Committee and approved by the Minister), which provide for payment of a minimum living allowance to stevedores unemployed because of lack of work in the port. Owing to absenteeism, demand for labour had, for some time, been greater than supply; and the Unemployment Insurance Fund had refused to pay the minimum living allowance to workers unemployed when demand for labour exceeded supply. Absentees, who "counted on the solidarity of ill-informed fellow-workers," declared M. Troclet, were responsible for the strike. He warned the strikers that the Government would deal with them with the "utmost severity." In addition to the Minister's appeal, the strikers have been addressed by representatives of the Transport Union and of the Christian Transport Workers' Union, and by a Communist Deputy, but in vain (19th and 20th). On the 20th, the Prime Minister, M. Huysmans, received a deputation of stevedores. He promised an enquiry; but reminded the deputation that 16 food ships awaited unloading, adding that he would not tolerate the Food Minister's difficult task being made still more difficult by strikes "for which no trade union was willing to assume responsibility." Unloading was eventually begun by the military on the following day (21st).

FRANCE

The new Socialist interim government, acting upon the advice and information supplied by M. Robert Schuman (see last week's Summary), is presenting the budget proposals for the first three months of 1947 to the National Assembly in two parts. The Assembly adopted on the 22nd December those proposals which are of immediate urgency, including an article providing for the dismissal on the 1st February, 1947, of 50,000 temporary and auxiliary civil servants, and arrangements for dealing with tax evasion. Military credits amounting to 40 milliard fr. were voted, also for the first three months of 1947. This shows no reduction on the expenditure planned for 1946, but is in fact 30 per cent. lower than the rate of actual military expenditure last year. The less urgent proposals will be presented by the Minister of Finance and National Economy in the form of a law to be debated in January. The Assembly also voted a bill re-establishing the principle of collective bargaining, the value of which is mainly psychological, to mark the return, in theory, to a peace-time régime. To meet the exigencies of the period of reconstruction and recovery, such bargaining will not be valid except with the express approval of the Minister of Labour, and will not for the present affect the Government's responsibility for fixing wages and prices.

After the appointment by the National Assembly of 42 Councillors of the Republic, according to the numerical importance of the party groups in the Assembly itself (see Summary No. 372), the balance of forces in this second Chamber remains the same, except for a slight proportionate increase in right-wing representation; Communists and M.R.P. each received 12 seats, Socialists 7, R.D.G. 5, P.R.L. 3, other right-wing parties 2, Independent Moslems 1. The remaining 8 councillors to be chosen by the Assembly will be appointed later on a different basis; 5 will represent Frenchmen in the protectorates and 3 Frenchmen living abroad. The 44 councillors from the overseas territories, distinct from the overseas departments, have not yet been elected.

The inaugural session of the Council of the Republic, held on the 24th December, was devoted to a speech by its doyen, the Radical Socialist ex-Senator, M. Gasser. He urged the council to bear in mind the lessons of the past and not to fear unpopularity, but to state clearly present necessities and future dangers. His references to the fashion, since the liberation, of denouncing the conservatism of the Senate, and to the present importance of party discipline, were not to the taste of his left-wing colleagues, and the Communists especially gave his speech a cool reception. Two days later M. Champetier de Ribes, M.R.P. candidate, was elected President of the Council of the Republic, but not before two unsuccessful attempts had necessitated the withdrawal of the Socialist and R.D.G. candidates. The Socialists then voted with the Communists, while the R.D.G. voted with the Right groups for the M.R.P. candidate.

At the end of last week, shortly after the Communist Party's central committee had issued a communiqué denouncing "the intrigues of the reaction" in favour of a President of the Republic who is an "enemy of the constitution," General de Gaulle made it clear in a reply to questions put to him by press representatives that he stood firm in his decision not to serve under the present "exclusivist régime of the parties" and the constitution which perpetuates it: he refused to "preside impotently over the impotence of the State." Left-wing opinion is relieved of its anxiety; the Right parties and the Radicals are loud in their approval of the General's reasons for declining to stand for office; only the M.R.P. who, although popularly regarded as his "own" party, cannot deny that they form an important part of that "exclusivist régime" which he condemns, are disappointed by his decision. Two names continue to be mentioned for the presidency: the Radical-Socialist leader M. Herriot, whose recent support of the Communist claim for a National Defence portfolio may have assured their support, and the Socialist President of the National Assembly, M. Vincent Auriol.

M. Moutet, Minister for Overseas France, Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu, High Commissioner for Indo-China, and General Leclerc, until last July Commander-in-Chief of the French forces in Indo-China, arrived last week in Saigon. (See under "Far East.") The Minister, who, with M. Blum, gives his full support to Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu, hopes to re-establish an atmosphere favourable for the resumption of Franco-Annamese relations. In this he could not have a more satisfactory colleague than General Leclerc, who has the respect and confidence of French and Annamese alike. General Leclerc will report to the French Government on the military situation.

The question of the future of Cochinchina remains crucial, and the chief hope of the French, once order has been restored, appears to lie in the possible emergence of some well-led section of the Annamese nationalists, with a less fanatical concern for the inclusion of Cochinchina in Viet-Nam than M. Ho Chi Minh, with whom as head of the Viet Minh party now in power the French have hitherto negotiated.

An agreement for the suppression of visas between France and Algeria, on the one hand, and Great Britain and Northern Ireland on the other, will come into force on the 1st January, 1947.

SPAIN

Sir Victor Mallet arrived at a London air port on Christmas Day after a 24-hour hold-up in Spain due to bad weather. H.M. Ambassador has been withdrawn from Madrid in accordance with the recommendation in the Resolution on relations between Spain and the United Nations adopted by the General Assembly on the 12th December (see Summary No. 373).

It is impossible as yet to get any clear picture of reactions in a Spain still vibrating from the effects of the sudden fall of the sword of Damocles suspended so long over the head of the Spanish Government. General Franco with his usual luck has been able to cover up a little of the obvious disquiet of his Government under a spate of what Mr. Polly would call "verboojuice." This particular red herring has been provided for him in the shape of the recent U.P. and A.P. reports attributed to "an authoritative Government source" published in New York on the 18th December under a London date-line to the effect that the "British Diplomatic Mission in Spain was engaged in the unusual task of contacting various political groups with a view to supplanting Franco" (and that it would not be surprising if the United States were doing the same thing). The reports referred also to the possibility of Army support for an interim Government set up by right and left wing "centrists" to hold the fort in Spain until elections could be held.

H.M. Ambassador paid a farewell visit to the Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 21st December. Aware that a Spanish Note of protest was in the offing and suspecting that Señor Artajo was waiting his chance to produce it, Sir Victor took the initiative and seized this last opportunity to make clear beyond all doubt that this was the end—the Spanish people must now do their part to clear out Franco or commit social and economic suicide. Señor Artajo, rather wanly and without much conviction, replied that he could not be expected to be disloyal to his Chief. He attempted to minimise the validity of the United Nations Resolution by pointing to the abstention from voting of such countries as Canada, South Africa and Egypt, and the pressure brought to bear on many smaller Latin American countries, from whom, Señor Artajo said, he had since received messages attempting to explain and to justify their attitude. Señor Artajo then mentioned the "unparalleled and impressive demonstrations" which had taken place in all the principal cities throughout the country: the Spanish people were behind the Government in defending the national dignity, the feeling was perfectly genuine—whether the demonstrations (as H.M. Ambassador had asserted) had been organized or not. General Franco had been recognized at the close of the civil war by every country save Mexico and the Soviet Union—why had the nations changed their tune? The Generalissimo's war record was better than that of M. Stalin who by his famous pact with Germany had precipitated the war. What had happened at New York in relation to pressure from the Soviet Union, Señor Artajo thought, was dangerously akin to the attitude taken by the Western Powers towards Hitler in 1938. He was very pessimistic about the future of the world. And so forth and so on. H.M. Ambassador pointed out that Russia had fought with the Allies while Franco had been abetting the Axis—it was such openly-expressed axophilia which damned him with all sections of the British public. Señor Artajo then went on to add that the Resolution of the General Assembly was simply another check on General Franco's plans for liberalising the régime. But he was glad to say that General Franco, undeterred, intended to press on with the process of "evolución." Only the day before he had taken steps to ensure that the period of the "amnesty" should be prolonged so that Spanish emigrés slow to make up their minds might still return to the homeland. The Generalissimo was considering further steps.

Finally Señor Artajo produced a draft of the Spanish note verbale which, he said, H.M. Ambassador would probably be receiving that same day. He regretted having to bring up such a disagreeable subject at their last meeting, but he had no alternative in view of the extensive publicity given to the agency messages in the world press. The draft expressed, as was to be expected, the Spanish Government's profound surprise at "this incredible revelation." Reports had been received repeatedly of H.M. Embassy's contacts with persons attempting to overthrow the present régime, but the Spanish Government had always preferred to accept the explanation given to them. After a hasty perusal of the draft H.M. Ambassador said that he would await its receipt and H.M. Government's comments before making any formal reply. But the charges were ludicrous—H.M. Government's policy had always been one of strict non-intervention in Spanish internal affairs, and every Ambassador met a number of people of all shades of opinion in the course of his normal routine and social round. He himself had met a great many important and interesting people, both Monarchists and Republicans, who did not hesitate to declare their strong opposition to the present régime. Señor Artajo then pointed out a passage in the draft which alleged that the U.S. Government had already refuted the imputations of Ambassadorial plotting—he hoped that H.M. Government would publish a similar denial. For very good reasons H.M. Government are not in favour of issuing a public statement on the matter, but H.M. Chargé d'Affaires has been instructed to send a formal communication to the Minister of Foreign Affairs rebutting the charges of undiplomatic conduct.

The Spanish Foreign Minister must, of course, keep up appearances, though H.M. Ambassador has reported that not once during the interview did Señor Artajo put up a serious defence for the Caudillo personally. Furthermore Sir Victor Mallet in the course of visits to other high officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was struck by their apparent agreement that the present situation was now impossible and that General Franco must go.

ITALY

The President of the Council, Signor De Gasperi, has been invited by the U.S. Government to visit America early in the New Year. Subjects of interest to both countries are to be discussed, including the resumption of normal trade relations. During his visit Signor De Gasperi may address the Council on Foreign Relations, a body with interests similar to those of our Royal Institute of International Affairs, at a forum to be held at Cleveland. Signor De Gasperi expects to be back in Italy by the middle of January.

Signor Nenni, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received a formal invitation to visit this country, but will not be able to arrive before the 20th January owing to Signor De Gasperi's absence in the U.S.A.

The Italian Trade Delegation has now returned to Italy after concluding its talks with the Board of Trade on ways and means of resuming normal trade relations between the two countries. The Italian Delegation stressed the necessity of saving their sterling resources for those raw materials and semi-manufactured goods essential to Italy's industrial recovery and as coming in this category, the British Delegation mentioned rubber, wool, cotton and petroleum products which should be available against payment in sterling. No formal Trade Agreement was signed since these talks were initiated to discover the most practical ways of resuming normal commercial and industrial relations. It was agreed, however, to set up a committee of officials of both Governments to meet when necessary in order to review the situation, help in the solution of any difficulties which may arise and to consider any further measures which may become necessary as trade relations develop. Dr. Mascia, the Head of the Italian Delegation, is reported as having said that the establishment of this committee was considered by experts to be of greater importance than the signing of a formal Trade Agreement.

Following a meeting at the Prefecture of Bari, attended by the Minister Cingolani, two Under-Secretaries and Signor Rapelli, Secretary of the Italian General Confederation of Labour (C.G.I.L.), the general strike was brought to an end. Emergency Food supplies, greater assistance to the unemployed and the immediate undertaking of public works were promised, and Signor Cingolani also promised to inform the Cabinet of the unanimous desire of the region to start work on irrigation schemes both in Apulia and in Lucania. Disturbances began with an attack on the Prefecture while a delegation of unemployed was presenting a demand for a large increase in unemployment allowance. The disorder gradually developed until the police had to intervene, and shots were fired. Unemployment, which is acute throughout Apulia generally, with the consequent inability to buy sufficient food is the cause of the trouble.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Yugoslavia

Some of the delegates from North America to the Slav Congress in Belgrade remained behind after the close of the Congress to visit other parts of Yugoslavia. The American Senator Bubanj spoke in Ljubljana on his impressions of the country and assured his audience that American foreign policy would have to change once the "real facts" about Yugoslavia became known in the United States. A great welcome was given to some Canadian Slavs visiting Macedonia.

While Trieste has almost completely dropped out of the news Austria has become the focus of attention. The Austrian Government have been reviled in the Yugoslav Press for allowing a so-called "Committee of Experts" to publish a pamphlet proposing a frontier adjustment in the area of Maribor in favour of Austria, for staffing the Carinthian police with ex-Nazis, for offering Austrian nationality to a number of Volksdeutsche expelled from Yugoslavia, and for persecuting the Carinthian Slovenes. Of course, according to the familiar refrain, Yugoslavia does not want anything belonging to another, but she will not renounce one particle of what is hers (meaning in this case Carinthia).

The decision of the Security Council to send a committee of investigation to both sides of the northern frontier of Greece was not favourably received in Yugoslavia, where it was styled as insult and an injustice. The investigation should be conducted in Athens, it was stated, and not in peaceful Yugoslavia.

A Yugoslav Government official has admitted that 100 German technicians have accepted contracts of about four years' duration to work in Yugoslavia. Most of them will be employed on a five-year plan for electrification, but some are believed to have contracted to train Yugoslav specialists in the armaments industry.

The United States Reading-room in Belgrade has been reopened after lengthy negotiations, but on condition that nothing but purely cultural material may be displayed.

The text of the economic agreement with Albania of the 27th November which was ratified by the Yugoslav National Assembly on the 27th December has now been published. By this agreement the economies of the two countries are to be brought into line according to a common plan. The Albanian lek is to be equalised with the Yugoslav dinar. Yugoslavia undertakes to supply Albania with all the materials necessary for the reconstruction of the country. A proportionate circulation of currency is to be established and price levels co-ordinated. Customs frontiers and customs are abolished. The agreement is to last 30 years. A second economic agreement between the two countries was ratified on the same occasion, but the text was not published. General Djilas in presenting the texts for ratification pointed out that such an agreement with any country other than Yugoslavia would have reduced Albania to a state of vassalage, whereas, on the contrary, the present treaty actually guaranteed Albanian independence.

Greece

On the 20th December the Security Council finally agreed to send a commission to inquire into conditions on the frontiers between Greece and her neighbours. The commission will be representative of all the Governments at present composing the Security Council and will have authority to conduct its investigation in "northern Greece and such other parts of Greece, Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia as the commission considers should be included in its investigations." The commission is to be sent not later than the 15th January, but only the American members of it have yet been named.

Raids by bandits have continued and there have been further heavy casualties among the Greek gendarmerie. The amnesty law is having some effect in Thessaly where ill-equipped bandits are feeling the pinch of winter, but surrenders in Macedonia and Thrace have been few. A number of incidents have been reported from districts more remote from the frontier. This has given rise to a suggestion that the sponsors of the bandits are anxious to distract attention from the frontier itself in view of the approaching arrival of the commission of investigation. Left-wing agitators are trying to provide evidence to support the Slav contention at the Security Council meetings that Greece's troubles are to be ascribed not to foreign intervention but to Greek maladministration throughout the country.

Considerable publicity was given to a report that, on the 26th December, the commander of the Greek troops at Drama had threatened that rebels crossing the border "in retreat before the Greek army" would be pursued into Bulgarian territory. Official circles in Athens, however, were inclined to dismiss the story as "mere journalism" and stated that, even if the report were true, such a threat could merely be the outcome of one commander's personal exasperation at seeing his quarry escape him and must not be interpreted as an expression of Greek Government opinion.

Before M. Tsaldaris left the United States he discussed Greece's economic difficulties with the State Department. On his return to Athens he made a statement to the Press that he had been assured that the U.S. Government would explore all possibilities of rendering immediate and long-term economic assistance to Greece. A communiqué to the same effect was given out in Washington on the 25th December. An economic mission headed by Mr. Paul Porter is to leave for Athens during January.

Despite M. Tsaldaris' successful presentation of Greece's case to the Security Council and apparently also to the State Department, demands for a broadening of the Greek Government have continued during the parliamentary recess and will presumably have to be met now that the Premier has returned.

Albania

A long, evasive, truculent and entirely unsatisfactory reply to His Majesty's Government's note of the 9th December was received on the 21st from the Albanian Government through their Chargé d'Affaires at Belgrade. They refuse to acknowledge any offence or to make any apology, and they reject completely H.M. Government's demand for compensation and reparation. The definition of the channel as an international waterway is not accepted, and H.M. Government's charges are all either denied or ignored. Pretending that they are themselves only too anxious to respect international law, the Albanian Government once more argue that the British warships were not "on innocent passage" through the Corfu Channel and that their penetration into Albanian territorial waters was unauthorised and provocative. They also disclaim all responsibilty for the mines, alleging that these were laid by some third party—doubtless agents provocateurs: (the Greeks appear to be meant). How could the Albanian authorities have been capable of laying mines in the channel, says the note, when they were considered to be unable to sweep it themselves by the Central Mines Clearance Board?

H.M. Government are now considering whether to invoke Article 39 of the United Nations Charter or the less grave Article 34. The latter empowers the Security Council to "investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute." Article 39, on the other hand, is concerned with "the existence of any threat to peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression." The more moderate course is the likelier.

The text of the economic agreement concluded between Albania and Yugoslavia on the 27th November and referred to in Summary No. 373 was published by the Albanian telegraph agency on the 28th December. The principal points agreed upon are given above under "Yugoslavia." At the time of its ratification at Tirana on the next day the Albanian Minister of National Economy is reported to have announced that it would now be possible for work to be begun during 1947 on constructing a railway system—something which Albania has hitherto lacked, apart from a primitive line connecting Tirana with Durazzo. One project would link Valona with the Yugoslav system at Bitolj (Monastir) and so connect up eventually with Salonica. Another scheme aimed at linking Tirana and Durazzo with the Yugoslav system further north.

Bulgaria

One of the three Opposition newspapers, the Democrats' organ Zname, has been permanently suppressed. An official statement issued on the 24th December said that in spite of repeated warnings the paper had continued to publish tendentious articles misrepresenting the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia and other friendly countries, and had tried to poison relations between them and Bulgaria. This may be interpreted without much difficulty. Offence was undoubtedly given to the authorities by a series of articles in Zname seeking to prove (with supporting quotations from Russian ethnologists) that the Bulgarian-speaking Macedonians—whom Marshal Tito proposes to detach—are not a separate nation apart. Another article, which perhaps annoyed the Government still more, hinted that the continued presence of the Soviet Army of Occupation was scarcely helping Bulgaria to settle down, and implied that her present rulers owed their authority less to popular support than to Russian backing. (Everybody, of course, knows this to be true.) It may be remarked that when it is a case of even really slanderous attacks in Government party newspapers against Great Britain or the United States—as when, for example, Trud (7th December) published a scurrilous cartoon depicting Mr. Bevin as Hitler and Mr. Byrnes as Mussolini—no official action whatever is taken, and General Biryusov doubtless grins as broadly as anyone.

The trial, for "treason," of General Popov and his 26 "fellow-conspirators" was due to begin at Sofia on the 30th December (see Summary No. 373). To offset this, an amnesty list was approved by the Cabinet on the 17th, under which 407 (mostly quite obscure) political prisoners and 94 criminals are to be set at liberty—for the time being at least—early in January. The trial of the 22 leading Social Democrats arrested 2 months ago, directly after the elections, has again been postponed. It is now announced that M. Lulchev himself is, after all, to stand his trial with the rest (see Summaries Nos. 367 and 371).

According to a statement broadcast from Sofia on the 18th December, apparently on official authority, the total strength of the Bulgarian army has been reduced already to 64,159, including 7,600 frontier guards (but naturally not the militia). The treaty allows Bulgaria a land army of 55,000 men, including frontier troops, and besides this 1,800 anti-aircraft personnel.

M. Yordan Bozhilov, Minister of Trade and Supply, is to lead a delegation to Moscow very soon to negotiate a new trade agreement with the U.S.S.R. for 1947.

Turkey

On the 4th December the Grand National Assembly authorised the prolongation for another six months of the state of siege in the six vilayets in European Turkey and on the Asiatic shores of the Straits. By virtue of the exceptional powers thus conferred on the military authorities the Government proceeded on the 17th December to nip a Communist movement in the bud. The so-called "Socialist Party of Turkish Workers and Peasants" and the "Turkish Socialist Party" together with affiliated clubs were all suppressed. Some forty Left extremists were arrested, and the offices of half-a-dozen mushroom newspapers, whose Communist sentiments were with little doubt inspired by the Soviet Embassy, were closed down after mounting public indignation had led to student demonstrations against them. The Cabinet, who were perhaps influenced by the encouraging news from Azerbaijan, appear to have taken these steps after an all-night sitting. An obviously well-informed article in Akşam explained in unveiled terms the reasons for the Government's action. The two parties which were suppressed, it said, were working in Russian interests to overthrow the Turkish Government by force and to set up a Communist régime; the documents seized, especially those in Russian, proved that the object of the movement was to turn Turkey into a second Bulgaria and hand the Straits over to Russia; everything was allowed in Turkey, the article concluded, except selling the country to a foreign Power. Communism and Fascism being both forbidden in Turkey, the Government gave their action an air of impartial legality by suspending at the same time two extreme Right papers, of which one was a daily of Fascist tone and the other a Pan-Turanian weekly. Ignoring this sop Russian broadcasts denounced the suppression of the Communist movement as reactionary repression.

The Soviet Government were informed on the 28th November that H.M. Government adhered to the opinion that there was no longer any purpose in direct correspondence about the Straits between each of the three Governments and Turkey, and that further discussion on this subject should be at an international conference. It remains to be seen whether the failure of a movement obviously designed to lead to the establishment in Turkey of a pro-Russian Government will make the Kremlin any less insistent on dealing with Turkey by herself.

Recent debates in the Grand National Assembly have shown the difficulty of introducing anything like a parliamentary spirit among immature politicians now that there is a substantial Opposition. By a narrow majority the Government obtained the invalidation of the election of a Democrat, on the ground that in 1920 he had refused Mustafa Kemal's call to the War of Independence—a heinous offence. A Democrat leader retorted that he could name members of the Republican People's Party who were guilty of the same thing, and two days later a newspaper accused M. Şükrü Saracoğlu, the former Prime Minister, and two former Ministers. This caused a great stir, more charges and counter-charges, and a further embitterment of the relations between the two parties. Finally, the Prime Minister, when replying to the Democrats' criticism of the budget, characterised some of them as "revolutionary-minded" and one gentleman as "neuropathic," and the Democrats marched out of the Chamber. Visits to the President of the Republic ensued, and on the 27th December an official statement expressed the regret of President Inönü (who is leader of the Republican People's Party) that one party felt itself aggrieved, his conviction that mutual respect and good will existed and his desire that the normal work of Parliament might be resumed. Though normally phlegmatic, the Turks have yet to learn not to be carried away in the heat of debate. President Inönü, while anxious for a united front against external dangers, was no doubt prompted to intervene by his well-known desire for the two-party system to develop successfully.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Hopes of an agreement between His Majesty's Government and the Egyptian Government over the interpretation of the Sudan Protocol appear to be as far from realisation as ever. Sidky Pasha's incorrect picture of his conversations in London, and the antidote supplied in the Governor-General's statement of the 7th December (see Summary No. 372), have resulted in the importance of the termination of the appointment of the Grand Qadhi, an Egyptian, and his replacement by a Sudanese, being unduly magnified in Egyptian eyes. A question on the subject has been asked in the Senate, and in conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador Nokrashy Pasha, in spite of his knowledge of the facts, has made a strong appeal for the decision to be revoked. He, in common with other Egyptian politicians, charges the Sudan administration and the Governor-General in particular with encouraging separatist ideas amongst the Sudanese, and with using their position in the Sudan to obstruct the fulfilment of Egyptian aspirations. The fact that two other high legal posts hitherto held by British officials are now being taken over by Sudanese is unlikely to alter their view. It is, in fact, difficult to believe that Egyptians give more than lip-service to the idea of Sudanisation.

Both Nokrashy Pasha and King Farouk (in an audience granted to His Majesty's Ambassador on the 26th December) believe that the solution of the Sudan question rests with His Majesty's Government. Nokrashy Pasha has expressed the hope that His Majesty's Government might authorise a statement to the effect that they had no intention of encouraging the Sudan to separate from Egypt, and that if it eventually chose to remain united with Egypt they would place no obstacle in the way and would be happy to see this happen. Nokrashy's own claims of the permanency of the Union between the two countries make it unlikely that the Egyptian Government will be ready to make an equally clear declaration of neutrality, in spite of Sidky Pasha's agreement in London that the Sudanese have an inherent right to independence under the United Nations Charter, which governs the whole of the Treaty.

Saiyid Abdur Rahman al Mahdi has returned to Khartoum from London, and on the 29th December said that he had an assurance from Mr. Attlee that His Majesty's Government recognise the right of the Sudanese to decide their own future. His statement has been attacked in the Egyptian press; the Saut al Umma (Wafdist) professes to regard it as repeating the Governor-General's challenge to Egypt, and wonders why Mr. Attlee should allow a person with no official status to make such an important statement on his behalf.

On Christmas Eve six bombs were thrown in various places in Cairo, including one in the Anglo-Egyptian Union. There were no British casualties, but three Egyptians were injured. Three arrests were made; all three were Muslim Brethren.

Syria

As not infrequently happens in the Levant States, public rumour of the Cabinet's resignation preceded the event by some days (see Summary No. 372). On the 21st December it was announced that the President had accepted the resignation of the Cabinet, and a week later, on the 28th December, Jamil Mardam had formed a new Government. The members are as follows:—

Prime Minister, Interior and Health: Jamil Mardam.
Foreign Affairs: Naim Antaki.
Finance: Sa'id al Ghazzi.
Defence: Ahmad Shurabati.
Education: Emir Adil Arslan.
National Economy: Hikmat al Hakim.
Justice and Public Works: Adnan Atassi.

It had previously been stated in the press that Jamil Mardam was forming a new political party, which was said to be receiving some support from prominent people.

The Syrian Government are proposing to reorganise their army and to reduce the total numbers from 9,000 to 6,000 men. The new army will be based upon three armoured car regiments, and should provide a reasonably efficient and mobile force for the maintenance of order.

Iraq

Nuri Pasha's new Cabinet, which was formed at the beginning of December, is composed as follows:—

Prime Minister and Acting Minister for the Interior: Nuri Pasha as Sa'id.
Finance: Salih Jabr.
Foreign Affairs: Dr. Fadhil al Jamali.
Defence: Shakir Mahmud al Wadi.
Supply: Muhammad Hadid.
Economics: Baba Ali.
Justice: Omar Nadhmi.
Education: Sadiq al Bassam.
Social Affairs: Jamil Abdul Wahhab.
Communications and Works: Ali Mumtaz al Daftari.

The hopes which had been expressed that this coalition Government heralded a new era in 'Iraqi politics have been short-lived. By the 23rd December Muhammad Hadid and Ali Mumtaz were threatening to leave the Cabinet and to boycott the elections on the ground that they were being rigged by Salih Jabr with the Prime Minister's connivance.

Muhammad Hadid comes of a wealthy Mosul family, and graduated from London University with an Honours Degree in Economics, and returned to 'Iraq in 1931. He was elected deputy for Baghdad in 1937, and when Parliament was dissolved he went into business. On the recent formation of political parties he returned to politics and became deputy leader of the left-wing Hizb al Watani al Demokrati (National Democratic Party).

Ali Mumtaz graduated from the Law College in Baghdad, and entered Government service about 1918. His first important post was Director-General of Revenues. He was appointed Minister of Finance in October, 1941, by Nuri Pasha, and again held the Finance portfolio in December, 1943.

One of the first acts of Nuri's Cabinet was to drop all the cases brought against newspaper editors by the Umari administration. Nuri Pasha outlined his programme at a press conference on the 4th December, making a plea for co-operation in internal policy, and pointing out that party government as it is known in some countries is not possible in 'Iraq. As regards external policy, the safety and interest of the country must come first, and Nuri Pasha, with some courage on the eve of the elections, said that 'Iraq would align itself where its national interests were likely to be best served, i.e., with Great Britain.

Palestine

The World Zionist Congress at Basle completed its work in the early hours of Christmas Day. The most important decision taken by the Congress was a resolution, approved by 171 votes to 154, that "in existing circumstances the Zionist movement will not participate in the London Conference. If a change should take place in the situation the General Council of the Zionist Organisation will consider the matter and decide whether to participate in the Conference or not."

This decision represents a victory for the large group of American Zionists who accept the leadership of Dr. Abba Hillel Silver over the supporters of Dr. Weizmann: and although Dr. Weizmann appeared at the Congress to have lost none of his personal popularity, there were other signs that politically he had lost ground. A good deal of support was given to a proposal to appoint him Honorary President of the Zionist Organisation, and to reserve the active President's place for some more radical figure. Dr. Weizmann not unnaturally refused to accept a nominal appointment of this nature, and the Congress dispersed without having elected a President. There was equally a failure to elect the new Executive, and powers to do so were delegated by the Congress to the "Actions Committee." Some changes in the membership of the Executive are to be expected; in particular it is likely to reflect the greatly-increased influence of the American Zionists.

In addition to the decision not to participate in the London Conference, the Congress approved resolutions reaffirming the Biltmore Programme (which demands the transformation of Palestine into a Jewish Commonwealth), condemning the 1939 White Paper and rejecting the Morrison autonomy plan, which was described as unacceptable even as a basis for discussion.

Reaction among the Jews in Palestine has not been altogether favourable to the proceedings of the Basle Congress. There appears to be a feeling of uneasiness at the increased influence of the American Zionists, and, specifically, the Jewish Press has criticised the Congress for its failure to decide the question of the Presidency, for its inconclusive bargaining about the constitution of the new Executive, and for its failure to put forward a clear-cut political programme.

His Majesty's Government have proposed that the London Conference should be resumed on the 21st January and the Governments of the Arab States have been informed accordingly. In view of the Zionist decision not to attend, and the unco-operative attitude of the Palestinian Arabs, there is little prospect of a solution of the Palestine problem by agreement. The proposals of the Arab States' Governments, which aim at preserving a unitary State, are entirely unacceptable to the Zionists. The Palestinian Arabs (upon whom the Arab League are now exerting some pressure to send a delegation to London) have also found the proposals unsatisfactory, and have made acceptance of them conditional on (a) a reduction of the proportion of Jews to Arabs in the provisional Government from 1 Jew to 2 Arabs to 1 Jew to 6 Arabs; (b) the deletion of the clause empowering the High Commissioner to appoint the provisional Government, and (c) the incorporation of a provision placing an absolute restriction on the sale of land to Jews.

The prospects of the relatively peaceful interlude in Palestine continuing appear slender. Although the self-imposed "truce" declared by the terrorists has so far been broken only once, with the kidnapping and flogging of a British officer and British N.C.Os as a "reprisal" for a sentence of flogging on a Jewish terrorist, the illegal broadcasting station of the Irgun Zvai Leumi has threatened that the terrorist campaign will reopen unless the discussions of the Basle Congress prove to be a signal for general action by the Zionist movement.

There are also unmistakable signs of a mustering of forces on the Arab side The Arab Higher Committee, which functions from Cairo where the Mufti is still residing, have virtually severed their contacts with the Government of Palestine and are exploiting every opportunity to embarrass the administration and to incite popular feeling. The Mufti remains the dominant figure in Palestinian Arab politics, and his ascendancy leaves little scope for more moderate influences. The Arab Higher Committee have already addressed a memorial to the Palestine Government attributing to it any "evil consequences which may ensue as a result of the present immigration policy." There are signs that the Arab para-miliary youth movements Najjada and Futuwa are preparing to play a more active rôle in resisting Jewish immigration, and fears have been expressed in responsible Arab circles that a campaign against "traitors" (a reference to the more moderate Arabs) may start in the near future. Although, in spite of these indications, the danger of large-scale disturbances from the Arabs in the immediate future does not seem to be grave, there is, without doubt, a growing restiveness and increased dissatisfaction with the administration, principally on account of the continued admission of Jewish immigrants to Palestine. In this connection the announcement by His Majesty's Government that the cost of maintaining Jewish deportees held in Cyprus would be found out of Palestine funds has been badly received, and the Arab Higher Committee have threatened to cease paying taxes if the decision is carried into effect.

Persia

The situation in Azerbaijan is rapidly returning to normal. Public delight at the Central Government's victory appears to be still in evidence: on the 17th December students were reported to have assembled outside the Tabriz Town Hall, where, in front of a large crowd, they burnt text-books issued by the Azerbaijan Democrats. The Persian General Staff estimate that about 200–300 "Fidais" and others who had made themselves hated by their brutality were killed in Tabriz by outraged inhabitants before the arrival of Government troops. Dr. Javid, former Governor-General, and Shabastari, former President of the Provincial Council, have been sent under escort to Tehran, where they were placed under arrest. The officer commanding troops in Tabriz has announced that all those arrested for sabotage or other offences will be tried as early as possible by the military courts. Under Persian law persons sentenced by these courts are deprived for one year of all rights of appeal. General Kabiri, head of the Fidais, has already been condemned to death, and a similar sentence is expected to be pronounced on Ibrahimi, Azerbaijan Democrat Prosecutor-General.

Ali Mansur has now been appointed Governor-General of Azerbaijan, though Sadiq, Minister of Communications, was originally nominated to fill the post. Ali Mansur is generally considered to be the more suitable of the two, and news of his appointment has been received with considerable satisfaction in Tabriz. He has held his new post on a previous occasion, from April 1927 to January 1931. He was Prime Minister under Reza Shah from June 1940 until September 1941, when he resigned as the result of the Allied occupation of the country. From February 1942 until the autumn of 1945 he was Governor-General of Khorassan. While he held this post the Russians had considerable dealings with him and have no grounds for complaining that he has an anti-Russian record.

On the 20th December various Cabinet changes were announced. Nikpay and Farman Farmayan (see Summary No. 366) have resigned in order to stand as candidates for the Majlis. Aramish, Under-Secretary in the Ministry of Labour, becomes Minister of Labour and Propaganda, and Hakimi, Under-Secretary in the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs, replaces Nikpay. Ghulam Husain Farouhar, a senior official of the Ministry of Finance, becomes Minister of Communications. Homayunjah, Under- Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and Fariduni, Under-Secretary at the Ministry of the Interior, become acting Ministers of their respective Ministries.

On the 24th December Aramish made a statement on the discovery of a subversive plot in Mazanderan, engineered by the Tudeh. Small arms of all kinds, including machine-guns and hand grenades were found in the possession of factory workers. It is believed that their intention was to cut communications between the capital and Mazanderan and the other northern provinces. Owing to prompt action by the Government the insurrection was nipped in the bud.

The country having recovered its equilibrium after the Azerbaijan coup, there now seems to be good grounds for expecting the elections to begin very soon.

Inspectors have already left for the various constitutencies, and as soon as the newly appointed provincial administration is installed in Azerbaijan, instructions will be given for the elections to start. The officer commanding in Fars has, however, issued a proclamation to the effect that the elections will not begin until the principal places have been occupied by the security forces and all the arms taken from the troops and gendarmerie have been handed back to the military depots.

THE FAR EAST

China

On the 25th December China's first Constitution was adopted by the National Assembly in Nanking. The new Constitution is due to be promulgated on the 1st January and the date selected by the Assembly on which it is to come into force is the 25th December, 1947. This latter date was chosen in preference to the two other dates considered, the 10th October ("Double Tenth," China's national day, on which the first shot was fired for the Republic at Wuchang in 1911) and the 12th November (the birthday of the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the Founder of the Chinese Republic).

The text of the Constitution is not yet available, but a memorandum written by Dr. Wang Chung-hui was distributed to each of the delegates attending the final session of the National Assembly, in which the salient provisions of the Constitution were given as being:— the equality before the law of all persons, irrespective of sex, religion, race, class or party affiliation; universal suffrage and secret ballot;

the guarantee of personal liberties and rights;
the supremacy of the National Assembly as the organ of the people;
the election by the National Assembly for a term of six years of a President, who may be re-elected to serve one additional term only;
the composition of the five branches of the Government, the Executive Yuan, the Legislative Yuan, the Judicial Yuan, the Examination Yuan and the Control Yuan;
the relationship between the Executive and Legislative Yuan, in which the Executive Yuan is made responsible to the Legislative Yuan; clarification of the degree of authority vested in the Central and Provincial Governments, respectively;
local self-government under an electoral system for all provinces and counties (hsien); and that the interpretation of the Constitution shall rest with the Judicial Yuan.

Unless Dr. Wang's pamphlet, entitled "High Lights of China's Constitution" was intended to serve as a memento, the exact purpose of its distribution among the delegates is not clear, since they themselves have been concerned throughout the last six weeks in weighing, assessing and discussing all the provisions of the Constitution on which they were about to cast their vote. The draft—which in the end showed little change from the revised state in which it was presented for deliberation by the National Assembly on the 28th November—had been severely criticised by the more liberal element in the Assembly, who disliked the statement that the Republic is founded on the "three people's principles," which phrase, they claimed, branded it as an exclusively Kuomintang instrument. They also complained that in this draft the Executive Yuan was not made sufficiently responsible to the Legislative Yuan; that it vested too much power in the President; made it too easy to deprive the people of their rights; and contained insufficient provision for local autonomy. The reactionary elements in the Kuomintang, on the other hand, drew a stern rebuke from their leader for their determined efforts to introduce amendments calculated to preserve, under a superficial coating of democracy, that dominating power which their party had enjoyed throughout its eighteen years of political sway. Indeed it was due almost entirely to General Chiang's firm, albeit undemocratic, stand that no change was made in any of the fundamental principles of the revised draft and that its adoption by unanimous vote followed an almost uninterrupted third and final reading.

President Chiang Kai-shek accepted the Constitution on behalf of the Government and in a short speech promised that immediate steps would be taken to implement the "interim measures" agreed upon by the National Assembly for the gradual replacement of the existing one-party rule.

In the meantime renewed efforts are afoot to entice both the Democratic League and the Communists to resume negotiations. Already it is claimed that there are signs that the League leaders, who played an important rôle in the revision of the original Kuomintang draft Constitution, might welcome a renewed invitation to take part in a Government which is intended to undergo immediate reorganisation on an all-party basis. Encouraged by the categorical denial by the Communist spokesman, Wang Ping-nan, of rumours that his party was about to set up a rival "National Assembly" and that an independent draft Constitution was in the course of preparation, renewed hopes of a reconciliation with the Communist Party are also germinating. Plans were formulated by General Chiang Kai-shek for the despatch of a peace delegation to Yenan with proposals for the immediate resumption of negotiations. Unfortunately news of General Chiang's intention found its way prematurely into the press. It is suspected that this embarrassing leakage was deliberately engineered by some of the reactionary members of the Kuomintang in the hope that the project would be nipped in the bud. Be this as it may, the news was rudely received in Yenan, where the Communists announced that any such advance would be quite useless since the Government were not prepared to dissolve the National Assembly and agree to a return to the military positions of January 1946. Nevertheless, it is confidently expected that General Chiang will persist in his intention to send a representative to Yenan with instructions to base a final appeal on the ground that a Constitution has been adopted in conformity with the Political Consultative Council resolutions; that the Executive Yuan is about to be broadened to include those who are individually most qualified, irrespective of party; and that a State Council will be set up in which seats will be reserved for the delegates of both the Communist Party and the Democratic League. The Communists are concerned to keep the situation fluid lest the United States Government should decide to throw the whole weight of American support on the side of the Nanking Government. To this end their representatives in Nanking have asserted that not only have they no desire to shut out American mediation, but hope that General Marshall may see his way to continue his efforts. But it is felt that they have little desire to effect an actual settlement with the Kuomintang and that, therefore, they are certain to reject General Chiang Kai-shek's contemplated appeal. Indeed, according to a press report of the 30th December, the Yenan spokesman Chou En-lai, in commenting on President Truman's recent statement on United States policy in China, reiterated that peace talks with the Nanking Government could be resumed only if the two essential conditions already made known to them were fulfilled.

On the 18th December, President Truman re-stated American policy toward China. He made it clear that the United States intends to persevere in the policy expressed in his statement of the 15th December, 1945; and he stressed that "it was a matter of deep regret that China had not yet been able to achieve unity by peaceful methods," but that, despite the fact that negotiations had been broken off by the Communists, his special representative, General Marshall, would remain there because of the seriousness of the problem and the importance of reaching a solution. "The United States" he said "stands ready to help China as she moves toward peace and a genuine democratic government." President Truman traced the reasons that had governed the stationing of American troops in China and pointed out that while last year these forces in China were large—"they had to be"—(113,000), today they were being reduced to less than 12,000.

Far from a cessation of fighting, it seems obvious that the state of full-scale civil war interrupted by General Chiang Kai-shek's cease-fire order of the 11th November, has been resumed with considerable vigour. According to recent reports, Government forces are engaged in major operations in northern Kiangsu where large pockets of Communist troops are said to be threatening their lines of communication. There is also extensive military activity in Hopei, in the vicinity of Paoting. Communist forces are closing in on the northern section of the Peiping–Hankow Railway with Paoting as their primary objective, and Government forces in this area are said to be holding their positions with difficulty. In Manchuria, too, the Communists are assuming the initiative and threatening the railway between Changchun and Kirin. In some quarters it is thought that the Government are about to launch a really large expedition with the object of liquidating the Communist forces in Shantung and Manchuria and that the ports of Chinwangtao and Tsingtao, which have been declared closed to foreign shipping, are to be used as bases for this expedition. No explanation of the closing of these two ports, however, is known to have been furnished in official quarters.

French Indo-China (see also under "France")

Attacks launched on the 19th December by the Viet-Nam Army on all French garrisons in Tonking and Northern Annam suggest that hotheads in the Viet-Minh Party have temporarily gained the upper hand. It is difficult to believe that they seriously expected to win complete independence by force of arms, but they may have hoped to force the pace. Several days before the outbreak the Viet-Nam Government withdrew from the capital, Hanoi, to Hadong, 6 miles south-west.

North of the 16th parallel, which formed the dividing line between Chinese and S.E.A.C. forces when Indo-China was first re-occupied, French garrisons at Hanoi, Langson, Huë, Tourane and elsewhere have been hard pressed but are reported to have the situation under control. Only at Vinh a French force was compelled to surrender in order that the lives of local residents might be saved. Reinforcements are on their way out from Europe, and General Leclerc, who has gone out to study the situation, has arrived in Saigon.

Admiral d'Argenlieu, the High Commissioner, and M. Moutet, Minister for Overseas Territories, have, since their arrival in Saigon, made it clear that the French authorities will not submit to violence nor will they be bound by conventions that the other side violates. So far, therefore, from accelerating a settlement, Viet-Nam action seems to have set the clock back. A statement by M. Moutet at an official dinner that "we are sure that your young Government (the Provisional Government of Cochin-China) will acquire the necessary authority and penetrate deeply among the peoples it is destined to lead" is significant: the proposed referendum that was to decide the future of Cochin-China seems to have receded further than ever into the background.

For their part the Viet-Nam Government seem to have become doubtful of the wisdom of the course they were pursuing, for they have been broadcasting suggestions of a resumption of negotiations for several days past. Present indications, however, are that the existing Viet-Nam Government is hopelessly discredited in French eyes.

Rumours from China also say that a group of Annamite exiles in Nanking reported to hold more moderate views, but not commanding sufficient support in Viet-Nam, and also two pro-Chinese parties who opposed Viet-Minh at the elections, are putting out peace feelers, and indicate that some sections at least of Viet-Nam opinion are willing to come to terms with the French. None seems, however, to have a leader in any way comparable with M. Ho Chi Minh. The High Commissioner mentioned in conversation with H.M. Consul-General at Saigon that the possibility of the reinstatement of the ex-Emperor Bao Dai, formerly a member of M. Ho Chi Minh's Government, should not be overlooked.

A Viet-Nam broadcast has been calling on the Cochin-Chinese to rise but the territory remains calm, though as a precautionary measure curfew has been declared.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

As the present year, with its record of industrial unrest, draws to a close in the United States there is still anxiety regarding the bid which organised labour is making for substantial wage increases in 1947. A further indication of what that bid is likely to involve was provided by Mr. Philip Murray on the 18th December, after the executive boards of the three major C.I.O. unions—the automobile, steel and electrical workers—had met in Pittsburgh to "co-ordinate strategy." Mr. Murray announced that his own union, the United Steel Workers of America, would ask for a guaranteed annual wage, for the provision of medical and retirement funds and for the recognition of the workers' right to "portal-to-portal" pay—i.e., pay for time spent on employer's premises while moving to and from work. (The steel workers and several other organisations are at the moment taking advantage of a Supreme Court ruling of last June on the Wage-Hour Act of 1938 to bring suits against industry for the recovery of an estimated 6,000 million dollars of such pay). Yet the fact that Mr. Murray and his union are apparently prepared to enter into negotiations with the employers next month without previously committing themselves to specific pay increases is taken in some quarters as a sign that a compromise will eventually be found and that there will be no repetition of last year's strikes. Mr. Murray has in fact stressed that there will be none. Mr. Walter Reuther has also intimated that he would be ready to modify his recent demand for a 23½ cents an hour increase for his United Automobile Workers if it could be shown conclusively that such an increase would necessitate a rise in prices. At the same time some of the other more reassuring aspects of the American industrial picture have been emphasised in the first report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers set up under the Employment Act of 1946. This predicts "great prosperity" in the New Year if there are no adverse developments such as another round of strikes or "international tension verging on war," and it holds out the hope of 1947 being followed by "some years of high production, employment and purchasing power."

The two weeks preceding the first meeting of the 80th Congress have witnessed growing interest in the 1948 Presidential campaigns, for which much of the coming activity on Capitol Hill is likely to serve, directly or indirectly, as a prelude. On the 17th December Mr. Harold Stassen caused surprise in some political circles by frankly announcing his candidature for the Republican nomination two years hence. He added that he was opening a Washington office in the New Year and that his main interest would lie in finding a policy to avert strikes, make restrictive labour legislation unnecessary and raise the standard of living of the much-neglected "white collar" workers. By his "courage" in thus defying the tradition which insists that Presidential ambitions be carefully concealed at so early a date in the political calendar the youthful ex-Governor of Minnesota has apparently enhanced his prestige among the Liberals of his party. His more guarded fellow-aspirants, on the other hand, are still maintaining the customary nolo episcopari pose. Senator Vandenberg stated on the 17th December that he was not a candidate for the Presidential nomination, adding that he "anticipated no campaign on his behalf." He also said that he would give up his present United Nations work in order to be able to devote himself more completely to Senate affairs, but he made it clear that he would continue to give his full support to Mr. Byrnes and that he would hold himself available for any further duties which the President or the Secretary of State might deem it essential for him to undertake. Mr. Dewey has refused to be drawn out on his Presidential aspirations, although his recent decision to support Representative Charles A. Halleck, a former follower of Mr. Willkie, for the key post of House Majority Leader has been taken to indicate a desire to participate in the shaping of Congressional policy so that the Republican record in both the House and the Senate may be an asset rather than an impediment to the party in 1948. On the Democratic side Mr. Truman is reported to regard himself as a candidate for the 1948 nomination, although when questioned on the subject at his press conference on the 18th December he replied that he had no comment.

Since the adjournment of the United Nations General Assembly in New York there has been a sharp decline in the volume of press and radio comment devoted to international affairs. Editors and broadcasters have in general expressed profound satisfaction that the Allied nations could celebrate the second Christmas of peace in such an unusual atmosphere of harmony and with the prestige of the United Nations Organisation, in the words of the New York Herald-Tribune, "at the highest point it has yet reached." Opinion is divided as to whether it has been Mr. Byrnes' policy of "patience combined with firmness" or the pressure of conditions at home that has induced the Soviets to make what another newspaper describes as "their first adventure in compromise" at Lake Success and the Waldorf Astoria. Mr. Walter Lippmann asserts that the agreements reached by the Foreign Ministers in any case merely "register an acceptance of the spheres of influence which were marked out when the victorious Soviet and Western Powers met." Yet further encouraging, though by no means conclusive, evidence of a change of heart in the Kremlin has been detected in M. Gromyko's acquiescence in the United States proposal for a special commission to investigate conditions on the northern frontier of Greece.

The curiosity of some newspapers regarding Anglo-American interests and intentions in the Antarctic, which was stirred at the beginning of the month by the departure of Admiral Byrd's large task force and by rumours of a race for uranium and oil deposits, has now been re-awakened by the announcement that Commander Finn Ronne, who accompanied the Admiral on two previous voyages to the South, is to take a small party of "scientists" to Marguerite Bay in the British possession of Graham Land. In a badly informed article of the 23rd December the New York Times suggested that His Majesty's Government had been requested by the State Department to withdraw one of the British parties at present in Graham Land—which has been defined by Letters Patent as British since 1908—to make way for Commander Ronne. It has been the subject of an official démenti in London, in which it has been pointed out—as it was previously pointed out—to Commander Ronne through the State Department in Washington—that, while every assistance would be given to any American party visiting the British station at Marguerite Bay, the supplies of seal meat available there would only be sufficient to feed a few more human beings and no more dogs. A further denial that the United States Government had asked for the removal of the British expedition was issued at his press conference on the 27th December by Mr. Dean Acheson, who also pointed out that, while the United States Government had never formally registered any claims in the Antarctic, they had not recognised any claims of other nations and had reserved all rights which the U.S. might have there. Meanwhile, Commander Ronne has called upon His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington and has explained that the purpose of his expedition to the Antarctic is solely scientific, and that it is not his intention to establish any territorial claim there. Nevertheless this present disclaimer of any political motives is difficult to reconcile with the fact that he himself left territorial "claim sheets" for the United States in the Marguerite Bay area in 1940.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

The United States Ambassador to Argentina has now returned to Washington for consultation, but no statement has been made up to the time of writing about a settlement with Argentina. This turns upon whether Mr. Messersmith can convince Mr. Byrnes that Argentine action against ex-enemy nationals and property has been sufficient. Just before his departure Mr. Messersmith saw President Perón, Dr. Bramuglia and Sr. Miranda, and when he complained of the delay in liquidating German firms, Sr. Miranda denounced the Junta de Vigilancia as corrupt and suggested that Axis property should be transferred to the Central Bank and thus to his own control. General Perón said that he had made his wishes plain, but had been disobeyed, and thereupon gave orders that the Central Bank should take over. With regard to the question of enemy aliens, it was resolved to send 30 of them who were under arrest straight to Hamburg and that the Argentine Government should announce the names of 22 others who were alleged to be hiding. Mr. Messersmith professed himself satisfied with this arrangement and convinced of General Perón's good faith. In fact, only 13 Germans sailed for Hamburg before Mr. Messersmith's departure, though Dr. Bramuglia gave a further assurance to H.M. Ambassador on the 23rd December that all the Germans in hiding would be arrested. A special Government Decree has since been passed naming the 52 Germans concerned and ordering their arrest and expulsion.

Meanwhile, Senators Vandenberg and Brewster, both Republicans, have made pronouncements in favour of normal relations with Argentina, and Mr. Braden's references to totalitarianism in the Americas in a recent broadcast were perhaps more guarded than usual. The contest between Mr. Messersmith and Mr. Braden may well take place soon after the meeting of Congress on the 4th January.

UNITED NATIONS

Atomic Energy Commission

In accordance with the request of the recent General Assembly the Atomic Energy Commission held a number of meetings in the last fortnight of December to make ready its report to the Security Council "by the end of the year." At the first of these meetings on the 17th Mr. Baruch in a brief speech formally moved the adoption of the United States proposals which have been the basis of the Commission's work, and the other delegates, with the exception of the representatives of the Soviet Union and Poland, gave their assent, Canada's representative, General McNaughton, however, securing approval for some modifications in the original wording. It was decided that the Baruch draft as amended should be incorporated in the Commission's report. At its meeting at Lake Success on Monday, the 30th December—the most important since the debate on the American proposals opened six months previously—the Baruch plan received ten affirmative votes, but the delegates of the Soviet Union and Poland abstained, and M. Gromyko made it plain that the Russians have not budged on their attitude of opposition to any scheme for the international control of atomic energy which should involve abrogation of the "rule of unanimity of the Great Powers," i.e., the veto. This outcome of six months' incubation cannot be said to be surprising, especially as the United States delegation had insisted, at a meeting of the Commission on the 5th December, not only on dotting the i's and crossing the t's of the proposal for an international authority outside the Security Council but also on specific provision for the abolition of the veto on action to be taken in respect of violations of such international control system as the nations might create by treaty. It was this last point on which the Russians stood absolutely firm.

The 30th December was Gromyko's day. Apart from moving the adoption of the draft report Mr. Baruch kept silence, and the other delegates made only brief interventions. The Russian delegate, speaking in English—which language he uses normally only when in the Chair—declared that the Soviet Union could not accept a plan which in their judgment contradicted the General Assembly's Resolution on disarmament and which virtually would have the effect of revising the United Nations charter—when the Assembly itself had now gone on record as opposing any revision of the veto power. The Atomic Energy Commission, he maintained, must necessarily take the Assembly's disarmament resolution as its basis, and there it was in black and white that the United Nations should be required to devise an international control system wholly "within the framework of the Security Council." In fact the disarmament resolution leaves the question of the veto and action in respect of violations open. The Baruch plan was "a retreat from the principle of unanimity" since, on its own authority, the Commission thereby was effecting a revision of the Charter by asking for "a voluntary relinquishment of the so-called veto." Sir Alexander Cadogan, taking up this point, argued that there was no real discrepancy between something done "within the framework of the United Nations" and "within the framework of the Security Council," since the greater included the less. But M. Gromyko had his instructions from Moscow—he had deliberately postponed speaking until he was fully briefed—and the only piece of good cheer that he contributed was to express the willingness of his delegation to debate in detail the Baruch proposals despite their "serious defects" so as to make "absolutely necessary corrections in them, having in mind the Draft Convention submitted by the Soviet Union in July!" (This was a reference to the Soviet plan for a convention to outlaw the use of atomic weapons and for the destruction of existing bombs which M. Gromyko had submitted to the meeting of the Commission on the 26th July—see Summary No. 353).

The same day, 30th December, was notable for the formal acceptance by the Commission of the report from its Scientific and Technical Committee (passed unanimously on the 26th September last) on the elaborate controls necessary to prevent the diversion of atomic energy to military purposes. An international atomic energy authority is envisaged operating under the Security Council, whose functions might range from keeping watch over uranium mines to the detection with the help of aerial surveys of illicit mining and the actual management of plants engaged in the later stages of the processing of atomic materials. The representative of the Soviet Union, Professor Alexandrov, was alone in refusing to discuss the project for aerial surveys.

GERMANY

The 1st January, 1947, marked the coming into force of the new bi-zonal economic arrangements, which will mean increased responsibility for Germans. At the same time the Anglo-U.S. economic policy boards began their work in Berlin, where they are likely to contrast by the speed of their deliberations with the protracted debates characteristic of Four-Power Committees at the highest level (although not always of the lower Directorates). By the 1st January the Laender in the British zone should have completed the assumption of the responsibilities granted to them under the new ordinance (see Summary No. 369), and on this date executive authority was given to Germans in the British sector of Berlin, thus bringing it into line with the system prevailing in the U.S. sector since March 1946. During the past two months new German Governments have been formed or elected throughout Germany (except in the Saar). These have sought to keep in line with the election results in the Assemblies or at lower levels, although the SED, for example, considerably strengthened its position in the Soviet zone. In most cases these Governments represent all the stronger parties, and only in Bremen and Hamburg, where the Christian Democrats have declined to join the cabinets, are there as yet genuine parliamentary oppositions. Despite the differences of structure and powers between these seventeen units the measure of responsibility in German hands is very real compared with the situation in January 1946. In the British zone in particular the next few months should provide a wider outlet for political activity hitherto directed largely into the channel of verbal criticism. There is, however, no sign that politicians in any quarter of the country enter the new year in a new spirit of give-and-take towards rival parties.

Ordinary Germans, gripped in a spell of icy weather, look at 1947 with numb apathy alternating with bitterness. In the British zone, where the new bi-zonal plans have not had time to take effect, anxiety about food, housing, fuel, dismantling prospects and financial reform, still holds first place. Although rations have in principle been pooled with those of the U.S. zone and have the same calorific value, there is bound to be discontent over the fact that the British zone ration for the next four weeks contains less meat and fats. In the U.S. zone, although conditions are not so acute, industry is also threatened by coal shortages. New Year messages from the East (which are intermingled with attacks on the bi-zonal arrangements as a means of Allied exploitation) seek to stress achievements in economic recovery and include appeals to the Germans to work as never before. This exhortation has been coupled in broadcasts over Leipzig radio with a rather surprising renewal of the theme of collective guilt which contrasts strongly with recent remarks by Herr Steltzer (see last week's Summary). The cry of misery and self-pity, however, creeps in even here. Dr. Paul of Thuringia, pleading for a conciliatory spirit at the Moscow talks, declared "soon we shall be at the end of our strength"; and the only hope for 1947 offered by Dr. Ostrowski, Lord Mayor of Berlin, is that "in its first half our plight will reach new depths and this will force upon us the decision that we must master our misery."

With the approach of peace treaty discussions, it is only natural that Germans who look beyond day-to-day difficulties are more than ever concerned with the problem of German unity; their reflections illustrate only too well some of the obstacles in the Treaty's path, quite apart from those of Allied disagreement. The Lord Mayor of Leipzig proclaimed with undue assurance on 31st December: "The coming year will bring us the Peace Treaty—a harsh peace. But it will go hand in hand with the establishment of a Reich Government and a unified administration." The new Bavarian premier, however, has already expressed his unwillingness to work for Berlin—although not opposing economic unity—whereas the leaders of the other two south German States show their eagerness to lead them back into the arms of the Reich. As early as the 27th November the Free Democrat organ Hamburger Freie Presse carried a pessimistic article fearing that if present trends persisted there would be no such thing as one treaty for the whole of Germany. The article contended that the East was being drawn away from German culture and tradition and that to bring it back a treaty in the name of the United Powers was necessary, however harsh. On the other hand, a writer in Die Welt of the 21st December takes the view that the absence of a central Government will not prejudice Germany's case at the peace conference. He concludes that the Allied Control Council has the power to put a peace treaty into effect on their own and that the Germans should retain a purely advisory rôle at this stage. He argues that it would be wiser not to burden the new democracy with the balance-sheet of the Nazi régime and reminds Germans of the blow suffered by the Weimar Republic through its responsibility for signing the Versailles Treaty.

As regards territorial losses, the picture is simpler. Adenauer has taken up Steltzer's declaration (see last week's Summary) and proclaimed in a New Year Message for re-settlers: "Tell them that no Christian Democratic politician will sign a peace treaty which recognises the Oder–Neisse Line . . . ." The SPD is not likely to seek political suicide by repairing this omission. The position of the SED, however, would appear to be veering again towards acceptance of the inevitable. Berliner Zeitung has now denied that the Eastern Frontier is merely provisional and on the 2nd January a Leipzig broadcast was directed against the Lebensraum theory. That this is likely to reflect the official party line is revealed in a private statement by one of its leading members some weeks ago. ". . . . If we were simply to accept the facts, we would appear as advocates of the separation—that would not benefit us. We must show the German people that there is only one solution: the destruction of Reaction and the guarantee of a truly democratic régime by the decision of the masses. Our living-space is not the space in which we live but our trade relations with other countries." The Allies can only applaud the admirable sentiment in the last sentence.

An important Trade Union Conference took place in Hanover on the 18th December under the auspices of the World Federation of Trade Unions. Delegates from all four zones represented some six million members (peak membership before 1933 was about eight million). The Communist-controlled Freie Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund supported by the WFTU was defeated by the Western trade unions in its attempt to gain control over all trades unions in Germany by establishing a central organisation in Berlin. It was merely resolved to hold regular meetings for consultation. But pressure by the FDGB will certainly continue and will probably come to a head next July when the WFTU will consider the question of readmitting German unions. A resolution criticising the denazification policy of the Western Occupying Powers was also rendered harmless by the efforts of the Western Unions. In the British zone these unions have enhanced their reputation over the Bode-Panzer strike. (See Summary No. 372.) Although started by the Communists, the Trades Unions later took the initiative and concluded negotiations to the satisfaction of the workers while preventing Communist-inspired sympathetic strikes in over one hundred other concerns.

An amnesty for Nazi small fry in the U.S. zone was announced by General McNarney on Christmas Eve. All minor offenders who did not profit financially from the régime or who are 50 per cent. disabled will be exonerated. It is estimated that this will apply to some 800,000 persons out of approximately 3,000,000 Germans liable for prosecution in the zone. Plans are also being prepared to speed up denazification in the British zone.

Changes in Christian Democratic leadership in Berlin and the Soviet zone may occur following an article in Telegraf of the 4th January accusing the Deputy-Chairman Ernst Lemmer of writing anti-Allied articles in the Belgian paper Le Soir which had come under Dr. Goebbels' influence. Damaging extracts are quoted, but Lemmer has denied that the reports which he transmitted expressed his own opinion and says that the CDU were well aware of his activities as a correspondent between 1933–1945. This is at best a dubious qualification for his present post, which was secured for him by the Russians after Hermes had been ousted. Lemmer is believed to have given the Russians confidential information about the CDU. His removal, while temporarily embarrassing to Kaiser, would in the long run be advantageous. His disappearance might also help co-operation between Kaiser and Hermes. The latter recently visited Berlin and since his return to the British zone has been trying to organise opposition to Adenauer. Kaiser himself is planning a serious campaign to break the hold of the right wing in the British zone, but Adenauer's position is still strong.

AUSTRIA

The New Year was marked in Austria with messages from President, Chancellor, members of the Federal Government, and Provincial Governors, all with the same note of hope that a treaty would be concluded early in the year, after the disappointments of 1946. General Mark Clark is reported to have begun discussions with Allied and Austrian authorities on various points of the Austrian Treaty, before the London talks at which he will be the United States deputy.

One of the main points to be cleared up during the treaty talks will be the displaced persons issue. Herr Ludwig, a People's Party deputy, spoke at a meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union Economic Commission in Paris, saying that it would be unbearable if occupation troops were to be retained in Austria under the pretext of this unsolved problem. Austria, with a population of approximately 7,000,000 had some 600,000 displaced persons. The Minister of the Interior, Herr Helmer, has spoken of the anxiety caused by foreigners who "ruthlessly use arms" and have caused "considerable losses" among the police and gendarmerie. Apart from the political and security problems, the material burden on Austria's strained resources is heavy, and the provision of supplies, both financial and material, for U.N.R.R.A's displaced persons operations in Austria in 1947 rests with the Austrian Government. Little progress has been made in repatriation, and there are still 46,366 repatriable displaced persons in the British Zone, 15,652 stateless persons, together with 15,956 Reichsdeutsche, 27,643 Volksdeutsche eligible for resettlement in Germany and 12,557 for whom no provision was made in the Potsdam agreement. Although there has been favourable comment among many Austrians on the possibility of absorbing some of these people, particularly Volksdeutsche from parts of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire, into the Austrian economy to help in reconstruction, even advocates of this course emphasise that it would be strictly limited by economic and political considerations, and any attempt to force a large-scale settlement and naturalisation of foreigners would be strongly resisted by the Austrians.

The Jewish refugees, of whom there are thought to be 30,000 now in Austria on their way from Eastern Europe to Palestine, have protested at their being "lumped together with the other displaced persons." They say that their food supplies are no burden to Austria since their entire rations come from "allied gifts."

The acute shortage of fuel and electric power has caused the worst crisis yet. Holiday restrictions on steam trains were extended until the 5th January, and during the week-ends there are no passenger steam trains at all, except for international expresses. Parts of Vienna have had to remain in complete darkness, and the population spend their days in cold dark rooms, heated at best for a few hours each day with scraps of wood and coal, and lighted often for a few hours only by candles. The Austrian Power Directorate announced on the 5th January that industrial undertakings, most of which have already been closed since the 19th December, must remain closed for at least another fortnight because of the fuel shortage. The result is likely to be that the slight recovery in industrial production during the Autumn will be lost.

There have been protests in French and American-controlled organs on the reported ban on the import of Dr. Schuschnigg's memoirs into Austria. They have been published in Switzerland under the title "Requiem in Red-White-Red," and have apparently occasioned "violent outbursts" against Schuschnigg from Communist and Socialist quarters.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The New Year pronouncements made by the Czech political parties were, on the whole, optimistic but critical. M. Gottwald broadcast on the 1st January in a programme celebrating the official start of the Two-Year Plan, the groundwork of which, he claimed, had already been successfully established. Not to be outdone, however, by the somewhat sombre Presidential address of Christmas Eve (see last week's Summary) the Prime Minister delivered an attack upon black marketeers and the "whispering propaganda of obscure elements" among the rural population. New regulations have indeed been passed recently to deal more rigorously with black marketing.

M. Gottwald's reference to farmers and their part in the Plan, coupled with his remarks on canvassing carried out by a "fifth political party of the Agrarian and Stribrný type," is of some significance. The Czech Communist party during the election campaigning last year paid considerable attention to the rural communities, whereas its strongest opponent, the Czech Socialist party, concentrated upon the towns. The non-Communist parties have since attempted to rectify this tactical error, and have invited applications from former Agrarians where politically desirable. One instance of this is Dr. Feierabend, a moderate Agrarian who redeemed himself by abandoning his cabinet post under Beran in January 1940, and escaping to England to join the Government-in-exile. M. Feierabend, known outside his own country mainly for his expert financial knowledge, was, during the summer, eagerly sought after by the Communists, both on account of this knowledge and his following in Agrarian circles. The Communists were, however, disappointed, Feierabend threw in his lot with the Socialists. The Communist party, with the help of the Minister of Information, thereupon began to accuse Feirerabend, and others who had joined the Socialists, of attempting to revive a fifth party, which has, of course, been denied. Faced with persistent and mainly successful counter-propaganda during December, M. Gottwald is now compelled to take refuge in vaguer accusations. (The counter-propaganda had found its main expression in Parliamentary criticism of budget expenditure, particularly of the Ministry of Information, and in the Socialist press campaign against Communist predominance in Czech broadcasting.)

M. Gottwald's passing reference to Stribný is of topical interest. The trial of this unscrupulous Czech Fascist has just opened in Prague. A brilliant and forceful personality, he began his political career as a Socialist, but his restless nature and will-to-power led him to form a league more favourable to his ideology. He became leader of the "yellow" press in Czechoslovakia, owning the biggest newspaper (see Summary No. 369) and was one of those Czechs who voluntarily aided Hitler.

The People's Party organ, Lidová Demokracie, claimed to give a fair representation of the views of the man-in-the-street upon the developments of 1946. The article expressed satisfaction at the solid achievements in recovery, the expulsion of the Germans, the holding of free elections, the growth of effective Parliamentary criticism, Press freedom and free speech. On the debit side it places the unparalleled growth of party influence in every sphere of life. The People's Party loses no chance to attack the growth of bureaucracy and excessive State expenditure. As a result of such criticism, a Control of Expenditure committee has been set up in the Assembly, and drastic pruning, e.g., the removal of 100,000 or more civil servants and their transfer to industry, foreshadowed. (See also under "Hungary.")

POLAND

In spite of considerable difficulties, M. Mikolajczyk's Polish Peasant Party succeeded in putting forward candidates in all the fifty-two constituencies into which Poland, including the former German areas under Polish administration, is now divided. M. Mikolajczyk is reported to have stated that up to the last day for handing in the party lists of candidates, namely the 20th December, means had been found to obstruct their presentation in no less than 18 constituencies; but that after he had raised the matter at a Cabinet meeting the General Electoral Commissioner had issued orders that all the lists were to be received. Since then they have been under consideration by the Divisional Electoral Commissions, and it is not yet known how many, if any, may be declared invalid by these Commissions. M. Mikolajczyk is said to have gained his point only after threatening to appeal to the three Great Powers; and he is still uncertain whether the disabilities under which his party is placed may not prove so great as to make it undesirable to contest the elections. A meeting of the party executive council on the 8th January is likely to bring the matter to a head; and the party's decision to participate may depend (a) on whether its lists of candidates are declared valid in all constituencies; (b) on whether the party's "observers" are allowed to attend the polling-area committees without being required to produce recommendations from the local authorities (as prescribed by the Electoral Regulations).

M. Mikolajczyk's party has received the adherence of a small group of seceders from the Socialist Party, including the veteran leader, M. Zulawski, who, with two others, is included in the Party's central list of candidates.

Strenuous attempts are being made to organise government employees and those of Cooperative Societies, together with Trades Union members, into marching in a body to the poll on the day of the election and vote openly for the "Bloc." In Upper Silesia canvassers spent the Christmas holidays in securing, it is said, over 1,000,000 signatures to a promise to vote for the "Bloc"; those who refused to sign being threatened with unpleasant consequences.

Polish civil law has now been codified, and the differences due to the Partitions, some of which persisted through the inter-war period, have been abolished.

The trial of four major German war criminals opened in Warsaw on the 17th December. The accused are Fischer, Governor of the Warsaw district; Leist, Governor of the City of Warsaw; Meisinger, Commander of the Security Police in Warsaw; and Daume, Commander of the Ordnungspolizei.

The Polish press reports a decision of the Council of Ministers of the 19th December raising, in respect of secondary industries, the limit imposed on enterprises that may remain in private hands from 50 to 100 workers per shift.

SOVIET UNION

The outstanding event in Anglo-Soviet relations this otherwise uneventful week is the visit of Lord Montgomery to Moscow. Though only mentioned in the most meagre terms by the Soviet press and wireless, there can be little doubt that the visit is arousing considerable interest in Moscow. The Daily Worker of the 6th January (which, in such matters, may be taken as reflecting the official Soviet attitude) warmly welcomed the C.I.G.S. The fact that this invitation, first made by Generalissimo Stalin at Potsdam, was renewed by Marshal Vassilievsky on the 14th October last, when Anglo-Soviet relations seemed, on the surface, none too cordial, was, according to the Daily Worker, an indication of basic Soviet goodwill towards this country.

The Soviet press has recently been paying considerable attention to all items concerning Anglo-American military co-operation, especially rumours and reports of standardisation of arms and training. A London Tass message of the 4th January emphasised that Anglo-American military collaboration is growing closer, despite the Security Council discussions on the limitation of armaments, and concluded with a reference to President Truman's statement about the continued existence of the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

One of the most conspicuous omissions from the Soviet press throughout the past year has been the situation developing in French colonial territories. The course of events there was eventually summed up in a long article in Izvestiya on the 28th December. After referring to the failure of French and British troops to crush Viet-Nam independence, it noted the recognition by France in March, 1946, of Viet-Nam as a Free State, with its own Government, forming part of the Indo-China Federation and the French Union and the "subsequent violation of the agreements." The article then referred to the Fontainebleau Conference, where "certain French circles,'' especially Admiral d'Argenlieu, were accused of attempts to prevent a peaceful settlement, a modus vivendi being, nevertheless, achieved '' thanks only to the efforts of the Viet-Nam delegation and French democratic forces.'' Krasnaya Zvezda (the 5th January) described the present position, following widespread armed clashes, as very serious and as being complicated by the formation of another Viet-Nam Government by the refugee Annamite Kuomintang leaders in China. The view was endorsed that a policy of force in Viet-Nam would be opposed by '' 20,000,000 men and women.''

The long silence maintained by the Soviet press on the fusion of the United States and British zones of Germany suggests that the detailed criticism that has finally appeared in Izvestiya (the 1st January) is mainly a statement for the record. It fits in neatly with the sharp Soviet reaction to the recent French measures in the Saar (see Summary No. 374). Such prolonged delay in rising to the bait is the usual Soviet method of treating cases where a fait accompli has been presented. The article was certainly severe, stating that the real purpose of the Agreement was the withdrawal from Allied (presumably Quadripartite) control of powerful military and economic resources and their utilisation for purposes of political and economic pressure. The usual charges of contravention of the Potsdam Agreement and failure to implement agreed reparations policies were, of course, brought forward. Finally the fusion was described as '' a dangerous attempt at the political and economic division of Germany;'' it would impede the restoration of political unity and would serve the Anglo-American purpose of turning Germany into a '' Union of States.''

The Soviet Government have accepted the Government of Siam's proposal to resume diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. Writing to the Soviet Minister in Sweden, the Siamese Minister to Sweden stated that the present Government of Siam completely disapproved of the attitude towards the Soviet Union of Siam's former Government and wished to maintain friendly relations with the Soviet Union and to exchange Ministers. The Siamese Government had followed an anti-Russian policy for many years until in March 1941 negotiations were opened to establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. These negotiations resulted in an exchange of notes to establish diplomatic, consular and trade relations between the two countries; owing to the subsequent severance of communications between Bangkok and Moscow, following the outbreak of the Soviet-German war, and the occupation of Siam by the Japanese in December 1941, no exchange of diplomatic representatives actually took place.

By stigmatising the Persian Government as reactionary, persecuting democrats, terrorising workers, &c., the Soviet Union is building up a case in public through the press and wireless which would enable it, if need be, to indict the Government, either before U.N.O. or the W.F.T.U. Action in this direction will, however, probably be postponed until a definite decision has been taken by the Majlis about the proposed Soviet oil concession in Azerbaijan.

A Delegation of Soviet scientists has left Moscow to participate in the forthcoming Congress of Scientists at Delhi. They will report on the achievements of Soviet science and visit Indian scientific institutions. This is the first time that the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences has been officially represented at an Indian Congress of this nature, and the visit is symbolic of the present efforts to establish closer links between the Soviet Union and India.

Further evidence has come to hand of the determination of the Party leaders to strengthen central control and tighten up discipline generally. The latest move, as announced in Pravda of the 14th December, is the creation of a new Administration for the examination of Party Organs, the personnel of which have been taken over from the former Department for Organisation-Training. The new Administration ranks as a third beside the existing Administrations for Cadres and for Propaganda set up by the 18th Party Congress. Its purpose was stated to be '' to improve the direction of local party organisations, to ensure control over their activities and to centralise control of their work in a single organ.'' A group of inspectors are to work under the new Administration; apparently they are to encourage rank-and-file Party members to speak out freely in criticism of the higher local officials. The administration must have existed in fact for some months, for, during the summer, there were accounts of a searching visit to the Astrakhan and Udmurt oblast committees from one such inspector, during which higher Party officials were shown up for bribe-taking and general slackness.

Metropolitan Nikolai Krutitsky, on his return to Moscow from the Slav Congress in Belgrade, has expressed warm appreciation of the hospitality extended to him by the Serbian Patriarch Gavrilo, with whom he stayed throughout his visit, and his conviction of the '' unshakable and sincere friendship between the two churches.'' Patriarch Gavrilo, in private conversation with representatives of the Russian clergy, is reported to have said that the centre of Orthodoxy was in Moscow and that the remaining small autocephalous Churches could only find the right path for their historical life in unison with the Russian Church. Too much should not, however, be read into this statement for the union referred to need mean no more than the natural unity already existing between sister Orthodox Churches.

SCANDINAVIA

Finland

The close of the year saw a marked increase in political tension, and a growing threat of accelerated inflation as the price and wage truce neared its date of expiration—the 31st December. Opposition towards the Government most clearly showed itself during the debate on the State Police (see Summary No. 368), and again when the Diet considered the bill for the punishment of persons involved in the arms dumps affair. Until the matter is finally settled it will continue to hang like a sword of Damocles not only over M. Pekkala and his Government but over the Finnish people as a whole, as the rejection of the bill may easily have the most disastrous consequences. The vast majority of Diet members fully realise this fact and are prepared to compromise with their consciences; but the position is further complicated by the Finnish Constitution which stipulates that bills involving departures from Constitutional Law must be passed with a majority of not less than five-sixths. While it is true that the so-called War Guilt Bill, passed in September 1945, required and obtained this necessary majority, it should be borne in mind that the Opposition has since then become bolder.

Evidence that fear of the Soviet Union still plays a major part in Finnish parliamentary affairs was, however, afforded when the Government recently asked for the prolongation of the Defence of the Republic Act, which motion was passed by 133 votes to 47. This is the second occasion upon which the Diet has perpetuated an unpopular war-time measure giving the Government special emergency powers. The Act will now remain in force till the signing of the Peace Treaty, but in no case beyond the end of 1947. A few days later the President actually invoked this Act when issuing a decree temporarily empowering the Ministry of the Interior to censor matter for publication which has a bearing on Finland's relations with foreign Powers. One periodical was, in fact, suspended for consistently printing anti-Soviet propaganda. The chief offenders, though the decree is naturally not directed against them in the present instance, have undoubtedly been Vapaa Sana and Työkansansamomat which have distinguished themselves by their vituperations against Great Britain, and to a lesser extent the United States; it may be recalled that H.M.'s Minister last year lodged a protest with the Finnish Government. Whether the Communist Minister of the Interior will be prepared to curb the wild attacks of his party's press against the Western democracies is, of course, open to doubt.

Despite these political developments, the greatest difficulty with which the Government had to contend was the redemption of a pledge given to the farmers, at the time of the price and wage truce, that they would be permitted, after fulfilling their quotas, to sell surplus produce in the open market. This arrangement did not materialise, and for several weeks before a settlement was reached the Agrarians pressed for a decision under threat of withdrawal from the Government. Having secured certain concessions they agreed to remain in the Government, while Social Democrats and Communists continue to exchange recriminations in an effort to make political capital of the question.

Alarmed by the prospect of a steep rise in the cost-of-living index, the Government, on the 15th December, agreed, in principle, to a five per cent. price reduction on all home-produced goods. Noteworthy exceptions include all agricultural produce; house rents will also remain unaffected by the decision. In a speech Minister Härmä made it clear that the Government considered the continuation of the price and wage truce to be essential, though wages of farm labourers would have to be increased by about eight per cent. early in April. The position of other groups, for instance civil servants, will probably also have to be reconsidered. The practicability of implementing the decision for a general price reduction has since been questioned.

The heavy economic burden imposed by the war reparations was further emphasised by M. Lauri Kivinen, Chairman of the War Reparations Commission, who recently revealed that the value of goods which had fallen behind scheduled delivery dates now amounted to between four and five million dollars. With a fine of five per cent. per month on all undelivered goods, M. Kivinen feared that, if the same tendency continued throughout the third reparations year, the aggregated fine would, at its close on the 19th September, 1947, amount to not less than 2,400,000 dollars. The position was worst in the shipbuilding industry which was now 1,400,000 dollars behind with its deliveries. Many bottlenecks unfortunately existed, owing chiefly to delays in obtaining certain materials from abroad. M. Kivinen specifically mentioned that orders placed in Britain for metal piping and metal drilling equipment frequently only arrived several months after promised delivery dates. Orders placed in Sweden, were as a rule fulfilled more promptly, but here too delays had occurred.

Some hope for a brighter future was, however, unexpectedly held out by the Russians when, on New Year's Eve, the Control Commission announced that the control of Malmi airport, serving Helsinki, would immediately be transferred to the Finnish authorities. A Finnish enquiry as to whether this implied permission for Finland to open air traffic on overseas routes received a negative reply. The relaxation only affected Finnish aviation in as much that aircraft engaged on flying within the country would now be permitted to use Malmi. It is also possible that the Russians wish to give a favourable impression to passengers travelling on the Swedish-Soviet link service between Stockholm and Moscow by exhibiting the field under Finnish control. As Sweden, the ex-neutral, is benefiting from the use of the airport the moment is considered opportune for Great Britain to secure facilities for operating a civil airline to Finland, and the Finnish Government will be asked to agree to this in principle. The final decision still rests with the Soviets, and, since a link service to Leningrad or Moscow, similar to the Swedish-Soviet one, is not contemplated by H.M. Government, certain objections are likely to be raised by the Russians.

Norway

A Norwegian-Soviet commercial agreement was signed in Moscow on the 27th December. It covers a two-year period, with provision for future extension. According to the Norwegians the exchange of goods is at present on a very small scale, and during the negotiations a Norwegian offer of 5,000 tons of whale oil was met with derision by the Russians. The Norwegians thereupon doubled the figure, in exchange for a promise made by the Soviets to supply Norway with Polish coal. Coal was in fact Norway's most important requirement, but small quantities of wheat, fodder, timber, and phosphates were also secured. The Russians on their part showed great interest in Norwegian aluminium, and were promised that part of the output would be set aside for them when production is resumed. Russia will also obtain Norwegian fish.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

In a strongly-worded broadcast talk on the Cheribon Draft Agreement, ex-Prime Minister Gerbrandy vigorously denounced the Agreement as being unconstitutional, and made a personal attack on Dr. van Mook, whom he referred to as "a Civil Servant with insufficient reverence for the Constitution, who is wilfully abusing the Royal Speech of December, 1942, in which the Indonesian peoples were promised great, though not unlimited, independence" (2nd January). Professor Gerbrandy, who is a Conservative (Anti-Revolutionary), addressed his listeners in his capacity of Chairman of the "National Committee for the Maintenance of the Unity of the Empire," whose formation, he declared, had been "enthusiastically hailed in all parts of the country," and whose weapons were "spiritual." "We live in a State based upon law," said Professor Gerbrandy; "but, despite the Second Chamber decision, it is our right as citizens of this State to realise that our Constitution is being threatened and violated by the Government. It is our duty to resist this. We feel that for months past we have been exposed to a coup d'état, resulting in a policy against the true patriotic sentiments of the nation, and leading to acts which are by no means approved by the people . . . . We must try to obtain a policy for the Netherlands Indies which will enjoy the support of the entire nation. It is still not too late. The drama has not come to an end with the decision of the Second Chamber." The conclusion of such an Agreement, he went on, meant a de facto change in the Constitution, since, for the purpose of concluding the Agreement, another State—unknown to the Constitution—had been created on the "national territory."

As the first point in its programme, the National Committee for the Maintenance of the Unity of the Empire had accepted the principle that no change affecting the structure and organization of the Empire could be made except on strictly constitutional lines. The machinery for constitutional changes was there—the dissolution of Parliament followed by a national referendum. A majority of at least two-thirds of all votes cast was prescribed by the Constitution before any change could be effected. What would happen to the N.E.I., asked Professor Gerbrandy, if the present policy continued? It would mean "helping into the saddle" the Republic "created by Japanese money and born of injustice"—a Republic which would be the "official ruler" of Java, Sumatra and Madoera, the "pseudo-constitutional" camouflage of whose structure did nothing to alter the fact that the existing Kingdom was "being dissolved." The Government apparently believed that their support of "this not quite Communist group of intellectuals" was wise; but they withheld their support from other groups "who refused to have anything to do with this policy," and in so doing, exposed "85 per cent. of the population of the N.E.I. to this adventure." Some 5 million Dutchmen had to decide on this matter—"quite different" from the 150 members of the States-General; but the fact was that, at the moment, the Dutch Constitution was being changed—not by the 5 million, nor yet the 150—but by one Dutchman alone, against the wishes of the people, of the Crown, of even the Cabinet and the States-General. That solitary Dutchman was Hubertus Johannes van Mook, who would—if he could—see to it that the nation "wake up one morning" to find their Kingdom dissolved. Dr. van Mook might, perhaps, believe this policy to be necessary; but certainly he had not the Constitution "at heart." One fait accompli was being heaped upon another, until at "long last" the Dutch flag would be "hauled down in a dissolved Kingdom." The problem was not a party matter; it was "too national, and too important."

The inevitable Government rebuke, apart from a defence and justification of its policy, was naturally also devoted to an apologia for Dr. van Mook. The Government felt bound to register an emphatic protest against the "slighting manner" in which Professor Gerbrandy had "thought it necessary" to attack Dr. van Mook, who was "devoting himself with such perseverance to his heavy task." Two highly pertinent questions are then put to Professor Gerbrandy, about his pre-war relations with Dr. van Mook. If, before the Royal Speech of December, 1942, Professor Gerbrandy knew "what he now believes he must say about the person of Dr. van Mook," why did he (who was then Prime Minister) support Dr. van Mook and appoint him successively Minister for the Colonies and Lieutenant-Governor-General? Again, why did Professor Gerbrandy, in October 1944, appoint Dr. van Mook Lieutenant-Governor-General in addition to his office of Colonial Minister, since, by so doing, he was conferring upon Dr. van Mook "more powers" than had "ever before" been enjoyed by a Colonial Minister or a Governor-General?

The resignation of Dr. Oud, Burgomaster of Rotterdam, from the National Committee for the Maintenance of the Unity of the Empire, was announced on the 3rd January. Dr. Oud said that he had expected "a more satisfactory solution" of the Indonesian problem after the recent Government statement on the Agreement.

The Parliamentary Commission for the West Indies (see last week's Summary) left Holland by air on the 8th. It is expected to arrive at Paramaribo (Surinam) on the 12th.

Belgium

A conference between the Foreign Ministers of the Netherlands and Belgium (Baron van Boetzelaer van Oosterhout and M. Spaak) took place in Brussels on the 4th January, at which the principal subject of discussion was the attitude to be adopted by both countries towards the German problem at future international conferences. In a statement issued to the Press, M. Spaak said that the meeting had shewn that the attitude of the two countries was identical on almost every point. Advantage had been taken of Baron van Boetzelaer's visit to discuss a number of outstanding matters relating to the Dutch-Belgian Trade Agreement. A settlement had virtually been reached on financial problems—notably, the granting of further loans to the Netherlands by the Belgian National Bank,—which would be submitted to the Dutch and Belgian Finance Ministers for final approval. There was another conference on the German problem on the 5th.

directions at once, and the results are so much appreciated that it is widely hoped that the experiment will continue and that M. Léon Blum will change his decision to retire again to private life on the election of the President of the Republic. The Government lost no time in tackling the economic situation and the new "expérience Blum" is a brave attempt to reverse the inflationary trend which nearly trebled the cost of living between January 1945 and October 1946.

M. Blum broadcast to the nation on New Year's Eve and announced that all industrial, commercial and agricultural prices were to be cut by 5% as from the 2nd January and that there would be a further cut of 5% in 2 months' time. The decrees which embody this decision show that all prices, including entertainments, catering and professional and public services and excluding only rents and certain imported goods, are affected. Steel prices are cut by 16·6%, but this reduction does not entirely compensate the 20% increase recently decided by the administration. Similarly, the 5% cut, even though it is increased to 10 or 20% in some cases, will only offset in part the big increases in the price of public services, such as gas, electricity, coal, postal rates and the Paris underground, which were decided only two weeks ago in order to remove the need for State subsidies to these services.

In a second broadcast speech on New Year's Day M. Blum explained that he intended his decision to give the "psychological shock" needed to start a downward movement in prices. The Government believe that the inflationary situation is due not to excess of money in the hands of the public but to lack of confidence in the currency and the tendency of producers and business men to hold on to stocks in expectation of higher prices. This theory is not entirely unassailable, and critics point out that the budget deficit has also played its part in inducing inflation. However, after some initial hesitation, the experiment has been very favourably received, and an undoubted movement for price reduction, often going beyond the 5%, has begun all over the country. The Government have organised an intelligent propaganda campaign since they realise that they have not the means to enforce their decision and must rely on the co-operation of sellers and buyers. The reaction of the peasants is particularly important and cannot yet be judged. The Government have the unanimous support of the press although some reserve is shown by the Communists who are clearly envious of the popularity now being gained by the Socialist Government.

The Government have been promised the support of the employers' associations and of the trade unions. M. Blum has also stated that the C.G.T. has confirmed its support of the man-power recommendations of the Monnet Plan (see Summary No. 371) and has accepted a 48-hour working week. The 40-hour week still stands in principle and the 48-hour week will be paid at the rate of 50 hours. Difficult wage and salary negotiations still lie ahead, and the C.G.T. has now laid claim to a minimum wage of 7,300 fr. a month for all workers, this figure to be reduced if there is a genuine reduction in prices. It seems to be recognised that the figure of 7,300 fr. is quite reasonable. The C.G.T. has also produced a plan for fiscal reform which includes the introduction of a system of pay-as-you-earn.

The balance of parties in the Council of the Republic for 268 out of 315 seats is as follows: Communists and allies, 78; M.R.P., 74; Socialists, 51; Rassemblement des Gauches, 32; Right-Wing, 23; Independents, 2; Algerian moderates, 4; Algerian nationalists, 4.

An agreement between H.M. Government and the French Government on the war-time use of shipping was signed on the 3rd January. It provides a settlement of the claims put forward on either side arising from the use of shipping during the war and leaves a balance of £5,750,000 due to the French Government. M. Jules Moch, Minister of Public Works, came over to sign the agreement; he had an informal conversation with Mr. Attlee and handed him a letter from M. Blum which appealed for British assistance in solving the French coal problem and raised again the question of an Anglo-French alliance. In his reply Mr. Attlee said that he would welcome a visit from M. Blum, as the latter had suggested, but that in view of our own grave difficulties he could not hold out any hope of increasing coal exports from this country in the near future.

The results of the census of the 10th March, 1946, have now been published and show that at that date the population was 40,517,923, including 38,847,194 Frenchmen and 1,670,729 foreigners. These figures show a fall of 1,389,133 on the figures for 1936, there being 606,355 fewer Frenchmen and 782,778 fewer foreigners. 312,105 Frenchmen were, however, serving on ships or in forces outside France at that date.

A trade agreement between France and Italy for the year 1947 was signed in Rome on the 22nd December. It provides for exchanges amounting to 4 milliard fr. in either direction. France is to import from Italy raw silk, hemp, oils, sulphur, pyrites, seeds, fruit and vegetables, machinery, &c. and to export phosphates, potash, scrap iron, bauxite, clay and machinery.

SWITZERLAND

Delivering the Presidential New Year broadcast, M. Philippe Etter said that his first wish was that the coming year might bring to all nations a just and lasting peace. We were still in a transition period, and the nations which had suffered so much as a result of the war now required a breathing-space in which to reconstruct their political and economic organization and their social and spiritual life. International co-operation, however, presupposed the existence of organised and free States. Switzerland had hitherto always shown herself sincerely anxious not to hold aloof from a new community of nations. But for all that she neither could nor should renounce her traditional neutrality. Wherever they looked beyond their frontiers, the Swiss people saw poverty, famine and material and moral ruin; and they had employed all their resources to mitigate it wherever possible. Swiss nationals living abroad had not escaped these bitter trials and in many cases they had lost the fruits of long years of toil. Turning to home politics, the President referred to the exceptional measures which the Government had been obliged to take during the war, but which had not weakened the nation's democratic institutions. These measures had now been abolished and the people were again free to speak their minds. During 1947 several matters of considerable importance to the nation would be put to the vote—e.g., the proposed economic regulations by which the connection between State and business would be regulated by constitutional procedure, in order to ensure the existence of a healthy and prosperous peasantry, middleclass and working class and to preserve justice and peace in the field of labour; the social security measures generally and old age insurance in particular; the election of the new National Council in the autumn. Opposition and differences of opinion would doubtless arise, perhaps the more strongly because of the war-time restrictions on self-expression.

On the 19th December, in the National Council, M. Stampfli, Minister for Public Economy, referred to "the precarious state of Switzerland's food supply." To-day's rations were slightly below what was regarded by doctors as normal. After Germany and Austria, Switzerland was the nation with the most severe bread rationing. Switzerland was not enjoying any privileged position, as many seemed to think. On the contrary, countries which had not suffered throughout the war were more favourably treated, Switzerland being often forced to buy her allotted share under most burdensome conditions. Meat-producing countries, such as Denmark, were prepared to sell to Switzerland, but the international organisations opposed this. The position was similar in regard to dairy produce. As for sugar, Switzerland was the worst treated of all countries except Austria and Finland. In the matter of food, Switzerland was definitely subjected to discrimination. Sometimes she was compelled to purchase in conditions made worse by high prices and difficult and expensive transport; sometimes the countries assigned to her to purchase from could deliver only a fraction of the required amount; even when freedom of purchase was permitted, it was often found that the large nations had got in first by means of long-term contracts and bought up all the available produce. What was the cause of all this, and why was such unfavourable treatment reserved for a small nation that had willingly put her industry and her resources to the service of reconstruction and international aid? In the opinion of many, the treatment Switzerland had received was due to the fact that foreigners judged the nation by its hotels and their menus, forgetting that the hotel industry was one of Switzerland's main sources of revenue and that it had therefore to be maintained at a high standard. Moreover, the smooth working of the rationing system, the absence of queues, the splendid window-displays, and the almost total absence of black market activities produced on the visitor the impression that the food supply generally was satisfactory and that additional imports were unnecessary. It was to be hoped that the Powers would stop thinking of Switzerland as "privileged" and that in the third post-war year, she would be treated on an equal footing with other nations.

In his Christmas Eve message the Pope, as he has so often done before, appealed to Christians even beyond the wide limits of his own Communion, to follow the Star of Bethlehem and save the world for justice and charity. Two years after fighting had ceased the vanquished were in misery and the victors disillusioned, pursuing conflicting aims. Despite much devoted toil by statesmen, the treaties were opus imperfectum. For millions life was uncertain. This uncertainty must be ended before the amazing resistance of suffering humanity broke down and civilisation perished. A definitive peace must be quickly signed: standards of justice must be restored: peace treaties must have the possibility of revision "as soon as the majority of the nations and the voice of reason and of equity indicate desirable and perhaps necessary modifications." But the Pope, while urging, as every Christian must, that victor and vanquished must behave as brothers, fraternise in fact, speaks openly of the origin of the last war, and the need for guarantees against its repetition: "Undoubtedly such a disastrous war, unleashed by an unjust aggression and prolonged beyond permissible limits, i.e., after it had become clear that it was irreparably lost, could not end with a peace not providing guarantees against the recurrence of similar acts of violence. But all measures of repression and prevention must . . . . remain subordinate to the ultimate aim of real peace, which consists in bringing victors and vanquished gradually together . . . . to work for the reconstruction of the whole family of nations," so that "a Christian Commonwealth may rise again, in which the law of love will be supreme."

The Message also had a reference to the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms "now mere shadows of themselves," to the needs of hungry Europe, and to the "upsurge of anti-Christian violence," against which the Pope bade Christians stand firm. These anti-religious forces had been active in Rome, denouncing the Roman Catholic Church and its Head as fascists, etc. On Sunday, the 22nd December, the Pope had addressed a vast rally of the faithful who had come to St. Peter's Square to protest against what he then described as "desecrators of divine objects and adorers of materialism." It seems that the Vatican has decided to counter-attack in face of the growing assaults of the materialists. Where the materialist headquarters is situated could be discovered from the Pope's recent address to the new Austrian Minister to the Vatican, and from the Vatican comment upon it. "Austria," said the Pope, "lies at the meeting-place of opposing currents from East and West, where social ideologies clash"—"the East," as the Vatican broadcaster explained, "which stands for the suppression of political and civil liberties: man reduced to a machine: spiritual problems solved by firing squads and intellectual problems by police corporals."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Relegating all other news to a position of secondary importance is the Ministry of the Interior's announcement of "a dangerous and widespread anti-republican conspiracy" to restore the Horthy régime upon the withdrawal of the Soviet Army from Hungary. The "Committee of Seven" which directed the movement had, so the report states, organised an underground armed force and, in addition, possessed several aeroplanes. The conspirators had not reached final agreement as to the composition of the new Government, but it was expected that General Lakatos, a former Premier, would be placed at its head. Six of the "Committee" have been arrested and are said to have admitted their guilt. The seventh, General Veres de Dálnok, escaped to Transdanubia in the hope of crossing the Austrian frontier. M. Nagy, the Premier, appears to think that the charges are not unfounded. The matter, which is being investigated by the Politico Military Police, has become the concern of M. Rajk, the Communist Minister of the Interior. Certain quarters believe that General Bartha, the Smallholder Minister of Defence, may in consequence feel his authority to be shaken. Prague radio has twice alleged that the conspirators intended not only to overthrow the internal régime, but also to "induce riots among Hungarians outside Hungary, mainly in Czechoslovakia."

A Memorandum published by five of the older members of the Social Democratic Party comes as an indication of growing dissatisfaction within the Party's ranks. The signatories, headed by M. Peyer, the leader of the Social Democrats until his internment by the Germans at Mauthausen, criticize both the leadership and the conduct of domestic and foreign affairs. They complain, inter alia, that former Arrow Cross supporters have found their way to highly lucrative positions through Party channels, that ability is not made the test of office, and that the land reform was carried through by a man (M. Veres of the National Peasant Party) whose earlier record was compromised by his association with the anti-Semitic "Defenders of the Race Movement." They deplore the "reactionary and Fascist method" of denouncement to the police, and speak of broken pledges to the workers, whose low standard of living they contrast with the abundance enjoyed by the wealthy. Readiness to attack the Labour Party in Great Britain is condemned as a grave error. Social democracy has prospered only in those countries where it has not been afraid to pursue an independent policy, the Memorandum states, and deep misgivings are felt about the Party's future under its existing leadership. The signatories, however, lay stress on three further points: they do not want a breach in Party unity, they desire to continue cooperation with the Communists, but this must be on an equal footing, and they recognize the geographical and economic situation which makes friendship with Soviet Russia imperative. A reply was immediately issued, condemning as an infringement of discipline the publication of the Memorandum before it had been discussed by the Party's Executive Committee. It will receive more detailed attention at the forthcoming Social Democratic Congress.

While the Communist attitude to the Smallholders' recent Declaration of policy may be summed up in the words "well said, but not well done," the Social Democrats appear satisfied with the extent to which the demands of the left-wing bloc have been met. The questions dealt with are economic rather than political, and agreement in this field was always easier to obtain. The Smallholders' Three Years Plan differs little, according to M. Nagy, from the Plan proposed by the Communists, and his statement on another occasion that since the meeting of the Freedom Party it has become clear where reaction is to be found suggests one of the ways in which the Smallholders may fight reaction, as the Declaration promises. A further concession to left-wing pressure has been the resignation of M. Pfeiffer, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Justice. M. Pfeiffer, whose past is impeccably anti-German, is also fearlessly anti-Communist. His unpopularity with the Left was greatly increased by the part which he played in bringing to justice a number of persons, including several Communists, in connection with a "mob" murder at Kunmadaras in May 1946, the Communists having hoped to shelve responsibility for the crime on Smallholder "reactionaries." M. Pfeiffer has, however, been blamed by representatives of all the Parties for his leniency in dealing with speculators and black market offenders, and the Smallholder newspaper, Kis Ujság, considers that his resignation is therefore in the interests of democracy. The Social Democratic Népszava reports that M. Imre Bencze is likely to be appointed his successor.

Yugoslavia

Miša Trifunović, a former Prime Minister of the Royal Yugoslav Government in London, has been sentenced to eight years' imprisonment with hard labour and loss of civil rights, and an ex-Army officer and two journalists (one of whom was employed by the U.S. Embassy) have been condemned to death in Belgrade on a charge of espionage. Three other people, including Konstantin Stanković, a son-in-law of Trifunović and contractor to H.M. Embassy, were sentenced to hard labour. This trial which lasted from December 31st to January 6th is a sequel to the closing of the U.S. Reading Room in Belgrade last September by the Yugoslav Government. At the time there appeared to be various reasons for this action, such as the unwelcome publication in Belgrade of the American case in the shooting down of the U.S. transport planes over Slovenia in August, the appearance in the American press of highly critical articles by Mr. Pridonoff, former Labour Attaché at the U.S. Embassy, but chiefly alleged political activities under the cover of diplomatic immunity. The Reading Room has just been re-opened on certain conditions (see Summary No. 374, 4.1.46). In this trial the U.S. Embassy was made to appear a hotbed of political intrigue and espionage. Mr. Shantz, former Counsellor and Chargé d'Affaires in the absence of Mr. Patterson, Mr. Pridonoff, and the Naval Attaché, were mentioned as persons who had bribed some of the defendants to supply secret information on Yugoslavia's Armed Forces and defences. Mr. Pridonoff was violently criticised for having received and published abroad "false" reports of the situation in Yugoslavia. The real crime of most of the defendants seems to have been that of grumbling to members of the U.S. Embassy, and Trifunović admitted that he had transmitted a pamphlet entitled, "The Subašić–Tito Agreement, the Yalta Declaration and Tito's Régime in Yugoslavia" to Mr. Shantz or to Mr. Stenbock of H.M. Embassy, he couldn't remember which.

H.M. Embassy was not otherwise mentioned during this trial, but its turn may come when Mr. Zollner, a temporary representative of the Board of Trade who was arrested in September 1946 on a charge of espionage, is brought to trial in the course of this month.

Since Mr. Peake's interview with Marshal Tito on the 13th December there has been a slight improvement in the prospects for British air communications in the Balkans. At Mr. Peake's suggestion the Yugoslav General Staff have submitted two alternative routes to Sofia and Bucharest, only one of which touches Yugoslavia near the Roumanian border, and both of which avoid the dangerous crossing of the Carpathians. The Yugoslav Government also appear amenable to the opening of British reading rooms at Sarajevo and Split, and to the arrival of additional Consular personnel, long overdue.

Marshal Tito, in his New Year Message, rebuked lazy and extravagant officials, grumblers and rich peasants who hoarded their produce and evaded taxes. He also issued a warning against infiltration of the National Front and of local government bodies by dissident elements. The Prime Minister of Bosnia, after he had reorganised his Government and had sacked one or two people of uncertain loyalties, spoke in almost identical terms.

Bosnia, Macedonia and Montenegro all began the New Year with the adoption of their new Constitutions by their respective National Assemblies.

Greece has dropped out of the news for the time being, but Austria is still a target of criticism, and there is more publicity for developments in Zone A, complaints of the bad behaviour of Allied troops and stories of the forcible removal of private and industrial property from Pola prevailing.

Greece

New Year messages issued to the Greek people by leaders of all parties expressed the hope that 1947 would see an end to the unrest and hardships at present oppressing them and to the hostile propaganda campaign being waged against Greece by Russia and her satellites. The King, after referring sadly to the allies' rejection of Greece's claim against Bulgaria, was driven, in his search for words to comfort his people, to borrow from the coming year and to say that "1946 has, however, restored to the mother country the Greek Dodecanese."

The forthcoming investigation of conditions on Greece's frontiers by the United Nations Commission has been warmly welcomed, but the realists and cynics have been quick to observe that the Commission may be expected to see little, if anything. Not only will the Commission's activities be hampered by the difficulties of transport in a mountainous region in the depths of winter, but there is every likelihood that the advance notice of the Commission's visit will enable the bandit leaders to clear the border area of all signs of activity. There is already a marked reduction in the number of raids reported from N. Greece and this cannot be wholly attributed to the severe weather. Moreover, in order to lend colour to the theory of civil war rather than foreign intervention, the bandits are increasing their activities in Central and Southern Greece. Meanwhile the members of the Commission are to meet in Athens between the 28th and 30th January and lengthy discussions are being held on the provision of transport, accommodation, interpreters, rations and so forth. There is some controversy on the question whether or not the Commission should follow a prearranged and published itinerary.

M. Tsaldaris' economic discussions in Washington gave rise to much optimistic comment in the Greek press, arising largely from a statement made to the press by M. Tsaldaris himself on his return to Athens, but reports from the U.S.A. suggest that, despite the State Department's communiqué (see Summary No. 374), M. Tsaldaris made an unfavourable impression on U.S. Government officials. It is said that the net result of the visit was to lower the Premier's stock in the eyes of State Department and Treasury officials. It did not, however, influence their desire to give economic aid to the Greeks.

On the 6th January a report was issued in London by the Parliamentary delegation who visited Greece in August. After apportioning the blame for the present strife in Greece between the extreme Right and the extreme Left they reported a growing desire for a policy of reconciliation and urged the formation of an all-party government, possibly excluding the extreme Left. They also made the timely comment that, in looking for foreign aid, the Greeks should not forget that they must themselves do their utmost to put their own house in order. No Greek comment on the report is yet to hand.

Albania

In the course of a New Year message broadcast to the Albanian people Enver Hoxha has once more accused the U.K. and U.S. Governments of unfairness and hostility towards Albania. "The policy of the U.S. Government towards our country has been one of sending continual notes full of threats and menaces," declares this pugnacious message . . . . "The attitude of the British Government has been particularly offensive and hostile, and the conciliatory and friendly spirit consistently shown on our part has called forth nothing but a series of notes full of provocative slanders, together with numerous arbitrary, threatening and intimidating acts. British ships have thrice over brutally violated the sovereignty of our country. They have purposely created incidents at sea in order to charge our people with things for which they have not the least responsibility . . . The British Government now threatens to bring up the Corfu Channel incident before the Security Council. The Albanian Government, however, had already three times before this brought up before the Council the question of the violation of its sovereignty by British ships, and they therefore ask that their demand should be examined first." There followed a dark reference to the sinister machinations of certain British officials in their dealings with Albania; after which Hoxha went on to announce—somewhat unexpectedly—that the Albanian Government welcomed the Security Council's decision to send a commission of investigation to the troubled Greek border regions, adding: "We shall ensure them the fullest co-operation if they come to Albania: we have nothing to conceal."

While they have not yet lodged their complaint against Albania before the United Nations, H.M. Government, in accordance with the code of behaviour which Mr. Bevin commended to his colleagues in New York, have sent full details of the case to the Governments of the U.S.A., the U.S.S.R., France and China.

Bulgaria

With the 10th February—the day on which the treaties with the five Axis Satellites are to be signed—now hardly more than a month ahead, and with no sign whatever that the unrepresentative Bulgarian Government is to be even slightly broadened in accordance with the Moscow decision of December 1945, the question of its de jure recognition or otherwise by H.M. Government and the U.S. Government has come once more to the fore. So far as is known, the U.S. Government remain of the same mind as when, last October, they confidentially informed H.M. Government that, whatever the technical peacemaking difficulties involved, they would be extremely reluctant to extend recognition. H.M. Government, for their own part, have been anxiously considering precisely what would be gained, in the concrete, were they to take up that attitude themselves, and they strongly incline, although with reluctance, to the view that the general interest will best be served by our according de jure recognition at the time when the peace treaty is signed, but at the same time issuing a declaration that our action is a purely formal step which does not by any means imply that we condone the undemocratic activities of the Bulgarian Government. Unsatisfactory though such a course may be, it would undoubtedly facilitate the unambiguous conclusion of a peace treaty with Bulgaria—which alone can bring into operation the obligation on the Soviet Government, accepted by them last June, of withdrawing their military forces within 90 days of the treaty's coming into force. This it is which H.M. Government desire above all to secure.

As a result of the highly objectionable cartoon published recently in Trud to which reference was made in last week's Summary, General Oxley has been instructed to take up with the Allied Control Commission the matter of the increasingly frequent and offensive references to Great Britain to be found in more than one of the Government parties' newspapers. An apology has already appeared in three newspapers on behalf of Trud, as a result of representations to the Minister for Foreign Affairs by Mr. Barnes.

There have been some lively scenes in the Grand National Assembly during the last month or so. Petkov, a brave man, has been conspicuously outspoken. On one occasion he derisively rallied Dimitrov himself on the subject of his luxurious and secluded manner of living; and another time he accused Yugov, the Communist Minister of the Interior, of being a common murderer; in the ensuing argument Yugov thought it best to admit having committed two political murders—a notable understatement.

The debate on the budget continued in an atmosphere of exemplary calm. President Inönü's intervention between the Democratic Party and his own Republican People's Party has brought home the constitutional need for the Head of the State to be above party. At the same time the President has increased his prestige in the eyes of all sections except the die-hards of the Republican People's Party. The Prime Minister, M. Recep Peker, a forceful person, is reported to have tendered his resignation twice, but to have been told by the President to carry on and face the economic situation created by his devaluation policy.

The attention attracted to the Communist movement by its recent suppression in Istanbul, Izmir and many other towns led to the question being raised both in the press and in the Grand National Assembly whether religious teaching should not be resumed in the schools. Since the introduction of secularism by the Republic (in 1924), it was pointed out, there had been a notable decline in religion, life had largely lost its moral basis, and Communism had in consequence tended to creep in. The Prime Minister is reported to have replied—with some truth—in the Assembly that worship was free and that Turkey had suffered much in the past from clericalism; he therefore thought that the proper defence against Communism was to encourage, not religion, but patriotism. It is patriotism, however, which seems to have been showing itself inadequate as the foundation of Turkish life.

By recalling their Minister from Madrid "for consultation" the Turkish Government evidently seek to comply with the United Nations Resolution on the Spanish question—on which Turkey absained from voting—without giving offence to the Franco Government.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

On the 31st December, as the result of a demand by the Opposition for discussion of the Sudan situation arising from the Governor-General's statements, Nokrashy Pasha declared that it had been the concern of the present Cabinet since it came into office to remedy that regrettable situation, but he failed to say anything to put the Governor-General's statements in proper perspective. He referred to the Governor-General's letter to himself about the termination of the Grand Qadhi's appointment and his own representations to His Majesty's Government on the subject, and to the Governor-General's speech of the 22nd December. He said that the Chamber had reason to be displeased with such activity and such declarations by the Governor-General, and that he had represented to His Majesty's Government that it was necessary to know whether or not they were deliberately following a policy designed to sever the ties between Egypt and the Sudan. Unfortunately, he said, he had received no official information to reassure him on this point. He asserted that the unity of Egypt and the Sudan under the Egyptian Crown was confirmed by the will of the Sudanese themselves, and he expected His Majesty's Government to give a precise indication of their attitude towards this expression of Sudanese wishes.

This statement was followed by an enthusiastic demonstration of approval by Makram Obeid Pasha, now leader of the Opposition and by others, and a motion was unanimously passed supporting the Government in "its clear attitude for the safeguarding of the country's rights."

The Cairo press made favourable comments the next day, and Makram's paper, al Kotla, referred to "the patriotic and historic" meeting of the Chamber. The Wafdist Balagh appears to have been alone in criticising the Prime Minister, who was blamed for making things even worse than he found them.

The situation in the Sudan has eased somewhat as a result of the efforts of the Governor-General and his staff to re-create that feeling of confidence in the policy of His Majesty's Government which was so badly shaken by Sidky Pasha's statements. The Umma and Independent leaders succeeded in persuading their followers to resume co-operation with the Government, and their representatives finally agreed to attend the meeting of the Advisory Council on the 1st January and the administrative conference which follows it. Opinion in the northern provinces is against any drastic changes, and fears too speedy a hand-over of power to the Sudanese effendi class almost as much as increased Egyptian participation in the Government or a revival of a Mahdist régime under Saiyid Abdur Rahman. The pro-Egyptian Ashigga party has been weakened by internal dissensions resulting from the Egyptian refusal to agree to ultimate self-determination, but they continue to be helped to some degree by fear that the Independents aim at putting Saiyid Abdur Rahman on a throne.

Palestine

The new Zionist Executive, which was finally elected on the 29th December after protracted negotiations, is composed of eight General Zionists, seven members of the Poale Zion, and four Mizrachi. A ninth General Zionist has been added as a deputy member with a seat in Jerusalem. Mr. David Ben Gurion has been appointed Chairman. The new Executive has been received with little enthusiasm in Jerusalem, as it is regarded as unlikely to achieve unanimity on major issues.

Extensive searches have followed the kidnapping and beating of a British officer and N.C.Os. in Palestine, and a large number of Jews has been "screened" or detained for further examination. On the 2nd January the Irgun Zvai Leumi announced by posters in Tel Aviv that they would resume their attacks on military vehicles and stores of arms and supplies. Since that date there have been numerous incidents resulting in casualties, including the death of one British officer.

A sentence of flogging passed on a young Jew has been confirmed by the General Officer Commanding. This, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, is regarded in responsible Jewish circles as an open provocation of the Yishuv. A member of the Irgun who participated in an attack on a police station on the 23rd April, 1946, and was wounded and has been in hospital since, was condemned to death by a military court on the 1st January.

Hussein al Khalidi and Emil al Ghuri returned to Palestine from Cairo on the 30th December, and the Arab Higher Committee was summoned shortly afterwards to hear of important decisions taken in Egypt. The nature of these decisions is not known but may be inferred from a statement made to the Arab News Agency by al Ghuri in which he said that all faith in the good offices of Great Britain and America has been finally lost, and a life-and-death struggle must now be started. The murder of an Arab well known for his relations with the Jews and for the facilitation of land sales shews that the Mufti again controls an underground organisation capable of intimidating or liquidating first, "traitors" to the Arab cause, and later, persons obnoxious to himself on personal or political grounds.

Rumours that the Arab Higher Committee is to be enlarged by the addition of eight new members have not been confirmed. There is, however, reliable information that the Mufti has already incorporated four notorious renegades in it.

Transjordan

The Amir Feisal of Saudi Arabia arrived in Amman on the 30th December for a private visit. It had been originally intended that political questions, particularly that of Aqaba and Ma'an, should be discussed. Towards the end of December, however, the Transjordan Minister in Cairo was told by Yusuf Yasin that the Amir Feisal was ill and would not be returning to London for the Palestine Conference, but would like to visit Amman on the understanding that the state of his health would preclude political discussions. King Abdullah replied that he would be welcome in any case.

On the 6th January King Abdullah, accompanied by his younger son, Naif, embarked at Haifa for Turkey, where he is to be an official guest for some days.

Lebanon

The final party of French troops left Beirut on the 31st December, 1946, in accordance with the agreement of the 23rd March. In announcing this the Lebanese Foreign Minister paid a tribute to the generous spirit of understanding in which the French Government had concluded and carried out this agreement. The Prime Minister, Riad Bey as Solh, in the Chamber of Deputies also referred in complimentary terms to the punctuality with which the engagement had been fulfilled.

Iraq

Muhammad Hadid and Ali Mumtaz both eventually tendered their resignations, which were accepted. They had accused Salih Jabr and Sadiq al Bassam of malpractices in connection with the elections. These two also have resigned, according to one account because of this accusation, according to another, in order that they may be free to take part in the elections without Cabinet ties. The Cabinet has been reconstructed by the inclusion of Abdulillah Hafidh as Minister of Supply and Minister of Finance, and Abdul Hadi Chalabi as Minister of Communications. Jamil Abdul Wahhab, Minister for Social Affairs, will also act as Minister of Education.

Persia

On the 4th January it was announced that polling would take place in Tehran between the 11th and 17th January. As yet there is no news of the polling dates in the provinces. The vote is open to all male Persian subjects over twenty, with the exception of members of the armed forces, municipal and judicial officers, "political offenders" (a sufficiently elastic term), and those who have officially renounced the Moslem religion.

It is reported in the press that students of Tehran University, demonstrating on 5th January with demands for free elections, came into conflict with the police and that a number of casualties resulted on both sides. A deputation of students afterwards went to the Palace seeking an audience with the Shah. The Minister of Labour and Propaganda, Aramish, has emphatically denied allegations that the elections will not be free, saying that, as the voting has not yet begun, such accusations can have no foundation and can only come from those who are certain of defeat at the poll.

According to General Hashimi, Officer Commanding in Azerbaijan, there are still approximately 1,000 Democrats in hiding in Tabriz. They are reported to be receiving assistance from the Russian Consul, though nothing definite has been proven. The Russians are, however, constantly complaining of molestation and attacks on their property. These complaints are without justification, their object being apparently to intimidate Hashimi and provide the Soviet Ambassador in Tehran with pretexts for "warning" the Prime Minister. Hashimi is having difficulty in disarming the populace. Even with more men under his command he anticipates that the operation will take a long time. However, public opinion in Tabriz is favourable to him, and the people feel that he is equal to the task.

During the last two months the power of the Prime Minister's Iran Democrat Party has grown steadily, while that of the Tudeh appears to be waning. In Kerman, formerly a redoubtable Tudeh stronghold, the Democrats have won a very large following in spite of dissensions among their more influential members, while Tudeh fortunes and morale have declined. In Isfahan, despite poor leadership and lack of organisation, the Democrats have also gained a substantial following, though the power of the Tudeh is still considerable. Gilan province has seen a marked reduction in Tudeh activity with the appointment of a new military governor with wide powers. The arrest of several notorious Tudeh members at Pahlevi, including the Mayor and Harbour-master, has had beneficial results.

Nevertheless, the Tudeh are still strongly entrenched in Abadan and Khorramshahr, in both of which towns Democrat gains have been very slight. The Mazanderan rising, reported in last week's Summary (and probably intended to revindicate the pro-Soviet faction after its set-back in Azerbaijan), indicates that the party may still have some power—in spite of Qawam's repressive policy. Tudeh denunciations of this policy have been loud and vehement in recent weeks. On the 16th December the party issued a manifesto to the effect that, owing to the abolition of freedom in the country by the imposition of martial law in the industrial areas, and the prohibition of political meetings, they would take no part in the forthcoming elections. The Tudeh have doubtless taken this line in order to avoid the loss of prestige which would result from a decisive defeat in the elections and thereby reduce the effectiveness of their future activities.

Mulla Mustafa of Barzan is once more causing trouble in Kurdistan. He is at present encamped at Naqadeh, 40 miles north-west of Mahabad, with a following variously estimated at between one and two thousand and three field guns. He has asked the General Officer Commanding to try and obtain pardon for him from the 'Iraqi Government or, failing that, permission for him to reside in Persia. The matter is under consideration by the Minister for Foreign Affairs; meanwhile a Persian cavalry brigade has been sent to counter the threat to security which his presence constitutes.

The disunity in Kurdistan mentioned in Summary No. 369 is borne out by a reported split in the Mahabad Kurds into two parties, one under Mulla Khalil of the Mangur tribe, and the other under Ali Agha Haji Ilkhani, son of Haji Karrani Agha of the Mamesh. The Mangur, Mamesh and Dehmukri tribes are reported to have fallen out with the Komala Kurds who are, or were, friendly towards the Azerbaijanis. Both Qazi Muhammad, the leader of the Kurdish "Democrats," and Mulla Mustafa are reported to have received considerable Russian assistance during the period immediately preceding the operations in Azerbaijan, although, possibly as a result of internal dissensions, they have shown little activity for some time.

THE FAR EAST

Indonesia

The return of the Commission-General, armed with the Netherlands Government's authority to sign the draft Agreement on the understanding that its provisions shall be interpreted strictly in accordance with the additional Minutes submitted, is awaited by the Indonesian leaders with little enthusiasm and a good deal of apprehension. Much valuable time has been lost, and the lengthy explanation supplied to the Netherlands Government and the latter's final statement have created an uneasy feeling in Java that, however necessary it may have been to appease the opposition parties in Holland, the outcome may mean modifications totally unacceptable to the Indonesians. Furthermore, in the interior, opposition to the draft Agreement is reported to be gathering strength. So far, in the Central National Committee (the Provisional Parliament of the Republic of Indonesia), which has a total membership of 205, the following Parties have declared for the adoption of the Agreement:—

The Socialist Party with 34 seats,
The Communist Party with 1 seat,
The Catholic Party with 2 seats,
Socialist Youth Party with 2 seats,
Laskar Rajat (People's Army) 2 seats, while the following have declared for the rejection of the draft Agreement:—

P.N.I. (Partai Nasional Indonesia) with 46 seats,
(The P.N.I. was founded by Dr. Soekarno, and numbers four Republican Ministers among its members),
The Masjoemi Party (Moslem Party) with 37 seats.

Eleven other minor parties, plus a number of non-partisans have not yet recorded their decisions. It is expected, however, that when the Central National Committee meets on the 27th January, it will support the Indonesian Cabinet, especially as Mr. Sjahrir has a considerable following in the Masjoemi Party.

Unfortunately, far from the military situation tending to ease the steadily mounting political tension, mutual recriminations concerning the failure to arrange a workable truce have been freely voiced in the local press. On all parts of the perimeters the temporary lull that followed the Truce Agreement gave place to considerable firing on both sides; skirmishing at Medan, Bandœng and Padang became particularly brisk. While early in December the position at Padang showed a temporary improvement, as the outcome of a mutual agreement to patrol a two kilometre neutral zone by civil police of both sides, the confidence that showed signs of emerging from this happy arrangement was rudely shattered but a week later by adverse developments at Buitenzorg. The precise initial causes of this outbreak are obscure. One Dutch report states that the Republican radio station in the town, contrary to the truce undertaking, persisted in broadcasting "fresh information of a tactical nature" and that, therefore, the station was occupied by Netherlands armed forces and the Mayor and staff detained for interrogation. Another report is that the electric power station in Buitenzorg, which supplies Batavia, was occupied by a detachment of Netherlands troops after a brush with the Indonesian police, and the Indonesian Mayor, his Secretary and two Assistants were arrested for their share in permitting an infraction of existing agreements. The development of an ugly situation was only prevented by a joint Dutch-Indonesian mission of investigation, which decided to release the Mayor and to refer the incident to the Joint Commission for the political application of the truce. The unfavourable impression created still lingers, however. And, together with the expulsion of three Republican journalists from Den Pasar, this episode is reported to be stimulating public opposition to acceptance of the Draft Agreement.

Nor has the political atmosphere been improved by a broadcast delivered from Jogjakarta on the 26th December by General Soedirman, Commander-in-Chief of the Republican Forces, in which he is reported to have declared that the actions of the Netherlands forces were endangering the independence of the Republic and that Indonesians must refuse to be intimidated by Dutch might, and, therefore, his orders were: "Fight; consolidate and improve co-operation between all available forces; despatch medicines, arms and forces to the front line; operate in unison, not as isolated units; and always be prepared, strong, careful and on your guard."

Dr. van Mook's reply to this outburst in his New Year speech was not conciliatory. He pointed out that General Soedirman's statements were apt to lead to renewed conflict and so to delay, or even endanger, the solution of their problem. He maintained that, while the Dutch had adopted a clear-cut attitude particularly regarding the draft Agreement, Indonesian aims were becoming increasingly obscure. He thought that General Soedirman's broadcast was based on preconceived ideas which had little relation to the facts of the situation. And he declared that the Netherlands were determined to adopt a strong policy against irresponsible elements. The report adds that Dr. van Mook concluded his speech with the statement: "The use of force is necessary sometimes to compel those who are unreasonable to listen to reason."

The note of "law and order" stressed both in this and the speeches delivered by the Lieutenant-Governor at the Den Pasar Conference is reported to have been so enthusiastically received in local reactionary circles that the newspapers warned him that he was in danger of becoming quite popular with his own people.

Although the unpleasantness caused by General Soedirman's outburst is reported to have been smoothed over by Mr. Sjahrir, it has undoubtedly had widespread repercussions. According to the latest reports, the military positions in various sectors have registered a marked deterioration. More especially is this so at Medan and Palembang, at which latter place it has been found necessary to reply to Indonesian attacks by using rocket-firing Mitchell bombers.

The Den Pasar Conference was preceded by a series of preliminary conferences, presided over by Dr. Hoven, Netherlands Commissioner for Borneo and the Great East, at which the tasks of the future Government of the new Great East State were outlined. Journalists who arrived at Den Pasar on the 11th December included three who were reported to be carrying propaganda material for distribution among the delegates to the Den Pasar Conference. Some of this material, including a political caricature of Dr. van Mook, in which he is asked by soldiers "Shall we drop bombs again, boss?" and replies: "Wait, I have to talk peace first," was pronounced to be at variance with the letter and spirit of the Cheribon Draft Agreement and likely to undermine Netherlands-Indonesian co-operation. The three offending journalists were accordingly deported from Den Pasar and with them went other journalists who claimed to have been sent by the Indonesian Ministry of Information.

On the 18th December, the many times postponed Den Pasar Conference—the successor to the Malino Conference—for the Outer Islands was convened by Dr. van Mook. The Conference was attended by Delegates from all the islands comprising the "Great East," i.e., from and including Celebes to, but not including, New Guinea.

It was decided to establish a State of East Indonesia, and to base the constitutional structure of the new State on the principles agreed upon at the Malino Conference. East Indonesia, of which Macassar is to be the Capital, will become a member State of the United States of Indonesia, enjoying equal rights with other members. There will be a Commissioner of the Crown to assist in the preparation of the State organisation, general administration and legislation. And a Committee of five, which included two representatives of Dutch nationality, was elected to work out a Constitution.

Tjokordo Gde Rate Soekawati was elected Temporary President of the new State. Soekawati, born in 1899, is described as a Balinese nobleman. He entered the Civil Service of the Netherlands East Indies in 1918 and in 1924 was appointed a member of the People's Council, which office he held until the Japanese invasion in 1942. He is not known to have collaborated with the Japanese, but resumed work in connection with the civil administration of Bali immediately after the Japanese capitulation. Najamoeddin Daeng Malewa was appointed Prime Minister and entrusted with the task of forming a Cabinet. Najamoeddin, a native of Celebes, is well known as an opportunist and a collaborator with the Japanese. The Provisional Parliament is to hold its initial meeting on the 1st March, 1947, and the first item on the Agenda is to be the colour of the State flag, which Dr. van Mook appears anxious should not be the red and white of the Indonesian Republic.

French Indo-China (see also under "France").

According to press reports, M. Moutet, Minister for Overseas Territories, who has been making a rapid tour of Cochin-China, Cambodia and Laos, has received from the competent administrations assurances of co-operation with the French Government in the task of building an Indo-Chinese Federation within the framework of the French Union. He has also visited Hanoi, where he is reported to have made an announcement that the Viet-Nam attack had been proved to be premeditated and that a military decision was necessary before any negotiations could be undertaken. M. Sainteny, French Commissioner for Tonking, appeared to underline this statement when he said that the Viet-Nam people had been criminally deceived (by their Government) and that it would be the task of the nation to discover men with sufficient capacity to take over the direction of affairs. It is a little difficult to reconcile these statements with M. Moutet's subsequent talk to the press in Saigon in which he is reported to have said that the French attitude to President Ho Chi Minh was unchanged, but during his visit to Hanoi the President had made no effort to get in touch with him. But since he added that possibly Ho Chi Minh was not a free man, the suggestion may be that the French would be prepared to treat with him if he could throw out the military hotheads and form a new Government.

Meanwhile the High Commissioner, Admiral d'Argenlieu, in a Christmas message, has cleared the air by a re-statement of French policy. He is reported to have said, in part: "France has moral and material interests which she can neither compromise nor discuss. She regards as essential the preservation and development of her cultural influence and economic interests, the protection of ethnical minorities, the implementation of her international obligations and the security of the strategic bases for the common defence of the Federation and the French Union. She does not wish to re-establish her sovereignty in its old form; she does not want to interfere in the administration and internal government of the Indo-Chinese States, but she cannot at the present stage grant them unconditional and total independence." This statement accords with various pronouncements of the French Government and of M. Moutet in person.

The military situation has changed little. French press reports give the total strength of the Viet-Nam army at 100,000. It is estimated that the French forces now amount to 85,000 and that further reinforcements shortly to embark will add another 10,000. On the other hand it is understood that the training and equipment of the Viet-Nam forces is inferior to that of the French. French casualties up to 1st January are given as 183 killed, 386 wounded and 28 missing; of civilians, about 150 are known to have been killed and the same number to be missing, but figures are incomplete and uneasiness is felt as to the possible fate of a number taken as hostages. Laos and Cambodia are quiet, but there is great disorder and lawlessness in Cochin-China.

Chinese communities in Haiphong, Hanoi, Huë and elsewhere, have suffered severely. Government circles in Nanking are quoted as stating that China relies on France to protect her nationals in Indo-China and would not deal with Viet-Nam or with any dissident party in China. With the knowledge of the French authorities, the Chinese Consul-General in Hanoi is negotiating with local Viet-Nam forces for their withdrawal from quarters where there is a large Chinese and Indian population, and is being assisted by his American and British colleagues.

Radio Paris reports the publication of a new Customs tariff for Indo-China instituting uniform duties for all countries in the Federation as a prelude to an Indo-Chinese Customs union.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The 80th Congress of the United States—the first to be elected since the Second World War and the first in sixteen years to have a clear Republican majority in both the Senate and the House of Representatives—is now in session. The two Houses assembled to swear in new members and to elect their principal officers on the 3rd January. Business began in earnest three days later when they met in joint session to hear the President deliver his Annual Message on the State of the Union. On this anxiously-awaited occasion Mr. Truman said much that he had previously been expected to say. He outlined a four-point programme to deal with the problem of labour. This included the early enactment of legislation to outlaw "jurisdictional" strikes, the extension of facilities for collective bargaining under the ægis of the Department of Labour, the development of a more liberal programme of social legislation to give the workers a sense of security, and the appointment of a temporary joint commission by Congress to inquire into the whole question of relations between employers and labour. (The appointment of such a commission had originally been recommended by the President at a joint session of Congress during the railway strike last May). Turning to the international picture, Mr. Truman said that, whatever the defects of the peace treaties, he was convinced that those for Italy, Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary were "as good as we can hope to obtain among the principal wartime Allies." Early in his Message the President admitted that there might be "honest differences of opinion" between himself and Congress. Yet, he added, "there are ways of disagreeing: we who differ can still work together together sincerely for the common good. We shall be risking the nation's safety and destroying our opportunities for progress if we do not settle any disagreements in this spirit without thought of partisan advantage."

The message has had a good press but it remains to be seen how the Republicans on Capitol Hill will respond to this and other recent appeals for co-operation. In the House of Representatives, the principal Republican spokesman, Congressman Joseph W. Martin, followed his election as Speaker on the 3rd January with an eloquent plea for "unsurpassed" collaboration between the two parties "for the constructive accomplishment of good government." Yet the good-will now existing between the President and Congress is likely to be put to an early test as the Republicans unfold their own labour policy. Congressman Harold Knutson, the new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, is also likely to subject the situation to some strain if he persists with his plan for retrenchment in the Federal Government and for a 20 per cent. reduction in the private income tax.

In the Senate the first meeting of the 3rd January found the Liberal Democrats of the North in unusual agreement with the Republicans against their own Conservative party-colleagues from the South. This was on a motion by Senator Glen H. Taylor (Democrat, Idaho) to prevent the notorious Senator Theodore G. Bilbo (Democrat, Mississippi) from taking his seat until the Rules Committee had studied evidence of coercion of negro voters and of bribery by Mississippi war contractors which had recently been collected against him. With the party's National Committee on the look out for ways and means of winning over the negro vote in the North in 1948, the charges against Mr. Bilbo could not fail to be grist to the Republican mill. Meeting in Washington on the 31st December, the Republican Steering Committee decided to place the fight to unseat the Mississippi Senator at the top of its agenda. In the Senate on the 3rd January a handful of Democrats from the deep South retaliated by threatening to talk indefinitely (i.e., to "filibuster") so that a vote on Mr. Bilbo's fitness to serve could not be taken. On the following day, however, a truce was reached when it was announced that Mr. Bilbo was in any case leaving Washington for a serious cancer operation. The senior Senator from Mississippi at the moment draws his salary and allowances without taking his oath—which means that the Republicans can still debar him by a simple majority (which they command), instead of having subsequently to expel him by a two-thirds majority (which they do not command).

The Bilbo case, along with all the publicity which has been given to it, is significant in that it has tended to distract attention from the internecine jealousies which the scramble for posts in the new Congress has disclosed in the Republican party itself. These jealousies have recently reached the pitch at which Senator Charles W. Tobey, who ranks fifth among Republican members of the Upper House, has publicly joined issue with Senator Taft and the "Old Guard" for endeavouring to dispose of Senator Committee appointments (now reduced in number under the La Follette–Monroney Act) without waiting either for the preparatory meeting of the Republican Senators and Senators-elect on the 30th December or for the opening session of Congress itself on the 3rd January.

As it emerged from the preparatory meeting of the 30th December and from subsequent Republican "caucuses," the list of party and Senate appointments is heavily weighted in favour of Mr. Taft and his friends. The ubiquitous Senator from Ohio—who was once described as "the man with the Senate's most brilliant nineteenth-century mind"—himself retains the chairmanship of the Republican Steering Committee, which is henceforth to enjoy the more expressive title of "Committee on Policy." (The Committee has meanwhile been packed with Middle-Westerners sympathetic to Senator Taft's views and interests) Senator Taft is also to become chairman of the Senate Committee on Labour and Public Welfare, although Senator Vandenberg, who becomes Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has been chosen as President of the Senate pro tempore. Senator Taft's influence with the Chairman of the Republican National Committee is said to have been responsible for the recent dismissal of the party's chief woman officer, Miss Marion E. Martin, who had been supporting the Senator's principal rival, Governor Dewey. Governor Dewey himself, however, seems to be in no danger of losing his front seat in party affairs. Under his sponsorship, Congressman Charles A. Halleck of Indiana has managed to secure the much-coveted post of Republican Majority Leader in the House of Representatives. Governor Dewey's inaugural address at Albany on the 1st January, in which he dealt much more with national and international than with New York State affairs, has also given him a useful opportunity to keep his Presidential qualifications before the public.

On the 31st December, by proclaiming the "cessation of hostilities of World War II" as of 12 noon that day, President Truman forestalled those Republican leaders who have been pressing for the early abolition of the remaining war controls and powers. As it was worded, his proclamation meant that about twenty war-time statutes ceased to be effective immediately and that another thirty-three would expire within periods ranging from six months to two years. Much of this legislation is purely domestic in scope, and it includes the all-important War Labour Disputes Act—the so-called "Smith–Connally Act"—of the 25th June, 1943, under which the Government has authority to seize strike-bound industries until the "cessation of hostilities" and to go on administering those already seized until six months thereafter. Other legislation affected is that to expedite the admission of G.I. brides into the United States, to permit U.S. forces abroad to receive tax-free tobacco, to extend loans to stabilize farm prices, to regulate the immigration of agricultural workers from Western Hemisphere countries and to dispose of surplus United States property. The entire position is, however, complicated by the fact that many of the wartime Acts are not limited in duration by the "cessation of hostilities": they continue as long as the "national emergency" proclaimed by President Roosevelt and the "state of war" are in force. On the 31st December Mr. Truman made it clear that he had not terminated either the "national emergency" or the "state of war." In any case he seems to have issued his proclamation without reference to the United States Service Departments, which stand to lose much of their authority when the war really ends, and he also apparently acted without waiting for the Attorney-General's Office in Washington to finish a study which it has been making of the constitutional difficulties involved in the whole transition from war to peace.

Further representations have been made by His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington regarding the advertisements appealing for funds to support resistance in Palestine which have appeared in the New York press. In this connexion an attempt has been made to impress upon Mr. Byrnes the reluctance of His Majesty's Government to have a situation develop in which it could be pointed out to the United Nations that it is becoming difficult to carry out the Palestine mandate because of interference by the nationals of another United Nations member like the United States. In replying to these representations Mr. Byrnes has been sympathetic, but he has not been able to hold out any promise of preventing the offending advertisements from re-appearing.

On the 7th January the President announced that he had accepted the resignation of Mr. Byrnes as Secretary of State and that he would nominate General George C. Marshall to take his place. In making this announcement—which apparently took the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (the body in the Upper House with which the Secretary of State is most closely associated) completely by surprise—Mr. Truman released two letters from Mr. Byrnes which indicated that, as early as the 16th April, 1946, the latter had been advised by his doctors to "slow down." General Marshall, who is 66 years of age, was United States Chief of Staff from 1939 to 1945. In 1945 President Truman sent him as his personal envoy to China to try to compose the differences between the Chungking Government and the Communists.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

Since his assumption of presidential power General Perón has had less time for the affairs of his "beloved shirtless," and the task of holding the affections of the mass has devolved upon his wife. Dona Evita has visited various provinces for declamatory purposes, and her appearance at Tucumán attracted such a concourse that the police were unable to control her admirers and several persons were crushed to death. Sra. Perón has succeeded in completely overshadowing Sr. Freire, the present head of the Secretariat of Labour and Social Security. While, therefore, unions hasten to offer their adherence to the régime and the President's lady, they are not always prepared to accept the discipline of the Secretariat, and there have been numerous unofficial stoppages of work. Nevertheless, the organisation of labour continues to progress. The Confederación General del Trabajo now claims 700,000 members, and hopes to reach a million in a few months, thus surpassing in size the Mexican organization and becoming the largest in Latin America. The Argentine C.G.T. is fully determined to play its part in politics, and its Secretary-General, Sr. Luis Gay, has recently compared it with M. Jouhaux's C.G.T. in France, the C.I.O. in the United States and the Chilean Confederation. In view of Sr. Gay's reference to the C.I.O., it is interesting to note that when an invitation was extended to the two United States labour organisations to visit Argentina, the radical C.I.O. refused on the ground that Argentina was still under Fascist influence, while the A.F. of L. has accepted.

Brazil

The focus of interest in Brazilian politics at present is the holding of elections for State governors and legislatures, but the national political situation continues to become steadily confused in a peculiarly Brazilian way. At the beginning of December the "opposition" U.D.N. authorised their members to co-operate with the Government, while not committing themselves to support of the Government's policy (see Summary No. 372). As a result, two U.D.N. Ministers were appointed, Sr. Raúl Fernandes to Foreign Affairs and Sr. Clemente Mariani to Health. The reconstruction of the cabinet, which began last September, was thus completed, and President Dutra found himself with five non-party members, one member of the Republican Party, two of the "opposition" U.D.N. and two of his own P.S.D., as follows:—

Justice: Dr. Benedito Costa Netto (P.S.D.).
Foreign Affairs: Dr. Raul Fernandes (U.D.N.).
Communications: Dr. Clovis Pestana (P.S.D.).
Agriculture: Dr. Daniel de Carvalho (Republican).
Education and Health: Dr. Clemente Pariani (U.D.N.).
Finance: Dr. Pedro Luiz Correia e Castro (Non-party).
Industry: Sr. Morvan Dias Figueiredo (Non-party).
War: Gen. Canrobert Pereira da Costa (id).
Marine: Almirante Silvio da Noronha (id.).
Air: Brig. Armando Trompowski (id).

The weak representation of the P.S.D. is due to the secession, or threatened secession of much of the party to ex-President Vargas. Nevertheless, the result is likely to annoy all members of the P.S.D. who are loyal to President Dutra, and to precipitate the secession of those who are Vargas' men. There is, moreover, a division of opinion in the U.D.N. on the question of co-operation with President Dutra which Dr. Mangabeira, the party leader, favours, but others, including Virgilio Mello Franco and José Américo, oppose. Should Dr. Mangabeira be elected Governor of Bahia this month, as seems likely, he would leave the U.D.N. in a highly friable condition.

Meanwhile, the anti-Communist campaign has been fed by one or two incidents—the withdrawal of a Brazilian second Secretary from Moscow, following an incident in a restaurant, and the arrest of an official of the Minstry of War, who admitted having orders from the Brazilian Communist Party to copy correspondence and search waste-paper baskets.

The cabinet appointed by President Alemán (see Summary No. 372) is perhaps most noteworthy for the proportion of "non-political" members. True, the President has protected himself by awarding the Ministry of Health to the Chairman of the "Institutional Revolution Party" (alias P.R.M.), but about six of those designated do not belong to any party. In view of President Alemán's business interests, it is perhaps not surprising that the newcomers include industrialists and business men. President Alemán is reported to be on good terms with ex-President Abelardo Rodríguez, latterly Governor of Sonora and strongly anti-Communist. The new Minister of War is a former associate of General Rodríguez. But whether this and the fact that he has broken with revolutionary tradition by appearing in that reactionary garment, the boiled shirt, really means that President Alemán will shake off the left-wing influence of General Cárdenas, remains to be seen. Two of the new ministers, those of Agriculture and Labour, are pronounced left-wingers, and President Alemán was endorsed up to the hilt by the powerful labour leader Sr. Lombardo Toledano. A broadcast report recently quoted Lombardo Toledano as denouncing Communist interference in the Mexican Unions, but such a striking change of face requires confirmation.

GERMANY

Preparation of the report for Conference of Foreign Ministers was the chief subject of discussion in the Co-ordinating Committee and the Control Council on the 8th and 10th January. Where disagreement arose, which it did in particular over the removal of equipment from Germany, the usual division between the delegates was followed, but the impression of a desire for personal friendliness on the Soviet side becomes more apparent at every meeting. While the Soviet representatives remained perfectly firm on issues which they considered vital, they were obviously at pains to be as conciliatory as possible and to avoid a break down—in the face of American unwillingness to make any sacrifices in order to secure a report. As regards former German armed forces, the Western representatives on the Co-ordinating Committee wished to include in the statement on the numbers of prisoners inside Germany, the figures for those held outside the country and to give similar information about Germans absorbed into the armed forces of the occupying Powers. When the Russians contended that the Council should not deal with matters outside Germany, General Clay replied that in that case he would not supply any figures at all. At the Russian request, the matter was referred to the Control Council. In the Council, Marshal Sokolovsky categorically denied that any German Generals, officers or soldiers were held in military units either in the Soviet zone or in the U.S.S.R. or that any German service men had been absorbed into the "qualified armed forces" in either region. He further stated that no prisoners-of-war were held as such in the Soviet zone, but that he knew nothing about those in the U.S.S.R., although if the Conference asked for information it would "probably" be given. The Committee is still trying to reach an agreed report. It may be noted, however, that all reports so far received almost certainly prove, not only that numbers of ex-officers and technicians are employed to advise or instruct the Soviet forces (although the Russians may not consider them to be absorbed in those forces), but that in at least one case a German unit under Russian officers was located in the Soviet zone within the last two months, and that other small formations were to be found outside the country. Information has not yet been received to show that these have been disbanded. Despite the Soviet assurance on prisoners-of-war, numbers of ex-officers are known to be held in camps in the Soviet zone although they may be classed as "internees." A major clash occurred when the Soviet delegate in the Co-ordinating Committee sought to elicit from the Western zones a complete catalogue of industrial plants destined for removal or retention or which had already been removed, although he showed no intention of furnishing such information himself. He maintained that the Foreign Ministers would call for this information if needed. General Clay refused to supply any details on these terms, and both the U.K. and U.S. representatives are consulting their respective Governments.

Signs of a more pliant attitude on the part of the French were revealed in a statement to the Committee that French delegates were willing to take part in discussions on Central Administrations. Next day, the 9th January, General Noiret told General Robertson that he had hopes of a solution to this problem, provided France was assured that Central Administrations would not lead to a highly centralised Government structure. It is unfortunate that the occasion of this encouraging statement should have been General Noiret's visit to complain of the Anglo-U.S. decision to charge the French zone in dollars for exports from the Joint Zone. The French Government are stated to take a serious view of the step, believing it to be a contravention of the four-Power conception of Germany which will result in the creation of customs barriers between the zones. General Noiret was assured that this was not the intention and that the step had, of course, been forced on the two Governments by the French refusal to participate in the fusion plan.

Other matters dealt with in the Coordinating Committee included the destruction of damaged German warships held by the Russians (discussed in Summary No. 370). H.M. Government had tabled a formal note on the subject. At long last the Committee was informed that a reply was being handed to H.M. Embassy in Moscow stating that the Soviet Authorities had not been able to get on with the work of destruction as they lacked resources to carry out such a large task, but they were now taking the necessary measures to fulfil their obligations. (Previous evidence had suggested that some ships were being repaired.)

Reports over the last few weeks (some of which were discussed in Summaries Nos. 375 and 373) raised the question of one of the most important undecided political factors in Germany—the relative strength of those Communists who are at all costs subservient to Moscow and those who ultimately place "German" interests first. Among the leaders the former class is likely to be composed mainly of emigrés trained in Moscow. There has always been a strong faction among German Communists who are Germans first and foremost, but the dividing line is blurred by uncertainty among these whether German interests can best be served by leaning on Russia or by speaking out when her policy conflicts with German desires and thus maintaining the popularity of the party with the German public. There have recently been signs of reaction against Russia, particularly among Communists in the British zone. This was referred to in Summary No. 373, when it was stated, however, that there is yet no real indication of a fundamental change in SED policy or that the party as a whole is ready to come into open disagreement with Russian economic aims. In general the latest reports confirm this view, but throw interesting new light on SED aims and tactics. Immediately after the Berlin election, several SED leaders privately blamed their defeat on dependence on the Russians and also complained of the undue influence of emigré leaders. Representations were also made to the Russians about the deportation of scientists and in strong terms about the Eastern frontier. The latter complaint, coming shortly after Stalin's statement on the 29th October that the frontier was final, may have seemed little short of insolent to Moscow and might tend to raise doubts in Russian minds about the possibility of working in alliance with the present or indeed any other SED leaders. In public, however, the SED has continued to stress the need for Germany to lean on Russia. Disinclination to oppose Russian economic policy, and possibly a degree of deception, is reflected in the confident statement of a SED leader that reparations from current production will cease with the coming of a peace treaty. This view conflicts with the Soviet approach to General Clay offering a scaling up of German industry in return for agreement to take reparations from current production. In general the SED appears to be biding its time and to be prepared to put up for a time with a degree of unpopularity among the Germans (which they will try to counteract by energetic campaigns against "Reaction") in return for Russian support. The attitude of an SED leader, originally of the SPD, towards the Eastern frontier reported in last week's Summary, seems typical of the difficult course which the party is trying to steer between the Scylla and Charybdis of pro-Russianism and chauvinism. Other reports indicate, however, that the same leader and a number of his colleagues do not really believe that the last word has been said about the Eastern frontier, they have vehemently denied, it appears, that they would ever abandon a foot of German soil. In the opinion of a leading member, Germany's only hope is to prove herself "democratic" (although he admitted the outlook for this was not bright) for then Russia would prefer a "democratic Germany" east of the Oder to a "national-fascist" Poland. He was convinced that Russia did not wish to swallow up any German territory and that it was not necessary for the Germans to turn Communists to satisfy the Russians.

A delegation from the South Schleswig Association accompanied by the Danish Consul in Flensburg was received by the Danish Premier and Minister for Foreign Affairs on the 7th January. It is understood that the Danish Government has been asked to forward to the Council of Foreign Ministers a request that South Schleswig should be granted autonomy during a transitional period until a fresh plebiscite can take place. The demands are not new, and this latest step is most unlikely to contribute towards a solution of the problem. It is of interest that this is the first time the Association has been officially received in Copenhagen by the Danish Government.

AUSTRIA

The Austrian Government have sent a Note to the British Government asking that a representative should be allowed to state the Austrian case before the Deputies meeting in London to discuss the Austrian Treaty.

General Clark, who is to be the U.S. Deputy at the talks, is to be succeeded as High Commissioner in Austria by Lieut.-Gen. Geoffrey Keyes, Commanding the Third Army in Germany. General Keyes is now General Clark's deputy, and will take over from him "probably in the early summer," as General Clark told a press conference on the 6th January. The exact date of his departure for his new appointment in the United States depends upon the success of the Treaty talks. He had "great hopes," and spoke of his Russian colleagues' "increasing desire for co-operation."

The Allied Council met on the 10th January, and the meeting was again cordial. The main item was the discussion of the food supply for the next rationing period. The food plan originally submitted by the Austrian Government showed a deficit of 25,000 tons of flour, but this was reduced to 12,885 tons by the arrival of U.N.R.R.A. supplies and the use of 6,000 tons originally earmarked as a winter reserve for inaccessible places. Before the meeting the Soviet and United States High Commissioners had reached agreement in bilateral discussion on the use of reserve indigenous supplies from their zones, and their proposals to use these stocks and a small amount from the British zone were put before the meeting. The British representative protested that these so-called contributions from the U.S. and Soviet zones were indigenous resources at the full disposal of the Austrian Government, in accordance with the often-repeated resolutions of the Allied Council. The plan was, however, passed, and the amount of indigenous food consumed in excess of the quota is to be replaced by later UNRRA imports. Unsatisfactory features of the arrangement were the fact that a bilateral agreement was made and placed before the Council for approval; and the fact that the U.S. authorities had offered the Government 500 tons of flour from military stocks on condition that this should be consumed only in the U.S. zone and in Vienna, which, again, is against the principle that all food supplies should be pooled.

General Kurasov then proposed that displaced persons should be excluded from the next food plan, and stressed the need for ridding Austria of displaced persons. While the British, U.S. and French representatives agreed with him on the urgency of the problem, they did not agree that their rations should be stopped. The British representative pointed out that many displaced persons were working and thus entitled to food rations. The inconclusive discussion ended without a decision.

The Council considered a letter from the Chancellor drawing attention to the fuel and power crisis, and asking for Allied support in getting additional coal supplied from abroad. He also asked for the curtailment of coal consumption by the occupying Powers and that any saving should be given to the Austrian Government. The urgency of the problem was fully appreciated by the Council, and a special meeting of the Executive Committee on the 14th January is to deal with the matter and take immediate steps.

The fuel crisis in Austria has reached a point where almost the whole of Austrian industry is at a standstill, schools and all entertainments are closed, papers have ceased publication and the Alpenland radio transmitter closed down, while from the 15th January passenger railway traffic, both steam-driven and electric, has stopped on all Austrian railways.

There have been some changes in the Austrian Government, but the party representation remains the same, a fact which has aroused Communist indignation and a renewed plea for new elections. Dr. Frenzel, Minister of Food, has been replaced by Otto Sagmeister, another Socialist, and a member of the Co-operative movement. Franz Rauscher, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry for the Safeguarding of Property is replaced by Karl Mantler, a prominent Trade Unionist who spent the war in Dachau and Buchenwald, and Lois Weinberger, Minister without Portfolio, is replaced by Erwin Altenburger, who comes from the Catholic Trade Union movement. Dr. Frenzel, who is not of high calibre, has resigned on health grounds, and Weinberger is said to wish to devote himself completely to his work as Vice-Burgomaster of Vienna.

The Conference of the Socialist Parties of the Danubian States met in Prague in mid-December. Accounts of a closed meeting held at this Conference go further than accounts published at the time. Apparently the Austrian delegation went so far as to advocate complete freedom of trade for all goods between the Danubian States, the removal of passport and visa restriction and the co-ordination of transport. It was recognised that this programme could not be immediately realised, but that, nevertheless, it was "essential for the unity of the Danubian States." This is an important indication of policy from the Austrian Socialist Party.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Czechoslovak delegation attending the London discussions on Germany and Austria is arriving here about the 14th January. M. Masaryk will be accompanied by Dr. Lisický, a career diplomat attached as special envoy to the Embassy in London and one of the leading delegates in Paris and New York. Dr. Heidrich, Secretary General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and Dr. Hajdu, Head of the Peace Treaty Division of the Ministry, are the other leading delegates. Their personal sympathies are, on the whole, towards the western democracies, but Czechoslovakia manifests the age-old hostility of Slav to Teuton which means that its attitude to German problems goes rather deeper than that of a country which suffered temporary obliteration by Hitler. Germany, in the form developed under Prussian domination and, subsequently, Nazi hegemony, haunts the mind of Bohemia, and therefore Czechoslovakia will judge the outcome of the peace talks by the extent to which that ghost has been laid. Apart from Soviet influence upon policy, public opinion obliges Czechoslovak statesmen to take up what appears to be an uncompromising position in this matter. Members of the moderate parties, fearing the undue capital likely to accrue to the Communists, sound uncompromising nationalists, even going so far as to embarrass the Foreign Minister and Under-Secretary by the zeal of their representations.

One complication for M. Masaryk is the fact that the most important territorial claims against Germany are those where Czechoslovakia marches with Polish-occupied Silesia. Here the Czech claims to the Zittau (Zitava), Glatz (Kladsko) and Leobschutz (Hlubčice) salients conflict with Polish interests. Despite manifestos on either side, the friction, originating in the dispute over Teschen (Těšín) and augmented by the Polish occupation, has not been removed.

Unless modified in the light of the Polish fait accompli, and the probably unfavourable attitude of the Great Powers, Czechoslovak claims on Germany will be for a general straightening of the frontier and an advance of some ten to twenty kilometres into Bavaria, Saxony and Silesia. The claims are based upon historical, economic and military arguments. The first are not very strong, although, in the case of Glatz and Zittau, they are stronger than the Polish claims. Economically the acquired territory would increase Czechoslovakia's already considerable forest resources, although these suffered as a result of German exploitation and the loss of Ruthenia to the Soviet Ukraine; the claim on Silesia would improve the north Bohemian communications system and take in the Waldenburg coalfield. From the point of view of defence against Germany the gains would be of local tactical value, but would not alter the general strategic picture.

Czechoslovakia's relations with Austria are not to be compared to Czech-German relations, seeing that both share a dislike of German imperialism. Austria, too, in itself offers no direct threat to Czechoslovak security. Bohemia at least, if not Slovakia, has strong cultural affinities with Austria which were not destroyed by the rupture of the old Empire. Post-war developments between these two Danubian States have indeed been more amicable than between Czechoslovakia and Poland. It is possible that the request for a small exchange of territory north of Bratislava may be renewed at the conference in London.

POLAND

The elections for the new Polish Constituent Diet are to be held next Sunday, the 19th January. The most important single event in Poland during the past week has been the decision of the Polish Peasant Party Executive, under M. Mikolajczyk's leadership, to persist in contesting the elections in the 42 constituencies (out of a total of 52) in which the party candidates' lists have not been invalidated by the Electoral Commissions. The more sober members of the party have long expected that the elections will be neither free nor fair, but they believe that a contested election can hardly fail to give evidence, as the Referendum did last year, showing that the party would have had a sweeping majority had it been a fair contest, and they still hope that this object will be realised.

No such favourable evidence is at all likely to be shown by the officially published results. For one thing, these results are not to be announced until the 31st January, twelve days thus being allowed for any manipulation that might be found necessary. And the scales are already, it might be thought, sufficiently weighted. The 10 constituencies, in which the Polish Peasant Party has been disfranchised by the invalidation of its lists, contain over one-fifth of the population of Poland, and will return 76 candidates who will belong to, or may be relied on to vote with, the Government bloc. In the rest of the country, obstacles of every kind continue to be placed in the way of the Polish Peasant Party. A week ago 104 of the party's candidates were actually under arrest. The names of many candidates have been cut out of the lists. Everywhere prominent supporters of the party have found their names deleted from the electoral roll, only a very small number of appeals against such deletions being allowed, or even attended to. Leaflets printed by the party, which state that all citizens have the right to vote secretly, will be difficult to distribute owing to the arrest of its workers on an ever-increasing scale; and it is reported that so large a proportion of the party's voting slips have been removed in a raid that it may now be impossible to distribute them in sufficient quantities to reach all the prospective voters.

At the same time a series of much publicised political trials have recently been staged, in which the evidence has been marshalled so as to imply the betrayal of Polish interests by M. Mikolajczyk and his party owing to their connection, real or alleged, with illegal underground movements and with the Poles in Great Britain.

A renewed note of protest has been addressed to the Warsaw Government by the United States Government. The American note refers to previous intimations that the electoral proceedings were not felt to be compatible with the undertakings given by the Polish representatives at Potsdam and contend that those proceedings are quite contrary to the conditions under which recognition had been given to the Polish Provisional Government. His Majesty's Government have also used the occasion, presented by the need to reply to a Polish Note of the 20th December on various grievances, to reiterate their very grave concern at the reports of widespread arrests and discrimination in connexion with the elections, and their insistence on the Polish Provisional Government's obligation to hold free and unfettered elections on the conditions laid down.

The culmination of the Government's propaganda is probably to be found in the suggestions of the Public Prosecutor in the latest political trial, seeking to implicate H.M. Ambassador at Warsaw as having allegedly used the accused as a means of getting in touch with members of an illegal underground movement. This, no doubt, is intended as a counter-accusation to H.M. Government's charges of unfair election procedure. But it is also intended to serve at the moment as a red herring to direct the attention both of the Polish public and of the foreign press correspondents now in Warsaw from the great mass and variety of methods of pressure to which the Government bloc is resorting.

As regards the attempt to implicate the British Ambassador an official statement made at the Foreign Office has stated: "We are satisfied that Mr. Cavendish Bentinck has not been engaged in any improper activities, still less in activities directed against the Polish State. On grounds of democratic principle we are unwilling to withhold any evidence which may be required by a court of law, and we have accordingly authorised the Ambassador to answer in writing any questions in connexion with the case which may be forwarded to him on behalf of the Court by the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs."

SOVIET UNION

A large number of articles in the Moscow press enlivened by cartoons of the favourite Soviet bêtes noires, Franco, Hearst, Yalchin, etc., reviewed the past year and the prospects for 1947. Great emphasis was laid, in all the articles, upon peace and the struggle of the Soviet Union to ensure peace. Trud emphasised the changed political set-up whereby the peoples have become masters of their fate and, in common with all the papers, referred repeatedly to the success of the policy of international collaboration on a basis of equality and open diplomacy.

The Anglo-Egyptian treaty negotiations were again given considerable publicity in the Soviet press last week, in terms which confirmed still further the direct Soviet interest in the outcome of these negotiations. A long article in Komsomolskaya Pravda on "the struggle of the Egyptian people for their independence" stressed the dissatisfaction felt in Egypt over the British attitude to the Sudan and the general criticism of Nokrashy Pasha and doubt of his ability to satisfy the "demands of the Egyptian people" on this score and for the evacuation of British troops. The British and United States delegations were accused of having exercised pressure on the Egyptian delegation at the last United Nations meeting to obtain a "softened" version of the Egyptian resolution demanding withdrawal of troops stationed on foreign territory without the consent of the appropriate Government. Growing dissatisfaction was alleged to exist in the United Kingdom at the Labour Government's policy in Egypt and the Near East, and a special tribute was reserved for Egyptian youth for "laying bare the manœuvres of the British to the broad masses."

The official Soviet view of the negotiations between the Government of the U.S.S.R. and of Norway concerning Spitzbergen has now been put out by Tass. According to this account, during discussions carried on with the Norwegians in 1944 and 1945 the question was raised from the Soviet side of revising the Treaty of Spitzbergen of the 9th February, 1920, which conferred the sovereignty of that territory and of Bear Island on Norway. The Treaty was said to have been signed without the knowledge of the Soviet Union and without its participation; the fact that the U.S.S.R. adhered to it without reservations in May 1935 was conveniently glossed over. In fact the Soviet Union might have appended its signature even sooner, had it not been for Article 10 of the Treaty, which stated that the recognition of a Russian Government by the High Contracting Parties was a necessary precondition of Russian adherence. The U.S.A., one of the original signatories, did not recognise the U.S.S.R. until 1933. The Tass statement went on to make the unfounded assertion that Bear Island was a Russian island—actually its first discoverers were Dutch and it never belonged to Russia. Against the continued validity of the Treaty was advanced the dubious contention that some of the original signatories had fought against the Allied Powers. The statement concluded by saying that agreement had been reached with the Norwegian Government about the necessity of joint defence of the Spitzbergen Islands, and that the negotiations for consultation with the Allied Governments concerning the revision of the 1920 Agreement had not yet been completed. In fact, it should be pointed out, only private conversations between the Norwegian Foreign Minister and our Ambassador in Oslo have taken place on this subject. (See also under "Norway.")

A démenti has been issued by Tass denying the statement made by Drew Pearson, basing himself on the American Military Attaché in Angora, that the Soviet Union is concentrating troops on the Turkish frontier.

The Soviet Union is among the many countries now showing interest in the Antarctic, and the first Soviet whaling expedition left for the Antarctic at the end of December. The Soviet whaling industry is a relatively new development, having started in 1932. In a recent interview to Tass, Alexander Akhimovich Ishkov (U.S.S.R. Minister of the Western Fishing Industries) recalled that a Russian expedition navigated the Antarctic continent at the beginning of the last century and discovered Peter I Island (now Norwegian), Alexander I Land (now British) and the Bellinghausen Sea. A Soviet delegation attended, for the first time, the International Whaling Conference held at Washington last November and intimated that the Soviet Government intends to adhere to the International Whaling Convention, which has been in force since 1937. The Soviet Whaling Flotilla which will operate in the Antarctic this season consists of the factory ship Slava and eight catchers. It is difficult to believe that Soviet interest in the Antarctic will remain confined to whaling, and territorial claims based on Admiral Bellinghausen's discoveries of 100 years ago may shortly be expected.

The work of the World Federation of Trade Unions has again come into the picture, both Trud and New Times devoting many columns to Tarasov's impressions of the session of the Executive Bureau in December. He spoke at length on the participation of the W.F.T.U. in the Economic and Social Council (a step forward, despite its limited nature), the campaign against Franco Spain (another first step), the decision to send delegations to Greece and Persia, German Trade Unions (where the W.F.T.U. are establishing free trade unions which could take an active part in de-Nazification and "democratisation") and the questions of African Trade Unions and the establishment of industrial sections of the W.F.T.U.

The Komsomols have been taking their share in the general campaign for overhauling Soviet and Party organs and gearing them to the tasks of the five year plan by holding a series of report and election meetings throughout the country. The meetings appear to have been used as a forum for general criticism of personnel, and appreciable changes in Komsomol cadres have been traceable since they were held. The most recent move has been the convening of Republican Komsomol congresses, which had not been held for six years. The first two to meet were those of Kirghizia and the Ukraine; the latter, being the more important, was addressed by Mikhailov himself, first secretary of the All-Union Central Komsomol committee. Mikhailov especially criticised the weakness of Komsomol work in the educational and cultural field. The Ukrainian youth press was charged with having given vent to nationalist sentiments, publishing low-grade literature of little ideological value. Komsomol leaders, according to Mikhailov, had often been chosen on grounds of personal feelings rather than of political worth, and a number had had to be removed on account of "incorrect behaviour." The criticism put out at the Kirghiz Congress was remarkably similar, the only notable addition in the latter case being the charge that among Kirghiz youth were found feudal relics and superstitions which were taking "most monstrous forms." The total Komsomol membership in the Ukraine was given as 1 million as against 35,000 at the time of liberation, and in Kirghizia 60,000, but the rate of intake of new members was said to have diminished in both Republics.

Electioneering for the forthcoming elections for the Supreme Councils of the constituent Republics is now in full swing throughout the country, and press announcements on the candidatures of Generalissimo Stalin and other members of the Politburo have occupied a great deal of space normally devoted to other issues. According to the now well-established practice, the leading members of the Government and the Communist Party were immediately nominated for many seats. The constituencies finally allotted to them will only be made known later.

SCANDINAVIA

Norway

Following a report in the British Press that the Soviet Union had asked Norway for facilities to establish military bases on Spitsbergen, the Foreign Ministry in Oslo on the 10th January released an official statement. According to this statement the Soviet Government approached the Norwegian Government, then in London, as far back as 1944, with a request for the revision of the 1920 Treaty, whereby the sovereignty over the islands was conferred upon Norway. Both parties, the statement continues, recognised the fact that the abrogation of the Treaty would require the consent of the other signatories, with the exception of ex-enemies. The Storting

Foreign Affairs Committee had been informed of the Soviet demands, as had also the United States, Great Britain, and France.

The original Russian proposals were for the abrogation of the 1920 Treaty and its replacement by a Norwegian-Soviet condominium over Spitsbergen, and the cession of Bear Island by Norway to the Soviet Union. On the 9th April, 1945, the Norwegians presented counter-proposals which suggested that Spitsbergen should remain under Norwegian sovereignty, but that the defence of the islands should be undertaken jointly by the two countries. All reference to Bear Island was deliberately omitted. The Russians appeared to accept this as a basis for further negotiations, and a joint declaration was drawn up.

In the course of a recent interview which M. Lange, the Norwegian Foreign Minister, had in New York with M. Molotov the latter indicated that the U.S.S.R.'s interests in Spitsbergen were not purely strategic but also economic. Russian mining interests, for instance, M. Molotov thought, ought to be given preferential treatment to those of other signatories of the original Treaty. M. Lange was unwilling to discuss the economic exploitation of mineral resources on Spitsbergen and maintained that this formed a question entirely separate from that of defence. Throughout the negotiations the Norwegian Government, on their part, emphasized that Norway could agree to a change in the status of Spitsbergen only if this received the sanction of the signatories of the 1920 Treaty and of the Security Council of the United Nations Organisation. They also emphasized that the Storting had to approve the final agreement. Although the majority of the Norwegian Government consider themselves bound by their offer of the 9th April, 1945, there can be little doubt that they would like to see the status quo preserved. The attitude of His Majesty's Government will be determined as soon as a full report on the strategic importance of Spitsbergen has been received from the Chiefs of Staff, and the views of the Canadian Government ascertained. (See also under "Soviet Union" for Spitzbergen.)

Iceland

So far all efforts to form a new Government have failed, and the retiring Ministers are still carrying on. The attempts by the Conservative Acting Prime Minister, Herra Olafur Thors, to form a Government with the Socialists (9 seats) and the Communists (10 seats), failed, partly because of the Communists' excessive demands. They had asked for the Ministry for Foreign Affairs or for the establishment of State import monopoly under the control of a Communist Minister. A minority Government by the Conservatives and the Socialists alone, on the French model, has apparently not been seriously considered. At one time the President had accepted a suggestion that each of the four parties nominate three representatives to try and reach an agreement on an all-party basis. As was to be expected, however, this four-party Government did not materialise, largely owing to the general reluctance to accept responsibility for the threatening economic crisis and partly because of the enmity between the leaders of the two largest parties, the Conservatives (20 seats) and the Progressives (13).

According to a broadcast from Sweden, Herra Thors has now advised the President that he is unable to form a Government and Herra Stefan Stefansson, Chairman of the Labour Party, has been entrusted with the task; if he should also prove unable to do so, the only course apparently open to the President would be to take the matter out of the hands of the Althingi and arrange for a non-parliamentary Government, as happened in 1942 in similar circumstances.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

Professor Gerbrandy wasted little time in broadcasting a reply to the rebuke which he received from the Government for his critical broadcast of the 2nd January [see last week's Summary]. A week later he returned to the charge with the facts behind Dr. van Mook's dual appointment of Colonial Minister and Lieut.-Governor-General of the N.E.I. In October 1941, said Professor Gerbrandy, when the portfolio of Colonies was vacant, and war with Japan was probable, he took the opportunity "to sound the opinion" of the Governor - General, Jhr. Tjarda van Starkenborgh-Stachouwer, with the result that it was decided to appoint Dr. van Mook as Colonial Minister. "I was thus fully entitled," added Professor Gerbrandy, "to suggest the appointment to Her Majesty." Then came the Japanese war; and, after further consultation with the Governor-General, who needed his services more than Professor Gerbrandy, Dr. van Mook asked to be released from his Ministerial duties, whereupon Professor Gerbrandy himself became Colonial Minister. Soon afterwards came the Governor-General's request that Dr. van Mook be appointed Lieutenant-Governor-General—a request which was immediately acceded to, as it was considered essential to have someone of his standing in the U.S.A. and elsewhere; for by law a Governor-General is not allowed to leave territory of the N.E.I., whereas his Lieutenant is free to do so.

It was in such circumstances, then, that Dr. van Mook became Lieut.-Governor-General. On the eve of the occupation of Java in March 1942, continued Professor Gerbrandy, they had to decide upon the future course of action of the N.E.I. officials; and it was agreed that, whilst the greater part of the officials—including the Governor-General, who had decided for himself—should remain behind, a number of "suitable persons" be sent to London to "strengthen" the Government there. These included Dr. van Mook. "We then had to decide," declared Professor Gerbrandy, "how this co-operation would have to be regulated, and decided that Dr. van Mook should be appointed Minister of Colonies, and thus be bound to the joint policy and 'collegiate' character of the Cabinet as well as the Commission of Ministers dealing with the direct conduct of the war. I was appointed Minister for the General Co-ordination of Warfare for the Kingdom by the Queen. The natural view was that Dr. van Mook would later return to the Netherlands Indies as Lieut.-Governor-General."

As for the combination of the offices of Colonial Minister and Lieut.-Governor-General, which he agreed he had called "a constitutional monstrosity" in the autumn of 1944, Professor Gerbrandy said that there was no question of this combination of powers having "serious consequences." At the time they hoped for the speedy liberation of the Netherlands, and they thought that the moment had arrived for Dr. van Mook's return to the N.E.I. as Lieut.-Governor-General. It was therefore arranged that he retain membership of the Cabinet as Colonial Minister "committed to co-operation" with them. "Legally speaking," that "construction" was a monstrosity; but it was a "practical" war emergency measure. But, with the hope of Dutch liberation unfulfilled, Dr. van Mook was told that his tenure of the combined offices would have to be terminated—a fact which the recent Government declaration omitted to mention. As Lieut.-Governor-General, Dr. van Mook of course had to be invested with special powers, and, moreover, demanded them, but was not given all he asked for—"not by a long chalk!" He was re-appointed Lieut.-Governor-General subject to "an all-decisive limitation," which Professor Gerbrandy emphasised he had "personally announced" to Dr. van Mook on behalf of the Crown and the Cabinet: "Your present appointment in no way ties us down regarding your successors . . . You will only become Lieut.-Governor-General, and will only very temporarily exercise the functions of Governor-General. Should you remain Lieut.-Governor-General—a fact which we shall not be able to decide—you will only be able to remain at your post as a subordinate official to Jhr. Tjarda van Starkenborgh-Stachouwer, after his liberation." Dr. van Mook's broadcast from London on the 17th October, 1944, shortly before his departure for the Far East, contained the "most unambiguous confirmation" of the above.

One now realized, said Professor Gerbrandy, in his concluding remarks, that that policy had been "completely reversed" by the two succeeding Cabinets. Jhr. van Starkenborgh-Stachouwer had been forced to resign, because his policy, which was Professor Gerbrandy's, had been rejected in favour of Dr. van Mook's. The official statement had said that the Government would proceed to an elaboration of the Agreement. What on earth could that mean?—the elaboration of an agreement which neither party had yet even signed nor probably would ever sign? A policy which helped "the abominable Republic into the saddle" and quickened the pace of Netherlands-N.E.I. separation was incomprehensible. The Government had protested against the manner of his attack on a man who was "working with such perseverance at his heavy task." He often heard of a Lieut.-Governor-General who, "blindly followed" by a Cabinet and without its concurrence, worked with "perseverance" at establishing new States unknown to the Constitution, and at conferring with men who called themselves Ministers but who lacked "everything" which characterized a Minister. But he heard "very little" of that official's "fulfilment of the duty" which the Indies Constitution imposed upon him above all other duties—that of protecting the native population from violence of any kind, which now, more than ever before, cried out for fulfilment.

Belgium

Details of the recent meeting between the Belgian and Dutch Foreign Ministers in Brussels [see last week's Summary] were given by M. Spaak to H.M. Ambassador during an interview on the 8th January. On the question of the settlement of Germany M. Spaak said that he and Baron van Boetzelaer wanted a system of federalization which would place the great bulk of political power in the hands of the individual states, leaving only a very little in the hands of the central government. They were agreed upon raising German industrial output to a point which would alleviate present conditions, provided that there were wholly adequate safeguards against the possibility of military production. They also favoured indefinite occupation, in which Belgian and Dutch forces should participate. With regard to territorial and economic claims against Germany, M. Spaak said that he had left Baron van Boetzelaer in no doubt that he objected to the Dutch claims; but he confessed to H.M. Ambassador that he was awkwardly placed, for, if these claims (and, for that matter, those of Luxembourg) were admitted, he would be compelled to ask for concessions of comparable weight on Belgium's behalf, although he himself was opposed to the idea.

FRANCE

M. Léon Blum arrived in London on the 13th January for a visit of a couple of days. He is the first French Prime Minister to be the guest of this country since 1940, and the visit was arranged as a result of the exchange of letters between him and Mr. Attlee (see last week's Summary). While the Prime Minister made it clear that there was no hope of an immediate increase in coal exports to France from this country or from the Ruhr, he warmly welcomed the prospect of a visit from M. Blum and said that H.M. Government were most anxious that economic relations between France and the U.K. should be put on the closest possible footing. (The question of harmonising reconstruction plans within the two countries is one that comes within the purview of the Anglo-French economic committee (see Summary No. 360) which is due to meet soon). M. Blum expressed himself as much touched by the warmth of the invitation extended to him and said that he was not expecting supplies of coal to be immediately available but only that some hope might be held out for the future. Negotiations started on the 14th January and made good progress.

M. Blum has already emphasised, in conversation with Mr. Duff Cooper on the 26th December, how glad he would be to do anything during his short tenure of office which would permanently improve Anglo-French relations. In contrast to M. Bidault, who has always insisted that an Anglo-French alliance would be valueless without previous agreement on the German question, M. Blum said that he would consider the possibility of concluding an alliance while the German question was still under discussion. Moreover, the change in the Communist attitude which, he said, had now become almost identical with that of M. Molotov, meant that there was little difference between the Communist views on Germany and those of the Socialists as expressed by M. Goutin last spring (see Summary No. 338). M. Blum was therefore hopeful of the prospects of reaching agreement with the U.K.

The life of M. Blum's all-Socialist Government is quickly drawing to a close. M. Blum will resign when the President of the Republic is elected on the 16th January, and, in spite of the very favourable impression made by his Government, it is unlikely that they will be asked or will agree to remain in office. M. Blum himself does not think it possible for a minority Government to retain power for long, and while the M.R.P. and the Right would be willing to see the maintenance of the present Government the Communists have declared their hostility to this suggestion. Negotiations for a coalition Government are therefore likely to be resumed. M. Blum might be induced to lead it, but it is doubtful whether his health would stand the strain. Candidates for the presidency of the Republic are likely to be put forward by each of the four main parties; the most-favoured candidate is M. Vincent Auriol. The Presidents of the legislative chambers were elected on the 14th January at the beginning of the new session; M. Auriol was re-elected President of the Assembly and M. Champetier de Ribes, after tying with the Communist candidate, M. Marrane, secured re-election in the Council by virtue of being older than his opponent.

The Government's price policy has so far been successful, and local vigilance committees are being set up everywhere to bring the pressure of public opinion to bear on producers. Model shops are to be set up by the co-operative movement to show what prices should really be. M. André Philip, the Minister of Finance, has introduced a further set of financial measures which, through the raising of interest rates and the obligation placed on prospective clients of the banks to disclose their stocks, are intended to bring hoarded goods on to the market. He has also decreed that all nationalised undertakings must accept common standards of accountancy and publish figures of costs of production. At a meeting of the Planning Council on the 7th January when the Monnet Plan was unanimously approved, the success of the Plan was shown to depend on the success of the programme of price stabilization. M. Blum told the press on the same evening that the Government would begin to put the Plan into immediate execution.

The demand of the C.G.T. for a minimum wage (see last Summary) has not been the only problem which the Government have had to face in the field of wages. The Civil Servants unions have been pressing for interim salary increases pending the completion of the new salary-scales promised for the 1st January. The Government have given them a temporary bonus but refused their full demands. Another and most inconvenient dispute has been the strike of the rotary machine minders in the newspaper printing shops which has left Paris without newspapers since the morning of the 9th January. The newspapers say that they cannot afford to pay higher prices for printing while the printers' men threaten to reveal the failure of many papers to pay their printing bills. Meanwhile it is feared that the absence of newspapers may endanger the success of the Government campaign for price reduction.

M. Moutet and General Leclerc arrived back in Paris from Indo-China on the 12th January. They were received separately by M. Blum and the Cabinet will review the situation at the earliest opportunity.

SPAIN

Fourteen political offenders including Socialists and members of the C.N.T., were tried by court martial on the 9th January on charges of conspiracy against the Franco régime. They had been held in prison since December 1944 following a large-scale round-up by the Spanish police of persons of Monarchist and Republican sympathies suspected of attempting to form a coalition to oust General Franco. The great majority of those arrested at the time—some of them more as a sharp reminder of what might be expected to happen to them if they persisted in their plotting—were set at liberty almost immediately. Certainly no one belonging to the political groups of the Right was detained for long, and many of the Left elements—in certain cases through the intervention of H.M. Embassy—were released soon afterwards. But for some reason or other the unfortunate fourteen have been left to languish in gaol until now.

General Aranda, who was believed to have been a moving spirit in the 1944 conspiracy, but who had been left unmolested by the police, had been subpœnæd—with his legal adviser—to appear as a witness for the defence. The General, however, was not able to give evidence. He had been hurriedly banished to the Balearics by order of the Captain-General of Madrid for reasons not yet disclosed and had actually left for his destination the night before the trial opened. His legal adviser, also,—who had seen the General off—had to excuse himself from attendance at the trial "on account of illness." The trial proceeded in orderly fashion and the defence, despite the deprivation of its two star witnesses, was, it appears, admirably conducted. The defence asked for the acquittal of all the prisoners on the plea that the whole charge was nothing but a pre-arranged conspiracy on the part of the police. It maintained, moreover, that the activities in question, though hostile to the Régime, were within the law, and alleged in justification of the prisoners that such prominent personalities as Señor Lequerica (then Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs), Señor Sangroniz (Ambassador to the Quirinal) and the Papal Nuncio, in addition to General Aranda, had in fact been associated with the activities called into question.

The Spanish authorities have not imposed heavy sentences. They obviously feel that they have to move more warily than in the old days when death-sentences were the rule in such cases rather than the exception. The public mention of prominent personalities will certainly cause much gossip in Spain and may well lead to repercussions by encouraging into the open many erstwhile timid critics. General

Aranda, for instance—who has been on the retired list for four years—has never hesitated to voice his opinion that General Franco has served his purpose and should make way for a return to Constitutional rule. In his endeavours to bring moderate Right and Left elements together the General has in fact recently cut-in on the negotiations which have been going on for some time between the representatives of the Left grouped in the Alianza de Fuerzas Democráticas and the Monarchist and moderate Right elements (represented by Gil Robles) in Lisbon (see Summary No. 365). General Aranda all along has taken the view that a restored Monarchy must first rid itself of the outmoded ideas of prestige and privilege still held by some of Don Juan's adherents, and this has not made him popular with more reactionary Monarchists who would be prepared to see the Monarchy restored by means other than democratic—for instance, through a military coup. Don Juan himself is not believed to share these ideas, but he was recently constrained to intimate to General Aranda that he must move more slowly—the time had not yet come for action. A similar lack of confidence between Spaniards is demonstrated in the message from Gil Robles and Sainz Rodriguez to Señor Luque, the new C.N.T. representative in the Alianza (the original envoy to Lisbon having been ousted because, apparently, he neglected to report immediately to his own group the result of his mission and was said to have exceeded his instructions). Señor Luque has been informed that General Aranda possesses no authority to speak for the Lisbon groups. The answer is, of course, that General Aranda has no authority from any source but is first and foremost a patriotic Spaniard with more political acumen than most of the others. Once again jealousy and rivalry are hampering Spanish efforts to get together long enough to force Franco out.

The C.N.T. Executive Committee, in reply to an invitation from Don Juan for the new representative to visit Lisbon, has set out finally and authoritatively its position "in face of the grave situation in Spain." In this document (apparently taken to Lisbon by the Duke of Alba) the old negative apolitical attitude of the days before the civil war is repudiated and the C.N.T., "in union with the Republicans and Socialists," is pledged to seek a restoration of sovereignty through the nation itself by constitutional methods. On his part Don Juan is asked to publish a manifesto, modifying that issued in March 1945, in which he will undertake to make no claim to take up his historic rights until the Spanish people through a nation-wide plebiscite has made its own decision. The issue is clear. The Left groups are prepared to accept a Monarchy restored by constitutional methods, but they would adopt an attitude of uncompromising antagonism to a Restoration by military coup d'état. They make pertinent reference to the example of the late King Alfonso, Don Juan's father. In the face of conflicting counsel from his advisers and the probable intransigence of some of the Generals Don Juan has now to make up his mind.

H.M. Chargé d'Affaires has been forced to protest to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs against an offensive attack on the alleged activities of H.M. Embassy and on H.M. Ambassador in particular, which was broadcast by the Spanish radio on the 28th December and reproduced on the front page of Arriba on the 2nd January. Mr. Howard expressed his surprise at the attack in view of the apparent acceptance by the Spanish Government of H.M.G.'s note of explanation, dated the 27th December, with regard to the recent charges of subversive activities (see Summary No. 374). Señor Erice, the Director-General of the Ministry, expressed his regret, but suggested that some sort of public announcement might usefully be made with regard to H.M.G.'s denial of the imputations. H.M.G. are not prepared to agree to any such thing. In the meantime the Spanish press has received orders to lay off such articles.

The Italian Ambassador and the Dutch Minister have now left Spain and the Turkish Minister, also, has been recalled for consultation by his Government. Señor Pedro Radio, the new Argentine Ambassador, arrived in Spain on the 5th January.

Details of Spain's 1947 Budget figures have now been published in the Official Gazette. Revenue amounts to approximately 13,000 million pesetas and expenditure to more than 14,000. Grants to the three Services and to the Ministry of the Interior all show large increases on 1946 figures, the total figure accounting for more than half the Budget. Expenditure for Morocco has also increased from 612 to 673 million pesetas. As in 1946 the amount of the subsidy to the Falange remains something of a mystery, but the Party, apparently, has to manage on its 1946 income.

ITALY

The Socialist party Congress opened in Rome on the 9th January with a speech by the leader of the party. Signor Nenni, who rose amidst loud applause began by saying that he had not wanted a Congress in the present circumstances, not because he was afraid of the judgment of the members but because he had thought that the pact of unity between the Socialist and Communist parties, received with unanimous approval, was so important that it should have led to an entirely new attitude in the party. This, however, had not come about, and the lack of success of the Socialist party in the municipal elections, due partly to the fact that the pact of unity had not been satisfactorily explained, had caused further difficulties. He himself had been about to clarify the resulting political confusion, when Signor Saragat's article in the Giornale d'Italia had appeared. This changed the discussion from one of political organization to the question of fusion which had, he thought, been buried at the Congress in Florence, and this was the reason that he had advanced the date of the Congress, because a party could not exist in a permanent state of discussion. Signor Saragat had said that a party could not adhere to one, two or three policies according to the moods of some of its members. "Let us accept this principle" said Signor Nenni "and agree that when the Congress has shown the way this must be followed by the party."

Signor Nenni then dealt with the accusations of the dissident group, represented at the Congress by Signor Matteotti, who charged the Socialist party with forsaking its democratic ideals and organization and, influenced by one group which was receiving help from outside, with creating an atmosphere of intimidation in the rank-and-file. This terrorism, said Signor Nenni, must not be taken lightly, but he had always done his best to moderate the various influences. To prevent a difference of ideas growing into a personal difference, he himself was ready to remain outside the Executive and to give up all his appointments. After speaking at length on the aims of the Socialist party Signor Nenni said that the pact of unity was a necessity in view of the fact that the working classes in Italy were divided into two parties and on account of present conditions in the country, but that no other party abhorred the idea of totalitarianism as much as the Socialist party.

On Saturday the 11th January Signor Saragat addressed the Congress. He began by stating that the party was "riddled" by Communists and that the methods they had introduced had brought discord among members. The result of the Congress in Florence, where the complete independence of the party was approved, had been the cause of the Socialist Party's success at the National Elections. Vice versa the party's losses in the municipal elections were due to blindly following the Communist policy of strikes for unimportant increases of pay, to the pact of unity and, above all, to the Party taking its place in the Cabinet when its interests would have been better served by staying out. The Socialist party was radically wrong in trying to form a bloc with the Communist party, and the whole "popular front" was thereby threatened. The Communists in Italy were doomed since they were splitting the country into two political camps, a dangerous thing to do in a country like Italy. Signor Nenni's policy had reduced the Socialist party's influence to nil both at home and abroad. Signor Saragat finished his speech by stating that he and his followers had decided they could be of no further use in the party. Their road, he said, would be hard, but very many comrades would come with them into "that great international Socialist family to which we belong in the sense in which Socialism has always been taught in Europe."

After leaving the University Hall where the Congress was taking place, Signor Saragat went on to the Palazzo Barberini to address a large number of his adherents. Many veteran Socialists had gathered there and in turn addressed the meeting. Finally Signor Saragat appeared and said that he would announce the formation of a new party on the 12th January. An outline of the new party's policy was duly given by Signor Saragat, in which he traced the essential differences between his party and the Communists. Despite Signor Togliatti's attempt to prove that the new party was anti-Communist Signor Saragat denied that this was so. Many of the Communists' decisions were approved of by the masses because they were just, but all conditions in that party were imposed from the top. Although the new party would have discipline, everyone would have the inalienable right to decide what was right and what was wrong.

The latest report in the Press says that 40 Socialist members of Parliament have joined the new party. There remain 75 Socialist members of the Constituent Assembly, but they have not all yet declared themselves in favour of Signor Nenni. Signor Saragat has resigned as president of the Constituent Assembly.

THE VATICAN

Each year the Roman Patricians give their Christmas Greetings to the Pope. This Christmas the Pope's reply was an appeal to the Patricians not to stand aloof, but to put all their devotion and experience at the disposal of the State. He condemned the abstentionist, "l'émigré à l'interieur" as he called him, who neglected his Christian duty to his fellow-countrymen. In a passage which Italian Communists will appreciate he told the Patricians to "direct their activity towards the welfare of the whole community rather than that of a single class." By this common welfare, which is the aim of the State, he meant the establishment of conditions under which individuals and families could lead a life according to the Law of God, regulated and happy. Passing naturally to the burning issue of freedom of the press, he said that the maintenance of the common welfare demanded the defence of public morality. Thus, if the State, by granting unconditional freedom to press and cinema, allowed them to undermine religion and morality, it would be "legalising licentiousness."

On the 10th and 11th January the Vatican broadcast an outspoken pastoral letter on the German situation by the Apostolic Delegate to Germany, Bishop Muench of Fargo, Dakota. Two short quotations show the contents of the letter. "That forced labour is described as reparations does not change the fact that it is slavery. We would be hypocrites were we not to regard as crime that which we did not hesitate to call crime when the enemy committed it." "We condemn the Mosaic principle of an eye for an eye, because Christ condemned it, and taught us to regard our fellow men as brothers."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Further disclosures concerning the alleged plot to overthrow the present Government and re-establish the Horthy régime in Hungary (see last week's Summary) link the activities of the conspirators with those of foreign "reactionary" elements in the West, possibly including General Anders' Polish Army. The coup d'état was to have been effected with the help of Hungarian Fascists brought for the purpose from Bavaria, Austria and Italy. According to a communiqué issued by the Ministry of the Interior, documents belonging to General Szentmiklosi reveal the existence of a plan to demoralize Hungary by inducing the peasants to hoard their produce and by flooding the country with forged forint banknotes in order to undermine stabilization. On the 11th January it was stated that the number of arrests had reached ninety-three and that other arrests were anticipated. Investigations are being conducted into the records of all officers formerly belonging to Horthy's General Staff. The law protecting the democratic order against which the conspiracy is said to have been directed provides for the punishment of offenders by the death sentence, penal servitude for life or a term of imprisonment ranging from five to fifteen years, according to the degree of complicity. Those who knew of the plot and failed to report it are liable to imprisonment for a maximum of five years. To this is added the loss of civic rights and the total or partial confiscation of property.

While all parties are at one in condemning the conspirators the Smallholders feel acute anxiety about the ends to which the incident may be turned. In their newspaper, Kis Ujság, they ask that its importance should not be exaggerated and that none of the parties should use it as a weapon against the others. Their fear is well-grounded for the Communist organ, Szabad Nép, has already called for a drastic purge. Recent reports state that Hungarian Communists are demanding the expulsion of all right-wing members of the Smallholders Party, and that if they succeed in enforcing their demands Hungary is expected to have a new left-wing Government by Thursday. The Ministry of the Interior has also declared that the "Committee of Seven" thought to achieve their purpose chiefly by winning over the Smallholders and the Peasants' Federation which is under Smallholder influence. Several of their Deputies have been accused of occupying prominent positions in the movement.

The most forcible denunciation of Communist rule over a non-Communist majority comes from the Prince Primate, Cardinal Mindszenty, in his approach to the U.K. Representatives in Hungary. While allowance must be made for the Cardinal's well-known right-wing sympathies his point of view should still be recorded. He lays particular emphasis on the so-called economy reductions in the Civil Service, which, in his opinion, are merely a political ruse for replacing non-party or Smallholder officials by others belonging to the Left, since new civil servants are being trained to fill the vacancies occurring after the dismissal of the 120,000 employees who, an official announcement acknowledges, were B. listed. In addition, he deplores the economic control which the Soviet Union has obtained over Hungary, the nepotism, corruption, misery and lack of security in the country, and the restraints imposed on religious freedom, in proof of which he adduces the imprisonment of priests, the confiscation of buildings belonging to the Church, the ban twice imposed on the Bishop's pastoral letters and the arrests carried out by the Hungarian police of persons attending services.

The expatriation of Swabians, which was suspended at the request of the U.S. authorities in Germany is to be resumed as from the 1st April. In November of last year the numbers of those evicted amounted to 120,000, and it is expected that a further 120,000 will be transferred. M. Veres of the National Peasant Party points out that the Potsdam Agreement allowed Hungary to expel a total of 500,000. It is reported that a few hundred have returned and that some of them have been arrested.

Hungarian circles express great satisfaction with the Hungarian-Yugoslav Trade Agreement signed in Belgrade, according to which Yugoslavia will provide Hungary with iron ore, timber, copper, soda and other raw materials in return for Hungarian engineering, electro-technical and chemical products.

Roumania

A Roumanian Trade Delegation left for Moscow on the 11th January. It is led by Dr. Gheorghiu-Dej. As a preliminary condition for talking business the Russians appear to have stipulated for substantial concessions for the benefit of Sovrom Petrol.

It is becoming evident that the Russian plan is to secure as firm a hold as possible on all Roumanian resources before evacuating the country after the conclusion of the peace treaty. Before the war the oil companies had the right under annual agreements to buy back from the State the crude oil which was due as royalties, and to refine this for their own purposes. Since the Armistice the royalties have had to be delivered to the Government in kind. This crude oil was refined by one of the Sovrom group of companies and was then taken over by the Government and delivered to Russia on account of reparation. The Russians now demand that 75 per cent. of this payment in kind on account of royalties shall be refined in one of the Sovrom Petrol refineries, Redeventa or Creditul Minier and the products sold by Sovrom Petrol for export by which means the Russians secure free currency. As a result the Roumanian Government will now have to increase the quantities taken from British and American firms in order to maintain the deliveries under the armistice.

Under the Petroleum Law of July 1942 companies could ask for new concessions every December. Sovrom Petrol now demand that, since they have no allotted areas for exploration, they should be given preference in all new areas. They have also been granted exclusive rights in the Banat, where preliminary work had already been done by Astra and Româna-Americana.

About six months ago Roumania, inspired by the Soviet Union, asked for the withdrawal of the Apostolic Delegate from Roumania, and for the appointment of an American bishop in his place. One reason for this may have been to leave the way open for the Russian representative to become Dean of the Diplomatic Body. Bishop O'Hara of Savannah was nominated, and the Soviet authorities at that time objected. The objection has now been withdrawn, and Bishop O'Hara is on his way to Bucharest.

Generally speaking, Roumania is passing through a period of suspense which is likely to continue until after the signing of the treaty of peace, when further developments may take place. (The prevailing opinion amongst the British residents in Roumania is that the existing state of affairs will continue.) The Allied Control Commission will come to an end, but Russia will continue in effective control through Dl Bodnaras. There are rumours that Russia is embarking on a face-saving course and is seeking to secure some moderate support for the Government: in connexion with this move, it is reported that certain prominent members of the Government are anxious to find fresh fields of activity and are looking with longing eyes at the post of Minister to the Quai D'Orsay which is vacant. One of the candidates, Dl Patrascanu, at present Minister of Justice, is credited with a desire to form outside Roumania a Roumanian National Communist Party, whose Communism would be of a different quality from the Russian variety.

object-lesson to all who would pour out their woes into the ears of foreign representatives. It will certainly lead to the greater isolation of Western diplomatic establishments from the life of the country. Close supervision by the political police is the least price that the ordinary individual may have to pay for acquaintanceship with a member of the Embassy. Travel is more restricted than it was formerly and the red tape round travel permits takes longer to untie. Perhaps the authorities realise that members of H.M. Embassy, in their travels, have gleaned interesting information about conditions and opinion, which is not of the kind that Tanjug likes to publish.

It would appear that dissatisfaction with the régime is very widespread, though it is expressed mainly by ineffectual grumbling in a spirit of hopeless resignation. In the less accessible parts of Bosnia and the Lika, also in Slovenia, there have been sporadic disorders since the end of the war. Recently quite a number of Communist and local government officials have been attacked; during September nearly two hundred are said to have been murdered in Croatia alone. There have been attacks on buses, and on a train on the Zagreb–Split line. Items in the press about the trials of " Križari " in Split and Maribor substantiate these reports. In Macedonia former supporters of I.M.R.O. have been unearthed and brought to trial.

Possibly with a view to the control of listening, though ostensibly to increase the State revenue, the Yugoslav Government have ordered the registration and licensing of all wireless receivers, at a cost of 40 dinars a set.

As a precaution against forgery, said to be very prevalent, all 1,000 dinar banknotes are to be withdrawn from circulation by the 27th January and to be replaced by a new issue.

H.M. Ambassador recently presented two notes to the Yugoslav Government concerning British property in Yugoslavia and the effect of nationalisation.

The Yugoslav Government have formally protested to H.M. Government and the U.S. Government against the delay in handing over Italian war criminals. It is the view of H.M. Government that this question should be settled as between Italy and Yugoslavia, whereas the Yugoslav Government maintain that it is a joint U.S.-British responsibility.

Greece

The United Nations' preparations for the despatch of their Commission to Greece have continued and almost all the members of it have now been appointed. An advance party is to make detailed administrative arrangements in Greece before the main party's arrival. Meanwhile, there is more news from Greece of local preparations for the Commission's visit. On the one hand there has been a further decrease in bandit activity near the frontiers; on the other, all women and children in Salonica under sentence of deportation are being released and other deportees are being rapidly shipped southward. The Left press has made caustic comment on this obvious clearing of the prisons just now.

The British Parliamentary Delegation's report published on the 6th January has been the subject of extensive comment in the Greek press. Right-wing papers deplored it, taking the line that its suggestions trespassed on Greece's independence and were both partial and misinformed. Centre papers, expressing great satisfaction, interpreted the report as all-round condemnation of the situation in Greece and as endorsement of the Liberal Party's appeasement policy. The warmest welcome came from the extreme Left press which heralded the report as a complete denunciation of the present Greek régime and of Mr. Bevin's policy towards it. Rizospastis had published a résumé of the report as long ago as 2nd November based it seems, on an early draft to which Rizospastis' London correspondent obtained access in October. A Greek translation of this draft, which contains several divergencies from the final text, was printed in pamphlet form on the 5th December, and public comment in Greece has been based on this rather than the authoritative version. KKE/EAM have accepted its recommendations as a basis for all-party agreement and a new deal.

Most of the bandit activity which has been reported confirms suggestions that KKE is diverting attention away from the frontier. Several attacks have been made on road and rail communications between Larissa and Volo, and there has been some activity in the Lamia area. There has, however, been an attack made by some 1,000 bandits on Kyriaki near Soufli in western Thrace. Casualties on both sides are said to have been heavy, but the village was finally re-taken by the Greek army.

The Crown Prince Paul has been making a tour of Greek frontier posts and Crown Princess Frederica has distributed relief to the orphans of men killed in encounters with the Communist bands or massacred by the Bulgarians. It has also been reported that foreign aircraft have been dropping supplies to rebels on Greek territory.

Hopes that M. Tsaldaris would face the question of broadening the Government promptly after his return from Washington have been dashed by his statement to the Press. In it he said that he saw no need for further discussions between the parties before the Chamber reassembles on the 16th January, and added that he intended then to renew his offer to the Opposition to join his Government according to the parties' relative strengths in the Chamber. M. Sophoulis, whose party holds one-seventh of the seats in the Chamber, remains determined to join the Government only as Prime Minister.

Albania

A brief note was presented on the 9th January to the Albanian Chargé d'Affaires at Belgrade by H.M. Ambassador there, requesting him formally to notify the Albanian Government that their reply of the 21st December could not be accepted by H.M. Government as a satisfactory answer to their own note of the 9th December, none of the demands contained in it having been met, and that consequently H.M.G. were going to bring up the matter before the Security Council.

This step was taken on the 10th January when a letter was addressed by Sir Alexander Cadogan to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, enclosing copies of all three notes mentioned above and concluding: " In the view of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, the Albanian Government's reply of the 21st December is entirely unsatisfactory, and H.M.G. have accordingly instructed me to bring this dispute to the early attention of the Security Council under Article 35 of the Charter." It will be noted that H.M.G. are not invoking the graver Article 39 (see Summary No. 374).

Somewhat ironically, a polite telegram was received by the British Foreign Secretary on the very next day from Enver Hoxha in the rôle of a suppliant, reminding him of Albania's sacrifices in the Allied cause and also of the Paris Reparations Conference's recognition, last November, of her right to some share in German reparations, and then going on to beg that her authorised representatives might be permitted—so far as H.M.G. are concerned—to state their case in greater detail before the next meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers to be held in Moscow.

Meanwhile, an article in the Government newspaper Bashkimi (12th January) reverted to the sore subject of the anti-Communist Albanians who found refuge in Italy in November 1944 and have been allowed to remain there ever since. The theme of the article is that these " traitors " are being " sheltered " by the Allied military authorities in Italy out of spite, but that their day of reckoning will come when times have changed. The implications seem clear enough.

Turkey

The suppression on the 17th December of the Communist movement in Istanbul was wholeheartedly approved by the general public—and by the Democratic press no less than by papers supporting the Government. Besides being outraged by the increase in Communist propaganda, national feeling had been inflamed by reports of Communist persecution of Turks in Bulgaria and Greece. On the 11th December students seized all available copies of Communist newspapers and burnt them in the streets. These demonstrations seem to have been genuinely spontaneous and not to have stopped until the police intervened. In any case they provided an occasion, as mentioned in Summary No. 374, for the authorities to liquidate a movement, evidently inspired from Moscow, at the moment when it was becoming a menace. About eighty extreme Leftists were arrested. They included all the active Communist propagandists in Turkey and were largely young officers and technical students and other young intellectuals impressed with the inefficiency and corruption of the Administration. The authorities also took into temporary custody the Sertel couple and Cami Baykurt, formerly prominent Left-wing journalists. Some 300 other persons were kept under surveillance. The chief leaders seem to have been two: Şefik Hüsnü, an elderly Dönme (crypto-Jewish) doctor who is something of a Marxian doctrinaire and ran several Communist papers; Esat Adil Müstecaplioğlu, a former judge and prison governor whose Communism seems more opportunist than that of his rival. According to fairly reliable reports which have still to be confirmed, the Soviet Press Office in Istanbul put £T400,000 (say £30,000) at the disposal of its agents, most of whom were connected with Şefik Hüsnü. But Müstecaplioğlu, too, was pretty clearly in Soviet employ. Şefik Hüsnü's agents are stated to have been particularly active in Izmir and Adana and at Trabzon and other places on the Black Sea. Centres representing ramifications of the movement have been closed down in these places and as far towards the south-east as Gaziantep.

The tone of the suppressed papers was not merely pro-Soviet. It was also bitterly anti-British. This is but another indication that the ultimate purpose of the movement—though not perhaps of all its Turkish dupes—was to detach Turkey from Britain and throw her into Russia's arms. The Turkish Government thus seem to have rid themselves of a fifth column which might have been embarrassing when the Soviet Union next presses its claim to control the Straits.

On the 30th December the Grand National Assembly passed a Government bill terminating the special régime which has been in force in the Tunceli (Dersim) area since the last Kurdish rebellion of 1937–8. This mountainous region, which was notorious as the core of Kurdish resistance, is now to be administered like other vilayets, and no longer on a semi-military basis. Some thousands of Kurds, who had been deported further west, are to be allowed to return. It may be assumed, therefore, that the Government regard their policy of assimilation as having had a measure of success, but both in the Chamber and in the press there were indications of fear lest the last has not been heard of Kurdish rebelliousness. The ban on travel in the area makes it difficult to say how far such fear is justified.

As a sequel to the visit paid by the Secretary-General of the Turkish Foreign Ministry to Amman at the end of November, King Abdullah of Transjordan, accompanied by his son and Foreign Minister, arrived in Angora on a State visit on the 8th January. In deference to the King's religious convictions official hospitality was less convivial than is customary at Angora, but the speeches exchanged by President Inönü and the King abounded in mutual goodwill, and on the 11th January a treaty of friendship was signed. It was noticeable that both speakers referred to Turkey's friendly relations with Iraq and the Lebanon, but that neither mentioned Syria. The Syrian Government took umbrage at the negotiations, suspecting perhaps that Turkey was arranging to support the King's claim to a Greater Syria in the event of Syria claiming the restitution of the Hatay (district of Alexandretta). When Turkey's interest plainly lies in promoting harmony among the Arab States, it would be impolitic of the Turkish Government to try to profit by Arab disputes, and the Secretary-General has declared that his Government had no such intention. The Soviet Government also look askance at the agreement—on the ground that it is another step in the Turkish rapprochement with the Arab countries.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Although full-dress negotiations have not been resumed His Majesty's Ambassador in Cairo is in constant touch with Nokrashy Pasha on the subject of the new Treaty, and in particular is exploring the possibility of devising a formula which will ensure the rights of the Sudanese ultimately to decide their own future, while recognising at the same time Egyptian susceptibilities on the subject of the sovereignty of the "whole of the Nile Valley." Nokrashy Pasha's die-hard speech of the 31st December (see last week's Summary) in which he confirmed his earlier references to the permanence of the union of Egypt and the Sudan, in whatever sense it may affect the popularity of his administration, has created an additional stumbling-block to agreement between the Egyptian Government and His Majesty's Government. Indeed, it has resulted in a set-back to the hopes of the less partisan Egyptians who would like to see a friendly settlement as soon as possible. In some quarters it is suggested that Nokrashy's term of office is unlikely to be a long one, and there are even hints of a coalition Cabinet with Wafd participation. No appointment of a successor to the Egyptian Grand Qadhi of the Sudan has yet been made. He was due to leave Khartoum on the 10th January, but, apparently on instructions from Cairo, deferred his departure until the 17th. Meanwhile the Cairo press has referred to the possibility of a decision being taken by the Al Azhar 'Ulama that only a Muslim authority can made the appointment. Such a decision would still further complicate the matter, although it would be no more than an unsolicited opinion expressed by the doctors of the law and would not necessarily have any validity, apart from the fact that it would ignore all precedents in the case.

On the 5th January three missiles believed to be hand-grenades were thrown at the Palestine train shortly after it left Cairo station. Eleven British troops were injured. The Egyptian police are reported to suspect the Muslim Brethren, but there is no news that any arrests have been made.

Palestine

Representatives of the Arab States will attend the Palestine Conference, which is to re-open in London on the 21st January. The Officer Administrating the Palestine Government had a long conversation on the 6th January with Jamal Husseini, who said that if the Arab Higher Committee were invited to the Conference the Mufti would not wish to go, and his name would not be put forward. An invitation has therefore been sent to the Arab Higher Committee inviting them to choose a delegation, and asking them to submit the names of those proposed. This invitation was conveyed to Jamal al Husseini on the 10th January, and on the 13th he handed a letter of acceptance to the Officer Administrating the Government proposing the following as the Palestine delegation :—

Jamal al Husseini,
Dr. Hussein al Khalidi,
Emil al Ghuri,
Mu'in al Ma'adi.

All are members of the Higher Committee who have not agreed to nominate Arabs from outside their number.

There is no change in the official Zionist attitude to the conference. "Existing circumstances" (see Summary No. 374) have not changed so as to free them from the decision not to participate. The nature of the conditions favourable to their taking part may be deduced from a Jewish Telegraphic Agency report of remarks by Mrs. Meirson, the Head of the Jerusalem Political Department of the Jewish Agency, who is said to have endeavoured to impress on Sir Henry Gurney that "it would greatly contribute to the pacification of the country and increase the chances of Jewish participation in the London Conference if the transfer of the Cyprus refugees to Palestine were speeded up, no further deportations of visaless immigrants were caried out, and the withdrawal of the Morrison Plan were officially announced." Mr. Shertok, her predecessor in Jerusalem and now in charge of political work in all countries, has also referred in a press conference in London to the "Morrison Plan" as a stumbling-block to participation, although he made it clear that any Government alternative would have to be acceptable to the Zionist organisation before they would agree to send any delegates.

On the 12th January a serious explosion damaged a district police headquarters building in Haifa and caused the death of five policemen, two of whom were British.

Transjordan

H.M. King Abdullah arrived in Istanbul on the 12th January for a private visit of four days. A Pact of Friendship between Turkey and Transjordan was signed in Angora on the 11th January. (See also "Turkey.")

During the visit of the Amir Feisal to Amman (see last week's Summary) it appears that King Abdullah referred on numerous occasions to the Greater Syria plan. In mentioning this to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Damascus Shaikh Yusuf Yasin expressed the opinion that, if these intrigues went on, the Arab League might find itself obliged to expel Transjordan, an act which could not fail to have repercussions on the relations of His Majesty's Government with other Arab States.

Persia

On the 5th January the newspaper Mardim, which has now replaced Rahbar as the official organ of the Tudeh party, published long statements by a body describing itself as "The Provisional Executive Committee," indicating that the party is to be drastically reformed. Past mistakes, inexperience and ineptitude—attributable to the presence of harmful elements in the party—are admitted, and full confession is made of the error of supporting the Azerbaijanis. The party, purged of those whose misconduct has brought it into disrepute, will, it is stated, seek in future to achieve its aims solely by legal and parliamentary methods. These aims are the cultivation of friendly relations with all foreign Governments respecting Persian independence, supported by a home policy of "liberty and progress within the framework of a constitutional monarchy." The party professes to be opposed neither to private ownership, nor to capitalism nor to religion. It remains to be seen whether this move represents a split in the Tudeh party between a moderate section and the hard core of Soviet-inspired Communists, or is simply a political manœuvre by the latter. Though the Tudeh still propose not to contest the elections officially (see last week's Summary), a member of the new Tudeh Central Committee has stated that the party will not discourage its members from voting. Since under Persian electoral law there is no formal nomination of candidates, as in this country, and any voter may cast his vote for any qualified person he can think of, there is nothing to stop Tudeh sympathisers from voting for any of the Tudeh leaders. Thus, whether the Tudeh like it or not, the voting will reveal the extent of the popular support which they enjoy.

It is reported that a right-wing Opposition group has been formed during the last month, composed of the Mardum, or People's party, the University Students' Union, the Radical Socialists and four other small parties. The group also has the support of elements of Saiyid Zia's former National Will party and the Edalat party. The leaders of this group have formed themselves into a committee which directs the work of the various parties, collectively called the Jamiyat-i-Vahdat-i-Iran (the Iran Unity Group). So far little has been heard of this group, and as the parties comprising it are all of very minor importance, its influence is not likely to be great.

An important step in the development of the Persian Trades Unions has been the recent decision to set up non-political factory councils for the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company workers at Abadan. Qawam, in a recent interview with His Majesty's Ambassador, stated that the Trades Unions in the country have now ceased to have any official contact with the Tudeh. This seems to be an exaggeration, for while the hold on Persian labour which the Tudeh used to exert has undoubtedly slackened, the Tudeh union is shewing considerable activity and is receiving strong support from Soviet propaganda. Qawam has now consented to admit a delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions to Persia, but he does not intend to invite them. The Persian Government has invited the International Labour Office to send a delegation to investigate social conditions in Persia.

During the past few weeks the Persian Government has been exposed to an increasing volume of provocative propaganda from the Russians (see last week's Summary, under " Soviet Union "), who, in addition to giving asylum to Pishavari and his associates, are allowing them to broadcast inflammatory speeches from a clandestine station near the Persian frontier. So far the Persian Government have shewn commendable restraint in the face of this provocation.

Several Tehran papers have recently taken up the cause of Bahrein. Mashrutiyat (Centre), in a series of articles written in December, states: " There is no difference between Azerbaijan and Bahrein from Persia's point of view. . . . . We favour the integrity of the entire country. . . . . Foreign penetration in any part of the island is intolerable to us. . . . . The Government should insist on the establishment of its power in Bahrein, just as it did in Azerbaijan."

Arab League

The Council of the Arab League, at its recent meeting in Cairo, accepted a draft cultural treaty prepared by its Cultural Committee. The treaty contains nineteen articles and aims at comprehensive measures of cultural co-operation between the League States. Article 2 provides for the exchange of teachers and professors; Article 3, for the exchange of pupils and for steps to harmonize educational syllabi and standards of examination. An important article provides for " work for the standardisation of scientific terms . . . . and to make the Arabic language convey all expressions of thought and modern science."

This announcement is a reminder of the belief which was widely held in British official circles during the months immediately preceding the formation of the League, that differences between individual States were too deep to give any great hope of success in political co-operation, but that valuable work could be done in the cultural and economic fields, which in the latter would follow up and profit by the activities of the Middle East Supply Council. Little has happened to belie this prophecy; the cracks in the structure of the League caused by internal dissension are barely covered by the plaster of a common policy towards the Palestine and Egyptian questions, while in this plaster itself small cracks appear from time to time.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

At the year-end General MacArthur issued a message to the Japanese people, in which American correspondents, who have criticised previous utterances on the score of their supposedly extravagant optimism, detect a note of more sober realism. He said that during the past year " there have been many successes, some failures; many strong points, some weak." After listing some of the reforms, he continued that the success of these and other projected reforms was dependent upon the manner in which the people themselves discharged their new responsibilities. Unless the people assumed in full reality the mantle and dignity of sovereign power, there could be but superficial and temporary change. This reminder that paper reforms are useless without the determination on the part of the people to put them into effect forms the key-note of the whole message.

The occupation authorities announce that all Japanese ex-servicemen and civilians in U.S.-controlled areas in the Western Pacific have now been repatriated. They total 991,559. The only large body of Japanese not yet repatriated is that held by the Soviet authorities; estimates range from 800,000 to 1,500,000. The Soviet authorities have now agreed to the return of 50,000 monthly.

The Japanese Government have extended the " purge " to industrialists. The original political purge was carried out in compliance with a S.C.A.P. directive of 4th January, 1946, which debarred from public office exponents of nationalism, militarists and influential members of secret societies, ultra-national political associations and companies engaged in aggressive overseas expansion. Persons coming under the new ban will be excluded from financial, economic and publishing activities.

The Government are also trying to eliminate so-called patriotic labour associations. These are nothing but reservoirs of cheap labour, ruled by a " boss " who farms out the men at so much per head for labour or any other service for which they may be required; on occasion in the past they have been used for " dirty work " and their leaders wield a sinister political influence behind the scenes in consequence. Since the occupation the " bosses " are said to have accumulated considerable funds from contracts for the Government and for the occupation forces. The dissolution of these labour combines, if effective, should aid in clearing the coming local elections of corrupting influences.

It appears from Allied Council discussions that the purge of industrialists will not be completed before the 15th April and that the local elections will take place some time thereafter. The Soviet member expressed concern at the repeated postponements which, he implied, were due to Government obstruction, but the Chairman denied that there had been any delay.

The extraordinary session of the Diet closed on the 26th December, 1946. Among the laws it passed were those which (1) re-enacted the rules for the Imperial succession (proposals that female succession and the abdication of the Emperor should be permitted were rejected); (2) transferred to the State Imperial property estimated at 1,600 million yen and put the Emperor on an annual income to be voted by the Diet; (3) decided the form of the " House of Councillors " which is to replace the House of Peers (it is to consist of 250 members, elected by the " whole people," i.e., all those entitled to vote for the members of the House of Representatives. It will be shorn of some of its power.

The regular session of the Diet, now in recess, is expected to open on the 20th January. If the Japanese press is to be believed, Premier Yoshida is holding his Cabinet together with difficulty. One bloc wants to reconstruct the Cabinet by throwing out all who do not belong to the Progressive and Liberal Parties, thus forming a purely conservative Government, prepared to fight the general election on that basis. The other bloc wishes to bring in Social Democrat members to form a Coalition Government. The Social Democrats for their part insist that the Yoshida Government should resign as a first step. But the right and left wings of the party are said to disagree on the subject of the Government then to be formed. The former seem prepared to accept Yoshida as Premier, the latter not.

Korea

A broadcast by two officials of the State Department on the 28th December was calculated to attract attention to the magnitude of the task carried by the United States in South Korea and to justify the American commitment. 1946 had been a hard year. "Beset by bad crops, floods, cholera, the breakdown of transportation, food shortages, political dissension . . . . we have had to play a lone hand in our zone." The need to keep up a steady flow of food, consumer goods and raw materials into Korea was emphasized. "If we do not do our share in rehabilitating southern Korea, we can expect serious food riots and a complete breakdown of production and distribution in the near future. Under these circumstances democratization would become an impossible goal."

Nor was there any optimism as to long-term prospects. Neither expressed any confidence that discussions with the Russians would be resumed in the near future. "So our job is to go ahead and do the best we can for the Koreans in our zone . . . . to train them to educate their own people, to train their own mechanics (sic), as far as is possible in a country that is arbitrarily divided, to run their own country. A friendly, prosperous, democratic Korea can be an important stabilizing factor in the Far East and a peaceful Far East is a most important objective of United States foreign policy."

The general impression given by the broadcast was that the American people must be prepared for a long and costly occupation.

Nevertheless, a press release of the 10th January revealed that hopes of a resumption of the Joint Commission had not been entirely abandoned. In a letter of the 26th November, General Christiakov expressed the view that no Korean who had "compromised himself" by active opposition to the terms of the Moscow decision should be admitted to consultation with the Commission. In his reply of the 24th December General Hodge proposed that any person or party that now adhered to the Moscow declaration should be eligible but should be consulted only so long as he or it refrained from agitation against the declaration.

Philippines

On the 16th November, 1946, the Philippine Republic and the United States signed a Treaty of Conciliation, to take effect from the date of exchange of ratifications at Manila, under which the two Governments agree to submit any disputes to a Commission of Conciliation for investigation and report.

Negotiations for bases for mutual defence continue. According to Washington press reports, the U.S. now asks for a dozen military and naval bases, apart from many minor installations. The Navy is said to be primarily interested in the southern stretch from Leyte Gulf to the tip of Mindanao. The Army is understood to be thinking of the Islands as a powerful detection and bombardment air arm base for the Northern Pacific. The Philippine Government accept mutual defence as a basic principle but final agreement has not yet been reached on detail. Manila press comment on the unsuitability of bases in close proximity to principal centres such as Manila and its complaint at times of the top-dog attitude of some of the American troops suggest points that require adjustment.

Press reports, which appear reliable, of the impressions gained by President Roxas from a tour of the southern islands, present a melancholy picture of the damage done to their social and economic welfare by the war. Apart from the devastation and disorganization, lawlessness is rife and the efficiency and honesty of the local administrations are at a low ebb. The President is credited with the determination to weed out undesirables irrespective of party associations. He discouraged over-optimism as to war damage claims compensation, pointing out that these will take a considerable time to settle.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

General George C. Marshall has now been formally confirmed in office as Secretary of State by the new United States Senate. In ratifying the appointment the Upper House displayed an enthusiasm and a unanimity that are likely to be rare in the next two years of its history. Its Foreign Relations Committee took only twelve minutes on the 8th January to decide that General Marshall was the right man to succeed Mr. Byrnes. Waiving its long-standing rule whereby new appointments must "lie over" for a day before consideration is given to them, the Senate itself thereupon immediately endorsed the nomination without a dissenting vote. Lavish tributes to the new Secretary of State and to his predecessor, Mr. Byrnes, were paid by Senators from such scattered parts and of such widely different views as Connally (Democrat, Texas) and Lodge (Republican, Massachusetts), Pepper (Democrat, Florida) and White (Republican, Maine).

Similar cordiality towards both General Marshall and Mr. Byrnes has been shown by the press, which takes it for granted that the new Secretary of State will continue what Senator Vandenberg recently described as the "rugged policy of firm but friendly candour to the Soviet Union." As the New York Times has observed, "the man who directed America's greatest war is not likely to compromise America's security after winning it." There is also satisfaction that Mr. Dean Acheson, the Under-Secretary of State, has consented to stay on in office as long as General Marshall needs him. Yet thoughtful observers profess to find it "disconcerting" that Mr. Byrnes should have departed so suddenly and so unexpectedly, just as he was apparently getting into his stride with the peace-making and just as he stood "on the threshold of a still greater task—the negotiation of the German treaty." While praising General Marshall personally, the New York Herald Tribune has expressed its concern that henceforth "no fewer than five of the posts most critical to the relations of [the United States] with the rest of the world will be held by professional soldiers." This, it believes, "presents a disturbing situation . . . . because it reflects the barrenness of present methods for the civilian conduct of foreign affairs." Yet others have hastened to point out that General Marshall received invaluable training in the conduct of foreign relations when he accompanied President Roosevelt to Casablanca, Teheran, Cairo, Quebec and Yalta, and that, by his tactful handling of civilians while Chief of Staff, and by his recent activities in China, he has in any case been able to demonstrate that "no military man was ever less of a militarist."

By selecting General Marshall for the exalted post of Secretary of State Mr. Truman is believed in some quarters to have made him ipso facto a possible candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1948. Mr. Truman is known to have referred to General Marshall more than once as "the greatest living American" (a writer in the Liberal-left-wing Nation maliciously retorting that "the little artillery captain from Missouri has an unlimited awe of top-rank officers"). In any event the absence of a Vice-President leaves the Secretary of State the heir-apparent to the Presidency under the Presidential Succession Act of 1886. Yet the General's sixty-six years (plus the fact that recent public opinion polls have shown army men to be extremely poor vote-winners) will probably prevent him from running far in the Presidential race, even if he himself is willing to line up for the start. When asked by newspaper correspondents at Honolulu on his way home from China if he was a Democrat he replied evasively that he was "an Army officer and an Episcopalian." Yet the General's father was a staunch Pennsylvania Democrat, and he himself has made his home at Leesburg in the traditionally Democratic State of Virginia.

It is perhaps indicative of the interest with which Americans now follow matters relating to foreign policy that the newspaper headlines this week have been dominated by the resignation of Mr. Byrnes and the appointment of General Marshall, rather than by the President's important report on economic policy and his Budget Message to Congress. Both the 54-page report, which Mr. Truman submitted on the 8th January in accordance with the Employment Act of 1946, and the Budget Message, which followed on the 10th, are in reality the first direct challenge to the Republican majority in the 80th Congress. In his report, Mr. Truman argued that it was unsound to reduce taxation while employment was at its peak and while the national income was high. He also emphasized that, as far as international trade was concerned, the readiness of other countries to eliminate import quotas and other restrictions would depend upon the willingness of the United States to reduce its tariffs. In his Budget Message, covering the fiscal year 1st July, 1947–30th June, 1948, the President made it even plainer that he stood unalterably opposed to any immediate tax reductions. On the contrary, he proposed that postal rates be raised and that the war taxes on luxury goods be re-imposed when they expire next summer. He anticipated a revenue of about $37,700 million, as against an expenditure of about $37,500 million, thus presenting the first balanced Budget since 1930. More than three-quarters of all the proposed expenditures would be for the armed forces, veteran's services and benefits, debt repayments and tax refunds, or for meeting international obligations. The last-named included an appropriation to enable the United States to discharge by the 30th June, 1948, about three-fourths of its commitments under the Anglo-American Financial Agreement.

Committees and in the Senate Finance and Appropriations Committees. Senator Taft has, however, already publicly joined issue with the President on some of the latter's more controversial proposals. Without cutting the armed services, he suggests, it should be possible to "squeeze" expenditure down to about $33,500 million. (He could not propose economizing at the expense of the Army and Navy without flying in the face of public opinion, which, according to a recent Gallup poll, is overwhelmingly opposed to retrenchment in the defence programme.) On the other hand, qualified support for Mr. Truman's reciprocal trade policy has been given by Senator Vandenberg, the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, at the Cleveland Forum on Foreign Affairs on the 11th January, at which Mr. Byrnes also spoke. Arguing that "peace and economics are inseparably kin," Senator Vandenberg expressed his confidence that the United States would "continue the device of reciprocal trade agreements, in one form or another."

In exercising their constitutional privilege of deciding how many of their opponents shall continue to serve on the Standing Committees—on which they themselves are henceforth to be in the majority—the Republicans in the Senate have proceeded with a ruthlessness that has called forth protests from the Democratic minority leader, Senator Barkley. On the important Labour and Public Welfare, Rules and Public Lands Committees the Republicans have given themselves a representation of eight to five. On the Appropriations Committee their ratio to the Democrats is to be twelve to nine, and on the other eleven Committees, seven to six. To make the humiliation of the Southern Democrats more complete, Senators Wayne Morse of Oregon and William F. Knowland of California have also introduced bills to curb the age-long practice of "filibustering" against unpalatable legislation.

Among the Democrats in Congress, where it was in any case the Conservatives who best survived the electoral landslide of November, there have so far been no pronounced repercussions from the split within the Liberal wing of the party which has been developing from the formation of two rival groups in New York and Washington on the 29th December and the 4th January respectively. The first of these groups—the so-called "Progressive Citizens of America"—has Mr. Henry Wallace as its mentor and seems determined to temporize on the Communist question. The second—the "Americans for Democratic Action"—is resolutely opposed to the U.S. Communist Party and all its works. Its inaugural meeting was attended by an imposing array of New Dealers, including Mr. Leon Henderson, Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Wilson Wyatt, as well as by a sprinkling of important C.I.O. officials.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Relations

The resignation of Mr. Byrnes and his succession by General Marshall is likely to cut across the tussle in the State Department between those who favour the "tough policy" towards Argentina and those who desire a settlement. General Marshall is said to be one of the originators of the Hemisphere Defence proposals intended to give the Pan-American system "teeth," and United States commentators have accordingly prophesied the fall of Mr. Spruille Braden, whose reluctance to admit Argentina to discussions of the defence proposals is responsible for the existing standstill.

In a speech reviewing United States foreign policy, Mr. Byrnes has demanded a "reasonable and substantial compliance by Argentina" of her hemisphere obligations before the Rio de Janeiro Conference is held. In return, Senator Vandenberg has said that the Conference should take place without further delay, since the elimination of German interests was a matter for joint decision and not for the United States alone. The question of United States-Argentine relations is thus likely to become an immediate issue.

Mr. Messersmith, the United States Ambassador to Argentina is still in Washington, and he and Mr. Braden are reported to have refused to meet.

Bolivia

Presidential and congressional elections were held on the 5th January and have been described as the most orderly and least corrupt in the history of Bolivia. Of the 130,000 registered electors, some 80 or 90 per cent. are reported to have voted. The presidential candidates were Dr. Enrique Hertzog (Union of Republican Socialists) and Dr. Luis F. Guachalla (representing the P.I.R., the Liberal Party and Acción Democrática). Incomplete results gave Dr. Hertzog a slight lead, but polling was so close that it may fall to Congress to make a final decision. In the elections for the Senate and Chamber of Deputies the left-wing P.I.R. is reported to have won less seats than was expected.

Dr. Hertzog enjoys a considerable reputation as a medical man and politician. He studied in France and during the war was actively and openly pro-British. He began his political career as prefect of La Paz and was on several occasions a minister in the days of President Salamanca (1931–34).

Colombia

The Confederación de Trabajadores Colombianos split into two groups in August 1946, the one being specifically socialist and the other led by Communists. Neither the Colombian Government nor the Colombian workers were apparently able to decide which group was the legal one, as the documents of the C.T.C. conveniently disappeared. In view of recent suggestions of a less pro-Communist attitude by Sr. Lombardo Toledano (see last week's Summary under "Mexico"), it is noteworthy that the C.T.A.L. inclined towards the socialist section as against the Communists. Its intervention was successful, and two of the Unions formally put forward a settlement which was accepted early in December. The much-criticised socialist leader, Sr. Medina, stood aside and Sr. V. J. Silva, also a socialist, became chairman, the next two posts being assigned to pro-Communists. It remains for the reconstituted C.T.C. to obtain official recognition.

Cuba

President Grau San Martin's administration has lost popularity during recent months, and the press has on several occasions criticised him for governing in a dictatorial manner. At the beginning of December, a small group of "Autentico" Senators (i.e., of the President's own party) condemned his methods and accused the Minister of Education, Dr. Aleman, of malversation, bribery and murder. The accusation of corruption was couched in such a way as to involve President Grau's sister-in-law who is the First Lady and adheres closely to the system established by previous First Ladies of enriching herself in devious ways. President Grau is further popularly charged with wishing to retain the presidency for a second term, which is unconstitutional, and with allowing the army to revert to its former evil ways, the two revolts of June and October last being regarded as "fake" movements for furthering the ends of the commander-in-chief. Despite these accusations, Cuba is prosperous, and there is no immediate suggestion of any action against the President.

Peru

The assassination of Sr. Francisco Grana, the editor of the principal opposition newspaper, La Prensa, has caused a political crisis. While it was first asserted that the murder was a crime of passion, the fact that the Prensa's offices were attacked last April during a political demonstration, allegedly by Apristas, could not fail to give it a political colouring. After long discussions the three Aprista Ministers retired from the Cabinet in order to give the President "freedom to investigate the origin of the crime"; the rest of the Cabinet also resigned. It seems likely that the A.P.R.A. may take this opportunity of withdrawing from the responsibilities of Government. A new Cabinet has now been formed under Rear-Admiral José Alzamora, who becomes President of the Council, and Minister for Justice and Labour. Sr. Enrique Garcia Sayan continues as Foreign Minister. Other Ministers are:—

Interior: General Manuel Odria.
War: General Del. C. Marin.
Finance and Trade: Luis Echegopar Garcia.
Public Works: Alfredo L. Fort.
Marine: Capt. Manuel R. Nieto.
Health: Alberto Hurtado.
Air: General Armando Revoredo.
Agriculture: Pedro Venturo.
Education: C. de Losada y Puga.

Venezuela

The Constituent Assembly opened on the 17th December and Dr. Andres Eloy Blanco was elected President of the Assembly, of which some 150 out of 160 members were present. The two members of the U.R.D. were absent in protest against the arrest of their leader, Sr. J. Villalba, and Dr. Rafael Caldero, the leader of COPEI, strongly attacked the Government. However, the Government majority is overwhelming, and the President's message, together with that of the Minister for War, Lt.-Col. Delgado Chalbaud, to the armed forces, was designed to suggest that the whole country was as resolutely on the side of Acción-Democrática as the Assembly.

The official return to constitutional government was duly announced.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Trieste

The Council met on the 10th January and voted by 10–0 in favour of the following U.S. motion approving the Trieste settlement :—

> "The Security Council, having received and examined the annexes to the proposed Peace Treaty with Italy relating to the creation and government of the free territory of Trieste, including an arrangement for the free port, hereby records its approval of the three following documents :—
>
> (1) Instrument for the Provisional Régime of the free territory of Trieste,
>
> (2) the permanent statute for the free territory of Trieste,
> (3) the Instrument for the free port of Trieste; and its acceptance of the responsibilities devolving upon it under the same."

Australia's delegate abstained from voting. At the meeting of the Council on the 7th January he had questioned the right of the Security Council under the Charter to exercise the powers proposed in respect of articles 10 and 37 of the Statute of the Free Territory. The three new members of the Council expressed similar fears. Sir Alexander Cadogan argued that Article 24 of the Charter gave the Council the necessary authority, and the Soviet delegate also supported this view.

Disarmament

The Security Council finds itself faced with three resolutions on how best to proceed with disarmament. A Soviet resolution urges it to "work out practical measures on the implementation of the General Assembly's decision of the 14th December, 1946, on the general regulation and reduction of armaments and armed forces and on the establishment of international control assuring the reduction of armaments and armed forces . . . . to establish a Commission of the representatives of countries members of the Security Council, to submit to the Security Council within a period of from one to two but not later than three months its proposals in accordance with paragraph 1 of this decision." H.M. Government regard as ill-considered the attempt to enforce such a time-limit to the solution of what is in fact the problem of world security.

The U.S. resolution urges the Council to "give first priority to the establishment of international control over atomic energy," and to consider and act upon the forthcoming report of the Atomic Energy Commission as soon as received. It will thereafter consider what further political measures it should take. . . ."

The French resolution is the now normal French compromise. It includes most of the Russian resolution, with the time-limit, but instructs the Commission to submit within three months the proposals "which it may be in a position to formulate." In other words, the whole problem need not be solved in three months. It expects the Council to consider the Atomic Energy Commission's report, not as the American draft enjoined, at once, but "as soon as possible." Its original contribution is a request to the Military Staff Committee, whose work Russia had so long held up, to submit within three months the recommendations for which it had been asked by the Security Council on the 1st February, 1946, concerning the organisation of an international force in pursuance of article 43 of the Charter. Such a request is in harmony with the traditional French search for security. The resolution finally asks the Military Staff Committee to make recommendations within 3 months on the Assembly's resolution concerning the withdrawal of troops. To do this the Military Staff Committee would have to enter the political field, a move which the U.K. delegation thinks inappropriate.

At its meeting on the 9th January the Security Council formally accepted the recommendations contained in the Assembly's resolution. In the course of the debate, the Chairman (Australia) suggested that the Council might at the same time establish a Commission, accept the Atomic Energy Commission's report, and refer to the Military Staff Committee the question of speeding up Article 43 agreements and information on forces. He was supported in his comprehensive suggestion by the French delegate. The Soviet delegate accused the U.S. of attempting to cause delay and making acceptance of the U.S. atomic energy plan the price of a disarmament system. To this the U.S. delegate replied that no disarmament system was thinkable without agreement on atomic energy control.

Post-U.N.R.R.A. Relief

The problem of post-U.N.R.R.A. relief was considered by the General Assembly of the United Nations on the 11th December, 1946. The Assembly took note of the U.N.R.R.A. Council Resolution No. 100 of the 16th August, 1946, and of the related resolution of the Economic and Social Council of the 3rd October, recommending that the General Assembly should establish or designate agencies to perform certain functions in respect of relief. These were to include (a) a review of the needs in 1947 for financing urgent imports of the basic essentials of life, particularly food and supplies for agricultural production (after the termination of U.N.R.R.A. programmes) to the extent that they could not otherwise be met, and (b) the making of recommendations on the financial assistance which might be required to meet such needs as were found to exist in consequence of foreign exchange difficulties which could not be dealt with by existing agencies. It was recognised by the Assembly that certain countries would need financial assistance in 1947 to provide for imports of food and other basic essentials of life and that this need might not in all cases be met by international and other institutions available for this purpose. After reaffirming the principle that at no time should relief supplies be used as a political weapon, and that no discrimination should be made in the distribution of relief supplies because of race, creed or political belief, the Assembly decided to establish a special Technical Committee whose functions should be—

(1) to study the minimum import requirements of the basic essentials of life, particularly food and supplies for agricultural production of countries which the committee believes might require assistance in the prevention of suffering or economic retrogression which threatens the supply of those basic essentials;

(2) to survey the means available to each country concerned to finance such imports;

(3) to report concerning the amount of financial assistance which it believes may be required in the light of (1) and (2).

It was then decided that the Committee should consist of ten experts in the field of finance and foreign trade to be designated by the Governments of Argentina, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Poland, U.K., U.S.A. and U.S.S.R.—to serve in their individual capacities and not as representatives of the Governments by which they would be designated. Each Government was to be urged to select a person of outstanding competence. The Secretary-General was directed to transmit to the Committee the information called for in the above-mentioned resolution of the Economic and Social Council. The Committee was instructed to present its report to the Secretary-General for submission to member Governments as soon as possible but in any event not later than the 15th January, 1947. The Assembly also called upon all members of the United Nations to assist in the furnishing of relief when needed and where needed during the ensuing year and, in appropriate cases, by extending special credit facilities to the needy countries. The Secretary-General was to be kept informed of their plans and progress, and to forward the information to other members so as to avoid wasteful duplication of effort. He should, in addition, facilitate informal consultation among Governments concerning relief programmes and should furnish, within the limits of available staff and funds, such technical assistance in respect of the 1947 relief programme as Governments might request. A further resolution proposed by the Norwegian Delegation was accepted. This required the Secretary-General to consider the ways and means of collecting and utilising contributions by persons, organisations and peoples all over the world equilavent to the earnings of one day's work for the purpose of helping to meet relief needs during 1947; and to report on the results of such consideration to member Governments and the Economic and Social Council, at the earliest possible date. The Council was requested to study the report to be made by the Secretary-General and to take whatever action it might deem appropriate. These decisions were approved in a Plenary Session held on the same day. M. Gromyko said that the U.S.S.R. would have preferred the continuation of UNRRA relief. Although the Soviet Government had previously indicated their willingness to contribute towards a continued UNRRA organisation in spite of the fact that the U.S.S.R., being an invaded country, was not bound to do so, nothing was said as to whether or not the Soviet Government would contribute to the new scheme.

The Assembly has also established an International Children's Emergency Fund which will in the first instance utilise such of UNRRA'S assets as may be available after the completion of its work together with voluntary contributions. This fund should enable the continuation of one of the most important branches of UNRRA'S work, that of child feeding and welfare. Moreover, assistance from the fund will not be limited to the children of the countries which received assistance from UNRRA, but will, if necessary, be available for child health purposes generally. The Executive Board of the Fund met on the 7th January and elected its officers. Dr. Rajchman of Poland was elected chairman.

Apart from the functions which, it was agreed by the Assembly, UNRRA should pass on to the United Nations, the Director-General of UNRRA has arranged for the Food and Agricultural Organisation to carry on continued agricultural technical assistance to recipient governments after UNRRA missions have closed. The extent and exact source of the funds which it is proposed that UNRRA should make available for this work has yet to be decided.

In addition, as from the 1st December, 1946, the epidemiological reporting and other functions of the Health Division of U.N.R.R.A. under the two International Sanitary Conventions of 1944 were transferred to the Interim Commission of the World Health Organisation. From that date the work of the epidemiological and medical intelligence sections of the Health Division of U.N.R.R.A's European Regional Office was transferred to the Interim Commission European Office in Geneva. The Interim Commission also approved for signature a draft agreement whereby the sum of 1½ million dollars should be transferred by U.N.R.R.A. to the World Health Organisation to continue certain of the U.N.R.R.A. health programmes, in particular its fellowships scheme, the malaria and tuberculosis control programme and the medical and nursing programme in Ethiopia.

At its Geneva meeting in August the U.N.R.R.A. Council had recommended the transfer to the United Nations of some of U.N.R.R.A's social welfare activities. The General Assembly has now authorised the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Economic and Social Council, to make provision, with the co-operation of the specialised agencies where appropriate, for the continuance of the urgent and important advisory functions in the field of social welfare carried on by U.N.R.R.A., and to include in the budget of the United Nations for 1947 the funds necessary for the assumption of certain recommended functions. It will be for the International Refugee Organisation, of course, to take over certain of U.N.R.R.A.'s functions connected with the care and welfare of Displaced Persons.

Sixth Council Meeting of U.N.R.R.A.

The sixth session of the U.N.R.R.A. Council was held at Washington from the 10th to the 13th December, 1946. The U.S., the U.K. and the majority of the Council were opposed to the holding of any further session, but the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia were not prepared to agree to this and it was necessary to seek a compromise. A Resolution was adopted providing for a final session of the Council to be held before the 30th June, 1947, unless the Central Committee decides by a unanimous vote that a further session is unnecessary. A Resolution regarding the completion of U.N.R.R.A.'s programme put forward by the U.S.S.R. was objected to by the U.S. on the grounds that it seemed to commit America to shipping supplies after the original final dates (31st December, 1946, for Europe and 31st March, 1947, for the Far East), and because it appeared to remove the Central Committee's right to alter programmes. A compromise resolution was eventually adopted by which supplying Governments were urged to make every effort to complete shipments by the 31st March, 1947, for Europe and the 30th June, 1947, for the Far East. U.N.R.R.A. was to be permitted to turn over to receiving countries any contracts uncompleted by these dates, subject to the consent of the supplying Government. Major-General Lowell Rooks was appointed Director-General from the 1st January, 1947, in succession to Mr. La Guardia, and a resolution was approved urging the employment of U.N.R.R.A. personnel by other international agencies.

Technical Committee

The Special Technical Committee set up by the Assembly held its first meeting on the 18th December. Henrik Kaufmann, the Danish representative, was elected chairman. The Secretariat was instructed to collect information regarding the needs of countries which had been assisted by UNRRA in 1946, in accordance with the resolution of the Economic and Social Council of the 3rd October, but this did not imply that these countries would be entitled to assistance in 1947. The Secretariat reported that, as regards Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine, information was scanty. Material from UNRRA, applicant Governments and information collected by the Secretariat should, it was agreed, be circulated by the 23rd December to the Committee. Receiving countries were reported to be beginning bilateral discussions with the State Department. Since the meeting of the Committee grave fears have been expressed on the feeding of Austria after UNRRA supplies cease. And Mr. Theodore Waller, acting chief of the UNRRA mission in Byelo-Russia, has spoken of the serious effect which the stoppage of UNRRA supplies will have on that country. The Technical Committee began a series of meetings on the 6th January and examined reports of needs of countries receiving UNRRA relief with the exception of Albania, Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine which submitted no reports.

U.N.R.R.A.'s Balance Sheet

On the 8th January Lt.-Gen. Sir Humfrey Gale, personal representative of the Director-General of UNRRA in London summed up the situation. He said that the great investment made by the 48 member Governments in UNRRA now looked like being lost altogether, just at the moment when the further expenditure of a much smaller sum would guarantee a dividend in the shape of the real rehabilitation of war-ravaged countries. In most cases, he said, it would be impossible to bridge the gap between the end of the shipments and the 1947 harvest; lack of foreign exchange would prevent replenishment of food stocks from abroad, and the industrial rehabilitation of the needy countries was not generally sufficiently far advanced to allow them to earn the foreign exchange by their own production. Total UNRRA shipments to the 1st January, 1947, amounted to 19,258,000 tons, of a value of $2,281,759,000. These shipments completed operations to the extent of 78 per cent.; the remaining 22 per cent. would be delivered as procurement and shipping conditions allowed. In any case food shipments would end before the real effects of agricultural rehabilitation could be felt. It was, therefore, according to Sir Humfrey Gale, imperative to implement the United Nations recommendation that food should continue to be supplied to countries without foreign exchange. The deputy Director-General (Commander Jackson) said that the only hope of keeping the food supply lines open was that of national contributions, and about this prospect he was not optimistic. People who knew and understood the continuing needs of the war-damaged countries would probably hasten to help; but favourable public opinion was the only sure guarantee for the continuance of international relief, and such opinion seemed to be lacking.

THE DANUBE

The principle of freedom of navigation on international rivers, which has taken a prominent place in recent international discussions, is not a new conception but was proclaimed over 150 years ago by the French Republic in 1792, when the Scheldt and the Meuse were declared open in the name of the Law of Nature. Broad principles of freedom of navigation of rivers were formally established by the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna in 1815, but were not at that time applied to the Danube.

As the U.K. Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference pointed out in September 1946, in a sense Russia may be called the inspirer of an international régime of the Danube, for it was Russia and Austria who agreed by the Treaty of St. Petersburg in 1840 to extend the principles of the Congress of Vienna to the Danube, and Russia did, in fact, undertake to carry out the necessary works to keep the mouths of the river open for navigation. By 1850, however, the channels at the mouth had become so badly silted up as to be dangerous to shipping, and to remedy this condition the Congress of Paris in 1856 decided to put the Danube under international control. Two Commissions were set up, the European and the International. The European Commission was composed of representatives of France, Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia and Turkey. The task of this Commission was to improve the navigability of the Danube from the sea up to Isaccea, about 19 miles above the apex of the delta, and it was given power to levy dues on navigation to cover the cost of any necessary works. It was to complete its task in two years. The International Commission was to be permanent and was to consist of representatives of purely riparian Powers, Turkey, Austria, Bavaria and Württemberg and of commissioners approved by the Porte for Serbia, Moldavia and Vlacchia.

Its immediate task was to draw up police and navigation regulations for the whole river, and after the dissolution of the European Commission it was to succeed to all the powers of that Commission at the Danube mouth. The International Commission, however, faded out and held no sessions after 1859, although legally it continued to exist, whereas the European Commission had its life prolonged by agreements and its jurisdiction extended up-river to Galaţi in 1878 (Treaty of Berlin), and to Brăila in 1883 (Treaty of London). The Treaty of Berlin gave Roumania a place on the Commission. Between 1883 and 1914 there was no modification in the membership, powers or jurisdiction of the Commission.

From the beginning one of the European Commission's main problems was to establish satisfactory relations with the territorial sovereigns, who inevitably regarded its very existence as an encroachment on their sovereignty, although the Berlin Treaty of 1878 gave the Commission a guarantee of complete independence of the territorial sovereigns. Roumania was openly hostile to it. She refused to sign the Treaty of London in 1883 because it confirmed the Commission's independence and she therefore never recognised the extension of the Commission's jurisdiction to Brăila—and constantly attempted to encroach on its privileges. But in spite of difficulties the work of the Commission went on; the Sulina branch, the middle branch of the Danube mouths, was made the permanent channel for navigation by the building of moles and dredging. Loans were raised and repaid and from 1887 until 1914 the Commission was more or less self-supporting.

The Treaty of Versailles made provisional arrangements for the control of the Danube, and the Barcelona Convention and Statute of 1921 laid down general regulations on the régime of international waterways, but it was not until the 23rd July, 1921, that the Danube's future status and organisation were fixed by the Definitive Statute of the Danube, which brought the whole of the river from Ulm to the sea under international control. The European Commission was confirmed in all its powers and privileges from Sulina to Brăila, but its membership, by this instrument, was confined to Great Britain, France, Italy and Roumania.

From Brăila to Ulm the river was entrusted to a new International Commission, which consisted of one delegate each from the riparian States of Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Roumania, two delegates representing the German riparian States (Württemberg and Bavaria), and one delegate each from Great Britain, France and Italy. Russia had ceased to be a riparian State in January 1918 when Roumania occupied Bessarabia.

But the new International Commission was a body with very little power compared with the European Commission. The International Commission could make plans for major works of improvement, but the execution of all works was carried out by each riparian State in its own territory and the cost was borne by each State, which could raise navigation dues to cover the cost of long-term works. Similarly, in matters of policing, the Commission was to draw up navigation regulations on the basis of proposals submitted by the riparian States, but each State was responsible for the applications of the regulations within its sphere of control. In one part of the river only the Commission had rather more extensive powers, between Turnu–Severin and Moldova–Veche where a special régime for the Iron Gates was set up. Here the Commission shared responsibility with Roumania and Yugoslavia for the upkeep and improvement of facilities for navigation.

The European Commission, on the other hand, had complete control of all works carried out on the maritime Danube, and it fixed, collected and disposed of the navigation dues. It also drew up and administered its own navigation and police regulations and had its own police officials.

From the first both Commissions were hampered by the mutual jealousy and hostility of the riparian States. Roumania and Yugoslavia constantly obstructed the work of the International Commission on the ground that it interfered with their sovereignty. The story of the régime of the Iron Gates is one of perpetual disagreement between these two Powers or between them and the Commission. The European Commission suffered similarly from the bitter hostility of Roumania, who never departed from the attitude which she adopted at the Peace Conference in 1919, when she declared that the Commission was an anachronism. Finally, in 1938 France, Great Britain and Roumania met in conference and signed the Sinaia agreement (Italy having declined to take part in the conference), by which many of the powers of the European Commission were handed over to the Maritime Danube Board to be set up by the Roumanian

Government, and the European Commission was reduced to a position analogous to that of the International Commission.

In spite, however, of these difficulties and disagreements and of the complicated technical problems which the Commissions had to face, particularly at the mouth of the Danube, the general navigability of the river was much improved during the inter-war period. On the upper Danube the riparian States, with the International Commission's approval, spent very large sums on hydraulic works and other improvements. Even during periods of very low water 1,000-ton barges could carry 650 tons anywhere along the river. In the difficult stretch of the Iron Gates the annual transport capacity was estimated in 1944 at 10 million tons upstream, though the maximum figure recorded down to 1939 was 1·8 million tons. Unfortunately at the mouth of the Danube financial difficulties and lack of agreement between the British, French and Italian members of the European Commission, on the one hand, and the Roumanians on the other, prevented the adoption of the recommendations of the Commission's engineers for improving navigability.

Statistics of shipping on the Danube are defective, but tonnage was steadily increasing down to 1914, and rose rapidly between 1919 and 1939 except during the period of the economic crisis. During the nineteenth century and until 1914 shipping on the Upper and Middle Danube was almost an Austro-Hungarian monopoly. On the Lower and Maritime Danube Turkish and Russian shipping predominated; there was a small amount of British shipping, Greek and Roumanian shipping increased after each of these two countries had achieved independence. After 1918 there were naturally great changes in the distribution of shipping. Austria and Hungary lost shipping interests to the Succession States, Roumanian and Yugoslav tonnage increased and a new Czecho-Slovak company came into existence. The German Bavarian-Lloyd Company grew in importance and the interests of the non-Danubian Powers expanded.

In 1940 Russia occupied Bessarabia and thus became again, as she had been from 1829–1856 and from 1878–1918, a riparian State. Shortly afterwards, on the ground that all Danubian affairs were of interest to her, she demanded representation on a new Commission which Germany proposed to set up. By September 1944 Danubian affairs had become the concern of the Allied Powers, and H.M.G. proposed that immediately after the cessation of hostilities in Europe a provisional administration, in which Great Britain would participate, should be set up to cover the whole length of the river in order to restore and to maintain the Danube as a means of communication. No progress was made on these lines, and in March 1945 the functions of the European Commission were assumed by representatives of the U.S.S.R. and Roumania. In May 1945 H.M.G. decided to treat this Russo-Roumanian Commission as a merely provisional body, and the Russian Government were informed that in the event of the establishment of a control organisation by Russia, H.M.G. as a member of both former Danube Commissions would expect to participate. At the beginning of 1946 the supervision of the Iron Gates sector was being exercised by a joint Roumanian and Yugoslav Committee at Orşova.

At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in September 1945, the U.S.A. Delegation proposed the establishment of an emergency régime for all European rivers. This was opposed by the Soviet Union on the ground that Allied Commanders should be able to control navigation on the stretches of rivers within their own zones. No decision was arrived at by the Foreign Ministers.

The Draft Peace Treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary all contained proposals made by the United Kingdom and by the United States for establishing freedom of navigation on the Danube and a further U.K. proposal for convening within six months of the coming into force of the Treaties a conference of all interested States to establish a new permanent international régime for the Danube. These proposals were rejected by the U.S.S.R. and their supporters on the ground that the Danube question could not be solved by the Peace Treaties, as it must be settled with the participation of all Danubian States. On the 10th October in the Plenary Conference on the Roumanian Treaty a French proposal which was a modified version of the British and American was adopted by a two-thirds majority. The terms of the French proposal were as follows:—

(i) Navigation on the Danube river shall be free and open on terms of entire equality to the nationals, vessels of commerce and goods of all States.

(ii) With a view to ensuring the practical application of this principle, Roumania undertakes to take part, together with France, the U.S.S.R., the U.K., the U.S.A. and the Danubian States in a Conference which shall be convened within six months of the entry into force of the Peace Treaty, with the object of establishing a new International Régime for the Danube.

This is a much less precise proposal than that of the U.K. and U.S.A. which laid down various rules about sanitary and police regulation and about dues to be charged. The main important difference, however, is that it applies to the Danube only and not, as did the U.K. and U.S.A. proposals, to its navigable tributaries and connecting canals. On the other hand, the second part of the French proposal defines the States described in the U.K. proposal as " interested."

During September and October the question of international traffic on the Danube was also under discussion at the Economic and Social Council. Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia complained to the Council about the retention by the United States of the Yugoslav and Czechoslovak barges removed by Germany to the Upper Danube. At this time the United States Government were making determined efforts in Paris to secure freedom of navigation on the Danube and they decided to make it clear at the Economic Council that the release of the barges depended on the implementation of an agreement on free navigation. On the 11th November, however, Mr. Byrnes unexpectedly announced at the Council of Foreign Ministers that the United States had decided to return the Danube barges to their owners, and on the 12th a similar announcement was made by Generals McNarney and Clark.

At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in New York, M. Molotov refused to accept the French proposal but submitted one of his own which was finally adopted by the Council of Foreign Ministers on the 5th December. This article is confined to the question of navigation and contains a clause limiting the freedom of local traffic (" petit cabotage "), a limitation which had been enforced by Yugoslavia and Roumania during the inter-war period. It runs :— " Navigation on the Danube shall be free and open for the nationals, vessels of commerce and goods of all States, on a footing of equality in regard to port and navigation charges and conditions for merchant shipping. The foregoing shall not apply to traffic between ports of the same State." The Council further agreed to issue the following Four-Power declaration in regard to a Danube Conference :—

(i) The Governments of the U.S.A., U.K., U.S.S.R. and France agree to call within six months of the coming into force of the peace treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary, a conference to work out a new convention regarding the régime of navigation on the Danube to be composed of representatives of the Danubian States :—U.S.S.R., Ukrainian S.S.R., Bulgaria, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, and representatives of the following States, members of the Council of Foreign Ministers :— U.S.A., U.K. and France.

(ii) Subsequent changes in this convention, should they become necessary, shall also be made by the Conference as indicated above.

(iii) Austria shall take part in the above-mentioned conferences after the question of a treaty with Austria has been settled."

Three points emerge from the above declaration. First, no mention is made of a future " international " régime of the Danube, secondly, the U.S.S.R. appears among the Danubian States, not with the other Big Three, in spite of the fact that the Ukraine is the only part of the U.S.S.R. which is a riparian State and the Ukraine is mentioned separately, and, thirdly, no provision is made for the representation of the German territories bordering on the river as was done by the Statute of 1921.

Both at Paris, during discussions on the Danube article in the Draft Peace Treaties, and at the meetings of the Economic Council in New York it was clear that the U.S.S.R., the Ukraine and Yugoslavia challenged the principles of freedom of navigation and of the international control of international rivers and held that only riparian States were concerned in the control of such rivers. The U.S.S.R. gave way on the first principle, but it is still doubtful if they will agree to international control. The view of the Western Powers was admirably expressed by Senator Vandenberg in Paris on the 30th September. He then said that, while the U.S.A. had no direct commercial interest in the Danube problem, they had emphatically an interest in international peace and security and in avoiding international trade barriers which invite discrimination and friction, factors involved in the question of the Danube. The Danube, the longest navigable waterway in Europe, west of the Soviet Union, was an inevitable factor in the peace of the area it served, and was therefore a factor in the total and indivisible peace which the countries represented at the Conference were pledged to sustain.

GERMANY

The Socialist Unity Party announced on the 15th January the results of a conference with the Soviet Military Administration about the economic situation in the Soviet zone. " In reply to the submissions and proposals of the SED " (apparently made last October) the Russians had granted a number of important concessions. The SED communiqué said that no more plants would be dismantled, except in the case of seven coal-mines whose machinery was essential to the U.S.S.R. Deliveries of reparations from current production would be considerably reduced, and shoes and clothing would be exempted; it was admitted that difficulties had arisen over former deliveries. The 200 large enterprises transformed into Soviet joint stock companies would remain in Germany instead of being dismantled, and of these, 74 would be handed back to the German State Governments. It was intended to permit production to be raised two to threefold above the level permitted in the four-Power plan. Improved supplies of food, consumer goods and raw materials were also promised.

This method of representing a statement of Russian policy as being the result of pressure by the SED is a familiar Russian device for boosting that party's waning popularity and is no indication that it carries weight with the Russians or that its leaders were told much more than the Russians chose to tell the world. In the Co-ordinating Committee on the 16th January, General Clay asked General Kurochkin to define his position in regard to the announcement. Although the General was named as one of the negotiators, he appeared embarrassed by the question and replied that he had not authorised anyone to make such statements.

At the next meeting of the Co-ordinating Committee on the 21st February, General Kurochkin explained that, having liquidated the new potential in their zone, the Soviet authorities now desired to encourage the development of peaceful industries in co-operation with the initiation of the SED. They did not consider that the limits established by the Control Council in any way prevented the expansion of peaceful industry and agriculture. General Kurochkin was unable to confirm that the projected expansion applied only to industries categorised as " unlimited " under the Level of Industry Agreement. The statement is important primarily for its psychological effect on the Germans and is timed to strengthen the position of Russia at the forthcoming Conference of Foreign Ministers. This is in line with present Russian efforts to secure a Control Council report which is a favourable advertisement of their occupation methods, while permitting virulent broadcasts from the Soviet zone on alleged exploitation of Germany by the western Powers. If Russia has in fact obtained what she needs in the way of capital equipment she will probably be eager to implement the offer of economic unity in return for acceptance by the other occupying Powers of the principle of taking reparations from current production. Many Germans, however, will treat the latest statement with reserve, recalling that last May Marshal Sokolovsky announced that in general, dismantling had already ceased (see Summary No. 347). They may well consider that the whole process would begin again if it suited Russian policy.

It is not clear from the communiqué in what way reparations from current production will be reduced. This may merely mean public recognition of the fact that deliveries have never reached the rate demanded on paper and that therefore the target has been brought into line with facts. On the other hand, the flow of goods may be reduced below the present level either because the total demand has been reduced or because it is intended to extend the deliveries over a longer period or with the intention of making a genuine concession to German opinion. The exemption of some consumer goods is presumably a common-sense move to help maintain maximum output by giving the workers at least something on which to spend their wages. As regards the Soviet-owned factories, it is curious to recall that when the Russians were originally questioned about this matter they replied that " nothing like 200 " plants were involved. (See Summary No. 359.) An increase in the level of production had, of course, been forecast by Marshal Stalin. The dramatically magnanimous tone of the Russian offer has immense psychological advantages over the slowly deliberated Anglo-U.S. scheme for a revision of the original plan which is to be submitted to the Conference in March. In fact it is improbable that the new level could be reached in most industries for many years. 1946 planned output in the Soviet zone is estimated at 45% of the 1936 level, whereas the present plan permits from anything up to 100–150% of the 1936 level. It is a measure of the fluidity of Russian tactics that, while in December 1945 they opposed an annual steel capacity of more than 5 million tons, their new plan if applied to Germany as a whole would mean a capacity of at least 15 million tons.

The indecisions of SED policy, some of which were discussed in last week's Summary, were again illustrated at a meeting of the Freie Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund in Berlin on the 11th January. The main SED speakers were critical towards Russian policy, as well as that of the Western powers, and again spoke of their hope for a revision of the eastern frontier. SED members have, in fact, stated that it is the desire of the Russians that the SED should not cling too tightly to the apron-strings of the occupying Power. The doctrine now being preached to SED members admits that past tactics have failed. It is felt that the KPD would have had more influence than the SED, but that it is impossible to undo the results of fusion and that the SED in any case represents only a transition stage towards union of all "progressive" people. In order to achieve this the party must tread slowly, since it is believed that Germans do not dislike the idea of Communism but only the way it is put into effect. The SED is now to proceed on the basis of German mentality which it declares (surely mistakenly) to be a complete negation of the principles of force and radicalism. The SED feels it will be necessary to carry out a purge within the party while its external policy in the immediate future will be to try to win influence over the intellectual classes.

The intense cold in Germany at the beginning of January severely dislocated industry throughout the country. In the British zone mass looting of coal has taken place, and serious public discontent has been evident. Frequent signs that the tide of despair and disaffection is rising are to be seen in the sharpened tone adopted by hitherto moderate politicians and in the critical articles of most press organs. The right-wing weekly Die Zeit, following its mischievous interview with Steltzer (see Summary No. 374) carried on the 2nd and 9th January articles which almost appear intended as test cases for the tolerance of the occupying Power. The first article, making the assumption that the Atlantic Charter is binding vis-à-vis Germany (although this was denied by Mr. Churchill in May 1944) contends that Germany has fundamental rights which are being grossly violated by the Allies. The second article in condemning French action in the Saar, ends with the open threat that Germany will turn Communist. On the 8th January the Free Democrat paper Hamburger Freie Presse carried as its main headline "Friedensdiktat in Sicht?", thus recalling the approbrious title given to the Treaty of Versailles. Another article bitterly hostile to British policy declares that "England is internally not sufficiently free or strong to set aside as a now historically obsolete prejudice the once justified distrust" of Germany. Such views are not restricted to the FDP. Schlange-Schoeningen, speaking to peasants on the 11th January, gave a warning that "when the starving masses in the cities exploded with despair not even the remotest farmstead would be spared." He continued by saying that Germany could not exist within its present frontiers and that if Germany did not get the chance to put forward its opinions at the peace conference it was to be feared that a real peace would not come. It is refreshing, but unfortunately exceptional, to find a defence of British policy by Erich Noelting, the Economic Minister for N. Rhineland-Westphalia. Speaking of the coal situation on the 11th January, he said that it was wrong to blame all on exports and that this was a Nazi slogan disseminated to incite the people.

An important change in the bi-zonal economic administration took place when on the 17th January the economic executive committee passed a vote of non-confidence in its chairman Dr. Rudolf Mueller. In the place of Dr. Mueller, a non-party delegate from the U.S. zone, the committee elected the prominent Social Democrat Dr. Agartz who stands for a strongly centralised economic policy. This is the first demonstration of the powerful position of the SPD due to the fact that the members of the Committee are the Ministers of Economy for the respective states and that these posts have in every case been secured by this party. The first trade talks between the bi-zonal agencies and German representatives from the Soviet zone were held in Minden on the 16th and 17th January in order to negotiate further exchanges of goods.

It was announced on the 17th January that an interim reorganisation of steel producing plants is to be carried out in the British zone. This does not prejudice final plans for socialisation but will mean a clean break from past association with big combines and industrial magnates. New managements will be formed to operate each undertaking separately.

AUSTRIA

The special Deputies for Austria met on the 16th January in London in a favourable atmosphere, and made some progress in the initial stages of the preparation of the Treaty. It was agreed, on the suggestion of Mr. Gusev, that the Treaty should be called a "Treaty for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria." The five Allied Governments — Yugoslavia, Poland, Canada, South Africa and Australia— which have submitted requests to be heard on Austria, are to be heard separately by the Deputies at an early date. It was unanimously agreed that Austria should be invited to submit her views in writing immediately, and she will be heard orally at a later date. The Austrian delegation will include the Chancellor, the Vice-Chancellor, and the Foreign Minister. The last-named has already arrived. No decision has been taken on which States should sign the Treaty, the French and Soviet Deputies arguing that it should be signed only by the Four Powers and Austria. During the discussions the Soviet Deputy made one reference to Austria's share of responsibility in Germany's war effort, mentioning the presence of Austrian troops during the Russian campaign, and said that consideration would have to be given to these facts in the Treaty, a point of view which has been further developed by Soviet spokesmen in sub-committees.

Yugoslavia has submitted a memorandum to the Deputies on her claims against Austria, and a Yugoslav delegation was heard on this subject by the Deputies on the 22nd January. These are a large part of Carinthia, including Klagenfurt and territory further north, with a population of 180,000; parts of Styria with 10,000 inhabitants, and "protection of the national rights of the Bergenland Croats," or an exchange of population with the Austrian minority left within the proposed new Yugoslav frontier. The Yugoslav claims have little or no justification. The present Austro-Yugoslav frontier was drawn after a well-conducted international plebiscite had determined the wishes of the inhabitants of the Carinthian frontier regions in 1920, and is an excellent strategic and economic frontier running along the high Karawanken mountains. The present Austrian Government have made important concessions to the Slovene minority on education, and on the resettlement and indemnification of the Slovenes expropriated under the Nazi régime. There is little doubt that the great majority of the Slovene-speaking population are satisfied with these concessions and have no wish for a change of régime. The claim for "protection" or transfer of the Burgenland Croats is curious. These people have lived contentedly under Austrian rule since 1919, having fled northwards from the Turks in the XVIth and subsequent centuries. They speak their own language and have their own schools and churches. They have never expressed any dissatisfaction, and would certainly not wish to be transferred to Yugoslavia.

Austrian hopes for the Treaty continue high, and the subject helps to distract attention from the present economic crisis. The Government issued an appeal to the people on the 14th January, urging them to stand together and endure their present hardships, and saying that the Treaty talks would give them strength to hold out during the next few weeks. The Executive Committee met to discuss the critical fuel situation on the 14th and 15th January. With half the month gone Austria has only received 19 per cent. of her coal allocations from abroad. The Soviet member was unco-operative, and the meeting was inconclusive; it was agreed that each Power should take measures to reduce its bid for coal in January, it being left to each Power to say how much, and that the amounts of any reductions should be notified to the Chancellor by the 18th January. It was also agreed that the Economic Directorate should investigate the fuel situation in its widest aspects.

It was announced at a Press Conference on the 13th January that the number of U.S. forces in Austria has been reduced to 16,000 officers and men and 900 civilian employees. To reduce the costs of occupation and to help the Austrian labour market, the number of Austrian civilians employed by the U.S. forces is to be cut down as far as possible.

The Austrian Newspaper Association has stated that the publication of all Austrian newspapers will be suspended on the 28th January owing to the shortage of newsprint. On the 16th January the Austrian printers' and paper industries trade union protested to the Austrian Government, declaring that in the event of a stoppage of Austrian newspapers the publications of the Allies in Austria would not be printed. The failure of the authorities to provide the minimum quantity of newsprint necessary, in a country so potentially rich in timber and pulp, has exasperated both newspaper proprietors and workers. And the heavy demands of the Allies on newsprint for their own publications has been a frequent subject for criticism in the Austrian press.

The Austrian Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow has been told by the Soviet authorities that there are only 30,000 Austrian prisoners of war in Russia. 20,000 are to be returned to Austria, and 10,000 who were in the S.S. and police detachments are to be retained. The Austrians believed that there were at least 200,000 Austrian prisoners in the Soviet Union, and their slow repatriation has caused much anxiety to the Government and the public. The Soviet statement seems to mean that Austrian losses in Russia, perhaps in the very severe winter of 1942–43, were very heavy. It is also known that no attempt was made, until recently, by the Soviet authorities to segregate Austrian from German P.O.Ws.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The memoranda presented to the Council of Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London are evidence that the Czechoslovak Government are approaching the problem of Germany in a statesmanlike fashion. The main concern is naturally for Czechoslovak security. They argue that effective control of Germany should be the paramount aim of the negotiations. To Czechoslovakia, therefore, the question of federation versus centralisation is stated to be of secondary importance, although the Government probably favour, especially in the political and economic spheres, a unified system which can be more easily supervised. Politically, Czechoslovakia fears that federation might lead to agitation for Austrian union, or to a repetition, for example by Bavaria, of the phenomenon of Prussia's rise to power. In addition, the memoranda embody the Czechoslovak desire to share in reparations on the basis of the conclusions reached by the Paris Conference, the disinclination to continue paying in dollars for rail transport across Germany (a serious drain upon the limited supply of foreign currency), anxiety to recover certain assets looted from Czechoslovakia and still held by Germany, and a claim to a free zone at Bremen as well as Hamburg (where facilities were possessed before the war).

Territorial claims have been considerably reduced, for the reasons suggested in last week's Summary. Dr. Clementis, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, claimed that this modification was only achieved after surmounting the opposition of the Ministry of Defence. West of the Polish occupation zone territory with only 25,000 inhabitants would be claimed. Demands for Silesian territory occupied by Poland have been shelved, no doubt under pressure from the Communists and in accordance with Soviet desires. The setting-aside of these Silesian claims, together with the Government's lack of support for the idea of federation, roused strong resentment in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Constituent Assembly. It was only after facing this opposition that Dr. Clementis disclosed that the delegation had already been briefed, and the interested foreign Governments informed. In view of the fact that the Committee is representative of a large section of public opinion, the independent brief which the Delegation carries is not likely to be particularly popular at home. This sidetracking of the Committee is an affront to parliamentary authority which the Assembly will not let pass without having its say any more than it has a recent action by the Minister of Agriculture. In its broader aspects, however, the Government's predicament is understandable, since they need to balance Czechoslovak nationalist aspirations against Communist, Soviet, Polish and Western viewpoints.

In an address to foreign journalists on the 15th January, Dr. Clementis revealed that a demand would be made to Austria for the cessation of a small strip of territory at the confluence of the Morava and Danube. This was in connection with the planned Oder–Danube canal.

Czechoslovak–Hungarian negotiations on the Magyar minority problem are likely to be reopened shortly. Little progress has been made in this prolonged and exacerbated dispute, although contact between the Social Democratic Parties established at the Prague Conference (see Summary No. 373) and the latest Communist trends in Hungary may place it on a different footing. H.M. Government are exploring the possibilities of Four-Power assistance, in the shape of a Commission, to implement the February 1946 Agreement on the population exchange. It is felt in London that discussions are not likely to produce any results, judging from the experience of the past year, and that conditions should not be allowed to deteriorate any further.

POLAND

The elections to the Constituent Assembly were held on Sunday the 19th January, with a few local clashes, but no large-scale disturbances. Foreign correspondents seem to have had greater freedom of observation than some of them had anticipated. "Open" voting took place fairly widely, though it is reported to have been the exception rather than the rule. An official spokesman on Monday said that on the basis of the preliminary (local) counts the "Bloc" had been allotted 327, and M. Mikolajczyk's Polish Peasant Party 24, out of the 372 seats for which voting took place by constituencies. The remaining 72 seats have to be allotted in proportion; so that the Bloc will have about 390 out of the total of 444. The final figures, which have to be issued by the 31st January, may in practice be published sooner.

As suggested in the last Summary these results would not have been obtained in an election conducted on the principles customary in "Western" countries. It had, however, long been expected that by one means or another results of this order would be produced. The Polish Provisional Government is a revolutionary government, based on the genuine support of a small minority. That minority, although it has increased, and is supported faute de mieux by many of the leaders of the Socialists, could certainly not yet win a general election that was free and fair according to western notions. But it has never been expected that the Provisional Government would passively submit to being turned out at a time when material conditions have shown very considerable improvement, and when control of the administration is largely in its hands. Hardly anyone in Poland, therefore, has been hoping for an Opposition success. It was felt, however, that the device used in the Referendum of last year, of having the votes recounted at regional headquarters, after large numbers of blank votes (counted as pro-Government) had been substituted for votes for M. Mikolajczyk's programme, would not be allowed to pass a second time. Everyone has, therefore, been guessing about the precise methods which would be used to fake the results.

Other devices of considerable variety and ingenuity have, in fact, been widely employed :—

(1) The peasant voters were presented with two "Polish Peasant Party" lists, so that some may have voted for the small secessionist group (which adds the name New Liberation to its title) in mistake for the real party, which was not permitted to add the name of M. Mikolajczyk.

(2) The electoral law disqualified from voting persons deprived of the right of legal action, and persons who co-operate with "underground fascist organisations" or "groups aiming at upsetting the régime." Advantage has been taken of these clauses, not only to disqualify a large number of P.S.L. members without necessarily any proof of such co-operation, but also to invalidate whole lists of candidates (some of whose supporters had been thus disqualified) by reduction of the number of qualified supporters below the statutory requirements. Individual candidates have also been disqualified in considerable numbers.

(3) Administrative officers have made it difficult for the Polish Peasant Party to obtain paper, to publish its daily journal, to print voting-cards for the use of its members at the polls, and to carry on the business of its central and regional committees.

(4) Armed gangs have broken into its offices and printing works and seized voting-cards or literature.

(5) A number of local party branches (about 10% perhaps) were closed. In all it is stated that 135 of the party's candidates are under arrest, or 18% of the total; that altogether 32% of its candidates were deprived of the right of standing; and that 22% of the population were thus prevented from voting for the party.

(6) Canvassers of the 'Bloc' carried out an extensive campaign of suggestion that the vote would not be kept secret and that measures such as loss of work or eviction would follow if voters voted for the P.S.L.

(7) A large number of signatures were obtained, under pressure, in Upper Silesia to a promise to vote for the 'Bloc.'

(8) Workers' organisations were induced to resolve to proceed in a body to the polls and vote openly for the 'Bloc,' leaving it to be assumed that those who did not do so would be voting for the P.S.L.

(9) Constant abuse was levelled at the P.S.L. in the Government Press, especially accusations of collaboration with the emigré Poles and the subversive movements in Poland.

(10) British actions have where possible been twisted and used to vilify the P.S.L., which is represented as the party supported by foreign Powers.

By these methods, many of which were already familiar in Poland before 1939, the Government has succeeded in getting the "sweeping majority" desired in order to enact a Constitution which, like that of Pilsudski 12 years ago, will put the régime in a position from which it will not be easy to dislodge it. M. Mikolajczyk has already announced his intention to use his right to appeal against the election, and to claim that a fresh poll should be held.

SOVIET UNION

Some justifiable perplexity must have been caused within and without the frontiers of the Soviet Union this week owing to the discrepancy between the hopes of better Anglo-Soviet relations aroused by Field-Marshal Lord Montgomery's visit to Moscow and the delayed-action bomb dropped by Pravda in its issue of the 15th January regarding the Anglo-Soviet Treaty of Alliance. The announcement that in his pre-Christmas broadcast of the 22nd December, Mr. Bevin had disavowed the Anglo-Soviet alliance, capped a recapitulation of the defects of the Labour Government's foreign policy and in particular its alleged failure to co-operate with the Soviet Union in the same spirit as with the U.S.A. Pravda's deductions were based on one sentence from Mr. Bevin's broadcast quoted (three weeks after the broadcast) out of its context in order to load the scales of the indictment. His Majesty's Government have protested through their Ambassador in Moscow to M. Stalin against the misleading interpretation of their policy given by Pravda. It was pointed out that the fact that the desire of both Governments to make the United Nations Organisation into an effective buttress of international security does not mean that the Treaty lapses merely because the United Nations Organisation has come into being, and that the Foreign Secretary, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, has several times urged an extension of the Treaty and has expressed regret that His Majesty's Government's proposals have not found acceptance by the Soviet Government.

Last week's spate of comment from Moscow on the Polish elections supported the Polish Government's propaganda regarding the situation. Emphasis was laid on the Polish people's approval of the Government's policy as reflected in the results of the referendum last year and, no doubt, the same specious conclusions will be drawn from the foregone results of the present elections. Soviet references to M. Mikolajczyk suggest that he is already being "framed" as an agent of the "reactionary underground," though so far he has not been described as its leader. The latest references to him in Izvestiya seem to pave the way for an even more sinister charge—all too familiar from the records of Soviet trials—that of treasonable connections with foreign Powers. "It is very significant," declared Izvestiya, "that the American Government, in its note of the 5th January, does not base itself on facts furnished by the Polish Government, which it has recognised, but on reports given by Mikolajczyk." As in the Soviet reply to the American note on the Polish elections, Soviet publicity has denied en bloc all charges of irregularity in the election campaign, and has countered the charges with the assertion of "criminal Fascist activities calling for repressive measures so as to ensure the conditions necessary for holding free democratic elections."

On the whole, the Albanian-British controversy has been relatively little discussed in the Soviet press. But the anti-British atmosphere which inspired the first analysis in Krasny Flot of the situation created by the explosion of the mines in the Corfu Straits last Autumn (see Summary No. 373) permeated the latest commentary on the subject from Moscow. Moscow wireless asserted last week that Albanian sovereignty was repeatedly violated by British warships penetrating Albanian waters off the port of Sarango "without permission and in a demonstrative manner." The point originally made by Krasny Flot, that the British warships "were navigating in Albanian waters" at the time of the accident was reiterated and the innocence of the Albanian authorities in regard to these mines was stoutly asserted.

Anglo-American reactions to the recent disclosure of Soviet-Norwegian negotiations regarding Spitsbergen evoked much bad-tempered comment in Moscow. Moscow radio charged The Times with "trying to present the Spitsbergen situation as akin to that in Iceland and several other places where Great Powers have, or are creating, naval bases", which would seem, on the face of it, a quite correct parallel, in view of the Soviet demand for bases in Spitsbergen. Following the original Soviet statement which was analysed in these columns last week, it is interesting to note that Soviet publicity now speaks of indisputable "territorial" interests in Spitsbergen.

The Collegium of the Ministry of Education of the R.S.F.S.R. has published a decision to "Reorganise radically the teaching of literature and literary research in the Pedagogical and Teachers' Institutes," in order to bring the work of these institutes in line with the "ideological and theoretical demands of the Party Central Committee on literature and art." Courses on Soviet literature are to be increased in number and duration. Graduates' theses are to be "revised" with the aim of increasing the number of themes devoted to Soviet literature. New text-books are to be published on Soviet and earlier Russian literature. There will be courses, too, on Western European authors and on the study of literature generally. All this is reminiscent of earlier criticism of the teaching of history (which had been alleged to give too little place to Soviet history and achievements and of the lack of a sufficiently ideological approach among teachers. It is also a logical stage in the campaign against Western influences which opened last summer with the attacks on Anna Akhmatova and Zoschenko (see Summary No. 358).

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark (see Summary No. 374)

The Anglo-Danish food, trade and financial negotiations were resumed in London on the 20th after a good deal of unofficial preliminary discussion between the two countries had taken place. A Danish suggestion that the conversations should be held in Copenhagen was turned down because, in our view, the British Delegation might easily have appeared as suppliants, and pressure groups might have had a chance of intensifying their influence. Hr. Waerum, the principal representative on the Danish side—who incidentally, has worked hard to bring about a favourable solution of all difficulties—admitted that the atmosphere in Copenhagen was bad for negotiations.

His Majesty's Government agreed that the question of Danish exports of food to Great Britain should be considered first, but only on condition that in making their offers the Danes should bear clearly in mind the effect that they would have on their balance of payment. H.M. Minister, in a conversation with M. Rasmussen, emphasised that our first consideration was not food exports or prices but means of balancing payments in 1947; our suggestions to this end had met with deadlock in 1946 because the Danish farmers had tied their Government to a quite unacceptable price for butter and had then refused to export meat and other products which raised no price difficulties and which would, if adequate quantities had been offered, have made a really appreciable contribution to payments. It had to be realised that we simply could not afford any extension of the indefinite credit which Denmark was now enjoying, nor could we easily provide dollar facilities; but we should be found sympathetic if substantial and precise suggestions were forthcoming. M. Randall also laid stress on the point that in any general reductions of her imports which Denmark might find necessary—a necessity which we admitted—Great Britain should receive a square deal.

In answer to some of the questions on points of detail the Danish Government advised His Majesty's Government on the 16th January that (a) a quantity of meat acceptable to Great Britain would be offered, (b) the additional quantity of butter made available by reduction of Danish home consumption would be 7,000 tons in a full year and 5,000 tons between January and September 1947, and (c) that, in the Danish view, an acceptable price for this additional quantity would be Kroner 6 per kilo, i.e. 315 shillings per cwt. or an average price of 229 shillings instead of 220 shillings to be paid during January/September.

By various indications part of the Danish press is endeavouring to prepare the public for acceptance of the idea that a certain amount of further sacrifice will be necessary to bring about an agreement with Great Britain. Thus Berlingske Tidende, Denmark's most widely read paper, has pointed out that the Danes were still inclined to blame other countries for their difficulties instead of asking themselves whether "agriculture is working as cheaply as possible or whether our living standard is such that we are competitive." On the other hand, Børsen, the leading financial paper, thought that if Denmark were to hold out long enough she would, like Canada, force Great Britain to pay the prices she was demanding for her butter and bacon.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

A sixteen-page Memorandum on Allied policy towards Germany was presented by the Netherlands Government to the London Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies on the 15th January. The Memorandum, which requests that the States bordering upon Germany be allowed to take part in a Treaty aiming at her demilitarization, emphasizes the importance of German economic recovery as essential for European economic recovery, but fears that German recovery might be accompanied by an increase of war potential. This difficulty could be surmounted "if, parallel with a reasonable degree of recovery . . . , the decentralization of the political structure and the deconcentration of economic power be carried through consistently." The occupation of Germany should ultimately be restricted to certain strategic areas, thus making possible the abolition of zonal boundaries and the conversion of the occupying forces into a body of police. Politically, the future Germany is seen as a loose confederation of States with a constitution containing effective safeguards against centralization, and with frontiers re-drawn in certain instances. Economically, the decentralization of large industrial concerns is suggested, together with the placing of the Ruhr and Rhineland industries under international control (in which the Netherlands would participate); the barring of German "governmental bodies" from receiving assistance in the shape of long-term foreign loans; the prohibition of the manufacture of arms; and the prohibition of "aggressive economic measures," e.g., protective tariffs, "dumping," and export premia. In laying the foundations of economic recovery, it is suggested, the cost of the occupation should be reduced as far as possible; the dismantling of industrial installations restricted to "war plants"; and a central organization set up with responsibility for maintaining a "minimum standard of provisioning." Mindful of the great importance of fitting German "trade policy" into the "framework of European co-operation," the Netherlands was considering the "advisability" of concluding a trade agreement which laid down a "long-term commercial policy." In the field of German "cultural and spiritual" needs, the Netherlands could make an "important contribution," and, accordingly, might (under Allied supervision) be entrusted with "certain parts of Western Germany," wherein "guidance" could be given to facilitate "cultural and educational recovery."

Following the announcement on the 16th January that the Netherlands and Canadian Governments had agreed to raise their Legations to the status of Embassies, the Netherlands Government have appointed Dr. J. H. van Royen to be the first Dutch Ambassador to Canada. Dr. van Royen, who was born at Istanbul in 1905, studied law at Utrecht University, and received his first diplomatic appointment in 1930 as an attaché to the Dutch Legation at Washington. After a period as Legation Secretary at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he went to Tokyo in 1935 as Legation Secretary. In 1939 he succeded M. van Kleffens as head of the Diplomatic Affairs Department at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Three times imprisoned during the occupation, Dr. van Royen eventually escaped to London in October, 1944. He accompanied M. van Kleffens to the San Francisco Conference, and served in the Schermerhorn Cabinet (June, 1945, to May, 1946), first as Minister without portfolio and Deputy Foreign Minister, subsequently as Foreign Minister.

Belgium

The Antwerp dock strike, which began on the 16th December, 1946 (see Summary No. 374), ended on the 13th January, normal work being resumed next morning. A week earlier the strike received union recognition. A conference between representatives of the port authority and the strikers' committee had shortly before agreed to a wage increase of 24 francs, an unemployment allowance of 10 francs, and had promised a revision of rates of pay for dangerous or heavy work. Armed with this agreement a deputation from the port authority called on the Prime Minister, who was accompanied by the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare (M. Troclet) and the Minister of Economic Affairs

(M. Libaert). M. Huysmans accepted the terms of the agreement, and promised to appoint a commission to examine working conditions with a view to improving them. As soon as the results of these conferences had been announced the strikers decided by a large majority—5,562 votes against 1,126, with 304 abstentions—to return to work.

Luxembourg

M. Pierre Krier, Socialist Minister of Labour, Social Services, Mines and Reconstruction, and leader of the Luxembourg Socialist Party, died on the 20th January at the age of 62. M. Krier, a prominent trades unionist who had been President of the Luxembourg Trades Union Council since 1917, entered Parliament in May, 1918. He had been a delegate to the International Labour Office since 1925; and was appointed Minister of Labour in November, 1937. He was a member of the Luxembourg Government in London during the war.

FRANCE

M. Léon Blum's visit to London (see last week's Summary) bore greater fruit than had been anticipated. The communiqué issued on the 16th January, the morning of M. Blum's return to France, stated that his visit had "provided an opportunity for a joint examination of a number of problems of common interest to the Governments of France and the U.K. and for a most useful exchange of views on a variety of questions." On the German question the communiqué said that—

> "it was recognised on both sides that it was in the interests of the two countries that effective steps should be taken to prevent the economic reconstruction of Germany, though necessary from many points of view, becoming once again a menace to the peace of the world. It was recognised that increased imports of coal were necessary to the economic recovery of France, and that increased coal production in the Ruhr was an essential factor in European reconstruction. It was admitted, however, that no immediate increase in exports from the Ruhr was possible, and that in order to ensure the rehabilitation of the Ruhr mines and a progressive increase in exports from Germany adequate quantities of coal must be retained on the spot."

It was, however, anticipated that by the end of April exports of Ruhr coal would be back to the level of last November before the cuts were made, and it was stated that every effort would be made thereafter to increase production and exports.

The communiqué then passed to the question of an Anglo-French alliance and went on :—

> "It was recognized that the two countries, having been twice attacked by Germany in a period of 25 years, have an equal interest in protecting themselves against a fresh German menace. It was therefore agreed that in these circumstances a Treaty of Alliance should be concluded between them at the earliest possible moment within the framework of Article 52 of the Charter of the United Nations and with the object of preventing any further aggression by Germany and of preserving peace and security. It was agreed that negotiations to this end should be opened as soon as possible. The two Governments were furthermore convinced that the conclusion of such a treaty would facilitate the settlement in a spirit of mutual understanding of all questions arising between the two countries."

Finally, the communiqué referred to the need for economic co-operation and directed the Anglo-French Economic Committee to press on with its task of examining and co-ordinating reconstruction plans in the two countries.

This announcement has been very favourably received in France although it is pointed out that the results achieved are moral rather than material. The Communists alone show real scepticism, but clearly future reactions will depend on the way in which this preliminary agreement is followed up.

The final step in the completion of the basic institutions of the Fourth Republic was taken on the 16th January when the President of the Republic was elected by the two Chambers, sitting together at Versailles. M. Vincent Auriol was elected at the first ballot, receiving 452 votes (10 more than the necessary absolute majority). M. Champetier de Ribes (M.R.P.) received 242 votes, M. Gasser (Radical) 122, and M. Michel Clemenceau for the Right, 60. The ballot was secret, but it is clear that M. Auriol received the votes of a number of electors outside the Socialist and Communist Parties which voted for him en bloc. In the circumstances, it is considered unfortunate that the M.R.P. and the Radicals put up their own candidates, although M. Auriol's reputation for impartiality serves to obscure the fact that he was elected by such a small majority.

The new President was an obvious choice, M. Herriot having refused to stand and General de Gaulle being out of the ring, and the skill he has shown in the past, as President of the Assembly and an experienced parliamentarian, in conducting negotiations between the parties, will continue to stand him in good stead. He is 62 and has been a Socialist deputy since 1914. He specialised in financial questions and was Minister of Finance in the Popular Front Government in 1936–7. In 1940 he voted against the grant of full powers to Pétain and was later imprisoned. He escaped to join General de Gaulle in 1943 and was a leading member of the Consultative Assembly and of the Constituent Assembly of which he became President at the beginning of 1946. He is a personal friend of M. Léon Blum and is liked by men of all political parties including the Communists.

M. Auriol's first task in his new post was to accept the resignation of M. Blum's Government and he immediately began receiving the leaders of the political parties with a view to choosing a Prime Minister. Under the terms of the new Constitution the Prime Minister is chosen by the President and then submits his programme to the Assembly which has to give him a vote of confidence before he and his Ministers can be definitely appointed. In fact, the procedure now being used scarcely differs from that used before the war, and the Prime Minister-designate necessarily has to assure himself of a majority before presenting himself to the Assembly. M. Blum having felt unable to lead a coalition, the President asked M. Ramadier, a veteran but uninspiring Socialist, to form a Government. His negotiations were held up by the attitude of the M.R.P., which has recently shown increased signs of internal division and has resented almost as much as the Communists the success of M. Blum's all-Socialist Government. However, the M.R.P. eventually agreed to the appointment of a Communist Minister of Defence and M. Ramadier, after receiving a big vote of confidence in the Assembly on the 21st January, was able on the following day to form a Government stretching from the Communists to the Independent Republicans.

Paris newspapers re-appeared on the 15th January after an interval of six days which will bear hardly on the finances of the independent papers. The dispute with the rotary machine minders is to be referred to arbitration.

General Mast, who has been Resident-General in Tunisia since 1943, has been replaced by M. Pierre Bertaux, former regional commissioner of Toulouse, who was chef de cabinet to M. Viénot, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in 1936 and recently held a similar post under M. Jules Moch.

M. Saadeddine Bencheneb, an Algerian and professor of Arabic literature at Algiers, has been appointed French representative in Saudi Arabia. He is the first Moslem to be given a French diplomatic post.

SWITZERLAND

According to a Swiss wireless report, 35 members of the "Bund der Schweiz in Grossdeutschland" — an organisation formed by a number of Swiss citizens living in Germany—are charged with plotting against the independence of the Swiss Confederation, participating in an illegal organization, subversive activities against the Swiss nation, political espionage, and illegal recruitment for a foreign military service. Fourteen of the men charged are still abroad. The others will be tried in the Federal Penal Court.

Low rainfall has been the cause of traffic cuts to save electric power. Urban tramways, the first to be affected, were required to reduce, from the 19th January, their power consumption by 20 per cent. by stopping heating in carriages, and curtailing Sunday services for 7 hours of the day. Railways must also expect cuts in their time-tables, probably from the 3rd February, unless adequate rain falls in the meantime.

The strict allocation by the Swiss authorities of quotas for the export of watches to countries in the sterling area has resulted in protests by manufacturers on the ground that it will cause unemployment.

Up to the present some 30,000 foreign workers have been imported into Switzerland. The enticement of labour from the clothing, footwear, fur and hosiery industries in northern Italy by the offer of higher wages by Swiss firms, has led to a local labour shortage and to demands for the restriction of emigration from Italy.

The export prohibition of arms and munitions has been prolonged for six months, but exceptions are now possible for small calibre material and dynamite for non-military purposes.

Switzerland will place several short-wave lengths at the disposal of the United Nations for the wireless service Radio Nations.

The Federal Council and the Danish Government have agreed to open negotiations with a view to regulating commercial exchanges in 1947. The discussions were started at Berne on the 14th January.

ITALY

Signor De Gasperi arrived back in Rome on Friday, the 17th January, after ten days in the U.S.A. and is said to be fully satisfied with the results of his visit. Amongst other advantages the Treasury Department has made available a second payment of 50 million dollars covering various services and supplies to the U.S. army in Italy; two ships have been put at Italy's disposal for the repatriation of prisoners of war and for Italian emigration and an assurance was given that if Italy desired to purchase a further 50 ships favourable consideration would be given to her request; an agreement was reached that negotiations for a new Italo-American commercial treaty should be opened as soon as possible, and finally Signor De Gasperi was informed that, after UNRRA had finished, Italy's needs would be included in the direct relief programme which will soon be submitted to Congress. It is also reported that the Export-Import Bank is willing to grant Italy a loan of 100 million dollars to "assist specific segments of Italian industry to restore and expand export markets."

In contradistinction to these satisfactory results, the political situation with which Signor De Gasperi was faced the moment he landed must have given him cause for disquiet. A feeling has been growing that it would be difficult to avoid a Governmental crisis, mainly owing to the repeated threats of the Republican party to withdraw from the Government. Once this intention was definitely confirmed and was followed by Signor Nenni's resignation from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, a crisis became inevitable and on the 20th January Signor De Gasperi tendered his resignation to the President, Signor De Nicola.

Owing to the split in the Socialist party, Signor Nenni felt he could no longer continue in office but that he must devote his time to the reorganisation of the party, of which he is still Secretary-General. Opinions differ as to whether the matter can rest here, whether a re-shuffle of Ministries will be sufficient or whether a Government crisis of greater or lesser magnitude will follow. Signor De Gasperi, helped by the prestige which he has gained in the U.S.A., is believed to be confident of coping with the situation. A Government of all the major parties would be a satisfactory solution at this moment in view of the Peace Treaty to be signed in the near future. If this is not realisable —and in view of the split in the Socialist party, it hardly seems possible—then some combination of parties will have to be sought. Signor De Gasperi is reported as having said that he might try and re-form his Government with the support of the Communist party. Although in politics disputes between individuals and parties are probably taken more seriously by the outside world than by the participants, a predominantly Christian Democratic-Communist coalition hardly seems workable, particularly in view of Signor Togliatti's recent extremely bitter attacks on Signor De Gasperi. In Christian Democrat circles it is thought that Signor De Gasperi might manage to form a Government with the support of Signor Saragat's Socialists, the Liberals and possibly the Republicans. This seems even less likely, for the Republicans, who have been on the point of resigning from the Government for some time, seem hardly likely to combine with the Liberals, neither would this combination, even if it could be effected, seem to have much chance of survival if the Togliatti-Nenni combine were left out. Another possibility is that Signor Nitti may be asked to form a Government with Signor De Gasperi as Foreign Minister. Whatever the answer it all goes to show in what an unstable position Italian politics still are.

Signor Nenni has confirmed his resignation and is taking over the direction of the Socialist party newspaper Avanti.

The Minister of the Treasury, Signor Bertone, has stated that, although the final figures are not yet available, the total sum subscribed to the Reconstruction Loan would be about 240 milliard lire. In the view of the British Economic Adviser at the Embassy in Rome, this result is not satisfactory since Italy had a deficit last year of 380 milliard lire and is expected to have one of 250 to 300 milliards this year.

Irgun Zvai Leumi, the Jewish terrorist organisation, sent a letter on the 9th January to the Italian Prime Minister, other Cabinet Ministers and the British Ambassador which threatened an attack on "nerve-centres" in Italy unless the Italian Government used its influence to persuade H.M.G. to change their policy to a more lenient one towards the Jews in Palestine. Pamphlet bombs, containing anti-British propaganda, have been exploded in Milan and Padua and six other towns. Owing, however, to their amateurish construction, the bombs destroyed most of the pamphlets when they exploded. Telephone warnings of bomb explosions in an hotel and in a house occupied by British and American Service personnel have also been sent, but in both cases, after a search by the Italian police, nothing was discovered.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The fall of the Coalition Government recently considered imminent has been averted by the refusal of the President, M. Tildy, to accept M. Nagy's resignation. This does not, however, mean that the left-wing bloc has ceased to clamour for a purge of the Smallholders' Party, or is failing to exploit the opportunity with which the unveiling of the "Fascist plot" presented it. Both Communists and Social Democrats are increasing their demands for a rectification of the purely "arithmetical superiority" obtained by their opponents at the General Elections. While it is true that the Smallholders' Party gave cover to many of the electorate who would have preferred to vote for a genuinely Conservative opposition had it existed, the Communists, at least, can ill afford to criticize, since their ranks include ex-members of the Arrow Cross who found the transition not a difficult one. The Social Democrats, indeed, admit the national character of the issue and demand equal punishment for the one member of their Party so far officially admitted by them to be involved. M. Szakasits also leaves the door open for future collaboration with an "otherwise respectable Party" if the Smallholders will abandon "the world of deceptive figures" in which they move by virtue of their majority in the National Assembly. The familiar argument is urged that they would actually gain in strength if they expelled their anti-democratic followers, and their peasant supporters are reminded of the conspirators' alleged intention to deprive them of such substantial benefits as land distribution which democracy brought in its wake.

That the Smallholders will undergo a drastic purge appears certain, since M. Nagy accepts the Ministry of the Interior's statement concerning the infiltration of his Party and the Peasants' Federation by the conspirators, and has already asked for authorization to carry it through. But he maintains that the other Parties are affected also, if to a less degree.

The predominantly military character of the plot is no longer emphasized, and the arrests which are steadily mounting now include that of M. Misténth, the Smallholder Minister for Reconstruction, who is said to have acknowledged his guilt. Members of the Legation staffs in Switzerland, Paris and London are being recalled to answer charges, and according to the Left press M. Sztankovits of the B.B.C., M. Lederer, a correspondent of The Observer, and Lady Listowel, the editor of East Europe, are likewise implicated.

The Peace Treaty with Hungary along with the other satellite Powers, has been signed by Mr. Byrnes.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Note to the British and U.S. Governments on the non-surrender of Italian war criminals was followed by a Press Conference at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and by the usual article in Borba. It has been pointed out that, in spite of the declarations of Moscow and Yalta, and in spite of three previous notes from the Yugoslav Government, the Anglo-American forces in Italy have done nothing to ensure the surrender of such men as Generals Gambara and Pirzio Birollo. And, as if that were not enough, they had even allowed a former officer of the Italian Second Army to publish a book on his exploits in Yugoslavia. The Allied Governments could not evade their obligations by throwing the responsibility on to the Italian Government. If no satisfaction were obtained from this latest protest the Yugoslav Government would lay the matter before the United Nations, as the situation arising therefrom constituted a threat to peace.

The imminent conclusion of the Italian Peace Treaty presents the British and American Governments with the more serious problem of the fate of the Yugoslav refugees in Italy, of whom there are many thousands, including not only genuine political refugees but a large number of Chetniks and Ustaši, whose surrender as war criminals or traitors has been requested by the Yugoslav Government. In many cases, though not in all, H.M.G. and the U.S. Government have agreed to their extradition, but such is the discipline and organisation of Chetniks at Eboli, under the efficient direction of the Royalist General Damjanović, that without a military operation of considerable dimensions it is impossible to trace and arrest them. The Ustaši are concealed by a different kind of "welfare" organisation, in which certain Croat Franciscans, with headquarters in Rome, play a leading part. Once the Allied forces withdraw there will be every inducement for the Italian Government to solve an awkward problem and to placate the Yugoslav Government by the forcible repatriation of all Yugoslav refugees, irrespective of their category. Thus, with a view to forestalling such an action, and also in the hope of speeding up the surrender of recognised traitors, H.M.G. are contemplating sending a special mission to Italy to sift the sheep from the goats in the whole flock.

Mr. Zollner, the representative of the Board of Trade who was arrested last September (see Summary No. 375), has been tried and condemned to six years' hard labour on charges of misappropriating gold belonging to the Yugoslav Government, of smuggling gold out of the country and of selling gold napoleons on the black market. He came to Yugoslavia in the summer on behalf of the Board of Trade, and was arrested as he was leaving the country. The case was contested on the basis of the ownership of the gold. Mr. Zollner believed it to be the property of H.M.G., whereas the Public Prosecutor argued that, if that were so, H.M.G. would have sought to recover it by the usual diplomatic means. The gold, on the contrary, was the illicit booty of the Mihajlovic organisation and now belonged to the Yugoslav Government. No charge of espionage was made, and the name of H.M. Embassy was kept out of the proceedings, although the Yugoslav authorities say that Mr. Zollner was abetted by an Embassy official.

Meanwhile, in connection with the Trifunović trial, the Yugoslav Government have rejected the U.S. Embassy's Note refuting the charges of espionage. At Sisak, in Croatia, an American citizen of Yugoslav origin has been condemned to death for maintaining contact with a subversive organisation.

There has been confirmation from no other source of a report in The Times of a secret meeting of important personages on the Hungaro-Yugoslav frontier, but the story is lent a little colour by a noticeable cordiality in the press of Yugoslavia towards her north-western neighbour.

Greece

While preparations have continued for the visit of the U.N. Commission, while sporadic outbreaks of bandit activity in Northern Greece have been reported and there have been several incidents of terrorism further South (including a few political murders in Athens itself), the Government crisis has overshadowed all else in the news from Greece.

At a Cabinet meeting on the 15th January the Premier was reported to have informed his colleagues of his political negotiations during the previous 48 hours. During his consultations with the leaders of the various parties certain differences of opinion had arisen. M. Sofoulis in particular disagreed with him both on the measures to be adopted to cope with the subversive movement and on the composition of a more broadly based Government. M. Sofoulis maintained that the revolt must be dealt with chiefly by a policy of appeasement through an amnesty, with repression only of those who continued rebellion after it. On the composition of the Government, M. Tsaldaris, making a concession to show his sincere desire for the inclusion of the Liberals, had proposed that he and M. Sofoulis should be Vice-Premiers under a Premier chosen by mutual agreement. In reply M. Sofoulis had insisted that only a Government under his own Premiership could apply his policy of appeasement. He had added that, on taking office, he would dissolve the Chamber and hold fresh elections as soon as normal conditions, which his policy would bring about, were restored. M. Tsaldaris had replied that such a solution would amount indirectly to the complete undermining of established order. He was sure the Cabinet appreciated that negotiations carried on in this spirit could not continue.

On the 16th January the Chamber reassembled after the Christmas recess but decided to postpone the resumption of work until the 20th. M. Tsaldaris publicly asked the Liberals to state by the 20th whether they were prepared to take part in a broadened Government. Otherwise, he declared, he would end the negotiations for such a Cabinet and proceed to apply his own policy.

Meanwhile, largely through Zervas and other intermediaries, discussions continued between M. Tsaldaris and the leaders of the EPE group. All these leaders, however, made it plain to M. Tsaldaris that they would not serve under him; he, for his part, felt that their participation in the Government was not worth buying at the price of the disintegration of his own party which his resignation would cause.

In the midst of these negotiations matters seemed to reach a crisis on the 18th when General Gonatas, the leader of the National Liberals, and M. Alexandris, the leader of the Reformists, resigned from the Cabinet taking with them the other four Ministers of these two parties who had hitherto supported the Populists. On the 20th, however, when a crowded Chamber met to debate a vote of no confidence in the Government, the two Ministers entered with M. Tsaldaris and proposed a few days' adjournment to give time for the parties to reach an understanding on the formation of a broad-based Government. They explained that it was to facilitate this that they had tendered their resignations, which had not been withdrawn. The motion was accepted, and the Chamber adjourned until the 23rd January.

On the morning of the 23rd it was reported that the leaders of seven Parliamentary parties, not including M. Sofoulis, had agreed on the programme and composition of a Coalition Cabinet.

One further factor which may influence the political negotiations is the EAM truce offer published on the 19th January. In it the EAM welcomed the forthcoming arrival of the U.N. Commission and proposed a suspension of the "Republican army's" hostilities during the Commission's visit, provided that governmental forces suspended theirs. This suspension would give the Commission complete freedom of movement for investigation of the real aims of the "Republican Army's" struggle. EAM would like to believe that internal bloodshed would end. Continuing on the subject of the Government crisis EAM repeated that only a radical change of policy could get the country out of its present impasse, and this could only be achieved by an all-party Government, including EAM, which accepted the principle of real authority of the people, of appeasement and of liberation of Greece from foreign interference. The dissolution of the present unrepresentative Chamber and the holding of free elections would allow the nation to return to normal life.

Albania

Early last week the Albanian telegraph agency began an anti-British propaganda campaign in the English language. Starting on the 13th January with a reference to the alleged provision of Greek bandits with British and American uniforms and arms, the agency proceeded on the next day —without directly placing the responsibility upon this country, it is true—to accuse the Greek authorities openly of "planning to land terrorists on the shores of Albania" with the deliberate intention of provoking grave trouble. On the 15th it gave further publicity to a long and bitter tirade against Great Britain which had appeared that morning in Hoxha's newspaper Bashkimi. "The Corfu Channel incident and the British note," declared this article, "are not considered by the Albanian people as something isolated, but as linked to other acts of the British Government which show the unfriendly attitude continually adopted by it towards our country. During the Fascist occupation of Albania British officers who were supposed to aid the Albanian people in their struggle for the common cause gave help to collaborators of the Germans such as Abbas Kupi . . ." [Abbas Kupi, who is now with ex-King Zog in Egypt, actually rendered services of definite value to the Allied cause in 1942–43. His real crime in Hoxha's eyes is that, like other prominent Albanians who are now exiles, but who for long did their best to collaborate with the L.N.C. resistance movement, he has always been opposed to Communism.] "It is the British," continued the article, "who, with Bevin at their head, in every gathering of U.N.O. have opposed Albania's admission . . . . At the Paris Conference the British delegates openly supported the greedy, aggressive monarcho-fascists of Greece who sought to dismember Albania . . . . British propaganda, by means of the London radio, Reuter's Agency and, many influential papers, has long been conducting a vast campaign of slander against us and lending support to Greek fascist calumnies and provocations besides . . . . The Albanian people, however, have strong nerves and will not permit their rights to be abused . . . ."

Bulgaria

It is now over six weeks since it was announced that General Ivan Popov and a group of 26 ex-officers associated with him had been arrested on a charge of treasonable conspiracy. The trial was actually started in the Courts on the 30th December, but it was quickly found that General Popov himself was quite unfit to plead, and so the case was postponed sine die. It is believed, in fact, that the General—who until the recent army purge was Deputy Chief of the General Staff—was driven insane by the appalling treatment which he suffered at the hands of the militia while under arrest. As has already been recorded in Summary No. 373, one accusation against the defendants is that they were plotting, "in the event of war breaking out between the Great Powers, to give active help to a certain Western Power," and furthermore publicity has been given on the Sofia wireless and in the press to an allegation, virtually sponsored by the Bulgarian Government—and therefore, one may quite safely assume, by their masters on the Control Commission—that the accused were in close touch with "certain diplomatic representatives of foreign Powers." These absurd but potentially mischievous suggestions have led Mr. Maynard Barnes, on behalf of the United States Government, and Mr. Tollinton, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, to call separately at the Bulgarian Foreign Office in the New Year and to represent strongly to M. Georgiev that it would be in the general interest if all references of this kind should be dropped from the case. If these things go unchecked—are even deliberately staged—before the peace treaty takes effect, one cannot help wondering what will happen thereafter.

The Bulgarian Government have felt obliged to cut down the standard bread ration from 500 to 420 grammes a day, but have been able to increasee the monthly ration of vegetable oil from 200 to 300 grammes per head. Sofia had to go without its monthly soap ration last November, and there is still a great shortage of fats in general. The effects of two severe droughts in succession are still being felt, as in other Balkan countries. None the less, Bulgaria is probably less badly off for food than any other of them, and this seems to have been the case all along since the War came to an end.

Turkey

After emerging from last summer's elections as a substantial Opposition, the new Democratic Party seemed to suffer a decline, and it had financial difficulties. The support which "Big Business" at first accorded to it dwindled as it became plain that for at least another four years it would have neither contracts nor other benefits to confer; while the poorer of its early supporters became less ready to contribute to the funds of a party which seemed largely identified with the well-to-do Although the Democratic Party has steadfastly repudiated Communism, its fortunes at one time looked like being prejudiced by certain extreme Leftists who had joined it. However, some of these extremists broke away and others, together with some extreme Rightists, were expelled. Thus, towards the end of last year the party was once more gaining ground at the expense of the Republican People's Party, whose prestige inevitably suffers from its long tenure of office and the prevailing economic discontent.

On the 7th January, the first anniversary of the foundation of the Democratic Party, M. Celal Bayar opened its first congress, an enthusiastic meeting at Angora of about a thousand people. The event was warmly welcomed even by the Government press as a sign of the country's increasing political maturity. At the outset M. Bayar once more emphasised his party's entire devotion to the constitution as laid down by Atatürk. Of foreign policy there was no question, since in this field the Democratic Party is at one with the Government. The main resolutions of the Congress were that the Head of the State should not at the same time be the leader of a party, and that laws not in accord with the constitution should be modified. The Democrats contend that as long as President Inönü remains the leader of the Republican People's Party, the Democratic Party will have against it the dead weight of an Administration accustomed to identify the Republican People's Party with the Government. The Democrats also maintain that if they are to have a fair chance, the laws governing elections, the press and the police must be amended. Under the influence of President Inönü and other leaders who are anxious to see a two-party system evolve, the formerly omnipotent Republican People's Party has already shed some of its exclusive privileges. It may well go some way to meet the Democrats' present demands, with the deliberate intention of helping them to assume power in the course of a few years.

The treaty signed with Transjordan on the 11th January, as mentioned last week, seems to be on normal lines: perpetual friendship and peace, the exchange of diplomatic representatives, judicial matters, travel and residence. Disputes are to be settled by pacific means in accordance with Article 33 of the United Nations Charter. In the absence of a settlement such disputes are to be submitted to the Security Council under Article 37 of the Charter. Transjordan would not agree to a Turkish proposal that each party should support the other in the event of a dispute with a neighbour. Nor, in spite of ample protestations that Transjordan would never be involved in the Hatay question, would Turkey consent to exempt Transjordan from the application of the treaty whenever it might conflict with the obligations of Transjordan as a member of the Arab League. When asked by journalists whether there had been discussions about a Turco-Arab bloc, King Abdullah replied that the two countries would try to revive the union of past centuries. Suspecting presumably—and quite wrongly—that the new treaty was engineered by Great Britain, Moscow has been denouncing it as an instrument of British Imperialism.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

His Majesty's Ambassador, in further conversations with Nokrashy Pasha, has failed to move him from his standpoint that the Sudan really desires unity with Egypt, and that the insistence of His Majesty's Government upon a statement declaring that the Sudanese should have freedom ultimately to decide upon their relations with Egypt, assumes that they might desire independence—a hypothesis which he cannot accept. He objects also to the underlying implications that His Majesty's Government are posing as the defender of the interests of the Sudan against an Egypt with evil intentions, and that Egypt is refusing a right of choice to a Sudan desiring independence, while His Majesty's Government are defending that right. Nokrashy Pasha stubbornly insists that his approach to the question is "factual," while that of His Majesty's Government is theoretical.

The debates on the subject of the Sudan, postponed from last week, were started in the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies on the 20th January. An all-party resolution submitted to the Senate asserts the indivisibility of Egypt and the Sudan, denies the right of Great Britain to make any change in the status of the Sudan, and asks the Government for information on the steps they are taking to counter the hostile actions of His Majesty's Government. In the Chamber Makram Obeid Pasha spoke for two hours on the history of the condominium, and then asked what was Egypt's reply to the defiant attitude of the Governor-General. Nokrashy Pasha said that he fully appreciated the desire of the Chamber for a satisfactory solution, and recalled his earlier assurance that he would take every possible step to realise Egypt's two demands. He added that, if he were unsuccessful in his present efforts, he would take another course.

The press had already suggested that, in the event of a breakdown in the Treaty negotiations, Egypt might refer to the Security Council of the United Nations only the question of the evacuation of British troops, and might bring the Sudan question before the International Court of Justice. By such action they would hope to obtain a re-affirmation of Egyptian sovereignty over the Sudan, and possibly increased participation in the administration of the country.

Meanwhile, thirteen tribal leaders, representing some 1,200,000 Sudanese, submitted a memorandum to the Governor-General at the conclusion of the meeting of the Advisory Council for the Northern Sudan, of which all thirteen are members. In it they expressed their disappointment at His Excellency's ban upon political discussion during the session of the Council, and said they felt bound to put forward the following points in writing:—

"1. We reject totally any foreign sovereignty over the Sudan.

"2. We stick to the rights of nations for freedom and our right to determine our future by ourselves. We beg Your Excellency to expedite methods for the formation of self-government so that we shall be able in the nearest possible future to express our opinion with regard to our self-determination. We assure Your Excellency that the longer the delay in attaining this the more shall be our fears for not getting the freedom hoped for.

"3. Although we appreciate the efforts on the part of the Sudan Government for introducing proper administration, yet we look forward to speedy methods with a view to reach our objective—a free and independent Sudan."

Although an assurance is given in the text of the memorandum that it is entirely spontaneous—as indeed it is—this is unlikely to convince Egyptian opinion, which will see in it yet another example of the anti-Egyptian activities of the Governor-General and his staff and a further reason for a larger share by Egyptians in the administration.

The Grand Qadhi left Khartoum for Egypt on the 17th January and was seen off by a large crowd which is reported to have been "on the whole, orderly."

The 19th January was celebrated as a day of mourning in Egypt as the anniversary of the signature of the Sudan Agreement of 1899. All Arabic and European language newspapers, with the exception of the Egyptian Gazette, appeared with black borders. The day passed off quietly.

Palestine

There is no change in the Zionist attitude towards the London Conference, the opening of which is to be deferred for a day or two in order to give time for the Palestinian delegation to arrive.

A meeting of the Jewish Agency Executive is being held in London this week in which Ben Gurion, Shertok and Dr. Silver will take part in discussions on the line to be followed in preliminary talks which they expect to have with representatives of His Majesty's Government.

There has been no important terrorist activity in Palestine during the week. The Jewish Agency Executive is said to be discussing practical measures to combat terrorism, beginning with a propaganda campaign. At the monthly meeting of the Board of Deputies of British Jews Professor Brodetsky, the President of the Board, expressed unqualified abhorrence and condemnation of acts of terrorism by irresponsible groups "whose criminal behaviour is contrary to all the teaching of Judaism and can only harm the interests of the Jewish people."

Transjordan

Three bomb explosions occurred in Amman on the 15th January outside the houses of the Amir Tallal and the Prime Minister. No damage appears to have been intended, and no casualties were caused.

(See also under "Turkey.")

Persia

The elections in Tehran appear to have aroused little enthusiasm among the population. Polling was extended for one day, until the 18th January, to compensate for a religious holiday which fell on the 13th. But, apart from the apathy of the many, there has been much fervour in Tudeh and anti-Government groups among those who allege that Qawam has been interfering with the freedom of the voter. There appears to be no justification for this charge. Fifteen of Qawam's opponents, headed by Dr. Musaddiq, approached the Shah with their grievances on the 13th January and then proceeded to take sanctuary ("bast") in the Palace grounds, in accordance with traditional practice, and stayed there until the 17th January. Their influence is not great, and Musaddiq himself is a wild, unreliable character. He sponsored the Oil Law of December, 1944, which prohibited the grant of oil concessions until after the departure of all foreign troops from Persia, thereby infuriating the Russians. He has since consistently tried to make amends in their eyes by criticising any Government which attempts to resist Russian pressure.

During the last month there has been considerable agitation for the release of Seyyid Zia ed Din, leader of the National Will Party, placed under political arrest by Qawam early in 1946. The agitation has been led by a committee of journalists who style themselves the "Committee of the National Front." His detention is claimed to be quite unjustified and a violation of the principle of freedom.

There has been little news from the Provinces, and nothing to indicate when the provincial elections are to be held. Pre-election disturbances are, however, reported from Irak (Sultanabad) and Yezd. The Prime Minister has had a notable success in Fars, where the tribal leaders are believed to have dissolved the Fars National Movement (see Summary No. 363) and to have asked for admission to the Democrat Party.

THE FAR EAST

China

The news of General Marshall's recall was received with considerable surprise throughout China. Indeed, coming but three weeks after President Truman's statement that his Special Representative was remaining in China, "even though active negotiations have been broken off by the Communist Party," this decision might well have brought dismay as indicating a complete change in United States policy in China. Such fears, however, were largely allayed by the step taken by the United States Government a few hours later in sending a Note to both the Chinese and Soviet Governments calling their attention to "the current unsatisfactory situation with regard to the status and control of the port of Dairen"; and by the announcement which followed quickly on its heels of General Marshall's appointment as Secretary of State in Washington. The former was interpreted as an indication of continued United States interest in the welfare of China; while the latter gave "face" to China where otherwise "face" might have been lost. Even much of the sting in the General's "personal statement" to the Press was smothered in the high honour of his new appointment.

General Marshall left Nanking on the 6th January, to return to the United States by air. On the following day the State Department in Washington issued his statement in which he surveyed the principal reasons for the failure of his efforts "to bring about peace in China and a stable democratic form of government." In this statement the General declares that the greatest obstacle to peace has been the intense suspicion with which the Chinese Communist Party and the Kuomintang regard each other; and, in a number of outspoken home-truths, he apportions the blame equally between the "dominant group of reactionaries" within the Kuomintang—who, he declares, have opposed every effort that he has made to influence the formation of a genuine coalition government—and "the dyed-in-the-wool Communists, who have not hesitated at the most drastic measures to gain their end . . . . without any regard to the immediate suffering of the people involved." General Marshall goes on to state that "the reactionaries in the Government have evidently counted on substantial American support, regardless of their actions"; while the Communists "are evidently counting on an economic collapse to bring about the fall of the Government." He then advances the opinion that the salvation of China would be the assumption, under the leadership of General Chiang Kai-shek, of the reins by the liberals in the Government and in the minority parties, whom he considers "a splendid group of men, but who as yet lack the political power to exercise a controlling influence."

General Marshall's statement was published in full by most of the leading Chinese newspapers, but, generally speaking, immediate press comment on this frank indictment of the extremists of both parties has been surprisingly mild. One left-wing paper, it is true, asserted that the General had acknowledged defeat and departed without having accomplished anything for the benefit of either China or his own country; while the independent paper Ta Kung Pao said that it was for China, rather than the General, to shoulder the blame for the failure of the United States efforts at mediation, which failure it confidently predicted would lead to the closing of Executive Headquarters and the withdrawal in the near future of United States forces in northern China. Ten days after the statement had been released the Communist spokesman, Chou En-lai, produced the expected Communist reply couched in the usual unpleasantly sharp and immoderate phraseology of Yenan; while in a lengthy apologia made to American press correspondents, Chen Li-fu, the leading light in the Kuomintang reactionary group, has advanced the opinion that General Marshall's appraisal of the situation might have proved more enlightening had he made a sounder choice of associates from among the Kuomintang leaders. For the rest, however, no doubt holding discretion the better part of valour in the circumstances, the General's statement has been glossed over by the Chinese press in favour of the more pleasing theme of personal praise for the sincerity of his efforts and expression of the belief that, as United States Secretary of State, General Marshall will find the rich fund of experience gained in China invaluable in moulding a balanced and realistic Far Eastern and Pacific policy.

In political circles the General's statement has been welcomed by the progressive section of the Kuomintang. Obviously with the encouragement of General Chiang Kai-shek, Dr. Sun Fo has seized the opportunity to make a renewed appeal to party leaders to bury the hatchet and come together in an all-Party round-table conference. Some progress is reported in this direction. At the same time General Chiang Kai-shek has been proceeding with his plans to despatch a delegate to resume peace talks in Yenan. His final choice of a delegate fell on General Chang Chih-chung, Chairman of the Sinkiang Provincial Government. It is thought that this choice was made in preference to other Kuomintang leaders whose names have come under consideration for the mission, because General Chang Chih-chung's experience in Sinkiang, his long-standing friendship with Chou En-lai, and the success that attended his previous negotiations with the Communists particularly fit him for the task. The good offices of the American Ambassador, Dr. Stuart, were obtained as a channel through which this proposal could be put before the Yenan leaders. No reply is so far officially known to have been received, but, according to the latest press reports, the proposal has been rejected, the Communists persisting in their demand for the cancellation of the Constitution and the return to the military positions of January of last year before they enter upon any discussion whatsoever.

On the 12th January, several hundred former employees at the Shanghai Municipal Council paraded first in the grounds of the British Consulate-General at Shanghai, where they remained for nearly three hours, and then in the grounds of the French Consulate-General. The purpose of this demonstration, which was conducted in an orderly manner, was to present a claim for the refund of their superannuation contributions and compensation for loss of employment. They were referred to the Mayor as being both the representative of the Chinese Government and Chairman of the Liquidation Commission and, on H.M. Consul-General undertaking to ask the Mayor to make a statement, they dispersed. Three days later, however, they reappeared in the Consulate grounds and on this occasion dispersed only after the Mayor, several hours later, appeared in person and appointed delegates to discuss the whole question with him. It is thought that behind the staging of this demonstration was an unsuccessful attempt to embroil the British community in Shanghai with the local population, much in the same way as the people of Peiping and elsewhere were worked up recently over a girl student incident, in which U.S. Marines were involved.

In response to strong representations by H.M. Ambassador the Chinese Government announced on the 6th January, that the ports of Chingwangtao and Tsingtao had been reopened to foreign shipping. No official reason for their closure was offered, other than that the order had been issued by the General Staff without previous reference to other Government Departments; the Minister for Foreign Affairs asserting that he believed that the necessity for the order was caused by the activities of Communist forces in the neighbourhood of both ports. The real reason, however, is believed to have been pressure brought to bear by Chinese shipping firms in an endeavour to secure a monopoly of the carrying trade with these important ports.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

During the past week press and radio commentators in the United States have continued to take stock of the situation that confronts General Marshall on his assumption of office as Secretary of State. The result has been substantial agreement with the verdict of the New York Herald-Tribune that "Marshall's task will not be quite the same as Byrnes's." It has been pointed out that much that was still in the balance when Mr. Byrnes entered office in July 1945 is now fundamental to the policy which he is passing on to his successor. The United States is "committed against a policy of economic, no less than of political isolation"; there is no doubt as to where it stands in relation to the principles of the United Nations Charter; it is prepared to maintain its military strength as long as there is no effective general disarmament in order that its word may continue to count among the Powers; and its people are unanimous on most major international issues. The task of General Marshall, it is therefore suggested, will be largely to bring American objectives into sharper focus in those areas where they have hitherto not been defined with sufficient clarity—particularly in the Western Hemisphere and in China. In China especially, the General's own clear-cut assessment of the situation in his report of the 7th January is believed to betoken a more effective American stand, now that he is the mainspring, rather than the mere agent, of State Department policy. Mr. Walter Lippmann also suggests that the new Secretary of State "will hardly wish to go on with the three or four distinct and disparate American policies on armaments," and that it would therefore be wise to mark time at Lake Success while General Marshall reviews the entire American position and lays down "a coherent policy."

That the Republicans may insist upon General Marshall exercising even greater firmness than his predecessor in dealing with the Soviets at the forthcoming Moscow conference is suggested by the outstanding speech on foreign policy which Mr. John Foster Dulles delivered in New York on the 17th January. (In some quarters it is felt that the Republicans may even make such a stiffening of the American attitude the essential price of continuing the present "bi-partisan" approach to international questions.) The importance of Mr. Dulles' speech has been underlined by the fact that he submitted it in advance to Senator Vandenberg and Governor Dewey, and that both concurred in its main thesis. It was also delivered to an audience of publishers, whose newspapers and magazines have a combined circulation of something like one hundred millions. In the speech Mr. Dulles was more outspoken on the subject of Soviet-American relations than any other Republican spokesman of commensurate stature in recent weeks. The Soviet Union, he asserted, was aiming at world leadership with a double-barrelled weapon: "one barrel aims at social revolution throughout the world; the other barrel aims at nationalistic expansion." To meet this challenge the Allied statesmen who went to Moscow to frame the German treaty would do well "to think more in terms of the economic unity of Europe and less in terms of the Potsdam dictum that Germany shall be 'a single economic unit.'" The industrial potential of Western Germany ought to be integrated into the economy of Western Europe, so that not only Germany but all her Western neighbours could regain their prosperity and stability. The mere "pastoralisation" of Germany would make prolonged military occupation and charity feeding inevitable, and the American people would not "indefinitely keep in Germany the huge armies which would be needed to repress restless people," nor would they "indefinitely provide immense charity to prevent mass starvation which threatens only because artificial conditions are imposed."

In view of Mr. Dulles' plea for economic federation to buttress Western Europe against Communism, and of Senator Vandenberg's recent insistence at Cleveland upon the continuing need for "reasonable" American loans to restore "democratic stabilities" there, it is perhaps not surprising that the Republican press has been in general agreement with the offer of the United States Export-Import Bank to extend credits of 100 million dollars to Italy. Particular approval has been given to the stipulation that these credits will depend in each instance upon conditions in Italy and upon the degree of stability achieved there. For similar reasons the Republicans have, in common with the rest, generally welcomed the announced intention of His Majesty's Government to negotiate a treaty of alliance with France. At the State Department, the Director of the Office of European Affairs, Mr. H. Freeman Matthews, has intimated that an Anglo-French alliance would not be unwelcome to the United States Government, provided that it fitted into the general pattern of security offered in the United Nations Charter, and that it did not contain exclusive economic clauses in conflict with the tenets of the proposed International Trade Organization. The latter is a point upon which not only the State Department but also a substantial section of the press continues to be extremely sensitive. On the 14th January the New York Herald-Tribune caused some uneasiness by reporting that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John W. Snyder, was making representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarding an alleged violation of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement in a clause of the recent Anglo-Argentine Agreement. Mr. Snyder himself declined to comment on the subject at his press conference on the following day, although he did remark that he "expected the British to live up to their loan agreement."

An attempt to revive interest in Palestine as an Anglo-American liability was made on the 18th January in a report presented to President Truman by Mr. Joseph Clark Baldwin on his return from a visit to this country and to the Middle East. Mr. Baldwin, a former Republican Congressman from the 17th District of New York, is now an official of the Political Action Committee for Palestine. He is urging the President to call an Anglo-American conference to deal with the military, political and economic situation in Palestine and to press for the recognition of Palestine as an "independent democracy" with the displaced Jews of Europe as potential citizens. Meanwhile the State Department in Washington is preparing legislation to admit a considerable number of these homeless European Jews to the United States. Two bills are in preparation, both to permit 50,000 a year to enter between now and 1950. The one admits this number under the existing quota system, whereas the other waives the present statutory limits; and Mr. Truman is to decide which of the two is finally to be submitted to Congress. Four similar measures have already been introduced independently into the House of Representatives by Congressman Emanuel Celler (Democrat, New York). Yet opposition on Capitol Hill is likely to be formidable. In the Democratic camp Senator Elmer Thomas of Oklahama is pressing for the cessation of all immigration, because he feels that the economic instability resulting from the war makes a further influx of population undesirable. On the Republican side, Senator Chapman Revercomb of West Virginia, who has been studying the immigration question for Senator Taft's Committee on Policy, maintains that it would be unwise to admit Jewish displaced persons from Europe on the grounds that they come from countries where left-wing movements are flourishing and that they are therefore likely to bring with them the virus of Communism.

On the 16th January it was announced at the White House that Secretary-of-War Patterson and Secretary-of-the-Navy Forrestal had reached "full and complete agreement" on the much-debated question of unifying the United States armed forces. The plan upon which they have agreed—and which Mr. Truman has described as "thoroughly practical and workable"—calls for the organization of the armed forces under a Secretary of National Defence, with subordinate Secretaries for the Army, the Navy and the Air Force. It now awaits the action of Congress, which shelved Mr. Truman's own proposals last session after long and at times acrimonious discussions in committee. There is apparently considerable support for the Patterson-Forrestal plan in both the new House of Representatives and the Senate, and Senator Chan Gurney, the Chairman of the Armed Forces Committee of the Upper Chamber (itself an amalgamation of the old Naval and Military Affairs Committees under the Congressional Reorganization Act), is known to favour unification of the armed forces in principle. Both Congress and the United States Service Departments are said to have been favourably impressed by the recent decision to appoint a Minister of Defence in Great Britain.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs and Argentina

The Argentine Ministry for Foreign Affairs has now issued a statement on Mr. Byrnes' parting remarks demanding Argentine "compliance with Hemisphere obligations" (see last week's Summary). The statement presumes that Mr. Byrnes' views are his own and not representative of United States policy, and asserts that Argentina has done all in her power to carry out her obligations under the act of Chapultepec. After questioning Mr. Byrnes' right to set himself up as a judge of Argentina, the statement quotes Senator Vandenberg's declaration that the calling of the forthcoming Rio de Janeiro Conference is a matter for all the American Republics and not for the United States alone.

In conversation with H.M. Ambassador Dr. Bramuglia stated that another seven of the obnoxious Germans (see Summary No. 374) were now in custody. The most obnoxious, a Herr Becker, is understood to be in Santiago del Estero, where the Governor of the province is protecting him. Dr. Bramuglia also spoke to H.M. Ambassador about United States' relations with Argentina, denouncing the "tough policy" of the State Department on the ground that it merely strengthened the extreme Nationalist supporters of Perón at the expense of moderates like himself. If the United States attitude were not modified, he would have to resign: if it were modified, the more Nationalist members of the Government could be got rid of.

Colombia

The Colombian Liberal Party, which recently seemed to be hopelessly divided, now shows signs of pulling itself together. Having lost last year's presidential elections owing to the split between the main body of the party and the followers of the demagogue Dr. Gaitán, the orthodox liberals not only failed to promote a conciliation, but also to find a leader for themselves. In December, however, a directorate of three was appointed: the attitude of two of these, Dr. Gabriel Turbay and Dr. Darío Echandía, was then unknown, and they subsequently withdrew, leaving Dr. Eduardo Santos as the sole leader of the majority faction. Dr. Gaitán's followers had thriven on the confusion of their opponents, but their fortunes appear now to have declined. Meanwhile, the Liberal deputies have given their authorisation to Liberals to hold cabinet office, and President Ospina Pérez's cabinet continues therefore to be a mixture of Conservatives and Liberals in equal parts.

Guatemala

The report of a recent statement by H.M. Secretary of State for the Colonies to the effect that the possibility of colonizing British Honduras with the aid of the British West Indies and an influx of displaced persons has produced a protest from the Guatemalan Government on the ground that this impairs Guatemala's "rights." As the Guatemalan Government appear to have adopted the unusual course of communicating their note to the Press before its receipt in London, it seems likely that the recent lull in the Guatemalan agitation for "Belize" will end.

Paraguay

A state of siege was declared for a period of 30 days by President Morínigo. This appears to have been due to the rising political agitation of Liberals, supporters of Colonel Franco, and Communists, the emphasis being officially placed in the last-named. Colonel Franco was arrested, but apparently released later. The Cabinet is reported to have resigned, and the new ministers are a mixture of Colorados and soldiers.

Uruguay

The probable distribution of seats in the next Uruguayan Congress is likely to be slightly more favourable to the Batllistas than was suggested by the figures given in Summary No. 373. About 150,000 votes are reported to have been challenged, however, and the final scrutiny will probably modify the present strength of the parties. In any case the President-elect will have some difficulty in finding a majority, though he is likely to be more astute than Dr. Amézaga in conciliating divergent interests. It is reported that Sr. Berreta has already received an offer from the Communists, but the Batllistas are anti-Communist, and must presumably remain so as long as they hope to capture the working-class vote themselves. The recent Communist successes show the danger of leaving the Union General de Trabajadores open to Communist influence, and the Batllistas will doubtless use their tradition of sponsoring social service measures to emerge as a Labour Party.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Corfu Channel

On the 20th January the Council decided by ten votes to nil to include on the Agenda the U.K. complaint against Albania. M. Gromyko, who abstained from voting, used an argument, coming with ill grace from a Soviet representative, that the U.K. had not exhausted the possibilities of direct settlement (article 33 of the Charter) before approaching the Security Council. It was a poor argument because Russia herself had more than once lodged complaints with the Council without having paid the slightest attention to Article 33. The U.K. who had been the target of these complaints and who had objected to this unchartered and discourteous procedure had been careful to come to the Council only after she had exhausted the possibilities of direct negotiations with Albania. M. Gromyko also contended that the incident was not a threat to peace and security. His third point was that, if there was an international minesweeping organisation it could regulate navigation in the Corfu channel. Sir Alexander Cadogan told M. Gromyko that such an organisation existed and had given authority for the sweeping operations carried out after the 44 British sailors had been killed. M. Gromyko was anxious to postpone matters until the arrival of an Albanian representative. This reasonable-looking suggestion would in fact give Albania power to tell the Council when it might hear the complaint, and the other ten members decided that the Chairman should fix the date of the next meeting.

Disarmament

M. Gromyko gave some explanation of the Soviet resolution at the Security Council's meeting on the 15th January (see last week's Summary).

It was designed, he said, not to sidetrack the Atomic Energy Commission but to make it easier for the Council to fulfil the Assembly's resolution of the 14th December. (It is always interesting to hear a Soviet delegate argue that the Council must obey the Assembly.) The Commission, which the resolution would set up, decides the nature of its work. Each Government chooses its representatives, bearing in mind that the task of the Commission would be first and foremost political. There could be military advisers. At the same time the Military Staff Committee would continue its existence. Sir Alexander Cadogan recalled the time which the League of Nations had wasted on preliminaries before discovering the best way to prepare for a disarmament conference, and pleaded that the United Nations should learn from its experience. At the same meeting the Australian delegate put forward a resolution based on the assumption that the United States and Soviet resolutions were complementary. It advocates the setting up of a Disarmament Commission, and calls for reports from the Disarmament Commission, the Atomic Energy Commission and from the Military Staff Committee, all by the 30th April, 1947. Meanwhile the United States delegation continues to be highly suspicious of Russia's motives.

Economic and Social Council

Human Rights Commission

The Commission on Human Rights meets in New York on the 28th January. Mr. Charles Dukes is U.K. representative on the Commission and it is thought probable that Mrs. Roosevelt will be elected Chairman.

2. Fundamental human rights and freedoms, which are mentioned eight times in the Charter, have not yet been defined internationally, and for this reason the first duty of the Commission will be to draw up what is commonly called an "International Bill of Rights." In this connection it will be recalled that an alleged violation of fundamental human rights in the complaint of the Indian Government about the treatment of Indians in South Africa provoked the Assembly to act as though Article 2 (7) of the Charter (limits of domestic jurisdiction) lost its validity when it was claimed that human rights were being violated.

3. Among fundamental freedoms must be counted freedom of information, for upon this freedom depend many others. The U.K. representative will give full weight to this point when presenting his views to the Commission and will press for the early establishment of a Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information. If this Sub-Commission is established it will immediately be faced with problems arising from the decision of the Assembly on the 9th December that a World Conference on Freedom of Information and the Press should be called in the course of 1947.

GERMANY

While meetings of the Foreign Ministers' Deputies for Germany since the 14th January have been devoted mainly to questions of procedure, certain points of substance have been raised which may have important repercussions on the later negotiations and will arouse considerable German interest. On the 21st January Mr. Murphy, although not claiming to represent the official view of the United States Government, suggested that an international statute might be imposed on the German people or referred to them ad referendum. It might alternatively be accepted by leaders of the democratic political parties or by whatever "Provisional Government" was approved by the occupying Powers. He referred to the collapse of the Government after 1918 by virtue of the odium incurred through signing the peace treaty and feared the recurrence of a similar state of affairs. This is, of course, the argument already put forward in "Die Welt" as discussed in Summary No. 375. Sir William Strang at this stage has merely commented that if a peace treaty were very long delayed it might be convenient for the Four Powers to impose unilaterally certain provisions as a preliminary measure. The Australian delegate, Col. Hodgson, speaking on the 24th January, said that Germany was at present unfit for self-government. The terms of a peace treaty should, therefore, be incorporated in an interim (not final) agreement to be drawn up by all the effective belligerents (not merely by the occupying Powers). This would be an extension of the tri-partite Potsdam Agreement and should point the way to a central German administration, define the German Government contemplated by the Allies and set forth the principles on which frontiers were to be fixed.

Although it is too early to assess accurately German reactions to proposals for a "statute of peace" they would seem in general to be unfavourable. If there is a Treaty, it is thought that a central Government or German representatives specially chosen for the purpose may defend the country's interest in negotiation. This possibility would appear to be regarded as outweighing the advantages of shifting responsibility for signing a treaty. The SED in particular is encouraging the idea of collective responsibility. Pieck stated on the 14th January: "I desire that the anti-fascist democratic parties and the trades unions of the whole of Germany shall at joint deliberations arrive at an understanding on how they intend to defend the interests of the German people if they are summoned to the Moscow Conference." Schwerin Radio on the 18th January described the idea of an imposed peace as "a real shock." Kaiser, on behalf of the CDU, offered the compromise suggestion that as the treaty was likely to be drafted without German participation it could only be ratified by a general plebiscite. The SPD and LDP remain more guarded, although the former's paper "Telegraf" supported Mr. Murphy's idea for the not altogether laudable reason that, whereas a treaty was intended to be valid for a long time, a statute left considerable scope for later modifications. It is unlikely, however, that Germany will welcome proposals that this statute should be merely an extension of the Potsdam Agreement, thus providing no end to the uncertainty about Germany's future; the consensus of German opinion is probably given by "Der Morgen" (Liberal Democrat) which describes the Australian proposition as an attempt to by-pass the real difficulties which would perpetuate Germany's chaos. At the same time Germans watch warily and anxiously as the nations put forward divergent views on the future structure and economy of Germany and see so far Russia, with Poland and probably Czechoslovakia, supporting a Unitary State; Great Britain, the United States and South Africa advocating a form of federalism; Belgium and the Netherlands leaning more towards a confederation as championed by France

The views of the Australian Government were presented to the special Deputies for Germany by Colonel Hodgson on 24th January. He claimed for Australia the right of full consultation and association at every step of the peace-making process. As to the substance of the German settlement, he advocated a "Peace Statute" to be imposed upon Germany, in preference to a Peace Treaty to be signed with a German Government. With regard to frontiers Australia adhered to the view which she had expressed in Paris, that decisions should be based on the Atlantic Charter and on the Charter of the United Nations, though, in dealing with the settlement of Germany, there might be cases where claims made on grounds of security should be regarded as of paramount importance, and account should be taken of the effect of any change on the economy of Europe as a whole. On the following day the South African Government similarly claimed a much larger share in the peace-making process than had been accorded to them in the case of the satellite peace treaties. On German frontiers the South African Government considered that it was not in Poland's interest to move the German eastern frontier to the Oder. South Africa would object to the incorporation of the Saar into Metropolitan France, but not to an economic and customs union.

The view that the speed-up of dismantling in the Soviet zone during October and November was undertaken partly to remove any skeletons in the cupboard, such as experimental stations and war plants, from the prying eyes of inspectors of an Allied disarmament team, was confirmed on the 21st January in the Coordinating Committee. During an exchange between General Kurochkin and General Clay the latter stated that the present committees of inspection were really useless since they investigated only those plants indicated by the Zone Commanders. He then renewed the proposal—frequently rejected in the past by the Russians—for a general investigation covering all aspects of disarmament throughout Germany. Rather to everyone's surprise General Kurochkin accepted without hesitation, and the terms of reference for the investigating body are now being prepared.

A long, prepared diatribe against the British and U.S. delegates in the Control Council was delivered by Marshal Sokolowsky on the 20th January when he accused them of attempting to sabotage the report for the Foreign Ministers by their refusal to give information on reparations and on denazification. This attempt at shifting the blame from Russian shoulders was immediately repulsed by the British delegate and with particular firmness by the American delegate; it was made plain to the Russians that the Western Delegates had nothing to hide, that any responsibility for a breakdown lay not with them but with the Russians and that the Western Delegates would produce no more but no less information than anyone else. Further American firmness was shown by General Clay the following day when he said that until the U.S.S.R. gave the necessary information about their zone he did not intend to change the economic status of the U.S. zone—implying that dismantling will not be continued for the moment. Some confirmation that the Soviet plan for increased production does not apply solely to industries in the "unrestricted" category (see last week's Summary) is given in a statement by the Socialist Unity paper "Berliner Zeitung" of the 17th January. This mentions for example that the capacity of the heavy engineering industry would rise from R.M. 74,700,000 to R.M. 260,700,000 and that of machine tools from R.M. 40,000,000 to R.M. 88,800,000.

Considerable publicity is likely to be given to a recently published report by an "International Committee for the study of European questions." It consists largely of reports selected from the press of recent months to convey the warning that the Nazi Party is reorganising underground for a return to power, that there are large amounts of German assets still hidden abroad and that, except for a small minority of Germans, the people "have on present showing in no way entered the path of democracy." While the last statement and the criticism of denazification, particularly in the South German States, is unlikely to be seriously disputed, the report as a whole gives a misleading impression. To impress readers it is represented as a discovery of hidden dangers against which the Occupying Powers seem to be taking no measures. The part attributed to underground organisations is grossly exaggerated. Small organisations do exist and their members are constantly being rounded up, but at present their influence as organised units in encouraging sabotage, hoarding or rumours is insignificant; hoarders and rumour-mongers are found in all classes of the population—not necessarily Nazis—and they need little encouragement from underground sources. Nor is an organised underground needed to account for the growth of self-pity, nationalism and xenophobia among the whole German population, as exploited openly by present politicians some of whom are strongly anti-Nazi. It is a pity that this real danger, of incalculable but serious extent, should be obscured by stories of a Nazi underground.

The now current belief in German circles that Great Britain is receiving huge sums from an uncalculated amount of reparation in the form of patents, foreign assets and dismantled factories was openly voiced in Hamburg City Assembly on the 15th January. It was unanimously decided to recommend the setting up of an Anglo-German Commission to determine the value of all reparation deliveries from the Hamburg area. Radio Berlin of the 16th January seized on this account and embellished the story with its own additions. These were that the entire gold reserve, the whole merchant fleet, and many German patents and inventions had been shared between Great Britain and the U.S.A. Many factories had been shipped to Britain. The value of these large assets had not been estimated or credited to the reparation account. U.S. experts had assessed the value to Great Britain and the United States at well over 10 milliard dollars. This broadcast abounds in untruths. Germany's gold reserve is shared among the nations deprived of their gold by Germany. Russia, who lost little if any, has renounced her claim. The merchant fleet is shared among the Allies according to their losses and Russia has received a handsome proportion. Very few reparation deliveries have so far been made to either Great Britain or the United States, certainly nothing like the value quoted. But, however devoid of truth, such reports are gaining ground, particularly in the British zone.

AUSTRIA

On the 22nd and 23rd January the special Deputies for Austria heard the Yugoslav and Polish representatives. The major part of Yugoslavia's case was devoted to the justification, in familiar terms, of Yugoslavia's territorial claims against Austria. Attention was drawn in particular to Austria's alleged record of crime both before and during the war, and the suffering of the Slovenes in Austria. Demands were also made for reparation and the effective disarmament and denazification of Austria. When Dr. Vilfan, the Yugoslav representative, had presented his case, the Deputies did not discuss the Yugoslav case, except that Lord Hood briefly reminded Dr. Vilfan that the 1920 plebiscite in the contested regions had been conducted under international supervision after the Yugoslavs had been in occupation of part of the area for eighteen months. Mr. Gusev touched briefly on the problem of displaced persons in Austria, and the discussion was adjourned. The Austrian Chancellor and Foreign Minister are expected to appear before the Deputies on the 30th January.

The Yugoslav claims have been the chief topic in the Austrian press during the week, and the anxiety that they have caused is reflected in the demonstrations of loyalty and resolutions passed in Villach, Klagenfurt, and many of the districts affected. The attitude of the Communists has aroused much criticism. At a meeting of the Communist Central Committee, Fuernberg, the Secretary-General, said that while the Yugoslav claims "were unacceptable to a democratic Austria," his Party demanded that the Government should at once ensure "complete equality to the Carinthian Slovenes," and the Government were criticised for failing to establish "friendly or at least neighbourly relations with Yugoslavia." The official Wiener Zeitung on the 24th, while attacking the territorial claims, called the Yugoslav reparation claims "a cruel joke."

The Polish representative, in his statement to the Deputies, also stressed Austria's responsibility in the war and claimed, among other things, that Austria should be responsible for the expenses of Polish citizens repatriated from Austria.

The Deputies agreed in principle to the clause in the treaty recognising the re-establishment of Austria as a Sovereign and independent State. The question of the Powers to be named in the Preamble as signatories to the treaty was referred to the Foreign Ministers for decision.

The Australian and South African representatives have also been heard, claiming their right to be brought into full consultation at all stages. The Australian delegation urged the adoption of clauses providing for treaty revision, fact-finding commissions for frontiers, displaced persons, and German assets, which they had put forward at the Paris Conference. After these hearings the Deputies discussed the idea of a Four-Power Guarantee for Austria. The French delegate wished the Four Powers to bind themselves to take action to resist any threat to Austria's independence or territorial integrity, while General Clark has proposed that in the event of such a threat the Four Powers will consult with one another and with the appropriate organs of the United Nations with regard to appropriate joint action. Mr. Gusev disapproved of the French proposal, on the ground that it could not properly be regarded as a "regional agreement" within the meaning of Articles 51–53 of the U.N. Charter, since after the conclusion of the Treaty the Four Powers would not in any sense be neighbours of Austria. The view expressed by the U.K. Representative is that the absence of any Austrian armed forces creates a special problem, and there might be a case for a special Four-Power guarantee for a limited period until Austria could defend her own frontiers. H.M.G. are opposed to a long-term Four Power guarantee, as they consider that it would be best not to take any step implying lack of confidence in the United Nations. They would not object however to including an article in the Austrian treaty stating that an Anschluss between Germany and Austria was forbidden, although any special measures towards that end would probably best figure in the German treaty.

In addition to the Austrian Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor and Foreign Minister, the Austrian Delegation includes representatives chosen by the three parties—Ing. Schumy, a former Vice-Chancellor and Minister of the Interior, for the People's Party; Dr. Koref, Mayor of Linz and a member of the Executive Committee of the Socialist Party; and Ernst Fischer, previously Minister of Education in the Renner Government and one of the ablest of the Communists. This all-party representation is designed to obviate any criticism in the future that decisions reached on the treaty were the responsibility of one Party alone. The Provisional Governor of Carinthia and his deputy are also in the delegation, giving added emphasis to the frontier question.

At the Allied Council meeting in Vienna on the 24th January the atmosphere, cordial at recent meetings, showed a marked deterioration, and there was an almost total lack of agreement. General Kurasov reverted to the Soviet policy of obstructing the passage of Austrian legislation and picking holes in the Control Agreement. The Austrian request for supplementary rations for miners and forestry workers was rejected. The Council failed to agree on the long-standing question of the armament and strength of the Austrian police force, although the Chancellor had drawn attention to the deterioration of public safety and the need for re-equipment of the police.

In the House of Lords on the 28th January Lord Schuster (until lately head of the Legal Division of the British Element of the Allied Commission in Vienna), raised the question of H.M.G.'s policy towards Austria. He deplored the decision on the South Tyrol (in which he was supported by other noble Lords), and its disastrous effect on the Austrian people. He spoke on the necessity for a Minister, without departmental responsibilities, who would occupy the position between the Commission and H.M.G. which Mr. MacMillan occupied in Italy. Lord Schuster also criticised the extreme severity of the Denazification Law, as amended by the Allies (although he had taken the main part in negotiations on the British side). Lord Schuster expressed the unanimous condemnation of the House of the Yugoslav claims on Austrian territory, which Lord Pakenham, for the Government, roundly rejected as "not worth the paper they are written on."

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Magyar-Slovak problem was brought once more to the notice of the House of Commons on the 22nd January, when Mr. F. Willey asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to make a statement on the "mass deportations of Hungarian-speaking people from the frontier districts of Slovakia." In his reply, Mr. Bevin pointed out that the compulsory transfer of labour was based on the Czechoslovak Mobilisation of Labour Decree of 1945, and that, according to the official figures, the number of Magyars affected amounted to less than 10 per cent. of the total number of Slovaks involved. (The Czechoslovak Census of 1930 put the Magyar minority at 17 per cent. of the total population of Slovakia.) Over a million Czechs had been subject to direction, apart from the Slovaks. H.M. Government have made no representations on the subject.

On January 20th the Czechoslovak Representative in Budapest, General Dastich, made another approach to the Hungarian Foreign Minister in an effort to reopen discussions on the carrying out of the February 1946 Agreement on population exchange. M. Gyöngyösi replied that, as a preliminary condition to resuming the talks, his Government still insisted upon the cancellation of the labour regulations in so far as they applied to the Magyar minority. He offered, however, to place before his Government the Czechoslovak proposal that their cancellation should be made contingent upon discussions having first produced concrete results. In an interview later in the week with Mr. Helm, Head of the British Political Mission in Hungary, M. Gyöngyösi disclosed that he had subsequently arranged to meet Dr. Clementis at Bratislava on the 26th January for a private discussion of the whole problem. The Hungarian Government, he said, would warmly welcome the suggestion that, if they found it necessary, they should apply to the Great Powers for assistance in finding a solution to the question. He considered it unlikely, however, that the Governments of Czechoslovakia or of the U.S.S.R., would consider such a proposal very favourably.

A Czechoslovak-Egyptian Trade Agreement has been concluded in Cairo. This provides Czechoslovakia with a credit of about £1 million for one year at 3 per cent., to purchase Egyptian cotton. Dr. Ripka, in announcing the conclusion of these negotiations, referred also to the "satisfactory" supplies of cotton reaching Czechoslovakia from the Soviet Union. Without these, he claimed, the cotton factories would have been unable to carry on in the early days after the liberation, and the Soviet Union had thus saved the textile industries from serious loss and deterioration.

The November figures for foreign trade show a further overall increase, but the favourable trade balance has shown a slight decline. Switzerland still takes first place in Czechoslovak trade, followed by the Soviet Union and Sweden. The production of iron and steel last November was the highest since the liberation—and 100 per cent. higher than November 1945. Brown coal production has reached a figure in excess of the 1937 average, although supplies of ordinary coal and coke are still lagging behind the pre-war figures. Dr. Ripka forecast that the export target set up under the Two Year Plan was within sight, and that the prospect for Czechoslovak trade was favourable. Home requirements, however, would have to be reduced in order to fulfil the export programme. (For Czechoslovak-Swiss negotiations on compensation of nationalised property, see under "Switzerland.")

Following the announcement that Mr. Henry Wallace is to visit the United Kingdom on a short lecture tour, it is reported that M. Kopecký, the Czechoslovak Minister of Information, has invited Mr. Wallace to pay an official visit to Prague in the near future.

POLAND

The official results of the elections have not yet been published. Unofficial figures have been broadcast from Warsaw as follows:—

		%
Entitled to vote	12,709,056	...
Valid votes given	11,244,873	89·0

An unofficial forecast of the balance of parties has also been broadcast, viz. :—

Communists (PPR)	119
Socialists	119
"Peasant" Party	107
Democrats	38
Total Bloc parties	383
Polish Peasant Party (M. Mikolajczyk's)	27
"Work" Party	17
Polish Peasant Party—New Liberation	13
Others	4
Total	444

Thus the Communists and the "Lublin" Peasant Party together have 226 members, or just over half the Assembly, which renders them independent, at a pinch, of Socialist support.

The members elected include M. Mikolajczyk (in Warsaw) and M. Zulawski (in Cracow).

It is reported that at a Polish Peasant Party Committee meeting last week there was some opposition to M. Mikolajczyk, in which at least one of his two party colleagues in the Cabinet took part; that M. Mikolajczyk himself had contemplated a "boycott" of the Assembly; but that no decision was taken. A meeting of the general council of the party will probably be held before the 4th February, when the Assembly is expected to hold its opening session.

A Warsaw message has stated that it is proposed that the Security Police should now be disbanded, having done its work in liquidating the bandits. This announcement sounds almost too good to be true.

SOVIET UNION

Generalissimo Stalin's reply to Mr. Bevin's message of the 18th January throws light on the attitude of the Soviet Government to an extension of the Anglo-Soviet Alliance and in the considerations underlying Pravda's recent (and still unwithdrawn) attacks. As the Soviet Government had made no response to the previous British suggestions for an extension of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty, the dissatisfaction apparently felt in the Kremlin with its present scope and form was not known until Stalin mentioned the subject to the Chief of the Imperial General Staff during the latter's conversation with him. Marshal Stalin has now stated that the Foreign Secretary and himself "share the same viewpoint with regard to the Anglo-Soviet Treaty" but that the Soviet Government are not ready to extend the Alliance unless it is modified and freed from "reservations" which "weaken the significance of the Treaty in the post-war period." Pending clearer definition of these reservations in Moscow, they may be assumed to refer to Articles III and IV of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty. None of the parallel Soviet Treaties with European Powers (France, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia) contain similar clauses providing for the replacement of the Treaties by arrangements concluded within the framework of the United Nations Organisation. The present Soviet moves in regard to the Anglo-Soviet Treaty may therefore be aimed at re-drafting in this sense.

A vigorous campaign is in progress in the Soviet press against the conduct of affairs in Western Germany, presumably designed to prepare the ground for the Four Power Conference on Germany in March. New Times has returned to the familiar charges and added new ones to the effect that the Western Powers are failing to deliver goods from their zones as reparations to the U.S.S.R. while systematically extracting products for the benefit of their own countries. The most disquieting move has been the publication by Tass of Marshal Sokolovsky's critical statement made at the last meeting of the Control Council. Such unilateral disclosure of a subject still under discussion is quite contrary to the precedents hitherto observed in the Control Council.

The long discourse of M. Alexandrov, Chief of the Propaganda and Agitation Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, on the anniversary of Lenin's death, in the main reiterated the current lines of Party propaganda, affirming the solidarity of the country as a whole with the Party. He described the leading intelligentsia of the U.S.S.R. as having given "fervent support" to the recent measures for suppressing "an impossible liberal attitude towards views alien to Bolshevism" and anticipated a renaissance in culture and the arts as a result of these measures. The speech was mainly interesting for its emphasis on the difficulties confronting the U.S.S.R.; it contained an admission of the acute food problem facing the Soviet authorities. In the sphere of foreign affairs Alexandrov once more raked up the old charge of delay in launching the Second Front, to which he ascribed much of the devastation from which the U.S.S.R. had suffered in the course of the war, and then went on to deprecate the value of the Second Front in the final stages of the war. He also insisted on the need for Bolshevik vigilance, in view of the continuing strength of the "war-mongers" such as Mr. Churchill and his friends in Britain and the U.S.A. He comforted his hearers, however, with the reflection that world reaction was overestimating its strength, whereas the working class of the bourgeois countries had still not awakened to a full realisation of its rights and of its power in the struggle for peace.

Russkie Novosti, the pro-Soviet Paris weekly, has published (10th January) an account of the experiences of the first batch of repatriates who left Marseilles for the U.S.S.R. as newly fledged Soviet citizens on the 26th November. They were met at Odessa by V.P. Pronin, Minister of Labour Reserves of the U.S.S.R., who had come down from Moscow for the occasion. The Ukrainians and White Russians among the repatriates were sent to work in the Donbass. All the Russians were said to have been given work according to their qualifications, e.g. one was working in an electric power station near Kazan and another in the timber industry at Vorovsk, while another was put in charge of a buffet on a Volga steamer. As this information is derived from the repatriates' letters home, it must be borne in mind that the writers may have had one eye on the censorship.

Khrushchev, Chairman of the Ukrainian Council of Ministers, in an article in connection with the forthcoming elections admitted the serious effects of the drought in the Ukraine and also once more alluded to the activities of the Ukrainian nationalists, which are evidently still proving a thorn in the Soviet flesh. Reports have been received of forays by U.P.A., the Ukrainian nationalist guerilla army, in the eastern as well as western Ukraine, and printed manifestos have been seen openly displayed on factory walls grumbling at conditions.

The visit of the delegation from the Soviet Ukraine to Canada last August is now being returned. A party of Canadian Ukrainians, including the editors of the two main left wing Ukrainian newspapers in Canada, have just reached Lvov. It has not been stated how far their travels are likely to range.

Admiral Rodionov, Soviet Ambassador to Greece—who has been in Moscow since the end of August and had said, on leaving Athens, that he was not sure whether he would go back to Greece—has just applied for a visa to return to his post. His move coincides with the arrival in Athens of the Soviet delegation to the United Nations Commission investigating the situation on the Greek frontiers. The delegation is headed by M. Lavrishchev, head of the Balkan Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. (See also under "France" and the "Middle East.")

It has been announced that the former East Prussian town of Tilsit, now in the Kaliningrad Province of the R.S.F.S.R. has been re-named Sovietsk. The same Soviet report states that the bridges over the Niemen which will link Kaliningrad Province with the Lithuanian S.S.R. are being repaired. Sovietsk is now the centre of a Soviet constituency and, in consonance with the new order, a woman agricultural worker has been registered as its candidate for the forthcoming elections to the Supreme Council of the R.S.F.S.R.

SCANDINAVIA

Sweden

The Swedish Royal Family and the people of Sweden have been plunged into deep mourning by the sudden death in an air accident of Prince Gustaf Adolf, the eldest son of Crown Prince Gustaf Adolf. The Prince was heir-apparent after his father and by his death the succession in the direct line will rest solely on his infant son, Prince Carl Gustaf, as the Swedish succession is governed by the Salic Law. Of the three brothers of Prince Gustaf Adolf only one, Prince Bertil, has retained his Royal status, the other two having married commoners and thus having forfeited their rights to the succession. The Crown Prince himself has one brother, Prince Vilhelm, whose only son Prince Lennart, has likewise married a commoner.

Denmark

M. Rasmussen, the Danish Foreign Minister, at a semi-official function, has referred to the Danish statement on the future of Germany which will be handed to the Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London. He said that, while the statement was still under consideration, it was natural that it would contain a request for Germany's complete disarmament, and equal political and cultural rights for non-German national groups within the country with the rest of the population; the opening of the Kiel Canal to ships of all nations; the re-establishment of normal economic relations between Germany and her neighbours, and equal right of access to Germany for all States. He also expressed the hope that the removal of German refugees from Denmark would not be indefinitely postponed.

Speaking in Copenhagen on the 19th January, M. Hedtoft, Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, has outlined his party's attitude to the South Schleswig question in a refreshingly vigorous speech. A referendum about the national status of South Schleswig would be absurd. If Denmark was not prepared to abide by the results of a referendum it was not right to undertake it, and the Social Democrats were certainly not prepared to take the consequences of any such step. They would not lend a hand to the formulation of a policy which directly or indirectly meant a revival of a kind of Eider policy, and which might create a bloc of 200,000 Danes against 300,000 Germans in a united Schleswig. They would oppose such an adventurous policy. While they would secure for the Danish minority its rights of freedom, they declined to break with those principles of justice which had always been the foundation for the frontier policy of democratic Denmark.

Finland

Plans for the conversion of the British diplomatic courier service to Finland into a commercial air line operated by British European Airways are now well advanced (see Summary No. 375), and formal proposals to this effect have been made to the Finnish Government. These proposals included the granting of full reciprocal rights to the Finns; a fact gratefully acknowledged by the Finnish Foreign Minister. At first M. Enckell had stated that the permission of the Soviet authorities on the Control Commission would have to be obtained, but later he agreed to the expedient of merely acquainting the Russians with the contemplated change. In the meantime the British Element of the Control Commission have informed their Soviet opposite numbers of the proposals and have stated that they favour the conversion.

As a result of the Armistice Agreement Finnish aviation became subject to the control of the Soviets, acting through the Allied Control Commission, and although a limited amount of traffic, was allowed to continue after the signing of the Armistice, the service between Finland and Sweden was suspended early in March 1945 (see Summary No. 283). At the same time internal air traffic was brought to a standstill. The ban on internal flying was lifted in August of the same year, but Finland remained without any external air communications until the inauguration, in November 1946 of the Soviet-Swedish link service between Stockholm and Moscow (see Summary No. 370 under "Sweden").

Since the New Year Helsinki airport at Malmi has been under Finnish control, and it would therefore be difficult for the Russians, assuming that they so wished, directly to interfere with the arrival and departure of British commercial planes. The possibility of the aircraft being detained by the Finnish State Police, acting on direct instructions from the Russians, should, nevertheless, not be overlooked.

The Import and Export Bank of New York has granted Finland a long-term credit of 20 million dollars to facilitate Finnish purchases of American machinery needed for the rehabilitation of the Finnish timber and paper industries. Repayment will begin in 1954 and is to be completed before the end of 1958. At the same time two short-term loans, totalling 12 million dollars, were also granted and will be spent on essential food imports and cotton. They are to be repaid by the end of the current year.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

Two Belgian Government Memoranda—the first on Allied policy towards Germany, the second on Belgian economic claims against Germany—were received by the Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London on the 20th January.

Briefly, the Memorandum on policy seeks the establishment in Germany of a "federal political régime"; economic unity with general industrial control; general control of "disarmament"; military occupation of the Rhineland; and "special" international control of the Ruhr. The political structure of Germany, says the Memorandum, was in process of being reconstituted on the foundation of "regional particularism" which, despite the "considerable degree of unity attained by Germany in recent years" had "preserved its roots in historical traditions and ethnical, religious and cultural differences." "A dozen States" were now being formed in Germany; and the Belgian Government believed that those States (whose frontiers would be "fixed rationally") ought to be given the "attributes of sovereignty." A "federal pact," it is suggested, might be concluded amongst them, for the purpose of "delegating to a central power" whatever authority is "strictly" necessary to ensure economic unity. That economic unity—"indispensable" to the solution of German domestic and foreign economic problems—would be the only responsibility of the "central power." Three guarantees are suggested as a means of preventing the recrudescence of German political and economic hegemony. First, with regard to general economic control, the Memorandum fully endorses the scheme presented by the U.S. Secretary of State on the 29th April, 1946, which provides for the close and effective supervision of German economy against the possibility of its being once more transformed into war potential. Secondly, "systems of particular control" should be instituted within the limits of the "general régime imposed on Germany"; and, in recommending the indefinite military occupation of the Rhineland after the end of the general occupation of Germany and the special control of the Ruhr, the Memorandum suggests that this should be effected by Belgium, France, the U.K., Luxembourg and the Netherlands jointly. Thirdly, it is urged that it should be made "impossible" for Germany "to use her commercial policy for encouraging the creation of a war economy" by enforcing her observance of "strict [unspecified] rules." "A certain degree of prosperity would be restored to her only if she remained inoffensive."

Among the principal claims set forth in the second Memorandum are the delivery of 6,600,000 tons of coal a year; the supplying of electric power amounting to 750 million KW a year; of lignite briquettes; industrial and table salt; potassium salts; barium sulphate; and timber. In the sphere of transport and communications demands include the re-establishment on the Rhine of "a régime of freedom and equality"; prohibition of Germany's diverting to her own ports traffic which "normally" would use the Rhine or the Belgian railways; limitation of the German Rhine fleet to the tonnage needed for inland traffic; delivery of a certain number of tugs, motor craft and barges to assist in the reconstruction of the Belgian Rhine fleet; deliveries of railway material and road transport; and the building of a Rhine–Danube canal, this last claim being an extension of the right accorded to Belgium under the Treaty of Versailles for the construction of a Rhine–Antwerp–Scheldt canal. With a view to improving water supplies in certain areas of Belgium there is also a demand for the construction, at Germany's expense, of an intake tunnel connecting the River Vesdre (Weser) with dams on the German side of the frontier. A number of reservations with the object of safeguarding Belgian interests in Germany are included, of which the most important is that concerned with any "measures of nationalization, socialization and 'decartelization'" which might be introduced in Germany. "The question arises," adds the Memorandum, "whether these supplies [of raw materials] will be free of charge, or, if not, how Belgium will be called upon, and will be able, to pay for them." There would also be the question of prices and currency. In conclusion, the Memorandum states that the Belgian Government reserved the right to prefer other claims, "general or particular in character," against Germany at a later date.

The Netherlands

After discussions lasting nearly a week on the subject of trade between the Netherlands and the combined British-American Zone of Germany, an agreement was signed at The Hague on the 25th January. This instrument was, however, not a "'trade agreement" as such, but a settlement of the nature of German-Dutch commercial relations and of the manner of payment. Dutch business men are to be allowed to enter the combined Zone for the purpose of making contracts subject to the approval of the appropriate authorities; and transactions are to be entered in a guilder account, with the net balance payable quarterly either in dollars or sterling at the option of the creditor. Lists of commodities available and in demand were presented and discussed, particularly in the light of possible trading in the current year; these included the export of Dutch phosphate fertilizer, and the import of German optical instruments, together with industrial ceramics, chemicals, and surgical and dental equipment. Contracts were actually negotiated during the discussions for the import of German dyestuffs and railway material to the value of $875,000. The Dutch request for permission to export fresh vegetables or entrepôt goods such as coffee, tea, chocolate and tobacco was rejected, on the grounds of the present low standard of living in Germany and of her lack of foreign currency. Another request for more extensive use of the lower Rhine and the port of Rotterdam was also turned down. Nevertheless, these requests are still being examined.

Speaking in Copenhagen on the 19th January, M. Hedtoft, Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, has outlined his party's attitude to the South Schleswig question in a refreshingly vigorous speech. A referendum about the national status of South Schleswig would be absurd. If Denmark was not prepared to abide by the results of a referendum it was not right to undertake it, and the Social Democrats were certainly not prepared to take the consequences of any such step. They would not lend a hand to the formulation of a policy which directly or indirectly meant a revival of a kind of Eider policy, and which might create a bloc of 200,000 Danes against 300,000 Germans in a united Schleswig. They would oppose such an adventurous policy. While they would secure for the Danish minority its rights of freedom, they declined to break with those principles of justice which had always been the foundation for the frontier policy of democratic Denmark.

Finland

Plans for the conversion of the British diplomatic courier service to Finland into a commercial air line operated by British European Airways are now well advanced (see Summary No. 375), and formal proposals to this effect have been made to the Finnish Government. These proposals included the granting of full reciprocal rights to the Finns; a fact gratefully acknowledged by the Finnish Foreign Minister. At first M. Enckell had stated that the permission of the Soviet authorities on the Control Commission would have to be obtained, but later he agreed to the expedient of merely acquainting the Russians with the contemplated change. In the meantime the British Element of the Control Commission have informed their Soviet opposite numbers of the proposals and have stated that they favour the conversion.

As a result of the Armistice Agreement Finnish aviation became subject to the control of the Soviets, acting through the Allied Control Commission, and although a limited amount of traffic, was allowed to continue after the signing of the Armistice, the service between Finland and Sweden was suspended early in March 1945 (see Summary No. 283). At the same time internal air traffic was brought to a standstill. The ban on internal flying was lifted in August of the same year, but Finland remained without any external air communications until the inauguration, in November 1946 of the Soviet-Swedish link service between Stockholm and Moscow (see Summary No. 370 under "Sweden").

Since the New Year Helsinki airport at Malmi has been under Finnish control, and it would therefore be difficult for the Russians, assuming that they so wished, directly to interfere with the arrival and departure of British commercial planes. The possibility of the aircraft being detained by the Finnish State Police, acting on direct instructions from the Russians, should, nevertheless, not be overlooked.

The Import and Export Bank of New York has granted Finland a long-term credit of 20 million dollars to facilitate Finnish purchases of American machinery needed for the rehabilitation of the Finnish timber and paper industries. Repayment will begin in 1954 and is to be completed before the end of 1958. At the same time two short-term loans, totalling 12 million dollars, were also granted and will be spent on essential food imports and cotton. They are to be repaid by the end of the current year.

FRANCE

M. Ramadier's Government, formed on the 22nd January, is the first real Government of the Fourth Republic, established in accordance with the new constitutional procedure. M. Ramadier himself was a somewhat unexpected choice for the Premiership, but during the last week he has shown considerable ability in forming his team of Ministers. He is a veteran Socialist, 58 years old, with little pre-war ministerial experience. He broke away from the party with M. Paul-Boncour in 1933 but rejoined it in 1944. He was Minister of Food from November 1944 to May 1945.

The new Government is as follows :—

Prime Minister : M. Paul Ramadier (Socialist).
Deputy Prime Ministers : M. Maurice Thorez (Communist) and M. P.-H. Teitgen (M.R.P.).
Minister of State concerned with Planning : M. Félix Gouin (Socialist).
Ministers of State : M. Yvon Delbos (Rassemblement des Gauches—R.D.G.) and Dr. Marcel Roclore (Independent Republican).
Minister of the Interior : M. Edouard Depreux (Socialist).
Minister of National Economy : M. André Philip (Socialist).
Minister of Production : M. Robert Lacoste (Socialist).
Minister of Public Works : M. Jules Moch (Socialist).
Minister of Agriculture : M. Tanguy-Prigent (Socialist).
Minister of Overseas France : M. Marius Moutet (Socialist).
Minister of Education : M. Naegelen (Socialist).
Minister of National Defence : M. François Billoux (Communist).
Minister of Labour : M. Ambroise Croizat (Communist).
Minister of Reconstruction : M. Charles Tillon (Communist).
Minister of Public Health and Population : M. Georges Marrane (Communist).
Minister of Foreign Affairs : M. Georges Bidault (M.R.P.).
Minister of Finance : M. Robert Schuman (M.R.P.).
Minister of War : M. Paul Coste-Floret (M.R.P.).
Minister of Commerce : M. Jean Letourneau (M.R.P.).
Minister of Justice : M. André Marie (R.D.G.).
Minister of Air : M. André Maroselli (R.D.G.).
Minister of Ex-Servicemen : M. François Mitterand (R.D.G.).
Minister of Youth, Fine Arts and Letters : M. Pierre Bourdan (R.D.G.).
Minister of Navy : M. Louis Jacquinot (Independent Republican).

This unwieldy-looking structure is topped by five Ministers of State who will, however, act as an inner Cabinet. The predominance of the Socialists who hold 9 out of the 26 Ministries is due to the responsibility that they accept in continuing the policy of M. Blum's Government. Their Ministers hold the same posts as they held in the last Government. M. Bidault returns to the Quai d'Orsay, and M. Jacquinot to the post he held so long and successfully before and after the liberation. The Communists were remarkably modest in their demands, since they were conscious of the importance of being in the Government at the time of the Moscow talks. They accepted National Defence in spite of the fact that this post has been shorn of most of its powers, since they feel that their right to hold a key ministry has now been conceded. The issue of the Communists having the portfolio of National Defence was in fact used as a pretext by the M.R.P., which only agreed to join the Government after long discussion and on condition that M. Ramadier adhered strictly to his declared programme. Failure to reach agreement on the distribution of the Under-Secretaryships of State has resulted in a decision not to appoint to these posts. Similarly, the unwillingness of all parties to accept responsibility for the Ministry of Food has decided M. Ramadier to set up a High Commissariat for Distribution and to require that decrees concerning food should be signed by all members of the inner Cabinet.

The need for ministerial solidarity was vigorously emphasised by M. Ramadier in his declaration of policy given to the Assembly on the 21st January. At this session a welcome dignity was introduced into the proceedings, first by the reading of a message from the new President of the Republic; then by the speedy election of M. Herriot as President of the Assembly by 429 out of 558 votes (he thus returns to the post he held in the Chamber of Deputies before the war); and finally by M. Ramadier's measured words. He described his policy in general terms as the continuation of the work of the previous Government and devoted considerable time to the situation in Indo-China where, he said, France's conciliatory policy had been answered with violence. Order must now be restored as the first priority, but as soon as Annamite representatives could be found with whom it was possible to negotiate, France would not refuse to grant Viet-Nam independence within the French Union.

Mr. Attlee stated in the House of Commons on the 23rd January, in reply to a question, that H.M.G. were anxious to enter into negotiations for a Treaty of Alliance as soon as the new French Government were ready to do so. Mr. Duff Cooper called on M. Bidault on the 25th January and told him that it was hoped to have a draft ready shortly and that it was proposed to complete the negotiations in London. M. Bidault agreed. He said that while he himself might have preferred to postpone the Treaty until after the Moscow Conference, he was quite prepared to pursue negotiations forthwith in the spirit of the joint communiqué of the 16th January (see last week's Summary). He said that the matter would be kept entirely separate from the question of the future of Germany, on which he held strong views. It is the intention of H.M.G. to model the Treaty on the Anglo-Soviet and Franco-Soviet pacts rather than to establish on paper any wider understanding between France and the U.K. Such closer understanding should be developed by direct and less public methods, such as those already adopted in the economic and colonial field and by the frequent contacts between Service authorities. The new development in Anglo-Soviet relations (see under "Soviet Union") may, however, have repercussions on this matter. The French are well pleased with the official reaffirmation of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty since it reassures them as to the reception which the forthcoming Anglo-French Treaty should have in Moscow.

The Anglo-French Economic Committee met in Paris from the 18th–20th January and discussed the Monnet Plan.

A French memorandum on the future constitution of Germany was presented to the Governments of the U.K., U.S. and U.S.S.R. on the 21st January. It accepts the principle of German economic unity but advocates the political division of Germany into a number of loosely-federated States. The federal Government would control only finance, food supply, communications, economics, agriculture and foreign affairs, and the federal assembly would not be elected by the whole people but composed of delegates appointed by the States. The federal president would be elected by the Assembly for one year only. The Governments of the States would have all residuary powers and would be able to accredit ambassadors to foreign Powers. This scheme shows the French anxiety to avoid any strong central Government in Germany, and the fear that any federal assembly directly elected by all Germans would be used for the airing of nationalist aspirations.

M. Blum's Government had decided to present the Médaille Militaire, the highest French military honour, to Mr. Churchill, Mr. Stalin, President Roosevelt (posthumously) and General de Gaulle. De Gaulle, however, wrote to M. Blum declining this honour on the ground that from 1940 to 1945 he acted as both head of the State and head of the Government and that it would therefore be unsuitable for him to receive a decoration.

SWITZERLAND

The Old Age Insurance measures which passed both Houses of the Federal Assembly last December have met with a good deal of criticism, though it is emphasised that it is not the principle itself which is questioned. Objections have been raised on the ground that the measures were presented in general terms without sufficient detail or discussion of any alternative proposals and that they therefore passed through the two Chambers almost without modification or amendment; that the plan appeared to be highly complex in its administration; and, finally, that it would involve heavy expense and probably an increase in cantonal taxation. In view of the prevailing doubt whether the people as a whole fully understand all the implications of the new law a committee has been formed with the object of collecting the 30,000 signatures required to demand a referendum and so to ascertain the views of the nation as a whole.

On the 11th January the Federal Council published a 326-page report on the activities of the Swiss Press before and during the period 1939–45 and the control and censorship imposed in the war years. Tracing the difficulties encountered in relation to Germany and the other belligerents, the report reveals that between 1929 and 1945 the German Legation made no less than 169 protests against the Swiss Press, although the newspapers of Nazi Germany had themselves launched a "systematic campaign" and "a veritable Press war" against the Swiss, who were repeatedly warned that if they ever suffered invasion, they could lay the blame at the doors of their journalists. Difficulties arose also with Fascist Italy, but they were never of the same serious nature as those with Germany.

A Swiss Press report states that negotiations which took place in Prague from the 9th to the 18th January have resulted in the signing of an agreement (still to be ratified) on the subject of Swiss interests affected by the Czech nationalisation measures. It is stated that the discussions were conducted in a spirit of mutual understanding and it was agreed that Swiss property which had already been placed under national administration or confiscated would be restored to its former owners or compensation paid where this was not possible.

A similar Swiss delegation, including members of food, textile, chemical and electricity industries, has visited Poland for discussions on problems arising out of the nationalization of Swiss interests in Poland.

The Bulgarian-Swiss agreement (see Summaries Nos. 371 and 372) providing for the exchange of goods to the value of 10 million Swiss francs, has been approved by the Bulgarian Authorities. Under the agreement Bulgaria will supply tobacco, timber, grapes and other fruit, against Swiss deliveries of electrical machinery and material.

A trade agreement signed on the 21st January between Switzerland and Argentina fixed the quantity of cereals to be bought by Switzerland between 1947 and 1951 at an annual minimum of 100,000 tons and a maximum of 250,000 tons of wheat; 120,000 tons of maize for 1947 and 100,000 tons for the following years till 1951; the quantities of oats, rye and barley to be purchased were also decided. A special clause stipulates that if Switzerland should find other sources for cereals of equal quality, but at a lower price, she may notify the Argentine Institute for Export Control, which will decide whether the same conditions can be arranged; if not, Switzerland may buy from the other country. Under the new agreement Switzerland will also purchase leather, edible oils, linseed oil, oilcake, meat, fish and flour. Argentina will take machinery of all kinds, electrical equipment and chemical and pharmaceutical products. Special machinery for watch manufacture is expressly excluded from the Swiss export list.

SPAIN

On the surface Franco Spain has settled down again after the recent excitements, and the Generalissimo can go ahead with his programme of evolución. The bread ration (for third class cards) was increased at the beginning of the year to 350 grammes per diem (formerly 250) and is said to have improved in quality with the elimination of the maize content. There is also to be a good distribution of olive oil, which has been very scarce for some weeks. In other respects, the economic situation continues to deteriorate and the cost of living is still tending to rise. There is a general disposition to accept the black market régime as normal, and the Government are evidently counting on the help provided by the Argentine trade and credits agreement being sufficient to overcome the economic malaise which two or three months ago looked as if it might be fatal.

The press, for lack of anything better, has gone nap on the arrival of Señor Radio, the new Argentine Ambassador, coinciding with the Resolution of the United Nations Assembly calling for the withdrawal of Ambassadors. In a general statement Señor Radio is reported to have supplied the necessary balm for Spanish injured feelings by saying: "Es una gloria tener relaciones con España"! it should be added, however, that in an interview given to Informaciones Señor Radio was at pains to emphasise that his appointment was "a normal and regular event" in his country's political action and in no sense a challenge. The post of Argentine Ambassador had indeed been vacant for 10 months since the departure (to Washington) of Señor Espil. The press has also welcomed vociferously Manuel Aznar on his return from his Special Mission as Minister Plenipotentiary in Washington. Señor Aznar has been awarded the Grand Cross of Civil Merit. He is once again being spoken of as a possible Cabinet Minister, although a more likely candidate to replace Señor Artajo at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is Señor J. M. de Areilza (co-author with F. M. Castiella of the régime's Imperialist programme in 1940—"Reivindicaciones de España") who has just produced a book called "Ambassadors over Spain" which contains a violent attack on Lord Templewood. This book, published under the auspices of the Instituto de Estudios Políticos at the low price of 15 pesetas contains incidentally, in an appendix, the full record of U.N. pronouncements on Spain from San Francisco to the Resolution of the 12th December which caused a furore when it appeared in H.M. Embassy's Bulletin on the 20th December last.

But behind the scenes there is reason to suppose that General Franco's thurifers, if not the Caudillo himself, are a little worried about the mounting tide of opposition. Further details have come to light about the trial for military rebellion of the 12 political offenders on the 9th January (see Summary No. 376) and the extensive ramifications of the "conspiracy" for which they were arrested. It is now seen that this episode was one of the most important political events since 1939, and the café gossips are drawing a not inept comparison with the trial before a military court of the members of the shadow Republican Government in March 1931 (following the abortive revolt at Jaca) which spelt the doom of the Monarchy. On that occasion the state of opinion with regard to the Monarchy was such that the prosecution fumbled badly and the defendants were acquitted. In the 9th January trial brilliant work by the defence counsel, Lt. Valentin Nuñez Losada, who has successfully defended many victims of Franco's political repression, made havoc of the stratagems of the prosecution, and, although he failed to secure the acquittal of his clients (except two of the minor personalities), the restraint of the presiding judges, who imposed sentences ranging from 6 years to 2, is eloquent testimony of the present political climate. Observers of the trial have remarked on the spirited conduct of the accused, the absence of any despondency, indeed the "festive" atmosphere which they radiated throughout the court. These men, Regulo Martínez (a Republican ex-priest), Sigfrido Catalá (C.N.T.)—for whom H.M. Government interceded successfully about a year ago when he was condemned to death—and Gomez Ejido (Socialist) had all been previously condemned to long terms of imprisonment. They were the original leaders of the Alianza Nacional de Fuerzas Democráticas who at the end of 1944 issued a manifesto affirming that the Franco régime must be replaced by a transition Government capable of leading Spain back to a constitutional life in which the extremists could be firmly controlled and civil war avoided. It seems established that these men had discussions then not only with General Aranda but, among others, with the Foreign Minister at that time, Señor Lequerica, the Minister of War, General Asensio, Señor Sangroniz, Ambassador to the Quirinal, and, through an intermediary, with Juan March, the powerful millionaire industrialist. What led to their downfall was becoming involved with a certain Luis Alfaro, who claimed to have credentials from Señores Martínez Barrio and Miguel Maura but was in fact no more than a police spy. During an early phase of the enquiry (by a Special Military Court of Instruction) a large number of the professional and business men implicated in the round-up were released, and the prosecution apparently decided to concentrate on the Alianza organization, hoping to crush it out in embryo. We know now that the Left underground parties have manifested considerable strength and resiliency since then under other leaders, and this trial will in fact have increased considerably the Alianza's prestige.

The latest reports make it clear that the temporary removal from the scene of General Aranda has by no means put a stop to the conversations between Left and Right representatives with a view to setting the stage for an interim caretaker Government. The successor of General Aranda has intimated that cordial relations with the Left continue. He has also added his voice to those who are warning Don Juan against those of his advisers who are inclined to stake all on a Generals' coup without the necessary 'bi-partisan' political understanding. Don Juan, who is proceeding with extreme caution, is not likely to make any such mistake. Meanwhile the satisfactory communication has been established, too, with Señor Martínez Barrio, President of the Republican Government-in-exile. (At the moment the Giral Government is breaking up, following a special Congress of Spanish Socialists at Toulouse—and the resignation of five at least of the Ministers). From the latest promotions it is clear that the Generalissimo is doing his best, as usual, to buy off potentially hostile Army leaders. He has also had a long talk with Señor Larraz, Minister of Finance in his first Cabinet, who, in common with certain other important figures in the present régime, has recently been hob-nobbing with Don Juan and his friends in Lisbon.

Government is apparently not finding the task too easy. The Italian Socialist Workers' Party led by Signor Saragat have informed Signor De Gasperi that they are not prepared to enter a new Cabinet because in their opinion the crisis can only be ended in such a way as to leave the situation virtually unchanged, i.e., with a Government composed of the same parties as before. Another reason given by Signor Saragat's party for non-participation was the inability of the late Governments to carry out even a small part of the programme on which the Socialist Deputies were elected on 2nd June, 1946. Signor Nenni, who is at least partly responsible for the present crisis, is reported as telling the press that it was deplorable that the crisis should have arisen in the present circumstances and that Signor De Gasperi's suggested solution, both as regards programme and structure of the new Government, was inadequate. Only on condition that a Government were formed which corresponded with the needs of the working classes could his party join it. Signor De Gasperi, replying in the press to Signor Nenni, expresed his surprise at his statements. While in the U.S.A. he had received a cable from Signor Nenni saying that it was urgently necessary to re-examine the political situation as a result of the Socialist congress. On his return it was made clear to him from every side that "clarification" was inevitable following Signor Nenni's resignation and the Republican party's decision to withdraw from the Government. After explaining that there were no basic differences of opinion as regards the Government programme with Signor Nenni, Signor De Gasperi said that besides asking for certain Ministries, Signor Nenni had demanded participation in the general political leadership observing that, as his group had been considerably weakened, it was "in their interests to prove that their specific weight remained unchanged." Signor De Gasperi finished by saying that the meeting of the Republican party's executive on the morrow was an important element in the development of the crisis. The Republican party subsequently announced that it must decline participation in the Government. Although Signor Togliatti, leader of the Communist party, informed the press that he had told Signor De Gasperi of certain of his party's objections to the latter's programme, he declined to reveal their nature. Signor De Gasperi later stated that the Communist party's objections to his programme did not contradict it but only suggested that it was inadequate. There were no difficulties between him and Signor Togliatti regarding the Government's immediate programme nor as to the Cabinet's structure or composition. Reports suggest that the meeting between the Premier and the Communist leader may lead to a favourable settlement of the crisis.

An official communiqué published on 24th January stated that the Foreign Minister, Signor Nenni, had, that morning, received Dr. Smodlaka, the Yugoslav representative on the Allied Council, who had informed him that the Yugoslav Government had decided to establish political relations with the Italian Government. Signor Nenni expressed his Government's satisfaction and said that after the Ministerial crisis was settled, the Italian Government would proceed with the appointment of a Political Representative to the Yugoslav Government.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Roumania

A bill for the "Organisation of Industry" is to be introduced into the Roumanian Parliament. A number of limited liability companies are to be set up each of which will consist of existing concerns, which will provide the capital and, incidentally, bear any loss. A general meeting of these member companies will appoint the boards of directors, and there is no minimum quorum laid down for these general meetings. The whole new organisation will be under the control of the Ministry of National Economy. The Minister is Dl Gheorgiu-Dej, one of the very few genuine Communists in the Government. Trouble with the member companies is anticipated, and heavy penalties are prescribed for such offences as disregarding orders concerning methods of production, for lowering production "in bad faith," for altering or destroying installations, any recalcitrant member company may be dealt with by the appointment of a sole administrator by the Ministry. There is already considerable apprehension in industrial and financial quarters. It is fairly evident that under this arrangement the position of British and American companies will be untenable.

The Conference of Foreign Ministers approved in principle the free navigation of the Danube. It is beginning to be understood that there is all the difference between approved principles and the method of dealing with concrete instances. At the end of November permission was asked for the British tankers "King George" and "Scotland," which were waiting in readiness at Port Said, to proceed to Sulina. The Russian authorities refused to grant clearance, making the somewhat thin excuse that the river had not been completely cleared of mines and that no responsibility could be taken for the safety of vessels. General Susaikov added that in his opinion the free navigation of the Danube will only be decided at the forthcoming conference. It is now proposed that the two vessels shall be paid off at Port Said and towed empty to Sulina, to which course there appears to be no Russian objection. This is an illuminating comment on the danger-from-mines theory previously put forward.

The British authorities in Roumania are concerned at the food shortage which threatens the English Colony. The serious famine in Moldavia is spreading to the whole of the country. It is proposed to purchase army stocks of essential foods and distribute them against payment. The number of British people in Roumania is said to be 300. This figure seems surprisingly large, as the colony before the war was not much more than 500 strong. Of this 300 no fewer than 180 are women and children.

Yet another delegation has left Bucharest for Moscow, this time to arrange a railway convention and establish direct communication between Roumania and Russia.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav representative on the Investigation Commission for Greece is M. Josip Djerdja, the present Minister in Tirana, who speaks Albanian, with an official of Albanian origin as his deputy. They are assisted by at least three Army officers and eight journalists. Complaining of obstruction on the part of the Greek authorities, the Yugoslav Government addressed to the Greek Minister in Belgrade a strong note of protest against the delay (of about 48 hours) in the supply of visas to the party. Owing to the state of communications in Greece the Yugoslav delegation had considered it necessary to allow a week for the journey to Athens, but although they had planned to start on the 24th the visas had not arrived by the 25th. The Yugoslav Government had informed the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the position, and they now demanded immediate satisfaction from the Greeks.

Meanwhile the Yugoslav Military Attaché has been withdrawn from Athens and the Greek Government have been asked to take parallel action in Belgrade.

The unfortunate fate of the Yugoslav Consul at Naples while on a visit to a chetnik camp, where he hoped to recruit candidates for repatriation, is likely to have a serious effect on the settlement of the refugee problem in Italy. It was clear on his arrival that the Consul was not welcome, but he appears to have disregarded the advice of the British authorities to leave. A little later he was attacked by a mob and was beaten to death, while his companion barely escaped with his life. A statement issued by the Yugoslav member of the Advisory Council for Italy declared that the British authorities were partly responsible for this occurrence. Yet it was admitted at the same time that the Yugoslav Government had been aware of a plot to kill the Consul. The British military authorities can, therefore, hardly be considered responsible for the death of a man who, with this knowledge, was foolish or obstinate enough to walk into the lion's den of a Chetnik camp.

Arrangements for the screening mission, which is to tackle the Yugoslav refugee problem in Italy, are complete and an advance party is to leave London on the 30th January under Brigadier Maclean.

Trials of black market dealers, corrupt officials (including, it is said, members of the Communist party) and of people suspected of having connections with dissident groups continue. One such trial in Macedonia, where a number of people of Albanian origin are accused of plotting to overthrow the régime, has evoked charges of subversive activities against Mr. Burton, H.M. Consul at Skoplje. He is reported to have been in contact with the plotters. Should the Yugoslav authorities not wish these charges to be disproved, it is likely that the sequel will be a request for the recall of Mr. Burton and probably also for the closing of the Consulate.

The Press has been full of the Yugoslav claims against Austria, of references to Austria's war guilt towards Yugoslavia, and of reports of the alleged complaints and petitions of the Carinthian Slovenes. That Austria should have a case to present is considered outrageous.

Greece

A broadly-based Government consisting of a coalition of seven out of the eight main parliamentary parties has finally been formed in Greece under the Premiership of M. Demetrios Maixmos, a Populist who had retired from active politics. Portfolios have been allocated to parties in proportion to their strength in the Chamber. Thus, out of 33 posts in the Cabinet, the Populists hold 16, the Venizelist Liberals four, the Social Democrats four, General Gonatas' National Liberals three, the Kanellopoulos group one, the Alexandris group one, and General Zervas four. The Cabinet is now practically complete and the principal Ministers are as follows:—

M. Tsaldaris: Vice-Premier and Foreign Affairs.
M. Venizelos: Vice-Premier charged with co-ordination of ministries related to security.
M. Papandreou: Interior.
M. Alexandris: Justice.
General Gonatas: Public Works.
M. Kanellopoulos: Navy.
General Zervas: Without portfolio.
M. Stephanopoulos: Economic Co-ordination.
M. Khelmis: Finance.
M. Papathanasis: Agriculture.
M. Karamanlis: Labour.
M. Hadjipanos: Political Co-ordination.
M. Papadimos: Education.
M. Kantzias: Supply.
M. Kotsianos: Health.
M. George Stratos: War.
M. Drosos: Press (Under-secretary).
M. Bournias: Transport.
M. Avraam: Mercantile Marine.
M. Glavanis: Reconstruction.
M. Kostopoulos: National Economy.
M. Politis: Without Portfolio.
M. Themistocles Tsatsos: Air.
M. Manouilidis: Welfare.

On the 27th January the new Cabinet appeared before the Chamber, and M. Maximos regretted that the Liberals were not participating in the coalition. In outlining his Government's policy for the future, he emphasised that it was the first duty of the State to enforce the law. In its policy towards the guerrillas the Government were determined to protect the law and the life of the people, but were ready to apply all measures of conciliation and appeasement. Such measures would include the revision of all deportations, the discontinuance of the deportation of women and children, and an amnesty for rebels who resumed a law-abiding existence within a given period.

M. Tsaldaris, in his last speech as Premier before the Chamber on the 23rd January, reviewed the work of his Government during its term of office. He found much of which it could be proud: progress towards a solution of the economic problem as shown by the British Government's loan and the despatch of the U.S. Economic Mission; agricultural production up to 92% of pre-war and industrial production up to 50%. He also said that "thanks to the Government's prudent financial policy, prices and the currency had been stabilized."

During the week the general economic situation was adversely affected by the Government crisis, and counter sales of gold at the Bank of Greece were discontinued from the 20th. Nearly all civil servants have been on strike since the 21st, demanding an increase of pay. The new Government, faced with the unattractive prospect of assuming office without any civil service, seem inclined to grant the demands, and press reports already credit M. Maximos with a statement to that effect. The Currency Committee, however, are insisting that they cannot agree to a step which will lead to limitless inflation, but they realise that continued rejection of the civil servants' demands may imperil the new Government from the start.

Little bandit activity has been reported, owing partly no doubt to the weather and partly to the fact that the members of the United Nations Commission are now reaching Greece. The Government has made no reply to the EAM truce-offer beyond extending the period of the present amnesty law. It has been suggested that EAM's recent move may have been dictated by the "Democratic Army's" desire to conserve their strength for better opportunities or worse trials ahead.

Bulgaria

The "Neutral Officer" trial which was postponed at the end of December owing to the physical condition of General Popov (see Summary No. 377 of the 22nd January, 1947) was resumed on the 22nd January in the General's absence. General Velchev's name has been involved, and the only direct reference to Great Britain and the United States occurred when he was described as having given false information to Mr. Mark Eltbridge, the United States expert who visited Bulgaria in the autumn of 1945. But there were allusions to "Foreign Missions," to a "colonel of a foreign mission" and to a "foreign woman journalist." The Government Press tried to repair omission in the proceedings by connecting the conspirators with the Opposition leaders. The trial of those who are charged with circulating copies of a bogus speech of Mr. Byrnes' was postponed until 28th January.

Bulgaria is represented on the Commission of Investigation in Greece by M. Kulishev, former Foreign Minister, M. Dimitr Ganev, Vice-Chairman of the Grand National Assembly, and by delegates from the Ministries of the Interior, Defence and Information. M. Kulishev made a long statement in no dispassionate manner on the work of the Commission. He referred to the "many foreign lands" swallowed by Greece in "the last decade," and, of course, to the iniquities of the present régime in that country. He anticipated that the success of the investigation would contribute to the removal of the cause of the chaos in Greece and to the establishment of a "normal democratic government."

The news of the preliminary signature of the Bulgarian Peace Treaty by Mr. Byrnes and by Mr. Bevin was received with relief. Despite its defects in Bulgarian eyes the conclusion of the Treaty is welcomed as an opportunity to return to normal in international and internal relations (but what is meant by "normal internal relations" is not explained).

Although the Allied Control Commission has now only a few months more of existence, the British Military Mission has been asked by the Soviet representative to reduce considerably their transport requirements. But since General Oxley has already returned to the Bulgarian Government a number of vehicles and has arranged to economise in petrol, and since the maintenance service provided by the Bulgarians is of a very low standard, any further reduction of transport would seriously affect the work of the Mission. The excuse that the transport is needed for the Greek Investigation Commission would be more convincing if the Bulgarian Government had no other means of transport at their disposal—and if a similar request were addressed to all Missions, which seems not to be the case.

It is believed that plans may be complete for the formal transfer of Bulgarian Macedonia to Yugoslavia as soon as the Peace Treaty is safely out of the way. No doubt it was with this in mind that the census which began on New Year's Eve gave all Macedonians in Bulgaria the option of registering as Bulgarians or Macedonians.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Until the end of last week there was still some hope that Nokrashy Pasha might have seen his way to come to London, and that he might have moved from the uncompromising position which he had taken up on the future of the Sudan; but he obstinately insisted, in the face of all the evidence to the contrary, that the Sudanese desired permanent union with Egypt and that the limit of their ambition is self-government under Egyptian sovereignty. Accordingly he refused to accept any statement by His Majesty's Government which explicitly or implicitly expressed the right of the Sudanese ultimately to contract out of their association with Egypt, on the ground that such a statement would encourage separatism—somewhat illogically in view of his insistence that no such tendency exists. Nokrashy Pasha was assuming, as Mr. Bevin pointed out to the Egyptian Ambassador in London, that His Majesty's Government might be prepared by treaty to deny the right to the Sudanese to choose their future status when the time came, and this, whether there were a treaty or no, could not be done.

On the 25th January Nokrashy Pasha handed to His Majesty's Ambassador in Cairo a decision of the Council of Ministers which reads:—

"The Egyptian Government have gone towards agreement with the British Government to the furthest possible extent. Nevertheless they found that the proposals offered by the British side do not satisfy our national rights. Therefore the Council of Ministers have decided to present the country's case before the Security Council."

This was announced in the Chamber of Deputies on the 27th January and was received with great enthusiasm. Makram Obeid Pasha argued against reference of the case to the Security Council, and expressed himself in favour of its submission to the General Assembly. This proposal caused such violent opposition that the President was forced to suspend the sitting. Eventually the Government received a vote of confidence by 175 to 15, with 6 abstentions.

The breaking-off of Treaty negotiations by the Egyptian Government was announced by Mr. Bevin in the House of Commons on the 27th January. He referred to the pledge which he had given in the House on the 26th March last year that no change in the status of the Sudan should be made until the Sudanese had been consulted. He felt, however, after taking the highest legal advice, that for the sake of an agreement which would have been as much in the interests of the Sudanese as of either of the other parties, he was justified in alluding in the Sudan Protocol to the existence of a "symbolic dynastic union between Egypt and the Sudan," provided always that no change was introduced into the existing system of administration. The draft Protocol which was agreed with Sidky Pasha read as follows:—

> "The policy which the High Contracting Parties undertake to follow in the Sudan within the framework of the unity between the Sudan and Egypt under the common Crown of Egypt will have for its essential objectives to assure the well-being of the Sudanese, the development of their interests and their active preparation for self-government, and consequently the exercise of the right to choose the future status of the Sudan. Until the High Contracting Parties can in full common agreement realise this latter objective after consultation with the Sudanese, the Agreement of 1899 will continue and Article 11 of the Treaty of 1936, together with its Annex, and paragraphs 14 to 16 of the agreed minute annexed to the same Treaty will remain in force notwithstanding the first Article of the present Treaty."

Mr. Bevin referred to the uncontradicted reports, which appeared in Egypt after Sidky Pasha's return, to the effect that His Majesty's Government had conceded the unity of Egypt and the Sudan without the ultimate right of self-determination, and to the correction of it which the Governor-General of the Sudan issued with Mr. Attlee's authority. He finally recounted the efforts which he had made (without response from the Egyptian side) to reach an agreed interpretation. In conclusion he announced that the Treaty of 1936 will be adhered to.

Palestine

On the 23rd January the High Commissioner received a telegram from Jamal al Husaini, who was in Cairo, saying that Mu'in al Maadi was unable to join the delegation owing to ill-health, and that the Arab Higher Committee had decided to add four persons to it. Approval for the proposal was asked. The four additional members were to be Sami al Tahir, Dr. Umar al Khalil, Yusuf Sahyun and Wasif Kamal. The inclusion of all but the last-named, who is one of the renegades excluded from Palestine, has been approved. The Palestine delegation, therefore, will comprise the first three, Jamal al Husaini, Emil Ghuri and Dr. Husain al Khalidi. With the exception of Yusuf Sahyun, who is described as an unpleasant nonentity, the new members should be assets to the delegation.

Delegates representing the other Arab countries had assembled in London by the end of last week, and the Conference was formally opened at St. James' Palace on the 27th January. Abdur Rahman Azzam Pasha, who took such a prominent part in the last conference, had pleaded that his health is unequal to the rigours of the winter in England, and he will not be present.

The attitude of the Zionists to the Conference remains unchanged.

In an interview which Jamal al Husaini gave to the press in Beirut shortly before he left for England he said that the Palestine delegation was going to London, but that they were not very optimistic, and that their only hope in going was to be able to put the Palestine problem before the British public in its proper perspective.

At a plenary session of the Vaad Leumi on the 20th January resolutions against terrorism were passed. After a reaffirmation of basic principles which are defined as recognition of the supremacy of the Zionist movement and of the Yishuv in the politcal struggle aiming at the tearing-up of the White Paper and its restrictions, the opening of the doors of Palestine for the admission of those Jews who wish to return to their home, and securing their future as a free people on its own soil, murder as a means of political resistance is repudiated. The resolution goes on to declare that the Yishuv will defend itself "with the necessary force" against domination and coercion, intimidation and threats, the extortion of money and the use of force against teachers and pupils, policemen, drivers and others. But there is to be no civil war, and the dangers to the Zionist movement from the actions of the "dissidents" are stressed once more. The resolution ends with an appeal for unity "in this fateful hour." In presenting the resolution the chairman, Mr. David Remez, called upon the authorities to ensure a peaceful atmosphere for the forthcoming talks on Palestine by refraining from any action which might be considered as a "provocation to the Jewish population." A spokesman of the Jewish Agency explained at a press conference on the following day that the announcement that force will be used merely indicates that ways and means of resisting terrorist acts are under consideration, and again on the 22nd a member of the Vaad Leumi told the press that the resolution was primarily a declaration addressed to the Government, and that the Yishuv does not assume any police or governmental tasks in combating the dissident groups. It is not unfair to see in these statements an admission that terrorism becomes reprehensible only when it is a danger to the Zionist cause.

The Irgun Zvai Leumi claims to regard any suggestion that the resolution would not lead to civil war as "bluff" and "humbug," and remains aggressive and defiant. In a broadcast on the 22nd January the speaker said that they would continue fighting, and "if the Hagana attack us we will fight in Palestine and abroad and teach them a lesson."

The death sentence on Dov Grüner, who was convicted of taking part in an attack last April, has been confirmed. Numerous Jewish authorities, headed by the Chief Rabbi, have been active in seeking commutation of the sentence on the ground that it would almost certainly lead to an intensification of terrorism. Grüner was to have been executed on the 28th January, but a delay of forty-eight hours has been granted during which he may lodge an appeal, which he had previously refused to do.

On the 26th January Major Collins, a British civilian, was abducted from his flat in Jerusalem by terrorists, and on the 27th eight armed men raided the Tel Aviv District Court and abducted the President, Judge Ralph Windham. Judge Windham was released on the 28th January. Major Collins was said by the Irgun to have been released in the outskirts of Jerusalem, and was found in the grounds of the Hadassah hospital late on the 29th January. He had suffered head injuries. The Irgun allege that these releases have been made possible by the respite granted in the sentence on Grüner.

A curfew from 5·30 p.m. to 6·0 a.m. has been imposed on Tel Aviv, and the Jewish parts of Jerusalem, and a dusk-to-dawn road curfew throughout the country. The Government is considering the application of severer measures of control if the men abducted are not speedily returned.

The Levant States

Jamil Mardam, the Syrian Prime Minister, has discussed with His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Damascus the recent Turco-Syrian press campaigns following King Abdullah's visit to Turkey. He said that public opinion was naturally upset over the visit, but that he had done all he could to calm things down and had instructed the Syrian Minister at Angora to try to persuade the Turkish Government to take similar action. He said that the Arab League would ask King Abdullah to define his attitude towards Alexandretta, and Jamil Bey himself said he could hardly believe that Abdullah would be prepared openly to declare himself a traitor to the Arab cause.

A communiqué has been issued to the local press by the Saudi Arabian Legation in Beirut in which they categorically deny the report that the Amir Feisal is a candidate for the Syrian Throne. The communiqué ends with the assurance that His Majesty King Abdul Aziz ibn Sa'ud "supports the present status of Syria and the Lebanon as confirmed by the Charter of the Arab League, and is strongly opposed to any policy designed to modify that status.

An exchange of Notes between His Majesty's Government and the Lebanese Government regarding the abolition of the Mixed Courts took place on the 22nd January. The terms are similar to those agreed with the Syrian Government in November last (see Summary No. 368).

Persia

The official figures of the Tehran election results have not yet been published, but reports indicate that the Prime Minister's Democrat Party has secured a majority. The Tudeh press continues to pour out allegations of the unfairness of the elections. An article in Mardum (appearing in place of Rahbar, the official Tudeh organ) of the 12th January describes how Government trucks collect factory-workers and peasants from the suburbs and bring them to the polling-booths, each person being supplied with a sealed envelope containing the name of a Democrat candidate. There is nothing to confirm the truth of such reports, however, and, as mentioned in last week's Summary, Qawam appears to be guiltless of the many charges levelled at him. The only charge which can legitimately be made is that he has monopolised the Tehran broadcasting-station for party purposes.

There has recently been an outcry from the right-wing press at the asylum given by the Soviet Government to Pishavari and his associates, who continue to hurl abusive speeches at Qawam and his Government from their secret broadcasting-station in Soviet territory (see Summary No. 376). An article of the 9th January in Zendegi (moderate right) stated that the Soviet Union was violating the 1921 treaty, which laid down that neither country would shelter persons with harmful designs on the other. "Such action," the article concludes, "may shake the foundations of Irano-Soviet friendship."

On the 17th January the Shah flew to Shiraz, returning the same day. He made a brief tour of the town and received Nasir Qashgai in audience. His Majesty's Consul reports that as a result of the Shah's visit cordial, or at least working, relations have been established between the local military and civil authorities, and between the military and the Qashgai.

Afghanistan

On the 12th January it was reported that the Soviet-Afghan Frontier Agreement (see Summary No. 347, under "Soviet Union") had been ratified. The Agreement provides for the frontier to run along the middle of the main channel of the Oxus (Amu Darya) River, instead of following the Afghan bank. (See also under "Soviet Union").

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The Cabinet crisis continues. After a Cabinet meeting, the press reported on the 17th January that the two major parties, the so-called Liberals and Progressives, who have hitherto provided the backing for the Yoshida Government, were agreed that the Government should be reconstructed on a broader basis, but that plans had been disrupted by an "unexpected development." The exact nature of the trouble was not divulged. Current reports, however, suggest that the stumbling-block was the discovery that certain members of the Social Democratic Party, whom the Party had nominated and the Premier had accepted as prospective members of the new Cabinet, would be required to undergo screening. At the same time the formation of a coalition government is hindered by dissension in the Social Democratic Party as well as in the Liberal and Progressive Parties. There is in consequence much jockeying for position by rival factions, and the outcome is still uncertain.

The latest information, however, is that Katayama, the President, and three other members of the Socialist Democratic Party have accepted an invitation to join a new Cabinet under Yoshida. It remains to be seen whether Katayama can retain the support of the left-wing of his Party, hitherto violently opposed to the idea of a coalition cabinet with Yoshida as Premier.

In order to allow time for the political situation to clear, the opening of the regular session of the Diet has been postponed till the 1st February. This happens to coincide with the "dead line" set by labour organizations for a general strike of government workers. Although the basic reason is given as the refusal of the Yoshida Government to meet their economic demands, the immediate purpose is definitely stated to be to oust that Government, which is branded as "unpatriotic." This endeavour to usurp powers that are conferred by the new constitution on the Diet was not likely to go unchallenged. Nor could the prospects of the sufferings of the people from a stoppage of public services as well as a further setback in the recovery of the national economy be regarded with anything but dismay. A spokesman of the Social Democratic Party, which is closely associated with the National Federation of Labour Unions, voiced the Party's opposition on the 23rd January. Meanwhile S.C.A.P. authorities had summoned representatives of the three big labour organizations together with the Ministers of Finance and Welfare and the Director of the Economic Stabilisation Board to a conference. According to the Central News, S.C.A.P. officials, while revealing that the Japanese Government had been instructed to better their working conditions, gave a verbal warning against (1) actions prejudicial to the occupation (2) general strikes. Labour leaders have since talked of appealing to the Allied Council and even of ignoring the warning. The press appears to think that wiser counsels will prevail.

Public opinion has been shocked by an attempt to assassinate Kikunami, the President of the National Confederation of Industrial Organizations, which had taken a leading part in planning the general strike. The crime is believed to have been the work of two members of the Shinei Taishuto, a small party which by its title claims to be a Party formed to Guide the Masses Anew. The method adopted is unfortunately not new. Assassination has in the past been a potent weapon to terrorise opponents into submission. It is disturbing to find it again in use, but it is at least a healthy sign that on this occasion the act is widely condemned.

The incident illustrates the latent danger of a reactionary movement in Japan. Kikunami himself, who is stated to have been seriously but not critically injured, is said to have declared that a much larger and more deadly ultra-nationalist movement was operating in Japan than most people thought. Although it has a sinister ring, a statement issued by the Shinei Taishuto that similar incidents would occur if labour continued to add to the sufferings of the people by further general strikes may have an element of truth in it. On the other hand left-wing thinkers might well retort that, unless the Government can succeed in redressing the grievances of labour, excesses are bound to occur.

It is reported that, in addition to the two assailants, the police have arrested the President of the Party, who is alleged to have instigated the attack.

French Indo-China

An uncontradicted report in the Paris Monde of the 19th January credits the U.S. Ambassador with expressing to M. Moutet the hope that France would act quickly in Indo-China. Since the new-born French Cabinet can scarcely be expected to produce a blue-print of its plans "out of the hat," it seems likely that the suggestion is that the present crisis in Indo-China is calculated to cause undesirable repercussions in other quarters.

In their emphasis at one moment on the prior need of a military decision and at another on the desirability of a peace by agreement. M. Moutet's public announcements tend to cancel one another out. But, according to the correspondent of the New York Times, Léon Boutbien, who accompanied M. Moutet on his visit to Indo-China, made an interesting admission to reporters at the airfield on his return. He is reported to have said that responsibility for the present fighting rested with both the French and the Viet-Namese. M. Boutbien stated that he had had unofficial talks with Viet-Nam leaders and added that, though Viet-Nam must shoulder the blame for resorting to force, French errors had caused the original flare-up at Haiphong (v. Summary 371). On the departure of the mission for Indo-China M. Boutbien was described in the press as a médecin capitaine, but he is also a member of the Socialist Party's executive committee.

The Times of the 27th January published a carefully reasoned estimate of the situation from its special correspondent. According to his view, the Indo-China nationalist movement has fallen into Communist hands. The movement includes, he says, some reasonable men with whom the French could work harmoniously but all decisions have to be referred to the Tong Bo, the central committee of the Viet-Minh Party and of the Indo-China Communist Party. At the moment the Viet-Minh is probably stronger than ever; it is ruthlessly eliminating all possible sources of opposition (chiefly among intellectuals, property-owning classes and Roman Catholic converts) and by precipitating war it has created that enhanced unity which comes to any people finding themselves in a life-and-death struggle.

The correspondent judges that there is little initiative that the French can take short of capitulating and walking out of Indo-China. He suggests that the hope lies in the opposition to the Viet-Minh policy subsisting in Indo-China itself. At present this opposition is terrorized, inarticulate and impotent, but three things might be done to give it an opportunity: (1) more French troops to create secure zones where the Annamites could speak freely; (2) material efforts to create more favourable conditions in the French than in the Viet-Minh zones; (3) a new political approach that would enable alternative nationalist leaders to prove to their people that negotiation promises better results than violence.

As regards bringing about a cessation of the fighting, the correspondent points out that the neutral Consuls have, by their courageous action in walking across no-man's land to discuss the welfare of neutrals and hostages, created a recognized channel of communication, which could be used to bring about a truce.

Recent reports from Hanoi show that "mopping up" is still incomplete. The French forces are handicapped by the fact that the Viet-Namese have established themselves in quarters where the civilian population is trapped and they can, therefore, be dislodged only at the sacrifice of civilian lives. Negotiations on the part of the Chinese Consul-General and his British and American colleagues to obtain the agreement of the Viet-Nam forces to the withdrawal of French civilians from the danger spots have not hitherto been successful. In addition to these unfortunates, there are over 400 French hostages in Viet-Nam. 225 were already held before the modus vivendi was signed. The exact number seized on the outbreak of the present hostilities is not known, but is estimated at over 200. In addition the T.UV.E. (Viet-Nam irregulars) have taken a number of Chinese hostages. The High Commissioner is reported to have asked his Government to appeal to the International Red Cross on their behalf.

A new outbreak of terrorism in Cochin-China is causing grave disquiet. The President of the Provisional Government has requested "real (? special) powers" from his Council; while one Councillor sadly remarked that "an invisible government" (i.e., the Nambo) was master of the situation, the Minister of National Defence was cheered when he declared that in the use of force lay the only hope of success.

In an over-all picture of almost unrelieved gloom, the only bright feature is afforded by the public expressions of gratitude by the Governments of Cambodia and Laos for French action in securing the return of territories lost to them under the Japanese Award.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

General George C. Marshall, who arrived in Washington on the 21st January to be sworn in as Secretary of State, remains the principal figure of interest in the United States. In the eyes of the press and public the General has added to his already considerable stature by denying all intention of permitting himself to be "drafted" as a Presidential candidate in 1948. In an emphatic statement issued to newspaper correspondents on his arrival from Chicago on the morning of the 21st he said that he regarded the office of Secretary of State as "non-political." He would therefore never "become involved in political matters" and he could not be considered a candidate for political office. The effect of this statement has been to dispel all lingering doubts regarding General Marshall in the minds of Republican Congressmen, who, it has been pointed out, might have hesitated to give the new Secretary of State their full support, had they felt that they were thereby building him up as a rival Presidential Candidate in 1948. Mr. Joseph Martin, the Republican Speaker of the House of Representatives, has been among the first to acknowledge that, by his repudiation of political ambitions, General Marshall has made it easier for all elements in Congress to give him the co-operation which he requires.

Since the formal swearing-in ceremony, which was attended by several members of the Cabinet and leaders of Congress, as well as by the President and Chief Justice Vinson, it has been announced that General Marshall will attend the forthcoming Moscow Conference and that he will meanwhile confer with Mr. Warren Austin on matters relating to disarmament and atomic control. At his press conference on the 23rd January President Truman revealed that he had already had consultations with the new Secretary of State on a number of outstanding international questions—among them China, Latin America, Palestine and Germany.

Germany is steadily gaining attention as the major problem with which General Marshall will have to grapple. The conservative internationalists, led by Mr. Walter Lippmann, have come out strongly in favour of the German plan outlined by Mr. Dulles (see last week's Summary), and a few well-informed Liberals like Mr. Edgar A. Mowrer and Mr. William Shirer have been willing to admit that the plan merits serious consideration. The fact that Republican views on Germany are apparently crystallizing has lent added interest to the announcement of ex-President Hoover on the 22nd January that he had agreed to go to the British and American zones and to Austria to study the food situation there. In making this announcement Mr. Hoover insisted that his mission would have "no political implications." Nevertheless, it seems that the principal object in sending the Republican ex-President to Germany and Austria is to secure his party's approval for the large appropriations necessary to carry out the American programme of occupation in those countries.

Confidence in the Potsdam Agreement as the basis of Allied co-operation in Central Europe has been further undermined by the failure of the Warsaw and Moscow Government to fulfil their promise of free and unfettered elections in Poland. In the opinion of the New York Times "the Polish régime has nullified the Potsdam Agreement in so far as that instrument deals with it." At the same time, the Philadelphia Record has called for an immediate investigation by the United Nations, "not to prove a fraud that is already obvious, but to learn the exact measure of control which Russia maintained over the Polish ballot boxes." The attitude of the State Department is likewise hardening. Mr. Clayton has now intimated that he is strongly disinclined to extend further credits—even the proposed short-term credit for cotton purchases—to the present régime in Warsaw, and that the State Department will try to discourage the International Bank from granting the Polish Government a loan. It seems that Poland will still be included, along with Italy, Greece, Austria and possibly Hungary, in the relief programme which the State Department is preparing to submit to Congress, although there are apparently no illusions regarding the attitude which Congress is likely to adopt.

On the domestic front harmony still reigns between the executive and legislative branches of the United States Government, and at his press conference on the 23rd January Mr. Truman was able to refer to co-operation between the White House and Congress as being real and effective. On the 16th January the President held a friendly conference with the "Big Six" of the 80th Congress (four Republicans, led by Senator Vandenberg, and two Democrats), but the subjects discussed were reported to be only the disposal of surplus war property and the continued operation by the Government of the merchant shipping fleet. In point of fact no really controversial issue has yet arisen to put relations between President and Congress to the test. The delicate question of what form of legislation is likely to be most effective to deal with labour has been temporarily shelved while the Senate Labour and Welfare Committee completes its examination of the large assortment of draft bills already presented. These bills include a Resolution incorporating the President's request for a Congressional Committee to study labour problems, as well as a revised version of the Case Bill, which Mr. Truman vetoed last session.

Meanwhile the Republicans are clearly determined to make the greatest possible use of Congressional investigations into the policies and practices of their Democratic predecessors in order to provide themselves with political ammunition for 1948. On the 23rd January they were able to extend the life of the Senate War Investigating Committee for another two years, despite the insistence of the Democrats and of a few of their own recalcitrant "Liberals" that Congressional investigations ought in future to be conducted only by the regular Standing Committees, as recommended by the Congressional Reorganization Act of 1946. The War Investigating Committee is now under the chairmanship of Senator Owen Brewster of Maine, who was the principal Republican member of the Joint Congressional Committee set up in 1945 to inquire into the Pearl Harbour disaster. Evidence previously unearthed by the Committee has now led to the indictment of the former Democratic Chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, Mr. Andrew J. May, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the United States Government.

The possibility of a further wave of strikes to enforce the wage demands of the C.I.O. has receded considerably since the 24th January, when Mr. Philip Murray announced that the United Steel Workers had agreed to extend their contracts with the U.S. Steel Corporation until the 30th April. The United Automobile Workers have also extended for a month their contract with the Chrysler Corporation. Among the several factors which have caused the C.I.O. leaders to become amenable to reason in the past few weeks has been the repudiation by the rival A.F. of L. of the Nathan Report (see Summary No. 373) upon which their fresh wage demands were originally based. The Metal Trades section of the A.F. of L. has also condemned the C.I.O. claims for arrears of "portal-to-portal" pay (i.e., pay for time spent on the employer's premises by workers proceeding to and from the actual job). Legislation to relieve industry of the nightmare of retrospective "portal-to-portal" claims is at present being studied by a special subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee under Senator Forrest C. Donnell (Republican, Missouri).

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Relations and Argentina

The Argentine Government has issued a decree providing for the acquisition en bloc of the property of former Axis firms now in course of liquidation (see Summary No. 374). The United States Chargé d'Affaires in Buenos Aires has advised the State Department that he considers that Argentina has complied with her "hemisphere obligations" as laid down by Mr. Byrnes on the 13th January. Broadcast reports of first United States reactions are favourable, and a State Department announcement hails the decree as "an important step and a welcome addition to the measures already taken in respect of Nazi . . . institutions." However, it is still uncertain whether this move will be sufficient to bring about a settlement of the differences between the United States and Argentina. On the 23rd January, President Truman said that he had placed the matter "right in General Marshall's lap": Mr. Messersmith has said that he will be returning to Buenos Aires, and Mr. Braden has said nothing. Opinion in Washington is that possibly neither Mr. Messersmith nor Mr. Braden will continue long in their present posts, but that United States policy will veer towards a settlement on inter-American lines as proposed by Senator Vandenberg.

In view of the steps taken by the Argentine Government, H.M. Ambassador in Washington has informed Mr. Dean Acheson at the State Department that H.M. Government consider the "gentleman's agreement" suspending the sale of armaments to Argentina to have terminated. Mr. Acheson was distressed, saying that his Government were still not satisfied with Argentine assurances. He hoped that H.M. Government would not make any public statement: if so, the whole American plan would be "pretty well cooked." When informed of H.M. Government's action, General Perón and the Argentine Foreign Minister were delighted.

Brazil

The Brazilian elections for Governors of States and state legislatures were held on the 19th January. Polling is reported to have been generally orderly. These elections have been preceded by the most complicated intrigues and negotiations in most of the states, and it is unlikely that the general trend will emerge until a reasonable proportion of the votes have been counted. The Communists (P.C.B.) expect an increase of strength in accordance with their increased enrolment since the congressional elections in November 1945, but while first countings seem to bear out their expectations, later results were less favourable to them. This is probably due at least in part to anti-Communist warnings by the Church.

Guatemala

With a view to the Congressional elections, President Arévalo has dismissed the whole Cabinet, and is likely to appoint a new left-wing group more "representative of revolutionary ideas." The present Minister for Foreign Affairs may remain in office. The Guatemalan Note mentioned in Summary No. 377 has been published in the Guatemalan Press. There is still no indication of the terms on which Guatemala would consider an out-of-court settlement of the Belize dispute.

Venezuela

The Assembly is now engaged in elaborating a new Constitution, which will keep it fully occupied for the time being. A new income tax law has, however, been passed, which operates more severely on high incomes, particularly those of the oil companies. This measure has received the support of all parties, but in other matters the small COPEI minority has been vigorous. Accusations against the Government alleging ill-treatment of prisoners involved in the last insurrection have led to the appointment of a committee of investigation which found some of the charges justified. The Government party subsequently refused to permit the publication of the committee's report, but referred the question to the courts.

The Presidential elections are due to take place in May. It remains to be seen whether Acting-President Betancourt and his colleagues will abide by their original promise not to remain in office once the provisional period was over.

UNITED NATIONS

Disarmament

An Official Committee on Disarmament is being set up with the following terms of reference: (1) to examine the Assembly's resolution, (2) to submit to the Defence Committee draft proposals on disarmament, &c., for the U.K. representative to submit the Disarmament Commission of the Security Council, (3) to watch the proceedings of the Disarmament Commission, (4) to work out with the Official Committee on Atomic Energy, a joint policy for the regulation and reduction of armaments and for control and prohibition of weapons of mass destruction.

The Chairman of the Committee will be Mr. Gladwyn Jebb (Foreign Office) and the members, Sir John Stephenson (Dominions Office), Vice-Admiral C. S. Daniel (Third Sea Lord), Vice-Admiral Sir Rhoderick McGrigor (Admiralty), Lieut.-General F. E. W. Simpson (War Office), Air Marshal Sir Wm. F. Dickson (Air Ministry), Sir George W. Turner (Ministry of Supply), Joint Secretaries, Mr. P. Mason (Foreign Office), and Brigadier A. T. Cornwall-Jones (Cabinet Office).

F.A.O.

The text of the report of the Preparatory Commission was adopted on the 24th January. Few Commissions have had wider fields to survey than this; to examine how to "develop and organise the production, distribution and use of basic foods so as to provide diets on a health standard for the people of all countries, and to stabilise agricultural prices at levels fair to producers and consumers alike."

The task of the eighteen nations represented on the Commission was complicated by the fact that their farmers and consumers are subsidised to an increasing extent by Governments, so that price alone can no longer adjust supply and demand. Factors alien to economics enter in, and one of the chief tasks of the Commission was to arrive at an agreed system of rules to keep Governments during conditions of scarcity from a wild international scramble for food. Very wisely all thought of a "World Food Board," a world authority with compulsory powers, was abandoned, and, instead, conciliation machinery is to be set up, whereby Governments can reconcile their differences by discussion without abandoning their sovereignty. An annual review of the world position should help to prevent the various national programmes clashing with one another, while avoiding the danger of stereotyping which all world-plans entail. The Commission's practical approach is clearly seen in its insistence that backward countries can only come to enjoy higher standards of diet if they develop both their own agriculture and their own industry. International organisations will help in this, but the basic principle both in effort and in finance must be self-help; and the Commission deserves high praise for rejecting the idea that the improvident have a right to impoverish their neighbours and lower the standard of living throughout the world.

In the Commission's view, its objectives can only be attained by increasing production and consumption, and expanding world trade. But, since the units of the world are the various countries, each unit must be made sound, and put in a position to develop its own resources. Development needs finance. This will be available, but the greater part must be furnished by the country itself. Scientific knowledge must pass easily across frontiers; but the scientific development of agriculture means the employment of less men. The surplus must be absorbed by new industries. Large-scale plans must be ready for execution when immediate objectives have been reached. As regards finance, the Commission hopes that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development will receive so many demands that its funds will prove inadequate. F.A.O. and the Bank should consult together over the projects submitted, and when funds run out, both should report to Governments and to the United Nations.

Much of the Commission's time was spent on the problem of how to stabilise prices, and its solutions may be summed up in the phrase "agreements between Governments." It recommended a "famine reserve" of basic foods to be held nationally for use internationally, and the creation of "buffer stocks" for commodities subject to "seasonal or cyclical fluctuations." These stocks, too, should be held nationally, but they should be administered internationally, in order to avoid balance of payment difficulties. Quotas and long-term contracts, while essential in certain cases, are dangerous. The first may stereotype production and prevent natural development, the second may prove discriminatory unless brought within a "multilateral framework."

An interesting recommendation was that, when scarcity ends, countries should not cut down production, but, having sold what they can at "reasonable prices" on the regular market, sell the surplus at special, reduced prices for "approved nutritional programmes." The danger here, as H.M.G. are aware, is that the regular customers may be charged too much, since it may well be argued that the existence of a surplus indicates that the regular price has been too high. To meet this objection, the report says that no part of the cost of the special price sales should be transferred to the price of the commercial exports, and the phrase "reasonable price" is intended as an additional guarantee.

To achieve F.A.O.'s ambitious objectives there must be a balance between production and nutrition and also between commodity and commodity, and the report makes three recommendations: (1) that pending the establishment of the proposed International Trade Organisation, a Temporary Coordinating Committee of three experts should keep in touch with inter-governmental arrangements for both agricultural and non-agricultural primary commodities, (2) that the F.A.O. Conference should conduct a yearly review of the programmes of each member nation. From this consultation of member with member much experience would be exchanged, and progress made towards a coherent world programme, by reason and friendship, and finally (3) to meet the urgent need for consultation and even action in the interval between annual reviews, the Commission recommends that a Council of F.A.O. be established, to be known as the World Food Council, which should carry out the function of the Annual Review between Conferences. It would meet at least twice a year, as well as immediately before the regular annual session of the Conference. Thus, by strengthening F.A.O., the United Nations would make itself far more able to deal with a problem vital to all men, and yet would not need to multiply its organs.

EUROPE

GERMANY

The Foreign Ministers' Deputies for Germany have continued to meet regularly to hear the views of interested countries (see under "France," "Low Countries," "Czechoslovakia," "Greece" and "Yugoslovia"). The Canadian Government have now joined in proposing that an international statute for Germany should be drawn up to cover the period until a permanent treaty can be made. As suggested by Sir William Strang, H.M. Government are also ready to welcome Mr. Murphy's proposal for an international statute, if this is interpreted as a revision of the Potsdam Agreement to cover the second period of control in Germany.

Dr. Schumacher has recently visited Berlin and has spoken on the Social Democrats' attitude towards a peace treaty. At a press conference on the 28th January he reaffirmed his view that, while it was true that the 1939 frontiers had been lost through Hitler's adventure, it must be the Germans' endeavour to get back as much land East of the Oder and Neisse as possible. Replying to a French correspondent's question as to whether some of his recent statements had not been too nationalistic, Schumacher admitted natural "national" feeling among the German people, a feeling to which, he said, they had as much right as the Dutch, the British or the French. He claimed, nevertheless (though his assumption is doubtful), that national sentiment did not prevent the Germans from realising that Europe had become too small a space both from the economic and political point of view to remain in the phase of national states. It is noticeable that Schumacher, since his visit to Great Britain, while continuing to stand fast on what he conceives to be the rights of the SPD in Germany and of Germany in the world, has paid considerably more attention than previously to international aspects of the problem. He has warned the Germans against indulgence in ultra-nationalistic agitation and has insisted that the peace agreement must be seen from an all-European aspect and that it would, therefore, be best to bring the problem before the United Nations. Speaking in Hamburg on the 2nd February, he added that the issue in Moscow would not really be whether or not a peace treaty with Germany should be forthcoming but whether the old national policy was to be continued or whether a fundamental reorganisation of Europe was to be reached. He gave as his belief that "there is only one patriotism and that is the patriotism of internationalism." Schumacher, however, is unlikely to be entirely unconscious of the way in which insistence on internationalism could be utilised by those of bad faith to foster the idea that Germany is morally on the defence against the national greed of other countries. However laudable the pronouncement, in his speech to the Party Congress in Munich on the 12th January, that "Germany has no mission in Europe but only a function," political agitators might nevertheless in the future make use of his subsequent remark: "In the political and economic fields the internationalism which we desire must not consist in a German surrender to other national claims with respect to State and economy."

Consideration of the economic sections of the Control Council Report is to be renewed in the respective Directorates on the suggestion of the British delegate to the Co-ordinating Committee. In some cases, such as exports and imports, it has already been realised that no agreement will be reached, but most subjects are likely to be debated to the point where either the Soviet delegates refuse to give information (which fact would be recorded in the report) or until an agreed report is reached. The action of the Russian authorities in permitting the verbatim publication in the Soviet-controlled press of Marshal Sokolowsky's attack on the British and U.S. delegates (reported in last week's Summary) was queried by the British representative in the Co-ordinating Committee on the 27th January. It is perfectly understood, and agreed, that no unilateral statements are made to the press about Control Council proceedings until discussion of the particular matter has ended. The Russian action is the more disingenuous as the attack was published without the reply by the other delegates or the subsequent retraction by Marshal Sokolowsky. General Kurochkin promised to investigate the matter and appeared obviously ill at ease. It seems clear that both the statement and its publication came as a result of direct instructions from Moscow and was not welcomed by Soviet representatives on the spot. This was evidently but the first pellet to be shot off from Moscow's newest type of propaganda weapon, specially designed to impress the German public before the Moscow conference. A similar case has since occurred over the meeting of the Berlin Kommandatura on the 31st January. On the following day Berlin and Leipzig Radios broadcast a lengthy "communiqué" about the Kommandatura's disagreement over election rules for the Freie Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund, although this matter is still under discussion. The statement was not a fair report of proceedings but a laudatory defence of Russian policy—combined with the most vituperative attacks on the attitude of the other members accusing them of attempting to sabotage the holding of elections by unwarranted interference in internal TU matters. Much of the broadcast was taken up with reports of the scandalous statements of General Kotikov characterised at the outset by the remark: "One is fully entitled to say that the U.S. delegation does not wish to reach agreement."

The principles behind this dispute are of importance in determining whether the Berlin Trade Union will be able to throw off domination of the Socialist Unity Party. The SPD demand that the election be fought on openly party lines has been hampered by the party's inability to tackle the problem of reorganisation realistically or to overcome their preoccupation with personal ambitions. The more unscrupulous Socialist Unity Party succeeded in "packing" a delegates' meeting on the 11th January by arriving two hours ahead of time. In the absence of SPD supporters they were therefore able to pass election rules satisfactory to themselves and to the Russians. At a meeting of the Kommandatura on the 17th January, however, the Russians agreed that the rules should be re-drafted. Whereas in the elections of January 1946 the SED held the whip-hand and arranged that the distribution of the executive's seats should be negotiated between the parties before the elections, it has now been proposed that 27 members should be elected directly by the Greater Berlin Delegates' Conference, and the remaining 18 by the local unions through their district delegates although these latter would be subject to confirmation by the Greater Berlin Conference. It appears that the Western Delegates in the Kommandatura considered this proviso for confirmation by the conference to be undemocratic, and also wished to reduce the number of the executive to the original figure of 30 so that local unions would have the majority. It is mainly for this reason that they have still not approved the election rules, thus occasioning the Russian outburst.

The battle for or against socialisation of basic industries in the Ruhr is now in full swing. In the Rhineland-Westphalian Diet on the 21st January motions for expropriating the coal and lignite industries and for transferring basic industries to public ownership were virtually defeated by the votes of the Free Democrats and the Christian Democrats headed by Adenauer, since they succeeded in deferring a decision until the February session. Schumacher has roundly accused Adenauer of defending big capital at the expense of the middle classes. Adenauer himself, however, is too canny to uphold big business in public and has approved a plan for transferring basic industries to German trustees while leaving other branches of industry to free enterprise. He remains firmly opposed to nationalisation and to the concentration of economic power in the hands of the State.

One of the more curious demands made in the Yugoslav memorandum on Germany is that the fundamental national rights of the Lusatian Wends must be guaranteed and their free national development made possible. Lusatia is a small area to the south-east of Berlin, named after the Slav tribe, the Lusitzi, who were incorporated into the Holy Roman Empire in 938. In connection with Polish plans in August 1946 for the formation of a Lusatian State, the Chairman of the Berlin Christian Democrats, Kaiser, stated that the separatist Wendish people's party only obtained 10,751 votes in the Reichstag elections of May 1924 (out of 72,626 Wendish-speaking inhabitants), and in the elections of September 1930 only 288 votes. The census in 1933 gave the number of Wendish-speaking inhabitants as 57,167. The Lusatian Wends have been producing demands for independence ever since the territory was occupied by the Soviet Army in April, 1945, and have been variously supported in these demands by Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria. Poland seems to be leading Czechoslovakia in the race to "protect" the Wends. The Wends have achieved since 1945 a certain degree of cultural autonomy unwelcome to the Germans who live among them, but it is not certain how far demands for independence have popular backing nor whether "Lusatians" in general know what is involved. Before the War they were known chiefly by their retention of their national customs and costumes, which proved a considerable tourist attraction.

AUSTRIA

The Council of Deputy Foreign Ministers meeting in London have asked the Allied Commission in Austria to prepare reports by the 10th February on two important questions; the progress of demilitarisation, the dissolution of military organisations and the elimination of Austria's military potential; and the present numbers and status of displaced persons and refugees in Austria, including the number of those who may be repatriated, those whom it is believed might be absorbed into the Austrian economy, and those who can neither be repatriated nor absorbed into the Austrian economy. The Allied Commission is also asked to report on the method of feeding displaced persons in Austria.

On the 28th January the Deputies resumed discussion of the political clauses of the treaty. General Mark Clark presented a United States draft clause by which Austria would undertake to abstain from any act likely to violate her own independent status. He thought that something should be included in the treaty to prevent Austria from associating herself with Germany again. The French and British Deputies agreed with this point of view, but M. Gusev felt that the clause was in too general terms since the only threat to Austrian independence would come from Germany. The French Deputy thought that, just as Germany should be prevented from repeating the Anschluss, Austria should be prevented from renouncing her independence. Lord Hood suggested a clause laying down that Austria should abstain from any act likely to create such a union, or from any act which might lead to the loss of her independence. These suggestions, together with a proposal by Lord Hood that there should be a clause securing German recognition of Austrian independence and the renunciation of all right to Austrian territory, were passed to the political sub-committee.

On the 30th January the Austrian Chancellor stated Austria's case, asking that the treaty should be a "Magna Carta" and not a burden. It should establish clear separation of Austria from Germany, and Austria should not be forced to carry a liability which made reconstruction impossible or delayed it. On the 31st January the Austrian delegation were questioned by the Deputies. M. Gusev asked the Austrian delegates whether the Austrian Government in accordance with the Moscow Declaration, recognised Austrian responsibility in taking part in the war on Germany's side. Dr. Gruber replied that, as was mentioned in the Declaration, the annexation of Austria by Germany was forced. After the Anschluss no Austrian State existed, and Austria's part in the war could not therefore be the responsibility of the Austrian State but only of certain Austrians.

The Deputies also discussed a Yugoslav protest against the inclusion in the Austrian delegation of Herr Hans Piesch, Landeshauptmann of Carinthia. The Yugoslav delegation alleged that Herr Piesch (who is a Socialist of long standing), had received power from Nazi hands. It was agreed that further details would be sought from the Allied authorities in Vienna. Herr Piesch is believed to have made contact with the Gauleiter of Carinthia in April, 1945, solely in order to induce him to quit his post. Herr Piesch subsequently became provisional Landeshauptmann, and in the elections of November, 1945, he was confirmed in his office.

At an Executive Committee meeting in Vienna on the 1st February the Soviet member objected to the appointment of Erwin Altenburger to replace Weinberger as the People's Party Minister without Portfolio, on the ground that Altenburger's outlook was anti-democratic and unsympathetic to the Allies. The matter is being investigated further.

There was renewed discussion on the food supplies for the next ration period, which emphasised the continued breach between the U.S. point of view that imported food supplies should not be used until indigenous resources had been totally expended, and the Soviet desire to conserve the indigenous resources of their zone in case of a possible stoppage of imported supplies, most of which must come from the West. It was finally agreed that the deficit in the Austrian Government's plan for the period should be met by U.S. loans and imports of food.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Czechoslovak delegation, headed by M. Lisický, presented its views on Germany to the Conference of Deputies on the 30th January. The contents of the supporting memoranda, which had been previously circulated, as well as the general attitude of the Czechoslovak Government and people, were described in Summaries 376 and 377. In its oral presentation the Czechoslovak case showed no modification, but adhered closely to the brief, even to the point of sounding guarded. That the Government had agreed with Poland in advance upon a common policy is borne out by this general wariness, and in particular by the refusal to be drawn on the subject of what had become of Czech claims on Polish-occupied Silesia. This interpretation of events is further corroborated by the reactions in the Prague press, now that the shelving of this issue has been revealed to the public. The Communists support the Government action on the grounds that a Polish Silesia no longer constitutes a menace to Czechoslovakia, and is therefore not an urgent problem; the others show that their national pride has suffered a blow, and that they see in it the subordination of legitimate Czech interests to the overriding dictates of an eastern European bloc. The affair will provide little real satisfaction in either camp, for the Communists, still following though for how much longer it would be rash to predict—the native Czechoslovak parliamentary tradition, must realise that they will lose thereby some useful popular support; while the non-Communists are probably aware that good relations with Poland and the Soviet Union, whatever their political complexion, rank in importance with Czech-German relations. The realistic approach may be somewhat unpalatable, but the unique position of Czechoslovakia has a way of continually reasserting itself, and presenting its statesmen with the same dilemma, though not always to such an insupportable degree, as that which Dr. Beneš faced during his lonely vigil in the Hradčany Palace in September 1938.

The recognition by Germany of the annulment of the Munich Agreement was listed at the head of the special demands outlined by the third Czech speaker, M. Lisický. In addition to the small frontier rectifications (for which after the abandonment of the Silesian demands, the general public is evincing little interest) and the return to pre-war conditions in transport arrangements with Germany, M. Lisický further demanded the complete assimilation into Germany of the Sudeten minority expelled from Czechoslovakia under the Potsdam Agreement. This is evidence of genuine concern—often voiced in the evacuated Border Regions themselves—that these transferees may otherwise, at some future date, and with the connivance of the German authorities, constitute themselves the spearhead of another, avenging, Drang nach Osten.

The core of the problem, as seen by the Czechoslovak delegation, is the final question of how to control Germany, and it is here that their representations were most circumspect. As already stated, they favour a unified Germany, not a federalist one, and an, at present, unlimited period of occupation, in which Czechoslovakia claims the right to participate. They advocate complete military and economic disarmament, re-education in the sense of inculcating a new, non-aggressive, outlook, and the adoption of a planned socialist economy (abolition of cartels, nationalisation of industry, land reform, controlled foreign trade and financial relations, and a slow but gradual rise in the standard of living). The adoption by Germany of such an economic system is seen as rendering it the more capable of effective control; it would be regarded further as a triumph for the economic revolution that is taking place both in Poland and Czechoslovakia. For the rest, the Czechs were cautious, or deliberately vague, on the question of how all this is to be achieved.

The continuing impasse in the Slovak-Magyar dispute is described in this Summary under "Hungary."

POLAND

The General Council of the Polish Peasant Party met on the 1st and 2nd February and passed what amounts to a vote of confidence in M. Mickolajczyk. According to the press reports, the Council decided by a majority vote that the 28 members of the party elected to the new Sejm should take their seats; and that they should form an official opposition. There would, in consequence, be no members of the party in the new Government.

In replying to questions on the Polish elections Mr. Mayhew said in the House of Commons on the 3rd February that the powers of the Polish Provisional Government were extensively used to reduce to a minimum the vote of those opposed to the Government bloc. "His Majesty's Government," he said, "cannot regard these elections as fulfilling the solemn contract which the Polish Provisional Government entered into . . . that free and unfettered elections would be held. They cannot, therefore, regard the results as a true expression of the will of the Polish people."

"On the 11th January," Mr. Mayhew added, "His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow had a conversation with M. Molotov in which he expressed the deep concern of His Majesty's Government. The Soviet Government replied . . . that they did not agree that there was discrimination, that the arrests were necessary to prevent disorder and terrorism, and that the Soviet Government did not consider there was any cause for intervention. My Right Hon. Friend did not agree with this view, but it was clearly useless to pursue the matter further in Moscow. My Right Hon. Friend, however, informed the Polish Provisional Government once more of his very grave concern at the situation. Every possible effort was thus made, but without success, to secure the execution of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements. Naturally our sympathy is with the Polish people who have thus been deprived of their democratic rights."

The Polish Government's official views on the treatment of Germany were presented by M. Wierblowski, Polish Ambassador in Prague, at the meeting of the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers in London on the 27th January.

The main points in the Polish statement on matters political were:—

(a) the need for unanimity among the Great Powers;
(b) the need for a long period of control to ensure the thorough democratisation of Germany;
(c) the importance of completing disarmament, demilitarisation, denazification and the punishment of war criminals;
(d) the impossibility, over a long period, of reversing history by attempting to divide Germany into "quasi-independent organisms" and the danger of a new German chauvinism and revisionism which such an attempt would create;
(e) the necessity for the final liquidation of Prussia and "the Prussian spirit";
(f) the expectation of the Polish Government that the Western Frontier of Poland would be formally and finally confirmed at the Peace Conference.

With regard to economic desiderata, the statement covered the following points :—

(a) The Potsdam Agreement should not be altered in Germany's favour :—

(i) without corresponding benefits to the countries which had suffered German occupation, or

(ii) until land reform had been carried out and economic unity achieved in Germany. The reconstruction of the German economy should not precede the reconstruction of devastated countries. Germany should not, as after the last war, be subsidised by foreign capital to a greater degree than her neighbours in Central and Eastern Europe. The Ruhr should serve not only Germany's needs, but those of all countries whose economy is linked with it.

(b) Payment of reparations, both capital and from current production, should be envisaged as one of the means of achieving the economic levelling of Germany with her neighbours.

(c) The liquidation of cartels and monopolies.

(d) The normalisation, as soon as possible, of trade relations between Poland and Germany.

As if in support of the Polish statement figures of Polish war losses have since been issued, according to which the total casualties were 6,028,000. 644,000 of these were from direct hostilities; 3,577,000 died in concentration camps, 1,286,000 in other camps or prisons; 521,000 of exposure and starvation. Besides these, 590,000 were disabled, there was an increase of 1,140,000 in tuberculosis cases, 2,460,000 were sent to slave labour in Germany, and 2,478,000 were evicted from their homes. Material losses are given as 258,432 million pre-war zloty. One newspaper comments "Germany has won the war biologically. . . . To-day the population of 'poor Germany' including repatriates from Poland and Czechoslovakia, is 66,000,000—or more than the population of the Reich in 1937."

SOVIET UNION

On the 27th January M. Zarubin, the new Soviet Ambassador, accompanied by M. Koukin, the Minister-Counsellor, called on Mr. Bevin for the first time since his arrival in London. The interview was very cordial and touched on several outstanding problems in Anglo-Soviet relations. In the first place the Ambassador raised the question of Generalissimo Stalin's statement regarding the Anglo-Soviet Treaty and was told by Mr. Bevin that it had been welcomed and was being studied. M. Koukin then broached the question of Anglo-American arms standardisation, asking whether there was an agreement between the United States and this country on the subject. He was assured by the Secretary of State that there was no actual agreement. But Mr. Bevin explained the vital importance of this matter, in view of our experience in the last war, and referred to the arrangements which he believed were being put into effect in Eastern Europe on a Russian standardisation basis. M. Koukin also raised the question of American interest in oil in the Middle East and the Palestine pipe-line proposal. These were purely commercial matters, Mr. Bevin said, and in no wise directed against Russia. He also denied the allegation that this country opposed the Russian oil concession in Azerbaidjan, pointing out that British interests were in the South of Persia. This country was only concerned that concessions in Persia should not be used to undermine the independence of that country or interfere with its Government. The Secretary of State emphasised the purely defensive nature of British interests in the Middle East—"It was our lifeline and we intended to maintain it." In connection with Germany, the Secretary of State expressed concern about the continuing differences in the handling of the German problem and the energy shown by Russian spokesmen in attacking this country rather than in attempting to solve the problem of containing Germany. He suggested that an effort should be made in Moscow by the Four Great Powers concerned to reconcile their methods of approach so as to ensure mutual security. Finally Mr. Bevin stressed the over-riding importance of working out a system of effective collective security.

Not long after the publication of Marshal Sokolovsky's statement in the Control Council (see Summary No. 378), Major General Kotikov's statement at the meeting of the four Allied Commandants of Berlin has now appeared in Taegliche Rundschau, the organ of the Soviet Military Administration. The statement, dealing with the Russian attitude on elections within the Berlin branch of the Free German Trade Union Federation, had been the subject of disagreement at the meeting. These new tactics of unilateral disclosure of discussions hitherto treated as private are coupled with renewed attacks on Anglo-American policy in Germany in the Soviet press.

Academician Tarle, who in the past has often given expression to the view of Generalissimo Stalin, in a public lecture on the 28th January stated that every problem so far dealt with since the war paled into insignificance beside that of Germany. He insisted on firmness in dealing with the German question, by which he meant the securing of adequate reparations for the U.S.S.R. He took up the point made in Pravda that "certain circles" were building up Germany against the U.S.S.R., on this occasion, however, making British diplomatists, and not the Labour Party or the Government, the villains of the piece. They were held to be the true authors of Schumacher's London visit. In all this propaganda the three main themes have been denazification and democratisation in the special Soviet sense of these terms, demilitarisation and reparations—presumably the subjects on which the Soviet Government wishes to focus attention at the Moscow meeting.

Izvestiya has returned to the charge over Spitsbergen accusing the British, American and Swedish circles which had shown concern over the Soviet proposals of raising a clamour in order to disguise their own expansionist plans, particularly those of the U.S.A. in Greenland.

The general pattern of Soviet policy in Japan remains unchanged. Though no concrete evidence seems available of Soviet underground assistance to subversive activities, it is believed in well-informed quarters in Tokyo that the Soviet mission is working hard and skilfully, to discredit General MacArthur's Administration, to infiltrate Communist propaganda into the country, to create labour unrest, etc.; in other words that the mission is "a state within a state" which, generally speaking, fails to observe the occupation regulations. The size of the Soviet Mission was reduced to approximately 250 last November (a number still abnormally high in relation to the mission's official work) and it is believed that it is being made into a hard core of highly skilled technicians.

Strong criticism of Mr. Pauley and of American policy towards reparations from Japan itself was published in Izvestiya (the 29th January). It was pointed out that "the Soviet Government has repeatedly explained that Japanese military property in Manchuria including plant which served the needs of the Kwantung army is the war booty of the Soviet troops." "Only by adopting this incontestable thesis is a serious solution of the reparations questions possible, as is perfectly obvious." Izvestiya indignantly denied Mr. Pauley's contention that the present condition of Manchurian industry was due to removals of plant by the Soviet Army.

Recent political events in India have given a fillip to Indian news and comment in Moscow. At first the Soviet press took the line that the measures against the Indian Communist Party were an attempt on the part of the provincial Governments and the police to paralyse the proletarian movement; later, however, it shifted its ground and declared that the suppression of the Communists had been carried out solely on the instructions of the British authorities, who were pursuing the traditional British "divide and rule" policy and were provoking anti-Communist measures in order to discredit the Provisional Government in the eyes of the people. The arrest of Communists in Burma was only briefly reported, and little appeared on the Anglo-Burmese negotiations till their conclusion. The press then summarised Lord Pethick-Lawrence's announcement in the House of Lords and in the same report played up the criticisms of U Saw and Ba Sein that not one of Burma's original demands had been met, except for the decision to establish a Constituent Assembly, which had to be approved by the British Parliament.

The Communist Party in India was illegal for several years before the war, and has only been functioning openly since July 1942. In October 1946 the Party claimed for itself a membership of 53,700, exclusive of candidates and sympathisers, a figure nearly double that claimed during the previous two or three years, and almost certainly greatly exaggerated. The bulk of the members are concentrated in the Provinces of Madras, Bengal and Bombay, but the comparatively small Punjabi branch is of special importance as many of its leaders are veteran revolutionaries trained in the U.S.S.R.

In the course of his recent visit to Moscow, M. Louis Saillant, Secretary-General of the World Federation of Trades Unions, gave an interview to Trud (the Soviet trade union organ) in which he echoed Soviet propagandist sentiments on such matters as the General Assembly decision on Franco Spain and relations between the World Federation of Trade Unions and the Economic and Social Council. He mentioned a recent talk with members of the Executive Committee of the Underground Spanish Trade Union Organisation in which "the horrible material and moral conditions" of the Spanish working class were described. His Soviet hosts no doubt appreciated his tribute to the superior strength of the organised workers in the Soviet occupation zones and in Berlin and his remarks about the menace of Nazism in the Western Zones. It is understood that M. Saillant will join the delegation from the World Federation of Trades Unions which is now visiting the American zone of Germany. Other W.F.T.U. visits announced by M. Saillant are to Japan (on the 10th March) and to Dakar, where an All-African Trade Union Conference is scheduled for the 10th–13th April. The information released from time to time in the Soviet Union regarding W.F.T.U. activities reflects a far greater concern about international politics than about trade union questions as such. The W.F.T.U. seems chiefly to be of use as an agency for supporting Soviet views on world politics.

The U.S.S.R. State Planning Commission has issued a progress report on the results of the first year of the new Five Year Plan (1946–50). The restoration and development of the national economy is stated to have proceeded in accordance with the programme. There is, however, much reliable evidence to show that the programme was not fulfilled in White Russia, where restoration has a low priority, and indeed had on the whole been adequately carried out with regard to housing.

According to the communiqué, the output of basic industry showed an increase of roughly 10 per cent. over the previous year's output, the actual figures for steel, coal and oil being respectively 109, 110 and 112. If this rate of increase is continued throughout the plan, the target figures of output set for 1950 should be reached by that date. The statement also emphasizes the seriousness of last year's drought (as indicated in Summary No. 377)—which it characterises as the worst experienced in the past 50 years—and mentions that the production of grain crops, sunflower seeds and sugar beet in the U.S.S.R. as a whole declined considerably in 1946 as compared with 1945.

In the Kursk area where the drought most drastically affected the people's grain supplies, the collective farmers, according to Moscow radio, were supplied with 4,000,000 poods of grain and tractors, while threshing machines and other agricultural equipment were directed to the local machine Tractor Station.

SCANDINAVIA

Finland

Towards the end of January the Diet considered a bill authorising the Government to send a delegation to Paris in order to sign the Peace Treaty, at the same time conferring upon the President of the Republic the right to ratify the Treaty immediately after signature without further reference to the Diet. Curiously enough, objections to the bill were raised by the Communists on grounds of procedure, and it was argued that the Diet could not give its consent to ratification before the Treaty had actually been signed. Eventually, nevertheless, the bill was passed unanimously.

The question of the conversion of the British courier service into a commercial air line has now been debated in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Diet. The Foreign Minister, M. Enckell, was severely criticised for the course adopted, and the view was taken that a formal application for permission ought to have been made to the Control Commission. Instead, M. Enckell had merely informed the Soviet authorities of the contemplated change, a procedure which many members thought might easily have given offence to the Russians. The matter, therefore, still remains unsettled, and it is impossible to say when the conversion will finally take place.

Norway

The 91st ordinary session of the Storting had its State opening on the 14th January. King Haakon began his Speech from the Throne with a brief review of the international situation, during which he noted that Norway had been invited to express her views with regard to the final settlements with Germany and Austria. Normal diplomatic relations had been resumed, he said, with Roumania, Austria and Siam, and a Representative had been sent to Tokio. Until the formal conclusion of peace Norway would remain in a state of war with Germany and Japan. She would continue to take an active part in the activities of the United Nations Organisation.

Negotiations had taken place with the Soviet Union, he went on, for the drawing up of the common frontier in the extreme North, and both parties were in complete agreement that the line should coincide with the original border established by treaty in 1826. (This line is identical with the former Finnish-Norwegian frontier.)

Several trade and financial agreements had been concluded with foreign countries, as had a civil aviation agreement with Great Britain. The question of reciprocal air agreements had also been discussed with several other Governments. A proposal for reform of the Norwegian Foreign Service, better fitting it for the demands placed upon it, would shortly be submitted for consideration.

Turning to domestic affairs King Haakon underlined that the budget proposals for 1947–48 had been drawn up in accordance with the Government's declared policy of price stabilisation, and that, for this reason, it had proved necessary to put aside a substantial sum. The Government were at present examining the advisability of establishing State monopolies for the import of solid fuels, concentrated cattle fodder, and medical supplies. Owing to existing shortages, and difficulties arising out of conditions of payment, State control of the import and export trade would be continued for the time being, while rationing of certain essential commodities, including building materials and liquid fuel, would also remain in force. Schemes for the employment of ex-traitors were being prepared and would soon be put into effect. King Haakon ended his speech by enumerating a number of measures dealing with social insurance, public health, &c., which the Government intended to place before the Storting.

It has not hitherto been customary for the Speech from the Throne to give a detailed account of the Government's intentions; the opening of the Storting has tended to be purely ceremonial, and the King's Speech has rarely formed the basis for an important political debate. The present departure, which more closely conforms to British practice, was greeted with satisfaction, particularly by Government supporters.

Iceland

(Also see Summary No. 376.) Herra Stefan Stefansson, the Chairman of the Socialist Party, has succeeded in forming a Government with the Conservative and Progressive parties, a surprising achievement if the enmity between the leaders of these two parties is remembered. From information so far available it appears that each party will furnish two Ministers and that the six main portfolios will be evenly distributed among them, while at the same time minor departments will be placed under the care of the same Ministers. Thus the Socialists will look after the Ministry for Social Affairs and that for Communications and also be responsible for the Department of Commerce; the Conservatives have been entrusted with the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and Finance and also look after the Departments of Justice and of Fisheries, the Progressive Party will inherit the portfolios of Labour and Education from the Communists and, besides, be responsible for the Departments of Agriculture and Aviation. It will also be seen that the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, which under the previous Coalition Government was combined with the Premiership, remains in the hands of the Conservative Party.

Denmark

The rumours that the United States have made, or are contemplating making, an offer to purchase Greenland have caused great concern in Denmark. According to the Danish press responsible circles, represented, for instance, by M. Rasmussen, the Foreign Minister himself, and Danish public opinion generally, regard any suggestion of selling Greenland as absurd and conflicting with Danish tradition.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

A third Netherlands Government Memorandum on territorial and economic claims against Germany was submitted to the Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London on the 25th January. The historical aspect of the territorial claims, hitherto rather discreetly relegated to the background, is here given considerable prominence. Beginning with the northern part of the frontier region—that bordered by the Provinces of Westphalia and Hanover—the Memorandum states that the Netherlands had never accepted Germany's claim to absolute sovereignty over the Ems estuary, since that was based on "a charter of extremely dubious authenticity." Further south, the reclamation during the past 50 years of the Boertange peat moor—once a natural boundary—had completely altered the situation so that the existing frontier had become "fortuitous and inconvenient." Still further south, the County of Bentheim [a well-defined and abrupt rectangular salient projecting into Dutch territory, from the head of which to the nearest point on the shore of the Ijselmeer is a little over 40 miles] is "geographically entirely dependent" upon and has, "from ancient times," been "closely associated" with, the Netherlands. The Vreden and Anholt "pockets" are the result of the "vicissitudes of mediæval political history": their removal is demanded in the interest of straightening the frontier. The Memorandum is careful to explain that, in "all these cases," it is frontier rectification, not the introduction of "fundamental changes," which is involved. The frontier opposite the Rhine Province, however, "presents a different aspect." It is of much more recent origin, having been delimited by the Congress of Vienna in 1815; but it is claimed by the Memorandum to have "much less historical authority" for its position than has the northern part of the frontier opposite Westphalia and Hanover. "It is the result," adds the Memorandum, "of a political compromise which was largely determined by alien factors, and against which Dutch protests in the past proved unavailing." The three frontier changes asked for in this region—near the territory of the former Duchy of Cleves and the towns of Cleves and Emmerich; near the Dutch towns of Roermond and Sittard; and near 's-Hertogenrade [Herzogenrath] and Aachen—do not, it is urged, "overstep the bounds of historical tradition."

In its economic section, the Memorandum reiterates the great importance and urgency of the Netherlands economic claims. It was essential, runs the argument, that the questions raised by these claims be "taken up at the earliest opportunity in order to ensure that the régime now in force in Occupied Germany be adapted as soon as possible to the system aimed at in the Peace Treaty." Economic activity in Germany was "likely to be at a low level for many years to come," and it was for that reason that the Netherlands Government wanted to lay "particular stress" on their claims. As the result of German economic depression, the "scope and character of one of the great sources of Netherlands prosperity" would "undergo a permanent change." It was clear, therefore, that the Netherlands would expect "more than ever before" that, as far as commercial and transport policy were concerned, her interests would be "fully taken into account"; for it was essential to a "reasonable recovery" of her prosperity that "free access" to her "natural hinterland" be once again secured to her, but under conditions which excluded "all discrimination." This did not mean that the Netherlands sought "preferential treatment"; but it did mean that she asked for the "free use of the Rhine, not only in a technical sense," but also "in a manner which fitted into the framework of modern economic traffic," in relation to "tariffs and measures of monetary and commercial policy." Since the Dutch hinterland extended to the Danubian countries, the Netherlands Government felt "justified" in demanding that transit traffic through Germany in both directions be "open to her without discrimination," and that this demand be "taken into account" in connexion with policy for ports other than the German North Sea ports—e.g., the port of Trieste. Netherlands rail and road traffic should be similarly treated.

The final section of the Memorandum is devoted to minutiæ connected with the river catchment areas and the rail, road and water communications in the frontier regions in question; together with a discussion of the rights and duties of the Netherlands and Germany relative to these regions and the technical considerations on which the frontier rectifications are based.

Belgium

Belgian views on Austria in connexion with the Peace Treaty with that country are contained in a Note presented to the Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies last week. The Note lays stress upon the importance of giving Austria political independence and of reviving her economy, together with "freedom of trade and communications," in order to enable countries such as Belgium to resume normal relations with her. The Note then requests the inclusion of the principle of freedom of navigation on the Danube in the Treaty with Austria, as was done in the case of the draft Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania. The Belgian Government reserved the right to prefer claims in the event of the Austrian Government's being required to compensate the Allied Powers, and also to claim compensation should any Belgian property in Austria be "affected by measures of 'de-cartelization,' socialization, nationalization or other operations of that kind." The Note ends with a request for Belgian participation in drawing up the Treaty, the Government reserving the right to supply more detailed information at a later date.

FRANCE

On the 28th January M. Massigli called on Mr. Bevin for preliminary talks on the Anglo-French alliance. The negotiations proper will begin as soon as possible, Meanwhile, M. Monnet has been in London to explain his Plan to U.K. officials.

Four French memoranda on Germany have now been handed to the Allies. The memorandum dealing with the future constitution of Germany (see last Summary) was accompanied by another on the provisional organisation of the country pending the signing of a peace treaty, which admitted the principle of economic unity and the consequent need for a number of central co-ordinating bodies with German participation, but insisted that the Allies must remain in control. A further memorandum on procedure for peace-making has been submitted to the Council of Deputies and one on reparations is in preparation. In addition, M. Alphand called at the Foreign Office on the 28th January to leave a technical memorandum on the German steel industry.

The memorandum on economic control of the Ruhr, handed to the U.K., U.S. and U.S.S.R. Governments on the 1st February, has been approved by both M. Blum and M. Bidault. It does not deal with the political status of the Ruhr, and the French claim that it leaves them free to demand once again the separation of the Ruhr from Germany. They realise, however, that this demand has little chance of being accepted by the other Allies and they seem to be preparing the ground for an eventual retreat in good order. Their plan is designed to ensure strict economic control of the Ruhr, whatever its political status. The memorandum provides for direct international management of the coal and steel industries, by representatives of countries "directly interested," while leaving other industries to be managed by Ruhr Germans. It states that the Ruhr should be treated as an asset of the United Nations and that its coal production should be developed to the utmost for the benefit of European industry. All signatories to the German treaty should possess treaty rights in the Ruhr industries and should appoint a High Commissioner for the territory. The desire of the French, as after the last war, to write into the general system of security the particular measures imposed on Germany is exemplified in their insistence that the statute of the Ruhr should be included in the peace treaty and guaranteed by the Security Council.

The United States' request for the repatriation by October 1947 of the German prisoners-of-war lent to France after the end of the war has forced the French Government, in spite of Communist disapproval (see Summary 372), to decide on the offer of the status of civilian workers to those Germans who wish to remain in France. The sudden departure of these prisoners, numbering 4–500,000, who have been working in French agriculture, industry, transport and in the coal mines, would be a severe blow to the French economy. The Government have therefore proposed to the United States authorities, in a note of the 14th January, that the prisoners concerned should be approached by the International Red Cross and offered the choice between repatriation or remaining in France as civilian workers, subject to certain restrictions. The French Press reports that this proposal has been accepted by the U.S. authorities.

The new Government submitted to an interpellation, i.e., a debate followed by a vote of confidence, in the Assembly on the 28th January, thus returning to the tradition of the Third Republic. M. Ramadier was not obliged to accept this debate since he had already obtained his vote of confidence before forming his Government. It now seems probable, however, that the procedure laid down in the new Constitution for the nomination of a Premier will mean that he will have to solicit two votes of confidence instead of one. The Opposition speeches, which were confined to the question of the composition of the Government, were made by M. René Capitant and by members of the Parti Républicain de la Liberté. They criticised the Government's lack of homogeneity and the bestowal of the Ministry of National Defence upon a Communist. M. Ramadier gave a skilful if not entirely convincing reply and received a vote of confidence of 521 to 12. There were a number of abstentions—including 14 members of the M.R.P.

The first Cabinet meeting to be presided over by the President of the Republic, in accordance with the Constitution and with traditional usage, was held on the 29th January. An innovation now laid down is the keeping of minutes of Cabinet meetings, to be preserved by the President. M. Ramadier, partly because of the unwieldy size of his Cabinet, has introduced a system of Cabinet committees on economic or other subjects, and it is reported that each of the Ministers of State will be responsible for co-ordinating affairs in a given sphere of action. Thus M. Delbos, the Radical Minister of State, is to assist M. Bidault in the field of foreign and imperial affairs.

The High Commissioner for Food was appointed on the 29th January. He is M.

Rastel, a permanent official who has been prefect of two departments and was concerned with the drawing-up of the Monnet Plan. He will be under the authority of the Prime Minister and the members of the inner Cabinet. The food situation demands and is receiving the urgent attention of the Government. While the 5 per cent. cut in prices has been generally applied it has not yet brought goods into the shops, and Paris has for weeks been virtually without meat. The Government are faced with the dilemma of maintaining fixed prices, in which case the farmers will not sell, or allowing prices to find their own level, in which case the poorer families will not be able to buy meat. Another problem is the extensive damage caused by frost to the autumn-sown wheat. Bonuses are being granted to farmers for the spring sowings, but it is impossible wholly to make up the deficiency and considerable quantities of wheat will have to be imported in the spring.

SWITZERLAND

The Report of the "International Committee for the Study of European Questions affecting Germany" has caused resentment in Switzerland, which has found expression in the leading columns of the Swiss Press and in the Swiss broadcasts. That portion of the report which deals with conditions in Germany is not disputed, but the comments relating to Switzerland and to the activities and numbers of Nazi refugees there have aroused considerable indignation. The Swiss complaint is that the Report estimates the numbers of these Nazis as 72,000, whereas, in point of fact this figure comprises all persons of German or Austrian origin in Switzerland, and includes many who have been residents for scores of years, long before National Socialism had been heard of. The "German Colony" proper was assessed in April 1945 at 24,000, since reduced by the expulsion of 3,000 active Nazis. A further cause of complaint is the allegation in the Report that National Socialists have still large assets in Switzerland at their disposal. The Swiss Press answers that all German assets in Switzerland had been frozen since the 16th February, 1945, and that, by agreement with the Allied Powers, assets in Switzerland of Germans still in Germany are being liquidated. In a broadcast commentary on the subject, on the 1st February, M. Pierre Béguin declared "We have used every available method of investigation. Switzerland cannot therefore tolerate the accusation of leniency, weakness, naiveté or connivance. Our conscience is perfectly clear."

The Swiss Authorities have recently been much exercised over outbreaks of counterfeiting on a considerable scale. Forged 1,000 franc Swiss notes have been put into circulation and the operations of the gang are said to extend not only to Switzerland but to France and Italy and even to Austria and Germany. Thanks to the co-operation of the French police, a number of suspects have been arrested, but neither the leader of the enterprise nor the printing-press has been found. The forged notes already in circulation are said to be the equivalent of 100 million French francs. A similar outbreak on a smaller scale with counterfeit 100 franc Swiss notes occurred about the same time in the southern cantons. In this case the Italian police made 17 arrests in Milan, and seized the printing-press and the leader of the gang. Two of the 17 were Swiss, and the rest Italians.

SPAIN

All is quiet in Spain, and interest centres at the moment upon the activities of the émigrés in Paris, following the break-up of the Giral Government-in-exile, to which reference was made in last week's Summary. The Franco Régime's propagandists in the press and on the radio have naturally made merry on the subject, and, since this crumbling of the structure of "republican legality" coincides with the Spanish Government's extension by a further six months of the so-called amnesty decree of October 1945, there is an insufferable Little Jack Horner tone about the various comments. That amnesty decree, it may be remembered—apart from its application to political offenders at home—purported to give the green light for return to Spain to all Spaniards in exile not guilty during the civil war of criminal behaviour or acts of violence. In other words it marked the final abrogation of the iniquitous Law of Political Responsibilities of February 1939. Applicants for this benefit are required to lodge their petitions with Spanish Embassies, Legations or Consulates, and, if accepted, they will, according to the Government spokesmen, "not be greeted with hostility but with kindness, help and all the necessary facilities to return to their homes and resume work." The number of exiled Republicans who have walked into the spider's parlour since October 1945 has hitherto been insignificant. It remains to be seen whether more will go on the strength of new arrangements (reported from Madrid) which will enable the exile to ascertain abroad whether he will be liable to any charge on his arrival in Spain.

Señor Giral and his Cabinet resigned office on the 27th January, and efforts of the President of the Republic-in-exile, Señor Martinez Barrio, to secure the formation of a new Government have not yet proved successful. He has invited Don Augusto Barcia Trelles, Finance Minister in the Giral Cabinet, to form a new Government, and Señor Barcia is "holding conversations." Señor Barcia, a distinguished jurist and staunch Republican, was Minister for Foreign Affairs in 1936. If he proves to be the new Prime Minister, his policy would be unlikely to differ in essentials from that of his predecessor. On the other hand, the Communists have been showing some initiative and have been supported by Moscow radio in an effort to keep alive the cause of the exile "Government."

Apart from one or two reckless yells in infancy, the Giral Government has conducted itself on the whole with dignity since it took office in August 1945, following the convening of the exiled Republican Cortes in Mexico City, when "Constitutional legality," in abeyance since March 1939, was re-established. Señor Giral has concentrated on establishing relations with the United Nations and winning their recognition. It was with this object that he departed from the original conception of "respectability" at all costs and agreed to the broadening of his Government last March represented by the entry of Santiago Carrillo, the Communist representative. Señor Giral did thereby secure recognition of his Government by a number of the satellite States of Eastern Europe (Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Hungary and Bulgaria), but at the same time forfeited the support of a considerable section of emigrant Spain. And all to no purpose. The United Nations have been lavish with words of sympathy and condemnation of the Franco Régime, but the Giral Government needed deeds. To-day, apart from the Russian satellite States, his Government enjoys diplomatic relations for what they are worth with the South American Republics of Mexico, Guatemala, Panamá and Venezuela. The Soviet Union has never recognised the Spanish Republican Government.

The rock on which the Giral Government foundered was one around which they had been endeavouring to navigate for some time, the question whether Republican continuity and legitimacy should be sacrificed and all effort turned to the task of achieving unity with anti-Franco groups inside Spain in order, first and foremost, that General Franco should be removed. Spokesmen of the Alianza de Fuerzas Democráticas have latterly made it quite clear that they attach paramount importance to a rapprochement with centre and right wing anti-Franco groups, and, specifically, the Monarchist advisers of Don Juan, with a view to some interim caretaker Government on the pattern of the Three-Power Note of 5th March last. To this programme it was obvious that the Government-in-exile with its uncompromising Republicanism now constituted a liability rather than an asset, especially since Señor Giral admitted the Communist representative to his Cabinet. Spaniards generally regard it as hopelessly unrealistic to suppose that the Franco Régime could be immediately replaced by any coalition of the Parties representing the losing side in the civil war. The one point, however, on which all the exiles appear to agree is that any new Government or Junta set up in place of the Giral administration should contain fewer of the "old gang"—the majority of the places being left for personalities inside Spain, whence it seems clear that the exiles will in future have to take their cue.

ITALY

According to wireless and press reports Signor De Gasperi has now succeeded in forming a coalition Government of Christian Democrats, Nenni's Socialists, Communists and Independents. In exactly what proportion the Ministries are divided between these parties is not yet clear, but from the various reports in the press it would seem to be approximately: Christian Democrats 7 Ministries, Socialists 3, Communists 3, Independents 2. This only represents a total of 15 Ministries as against 22 in the last Government, but the Ministries of War, Navy and Air are now concentrated into one, the Ministry of Defence, and Signor De Gasperi, besides remaining Prime Minister, may be retaining some other Ministry. No list of Ministers with Portfolios is yet available. It is, however, definitely known that Count Sforza (Independent) has accepted the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Count Carlo Sforza was born in 1873 and entered the diplomatic service in 1896. He has already held the office of Minister for Foreign Affairs as he served in Giolitti's Cabinet from 1920–1921. In this capacity Count Sforza signed the Treaty of Rapallo with Yugoslavia by which Italy acquired Venezia Giulia, a great part of which is allotted to Yugoslavia by the Italian Treaty which is to be signed on the 10th February. Count Sforza made no compromise with Fascism and from 1926 to 1943 lived in exile, first in France until 1940 and then in the United States, where he was generally regarded as the leader of the anti-Fascist opposition.

Considering what a short interval has elapsed since his return from America Signor De Gasperi seems to have done extremely well to have succeeded so comparatively quickly in forming a Government. Difficulties between the Parties, however, which might have been hard to surmount at other times, may have been smoothed over by one overwhelming and possibly sobering consideration, the fact that it is this Government which will be faced with the responsibility of signing the Peace Treaty.

The new Government's programme is said to be concentrated on five main points: (i) a drive against neo-fascists and monarchists, (ii) a capital levy, (iii) a new deal for agricultural tenants, by which landowners will receive 40 per cent instead of 50 per cent of the produce, (iv) labour collaboration in the management of industry, (v) extension of rationing and war on the Black Market.

The Allied Commission has been abolished as from midnight the 31st January, 1947. The announcement was made by General Sir William Morgan, the Supreme Allied Commander Mediterranean, in a statement which said the Commission was being closed as part of a general reduction of military establishments in Italy.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The meeting between M. Gyöngyösi and Dr. Clementis which took place at Bratislava on the 26th January brought the problem of the exchange of populations between Hungary and Czechoslovakia no nearer to a solution. Dr. Clementis repeated the arguments used by General Dastich in Budapest on the 20th January (see last week's Summary under "Czechoslovakia"), while M. Gyöngyösi once more emphasised that his Government could not agree to the reopening of negotiations unless the drafting of Hungarians to Slovakia ceased. At a Press Conference on the 30th January M. Gyöngyösi complained that though the meeting was to have been strictly confidential a Bratislava report had made it public. He denied that Hungarians objected to the Czechoslovak labour decree as such. What they did protest against was that the families of those called up were ejected from their homes which immediately passed into the possession of Slovak settlers. After the signing of the Peace Treaty, M. Gyöngyösi continued, Hungary as a member of the United Nations would be able to bring the matter before an international forum. Because she had failed in her attempt to reach an understanding with the Czechoslovak Government she was asking for the support of the Great Powers.

H.M. Government are favourably disposed to the idea of forming a Four-Power, or, if the Soviet Union refuses to co-operate, a Three-Power, Commission—to which Hungarian and Czechoslovak representatives would be attached—whose business would be to supervise the implementing of the February Agreement on the exchange of populations, and if possible to afford help in settling the question of the 200,000 Hungarians, who remain to be transferred. But the U.S. Government consider that the time is not yet ripe for intervention along the lines suggested, since they still hope that a solution will be found by means of direct negotiation. The fact that if Soviet Russia stands aloof the hostility of those affected may be exploited to the detriment of the Western Powers has not been lost sight of. The U.S. Government affirm their belief that the Czechoslovak attitude to the Hungarian minority problem has contributed materially to the present difficulties, and are willing to inform the Czechoslovak Ambassador in Washington of the importance which they attach to an early and satisfactory settlement.

With the capture of General Veress de Dálnok the Committee of Seven accused of responsibility for directing the plot against the Hungarian Government are all under arrest. Whatever the degree of complicity among Smallholders—and M. Nagy, the Premier, has admitted, and not only in public utterances, that some of his party were certainly involved—the left-wing bloc is making the most of its chance to press for their further elimination from political life. To the eight Smallholder Deputies recently excluded only another five would have to be added for them to lose their majority in the National Assembly over the Communists and Social Democrats if the two Parties combined; and M. Szakasits, the Social Democratic leader, is alleged to be urging the alliance. The Communists are demanding as a victim M. Béla Kovács, Secretary-General of the Smallholders' Party, and one of its staunchest members. M. Tildy, the President, who advocates a policy of concession, is ready to let M. Kovács go, but M. Nagy has made it clear that in the event of M. Kovács' resignation his own would not be long delayed. Meanwhile, M. Kovács is taking a month's leave to allow time for the situation to clarify.

M. Nagy has expressed his determination to stand firm after the completion of his Party's purge which he, too, considers necessary. In spite of Communist opposition the situation is not, he feels, beyond his control. Smallholder members of the Police Force are associated with the enquiry, and M. Rajk, the Communist Minister of the Interior, although responsible for directing investigations, reports to him from time to time. There has, he contends, been no interference from Soviet Police, nor has the Soviet brought direct pressure to bear on himself or his Government in connection with the plot.

Yugoslavia

Details of the attack on the Yugoslav Acting Consul at Naples on the 25th January (see Summary No. 378, 29.1.47) have been received in London. It is clear that the British authorities were primarily not responsible for his death, and that he and his companion must have been aware of the risks they were taking. The military authorities on the spot did all they could to avert the disaster, short of forbidding access to the premises occupied by the chetniks. At G.H.Q., Caserta, where the visit was discussed, the Consul, M. Viktor Glumčić, was warned that the British could not accept responsibility for his safety. When he called on the British Town Major at the Artillery Barracks, Naples, the Headquarters of the chetnik administration, to make arrangements to interview individual chetniks on behalf of the Yugoslav Repatriation Mission, he was again warned of the danger he would incur. He was, indeed, asked not to call again until the Town Major had consulted Caserta. In spite of these warnings Glumčić and his companion appeared unexpectedly at the Barracks next day and while they were talking with the Major alone in his office, they were surrounded by a mob of chetniks and attacked with iron bars and other implements. By the time the dozen British troops on the premises could be called the two Yugoslavs were already seriously injured. Glumčić died in hospital.

The Yugoslavs have refused to accept the British account of the incident as published by A.F.H.Q. Tanjug, in a special communiqué, called it untruthful and an attempt to conceal the "participation of the Allied authorities in the crime." The Assistant Foreign Minister also blamed the British, and the Yugoslav Ambassador in London has addressed a Note to Mr. Bevin threatening to bring the whole matter before the Security Council if a satisfactory settlement is not reached. The Yugoslav Press let itself go over the incident. Borba described it as one of the most serious assaults carried out by the British against Yugoslavia, and as a grave violation of the Moscow declaration on war criminals. Elsewhere it was alleged that the Yugoslav consul was "enticed" into the chetnik camp, by the British authorities who were aware of a plot to kill him.

This incident will, of course, complicate the task of Brigadier Maclean. One of the purposes of his mission to Italy is to prove that His Majesty's Government are not intentionally harbouring Yugoslav war criminals and traitors, nor supporting their organisations, nor discouraging would-be repatriates from returning home. The need to accelerate the process of arresting and handing over genuine traitors has now become a matter of great urgency. As was stated in Summary No. 377, 24.1.47) the chetniks present a particularly vicious problem. The Naples affair may well encourage the more irresponsible elements to flout British authority still more. It may also have unfortunate consequences for innocent persons. There may now be neither the time nor the opportunity to draw nice distinctions between those who collaborated with the Germans and those who did not.

The Yugoslav Government have made a formal application to the Holy See for the surrender of five former officials of Nedić's Government who are believed to be residing in Vatican territory. They have also protested against the alleged connivance of a charitable organisation of the Vatican in the escape to South America of certain other collaborators, including three of Pavelić's ministers.

frontiers of Albania, has many ramifications. Not only are the names of the British and Turkish Consuls at Skoplje frequently mentioned, but General Hodgson, former head of the British Military Mission in Albania, is credited with having promised the conspirators military supplies by parachute, and even political support. The accused in such cases usually confess that they established bases across the Greek frontier because there they could be sure of help from the "monarcho-fascists" and the British. It is difficult not to connect this trial with the arrival of the United Nations' Commission of Investigation in Greece.

Similarly while the Security Council is awaiting the arrival in New York of the Albanian representative, the Yugoslav Government have informed H.M. Chargé d'Affaires in Belgrade that warships flying British colours have been seen in Yugoslav territorial waters.

The Yugoslav memorandum on Germany was heard by the Deputy Foreign Ministers on the 28th January. It was not a striking document, consisting mainly of the usual complaints about the non-delivery of reparations and accusations of support by the Western Powers for German big business. On political questions it was an echo of Soviet views, but it also included a request for the guarantee of the fundamental rights, &c., of the Lusations Serbs (or Wends) and a demand for the removal of the remaining Volksdeutsche from Yugoslavia to Germany.

Greece

The new Greek Government has already had cause to regret its precipitate and ill-considered decision to increase the pay of all civil servants at a cost to the Exchequer of thirty milliards of drachmas monthly. Prices rose immediately, and the inevitable outcrop of strikes on the part of other workers began. Employees of public utility concerns came out on strike on the 29th January but resumed work on the 31st after they had been promised a bonus equal to that granted to the civil servants. Further wage demands are already manifest. The Piræus dockers, for instance, are demanding double their present wages.

Following M. Maximos' statement to the Chamber on the 27th January (see Summary No. 378) a five-day debate began on the new Government's policy. M. Sofoulis, opening the debate as leader of the Opposition, limited himself to the question of public order. He could see no hope of success for the Government's plan to apply a policy of force concurrently with its policy of appeasement. M. Papandreou in reply deplored the Opposition's description of the Government's plan as a "policy of force." They were merely determined to apply the law and to annihilate all rebels against the State, whatever their politics. M. Sofoulis, challenged to define his policy in greater detail, urged the immediate suspension of all deportations and the granting of an amnesty to all guerrillas, whether of the Left or the Right, with the sole exception of those guilty of "particularly atrocious crimes." Anyone persisting in the use of violence after the granting of this amnesty, should be severely dealt with, whatever his political complexion. M. Papandreou welcomed the Liberal policy, as defined by M. Sofoulis, as being virtually identical with the Government's policy, and urged the Liberals to join the Government. M. Rentis, however, in reply declined this suggestion; the Liberals being equally opposed to the Left and Right could not agree with the Government's policy. They would not, however, obstruct the Government in their task. On the 1st February the Chamber passed a vote of confidence in the new Government by 252 votes to 36.

The majority of the members of the United Nations Enquiry Commission have now arrived in Athens have settled a number of points of procedure and have heard a statement of the Greek case by M. Kyrou. In the absence of the Albanian representatives whose arrival was delayed, the Yugoslavs and Bulgars chanted the Slav chorus that the root of Greece's troubles lay in "the two-year-old internal strife" and that after its investigations in Greece the Commission "might find it unnecessary to visit other countries." They emphasised that the main field of investigations should be Greece, and, if necessary, the Yugoslav and Bulgarian border areas where the Commission could hear from Greek refugees about the persecutions that they had suffered in Greece. Preliminary reports suggest that the Commission will begin its work by examining captured guerrillas. Yugoslavia will also be asked to explain the presence on her soil of some thousands of E.L.A.S. men.

Meanwhile few reports have been received of bandit activity in Northern Greece. The The headquarters staff of the "Democratic Army" are said to be moving southwards to western continental Greece.

In London on the 29th January M. Aghnides presented Greece's case to the Foreign Ministers' Deputies who are considering the treaty with Germany. He claimed that all the minor Allies, and particularly Greece, who had fought against Germany, should participate fully in any peace-making. Greece was especially interested in Germany's economic future and wanted an outlet in the German market for Greek tobacco, a larger share of German reparations than had been suggested in Paris and permission to employ German technicians and experts in Greece.

Turkey

Shortly after the Democratic Party Congress mentioned in Summary No. 377, the central executive committee of the Republican People's Party met in Angora. Although its conclusions have still to be learnt, it is known that it was to discuss proposals submitted by Hamdullah Suphi Tanriöver, who, as a former Cabinet Minister and Ambassador of somewhat enlightened views, perhaps appreciates more than others the need for reform in a party till recently unchallenged. His proposals appear to have included a party "purge," a greater say of local branches in the choice of parliamentary candidates, emphasis on principles rather than on persons, and moral education. This last point evoked in the press some sympathy for the idea of re-introducing religious teaching, although Akşam had the sense to point out that if religion was to be a force, it had got to be, in a secular State, more than a matter of form.

On the 29th January the Minister of the Interior made a statement in the Grand National Assembly about the recently suppressed Communist movement. He described attempts made by Communist leaders in recent years to contact military cadets, technical students, reserve officers and naval crews. On the basis of documents seized in the raid on Communist premises in Istanbul, he declared that the Communist plan had been to use the young Democratic Party and the popularity of the aged ex-Chief of the General Staff, Marshal Çakmak, to overthrow the Government and set up a so-called Democratic government out of which a full-fledged Soviet régime would in due course have emerged. The Minister thanked the Democratic Party for not having lent itself to these machinations. From letters written by Dr. Tevfik Rüştü Aras, and the Leftist journalists Baykurt, Zakarya Sertel and his wife, he quoted passages showing their intention to enlist the sympathies of the Democratic leaders and Marshal Çakmak. But Dr. Aras thereupon disclaimed all connexion with Communism, and the Marshal issued a statement defending both him and Baykurt.

Perhaps it was as a rejoinder to the ill-humour shown in Syria over the Turco-Transjordan treaty that Turkish newspapers published—apparently ridiculous—allegations of the persecution of Turks at Lattakieh. The Anatolian Agency also reported that the Syrian Prime Minister had announced an intention of submitting the Hatay question to arbitration and of raising a claim to Cilicia. The Prime Minister denies having said any such thing, but the report caused considerable excitement in the Turkish press.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Since the announcement that Egypt is to put her case before the United Nations, Egyptian opinion seems to be in some confusion. There is uncertainty as to how the matter would be handled, and, in some quarters, the realisation that Egypt has nothing to gain by such a course, and that she would do better if a Government of National Union could be formed and negotiations re-opened with His Majesty's Government. A reference in Mr. Bevin's speech to the difficulty resulting from dealing with "a minority Government" has, as was expected, received considerable prominence, although it must have been well known that this question had influenced the whole course of the negotiations since their beginning. Nokrashy Pasha is reported to have remarked that Mr. Bevin would have regarded it as a majority Government if it had accepted the Treaty. An article in the Ahram of the 29th January accused Mr. Bevin of attempting to sow discord amongst Egyptians! The Wafdist press proclaims that the Wafd is opposed to a coalition Government, and insists that, before any reference is made to the United Nations, free elections should be held and a National Union established on the basis of these elections. This apparently means that the Wafd should form a Government and allow the participation of some other parties in it. There is, however, no sign that King Farouk will allow the Wafd to return to power, and it is only on that basis that a coalition Government could be formed. The Makramites, the Watanists and the refractory Independent members of the Egyptian Treaty delegation are likely to refuse to be represented in a delegation to the United Nations until an all-party Government has been formed.

Members of the Foreign Affairs Committees of both Houses are expected to meet on the 5th February to discuss the situation.

The Arab representatives in London have expressed their feeling that the break is a mistake on Egypt's part, but Azzam Pasha has been using the Egyptian State broadcasting station to proclaim the support of the Arab League for Egypt's case. The Syrian President has promised Egypt the support of his Government and people, and has recalled the help given to Syria in their crisis by King Farouk. Although Azzam Pasha has been freely criticised in the past for unauthorised statements and actions on behalf of the League, it may well be that the comments of the Arab representatives in London are to be taken rather as polite expressions of concern than as true indications of what the official attitude of their Governments will be.

Palestine

Although the immediate internal situation in Palestine has depended during the past week to some extent upon the question of Grüner's appeal and the subsequent attitude of the terrorists, it had become increasingly evident that effective co-operation from the Jewish Agency in combating terrorism was not to be expected, and that protection for civilians could not be guaranteed under the conditions of normal civilian life which were obtaining. The High Commissioner decided, therefore, with the approval of His Majesty's Government, to order the evacuation of British women and children and other British civilians, and their removal has already begun. Some protests were received when the announcement was made on the 31st January, but the operation is proceeding satisfactorily, and some sixteen hundred persons are leaving. The majority of them will return to England, but accommodation for some may be found in Transjordan.

After having given way to the persuasion of his lawyer and of the Chief Rabbi and having agreed to appeal against his sentence, Grüner later withdrew his application.

On the 3rd February an ultimatum was addressed to the Jewish Agency by the High Commissioner. The Note, which was signed by the Chief Secretary, referred to the repeated warnings which the Government had given to the Jewish leaders, and the disastrous consequences which the growth of terrorism would have for the Jewish people themselves, as also to the refusal of the Jewish Agency to co-operate with the Government in suppressing it. A categorical statement was demanded immediately saying whether the Jewish Agency and the Vaad Leumi were prepared "within seven days . . . to lend their aid to the Government by co-operating with the police and the armed forces in locating and bringing to justice members of terrorists groups." Without waiting for a meeting of the Jewish Agency Executive Mrs. Meierson, head of the Political Department, in the course of a press conference reported by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, declared that they would refuse to plunge the Yishuv into civil war. The Agency is clearly in a dilemma and may well calculate that the results of such action as the Government may intend in the event of their refusal may, in the long run, be less dangerous than would be an open break with the terrorists.

The Forty-sixth Annual Conference of the Federation of British Zionists is being held in London. On the 2nd February it was addressed by Dr. Weizmann, who is intending to leave very shortly for Palestine. In his speech he referred to the "flagrant contradiction" between the White Paper of 1939 and the Balfour Declaration, and appealed for a restoration of normal relations between the Zionist Organisation and His Majesty's Government, which depended, in his view, on the abolition of the policy of the White Paper. The Conference re-affirmed its conviction that only the establishment of a Jewish State could solve the problem of Palestine, condemned the restriction of immigration, and expressed resentment at the "régime of oppression instituted for the maintenance of this evil policy."

At a meeting of the London Conference on the 30th January Mr. Bevin commented on the Arab plan for a unitary State of Palestine with an Arab majority, and pointed out that the democratic functioning of any State could be wrecked by a minority which is sufficiently strong and sufficiently determined to withhold co-operation. He discussed also the possibility of partition, which, he explained, appeared likely to be acceptable to the Jews, with whom informal conversations were going on. He suggested that a committee of Arab delegates should re-examine the question and see whether they could arrive at an intermediate solution which would be acceptable to both parties. He described the position of His Majesty's Government as Mandatory Power, and explained that for changes in the system of Government in Palestine it would be necessary to seek the approval of the United Nations. Several Arab delegates spoke afterwards, but they shewed little inclination to withdraw their opposition to partition. Eventually the Arab delegates decided to consider the statements made by the United Kingdom delegates, and the meeting adjourned.

Persia

Qawam as Sultaneh, Prime Minister, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Minister of the Interior, has now been in office for just over a year. He has held the Premiership on three previous occasions: from June, 1921, to January, 1922; from June, 1922, to February, 1923; and from August, 1942, to February, 1943. His present term of office is thus his longest, and undoubtedly his most successful. When he succeeded Hakimi at the end of January, 1946, the country was in a sorry plight. Russian troops were firmly entrenched throughout the northern provinces in accordance with the Tripartite Treaty, the Azerbaijan Democrat administration was steadily growing in self-confidence and openly defying the Central Government, the Kurds, clamouring for independence, were in almost complete control of the areas of Rezaieh, Mianduab and Sardasht, while the influence of the Tudeh party was increasing in the other provinces with Soviet support. In Tehran the prevailing note was one of gloom tinged with fear. Courage, never a dominating ingredient in the Persian character, was gradually oozing away, while the confused indecision of Qawam's predecessor, Ibrahim Hakimi, had further weakened morale, which was not restored by Qawam's assumption of office. The general anxiety was shared by the Shah, who, with others, feared the imminence of an armed outbreak in Tehran, Soviet-inspired, to force the fall of Hakimi's Government.

The difference between conditions then and now is most marked, and some credit must certainly go to Qawam for the improved outlook in both home and foreign affairs. The intervening twelve months have witnessed the Security Council discussions, the withdrawal of the Soviet forces, the collapse of Pishavari's Azerbaijan Democrat Government (which turned out, after all, to be nothing but a cardboard façade), the suppression of a tribal rising in Fars with autonomist aims and the partial restoration of Persian authority in Kurdistan. In addition, Qawam has announced a programme of social reform more comprehensive than has ever been attempted before. Foremost among his achievements are the Labour Law and a plan for the distribution of the State lands among the peasantry. Though he is feared and disliked by the Shah—a dislike which was increased by jealousy of his successful handling of the Azerbaijan situation, the country as a whole (apart from the strident Tudeh minority) appears to be well-disposed towards him.

A letter has been sent by Qawam to the British, American, Russian and French Ambassadors, pointing out the necessity for Persian participation in the German Peace Conference, and stressing the losses suffered by Persia during the war. He maintains that the country has a justifiable claim against Germany.

The Officer Commanding in Western Azerbaijan is experiencing considerable difficulty over the collection of arms from the Kurdish tribes. In the Maku district north-west of Julfa, only 300 rifles out of a total of 5,000 have been surrendered. Some thirty Kurdish chieftains have passed through Tabriz on their way to Tehran, whither they have been summoned by the Government. They have stated their willingness to hand over the arms which they captured from the retreating Azerbaijan Democrats, but not those which they had acquired previously by purchase. It appears, however, that most of the arms captured from the Azerbaijan Democrats—about 3,500 rifles were seized in the Mahabad district between the 11th and 15th December—have been sold to the 'Iraqi Kurds.

Throughout the country reasonable calm seems to prevail. Pre-election fervour has died down in most districts owing to the prolonged delay in starting the provincial elections. In Abadan, however, there are under-currents of unrest. Certain ex-members of the Tudeh party are complaining that they have been let down by the party and have had their funds embezzled. They intend to break away from all parties and form an Oil Workers' Union, which will conform with labour laws.

The visit of a number of Soviet scientists to Tehran has been used to stimulate the activity of the Irano-Soviet Cultural Society, which is now to work under the joint presidency of Qawam and the Soviet Ambassador. The twenty-third anniversary of Lenin's death was marked by a special meeting of the Society, attended by members of the Cabinet and other prominent personalities. Amir Alai, Minister of Agriculture, paid tribute to the genius of Lenin, emphasising particularly his efforts in establishing relations with Persia.

THE FAR EAST

China

Following the Communist Party's rejection of General Chiang Kai-shek's proposal to send a representative to Yenan to re-open peace discussions, the Government issued a statement recapitulating the efforts which they had made since 1944 to arrive at a workable peace settlement through negotiations. This review, drafted no doubt in the hope of recapturing waning sympathy in the United States, was studiously moderate in its wording, if naturally one-sided. The Government then made public the four points which they had advanced as a basis for discussion in their recent offer. Briefly these points were :—

1. Willingness on the part of the Government either to send representatives to Yenan, or to invite the Communist delegation in Nanking to resume talks, or to convene a conference of all political party leaders and non-party spokesmen.
2. A cease-fire order, with both parties maintaining their present positions, to be issued by both the Government and the Communist Party who would then discuss effective measures for the cessation of hostilities.
3. Readiness on the part of the Government to resume negotiations for the enforcement of the military reorganisation plan and the restoration of communications, in accordance with the principles of the Committee of Three.
4. Willingness on the part of the Government to work out an equitable plan to solve the existing controversy over the question of regional administration.

Although, nominally, the Government still stands by their invitation to the Communists to seek a settlement through negotiation, it is generally thought that both parties have placed their cards on the table and that civil war will now continue until one side finally collapses as the result of either military reverses or economic difficulties. Indeed, fighting of a more or less intensive nature appears to be in progress on all fronts with varying degrees of fortune. Recent reports from Nanking indicate that Government forces have made some progress in northern Kiangsu and parts of Shantung and they are now engaged in a large-scale drive in an endeavour to capture Lenyi, the Communist head-quarters in the north-west corner of the latter province. Far more serious, however, is the picture painted by competent observers of the gravity of the economic situation. It is feared that China's gold reserves and foreign exchange may be nearing exhaustion and that, whatever last-moment measures are taken to stimulate exports, the crash cannot long be averted—a state of affairs which appears to be realised by Dr. T. V. Soong, but not by General Chiang Kai-shek.

As a natural consequence of the withdrawal of General Marshall from China the U.S. State Department announced on the 29th January, that—> "the United States Government has decided to terminate its connexion with the Committee of Three which was established in Chungking for the purpose of terminating hostilities in China and of which General Marshall was Chairman. The United States Government also has decided to terminate its connexion with Executive Headquarters which was established in Peiping by the Committee of Three for the purpose of supervising in the field the execution of the agreements for the cessation of hostilities and the demobilisation and re-organisation of the armed forces in China.

>
> The American personnel involved in Executive Headquarters will be withdrawn as soon as possible."

The U.S. State Department spokesman told the press that later instructions would be issued concerning the evacuation of the U.S. Marines assigned to safeguard the Executive Headquarters in Peiping; and he declared that this decision does not involve any change in the status of the United States Ambassador to China. A section of the press in the United States has been at some pains to emphasize that the decision also does not imply any fundamental change in United States policy toward China, nor the lessening of American desire to assist the Chinese people to achieve political and economic stability. "The United States is not washing its hands of China, which country it has always recognised as the key to peace in the Far East." It is not clear, however, whether this press comment represents the official viewpoint, and a more definite official pronouncement on the United States attitude of the future towards China is awaited with considerable interest.

Asserting that the obdurate attitude of the Communist Party rendered the functions of the mediatory Committee no longer of any practical value, the Chinese Government have also announced their formal withdrawal from the Committee of Three. The Government announcement contained an expression of deep gratitude to General Marshall and his staff for the great effort that they had made and the hardships endured. Almost simultaneously General Chiang Kai-shek also issued a fresh statement, admitting failure of his peace efforts, reaffirming his desire to broaden the basis of the Government, and appealing to all political leaders to play their part in making possible the early establishment of a constitutional government. This theme was reiterated by the Government-sponsored press; while the Communist spokesman in Nanking stated that the United States withdrawal from the Committee of Three signified an admission of failure not only of United States mediation, but also of United States policy in China. "But," he added, "this does not absolve the United States Government from the responsibility of helping to prolong China's civil war."

The Communists are said confidently to expect that their cause will be championed at the forthcoming Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers. The Nanking Government, on the other hand, are reported to be strongly opposed to any suggestion that the Council of Foreign Ministers should discuss the internal affairs of China; they are also said to be displaying some nervousness lest the Soviet Union should now attempt to mediate in their dispute with the Communist Party, which they maintain "patience and time will settle."

In a debate on China in the House of Lords on the 23rd January, in replying to Lord Lindsay's criticisms on Britain's policy—or alleged lack of policy—in China, the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Jowitt, said that > ". . . . it had been suggested that by supporting American policy in China the [British] Government had been encouraging the perpetuation of the civil war. The Government did not follow blindly the policy of any Government. . . . It was true that in China our general aims happened to be the same as those of the United States. They were to do business, and to conduct relations with a strong, stable Government which could honour its obligations and which was based on a broad democratic basis. Beyond that we had not committed ourselves. We were pledged not to interfere in the internal affairs of China, and we should adhere to this pledge."

The Lord Chancellor also pointed out that the Chinese counter-draft to H.M. Government's draft commercial treaty, which was handed to the Chinese Government in June last year, had only just been received. The Government would do their best to secure satisfactory rights for British merchants, and would also endeavour to see that the process of restoring British properties was speeded up.

This debate aroused considerable concern in China. The Nanking Government's Minister of Information, Mr. Peng Hsueh-pei, usually painstakingly cautious in commenting upon international affairs, sharply criticised Lord Lindsay for being "woefully ignorant of conditions" in China and for suggesting intervention in Chinese internal affairs. Mr. Lee Yun-liang, Secretary-General of the Shanghai Steamship Companies' Guild, in an interview with the Central News, professed alarm that Viscount Jowitt and other members of the House of Lords should have advocated a revival of British shipping rights in Chinese waters. After cautioning the Chinese Government to be on their guard, he expressed concern lest the contemplated new commercial treaty between the two countries should turn out to be a one-sided affair, providing much benefit for Britain, but little in the way of protective measures for the promotion of China's young and growing shipping enterprise.

According to a report of the 28th January issued by the London Office of the Chinese Ministry of Information, the Nanking Government have issued orders that all Allied property in former enemy-occupied areas of China must be returned to their owners before the end of January. The report adds that law courts and other judicial organisations in Shanghai are understood to have been ordered by the Ministry of Justice to act on these instructions.

According to another report from the same source, Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, Minister for Foreign Affairs, in the course of an interview with M. Jacques Meyrier, the French Ambassador to China, officially asserted China's claim to sovereignty over the Paracel Islands. The interview is reported to have taken place as a sequel to recent landings by French troops on one of the Paracels following the occupation by the Chinese of another of the atolls and an announcement by a Government spokesman that the islands had always belonged to China. Of little material value, these islands have a strategic importance, lying as they do off the coast of Indo-China on the sea route from Singapore to Hongkong.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The first act of the State Department since General Marshall entered office has been to issue a statement condemning the recent elections in Poland. In that statement, which was handed to the press on the 28th January, the State Department accused the Warsaw Government of "widespread measures of coercion and intimidation against democratic elements" and of breaking the "solemn pledges" given at Yalta and Potsdam. It said that reports received from American officials in Poland both before and after the elections had confirmed the fears repeatedly expressed by the United States Government in its Notes to Warsaw that those elections would not be free.

This sharp condemnation of the practices indulged in by the Polish Provisional Government during the elections has been warmly welcomed in the United States. Nevertheless, while admitting that it is a step in the right direction, some observers are inclined to believe that it does not go far enough. Mr. Sumner Welles, among others, has been quick to emphasize that what the State Department does now with regard to Poland may profoundly affect the future of Europe and of the United States itself. He insists that it is a question whether the United States can hope to retain the confidence of the smaller countries and to continue to exercise a constructive influence in the regulation of international problems if it permits undertakings like those entered into at Yalta and Potsdam to be renounced with impunity. Mr. Welles therefore suggests that the Polish question be submitted to the next General Assembly of the United Nations. The same course is being urged by Mr. Charles Rozmarek, the President of the Polish-American Congress, and by the numerous Polish-American groups which he represents.

Some Republican Senators are also pressing for a "showdown" with the Soviet Union over Poland. In a speech in the Upper House on the 29th January, Senator Vandenberg stated that he did not see how there could be any thought of resting the case upon the "mere filing of an unpursued indictment, when the indictment charges basic violations of the very fundamentals of the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations Charter." He thought that the situation demanded "frank and immediate consultations" between Great Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union as the authors of the Yalta and Potsdam guarantees on Poland. The State Department, however, is not inclined to propose such consultations, as it feels that no useful purpose could be served by discussing the Polish question with Moscow at this juncture. Mr. Arthur Lane is being recalled from Warsaw "for consultations" at his own request, but it seems certain that a new Ambassador will be sent out to replace him.

General Marshall's decision to withdraw from the Chungking Committee of Three has given rise to some discussion and speculation in the press regarding the next step to be taken in China. Most newspapers emphasize that the decision does not imply any fundamental change in U.S. aims in China or any diminution of the desire to help the Chinese people to achieve political and economic stability. A somewhat sceptical view of the future is taken by the New York Herald-Tribune, which has reached the conclusion that "the bald truth about American policy in China is that there is no completely satisfactory course to be followed." It therefore feels that General Marshall's idea of withholding large-scale assistance from the Chinese Government until the latter puts its house in order—"meanwhile making it clear that such assistance will be forthcoming under reasonable conditions"—is likely to prove as fruitful as any. It is perhaps hardly surprising that the decision to withdraw from the Committee of Three has been most cordially endorsed by the Left, while the Right—led in this instance by the New York World-Telegram—continues to insist that the American marines be kept in China until the Russians have evacuated Manchuria. Outspoken criticisms of United States policy in China were made on the 31st January in a statement on foreign affairs issued by the Republican Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator Styles Bridges. Senator Bridges insisted that the United States could hardly remain indifferent to the fact that the Soviet Union had, in violation of its promises, treated China like a conquered country. The United States, he said, "had an opportunity in China that was also a duty"—which, as he obviously saw it, meant giving unqualified support to the Nanking Government against the Chinese Communists.

On other aspects of United States policy there has recently been a marked hardening of opinion in the Republican camp. The hearings of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee of Congress on President Truman's appointments to the Atomic Control Commission have been notable so far for the misgivings which they have elicited from Republican Senators and Congressmen regarding the wisdom of passing on atomic information to other nations. On the 30th January, Senator John W. Bricker stated quite flatly that he saw no reason why the United States should ever share with other Powers the secret of how to make the atomic bomb. Mr. Warren Austin—himself a Republican Senator for fifteen years—also felt it necessary to remind the press, after his conferences with General Marshall and the President on the 27th and 28th January, that the Senate could never be expected to agree to any disarmament treaty involving the atomic bomb or other weapons until it was confident that an effective system of collective security had been created.

That disarmament is in any case still largely an academic question in the minds of many American observers is clear from the sympathetic interest which continues to be shown in the efforts of the War and Navy Departments to strengthen the outer defences of the American continent. In its issue of the 27th January the magazine Time reported that "Washington military men" had been toying with the idea of acquiring Greenland by purchase so that the "fortress of North America" might be provided with the same sort of "castellated outpost" in the North-East as it had already been given in Alaska in the North-West. A similar scheme was reported in the New York Herald-Tribune on the 29th in an article quoting the Danish newspaper Ekstrabladet. This hinted that the future of Greenland had been discussed between Mr. Byrnes and the Danish Foreign Minister in New York last autumn. The State Department, however, emphatically denies that any overtures have been made to the Danes, although it admits that the situation with regard to Greenland may have to be clarified at an early date if the Soviet demand for a Spitsbergen base necessitates a general exchange of views among the interested Powers.

At home one of the highlights of the week has been the announcement by President Truman at his press conference on the 1st February of an agreement between the building industry and nineteen unions of the A.F. of L. to settle labour disputes through voluntary arbitration and without recourse to strikes and lock-outs. This agreement, following as it does the recent decision of the C.I.O. Steel Workers to extend their contract with the U.S. Steel Corporation, is likely to take the wind out of the sails of those Congressmen who have been clamouring for restrictive labour legislation. On the 28th January the Secretary of Labour, Mr. Lewis B. Schwellenbach, appeared in person before the Senate Committee on Labour and Welfare to state his views on a number of bills that are being sponsored by the Republican leaders. He did not mince his words when he came to deal with Senator Ball's much-discussed bill to outlaw the "closed shop." He said that, if Congress wanted to foment industrial unrest, it could not choose a better instrument. He also opposed the establishment of a Federal Mediation Board (a project which is at present dear to the hearts of Senators Ball, Taft and Smith) on the ground that it would delay, rather than expedite, the settlement of industrial disputes.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

H.M. Ambassador saw President Perón on the 27th January about the purchase of the British Railways in Argentina, and negotiations continue with reasonable chances of success.

Bolivia

Disorders took place in Potosí towards the end of January, when the tin miners tried to oust the local authorities. They were frustrated by the townsfolk who demanded arms and drove out the rebels, at a cost of some twenty killed and sixty wounded, and considerable damage to a tin mine of the Hochschild group. The speedy suppression of the uprising is generally regarded as showing what little support is enjoyed by the M.N.R., who fomented it.

Order is now complete throughout Bolivia, and an excellent impression has been caused by a manifesto issued by the chief opposing candidates in the recent Presidential elections, calling on their supporters to sink party interests and work for the good of the country.

Brazil

The general trend of voting in the Brazilian state elections has been to increase the strength of the Liberal opposition (U.D.N.) and—though more locally—that of the Communists. Ex-President Vargas' Labour party proved to be weaker than was expected, and President Dutra's P.S.D. has made a very poor showing. Owing to the tangle of alliances contracted from state to state, the political map of Brazil will be rather variously coloured, though the tinge of red is noticeable. In Rio de Janeiro partial results for the Municipal Council give the Communists 65,000 votes, the U.D.N. 53,000, the (Vargas) Labour Party (P.T.B.) 52,800, the Democratic Labour Alliance 35,900 and the Republican Party 30,900. This gives the Communists 7 of the first 26 seats on the Municipal Council, which has 50 seats altogether. The important Governorship of São Paulo goes to Sr. Ademar Barros, who was elected largely by Communist support.

According to broadcast reports the P.S.D. leader, Sr. Nereu Ramos, who is Vice-President, has proposed the formation of a new party to combat Communism; and Dr. Otávio Mangabeira, the U.D.N. leader, has declared his opposition to such a plan. Communist leaders, on their side, appear to have demanded the formation of a "national" Government. The Communist gains will make it difficult for President Dutra to proceed with schemes for abolishing the Communist Party, and his outspoken anti-Communist statements, coupled with the dwindling of his P.S.D. supporters and of his personal prestige, are likely to place him in an awkward situation.

Chile

There have been a number of cases of acts of violence by Communists, usually with the purpose of intimidating non-Communist workers. In a recent incident in Congress Communists are reported to have thrown missiles at an Agrarian speaker. It appears that President González Videla's confidence in his power to keep the Communists in order and gradually slough them off was exaggerated. Strikes, which are endemic in Chile, continue, and some 27,000 men are now stated to be out.

Mexico

President Alemán has now completed the first three months of his term. During this period he appears to have established his ascendancy over most of the forces that elected him—unlike President Avila Camacho, who was always in the hands of the Mexican Revolutionary Party (now the P.R.I.) and of Sr. Lombardo Toledano and his labour organization.

Disturbances are reported from Tapachula in Chiapas. On 31st December the townspeople organized demonstrations to protest against the allegedly corrupt election of a new mayor. Although the crowd was unarmed and unprovocative, police opened fire with machine-guns, and 13 persons were killed and many more badly injured. The massacre recalls that which occurred for similar reasons at León (Guanajuato) a year before, except that in the Chiapas case the official party (P.R.I.) was not involved, and federal troops stood aside, their commandant being on unauthorized leave in Mexico City.

Venezuela

Rumours of a possible rising by supporters of ex-President López Contreras, or even of a landing on the Venezuelan coast, have caused much apprehension in Caracas. According to broadcast reports, an Acción Democrática deputy declared that a plot was afoot to murder Government leaders, and a Communist deputy stated that an invasion was planned from the Dominican Republic. Other broadcast reports add that General López Contreras declared in an interview in Miami that an insurrection "might have started," though he denied any "intensive invasion." Should such an attempt occur, there would be a danger of bitter strife: the gulf between the present Left Government and the parties of the Right is a deep one, discipline in the army is unsatisfactory, and there would be every prospect of armed resistance on the part of the populace, at least of central Venezuela, in the face of an insurrection.

UNITED NATIONS

Economic and Social Council

Human Rights Commission

No part of the Economic and Social Council contains more explosive material than the Commission on Human Rights. M. Laugier, Assistant Secretary-General for Social Affairs, himself once president of the International League for the Rights of Man, opened its sessions on the 27th January by citing the recent decision of the Assembly on India's complaint about the treatment of Indians in S. Africa as proof that no violation of human rights could be covered up by the principle of national sovereignty: and he went on to say that the Charter's insistence on human rights and freedoms had given to individuals and to groups inside nations a conviction that they had the right to appeal to the United Nations. The Slav group had been active champions of the Indian case which is now held to have set limits to the State's rights over its own citizens.

None the less, a member of the Slav group, Dr. Ribnikar of Yugoslavia, told the Commission, in orthodox marxist language, the mistakes of what he called bourgeois individualist philosophy of the XIXth century, declaring that in the modern world the right of the State was more important than the right of the individual, and that real individual liberty could only be reached through complete harmony between the individual and the collectivity. Dr. Malik (Lebanon) showed how the Totalitarian State and excess of Industrialisation alike threatened individual rights; and the Indian representative, realising the conflicting claims of State and individual, wished the International Bill of Rights to include "Access to the United Nations without risk of reprisal." Thus, in the first meeting of its first session, the Commission on Human Rights grappled with the fundamental problem—has man rights as man? Has he only such rights as the "collectivity" allows him? Are there standards of value higher and more enduring than those set by the State? If there are "human rights," who shall enforce them?

The Commission elected Mrs. Roosevelt chairman, Dr. P. C. Chang (China) vice-chairman and Dr. Malik (Lebanon) rapporteur. After agreeing upon a method of dealing with the vast amount of appeals, complaints and suggestions that it has been receiving (and will no doubt continue to receive), the Commission set up a sub-Committee consisting of the Delegates of the U.K., U.S., U.S.S.R., Lebanon, Philippines, China and Australia to consider the terms of reference and the composition of the sub-Commission on Freedom of Information; and the sub-Committee later recommended terms slightly more flexible than those suggested in para. 6 B of the Economic and Social Council's Resolution of the 21st June, 1946.

It will be remembered that the Russians, with an obvious eye to political strategy, had pushed through the Economic and Social Council, without the courtesy of prior notice of their proposal, authorization for the establishment of sub-Commissions on the Protection of Minorities and on the Prevention of Discrimination. The Commission on Human Rights decided to make one sub-Commission of these two. Much mischief may come out of this sub-Commission, if its scope is not carefully defined, and the U.K. representative is likely to concentrate on the practical task of preventing it overlapping with the work of other Commissions or the Trusteeship Council, or its members growing indignant over "grievances," before the Human Rights Commission has decided what Minorities, Discrimination, and Human Rights are.

Discussion on the proposed International Bill of Rights began on the 31st January, and centred on the question what body should make the first draft to be submitted to the Assembly. The U.S. held that the Commission should appoint a drafting committee to embody the results of its several discussions in a draft Bill to be considered by the Commission at its next session, probably in June, and then to be handed to the Assembly in the form of a draft resolution. After an interchange of views, a majority inclined to the opinion that the Secretariat should be given the task of preparing the first draft. The delegate of the U.S.S.R., however, contended that the Commission itself should first decide what rights the draft ought to contain. At the close of the 31st January meeting, opinions had not become sufficiently definite to enable a decision to be taken. H.M.G. in the United Kingdom are convinced that an International Bill of Rights is of such concern to all men that the world would not grudge two years being spent in the attempt to define matters of eternal moment: that the Secretariat have neither the duty nor the ability to prepare a draft, and that the Governments of the United Nations must be allowed time to put their own experience at the disposal of the Commission, since the human rights are meant to be enjoyed on earth, even though they are part of the eternal values.

Social Commission

The work of this Commission has suffered from the slowness of the Secretariat in producing documents, the inexperience of many of its members, and the wholesale interruption and distortion of its work by political considerations constantly forced on it largely through the French Delegation or the strong French element in the Secretariat. Its programme has been wide: the transfer of League of Nations functions in the social field—traffic in women, obscene publications, &c.—and of the advisory welfare activities of UNRRA. Its attitude to the subject of the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders was entirely political and in no way objective. The Economic and Social Council had resolved on the 21st June that the Commission should undertake a study of international action, existing and required, in consultation with I.L.O. and the International Penal and Penetentiary Commission. At first the Commission decided to ask the Secretariat to undertake this study with I.L.O. and I.P.P.C. It also agreed to a U.S. suggestion to ask the Chairman of I.P.P.C. (Mr. Bates) to speak to its members. Then French members pointed out with extreme indignation that Franco's Government belonged to the I.P.P.C., and had even paid its subscription recently. Mr. Bates, they said, should not be invited. The Soviet and Polish Delegations heartily concurred. The U.K. representative pleaded for a scientific as against an emotional approach to the problem, and declared himself ready to hear anyone who could contribute to the prevention of crime, provided the Assembly's resolution were not transgressed, and the resolution did not exclude consultation with I.P.P.C. Then, when the great majority favoured a resolution not to hear Mr. Bates, and (in view of the Assembly resolution on Spain), not to consult the I.P.P.C., the U.K. and the U.S. gave up their opposition.

On the 30th January the Commission decided to set up a Committee on child welfare which should consider the possibility of establishing a sub-Commission on Child Welfare. The French representative wished such a sub-Commission to be created, the U.K. contended that the Economic and Social Council's request for such a sub-Commission had been made out of date by the creation of the International Children's Fund and the transfer of UNRRA welfare functions to the Secretary General, and hoped that the new Committee would perform the necessary liaison duties.

At the same meeting, the Commission passed a resolution on relations with non-governmental Agencies, which, on the face of it, contradicted the equal status which all Agencies in Category A should enjoy. The relevant passage is as follows:—

> The Commission . . . . has decided to give these organisations all the facilities necessary for full consultation and in particular to invite the representatives of those placed in Category A to all the meetings and also to the meetings of its Committees and sub-Commissions. In particular the Commission desires to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with the W.F.T.U., which groups 71 million workers in 56 countries, and is the most authentic representative body of the workers of the whole world."

The resolution, which as the U.K. representative showed, is at variance with the Assembly's resolution on the equal treatment of Category A organisations, was passed by 10 votes to 3 (China, U.S. and Netherlands). In the absence through illness of the regular U.K. representative the present U.K. representative only ranked as an alternate and had no right to vote.

EUROPE

GERMANY

The Foreign Ministers' Deputies for Germany have continued to hear the views of interested Governments (see also under "Low Countries," "Scandinavia"). The New Zealand delegate, Mr. Jordan, presented the views of his Government on the 4th February. The New Zealand Government favours federation for Germany. Inter alia Mr. Jordan emphasised the need, in the interests of security, for a settlement which the signatory Powers would be determined to uphold and which should command a sufficient degree of acquiescence on the part of the German people to eliminate the need for a disproportionate effort of constraint. While it was doubtful whether this latter condition would be fulfilled in the event of territory being detached from Germany, such detachment was, he suggested, the lesser evil if the only alternative was to allow Germany to resume her course of aggression.

Marshal Sokolowsky, having violated quadripartite procedure, has called forth a deliberate and frank expression of H.M. Government's disapproval. This was delivered by General Robertson in the Co-ordinating Committee on the 5th February and the gist of the statement was communicated to the press. A tense meeting preceded the reproof. Members of the Committee were unable to reach any agreement on the principles of vetoing appointments to the Berlin Magistrat. General Robertson then asked General Kurochkin for his report on the premature release to the press of Marshal Sokolowsky's statement to the Control Council (see last week's Summary).

While it was doubtful whether this latter condition would be fulfilled in the event of territory being detached from Germany, such detachment was, he suggested, the lesser evil if the only alternative was to allow Germany to resume her course of aggression.

Marshal Sokolowsky, having violated quadripartite procedure, has called forth a deliberate and frank expression of H.M. Government's disapproval. This was delivered by General Robertson in the Co-ordinating Committee on the 5th February and the gist of the statement was communicated to the press. A tense meeting preceded the reproof. Members of the Committee were unable to reach any agreement on the principles of vetoing appointments to the Berlin Magistrat. General Robertson then asked General Kurochkin for his report on the premature release to the press of Marshal Sokolowsky's statement to the Control Council (see last week's Summary).

General Kurochkin said that as there was now no censorship of the press before publication, he could not prevent the appearance of some item which was drawn from the foreign press (actually from that of the Soviet Union), but that he had at once stopped further publication and reprimanded the editor. After some further passages of arms in which allusion was made to attacks on Soviet policy by the West German press, General Kurochkin said that the Soviet Delegation had no intention of involving themselves in quarrels with their Allies on account of these articles. He appeared earnestly to hope for better relations and to be exceedingly embarrassed by a campaign evidently directed by remote control from Moscow. General Robertson said that the appearance of the article was certainly not just an accident and he must therefore conclude that the Soviet Delegation was making use of these disagreements to enlist the sympathy of the German public. This was only one of a series of incidents. Day by day articles in the German press attacked the administration of the American and British Zones, although he was sure that they "are not spontaneous expressions of German opinion." His Majesty's Government desired to co-operate in achieving an early, just and practicable Peace Settlement, but, said General Robertson, "we shall not be bludgeoned into accepting the ideas of others by any campaign of vilification. The very idea that any one of us should seek to engage the support of the Germans in an attack on an Ally is not only most offensive to us but is, in our opinion, highly dangerous to the future peace of the world. . . . Those who are attacked must be free to defend themselves. In so far as we are compelled to do this, the responsibility lies with those who began it."

After lengthy consultation a decartelisation ordinance for the British Zone was ready for promulgation on the 11th February. A law on similar lines is being issued for the U.S. Zone. The British ordinance prohibts Germans from taking part in international or domestic cartels and forbids the combination of interests in restraint of trade. Enterprises employing more than 10,000 persons will be examined as prima facie excessive concentrations of economic power. Exemption will be granted to undertakings which are required to further Military Government policy as well as the enterprises under Military Government control, except that the controlling authorities may be required to submit reports of their activity. This avoids interference in plans for the socialisation of basic industries. Promulgation of the ordinances on a zonal basis was necessary because of lack of Four-Power agreement. In previous months some misapprehension had been caused in United States circles by His Majesty's Government's apparent hesitation in agreeing to a law for the de-concentration of economic power. This was not due to disagreement over the object of such a law, but H.M. Government were anxious to avoid hindering economic revival by more reorganization than was necessary, while regarding socialisation as an important step for removing economic power from potentially dangerous hands.

The cold weather returned to Germany at the end of January, bringing inevitable hardships and dislocation of economic activity to all parts of the country, particularly to Berlin and other large cities. In Hamburg, for example, there were 37 deaths from frostbite between the 1st and 24th January, and 21 deaths from the same cause in Schleswig-Holstein. Over 200,000 people in Hamburg are living in temporary shelters, ranging from Nissen huts to cellars. During the past fortnight the dislocation of food supplies has led to sporadic strikes in several Ruhr mines. Daily output of coal in the British zone, however, rose steadily during January, reaching 221,421 tons on the 24th. To obtain the target of 400,000 tons daily, General Robertson has said that 2,000 more miners a week have to be recruited. Present recruitment is at the rate of 1,000 a week. This is a great improvement (largely due to better welfare provisions) when it is remembered that last autumn hundreds of miners left the pits each week.

A new Ordinance was issued in the British Zone on the 6th February which gives instructions for the trial of war criminals, the disposal of persons now in internment camps and the procedure by which German panels will classify those still at large. The Ordinance is based on the Control Council Directive which divided persons into five categories according to their degree of guilt. Of the 34,000 Germans already interned in the zone, 20,000 have been provisionally placed in the first category as war criminals, the great majority of them because they were members of criminal organisations. These members will be tried by German courts, not by ordinary denazification tribunals, so that this shall be neither a political affair nor a matter of revenge. In this category, only those will be punished who remained in a criminal organization after the 1st September, 1939, because the Nuremberg judgement was based on the activities of these organizations during the war. This does not, of course, preclude lesser sentences for other members.

The imminence of the Moscow conference has led to a tightening up of purge proceedings in the Soviet Zone—which, incidentally, reveals the unsatisfactory state of denazification in several fields. Commissions working on the lines of Control Council directives have been set up since the 1st January, 1947, and standards appear to be considerably stricter than before (see Summary No. 361). The three parties and the FDGB are represented on the Commissions but are not competent to rehabilitate former Nazi Party members and all previous certificates permitting continued employment are declared invalid. On the 30th January the Minister of the Interior for Saxony was reported as stating that National Socialists, militarists and reactionaries had penetrated the administration "in substantial numbers." In Thuringia new political purges among the teachers are foreshadowed, and a Liberal Democrat member of the Diet stated on the 28th January that 20 per cent. of the new teachers were to be dismissed. The Minister of education admitted that 50 per cent. of new teachers in secondary schools recruited under an emergency scheme since January 1946 had been Party members. These revelations do not check the flow of abuse against the Western zones particularly against the power alleged to be retained by industrialists. In fairness it should be recalled that the power of the industrialists has probably been broken most thoroughly in the Soviet Zone by ruthless measures of expropriation.

The political and economic situation in the U.S. Zone, if less marked by disaffection and despair than that of the British Zone, is characterised by an atmosphere of unreality and backstairs intrigue which would be reminiscent of musical comedy, were it not such a lamentable forecast of future difficulties. Bavaria appears the most extreme example. While American figures show an increase in industrial production the economic standards of the town populations were still falling in mid-January and fears have been expressed by responsible observers, that an economic collapse is in store. The reasons would be lack of coal, of raw materials, of adequate planning and of food, the latter shortage being aggravated through hoarding by Bavarian peasants. While rapid devolution of authority by Americans has not exactly helped planning, it also appears that in the economic sphere the remaining Occupation staff frequently lack technical knowledge and that corruption is widespread. Economic activity is often conditional on "protection" from the appropriate U.S. official—a protection which sometimes extends to Nazis. German morale is further lowered by evictions in many towns in order to make room for the families of U.S. staff (a problem, of course, facing every occupying Power). The Bavarian Government itself grew out of inter-Party intrigue which resulted in a coalition of the right wing of the Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats against the left wing of the Christian Democrats. These uneasy stable companions are unlikely to remain together long or to benefit the State to any great extent.

Above all, however, the situation with regard to denazification in Bavaria—as also, to a slightly lesser extent in Wuerttemberg-Baden and Hesse—continues to be deplorable. General Clay has decided not to implement his warning of last November that U.S. Military Government might have to resume control of denazification unless there was an improvement within 60 days. Since then activity has certainly been greater, but distinctly haphazard. Well-known Nazis in Bavaria still retain their posts, largely because of rule-of-thumb laws. It was only recently that thirty professors were removed from Munich university and a second purge in Erlangen university during January resulted in Military Government depriving 76 members of the staff of working permits. With the purge tribunals in German hands the way is open for denunciation and intrigue. While there are plenty of people ready to cry "how now!—a Rat?" and to pursue ruthlessly the petty offender, they are often afraid to touch the real villains of the piece. In Wuerttemberg-Baden, for example, the Premier after holding office since 1945, was recently charged with having supported the Nazis by favouring the Enabling Act of 1933. (This he did, but there is no sign that he was an active Nazi.) In turn, however, the Minister of Denazification has dismissed the Public Prosecutor who brought the indictment saying that he had exceeded his rights. The same Minister, seeking to court popularity, has blamed U.S. Military Government for "interfering" in denazification.

On the 30th January Hans Fritzsche, former Nazi radio chief, acquitted by the International Military Tribunal, was sentenced by a German purge court in Nuremberg to 9 years' hard labour. Strikes were called in protest against the third bomb incident in the U.S. Zone which occurred on the 3rd February outside the office of the Nuremberg Public Prosecutor, who is now trying Franz Papen.

AUSTRIA

The Deputies in London have made fairly good progress during the past week in the discussion of the political clauses of the Austrian Treaty, and have now sent the last of these to the Political Sub-Committee for drafting. On the 3rd February it was generally agreed that the existing Austrian Nationality Law should be taken as a basis for consideration; clauses which would safeguard the position of Austrians who have acquired another nationality since the Anschluss, while invalidating and preventing the naturalisation of undesirable Germans since 1933 and in the future, are to be considered by the Sub-Committee. The Treaty is also to contain articles on human rights, the basis of democratic government, and the prohibition of anti-democratic organisations.

On the 3rd and 4th February the Deputies were unable to reach any conclusion on the clauses relating to war criminals. M. Gusev maintained that the article should be similar to that in the satellite treaties, which provide simply for the handing over of those accused of war crimes. The view of the United States representative, supported by the British Deputy, was that applications for the surrender of war criminals must be made—within ninety days after the Treaty comes into force—to the four Allied representatives in Vienna, and must be supported by evidence satisfactory to all four Allies. M. Gusev insisted that, although Austria has been under Allied control for eighteen months, there had been no greater vigilance on this matter than in Roumania and Bulgaria. It was finally agreed to ask the Allied Council in Vienna for a report on the progress which has been made in regard to the surrender and trial of war criminals.

On the 5th February the Deputies heard Mr. Jordan, the New Zealand High Commissioner, give his Government's view that Austria must be made to pay just penalties for her share in the war. At the same time, he said, Austria must be re-established as an independent State within her pre-Anschluss boundaries. Careful examination would have to be given to Austria's economic rehabilitation, and to whether her need for development within a larger economic framework would be met by the Economic Commission for Europe, the establishment of which was to be studied by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Members of the Austrian delegation were then questioned. M. Gusev asked Dr. Gruber about denazification measures, particularly about the 536,000 Fascists who, he said, were in Austria at the end of the war, and the 98,000 members of the Nazi party who were there before the Anschluss. Dr. Gruber said that 68,000 cases had come under the denazification and war criminal laws, of which 26,000 had been before the courts. 2,307 sentences had been passed, including 30 death sentences. About 135,000 people, including 66,000 Civil Servants, had been removed from their posts. In reply to a further question from M. Gusev about displaced persons in Austria, Dr. Gruber said that Austria, while ready to grant Austrian nationality to a limited number of "politically certified" displaced persons, wished to be rid of the bulk of them.

On the 6th February there was a lengthy wrangle on the procedure for dealing with the Yugoslav and Czech territorial claims. It was decided that the Deputies would hear again both the Yugoslav and Austrian representatives at a joint session, and that they should then decide whether an expert committee would be useful or whether the Deputies would immediately consider the question themselves. The Czech and Austrian Governments are to be encouraged to settle the Czech request for the sale by Austria of a small, but strategically and economically important area on the Danube near Bratislava between themselves.

Another clause passed to the Sub-Committee on the 6th February provides that the diplomatic representatives of the four Powers in Vienna should, for a period of not more than eighteen months, represent the Allied and Associated Powers in dealing with the Austrian Government on matters of interpretation of the Treaty. This is parallel to the clause in the Italian Treaty providing for a Council of Ambassadors in Rome.

On the 8th the Deputies reached agreement in principle on the clauses dealing with the cessation of the Allied Council when the Treaty came into force, and the withdrawal of the occupying armies within ninety days from that date.

In Vienna, the Executive Committee and the Allied Council have had lengthy discussions on the replies to the questions from the Council of Deputies (see last week's Summary). Although the Soviet member of the Allied Council on the 7th February tended to emphasise Austria's part in the German war machine, the danger of the presence of large numbers of displaced persons, and such like familiar arguments, there was on the whole a genuine attempt by all to reach agreement, and a considerable measure was in fact achieved. The main report contains paragraphs unanimously agreed, while a part called "Special Opinions" contains paragraphs on which unanimity could not be reached.

The Austrian Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor are back in Vienna, where they reported favourably to the Cabinet on the progress of the Treaty talks on the 5th February. Dr. Schaerf said that there had been absolute agreement among the Austrian delegates. The Socialist Minister of the Interior, Herr Helmer, thanked the Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and the Austrian delegation on behalf of the Government and country for their excellent work in London. The Foreign Minister, Dr. Gruber, intends to remain in London until the end of the Deputies' discussions. He has now been joined by Dr. Krauland, the Minister for Economic Planning and Property Control.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The conflict between eastern and western conceptions of democracy continues to be fought out upon Czechoslovak soil in a series of encounters which, in contrast with what goes on in neighbouring lands, appear tempered with restraint. This moderation is rooted in the comparatively enlightened, if corrupt and despotic, benevolence of the latter-day Austro-Hungarian Empire, and derives, in more recent times, from the broadly-based democratic tolerance of the Masaryk Constitution. At present its continuance depends upon the skilful work of compromise being performed by the President and his closest collaborators, who were largely responsible for saving Czechoslovakia from a period of post-war internecine strife by bringing back into public life the most reputable statesmen from both east and west. This hard task has been taking a heavy toll upon the President's health, although from all accounts he persists in giving himself no quarter.

It is difficult to foretell the exact result of the present conflict. While there is reasonable hope that, in the case of Czechoslovakia a workable synthesis may be the outcome, it cannot be denied that events in adjacent countries are bound to have some effect, the Soviet Union will, in any case, continue to be the most significant external factor in Czechoslovak life.

The various Government bills which have recently been under consideration give point to the foregoing remarks. M. Nosek, Communist Minister of the Interior, speaking in Brno on the 6th February at a conference of local government representatives, referred once again to his plans for reducing the number of civil servants. It is clear that he is not aiming merely at a redistribution of man-power, but at making the Civil Service dependent upon the goodwill of his own Ministry by altering the established status of the officials. Another measure, the new Police Bill, aims at unifying the police into one centralised force, the S.N.B., and placing it directly under the Minister of the Interior. In this way M. Nosek seeks to deny the right of municipalities to exert police control, a right formerly recognised by the Government. If these two bills are passed in the form originally proposed by M. Nosek, the Communists will have two deadly weapons with which to reinforce their position—a subservient Civil Service and a party police force.

Two other bills, which appear fraught with similar possibilities, are the Military Service Bill, which would, among other things, extend the scope of politico-military education in the schools thus preparing the ground for the Army Education Officer (almost inevitably a Communist), and the Bill for the Protection of the Two Year Plan, which would give the Government the power to punish anyone obstructing the widely ramified economic schemes. All these bills have legitimate purposes in a country endeavouring to extricate itself from the morass of complex social, economic and political problems of Central Europe to-day; but the non-Communists are well aware of the danger threatening democratic institutions and personal liberty, should the Communists once possess the legal and physical weapons with which to enforce their will.

So far the Communist Ministers have been obliged to compromise, and draft regulations affecting the freedom of the press and the control of the police, for example, have been much modified and frequently referred back as the result of the criticisms made by all the other parties. An example of how jealously the National Assembly has been guarding its authority is the case of the Minister of Agriculture, M. D'urfš (Slovak Communist) who has been severely criticised—especially by the Social Democrats, it is interesting to note—for his unconstitutional action in submitting certain draft bills to local farmers for consideration before the Agricultural Committee of Parliament had seen them. There are signs that the National Front is embarking upon a critical period, as the fundamental problem of the new Constitution, and the 1948 elections, loom ever larger upon the horizon. Small disputes, such as the lightning strike of Czech workers in the Sudetenland factories at Cheb against proposed transference of the plant to Slovakia, are beginning to assume new significance as each party faces a trial of strength.

According to a wireless broadcast from Prague, the Government intend to contest the UNRRA decision to make cuts in the allocations to Czechoslovakia. The decision was based on the consideration that the Czechs had rather overstated their case, and that the country had made a more rapid recovery than other claimants. The Government assert, however, that particularly since the State Department opposed the Czechoslovak loan application, they are not in a position to pay for needed supplies in the free market. It is suggested that counter-proposals, including the allocation of Czech home supplies to Yugoslavia, will be lodged by the Czechoslovak Government at UNRRA Headquarters.

POLAND

The first session of the Polish Parliament, composed of 444 deputies, took place on the 4th February. No representatives of Great Britain or the United States were present. The only candidate to the Presidency of the Republic, M. Bierut, was re-elected for a term of seven years by 408 votes out of 433, M. Mikolajczyk and his party having opposed the Bill to elect a President.

In a courageous speech M. Mikolajczyk said that he had already filed a protest against the elections of the 19th January, and his party was unwilling to grant to the Parliament formed as a result of them, the prerogatives to deal with the essential principles necessary for the building of a democratic state. He did, however, promise his support for any measures which Parliament might take for the country's reconstruction and the nation's welfare and independence. The passage of the Bill was also marked by a debate on whether the words "so help me God" should be introduced at the end of the President's oath. It was agreed that this should be so, strangely enough with the support of the Communists, and with the Socialists abstaining.

President Bierut said that the two important projects to be laid before Parliament were the Amnesty Bill, and the drawing up of the new Constitution. The aim of the former is to influence the "tens of thousands of Poles who are still abroad to return home, where work for reconstruction is in full swing." The function of the latter, according to Glos Ludu, the Communist paper, is, as an interim constitution, to establish a legal basis for relations between the President, Parliament and Government. A later Constitution will deal with fundamental structural problems.

On the eve of the first session of the new Parliament, meetings were held by the Parliamentary Groups of all the parties represented in it. These are: the four "Bloc" Parties of the Communists, Socialists, Peasants and Democrats, together with the Polish Peasant Party of M. Mikolajczyk (P.S.L.), the Catholic Work Party, the Polish Peasant Party "New Liberation," and the Independents. The last consist chiefly of "splinter" Catholic groups. The Opposition in the new Parliament is represented by the 27 members of M. Mikolajczyk's Peasant Party (P.S.L.) and the veteran right wing socialist Zygmunt Zulawski, who, having seceded from the official Socialist Party (P.P.S.) contested the elections as an independent socialist. After the formal resignation of the provisional Government, President Bierut, with the consent of the Parliamentary Groups entrusted the formation of a new government to Jozef Cyrankiewicz, Secretary-General of the Socialist Party, who thus succeeds his party colleague M. Osubka-Morawski, as Prime Minister. M. Cyrankiewicz, who is about 35 years old, was the Secretary of the Socialist Party in the Krakow province from 1937 till 1939. Under the German occupation, he was one of the leaders of the new left wing Polish Workers' Socialist Party, which united with the traditional party in 1943. In that year M. Cyrankiewicz was sent to the German concentration camp at Oswiecim (Ausschwitz), being freed by the Russians in 1945. He became one of the chief figures in the Polish Socialist party as re-created at Lublin. Despite this he is usually credited with a fundamental Western outlook, and feelings of genuine friendship towards Great Britain. As a politician, he has shown great energy, and is reported to be one of those most opposed to the Socialists being mere tools of the Communists.

M. Cyrankiewicz's new Cabinet consists of 23 Ministers, with the following distribution of seats: Socialists 7, Communists 5, "Bloc" Peasant Party (SL) 6, Democrats 3, Catholic Work Party (SP) 2. Besides the Premiership the Socialists hold the Ministries of Finance, Justice, Labour and Social Welfare, Reconstruction, Foreign Trade and Shipping, and Public Administration. The Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Education, Public Security, Industry and Regained Territories go to the Communists, who thus have a good chance of maintaining their control over the country. Although the Socialists have the most ministries, it must be remembered that the S.L. with a representation far beyond their actual strength in the country, have shown a marked tendency to ally themselves closely with the Communists ever since their re-formation in 1945. If they are to make an attempt to win the confidence of the peasants, still enjoyed entirely by the P.S.L. they can only succeed by adopting an attitude of moderation more in keeping with the outlook of the peasant population, though there has been very little in their past record to support such a consideration. Moreover the Communists, besides retaining the key posts of the Ministries of Public Security and Industry, have also secured those of Foreign Affairs and Education, with the very energetic M. Gomulka remaining Vice-Premier and still in charge of the Regained Territories. The new Foreign Minister is Zygmunt Modzelewski who, as the previous very competent Vice-Minister, exercised most of the real power behind the back of the "Democrat" Wincenty Rzymowski, the nominal Minister.

In his first speech in Parliament M. Cyrankiewicz spoke of reducing expenditure on the army and secret police, and the granting of a "wide amnesty." The Government also desired to help private enterprise, to improve relations with the Church, and to maintain friendly relations with the Western Powers. On the last point, M. Hochfeld, chairman of the Socialist Party's Parliamentary Committee, said that such relations depended on the recognition by Great Britain and the United States of Poland's right to conduct her internal affairs without interference, and of her vital need of the Regained Territories.

SOVIET UNION

No hint of the more cordial note introduced into Anglo-Soviet relations by the recent exchange of messages between the Secretary of State and Generalissimo Stalin has so far found reflection in the Soviet press which, in its foreign news, continues to harp almost exclusively—and in roughly equal proportions—upon British and American misdoings. The main targets of attack are Anglo-American military co-operation, British policy in Germany, atomic control, Mr. Churchill's United Europe project, the Anglo-Burmese negotiations and even British policy in Trinidad and Ethiopia. This lack of co-ordination between the temper of Anglo-Soviet exchanges at the highest level and the news retailed to the public was most marked in an article by General Galaktionov in New Times, dealing with the questions of standardisation of arms, collaboration between air forces, exchange of officers and the post-war functions of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. All the explanations given by Field Marshal Montgomery to Generalissimo Stalin and Marshal Vassilievsky, of which Galaktionov at least should have been fully aware, are completely ignored. On domestic affairs, the Labour Government was sharply rebuked by Moscow radio for inadequate progress with nationalisation: "British workers cannot help seeing that, under a Labour Government, Britain is still a comfortable country for gentlemen who own solid packets of shares and fat bank accounts."

A Moscow broadcast, commenting on the Agreement with Finland, stated that it illustrated the reluctance of the Soviet Union to grow rich at the expense of another country and confirmed her consistent acknowledgement of Finland's independence and rights. The Agreement would stimulate economic relations between the two countries and promote the growth of Finland's national wealth, besides strengthening Finnish economic independence. It may be added that this statement contained no mention of the original Soviet demands for participation in Finnish key industries, and which if granted would have seriously jeopardised Finnish independence. (See also under "Scandinavia.")

Hochfeld, chairman of the Socialist Party's Parliamentary Committee, said that such relations depended on the recognition by Great Britain and the United States of Poland's right to conduct her internal affairs without interference, and of her vital need of the Regained Territories.

SOVIET UNION

No hint of the more cordial note introduced into Anglo-Soviet relations by the recent exchange of messages between the Secretary of State and Generalissimo Stalin has so far found reflection in the Soviet press which, in its foreign news, continues to harp almost exclusively—and in roughly equal proportions—upon British and American misdoings. The main targets of attack are Anglo-American military co-operation, British policy in Germany, atomic control, Mr. Churchill's United Europe project, the Anglo-Burmese negotiations and even British policy in Trinidad and Ethiopia. This lack of co-ordination between the temper of Anglo-Soviet exchanges at the highest level and the news retailed to the public was most marked in an article by General Galaktionov in New Times, dealing with the questions of standardisation of arms, collaboration between air forces, exchange of officers and the post-war functions of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. All the explanations given by Field Marshal Montgomery to Generalissimo Stalin and Marshal Vassilievsky, of which Galaktionov at least should have been fully aware, are completely ignored. On domestic affairs, the Labour Government was sharply rebuked by Moscow radio for inadequate progress with nationalisation: "British workers cannot help seeing that, under a Labour Government, Britain is still a comfortable country for gentlemen who own solid packets of shares and fat bank accounts."

A Moscow broadcast, commenting on the Agreement with Finland, stated that it illustrated the reluctance of the Soviet Union to grow rich at the expense of another country and confirmed her consistent acknowledgement of Finland's independence and rights. The Agreement would stimulate economic relations between the two countries and promote the growth of Finland's national wealth, besides strengthening Finnish economic independence. It may be added that this statement contained no mention of the original Soviet demands for participation in Finnish key industries, and which if granted would have seriously jeopardised Finnish independence. a year's absence. Presumably he has come to deal with the liquidation of the Commission after the signing of the Peace Treaty.

The new Italian Ambassador to Moscow, Signor Manlio Brosio, who was appointed last November to succeed Signor Quaroni, has just left for his post. During one of the latter's recent visits to Rome the Soviet Ambassador there is reported to have told him categorically that Italy could count on no support from the U.S.S.R. in connection with any protest over the terms of the Treaty. The Soviet Union had no intention of creating a precedent which might be used by other ex-satellites. Signor Quaroni finally left Moscow on the 11th February. The Soviet Embassy in Rome has invited the proposed Italian Commercial Delegation to Germany to establish contact with the Soviet Military Administration with a view to the conclusion of a Commercial Agreement. Meanwhile the withdrawal of the Soviet representative from the Advisory Council for Italy and the Allied Commission announced for the 31st January has been delayed pending further instructions from Moscow.

A long silence on Italian affairs has now been broken by Izvestiya (the 5th February) with an article condemning Giannini and his Uomo Qualunque party as pure Fascists and hinting obliquely that he was receiving tacit encouragement from the British and American authorities.

Tass has taken up with vigour the refusal of General MacArthur's headquarters to allow a representative of the Moscow Patriarchate to enter Japan and the American counter-proposal to send an Orthodox Bishop from the U.S.A. out to the Mission. Tass regarded this as "an unfriendly act towards the Russian Orthodox Church and a gross interference in the affairs of the ecclesiastical consistory of the Orthodox Church in Japan." The situation among the Japanese Orthodox has naturally been complex since the war. In 1931 the mission numbered about 40,000 faithful and 32 priests, of whom the majority were Japanese. Metropolitan Sergei, a Russian, had been head of the Mission since 1912, but in 1941 he resigned, owing to a decree of the Japanese Government that the Head of the Orthodox Mission must be a Japanese. He died in 1945. A Japanese priest named John Ono was hastily separated from his wife and consecrated Bishop under the name of Bishop Nikolai, to comply with this decree. The majority of the Japanese Orthodox, however, did not recognise him, and at a Consistory held in April 1946 they sent a message to Patriarch Alexei of Moscow asking him to take the Japanese Church under the wing of the Moscow Patriarchate and to send a Bishop out to Tokyo. The United States action in refusing entry to the Patriarchal Emissary seems a little high-handed in view of the fact that the Orthodox Church in Japan, unlike some other Russian Orthodox Missions in the Far East, had never broken off relations with Moscow even throughout the inter-war period and has now itself asked for a Bishop from Moscow.

It is hard to be sure of the exact present position as regards theological education in the U.S.S.R. but it seems that at any rate one institution may be functioning in Moscow. Efforts are being made to get theological students from abroad to study there. As far back as last April the Japanese Orthodox Consistory proposed to teach selected Japanese priests Russian with the object of sending them to Moscow for theological studies and last Autumn it was stated in Paris that Patriarch Alexei had plans for inviting Professors from the Orthodox Institute there to visit the "Moscow Academy." Metropolitan Grigorii of Leningrad, during his recent Middle Eastern tour, is said to have proposed to the Patriarch of Alexandria that priests from the Orthodox Communities of the Middle East should spend a period in a seminary in the U.S.S.R. He also intimated to the Coptic Patriarch that Russian Universities would welcome Coptic theological students who wished to complete their studies abroad (though, of course, no Soviet university teaches theology, church history or any other ecclesiastical subjects). So far, however, the Copts do not appear to have risen to the bait and they have indicated a preference for pursuing their studies in this country in the calmer atmosphere of Anglicanism.

Some news has at last begun to filter through of the position in the Kaliningrad oblast of the R.S.F.S.R. (formerly Königsberg). The area has been divided into 14 raions, all the towns being given Russian names; Gumbinnen has had the honour of being called after M. Gusev. The original intention was apparently to remove all the Germans and to people the area with Great Russians, but this has not been strictly carried out. Most of the Russian colonists come from Kursk and Orel but Byelorussians have now been allowed to come in though Ukrainians are not admitted. In spite of deaths and evacuation to Germany, many Germans still remain; some have, apparently, been deported to the U.S.S.R., but there is no solid evidence on this point. The Germans staying behind are not regarded as Soviet citizens, have no political parties of their own and are in general poorly treated. One German Anti-Fascist Committee is said to be functioning in Kaliningrad itself.

In virtue of a decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, demobilisation of the following senior age classes of N.C.O.s and men of the armed forces is to be carried out :—

(a) From the land forces : the two oldest age groups (estimated as the 1923 and 1924 classes).
(b) From the air forces : the one oldest age group (estimated as the 1922 class).
(c) From the navy : the three oldest age groups (estimated as the 1893, 1894 and 1895 classes).

It should be pointed out in this connection that in the case of the land forces 32 age groups will have been released by the end of June of this year, but only the first 13 age groups included officers. 30 age groups of the air forces will have been released by June 1947 but, as in the case of the land forces, only the first 13 of these will have included officers. The latest decree is the first to mention the navy. It is therefore estimated that by the end of June 1947 the strength of the Soviet Army including M.V.D. troops will be 3,570,999 plus whatever additional intake there may have been by then.

During the past eighteen months, various Soviet scientists have been mentioned in the accounts of the post-war organisation of international learned bodies, although it remains as difficult as ever to establish contact with individual experts. Alexander Mikhailov is president of the International Astronomical Union, which will hold its 1948 congress in Moscow. Academician A. N. Nesmeyanov, Director of the Soviet Institute of Organic Chemistry since 1939 and famous for his research into metallic alloys, has been elected vice president of the International Chemistry Association. The Soviet Union is represented in the International Committee on Historical Sciences by Academician V. Volgin, who is Secretary of the Academy's Department of History and Philosophy and an authority on the history of socialism. As head of the Soviet delegation to the Congress of Indian Scientists, Volgin recently received an honorary doctorate of Delhi University. Academician Leon Orbeli, formerly vice-chairman of the Academy and at present Secretary of the Department of Biology, serves as Soviet representative on the organising committee of the International Physiological Congress. The aged geologist Academician Vladimir Obruchev, whose "Geology of Siberia" was awarded a Stalin Prize, is closely associated with Soviet preparations for the International Geological Congress to be held in Britain in 1948. This Society's last Congress was held in Moscow in 1937. Mikhail Shatelen took part in the recent international conference on high tension transmission network and represents the U.S.S.R. in the World Energetics Federation. Boris Polinov, an expert on soils, member of the American Geographical Society and the International Association of Soil Science, now serves on the Executive committee of the International Association of Scientists. It is also announced that the International Council of Scientific Unions has invited the Academy of Sciences to become a member. Soviet propagandists attribute the "growing respect of the world for Soviet scientists" to their humanitarian ideals, which are contrasted with the cynical misapplications of scientific knowledge in imperialist countries.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

There has been a good deal of controversy both in the press and in the Rigsdag on account of the recent approaches to the Danish Government by the South Schleswig Association (see this Summary No. 376 under "Germany"). At one time it looked as though the opposition between the South Schleswig-minded parties (Conservatives and Venstre) and those who held a more moderate view (Social Democrats) might lead to an election or a referendum—despite the fact that the Social Democrats were opposed to such an extreme measure (see this Summary No. 378 under "Scandinavia"). Discussions in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Rigsdag, however, have now led to a compromise, and a statement on the subject was issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the 3rd February. It began by reporting that the Committee had approved the draft statement of the Danish Government's point of view in regard to the future settlement of Germany on the lines indicated by M. Rasmussen and then made specific reference to the South Schleswig question. A representative of the Danish Government in South Schleswig would be authorised to hand to the British Governor in Kiel the South Schleswigers' request to the Control Council in Berlin regarding the administrative separation of South Schleswig and Holstein and the removal of the refugees. Denmark's own attitude to these questions, the statement reiterated, had been set forth in the Note of the 19th October (see this Summary No. 365).

The question of a Danish contingent being sent to the British Zone of Germany seems to be nearing a settlement (see Summary No. 374). On the 1st February the Danish Government handed a note on the subject to His Majesty's Minister in Copenhagen. In it the Danish complaint about the continued presence of German refugees in Denmark was repeated, as was the fact that Danish army personnel was mainly responsible for guarding them. Consequently, the statement went on, it was impossible without the greatest difficulties to spare military personnel for the discharge of duties outside Denmark as long as these people remained in the country. Nevertheless, the Danish Government was prepared to ask the Rigsdag to approve the despatch of the suggested contingent " in the certain expectation that in the course of the next few months " a solution would be found to the question of the repatriation of these refugees. The note also asked for further facilities in regard to the sterling payments due for the equipment of the contingent.

The British reply agrees to the easier terms of payment but points out in regard to the second demand that the solution of this difficulty does not rest with His Majesty's Government alone. They will exert their utmost efforts to secure the early and total removal of these refugees, but, as in the past, it will be necessary to secure the co-operation of the other occupying Powers for this purpose. Given such co-operation, it is the aim of His Majesty's Government to assist in securing the removal of the refugees within the next few months and to take their full share up to the limit of capacity of the British Zone.

According to a Danish broadcast Mr. Hans Hedtoft, Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, speaking on the refugee problem on the 8th February, pledged his party's full support of the Danish Foreign Minister's efforts to solve the refugee problem and expressed surprise that " millions of Germans from East Prussia, Poland and Czechoslovakia " had been evacuated to the West and yet no room could be found for the 200,000 Germans from Denmark.

Finland

On the 3rd February an agreement was signed in Moscow between the Finnish and Russian Governments providing for the disposal of former German assets in Finland, which by virtue of the Potsdam Agreement were taken over by the Soviet Union. Negotiations for the disposal of these assets, amounting in all to 6 milliard Finnish marks, were carried on in Helsinki where a Soviet delegation headed by M. Kumykin arrived early in January.

At first the Russians put forward demands for the revaluation of the total sum at the 1944 rate of exchange, coupled with a request for equal Russian participation in a number of Finnish key industries, which, had it been conceded, would most certainly have permanently restricted Finland's economic independence. The Finnish Government, despite heavy pressure, steadfastly refused to give way on both these points, and after receiving fresh instructions from Moscow the Russians presented the proposals which form the basis of the present agreement.

The demand for a revaluation was dropped, as was also that for the transfer of industrial shares. Instead, the disposal of the assets has been divided into two parts. Under the first part, which covers 2,980 million marks, the Soviet Union purchases the Jäniskoski Power Station in the extreme North together with a strip of surrounding uninhabited territory. The installation will be restored by the Finns. They also undertake to repair Russian ships in Finnish yards. The last remaining sizable unit of the Finnish Navy, the armoured vessel Väinämöinen, of about 6,000 tons, together with certain Finnish-owned buildings abroad, will be sold to the Soviets. The Soviet Union will participate equally with the Finns in a company formed in 1945 for the production of artificial silk yarn. After a few items of lesser importance have been taken into account the Russians still retain, from the first part of the settlement, a balance of 465 million marks, which during 1948 is to be met in foreign exchange.

For the remaining 3,020 million marks Finland will, under the second part of the agreement, supply a variety of goods to the Soviet Union; the most important single item being horses to the value of 720 million marks. Other promised deliveries include wooden houses, sawn timber, newsprint, woodpulp, and sulphite spirit [named in the order of their importance]. Fulfilment of this pledge will still leave the Russians with a favourable balance of 650 million marks which will be held in reserve. The prices for these deliveries though more advantageous to Finland than 1944 prices, are still about 20 per cent. lower than those which could at present be obtained in the open market.

The great relief which the Finns felt at the removal of the threat to their economy embodied in the first Russian demands, induced their negotiators to recommend the acceptance of the new terms. Jäniskoski which supplies power for the Petsamo nickel mines was leased to the Soviet Union in April of last year (see Summary No. 341), and after the loss of Petsamo itself was of little importance to Finland. On the other hand, it had been hoped that ownership of this plant could have been exchanged for the right to use Saimaa Canal and the railway line through the Porkkala area.

The present Agreement is of particular importance as it should remove the last element of uncertainty from the economic relationship with the Soviet Union which resulted directly from the Armistice Agreement and the war. Whether Finland will be in a position to meet all her liabilities is naturally a different matter, but, with the signing of the Peace Treaty, and the disposal of ex-German assets, the Soviet Union would find it difficult further to increase the burden, assuming that she wished to do so.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

A Netherlands Government Memorandum on Austria was submitted to the Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies on the 30th January.

Emphasis is laid upon the need for giving " full attention " to the " peculiar situation arising from the respective positions of Germany and Austria," without which there could be no solution to the German and Austrian problems. The Netherlands wanted to see a " free, independent and democratic Austria." With this object in view, it was essential to restore her former frontiers and to encroach no further upon her already " narrow economic basis." Austria's geographical position in the heart of Europe demanded the provision of a " reasonable level of prosperity," so that she might not be driven again, in despair, to turn to Germany. Special attention had also to be directed to the question of de-nazification, as a means of obviating " any striving towards 'German aims,' under whatsoever guise such activity might be camouflaged." The Netherlands Government thought it desirable that Austria, a Danubian country, should give effective guarantees (to be embodied in the treaty with her) against interference with shipping on the Danube from customs barriers or other discriminatory measures. Finally, while there would be no claim against Austria for reparation payments, the Netherlands Government reserved the right to demand compensation for losses suffered by Dutch subjects through the effects of the Anschluss and the war, and damages for offences against the Netherlands or her people by persons of " Austrian origin."

Belgium

A Council of State is to be created in Belgium under the provisions of a law dated the 23rd December, 1946.

The need for such a body has been felt from the earliest days of Belgian independence. A draft law for the creation of a Council of State was first laid before the Chambers in 1832; but the failure to find an acceptable formula then or subsequently postponed serious action until now. The objects of the Council are two-fold: first, to remove the inconsistencies and obscurities which have found their way into bills (particularly in recent years) as the result of hasty drafting, the confusion tending to increase with the adoption of amendments to the original drafts; secondly, to deal with cases involving the abuse of executive authority which may have resulted in friction between individuals and branches of the administration [e.g., the case of M. van Glabbeke, the former Minister of Justice, whose action was the ultimate cause of M. van Acker's fall in July 1946]. In order to remedy these defects the Council is to have two principal functions: first, of scrutinizing (and, where necessary, of amending) all Bills and Decrees before they are put to the vote; secondly, of intervening (when requested) in the above-mentioned cases of conflict between individuals and administrative branches, either by giving advice to the branch in question or actually delivering judgement. The number of Councillors is to be not less than 13 and not more than 15; and the impartial character of the Council has been guaranteed (by agreement among the various political parties) through the selection of its first members from those no longer actively engaged in politics. It is believed that the Presidency of the Council is likely to be offered to Comte Pierlot, the Catholic ex-Premier.

At a Cabinet Council on the 4th February, M. Godding, Minister of Colonies, announced that the Prince Regent is to pay an official visit to the Belgian Congo in June, accompanied by the Minister and M. Spaak. The visit will last six weeks.

Luxembourg

A second note from the Luxembourg Government on claims against Germany dated the 27th November, 1946, differs little from the first [see Summary No. 368], except in its demand for a great increase of the catchment area which is to provide water for the proposed hydro-electric plant. It is claimed that the tributaries of the River Our (on which it is proposed to build the dam, at some point above Vianden)—namely, the Rivers Irsen, Enz, Prüm " and others," are " indispensable " to the supply of water to the reservoir; but the difficulty is that the courses of all these streams lie wholly in German territory. This would appear to involve the addition of an area at least as great as that already claimed along the entire Luxembourg-German frontier. It is difficult to understand what advantage would be gained by controlling these rivers, since some of these—the Prüm, for instance —would not have the slightest practical effect upon the power scheme. It should be noted that the southern half of the new territory had, from as early as 1300 until the Revolutionary Wars, belonged to the old Duchy of Luxembourg; but this may be a coincidence.

FRANCE

M. Ramadier's Government has not yet found its internal equilibrium, and the last week, which should have been devoted to decisions on economic matters, was taken up with arguments over the respective functions of the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister and the Service Ministers, a matter which it was believed had been decided before the Government was constituted. The decree defining the functions of the Minister of National Defence only appeared on the 8th February. Another subject which raised a storm in the Cabinet was a plan inherited from the Blum Cabinet for the partial nationalisation of the merchant navy. The M.R.P. Ministers—and particularly the Minister of Finance, M. Robert Schuman—took exception to this project on financial and other grounds; a compromise was finally reached. The incident has shown, however, the need of some clear Government programme to which all parties in the coalition could subscribe.

The urgent problems of wages and prices, problems which have faced every new Government in the last two years, were to have been discussed by the Cabinet last week, but no detailed decisions have yet been announced. The second reduction in prices of 5 per cent., which was to follow within two months of the first one (see Summary No. 375) is forecast for this week, but the Government have not yet decided whether it is to be, as before, a general cut or whether it should discriminate between those goods (mainly manufactures) which cannot bear a further price decrease, and those (mainly foodstuffs) whose prices could be reduced by more than 5 per cent. The new Commissioner of Food is reported to be anxious to lift controls on some foodstuffs, especially meat, but such a step might well imperil the success of the price experiment.

As regards wages, the C.G.T. demand for a minimum wage of 7,000 fr. a month was formally presented to M. Ramadier on the 5th February. The C.G.T., supported by the Communist Party, maintain that wages can be increased without a parallel rise in prices, but this thesis is denied by all other parties and is daily refuted by M. Blum in the columns of Le Populaire. The Government have been able to secure the unanimous support of the Assembly for their refusal to grant in full the demands of the civil servants for salary increases pending the completion of the re-grading scheme. Under the new constitution deputies may not propose additional expenditure during a debate on the budget or supplementary estimates, so that the Assembly had to accept the Government proposals en bloc, including the provision for a 48-hour working week. During the debate the Minister of Finance said that agreement had already been reached within the civil service for the dismissal of 25,000 persons. The bill was also passed by the Council of the Republic on the following day (31st January) together with a bill on the election of members of the Council of the Magistrature. These bills were the first to be dealt with by the Council of the Republic, but it had no time to debate them at length since the special procedure for urgent matters had been invoked by the Assembly.

The political bureau of the Communist Party passed a resolution on the 6th February which declared that while the Party favoured an Anglo-French alliance it considered that existing differences between the two countries over Germany and the coal of the Ruhr should first be settled. M. Bidault, however, told Mr. Duff Cooper that he did not attach much importance to this statement and that he was determined himself to go ahead with the alliance. M. Jouhaux, general secretary of the C.G.T., has spoken in the same sense.

The appointment of M. Pierre Bertaux to replace General Mast as Resident-General in Tunisia (see Summary No. 377) has not been confirmed by the new Government, and it is thought that M. Bertaux will not now be given the post.

Admiral d'Argenlieu, High Commissioner in Indo-China, has been recalled to France for consultations, and it is believed that the Government have decided to relieve him of his post. Such a step would indicate that the Government's declared policy of conciliation will henceforth be observed more faithfully by the local administrative authorities. Following the adoption by the Viet Nam Government of recognizably Communist tactics (see Summary No. 374, under " Far East "), Admiral d'Argenlieu had stated publicly that he opposed their " international Marxist régime." His removal would thus facilitate the resumption of negotiations with the existing Viet Nam Government. Admiral d'Argenlieu has now crowned a series of singularly independent actions with a federal ordinance " promulgated by draft," extending considerably the powers of the Cochinchinese provisional autonomous government. According to a statement made by the head of the Cochinchinese Government on the 4th February, Cochinchina is now " a free state, associated with France within the Indo-Chinese Federation and the French Union." Such an alteration in the status of a French colony could not, however, be made by the federal authority, but only by the French parliament.

The date of the promised Assembly debate has not yet been announced. The left-wing parties have exploited to the full the Admiral's anti-Marxist bias, and the Communists, especially, want immediate resumption of talks with the Viet Nam Government. (The Viet Nam Minister of National Economy is the son-in-law of M. Marrane, Communist Minister of Health in the French Government.) They do not, however, encourage the demand for complete independence made by the extremists and thought to be favoured by the moderates in Viet Nam, but agree with the Socialists in accepting the March 1946 agreement as a working basis. The M.R.P., who have consistently supported Admiral d'Argenlieu, still see the restoration of order as a necessary prelude to negotiation. But while all moderate opinion has been strongly incensed by news of Viet Nam atrocities and French casualties, it is only the right-wing extremists who would be willing to hazard a long, costly and unpredictable war in Indo-China. (See also under " Far East.")

SWITZERLAND

Considerable agitation and resentment have been caused in Switzerland by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech at Newcastle on the 2nd February reverting to his suggestion made in October 1946 (see Summary No. 366) that neutrals should contribute towards the cost of world reconstruction. It is felt that, whereas the first statement might have been regarded as the personal opinion of an individual Minister and not necessarily an expression of his Government's policy, this second pronouncement coming on the heels of the Report of the " International Committee for the study of European Questions " (see last week's Summary) is not to be so lightly brushed aside. The Swiss again point to the contributions already made by them in the interests of humanity both during and since the war. They declare their readiness to pay their share of the cost of reconstruction in accordance with the terms of the Washington Agreement, but they point out that the misery and devastation in Europe to-day are not due to any fault or failure on the part of Switzerland. Nor do they feel that Switzerland need pay an insurance premium now to protect herself against the German menace, which, they maintain, they saw clearly enough and against which they took steps to safeguard themselves long before some of the other nations appeared to realize its existence.

A report in the Swiss press of the 4th February refers to a Washington message to the effect that gold to the value of seven million dollars had been transferred by the Nazis from Holland to Switzerland. The Swiss Political Department was said to have declared that neither the Federal Council nor the directorate of the National Bank had any knowledge of this alleged transaction; that no communication on the subject had been received from the Allied Governments; and that transactions with Germany during the war had been dealt with in the Washington Agreement and liquidated by Swiss payments. The report goes on to state that the Swiss Legations in Washington and the Hague had been requested to furnish as speedily as possible all obtainable information on the subject.

The report of the Federal Bureau of Statistics on the hotel industry for the period June–September, 1946, shows that the number of foreign visitors has greatly increased (in certain cases exceeding even the 1937 figures), and even that of Swiss tourists has remained undiminished. As was the case before the war England furnished the greatest number of Switzerland's foreign visitors, though the total for the period under review is still 40 per cent. below the 1937 level. The French have now yielded second place to the Belgians, while the Dutch and the Germans, once frequent and numerous guests, now form a very small portion of the total. Switzerland finds the revival of one of her major industries gratifying, as showing that the country has not lost its attraction for visitors and holding great promise of future prosperity.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

At the week-end the names of a new team of Spanish Republicans constituting the Government-in-exile were announced as follows :—

Prime Minister and Foreign Affairs : Rodolfo Llopis (P.S.O.E.—Socialist).
Justice : Manuel Irujo (Basque Nationalist Party).
Education : Miguel Santaló (Catalan Left Republican Party).
Emigration : Trifón Gomez (U.G.T.—General Union of Workers).
Economy : Vicente Uribe (Communist Party).
Information : (A representative, not yet specified, of the C.N.T.—National Confederation of Labour).

Thus the outcome of the caperings by the leaders of the various political groups in Paris has been nothing more than another all-party coalition with changed personnel; and the opportunity to replace the pantomime "Government" by a modest technical Junta—an instrument which could subserve the entente of Right and Left groups sponsored by the Alianza and certain of the Army leaders in Spain—appears to have been lost.

When Señor Barcia failed to form a Cabinet, the President of the Republic, Martinez Barrio, called upon the Secretary-General of the Socialist Party, Rodolfo Llopis, to try his hand. Fortified no doubt by his contact with Party colleagues from inside Spain at the recent special Socialist congress at Toulouse (14th–16th January), Señor Llopis had made a statement to the press at the end of January to the effect that the Socialist and Trade Union Ministers had forced the resignation of Señor Giral because they felt that he and his Government were an obstacle to the line of development which seemed to follow from the Resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Spanish problem, he declared, had entered a new phase calling for closer liaison between the emigration and anti-Franco elements inside Spain, as well as for a broader-based Government, possibly including elements of the Right, which would be, he averred, in a better position to obtain the necessary assistance from the Western Powers. A full-blown "Government" (even though, at present, the number of portfolios has been reduced from 14 to 8) hardly seems to be the right way to go about things, especially when it includes an experienced Communist leader, Señor Uribe—he was Minister of Agriculture in the last Government of Dr. Negrin in 1939 and, formerly, in the Largo Caballero Government of September 1936—who will certainly not be acceptable to the Right opposition groups. It is surprising that Trifón Gomez, the Labour leader, who was reputed to have barred any further collaboration with the Communists, should retain his place. This Llopis "Government" has now to present itself before the shadow Cortes.

A controversy similar to that which provoked the dissolution of the Giral combination has been agitating the Catalans, with the Consell of political groups in Barcelona, apparently, pressing the Generalitat "under President Irla and Señor Tarradellas—an all-party affair likewise based on the principles of "legitimacy" and continuity from 1939—to accept a new formula prescribing both direction from inside Spain and the exclusion of Communist representation.

On the 4th February the press in Lisbon announced certain changes in Dr. Salazar's Government. They are in line with earlier indications and, clearly, represent nothing in the way of a change of policy. Dr. Salazar gives up the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and has decided to instal there an old friend and henchman, Senhor Caeiro da Matta, who until recently was Minister of Education. Senhor da Matta spent the War years as Portuguese Ambassador to Vichy France. His place at the Ministry of Education is taken by a newcomer, Senhor Pires de Lima. The Minister of Works in the former Cabinet, Senhor Augusto Cancela de Abreu, is transferred to the Interior, displacing Julio Alves Botelho Moniz, and his Under-Secretary, José Federico Ulrich, gets promotion to Ministerial office. Another Under-Secretary who has been promoted to Santos Costa's assistant at the Ministry of War, Lt.-Col. Gomes de Araujo; he takes the portfolio of Communications. Two other new Ministers are Teofilo Duarte (Colonies) vice Marcelo Caetano, and Barbosa (Economy). The Ministries of Justice, Finance, War and Marine, show no change.

This is the first re-shuffle which Dr. Salazar has undertaken since September 1944. As a sign perhaps that he realizes he has been overtaxing his strength he has also handed over the Presidency of the National Union to Marcelo Caetano, the ex-Minister of Colonies.

ITALY

On the 3rd February Signor de Gasperi finally succeeded in forming his third Coalition Government. The new Government is composed of seven Christian Democrats, three Socialists (Nenni) three Communists and two Independents, as provisionally reported in Summary No. 379. The portfolios have been divided as follows :—

Prime Minister : de Gasperi (Christian Democrat).
Interior : Scelba (Christian Democrat).
Foreign Affairs : Sforza (Independent).
Justice : Gullo (Communist).
Finance and Treasury : Campilli (Christian Democrat).
Defence : Gasparotto (Independent).
Education : Gonella (Christian Democrat).
Public Works : Sereni (Communist).
Agriculture : Segni (Christian Democrat).
Transport : Ferrari (Communist).
Posts : Cacciatore (Socialist).
Industry and Commerce : Morandi (Socialist).
Labour : Romita (Socialist).
Foreign Trade : Vanoni (Christian Democrat):
Mercantile Marine : Aldisio (Christian Democrat).

Thus, for the first time, the Christian Democrats have secured a majority in the Council of Ministers. Moreover, the party has been strengthened by the fusion of the Ministries of Finance and the Treasury under a single Minister, Signor Campilli. This should enable steps to be taken to plan for the introduction of some efficient system of tax-collection which was rendered difficult in the previous Government when the Minister of Finance was a Communist and the Minister for the Treasury was a Christian Democrat. The Ministry of Post-War Assistance has been abolished and its functions divided between other Ministries. It had been reported that the Ministry was being used by the Communist Minister (Sereni) for the furtherance of Party aims.

The public reaction to the Government crisis has been, on the whole, one of indifference and of hostile comment on politicians as such who cannot get together to help forward the reconstruction of the country.

The Liberals, Republicans, Saragat Socialists and Qualunquists remain outside the new Government. Signor Saragat has, moreover, resigned from the Presidency of the Constituent Assembly. He evidently intends to make use of the time between now and the General Election (which is likely to be held in June or in October) to organise his new party, which has now obtained the support of some 47 of the 105 Socialist Deputies. Another 15 Deputies including Ignazio Silone have not yet declared themselves but are on the whole believed to incline towards Saragat. The new party claims to have secured the support of some two-thirds of the Socialist Party members in Milan, fewer in Turin, most of the inscribed members of the Party in Bologna and the Socialist Federations of Southern Italy.

Feeling on the subject of the Peace Treaty has been growing increasingly bitter since Italy's suggestions for amendments to the draft were turned down at the Paris Conference. A strong nationalist feeling has been inflamed by the press. Much of the blame for the terms of the Treaty is now fixed in the popular mind on Great Britain, and British prestige is at a low ebb. The decisions most bitterly felt are of course the alteration of the frontier of Venezia Giulia, in particular the loss of Trieste and of the Italian-inhabited towns on the Istrian coast, and secondly the drastic reduction in the Fleet. In particular it is felt that the services rendered to the Allied cause by the Italian Navy deserved more appreciation from Great Britain as a seafaring nation. The unrealistic attitude makes feeling no less bitter.

On Monday the 10th February the Italian Peace Treaty was signed in Paris by the representatives of the Allied and Associated Powers and by Ambassador Meli Lupi di Soragna on behalf of Italy. There had been some doubt as to whether Italy would sign, but on the 6th February the Italian Parliamentary Treaty Commission decided that in the interest of the country the Treaty should be signed while the question of ratification should be freely decided by the Constituent Assembly. On the 7th the Cabinet issued a communiqué to the same effect, stating that in designating Ambassador Di Soragna as plenipotentiary for signature it did so under "explicit reserve of ratification by the Constituent Assembly in accordance with Decree Law 98 of the 16th March, 1946." The Italian Government thus made it clear that they were unable to pledge the country to ratification.

During January the Italian Government attempted to discover the views of the U.K., France and the U.S.S.R. on the effect of non-ratification by Italy. The Government suggested that Article 90 of the Peace Treaty was to be understood in the sense that the coming into force of the Treaty depended on ratification by Italy. This suggestion drew definite replies. According to the Soviet Minister for Foreign Affairs his Government considered that an answer should point out that, in accordance with Article 90, the Treaty would be ratified by the Allied and Associated Powers and must also be ratified by Italy, and that the obligation to sign and ratify were both imposed on Italy by this Article. The coming into force of the Treaty was dependent on the handing over of ratification papers by the Four Great Powers. H.M.G. told Count Carandini plainly that unless Italy signed there would be no Treaty, in which case the Armistice would remain in force. But if Italy signed, the Treaty would come into force as soon as it was ratified by the Big Four. Italy's ratification was not necessary for bringing the Treaty into force, even though Article 90 required her ratification, which was further desirable as it would show that the Government's signature had the backing of the Constituent Assembly. France replied in similar terms. This firm attitude appears to have made an impression in Rome, for although Count Sforza has pointed out that his Government must by law submit the Treaty for ratification to the Constituent Assembly, he has also promised that he and Signor De Gasperi will do their best to secure ratification. This promise was made on the 9th February the day after Signor De Gasperi's speech in the Constituent Assembly, when he said that the period between signing and ratification might be used by Italy "to obtain from the Allied Powers, or from some of them, some promises of a revision, a pledge not to exact in full some of the Treaty's sternest provisions, and promises of support in all those matters not defined in the Treaty, such as the colonies and our demands for reparations from Germany." The U.K. feels that apart from the obligation on Italy to ratify established by Article 90, ratification is most desirable as otherwise Italians may be encouraged to evade their obligations by a claim that Italy only signed under duress and that the Treaty was not accepted by the Italian public.

The Italian Government have also attempted to sound H.M.G. on the question of Treaty revision, particularly in regard to the clauses dealing with reparations and the Navy. H.M.G. have pointed out that the U.K. is not in a position to give any assurance on future revision inasmuch as she is only one of the signatory Powers. But they add a reminder that possible modification of the Military, Naval and Air clauses is provided for in Article 46 by agreement between the Allied and Associated Powers, or, after Italy has become a member of the United Nations, by agreement between the Security Council and Italy. H.M.G. have also indicated that insofar as the Treaty conferred on any individual Allied Power rights affecting only that Power and Italy there would not seem to be anything to prevent an agreement between that Power and Italy regarding modification of those rights in particular cases. H.M.G. are prepared to consider suggestions from the Italian Government on such an agreement once the Treaty has come into force. While the French Government appear to be distressed by the above suggestion, they are in fact in favour of holding conversations with Italy on the possibility of frontier adjustments once the Treaty is in force, though they deprecate the possibility of hinting at any such thing before the ratification of the Treaty.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

A fresh attempt to solve the deadlock arising out of the February Agreement for the exchange of populations between Hungary and Czechoslovakia has been reported. According to the proposals placed before Dr. Wagner by Dr. Okaly, the Czechoslovak Government Plenipotentiary, 3,000 Slovak families in Hungary will be transferred to Slovakia in return for the same number of Magyar repatriates from Slovakia, the selection being taken out of the hands of the Hungarian Government by the Bratislava Resettlement Office and the Czechoslovak Repatriation Commission in Budapest. The transfer is to begin not later than the 1st March—and earlier if the Hungarian Government so desires. Four trains are to travel daily both ways, each carrying at least 32 families. The Mixed Commission, responsible for settling the details of this partial transfer, must announce its decision by the 15th February, after which date the Slovak Resettlement Office will hand an inventory of the possessions of the Magyars affected to the Hungarian Plenipotentiary in Bratislava.

Bratislava Radio professes to see in the proposals a means of eliminating the existing tension between the two countries. No Hungarian comment has yet been received but hostility towards Czechoslovakia is mounting. M. Gyöngyösi, the Foreign Minister, has delivered a Note to the Representatives of the Four Powers in Budapest, recounting the history of the dispute over the past year, and claiming that the displacement of Magyars in Czechoslovakia constitutes a breach of the February Agreement of 1946 and of the Paris Conference Resolution. The Social Democratic newspaper, Népszava, interprets a statement made by the Czechoslovak Vice-Premier, M. Fierlinger, on the 29th January as evidence that the so-called Labour Decree is intended "not as a legal compulsion of the population to work, but to disperse and assimilate the Hungarians in Slovakia." There are even allegations, ridiculed in Czechoslovak circles, that Hungarians deported to the Czech lands have been sold as slaves. Cardinal Mindszenty has appealed to the Holy See, H.M. King George VI and President Truman on behalf of the Magyar minority in general—and in particular of those who since the 15th November have been or are still liable to be the victims of indiscriminate deportation.

It now seems that the places of the fourteen Deputies of the Smallholder Party, recently expelled during the purge which M. Nagy has undertaken, will be filled by other members of the Party. This concession, however, is not to be granted in the case of five Smallholder Deputies who resigned in protest against the expulsions. M. Nagy's own position is seriously threatened since the Public Prosecutor has demanded the suspension of the parliamentary immunity of M. Béla Kovacs, Secretary-General of the Smallholders' Party, and his extradition by Parliament on the ground that he was associated with the conspiracy and had facilitated the escape of the former Deputy, M. Salata, for it is an open secret that M. Nagy feels himself unable to continue in office without M. Kovacs' support. M. Gyöngyösi, who stands to the left of the Smallholders' Party, has been mentioned as a possible successor, as have also M. Ortutay, M. Szakasits, Count Károlyi and M. Bán. As was no doubt intended, the odium of leading a Government responsible for signing the Peace Treaty in Paris on the 10th February—a Treaty fiercely resented by Hungarians independently of party considerations—attaches to M. Nagy.

The fact that in spite of Communist pressure M. Peyer has not been excluded from the Social Democratic Party during the present Congress may be regarded as a proof that the Social Democrats retain some measure of independence, but the general tone used by M. Szakasits indicates complete willingness to toe the Communist line. Referring to the "thunderous applause" aroused by the suggestion that the two Workers' Parties should form a Government to solve the present crisis, he admitted by implication that, though the moment had not yet arrived, the question was merely one of time. Nor is it to be supposed that in such a partnership the concessions will come from M. Rákosi. A Memorandum outlining the Party's policy stresses the need for revising the Electoral Laws in order to exclude "the enemies of the people from the lists of electors and candidates." It was precisely on this point of a restricted franchise that the Smallholders refused to yield during the recent inter-Party negotiations.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Engel, who was the survivor of the attack on the Yugoslav Consul at Naples on the 25th January (see Summary No. 379) has given his account of the incident. The chauffeur who drove the Consul to the barracks has also told his story. Both versions, which have appeared in the Yugoslav Press, differ in detail from the findings of the Court of Enquiry, and impart a sinister rôle to the British officers concerned. In addition the Yugoslav press has produced some fantastic stories about the callous treatment of the injured men and about the subsequent behaviour of the chetniks.

This incident has released a flood of propaganda about the alleged protection of war criminals by the Allied authorities in Italy, Germany and Austria. A series of documented reports appeared in Politia, beginning with the testimony of those "who have escaped from the chetnik Hell." There are charges of persecution and torture at Eboli and other camps of those in favour of repatriation; of British connivance in the escape abroad of some notorious traitors; of an arrangement with General Damjanović for the drafting of all able-bodied men at Eboli into the British Regular Army; of the recruiting of chetniks for service in Greece, etc.

Brigadier Maclean's first report on the refugee situation in Italy is not encouraging. The most urgent problem concerns the disposal of the chetniks at Eboli and the fate of General Damjanović. But this cannot be solved without reference to the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington and the State Department. And, even though the Yugoslavs in Italy may be classified by the Allied authorities into repatriable and non-repatriable refugees, there can be no guarantee after the ratification of the Peace Treaty that the whole lot may not be handed over to Yugoslavia by the Italian Government. In fact a recent rumour that the Yugoslav Government were facilitating the departure of the Italian minority from Zara may encourage the Italian Government to take such action. The only safeguard for innocent refugees will be removal to some place of safety outside Italy. This course is being considered, and North Africa has been suggested as a suitable temporary asylum.

Contrary to expectations, and to previous officially-inspired declarations, Yugoslavia signed the Italian Peace Treaty in Paris on the 10th February. On the same day the Yugoslav delegation published a statement expressing Yugoslavia's dissatisfaction with the Treaty and announcing that she had signed the Treaty in the interests of peace, but did not thereby renounce her territorial claims.

The trial of Albanians at Skoplje has been concluded with the imposition of the death sentence on four of the conspirators and of long terms of forced labour on the remainder. This trial has been notorious for the manner in which the perfectly correct attitude of H.M. Consul has been distorted in such a way as to represent collusion with the underground. The actions of the Turkish Consul may, therefore, have been similarly misrepresented.

Very severe sentences, including capital punishment, have been passed on a group of "Jehovah's Witnesses" at Zagreb. They were found guilty of pacifism.

Greece

After the vote of confidence in the new Greek Government the Chamber passed a resolution arranging for a recess until the 15th February. Meanwhile the Cabinet may legislate by decree on "pacification and appeasement." Any action taken, however, requires previous consultation with the Parliamentary Judicial Committee and then ratification by the Chamber. Such decrees may "modify, complete or annul standing regulations concerning deportations; define measures for dissolution of organisations which usurp the authority or power of the State or interfere in the exercise thereof; amnesty specified crimes previously committed." One decree has already been passed cancelling further deportations of women and children and providing for the return of those already deported.

The first week of the United Nations Commission's work was largely spent in discussions on procedure and on the scope and programme of their activities. The chief points agreed were: that the Chairmanship should rotate weekly in alphabetical order; that sessions should be open to the public except when otherwise decided; that the liaison representatives of Greece, Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia should be present at public sessions, with the right of participation on the basis of Security Council practice; that the Commission should consider localities to be visited on the conclusion of general statements from the liaison representatives; and that the Commission will hear a statement from EAM and will also be open to receive statements from other organisations which may apply. Detailed statements have now been made by the representatives of Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia insisting that, as the real cause of the condition which the Commission is required to investigate lies in the internal situation in Greece, the Commission should concentrate its activities there. The Soviet representative has also made it known that he thinks the greater part of the Commission's functions can be performed without moving from Athens. These tactics are obviously designed to focus attention on the internal situation in Greece and to prevent, so far as possible, investigation of the specific and detailed charges which Greece levelled against her neighbours before the Security Council.

C266969

On the 2nd February EAM lodged a petition with the Commission begging them to urge the Greek Government to suspend the executions of four bandits sentenced to death by court martial. Certain members of the Commission informally recommended to the Greek authorities that the executions should be postponed and their recommendation was later generally endorsed by the Commission. It was felt, however, that the Commission would be placed in an impossible position if petitions continued to come in. Moreover, the Greek Government were considerably disturbed by the Commission's intervention in their affairs. They pointed out that such interventions could only put a premium on banditry and undermine the authority of the Army and the Government. The Commission, therefore, appealed to the Security Council who decided that the Commission had no power to request authorities in Greece, Albania, Bulgaria or Yugoslavia to defer the execution of any persons sentenced to death unless they had reason to believe that examination of any such person as a witness would assist the Commission in their work.

The Greek Government are reported to be taking a serious view of the information published in Rizospastis that a body of French volunteers is being formed to fight at the side of the "Greek Democratic Army" and that attempts are being made to recruit an "international brigade" in England, Belgium and Holland.

Bulgaria

General Popov has made a written confession of guilt which was read to the Court in the "Neutral Officer" trial on the 30th January (see Summaries Nos. 377 and 378). He blamed the Opposition Press for inspiring sedition in the Army. The first Opposition leader to be sucked into the vortex of this trial is Petr Koev, whose immunity as a Deputy of the Grand Sobranie was removed on the 5th February at the request of the Public Prosecutor, in order that he should be arrested and stand among the accused. Koev has already had experience of the ministrations of the Militia and can expect no gentle treatment this time.

All the Opposition Deputies have been aware of the insecurity of their position and know that they hold their mandates only so long as it suits the Prime Minister and, ultimately, Moscow. The removal of Koev is no doubt the thin end of the wedge, and the beginning of a process whereby not only the Opposition, but also, it is believed, such uncertain and bourgeois elements as the Zvenari and the Radicals, will be eliminated leaving the Communists and their Agrarian and Socialist satellites alone in the field. The signature of the Peace Treaty may accelerate this process.

The Peace Treaty was duly signed in Paris on the 10th February. The Bulgarian delegation, in a memorandum to the Council of Foreign Ministers, registered their objections to the clauses concerning reparations and to the failure to grant Bulgaria an outlet to the Ægean. They expressed the hope that the injustices of the Treaty might in due course be remedied by agreements with the parties concerned.

The Supreme Economic Council has decreed that 50,000 workers should be recruited for the mines and industry.

Negotiations for a trade agreement with Italy and for the purchase of motor vehicles from Czechoslovakia have been successfully concluded.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Foreign Affairs Committees of the Senate and the Chamber have been unable to reach a decision regarding the international organisation to which Egypt should appeal, and a further meeting is being held. The Wafd, in a manifesto published on the 3rd February, attacks Nokrashy's Government and asserts that it is not qualified to submit Egypt's case to the United Nations. It emphasises the need for unity, but refuses to collaborate with the parties at present in power and, apart from denunciation of Egypt's attitude during the United Nations debate on Russia's proposal regarding the withdrawal of troops from occupied countries, avoids any detailed statement of its policy. Heikal Pasha, the President of the Senate and Leader of the Liberal Party, has told the Ahram that Egypt must present her case to the Arab League and obtain a unanimous decision about the authority to be appealed to before submitting it to international arbitration. The question is on the agenda of the meeting of the Arab League which is due to open on the 1st March.

It has been reported in the press that King Farouk has sent one of his aides de camp to deliver personal messages to the Lebanese and Syrian Presidents, and also that an Egyptian delegation has arrived in Damascus to put the Egyptian case to the Syrian Government. It appears possible from these reports that the Egyptian Government has expressed willingness that the Levant States should act as mediators (see also "Syria and the Lebanon").

Although the matter may be regarded as of relatively minor importance, the Egyptian Government shows no signs of dropping the argument about the appointment of a replacement for the Egyptian Qadhi in the Sudan. The Prime Minister has addressed a note to the Governor-General in which he refers to the appointments being made by Egypt before the 1899 Agreement, and to the nomination of the first Qadhi after that Agreement by a committee of qadhis and his subsequent appointment by Khedivial decree. He further develops the theme of the religious nature of the appointment and the necessity for its holder to be fully acquainted with current procedure in the Egyptian Sharia' Courts. He ends by stating that the Egyptian Government does not agree to any change in procedure, and he insists that the holder of the post shall always be an Egyptian. The Governor-General has independently drawn attention to the fact that, according to Article 11 (2) of the 1936 Treaty, the condition of the appointment of an Egyptian is that no suitable Sudanese is available—a principle which was followed with the acquiescence of the Egyptian Government in 1941.

Palestine

Further meetings have taken place with the representatives of the Jewish Agency, who continued to circle round participation but failed to make any positive proposals. A meeting of the Anglo-Arab Conference was held on the 4th February at which the Arab delegates maintained that their own proposals offered the most just and practical solution of the problem, but intimated that they were prepared to continue the discussions if they could be assured that His Majesty's Government had no intention of establishing a Jewish State in any part of Palestine, and that a limit to Jewish immigration had been reached.

On the 7th February a document containing the detailed proposals of the British delegation was communicated to both Arabs and Jews. In it the obligations of His Majesty's Government under the Mandate are described, and the inability to find a basis of co-operation acceptable to Arabs and Jews is shown to have resulted in the impossibility of securing the development of free institutions. The present proposals are designed to establish forms of Government which have their roots in the people of the country, and which offer the prospect of full independence within a reasonably short time. They are, in effect, a five-year plan for a Trusteeship Agreement under which the people of Palestine would be associated with the Central Government from the outset, and would be given a large measure of responsibility for administration in local areas, which would be delimited in such a way as to include in each a substantial majority either of Arabs or Jews. Neither the whole of the Arab nor the whole of the Jewish territory would necessarily be contiguous. There would be safeguards for the minorities. The High Commissioner would continue to exercise supreme legislative and executive authority, but would endeavour to form an advisory council to include representatives of the Arab and Jewish local administrations, and also of labour, cultural and other organised interests. Palestinians would be introduced into the executive council, and, at the end of four years, a Constituent Assembly would be elected.

The Jewish contention that the rate of immigration should be determined by themselves alone cannot be accepted, but the trusteeship agreement would provide for a rate of four thousand immigrants monthly for the first two years. Subsequently the rate would be regulated by the High Commissioner in consultation with his advisory council, with due regard to the principle of economic absorptive capacity.

Control over land-transfer would be conferred on the local authorities.

Both Jews and Arabs have rejected these proposals.

The Jewish Agency, with the Vaad Leumi, have refused to put their resources at the disposal of the Government for the suppression of terrorism, although they allege that their declarations shew their opposition to terrorism, and that effective steps designed to break its power are being taken. The Agency deny that conditions in Palestine—with its "White Paper Government"—are comparable to those in other countries where the co-operation of the citizens in the maintenance of law and order is naturally expected and given.

The evacuation of non-essential civilians has been accompanied by precautionary measures designed to give security to those who must remain behind. These have necessitated the removal of Jewish and Arab householders from certain parts of the principal towns in order to create protected areas there. The High Commissioner has made it clear that this does not mean that martial law will be imposed.

An illegal immigrant ship named La Negeb, and believed to be the Meriça, was intercepted off the Palestine coast on the 8th February and brought into Haifa. Resistance was offered by the passengers, causing injury to the boarding party. Trans-shipment of the immigrants and their transfer to Cyprus has taken place.

Syria and the Lebanon

The Lebanese Chamber unanimously passed a resolution on the 24th January declaring solidarity with Egypt in her struggle to realise her national aspirations—following the line taken in Syria—but this was done at the instigation of the Egyptian Chargé d'Affaires and caused both the President and the Prime Minister some embarrassment. The break-off of negotiations on the 25th January, however, undoubtedly came as a shock, and the Syrian and Lebanese Governments have formally offered their good offices with a view to reopening them. The offer is being accepted by His Majesty's Government.

Transjordan

The Transjordan Cabinet resigned on the 4th February. The resignation was inspired by King Abdullah, who has expressed the belief that they were no longer capable of governing. A new Cabinet under Samir Pasha Rifa'i was formed the same day.

Persia

Polling is now under way in most of the provinces, except Azerbaijan and Fars, while some constituencies have already sent in their election results to Tehran. As was expected, the Democrat Party has so far secured the majority of votes.

Interest in the elections—never great at any time—is now giving way in Tehran to speculation as to Qawam's line of action in regard to the Soviet-Persian Oil Agreement, due for presentation to the Majlis when it finally assembles. There is general anxiety in the capital; the Shah and many educated Tehranis feel that no ingenuity in drafting the agreement will prevent the Russians from exploiting it to re-assert their authority throughout Northern Persia, from Lake Urmia to the Afghan frontier.

It appears that, as yet, little progress has been made in straightening out the administrative chaos which the Azerbaijan Democrat régime created in that province. Iqbal, the Minister of Health, who visited Tabriz in January, paints a sad picture of the state into which the health and educational services had fallen. A report from the Ministry of Communications indicates that many roads except those leading to the Russian frontier had been neglected, while the section of the railway between Zenjan and Mianeh had suffered a similar fate. Although the Prime Minister alleges that the army in Azerbaijan have done much by their recent behaviour to destroy the friendly feeling with which the population greeted them last year, there is no evidence to confirm this statement, which appears to be an attempt by Qawam to score off the Shah and the army. An accurate appreciation of conditions in Azerbaijan may be made even more difficult by a whispering campaign that all is far from well in the province, which is inspired by the Russians with the object of causing a general feeling of insecurity, and of undermining confidence in any officials sent by the Prime Minister.

The Kurdish chieftains mentioned in last week's Summary have been pardoned by the Shah, and will not be held to account for any past offences. Colonel Zanguineh, Officer Commanding in Rezaieh, left Tabriz for his post on the 2nd February with copies of the amnesty, which are to be distributed among the Kurds by hand or by aircraft. A press report, however, states that Qazi Muhammed, the leader of the former Kurdish Independence Movement, and his brother have been sentenced to death by the Military Tribunal at Mahabad. The report states that the sentences are awaiting confirmation.

The local administration has at last taken steps to alleviate the famine in the Qainat area of East Persia (see Summary No. 363), and has sent 1,700 tons of grain there. It is reported, however, that only about 10 per cent. of it is fit for human consumption.

MIDDLE EAST OIL

On the 26th December, 1946, it was announced that the Standard Oil Company (S.O.C.) of New Jersey had made an arrangement with the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (A.I.O.C.) for the purchase of crude oil over a period of twenty years. The Agreement provided, among other terms, for a preliminary investigation of the possibility of constructing a pipeline from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean which would be partly owned by the S.O.C. of New Jersey.

The same company, in order to provide its affiliates with oil, proposes also to acquire a one-third share in the Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco), and to construct a second pipeline from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean, for which it would share the cost in proportion to its interest in Aramco. A final settlement, it was agreed, would depend on the satisfactory conclusion of surveys now being undertaken and talks in progress.

Another deal, details of which have not yet been made public, is being discussed between the Shell Oil Company and the Gulf Oil Corporation (G.O.C.) whereby Shell would transport to the Far East and there refine and market for a period of ten years the G.O.C's share of the oil produced in the Kuweit oilfield. Annual shipments starting at one million tons would gradually increase to ten million tons. One of the probable results of these agreements, if they materialise, would be that half of the output of the Kuweit oilfield would be shipped by tanker to the Far East, the other half being transported by pipeline to the Mediterranean.

The interest of the United States in projects for the transport of oil from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean is not new. In February, 1944, Mr. Harold Ickes, then U.S. Secretary of the Interior and Petroleum Administrator for War and also President of the Petrol Reserves Corporation, announced that the Administration had agreed with Aramco and the G.O.C. to construct a pipeline which would carry oil from the fields owned by these companies from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. Other producers, he intimated, would be permitted to use the pipeline.

The question duly came up for discussion during the Anglo-American talks on oil supplies which opened shortly afterwards at Washington. An Anglo-American Oil Agreement was signed in August, 1944. Owing to the opposition of the American Oil Companies, however, this Agreement was not ratified by the Senate, and the plan for a pipeline was dropped.

In the case of the present proposals, the Acting Secretary of State has stated that the United States Government have no objection to the agreements, since they do not involve any new concession or development rights.

Oil Groups in the Middle East

It would seem desirable to set down here the nature and extent of the interests of the various oil groups in the Middle East. The S.O.C. of New Jersey, apart from controlling numerous companies, has thirty-three subsidiary companies. The Standard Vacuum Oil Company (S.V.O.C.), one of its affiliates which would benefit from these agreements, was formed in 1933 by the amalgamation of the Far Eastern properties of the S.O.C. and those of the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company. Hitherto its chief source for crude oil was the Dutch East Indies.

The A.I.O.C., which also has many affiliates and subsidiary companies, has its main oilfields in Persia. They are worked under a concession granted by the Persian Government in 1933 for a period of sixty years. The figure for 1945 production is given as 16,839,231 tons. The oil is conveyed by pipeline to Abadan, where there is a large modern refinery capable of refining 19 million tons annually, together with a large plant for the production of aviation spirit.

The A.I.O.C. holds 50 per cent. of the shares of the Kuweit Oil Company (K.O.C.), the other half being held by the G.O.C. A concession was granted to this company in 1934 by the Sheikh of Kuweit for the whole of his territory, excluding a neutral zone in the south claimed both by himself and Ibn Sa'ud.

In Iraq the A.I.O.C. is the sole shareholder of the Khanaquin Oil Company which works the Naft Khaneh oilfield, where production in 1945 amounted to 200,000 tons. It also holds a 23·75 per cent. of the shares of the Iraq Petroleum Company (I.P.C.), which, by the agreement signed with the Iraqi Government in 1931, has a concession for lands east of the Tigris till the year 2000. A similar proportion of shares is held by each of the following companies, the Royal Dutch Shell group through the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company (A.S.P.C.), Compagnie Française des Pétroles and the Near East Development Corporation, a holding company of which the shares are held in equal parts by S.O.C. of New Jersey and the S.V.O.C. The remaining 5 per cent. of the shares is held by Participations and Investments Ltd., representing Mr. C. S. Gulbenkian's interests. The main oilfield is in the Kirkuk area; 4,341,578 tons were produced from it in 1945. Production has hitherto been limited by the capacity of the existing bifurcal pipeline to Haifa and Tripoli. The capacity will be increased from 4 to 7 million tons annually, however, when the duplication of the pipeline, now in progress, is completed. The southern branch is expected to be ready in 1948, and the northern branch in 1949. The refinery at Haifa, owned by the Consolidated Refineries Ltd.—the shares of which are held in equal parts by the A.I.O.C. and the A.S.P.C.—can deal with 4 million tons annually. The I.P.C. also controls the Mosul Petroleum Company and the Basrah Petroleum Company, which has a concession for 75 years for all parts of Iraq not covered by the concessions of I.P.C. and A.I.O.C.

In Arabia, the Petroleum Development (Qatar) Ltd., an associated company of I.P.C., obtained in 1935 from the Sheikh of Qatar a promising concession covering the whole of his territory. Other associated companies of the I.P.C. hold concessions on the Trucial coast and other parts of Arabia, as also in Palestine, Syria, Lebanon and Cyprus. A concession covering the whole territory of Transjordan is on the point of being granted to the company.

Finally, an important party to one of these agreements is Aramco, the shares of which are held in equal parts by the Standard Oil Company of California and the Texas Company. Their original concession rights, granted in 1933 by Ibn Sa'ud for a period of 60 years, were extended in 1939 over territory further westwards so as to include Saudi rights in the two territories known respectively as the "Saudi Arab-Kuweit Neutral Zone" and the "Saudi Arab-Iraq Neutral Zone." The fact that the frontiers between Saudi Arabia and her neighbours Kuweit, Iraq and Qatar have never been demarcated may possibly prove to be an obstacle at some future time in the development of the oilfields in this area. Production in 1945 amounted to approximately 2,840,000 tons (21,300,000 barrels). Oil is taken by pipeline from the Dammam field to Ras Tanura on the coast, where there is a new refinery with a capacity of 70,000 barrels a day, or by a new submarine pipeline to the Bahrein Refinery which has a capacity of 2,750,000 tons annually. An aviation spirit plant is conected with the Bahrein refinery, which belongs to the Bahrein Petroleum Company, the shares of which are held in equal parts by the partner companies of Aramco. The concession, granted by the Sheikh of Bahrein in the first place to Eastern and General Syndicate, was taken over by the Company in 1925 and later extended till 1989. Production in 1945 was one million tons.

Oil Production in the Middle East

Total oil reserves in Iran are estimated at 900 million tons, while those of Iraq and Arabia are both placed at 700 million tons. The reserves of the Kuweit oilfield have been estimated at 600 million tons and those in Qatar at 100 million tons.

In nearly all the oilfields mentioned above, especially in the case of the Kuweit oilfield, potential production is believed to be much greater than the present output. The development of many of these oilfields was retarded or indeed entirely stopped during the war. The following table indicates the large estimated increase from proven resources in these countries during the next eight years:—

Millions of tons

	1945	1950	1955
Iran	16·8	25	35
Iraq	4·8	13·5	20
Saudi Arabia and Bahrein	3·9	15	20
Kuweit	...	15	20
Qatar	...	2·5	3·5
Egypt	1·3	1·5	1·5
Total	26·8	72·5	100

Further supplies may be procured from the development of present or future concessions which are still non-productive. In the meantime it is clear that A.I.O.C. and Aramco will have increasing quantities of oil at their disposal, since they have considerable control over the oilfields which show the greatest promise of expansion.

A proportion of the increased output of the Middle East will be needed for the growing consumption of the British Commonwealth (excluding that of Canada and India). It is estimated that the requirements of Commonwealth countries from this part of the world will increase from the 1945 figure of 25 million tons to about 43 million tons in 1955. This should still leave an increasing balance, which would approximate to 67 million tons in 1955, for disposal to other countries, including the United States. While consumption in the United States is estimated as likely to rise from 225 million tons in 1946 to 275 million tons in 1955, it is believed that her output will decline from 247 million tons in 1945 to 215 million tons in 1955. This deficit of 60 million tons may in part be covered by an estimated increase of 24 million tons in production in the Caribbean area. The balance of 36 million tons will probably come from the Middle East, made up as follows: the proposed agreement between the S.O.C. of New Jersey, and A.I.O.C. will involve, it is said, an amount of 134 million tons which, delivered over a period of twenty years, gives an average of over 6 million tons per year; in addition, U.S. interests should be obtaining in 1955 20 million tons from the Aramco oilfields and 10 million tons from Kuweit.

Pipeline Proposals

In 1944, when the United States Administration put forward its plan, it was suggested that one pipeline would probably link Qatar with Kuweit at Dammam in Saudi Arabia and then traverse the Arabian peninsula to Alexandria or Haifa, with a possible branch to the Gulf of Aqaba, while a second pipeline might link Abadan with Haifa. The idea of Alexandria as the Mediterranean terminal appears later to have been discarded in favour of Haifa, since the Trans-Arabian Pipeline Company, owned by the same companies as Aramco, in January 1946 had obtained a concession for seventy years from the Palestine Government to lay a pipeline through Palestinian territory to a terminal port on the Mediterranean, for the erection of refineries, and for the construction, maintenance and use by the Company of a port or ports in the zone adjacent to the pipeline. This proposal in its turn, however, appears to have been discarded in favour of a course still further north, namely, through Syria. When the Syrian Government objected to this plan, an alternative route through North Palestine with the terminal at Saida in South Lebanon was suggested. The United States, possibly on account of the present, and potential, unrest in Palestine, does not favour the alternative plan and is seeking to have pressure brought to bear on Syria by the other Arab States to agree to the pipeline passing through her territory. Whether the terminal would then be at Tripoli or elsewhere can only be a matter of surmise at present.

The proposed pipeline mentioned in the agreement with the A.I.O.C. would probably start at Abadan and run through Iraq and Transjordan to Haifa, although there is no information as to its course or terminals.

It would seem that some time must, in any case, elapse before negotiations can be successfully concluded with the Governments of some of the Middle Eastern States for the construction of the pipelines through their territories. However, the increase in revenue from royalties, which no doubt would result from such concessions, may be sufficiently attractive to overcome any fears that those Governments may entertain of foreign penetration or control.

Formal representations have been made to the British and United States Governments by the French Government on behalf of the Compagnie Française de Pétroles in which it has a 35 per cent. interest. The C.F.P., representing the only French oil interests in the Middle East, has a 23·75 share in the I.P.C. The Company claims that the Agreements are a contravention of the terms of a secret agreement made in 1928 between the groups represented in the I.P.C. that they would not separately seek concessions in what is known as the "Red Line" area which includes the old Ottoman Empire. While they appear to be irritated in general at being excluded from these deals, their chief grievance is against the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and the Standard Vacuum Oil Company as parties to the 1928 Red Line Agreement for acquiring a one-third share of the concessions held by Aramco. Steps are being taken to test the validity of their claim in the British Courts. In the meantime the American companies have been legally advised that the 1928 Agreement is null and void—apparently on the basis that, under the Trading with the Enemy Act, France technically became an enemy during the last war. Negotiations are now proceeding between the groups of the I.P.C. with a view to settling the dispute. It is understood that the United States Government are awaiting the result of the court action here before taking any steps in this matter.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

Bargaining between the principal Japanese parties failed to produce a coalition Cabinet. The 'old Guard' in the Liberal and Progressive parties grudgingly agreed to the proposal but stipulated that Ishibashi, the Finance Minister, should be retained. The moderates in the Social-Democratic Party persuaded the left-wing to agree to the coalition but their consent was obtained only on condition that Ishibashi should go. Premier Yoshida then hastily dropped the idea of a coalition and re-shuffled the Cabinet so as to include 6 Liberals (including Ishibashi), 4 Progressives and 3 Independents. The younger members of the two Parties are far from happy at this solution and are now taking a hand at the game of forming a coalition cabinet. There is even talk of forming a new Party to stand in the middle of the road between the two conservative parties and the Social Democrats.

The weakness of all the parties, except perhaps the Communist, is that members are still grouped round outstanding personalities rather than bound together by common principles. And the weakness of the whole political structure is that there are too many parties. Moreover the general election was held before the main problems that would face the Japanese Government had been generally appreciated. A new election was obviously necessary but it is significant of the inertia of the Government that it has now been necessary for S.C.A.P. to send a personal letter to the Premier indicating that a general election should be held as soon as practicable after the 3rd April.

Ishibashi is accused by his opponents of allowing the financial situation to get out of hand. The note issue passed the 100,000 million yen mark at the end of January (it was 70,000 million in mid-November). Even Zen, the then-Director-General of the Economic Stabilisation Board, stressed the possibility of a grave economic crisis around the end of March, but Ishibashi blandly stated "it is impossible for me to term the current financial situation as inflationary." The general public would like to know, not what he terms the situation, but what he proposes to do about it. The answer is apparently, nothing: production will presently catch up with demand and all will be well. Watching the hare outdistancing the tortoise by leaps and bounds, the public considers that the race is unfair and is even inclined to impugn the honesty of the handicapper. It is darkly hinted that the Liberal Party is receiving financial backing from the nouveaux riches who are waxing fat on pickings from the black market. These ugly rumours cannot but exacerbate the growing resentment of Labour circles against the Government.

In spite of the verbal warning given them by S.C.A.P. Headquarters, the committee for the general strike on the 1st February refused to cancel their arrangements. They professed to find justification of their attitude in the principle recently enunciated by the Far Eastern Commission that unions should be permitted to take part in political activities and to support political parties. Since they would not listen to reason, General MacArthur on the 31st January ordered them to desist. In a statement issued at the same time S.C.A.P. explained that he could not permit the use of so deadly a social weapon in the present impoverished and emaciated condition of Japan. The paralysis which inevitably would result might reduce large masses of the Japanese people to the point of actual starvation, and would produce dreadful consequences on every Japanese home regardless of social strata or direct interest in the basic issues. He was not prepared to ask the Allied Powers to make good losses in food and other supplies that would be caused by the action of a small minority of the people. At the same time he did not intend otherwise to restrict the freedom of action of Labour for the achievement of legitimate objectives.

Since General MacArthur's action might have been foreseen, the question arises what the Labour leaders expected to achieve by their audacity. They may have hoped that the order to desist would be based on the needs of the occupation forces since these were mentioned in the verbal warning. Or, again, they may have hoped to embroil the General with the Allied Council and the F.E.C. If so, he has once again given them proof of his quality. One significant fact emerges. A year ago the Japanese scurried to anticipate General MacArthur's least desire. Now it has needed an order to induce the union leaders to cease from action which they knew to be directly opposed to his wishes. S.C.A.P. is known to blame the recalcitrance of union leaders on Communist agitators. Japanese newspapers generally welcomed S.C.A.P.'s action while inclined to lament that the irresolution on the Government had made intervention necessary. But in an appeal sent to S.C.A.P., to the Allied Council and to the F.E.C. and also issued to the press, the Yokohama strike committee criticised S.C.A.P.'s order on the two-fold score that (a) the "small minority" consisted of 2,600,000 Government workers and their familes; (b) the general strike was an indispensable means of democratising Japan. This latter assertion has a curious ring. It suggests that the form of democratization desired is fashioned after a Soviet model. But possibly the emphasis should be placed merely on the right to strike. According to the press, the Welfare Ministry has mobilised half a million repatriates to aid the removal of reparations equipment, which is expected to start shortly.

French Indo-China (see under "France")

The contrast between the war-rent coastal States and the relatively peaceful interior kingdoms was vividly illustrated by a recent festival which a correspondent did not hesitate to describe as "a memorable day in the annals" of Cambodia. The ceremony, which was "celebrated with due pomp and popular rejoicing" was none other than the anointment of a new sacred white elephant. Taken in conjunction with the restoration of the lost provinces, the consecration was regarded as a happy augury of the reign of the young King.

The impression gained is of a people quite content to build on the past. It is conceivable that the masses in Viet-Nam would also be prepared to progress in gradual stages. Unfortunately, for the realisation of this French dream, the communist Viet-Minh, who now hold the administrative machine in their firm grasp, are determined to advance per saltum. The replacement of the High Commissioner and the Commander in Tonking, if confirmed, will be taken as a turning-point in French policy. Foreign observers seem generally agreed that the High Commissioner's action in setting up a Provisional Government in Cochin-China was, at least tactically, a blunder calculated to defeat its own object. At the same time the Viet-Nam Government, by its constant broadcast suggestions of a truce, strengthens the view, which seems to be gaining ground in official circles in France and which has been suggested to the French Government by the U.S. Ambassador on orders from his Government, that discussions should be resumed, however distasteful such a course may be after the treachery of the 19th December, 1946.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

General Marshall held his first press conference as Secretary of State on the 7th February. The occasion excited unusual interest, and more than a hundred newspaper correspondents were present. Speaking for the first thirty minutes in answer to written questions, the General touched upon every important aspect of current United States policy—the United Nations, disarmament, the Moscow Conference, Argentina, Poland, Palestine, tariffs and relief, trusteeship and China. He said that it would be his aim, as it had been that of the President and of Mr. Byrnes, to make the influence of the United States felt in world affairs by doing all that was possible to strengthen and perfect the United Nations. The statement which Mr. Austin had made in the United Nations Security Council on the 4th represented the "well-settled and thoroughly considered opinion" of the United States Government on the question of disarmament, and there would be no "repetition of the tragic consequences of unilateral disarmament" which occurred after the first World War. As far as the forthcoming Moscow Conference was concerned, the Soviet Embassy had now informed the State Department that no more than fifteen to twenty American correspondents could be accommodated (a position likely to cause dismay among publicity-minded Americans, both inside and outside the newspaper world), but the Soviet authorities were being pressed to increase this figure. On Argentina there had been no change in the position previously announced by Mr. Byrnes (see also under "Latin America"). In the Far East, the American Marines, having almost completed their task of evacuating the Japanese from China and Manchuria, would be withdrawn from those countries and only a small force would remain to secure communications.

At one point General Marshall went out of his way to express his satisfaction with a series of proposals on the delicate subject of tariffs which had just been issued by Senators Vandenberg and Millikin, the Republican Chairmen of the Senate Foreign Relations and Finance Committees respectively. These proposals, which were worked out after long conferences with Mr. Acheson and Mr. Clayton at the State Department, call upon Congress to take no action on the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act until the Act itself expires in June, 1948. In return they ask the President to give the United States Tariff Commission greater authority in reviewing tariff adjustments and to insert "escape clauses" in all future trade agreements so that these can be abrogated if they become detrimental to vital American interests. The proposals thus represent some advance towards a modus vivendi between the President and the Republican majority in Congress on matters of economic policy abroad. Both Mr. Truman and Senator Vandenberg are clearly anxious that there shall be a measure of understanding on these matters. In his letter to Congress of the 5th February, which accompanied his 200-page report on the participation of the United States in the United Nations, the President had emphasized the desirability of pursuing "without hesitation bi-partisan policies of economic co-operation with the rest of the world in such matters as economic reconstruction and development and the expansion of world trade and employment." On the previous day, in declining the President's invitation to accompany General Marshall to the Moscow Conference, Senator Vandenberg pointed out that one of the reasons why he felt it necessary to remain in Washington was that Congress still had to work out a policy of international trade and international relief.

Not all Republicans, however, are likely to see eye to eye with Senators Vandenberg and Millikin on the tariff question or on the necessity of granting economic assistance to other nations. At the moment a member of Senator Vandenberg's own delegation from the State of Michigan, Representative Fred Bradley, is pressing hard for America to exact her pound of flesh under war-time agreements by compelling Great Britain to return the ships which have been on loan since 1944. Hearings on a concurrent resolution calling for the immediate return of the ships are at present being held by the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which Mr. Bradley is the Chairman. Much confused testimony has already been given by Admiral W. W. Smith, of the United States Maritime Commission, who apparently feels that the 306 merchant vessels in question should be reclaimed without further ado. On the other hand, Mr. Clayton, who has also appeared before the Committee, maintains very firmly that the question is one for negotiation by the State Department, and he has emphasized that His Majesty's Government are in any case willing to buy a large number of the ships (particularly those of the Liberty type) and to return the rest by June, 1948.

The American press continues to display a lively interest in the affairs of Europe and the Middle East. More than usual prominence is being given to the news from Palestine, where the evacuation of non-essential British civilians and the other recent security measures are generally believed to betoken a policy of greater severity on the part of His Majesty's Government. The American Zionists are said to be greatly perturbed about the possibility of martial law being proclaimed in Palestine, and the State Department feels that a violent campaign will be launched against this country in the United States if any such drastic step is taken. A full explanation of recent measures has, however, been communicated by His Majesty's Government to the U.S. Embassy in London, and it was presumably on the basis of this that General Marshall was able to assure the press at his conference on the 7th February that he did not think that "strong military tactics" would be employed in Palestine. General Marshall also stated that he was being kept fully informed "of the very delicate and critical discussions" on Palestine in London.

In domestic affairs the President has been the dominant figure of the week. On the 3rd February Mr. Truman turned the tables on those Republicans who have been clamouring for a curtailment of the Presidential war powers by boldly asking Congress for a year's extension of his authority to control the distribution of scarce foodstuffs and to regulate certain exports under the Second War Powers Act. He has also again asked Congress to revise the Presidential Succession Act of 1886 so that, in the event of his death, the Presidency would go to the Speaker of the House of Representatives or to the President pro tempore of the Senate (both of whom are elected by the people), instead of to the Secretary of State or to the Secretary of the Treasury (the present heirs, who are not elected to office, but appointed by the President himself). Meanwhile the House of Representatives has mustered the requisite two-thirds majority for a constitutional amendment to limit the tenure of office of any President to two terms. To become effective the proposed amendment requires similar endorsement by the Senate and then ratification by 36 of the 48 States. On the 6th February, at a dinner in New York, the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Mr. Robert E. Hannegan, threw out a hint that Mr.

Truman might be called upon to run for a second term in 1948. In any event the President's prestige is clearly rising once more from its nadir last October. The results of a Gallup Poll published on the 3rd February indicate that 48 per cent. of Americans now approve of the way in which he is handling his job—as against only 32 per cent. four months ago.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Organisation

Mr. Messersmith has now returned to Buenos Aires, and in conversation with H.M. Ambassador has expressed confidence that the United States Government intend to settle the question of relations with Argentina without delay.

Such a settlement would permit the resumption of Pan-American meeting, and in particular the holding of the Rio de Janeiro Conference on Hemisphere Defence. So far as is known, the United States remains committed to a policy of complete standardization of military equipment for all the American Republics, and it is probable that the Economic Mission from the United States now in Argentina is attempting to put over this point of view. Whether the Argentines will accept it is another matter, though it seems likely that United States prices will be artificially lowered by subsidies, loans or rebates.

Chile

The Argentine-Chilean agreement (see Summary No. 373) is expected to be ratified shortly by the Chilean Senate. It stipulates that Chile shall spend her credits in Argentina, unless the Argentine Trade Promotion Institute is unable to supply goods required at competitive prices, in which case Chile may obtain the necessary foreign exchange from Argentina. This arrangement gives Argentina an obvious measure of control over Chilean purchases abroad.

The Agreement with Argentina offsets to some extent Chile's considerable commitments in the United States. Chile accumulated large balances of dollars in the years 1942 to 1944; these led to large currency issues in Chile, which strongly accentuated the already serious inflation. The cost of living has soared steadily; foodstuffs are now five times their 1928 price, while persistent strikes by the "workers" have brought about the strange state of affairs in which an engine-driver is paid more than a High-Court judge. Ever-rising costs and uncertain future face Chile's two industries, nitrate and copper, and the Government and industrialists have been doing their best to develop alternative means of wealth. These include iron smelting, chemicals, textiles and canning. Most of such activities appear to rely on continued assistance from the United States—the Concepcion Steel Works alone will cost U.S. $33 million. Whether Chile, with her high labour costs, will be able to produce steel at exportable prices is highly problematical. Meanwhile, the inflationary trend persists, Chile continues to accept all possible credit from the United States, and public finances deteriorate: and by the end of 1945 the note circulation was ten times that of 1930.

Nicaragua

Presidential elections took place on the 2nd February. President Anastásio Somoza, having finally accepted the fact that he could not stand in person, chose as his successor Dr. Leonardo Argüello, an elderly physician who has several times stood unsuccessfully as Liberal candidate for the presidency. He was in fact the sole candidate in 1936, when General Somoza seized power before the elections could be held. Dr. Argüello went into exile at the beginning of the Somoza régime, but soon returned, was reconciled, and became Minister of Interior until July 1944. The opposition candidate, Dr. Enoc Aguardo, was supported by the Independent Liberals and Conservatives.

Complete results are not yet to hand, but the Government have announced that Dr. Argüello has been elected. The Opposition has protested that as the electoral machine was controlled by the Liberals, and opposition observers, though present at the polling booths, were excluded from the count, the results are fraudulent. These complaints are probably not without foundation.

Venezuela

The Government has launched a Press campaign against a possible rising on behalf of ex-President López Contreras, and this, coupled with recent promotions in the army, appears to have lessened the tension.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Disarmament

The main point of disagreement in disarmament discussions is still the amount of independence that the Atomic Energy Commission should enjoy, with the U.S. representative championing the cause of independence, though in far more conciliatory terms than formerly, and the Soviet representative trying to secure that the right to ban atomic weapons should be entrusted to the new Disarmament Commission, which the Security Council may set up.

Five countries have submitted disarmament resolutions. The last of these, U.S.A. proposed that all fields of disarmament should be explored simultaneously. A Committee should be set up to advise the Security Council on all practical measures for disarmament, safeguards, &c., with the exception only of that part of the problem which the Assembly had entrusted to the Atomic Energy Commission. On the 4th February the Security Council adopted an Australian proposal that Representatives of the five countries to submit resolutions, Australia, Colombia, France, U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. should form a Committee to try to evolve an agreed text to submit to the Security Council. After three sessions the Committee agreed to put before the Council a draft containing the matters on which it agreed, and also the U.S. reservations on Atomic Energy with which it disagreed. The U.S. have made it known that they will oppose the whole resolution if the reservations are not accepted.

According to the agreed parts of the draft resolution, the Security Council is asked to resolve to give practical effect to the Assembly resolution of the 14th December, 1946, "to consider as soon as possible the report submitted by the Atomic Energy Commission and to take suitable decisions to facilitate its work," "to set up a Commission consisting of representatives of the members of the Security Council" to make proposals on the problems of disarmament, safeguards, &c., and to report what progress they have made within three months. The Commission shall guide the work of the Military Staff Committee and other organs of the United Nations on disarmament, and request the Military Staff Committee to produce "as soon as possible" the recommendations on Article 43 of the Charter (U.N. Security Forces), for which the Security Council had asked it on the 15th February, 1946.

Greece

The Security Council decided on the 10th February by 9 votes to nil, Russia and Poland abstaining, that the Commission of Enquiry in Greece had no right to request the Greek Government to suspend the execution of condemned rebels, unless it considered that the condemned would prove useful witnesses. (See under "Greece.")

The Corfu Case

On the 31st January the Security Council decided to defer hearing the U.K. complaint against Albania to a later meeting to be called by the Chairman. Had the Council accepted the Russian view that it should wait until Albania's representative arrived, its prestige would have suffered; since there was no certainty that Albania was making all haste to send a representative. On the other hand, it would have been unsatisfactory for the Council to consider the complaint in Albania's absence; especially as the Secretariat of the United Nations had not made all possible haste to get into touch with Albania. By its decision the Council combined dignity with common sense.

Economic and Social Council

Human Rights Commission

On the 3rd February the Commission resolved that "The Chairman of the Commission, the Vice-Chairman and the Rapporteur undertake, with the assistance of the Secretariat, the task of formulating a preliminary draft of the International Bill of Human Rights, in accordance with the instructions and decisions of the First Session of the Commission. This draft is to be submitted to the Second Session of the Commission for thorough examination. In the course of this work the Chairman may enlist cooperation, and shall receive orally or in writing any observations and suggestions from any member of the Commission. The Chairman may also consult experts with the approval of other Governments members of the United Nations." The body thus set up has come to be known as a "working group." The paper which they hope to produce is a "working paper," since the view is generally held that little progress is possible in defining human rights without some draft or paper to work on. An attempt was made to extend the work of the working group by asking it to study proposals on the question of execution and enforcement of the Bill of Rights and to make recommendations to the Commission at its Second Session. As the result of some opposition, including that of the U.K. representative, who considered that it was premature to consider the question of execution and enforcement until the Commission had a definition of human rights, a compromise was reached under which the working group was asked to explore the field and to study the proposals put forward for the benefit of the Commission at its next Session. The Russian representative persisted in his objection to this widening of the functions of the working group and withdrew his support for the resolution setting up the group. Among the proposals which will be studied by the group is one put forward by Colonel Hodgson (Australia) suggesting that there should be an International Court of Human Rights, similar to that put forward by the Australian Delegation at the Peace Conference.

There has been a general tendency among delegations to envisage a Bill of Rights covering a very wide field, including political rights. If this tendency develops too far it may gravely prejudice the success of the Bill. However, the Russian representative went significantly far in the opposite direction when, in the course of the general debate on the contents of the Bill, he urged the omission of the following concepts: prohibition of slavery and compulsory labour, right to petition National Governments and U.N., the non-retro-activity of penal laws, right of property, freedom of movement and freedom from oppression. He claimed that most of these rights and freedoms were either superfluous, beyond the present power of the United Nations or impinged on the local laws and customs of national States.

International Refugee Organisation

The U.K. representative, Sir Alexander Cadogan signed the Constitution of the I.R.O. on the 5th February, bringing the total signatories to eleven, and the proportion of the first year's budget guaranteed to 69·80 per cent., the U.K. contributing 14·75 per cent. The organisation will come into being when fifteen States have signed and 75 per cent. of the budget has been guaranteed. Meanwhile the Preparatory Commission of I.R.O. began its first meeting on the 11th February in Geneva. Its main task is to "provide for an orderly transfer of the functions and assets of existing organisations." It will continue in existence until it is possible to elect a Director General for I.R.O. itself. So far the following countries have signed the Constitution, U.K., Canada, U.S.A., France, Netherlands, Norway, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Liberia, and the Philippine Republic.

GERMANY

The Foreign Ministers' Deputies for Germany in their meetings of the past week have been largely concerned with questions of procedure (but see under "Scandinavia" and "Soviet Union"). In Berlin considerable progress has been made in preparing the Control Council's report for the Foreign Ministers. This does not mean that when completed it will give one coherent account of administration in Germany since the occupation; although on some topics agreed reports have been drafted, in many cases the Occupying Powers have only agreed to differ, and thus several independent statements have been included. Even this procedure has necessitated a good deal of give and take in discussions—which have been aided by Russian anxiety to secure a report of some kind, however voluminous.

The deadlock over the Berlin Trade Union elections (see Summary No. 379) has now been broken. At the meeting of the Kommandatura on the 11th February a compromise between the American and Russian views was reached after the French representative had undertaken the task of mediation—at Russian instigation. The Russians conceded that a uniform ratio between the delegates of the F.D.G.B. and its members should be established for all districts of Berlin, and that the Greater Berlin Conference should not be able to exercise the right to reject delegates elected by the district unions because they are politically displeasing to them. The Conference will only be able to confirm the legality of these elections. On the other hand, the U.K. and U.S. representatives withdrew their objection to the new executive consisting of 45 instead of 30 members. It should now be possible to hold elections fairly soon. Despite the display of Russian indignation against the other representatives, the F.D.G.B. itself has apparently shown no inclination to adopt an intransigent attitude or to attempt to carry through the elections on the basis of the 1945 procedure.

In the continuing cold weather discomfort and real hardship persists throughout Germany. It is now reported that in the Schleswig-Holstein Landtag on the 15th January, the Communists alone hesitated to blame the Occupying Powers for the coal crisis, and a resolution was carried unanimously stating that no blame devolved upon the German authorities and that it was entirely a Military Government responsibility. In Berlin, where extensive electricity cuts have been in force since the beginning of November and have necessitated the closing of several industries the position now seems somewhat improved. In January electricity was cut off for four hours daily in the Soviet Sector, 8 hours in the French and U.S. Sectors and as much as 14 hours in the British Sector. As from the 15th February cuts have been reduced to a uniform four hours daily (one hour less than in Great Britain). The effect of the cuts has probably been felt less in the industrial sphere than in the homes of the Berliners where personal hardship has undoubtedly been severe. A British Military Government official, however, made a statement on the 17th February showing that the Germans have tended to exaggerate the crisis (there have been somewhat hysterical debates in the City Assembly). There are from 12–16 days' stocks of hard coal at the generating stations and gasworks, and there has recently been a surplus in deliveries from the Ruhr—although no reasonable household distribution is possible. The British medical authorities also oppose the Germans' contention that there are great shortages of hospital beds, saying that the position is as good as anywhere else in Europe. It is maintained that deaths from cold in the whole of Berlin between the 1st December and the 5th February numbered 68 which, though serious, is far below German figures of about 130–150 for the same period.

A statement on the future policy of His Majesty's Government towards displaced persons in the British zone of Germany was circulated by Mr. Hynd in the House of Commons on the 19th February. The aim will still be to encourage and assist displaced persons to return to their countries of origin, but no one who is not a traitor or war criminal will be compelled to do so. The proposed International Refugee Organisation will take some time to get working effectively, and in the meantime displaced persons still in Germany will be brought within the ordinary machinery of direction to useful work so that they may become self-supporting. They will be protected from discrimination or hostility on the part of the Germans. A measure which will help to combat such hostility is the proviso that the standards of living of displaced persons, which have in some respects been higher than those of the Germans, will be brought into line with the latter. Every effort will also be made to preserve cultural and welfare organisations "so long as these do not lend themselves to political activities or act as a deterrent to repatriation." On the 31st December, 1946, a total of 270,836 foreign displaced persons and former prisoners-of-war were held in or registered at assembly centres in the British Zone while 1,832,810 had been repatriated. Of those remaining 137,639 were Poles, 82,415 Balts and 12,492 Yugoslavs.

The text of a communication from the South Schleswig Association to the Allied Control Council in Berlin was published on the 12th February. It is largely on the lines of a memorandum sent to the Danish Government in September 1946. It requests the political recognition of the South Schleswig Association and separation of Schleswig from Holstein to form an independent area. The point is made that the Association asked at the same time for an administrative separation of Holstein and Schleswig. The repetition of this latter request, which has the support of the Danish Government, at the same time as the demand for complete severance from Germany indicates that the Association is not unduly hopeful of attaining its ultimate aims. It is asked that South Schleswig should be placed under a special administration of a form to be determined in the Peace Treaty, for example by the appointment of an international commission or the establishment of some other form of self-government under the United Nations or by the formation of an autonomous area administered by the resident population. All refugees must be removed within a fixed number of years. Whereas formerly the Association suggested that an international or Scandinavian mandate should be followed later by a plebiscite to determine the final status of the area, international administration now appears to be considered as a possible permanent alternative to autonomy or inclusion in Denmark—although it is stated that the population must have the right to decide whether it wishes later to ask for a final decision on the question of the national status of the area on the basis of self-determination. Execution of the present scheme, the memorandum states, should be dependent on the results of a plebiscite in South Schleswig from which all persons not born in South Schleswig who entered the area after the 30th January, 1933, would be excluded. This referendum, however, could be dropped if the Peace Conference considered it unnecessary. As regards German opinion it may be noted that in the Schleswig-Holstein Landtag on the 15th January the Association demanded full recognition as a political party, but the motion was decisively rejected, although Social Democratic speakers were conciliatory in tone. The law for elections to the Landtag has also been passed without making provision for the Association to enjoy the benefits of a reserve list (see Summary No. 374). It is nevertheless possible that this matter may be discussed again before the Land elections, which have been postponed from the 30th March until the 20th April in the whole of the British zone.

AUSTRIA

The Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London have discussed further points in the political clauses of the Austrian Treaty during the past week. On the 11th February the Deputies accepted the texts proposed by the Political Sub-Committee for articles on the recognition by Germany of the Austrian State; franchise and democratic institutions; human rights; the recognition of the peace treaties with the ex-satellite nations; the liquidation of certain international institutions; bilateral treaties; and the restoration of archives.

When the Deputies came to discuss further the prohibition of any Anschluss in the future, there was a clash between General Clark and M. Gusev on the inclusion of a ban on "Pan-German propaganda in any form whatsoever." General Clark's view was that Pan-Germanism "like democracy, had very different meanings in Russian and English," and he feared that the inclusion of such a phrase in the treaty might give the Soviet Government an opportunity to interfere in Austrian affairs. He did not want any interference with such matters as the freedom of the press and of speech, to which he knew the Soviet Government "attached less importance than did his own." This aroused the indignation of M. Gusev, and he protested against General Clark's statement on the alleged intentions of the Soviet Union. General Clark was prepared to include some phrase such as "Pan-Germanic propaganda in favour of such a union"; but his fears of the ultimate Soviet intentions in Austria have been well demonstrated in his battles with the Soviet members of the Allied Council in Vienna, and he is determined not to put in the treaty words which are not perfectly clear and could be construed later to give the Soviet, or any other, Government an opportunity to interfere in Austria's domestic affairs.

On the 13th February M. Gusev opposed a proposal by the other three deputies that, in this same article on an Anschluss, which states that Austria should do nothing to impair her political and economic independence, the words "or territorial integrity" should be included. The matter is referred to the Foreign Ministers for decision. The unagreed text of a clause on the dissolution of Fascist organisations is also to be submitted to the Ministers. The Political Sub-Committee, in consultation with the Military and Economic Committees, is to prepare a draft giving articles which have been agreed, articles which have been partially agreed, and unagreed articles, as a basis for the final report which the Deputies have to submit to the Foreign Ministers.

On the 14th February the Deputies heard the Yugoslav and Austrian representatives amplify their previous statements on Yugoslavia's territorial claims. Here again, the three Deputies for the United States, France, and the United Kingdom took one side, rejecting the Yugoslav claims, while the Soviet Deputy maintained that the claims should receive further study on the grounds of Yugoslavia's rôle in the war and Austrian oppression of the Slovene minority. This matter too goes to the Foreign Ministers for decision.

At this meeting Dr. Gruber, the Austrian Foreign Minister, was present, and agreed to a clause in the treaty binding Austria to maintain the principles of the laws passed during the Allied occupation, but M. Gusev is pressing for a definite undertaking to keep in force all the provisions of the severe denazification law and other laws passed by the Allied Commission.

On the 15th February the French, United States and United Kingdom Deputies agreed on the maintenance of Austria's 1937 frontiers, with the Soviet Deputy pressing his wish for further consideration of the Yugoslav claims. The Italian Government is to be consulted on the question of including the Austro-Italian agreement on the South Tyrol. (There has been growing Austrian dissatisfaction lately at the failure of the Italian Government to implement this agreement, and Dr. Vollger, one of the South Tyrolese who helped to negotiate it in Paris, said recently that he doubted whether Italy would fulfil her obligations any better now than she did in 1919.)

In Vienna the Allied Council met on the 14th February. It discussed ordinances concerning the iron and metal industries and as no agreement was reached they will come into effect by default. The Soviet member, however, pursued his policy of refusing to accept this, in spite of the Control Agreement's provision, and said that he would not carry the ordinances out in his own Zone, but would safeguard property of the United Nations affected by them in accordance with his own views. After inconclusive discussion of trade with Germany, the Council came to the questions on Herr Piesch, Landeshauptmann of Carinthia, and on war criminals, set by the Deputies in London. General Kurasov strongly supported the Yugoslav contention that Herr Piesch, in taking over authority in Carinthia from the Nazi régime had accepted power from the Nazis after negotiation with them and within the framework of Nazi laws. This allegation was founded on reports published in the Kärntner Zeitung at a time when that paper was entirely under Nazi direction. The French member strongly supported the United States and British members' opinion that the allegation was "not capable of substantiation from an unbiased source." General Cherriére pointed out that Herr Piesch as Mayor of Villach in 1933 had been labelled "Public Enemy Number One" by the National Socialists, and had had to take to the hills after assisting partisans in 1944. The Council's report to the Deputies contains the majority view of the three members, and General Kurasov's dissenting view.

On the subject of war criminals no more satisfactory agreement was reached, and the Council's report contains the separate definitions of a war criminal, a description of the policy pursued, a note on extradition procedure and statistics of results obtained up to the 1st February, 1947, by each Element, with a fifth report from the Austrian Government covering their policy for arrest and trial and statistics.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The signing of the Peace Treaty with Hungary has been the occasion for Czechoslovak spokesmen to comment regretfully upon the deadlock continuing in the Slovak-Magyar dispute. Czechoslovakia evidently sees no change from pre-war days in the Hungarian attitude, which the Czechs interpret to be a failure, ever since 1918, to admit the break-up of the old Empire, and an implication that Hungary hopes to exploit the presence of the Magyar minority in southern Slovakia to its own ends. If no change has been evident in the Hungarian outlook, which is that of a rump empire trying, understandably, to prevent the shrinkage of the territory still occupied by its nationals, the Czechoslovak Republic has certainly been forced to modify its own views. It believes that the multi-national state, in this part of Europe, has been proved an impossibility; consequently, it abandoned its former minorities policy, and set about the task of establishing a nation-state. It secured the support of the Great Powers in the major part of this work, but the sanction given at Potsdam for the expulsion of the Germans. It was unable, however, to solve the Magyar problem with the same rapidity, and the misgivings concerning the advisability of sponsoring further expulsions felt by the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom, led these Powers to postpone the issue, and later to advise Czechoslovakia to try direct negotiation. Czechoslovakia attempted to find a partial solution, by signing the head-per-head Exchange Agreement of February 1946, which would have disposed of one-fifth of the minority; one-half of the remainder, it was hoped, would be assimilated and the other half, the "hard core" of 200,000, would be expelled. The anniversary of the apparently still-born February Agreement finds Czechoslovakia with the problem almost entirely unsolved, and with Hungary, so far successfully, staving off any solution which would mean a final recognition of Czechoslovak sovereignty over territory still mainly Magyar in its national composition. (See also under "Hungary.")

Since the onset of winter, which has been unusually severe, Czechoslovakia has been obliged to ration the consumption of fuel and power supplies in an attempt to maintain the production targets required by the Two-Year Plan. January statistics claim that the Plan has been fulfilled in its first official month by most branches of industry; in some instances, such as textiles, locomotives, and agricultural, radio and electrical equipment, a 20 per cent. margin has been achieved. In motor cars, artificial fertilisers, rayon and particularly building materials (cement, bricks, etc.) output is from 10 to 40 per cent. below the target figures. This month cannot hope to be so successful, as, according to an emergency appeal on the 13th for assistance in clearing blocked marshalling-yards, a phenomenal blizzard has hit the vital Ostrava coalfield, and has thus reproduced some of the conditions obtaining at the moment in Britain.

The success of the Two-Year Plan depends largely upon overcoming the man-power shortage, which was, of course, aggravated by the German transfers. The Government have resorted to a variety of methods, some of which will take time to bear fruit. These methods include long-range rationalisation of industry, and the return of Czech and Slovak settlers from other European lands, as well as short-term improvisations, such as voluntary "shock-brigades," emergency labour conscription (see Summary No. 378) and the importation of "friendly" foreign labour. Thus, for example, General Svoboda, the Minister of Defence, has recently welcomed the first groups of Czechs to arrive from the territory of the former Volhynian Government. These Czechs are descendants, now numbering 45,000, of members of the Mennonite religious sect (including also Germans) who found greater freedom in the Ukraine under Catherine II, after 1786, than further west under Teutonic domination. Many were members of the General's Czechoslovak contingent of the Red Army during the war. The movement is being effected by virtue of the Citizenship Exchange Agreement signed in Moscow on the 10th July, 1946. By this Agreement, also, Russian, Ukrainian and Belorussian settlers in Czechoslovakia were given the right to opt for Soviet citizenship; the time-limit for these prospective Soviet citizens has again been extended, to mid-March. It is expected that by summer, over 100,000 repatriates will have returned from France, Austria, Germany, Roumania, Yugoslavia, and Volynia.

As regards foreign labour, use is to be made of surplus man-power in Bulgaria, Roumania and Italy. An agreement signed in Rome, on the 10th February, arranges for the recruitment of 5,000 Italian workers, including Sicilian miners, for one year, with option for renewal for a further year. The Italians will sign individual contracts with their Czech employers, and enjoy the same working conditions, pay and insurance, as Czech workers. They will be permitted to send home their pay up to the value of £7 (married) or £4. 5. 0. (single) per month. The Agreement will stimulate the export of coal to Italy.

For the possibilities of a Franco-Czechoslovak alliance see under ("France").

POLAND

The Polish Resettlement Bill received its second reading in the House of Commons on the 11th February. In the words of Mr. Ede, the Home Secretary, the Bill's primary purpose "is to enable Departments to take over the functions which have been performed by the Interim Treasury Committee for Polish Questions." The Committee came into being on the 5th July 1945, with the object of caring for the welfare and education of Poles in the United Kingdom. Mr. Ede said that His Majesty's Government had knowledge of some 213,000 Polish nationals. Of these, 127,000 were now in the United Kingdom; 25,000 were overseas, and 61,000 had returned to Poland or emigrated elsewhere. Of the 127,000 in the United Kingdom, 65,400 had opted for the Polish Resettlement Corps; 19,600 had opted for repatriation or emigration; 15,400 were still undecided after the various alternatives had been put to them, and 26,600 had not yet been approached. The various alternatives were described by Mr. Ness Edwards, Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour:—

> "There are three alternatives—to emigrate, join the Resettlement Corps and take up civilian employment in this country, or go back to Poland. If they decide to emigrate we will pay their fares and give them allowances. If they go back to Poland we will ship them there, and give them certain allowances when they land there. If they join the Resettlement Corps and enter civilian employment, again they will get certain allowances. But if they say, 'We will do nothing,' in order to remain a charge on this country, then the Government must take some action in order to get a decision."

In fact, seven days' notice to decide had already been given to 200 Poles who had refused to make a choice, and this would henceforth be the rule, he explained, for anyone from the day he declared a similar intention.

On the question of using the Poles as an armed force, and with particular reference to Mr. Churchill's statement that he had always intended to send 180,000 to the Army of Occupation in Germany, Mr. Ede said that such a suggestion had never been accepted by His Majesty's Government. In establishing the Resettlement Corps, Poles had been brought into a Unit of the British Army for disciplinary purposes. They were unarmed, and were being steadily prepared for absorption into civilian life.

> "We do not regard," said Mr. Ede, "any of the people who remain in this country as being available as military personnel, if at any time there should be disputes or trouble in Poland. We are determined that, as far as we are concerned, they are not to be regarded as the nucleus of some anti-Warsaw Government army in this country."

Poles who wished to join His Majesty's Forces would be able to do so, and the Home Secretary hoped they would soon be able to become British citizens. The number of Poles to be enrolled, and the highest rank permissible to them would be fixed by the Bill. No Pole would be forced to return to Poland against his will, although H.M. Government wished that as many as possible who felt that they could return with safety to Poland should do so as soon as possible. Those remaining in Britain would, if possible, be assimulated into the British way of life. After the statutory five years' residence, they would, it was hoped, be able to benefit from the provisions of the naturalization laws.

More details of the amnesty projected by the Polish Government have been given by President Bierut. Political prisoners in very large numbers are expected to benefit, and a chance is to be offered to "nearly everybody in conspiracy" except murderers. It has been reported that even members of the former London Polish Government may benefit, as well as the Polish officers in the United Kingdom, recently denationalized by the Warsaw Government. The full text of the law has, however, still to be published. The amnesty is expected to last for three months, after which period it will probably be possible to discern the Polish Government's genuine aims and intentions.

Polish comment on the present fuel crisis in the United Kingdom might perhaps have served as an opportunity for the promotion of the friendly relations with the Western Powers, recently mentioned by the Prime Minister, M. Cyrankiewicz. In fact, the humour of such press comment as there has been displays a cheapness equalled only by the virulence of the poisonous malice which so clearly inspired it.

SOVIET UNION

Generalissimo Stalin's elucidation of his views on the Anglo-Soviet Treaty, delivered in a message to the Secretary of State dated the 10th February, contained no surprises. As anticipated, the reservation of which he complained proved to be that in Article 4 of the Treaty, which stated that the obligation of either of the Contracting Parties to come to the assistance of the other in the event of attack by Germany or her satellites would remain in force until the High Contracting Parties, by mutual agreement, recognised that it was superseded by the adoption of the proposals referred to in Article III (1) of the Treaty for common action to preserve peace and resist aggression in the post-war period. The Generalissimo further stated that the first part of the Treaty had lapsed in view of the achievement of victory over Germany and intimated that the text of the Treaty would demand certain other amendments and additions.

It was hardly to be expected that the Soviet press would express sympathy with the British fuel crisis. It has not been dealt with specifically, but Izvestiya, on the 12th February, came out with a full-dress criticism of the achievements of the Labour Party to date. Hitherto remarkably little attention has been paid to internal developments in the United Kingdom. In view of the present difficulties of the U.S.S.R. this may have seemed to the authorities an excellent opportunity of showing their public that conditions are as bad, or worse, in a capitalist country. The main points of the article were that nationalisation, particularly in the coal industry, had not been opposed by the ruling classes because they were glad of Government assistance in re-equipping backward industries and because the compensation had been so generous that their financial position was untouched. This applied also to the nationalisation of the Bank of England. In the case of iron and steel, however, the "bastion of the power of the ruling classes," the Labour Government had been forced to yield to the protests of "monopoly capital" and to abandon its programme. The failure of the housing programme, leniency towards rising Fascist organisations and the refusal of equal pay to women were other features singled out for criticism.

New Times gave a cautious though interesting analysis of the present feelers on the part of Conservative elements in the direction of a coalition. Admittedly the Labour Government had disappointed everyone, but it was too soon for the British elector to have forgotten why he turned down the party of Churchill and Eden. Mr. J. B. Priestley was quoted to show what the British people were longing for were dramatic and exciting changes. A coalition would not satisfy them, for the Labour Party was unpopular chiefly for its too close resemblance to its predecessor, particularly in the field of foreign affairs.

In view, presumably, of the exchanges between London and Washington over the question of strengthening the Anglo-Soviet Treaty, a number of articles have been devoted to Great Britain's increasing subservience to the United States. The well-known Soviet economist, Academician Varga, said that Mr. Bevin's policy of "invariably presenting a single front with the U.S.A." was being opposed, not only from the Left, but from the extreme Right, as represented by Mr. Amery. The British people as a whole were beginning to feel that the burdens resulting from the war and the fruits of victory were being unequally distributed. "The law of unequal development is nothing but the law of the imperialist wolf pack, under which the strong suppress the weak, and this law is fully applicable to the U.S.A. and Great Britain." A commentary on the American loan stated that Great Britain's transformation into a junior partner of the U.S.A. was the loan's inevitable corollary. It was not merely that Britain would have to sacrifice certain privileges of her colonial monopoly or cede some part of her empire—the whole independence of her foreign policy was at stake.

M. Molotov has protested to the American Ambassador over a statement made by Mr. Acheson before a Senate Commission of inquiry on the 10th February, which included the remark that Russian foreign policy was "aggressive and expansionist." The Soviet note described the statement as "a blatant slander"; the American reply was to the effect that restrained comment on a matter of public policy was not a slander.

Despite these attacks on the strongholds of capitalism, a lengthy disquisition on the peaceful co-existence of different social systems by Dr. Lemin was broadcast from Moscow on the 9th February. This theme has occasionally been brought forward of late in Soviet propaganda, the most notable occasion being the use of it more than once by M. Molotov in one of his U.N.O. speeches in October last year. Dr. Lemin pointed out that just as many disputes had occurred in Paris during the peacemaking in 1920, when there were no differences in ideology as in 1946, when these loomed so large. He quoted numerous statements by Stalin in support of the thesis of peaceful co-operation, going back to the Fifteenth Party Congress of 1927, when he had said that the basis of Soviet relations with capitalist countries consisted in allowing for the existence of two opposite systems. One could not develop into the other, but they could continue side by side. Dr. Lemin concluded by saying that the principle of allowing for the peaceful co-existence of different social systems was not a temporary slogan of expediency but a permanent feature of Soviet foreign policy.

Delegations from the Lebanese Society of Friends of the U.S.S.R. and of the Syrian Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R., headed by their respective Presidents, have just arrived in Moscow at the invitation of Voks. The Societies, which are mainly Communist, appear to have been formed in 1945. The leader of the Lebanese delegation, Antoine Tabet, is a member of the Central Committee of the Lebanese Communist Party and has recently visited France, where he was received by M. Thorez! The Soviet press, though still cautious, has had a slightly pro-Arab orientation in discussing Palestine during the week.

M. Saburov has again been made a deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers, bringing the number up to ten. In 1941 he was deputy Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars but from 1943 onwards he was apparently seconded to other work. In 1945 he was Assistant Chief of the Soviet Administration in Germany and participated in the Potsdam Conference.

Most of the results of the elections to the Supreme Soviets of the Union Republics have now come in, nearly all showing a monotonous total of over 99 per cent. of the electorate polling and an almost equal percentage of votes cast for the candidates of the Communist and non-Party bloc. As usual, Politburo members were given the honour of being selected as candidates in various republics, Generalissimo Stalin on this occasion being nominated in all 16. The degree of publicity accorded to various members of the Politburo confirms earlier indications of M. Molotov's coming definitely second to the Generalissimo, with Beriya and Zhdanov as third and fourth. Although the elections are certainly not elections as we understand the term, and are mocked at in private by many Soviet citizens, still they are not wholly negligible. They are used as an occasion for the masses to demonstrate their confidence in the Party and Government and they gave the more naïve element of the population the illusion of active participation in the affairs of State.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

The Danish statement on the future of Germany, dated 5th February, consists of two parts, the first dealing with Political, the other with economic questions. It also has two annexes, of which Annex 1 sets out the importance of Germany to Denmark's pre-war economy and the consequences for Denmark of the plan for Germany's industrial disarmament, while Annex 2, very much shorter, reiterates the demand for the repatriation of German refugees still on Danish soil.

It is interesting that among the political questions the Danes have been careful to enumerate—under Section (6)—Measures to Safeguard the Privileges of Non-German Groups of Population—most of the demands originally put forward in respect of the Danish minority in South Schleswig alone. By thus making these demands a matter of interest to any country which has a minority inside the German frontiers—if there is such an one—the Danes obviously hope to gain the support of such country, with beneficial results for their own minority in Schleswig. With one exception the demands themselves are not new, being those which the Danes have persistently put forward on behalf of the Schleswig Danes; but in the penultimate paragraph of this Section (6) the creation of a "special body of an international character" is proposed, which organ is to decide "with binding effect for German authorities" such questions as may be submitted to it by members of the population groups in question.

As regards the South Schleswig question itself, the statement does not deviate from the attitude taken up in the Danish Government's statement of the 19th October, 1946, and it emphatically reiterates the protest against the admission into German Schleswig, on equal terms, of the "foreign refugee element," the settlement of which is said to be contrary to the wishes of very large numbers of the "indigenous population"—thus again avoiding to mention the Schleswig Danes alone. This paragraph ends with the well-known general complaint that the accumulation of these refugees also constitutes a threat to the future security of Denmark, which conveniently overlooks the fact that other countries with land frontiers have to face a foreign population across their border. (See also under "Germany.")

The section of the statement dealing with economic questions is perhaps more interesting, since it gives a good deal of factual information. On the general problem of Germany's economic reorganisation it takes the line that Denmark is as disinclined as are her Allies to allow economic considerations to be the only decisive factor, but that, when security considerations do not constitute the decisive factor, needless restrictions on German participation in the economic life of Europe ought to be avoided. It also suggests that the final restoration of the country to its position as an efficient factor in the economic life of Europe is dependent on it not becoming disintegrated by tariff or other economic frontiers.

In regard to reparations (while expressing the hope that it will be possible to obtain compensation from current German production and that special privileges may be granted to individual countries in the form of concessions or compensations in kind), the statement makes no specific demands but merely reserves the right to set forth Denmark's wishes in this respect "with due regard to the principle of equality."

Annex 1 provides an illuminating survey of the important rôle played by Germany in Denmark's pre-war economy. Germany met roughly one-fourth of Denmark's normal import requirements, but within the total of such imports she was, for instance, Denmark's sole supplier of chemicals, her principal supplier of most of the important dyestuffs, her only important supplier of sulphate of ammonia and potash for fertilising purposes, and the supplier of more than one-half of Denmark's pre-war imports of raw materials and semi-manufactures of iron and steel. At the same time Germany was also the sole or predominant buyer of live cattle and live pigs, horses and especially also of perishable commodities like offals and the less valuable kinds of fish. In fact it is made clear that continued economic relations with Germany must be considered of decisive importance for the full utilisation of Denmark's productive capacity and the maintenance of a reasonable standard of living in that country.

In view of this, the Danish statement emphasises, Denmark views with much concern the possible realisation of the reparations plans hitherto known, which assume an average curtailment of Germany's industrial capacity by about 50 per cent. It is pointed out that Denmark has, for instance, found it impossible to satisfy anything like the existing demand for the supply of raw materials and semi-manufactures of iron and steel hitherto imported from Germany; and that the replacement of heavy and light machinery and machine tools originally imported from that country and for which spare parts are now needed which cannot be obtained elsewhere, would require capital investment, the magnitude of which could not at present be gauged, an expenditure which could be avoided if the continued working of the existing plant could be secured by the delivery of spare parts from the original makers. Similar concern is shown in regard to the proposed scaling down of Germany's output of chemical raw materials. The dependence of Denmark on foreign fuel is also given prominence and it is suggested that she be allotted a certain share of the German output of coal.

Annex 2 mainly reiterates Denmark's demand for the repatriation of the German refugees, which, incidentally, it is stated, are interned in sixty-one camps and twenty-nine other encampments, and concludes with a categorical pronouncement that "Denmark is under no conditions willing to absorb the German refugees into the Danish community." On the other hand, it is also pointed out, the Danish Government cannot take the responsibility on humane grounds of keeping these people in continued confinement.

At the twentieth meeting of the Conference of Foreign Ministers in London the hearing of the Danish Delegation headed by Count Reventlow was the first item on the Agenda. According to reports so far to hand, little of further interest transpired, and, compared with the Dutch and Belgians, whose force and clarity they lacked, the Danes are said to have made a somewhat indifferent impression. Count Reventlow read out a summary of the original statement of his Government.

Sweden

On the 10th February, M. Undén, the Swedish Foreign Minister, speaking at Gothenburg, denied that Sweden was isolationist. In joining the United Nations Organisation, he said, she had pledged herself to active co-operation in the promotion of the aims of that body. But he protested against the contribution payable by Sweden as being excessive. Her external financial engagements amounted to some three thousand million kronor (more than 200 million £ sterling) and caution would have to be observed before extending further credits. Nor was Sweden quite ready to join the new international refugee organisation, since it was not yet clear whether on joining she would be credited with the fifty million kronor which she had promised to contribute in an agreement concluded regarding German assets—and which sum would shortly be paid. As regards Sweden's adherence to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction, M. Undén stated that no bill would be submitted yet to the Swedish Riksdag, because these steps come up for consideration in conjunction with the plan for the United Nations commercial organisation. He also repeated the importance that Sweden attached to the Great Powers' veto and said that any attempt to diverge from this cardinal principle lay outside the realm of practical politics.

FRANCE

The drafts of the U.K. and French Governments for the proposed Anglo-French treaty of alliance were exchanged at the Foreign Office on the 14th February. The French draft had been approved that morning by the French Cabinet. M. Bidault seems determined to press on with the negotiations and is not disturbed by the fact that the Foreign Affairs Committee of the National Assembly, while voting in favour of the signature of the treaty before the opening of the Moscow Conference, has urged him to press for adequate recognition of France's need for security against Germany. The Communists continue to minimise the good effects which would result from the alliance, but M. Blum is devoting himself to its justification.

The French Government also announced on the 14th February that discussions with the Czech Foreign Minister during his visit to Paris for the signature of the peace treaties had resulted in agreement between the two Governments to open negotiations "within the framework of current international discussions" for strengthening collaboration between the two countries. Such negotiations would start from the agreement of the 22nd August, 1944, which declared the Munich agreement to be null and void. A Franco-Polish pact is also in the offing, and a statement may be made on the occasion of the signature of a Franco-Polish Cultural Convention on the 19th February. Both the Czech and Polish Governments pressed for the conclusion of pacts with France last summer, but the French Government were then unwilling to commit themselves, particlarly in view of the objections expressed by H.M.G. These objections, in the opinion of Mr. Duff Cooper, would be largely discounted by the preliminary conclusion of an Anglo-French alliance, and M. Bidault has given assurances that negotiations with Poland and Czechoslovakia will not be started until after the alliance has been signed.

French reactions to the fuel crisis in this country are sympathetic. The moral is drawn that both France and Britain need compensation from Germany to repair the effects of the war, and that both countries must also accept the need for foreign immigrants.

Paris is again without newspapers. The printers' men struck on the evening of the 13th February and their demand for higher wages has so far been refused by the Government. Papers therefore ceased to appear all over France on the 14th, and it seems that the strike may be of considerable duration. The Communist leaders of the C.G.T. are not wholly in favour of the strike, and an incident is reported to have occurred at the offices of L'Humanité when members of the staff of the paper evicted a strike picket from the telephone switchboard. The wages question as a whole remains unsettled, and there was a token strike of employees in all public services on the 14th February in protest against the Government's refusal to meet their demands in full (see last week's Summary). Negotiations are being held between the Government and the trade unions on the question of the minimum wage, but M. Ramadier declared in the Assembly that there could be no question of granting a general wage increase. The date of the new 5 per cent. cut in prices has not yet been announced. The Government have thus failed so far to take any decisions on the major problems which face them.

M. Tanguy-Prigent, Minister of Agriculture, has been visiting the United States and Canada to ask for seed wheat. Considerable quantities are needed for the spring sowings in France since the autumn-sown wheat was very severely damaged by frost. H.M.G. have not been able to accede to the French request for a loan of seed wheat; they are willing, however, to try and help the French to transport any wheat they may secure in America.

M. Schuman, Minister of Finance, revealed to the Finance Committee of the Assembly on the 12th February, the budget figures for this year. Total expenditure is estimated at the huge figure of 1,150 milliard(1) fr., of which 660 milliards are for the ordinary budget, 360 milliards for the extraordinary budget (reconstruction and special military expenditure), 70 milliards for the re-equipment of nationalised industry and 60 milliards for grants to local authorities. Budget receipts are estimated at 550 milliard fr. M. Schuman hopes, however, to balance the ordinary budget. The Cabinet has already approved the extraordinary budget, but the Assembly will only be asked to vote 60 per cent. for the time being as the Minister feels that the French economy cannot bear the full burden unless the ordinary budget is balanced and economic conditions improve generally. It is pointed out that a further 100 milliards must be invested by private industry if the Monnet Plan is to be carried out.

ITALY

Demonstrations were held throughout the country on the 10th February, the day of the signing of the Peace Treaty and the Constituent Assembly stood adjourned for half an hour as a protest "against the very harsh conditions of the so-called peace treaty imposed on the nation." When the sitting was resumed Count Sforza, the new Foreign Minister, stated that the Italian Representative in Paris had been allowed, before signing, to submit a formal statement to the Secretary-General of the Conference in these terms: "The Italian Government appends its signature to the Treaty, subject to ratification by the sovereign decision of the Constituent Assembly which, according to Italian law, is invested with the approval of international treaties."

Count Sforza also sent the following note to the Allied Governments:—

"In signing a treaty which it was not called upon to negotiate and which must be submitted to the Constituent Assembly the Italian Government wants to prove that it faces squarely those painful acts as the only way to hastening the advent of a constructive peace in the world. But the first duty of my Government is to act with absolute loyalty towards the signatory Governments and their peoples. In the spirit of this loyalty it is well to remember that peace treaties cannot be carried out unless they are upheld by the moral conscience of the people who sign them. The

(1) 1 milliard = a thousand million.

Italian people is conscious of having acted under pressure from that régime which later drove it into war, that régime which so many people abroad sustained by lavishing their praises upon it. The Italian people could only demonstrate its true character to the world by being the first nation in the Axis camp to free itself from an oppressive régime and by then offering to the Allies during the war of liberation a number of direct and indirect advantages, for which not enough justice has been given. The Italian Government believes it is both for the common good and in the direct interests of the great democracies that they should review their attitude to and dealings with the Italian problem, which is an essential part of the problem of world reorganisation. We may well admit innumerable past errors, but our expiation has already been so hard that we look forward to a revision of that which might paralyse or poison the life of forty-five million people living upon a soil which cannot possibly nourish them."

The next day, Mr. James Dunn, the new United States Ambassador to Italy, said, during the course of a Press Conference, that a large part of public opinion in the U.S. was favourable to revision of the Treaty with Italy, although any decision on this subject would, of course, be the concern of all the United Nations. According to the Popolo (Christian Democrat newspaper) he added that in his opinion if Italian law required ratification of the Treaty by the Constituent Assembly, the Treaty would not be effectively valid without such ratification.

Mr. Bevin has sent a message to the Italian people in which he says:—

"For nineteen centuries there was no war, no hint of war, between the people of our islands and the people of your peninsula. To-day the signing of this Treaty means that friendly relations can be restored as they existed of old. Despite the interlude of Fascism, now we hope buried for ever, we can remember that the Italian tradition of liberty and democracy, and of solidarity with the peaceful nations of the world, was never really extinguished. We saw that in the last phases of the war the real Italy—the Italy inspired by the spirit of Mazzini and Matteotti—awoke and arose in successful revolt against Nazism. We want Italy to live, to thrive and prosper as a member of the community of peace-loving nations. The chance is now offered to all of us to rebuild the world as we want it; with hard work and goodwill we can succeed."

The Italian Press reports that naval officers and men have met in Naples and passed an order of the day protesting against the "so-called peace treaty" and urging the members of the three services who have allied decorations to return them on the ground that such decorations "are now merely the symbol of a bitter mockery."

(For Italo-Czechoslovak Trade Agreement see under "Czechoslovakia.")

THE VATICAN

The formal ceremony of the signing of the Peace Treaties with Italy and the satellite States of Germany on the 10th February was made the occasion for a characteristic broadside on the Allies by Osservatore Romano. The Allies are taken to task in particular, of course, for their repudiation of moral principle as a result of association with the Red beast of Moscow. "Let us remember," says the writer sagely, "amid protests by those on whom the treaties are inflicted, that the responsibility does not lie so much with men as with events. This is no longer a peace negotiated between combatants, but between allies, united for different motives, on the same side and pursuing their several aims through that peace." (Which is to resurrect the pet thesis of General Franco and his Spanish friends about the co-existence of two different wars.) The writer then sheds a tear for the vanished Atlantic Charter. The Allies' ship, he says, was forced to shift course, and make for port under very different conditions and in different company from what had been the original intention, and during their unfinished journey, of which Moscow is the next stop, they had lost overboard justice, logic and commonsense. "From the chrysalis of ideals the butterfly of practical negotiations emerged." Then follows the usual lament over the subordination of justice to other considerations. The makers of the treaties (which are described as "dictates") should take heed—especially with regard to Germany—that peace, properly speaking, means the revival of trust and collaboration, and that justice subsists, nevertheless, in the minds of men transforming to-day's sentiments of regret into to-morrow's confidence and a rapprochement among the peoples who never wanted war. "Nations do not die; they survive and remember . . . ."

Hungary

Regret that the first year of Hungarian democracy's greatest efforts had met with "little but contemptuous criticism or malicious intrigue" tempered the general tone of cordiality with which Mr. Bevin's message to the Hungarian people on the signing of the Peace Treaty was received. As to the Treaty itself the most optimistic appraisal of it could find little to say in its favour beyond an expression of satisfaction that Hungary would hereafter be entitled to the blessings of peace, notably the return of her prisoners of war, the restoration of her sovereignty, with all that the term implies, and release from the cost of supporting an army of occupation. Significantly enough the burdensome economic conditions have aroused less bitter comment than the fact that the minorities outside her frontiers have obtained no guarantee that their human and civil rights will be respected.

The context of the complaint which the Hungarian Treaty Delegation in Paris incorporated in a Note to the Great Powers is the continued deportation of the Magyars in Southern Slovakia. The Czechoslovak proposals to implement the February Agreement on the exchange of populations (see last week's Summary) have not led to a renewal of negotiations, since from the Hungarian side it is affirmed that they entail wide departures from the original scheme entirely in Czechoslovakia's favour. Czechoslovak circles, for their part, disregard, or disbelieve, the statement of M. Szakasits that Hungary will abide loyally by the heavy terms imposed upon her. In her hope of a "resurrection", they see irredentist designs and a violation of the Treaty which forbids her to conduct revisionist propaganda. Particularly they condemn the publication of a "Blue Book" dealing with the labour mobilization of Magyars both as a stubborn misrepresentation of facts and as an attempt to disrupt the unity of Czechs and Slovaks by suggesting that the latter are to blame for the present situation. Interference in Czechoslovakia's internal affairs in connection with the general labour obligations and systematic infringement of the Repatriation Agreement are alleged in Notes which General Dastich has handed to the Hungarian Government.

M. Nagy appears tacitly to have approved the withdrawal, on the intervention of the Communist Minister of the Interior, M. Rajk, of the first edition of the Smallholders' evening paper which contained a Declaration drawn up by the Smallholder Peasant Deputies and unanimously accepted by the Party. The Declaration condemned in the strongest terms attempts to cause dissension in the Smallholders' ranks and demanded the immediate appointment of a Parliamentary Committee to conduct an impartial investigation into the charges of conspiracy against the Republic. The left-wing bloc, however, resisted this proposal on the ground that machinery adequate for the purpose already existed, and the motion which found its way to the Agenda of the National Assembly was subsequently removed therefrom at the instance of a Smallholder Deputy, M. Istvan Kovacs. A further concession to the Left has been the decision taken by the Smallholders' Political Committee to return to the policy of peasant radicalism as laid down in Bekes in 1930. Though their main concern will be the welfare of the peasants, they pledge themselves to promote the interests of the intelligentsia, the small bourgeoisie and the workers. While remarking that deeds must follow words, the Communist newspaper, Szabad Nép, views the step with guarded approbation. As the Smallholders were formerly what their name implies—a Party representing the interests of the smaller landowning peasants—until Communist discouragement of any Conservative or even Right Central Party attracted to them the support of voters for whom their programme was merely the lesser evil, left-wing pressure would now seem to be urging them back to the point which it had forced them to surrender.

M. Nagy has obtained a vote of confidence from the Political Committee and the Parliamentary Group of the Smallholders' Party. The seven diplomats recalled to answer charges of complicity in the plot are reported to have been deprived of their citizenship in consequence of their failure to return within the given time limit.

Roumania

The Peace Treaty which was signed a week ago contains (Article 36) a somewhat hesitant provision on the subject of the navigation of the Danube. The history of Danube navigation was dealt with fully in a special article in Summary No. 377 of 22nd January. Up to 1940 Roumania's position was exceptional amongst the riparian States, as all the three channels of the delta were in Roumanian territory. The inclusion of Bessarabia in Russia made Russia a riparian State, since the northern bank of the most northerly channel was now Russian territory. From that time onward the Danube question has been largely concerned with ever-expanding Russian claims, and with what she was prepared to allow to other countries. After opposing the inclusion in the Peace Treaties of any reference to the Danube, Russia eventually consented to the article providing for free navigation. That article—while Russia is in a position to control the course of events—cannot be said to have achieved much. (See Summary No. 378.) Following on the treaty provisions, details are to be worked out at a Conference at which the riparian States will be represented and also Great Britain, the United States and France. It is probable that the two former Commissions will now be replaced by a single Commission. The British view is that such a Commission is necessary to preserve the international character of the river, and to prevent action being taken which would be disadvantageous to interested, but non-riparian countries. A preliminary problem is to secure agreement between Great Britain, America and France. Each of these countries has its own point of view. France would like to take part, but does not wish to lay herself open to a claim from Russia to an interest in the Rhine. America is not sure if she wants to be let in for permanent membership of a Danube Commission. The British point of view is that all international rivers should be brought under the United Nations, and, until that is done, is anxious that the interests of all the non-riparian users should be safeguarded. When that comes to pass Great Britain would not feel so strongly about non-riparian membership of commissions for any particular river. Great Britain's legal position is a strong one, for, when the Peace Treaties come into force, the Definitive Statute of 1921, by which the whole of the Danube was brought under international control, again becomes operative. The details of the forthcoming Conference have not yet been decided upon, but it would seem to be most suitable that the meeting-place should be at some place on or near the Danube, which possessed the advantage of not being within any definite sphere of influence.

On the 19th January the Peasant Party newspaper Dreptatea published an outline of the Peasant Party programme of the future. It is to be "a social democracy from the juridical point of view, a Liberal-Socialist State from the politico-economical point of view, and a Workers' State from the social point of view." Dl. Maniu's aim seems to be to base his programme on that of the British Labour Party, providing for nationalisation, but not restricting private enterprise in small concerns. The older members of the party are not likely to be sympathetic, but he has hopes of the younger ones. In this connexion a somewhat formidable essay which has recently appeared on "The Situation in Roumania" indicates that ability is not wanting among the younger people, but does not suggest that the Labour programme would as a matter of course commend itself to them.

Mr. Platt-Mills, M.P., has been interviewed by the Central European Observer and gives the following account of the achievements of the present régime. Solution of the nationalistic and racial problems; the gaining of the workers' confidence, thus enabling an increase in industrial production; revolutionary measures taken against the drought, and transport of peasants from drought-stricken areas to do work in Bucarest so that "there is more rebuilding and reconstruction activity in Bucarest than in any other 'European' town, with the exception of Stalingrad." All of which is pure invention. Racial problems are far from being solved, and with regard to the Jews, the present Government have made matters decidedly worse. So far from industrial production having increased, it has fallen disastrously in all branches of industry. Thousands of Moldavians have been left to die of starvation, while there was not enough labour in Bucarest to clear the streets of snow after the last fall. In point of fact, the amount of war damage compared with many other places was comparatively small. However, this latest effusion may have done some good, as it has definitely discredited Mr. Platt-Mills in the eyes of the Roumanian public.

The Bank of Roumania has been nationalised. A period of ten days was allowed for application from all shareholders for payment of their holdings. His Majesty's Government have asked for this period to be extended in the case of British shareholders to three months, and in the meantime "reserve the rights of British shareholders."

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Government have suggested that it might be of great assistance to Brigadier Maclean if he were to have a Yugoslav Liaison Mission at his disposal. While there would be obvious disadvantages in the attachment of representatives of the Yugoslav Government to the Maclean Mission, and it would involve a risk of forcible repatriation in cases where this would be unjustified, yet acceptance of limited help from the Yugoslavs on questions of identity and the furnishing of evidence may assist a satisfactory solution of the Yugoslav refugee problem in Italy. This possibility is being considered. The U.S. Government have made a suggestion that American representatives should be attached to Brigadier Maclean's mission for the purpose of securing camps under joint Allied control.

The Yugoslav authorities have taken steps to encourage voluntary repatriation by announcing that of all the exiles who have returned so far, only ·4 per cent. have been prosecuted for criminal acts. Attention has been drawn to the Amnesty Decree of August, 1945, whereby all members of the Royal Yugoslav Armed Forces, except senior officers and those who have acted against the interests of the State, may return with impunity. Moreover, it has been stated that even those who have lost their citizenship by remaining abroad, including četnici and members of the quisling organisations (i.e., Serbian Volunteers Corps, Domobranstvo, &c.), may make individual applications to regain their citizenship, provided of course that they have committed no crime against the Yugoslav people. A special transmission from Radio Belgrade informed displaced persons of the material benefits, such as holidays with pay, to be had in Yugoslavia, besides the spiritual joys of a free religious life in the bosom of a "truly national Orthodox Church."

For some time there have been few public references to the "traitor Maček," and it appears that the Government have once more been trying to enlist the support of the Croat Peasant Party, holding out promises of greater autonomy for Croatia, the Presidency of the Croat Government for Dr. Maček, and posts in the Central Government for other Party leaders. But the Croats are traditionally cautious, and such bait is not likely to be swallowed without long and careful mastication.

There has been much publicity for the proceedings of the United Nations Commission in Greece (see under "Greece"), and for the Greek Government's alleged efforts to "tidy up" for the benefit of the Commissions. The removal of property from Pola has been denounced as a violation of the Duiro Agreement. Austria's participation in the war against Yugoslavia has been emphasised. The latest intrigue attributed to the British and Americans is a plan, submitted to a former Ustaši for his approval, to form a Danubian Confederation under the Archduke Otto of Austria or the Duke of Windsor.

Greece

The United Nations Commission's continued dalliance in Athens caused widespread dissatisfaction among all except the Communists. The Albanian, Bulgarian and Yugoslav spokesmen took up several days of the Commission's time by making long and tedious speeches, mainly devoted to counter-charges against the Greeks, having little bearing on the matter which the Commission were sent to investigate. The Commission have also come under criticism for agreeing to hear statements from EAM and from the Greek Confederation of Labour before proceeding to Northern Greece. Substantial agreement has, however, been reached that the 18th February alone should be devoted to the hearing of these statements and that on the 19th the Commission should transfer their base to Salonica where organisations not heard in Athens will be given an opportunity to air their views. The Soviet delegation are insisting that a team must be left behind for investigation in Southern and Central Greece and in the islands.

Meanwhile there has been a recrudescence of bandit activity. Reports have now come in of an attack on the 20th January by a band of 300 who retired into Albania. Vicious attacks have also been made against Konstandia, a Nationalist village in the Ardea plain, where 26 people were killed, and against Sparta where the bandits overpowered the entire police force and released 232 prisoners, many of them left-wing sympathisers. It is possible that these two recent incidents, which have afforded no evidence of foreign assistance, have been staged in order to demonstrate that they are quite feasible without it.

The new Maximos Government have shown both courage and an appreciation of Greece's need for economy by reducing their own numbers by well over half. The revised Cabinet now consists of:

M. Tsaldaris: Vice-Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs.
M. Venizelos: Vice-Premier and Minister of Navy, National Economy and Merchant Marine.
M. Kanellopoulos: Minister for Air and Public Order.

M. Papandreou: Minister of the Interior.
Gen. Gonatas: Minister for Public Works, Transport and Reconstruction.
M. Alexandris: Minister for Justice.
Gen. Zervas: Minister without portfolio.
M. Stefanopoulos: Minister for Economic Coordination and Labour.
M. Khelmis: Minister for Finance and Supply.
M. Stratos: Minister for War.
M. Papadimos: Minister for Education.
M. Kotsianos: Minister for Welfare and Health.
M. Hadjipanos: Minister for Political Coordination and Posts and Telegraphs.
M. Papathanassis: Minister for Agriculture.
M. Rhodopoulos: Governor-General of Northern Greece.

The press has stated that the Governorates-General of Central and Western Macedonia and the Aegean Islands will be suppressed and those of Crete, Epirus and Thrace retained only as administrative appointments.

Bulgaria

For the reasons already set out in Summary No. 375, His Majesty's Government decided, although with some misgiving, to extend de jure recognition to the Bulgarian Government directly after the signature of the peace treaty. This decision was made known to them in a note which was handed on the 11th February by Mr. Tollinton, the acting British Political Representative at Sofia, to M. Dimitrov. The note continued as follows:—

> "His Majesty's Government wish, however, to make it clear that the grant of de jure recognition in no way implies that they consider either the past methods employed by the Bulgarian Government to consolidate their position or the conduct of the recent elections to have been in keeping with the spirit and intentions of the Yalta Declaration on Liberated Europe. But they have taken into consideration the obligations accepted by the Bulgarian Government in Article 2 of the peace treaty and have decided to accord them de jure recognition in the hope that it is the intention of the Bulgarian Government henceforth to fulfil in the spirit as well as the letter their pledge to secure to all persons under their jurisdiction the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of expression, of press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting. His Majesty's Government sincerely desire the well-being of the Bulgarian people. They will watch with close and friendly interest the course of future developments in Bulgaria, the disposition of the Bulgarian Government towards His Majesty's Government and the spirit in which the Bulgarian Government fulfil all their obligations under the peace treaty, and they will thereby determine their attitude to the Bulgarian Government . . . ."

The note was published in all the Sofia newspapers on the 13th, together with the Bulgarian Government's reply. This expressed satisfaction at the British decision and undertook to do everything for the greatest possible development of friendly relations. The Bulgarian Government would "naturally fulfil the obligations contained in Article 2 of the treaty." With regard, however, to H.M.G's criticism of the methods employed by them in the past, this appeared to them to take no account either of the special conditions in which the Fatherland Front was formed or of the struggle which had been necessary to exterminate Fascism and to prevent its revival.

The interview which M. Dimitrov gave Mr. Tollinton on the 11th was remarkably friendly and lasted for an hour and a half. He maintained a polite and reasonable attitude in discussing Anglo-Bulgarian relations, saying that he would welcome the extension of cultural and commercial contacts between the two countries. (It may here be noted that, if only for the purpose of securing goods—such as machinery—which they urgently need for reconstruction but find they cannot obtain from the U.S.S.R., many Bulgarian officials as well as business-men do seem genuinely anxious to get on better terms with the Western Powers.) M. Dimitrov further told Mr. Tollinton that he would personally guarantee that Bulgaria would loyally fulfil all her obligations under the peace treaty. But he could not spare a good word for the leaders of the Opposition. This did not prevent him, however, from making a fairly conciliatory speech in the Assembly later in the day—if the spider can ever be called conciliatory to the fly! Evidently addressing the back-benchers, he is reported to have said that the Government were quite ready to collaborate with "honest and patriotic Opposition members": they realised that "in the last elections about a million people who were not Fascists or reactionaries had voted for the Opposition"; but now that the treaty had been signed, their proper place was in the ranks of the Fatherland Front. It was not true that the Government were intending to expel the Opposition from the Assembly. On the other hand their leaders were "sabotaging the Government's efforts" to prepare against the supply difficulties expected in May or June; and they must be held in check.

Twenty-four of M. Lulchev's supporters, including his daughter, were sent to prison on the 10th February in connexion with the "bogus Byrnes speech" case (see Summaries 367 and 371). On the 12th four "Neutral Officer conspirators" were sentenced to 15 years' solitary confinement and eighteen others to shorter terms of imprisonment (see Summaries 373, 377, 378 and 380). On the 15th it was announced that 43 more army officers—members of the "Military League"—were about to be tried for alleged conspiracy. Outstanding among these figures the name of General Kiril Stanchev, the former Second Army Commander, who fell into the militia's hands last August (see Summary 357). Again, almost all the accused are stated to have admitted their guilt. The militia see to that.

Turkey

The Turkish budget, as finally passed by the Grand National Assembly on the 30th December last, shews expenditure at £T.1,136 million, revenue at £T.1,021 million and a deficit of £T.114,983,530 (say £10 million sterling). The expenditure is much greater than ever before, and the heavy deficit, a familiar feature in recent years, is to be met by internal loans and Treasury bonds. The excess of expenditure is due in large measure to the Soviet war of nerves which compels the Turkish Government to keep the army mobilised. While thus obliged to devote 35 per cent. of their resources to military purposes, the Turkish Government have to face the various direct and indirect consequences produced by keeping more than half a million men under arms: lack of labour, high cost of living, suspension of social and economic schemes, a growing sense of frustration and impatience among the men forced to endure a protraction of the rigours of life in the Turkish army. Upon the discontent which it has thus generated Moscow does not fail to play, demanding artlessly in repeated broadcasts why Turkey is the only country not to have demobilised.

At its congress mentioned in Summary 379 the Republican People's Party appears to have turned down the idea of reintroducing religious teaching in schools, but to have decided in favour of the opening of private theological schools. M. Tanriöver, who first raised the question, has stated that he will start a movement for modernising Islam.

Towards the end of January the Minister of the Interior presided over an administrative conference at Angora of about thirty valis (governors of provinces). Since these officials can be described as the backbone both of the Administration and of the Republican People's Party, there is perhaps some substance in the Democratic Party's constant complaint that the Administration is weighted against it.

In general the Turkish press did not take a clear line on the break-down of the Anglo-Egyptian negotiations, but Yalçin and Sadak consistently condemned the Egyptians for wanting to sever the British connexion. The Turkish Government have no illusions about the supreme importance to Turkey of the maintenance of British bases either in Egypt or elsewhere in the Middle East. At the same time they are eager, as soon as the Egyptian Government is less preoccupied, to make a treaty which would add Egypt to their Arabic-speaking friends—Iraq, Transjordan and Lebanon.

When sounded by the Syrian Government with a view to trying to reach some sort of a compromise over the Hatay (district of Alexandretta), the Turkish Government sent back a flat refusal. They suspect the Soviet Government of encouraging Syrian territorial pretensions in order to create a precedent for demanding a discussion about Kars and Ardahan. But the Syrians feel strongly enough about the matter, without any Soviet incitement, to take it to U.N.O. This would be regrettable, and both countries would be well advised to seek a compromise in the economic sphere without raising the territorial issue at all.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

There is no news of the reply which the Egyptian Government are to make to the offer of the Syrian and Lebanese Governments to mediate in the Anglo-Egyptian question, and it is clear that Nokrashi Pasha is somewhat embarrassed by it. He had decided on appeal to the United Nations because he was convinced that Egyptian public opinion was against any continuance of negotiations from a belief that Great Britain was out to direct the Sudan towards separation from Egypt.

In the debate in the Senate on 12th February Sabry abu Alam Pasha, the Secretary-General of the Wafd, criticised the Government for failure to decide upon the international organisation to which it would appeal before breaking off the negotiations, but, at the same time, called upon the Prime Minister to declare that negotiations were no longer a means of settling the question. The debate was adjourned until 17th February.

In the Chamber of Deputies the Minister of Commerce and Industry is reported by the press to have said that the submission of the Egyptian case to an international organisation was in order to claim the nullity of the 1936 Treaty.

Ibrahim Abdul Hadi Pasha has been appointed Chief of the Royal Cabinet. Ibrahim Pasha has been Minister of Finance in Nokrashi Pasha's Cabinet since it was formed two months ago. He is a Sa'adist. The appointment is but one of a number of indications that the King is determined to keep Nokrashi in office as long as possible as the only alternative to the Wafd, and it is coming in for a good deal of criticism because it has previously gone to a non-party man. Nahas Pasha failed to sign the King's book on His Majesty's birthday in protest.

The appointment has resulted in a reshuffle of the Cabinet. Abdul Maguid Badr Pasha, a fairly recent adherent to the Sa'adist Party, becomes Minister of Finance and his place in the Ministry of Commerce and Industry goes to Mamdouh Riaz Bey (Sa'adist). Aly Abdul Raziq Bey becomes Minister of Waqfs (Religious Foundations).

Palestine

A final meeting with the Jewish Agency representatives was held on 13th February, and the Anglo-Arab conference came to an end on the following day. At both meetings it was announced that His Majesty's Government would refer the Palestine problem to the United Nations, without making any recommendation in favour of any one solution. The Arabs, who had all along expected this result, opposed the plan for cantonisation which had been put forward by the British delegates and maintained their stubborn opposition to Jewish immigration as also their claim that they have always rejected the mandate and the Balfour Declaration. In a written memorandum they argue that the Arabs of Palestine have an inherent right to independence which has been denied to them for the past twenty-five years, and that, if this right is not to be for ever withheld, there is no need for a Trusteeship; and they oppose partition in any form.

The representatives of the Jewish Agency showed themselves no less intransigent. They contrasted the admission of 4,000 immigrants a month for two years with the 100,000 in one year for which the Morrison plan provided. They interpreted the British proposal as meaning that, after five years, Palestine would become independent with an Arab majority, which was "the antithesis of the mandate," in which, they remarked, no mention occurs of an "independent State." Ben Gurion argued that the main object of the mandate was the establishment of the Jewish National Home, and it was clear that, in the Zionist view, an independent Palestine with a Jewish majority would not be open to the same objections. Dr. Goldman, who is known to favour partition, urged that His Majesty's Government should propose it to the United Nations as a solution, and there appears to be some prospect that a partition scheme may eventually be put forward by the Jews, although the area left to the Arabs under such a proposal would be extremely small.

Three members of the Irgun Zvai Leumi were sentenced to death on 10th February. The execution of Dov Gruner (see Summary No. 378) has been postponed pending a decision of the Privy Council on an appeal filed by his lawyer on his behalf.

The Jewish Agency have issued an official statement in Jerusalem in which the appeal to the United Nations is pronounced to be acceptable in principle although the delay involved is regretted. (For American reactions see under "United States.")

Saudi Arabia

The Amir Sa'ud (the Crown Prince) who is at present on a visit to the United States has been invited to make an official visit to this country on his way home. The invitation has been accepted, and the Prince is expected to arrive this week.

Iraq

On 13th January the Iraqi police seized the printing press of the Communist Party and afterwards made a number of arrests. These arrests shook the morale of the party, and the police were afterwards able to arrest a certain Yusuf Salman Yusuf, "the Secretary-General of the Communist Party of 'Iraq," who, under the name of the "Fahad" (Leopard), has eluded capture for several years. The police showed great zeal and efficiency. Among the documents so far examined there is nothing implicating the Soviet Legation. General satisfaction has been expressed by the public about the arrests. The left-wing press has maintained an almost complete silence on the subject.

Persia

The Persian Government have now offered Mulla Mustapha (see Summary No. 375) the following alternatives:—

(a) He and all his followers will be allowed to settle at Varamin, 30 miles south-east of Tehran, where land will be made available to them free, provided that they accept Persian nationality. They will be given seed corn and other assistance for the first year's harvest.

(b) The same facilities will be made available to Mulla Mustapha and 110 of his followers who have been condemned to death by the 'Iraqi Government. The remainder of the followers who have not been condemned to death and who, the Persian Government presume, have nothing to fear from the 'Iraqi Government, would be disarmed and sent back to 'Iraq.

(c) If the above offers are refused, the Persian Government will take steps to expel Mulla Mustapha and all his followers from Persia into 'Iraq. In this event it will not be possible to disarm them.

There is as yet no information with regard to the line Mulla Mustapha will take. The 'Iraqi Government, however, have no intention of pardoning those condemned to death, most of whom are deserters from the 'Iraqi Army who took up arms against their King.

Homayunjah, the Foreign Minister, has announced that a Persian mission is to be sent to India to study social and cultural matters there. If it arrives in time, the mission will attend the Inter-Asiatic Relations Conference whose Chairman is Pandit Nehru.

The delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions (see Summary No. 376) is due to start work in Tehran on 26th February. The members of the delegation are Mustafa el Ariss, a Lebanese Communist and a member of the Executive Committee of the Federation, Borisov, a Soviet representative, and Mr. E. P. Herries, from the British Trade Unions Congress. The secretary of the delegation is a Frenchman, M. Malefete.

THE FAR EAST

China

The attention of the Government has been centred on the increasing seriousness of the economic position which has developed with remarkable rapidity into the long-feared national crisis. In an eleventh hour attempt to forestall the complete collapse of the foreign exchange value of the national currency, Dr. T. V. Soong announced on the 5th February, the establishment of a Board for the development of Export Trade and proposed to subsidise certain approved commodities by granting exporters a specially favourable rate of exchange of Chinese National $6,700 = United States $1, as against the then existing official rate of C.N.$3,350. The funds required to provide this subsidy were to be obtained from an ad valorem surcharge of 50 per cent. on certain selected imports. It is understood that Dr. Soong had originally intended to bring these measures into force before the end of January, but that General Chiang Kai-shek declined to permit their promulgation until they had been approved by the Defence Council, which body did not sit until the 5th February.

The delay proved fatal to the scheme. By the 12th February, the exchange rate on the black market had dropped from C.N.$9,000 to C.N.$19,000 = U.S.$1—a depreciation of C.N.$10,000 in five days—and, although there was a temporary rally due to covering operations by heavy speculators in Shanghai, who were alarmed by reports that the Generalissimo was contemplating drastic steps, public confidence remained badly shaken, as was evidenced by the failure of merchants to reduce commodity prices which had been increased in keeping with the sliding of the value of the national dollar from nine to nineteen thousand.

On the 17th February, the Minister of Economics announced that the proposal to subsidise exports had been dropped and that a new control plan would be put into force, under which:—

"(1) the exchange value of the national currency is fixed at C.N.$12,000 equals U.S.$1;

(2) ceiling prices are fixed for daily necessities;

(3) the circulation of foreign currencies and the sale of gold within China is prohibited.

A scheme is also under consideration to ration supplies to factory workers and Government servants, also to supply them with essential household articles instead of following the existing practice of paying their salaries on a sliding scale, based on the cost-of-living index.

It is yet too early to attempt to forecast the success of these measures. Chiang Kai-shek's flat refusal to entertain any suggestions to permit further sales of gold is causing some misgivings and is in keeping with the recommendations recently reported to have been advanced by the Legislative Yuan to prevent the national currency from sliding to complete collapse: that all gold bars should become Government-owned; all transactions in gold halted; foreign currency transactions prohibited; and the black market wiped out; measures on which The Economist comments "This is indeed attempting to cure a raging fever by removing the thermometer." Nevertheless, the statement issued by the Generalissimo, together with economic emergency measures, is firm and confident in tone and concludes by appealing for the sympathetic understanding of friendly nations.

Some progress appears to have been made in the endeavour to persuade the Democratic League and minor party leaders to enter the Government, and General Chiang Kai-shek is reported to have expressed the hope that he may now be able to announce the formation of the State Council "in two or three days."

In the meantime the Government military campaign is being prosecuted with renewed vigour—doubtless in the belief that the infliction of a crushing and final defeat of the Communist forces in the field would be the more certain means of restoring public faith in the Nanking régime. But, although Government supporters are busily claiming a succession of victories, including the capture of Linyi—the Communist stronghold in Shantung Province—observers are inclined to the opinion that once again the Communists have outwitted the Nanking Generals and, by resorting to guerrilla tactics, are holding their own. It is of some interest to recall that the Communists have long maintained the thesis of the Government's inability to crush them by military force and have contended that the Kuomintang will eventually meet their Waterloo, not in the field of battle, but in the economic collapse of the country.

Indonesia

On the 20th December, 1946, the Netherlands Government adopted a motion proposed in the joint names of Professor C. P. M. Romme and Jhr. van der Goes van Naters. Briefly, this motion provided that the Netherlands Government should engage in a reciprocal undertaking with the Government of the Republic of Indonesia by acceptance of the Cheribon Draft Agreement in the light of the explanation afforded by the Commission-General in their Memorandum and of the interpretation of the Draft Agreement contained in the statement before the Second Chamber by the Minister for Overseas Territories, M. Jonkman (see Summaries Nos. 373 and 374 under "Low Countries"). And since the return of the Commission-General to Batavia, numerous, but fruitless, discussions have taken place in an endeavour to persuade the Indonesian Delegation to accept the Jonkman interpretation as an appendix to the Agreement. These discussions were discontinued in order to enable Mr. Sjarir to proceed to Jogjakarta in time to attend the meeting of his full Cabinet scheduled to take place on the 5th February. Before leaving Batavia Mr. Sjarir informed Professor Schermerhorn that, while he would discuss the whole question further with the Commissioners-General after he had consulted Dr. Soekarno and the other members of his Government, he was, himself, entirely out of sympathy with any suggestion to attach M. Jonkman's statement of interpretation to an Agreement already initialled by both parties.

On the 9th February, the Republican Government issued an official communiqué to the effect that, the Cabinet having given careful consideration to the Dutch Parliament's decision regarding the Romme–van der Goes van Naters motion which was forwarded by the Dutch Government to the Indonesian Delegation through the intermediary of the Commission-General, has decided to adhere to its decision, to authorise the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement only in the form as established after the Republican Cabinet session of the 14th January—that is, based exclusively on the articles of the written Agreement and elucidations contained in the Minutes and official correspondence between both Delegations; and that the Indonesian Delegation have been authorised to inform the Netherlands Delegation accordingly.

Press editorials and reports of interviews with Dr. Soekarno indicate that the desire of the Netherlands Government to make the Jonkman "clarification" an integral part of the Agreement has increased Indonesian suspicion and bitterness; while the situation has not been improved in either Indonesian or Dutch circles by the die-hard nature of the public statements of Professor Romme (Leader of the Catholic Party in the Second Chamber at The Hague) now on a visit to Java. Nevertheless, there is a general impression that complete deadlock will not be allowed to occur; that both sides are anxious to sign; and that a satisfactory solution will somehow be forthcoming. A healthy sign is seen in the conciliatory attitude adopted by the Indonesian Government, when a highly provocative situation created by the Netherlands military contingent at Krian in the Sourabaya area was treated with commendable restraint and finally smoothed out by negotiations. Moreover, on the 14th February the Republican Commander-in-Chief issued a general "cease fire" ordinance. The order instructed all Indonesian military commanders to withdraw two kilometres behind the demarcation lines, from midnight on the 15th February, after which they were to contact the local commanders of the Netherlands units in order to arrange details necessary to the preservation of the truce.

Mr. Sjarir is reported to be disappointed at the present hitch. On the other hand, he is also said to be gratified at the manner in which the impasse has served to cement political unity among the members of his Government and make for improved discipline within the ranks of the army. In the past the Commission-General have frequently complained that the desired speed of negotiations towards the signing of the Agreement was obstructed by the inability of the Indonesian Government to control their forces and if, as Mr. Sjarir now claims, the "cease fire" order can be effectively enforced, a considerable step forward will have been made.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The coal crisis in the United Kingdom has given rise to genuine anxiety among thoughtful Americans. In an unsolicited statement issued at his press conference on the 13th February, to which British correspondents were specially invited, President Truman said that the United States Government stood ready to do everything within its power to relieve the plight of the British people in their present emergency. He stated that he had directed Captain Granville Conway, the Co-ordinator of the Emergency Export Programmes, to determine how quickly and in what quantity coal could be landed at British ports, and he added that he had instructed the United States representative on the European Coal Organization in London to support any request that might be made by this country for a "re-allocation" of shipments of coal at present on the high seas. The Prime Minister's decision to decline this spontaneous offer of assistance on the ground that European needs are as great as ours has been warmly praised as typical of the unselfish determination of the British people to overcome their domestic difficulties without causing hardship to other nations.

In Conservative quarters in the United States the crisis has produced the inevitable gibes at what the Washington Post calls British "planning without a plan." There has also been some wishful speculation on the possibility of the Socialist experiment coming to grief and of the country reverting to "free enterprise." Nevertheless, informed observers have not failed to recognize that the omens in the present situation may be hardly less portentous for the United States than they are for this country and that Americans have a common interest in helping the British people to pull through successfully. Mr. Walter Lippmann, for one, has hastened to point out that the position of the United States in world affairs would be left "highly vulnerable and precariously isolated" if the crisis resulted in the "British type of free, moderate and gradual Socialism" being abandoned and in a "forced and disorderly liquidation" of British commitments abroad. Others are similarly uneasy regarding the "power vacuum" that is likely to be left if the manpower shortage at home compels Great Britain to withdraw her troops from their present foreign stations. The fear of finding themselves alone to cope with Soviet ambitions in a world shorn of British power and influence is thus clearly weighing more heavily with most Americans than their instinctive likes or dislikes of the internal economic policies of this country.

The Russians, for their part, have done much to inflame American opinion during the past few days by their short-sighted refusal to provide adequate facilities for press and radio correspondents at the forthcoming Moscow Conference. On the 11th February the four associations of American journalists and radio commentators normally assigned to diplomatic functions addressed a vigorous note to General Marshall, condemning the Soviet arrangements for news coverage of the Moscow Conference as "shockingly inadequate" and asking the Secretary of State to do all in his power to get the present offer of 20 visas increased to 52. The petition has been endorsed by nearly every newspaper that is not controlled by the Communist party, and even the left-wing New York journal P.M. has been constrained to suggest that, if proper accommodation cannot be provided for the press in Moscow, the meeting of the Foreign Ministers should be held elsewhere. In Moscow, General Bedell Smith has been instructed to approach M. Molotov personally on the subject. He is to make it clear how strongly the American press feels on the matter and to insist that 50 U.S. correspondents be allowed to attend the Conference as an "irreducible minimum." Such is the strength of feeling already engendered in the United States that Senator Vandenberg—himself a newspaper man of many years standing—found it necessary, in speaking on the forthcoming Conference in Washington on the 14th February, to remind the Moscow authorities once again that they had made a "very definite promise" to allow the press "unlimited entry and unlimited facilities" when the place of the next Foreign Ministers' meeting was originally fixed.

In the United States itself the drive against the alleged agents of Moscow and against native and other Communists tends to gain momentum in direct proportion to the exasperation produced by the policy and conduct of the Soviets abroad. This week the House of Representatives Committee on Un-American Activities, which has in the past been notorious for the levity with which it has impugned the characters of respectable American Liberals, has earned the praise of such fair-minded journals as the New York Herald-Tribune, the San Francisco Chronicle and the Chicago Times by its handling of the case against Gerhard Eisler, a German Communist, who is alleged to be the principal Soviet agent in the United States. The Committee has now persuaded the Department of Justice to prevent Eisler from leaving the country until the charges against him have been thoroughly investigated. Such is the present improved standing of the Committee that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Joseph W. Martin, has deemed it safe to pledge the wholehearted support of the Republican party to its efforts to remove the "red menace" from America. The Committee itself has announced that 1947 is to be "the most active year" in its history.

An attempt to exploit rising sentiment against the Communists and their "fellow-travellers" in order to prevent the appointment of Mr. David E. Lilienthal to the all-important chairmanship of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission is at present being made by a coalition of Republicans and Conservative Democrats on the joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee. In this endeavour Senator Kenneth McKellar (Democrat, Tennessee), who dislikes Mr. Lilienthal for refusing him patronage over the Tennessee Valley Authority, has been joined by Senator Styles Bridges (Republican, New Hampshire, and Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee) and Senator Kenneth S. Wherry (Republican, Nebraska, and party whip in the Senate), who object to Mr. Lilienthal's New Deal record. On the other hand, both the Secretary of War, Mr. Patterson, and the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, have testified in Mr. Lilienthal's favour. On the 13th February President Truman entered the fray with an announcement at his press conference that he intended to support Mr. Lilienthal "all the way" for the post to which he had nominated him. It was the statement in Mr. Acheson's testimony on the 12th February that Soviet foreign policy was "an aggressive and expanding one" to which M. Molotov took exception as a "rude slander." In reply to a formal Soviet protest on this point General Marshall stated on the 18th that he felt that Mr. Acheson had acted "in his line of duty" in answering frankly and in accordance with his conscience the question regarding Soviet policy which had been put to him during the Committee hearings. He added that he knew that, on second thoughts, the Soviet Government would not "attribute hostility to frankness." (See also under "Soviet Union.")

Serious concern has been expressed by those who favour a strong defence programme at the decision of the joint Congressional Committee which has been examining the President's Budget (see Summary No. 376) to recommend a cut of $6,000 million in the estimates for the fiscal year 1947–48. More than a quarter of this saving would have to be made at the expense of the armed forces, and at his second press conference on the 14th February General Marshall spoke of the deleterious effect which the cut would have upon U.S. occupation policy in Europe and the Far East. The recommendation has still to be discussed by both Houses of Congress, and the Republicans are divided on the wisdom of adopting it at a time like the present.

The breakdown of the London Conference on Palestine has caused little surprise to an American public that had already been forewarned by the press to expect the worst. Comment on the present position is cautious and reserved, although the American Zionists are said to be showing some anxiety regarding the possible consequences of the British decision to make the United Nations the arbiter on Palestine. Every effort has been made by His Majesty's Government to keep the United States Government informed of developments at the London Conference, and a full statement of the considerations which have led them to submit the question of Palestine to the United Nations has been communicated to General Marshall. In replying to the latter General Marshall has suggested that it might be preferable to refer the issue first of all to the Trusteeship Council, which could give it some preliminary study before it is thrown into the General Assembly for a full-dress debate. He has also urged a substantial increase in the number of homeless European Jews to be admitted to Palestine while that country's future is being considered by the United Nations.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

Negotiations for the sale of the British-owned railways to the Argentine Government were successfully completed on the 12th February. The total price is £150 million, payable in London in sterling. The sum will be largely covered by Argentina's balances in this country, which amount to about £126 million. The outright sale replaces the plan for an Anglo-Argentine consortium which was agreed to last September; and, although the exchange of British securities so recently guaranteed to earn 4 per cent., for Argentine credits in this country, which require an outlay of only ½ per cent., seems a poor bargain, the measure is justified by the technical difficulties of operating a mixed consortium, and by the fact that no future Argentine Government is likely to offer a better price. It is understood that those at present employed by the railways in Argentina are to retain their posts under the Agreement.

Brazil

Results in the elections for state governors confirm that there has been a slump in the stock of President Dutra's P.S.D. The Liberal opposition (U.D.N.) won the governorships of Minas Gerais (Sr. Milton Campos) and Bahia (Dr. Otávio Mangabeira). Ex-President Vargas' candidate was defeated in his own state of Rio Grande do Sul, which Sr. Walter Jobim won for the P.S.D.

UNITED NATIONS

Economic and Social Council

The Human Rights Commission concluded its first session on the 10th February, and will meet again from the 21st July to the 2nd August if possible at Geneva, failing that at U.N. Headquarters. Its 'working group' is required to complete a draft Bill of Rights by the 25th June. It was decided that the Sub-Commissions on Freedom of Information and on Minorities and Discrimination should be composed each of twelve persons "selected by the Commission in consultation with the Secretary-General and subject to the consent of the Governments of which the persons are nationals." Not more than one member may come from any one country. The Commission desired that the Sub-Commissions should be set up at the earliest possible date, and since it was clearly impracticable to hold the elections before the Commission rose, it was decided to ask the Economic and Social Council to carry out the elections, from lists of nominations made by members of the Commission. The choice would be made in consultation with the Secretary-General, and be subject to government consent.

The Status of Women Commission held its first meeting on the 10th February, seven of its fifteen members being absent owing to the weather. A proposal by the Assistant Secretary-General to postpone elections until the next day was defeated by 5 votes (Australia, Mrs. Street, ByeloRussia, Mrs. Ouralova, Denmark, Mrs. Begtrup, Guatemala and U.S.S.R.) to three (China, Mrs. New, U.K., Miss Mary Sutherland and U.S., Miss Kenyon). All other voting was on the same lines. Miss Kenyon proposed Miss Sutherland for Chairman and was strongly supported by Mrs. New. Mrs. Street opposed this nomination and put up Mrs. Begtrup, who had been chairman of the Nuclear Commission. Mrs. Begtrup was elected. Mrs. Street became Vice-Chairman (defeating the candidate supported by the U.K. Delegation, Madame Ledon), and Mrs. Ouralova Rapporteur, defeating Mrs. New. Mrs. Street and Mrs. Ouralova are identified with the Women's International Democratic Federation Mrs. Ouralova proposed that the Commission should recommend the W.I.D.F. for inclusion among the highest grade non-governmental Organisations in Category "A," which would give to this new body a status superior to that of any of the long established women's organisations. Later, on the initiative of the U.S.S.R. delegate, the proposal was withdrawn on the ground that it was irrelevant to the work of the Commission.

International Refugee Organisation

The Preparatory Commission opened its sessions on the 11th February. Its officers are as follows: M. Ponsot (France) Chairman, Dr. Sassen (Netherlands) Rapporteur, M. Skylstad (Norway) Vice-Chairman, but the future of I.R.O. itself is not yet assured, therefore the Commission passed a unanimous resolution asking the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appeal to all States, those who had agreed that the Organisation should be set up, and those who had abstained, to sign the Constitution so that the Refugee problem might be tackled in time—i.e., before the final winding-up of U.N.R.R.A. Sir Herbert Emerson, as spokesman of the existing refugee organisations, reported to the Commission on the progress of resettlement work in Latin America.

Security Council

Disarmament

A definite stage was reached in the process of disarmament on the 13th February, when the Council approved the draft resolution (see last week's Summary) by 10 votes to 0. Poland was one of the ten, while U.S.S.R. abstained. The final draft contained two amendments designed to put speed into the deliberations of the military Staff Committee. The Australian delegate secured insertion of the words "as a matter of urgency," and the U.K. delegate requested the Committee "as a first step to submit to the Security Council not later than the 30th April its recommendations with regard to the basic principles which should govern the organisation of the United Nations' armed forces." In the long debate on the 12th, the delegates, apart from the Polish and U.S.S.R., favoured the U.S. thesis that the work of the Atomic Energy Commission should be kept distinct from that of the new Disarmament Commission. The U.K. spokesman and others uphold the principles that security must precede disarmament, and that disarmament is not possible without international confidence, and that such confidence depends upon the organisation of a system of security; hence the U.K. insistence on the importance of the work of the Military Staff Committee, and that a system of control and verification must be established before armaments can be reduced in reality. On the other hand, as was obvious during Mr. Gromyko's speech on the 14th, the U.S.S.R. contend that Atomic and suchlike weapons must be banned forthwith, in order to create the atmosphere of confidence, and in no case must the rule of unanimity be impaired. Mr. Gromyko bases his argument upon his interpretation of the original Assembly resolution, and his aim would seem to be the practical one of abolishing particular means of warfare, which happen to be at the sole disposal of the United States. It is noteworthy that in all this voting, U.S.S.R. went no further than abstention.

The choice would be made in consultation with the Secretary-General, and be subject to government consent.

The Status of Women Commission held its first meeting on the 10th February, seven of its fifteen members being absent owing to the weather. A proposal by the Assistant Secretary-General to postpone elections until the next day was defeated by 5 votes (Australia, Mrs. Street, ByeloRussia, Mrs. Ouralova, Denmark, Mrs. Begtrup, Guatemala and U.S.S.R.) to three (China, Mrs. New, U.K., Miss Mary Sutherland and U.S., Miss Kenyon). All other voting was on the same lines. Miss Kenyon proposed Miss Sutherland for Chairman and was strongly supported by Mrs. New. Mrs. Street opposed this nomination and put up Mrs. Begtrup, who had been chairman of the Nuclear Commission. Mrs. Begtrup was elected. Mrs. Street became Vice-Chairman (defeating the candidate supported by the U.K. Delegation, Madame Ledon), and Mrs. Ouralova Rapporteur, defeating Mrs. New. Mrs. Street and Mrs. Ouralova are identified with the Women's International Democratic Federation Mrs. Ouralova proposed that the Commission should recommend the W.I.D.F. for inclusion among the highest grade non-governmental Organisations in Category "A," which would give to this new body a status superior to that of any of the long established women's organisations. Later, on the initiative of the U.S.S.R. delegate, the proposal was withdrawn on the ground that it was irrelevant to the work of the Commission.

International Refugee Organisation

The Preparatory Commission opened its sessions on the 11th February. Its officers are as follows: M. Ponsot (France) Chairman, Dr. Sassen (Netherlands) Rapporteur, M. Skylstad (Norway) Vice-Chairman, but the future of I.R.O. itself is not yet assured, therefore the Commission passed a unanimous resolution asking the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appeal to all States, those who had agreed that the Organisation should be set up, and those who had abstained, to sign the Constitution so that the Refugee problem might be tackled in time—i.e., before the final winding-up of U.N.R.R.A. Sir Herbert Emerson, as spokesman of the existing refugee organisations, reported to the Commission on the progress of resettlement work in Latin America.

Security Council

Disarmament

A definite stage was reached in the process of disarmament on the 13th February, when the Council approved the draft resolution (see last week's Summary) by 10 votes to 0. Poland was one of the ten, while U.S.S.R. abstained. The final draft contained two amendments designed to put speed into the deliberations of the military Staff Committee. The Australian delegate secured insertion of the words "as a matter of urgency," and the U.K. delegate requested the Committee "as a first step to submit to the Security Council not later than the 30th April its recommendations with regard to the basic principles which should govern the organisation of the United Nations' armed forces." In the long debate on the 12th, the delegates, apart from the Polish and U.S.S.R., favoured the U.S. thesis that the work of the Atomic Energy Commission should be kept distinct from that of the new Disarmament Commission. The U.K. spokesman and others uphold the principles that security must precede disarmament, and that disarmament is not possible without international confidence, and that such confidence depends upon the organisation of a system of security; hence the U.K. insistence on the importance of the work of the Military Staff Committee, and that a system of control and verification must be established before armaments can be reduced in reality. On the other hand, as was obvious during Mr. Gromyko's speech on the 14th, the U.S.S.R. contend that Atomic and suchlike weapons must be banned forthwith, in order to create the atmosphere of confidence, and in no case must the rule of unanimity be impaired. Mr. Gromyko bases his argument upon his interpretation of the original Assembly resolution, and his aim would seem to be the practical one of abolishing particular means of warfare, which happen to be at the sole disposal of the United States. It is noteworthy that in all this voting, U.S.S.R. went no further than abstention.

GERMANY

The approaching Moscow Conference has been the background and stimulus to nearly all propaganda and political activity in Germany during the past weeks, and all bodies of opinion have, very naturally, been taking stock of their programmes and jockeying for a favourable position so that in the eyes of their supporters they shall not be accused of failing to represent Germany's interests.

Only Nachtexpress of the Soviet-controlled newspapers in Berlin even mentioned General Robertson's statements to the Co-ordinating Committee (see Summary No. 380) and it has had no effect on the general tide of propaganda in the press and radio both from the Soviet Zone and from Moscow. This is devoted to praising conditions in the Soviet Zone and accusing the British and U.S. powers of failing to carry out their obligations, military, economic and democratic. The occupation authorities are frequently envisaged as birds of prey descending on their zones and stripping them of peaceful industries, while maintaining war plants, with the long-term aim of bringing western German economy under the control of foreign monopolies and at the same time using it as a base for future policy, presumably directed against the East. Mr. Hoover's recent visit to study food conditions in Germany was the subject of a sharp attack by Leipzig radio on the 17th February. He was considered as an envoy sent by the reactionary wing of the Republicans who aimed at dovetailing Germany's economy with the West and making her the nucleus of the proposed West-European Federation. On the 19th February Leipzig radio carefully insisted that the new decartellisation laws in the British and U.S. zones failed to destroy the influence of monopolies and that British Socialisation plans were really being rendered void (see last week's Summary). Persistent reports, said to be based on a "story" carried by a U.S. news agency, continue to be about plans being drawn up by some circles in the British and U.S. zones, to set up a Government of Western Germany if the Moscow Conference fails. The official Soviet organ, Tägliche Rundschau, has asked whether it is not wishful thinking to assume that the conference will fail and has declared that certain people clearly do not want German unity and consequently prefer a dictated peace to a treaty which would require the signature of a central Government. By contrast a solitary gesture by the Soviet authorities to the French Government, was the banning for one day of Berliner Zeitung which published on the 19th February an article insulting the occupation authorities of the Saar.

Germans may draw slight hope from Sir William Strang's statement to the Deputies on the 12th February that if, when a conference was held to draft a peace treaty, a German Government adequate for the purpose of accepting it was in existence, it should be given an opportunity to express its views—and that in any case, before a treaty was signed by a German Government, that Government should have a chance to express its views. Grotewohl of the Socialist Unity party (SED) again insisted on the 15th February on the need for a central Government and said that the Trade Unions ought to participate. The SED is also planning a referendum on the formation of a unitary state with a "decentralised administration." The three political parties in the Soviet Zone have discussed the submission of proposals to the Moscow Conference and are to appoint a committee of experts. The recently formed Foreign Policy Committee of the Socialists (SPD) in Berlin is also preparing a memorandum. The eight premiers of the British and U.S. Zones, at a meeting on the 17th February, decided to set up a board for preparatory work in connection with the German peace treaty. The States Council officially denied reports that the premiers were preparing to form a bi-zonal parliament, although admitting that the question of some co-ordination between the bi-zonal committees, had been discussed. (The economic merger was of course carefully arranged in such a way that no political union took place.) Such zonal co-operation is virtually unknown in the French Zone, and the only reported preparation for the Conference of any note was a resolution by the Rhineland Palatinate Assembly on the 20th February opposing all territorial changes and appealing for peace conditions which would enable the German people to retain its faith in justice.

It is of considerable interest that, apparently on KPD initiative, it has been decided to set up a KPD/SED inter-zonal committee—openly centralised in Berlin—to promote collaboration between the parties in the Western Zones. Representatives from the French zone have not yet been nominated. Neues Deutschland hails the decision as of "historic importance" for the coming treaty. It is not yet possible to say whether this really means that KPD leaders recognise the hopelessness of expecting spontaneous "fusion" in the West or whether they consider that bitterness and despair in these areas have now reached a pitch where conditions are more favourable to an "Eastern" policy—and hence to "fusion"—than at any time in the past. By contrast rumours and reports since the end of January, which should, however, be treated with reserve, have hinted that the SPD might be readmitted into the Soviet Zone, but press sources such as Der Kurier are very cautious and point out that the SED might try to "infiltrate" the new SPD with specially trained officials. At the meeting of Soviet Zone parties to discuss proposals for the Moscow conference (see above) the Christian Democrats and Liberal Democrats even had the courage to ask that the SPD should take part, but this was turned down by the SED. The SED itself has not been without its setbacks. Between the end of January and the 11th February it was defeated twice in the Saxony Diet on measures for dealing with black marketeers and those who violated the rules of economic planning. This was no doubt due to over-confidence, since normally the party has a clear majority of one, but it is interesting that on the second occasion agreement had been contrived beforehand in Committee, yet when it came to the full session the other parties executed a volte face.

The British Zonal Committee of the CDU met on the 3rd February and agreed on a programme for reorganising German economy which represents a considerable triumph for the Left wing of the party and goes further than anything which Adenauer had favoured in the past. It proposes that mines and iron producing industries should be socialised (vergesellschaftet); if in particular cases the form of State Corporations appeared more appropriate the programme would not stand in their way. The time for the domination of private capital was past but the substitution of State capitalism would be even more dangerous for the individual. Therefore large concerns should be broken up into independent units, and if a firm were still too large for personal contact between employer and employee the latter should have a say in the firm's decisions. Since then, the CDU of the Soviet Zone has advocated public ownership for mineral wealth although stating that the possibility, in some cases, of transferring working rights to private persons should not be excluded. The Christian Democrats in Germany, frequently at loggerheads in the past, have certainly been brought closer together during the month, and at an inter-zonal conference in the U.S. Zone on the 5th and 6th February, it was decided to set up a coordinating committee for the whole country.

An extensive round-up of members of a subversive organisation began in the British and U.S. Zones on the 23rd February, and by the following day approximately 80 per cent. of its leaders had been arrested. The group also has ramifications in the French and Soviet Zones and the authorities there have been informed of the arrests. Members included a number of persons wanted for war crimes and other high-ranking members of the S.S., including Walter Teich, formerly liaison officer with the S.S. in Denmark, and Edmund Biedelmeyer, former chief of the Secret Service in Lublin; a number of the leaders had been personal friends of Himmler. The aim of the organisation seems in general to have been the restoration of German militarist power, which might have been achieved by some secret weapon—possibly bacteriological warfare. Its immediate "demands," however, were devised to agree with the sentiments of a wider circle of Germans than would have at this stage lent an ear to talk of a secret weapon. Such demands included the return of all prisoners of war and the immediate cessation of dismantling. The group had been under close observation since the summer of 1946, but the authorities naturally delayed the round-up in order to spread the net wide. The programme of the group was of course fantastic, and it did not constitute a serious danger, though it could not be allowed to continue.

Franz von Papen, now 67 years old, was sentenced on the 24th February by a German Court in Nuremberg to eight years' "light" labour. All his property except 5,000 marks is to be confiscated, and he loses for a further period normal civic privileges and the right to enter a profession. Denazification in the U.S. Zone is expected to end by the 31st March, 1948, according to a recent statement by General Clay, who also now professed himself in general satisfied with the work of the German tribunals. In the Soviet Zone, Thuringia has led the way in passing an amnesty for all those born after the 1st January, 1919 (as in the British and U.S. Zones), and who have not held office in the Nazi party, Hitler Youth or other Nazi organisations nor engaged in "militarist, Nazi or anti-democratic propaganda after the 8th May, 1945." The latter condition is of course all too dependent on the interpretation of the word "democratic." There had previously been considerable confusion over the position of youth in this Zone.

From the 4th March, as a result of British and American decisions to relax certain regulations against "Trading with the Enemy," foreign firms will be able to buy goods by direct contract from German firms in the British and U.S. Zones, although such contracts will require the approval of the joint Import-Export Agency and will not apply to timber, potash or metal scrap from the British Zone. Germans will not be able to buy goods on this basis since the Agency continues to negotiate imports. Foreign buyers will pay the Agency in sterling or other currency, and German firms will then be paid in marks. Business is still handicapped by the fact that there is no uniform exchange rate and that the number of business men who may visit Germany is strictly limited. The actual volume of business in the early stages is therefore not likely to be large, but the new regulations are an important step towards fulfilling the aim to restore normal business channels. It is expected that similar arrangements will shortly be concluded with the Soviet Zone.

On the 20th February the French Government drew the attention of the Anglo-U.S. authorities to the serious difficulties experienced in the French Zone as the result of insufficient allocations of coal and steel from the British and U.S. Zones. It was pointed out that in some cases these allocations had been cut drastically below the level originally agreed (see also under "France").

Austrian Treaty on the 20th February. Seven articles will go to the Foreign Ministers in Moscow as agreed, and eight will show a difference of opinion, principally between the Soviet and the other three delegations, and on such important questions as the Austro-Yugoslav frontier. In further discussion of the Preamble to the Treaty on the 18th February the Deputies again failed to reach agreement on the question of the list of States to sign the Treaty, and on that of Austrian responsibility for the war. When, on the 19th February, the Deputies came to consider the United Kingdom and Soviet draft articles on German assets in Austria, the fundamental difference in the attitude of the Western Powers and in that of Soviet Russia was emphasised still further. While the United Kingdom and United States representatives in particular are anxious to see a healthy independent Austria established by a just treaty, the Soviet policy seems to be to insist on Austria's responsibility for the war and her failure to act correctly since the end of the war in such matters as denazification and the treatment of war criminals.

M. Gusev, accordingly, said that German assets were a political problem associated with the separation of Austria from Germany. He complained that the Deputies had only succeeded in obtaining, as the result of his persistent questioning of Dr. Gruber, a verbal assurance of Austria's recognition of the Potsdam agreement, recognition of which was an essential preliminary to consideration of the whole question. The Soviet Government were anxious that Potsdam should be acted upon, and that they should receive the reparations to which they were entitled (as they had agreed with the Governments concerned in the case of Bulgaria, Roumania, Hungary and Finland), rather than that the detail of the question should now be discussed.

The United Kingdom draft proposals, while recognising the Potsdam decision that Austria should pay no reparations but that reparations should come from certain German assets in Austria, and that an obligation should be laid on Austria to carry out its principles, attempt to ensure that the Austrian economy is not hopelessly crippled by a sweeping interpretation of "German assets" such as the Russians seem to wish to adopt, and have in fact already used in many cases. The United Kingdom proposals suggest machinery by which the assets could be transferred, and include one that Austria shall prepare and submit to the four Powers lists of German interests and enterprises in Austria; that these lists shall be agreed between the Austrian Government and the occupying Power of the Zone in which the interests are; and that a four-Power assets commission, sitting in Vienna, shall decide which assets are liable to transfer. A further proposal, that some assets which were not transferred to the Allies should be transferred to the Austrian Government (as the U.S. authorities have already done provisionally in their Zone) was particularly criticised by M. Gusev as being "in direct conflict with Potsdam."

General Clark, supported by the United Kingdom representative, hotly defended the Austrian attitude to the Potsdam agreement, saying that the Austrian Government had given adequate answers in the light of the Control agreement and of the lack of any quadripartite instruction. He opposed equally strongly the Soviet attitude on German assets, saying that for two years the question had been repeatedly raised in Vienna without results because of the refusal of the Russians to discuss the matter. The legality of many of the seizures made in the Soviet Zone regardless of Austrian interests had never been and never would be recognised by the United States.

It was agreed that the Soviet and the United Kingdom proposals on German assets should be passed to the Economic Committee with a request for a report by the 24th February. The Soviet draft does not provide for any implementation of the agreement, nor for a definition of Eastern Austria, while it suggests that assets are already transferred by virtue of Potsdam, whereas in fact transfer can only be effected in accordance with Austrian law, and provides for excluding from Austrian jurisdiction assets transferred as reparations.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Transport and communication difficulties have, as in most parts of Europe, been increased so greatly by the latest tricks of the cold weather that signs of a minor crisis have appeared in Czechoslovakia. One of the worst hit services is the Czechoslovak State Airlines, while, to complicate matters, flying personnel chose the 16th February to go on strike. Although the air crews' grievances have been heightened by the rigours of this coldest of winters, discontent was already smouldering before the first snow fell. The Airlines pushed through a very rapid extension of services after the end of the war, when Prague was able to take advantage of the lack of facilities and the international uncertainties existing in the other cities of central Europe. Czech crews have been flying for more than twelve months on regular services to the Balkans, eastern Europe, Scandinavia, the Atlantic Seaboard, and southern Europe. (The latest civil aviation agreement to be signed is that with Eire, which, together with that under discussion with the United Kingdom, will provide the Airlines with links to North America and even further afield.) These Czech services, and the internal artery between Karlový, Varý, Brno, Bratislava and Košice, together with the reciprocating foreign lines, have transformed Prague into an important aerial crossroads at the heart of the Continent.

The rapid expansion has imposed a severe strain upon the capacity of the men (many of them R.A.F. repatriates) and machines (Dakotas and a few, often rather decrepit, Junkers) which compose the Československá Aerolinie. Besides the growing operational difficulties and the tendency—not restricted to the Č.A.—for accidents to increase in number, and the personal troubles such as shortage of living accommodation for repatriates, these ex-R.A.F. aircrews and groundstaff have found themselves involved in the clash of rival influences. On occasion their interests and seniority have been set aside by men whom they consider less experienced, but who have acquired the right political complexion, namely, Communist.

The strike action of the flying personnel was condemned by M. Zapotocký, the Communist Chairman of the Central Council of Trade Unions, on the ground that it had been taken without first consulting the Airlines Works Council, but it was supported by the independent Association of Airmen. Although now back at work, the crews are standing by the demands embodied in their memorandum, and are calling for satisfaction by the 1st March. The affair was debated by the Parliamentary Transport Committee, and a resolution passed that all civil flying affairs should be placed completely under the control of the Minister of Transport. At the moment, this is M. Pietor, a Slovak Democrat; his party, in common with all the other non-Communists, are no lovers of doctrinaire interference with the proper functioning of crafts and professions. Dr. Pietor has set up a commission to investigate the situation in the Airlines, and it will be interesting to see, as a pointer to wider issues, if he is able to dismiss the Deputy Director-General and other individuals whom the crews have found unsatisfactory.

Czech-Slovak relations formed the subject of a frank statement by President Beneš on the 13th February. The occasion was the reception of the executive committee of the Czech-Slovak Association, which held a conference in Prague last week. Its chairman is Dr. Lettrich, leader of the Slovak Democrats, who is also Chairman of the Slovak National Council. The President questioned a statement made during the trial of Dr. Tiso (see Summary No. 372) which is continuing in Bratislava. Dr. Kmetko, the Catholic Archbishop of Nitra, to whom Tiso was once secretary, stated in evidence, that the Slovaks still wanted an independent state, but had been obliged to bow to force majeure. The President stated categorically that he would never agree to autonomy for Slovakia; another crisis in Czech-Slovak relations, he said, would finish the Republic, and an independent Slovakia would soon fall to Soviet Russia. With 70 million Germans on their flanks, the Czechs needed Slovak support just as much as ever, and the two brother nations must rest together upon the alliance with Russia. Future relations between the two partners must take the path of equalisation of wealth and political responsibility. The President forecast that the Slovak National Council would have no more and no less power than the Bohemian and Moravian Provincial Assemblies. Most leading Slovaks openly support this unitary form of government, and both the President and Dr. Lettrich expressed the belief that, with the increased understanding of the realities of the situation, the Constitution-makers would be enabled to find an acceptable permanent solution.

POLAND

On the 19th February, the Polish Parliament adopted the new interim Constitution, called the "Small Constitution," by 330 votes to 17. The opposition consisted of deputies of M. Mikolajczyk's Party, who had proposed that the old Constitution of March 1921 should be considered valid, pending the drafting of a new one. (The 1921 Constitution was considered in its time as an example of the fullest measure of Parliamentary democracy.)

According to the new Constitution the supreme authorities of the Republic are, as regards legislation, Parliament itself; in executive matters, the President of the Republic, the Government and the Council of State; on judicial questions, independent courts of justice. The precise powers of the various authorities are described by the Constitution's 33 Articles, of which only some have so far been published.

Parliament's term is to be five years, and it will be summoned twice yearly by the President for spring and autumn sessions. Its functions will be the passing of laws, the control of the Government, and the fixing of the principles of the State's policy. Together with the Government and the Council of State, it has the right to initiate legislation. It may also entrust the Government with the power to rule by decree for periods between Parliamentary sessions in the case of adjournments, or after Parliament has been dissolved, pending the convocation of a new one. Such power does not, however, extend to the most important aspects of the country's finances and economy, such as the Budget and the three year plan, or to Constitutional questions, or to military conscription. The decrees must be approved by the Council of State, and signed by the President, Prime Minister, and Ministers concerned.

The President is to be elected by Parliament for seven years, by an absolute majority of votes, two-thirds of the total number of Deputies (444) being the requisite quorum. His prerogatives are set forth in Article 13, a description of which has not yet been offered. One important Presidential power is described by Article 8, which provides that if, within three months of the Government tabling the respective Bills, Parliament fails to pass the Budget, the national economic plan, or the Conscription Bill, the President with the consent of the Council of State, will pass these Bills as laws in the form in which they have been drawn up by the Government.

The Constitution does not make any special provision for the relative position of the Government, except for defining its responsibility to Parliament. Precisely how Parliament will exercise its control has not yet been explained, though it appears that, in the case of Governmental rule by decree, any decrees must be submitted for Parliament's approval at the next session. The Cabinet's position is likely to be important by reason of its very elasticity. Article 18 provides for a Council of Ministers, not chosen by the various parties, but "forming a whole" under the President's leadership. The President will convene it to examine matters of "exceptional importance," on which occasions it is apparently to change its name, to become the "Cabinet Council." As such, it will have the very important power of recommending the Council of State to introduce a state of emergency or war in "certain exceptional situations."

The most novel feature of the whole Constitution is the creation of the Council of State. Its purpose, to some extent, is to assume the functions formerly exercised by the old Homeland National Council (K.R.N.), which was the genesis of the former Lublin Government of 1945. Its members will be elected by Parliament, which apparently has the power to review any decrees endorsed by it. The Council will be presided over by the President, and will include the Speaker and Vice Speakers of Parliament, as well as the President of the Supreme audit chamber. Three more members may be elected to it by Parliament on the unanimous recommendation of the already existing Council. Its powers as defined by Article 16 include: control over the local national councils within the prerogatives of the old KRN according to the law of the 11th September, 1944; confirming of Governmental decrees issued according to Parliament's authority; the right to initiate legislation; the consent to publication in the form of laws of the Budget and national economic plan according to Article 8; the passing of resolutions introducing a state of emergency or war, on the recommendation of the Council of State. Such resolutions must apparently obtain the approval of Parliament as early as possible.

The Constitution vests judicial powers in the Courts. Judges will be independent, and subject only to law. Courts will not, however, have the right to question the validity of laws duly published in the form of decrees with the force of law.

Whether the new Constitution will usher in the period of social harmony according to the often proclaimed intention and conviction of members of the Polish Government will be shown only by time. It is, however, interesting that, as in electoral, so also in Constitutional matters, the present Government has shown marked tendencies to imitate (and sometimes to surpass) the semi-totalitarian régime of Pilsudski established in 1935, on which it has so often bestowed such epithets as "fascist" and "reactionary," and thus to depart from the 1921 Constitution, its supposed model for democratic freedom. Unlike the 1921 Constitution, the two later ones give much more power to the executive, in the person of the President, as opposed to the legislature, though in the new Constitution, Parliament certainly appears as theoretically sovereign. While the 1921 Constitution had no provision for rule by decree, such provision exists in the 1935 as in the 1947 document, conferred in the former on the President, and in the latter both on the Government (though at the instance of Parliament) and in the Council of State, presided by the President. Admittedly, Parliament has the right to examine even the latter decrees, but, in view of the past attitude of Poland's rulers towards any attempted expression of popular will such a right can very easily remain theoretical. Moreover, as previously mentioned, out of 444 seats, the Government hold 394.

SOVIET UNION

The week has thrown up nothing basically new in regard to Anglo-Soviet relations, though on certain topics familiar criticism in press and radio has become sharper and more embittered. This is notably so in the case of the Western European bloc and the foreign policy of the Labour Party, to which Pravda last week devoted several columns under the heading "Unity or Schism in the Working Class movement." Special cause for alarm was found in the attitude of the British Labour party leaders, whose efforts are allegedly directed first to the division of the working class movement, and secondly to increasing British economic and political influence in European countries through the leaders of the Social Democrat parties. It is recalled that numerous Labour Party delegations have been sent to make contact with Socialist leaders abroad and there is special mention of France, where Mr. Laski is said to have urged Socialists not to cooperate with Communists, to have praised M. Blum for his independence and to have poured every sort of abuse on the French Communist Party, even suggesting that they are not true friends of Socialism. Labour Party representatives are criticised for persuading Social Democrats to cooperate with bourgeois rather than with Communist parties (which is tantamount, according to Pravda, to forming coalitions directed against the masses). Labour Party leaders were also accused of aiming at the establishment of an international centre to promote their so-called schismatic and reactionary policy and finally (and most important) of impeding the "beneficial historic process" of working class unification . . . . Thus Pravda virtually demands that we should change our European policy to one of support for "popular fronts," from which "genuine" Anglo-Soviet collaboration à la Pravda would apparently spring.

Soviet suspicions of a Western bloc, revived by the launching of Mr. Churchill's movement for a United States of Europe, have been fomented by Mr. John Foster Dulles' recent utterance. Just as, despite denials in London, His Majesty's Government have not been fully exonerated in Soviet propaganda from at least tacit sympathy with the objectives put forward by Mr. Churchill, so the Dulles plan is treated as a definite expression of the Republican Party platform. An important article in Krasnaya Zvezda (the 19th February) criticising Dulles, said that his scheme was in essence the same as that of Mr. Churchill and as M. Briand's plan of 1930—they all wanted Europe without the U.S.S.R., though each assigned to his own country the predominant rôle in the new set-up. The whole subject of the future of Europe was dealt with more in detail in Pravda by Otto Kuusinen, former prominent member of the Comintern, now President of the Karelo-Finnish Republic and one of the Deputy Presidents of the Presidum of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. He has emerged from a comparatively long silence to deliver an attack on Anglo-American economic domination of western Europe and attempts to interfere with the sovereignty of States in eastern Europe. Kuusinen cited the Soviet treaties with Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia as models for the lines on which cultural cooperation between the peoples of Europe and non-European nations as well as among themselves should run. Neither his article nor that dealing with the Dulles plan contained any criticism of, or, indeed, reference to the proposed Anglo-French alliance. As well as the attack on Mr. Dulles, a general anti-American line has been taken during the week, including a broadcast in English castigating the Americans for deserting their own best traditions by their extensive remilitarisation programme. General Marshall's reply to M. Molotov's note complaining of Mr. Acheson's hostile statement on the U.S.S.R. has been rejected as unconvincing in a fresh note sent by M. Molotov on the 20th February.

The following message was sent by the Chiefs of Staff, on the occasion of Red Army Day. "On the anniversary of Red Army Day, the British Chiefs of Staff send their cordial greetings to the Russian Army, confident in the hope that mutual friendship and trust will continue in the years to come."

The 29th anniversary of the Soviet Army evoked a spate of articles paying tribute to it as the "defender of peace" and "an instrument against international reaction which is preparing new conflicts." Its unique achievements in winning the war against Hitlerite Germany were strongly emphasised. The Soviet cuts in military expenditure were compared to "the opposite policy of Great Britain." "Everybody capable of passing independent and objective judgement can see now who is the true champion of peace and who is concealing far from peaceful intentions behind empty prattle about peace." In fact, the expenditure of the Soviet armed forces in 1947, according to the new Budget estimates, is 72·2 milliard roubles or 18 per cent. of the total budget.

It was announced last week that the Delegation of the Supreme Soviet, which several months ago had accepted an official invitation to visit this country on the 1st March, had postponed the visit for two or three weeks owing to the meeting of the Supreme Soviet in Moscow on the 20th February.

It is reported on reliable authority that Marshal Zhukov was seated next to Marshal Koniev at the opening session of the Supreme Soviet. This disposes of the rumour recently circulating in Moscow that M. Zhukov was under arrest.

Culture and Life has now attacked the B.B.C. Russian broadcasts. Academician E. Tarle, the well-known historian and publicist, in a long article published in No. 5, says that these broadcasts "have begun to take on the nature of propaganda leaflets aimed invariably at misleading Soviet people." Detailed accusations are made about the publicity given to Schumacher's visit, the Polish elections, "The Committee of Economic Planning" (the 30th December), Australia (whose Ministers "gladly and coarsely attack the U.S.S.R."), Greece (the 11th February), the occupation of Greenland, &c. It is also alleged that Soviet listeners are indignant at the B.B.C.'s reporting of United Nations activities which contain "a deliberate misrepresentation of the attitude of Soviet representatives." Tarle ends on a sarcastic note, describing the B.B.C.'s "tendentious information" as a "free educational course" that "no one on this side wished to receive." His contention is belied by the friendly letters which have recently begun to reach the B.B.C. from listeners in the U.S.S.R.

Tass has issued a denial of the report published in several Chinese papers of the arrival at Dalny of three military vessels with Chinese Communist troops and of the transport by sea from Dalny and Port Arthur to Chefoo of large amounts of war supplies for Chinese Communist party troops in Southern Shantung.

SCANDINAVIA

Sweden

Two Swedish White Books dealing with relations between Sweden and Norway during the war were published last week with a preface to one of them which discloses that His Majesty's Government had refused consent to the inclusion of a telegram, dated 18th June, 1940, from M. Prytz, the Swedish Minister in London, to his Government in Stockholm. M. Undén, the present Swedish Foreign Minister, explained that his Government had been forced to take this step, since both press and public were aware of the nature of the telegram and would otherwise have clamoured for an explanation. The reason for His Majesty's Government's refusal to the publication of the telegram in question—which alleged British readiness to conclude a compromise peace—was that we regarded it as a misinterpretation of the gist of an interview which M. Prytz had had with Mr. R. A. Butler, at that time Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In the circumstances it seems regrettable that the Swedish Government has decided to give publicity to the British refusal, as this may lead to further misinterpretations.

Denmark

On the 13th February two Russian representatives arrived in Copenhagen from Berlin for negotiations regarding the return of German refugees to the Soviet Zone. It was agreed that 1,000 refugees per week would be accepted up to a total of 12,000 and that arrangements for another 3,000 to be sent to Berlin were to be made later. Apart from these fifteen thousand, a message from Moscow states that the Soviet Government have agreed to take another twenty-one thousand some time in the future to bring the total up to the equivalent of that received into the three Western zones. According to the Danish press the Russian delegates also repeated M. Stalin's previous offer to take half of the total number of Germans in Denmark provided the Western Powers received the other half.

According to a Danish broadcast an agreement has been reached with the British Red Cross and the British authorities in Germany, under which the Danish Red Cross will take over the responsibility for the feeding of 80/100,000 children in the British zone for about six months. The Danish Government have approved a subsidy of 3 million kroner for this purpose. The negotiations also include an anti-tuberculosis scheme, since Denmark is the leading country in the use of the Calmetto vaccine and can undertake any number of inoculations and examinations. Such work has already been carried on in Yugoslavia and will shortly be started in Poland, Austria and Hungary. Now Germany has likewise applied for help. It is agreed that Denmark will carry out anti-tuberculosis work in Europe for two years.

Finland

To mark the occasion of the signing of the Finnish Peace Treaty in Paris members of the Control Commission were the guests of President Paasikivi at a banquet in Helsinki. In the course of the evening the President paid a warm tribute to the guest of honour, Col.-Gen. Zhdanov, whom he assured of his own personal friendship and of the fact that he would always be remembered with gratitude in Finland.

In his reply the Chairman of the Control Commission said that he wished to reiterate that Finland, despite many difficulties, had honestly and loyally fulfilled the Armistice terms. What was of even greater importance, General Zhdanov continued, was that a firm foundation had been laid for future friendly relations between Finland and the Soviet Union; a fact largely due to the personal contributions of M. Paasikivi and the present Prime Minister, M. Mauno Pekkala. In conclusion the speaker stated his conviction that Finnish-Soviet relations could be developed in such a manner as to serve as a model for international intercourse between all great and small nations.

The linking of M. Pekkala's name in this connexion with that of the President throws an interesting sidelight on the Soviet attitude to a change in the composition of the Finnish Government. The desirability of a change has frequently been mooted of late, and it may be expected to become topical with the ratification of the Treaty. Before returning to the Soviet Union Gen. Zhdanov is also reported to have told the parliamentary leaders of the Government coalition parties that he did not consider a change of Government necessary. With the exception of the Folk Democrats, most Finnish politicians, however, take a divergent view as M. Pekkala, quite apart from an unfortunate addiction to alcohol, has proved himself ill-fitted for his responsible office. As the Communists would probably experience considerable difficulty in securing the Premiership for a member of their own party, their reluctance to part with such a useful tool, entirely dependent upon them politically, is easily understood. Their opposition to a change is further reinforced by the fear that it might result in a weakening of the influence wielded in the Government by the Folk Democrats, which at present is far greater than is warranted by their strength in the Diet.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

H.R.H. Princess Juliana gave birth to a fourth daughter at the Soestdijk Palace at 1·30 a.m. on the 18th February. The Princess has been given the names of Maria Christina, but will be known as "Marijke." Although there was doubtless some disappointment that the Netherlands should still be without a Prince of Orange, the event was made the occasion of great national rejoicing, and was heralded at 7 a.m. with a salute of 51 guns and the ringing of church bells throughout the country. The birth of another princess has kept up the tradition of the House of Orange-Nassau which, during the past four centuries, has produced but 15 males. The last Prince of Orange, Prince Alexander, youngest son of King William III, and half-brother of Queen Wilhelmina, died in 1884 at the early age of 33.

A Netherlands Government Memorandum on Indonesia, designed as a reply to the First Chamber of the States General, was published on the 20th February. "The political value of the basic agreement on [the] Linggadjati [proposals]," says the Memorandum, "is that, by the de facto recognition of the authority of the Republic, the necessary proof has been given of our peaceful intentions and of our efforts to achieve genuine co-operation, on the basis of political equality, with all Indonesian peoples in the Netherlands Indies." So long as the "new structure" in the N.E.I. remained unbuilt, the Netherlands Government had a responsibility towards Indonesia—the more so if the Republic proved unworthy of the confidence which had been reposed in it. In view of that responsibility the "necessary forces" were being maintained in Indonesia. The achievements of the "valuable constructive elements" in the Republic had justified the belief that the Republic would "succeed in protecting the country from the general economic collapse threatening it"; but the Government were aware of the conflict of aims which divided parties in the Republic, a struggle which (it could not be denied) would "more or less seriously" undermine the central government's authority, and which was aggravated by the "deep differences of opinion on the subject of Linggadjati." To these difficulties could be added another, the "disobedience" of Republican officials and of the T.R.I., as illustrated by the latter's "systematic violations of the Truce." The Memorandum goes on to dispose of allegations that Soekarno, Hatta and Sjarir had Communist sympathies, by pointing out that the Communist support which the Republicans, "in their struggle for national freedom," had admittedly enjoyed for the space of 25 years did not "stamp them as Communists." As for the Republic's own political creed, the Netherlands Government "were not prepared to go so far as to say that the Republic was dictatorially governed or was Fascist," as some members of the First Chamber had alleged. The Memorandum makes it clear that the Government have no intention of signing the Agreement until the Republic has "complied with the conditions stipulated by the Government on reasonable grounds." As far as the Crown's position was concerned, the Government understood the desire for a "more exact definition," but agreed with the Commission-General's view that the time for such definition was "not ripe." Dutch-Indonesian relations were better discussed after the Agreement had been signed. The Government agreed with those members of the First Chamber who wanted "special consideration" to be given to the economic interests of both the Netherlands and Indonesia; accordingly, they aimed at supplementing the political agreement with a financial and economic agreement. The Netherlands Government would have liked the attitude so far adopted by the U.K. and the U.S.A. to have been "otherwise"; but that "certainly did not justify the notion that the Great Powers, by making use of their superior strength, had tried to drive the Netherlands in certain directions by threats." On the vexed question of the secret minutes taken during the discussions on the Agreement, the publication of which a number of persons had recently urged, the Memorandum says that the Minister [M. Jonkman] did not consider himself entitled to reveal them without the consent of the other party, but was prepared to consult the Commission-General in order that the Indonesian Delegation might be asked whether they were agreeable to the minutes being given confidentially to members of the States-General. With regard to the Truce, the Government had instructed the Commission-General not to sign the Agreement until the cease-fire order had been given. The Government refused any longer to "tolerate" violations of the Truce "at the cost of its troops or of the population or prosperity of Indonesia and the Netherlands." If the Government's attitude in this matter should lead to "military action," their "political aim" would remain unaffected.

This year's Lenten Pastoral from the Dutch Roman Catholic Hierarchy, which was read in all Catholic churches on Sunday, the 16th February, takes the dangers of Communism as its theme. The development is along familiar lines, but includes partial condemnation of Socialism. Communism, says the Pastoral, was "a danger as great as National Socialism, or even greater": its origins were the same; so were its methods—"deception, coercion and tyranny." Socialism was "much more moderate" than Communism: even so, it had its "own methods of teaching the meaning of the term 'community,'" which was "irreconcilable" with Christianity. From this the Pastoral argues that "a good Catholic" could not be "a good Socialist in the true sense." The Bolshevik idea of the omnipotent State was "unacceptable," since it denied "moral freedom" and was undemocratic; events in Poland and Yugoslavia provided examples of that idea put into practice. Bolshevism had "a most detrimental influence" on marriage and family life; and the "large" Communist following was the fruit of "crafty propaganda" which was attempting the domination of "humanity's longing for happiness." "Opposed to Communism were the opinions of the Pope, who had always appealed for the renewal of public and personal life in the spirit of the Gospel, and for Christian love of neighbour and social justice."

Belgium

Several thousand former prisoners of war—as many as 50,000, according to one estimate—took part in a demonstration in Brussels on the 26th February, because of the Government's failure to fix their service bonus. The demonstration began with a march past the Colonne du Congrès (where the Unknown Warrior is buried), after which the men invaded the area of the Rue de la Loi, with the intention of making their way to Parliament. At this point the demonstration developed into a riot, since demonstrations of any description are prohibited in the Rue de la Loi and its immediate neighbourhood. Unable to hold back the demonstrators, the police called out the fire brigade, but the hoses were cut and police and firemen pelted with bottles and stones. An attempt by the police to disperse the demonstration by firing blanks proved equally unsuccessful. At the height of the riot a brick was thrown through a window of the office of Col. Defraiteur, the Defence Minister, and two cars—one belonging to the Army, the other to the Catholic ex-Minister of Colonies, M. de Vleeschauwer—were overturned and burnt. Dr. Marteaux, the Communist Minister of Health, was slightly injured whilst attempting to cross the line of march on his way to Parliament. Altogether, some 30 or 40 persons—mainly demonstrators and police—were injured, one seriously injured policeman apparently having later died. The Parliamentary sessions were not disturbed, and after three hours quiet was restored. Eventually a delegation of demonstrators was admitted to the Parliament building to present their claims to the Prime Minister.

In a speech in the Chamber, M. Huysmans described the incidents as "a breach of faith" by the ex-prisoners, whose delegates had already undertaken to hold an orderly demonstration. No country, he declared, either in America or in Europe, had expended so much on its ex-servicemen, its disabled and its deportees of both wars as had Belgium. Col. Defraiteur said that the cost of ex-prisoners' benefits now under consideration would cost about one milliard of francs (nearly £5,760,000).

FRANCE

The French Government have officially requested His Majesty's Government to cancel the cut in Ruhr coal exports introduced last autumn; they propose that any increase in output over 220,000 tons a day (output at the end of January was 217,800 tons) should be divided equally between export and German internal consumption. This request is in tune with the assurance secured by M. Blum on his visit to London (see Summary 377) although that agreement did not anticipate the restoration of the full coal export quotas until the end of April. (See also under "Germany.")

The Anglo-French Economic Committee met in London from the 17th–19th February. It reviewed the balance of payments between the franc and sterling areas and decided on various measures for increasing trade. M. Laurentie, secretary-general of the French Ministry for Overseas France, also came over last week to have discussions at the Colonial Office, and it was agreed that an Anglo-French-Belgian conference should be held in Paris in late April or early May to discuss mutual co-operation and questions arising from the trusteeship system of the United Nations.

As anticipated in last week's Summary, the signing of a Franco-Polish Cultural Convention on the 19th February was accompanied by a decision to revise the Franco-Polish treaties of 1921 and 1925 and replace them by a pact of mutual defence against Germany.

The French Government and the Government of India have decided to exchange diplomatic representatives, and M. Henri Roux is to be Chargé d'Affaires in Delhi with the rank of Minister plenipotentiary. The French are naturally anxious to be on good terms with the Indian Government on account of their own possessions in India.

The Paris press is still out on strike, and Government news bulletins posted up in the streets are the only form of printed news available. The printers' men, who have been having a go-slow strike since the dispute at the beginning of January (see Summary No. 376), are demanding a 25 per cent. increase in wages in spite of the fact that they are very well paid in comparison with other trades. Those newspapers which are not supported by party funds cannot afford to pay higher wages and the Government have been asked to intervene. It is feared that in any case this long suspension will ruin the independent papers such as Combat whose circulation has been steadily declining in spite of its exceptionally independent and intelligent presentation of news and views. It is now evident that no morning paper can pay its way without a circulation of 200,000 (the figure is double for an evening paper), even at the present level of costs; among the important papers only the Communist L'Humanité, with 321,000, Franc-Tireur (Communist sympathiser) with 220,000, the Conservative Le Figaro, with 330,000, and the centre Le Parisien Libéré, with 262,000, attain the requisite circulation. Consequently, the ideal of a press free from the taint of money is vanishing and newspaper trusts are already making their presence felt. The standard of journalism is low and mortality among papers has been high since the liberation, but there are long lists of applicants for authorisation to revive old papers or produce new ones. At present, partly as a result of the need to replace the collaborationist press and partly because of the continuing shortage of newsprint and printing presses, the State controls and allots newsprint and presses, fixes the size and price of papers and the wages of the workers, and gives permission for papers to appear. This scheme was due to expire at the end of this month but it now seems that it will be prolonged until a permanent and more liberal system can be set up, since the information committee of the Assembly has rejected the new set of temporary regulations proposed by the Government.

The new 5 per cent. cut in prices is to take effect on the 26th February. M. Ramadier announced this decision in a broadcast speech on the 24th and said that there would be some exceptions. The cut would not be applied to wheat, so long as it was delivered by certain fixed dates; nor to iron and steel, except for those products entering into the manufacture of agricultural machinery; nor to some metals and alloys and some chemicals and drugs. M. Ramadier acknowledged that the price-reduction would cause loss to some traders and producers. Price statistics now issued for the month of January show that, in spite of the campaign for the reduction of prices, wholesale prices rose by 3 per cent. and the only prices to fall were those in retail shops, which fell by 1 per cent. Prices would indeed have risen far more, if nothing had been done, but the most serious feature of the situation is the failure of the Government's efforts to bring hoarded stocks on to the market.

Admiral d'Argenlieu arrived back in Paris on the 24th February, and will take part in the meeting of heads of overseas territories which opens at the end of the week. It is also reported that M. Sainteny, Commissioner in Tonking, is to resign his post on grounds of ill health.

A new Resident-General in Tunisia has at last been appointed. He is M. Jean Mons, a Socialist sympathiser and trade unionist, who was directeur de cabinet to M. Blum in the last Government and since then has been secretary-general of the Seine Préfecture.

SWITZERLAND

The Swiss-Czech negotiations, which were initiated in Berne in December and continued in Prague in January (see Summary No. 378) with regard to Swiss assets in Czechoslovakia placed under State administration or confiscated, resulted in an agreement which provided for compensation payable by way of interest-bearing debentures made out in crowns and guaranteed by the Czechoslovak State. A Czech delegation, composed of representatives of the Foreign Ministry, the Ministry of Foreign Trade, and the National Bank, left for Berne on the 8th February for further discussions, which it is expected will result not only in further amplification of the above agreement, but also in a new Trade Agreement.

At a reception given by him last week in honour of Dutch commercial representatives, the Swiss Minister to The Hague said (according to a Swiss wireless report) that commercial exchanges between Switzerland and Holland had been greatly increased during 1946, as compared with pre-war years. Swiss exports to Holland had amounted to 105,000,000 Swiss francs, while imports had amounted to 85,000,000 frs. It was estimated that this year's exchanges would reach a value of approximately 200,000,000 frs.

According to a wireless statement from Leipzig, General Schmittlein, in charge of education in the French zone, is in Switzerland to engage teachers and to obtain school books. In a speech at Zurich the General declared that as a result of denazification, schools in the zone were short of 7,000 teachers. Reuter is quoted for the statement that the General declared the relationship between the French Authorities and the German population in the French zone to have deteriorated in every respect during the past 12 months.

Customs duties yielded 270 million francs in 1946—a figure exceeded only in 1939 when imports were extremely heavy to build up war stocks.

A marked improvement has been shown in Anglo-Swiss trade. In 1946 Swiss imports from the United Kingdom were 153,237 tons, with a value of 197 million frs., as compared with 26,849 tons and 22 million frs. in 1945. Swiss exports to the United Kingdom in 1946 were 5,581 tons, with a value of 58 million frs., as compared with 6,227 tons and 32 million frs. the previous year. In 1938, Swiss imports from the U.K. were 348,257 tons, and exports 34,056 tons.

The state of electricity stocks is becoming still more precarious as a result of low rainfall (see Summary No. 377). Additional restrictions to meet the situation include the banning of all domestic electric water heaters, except in households which include invalids or children under two years of age. Hotels and boarding-houses are required to reduce the consumption of electricity by 10 per cent. from February. As a result of severe cuts already made in transport and industry, a few factories which have exhausted their electricity quota have closed down for a month.

Since the 6th January, the rationing of wood for domestic fuel and gas-generators has been cancelled, as a result of favourable timber production, coal imports of 1·5 million tons as against an estimate of 600,000 tons, release of military stocks, timber imports from France and the unexpected decontrol of fuel oil.

The value of agricultural production in Switzerland increased from 1,960 million frs. in 1945 to 2,085 frs. in 1946, due mainly to improvement in the yields from fruit, wine, cattle exports, milk, pigs and poultry.

SPAIN

The situation in Spain remains devoid of any excitement, but rumours of Ministerial changes are flying thick and fast. The suggestion is that General Franco, at present head of the State and head of the Government, proposes to divest himself of the latter function, thus spreading the shadow of power and retaining the substance. There is jubilation in Francoist circles over the decision to return to Spain of the Count de Guadalhorce, who was one of General Primo de Rivera's discoveries and was quite a successful Minister of Public Works. The Count, a brother of Señor Benjumea, the Minister of Finance, left Spain in 1931 on the advent of the Republic and settled in Argentina, where his engineering abilities were employed in the construction of the Buenos Aires Metro. He is being appointed to be head of a Board which will take in hand the job of reorganisation of the Spanish railway network (RENFE). Owing to shortage of rolling stock and of coal Spanish railways have been having a hard time.

In the meantime the Caudillo continues to see himself as a man with a mission—the keeper of Spain's Catholic conscience, and, now, a master in the field of economics. A spate of articles which have appeared recently in Arriba under the pseudonym of "Hispanicus" are generally attributed in Madrid to the pen of the head of the Spanish State.

An excited crowd of Monarchists about 3,000 strong were able to give vent to their Royalists sympathies when the Infante Don Jaime and his sister Doña Cristina on their way to Italy after paying a visit to their brother Don Juan at Estoril touched down for a two-hours' stop at Barajas airport (near Madrid) on the 18th February. It was the first occasion on which the two Infantes had set foot on Spanish soil since the departure of the Royal Family from Madrid in 1933. Spanish police guarded the road to Barajas, and quite a number of Don Juan's supporters failed to reach the airport. Monarchists in motor coaches, also, were held up in Madrid, presumably on the orders of the Government whose policy on this occasion appears to have been one of hindrance rather than of repression. On the other hand the Head of General Franco's Military Household and other Government officials were dispatched by General Franco to give official sanction to the whole affair, though the former apparently got lost in the crowd of milling Monarchists and failed to carry out his mission of conveying the Caudillo's respects.

Meanwhile in view possibly of the rumours that General Franco was planning to reorganize his Cabinet Don Juan has issued a note to his supporters inside Spain which repeats the orders given in his manifesto issued from Lausanne in March 1945. Monarchists are ordered to resist all the Generalissimo's blandishments and to refrain from "collaboration" with the present régime on pain of automatic dismissal from the Monarchist organization. The urgent need to gather up loose ends and to unify the several channels of communication between Monarchist "spokesmen" and representatives of the Left has Additional restrictions to meet the situation include the banning of all domestic electric water heaters, except in households which include invalids or children under two years of age. Hotels and boarding-houses are required to reduce the consumption of electricity by 10 per cent. from February. As a result of severe cuts already made in transport and industry, a few factories which have exhausted their electricity quota have closed down for a month.

Since the 6th January, the rationing of wood for domestic fuel and gas-generators has been cancelled, as a result of favourable timber production, coal imports of 1·5 million tons as against an estimate of 600,000 tons, release of military stocks, timber imports from France and the unexpected decontrol of fuel oil.

The value of agricultural production in Switzerland increased from 1,960 million frs. in 1945 to 2,085 frs. in 1946, due mainly to improvement in the yields from fruit, wine, cattle exports, milk, pigs and poultry.

SPAIN

The situation in Spain remains devoid of any excitement, but rumours of Ministerial changes are flying thick and fast. The suggestion is that General Franco, at present head of the State and head of the Government, proposes to divest himself of the latter function, thus spreading the shadow of power and retaining the substance. There is jubilation in Francoist circles over the decision to return to Spain of the Count de Guadalhorce, who was one of General Primo de Rivera's discoveries and was quite a successful Minister of Public Works. The Count, a brother of Señor Benjumea, the Minister of Finance, left Spain in 1931 on the advent of the Republic and settled in Argentina, where his engineering abilities were employed in the construction of the Buenos Aires Metro. He is being appointed to be head of a Board which will take in hand the job of reorganisation of the Spanish railway network (RENFE). Owing to shortage of rolling stock and of coal Spanish railways have been having a hard time.

In the meantime the Caudillo continues to see himself as a man with a mission—the keeper of Spain's Catholic conscience, and, now, a master in the field of economics. A spate of articles which have appeared recently in Arriba under the pseudonym of "Hispanicus" are generally attributed in Madrid to the pen of the head of the Spanish State.

An excited crowd of Monarchists about 3,000 strong were able to give vent to their Royalists sympathies when the Infante Don Jaime and his sister Doña Cristina on their way to Italy after paying a visit to their brother Don Juan at Estoril touched down for a two-hours' stop at Barajas airport (near Madrid) on the 18th February. It was the first occasion on which the two Infantes had set foot on Spanish soil since the departure of the Royal Family from Madrid in 1933. Spanish police guarded the road to Barajas, and quite a number of Don Juan's supporters failed to reach the airport. Monarchists in motor coaches, also, were held up in Madrid, presumably on the orders of the Government whose policy on this occasion appears to have been one of hindrance rather than of repression. On the other hand the Head of General Franco's Military Household and other Government officials were dispatched by General Franco to give official sanction to the whole affair, though the former apparently got lost in the crowd of milling Monarchists and failed to carry out his mission of conveying the Caudillo's respects.

Meanwhile in view possibly of the rumours that General Franco was planning to reorganize his Cabinet Don Juan has issued a note to his supporters inside Spain which repeats the orders given in his manifesto issued from Lausanne in March 1945. Monarchists are ordered to resist all the Generalissimo's blandishments and to refrain from "collaboration" with the present régime on pain of automatic dismissal from the Monarchist organization. The urgent need to gather up loose ends and to unify the several channels of communication between Monarchist "spokesmen" and representatives of the Left has led to the suggestion being made to Lisbon that a National Confederation of Monarchist Forces should be formed to group the Monarchists in Spain in one organization. This would probably be a very sensible move on Don Juan's part in view of the jealousies among his champions, each group anxious to be Don Juan's official mouthpiece and to have a hand in bringing about his return to Spain.

The more the changing of the guard of the Republican Government-in-exile is examined, the less it seems to make sense. As if conscious of the shaky basis of the new set-up, the Premier, Señor Llopis, has been explaining that his purpose was to give substance to a (hypothetical) National Council of Resistance inside Spain which would embrace former Republicans and Monarchists attached to no political party as well as members of the Alianza. With these elements represented in the "Government" Señor Llopis felt he could go before the United Nations and maintain that his Government fulfilled its part of the desiderata of the U.N. Resolution. He would then look for U.N. approval and support. While disclaiming any intention of seeking contact with the Monarchists he vouchsafed that he had no objection to his own supporters doing so. (This is rather rich in view of the extent to which such contact has already been established!) The Republicans, he added, would naturally offer themselves for the leadership of any interim government that might be formed in Spain after the ejection of General Franco: for the moment he was concerned to efface the impression (given through Señor Giral's recognition by East European countries) that Spanish Republicanism was oriented towards Communism. Finally he was anxious to maintain contact with H.M. Government.

The President, Señor Martínez Barrio, incidentally, has got himself into trouble by some cryptic remarks in an interview with José Maria Aguirre, editor of the "Febus" News Agency in Paris, which were picked up and commented upon by Reuter's Paris Correspondent.

He was asked whether the Llopis Government would be prepared to bide its time until a military Junta received Franco's resignation or whether it contemplated a coup, if power were not willingly relinquished. He replied oracularly:—

"The Republican Government has other things to do than await such an event. In my Note I referred to understanding with Spanish sections of opinion which, without being included in the frame of Republican ideas, could unite with us in the appreciation of the need for the disappearance of the Franco régime . . . These rapprochements could create an external atmosphere of support for a coalition of Spaniards who, from different positions, gather their efforts to overthrow Franco. Such an atmosphere might perhaps indicate to the Spanish Army its moral obligation to the country. The Spanish exile Republican Government has the corresponding duty to work for the creation of such an atmosphere as soon possible."

And he went on to make clear that, in his view, the holding of power by a military Junta, if that should happen, could only be a temporary situation pending elucidation of the political will of Spaniards.

The report as written up in the London Office of Reuter's represented Señor Barrio as envisaging favourably the restoration of a constitutional monarchy, openly avowing that there was no chance of overthrowing the Franco régime without the support of the army and the Monarchists, and declaring that the anti-Franco movement must lean heavily on Great Britain and the U.S. if it was ever to become effective. A note of apology was issued by Reuter two days later, and, subsequently, Señor Barrio's office described the report as "untrue from beginning to end" and denied that he had ever received any Reuter correspondent.

ITALY

The Italian press has already been indulging in some wishful thinking on the subject of Treaty revision and the attitude likely to be taken by His Majesty's Government. With regard to the question of ratification of the Treaty on the part of Italy, the U.S. Government have stated that in their opinion Italy will remain subject to the Armistice terms until she ratifies and that until she does so she can claim no rights or benefits under the Treaty

On the 25th February the general debate in the Constituent Assembly came to an end, and Signor De Gasperi received a vote of confidence of 291 votes to 107.

The U.S. Government have now submitted to the Security Council five nominations for the Governorship of the Free Territory of Trieste. They are: Mr. Leif Egeland, South African Minister to Belgium and the Netherlands, who was Chairman of the Italian Political and Territorial Commission at the Paris Peace Conference; General Henri Guisan, former Commander-in-Chief of the Swiss Army; Dr. Alberto Lleras Camergo, wartime President of Colombia; and Lieutenant-General Nordenskiold and Justice Emil Sandstroem of Sweden.

The Italian Government, in association with the General Confederation of Labour, is anxious to speed up and facilitate emigration schemes by means of special bilateral agreements. The General Confederation wishes to secure reasonably good working conditions for the emigrants, but it is now accepted by the Government that the emigrants must accept assimilation to the country of their adoption, in contrast to the Fascist idea of close links being retained with the homeland by means of a special office (Italians Abroad) set up for that purpose. In the first eleven months of 1946 34,000 Italians left the country, including 7,000 permanent emigrants. In the same period 4,200 returned. Switzerland took the majority of the emigrants, 19,000, followed by France with 7,000 and Belgium with 3,000. On the 21st February an agreement was signed with Argentina which in its scope is the most important of all those bearing on emigration that have been concluded since the end of the war. Negotiations had been going on for some weeks but showed signs of breaking down owing to the persistence of the demands of the General Confederation for adequate assurances with regard to the working conditions of emigrants. (The Argentine Trade Unions are not recognised by the International Labour Office or by the World Federation of Trade Unions). The first contingent of emigrants will leave this month, and it is expected that average departures will be about two thousand a month. No figure is given of the total number which Argentina will accept. The emigrants will consist of unskilled manual workers as well as of skilled workers and should, therefore, help to reduce agricultural unemployment in Italy. An assurance has been secured that the emigrants will enjoy the same labour legislation, social insurance and trade union rights as Argentine workers. They will be allowed to send home remittances, and the Argentine Government will advance the fare to those who are unable to afford it.

SOUTH EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

For a brief moment it appeared as though M. Masaryk had succeeded in establishing better relations between Hungary and Czechoslovakia by his promise to attempt to correct any mistake which might have occurred on the Czechoslovak side in connection with the Exchange of Populations Agreement, and the Social Democratic newspaper, Népszava, voiced Hungary's readiness to respond to what it considered the manifestation of a genuinely new spirit. Shortly afterwards, however, the customary tone of mutual recrimination returned. Among accusations directed against Hungary was that of bribing Slovak repatriates to withdraw their registrations by offers of land, while Hungarians asked whether the hostile attitude of the Czechoslovak Press indicated a different policy from that officially laid down or whether it interpreted this policy only too faithfully. On his return from Paris M. Gyöngyösi revealed that he had held private conversations with M. Bidault and the representatives of neighbouring countries. He had also approached Czechoslovak statesmen about the possibility of starting new negotiations, but there is as yet no evidence that any concrete result was obtained.

The implications of the left-wing demand for the raising of M. Kovac's parliamentary immunity reach far beyond the question of his personal guilt. His enemies profess to see in him the embodiment of every kind of reactionary threat to the continued existence of a democratic Hungary. The Communist organ, Szabadság, merely paraphrases the words of MM. Rákosi and Szakasits when it says that the fate of the Coalition depends upon the issue. By a majority vote of eight to six the Committee of Privileges decided not to surrender M. Kovacs to the judicial authorities, and the Smallholders are again asking for the appointment of a Political Committee of Enquiry to investigate the case, although they had previously agreed to withdraw the motion from the Agenda of the National Assembly (see last week's Summary). M. Rákosi, in an angry speech, recalled that M. Ries, the Social Democratic Minister of Justice, had examined the files of M. Kovacs and had found ample evidence for suspecting him of complicity in the plot. The matter therefore, he argued, was one for the Courts, and in no event would the Smallholders' Political Committee be accepted as judges. He claimed that the progressive intelligentsia and the peasant members of the Smallholders' own Party backed him in urging the merciless punishment of the conspirators and called on his followers to unite more closely with the rest of the left-wing bloc, as well as with the democratic elements among the Smallholders. "If the Smallholders' Party continues to obstruct the conspirators being brought to justice," he concluded, "we shall appeal to the working people, to the nation . . . . We shall demand new elections, and in these the Hungarian people will support not the conspirators of the old gentlemanly world, but the constructive forces of democracy." Here it is worth noting that the Communist Press has devoted much space to the Polish elections, emphasising their impartiality and pointing to Poland as a model for Hungary to copy.

The Smallholders, too, are preparing to launch a nation-wide campaign in view of the elections which may shortly be forced upon them. The astute, if unscrupulous, Fr. Balogh has been instructed to reorganise the Party, of which he became Acting Secretary-General on the resignation of M. Kovacs. M. Kovacs has also resigned his membership of the Party's Political Committee and his position as Editor-in-Chief of Kis Ujsàg. In addition he has asked permission to absent himself over a long period from the meetings of the National Assembly. While vigorously disclaiming any share in the conspiracy, he admits responsibility by reason of his office for those members of his Party who were involved. He further hopes that his action will advance the cause of political reconciliation.

The Social Democratic Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Finance, M. Kemeny, has negotiated a British loan to Hungary of £500,000 to be used for the purchase of cotton, rubber, machine-tools and raw materials. It is expected that this will greatly increase the prestige of the Social Democrats who are preparing a house-to-house recruitment scheme in an attempt to gain new members for their Party. The loan which Hungary obtained from the United States is to be raised to 30 million dollars; it will be expended on surplus American stocks in Germany and, if the concession is granted, in Italy and the U.S.A. Negotiations to buy raw cotton are in progress with the Egyptian Government and a private Egyptian firm. M. Rácz, the Minister of Finance, stated in the National Assembly that foreign assistance and the reduction of her international obligations would greatly hasten Hungary's economic recovery, but that she was resolved ultimately to balance her Budget from her own resources.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Government have agreed to send a delegation to Trieste to discuss with Italian representatives the exact delimitation of the provisional Italo-Yugoslav frontier, under the supervision of a Four-Power Commission. Arrangements are also to be made for the transfer of administration in Zone A.

The press still concentrates on vilifying the Greek Government and the British forces in Greece. The strange career of Mr. Balfour, now First Secretary of H.M. Embassy in Athens, has provided Borba with material for a sensational article in the best spy-story tradition.

Grievances against Austria have also played a prominent part. The Yugoslav Government have sent notes of protest to the Deputy Foreign Ministers against the inclusion of Herr Piesch in the Austrian delegation, and to the Allied Council for Austria against a proposal to settle Balkan Volksdeutsche in Carinthia, news of which was apparently gleaned from The Times and Reynolds News. The Yugoslav Government have also complained that lack of control over "armed bands" in the Austro-Yugoslav frontier area is causing tension and offers a threat of disorders.

A year after the Yugoslav Government, in their note of the 25th November, 1945, had given assurance that British property in Yugoslavia would be returned to the owners, the Law of Nationalisation, affecting most, if not all, foreign interests, was rushed through the National Assembly. H.M. Government, in making enquiries as to British concerns thus affected, reminded the Yugoslav Government of their previous assurance and suggested that it was a suitable moment for a meeting of the Anglo-Yugoslav Mixed Commission, in which questions of compensation, &c., could be discussed. The Yugoslav reply of the 20th February was not encouraging. Questions of compensation, it was said, would be settled according to a decree shortly to be published. British property owners would, however, be consulted. There was now no point in the existence of the Mixed Commission since it had originally been set up to fulfil an entirely different set of conditions.

It is now over a year since the Yugoslav Government first suggested that an Anglo-Yugoslav Mixed Commission might be formed to settle questions concerning the restoration of British property. H.M. Government welcomed the suggestion as being a practical means of tackling a complicated problem. But for various reasons the Commission never met in 1946. For one thing, H.M. Government were dissatisfied with the Yugoslav attitude towards representatives of British concerns who wished to inspect their property, also with the unpleasant practice of convicting local managers for collaboration with the enemy and confiscating the enterprise. Then, while the Shipping and Property Agreements were being negotiated in London, the formation of the Mixed Commission was held in abeyance.

In spite of a barely disguised intention to confiscate as much property as possible on the ground of collaboration, and thus reduce their commitments to pay compensation, the Yugoslav Government may, perhaps, be induced to fulfil their remaining obligations if it is made clear that British signature of the now completed Shipping Agreement may depend on this. According to an unofficial and unconfirmed report Swedish property-owners are to receive eight million U.S. dollars in compensation for nationalisation.

But the Yugoslav record in this question of British interests is nothing to be proud of, and their promise to fix compensation in consultation with British owners may mean as little as their original assurance of November, 1945.

Greece

On the 18th February the United Nations Commission completed the series of preliminary sessions which have been held in Athens. To the last the statements of the Albanian, Bulgarian and Yugoslav representatives continued to overlap and to bear a marked resemblance and also strangely to resemble the statements made by the Greek left-wing organisations. All pointed towards the Greek internal situation as the cause of the disturbances on the frontier and towards Greek expansionist aims as a threat to the peace of the Balkans. The final speech made by the Greek representative exposed the weakness of their arguments and stressed the peaceful intentions of the Greeks. The Commission have now moved to Salonica in order to proceed with fuller enquiries in Northern Greece and in the three neighbouring countries.

There has been no diminution in the general unrest throughout the country. It is estimated that the number of armed bandits increased by 240 recruits in Macedonia and 200 in the Peloponnese as a result of the Sparta incident mentioned in Summary No. 381. The sphere of activities of the bandits in Thrace has been enlarged, giving them considerably more control, particularly in the Xanthi and Komotini areas. Increased activity in the Lamia district has been accompanied by an influx to that area of local recruits and reinforcements from Northern Thessaly. It is also reported that the bands in central Macedonia have been reorganised. Meanwhile the Greek Government are hastening their preparations for dealing with the bandits. A third amnesty bill is being presented to the Chamber on the 26th February offering pardon to rebels who surrender within a month. A drive against the others will be conducted by the Greek Army and, to that end, several changes have been made in the Higher Command. Moreover, General Zervas, the former leader of the right-wing resistance movement, who was originally Minister without Portfolio, has been sworn in as Minister of Public Order. It is also reported that the Greek Army are already conducting operations on a considerable scale in the area North of Salonica.

There is a growing realisation that any large-scale drive for final liquidation of the bandits is going to prove an almost intolerable burden to the Greek Treasury, particularly in view of the imminent exhaustion of Greece's holdings of sterling and dollars. The revised estimated deficit for 1947, calculated on an austerity basis for imports and a maximum export programme, was placed at not less than £44,000,000; and this estimate assumed that Greece would not be called upon to furnish foreign exchange for the provisioning and equipping of the Greek Army. It will be remembered that the British Government have undertaken to provide sterling for this purpose only until the 31st March; and that the bandits may be expected to intensify their activities in the Spring.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

In interviews with the correspondents of the Times and of the Chicago Tribune, Nokrashy Pasha has specified the Security Council as the body to which Egypt will appeal. He told the Times correspondent that he realises that Egypt has not a very good case, but thought that it was better for relations between the two countries that they should be able to blame a third party rather than that one party should blame the other if the result dissatisfied them. This curious argument partially confirms his statement to the Chicago Tribune that the possible resumption of negotiations is only a rumour, and may be an indication of the line which he will take if he finally decides to refuse the offer of the Levant States to mediate with that object.

There is little doubt that the removal of all British troops from Egypt and the Sudan will be claimed by the Egyptian delegation. Nokrashy is obsessed with the idea that the Sudan Administration is deliberately encouraging anti-Egyptian feeling amongst the Sudanese (see last week's Summary). He told the Chicago Tribune representative that, when the Sudanese have reached the stage of autonomy after the evacuation of their country by the British, no force in the world could prevent the Sudanese from deciding their own fate. History, however, gives some clues to what that fate might be.

King Farouk seems to be of the same mind as his Prime Minister on the subject of the Sudan, and to be persuaded that the "disloyalty" of the Sudanese is the result of British intrigues. This, quite apart from his hostility to the Wafd, may be an additional reason influencing him in his apparent determination to keep the present Cabinet in power as long as possible. There are signs, however, that his personal popularity is not what it was. A torch race which is usually held on his birthday (11th February) was cancelled at the last moment this year on the excuse that it was out of place while national aspirations were unfulfilled, but, in actual fact, because of the risk that Wafdist supporters might have interfered with it.

Palestine

Minor acts of terrorism continue, and, although the Jewish Telegraphic Agency claim that the Hagana has recently frustrated several attempts of the Irgun Zvai Leumi to attack military transport and installations, there is no official change in the policy of non-co-operation. In addition to a number of road-mining incidents an attack on an R.A.F. airfield at Ain Shemer, near Hadera, took place during the night of the 19th/20th February, and on the 20th the 'Iraq Petroleum Company's pipe line was cut in two places. The Irgun Zvai Leumi are threatening reprisals if the three terrorists recently condemned to death are executed. As a matter of fact, the carrying out of the sentences on them is being postponed pending a settlement of the case of Dov Grüner (see last week's Summary).

The announcement that the Palestine question will be referred to the United Nations appears to be welcomed by the Jewish Agency as a recognition of the international character of the question, and the indications are that, while pressing for an increased immigration quota, every effort will be made to mobilise world opinion in favour of Zionist aspirations. The Arabs express dissatisfaction at the continuance of immigration at the present rate of 1,500 a month, and, while somewhat reassured by the fact that concessions which the Jews might have gained in London have been averted, show some apprehension at the final outcome.

Mr. Bevin opened the debate on Palestine in the House of Commons on the 18th February. He said that there was no denying that the Mandate contained contradictory promises, and had been proved by the experience of the last 25 years to be unworkable. He referred to the difficulties which had ensued from President Truman's demand for 100,000 Jewish immigrants, and protested at the intrusion of domestic politics in international affairs. He outlined both Arab and Jewish cases. He said that he had made efforts that this country should take its proportion, with all the other countries, of the million displaced persons in Europe—not only Jews; he did not think that they should be singled out—and he had failed. He was studying the matter to see whether it could be considered by the United Nations before September, and would prefer, even now, that it should be dealt with on humanitarian grounds. He ended his speech with the words:—

"Let them go back to relieving Europe of 100,000, and if there was a dispute let there be arbitration, so that they could as quickly as possible create an independent State in Palestine where Jews and Arabs, who had such traditions and had contributed so much to the religious and cultural thought of the world, could work together and end century-old conflicts."

It is announced in the press that Fauzi al Qawuqchi, who was prominent as a leader of the Palestine rebels from 1936, and took part in the Rashid Ali rebellion in 'Iraq in 1941, has returned to the Middle East. He was wounded in 1941, and has since that date been in Germany, latterly in the Russian Zone.

Transjordan

Haji Amin al Husseini has sent a message to King Abdullah asking for his immediate intervention in view of Mr. Bevin's statement on Palestine. His Majesty has replied suggesting that the question of future action appears to be a matter for consideration by the Arab League. Haji Amin has also telegraphed to a leading tribal chief of Transjordan, and may have sent messages to others.

Public opinion in Transjordan approves the reference of the Palestine case to the United Nations, the only criticism heard being that the delay involved would allow further Jewish immigration and land-buying.

Iraq

There is little news of the progress of the elections, but the general opinion is that Government supporters are assured of a handsome majority. Taufiq as Suweidi's Liberal Party is reported by the press to have withdrawn from the elections on the ground that pressure is exerted on them, although there was evidence that little or no support was forthcoming for this party.

By an administrative decree the Government will take over all supplies of newsprint entering 'Iraq, which will enable them to control all sales to the press. This step appears to have been necessitated by the issue of a licence to the Soviet Legation to import four hundred tons of newsprint, which offered dangerous possibilities of support to undesirable newspapers.

Persia

Mulla Mustafa (see last week's Summary) has failed to persuade any of his followers to accept the Persian Government's offer of settlement, and the whole band are returning by devious mountain routes to 'Iraq. Persian army columns are ensuring that they cross the frontier without provoking hostilities en route.

More information has now been received about the Oil Workers' Union (see Summary No. 379). A manifesto of the 21st January, issued in Abadan by the "Executive Committee of the Oil Workers' Union," states that it was formed as a result of dissatisfaction with the Tudeh Party, which controlled the old union. The new Union intends to remain free from all political influence: its sole concern will be to protect the interests of the workmen. The members of the Executive Committee are all either oil labourers themselves, or have experience in oil matters. Hence it is claimed that they will be well fitted to represent the workers' interests. The new Union is to be officially registered under the Labour Law.

A report from His Majesty's Consul, Khorramshahr, indicates that, so far, this new Union has not made great headway. Many workers, recalling the misappropriation of party funds by the Tudeh treasurer (see Summary No. 379), have little confidence that the officials of the new Union will set a better example. Furthermore, the Union is still awaiting official recognition, and is without a headquarters. Nevertheless, a reliable but unofficial report states that the majority of Anglo-Iranian Oil Company employees at Abadan now support Qawam's Democrat Party rather than the Tudeh, which has not recovered from the severe setback to its prestige occasioned by the restoration of Central Government authority in Azerbaijan. A report from another source states that the uncompromising attitude which the new Union proposes to pursue towards the Tudeh has made a ready appeal among the workers. It seems, therefore, that, once it has overcome its initial difficulties, the Union should eventually gain the workers' support.

His Majesty's Consul, Tabriz, reports that the Russians are apparently unwilling to keep the refugees (muhajirs) (see Summary No. 373), Armenians and Fidais, who fled to Russian Azerbaijan in the summer. They are said to be, at present, in a concentration camp, fed on a starvation diet.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

After 7½ months the prosecution in the Toyko International War Crimes Tribunal has concluded its case against the 26 defendants. In one sense it is Japan herself that is on trial, since the prosecution has cited more than 100 treaties, international agreements and conventions that Japan has violated since 1890. The crimes charged fall into three categories: (1) "crimes against peace"—planning and waging aggressive war; (2) "war crimes"

—ill-treatment of prisoners and internees; (3) "crimes against humanity" e.g., promotion of opium sales to China to weaken the will to defence. The trial differs from the Nuremberg trial in that 11 nations are represented instead of 4, and it is claimed that certain aspects of "war as a crime" are being more thoroughly explored.

The Japanese press has hitherto shown little interest in the proceedings. In so far as the monthly magazines may be taken as a guide, thinking people arraign the past semi-feudalistic, authoritarian form of government, which, it is argued, was bound to issue in oppression at home and aggression abroad. The actual authors of the last war were guilty of plunging the country into a war which it could not win but, presumably because they were the products of the system and not its makers, there is no admission of their moral guilt.

Now that it is the turn of the defence, the newspapers are displaying a lively interest. The defence is expected to maintain that (1) the Japanese war preparations were identical with those of other countries; (2) Japan attacked the Netherlands only after that country had declared war on her and (3) local commanders, and not the defendants, were responsible for "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity." As for Pearl Harbour, that was necessary to break the encirclement by the ABCD Powers (American, British, Chinese and Dutch).

Korea

Since their orgy of strikes in the late autumn, the Korea communists have remained quiescent. It would be too much to hope that they have suffered a change of heart. It seems more probable that they are watching their political opponents dig a grave for themselves.

On the 20th January the interim legislative assembly passed an anti-trusteeship resolution by 44 votes to 1. The result was a pyrrhic victory for the extreme right, Rhee-Kim Koo, faction, since opponents of the motion—a pro-coalition group and most of the appointed members—had not the courage to vote. Their abstention, however, is evidence of the strength of feeling against trusteeship.

Some American correspondents paint a sad picture of the bewilderment and dismay of the southern Korean at the results to date of the American occupation. Signs of any growth of liking for western democracy are wanting. The people have no confidence in the officials appointed by the Military Government, most of whom they accuse of being ex-collaborators, and they have a naïve belief that all their troubles would vanish if only the occupation forces would go away.

The egregious leader of the right faction —Syngman Rhee—is now touring the United States in a courageous attempt to win over American opinion to a reversal of the decision of the Moscow Conference (December 1945) and the grant of immediate independence to Korea. It is understood that he hopes to send his lieutenant to the United Kingdom. Meanwhile his henchman, Kim Koo, in Seoul has nailed his colours to the mast and excluded himself and his followers from consultation by the Joint-Commission (see Summary 376), should it meet.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The economic crisis in Great Britain continues to be front-page news and to provide a leading topic of discussion in the United States. In the words of the New York Herald-Tribune "the weather reports from the British Isles have suddenly taken on all the nightmare quality of the communiqués that once described the Battle of Britain. . . . And, as in 1940, the world watches, a little awed, more than a little fearful and all too helpless, while one of the pillars of the order that men and nations have known for generations is shaken under the weight of its accumulated burdens." There is also a growing demand for the United States to show its sympathy in the form of "quick, effective and sufficient action" to assist the British people through the emergency period. Newspaper editors have spoken of the desirability of extending the British loan, and it has been suggested that the United States ought even to take a lenient view of any failure on the part of His Majesty's Government to make sterling freely convertible into dollars this summer (July) under Articles 7 and 8 of the loan agreement.

The combined effect of the latest White Paper on the British economic situation and of the Prime Minister's announcement regarding the forthcoming withdrawal from India has been to awaken an even stronger body of opinion to the fact that any change in the disposition of British power and influence over the globe is necessarily a matter of supreme concern to the United States. Thus Mr. Charles A.

Eaton, the Chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs, has been constrained to remark that he could not conceive of "any greater disadvantage to the American nation as a world leader than the disappearance of the British Empire." Nevertheless, as an earnest of British intentions to accord full political freedom and self-government to the people of India, Mr. Attlee's announcement of the 20th February has been cordially welcomed by American Liberals and Conservatives alike. At the State Department, General Marshall, to whom the text and a full explanation of the Prime Minister's announcement were submitted in advance, has assured His Majesty's Government that he has the fullest confidence in their sincerity of purpose with regard to India, and he has offered to make any statement in sympathy with their policy which they feel might help them. He has also spoken highly of the new Viceroy, Lord Louis Mountbatten.

General Marshall has been warmly praised by press and radio commentators for his swift and outspoken vindication of Mr. Dean Acheson in his Note to Moscow of the 18th February (see last week's Summary). His reply to the Soviet charges of "slander" has been taken to mean that he intends to be candid with the Russians right from the very start and that, while he is at the State Department, "a spade will be called just that and aggression, military or diplomatic, whatever national label modifies it, will be given its proper name." At the same time there has been a tendency to contrast Mr. Acheson's mild description of Soviet policy as an "expanding and aggressive one" with the raucous abuse of the United States and its leaders that has issued from Radio Moscow in recent months. In this connexion the State Department has been widely commended for its efforts to give the Russian people the other side of the American picture in its newly-inaugurated "Voice of America" broadcasts.

In American domestic politics the major issue of the moment is whether Mr. David E. Lilienthal is to be confirmed in office as Chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission. The hearings on Mr. Lilienthal's appointment have tended at times during the past few days to degenerate into a boisterous discussion on the virtues of military, as opposed to civilian, control of atomic research and on the iniquity of the Government monopolizing the development of atomic energy for commercial purposes. The fact that Mr. Lilienthal (in common, it must be observed, with the 79th Congress which passed the McMahon Act last year) is against the exploitation of atomic energy for private profit has been adduced as further evidence of his leanings towards "Socialism." His part in drawing up the plan whereby the United States might make the atomic bomb international property if adequate safeguards against its abuse were forthcoming is also cited as a strong disqualification by those who object to sharing atomic secrets with the Soviet Union. For their part the atomic scientists are said to be united in support of Mr. Lilienthal, and a survey by the Washington Post of 95 newspapers in 35 States reveals that 80 per cent. are in favour of his nomination being confirmed. Senator Taft, however, has made it plain that he will vote against the appointment. Much therefore depends upon Senator Vandenberg, who refuses to take a very definite stand until the current hearings on Mr. Lilienthal's fitness to serve have been completed.

During the past week Senator Vandenberg has been fully occupied in trying to prevent the Republican die-hards in the Senate from confirming the proposed reduction of $6,000 million in the Federal Budget estimates. This reduction was approved by the House of Representatives on the 20th February by 239 votes to 159. On the 21st Senator Vandenberg opened the debate in the Senate by pointing out that the proposed economy would seriously jeopardize the chances of "winning the peace" and that America could not "take the hazard of weakening herself in the world in such critical times." He therefore suggested that the Senate might compromise on a reduction of $4,500 million—a figure which would take the burden of retrenchment off the armed services. Such a compromise is favoured by Senator Chan Gurney, the Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Armed Services, and by Senator Eugene Millikin, the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Meanwhile, the House Appropriations Committee has been applying itself with zest to Mr. Truman's supplementary estimates, which it has endeavoured to prune by as much as 56 per cent. If the cuts which the Committee has recommended are allowed to stand the Veterans' Administration will be deprived of a substantial portion of its working funds, while the $9,000,000 already provided to keep the rent control and sugar rationing schemes in operation until the 30th June will be cancelled altogether.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

The Inter-American Defence Board has published its recommendations to the Latin American Governments. Proposals include standardization of training and equipment for the armed forces of the Western Hemisphere. This suggests that the Rio de Janeiro Conference to discuss a permanent Inter-American Defence pact may soon be held.

Brazil

Reports on the Brazilian elections for State Governors (see Summary No. 379) show that General Dutra's P.S.D. hold the governorships of nine states and can rely on support from the governors of two more, while the opposition U.D.N. win seven, and other groups two. The very disparity of the results is a testimony to the fairness of the elections, and it is probably true to say that no previous Brazilian administration has so reflected the wishes of the people.

It now emerges that the Brazilian Communist (P.C.B.) Party, despite their great efforts, have not appreciably increased their voting strength since the Presidential elections at the end of 1945. The one Communist candidate for a state governorship (in Pernambuco) polled only a fifth of the total votes. Elsewhere Communists offered their votes to candidates of various colours; in São Paulo their support of Sr. Adhemar de Barros was decisive, and it remains to be seen how Sr. Barros will pay for his victory. In Rio de Janeiro, their other stronghold, the P.C.B. have a third of the seats on the Municipal Council. It would appear, therefore, that the Communist proliferation is arrested for the time being. It may be arrested further, for, according to a recent broadcast report, the Brazilian Attorney-General has requested the Supreme Electoral Tribunal to declare the Brazilian Communist Party illegal in accordance with the terms of the new Constitution.

A second feature of the elections has been the collapse of Dr. Vargas and his Labour Party (P.T.B.). Dr. Vargas thought himself strong enough to break with the Communists, formerly his friends, before the election. In fact, his three candidates for State governorships were all defeated: his own state of Rio Grande do Sul voted against his candidate by 255,000 to 225,000. The only state to elect one of his supporters as governor was Pernambuco, where the unscrupulous Agamemmon Magalhãis appears to have been elected by a bare 700 votes on a combined P.T.B.-P.S.D. ticket.

The party which has made most progress is the liberal opposition party, U.D.N., which has won the important states of Minas Gerais (where Dr. Vargas' satellite Benedito Valdares was well dug in) and Bahia. The U.D.N. is perhaps more truly a party in the English sense than any of the others, which remain largely groups in support of a particular individual. A division has existed in the U.D.N. between those who favour collaboration with General Dutra and those who prefer full opposition. Their leader, Dr. Otavio Mangabeira, who has strongly supported collaboration, has been elected Governor of Bahia, and will therefore give up the active leadership of the party, while the position of secretary is vacant since the resignation of Sr. Virgilio Melo Franco, who took the opposite line. The future leader of the party is to be chosen early in March, and the candidates are Dr. Prado Kelly, who follows Dr. Mangabeira, and Sr. José Américo, the leader of the non-collaborating group.

One effect of the election has been to ease the general political atmosphere. The discomfiture of Dr. Vargas and the Communists is pleasing to the army. The P.S.D., though not strong, is satisfied with its majority, while the U.D.N. is particularly gratified by its victory in Minas Gerais. General Dutra himself is given credit for allowing a free election in a country where the government in power has almost always "won" elections.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Corfu incident

On the 22nd October, 1946, two British warships, H.M.S. Saumarez and H.M.S. Volage, were mined whilst passing through the Corfu Strait, and 44 of their officers and ratings lost their lives. Having failed to get satisfaction from direct negotiations with the Albanian Government, H.M.G. brought the matter before the Security Council, and on the 18th February, 1947, Sir Alexander Cadogan presented the British case.

C267026

The ships were moving northward, through a channel swept clear of mines in 1944. On their left was an unswept German minefield: close to their right the Albanian shore. They were in Albanian territorial waters; but this was the channel normally used by shipping, and the "right of innocent passage" entitled them to be there. At 2·45 the ships heard two bursts of machine-gun fire from the Albanian shore. At 2·53 Saumarez struck a mine, Volage taking her in tow. At 3·32 an Albanian launch, flying a white flag, came up, asked the business of the British ships, and retired after about half an hour, without once offering to help. Three-quarters of an hour later Volage also struck a mine.

On the 12th and 13th November the British swept the channel, at the unanimous recommendation of the Mediterranean Zone Board of the International Mine Clearance Organisation (its members being France, U.K., Greece, U.S., U.S.S.R., and Yugoslavia). Twenty-two mines were found, of the German Y type, the most powerful of all anchored mines. They had been laid within the last six months. They stretched for three miles along this shipping channel, coming to within 300 yards of the Albanian shore. They had been laid in secret, and shipping had not been warned.

On the basis of these facts, Sir Alexander Cadogan asked the Security Council to find that an unnotified minefield had been laid by, or with the connivance of, Albania; that this action had resulted in the loss to British lives and ships; that Great Britain and Albania should settle the dispute according to this finding; that the dispute remain on the Council's agenda until settled, and that the Security Council remind all States that they were bound by international law to sweep or allow the sweeping of all parts of their territorial waters where there was reason to suspect mines. Briefly, the British case was that Albania had committed a crime against humanity in laying or conniving at the laying of an unnotified minefield.

M. Kapo replied for Albania. His country, he said, had not laid the mines, nor had she any knowledge of their existence. They were old mines. He admitted the right of innocent passage, but claimed that the State through whose territorial waters innocent passage was intended, must receive previous notice. Albania had deceived none. He claimed further that the British ships were in battle order, that theirs was not "passage" through but penetration into territorial waters, and that such penetration destroyed the rights of innocent passage. His argument—as Sir Alexander Cadogan later pointed out—led to the conclusion that counter-action was justified. Continuing on the subject of the international law concerning innocent passage, M. Kapo gave instances, which, he said, showed that Great Britain had in the past acted as though her rights over territorial waters justified her in preventing passage, by force.

The second part of M. Kapo's speech was an account of Anglo-Albanian relations, in which the British appeared as unresponsive to Albanian affection, aggressive, working with Greece against Albania, &c., and he quoted eight occasions, beginning with the 16th July, 1945, and ending on the 30th April, 1946—N.B. within six months of the mining of the British Destroyers—on which he alleged that Greek or other warships had committed aggression in Albanian territorial waters. As Sir Alexander Cadogan said, in reply to M. Kapo, it was too much to believe that a minefield had appeared miraculously at the exact spot where the Albanian Government obviously wished to prevent passage. M. Kapo's speech had supplied the motive for laying the minefield. The Albanian Government, he concluded, might differ from the majority of international lawyers in its views on the right of innocent passage. It had no right to enforce those views by high explosives. The charge remained the laying of an unnotified minefield.

The Security Council resumed its consideration of the Corfu incident on the 24th when M. Gromyko attacked the British and seemed to justify any Albanian action. He said that the fairway used by the British ships was not that cleared in 1944–5: that Great Britain and Greece had excluded Albania from her rightful share in clearing her own waters: that the Mines Board had not unanimously recommended Great Britain to sweep the mines, and that the British action was therefore unilateral: that foreign warships were "bossing" Albanian waters under pretext of sweeping mines, and that the French expert, Captain de Mestre, a member of the Mines Clearance Board, had examined the mines at the request of the British and not of the Board, and that, therefore, his evidence as to their age was worthless. Albania was no threat to peace. The case should therefore be dismissed. Sir Alexander Cadogan corrected "the great and important inaccuracies" of the Russian speech. It was "untrue," he said, that the British ships were not in the unswept channel; and the Mines Board's recommendation had been unanimous, though later, Russia tried to have it reversed. At this stage the representatives of U.S. and of Australia proposed setting up a small Committee to hear evidence and report to the Council.

International Refugee Organisation

The Preparatory Commission adjourned on the 21st February, and arranged to meet again in Geneva on the 15th April. It appointed an experienced and highly qualified United States citizen, Mr. Arthur Altmeyer, who is U.S. Commissioner for Social Security, to be its Executive Secretary and drew up instructions to enable him to carry out his work with the least possible delay. That work is to ensure the birth of the I.R.O. itself, to which the Slav States are known to be opposed. The Secretary-General of the U.N. has responded to the appeal of the Preparatory Commission, and has agreed to make advances from the U.N. Working Capital Fund in order to enable it to carry on its work until the Organisation is able to finance its own activities.

GERMANY

The report for the Conference of Foreign Ministers was approved by the Control Council in Berlin on the 25th February after being hustled through with unseemly haste in its last stages, owing to the reluctance of the French, Soviet and United States delegates to incur the imaginary stigma of delaying its passage. This Gargantuan document (weight six pounds) holds a mirror to four-Power disagreements on many essential issues and is incomplete and uncoordinated as a record of fact. It has not, however, degenerated into a lopsided advertisement of Soviet views. The Soviet representatives have been more conciliatory than was expected in admitting the statements of the other delegates, probably because they saw that this was the only way to get a report at all and therefore were content to rely on a different type of protest. This took the form of direct reproofs from Moscow, the first delivered on the 20th January (see Summaries Nos. 378 and 379); the second on the 25th February, when members of the Control Council were just congratulating each other on the conclusion of the report. Marshal Sokolowsky read a twenty-minute lecture on Anglo-U.S. policy which was in effect a formal anthology, in more restrained terms, of Moscow press attacks since the beginning of 1947. Control Council procedure was again defied and the statement was published in the Moscow press on the 27th February. Marshal Sokolowsky referred to reports (see last week's Summary) that preparations were being made for bi-zonal political fusion. He attacked economic fusion as contrary to Potsdam. He contended that the original and excusable argument that this was done to mitigate the burden of the British and U.S. taxpayer (although the Soviet Union did not harp on her "not less heavy expenditure") had been abandoned. The bi-zonal authorities were ignoring their obligations to carry out the liquidation of war potential, the provision of reparations and the elimination of monopolies. The fusion had facilitated an anti-Allied campaign by "fascist dregs" and others. The two Powers were hampering the economic rehabilitation of Germany by splitting her in two and orientating trade only towards the Western countries. Marshal Sokolowsky attacked the talk of a large loan to be granted to Germany and said that the bi-zonal area was being subordinated to foreign monopolies while support was given to German monopolies, the heralds of aggression. The territorial reorganisation of these zones aimed at federation, which the Germans did not want, and they ought to have the opportunity to express their views freely on this matter. At the conclusion of this diatribe General Robertson merely said that there was no agreement for political fusion, he knew of no monopolies in the British zone, and, unlike the situation obtaining in the Soviet zone, no German property had been transferred to the ownership of the occupying country. The remedy for bi-zonal fusion was to make it quadri-zonal.

The report for the Conference of Foreign Ministers was approved by the Control Council in Berlin on the 25th February after being hustled through with unseemly haste in its last stages, owing to the reluctance of the French, Soviet and United States delegates to incur the imaginary stigma of delaying its passage. This Gargantuan document (weight six pounds) holds a mirror to four-Power disagreements on many essential issues and is incomplete and uncoordinated as a record of fact. It has not, however, degenerated into a lopsided advertisement of Soviet views. The Soviet representatives have been more conciliatory than was expected in admitting the statements of the other delegates, probably because they saw that this was the only way to get a report at all and therefore were content to rely on a different type of protest. This took the form of direct reproofs from Moscow, the first delivered on the 20th January (see Summaries Nos. 378 and 379); the second on the 25th February, when members of the Control Council were just congratulating each other on the conclusion of the report. Marshal Sokolowsky read a twenty-minute lecture on Anglo-U.S. policy which was in effect a formal anthology, in more restrained terms, of Moscow press attacks since the beginning of 1947. Control Council procedure was again defied and the statement was published in the Moscow press on the 27th February. Marshal Sokolowsky referred to reports (see last week's Summary) that preparations were being made for bi-zonal political fusion. He attacked economic fusion as contrary to Potsdam. He contended that the original and excusable argument that this was done to mitigate the burden of the British and U.S. taxpayer (although the Soviet Union did not harp on her "not less heavy expenditure") had been abandoned. C267029

In the meantime preparations are going ahead with proposals which His Majesty's Government will take to Moscow on the future structure of Germany and allied questions. Agreement has been reached to negotiate with other Occupying Powers for a revision of the level of industrial production based on an annual production of 10 million tons of steel. This figure was arrived at after considerations of a French memorandum which favoured German steel capacity being restricted to the present level of industry basis (steel capacity 7·5 million tons). It is not known whether the United States Government will agree to H.M. Government's proposal. The United States Government have informed H.M. Government that with regard to Germany's Eastern frontier "The United States Government is inclined to the view that, in the interest of the recovery of Europe as a whole, the German territory transferred to Poland shall be limited to an area which Poland can be expected to utilise fully within a reasonable period of time." Mr. Matthews of the State Department in the course of conversations in London has stated that the U.S. Delegation will, in fact, strongly oppose the present frontier at Moscow and will propose a revision in Germany's favour, to a line following the Oder (but East of Stettin) or failing that the Oder and Eastern Neisse.

Details of new regulations for foreign trade from the Soviet Zone were broadcast over Berlin Radio on the 28th February. As in the case of the British zone (see last week's Summary) direct contracts may now be made with foreign firms, but each contract will require the approval of the German central administration for Trade and Supply and of the Soviet Military Administration. The Germans, however, will not be allowed to make definite price offers for their goods. These will be determined by the Central Administration who will also be responsible for paying German firms in marks. Unlike the British and U.S. zones German firms in the Soviet zone may contract for imports also. They will have first to obtain an offer from abroad and then apply for a license which will usually be granted only for raw materials or semi-finished goods. The S.M.A. approve of schemes for importing such material which will then be processed for re-export, but the Order lays down that during this period the material remains the property of the foreign contractor. It is curious that this provision is not considered to be at odds with the constant stream of propaganda against the influence of foreign firms in Western Germany.

Mr. Hoover has now returned to the United States and has made a report on the German food situation in which he lays emphasis on Germany's distress, but in his proposed remedy is ever mindful of the cost to the Allies and considerate of Great Britain's dollar difficulties. He has told His Majesty's Government that it must be clearly established that claims for repayment of sums thus expended have priority over reparations. A tax on German exports, to be paid in dollars after the 1st July, 1947, might be an effective means of recovering expenditure. Mr. Hoover recommended an immediate allocation of some 60,000 tons of maize and 500,000 tons of potatoes from the United States to tide supplies over until the summer. A system of soup-kitchens for the children and aged should be established "at once." He also recommended that some "normal" consumers should receive the rations of moderately heavy workers. Although he proposed in his report a dollar provision for increasing the calory level to 1,800, if necessary, after October 1947, he has told His Majesty's Government that he hoped other remedies would prevent the necessity of being committed to this general increase in the near future since neither the food nor the funds were really available. Other suggestions made included an extension of fishing, the use of Germans to help transport potatoes from abroad and, within Germany, stricter measures to prevent hoarding by displaced persons and inefficient collection of farm yields. Mr. Hoover has expressed the opinion that denazification had gone too far, particularly with regard to the doctors and engineers.

On the 28th February, the Schleswig-Holstein Diet adopted an SPD motion for a socialisation law providing for the transfer of certain basic industries and transport services to State ownership with provision for the participation of other bodies at a later date. The CDU, the FDP and the Conservative party voted against the motion. Although the Christian Democrat Premier, Steltzer, supported a measure of socialisation and of land reform he failed to gain his party's co-operation. On the 12th February Goerlinger, leader of the Social Democrats in the North Rhine-Westphalia Diet, put forward a resolution that the transfer of certain basic industries to public ownership should be submitted to a plebiscite to be held at the same time as the Land elections. He also sent a telegram to Dr. Schumacher suggesting that similar proposals should be submitted in the other Diets. This move was entirely unexpected. Dr. Schumacher has stated privately in the past that although he had considered a plebiscite he would only wish to adopt it as a final resort if other means failed. The CDU may find it difficult to oppose such a measure. This step has been followed up in Lower Saxony where the Minister of Economics has said that the SPD will ask in the Diet for the transfer of key industries to public ownership—and if other parties opposed this will organise a referendum. These moves are likely only to cause a cleavage of public opinion and may in the end tend to harden the opposition of the CDU. Within the CDU itself considerable friction persists, and no one can accept the statement by the CDU executive in the British zone on the 28th February, that all reports alleging differences between the CDU in the British zone and the CDU in the Russian zone were unfounded. It is now learnt that at the inter-zonal conference to which reference was made last week, the personal hostility between the British and Soviet zonal Chairmen came to a head, and Adenauer accused Kaiser in front of all the delegates of consorting with high German officers in Berlin and of planning with them and with the Russians for the recreation of the German Army. This is a striking demonstration of Adenauer's pathological hatred of Berlin and the Russians.

At long last a law dissolving de jure the Prussian State was signed by the Control Council on the 25th February after the Russian representative had withdrawn his objections—of many months' standing—that the matter was not within the competence of the Control Council and should be dealt with by the Council of Foreign Ministers. In fact, of course, Prussia had already been administratively wiped out under the Nazi régime.

(See also under "France," "Poland" and "Council of Foreign Ministers' Deputies.")

AUSTRIA

At their final meeeting on the 25th February, the Foreign Ministers' Deputies approved the Report and Draft Treaty to be sent to the Ministers. The Report included a recommendation that the Deputies should meet again in Moscow on the 10th March to resume discussion. It was left to the Ministers to decide whether, as the U.K. representative advocated, the Draft should be circulated to interested persons. There has also been no resolution of the difference between the U.K. view that all Allied Governments with a direct interest in Austria should be original signatories of the Treaty and the view of the other three Powers that such Allied Governments shall only have the opportunity of acceding to the Treaty after signature by the Big Four.

The Articles which have not yet been discussed do not relate to any matters of great controversy, except the disposal of Displaced Persons. The thorniest subject on which partial agreement was reached was the limitation of the Austrian Armed Forces: these were fixed at either 50,000 or 55,000 including frontier guards and gendarmerie, plus an air force of 90 aircraft and 5,000 men. The list of subjects which were discussed but on which no agreement was reached includes the outstandingly difficult one of German assets in Austria, and the equally prickly though less solid obstacle of the Austro-Yugoslav frontier. An article in the New Times of Moscow—apparently dated 22nd February—gave an important review of the Soviet attitude to the Austrian Treaty. The article distinguishes between "major" and "other" problems connected with the Treaty. The latter include the international guarantee of Austrian independence, the date for withdrawal of occupation forces, settlement of Austrian pre-war debts, reparation claims for Yugoslavia and Greece, and, interestingly enough, the Yugoslav frontier and Slovene minority question. About German assets, however, which count as a major question, the article asserts that Soviet rights are incontestable and that any attempt to revise them would only delay the preparation of the Peace Treaty. The disposal of "over half-a-million" displaced persons in the western zones, it says, constitutes a grave threat to democracy, and the activities of these are fostered by the Occupying Powers. The U.S. is obstructing the surrender of war-criminals. The economic life of the country has not been democratised, nor indeed has even the new Austrian Constitution. Pan-Germanism is reviving and must be suppressed. And, foremost in the indictment, Austria actively supported Nazism both before and during the War, and her guilt must be proclaimed in the Treaty.

Recent Russian action in Vienna over two cases allegedly involving German assets has again illustrated Soviet stubbornness on this point. In the Allied Council meeting on 28th February the Soviet representative refused to discuss an Anglo-French-U.S. complaint that the Soviet authorities had prevented an Austrian firm in the Soviet zone from declaring its foreign exchange holdings as required by the Foreign Exchange Law: General Winterton declared that the Soviet action was tantamount to a claim for extra-territoriality, and that the principle would tend to prevent Austria from balancing her foreign trade. The Soviet representative also heard in silence a further statement by General Winterton that it would be contrary to the Control Agreement for the Austrian authorities to comply with a recent Soviet instruction to hand over "German assets" lodged in Austrian credit institutions.

On 27th February Chancellor Figl appealed to Provincial Governors at a meeting in Vienna to "collect the last reserves of foodstuffs in the months ahead" in order to maintain the ration until the position improved in May. The Austrian machinery for enforcing food collection from peasants has been notoriously weak, and no good is boded by an article, published the same day, in the People's Party Kleines Volksblatt praising the peasants for excellent production and delivery. Unfortunately the peasants hold the whip-hand because the narrow People's Party majority rests on their vote, and in their treatment of this key-vote none of the parties is likely to diverge from precedent set by political parties elsewhere. Under extreme pressure from countries which have had to send food to subsidise Austrian inefficiency the Government has at last decided to impose a complete cropping plan for the country, but this is only the first step in the struggle. In the Executive Committee meeting in Vienna on the 25th February the Russian representative broke the usual Allied front in the line of attack on the Austrian estimates for grain collection from the 1946 harvest: he supported the low Austrian estimate, no doubt in order to preserve as much grain as possible within the Soviet Zone.

POLAND

On the 22nd February the Amnesty Bill became law by a unanimous vote of the Polish Parliament. According to Col. Romkowski of the Ministry of Public Security (which has charge of the secret police), it concerns two different groups of people: those already in prison, and members of the forest bands still at large, who are asked to come out into the open. Of the first group, 45,000 persons serving prison sentences or remanded for investigation will come under the amnesty. 25,000 will be freed at once, and the others will have their sentences reduced, at the most by half. As regards the second group, the persons concerned will be invited by public posters to report to Commissions, composed of public security officers acting together with provincial, district, municipal and national councils. Those reporting will have to sign statements that they have given up their criminal activity, as well as surrender all weapons and other forbidden articles. Once legally pardoned, they will receive work and assistance from welfare organisations. The Colonel said that 244 members of forest bands had reported between the 1st and 15th February, and 104 from the 15th to the 20th.

It seems clear that the amnesty will not apply to spies, of whom there are now said to be 158 in gaol, to about 3,000 people sentenced for collaboration with the Germans or for joining the Ukrainian terrorist or German werewolf organisations, and certain persons convicted of "sabotage and counterfeiting, bribery and economic sabotage." Neither will it benefit those guilty of organising the concentration camps of Bereza, Kartuska and Brześć (Brest Litovsk), used for the detention and maltreatment of political opponents of the Pilsudski régime. The position of those responsible for the disaster of September 1939 and the pre-war "fascistization of public life" seems uncertain, since press and radio reports are conflicting on this subject, and the full text of the Amnesty is not yet available.

In order to rectify an important omission from the interim Constitution, Parliament closed its first session by passing a fourteen-point declaration guaranteeing full personal, religious and political freedom, as well as the right to work, leisure, education and social services.

With the approaching Moscow conference, Germany has again assumed a natural prominence in Polish affairs. Negotiations with France have recently been concluded in Paris by the Polish Foreign Minister, M. Modzelewski, who is reported to have said that it had been agreed to bring the 1921 Polish-French Alliance into line with present conditions. Questions of reparations and frontiers were also discussed. M. Modzelewski said that France would support Poland's claim to her Western frontier at the Moscow Conference, and that Poland would support France's endeavours to "bind up" the Saar economically with France. As to the future structure of Germany, Kurier Codzienny, the paper of the Democratic Party (known for its pronounced inclination to the Communist viewpoint), has condemned the idea of splitting up the country into various states. This, it says, by disregarding German unification achieved during the two world wars, would provide one more argument for German nationalism. Moreover, it would be easier to control a unified Germany and to extract reparations from it. That a German danger still exists is proved, according to the Poles, by the recent revelation of the neo-Nazi conspiracy in the British and American zones. While professing to be deeply shocked, Polish commentators have explained that nobody in Poland was the least surprised that such things should be, since their origin lies in "the ideas of such British politicians as Lord Beveridge, British and United States propaganda, and the banquets for Schumacher, who, indeed, did not threaten a bacteriological war, but only the wrath of the German people." Anglo-Saxon tolerance is in fact represented as reaping what it has sown.

Discussions have recently begun between Mr. Marquand, Secretary for Overseas Trade, and a Polish trade delegation led by Dr. Lychowski of the corresponding Polish ministry. Methods of extending commercial relations between the two countries are under review, and it has been reported that Poland might export to the United Kingdom during 1947 about £5,000,000 worth of cement, furniture, eggs, sugar and other articles, while placing orders for about £20,000,000 of machinery and raw materials.

On the 23rd February the Polish Prime Minister M. Cyrankiewicz left Warsaw for Moscow, together with M. Minc, Polish Minister for industry, to have discussions with Russian leaders on "current political and economic matters." They have been received by Generalissimo Stalin and President Shvernik.

SOVIET UNION

The tone of Soviet publicity on the eve of the Moscow Conference has been one of qualified optimism, the U.S.S.R. being presented as eager to reach a settlement as speedily as possible, while circles abroad which have expressed doubts of the likelihood of agreement are dismissed as reactionaries. Mr. Churchill and Mr. Dulles were personally attacked; it was alleged that they expected to reap advantages if the treaties were not concluded. According to Viktorov, the experience gained in working out the treaties with Germany's satellites showed that with goodwill and "by adhering to the principles of truly democratic international co-operation," the German problem could likewise be solved in accordance with the demands of peace and security.

No new line on the German question has emerged; both public lectures and articles on the subject have given first place to the case against federation. The main arguments against it were that a disrupted Germany would mean a disrupted working-class and that federation would foster the "nests of reaction" in the Ruhr and Bavaria. A lecture delivered by Yerusalimsky on the 27th February brought up the old charge that Great Britain, since the days of Bismarck, had continually been building up Germany as a counter-weight to France and Russia. No surprises appeared either in the position taken up over Austria; the American plan for Austria, it was alleged, would turn the country into a colony for Western capital, while the British scheme of restoring the 1937 frontiers would be detrimental to the rights and interests of Yugoslavia, which had already been wrongfully deprived of Trieste. New Times (No. 8) insisted on Austria's responsibility for the war; Nazism had not been imposed on Austria from outside, but was the fruit of a long period of pan-Germanism. The new Treaty must above all things preclude the possibility of a second Anschluss.

There are reports that the Russians are inviting a delegation of German politicians of several parties and journalists to Moscow for the Conference, including Grotewohl and possibly Pieck. On the whole question of Germany, the only fresh point to be noted is the evidence of increasing Russian interest in the Rhine. The Soviet unilateral report to the Council of Foreign Ministers on transport included a request that the question of a new International Convention for the Rhine should be discussed at Moscow. (See also under "Germany" and "Austria.")

A warning to France not to follow slavishly the British line at the Conference has been given in the form of a New Times article dealing with the Anglo-French alliance, a subject on which hitherto a discreet silence had been observed by the Soviet press. Great Britain was described as hurrying on the negotiations precisely with the object of having at the Conference a submissive partner in France. After tracing the course of Anglo-French relations since 1914, New Times was at pains to emphasise that at every point Britain had tried to use France as an obedient tool. The proposed new alliance would only enhance French dependence on Great Britain, for it would merely give France the promise of British military assistance in the event of future German aggression while denying her effective guarantees of security. Apart from the demobilisation and denazification of Germany and the destruction of German war potential, France, to be truly secure, would need the separation of the left bank of the Rhine from Germany, the transfer of the Saar and general international control, with Soviet participation, over the Ruhr. Although so highly critical of the British attitude towards French security requirements, New Times carefully avoided committing the Soviet Government to support of them. The article returned to the charge over the Western bloc, claiming that the Anglo-French pact would be its cornerstone; such a bloc, "the policy of the Labour Government being what it is at present," would be pointed aggressively at the U.S.S.R. The bloc would also have a defensive anti-American edge, owing to the common colonial interests of all the Western European Powers. Communist members of the French Embassy staff in Moscow and, in particular, the Press Attaché, have taken the line that the article should be regarded as an authoritative expression of the Soviet view and as a warning to French Communists not to adopt too pro-British an orientation before the Moscow Conference. The French expectation that this propaganda line would be followed up by the Russian daily press has not so far been confirmed. There has been a noticeable absence of further comment and M. Thorez's speech at Toulon of the 23rd February, in which he welcomed the conclusion of the alliance as a reinforcement of the Franco-Soviet alliance, was not reported.

After a press silence of several weeks on events in Korea, Trud (the 25th February) reviewed the situation in detail. Emphasis is laid on the "unanimous approval" expressed by the Conference of People's Committees in Northern Korea for the Government's agrarian reform (which had "changed the social face of Northern Korea"), the labour and social insurance laws and the nationalisation programme. "No tricks and manœuvres of the corrupt Korean reactionaries, who are the bosses of Southern Korea, will distract the Korean people from setting up a single democratic Korea," according to Trud. The "so-called legislative organ" is alleged to have been created on American orders, over half the delegates were American nominees and the remainder had been elected through falsified elections. The legislative body also contained no workers' or peasants' representatives, and its majority was composed of quisling landlords, industrialists and right-wing editors. General Hodge's visit to the United States is described as an attempt to persuade the Americans to supply his "democratic party" with arms in order to start military operations against the Northern "Communists." The article concludes with a reference to the desire of the Korean people to "build its future on the principles of peace, liberty and democracy," guaranteed at the Moscow Conference discussions on Korea.

It was announced on the 3rd March that the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. had complied with Generalissimo Stalin's request to be relieved of his post of Minister of the Armed Forces of the U.S.S.R. "in view of the excessive burden of his other work." His successor is General N. A. Bulganin, who had been deputy P.C. of Defence since 1944 and a member of the State Committee of Defence set up in 1940. General Bulganin was born in 1895 and was the son of a small factory employee. He is not a professional soldier and before the war held the following important posts: Chairman of the Moscow Soviet (1931); Deputy Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. (1938); President of the Board of the State Bank (1938) and President of the Economic Council in 1940. He also has an important position in the Communist Party, having been made a member of the Central Committee of the Party in 1939 and in March, 1946, elected Candidate Member of the Politburo and of the Orgburo.

Important changes and additions to the text of the U.S.S.R. Constitution were approved by the Supreme Soviet on the 25th February, while the Statutes of the Standing Commissions on Legislative matters of both Chambers (set up in 1938) were approved. Among the amendments to the Constitution worth recording here are the following: (a) redrafting of several clauses of Article 14, which defines the functions of the All-Union Government, to include notably (a) the denunciation as well as the conclusion and ratification of Treaties; (b) a new clause W—"the establishment of principles of legislation on marriage and the family" . . . "so as to ensure a further strengthening of the family"; (c) the institution of the eight-hour working day (article 19); (d) abolition of the 1936 Constitutional right to free higher education, this right being now constitutionally limited to free seven year education (as has been Soviet practice since 1940), fees being paid in the 8th, 9th and 10th classes of the secondary schools. The Commissions for Legislative Matters have been set the complex task of the unification of Soviet law, as there are no All-Union codes and many discrepancies exist between the Criminal, Criminal Procedure, Civil and Civil Procedure Codes of the several Union Republics. During the debates on the subject it was revealed that malicious theft, for example, was punishable according to the Georgian code by imprisonment up to eight years, according to the Azerbaidzhani code by imprisonment up to five years and according to the R.S.F.S.R. criminal code by imprisonment up to one year. The establishment of a system of education common to the whole of the U.S.S.R. is now to be actively pushed forward in place of the former individual Union-Republican arrangements, based on certain all-Union principles. All these measures aim at fuller and more rigid centralisation of the Government machine and the abolition of local and national "vagaries" in legal administration.

The new collective labour agreements to be concluded on the 1st March between the administrative boards and factory and workers' trade union committees as proposed by the Central Trade Union Council, aim at increasing the productivity of labour, strengthening working discipline and improvement in the living conditions of the workers. The collective agreements must be concluded in accordance with the State production plans for the various ministries for 1947 and are required to make minute provision for guaranteeing fulfilment of the plans in regard to wages, cost of production, as well as output. These agreements "should also promote the development of livestock and poultry breeding" (as auxiliary foodstocks for industrial workers), include plans for individual housing construction (important in view of the acute housing shortage) and are designed to stimulate socialist competition and measures for improving workers' production standards.

SCANDINAVIA

Norway

After a debate in secret session, the Storting, on the 15th February, defined its attitude to the proposed joint militarisation of Spitsbergen by Norway and the Soviet Union (see Summary No. 376). In a resolution which was communicated to the Russians two days later, the opinion is expressed that since the original Norwegian offer was made the situation has undergone fundamental changes through the creation of the United Nations Organisation and the recent disarmament proposals made by the Soviet Union herself. Negotiations of a military character with any single foreign Power regarding Norwegian territory, are, therefore, held to be contrary to the foreign policy pursued by the Government in concert with the Storting. Norway does, however, recognise that the Soviet Union has particular economic interests in Spitsbergen and is prepared to continue the discussions of the non-military aspects of the question with a view to making the Spitsbergen Treaty more satisfactory. There is at yet no report of the Russian reactions to the Norwegian note.

In a statement to the Storting on the 27th February, the Foreign Minister, M. Lange, disclosed that Norway had been handed a note by General Franco's Government which contained a veiled threat to close Spanish ports to Norwegian shipping. The Spanish note alleged unfair discrimination by Norway in her trade with Spain and ended by questioning the practicability of continuing commercial relations in the present circumstances. In his assessment of the implications which the contemplated Spanish action would have M. Lange regretted that many member States of the United Nations had clearly shown that they did not intend to allow the recent decision of the General Assembly to influence their trade policy. Norway was consequently in danger of losing an important market to her competitors; a futile sacrifice which would not bring about a change of régime in Spain. That country, moreover, M. Lange went on, occupied a key position for shipping, and, since nearly a half of the Norwegian merchant fleet was engaged on time charter to foreign Governments, the closing of Spanish ports would have more far-reaching repercussions than the mere cessation of Norwegian-Spanish trade. The Minister ended his statement, which was referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee, by saying that the primary duty of the Government was to safeguard Norway's interests, and that it would be dangerous for his country to attempt to solve the Spanish question single-handed, as this could only be done on an international basis.

After making his appearance in the Storting, M. Lange (who was recently discharged from hospital after a short illness) was due to fly to London with his wife in order to join a Norwegian ship for a cruise in the Mediterranean. It seems hardly likely in any case that the Norwegian Government are contemplating the instigation of direct negotiations with the Spanish authorities.

Agreement for the abolition of visas has been reached between Great Britain and Norway, and holders of British passports may now travel to Norway, though not to Spitsbergen, without first making an application at a Norwegian Consulate. Negotiations to the same end are in progress with the Swedish and Danish Foreign Ministries.

Denmark

Agreements embodying the results of the negotiations between His Majesty's Government and the Government of Denmark, covering the general trends of trade and payments between the two countries and the operation of the Anglo-Danish Monetary Agreement, were signed on the 28th February. Under the new arrangements Denmark will balance her payments with the sterling area for the year 1947 and will make additional exports of food to the limited extent at present possible. In order to achieve the desired balance in payment she has found it necessary, however, to adopt an import programme based on her essential requirements—although provision will be made for the import of a strictly limited quantity of goods not eligible for inclusion in such programme. The United Kingdom will assist Denmark to purchase from non-sterling countries certain essential commodities, such as feeding stuffs, not otherwise obtainable. The Agreement also provides for an increase in the price of butter from 220/– to 242/– per cwt. f.o.b. as from 1st January, 1947, and in that of bacon from 150/– to 161/– per cwt. f.o.b. as from 1st February, 1947, and up to 30th September of the same year. It is interesting to note that the British proviso for passing on to the producers the increase of 11/– per cwt. in the price of bacon has been maintained, despite the fact that it had aroused some indignation in Denmark on the ground that Great Britain was seeking to interfere in Denmark's internal affairs. Full particulars of the arrangements were provided in an official statement agreed with the Danish Legation and released to the press of both countries on the 28th February.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

In compliance with an undertaking given to the Conference of Foreign Ministers' Deputies on the 28th January, 1947, the Netherlands Government have submitted a Note containing an evaluation of their claims against Germany as set forth in their Memorandum of the 5th November, 1946 (18th February, 1947). The total value of the claims, " in so far as these may be appraised in money," is estimated at about 231 million florins (about £21,590,000 at current exchange rates) of which 100 million florins are in respect of mines in production, 87 million in respect of territory, and 44 million in respect of minerals (coal and oil). The mere addition of these figures, it is pointed out, " does not correspond with the facts." For example, the value of the mines in production at pre-war exchange rates amounts to 75 million florins; that of the territory to RM 145 million in 1928. In its concluding paragraph the Note again draws attention to the value, in terms of money (on the basis of 1938 prices), of the total damage suffered by the Netherlands through " German aggression and occupation "—some 25,725 million florins (about £2,404 million). This figure had already been mentioned in the Netherlands Government Memorandum on their indemnity claim against Germany, which had been submitted to the Paris Reparations Conference. The claims considered in the present Note " should consequently be set at about one per cent. of the total damage "; —a calculation which had " only been made by way of illustration."

Belgium

During a recent conversation with H.M. Ambassador, M. Spaak, the Foreign Minister, referred to the question of his country's position in view of the imminence of the signing of the Anglo-French Treaty of Alliance. He believed that Belgian public opinion was favourably disposed towards Anglo-French understanding: he himself certainly was; and he had in mind the proposal that Belgium should " integrate herself " with the Alliance. The possibility of Soviet reactions had, of course, to be taken into account; and he recalled the proposal which he had earlier put up to M. Vyshinsky for a Belgo-Soviet Treaty, but which had remained unanswered. M. Spaak's idea now was to see the Soviet Ambassador with a view to reviving this proposal, and at the same time to apprise him of his own views on the subject of Anglo-French understanding. There was, he thought, the useful analogy of a treaty between western and eastern European countries provided by the forthcoming negotiations between Czechoslovakia and France, which evidently enjoyed Soviet approval, since without it Czechoslovak participation would be impossible.

First reports in the Press of the demonstration in Brussels on the 26th February by former prisoners-of-war [see last week's Summary] appear to have been somewhat exaggerated. There were, for instance, no fatal casualties; and the undertaking given by the organizers of the demonstrations that the procession would be orderly was fully respected until the police attempted to divert it from the Rue de la Loi area. The Government apparently attach no partisan political significance to the affair.

FRANCE

The Anglo-French Treaty of Alliance was signed at Dunkirk on Tuesday, the 4th March. It was M. Bidault who suggested that the town of Dunkirk, with its historical associations, should be the place of signature, and Mr. Bevin was able to break his journey to Moscow in order to be at Dunkirk for the ceremony. The signature took place in the Sous-Préfecture, the only public building left intact in this war-shattered town. After the signature M. Bidault made a short formal speech and Mr. Bevin spoke at greater length, saying that the Entente Cordiale had never really been broken and that the new Socialist Britain would strive to avoid misunderstandings with the new France such as those which had arisen between the two wars. Mr. Bevin referred in warm terms to M. Bidault's personal record and standing, and ended by saying: " My country will never leave the side of France; France will never leave the side of Britain." Afterwards the two Ministers went to stand on the beaches where the evacuation from Dunkirk had taken place in 1940.

The Treaty is one of alliance and mutual assistance, and the Preamble, which refers to the " cordial friendship and close association of interests " between the U.K. and France, declares that the two countries are " determined to collaborate in measures of mutual assistance in the event of any renewal of German aggression, while considering most desirable the conclusion of a treaty between all the Powers having responsibility for action in relation to Germany with the object of preventing Germany from becoming again a menace to peace." Article I states that in the event of any threat to the security of either of the two countries arising from the adoption by Germany of a policy of aggression, they will take, after consulting with each other and where appropriate with the other Powers having responsibility for action in relation to Germany, " such agreed action (which so long as . . . Article 107 [of the United Nations Charter] remains operative shall be action under that Article) as is best calculated to put an end to this threat." Article II states that should either country become involved in hostilities with Germany the other will at once give it all military and other assistance. Article III states that in the event of either party being prejudiced by the failure by Germany to carry out her economic obligations, the two countries will consult with each other and where appropriate with the other countries concerned with a view to taking agreed action. Article IV refers to the strengthening of economic relations between the two countries. Article V places the Treaty within the framework of the United Nations Charter and states that neither country will take part in any coalition directed against the other. Article VI provides for the ratification of the Treaty and states that it will remain in force for at least 50 years and without any specified time limit thereafter unless either country gives one year's notice of its desire to terminate it.

A joint declaration was made by the two Foreign Ministers and published at the same time as the text of the Treaty. It expressed the hope that the guarantees against German aggression contained in the Treaty " will soon be completed by the conclusion of a Four-Power Treaty laying down conditions for the disarmament and demilitarization of Germany and the methods of putting them into effect." This agreed wording met the anxiety of General Marshall and the U.S. Government that the Anglo-French Treaty should not appear as in any way a substitute for the Four-Power Treaty proposed by Mr. Byrnes.

Mr. Bevin had announced to the House of Commons on the 28th February the successful conclusion of the negotiations. M. Bidault made a similar announcement to the National Assembly on the same day in the course of the foreign affairs debate. He referred to the Franco-Soviet alliance and said that the new Treaty was not in any way a counter-alliance. He also spoke of the French Government's attitude to the forthcoming Moscow Conference and said that, now that the time had at last come for serious discussions on Germany, France was determined to press her views and would not give way. It seems therefore that the French representatives will abandon the somewhat neutral rôle they have hitherto played in the peace negotiations and will urge their case with energy. In the negotiations for a German peace treaty they feel that the very existence of France is at stake. On the question of reparations M. Bidault, replying to the desire expressed by several speakers, said that the Government would accept the payment of reparations out of current German production under certain conditions. The debate ended with the passing of a unanimous vote of confidence in the Government.

The Government's decision on the demand of the Confédération Générale du Travail (C.G.T.) for the establishment of a minimum wage was announced by M. Ramadier in a broadcast speech on the 28th February. He said that all workers who earned less than 7,000 fr. a month in Paris (the figure for the provinces is lower) would be given special allowances to bring their income up to that figure and that a bonus of one-tenth would also be added to family allowances. The Government have thus maintained their refusal to agree to any general rise in the level of wages. Their attitude is that, while all workers must be given enough to live on, no general wage adjustment should be made until there has been time to judge the success of the policy of deflation. M. Ramadier said he believed that by July the fall in the price-level would be an accomplished fact, production would have increased, and it would then be possible to re-examine the wage situation. M. André Philip, the Minister of National Economy, broadcasting on the 25th February, described the progress of his deflationary campaign. He said that the Government were about to release substantial quantities of consumers' goods, textiles, household goods and agricultural tools and supplies, at prices from 30 to 50 per cent. lower than those recently prevailing. He appeared confident of the possibility of reducing prices on the free as well as legal markets and spoke with energy of the publicity measures devised to acquaint the public with their legal rights. On the more general issues, M. Philip quoted the Government's determination to present a balanced budget to the Assembly and to set the nationalised industries on an economic footing.

The Minister of Agriculture, M. Tanguy-Prigent, has obtained from the U.S.A. and Canada an allocation of over half-a-million tons of wheat including seed-wheat, which is already on its way for the spring sowings. This quantity will be sufficient to enable the bread ration in France and North Africa to be maintained until the next harvest.

The French are greatly impressed by the fuel crisis in the U.K., having been brought up to look on this country as one of the main sources of coal in the world. They are shocked but sympathetic, and the news has made them less apt to compare their own condition unfavourably with that of the British. In fact, the French people have long had to endure severe restriction on the use of coal, gas, electricity and oil, for both industrial and domestic uses, but the black market has spread to these as to other commodities and there is considerable evasion of the regulations. The domestic coal ration is extremely small and is only allocated to the townspeople; in the country people are expected to use wood. Since the end of November, the use of electricity in industry has been prohibited for 12 hours on two consecutive days each week, and in January there were a number of stoppages in industry because of lack of coal.

A new session of the High Court of Justice opened at Versailles on the 25th February to try 14 Vichy Ministers and high officials. Paul Baudouin, Minister of Foreign Affairs in the early Pétain Governments (June–October 1940), was the first to be tried and was sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment with hard labour.

SWITZERLAND

According to a Finnish broadcast of the 24th February. M. Petitpierre, head of the Swiss Political Department, declared in an interview with a correspondent of the Stockholms Tidningen that Switzerland was following her own line after the bitter experiences of the second World War. He reiterated that the Swiss Parliament, Federal Council and general public alike sincerely believed in their policy of neutrality, and asserted that the people would reject by a majority vote of 80 to 90 per cent. any attempt on the part of the Authorities to sacrifice neutrality for membership in the United Nations. This did not mean that Switzerland lacked confidence in the new world organization, which was the sole means of achieving a lasting peace, and if Switzerland were to be given a special place in the United Nations, ensuring Swiss neutrality, the position would be altogether different.

Mr. Krishna Menon, representing the Government of India, has arrived in Berne on a special mission, and has delivered to M. Petitpierre a letter from Pandit Nehru, Indian Minister for External Affairs.

It is expected that the Franco-Swiss trade negotiations which took place in Berne from the 13th to the 15th January and resulted in the signing of a protocol on the 18th January, will be resumed in June. On the whole, the development of trade between the two countries has been favourable, with special arrangements for coping with problems as they arose. France is said to have agreed to deliver 100,000 tons of coal which were then in arrears.

Under the agreement made at the end of 1946 with the Soviet-occupied zone of Germany, Switzerland will import timber, potash, glassware, optical instruments, and certain chemicals; her exports will include dyestuffs, watches with intricate mechanism, ball-bearings and electric motors.

Commercial discussions with Spain have so far proved unsuccessful owing to the high prices of Spanish goods. According to the Press, it is expected that an import premium of 33⅓ per cent. will be imposed on Swiss imports into Spain to form a fund for lowering the prices of deliveries to Switzerland. Swiss imports would include pyrites, lead, oranges and wine; exports would be mainly machinery, precision instruments and pharmaceuticals.

Swiss transport insurance companies have reduced their premiums in order to meet competition from British and American firms. For exports of machinery, tools and instruments the reduction amounts to about 30 per cent., while a special rate has been agreed for imports of wool. Although thefts of watches warrant an increase, Swiss insurance firms have also lowered the premiums on watch consignments, especially those to the United States, Canada, Australia, South Africa, the United Kingdom, Scandinavia and Iceland.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

The enthusiastic reception received by the Royal Infantes on their journey through Spain (see last week's Summary) appears to have caused alarm and despondency in Falangist circles, and may well have been one of the irritations which led to the disturbances outside the Church of Jesus in Madrid on the occasion of the anniversary mass held as usual on the 28th February in memory of King Alfonso XIII. About 2,000 Monarchists had taken part in the service, and on their way out of the church they were intercepted by a squad of Falangists who roughly jostled their way through the crowd. Indignant Monarchists retaliated, and individual scuffles looked like leading to a free-for-all when Spanish shock troops, fully armed, arrived and engaged the Monarchist stalwarts while the Falangists beat a hasty retreat to the strains of the party anthem. General Franco has an efficient spy system and may well have heard of Don Juan's decision (reported here last week) to group all Monarchist sympathisers in Spain into one organization.

A small round-table conference of the active Monarchist leaders has been convoked by Don Juan for the middle of March. They will review the present position of the negotiations with the representatives of the Alianza, and, if it is considered that the time is ripe, Don Juan will issue in Lisbon a statement calculated to appeal to Centre and Left opinion. (It will be almost exactly two years since his last manifesto, in which he staked his claim to return as King of all Spaniards—with a liberal constitutional programme.) What is certain is that the Monarchists will not be prepared to treat directly with the Llopis "Government" as such, much less agree to be represented in it. In his public statements Señor Llopis (and the Spanish Socialist press published in France) continues to assume that any interim caretaker Government would be wholly or largely Republican in character—although Señor Llopis concedes that "the question of legitimacy must be left in abeyance." That assumption is, of course, open to the same objections—i.e., as prejudging the issue—as the opposite view of a "Restoration" caretaker Cabinet. There are some grounds for thinking, however, that Señor Martínez Barrio, who emerges as the real source of power, now realizes that the solution for Spain must come not from any Government-in-exile but from inside the country, and that he regards the present team as a stop-gap arrangement which, if and when the current Right-Left negotiations have borne fruit, would disappear.

Franco-Spanish relations have not been improved by the recent decision of the French Government to permit the Moroccan rebel leader, Abd-El-Krim, and his family, to settle in the South of France on the grounds of health. (Abd-El-Krim was sent to exile in Réunion twenty years ago.) This decision, communicated to the Spanish Government on the 10th February, directly violated the terms of an Exchange of Notes on the 10th July, 1926, which bound both Governments to consultation before any action on matters concerning Abd-El-Krim and his property. The Spanish Government were highly indignant at this independent decision on the part of the French Government, and a statement on the subject issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs appeared in the Spanish press on the 12th February. The Spanish Government, it said, were not in a position to form an opinion on the justification for the French Government's action, for they had received no previous communication on the subject of Abd-El-Krim's health. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs had protested most vigorously to the French Mission. (See also under "Scandinavia.")

Portugal

After negotiations which have lasted some five months a contingent Agreement was signed in Lisbon on the 21st February between the Portuguese Government and an allied Delegation on the subject of German assets, State and private, in Portugal. At the demand of the Portuguese, the Agreement will not come into force until a future date, which for practical purposes means until a final settlement has been reached on the subject of the gold stocks in Lisbon, part if not all of which were German loot from Holland and Belgium.

The terms are not unsatisfactory. In the first place the agreed definition of "assets" is a comprehensive one—"assets of whatever nature." Moreover, the Portuguese Government, unlike the Swedish and Swiss Governments, have accepted the principle that the totality of German State assets passes into Allied hands for liquidation. After deduction of expenses of administration the Agreement provides that the proceeds of liquidation of private assets shall be allocated as follows: (1) the first hundred million escudos for the benefit of the non-repatriable victims of German aggression; (2) the next fifty million escudos to the Portuguese Government as a first instalment to be set off against Portuguese claims on Germany. These claims are for an amount between a hundred and fifty and a hundred and eighty million escudos; (3) thereafter on a fifty-fifty basis as between the Portuguese Government and the Allies up to the ultimately agreed limit of Portuguese claims, any surplus above this limit passing to the Allies.

The Allies accept responsibility for the indemnification in Germany of the dispossessed German owners.

At Portugal's request the signature of this Agreement is to be kept secret for the time being. Negotiations for a parallel agreement with the Spanish Government are continuing in Madrid.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Although the Committee of Privileges which met to consider the case of M. Béla Kovacs decided against handing him over to the judicial authorities, M. Nagy later admitted that the possibility of his having been, perhaps unwittingly, implicated in the plot could not be excluded. Deliberations between the Premier and the leaders of the Communist and Social Democratic Parties ended in an agreement that the former Secretary-General of the Smallholders' Party should "voluntarily" present himself for examination by the Political Police. A more startling development occurred on the 26th February when the Soviet occupying forces arrested M. Kovacs on charges of "active participation in the formation of underground anti-Soviet armed terrorist groups and organizing espionage aimed against the Soviet Army."

In spite of the recently intensified campaign against M. Kovacs in the Soviet Press the step taken less than three weeks after the signing of the Peace Treaty has come as a surprise and shock to Hungarian public opinion. The foundation for the charge of espionage is not yet clear unless it refers to the supply of economic information to the U.K. and U.S. Missions in 1945 on matters such as the Soviet removal of factories from Hungary.

Meanwhile large-scale arrests are continuing. There has been a further round-up in Budapest of 380 persons. From recent information it would seem that the renewed left-wing threat to force elections has again been turned aside—and again by Smallholder concessions. These are said to include the acceptance of a more radical Party purge and an educational "reform" by which religious teaching in the schools is to become optional. The Smallholders are unwilling to face the prospect of elections in the immediate future, since they feel that the conspiracy has seriously endangered their position as the majority Party. In particular the allegation that the plotters were fostering the idea of restoring the medium-sized estates has harmed them in the eyes of the peasantry from whose ranks the bulk of their supporters are drawn. Since the land reform was inaugurated the maximum holding of 300 yokes has been granted only, and exceptionally, to those able to prove outstanding anti-Nazi merits.

The trial of the conspirators which began on the 27th February has been heralded by the Communist Press as a triumph for democracy, and punishment of the guilty is demanded. The Smallholder newspaper, Kis Ujság, while agreeing that no time should be lost in bringing them to justice, asks only that justice should in fact be strictly adhered to, a condition which, it adds, Hungarian democracy is strong enough to observe. A cautious weighing-up of the effects both at home and abroad which even the "slightest departure from the formal requirements" of the law would entail somewhat mars the disinterestedness of the sentiment.

M. Erdei has succeeded M. Imre Kovacs as Secretary-General of the National Peasant Party. M. Kovacs resigned his position on finding himself in disagreement with his Party's strongly pro-Left outlook.

M. Gyöngyösi has gone to Prague to open discussions on the Hungarian-Czechoslovak minority question. Recent reports indicate that the Hungarian Government Commissariat in charge of the population exchange is preparing the transfer of Hungarians from Southern Slovakia. As a preliminary step 3,000 families are to be repatriated within two weeks. If the news is confirmed it may be hoped that the Czechoslovak authorities will mitigate their deportation policy.

Roumania

During the war Roumania exported many of her products to Germany. All she received in return was "credits," that is promises to pay at some time, all being well. The value of these promises depended upon two things: Germany's willingness to pay, and her ability to do so. The latter depended upon whether or not she won the war. Towards the end of 1944, Roumania, evidently feeling less certain about a German victory, declined to export further goods except against payment in gold. As Germany was in urgent need of Roumanian goods she was obliged to consent to these terms, and by the end of the war something over £16,000,000 worth of gold had been sent from Germany to Roumania. It has been estimated, however, that about three-quarters of this gold was looted by Germany from other countries. By the end of last year claims were received from certain countries for the return of gold which had been taken from them. The Allies asked for proof that gold in the possession of any countries which had been in diplomatic relations with Germany was not "tainted." At the beginning of this year the U.S.A. began to press for a joint investigation of the gold position by the Governments of the U.S.A., Great Britain and France in order to reach agreement upon the return to its owners of such gold as could be proved to have been looted; they requested that the gold holdings of Roumania should be "immobilised" pending the settlement of the whole business. H.M.G. suggested a proviso that Roumania's own production of gold, amounting to 17,165 kilogrammes, should be exempt from this proposed order. In reply to this action by the Allies the Roumanian Government recognised their obligation to restore all looted gold, and undertook to provide all information and details of all gold they had obtained since January 1939. The Government also promised to ask permission from the Allied Control Commission to make restitution to Great Britain, France and the U.S.A. as the representatives of the owners. The consent of the Allied Control Commission to this depends, of course, upon Russia.

The food situation in Roumania has now made it a matter of extreme urgency that Roumania should be able to purchase cereals abroad. The State Department's estimate of the amount of gold which is "tainted," is £12,000,000. The United States now propose to make it a condition of a loan for the purchase of food that four wagons of gold, amounting to £12,000,000, shall be deposited in Switzerland. The Roumanian Government have now asked for a permit for the transit of this gold through the American zone of Austria.

Information was received recently that Russia had agreed, in fact had suggested, that the reparation payments from Roumania should be postponed for a term of years. This proof of Soviet generosity was received with enthusiasm by the inspired press, but the Roumanians are beginning to learn the significance of the old tag "timeo Danaos." If Roumanian assets are not to be used for payment of reparations the way is open for utilising them in some other way. A Trade Agreement with the Soviet Union concerning trade, navigation, payments and organisation of transport has just been concluded and will remain in force until the end of this year. Russia is to supply what is necessary for setting certain parts of Roumanian industry on its feet. She is to exchange goods to the value of 15 million dollars, and to give a credit of 10 million dollars repayable in four years. The supplies from Russia are not, however, to be drawn from the territory of the Soviet Union, but may be drawn from areas, such as Germany, which are under Russian control. The demands of the Sovrom groups are to be met before anything else, and of the total amount of 25 million dollars 3 million dollars are to be set aside as profits on past dealings of the Sovrom companies.

On the 25th February, Dl Franasovici at a Press Conference made an appeal for publicity in the British press about the present food situation in Roumania. He speaks of a death-rate amongst children in Moldavia of from 60 per cent. to 80 per cent., and announces that Russia has "renounced" the delivery under the terms of the Armistice of 14,000 car loads of grain. The American Red Cross has provided clothing for 100,000 children and is distributing large quantities of food. Help has also been received from Sweden and from Ireland.

The existence of famine in Roumania has reacted on the discussions which are in progress about looted gold. The Americans are coming to feel that they must supply grain against payments in gold and leave the question of "tainted" gold to be settled later.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Government have submitted to the Deputy Foreign Ministers a supplementary note on Austrian participation in the occupation of Yugoslavia (see also Summary No. 382).

On the whole there has been less publicity recently for Austrian misdemeanours than for Greek circumstances. Attacks on British aid for Greece have become increasingly violent; British forces, and not the Greek Government, are now credited with the main responsibility for the civil strife. The Yugoslav, Bulgarian and Albanian statements to the United Nations Commission are said to have proved the utter falseness of the Greek case.

It has been announced in Yugoslavia that the "National Liberation Committee for the Slovene Littoral" (P.N.O.O.) is to be dissolved, since the partition of Venezia Giulia between Yugoslavia, Italy and Trieste will make its work impossible in the future. Its main function seems to have been to harass A.M.G., or as the Yugoslavs put it, to protect the rights and prosperity of the Slovenes in Zone A. The Slovene population in the area is urged to join the Italo-Slav Anti-Fascist Union (U.A.I.S.) which will continue to exist.

The appeal of General von Loehr and other German officers against the death sentences recently imposed on them in Belgrade has been rejected. Dr. Harald Turner, the head of the German military administration in Belgrade, and twelve other occupation officials accused of war crimes, are now on trial. Some former Domobranci and other Slovenes have been tried in Ljubljana on charges of treachery committed before and after the Liberation, and of espionage conducted on behalf of a foreign Power.

Mr. Patterson, the U.S. Ambassador, who has been in the United States for some months, has been delivering some rather outspoken "off-the-record" lectures on the situation in Yugoslavia. This has not escaped the attention of the Yugoslav Press, which, not unnaturally, considers this a breach of diplomatic privilege. It is doubtful whether the Ambassador will be very welcome if and when he returns to Belgrade.

An American newspaper correspondent in Belgrade has reported that Dr. Dragoljub Jovanović, the People's Peasant Party leader, who is almost the only remaining public critic of the Government, has been beaten up by a gang of young Communists.

Greece

Most of the Greeks hoped that, when the United Nations Commission moved to Salonica, they would concentrate on the task assigned to them of investigating the Greek Government's allegations against their neighbours. The Greek liaison officer has, in fact, submitted to the Commission a proposal that they should divide into four groups: the first group to visit the district near the Yugoslav border; the second to cover Greek territory near the Bulgarian border; the third to cover the Jannina/Florina district; and the fourth to visit places in Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia to be indicated by the Greek representative. Except, however, for the small team sent to interview political refugees and prisoners in the islands, the main commission are still engrossed in listening to the evidence of left-wing Greeks and of captured bandits. A surprise item of Greek evidence was the production of a manual for training in partisan warfare which had been compiled at Rubig camp in Albania and which was subsequently distributed to Greek refugees undergoing military training at Bulkes in Yugoslavia.

The Commission have also discussed the practicability of their seeing Markos Vafiades, the bandit leader who has offered to appear before them. There are obvious objections to bringing him for this interview into Government-held territory where he has long been wanted by the police for several murders and where the relatives of his victims will undoubtedly try to take their revenge. There are equal objections to the Commission's visiting him in any bandit-controlled area; the "Democratic Army," despite any formal reservations by the Commission, are certain to claim that their visit implies formal recognition of the bandits' status. It is unfortunate that the Commission should have been drawn into long discussions on the legal status of the rebels. Either as recognised "insurgents" or rebels and outlaws, the Commission have still to decide whether they are being supported by Greece's neighbours.

Meanwhile raids by the bandits have continued and the Government are proceeding with their counter-measures. Three bills have been submitted to the Chamber extending the clemency measures. The first bill gives all persons sentenced to deportation the right to appeal; the second "prohibits all organisations which seek to take upon themselves powers belonging to the Government"; the third extends the amnesty to all rebels who surrender by the 15th March.

Both the implications of the Government's plans to mount an all-out offensive against the rebels who do not surrender and Greece's financial position have been the subject of discussion in London and Washington (see under "The United States").

Albania

During the last two or three weeks the Albanians have been told little enough about the proceedings of the Security Council directly affecting their country's honour (see last week's Summary under "United Nations"), but a diversionary counter-attack has been kept up against Great Britain and Greece from Tirana, in the course of which various red herrings have been drawn across the path. Thus General Scobie and another British army officer are alleged to have told two detachments of Greek troops towards the end of the War that British forces would not be withdrawn from Greece until Northern Epirus had been won for her from Albania; and some sentences from one of Brigadier Hodgson's secret political reports home from Albania, relating to events in July 1945, have been taken out of their context and published in a garbled form in Bashkimi, together with a facsimile of the original (how obtained it is not known), by way of proving that even he was prepared to admit, after investigation, that in at least one case occurring at that time a couple of Greek ships had behaved off Sarande in a provocative manner. (It will be recalled that Greece considered herself to be still at war with Albania.) For the rest, the Albanians are constantly being told that Russian and Yugoslav support will see them through anything.

The economies of Albania and Yugoslavia are being ever more closely welded together. The Tirana telegraph agency announced last week that joint Albanian-Yugoslav corporations had just been set up to deal with questions relating to banking, electricity, railways, minerals and petroleum, on a common basis.

An earlier announcement stated that two new Ministries—of Industry and of Trade—had been set up in place of the former Ministry of National Economy.

Bulgaria

In the course of last month three draft laws have been published, marking a further stage in the Government's increasing control of the economic life of the country. The Minister of Finance has presented to the Sobranye a law establishing a tobacco monopoly, under which all sections of the industry except retail sales will be taken over. Compensation is to be fixed by a commission. Payments up to 3 million leva will be made in cash, and above that sum in 4 per cent. bonds. The second law will bring into effect the Supreme Economic Council's two-year plan for Bulgarian economy. The plan aims at increasing agricultural production in 1948 by one-third over 1939, and industrial production by two-thirds over 1939. The Economic Council is also responsible for the third new law, which establishes a central price commission, in place of the present system by which each ministry fixes prices for the commodities concerning it. The new commission will fix prices for imported as well as home-produced goods, and will also establish wages and profits levels.

While a Bulgarian delegation has been negotiating a trade agreement in Paris, a representative of the U.K. Ministry of Food arrived at Sofia last week to open similar discussions. He has been reported as saying that Great Britain hoped to buy from Bulgaria tobacco, fruit pulp and other produce, including later on chickens, eggs and meat. Bulgaria would in return receive industrial products from Great Britain.

The coal crisis in the United Kingdom has been given considerable publicity in the Sofia press. Sofia likewise has been very short of coal, and treatment has been sympathetic. The new two-year plan provides for improvements in the housing, rations and wages of miners, and exempts from military service those youths who prefer to work in the mines. "Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery."

The newly-appointed British Political Representative in Bulgaria, Mr. J. G. Sterndale Bennett, C.M.G., M.C., is expected to arrive at Sofia about the middle of March.

There is good reason to think that M. Dimitrov took advantage of the absence of M. Georgiev and M. Kulishev last month, in Paris and Athens respectively, to overhaul the personnel of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dismissing some officials there whom he suspected of being too friendly to the Opposition and planting Communists in their place. The Sofia wireless virtually admitted as much on the 20th and 21st February in announcing new Bulgarian diplomatic appointments to Belgrade, Rome and Stockholm.

Preliminary results of the census held on the last day of 1946 give Bulgaria (including Southern Dobruja) a total population of 7,020,863. On the last occasion, at the end of 1934, without Southern Dobruja, it had 6,077,939. Sofia now has 436,936 inhabitants, as against 328,527 in 1934. Plovdiv has 122,875 now, against 99,883 then; and Varna has 77,636 now, against 69,944 then.

Turkey

Before adjourning until the 14th April the Grand National Assembly passed a Bill on the formation of employers' associations and of workers' unions. Turkish industry is a recent and artificial creation, in an overwhelmingly agricultural community its relative importance is small, three-quarters of it is run by the State on paternal lines, much of the labour is migratory and seasonal, and in general there is little class feeling. For all these reasons the workmen are not greatly interested in forming trades unions. The new measure, although it owes much to the inspiration and counsel of the British adviser to the Ministry of Labour, must therefore be regarded as largely window-dressing: to acquire merit in Great Britain and America for a truly democratic development, and to stultify Soviet fulminations against the previous ban on workers' unions. In view of the persistence with which Soviet agents have attempted to establish Communism in Turkey, it is not surprising that the law just voted forbids strikes and lock-outs, political activity and connexion with foreign or foreign-inspired unions. Although a leader of the Democratic (minority) Party objected to the ban on strikes, the Bill seems to have been passed with little opposition. The idea that appropriate social reform is the great safeguard against Communistic upheaval has already begun to find expression in the newspapers.

The coal crisis and the resultant paralysis of British economy, coupled with what seems to Turkish minds to be abdication in Egypt and India, not unnaturally produced in the press misgivings with regard to the military and diplomatic strength of Great Britain. It was no doubt to correct such doubts that the semi-official Ulus flatly repudiated Soviet insinuations that the Anglo-Turkish alliance was useless to Turkey, and insisted on its value and on Turkish determination to hold to it.

The Foreign Minister, if correctly reported, claimed on the 18th February to have received assurances from the Syrian Government that Turkish reports of the persecution of Turks in Syria were unfounded. Thereupon the Ulus admitted that it had no complaint against the Syrian Government, but—without mentioning Russia—it warned the Syrians against propaganda of foreign origin designed to provoke them against Turkey. While expressing the wish for friendship with Syria, the Turkish press has firmly rejected all idea of discussing Turkish sovereignty over the Hatay (district of Alexandretta), an attitude which was underlined in a chauvinistic speech by General Kâzim Karabekir, the President of the Grand National Assembly, at Antakaya on the 16th February.

In the general attitude of the Soviet Government Turkish commentators see discouraging omens for the Moscow conference. Moreover, they are inclined to be anxious lest the Straits question should be discussed over Turkey's head, as happened at Potsdam.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Egyptian Government have replied to the offer of mediation by the Syrian and Lebanese Governments, asserting that their difference with His Majesty's Government is not merely a minor one of interpretation of a particular clause, but goes much deeper than that. They allege that the attitude adopted by His Majesty's Government ignores "the spirit of friendship which Egypt expected after the services rendered by Egypt and the obligations fulfilled by her," and that His Majesty's Government's policy tending to spread the spirit of separatism amongst the Sudanese is leading to "a state of affairs which, if it continued, would endanger international peace and security." The reply ends with a hint that, unless the Levant States have an official assurance from His Majesty's Government that they are prepared to modify their policy, there is nothing to be gained from any further intervention (see also "Syria and the Lebanon.") A statement issued by the Prime Minister on the 3rd March implies that any further efforts at mediation—by the Levant States or others—will be fruitless. Nokrashy Pasha attributes the breakdown of the negotiations to the failure of the Egyptians to obtain satisfaction on the two essential points claimed unanimously by the Egyptian people. These are:—(i) the evacuation of British troops from Egypt, immediate, complete, and without conditions as laid down in the Treaty; and (ii) the maintenance of the unity of Egypt and the Sudan, self-government for the Sudanese, and the restoration to Egypt of her rights in the administration of the Sudan in order to prepare the Sudanese for self-government. He repeats his charge against His Majesty's Government of inciting the Sudanese to secede from Egypt, and claims that, if Egypt had not been deprived of her fair share in the administration of the Sudan, greater progress towards self-government would have been made. In conclusion he expressed the opinion that the Charter of the United Nations may fairly be regarded as applicable to the two points in dispute. Meanwhile, there are signs that consultations are in progress between Hussein Heikal Pasha and Independent elder statesmen who believe that a coalition Government, including the Wafd, should be formed. Such a coalition would probably be against Nokrashy Pasha, who has remained outside these conversations.

Towards the end of February the widespread enthusiasm at the breaking-off of the Treaty negotiations had given way to some anxiety at the result of submitting the case to the United Nations, although the general public had become preoccupied with economic troubles and appeared to have lost interest in both national and internal politics. The press continues to attack the Greater Syria plan as a British manœuvre to divert attention from Egypt and to break the unity of the Arab States.

Syria and the Lebanon

His Majesty's Representatives in Damascus and Beirut were informed on the 26th February that the Egyptian reply had been received. Both the Syrian and the Lebanese Governments concluded from the tenor of the Note that there was nothing more they could do. They had been fiercely attacked in the Egyptian press and by telegraph and telephone, and the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs suggested that the present Egyptian Government was so weak, and the internal situation so complex, that a rebuff by the United Nations would be preferred by Egyptians to the resumption of negotiations.

The Greater Syria plan (see also under "Egypt") has remained a subject of interest to the Syrian and Lebanese press. Although King Abdullah has declared his abstention from interference with the internal affairs of his neighbours, there is evidence that privately he talks a good deal on this subject. At the same time the feasibility of the project, which has no backing from His Majesty's Government, is so doubtful that the extent of the discussion of it in the press gives rise to the suspicion that it is deliberately inspired as an item of propaganda against this country, and also against the unity of the Arab League.

Palestine

On the 2nd March statutory Martial Law was imposed on a restricted Jewish area of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Ramat Gan, Bnei Braq and Petah Tiqvah. The regulations were made under a Palestine (Defence) Order-in-Council and provide for the withdrawal of the usual facilities for civil government (including courts of law), for the closure of banks, and for the control of entry into and departure from specified areas of persons and vehicles by order of the Military Commander, and for the trial by Military Courts of all criminal offences committed in the specified areas.

This step has been taken as a result of the terrorist outrages of the 1st March, the most serious of which was the blowing-up of the Officers' Club in Jerusalem, in which at least twelve persons were killed and fifteen injured. Attacks on transport occurred on several roads elsewhere in Palestine, causing deaths and injuries. On the 28th February an explosion caused considerable damage to a floor of Barclay's Bank building in Haifa, and several casualties, including two Jews who were injured and have since died.

The announcement of the imposition of Martial Law stressed the failure of the Yishuv to co-operate with the Government in anti-terrorist measures, and the refusal of the Jewish Agency and Vaad Leumi to respond to the invitation to co-operate in bringing terrorists to judgment. The fact was mentioned that vehicles used in attacks at Jerusalem and Haifa on the 1st March had been stolen in Tel Aviv, which was thus clearly linked with these outrages.

The Jewish Agency declare that they will continue their efforts to stop terrorists and undermine their organisation, though hampered by "lack of adequate power." They complain that the Government have failed to give any help on the question of immigration which would have assisted in arousing the community, and that they now seek to punish the community without any real likelihood of deterring terrorists. There had already been indications that the influence of the Agency was rapidly declining, and that, seeing their resolutions denouncing terrorism openly defied, they were seeking popular support in opposition to the Government. The Government have replied to the Agency's statement, which is described as a deliberate misrepresentation of facts. Not only has immigration at the rate of 1,500 monthly been continued after the admission of the 75,000 allowed by the White Paper of 1939, but His Majesty's Government proposed as part of the scheme suggested to the Jewish representatives in the recent talks in London that 4,000 a month should be admitted for two years, after which the rate should be determined, with due regard to economic absorptive capacity, by the High Commissioner, or, in the event of disagreement, by an Arbitration Tribunal appointed by the United Nations. This proposal was rejected by the Jewish Agency. At the same time the flow of illegal immigrants was unscrupulously promoted and organised by the Agency, and the quota was mortgaged for many months ahead. Deserving applicants for immigration certificates were debarred by inclusion amongst the illegals of a considerable number of terrorists.

An illegal immigration ship, the Ulua, re-named the Haim Arlossorof, was sighted by naval patrols on the 27th February and arrived off Haifa on the evening of the 28th. The ship was run ashore west of Haifa town and some of the passengers jumped overboard. All were captured. The naval boarding-party met with considerable resistance, but the passengers were eventually trans-shipped to transports in preparation for their journey to Cyprus. An application for habeas corpus for these illegal immigrants has been made, and the transports are remaining at sea until the court has discharged the order.

Fauzi al Qawuqchi (see last week's Summary) arrived in Cairo at midnight on the 23rd February, and, although Nokrashy Pasha is said to have been extremely put out by his arrival, he agreed, at Azzam Pasha's request, to grant him a visa to remain for four days. Fauzi is a Lebanese subject, originally from Tripoli, and was indiscreetly entertained by the Lebanese Minister in Cairo. He is also reported to have called at Abdin Palace and on the Mufti. Receptions were being prepared in his honour in Tripoli, since he is expected to go to the Lebanon this week. The Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs, however, is warning him that he must be on good behaviour and not go to Tripoli.

Persia

On the 26th February Tabriz radio announced that the Martial Law regulations forbidding political meetings were to be relaxed from that date in order to allow preparations for the elections to be made in an atmosphere of "absolute freedom." Polling is expected to start very soon in Tabriz, and may be already under way.

A much brighter picture of conditions in Azerbaijan than that painted in Summary No. 380 has been provided by Nikpay, former Minister of Posts and Telegraphs (see Summaries Nos. 366 and 374). He informed His Majesty's Ambassador that, on his recent visit to the province, he had seen no sign of disorder nor of excess, and that conditions were improving daily. According to Nikpay, the Governor-General, Ali Mansur, has the situation well in hand, and even the Soviet Consul-General has said that there had been a general improvement since Ali Mansur's arrival.

Efforts are now being made in labour circles to depose Reza Rusta from his position of Secretary of the Central Committee of the Persian Federation of Trade Unions, and to form a new Executive Committee. On the 13th February a number of workers, claiming to be members of the Federation of Trade Unions, held a meeting, attended by Persian and foreign press correspondents, at which they elected a new Executive Committee. On the 15th February the old Executive Committee staged a counter-offensive on the Trade Union Headquarters, which, however, remained in the hands of the reformers. The Ministry of Labour is now supporting the demands for Rusta's removal. Their opposition to him has been strengthened by the investigations they have been making into Tudeh activities in preparation for the visit of the World Federation of Trade Unions delegation (see Summary No. 381). An imposing dossier has been prepared containing signed evidence of Tudeh malpractices. Much evidence of financial and administrative irregularity appears to involve Rusta.

The eclipse of the Tudeh party (see last week's Summary and Summary No. 375) now appears to be almost complete. In Khuzistan, Kermanshah, Isfahan, Kerman and Gilan party headquarters have been forcibly closed down by the police or by the local population. In Khuzistan several important Tudeh trouble makers have been arrested, while elsewhere many former Tudeh supporters have recanted and joined the Democrat party.

The Persian Government have asked the International Rehabilitation Bank for a loan of $250,000,000, a course of action which has aroused much adverse criticism in the Persian press. Nearly all the Tehran papers oppose the idea. Mardum, the official Tudeh organ, in an article of the 7th February states: "Small nations, Persia amongst them, have very painful memories of past foreign loans. Through this loan the country may come under economic domination, which is the first step towards political domination."

Most papers welcome the attendance of Persian representatives at the Inter-Asian

INTER-ASIAN RELATIONS CONFERENCE

This Conference, which is to be held at New Delhi from the 23rd March to the 2nd April, has been organised by the Indian Council of World Affairs. This is an unofficial body whose activities are somewhat similar to those of our Royal Institute of International Affairs (Chatham House). Pandit Nehru will probably be the Chairman of the Conference.

Invitations to attend have been sent to the thirty-two major Asiatic countries, including Japan and the Asiatic Soviet Republics. All the Middle East Asiatic countries have been invited. Egypt has also received an invitation owing to her close connections with the rest of the Arab World. In Palestine the invitation has been extended to Jews and Arabs. The delegation from each country is intended to consist of sixteen members and four "observers," chosen for their academic qualifications. Women will not be excluded. So far, nearly all the countries invited have accepted, including the Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan, (which is sending members from their branch of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences and from the University of Baku), and Uzbekistan (which is sending members from the State University of the Middle East, Tashkent); the Pacific Institute of the Academy of Science of the U.S.S.R. in Moscow will also be represented. Sa'udi Arabia and Yemen have refused the invitation.

In addition, observers have been invited from academic bodies in non-Asiatic countries which are likely to be interested. Chatham House is sending two representatives from their India branch; the Institute of Pacific Relations, New York, is sending four.

The items on the agenda will include race conflicts, problems created by the transition from a colonial to a national economy, economic co-operation among the Asiatic countries, industrial development, labour welfare and the status of women in Asia. The Conference will take the form of group discussions and planning meetings. Its main objects will be to promote a sense of solidarity in Asia, to formulate a co-ordinated policy on cultural and economic matters, and to stimulate a cultural and intellectual revival. The promoters of the conference have announced that political subjects will not be discussed. How far this is adhered to remains to be seen, and the acceptance of the Soviet delegates is already giving rise to some anxiety as to the way the conference may develop.

THE FAR EAST

China

On the 1st March it was announced in Nanking that Dr. T. V. Soong had resigned from the Government and that, by a decision of the Supreme National Defence Council, his place as President of the Executive Yuan would be filled for the time being by General Chiang Kai-shek.

Although Dr. Soong's resignation is calculated to cause considerable misgivings in financial circles at Shanghai, in Chinese political circles it was not altogether unexpected. For some weeks he has been subjected to considerable internal political pressure, while his attitude in connection with the recent economic crisis has been widely criticised, more particularly in the Legislative Yuan. A man of explosive temperament, he does not suffer interference gladly. When, therefore, following a discussion of the situation with General Chiang Kai-shek on the evening of the 28th February, the Generalissimo advised him not to attend the meeting of the Legislative Yuan on the following morning, Dr. Soong tendered his resignation and was somewhat taken aback when General Chiang Kai-shek accepted both it and that of the Governor of the Central Bank, Pei Tsuyee. Contrary to the advice which he had been given the previous evening, Dr. Soong decided to present himself before the Legislative Yuan, where in a lengthy statement he rendered an account of his stewardship and stoutly defended the emergency measures introduced to meet the recent economic crisis. According to press reports, Dr. Soong's reception in the Yuan was exceedingly hostile and on being assailed with questions he merely replied that he had resigned and walked out. It is understood, however, that there has been no breach of personal friendship between the two brothers-in-law and that Dr. Soong has promised General Chiang Kai-shek to remain in Nanking in order that his advice may be available when required.

Dr. Soong's withdrawal may ease the general political situation. It has long been an open secret that he has stood between the Government and Carson Chang, leader of the Social Democratic Party, and the removal of this barrier may render possible the immediate broadening of the several Yuan and the formation of the State Council with minority and non-party representation. This reading of the situation reflects the belief among quite a large number of those who welcome the departure of Dr. Soong that General Chiang Kai-shek will remain President of the Executive Yuan only until a Government reorganisation has been effected, when, they hope, the post may be given to General Chang Chun, present Governor of Szechuen Province and leader of the Political Science Group which is closely associated with Carson Chang's Social Democratic Party. It is also thought that if General Chang Chun were made President of the Executive Yuan, he, in turn, would appoint as his Minister of Finance Chang Kia-ngau, a brother of Carson Chang, recently Finance Commissioner in Manchuria and who has now been selected to succeed Mr. Pei Tsuyee as Governor of the Central Bank. On the other hand, there are those who fear that General Chiang Kai-shek may have been too readily tempted to dispense with Dr. Soong's expert financial knowledge by a false sense of security born of the initial success which has attended his own determined, if drastic, measures of intervention in the recent economic crisis. "Investigations" are still being carried out, and many have thought it wise to cash their U.S. dollar holdings at the new official rate. Moreover, to judge by current imported commodity prices, the black market is already showing signs of renewed activity. The voice of Labour is also making itself heard in Shanghai with increasing strength in protest against the decision to fix wages on the rates ruling in January instead of adjusting them monthly on the cost-of-living index. The granting of a flat supplement calculated to meet the rise in cost of the six basic commodities—rice, sugar, salt, oil, coal, and cloth—is regarded as a totally inadequate measure while the Government are still unable to fulfil their promise to control prices. Even the anti-Kuomintang paper Lien Ho Jih Pao admits that Dr. Soong is not entirely to blame for the existing state of economic chaos and that there can be no effective check on inflation so long as the country continues to be ravaged by civil war.

This statement of home truths, however, has evidently not been taken to heart by General Chiang Kai-shek, who has now decided on a complete and open severance of relations with the Communist Party and an intensified military offensive, regardless of expense. The leaders of the Communist Liaison Delegation in Nanking, Shanghai and other centres have been summarily ordered to remove themselves and their "esteemed party" from Nationalist-controlled China before the 5th March. There is much talk of a full-scale military offensive in progress in China proper which is claimed to be bringing the Government a series of important victories: but it seems that, in fact, the Government forces have been badly defeated in Shantung Province. No less than three Kuomintang divisions are reliably reported to have been lost in the neighbourhood of Linyi; while Tsinan, capital of Shantung and an important railway junction, is said to be in imminent danger of capture by large numbers of Communists who have succeeded in isolating the city.

According to the latest reports, however, it would appear that the tide has turned in favour of the Government in Manchuria, where particularly large Communist forces are reported to have been engaged in a vigorous offensive covering a large area, with the important railway town of Changchun as their main objective. But, although their initial efforts were attended with some success, reliable press reports from Nanking support the Government's claim to have broken the attack on Changchun by surrounding the main body of Communists in the neighbourhood of Tehwei and driving the remnants of the defeated force in a northerly direction towards the Sungari River. It is generally thought that the Government have now succeeded in restoring their lines in Manchuria.

General Chiang Kai-shek still appears hopeful that if he can demonstrate his ability to deal successfully with the Communists in the field, the United States will decide to come out openly in support of his Government, in which case the Communists might well seek a compromise. Be this as it may, it is certain that the Chinese Government is most anxious that external intervention in her affairs should not come from elsewhere. During the course of a recent interview with H.M. Ambassador in Nanking the Minister for Foreign Affairs said that it was the earnest desire of the Chinese Government that the Foreign Ministers at the forthcoming Moscow Conference should come to no agreement concerning China without first consulting her. He hoped that neither the problem of China nor any Far Eastern issue would figure in the Moscow discussions. The Chinese Ambassador in London also made the same request on the 3rd March, when he called on His Majesty's Secretary of State and was assured that this was the policy he intended to follow. According to a recent Press message from Nanking, Mr. Liu Chieh, Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, has stated that all the "Big Four Powers" have given China a similar assurance.

Japan

According to newspaper correspondents, General MacArthur, in an interview given to a party of Congressmen accompanying Mr. Julius Krug, U.S. Secretary of the Interior, expressed the view that a peace treaty should be signed with Japan without delay. He is reported to have said that Japan could become a more thorough democracy than Germany and that delay in concluding peace was handicapping her development. He is also said to have envisaged the Japan of the future as "a foremost centre of American democracy and Christianity."

It has been apparent for some time that one inevitable result of the occupation is that any Japanese Government administering the country under the control of a Supreme Commander must lack initiative and suffer in prestige in consequence. Moreover, the belief, whether well or ill-founded, that progress towards a particular type of democracy will be welcomed by military headquarters is bound to result in measures that do not represent the considered opinion of the people and are regarded by them as dictated by S.C.A.P. In no sphere has the decline in prestige been so apparent as in the half-hearted attempts of the Government to secure a fair distribution of food. The farmers flout Government orders; they conceal a portion of their stocks, partly for their own use and partly for sale through irregular channels. The salaried classes sell their possessions and buy on the black market to keep body and soul together. Behind all this lack of co-operation with the Government is the belief that the American "war-lord" will provide.

At the same time it is equally apparent that to leave the Japanese to their own devices in the immediate future might well entail far worse disasters. It is possible, therefore, that what General MacArthur has principally in mind is (1) an early transition from military occupation to some form of civilian control and (2) a final settlement on reparations.

General MacArthur's reported hint that the American type of democracy is most suitable for Japan can scarcely meet with the approval of the Soviet Union. The Russians have more than once complained that Japan is being built up as a defensive bastion against themselves.

In the House of Representatives in Canberra Dr. Evatt also pleaded for an early peace settlement with Japan.

S.C.A.P. is understood to be asking the U.S. Government for the supply of 1½ million tons of food-stuff during 1947. Imports in 1946 amounted to 700,000 tons thanks to which the individual ration was 1,200 calories. With the increased import it would be possible to raise the ration for workers to 1,550 calories. Many foreign observers maintain that the 1946 crop, if fairly distributed, would, without imports, be sufficient to give the Japanese, during 1947, a low but adequate diet which would still be better than their diet in the later years of the war. It is pointed out that certain countries in South-East Asia, which were overrun and despoiled by the Japanese during the war, are relatively worse off now than the Japanese themselves.

In an endeavour to get industry going again, the Government are proposing to allocate materials to essential industries and to withhold them from others. A Tokyo newspaper quoted from the Economic Stabilisation Board's statistics to prove that further 1,500,000 workers would be thrown out of work and hinted at the danger to public security if the already great number of unemployed were added to in this way. Wada, former Minister for Agriculture, has now rejoined the Government as Minister without Portfolio. He is to take over supervision of the E.S.B.

The Cabinet has decided on a tentative programme for elections. The Diet session is to end on the 30th March, town and village heads are to be elected on the 5th April, the general election for the House of Representatives is to take place on the 15th April and local elections on the 30th April. This prospect of a general election has been the signal for intensive political activity, but as yet there are few signs of the parties closing their ranks. The rift among the Social-Democrats has been widened by the action of the left-wing in "stealing" the Farmers Union, originally sponsored by the right-wing of the Party. There is talk of a merger between two other left-wing parties: the Co-operative Democrats and the People's Party (the Kokuminto formed as late as September 1946 out of the earlier Shinseikai or New Life Party). The new Party would muster 75 members but there is the usual dissension with regard to leadership. Trouble simmers in the Progressive Party, too, where the young bloods have actually suggested to their elders that the party should be dissolved and a new party formed.

The Communist Party have decided that general strikes do not win votes, and Nozaka, donning sheep's clothing, has warned the unions of the danger of their going too far in their political activities. There is some hope, therefore, of a temporary subsidence of strike fever. The Government were in fact within an ace of settling the nine month's old dispute with the State employees. The average wage was to be doubled to Yen 1,200 but the Government asked for the dissolution of the special "strike preparedness" committee, and to this the union would not agree.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

American interest in the British coal crisis is beginning to ebb slightly with the receipt of more favourable news from this side of the Atlantic. Nevertheless, the conviction remains that, for purely selfish as well as for broader humanitarian reasons, it behoves the United States to assist as generously as possible in alleviating the economic burdens of this and other European countries. This is especially the case as Congress turns its attention to the foreign relief programme of the United States Government. That programme has been embodied in a special message which President Truman addressed to Congress on the 21st February, asking for $350 million to provide direct assistance under United States control to the war-stricken areas. It has been followed by another message on the 24th, urging Congress to authorize the United States to participate in the United Nations International Refugee Organisation. Hearings on the relief programme, which are at present being conducted by the House of Representatives' Committee on Foreign Affairs, have included testimony by Mr. William L. Clayton, the Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, who on the 25th February mentioned Austria, Greece, Hungary, Italy and Poland as the European countries requiring assistance when U.N.R.R.A. goes out of business. Mr. Herbert Hoover, whose 21-page report to the President on the German food situation should cause some of his fellow-Republicans to take a more favourable view of requests for funds for the joint administration of the American and British zones, has also given evidence. On the 28th February he outlined a scheme whereby the distribution of foreign relief would take place under the strict supervision of experts of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Health Service and the International Emergency Food Council, and whereby all nations receiving relief would have to undertake to assure repayment by imposing a special tax on their exports. The scheme would forbid relief to be given to countries where "either commodities or cash" were being drawn off for reparations or for the purchase of armaments.

As a result of information which—by intention or otherwise—has been allowed to leak out regarding the discussions which President Truman and General Marshall had with leaders of Congress behind closed doors at the White House on the 27th February, considerable attention is now being given to Greece and, to a lesser degree, to Turkey as the countries where American economic assistance is most vitally needed. There has also been speculation in the press on the nature and content of the American reply to the aide-mémoires on Greece and Turkey presented by His Majesty's Government to the United States Government on the 24th February.

In delivering this reply Mr. Acheson informed His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington that the State Department has been giving considerable time to the problem of Greece and that it hopes to have proposals ready for the President on his return from Mexico on the 6th March. These will include a request to Congress to authorize the Export–Import Bank to extend credits to Greece. The United States Government are apparently ready to make every effort to maintain the territorial and political integrity of both Greece and Turkey, and they propose that consultations be held at once between the State Department and His Majesty's representatives in Washington regarding the financial considerations involved. They also suggest conversations with His Majesty's Government on more general problems of common concern relating to Asia as well as to Europe. (This reflects perhaps the state of mind induced in Washington, not only by the appeal for assistance in the case of Greece, but also by what the American press has been saying about possible changes in the disposition of British power abroad as a result of developments in India and of the economic crisis at home. In this connexion it is probably not surprising that, in delivering the American reply on the 1st March, Mr. Acheson laid great emphasis on the desire of his Government that our troops shall not be withdrawn from Greece.)

Mr. Bevin's reference, in his House of Commons speech of the 25th February, to the way in which the problem of Palestine had been "made the subject of local electioneering" by American political leaders, and his own efforts to reach a solution had thereby been impeded, has given rise to a spate of lively comment. Reactions have ranged all the way from the angered retort of Representative Emanuel Celler (Democrat, Brooklyn) that the whole speech was a "damnable lie" to the equally strong assertion of the Los Angeles Times that Mr. Bevin was right and that President Truman "demeaned his office by wooing Jewish votes." Some commentators admit that the President's statement of the 4th October last, which was referred to in the House of Commons debate, "smacked of electioneering," and they recall that they as good as said so at the time. (Mr. Truman was, in fact, reproached last October for bringing Palestine down to the level of "ward politics" and for possibly jeopardizing Mr. Byrnes' good work on the subject in Paris.) In these quarters the White House démenti of the 26th February, which stated that it was "unfortunate and misleading" to suggest that American interest in Palestine was "motivated by partisan and local politics," has tended to fall completely flat. Others, however, have been inclined to question whether the President's action could really have had the effect on the London negotiations ascribed to it by Mr. Bevin, the Washington Post remarking that "there could have been no negotiations worthy of the word if Bevin was trying to duck the issue over immigration."

With characteristic readiness to believe only the worst of Soviet conduct in the international sphere the majority of commentators have imputed none but the most sinister motives to the Russian decision to accept without further question the proposed U.S. trusteeship over the former Japanese mandates in the Pacific. This unexpectedly amicable gesture on the part of the Kremlin, to which General Marshall referred at his press conference on the 25th February, is generally believed to stem from a desire to establish a precedent in the disposal of ex-enemy territory which will work to the advantage of Soviet claims in Europe. Thus the consistently Russophobe New York Daily News has been prompted to ask "just what quid pro quo" Stalin wants for this "seeming generosity" and to add that "until we know the answer to that question let's go easy on dancing in the street." In view of the firm line which he is known to favour in dealing with the Russians, and in view of his recent positive contribution to Republican thought on the subject of Germany (see Summary No. 377), the choice of Mr. John Foster Dulles as General Marshall's "special adviser" at the forthcoming Moscow Conference has given much satisfaction in all but left-wing quarters. As the New York Herald-Tribune has observed, "it is most unlikely that Secretary Marshall would have issued the invitation unless he believed that Mr. Dulles' approach to the German problem was compatible with his own, or that Mr. Dulles would have accepted unless he felt that his views were sufficiently representative of those of other Republican leaders to be more than a personal contribution."

On the 26th February it was announced that President Truman had appointed Mr. Lewis William Douglas, a former Congressman-at-large from Arizona and Director of the Budget from 1933 to 1934, to be U.S. Ambassador to the Court of St. James's in succession to Mr. O. Max Gardner, who died suddenly on the 6th February, only a few hours before he was due to leave for this country. Like Mr. Gardner, Mr. Douglas is a successful business man. Since 1940 he has been President of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. From 1938 to 1939 he served as Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. His appointment has been well received among American Conservatives. A few Liberals, on the other hand, while admitting his lifelong friendship for this country, have suggested that his known antipathy towards the New Deal at home will not make it easy for him to see eye-to-eye with a Socialist Government in Great Britain.

LATIN AMERICA

Bolivia

The inauguration of the new Bolivian president is envisaged for the 10th March, following confirmation of the results by Congress. It is reported in the press, however, that the event may be postponed, apparently on account of the recent disastrous floods at Trinidad, which are described as a national calamity.

The complete electoral returns give Dr. Enrique Hertzog a narrow victory over Dr. Luis F. Guachalla by 43,581 votes to 43,302. Dr. Paz Estenssoro, the leader of the disbanded Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario (M.N.R.)—the "fascist" party under the Villarroel régime—received 5,194 votes; his very appearance as a candidate is a sign of broadmindedness on the part of the Government. The number of votes cast represents nearly 72 per cent of the total electorate of 130,000. This is the highest percentage recorded in Bolivia, though the electorate remains a bare twentieth of the population.

Dr. Hertzog is a member of the "Union of Republican Socialists," which will have 14 out of 27 seats in the new Senate and 45 out of 111 in the Chamber of Deputies. With the aid of Señor Juan Lechín's miners and other small groups, Dr. Hertzog's supporters should command a majority in both houses. Dr. Guachalla was supported by the Liberals (who are extreme conservatives) and the Left Revolutionary Party (P.I.R.): these two disparate groups have 15 and 35 seats respectively in the Chamber, and could therefore outvote the Republican Socialists if these failed to come to terms with the minority groups.

Peru

The political situation in Perú has further deteriorated since the Graña murder (see Summary No. 376), and President Bustamente's new Cabinet holds a precarious balance between the Apristas and the conservative opposition. Antagonism between right and left is now intense; the Graña murder has been followed by an armed attack on the offices belonging to the Padro family, one of whom is related to the late Señor Graña by marriage. While conflicting versions of the latest affray have been published, the official investigation of the Graña affair seems more and more unlikely to lead to an impartial assessment of responsibilities.

The existing tension throws into clear relief the difficulties of A.P.R.A. itself. While Sr. Haya de la Torre remains the idealistic leader of a popular crusade, his party contains few experienced administrators together with a considerable and apparently growing number of undisciplined toughs and political place-hunters. Señor Haya de la Torre had recognised that his party is passing through a critical phase, but its relations with the President remain undefined. Should the Graña investigation absolve the party, it may possibly be cajoled back into taking its share of the responsibilities of Government. Should the investigation implicate the party, it would presumably become openly oppositionist. In this case it is difficult to see who would govern; President Bustamente could turn to the armed forces, though such a move might be resisted forcibly by the Apristas. According to broadcast reports, two hundred leading Peruvians have recently issued a statement that liberty, security and order "no longer exist" in Perú.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Japanese Mandated Islands

On the 26th February Senator Austin presented to the Security Council his Government's claim to the trusteeship of the islands. In submitting the draft agreement to the Security Council, he pointed out that the U.S. had conquered the islands in its struggle against Japanese agression:

that it was in occupation of them: that they were vital to the security of the U.S., and that Japan had forfeited her mandate. No other Power claimed the islands. At the same time the U.S. was anxious to carry out the Assembly's Resolution that trusteeship agreements should be completed promptly for all former mandated territories. His Government therefore proposed trusteeship rather than annexation. The proposed trusteeship would, however, allow the administering Government to declare certain areas closed for security reasons. On the other hand, whatever international controls became part of an Atomic Energy agreement would apply to the islands.

Mr. Gromyko supported the U.S. request on the ground that the U.S. had made greater sacrifices than had any other Power in the war against Japan. (For the possible implications of this doctrine see under "The United States.") Mr. Gromyko proposed three amendments to the draft agreement, the most important of which would give the Security Council the right to amend or terminate the Agreement.

Corfu Incident

On the 27th February the Council voted in favour of an Australian proposal to set up a Committee of three to examine all the available evidence concerning the dispute and to report back to the Council by the 10th March. The Committee consists of representatives of Australia, Columbia and Poland. During the general debate the Soviet representative once more raised the alleged illegality of the U.K. action in sweeping the mines. Sir Alexander Cadogan tried to bring the discussion back to the original complaint, and demonstrated the irrelevance of this issue.

Economic and Social Council

The Council opened its Fourth Session on the 28th February, and elected the following officers, President, Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, First Vice-President, Jan Papaner (Czechoslovakia), Second Vice-President Arca Parro (Peru). Thirty-one items were on the Agenda, one has now been dropped and two added, on the F.A.O. Timber Conference and on States not members of the United Nations joining U.N.E.S.C.O. During the first two meetings the Council approved the report of the Narcotics' Commission. A Soviet proposal to make members of the Permanent Central Opium Board Government representatives was defeated, after the Canadian delegate had pointed to the stipulation in the 1925 Geneva Convention that they should be experts in their own right. The report is to go before a Committee whose members represent U.K., U.S.A., U.S.S.R., France, China, India, Peru, New Zealand, Byelorussia, Venezuela and Lebanon. It is assumed that other social matters on the Council's agenda will also be referred to this Committee. A certain amount of discussion arose on the question of the right conferred by the Assembly upon all Category 'A' Non-Governmental Organisation, to propose items for the provisional agenda. It will be remembered that the Assembly had first given the right to the World Federation of Trade Unions, thus violating the equality which these bodies must enjoy according to the Charter. The Assembly had then restored the constitutional balance by extending the right to all Organisations in Category 'A.' It is not clear, however, what is the best method of carrying out the Assembly's resolutions, which the President ruled must be taken together. On the President's suggestion, a special Committee will now study the matter and report back to the Council. The Council will then be in a position to decide how to deal with the W.F.T.U. item. The Soviet representative urged a simpler procedure which would have led to the W.F.T.U. resolution being taken more speedily. Russia voted against the President's motion. France and Czechoslovakia abstained.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS DEPUTIES

Following the instructions given them by their Foreign Ministers on the 12th December, the Deputies met in London from the 14th January to the 25th February. Those for Austria had to "proceed with the preparation of a treaty recognising the independence of Austria." Those for Germany had to "consider questions of procedure with regard to the preparation of a peace treaty for Germany." Both had to hear the views of "neighbouring Allied States and other Allies who had participated with their armed forces in the common struggle against Germany." Eighteen allies were invited to give their views, Denmark being added to the seventeen of the Paris Conference.

The Deputies for Austria had a comparatively definite task, and managed to agree to a fourfold classification of the articles of the peace treaty, (1) agreed articles, (2) articles agreed in part, (3) articles on which no agreement had been possible, (4) articles not discussed (see under "Austria"). The Deputies for Germany had before them the study of procedure and "procedure" had set the whole Paris Conference by the ears from the 29th July until the 7th August. As at Paris, the centre of debate was the share that the "other Allies" who had fought the war, should have in making the peace, or, as the Canadians put it, in seeing that they were not drawn into another war. Russia, as Mr. Byrnes once said, had striven ever since Potsdam to reduce the share of the Allies, and Mr. Gousev maintained this policy in London. The only apparent concessions which he made to the contrary view, held most strongly by the U.K. and the U.S., and held, though with an eye to compromise, by France, illuminated the motives of this Russian policy. He invented a new category of allies, those "directly interested," whose countries had been occupied by Germany, i.e., Albania, Belgium, Byelorussia, Denmark, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Ukraine, Yugoslavia. They would take part in the discussions of the Standing Committee which Mr. Gousev intended to be the organ for consultation with the Allies. Other non-occupied allies might be present as observers. The Dominions would thus be excluded from participation on the ground that their territory had not been occupied; and the occupied States contained a substantial pro-Russian majority. The U.K. Deputy, Sir William Strang, had no difficulty in showing that the new category was unknown to Potsdam, was based on a confusion between States directly interested in a particular issue—these could not be defined apart from the particular issue—and States directly interested in the German problem—these had been defined when the eighteen invitations were sent out. Mr. Murphy remarked dryly that it was more important that Canadian troops had arrived in Germany than that no German troops had occupied Canada.

The U.K., the U.S. and France all agreed that the other Allies must be kept informed of the process of peacemaking, be able to express their views and to discuss matters of direct interest to them. Mr. Murphy (U.S.) went further and wished them to share in discussions on any aspect of the German problem; Sir William Strang went further still, calling the question of Allied participation the most important matter before the Deputies. The procedure for the "Satellite" treaties had not, he said, been satisfactory in this respect and he recommended that the Deputies should observe two principles in preparing for the German treaty: (1) Allied consultation at every stage of peacemaking, and (2) the final decisions on the text of the treaty to be made at a full conference of all the governments concerned, the Foreign Ministers having drawn up only the general lines. Here, of course, Russian views clashed; Mr. Gousev insisting that the entire responsibility for drafting lay with the Ministers, who should present the other allies with a text agreed in detail; and it was obvious that he had in mind the same kind of pledge that confronted the Paris Conference—that the Four Powers would support everything in the treaty they had previously agreed upon. In this way a new conference would be presented with faits accomplis; against this the Dominions' representatives orally and in their memoranda had protested to the Deputies. French, U.K. and U.S. representatives all submitted plans for securing Allied consultation and ensuring the smooth achievement and general acceptance of a treaty. The French yielded most to what was at the Paris Conference the "Big Four" view. The U.S. plan was detailed and a little rigid, but contained the ingenious idea that the four Big Power members of the four Standing Committees should each choose one member of the other Allies. The U.K. plan was more elastic, a consultative and information committee in which any ally who wished could take part, and sub-committees which should include a "convenient" number of allies.

It is not surprising that the matter of Allied participation was not settled. Mr. Gousev failed utterly to trap Sir William Strang into agreeing that he had previously agreed to propositions to which he had not agreed—on one occasion the French and U.S. Deputies confuted Mr. Gousev by reading the minutes of what had taken place—nor did he succeed in the subtler plan of securing agreement to part of a document, i.e., the Russian proposals on procedure and consultation, and putting aside as a separate matter, the unagreed portions. Sir William Strang was unshakeable in his contention that documents must be taken as a whole, and that any report submitted to the Ministers must record that U.K. agreement on one part was conditional on agreement on the whole. Thus in their Report, the Deputies listed and attached the various Soviet, French, U.S. and U.K. proposals on procedure. They adopted a report by the Committee of Experts on procedure for the German treaty. The Report indicates the areas of agreement and of disagreement. Part 1 contains matter on which disagreement would be difficult—who are the Big Four, etc. It also indicates two matters of controversy: (1) Russia and France wish to add Albania to the eighteen allies. U.K. and U.S. object. Mr. Murphy contended that his country had no diplomatic relations with Albania. Mr. Gousev replied that Russia collaborated happily in the United Nations with governments with which she had no such relations. Mr. Murphy at once quoted Russia's grounds for refusing to admit Eire and Portugal to the United Nations: (2) A far more important issue, the problem of a German government; and the opposing views are best shown by quotation: (1) U.S.S.R. "a conference shall be called to discuss the draft treaty, when a central government is formed in Germany which will be deemed adequate for the purpose of accepting the said document." (2) U.K. "If at the time of the conference there exists a German government adequate for the purpose of accepting a peace, representatives of the German government will be given an opportunity of expressing their views at this conference." The experts' report says that the allies will be consulted as laid down in Part 2; but the Deputies told the Foreign Ministers that "they failed to work out the procedure for consultation of the allied governments"!

Much of the Deputies' time was taken up in hearing the views of the allies, and in questioning the speakers. For the most part the views of the Slav States were on familiar lines, 40 years of control over Germany, democratisation, demilitarisation, unified Trade Unions for all Germany, a centralised government, etc. Poland's representative wished to ensure that Germany's standard of living was not superior to that of her neighbours and considered that reparations from current production and dismantling of industrial plant would help to bring this about. The argument was put forward that Germany's pre-war economy was artificially swollen, and was not a true measure of a German peacetime economy. Yugoslavia asked for minority rights for the "Serbs of Lusatia" and contemplated the removal of 100,000 "Germans" from Yugoslavia.

Of the other States, the Dominions stressed the right to full consultation, and the need for fact-finding committees, South Africa's representatives contending that it would help the discovery of truth if boundary commissions contained disinterested as well as interested States. All the Dominions dwelt on the part principle must play in a lasting settlement. On the whole they were at one with Belgium, the Netherlands and Denmark in seeing the problem not as a mere German problem, but as the place of Germany in a prosperous and contented Europe. Urgent domestic needs accounted for some suggestions, such as the Norwegian that Germany should not go whaling, or the Greek, that Germany should be compelled to buy Greek tobacco.

The last communication which the Deputies received came from Mr. Beasley of Australia, and it summed up the disappointment of the supporters of full allied consultation: "my Government is forced to the conclusion that the Deputies are agreed that, while the fullest participation of active belligerents was required in time of war, such participation is unappropriate or undesirable in the drafting of the Peace Settlement." Only Mr. Gousev seemed to hold the view thus stigmatised; but he was able to block the ideas of the other three, and the Deputies failed to agree.

GERMANY

The Coordinating Committee, having disposed of the Report for the Council of Foreign Ministers, returned to normal business on the 4th March. Except for approving the law to end the operation of German insurance companies abroad it achieved little. A Draft Law on electoral procedure for local government in the various zones was withdrawn from the agenda after a brief debate on the pros and cons of proportional representation. The Russian representative insisted that the Germans wanted proportional representation and he wished to revert to the procedure of the Weimar Republic, although it was pointed out that the Constitution had not been an outstanding success. The British representative thought it unwise to dictate to local Governments the exact electoral procedure which should be followed. (At present the State Governments in the British zone are each drawing up their own electoral laws for elections at State level.) The chances of agreement were obviously remote since the fundamental issue of Germany's political unity was involved. At the end of the meeting General Clay asked for an investigation into arrests in the Soviet zone of former prisoners-of-war from the U.S. zone, all of whom were carefully vetted before release. General Clay issued a warning that, if his Soviet colleague could not make investigations, he would be obliged to place his information in the hands of his Government. This is not the first time that the question has been raised. On a previous occasion (see Summary No. 370) a protest was made by the Episcopal Conference at Fulda, and it was reported on the 5th March that the German Catholic bishops had sent a letter to the Allied Control Council protesting against former prisoners-of-war being sent to the Soviet Union.

A proposal for the free exchange of newspapers between all zones and Berlin was tabled by the Russian representative in the Political Directorate on the 27th February. The Russians have consistently refused to agree to such an exchange, and details of the proposal will obviously require careful scrutiny. The possibility of such a move was forecast in Summary No. 374 and it has obvious tactical advantages during the present Conference season.

The position of the Berlin Government is still highly unsatisfactory. It is now three months since it took office and during the entire period the central question has been the degree of freedom which should be allowed to the Government and Assembly, behind which lies the question of future quadripartite control over any Central Administrations. The British and United States representatives on the Kommandatura, supported usually by the French, oppose the Russian desire for strict control of the Government—a desire made more keen by antagonism to the Social Democrat Party (SPD) which has replaced the Communist-dominated Socialist Unity Party (SED) as the leading faction. The conflict has already been brought into the open over the question of approving Government appointments (see Summaries Nos. 373 and 374). On the 23rd February it was reported that the Kommandatura had issued a new order, based on the provisions of the Constitution, laying down that all decrees and orders required Kommandatura sanction. The Government does not appear to have been quite clear on this point, and only three out of seventy-five orders have been confirmed. The law governing the transfer of combines to public ownership still awaits approval. The administration is also burdened by the large number of SED functionaries who obtained posts before the elections, but here again the Russians seek to restrict the German Government's power to dismiss employees. According to Berlin Radio of the 6th March the Kommandatura has now laid down that "leading personages" who may not be dismissed without their approval (which has to be unanimous) include police chiefs and deputy heads of departments. In many cases these positions are held by SED members, and so the order appears to represent a virtual victory for Russian views, although the number of posts affected by these restrictions is probably less than they hoped. Small wonder that under these uncertain conditions the German administration is the victim of a growing mood of defeatism. The material difficulties of the winter and the internal problems of personnel besetting the SPD and Christian Democrats (CDU) have contributed to this situation. This is doubly unfortunate in Berlin, an outpost of Western ideas, where the SPD ought to take the initiative in building up a vigorous and efficient administration.

A revealing account of how the Bloc policy works was given in a broadcast by Otto Buchwitz, the SED President of Saxony Diet, on the 26th February. He claimed that under normal procedure the SED, "with its small majority in the Diet," could force its will on the minority parties, but that this would mean a head-on clash on every issue and an "undemocratic" neglect of the minority. "On top of this the SED would have to bear sole responsibility." On the other hand, under a bloc policy agreement on major political points was reached outside the Diet in small bloc committees on which the three parties were represented equally. Buchwitz added significantly that not only was the Communist-dominated Free Trade Union Organisation (FDGB) present at these meetings, although not represented in the Diet, but the Committees could also coopt "experts" who were not members of the Diet. They presumably weight the scales in favour of the SED. The CDU and Liberal Democrats (LDP) thus get the worst of both worlds since they appear to have little influence over important decisions taken and are expected to share the blame for anything that goes wrong. Another interesting point is that in fact the SED has not a clear majority in the Diet, and Buchwitz thus confirms the view that the ostensibly non-party representatives of the "Peasants' Mutual Aid Association" and "Cultural League" are counted as members of the SED.

As in 1946 the Leipzig Trade Fair, held at the beginning of March, was the occasion of a rally organised by the SED in support of German unity. Leipzig radio claimed that Germans attended from all over the country, but in fact it appears to have been conducted largely by the Soviet zone leaders, Pieck and Grotewohl (SED), Jakob Kaiser (CDU) and Wilhelm Kuelz (LDP). The SPD was not represented. Grotewohl emphasized the need for helping German youth, urging that they must not be allowed to feel themselves inferior and thus be led into the arms of chauvinism. Germans must be educated to lose the spirit of blind obedience and narrow-mindedness—the latter failing could be overcome if the several States of Germany gave way to German unity. The SED now favours a referendum on the structure of Germany. From references in the Moscow press it seems likely that this course will be proposed during the Conference and that the Russians will also advocate adoption of the SED Draft Constitution for Germany which is already serving as a model for the State Constitutions in the Soviet zone. As regards the Trade Fair itself, The Times of the 10th March noted that the Soviet-owned industries were among the exhibitors. This shows that although they are producing exclusively for the benefit of the Soviet Union their goods will in some cases be available for German as well as foreign buyers.

General Robertson told a press conference in Berlin at the end of February that the efficiency of German administration had recently suffered a decline. In spite of that many people liked to say that all would be well if Military Government let the Germans run things themselves. German officials paid too much attention to party politics and were not "tough enough." Die Zeit, the right-wing British zone weekly, supported such views on the 20th February when a leading article attacked German Governments for their lack of sense of responsibility combined with a striving for bureaucratic tyranny. Die Zeit then said that German politicians were afflicted with a blind belief that their particular party alone was capable of saving Germany. Criticism directed against the Government was criticism of the party and must therefore be suppressed, while party discipline was so severe that members of the Administrations dared not take any step which might displease the party hierarchy. The article contains a good deal of truth, but unfortunately seems motivated by an equally dangerous attitude, and one likely to have wide support, particularly among the "disillusioned," namely a dislike of all democratic political parties which may tend to deepen the impression, cultivated by the Nazis, that they are corrupt and ridiculous.

A recent British investigation into the mood of the people gave ground for the belief that self-pity had reached the stage where any mitigation of German hardships would be received not with gratitude but as proof of British consciousness of guilt in maltreating the Germans. The report stressed that besides the "hard core of resistance" which might amount to 8 to 12 per cent. of the population of the British zone there were the considerably more numerous and quite as dangerous "Yes-men" of Nazism who were still authoritarian in outlook and prepared to follow any strong lead.

Members of the Saar Committee and of the leading political parties were received by M. Bidault in Paris on the 7th and 8th February in order to make "friendly contact" in anticipation of economic union between the two areas. An interesting feature of the meetings was the presence of the Saar Communist leaders who until then had made a lone stand against economic union. In the rest of the French zone steps have recently been taken to perpetuate French influence. The south-west German News Agency set up on the 5th March, 1947, is a German Company in law, but will have a majority participation of French news agencies. In the British and U.S. zones the press agencies will have no British or American participation. A German film distributing company is also planned for the French zone in which French interests will hold a majority of the shares.

AUSTRIA

The United States Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, before leaving for Moscow, said he hoped that the provisions of the Austrian Treaty might be completed at the Moscow Conference.

Two further Memoranda were handed in to the Deputies before the conclusion of the London talks. One, from the Yugoslav Government, was framed as a reply to the Statement and Memorandum of the Austrian Delegation; it sought to establish Austria's responsibility for her part in the war and for aggression in Yugoslavia, and to minimise the extent of the "Austrian" resistance movement as compared with that of the Carinthian Slovenes, and thus to support the Yugoslav territorial claims. The other Memorandum gave certain of the Canadian Government's general views on the Austrian Treaty. It recommended that, on the entry into force of the proposed Treaty, the authority exercised by the Allied Control Council for Austria should be transferred to the Austrian Government and the Allied occupation forces should be withdrawn at the earliest possible date. In the view of the Canadian Government the Treaty should provide for a specific prohibition of any future Anschluss with Germany and should also contain a clause about the Austrian Government abstaining in the future from any action likely to impair Austria's independent status. They suggest that any threat to Austrian independence should be dealt with by the United Nations.

A Reuter report of the British draft of the (unagreed) Article in the draft Treaty concerning compensation for United Nations property in Austria has caused considerable apprehension in that country and has been compared unfavourably with the United States attitude. The Austrian Minister for the Safeguarding of Property and Economic Planning has estimated that a sum of between one and a half and two milliard schillings would be involved. This would be beyond Austria's capacity to pay. Ernst Fischer, speaking for the Communists, has used the occasion to urge more friendly relations with the U.S.S.R. and to assess, as the sole result of the "one-sided policy of Western orientation," mistrust of Austria by the U.S.S.R. and her neighbours, on the one hand, and "milliard-demands" by the West, on the other. The Chancellor has sought to allay apprehensions by holding out prospects of a satisfactory compromise solution.

The Austrian Minister of Agriculture has given details of the "emergency contribution" recently announced by Chancellor Figl to maintain the 1,550 calory ration for the next two months. Some 16,000 tons of grain must be collected, and, to meet the fats ration, 20,000 pigs are to be slaughtered. This measure will also release food for human consumption which would have been used as fodder. When a British official recently pointed out to the Minister that Austria's pig population had been allowed to increase by nearly 50 per cent. in the past year in defiance of the Emergency Economic Committee for Europe agreement signed by Austria in 1946, the Minister remarked simply that it was the will of the Lord. Ultimately it is of course the British and U.S. taxpayer who pay because the Austrian Government allows grain and potatoes to be fed to pigs instead of to the semi-starving population of the towns. The policy of the Peasants' League in this respect has been condemned by the Socialist Arbeiterzeitung, which has called for a re-orientation of Austria's agrarian policy.

The trial for high treason of Guido Schmidt, Austrian Foreign Minister at the time of the Anschluss, opened in Vienna on the 26th February. Articles in the Socialist and Communist press have portrayed the trial as evidence of the guilt of Herr Schuschnigg's régime.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

During the past few days public attention throughout the Republic has been focussed principally upon foreign affairs—more particularly in respect of Czechoslovak relations with those countries which repeatedly have fallen prey to German expansionist designs. The fear is prevalent in Czechoslovakia, as elsewhere upon the Continent, that Germany will again emerge as a powerful nation, intent upon revenge. The uncertain international situation and the clash of Eastern and Western ideological conceptions has added to, rather than detracted from, this growing apprehension. In this conflict the Czechs see a golden opportunity for a German revival. Hence they are determined that no loophole shall be left through which German nationalism can again escape to wreak fresh havoc.

Since the end of hostilities the Russian bloc has been impelled—partly as a consequence of its suspicious reaction to "Western" policy where Germany is concerned, partly from its conviction, justified or not, that the Slav nations have always suffered the most when Germany has embarked upon a war of conquest—to fall back upon its own exclusive system of alliances. In this defensive pattern there was, however, one serious deficiency: the absence of any such agreement between Poland and Czechoslovakia. The traditional friendship between the Republic and Yugoslavia, based upon similar experiences under the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, and the realisation that the Soviet Union is Czechoslovakia's natural defender against German aggression eliminated any obstacles to a Czech-Yugoslav or a Czech-Soviet agreement. Relations with Poland, on the contrary, were not on such a happy plane. Different historical backgrounds, frontier disputes, and the narrow chauvinism of the Polish Communists made it difficult for any satisfactory compromise to be effected. Nevertheless the Soviet policy of presenting the Moscow Conference with a united Slav front has now led to the signature of a Twenty-Year Pact of Friendship and Mutual Assistance against any aggression on the part of Germany or other satellite country. (See under "Poland".) It is to be hoped that a new era has thus dawned in Czechoslovak-Polish relations; but the agreement to leave in abeyance the Czechoslovak claims to parts of Polish-occupied Silesia, and the Polish claim to Czech Teschen, is extremely unpopular with all the non-Communist parties.

Czechoslovakia, in view of her Western gravitation, is not prepared to seek security from the East alone. Indeed, she has tried to avoid, at least in the case of the Yugoslav Pact, anything but very limited commitments with the Slav bloc. Cultural, historical, and economic reasons still incline the Republic to keep a door open for Western influences, even to the extent of seeking military co-operation. Prospects of a Franco-Czech military alliance have again been revived, whilst M. Spaak—during his visit to Prague a cultural agreement was signed last week between Czechoslovakia and Belgium—expressed the hope that a Czech-Belgian Alliance would be concluded as a stepping-stone to a future Soviet-Belgian Agreement. Incidentally a Cultural Agreement is being prepared for signature between the United Kingdom and Czechoslovakia.

The first transports of some 400 Slovaks, descendants of those who emigrated to the Bukovina about 150 years ago, have returned to the Republic. So far about 70 factories have been transferred to Slovakia under the plan to industrialise that province.

(See also under "Hungary".)

POLAND

As a result of the conversations held at Moscow between the Polish delegation and various Russian leaders (see Summary No. 383), an agreement was reached on a number of political and economic questions, chiefly the latter. On the political side, the governments of Poland and Russia are described as being at one in their views on the German problem. They have also agreed to accelerate the repatriation to Poland of Polish nationals now in the U.S.S.R. as a result of the War, including former German citizens. The following are the economic clauses:—

(a) A loan to Poland of 27,875,000 dollars in gold.

(b) The settlement of mutual financial obligations as at the 1st January, 1947, and the establishment of a basis for the regulation of future financial claims.

(c) The reduction by half of deliveries of Polish coal to the U.S.S.R., according to the agreement of the 16th August, 1945.

(d) Compensation for damage caused by German occupation.

(e) Transfer to Poland of railway rolling stock from Soviet war booty. The railway line Katowice–Krakow–Przemysl is to be changed to the Central European gauge, before the 1st November, 1947.

(f) Scientific and technical collaboration in the field of industrial production.

(g) The supply to Poland by the U.S.S.R. of arms and war equipment on a credit basis.

(h) The transfer to Poland of that part of the German merchant fleet which is due to it before the 15th May, 1947.

A twenty-year treaty of friendship and mutual assistance between Poland and Czechoslovakia was signed at Warsaw on the 10th March. The treaty, which resembles that signed a year ago between Poland and Yugoslavia, is designed to render impossible aggression on the part of Germany or any other country. The two countries promise the widest cooperation in the cause of international peace and security and bind themselves to give immediate military aid, should one of them be involved in a struggle with Germany or any ally of Germany. The protocol attached to the treaty states that all territorial questions are left in abeyance, and that solutions will be found within two years. The problems of the Polish minority in Teschen and the Czechs in Poland are to be settled on a basis of reciprocity, the fullest rights being accorded to each.

The treaty marks a very important and welcome change in Polish-Czech relations. For some time after the war they remained difficult, partly owing to the old problem of the Teschen district, and partly to the new conflict of claims to Silesian territory taken from Germany. There was also the Polish feeling that Poland, as a nation, had suffered more than Czechoslovakia at the hands of Germany, and that this gave all the less justification to Czech territorial claims. A settlement seemed unlikely because of the obstinacy of the communists in the two countries, especially in Poland. Gradually, however, it was realized that danger from Germany was the fundamental reason for unity, in relation to which questions of territorial extension and national pride assumed a very small importance. Economic and cultural pacts were made, and a general atmosphere of reconciliation was introduced, chiefly owing to the activities of M. Fierlinger, head of the Czech Social Democratic Party, and M. Wierblowski, Polish Ambassador to Prague. To such a sequence the present treaty is a logical conclusion, the Czechs having made a great contribution to the cause of unity by their willingness not to insist on their claims to those areas of Silesia, notably Kladzko (Glatz) and

In this defensive pattern there was, however, one serious deficiency: the absence of any such agreement between Poland and Czechoslovakia. The traditional friendship between the Republic and Yugoslavia, based upon similar experiences under the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, and the realisation that the Soviet Union is Czechoslovakia's natural defender against German aggression eliminated any obstacles to a Czech-Yugoslav or a Czech-Soviet agreement. Relations with Poland, on the contrary, were not on such a happy plane. Different historical backgrounds, frontier disputes, and the narrow chauvinism of the Polish Communists made it difficult for any satisfactory compromise to be effected. Nevertheless the Soviet policy of presenting the Moscow Conference with a united Slav front has now led to the signature of a Twenty-Year Pact of Friendship and Mutual Assistance against any aggression on the part of Germany or other satellite country. (See under "Poland".) It is to be hoped that a new era has thus dawned in Czechoslovak-Polish relations; but the agreement to leave in abeyance the Czechoslovak claims to parts of Polish-occupied Silesia, and the Polish claim to Czech Teschen, is extremely unpopular with all the non-Communist parties.

Czechoslovakia, in view of her Western gravitation, is not prepared to seek security from the East alone. Indeed, she has tried to avoid, at least in the case of the Yugoslav Pact, anything but very limited commitments with the Slav bloc. Cultural, historical, and economic reasons still incline the Republic to keep a door open for Western influences, even to the extent of seeking military co-operation. Prospects of a Franco-Czech military alliance have again been revived, whilst M. Spaak—during his visit to Prague a cultural agreement was signed last week between Czechoslovakia and Belgium—expressed the hope that a Czech-Belgian Alliance would be concluded as a stepping-stone to a future Soviet-Belgian Agreement. Incidentally a Cultural Agreement is being prepared for signature between the United Kingdom and Czechoslovakia.

The first transports of some 400 Slovaks, descendants of those who emigrated to the Bukovina about 150 years ago, have returned to the Republic. So far about 70 factories have been transferred to Slovakia under the plan to industrialise that province.

POLAND

As a result of the conversations held at Moscow between the Polish delegation and various Russian leaders (see Summary No. 383), an agreement was reached on a number of political and economic questions, chiefly the latter. On the political side, the governments of Poland and Russia are described as being at one in their views on the German problem. They have also agreed to accelerate the repatriation to Poland of Polish nationals now in the U.S.S.R. as a result of the War, including former German citizens. The following are the economic clauses:—

(a) A loan to Poland of 27,875,000 dollars in gold.
(b) The settlement of mutual financial obligations as at the 1st January, 1947, and the establishment of a basis for the regulation of future financial claims.
(c) The reduction by half of deliveries of Polish coal to the U.S.S.R., according to the agreement of the 16th August, 1945.
(d) Compensation for damage caused by German occupation.
(e) Transfer to Poland of railway rolling stock from Soviet war booty. The railway line Katowice–Krakow–Przemysl is to be changed to the Central European gauge, before the 1st November, 1947.
(f) Scientific and technical collaboration in the field of industrial production.
(g) The supply to Poland by the U.S.S.R. of arms and war equipment on a credit basis.
(h) The transfer to Poland of that part of the German merchant fleet which is due to it before the 15th May, 1947.

A twenty-year treaty of friendship and mutual assistance between Poland and Czechoslovakia was signed at Warsaw on the 10th March. The treaty, which resembles that signed a year ago between Poland and Yugoslavia, is designed to render impossible aggression on the part of Germany or any other country. The two countries promise the widest cooperation in the cause of international peace and security and bind themselves to give immediate military aid, should one of them be involved in a struggle with Germany or any ally of Germany. The protocol attached to the treaty states that all territorial questions are left in abeyance, and that solutions will be found within two years. The problems of the Polish minority in Teschen and the Czechs in Poland are to be settled on a basis of reciprocity, the fullest rights being accorded to each.

The treaty marks a very important and welcome change in Polish-Czech relations. For some time after the war they remained difficult, partly owing to the old problem of the Teschen district, and partly to the new conflict of claims to Silesian territory taken from Germany. There was also the Polish feeling that Poland, as a nation, had suffered more than Czechoslovakia at the hands of Germany, and that this gave all the less justification to Czech territorial claims. A settlement seemed unlikely because of the obstinacy of the communists in the two countries, especially in Poland. Gradually, however, it was realized that danger from Germany was the fundamental reason for unity, in relation to which questions of territorial extension and national pride assumed a very small importance. Economic and cultural pacts were made, and a general atmosphere of reconciliation was introduced, chiefly owing to the activities of M. Fierlinger, head of the Czech Social Democratic Party, and M. Wierblowski, Polish Ambassador to Prague. To such a sequence the present treaty is a logical conclusion, the Czechs having made a great contribution to the cause of unity by their willingness not to insist on their claims to those areas of Silesia, notably Kladzko (Glatz) and Ratibor, which were part of the old Bohemian kingdom. It is, of course, not surprising that two countries in the Soviet Zone of influence should have made this treaty, the conclusion of which publicly removes a serious point of friction from the organisation of inter-Slav solidarity. (See also under "Czechoslovakia.")

On the 4th March the House of Commons was informed by the Home Secretary of the measures to be applied to those Poles in the United Kingdom, as well as in other areas under British administration, who had reached no decision as to their future (see Summary No. 381). They are to come under the command of a person of British nationality, appointed by the Secretary of State, and experienced in British military law. He will be known as the Administrator. The law to be applied will be Polish law as it was on the 1st January, 1945, which will be administered by Polish military courts presided over by Polish officers. These officers will be responsible to the Administrator, who will be free to delegate to them as much or as little of his authority as he pleases, either generally or for any specific purpose. The courts-martial administering this law will not have the power to inflict the death-penalty, and no sentence of imprisonment longer than three months will be valid unless confirmed by the Administrator, who may have it reviewed if he thinks it inconsistent with British standards. This power of review extends to sentences passed before the act.

SOVIET UNION

After the hopes raised by M. Molotov's apparent concessions in regard to the control of atomic energy, M. Gromyko's statement at the Security Council last week (see under "United Nations") was a rude setback. M. Gromyko made it all too clear that in the Russian view the rule of Five Power unanimity must be applied in the case of sanctions against a violator of the atomic energy Convention. For the rest, his peroration on the "veto," attributing it, in the first place, to the initiative of the United States—and in particular to the late President Roosevelt—was most dishonest and to a large extent historically untrue.

On the eve of the Moscow Conference, there was hardly a part of the world where the press did not denounce the evil influence of British and American capital. Moreover, the daily reports of the Congress of the Empire Communist Party meeting in London effectively reinforced the Soviet press in attacking British imperialism throughout the Commonwealth. To the now familiar accusations against both Anglo-Saxon Powers for their activities in Germany was added a new charge against their financial policy, while the discovery of the Nazi conspiracy in Germany provided a golden opportunity for playing up the alleged Anglo-American failure to denazify their zones.

The Delegation of the Supreme Soviet which is due to arrive in this country on the 13th March contains representatives of most of the 16 Soviet republics of the Union Republics, with the exception of the Turkmen, Estonian and Tadzhik, and reflects a broad variety of interests. Apart from the leader of the Delegation, V. S. Kuznetsov, who has visited this country several times before on trade union business in his capacity of Chairman of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, the political element in the Delegation is not predominant. Among the better known Delegates are the novelist, Alexander Alexandrovich Fadeev (a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party), appointed General Secretary of the Soviet Writers' Union during the purge last year, the famous Arctic aviator, M. M. Gromov, the Presidents of the Georgian and Kazakh Academies of Sciences (N. I. Muskhelishvili and K. I. Satpaev) the Presidents of the Unions of Soviet Writers of the Uzbek S.S.R. and of the Azerbaidzhani S.S.R., (Musa Aibek Tashmukhamedov and S. V. Vekilov), and N. A. Lunin, whose exploits in achieving rationalisation records in engine-running have made him famous in the Soviet Union.

The well-known commentator Zhukov writing in Pravda (5th March) under the headline "On the military alliance between the U.S.A. and Canada," again emphasised that Canada has fallen into the United States' sphere of military influence. After pointing out that the alliance is called an agreement in order to avoid Parliamentary formalities, publicity and revelation of secret clauses, Zhukov shows how Canada's "Northern Programme" is designed not for scientific or defence purposes but to provide a jumping-off base for United States aggression. Canadian Progressives' opposition to these plans (Messrs. Nollet, Archibald and Caldwell are mentioned with approval) is alleged to be based on distrust of United States imperialism and on the idea that the agreement implies a limitation of Canadian independence, since the United States of America are now likely to control Canada in much the same way that Great Britain formerly did.

Attacks on the Western bloc have been supplemented by a diatribe in Trud against the plans for a so-called Northern bloc. The conception of a military political bloc of the Northern countries which would fit in to the pattern of Churchill's United Europe was said to be supported by reactionary circles in Norway and Sweden who had taken up an extreme anti-Soviet line during the inter-war period. The military features of the plan were said to be transforming the whole of the North and the adjoining Arctic regions into an aerodrome for use in Anglo-Saxon strategic plans.

The Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. has appointed the Chief of the General Staff of the Armed Forces of the U.S.S.R., Marshal A. M. Vasilevski, to be First Deputy Minister for the Armed Forces of the U.S.S.R. The Minister is General N. A. Bulganin, who has now been appointed a deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R.

Moscow wireless has broadcast without comment the statement by the Tokyo "Reception Committee" for the visit to Japan of the delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions that the U.S. War Department has refused permission for the Delegation's visit: "In conditions of unimaginable inflation we are waging a courageous battle against Fascism and are doing everything for the democratisation of Japan. Our burning desire is to show the delegates of the whole world that we are fighting for universal peace and freedom." The tenor of this message conforms exactly to the pattern already familiar from the utterances of Soviet-inspired bodies in other parts of the world and suggests that this reception committee is already working under the auspices of the U.S.S.R.

According to a statement issued by the Soviet Department for Repatriation Affairs, the Government of the U.S.S.R. adopted a decision in October, 1946, to begin the repatriation of Japanese prisoners-of-war and civilians of Japanese nationality from the territory of the U.S.S.R. to Japan. Repatriation of civilians was to be on a voluntary basis. The conduct of repatriation was entrusted to the Plenipotentiary of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. for Repatriation Affairs, Col. General F. I. Golikov. An agreement on the repatriation of Japanese was also concluded with the headquarters of the U.S. Occupation Forces in Japan, by which a monthly quota of repatriates was arranged by mutual consent in accordance with transport and technical possibilities for repatriation. As a result, it is alleged that by the 15th February, 1947, more than 145,000 Japanese had been sent to Japan from the U.S.S.R. and the territories controlled by it.

The reports which have appeared in the American press alleging that the Soviet Union was recruiting 500,000 inhabitants of Northern Korea for the Soviet Army have been denied by Tass as being without foundation and ridicuous fabrications.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

M. Jonkman, Minister of Overseas Territories, replying to last week's debate in the First Chamber on Indonesia (5th March), opened his speech by saying that, whatever Soekarno had done during the Japanese occupation, the nationalist movement regarded him as their "champion." Certain remarks made by the Opposition during the debate had merely served to "undermine the efforts to reach agreement." The issue of the publication of the secret minutes had again been raised by several members, continued M. Jonkman, but there was no question of their being published, for the simple reason that they had never been intended for publication. He admitted the Government's great concern about events in Madoera; but their hands were tied, since occupation of the island for the purpose of relieving the "distress" would "constitute a violation of the Truce." Besides, supplies of rice and textiles [both urgently needed] were short. The only way round the difficulty was through "co-operation" with the Republic. M. Jonkman then gave assurances that there "need be no fear of further concessions"; there would be no departure from the provisions of the Draft Agreement. He added that the Government would keep the Chamber fully informed about the Commission-General's work. Proof of the Government's wish for "peaceful consultations" was afforded by the fact that the army, "although strong enough," had not been used to solve the problem of internees, of whom there were still 23,500, including 6,000 in former Japanese camps. M. Jonkman thought that it might be possible to complete the evacuation of these persons in two-and-a-half months; but there were shipping difficulties. With regard to the "Conference of the Realm," this would have to be preceded by a round-table conference, at which the West Indies also would be represented. In conclusion, M. Jonkman said that there were times when the Government wondered " whether it would not have been better " to have instructed the Commission-General to sign the Agreement " straight away " rather than " merely " to initial it. He accepted Mr. Sjarir's recent statement at Malang that the signature of the Agreement was " merely a phase "; it was " the first step on the road towards a new political structure."

The vacancy in the Dutch Cabinet caused by the resignation, last November, of Dr. Ir. J. A. Ringers, Minister of Public Works and Reconstruction (whose portfolio had been held ad interim by M. Vos), has been filled by M. L. Neher, a member of the Party of Labour (1st March). (This increases the Party of Labour representation in the Cabinet from four to five, Dr. Ringers having been a non-party man). The new Minister, who began his career as an engineer in the Amsterdam Telephone Service, ultimately became Director-General of the Netherlands P.T.T. Service. The name of M. Neher's Ministry has been altered from Public Works and Reconstruction to Reconstruction and Housing.

Belgium

Mr. Huysmans' Cabinet resigned on the 12th March. The decision to resign was taken immediately after a long discussion at a Cabinet meeting the previous evening when, as a result of the Government's decision to abolish the subsidy to coal mines and to authorise an increase in the price of coal, the four Communist Ministers in the Cabinet themselves resigned. M. Spaak, the Foreign Minister, has been invited to form a Cabinet, and is to begin his task on the 13th.

Luxembourg

A new Luxembourg Cabinet, with M. Dupong again as Prime Minister, was formed on the 2nd March. Events leading up to the change are not very clear; but it appears that for some time past there have been considerable differences of opinion between M. Dupong and his Socialist Minister of Justice M. Bodson. Whatever the origin of these disputes, they seem to have been brought to a head by the failure to agree early last month on the question of increasing railwaymen's wages. By this time the breaches in the Cabinet had become unmanageable; and M. Dupong was left with no alternative but to resign (12th February). After consultations with the Grand Duchess (18th February), M. Dupong was once more entrusted with the task of forming a Cabinet, which he began next day. The ensuing negotiations were somewhat protracted; and it was not until the evening of the 2nd March that he was able to announce his success. The immediate result of the crisis is the disappearance of the National Union, which had been formed soon after the liberation and which had made a coalition Cabinet possible, and the driving into opposition of the Socialists and Communists. With four Ministers (including himself), the representation of M. Dupong's own party —the Christian Social Party—in his new Cabinet is unchanged. The rest of the Cabinet now consists of members of the Groupement Patriotique et Démocratique, a " centre " Resistance party, previously represented by one Minister. The list of Ministers (one less than in the old Cabinet) is as follows :—

M. P. Dupong (C.S.P.) : Prime Minister and Minister of. Finance and Labour.
M. J. Bech (C.S.P.) : Minister of Foreign Affairs and Viticulture.
M. N. Margue (C.S.P.) : Minister of Agriculture and Education.
M. L. Schaus (C.S.P.) : Minister of Food and Defence.
M. E. Schaus (G.P.D.) : Minister of the Interior, Justice and Physical Education.
M. A. Osch (G.P.D.) : Minister of Health, Repatriation and War Damage.
M. R. Schaffner (G.P.D.) : Minister of Reconstruction, Public Works, Transport and Electric Power.

Only MM. Bech and Margue retain their portfolios unchanged. M. Dupong exchanges the portfolio of Defence (which he had previously held concurrently with the Premiership and the portfolio of Finance) for that of Labour, formerly in Socialist hands. There has been a fairly extensive re-distribution of portfolios among the other Ministers; and the Ministry of Commerce and Economic Affairs has disappeared. The newcomers to the Cabinet are MM. Osch and Schaffner, of whom M. Osch (previously described as " non-party ") had been Secretary of State for War Damage.

FRANCE

France is still in the humiliating position of having no newspapers in her capital to present news and comment on vital international and domestic affairs such as the Anglo-French Alliance, the Moscow Conference, or the Government's economic policy. It is now four weeks since the Paris papers ceased to appear and the fact that the printers' men can afford to stay out for so long is an eloquent testimony of the fact that they are among the best paid of all French workers. The newspaper proprietors would no doubt have given in long ago to the demand of the machine-minders for a 25 per cent. wage increase, in spite of the financial burden incurred, had it not been for the Government's refusal to allow any wage increases except for the lowest-paid workers. Apart from this ruling, however, the Government refused to intervene in the dispute. M. Ramadier declared in the Assembly on the 7th March that the Government could only interfere with the right to strike when a public service was involved (sanctions are in fact being taken against the instigators of the civil servants' strike last month); the press was not a public service and any attempt to treat it as such would be an infringement of its liberties. Agreement between the newspaper proprietors and the printers' men seemed to have been reached at the end of last week through a compromise arrangement allowing increased wages in return for the working of a seven-day week, a solution acceptable to the Government; but at the last moment the machine-minders stood out for their full demands.

Meanwhile the Assembly has passed the Government's bill for the suppression of the system of permits authorising newspapers to appear, and the Minister of Information is soon to table another bill relieving his Ministry of the responsibility of allocating newsprint. These measures are a concession to the Radical members of the Government who are being pressed by their party to stand up for the freedom of the press and a gradual return to economic liberty.

Although no Paris papers are appearing, a summary of the editorials which they would have contained if they had appeared is broadcast daily on Radio Paris. The main topic of the last week has been the Anglo-French Alliance, which has been warmly approved. Some of the Right-Wing papers and also the Communist fellow-travellers emphasised that the Treaty must be judged by its fruits, but most papers approved it as having real as well as symbolic value. The M.R.P. paper, L'Aube, said that it would facilitate the settlement of existing difficulties, and the Socialist Le Populaire particularly welcomed its economic aspects. The Radical Aurore went so far as to say that it represented a great change from the policy of 1919 and showed that Britain had understood the impracticability of a policy of splendid isolation. L'Humanité, however, observed that the Treaty left unsettled the main problems of reparations and coal.

M. Champetier de Ribes, President of the Council of the Republic, died in Paris on the 6th March. He was a leading member of the M.R.P., having been one of the founders of its predecessor, the Parti Démocrate Populaire. He held Cabinet Office on several occasions before the war and in 1940, and played a distinguished part in the resistance movement during the occupation. A year ago he was appointed French delegate to the International War Crimes Commission at Nuremberg. H.M. Government have sent a message of condolence to M. Ramadier.

Fernand de Brinon, Vichy Ambassador to the Germans in Paris during the occupation, was sentenced to death by the High Court of Justice on the 6th March on the charge of conspiring with the enemy.

M. Emile Bollaert is to leave for Indo-China this week with Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu to take over the post of High Commissioner. M. Bollaert has held responsible administrative posts and, after his dismissal from the prefecture of the Rhône by the Vichy Government, represented General de Gaulle in the Conseil National de la Résistance until he was arrested and deported to Germany. Politically his sympathies appear to be closely allied with those of M. Herriot. He now represents the Radicals in the Council of the Republic. The appointment was announced after a Cabinet meeting at which the Minister for Overseas Territories said that no fresh reinforcements would be sent to Indo-China. There is, however, as yet no indication that the Government will now set about negotiating with the Viet Nam Government. On the contrary, M. Ramadier told press representatives on 6th March that the status of Cambodia, of Cochinchina and of Laos in the French Union would be considered, in that order, before the Government turned its attention to Annam and Tongking. It would seem, moreover, from the recognition in a Cabinet communiqué of Admiral d'Argenlieu's services, and the award to him of the Médaille Militaire " in recognition of the gratitude of the nation," that the Government are anxious not to appear to censure his conduct of policy.

ITALY

The question of the future of the ex-Italian colonies is giving rise to much discussion. The postponement of a decision by the Council of Foreign Ministers has aroused considerable hope in Italy that she may be granted the trusteeship of at least Tripolitania and Eritrea on the ground that they were Italian possessions before the advent of Fascism, and that the conquest by Italy of these territories was approved of by the great European Powers of the time. It is still felt that Italy has a right to administer these territories, and there is a general belief that Italian administration was popular among the natives concerned. Little has been done either by the Allies or by the Italian Government to prepare the public for the eventual loss of the colonies, and any decision which makes no provision for Italian participation in their administration would be likely to provoke great discontent and even stronger anti-allied feeling than exists already. Of the maladministration and atrocities on the part of the Fascist administrators—and possibly of others—the general public seems to have no idea. The old erroneous assertions regarding the colonies as an important outlet for emigration and as a source of wealth are being voiced once more.

Signor de Gasperi, in reply to a message from the Associations of Italian Refugees from Africa, has assured the Italian populations in Libya, Eritrea and Somaliland of the Government's concern for them and stated "The return of Italian labour to Africa, which we confidently expect from justice and in the general interest when the year is over, will mean that democratic Italy will have one objective in sight: in the most up-to-date forms of economic and political progress, to lead these countries to self-government and to independence, in the spirit of the San Francisco Charter." Don Sturzo, the veteran leader of the Partito Popolare (the predecessors of the Christian Democrats) voiced the popular feeling and that of Government circles when he maintained that Italy cannot be absent from the inquiry to be conducted by the Commissions of Investigation, meaning that the views of the Italians residing in the colonies should be taken into account. The leading protagonist for Italy's rights in Africa is Signor Cantalupo, former Fascist Under-Secretary for the Colonies (1924–26) and later ambassador in Egypt and Spain. His articles are decidedly anti-British, the more violent appearing under the nom-de-plume of "Africanus."

The Italian press continues to print reports that the United States Government are willing that there should be Italian participation in the future government of the ex-colonies. Signor Tarchiani, the Italian Ambassador in Washington, is said to have received an assurance from General Marshall that his Government would lend their support to the French plan put forward at the Council of Foreign Ministers in May 1946 for the return of the colonies to Italy, and M. Molotov's suggestion for Italian trusteeship. It is also reported that the United States Government would favour Italy being represented by experts to be attached to the Four Power Committee of Investigation. There has, as yet, been no official confirmation of these reports.

There are indications, however, that the French official attitude on the subject has undergone modifications. According to an official French source, the Quai d'Orsay would now be unlikely to propose Italy being granted a Trusteeship over Tripolitania, because it fears possible Arab repercussions. It seems probable that the French would now only support such a proposal if it came from one of the other three Powers.

At the moment there exists in Tripolitania a broad measure of toleration between Arab and Italian, at least in the case of the Italian and Arab agricultural population and from the economic angle the expulsion of the Italian agriculturalists would involve a drastic decline in the country's prosperity. The Italian town dwellers were for the most part bound up with the Italian administration and are disliked accordingly.

The Italian Economic Mission invited by the British Treasury arrived in England on the 7th March. The leader of the Mission is Signor Menichella, director of the Bank of Italy.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

His Majesty's Government and the Government of the U.S.A. have protested against the unilateral action taken by the Soviet Occupying Forces in the arrest of M. Béla Kovács. The British Note, which has not yet been published in the Hungarian press, is similar to that issued by the U.S. State Department. Hungarian newspapers were permitted to print the latter only after the Soviet reply had been received. The U.S. Note describes the arrest as "unjustified Russian interference in Hungarian internal affairs" and an attempt to support minority elements against a freely elected democratic Government. It further proposes that a tripartite enquiry into the situation should be instituted.

The Soviet Government deny the charge of interference, maintaining that the Army of Occupation was acting merely in self-defence in arresting M. Kovács for espionage. They claim that the enemies of the democratic system were not the minority elements but the conspirators who had plotted to overthrow the Government, and in evidence point out that the Smallholders themselves admit the existence of a conspiracy. They reject the request for a tripartite investigation on the ground that this would constitute a flagrant violation of the rights of the Hungarian People's Court, which already has the matter in hand. In a conversation with M. Gyöngyössi General Sviridov also alleged that evidence pointed to a connection between the conspirators and an unnamed foreign Power for whom they had been attempting to find out details concerning the numbers, disposition and morale of the Soviet troops in Hungary. M. Gyöngyösi countered with the remark that such information, if wanted at all, did not require deep digging.

Recent reports from Budapest state that the Communists, emboldened by the Soviet answer, are pressing their demands more vigorously. These include a drastic purge which extends to forty members of the Smallholders' Party. They have also intensified their campaign for the resignation of General Sartha, Minister of Defence, M. Rácz, Minister of Finance, and M. Bárányos, Minister of Agriculture, all of whom are Smallholders. Whatever the outcome M. Nagy appears resolved to delay the elections until the departure of the Soviet Occupation Troops.

Damaging admissions involving not only himself but also M. Kovács, General Veress de Dalnok and others, have been made by General Szentmiklóssy during his trial. His Counsel has expressed doubts of his sanity and obtained consent for his examination by an alienist. The demeanour of the accused, however, does not suggest third degree treatment.

The hopes aroused by the seeming success of the first stage in the resumed Hungarian-Czechoslovak talks have been disappointed. The breakdown occurred over the question of compensation for damage caused to Hungarians in Slovakia which the Czechoslovak Delegation refused to consider. Since Hungary cannot accept the point of view that the dispossession of Hungarians called up for labour service is a purely internal Czechoslovak question no way out of the impasse by means of direct negotiation appears possible. M. Clementis has disclaimed responsibility for any results which may develop from the present "catastrophic" situation.

Roumania

As noted in last week's Summary the question of return by Roumania of "tainted" gold is complicated by the famine in Moldavia, and the negotiations for the supply of cereals from the U.S.A. against deposits of gold. The Americans propose to make the return of the looted gold a condition of the loan for purchase of cereals, and they also demand the deposit of gold in Switzerland as security for the repayment of the loan—the expression of quantities and values in a number of different ways does not make for clarity. Pounds sterling, dollars, tons, kilograms, and car-loads are all used in connexion with these transactions, and a comparison of the various figures quoted becomes extremely difficult—especially in view of the difference between metric and English tons. At the present stage of the negotiations it is believed that the Roumanians are prepared to settle, if a payment of 20,000,000 dollars can be accepted. Their original offer was for 7,500,000 dollars.

The United States administration are sending 7,000 tons of food for free distribution in Moldavia: allocations of this gift are to be supervised by the Red Cross to ensure against discrimination. Great Britain is also sending 500 tons. The New York News, referring to what has happened elsewhere, congratulates Roumania on having promised not "to follow the example of Tito in Yugoslavia and of the Communist régime in Poland, of feeding relief supplies to deserving Communists and letting non-Communists go hungry," and emphasises the American idea that the hungry should be fed and clothed "without asking how they vote." România Libera, referring to similar gifts received from Bulgaria, compares the unselfishness of the Bulgarian people with others "who accompanied their gifts with specific conditions." The fact is that in the Balkan countries no opportunity is ever missed of turning everything to political account. Dl Maniu has refused to join in a joint appeal to the Western Powers for help, because he felt that he could neither ensure fair distribution of supplies nor guarantee that they would not find their way to Russia.

The Home Chronicle broadcast by the Bucharest Radio reports that "as a result of the Moscow Agreements," food prices have fallen by 50 per cent. Moreover, owing to the nationalisation of the Bank, there is now a shortage of purchasing power, and credits are being directed towards productive uses, instead of financing profiteering middle-men. This is recorded for what it is worth but it reads like a miraculously rapid result, as to the probability of which experts will be able to judge.

Yugoslavia

Just over four months ago Marshal Tito spoke in a reassuring manner on the food situation. In spite of the bad harvest caused by the drought there was no need to worry, he said; Yugoslavia had enough to live on, everything had been done to keep all regions supplied and nobody would die of hunger. It is now doubtful whether this optimism was justified. Bread rations were reduced at the beginning of February, but the normal consumer in Belgrade was even then not getting the full 300 grammes due to him. A further reduction came into effect on the 7th March. In the passive regions—Dalmatia, Bosnia-Hercegoveina and Montenegro—a state of famine exists, and the head of UNRRA in Yugoslavia has cabled asking for the urgent despatch of two grain ships to Dubrovnik and Split. A warning has been issued to the public, through Borba, on the need for the strictest economy in the distribution and consumption of grain. Only by the most careful observance of rules and regulations would it be possible to come through "this most difficult period" until the next harvest.

A major factor contributing to the present shortage of supplies for the non-producing population has been the difficulty in compelling or coaxing the peasant in the productive areas to surrender his surplus crops. There have been a number of official and semi-official complaints of the inefficiency of local authorities in carrying out the grain-collecting scheme. It is in this sphere particularly that the Yugoslav Government find the gap between theory and practice hard to bridge.

Possibly for lack of clear directives from "higher authority" the Yugoslav Press have shown some uncertainty in their comments on the Anglo-French Treaty. Because the French Communists have accepted it, it must be all right, was the gist of one comment. But the fact that Mr. Churchill had expressed his satisfaction with the negotiations obviously meant that the Treaty must be of some benefit to "international reactionaries," and was likely to further their plans for a "Western bloc."

Since the conclusion of the Italian Treaty some of the more influential Yugoslav refugees in Italy, including those with bad consciences, have decided that life in South America holds brighter prospects. Nine suspected Ustaši were recently removed from the s.s. Philippa before she left Genoa on the 5th March. They include at least two of the men whom H.M.G. have agreed to hand over to the Yugoslav Government. It is believed that the departure of these people was arranged by an organisation of Croat clergy who enjoy extra-territorial rights in the Vatican city.

King Peter has been deprived of his nationality and his property has been confiscated, according to a decree of the Presidium of the National Assembly.

Greece

Bandit activity in Greece has continued, particularly in Thessaly. A gendarmerie convoy was attacked south of Dhomokos and bandit casualties are reported to have been heavy. Meanwhile considerable success is attending the Army's counter-operations in the north Vermion area, despite alarmist reports to the contrary which are being spread by the Communists.

The United Nations Commission have continued their hearings in Salonica of captured rebels who have been trained in Albania, Bulgaria or Yugoslavia. They have all produced evidence incriminating Greece's neighbours, and attempts made by the Slav representatives to discredit their testimony have failed. More visits have also been paid to Yugoslav refugees who have spoken of the training of Greek guerrillas in Yugoslavia. No decision has yet been reached on the detailed arrangements for the Commission's interview with Markos Vafiades. The Greek Government are opposed to his being examined on Greek territory, as any visit by the Commission to rebel-held territory will require negotiation with the bandit leaders and imply recognition of their status. There has also been considerable discussion on the Commission's future plans. If, as has been proposed, they complete their investigations in Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia by the end of March and then retire to Geneva to write their report, it may be many weeks after that before effective action can be taken on it by the Security Council. During that period there will be no obstacle to the despatch of help to the bandits from abroad in perhaps the most critical period of the spring and summer. It is, therefore, hoped that a small sub-committee may be left behind in Greece "to clear up outstanding investigations."

The Government have now realised that the bandits cannot be dealt with effectively by the Army so long as "fifth-column" organisations in the towns are free to help the bands with supplies and with information about troop movements. On the 4th March, therefore, the Athens police arrested 571 men who were known to have been aiding the bandits. The Greek Government and the press, with the sole exception of the Communist newspapers, have approved of the steps taken, which imply no change in the Government's declared "reconciliation" policy. Their offer of amnesty to rebels who surrender still holds good; but they are determined to punish the unrepentant.

All except the Communists (who are now shouting "No Americans must come to Greece" as often as "The British must go") have welcomed the prospect of American aid to Greece (see under "United States"). The fear is expressed, however, not only that the United States may impose such a strict control over the uses of any loan as to endanger Greece's independence, but also that Great Britain may disinterest herself in the future of Greece, especially after the troops leave. This fear has not been allayed by our announcement that, despite the conversations being held in Washington, there is no change in present arrangements for the impending reduction of the British forces in Greece nor in H.M.G.'s decision to withdraw the remainder as soon as practicable.

Albania

The propaganda campaign against the Greek Government and the "British invaders" of Greece, to which reference was made in last week's Summary, has been carried on uninterruptedly. A page from one more British secret document has been reproduced in facsimile, with a translation of sorts, in the semi-official newspaper Bashkimi. This time it is part of a report written by Colonel Alan Palmer, of the former British Military Mission, on a five days' visit to Greece which he made in April 1945. The passages quoted relate to Greek treatment of the Chams—the Albanian Moslem minority in Greek Epirus who collaborated with the Axis Powers and whom General Zervas's forces drove north into Albania towards the end of the War. The same passages have also been unblushingly quoted in a letter from the Albanian liaison representative to the Greek Frontier Commission, together with sentences from Brigadier Hodgson's covering report, and a message from A.F.H.Q. of the same month.

This Commission's activities are naturally being followed with interest. Tirana radio told its Russian-speaking listeners on the 5th March that their investigations had recently taken them to certain Ægean islands where, "apart from numerous deported democrats, there are a number of Albanian, Yugoslav and Bulgarian quislings and war criminals." They found that "the war criminals live in fairly comfortable houses and receive 1,300 drachmas a month from the Greek Government," whereas the democrats and anti-fascists are bullied and suffer privations. How long the democratic world will put up with a situation like this is a question which the broadcaster left to the Russians; but he asserted vehemently that the Albanians would defend Albania—whether against "the British invaders" or "the former collaborators of Germany." Distortion and malice could scarcely go further.

Bulgaria

On the 7th March the Bulgarian Government suddenly issued a decree withdrawing from circulation all existing banknotes and currency worth 200 leva [say, 3*s*. 6*d*.] and upwards and all 3 per cent. treasury bonds. They must be handed in at the latest by the 16th March. Depositors would be allowed 2,000 leva per head of their family in new notes, the rest going into a blocked account. Business enterprises would be allowed half their February pay-roll in cash. Withdrawals of further sums from blocked accounts would have to be justified to the authorities of the Bulgarian National Bank.

In a broadcast delivered a few hours after the announcement the Finance Minister explained to an anxious and bewildered public that the step was one which had been contemplated ever since the country's liberation in September 1944 and that it was expressly designed "to consolidate the currency, remove the threat of inflation, put the national finances in order and liquidate the black market." He felt confident that very soon all Bulgarian citizens would come to appreciate the wisdom of the measure: their true interests would remain unharmed.

Actually the whole population, including the peasants, have been holding on to currency as the only safe form of property, and they will not at all like having to justify regularly to the authorities every item of their expenditure. They will rightly judge that a further premium is being set on membership of the Communist party. Any independent enterprise that has up till now existed will, indeed, be still further crippled, and the remnant of the rentier class will be broken; but every non-Communist will feel the turn of the screw, whatever his social position.

However, this is not all. The same decree went on to state that "members of the Diplomatic Corps, Foreign Legations and Missions connected with the peace treaty and the armistice, Consulates and trade representatives in the country must exchange any of the banknotes and bonds above specified in their possession not later than 6 p.m. on the 7th March"—the very date of its promulgation!—"and foreign army units are required to do the same by 12 noon on the same date." Heads of foreign missions were informed that funds held by them would be exchanged at 100 per cent. for new notes, in so far as they could prove that they had been "acquired in conformity with the law on trade in foreign means of payment" (which would obviously involve presenting their accounts). Sums otherwise acquired would be accepted by the bank as "obligatory deposits."

Early in the day all foreign missions and the private dwellings of their staffs were surrounded by militiamen, who proceeded to interfere rudely with anyone entering or leaving. The French Minister was himself physically assaulted by them, although they knew who he was, and the First Secretary of the French Legation was later on dragged by them out of his car. Other disgraceful scenes occurred. After making an unavailing protest to the Foreign Under-Secretary, the Acting U.K. and U.S. Representatives called on the Governor of the National Bank, together with their colleagues, except those of the Slav bloc, who are known to have received quite other treatment—the Poles, for instance, being paid in full. The Governor had already refused to exchange currency held by the British Military Mission for new notes on the ground that he could not be sure where they had got it from, although his own books proved it to have come from the Bulgarian Government themselves. After a conference at the bank lasting from 4 p.m. till 1.15 a.m. the Governor finally agreed to exchange about one-third of the cash holdings of the French, Italian, United States and British missions, allowing each of their representatives to take away the balance in a sealed bag. More than this he refused to do.

Notes of protest to the Bulgarian Government have been sent on behalf of Great Britain, the United States, France, Italy, Switzerland, Sweden and the Vatican.

Turkey

Indications that concern for the situation in the Near East may impel the United States Government to afford Turkey more substantial support than hitherto, have not unnaturally created some sensation in Angora. The Soviet authorities seized the occasion for intensifying their propaganda in Turkey, and there were a number of mischievous suggestions in circulation. One was to the effect that Great Britain was asking the United States to take over her commitments in Greece and Turkey. Another rumour was that Great Britain had entered into an understanding with the U.S.S.R. regarding the Straits. Before leaving for Moscow Mr. Bevin assured the Turkish Ambassador that there was no truth in the rumour and that if any question affecting Turkey were raised at Moscow, he would inform the Turkish Government (see "United States" for President Truman's message to Congress).

On the 1st March the Prime Minister, M. Recep Peker, made a statement earnestly desiring friendship with Syria and deprecating Syrian agitation for the recovery of the Hatay. In their anxiety to prevent this from again becoming an active issue, the Turkish Government have made it plain to Syria that they are ready to make the most ample economic concessions there. They have also informed Persia, Iraq and Afghanistan that they are willing to consider making Iskenderon (Alexandretta) a free port for the benefit of the whole Middle East. Syria, however, seems to the Turkish Government to take no interest whatever in economic concessions, but to be bent on raising the territorial claim which the Turkish Government decline to discuss.

Egypt

There have been no developments during the week either in the internal political situation or in the question of reference of Egypt's case to the United Nations. The general attitude of the Government to this country is shewn in a letter from the Prime Minister to His Majesty's Ambassador notifying him of the Government's decision to dispense with the services of the British Military Liaison Mission, and enclosing lists of the names of those who are to leave on the 30th June and the 31st December next. A similar spirit is shewn in the cancellation of the Marconi Company's broadcasting agreement. The Minister of Social Affairs, who is also the Chairman of Egyptian State Broadcasting, has told Marconi's Director-General that this action has no political significance, but is based on the desire that the Egyptian authorities should control broadcasting in Egypt. The agreement was to terminate on the 31st December, 1949, and the Minister has let it be understood that the Company will be compensated for the unexpired portion of it. Generally speaking, anti-British propaganda seems to be becoming more intense, and there is a move to close the Anglo-Egyptian Union, a club in which many prominent Egyptians and Englishmen have been closely associated, on the ground that it is failing to accomplish its purpose, and that, in view of Great Britain's present hostility, Egyptians should no longer associate with the British in such a club.

Mr. Attlee replied in the House of Commons on the 11th March to Nokrashy Pasha's recent statement on the reasons for the breaking-off of the Treaty negotiations. He pointed out that the sole reason why the Treaty was not signed was the attempt of the Egyptian Government to construe one phrase of the Protocol on the Sudan as meaning that they could rely on the support of His Majesty's Government to deny the Sudanese complete freedom of choice when the time came for them to choose their future status. In reply to a question Mr. Attlee said that we have fallen back on our rights under the 1936 Treaty, and that, while troops are being evacuated from Cairo, they are going to the Canal Zone.

The Anglo-Egyptian talks on Egypt's sterling balances, which amount to some £450 million, ended on the 3rd March, 1947. The talks were mainly exploratory, and during the negotiations agreement appeared near on the questions of the interest payable on, and the partial release of, the balances. The main stumbling-block, however, was the question of cancellation. We maintained, in accordance with the Anglo-American Loan Agreement, that there should be some writing down of the debt, on the ground that it was incurred in part in the defence of Egypt, and Egypt herself played only a passive part in the war. The Egyptians, on the other hand, took the view that formal cancellation would imply either that they had originally overcharged us, or that Egypt did not fulfil her obligations under the 1936 Treaty. They were apparently willing to concede the concealed cancellation of a certain amount by purchasing from us stores and installations at a price in excess of their sales value, but no final agreement resulted and both delegations are now reporting to their respective Governments.

Palestine

Owing to the unsuitability of the accommodation on board the two vessels to which some of the illegal immigrants from the Ulua (see last week's Summary) had to be transferred, they were taken to Cyprus. An assurance was given that their disposal would, nevertheless, be in accordance with the directions of the High Court hearing the action for habeas corpus. The order nisi in this case was discharged on the 5th March, and all the passengers from this vessel have now been transferred to Cyprus. Meanwhile the ss. Abril, which sailed from Marseilles about the 1st March under the auspices of the Hebrew Committee for National Liberation (an American extremist organisation) with a crew of 20, all claiming to be Americans, was brought to Haifa on the 9th March. The passengers have been transferred to Cyprus; the crew have been arrested on a charge of aiding and abetting illegal immigration.

Acts of terrorism have been widespread during the week, though none has approached in seriousness the attacks of the 1st March, which were the immediate cause of the imposition of martial law on certain areas. This measure had been under consideration for some time, but it is incorrect to describe the note of the 3rd February from the Chief Secretary to the Jewish Agency as an "ultimatum," although it was so called by the Zionists. The Agency have now countered the Government's charge of misrepresenting the facts about immigration (see last week's Summary) by ignoring the admission of 75,000 under the White Paper quota and subsequent arrivals at the rate of 1,500 a month. They point out that the 4,000 a month quota was conditional on acceptance by the Jews of a "unilateral Palestinian State" in which they would have been a minority, and that, "since the Arabs would have a voice in determining the rate of immigration" after two years, "this could hardly be described as making it subject to absorptive capacity only."

The Agency have asked officially for an increased immigration quota during the interval before the conclusions by the United Nations are reached, regardless of the probability that it would have the double effect of infuriating the opinion of the Arabs and encouraging them to suppose that resort to extremism would help them to the realisation of their own demands.

Complaints by Jews at the economic effects of the imposition of martial law are general in the areas affected, and attempts are being made, by requests for permission to import raw materials and by other means, to lighten the burden. Mr. Kaplan, the Treasurer of the Jewish Agency, at a meeting in Jerusalem at which a decision was passed barring strikes or lock-outs during the period of "emergency," went so far as to assert that the imposition of martial law was not designed to stamp out terrorism, but to destroy Jewish economy. This charge has been echoed by Dr. Silver, who, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, has represented to the United States Government that the imposition of martial law is "part of a carefully conceived plan calculated to bring about economic strangulation of Palestine Jewry."

The satisfaction of the Palestine Arabs that the London Conference ended without either partition, federation, cantonisation or an increase in the immigration quota, was tempered by the reference in Mr. Bevin's speech (see Summary No. 382) to acquiescence by Arabs in the admission of immigrants above the White Paper quota. There has been some speculation as to which of the Arab leaders had, in fact, acquiesced, and the Arab Higher Committee has issued a manifesto calling for the cessation of Jewish immigration with the object, no doubt, of forestalling any future misunderstanding on this subject.

The Lebanon

Fauzi al Qawuqchi ignored the request of the Minister of Foreign Affairs not to go to Tripoli, and went there on the 4th March. A large reception arranged in his honour by rival political parties resulted in serious disturbances in which sixteen lives were lost and fifty people were wounded. The Minister for Foreign Affairs has told His Majesty's Minister that the trouble was not caused by Fauzi's arrival, but by internal politics, and that he would be suitably dealt with if he did stir up trouble. Fauzi has now left Tripoli at the request of the Lebanese Government.

Persia

The delegation of the World Federation of Trade Unions (see Summary No. 381) started work in Tehran on the 1st March. Since El Aris has not yet arrived (allegedly because the 'Iraqi Government have refused him a transit visa) Borisov has agreed to act as provisional leader of the delegation. The work so far covered includes the interviewing of members of the Tudeh Central Committee, rival Trade Unions and Government representatives. The delegation have also visited three factories. They had decided to leave Tehran for Abadan on the 8th March, but Borisov had the visit postponed to await the arrival of El Aris, who, he had been assured by Svernik, head of the Russian Trades Union Movement, was on his way, having travelled via Moscow.

Borisov has, in fact, being shewing increasing reluctance to continue the programme of future interviews and visits outside Tehran. He has been making daily visits to the Russian Embassy on the plea of illness, postponing decisions on the work of the delegation until after these consultations, which, it is strongly suspected, are also attended by Reza Rusta (see last week's Summary). Thus is appears that the Russians, ably assisted by Reza Rusta, intend to direct the work of the delegation. The delayed arrival of El Aris (who has doubtless been well primed in Moscow) is being used to strengthen Rusta's position.

The Prime Minister appears to have taken steps to implement his compulsory education scheme (see Summary No. 367) in Tehran, according to a recent broadcast. A hundred teaching centres are to be formed in the capital, six of which are already working. Further details are lacking.

THE FAR EAST

Indonesia

Little progress has been made in the search for an acceptable solution of the deadlock which has occurred over the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement. The Indonesian Cabinet's refusal to accept the so-called "Jonkman interpretations" (see Summary No. 381) has been endorsed by the several political parties in the interior of Java, and all informal efforts to find a compromise that might be acted on without loss of prestige to either side have so far failed. For a brief moment it looked as if the Indonesian Delegation would allow itself to be persuaded to sign the Agreement following an exchange of Notes with the Commission-General, placing on record M. Jonkman's interpretations without actually committing the Indonesians to any written undertaking of their acceptance. Although this attempt to arrive at a compromise failed, its shadow still hovers in the background, and competent observers are inclined to the belief that it will be re-dressed and brought out of the cupboard once again when next Mr. Sjarir returns to Batavia. It is thought that it will probably take the form of a suggestion that each side shall affirm its right to interpret the Agreement in its own way and to resort to arbitration under Article 17 in the event of a dispute arising and proving incapable of local settlement—a clumsy solution designed to cover the discarding of the "Jonkman interpretations" in a "face-saving" manner for the Hague.

What the final outcome of any such overture will be it is impossible to hazard. There can be no doubt but that Mr. Sjarir has been most anxious to sign the Agreement and that he might well have accepted some such compromise, had it been proposed in the early days of the Commission-General's return to Batavia. Delays, however, are dangerous, as Lord Killearn took infinite pains to impress on both parties during the earlier stages of negotiations, and Indonesian public opinion is now becoming both less conciliatory and daily more suspicious. Nor has this outlook been improved by a memorandum which was issued by the Netherlands Government on the 20th February stating that Dutch troops would be stationed in Indonesia "so long as the new structure in the Indies has not been realised"; and that "the Government does not intend to tolerate any longer violations of the truce"; nor by the declaration made by the Minister for Overseas Territories in his speech at the end of the debate in the States-General at the Hague that, while the Netherlands Government were prepared to discuss the situation with the Indonesians in the hope of making it possible to sign the Agreement—and it has always been open to the Indonesians to put forward their interpretation—so far as the Netherlands Government were concerned their own interpretation remained binding; and that, in his opinion, the steadily worsening economic situation would sooner or later compel the Indonesians to accept his interpretation and sign the Agreement. The hint that the Netherlands Authorities might seek to reimpose their will over Indonesia by force has raised the ire of even the usually cautious Mr. Sjarir, who, in his speech at Malang, has made it known in no uncertain terms that force would be met with force.

On the 25th February, a new session of the K.N.I.P. (Provisional Indonesian Parliament) was opened at Malang by Dr. Soekarno and attended by more than 500 delegates from all parts of the Netherlands East Indies. Its main business was concerned with internal affairs and, by threatening his own and Dr. Soekarno's resignation, Vice-President Hatta succeeded in forcing acceptance of Dr. Soekarno's decree increasing the membership of the Indonesian Parliament by 232 seats, which had previously been rejected by the Working Committee. External affairs, however, were touched on during this meeting, and in the course of his speech Dr. Hatta also declared that the aim of the Indonesian Republic was not merely to comprise Java and Sumatra, as provided by the Draft Agreement, but to include as well all territories which form part of the N.E.I. He declared that "not a single Indonesian will believe that the Dutch-held areas are separated from the Republic, even spiritually." The session went on to discuss the Linggadjati Agreement and, finally, but only after considerable, and at times heated, argument, endorsed by an overwhelming majority the Sjarir Government's policy.

While political settlement waits on the discovery of an acceptable compromise it is, of course, impossible for the Netherlands Authorities to enter into any formal economic and financial agreement with the Sjarir Government with the result that a difficult situation has been created which threatens to cause international repercussions. The Indonesians are well aware that the natural resources of their islands are attractive to foreign capital, and on the 27th February, the Republican Ministry of Economic Affairs announced that the Javanese port of Tjilatjap had been opened to world shipping: at Malang it has been prominently reported that among the many foreign guests attending the session of the Republican Parliament is the Director of the British Empire Shipping Company, who is studying the prospects of shipping communications between Cheribon, Singapore and Hongkong. The Netherlands authorities, on the other hand, consider that a drastic restriction of trade is essential to the prevention of smuggling of arms, etc., into the Republican area and the selling and exporting by Indonesians of produce from the plantations and factories, which are the property of absent Dutch and other foreign owners. The Dutch Navy has enforced a strict blockade of all Indonesian ports in Java and Sumatra and have been engaged in stopping, and searching all vessels and diverting them to Dutch-controlled ports where their cargoes have been confiscated. British ships which have entered an Indonesian-controlled port have had Netherlands naval boarding parties placed on board and have been escorted to Batavia or Semarang for examination, even though from Cheribon the voyage under armed guard has necessarily been made outside territorial waters.

H.M. Ambassador to the Hague has been supplied with an aide-mémoire and asked to bring the series of acts against British vessels to the attention of the Netherlands Government and to point out that, quite apart from the stopping and boarding of vessels on the high seas, the sudden application of stringent measures of control without previous warning is contrary to the procedure agreed upon between Dr van Mook and Lord Killearn for joint consultation on such matters. H.M. Ambassador has also been asked to enquire if, with a view to the prevention of possible misunderstanding in the future, the Netherlands Government will clarify the position in regard to the contention that all produce is European estate-owned and, therefore, the property of the Netherlands East Indies Government as custodian for absent owners.

Similar treatment has been accorded the American vessel, S.S. Martin Behrman, which, after loading a valuable cargo of rubber, sugar and quinine at Cheribon, was escorted by a Dutch destroyer to Batavia. Her cargo is now reported to have been confiscated, and the American Master and crew to have left the ship in consequence. The United States Embassy at the Hague has now made representations concerning both this incident and the more general subject of the restrictions recently imposed on trade by the Netherlands East Indies Authorities.

In the meantime a threat from the Chinese merchants in Singapore to boycott all Dutch shipping unless the blockade of Java and Sumatra is called off and the export restrictions relaxed has caused Dr. van Mook considerable concern, the more especially in view of the disturbing financial situation with which the Netherlands East Indies is faced. On the 3rd March, therefore, Dr. van Mook convened a meeting of all estate owners or their representatives for the purpose of explaining the seriousness of the financial position; and of suggesting the formation of a Dutch-Indonesian disposal pool for the sale of produce from Indonesian areas as the only certain means of obtaining the considerable sums of foreign exchange so urgently needed. It appears, however, that estate owners were not impressed with the scheme and took the line that the most urgent need lay in the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement and then concentrating on the implementation of the restoration of the rights of foreigners, as laid down in Article 14 of the Agreement.

In his speech on Foreign affairs in the House of Commons on the 27th February, H.M. Secretary of State, after expressing regret that the agreement made between Indonesia and the Dutch has not been signed, went on:—

> "without endeavouring to interfere with the rights of others I earnestly hope that this settlement, which should have such a beneficial effect on so many millions of people, not only in the Far East but in the West, will soon be complete."

An unfounded report that H.M. Government have pressed the Netherlands Government to sign the Linggadjati Agreement, has been officially denied by the Foreign Office, the Netherlands Embassy in London, and H.M. Embassy at the Hague.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Considerable attention is now being given in the United States to the question of how soon and to what extent economic assistance can be lent to Greece. On the 4th March, after receiving a formal request for help from the Greek Chargé d'Affaires in Washington, General Marshall issued a statement describing the economic condition of Greece as "a matter of primary importance to the United States." He added that the problems involved were "so far-reaching and of such transcendent importance that any announcement relating to them could properly come only from the President himself." In other words the final decisions would rest with the President and Congress. On the 10th March Mr. Truman had another long conference at the White House with thirteen leading Republicans and Democrats from both the Senate and the House of Representatives, and it was afterwards announced that he would appear before a joint session of Congress on the 12th to review the whole problem of Greece and the Eastern Mediterranean and to present his plan for dealing with it.

The message which Mr. Truman delivered to Congress may well prove to be one of the most momentous of his Presidential career. In it he asked Congress to provide $400 million for assistance to Greece and Turkey over the next fifteen months and to authorise American civilian and military personnel to be sent to those countries at their request to help with the task of reconstruction and to supervise the use of such financial and material aid as might be furnished. The President made no effort to conceal the fact that his principal object was to protect the Greeks and the Turks from the machinations of the Soviet Union. He was, he said, "fully aware of the broad implications involved if the United States extends assistance to Greece and Turkey," but he believed "that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressure."

In the American press, as well as in Congress, the discussion on the Greek question is rapidly broadening out into a full-dress debate on United States foreign policy. The more faint-hearted are endeavouring to find an easy way out of the present difficulties by suggesting that the affairs of Greece should more properly be referred to the United Nations, although it is conceded that this would do nothing to provide the necessary financial assistance. From such normally disparate exponents of international policy as Senator Pepper and the Detroit Free Press there have also been the inevitable objections to "pursuing the fools' goal of imperialism" by picking up British commitments. To these the New York Herald-Tribune has replied with a heated editorial reflecting the growing sentiment in more thoughtful internationalist quarters which states that, "if there is anything to be 'bailed out' here, it is not the British Empire; it is simply and solely the foreign policy of the United States . . . . If there is anything to be propped up, it is in the first instance the security, the influence, the adequacy of the American system in the world to-day."

It is widely agreed that it will be the Republicans in Congress who will be put to the test by the Greek crisis. Senator Taft, the Chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, called upon the Senate to ignore reports regarding the situation in Greece when the vote on the proposed Budget reduction of $4,500 million was about to be taken on the 3rd March. In the House of Representatives, on the other hand, Mr. Chester E. Merrow, a Republican member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who has recently been to the Middle East, went out of his way to compliment the State Department upon its "realism" in trying to save Greece from being absorbed into the Soviet orbit. In the country at large the Republicans are being bitterly criticised for their lack of a coherent policy, and it is regarded as significant that the National Committee Chairman, Mr. Carroll Reece, has had to appeal for better team work in a recent issue of the official Republican News. In any case there is a strong feeling among informed observers that the nature and scope of the Federal Budget will ultimately be determined less by the present Congressional debate on the need for retrenchment than by events in the world outside. In this connexion there is anxiety regarding President Truman's proposal of the 3rd March to allow the selective service system to expire at the end of the month, it being feared that voluntary recruitment will prove inadequate and that some form of military training on a national scale is essential to meet modern needs.

General Marshall's "frank scepticism" as he left Washington for Moscow on the 5th March has done little to relieve the misgivings of most Americans regarding the Foreign Ministers' Conference. In a statement to newspaper correspondents at the airport the Secretary of State said that he recognized that the negotiations in Moscow would be "extremely difficult" and that it seemed doubtful whether a draft treaty for Germany would be ready for consideration. The outspoken tone of the United States' protest on Soviet interference in Hungary and the unhelpful and unrepentant nature of the Soviet reply, as well as M. Gromyko's categorical rejection of the Baruch plan for the control of atomic energy, are not believed to augur well for the success of the Moscow proceedings. In some quarters there is a lingering hope that the Conference may yet pave the way for the acceptance of a Four-Power pact along the lines proposed by Mr. Byrnes, and the Dunkirk treaty between Great Britain and France has been welcomed as a step in this direction. Nevertheless, in the bulk of American comment the emphasis is upon the need to contain Soviet ambitions, rather than upon the desirability of reaching any accommodation with the Russians. In reviewing recent attempts to keep Soviet power and influence in check "by supporting opposition to it around the immense periphery from Manchuria and Korea through the Middle East, the Balkans and Central Europe," Mr. Walter Lippmann reaches the sombre conclusion that "the situation on virtually every part of this diplomatic front is worse than when we undertook to maintain it." He therefore suggests that the United States and Great Britain concentrate their resources at keypoints like Germany, Western Europe, Turkey and Japan, and from these try to exert "a direct leverage upon Moscow." Something like this also appears to be the prevailing trend of thought at the State Department. Special departmental committees, covering the State, Treasury, War and Navy Departments, are now being set up in Washington to study the position in countries like Italy, Austria, Hungary, Greece, Turkey, Persia and China, which lie on the Soviet "periphery," and to formulate a policy for the United States to pursue there. Following the recent proposals for conversations with this country (see last week's Summary) the State Department has expressed a desire to learn more precisely the views of His Majesty's Government regarding the situation produced by Soviet Communist pressure upon Russia's neighbours, and it has intimated that it would welcome co-operation with us on this matter.

In his much-publicised speech of the 6th March at Waco, Texas, where he received an honorary degree from Baylor University, President Truman said little about the political aspects of present world problems. He pleaded in the main for bipartisan support for his economic policy abroad and championed the principles upon which the International Trade Organisation is to be based. He spoke fervently of the need for "free enterprise" in the world to-day, saying that the one thing which Americans valued more than peace was freedom: "freedom of worship, freedom of speech, and freedom of enterprise." Yet he assured the country that his Government did not intend to eliminate tariffs or to establish free trade. Tariffs would not be "cut across the board." Furthermore, as ordained in his executive order of the 25th February giving effect to the proposals which Senators Vandenberg and Millikin had worked out with the State Department (see Summary No. 380), a proviso would be inserted into every future trade agreement to permit the withdrawal of any concession which was found to jeopardise any American industrial interest.

On the 6th March the U.S. Supreme Court announced its decision to uphold the conviction of Mr. John L. Lewis and the United Mineworkers for failing to obey an injunction restraining the miners from breaking their contract with the Government last November. Mr. Lewis and the union were originally convicted by a Federal District Court on the 4th December last. The Supreme Court also confirmed the fine of $10,000 imposed upon Mr. Lewis personally, but ordered the fine of $3,500,000 imposed upon the union to be reduced to $700,000. Justices Frank Murphy and Wiley B. Rutledge both wrote dissenting opinions, arguing that the Norris–La Guardia Act did not permit the Government to use injunctions and that the methods employed to break the strike were therefore illegal.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

At a demonstration in Buenos Aires on the 24th February to mark the first anniversary of his election, President Perón proclaimed a ten-point "Bill of Rights of the Argentine Workers." This laid down for all the people of the Argentine the right to work for fair remuneration, to social security and welfare, proper working conditions, economic betterment, family protection and the right to form trade unions freely, with repression of all acts that might impede their working. With this declaration, the President said, Argentina had placed herself in the vanguard of the working masses of the entire world.

In a warning to the Communists, President Perón said that neither the Government nor the workers' movements would allow themselves to become the medium of Communist anti-patriotic designs, and they would not allow the liberty enjoyed by the workers to be exploited by those who represented nothing, had done nothing for the workers' benefit, and would use labour forces to impede the work of the Government. The Government and the Army, he insisted, were the faithful guardians of the workers' rights and of public order.

Chile

The labour situation in Chile has slightly improved since the beginning of the year, and none of the recent strike threats and short stoppages have occasioned a serious break in production or transport services. The decision of the Government to nationalise the National Tramway services—which with the Railways are virtually insolvent—and the precarious position of the Communist element in the Government, may have had a sobering effect on Labour, though the main deterrent to further strikes seems to lie in the indignation of large sections of the public at the effect of last year's strikes on production. A conciliatory gesture recently made by the Communist Party, in the form of a plan for production and "no more strikes," puts forward some sweeping and impractical measures of control in a framework of economic orthodoxy and Communist ideology and is hardly likely to prove a cure for Chile's economic ailments. Meanwhile the Communists indulge in their familiar sport of rowdy meetings and lose no opportunity of attacking the Socialists, with whom their feud is as bitter as ever. Unfortunately the former Minister of the Interior, Admiral Merino, is no longer available for dealing with disturbances.

In this setting the President's control is uncertain. He tries to manipulate problems rather than grasp them, and is criticised for spending his time in an effort to reconcile politically the many delegations that visit him, instead of dealing with problems of state. He has obviously disappointed many of his supporters, and a great deal depends on the ratification and success of the agreement with Argentina (see Summary Nos. 373 and 380) his only, and doubtful achievement, so far. In any event the popularity of the present Government is likely to be tested at the municipal elections which are due to take place in April.

Guatemala

The new Guatemalan Congress, which met on the 1st March to hear the President's message, is in a curious position. On the ground that the 1946 election was unconstitutional all independent parties, with one exception, declined to participate in the Congress elections, which, accordingly, resulted in a victory for the Government party by 29 to 5. The view of the Independents is strengthened by the Association of Guatemalan Lawyers, who have decided by a considerable majority that certain articles of the Election Law are unconstitutional. The Independent Parties are now organizing mass demonstrations to declare the elections null and void. The leader of the Guatemalan Independent Party has pronounced that the legality of the Election Law must be decided by Congress alone and has said that they naturally will not vote themselves out of their seats. Under pressure they would probably amend the law and regularize their position.

Uruguay

The inauguration of Sr. Tomás Berreta as President of Uruguay took place on the 1st March. In a speech which has merited the approval of all political sectors, the President emphasized his determination to carry out his great responsibilities, without deviating from constitutional rights and duties, with unbiased mind and unmoved by political passion. He referred to Uruguay's ceaseless effort for social improvement and her democratic sense, and he interpreted the "singularly expressive demonstrations" attending his recent journey to the United States and the

With the exceptions of those holding the portfolios of Finance and National Defence all of the Ministers are new-comers.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

No Soviet statesman has defended the veto with more skill and less principle than did Mr. Gromyko before the Security Council on the 5th March. He broke confidence by quoting from a Soviet record of the secret discussions between President Roosevelt, Mr. Churchill and Marshal Stalin at Yalta to prove that the veto was due to American initiative, backed for selfish reasons of Empire by Great Britain; and that Russia agreed only because she realised that peace depended upon the unanimity of the Great Powers. He quoted Mr. Churchill as foreseeing the possibility of China demanding the "return of Hong Kong," or Egypt raising the question of the Suez Canal, and Great Britain feeling secure behind the veto; but "Generalissimo Stalin agreed with the proposals of Roosevelt and Churchill, since the principle of unanimity of the Great Powers corresponds to the interests of co-operation among them and to the interests of international peace." The fact is, of course, that the Russian representatives at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference five months previously had held most firmly to the veto, claiming the right even in cases where a Great Power was a party to a dispute: the Americans cleaved less strongly to the veto than Russia, but for all that set great store on it; and the United Kingdom delegation proposed specifically to deny the vote to parties to a dispute. Russia rejected this, and the United Kingdom then evolved a compromise which the U.S. took the initiative in proposing to the Russians at Yalta, and which became the ultimate solution (see Summary No. 283 under "United Nations").

M. Gromyko's speech was reported at length in all Moscow papers, the second and third parts, with the heading "more about the Veto" occupying seven columns on the 8th March. It can be inferred that the Soviet Government considered it important for the Russian public to know the history of the veto, to realise that in defending it, the Government were defending international peace, and to understand that the Americans and British, in attacking the veto were not only attacking peace, but they were innovators, who broke the agreements they had made. There is a parallel between the Mr. Gromyko of today and the Sir Edward Cokes of the XVIIth century in the high value each of them attaches to precedent, and in the defects in their historical scholarship. The parallel would be still closer if Sir Edward had been present at Runnymede or Mr. Gromyko absent from Dumbarton Oaks or Yalta.

Mr. Gromyko's speech contained little that he had not already put to the Council on the 14th February, or the 18th when he tabled the Russian amendments to the Report of the Atomic Energy Commission. He had already argued that atomic weapons must be banned and abolished before a system of control was elaborated, and that the agency of control must work within the framework of the Security Council. In his amendments he proposed the omission from the Report of all reference to the research and development activities of the Atomic Development Agency, and of its relation to development inside the various nations. All this he repeated on the 4th March but, as he himself said, "realistically": Prohibition must precede control. The United States held a contrary view in order to create a monopoly and dominate the world. International control is necessary; but it can be planned at leisure after the bombs have been destroyed. Such control must not interfere with production of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

To propose, as did the Baruch Plan of June 1946, to transfer enterprises of production and research to international ownership was tantamount to transferring them to the control of the United States.

This would be incompatible with State sovereignty and would not be accepted. Such control was an "excuse for interference in the economic life of other countries." Such interference could not, "in reality," be governed by a majority vote. "The Soviet Union cannot allow such a situation. It is aware that there will be a majority in the control organs which may take one-sided decisions, a majority on whose benevolent attitude the Soviet people cannot count." There must be no right of unlimited inspection, right to shut down plants, to interfere with mining or milling operations, to grant licences, &c. M. Gromyko then selected, to support his contentions, convenient passages from the report of the British Atomic Scientists Association, and left out others.

Turning to the question of violations, he agreed that violators must be punished, "if their guilt was proved"; but no progress was possible in this direction unless the full use of the veto were accepted. This was the central point of his speech, a defence of the veto, that great national bulwark against international interference with "national sovereignty"; and Russia knows what "interference" the United Nations can be persuaded to undertake.

It was something of an anti-climax when on the 10th March the Security Council agreed, unanimously, to a revised U.S. resolution, requesting the Atomic Energy Commission to continue its work, and hoping that a new Report will be ready before the Assembly meets in September. At this same meeting Senator Austin refuted many of M. Gromyko's charges, and M. Parodi (France) spoke of Russia's "conventional" conception of national sovereignty. He did not use the word "reactionary."

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

The Conference of the four Foreign Ministers, Mr. Bevin, Mr. Marshall, M. Bidault and M. Molotov opened on the 10th March. The Ministers will meet every afternoon, their Deputies every morning. Two changes have been made in the Deputies who met in London. Then, M. Gusev and M. Couve de Murville played a double rôle. Now M. Vyshinsky takes M. Gusev's place for Germany and M. Jacques-Camille, Paris, Minister-Plenipotentiary in London, is the French Deputy for Austria. It was agreed, provisionally to follow the agenda drawn up at New York, the main items of which are: (1) Allied Control Council's Report; (a) Demilitarisation, Denazification, Democratisation, Economic principles, reparations: (b) establishment of a central administration: (c) Liquidation of Prussia. (2) The Provisional Political Organisation of Germany. (3) Preparation of the German treaty. (4) The U.S. Draft Disarmament treaty. (5) Report of the Committee of Coal Experts. (6) The Deputies' Report on the Austrian treaty.

To give the Conference a good start, Mr. Bevin, as it were, put in his thumb and pulled out a plum, and said let us liquidate Prussia. It was unanimously agreed that Prussia as an administrative unit should be legally liquidated.

The Russian red herring which can usually be expected on such occasions was produced by M. Molotov in his request for a discussion on China. This was, to say the least, remarkably tactless in view of the presence of the French, who had been absent in 1945 and who would therefore be ignored again. M. Bidault's comments had a tartness worthy of the occasion. M. Molotov's argument was that the three Foreign Ministers (U.S.S.R., U.S. and U.K.) had agreed in Moscow in December 1945 that there was need for a democratic China, an end of civil strife and a withdrawal of Allied troops from China. The three should therefore discuss how the 1945 intentions had been carried out. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall both refused to discuss China at the Conference, in China's absence; but Mr. Bevin suggested, and Mr. Marshall agreed, that the three Ministers could exchange views unofficially and away from the Conference. Indeed, the 1945 discussions on China had been unofficial in the sense that they took place outside the framework of the Council of Foreign Ministers. Neither Mr. Bevin nor Mr. Marshall agreed to M. Molotov's idea that a communiqué should be issued after these conversations. The Chinese Communists are believed to have been expecting their cause to be championed at the Moscow Conference, and the Nanking Government has insisted strongly that the subject of China shall not be raised, and certainly no decisions reached in China's absence.

Tuesday's discussions centred on the demilitarisation of Germany, and M. Molotov renewed old charges that the Western Zones were maintaining the German "war potential," and that the British, in particular, were maintaining German military formations. He proposed that the Conference instruct the Control Council to eliminate the "war potential" by the end of 1948, disband German formations, and disband and return home all non-German formations. This was the old Soviet demand for enforced repatriation, which Mr. Bevin once more rejected. He refuted the charge of maintaining military formations and reserved his full reply until Wednesday, the 12th, only asking meanwhile a question most awkward for the Russians—how many prisoners-of-war were still outside Germany. M. Molotov contrasted the high percentage of warlike factories which the Russians had dismantled and removed.

It has been agreed to add the Trieste report to the Conference Agenda.

THE SUDAN

I.—Under Egyptian and Mahdist Rule

The peculiar status of the Sudan and the relation in which it stands to both Great Britain and Egypt have proved to be the stumbling-block preventing the satisfactory conclusion of His Majesty's Government's negotiations with the Government of Egypt for a revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936.

For an understanding of that status it is necessary to give a brief outline of events from the conquest of the Sudan by Muhammad Ali Pasha, the founder of the present dynasty in Egypt to the signing of the Condominium Agreements in 1899. It was for the purpose of procuring gold and slaves that Muhammad Ali Pasha decided in 1820 to invade the Sudan; he dispatched one army under his son Ismail to conquer the Fung kingdom in the east and another under his son-in-law Muhammed Bey the Defterdar to occupy the western province of Kordofan and destroy the Fur forces. Both men carried out their allotted tasks successfully.

In the Sultan's firman of 1841 the Government of the Sudan was confirmed to Muhammad Ali Pasha for his lifetime only but was included in the hereditary domains of his dynasty by later firmans. It remained, however, under the nominal juridical sovereignty of the Sultan.

The Egyptian officials who were sent to administer the Sudan instituted a policy of merciless exploitation of the natives; deprived of all their wealth they were forced to surrender themselves as slaves in lieu of taxes. After the middle of the century, when Egyptian control had been firmly established over the northern provinces, these slave-trading activities were extended to the southern Sudan, where they were carried out principally by Arab traders. These Arab intruders, having armed forces at their disposal, became petty potentates virtually independent of Egyptian authority. Attempts by the Khedives Said and Ismail to abolish the slave trade and break the power of the traders met with little success, even though a number of Europeans, including General Gordon, were employed for this purpose.

In the meantime Egyptian jurisdiction was extended to Suakin and Massawa, as a result of a firman from the Sultan to Khedive Ismail; Keren, part of the Ailet province and Harrar were occupied; and Zeila and the coastal rights to and including Berbera were acquired by purchase from the Sultan. After several expeditions to equatorial Sudan, territory extending to the north-east of Lake Albert was annexed, while Darfur province in the west was taken on behalf of Egypt by a powerful slave-trader.

Egyptian control of the Sudan and her other possessions was lost, however, as a result of the successful rebellion of al-Mahdi, the religious leader, which broke out in 1881.

Although Great Britain took Egypt under her tutelage in 1882 Her Majesty's Government had no intention of becoming involved in the Sudan. The Khedive's Government, however, were determined to assert their authority and, in 1883, sent an expedition under General Hicks with the hope of smashing the Mahdi. This was annihilated, and during the ensuing months, province after province was lost, General Gordon, who was sent early in 1884 with the task of evacuating the remaining Egyptian garrisons, was besieged in Khartoum. He was killed and the town was captured by the dervishes in January 1885. From this date began a period of appalling misrule under the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifah, and the population was wasted by famine and disease as a result of continuous internecine wars.

Any attempt to reconquer the Sudan was deferred, on Lord Cromer's advice, because of the financial position of Egypt and of the inefficiency of the Egyptian Army, although it was strenuously advocated by sections of public opinion in both England and Egypt. In 1896, however, Her Majesty's Government decided that an expedition should be undertaken to reoccupy Dongola in order both to secure Egypt's southern frontier and to support the Italians who had just suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Abyssinians at Adowa. It was manifest that the campaign, once started, could not be terminated until the Mahdi was defeated. It was therefore continued until 1898 when the Mahdi was routed at the battle of Omdurman. (Some resistance continued until 1900 and Darfur remained practically independent until 1916.)

II.—The Condominium

After reconquest the problem arose of providing an administration which would enable the Sudan to recover from the evil effects of both Egyptian and Mahdist misrule. The British Government were chary of any attempt to annex the country, partly for fear of international complications—specifically with Turkey and France. Eventually, wishing to associate Egypt with the governance of the country for the sake of Egyptian prestige but unwilling to allow the Sudan to relapse into misrule and anarchy, the British Government decided to set up a "Condominium." Accordingly agreements were signed in 1899 with Egypt to achieve this aim. The main agreement which is described as "relative to the future administration of the Sudan" was designed > "to give effect to the claims which have accrued to Her Britannic Majesty's Government, by right of conquest, to share in the present settlement and future working and development of the said system of administration and legislation . . . ."

The chief provisions were that the British and Egyptian flags should be flown side by side throughout the Sudan; supreme military and civil command was to be invested in the Governor-General, who was to be appointed by Khedivial decree on the recommendation of the British Government and in whom full legislative powers were to be vested; neither Egyptian legislation nor the jurisdiction of the Mixed Courts or the Capitulations were applicable to the Sudan; Egyptian goods going into the Sudan were to be free of import duty. The second agreement abrogated a special provision in the first document by which Suakin, the port on the Red Sea, was exempted from the régime to be set up.

Relations with Egypt

There was a section of Egyptian opinion which had never acquiesced in the conclusion of the Condominium Agreement, but opposition to it and to the gradual increase of British influence in the Sudan remained dormant for some years.

Egyptian officials are always reluctant to move far from their homes, and the Sudan is to them (whatever their politicians may say) a distant, alien and uncomfortable country. The Sudanese had no pleasant memories of their rule, and it was thus natural that the control of the administration should be assumed by the picked team of British officials headed by the Governor-General. When the Protectorate over Egypt was declared in 1914 the status of the Sudan was unaffected, and when Egyptian independence was proclaimed by the unilateral Declaration of His Majesty's Government in 1922 the question was reserved for later negotiation.

But in 1924 the Egyptians, led by their Prime Minister Zaghlul Pasha, became particularly insistent upon the indissoluble unity of the Sudan and Egypt and, under their guidance, a subversive organization, the White Flag League, was formed in the Sudan. This led to serious unrest amongst the Egyptian army units, and after the murder in November that year of Sir Lee Stack, Governor-General of the Sudan and Sirdar of the Egyptian Army, the withdrawal of these units was one of the demands in the ultimatum presented to Zaghlul Pasha by Lord Allenby, the High Commissioner in Cairo. In a second Note agreement was required for the creation of a Sudan Defence force "owing allegiance to the Sudan Government alone and under the supreme command of the Governor-General." The relative status of the co-domini thus underwent a change unfavourable to Egyptian aspirations. In the 1936 treaty the question was shelved by both parties reserving the right to conclude new agreements in the future modifying those of 1899.

Between 1924 and 1936 attempts to conclude an Anglo-Egyptian treaty had broken down over one aspect or another of the Sudan question, but it was not until the negotiations begun last year—which are too recent to require recapitulation—that Egypt had made a specific claim to absolute sovereignty over the Sudan in perpetuity.

Anglo-Egyptian relations with regard to the Sudan had been embittered and rendered difficult through the renewal during the war of Egyptian efforts to gain influence and reassert their rights in the Sudan by their previous subversive methods. Apart from giving support to the extremist pro-Egyptian party, they have utilized the existing economic, educational and religious channels there to spread their propaganda, while in Egypt a virulent press campaign from 1944 onwards demanded the "Unity of the Nile."

III.—The Development of Political Consciousness

Nationalism, as opposed to the hitherto prevalent tribal and religious loyalties, first made itself felt in the Sudan in 1924 after the suppression of the White Flag Society and the expulsion of the Egyptian army units and civilian officials. Political consciousness, inspired by Egyptian propaganda and intrigue, sought a new orientation and found it under the slogan "Sudan for the Sudanese." Resentment that the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936 was concluded without any reference to the Sudanese with regard to the article effecting their status, provided a further impetus to the embryonic movement. The setting up of the Graduates Congress in 1937 provided an opportunity for the expression of these sentiments. Although the Sudan Government had agreed to give consideration to the views of Congress, provided that it acted as a semi-public organization interesting itself in philanthropy and public affairs, an extremist element among its members consistently attempted to direct its activities into political channels and to follow a policy both hostile and obstructive to the administration. Claiming to represent the opinion of the nation, it demanded in 1942 an immediate declaration by the British and Egyptian Governments that they would grant the Sudan the right of self-determination after the war. At the end of 1943 Saiyid Abdur-Rahman al Mahdi, son of al-Mahdi, the conqueror of the Sudan in the last century, although he had in the first place given encouragement to the Congress, decided to withdraw his support on account of the pro-Egyptian attitude adopted by the extremist party, which now became known as the Ashigga and was led by Ismail al-Azhari. The Saiyid is the religious head of the Mahdists and thus has a considerable following in the provinces of Western Sudan as also from among the riverine population south of Khartoum. Soon after he withdrew his support from Congress, it found a new sponsor in his opponent Saiyid Ali al Mirghani, leader of the religious sect of Khatmia, which is the dominant power in Northern and Eastern Sudan, including the big towns. While the rivalry between the Mahdist and Mirghani factions was, and still is, a constant factor of Sudanese politics, several other parties weighed in with clearly defined policies on the future status of the Sudan. The Ashigga favoured a complete political and administrative union of the Nile Valley under the Egyptian Crown; the middle group composed of the Ahrar, Ittihadyin and Qawmiyin parties desired union with Egypt on the basis of two self-governing and equal nations; the older graduates, senior officials and Mahdists made the achievement of independence their chief aim, after which they could make a free choice as to their future status. In April, 1945, this latter group formed the Umma party, which received the blessing of Saiyid Abdur-Rahman al-Mahdi, who for some time had been alleged by his opponents to be aspiring to be recognised as ruler of the whole Sudan. After lengthy negotiations the parties collaborated in sending a single unofficial delegation to Cairo to be present during the negotiations for the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. Their common demands were the acceptance by the Condominium Powers of a free democratic Sudanese Government in union with Egypt; his Government would decide the form of the union, and on the basis of such union would enter into an alliance with Great Britain. The alternative Egyptian formula of one Crown, one army and one system of foreign representation (which was accepted by Ismail al Azhary, the leader of the delegation) being unacceptable to the Umma and members of the middle parties, they returned after a few days to Khartoum.

As a result of Sidky Pasha's misleading statement in October 1946 that the British Government had accepted the unity of Egypt and the Sudan, the Umma party, which had up to then been well disposed towards the Sudan Government, veered round and became extremely hostile to the Government as well as to its rival, the Ashigga party. Reassuring statements with regard to the Sudan's right of self-determination, however, made both by the Governor-General and the Mahdist leader after their visits to London restored the confidence of the Umma, which resumed its collaboration with the Government. It is to be hoped that the clear statement by the Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons on 27th December, 1946, will have finally removed all misunderstandings about the attitude and policy of His Majesty's Government.

EUROPE

GERMANY

During the first week of meetings between the four Foreign Ministers in Moscow a good deal of sober and useful discussion took place which, on the whole, had the effect of clearing the air rather than of accentuating disagreement, although the most contentious questions such as economic unity were not debated. On the 10th March Mr. Bevin took the initiative in proposing that the Council should confirm the decision of the Control Authorities to liquidate the Prussian State (see Summary No. 303). The Russians had been eager for this final seal of approval. Next day the Ministers began discussion of the Control Council's Report and during the week covered "demilitarisation." "denazification and democratisation" and "Displaced Persons."

As regards demilitarisation, the French Delegate, M. Bidault, laid chief emphasis on the need to examine carefully how the industrial potential of Germany should be curtailed in those industries which, although ostensibly designed for peace production, were easily convertible to war purposes. He appeared reasonably satisfied with progress on the other aspects of demilitarisation, and this view was shared by the American Delegate, Mr. Marshall, who, however, was not happy about the progress made in the reduction of heavy industry and considered this question integrally linked with that of economic unity. M. Molotov made his expected attack—backed by circumstantial detail against the Western Allies for their slackness in liquidating war industries. He contrasted the fact, announced for the first time, that 676 out of 733 war plants in the Soviet Zone had been removed as reparations or dismantled with conditions in the west where by the 1st January, 1947, only 7 per cent. of war factories in the British Zone had been dismantled and only 40 plants from the three Western Zones had been wholly or partly deprived of equipment for reparations. In fact the Control Council's Report stated that up to the 1st January, 1947 work had been begun on 29½ plants, the French having loaded only 7 tons of equipment. A larger number of plants have been allocated to the different nations, for example 40 from the British Zone alone up to October 1946. These figures do not, of course, include armament installations which have been destroyed. Indeed, Mr. Marshall later told the Conference that 80 out of 117 armament plants in the U.S. Zone had been liquidated and was congratulated on this result by M. Molotov, who wished the same could be said of other Zones.

M. Molotov also attacked the presence of what he stated to be units of non-German nationals in the Western Zones and the Dienstgruppen in the British Zone. He proposed that a plan should be made by the 1st July, 1947, for the elimination of all German industrial war potential by the end of 1948; all war installations should be destroyed by the end of 1949; remaining German military organisations should be dissolved by the 1st June, 1947; and all units of non-German nationals should be disbanded. Mr. Marshall asked that the Foreign Ministers' Deputies should consider, together with M. Molotov's proposals, a resolution that the Council noted the Report on demilitarization and the substantial progress made in this field and directed the Control Authority to proceed without delay to complete demilitarization. Mr. Bevin's main Statement was made on the 12th March. He considered M. Molotov's anxieties about the Dienstgruppen to be unreal. They comprised only some 80,000 men who were not organized in military formations, while by contrast three million members of the Wehrmacht had been disbanded in the Zone. The Dienstgruppen were employed on such work as mine clearance on which it was not intended to risk British lives. M. Molotov was informed, however, that it was hoped to replace these groups with ordinary labour under civil contract by the end of 1947. As for the non-German nationals, particularly the so-called Royal Yugoslav Army, the latter had been disbanded and its members given the status of displaced persons. Some had joined the civilian Mixed Watchmen's Corps for special guard duties—a step which did not infringe any Allied obligation. Mr. Bevin then asked for denials of reports that ex-German soldiers were serving with the Soviet Forces and that several million prisoners-of-war were held in the Soviet Union. The general progress of disarmament was not unsatisfactory, but a black spot was the Russian failure to destroy damaged German warships as they were bound to do under the Potsdam Agreement. (It will be recalled that the Soviet authorities have been repeatedly questioned on this subject and that there was reason to think that some ships were being reconstructed.) M. Molotov later admitted to the Conference that they had been unable to carry out the work but promised that it should be done. Mr. Bevin then refuted allegations about the existence of cartels in the British Zone. He did not disagree with M. Molotov's low figures for removals of equipment from the Western Zones, but pointed out that economic unity had been a basic assumption of the level of industry plan and of the Potsdam Agreement. While agreeing with M. Molotov on the need for a plan to be drawn up by July of this year he insisted that they must first know whether there would be economic unity. Moreover, experience had shown that the present plan needed review. A full study should be made, but to do so it was essential to know how much industrial equipment had been removed and how much remained; M. Molotov's figures were interesting but shed no real light on the position of peaceful industries or the extent to which firms had been transferred to Soviet hands. (It is estimated that in Saxony Soviet-owned companies account for 59 per cent. of all industrial production and that they enjoy a privileged position as regards labour and supplies.) Mr. Bevin said he did not wish the question of demilitarization to be dealt with in isolation from other subjects.

On the 13th March Mr. Marshall and M. Bidault urged the need of uniform denazification procedure, although M. Bidault objected to Mr. Marshall's plan for the Control Council, without acting through Zone Commanders, to instruct the Germans to draft a law. Mr. Marshall attacked the Soviet authorities for clearing former Nazis who joined the Socialist Unity Party. M. Molotov denied this allegation and dwelt mainly on the shortcoming of other Zones, mentioning Herren Dinkelbach and Poensgen as examples of Nazis now holding prominent positions in the British Zone. Mr. Bevin, while deprecating the system of accusation and counter-accusation, turned the tables by giving the names of five Nazis holding important posts in the Soviet Zone; the names of some forty others, he said, were available. In the British Zone nearly 300,000 Nazis had been deprived of posts, apart from 34,000 in internment. Mr. Bevin did not commit himself to direct support of Mr. Marshall's proposal for uniform denazification laws. He called for a word of approval on the progress made so far.

On the question of democratisation there were some exchanges of opinion about the varying electoral procedures of the zones and Mr. Bevin attacked the suppression of the Social Democrats in the Soviet Zone. On the following day (14th) the U.S. representative read a paper on democracy in which he called for agreed civil rights for the individual and parties and freedom of Trades Unions, press and movement. He also answered Soviet allegations about denazification in the U.S. Zone and said that 9,000 members of the Wehrmacht employed in the Zone were not in military formations and were being disbanded. M. Bidault re-stated the French view that it would be dangerous at present to make any advance towards the unification of political parties and Trades Unions. He said that in the French Zone denazification had been directly applied against Nazis in high positions and the rank and file had been spared. (In fact the French attach little value to denazification.) M. Molotov concluded the debate by giving the known Soviet view that freedom of speech must not mean freedom to propagate Hitlerism and aggression. He was still critical of denazification in the West, but announced that the Soviet Government would check up immediately on the five prominent Nazis employed in the Soviet Zone.

An important step in the Conference was the agreement of the Soviet representative to produce figures on prisoners of war in Russia. These were circulated on the 14th March, after details had been given by the other Powers. It was stated that 890,532 prisoners remained in the Soviet Union and that since the surrender 1,003,974 persons—the statement did not specifiy that they were all prisoners of war—had been repatriated. The former figure will be a bitter blow to the Germans as it had been frequently estimated that there were still at least 2–2½ and possibly 4 million Germans in Russian hands. Less than 200,000 prisoners have been repatriated since July 1946 and no details have been given of the earlier groups. It was not stated how soon the rest would be repatriated. Prisoners-of-war in British hands outside Germany number 435,295. They are being returned at the rate of 17,500 a month, and this rate will be increased. Mr. Bevin stressed the need for all prisoners to return as soon as possible in order to help build a balanced labour force. The United States hold only 30,976 prisoners, and repatriation is to be completed by June 1947, but France still holds 631,483, and, as in the case of the Soviet Union, no date was given for their return, although those living in the Saar are being sent home.

Perhaps the most interesting contribution of the week was the French proposal for large-scale emigration from Germany in order to reduce her over-population which was likely to be a constant danger to the rest of Europe and particularly to France with her inferior man-power resources. M. Bidault pointed out that there were now 66 million people in the reduced Germany amounting to 185 persons per sq. kilometre or 40 more than in 1933. When all Germans had been repatriated the total population would amount to 196 persons per sq. kilometre; this was a greater density of population than in any part of Europe except Holland and Belgium, and the comparison with France was 3 to 1 and even worse for Poland. The French Government therefore suggested that there should be no transfers of German population beyond those already agreed and that even those should stop where the interested Powers approved. Displaced persons should be repatriated or settled elsewhere. Emigration should be encouraged and France was willing to take her share of Germans. There must be a high enough standard of living in Germany to ensure political and economic stabilisation. Mr. Marshall expressed particular interest in these views. Mr. Bevin gave an account of the serious over-crowding in the British Zone as well as of the achievements in repatriating 2 million displaced persons and pointed out that whereas the British Zone had increased its population by 2½ million since 1939 that of the French Zone had decreased. He asked for a review of all previous agreements and said that until then the British Zone could undertake no new commitments to receive refugees. The Germans themselves should be made responsible for redistributing inside Germany those already admitted, and the Control Council should set up a Commission of Germans for this purpose. The Russians made a criticism of the treatment of displaced persons in the Western Zones as also a number of proposals for preventing "fascist" influence in displaced persons camps. All these proposals are to be considered later.

Other events of the week have naturally been overshadowed by the Conference. Comment on the Conference in the German press has not yet crystallised. Full and accurate reports of proceedings were given in the British, American and French licensed papers in Berlin, but the Soviet-controlled press, while reporting in detail, has been busy manipulating the headlines in order to place the Western Allies in an unfavourable light, and this has been combined with lengthy reporting of German speeches in support of German unity. Pieck and Grotewohl of the Socialist Unity Party have gained admission to the U.S. Zone once more in order to propagate these views. It was announced on the 4th March that one aim of this journey was to speed up the concentration of forces of the Western Communists with the S.E.D., and that one difference to be overcome was the Communists' disagreement on the S.E.D. bloc policy (see last week's Summary). A resolution passed by the S.P.D. executive in Hanover on the 13th March stated that the S.P.D. favoured the political and constitutional unity of Germany. There must be a Central Parliament elected on the basis of equal electoral rights and representing all German people. The German republic must be a federal State (Bundesstaat) but not a mere confederacy, while the S.P.D. equally opposed the attempts at neo-national communism, a road leading to a totalitarian State by way of supercentralisation. The S.P.D. wishes to see alongside a Reichstag, a Reich Council elected by the respective Diets, and the Party therefore seems to be drawing nearer to H.M. Government's conception of a federal structure in which the Laender would have direct representation.

The United States Government are already taking action to implement some of the suggestions made in Mr. Hoover's report on food conditions which were outlined in Summary No. 383, particularly with regard to soup kitchens for feeding children and old people, and extra shipments of seed potatoes. Action is being considered on other aspects of the report.

In the Political Directorate on the 5th March the Russians, surprisingly, approved in principle a new draft proposal circulated by the French on the political activity of police and public servants. This has long been a bone of contention, but agreement now seems possible.

AUSTRIA

In Moscow the Special Committee set up to discuss the thorny question of German assets has reported to the Ministers' Deputies, who have confirmed the Committee's recommendation that the provisions of the Treaty on the subject of German assets should include a recognition by Austria of the Potsdam decision. No agreement was reached on the question of the transfer of title to the assets, the Soviet Deputy maintaining (as in the London talks) that this had already been effected under the Potsdam Agreement. "Eastern Austria" has still not been defined, but the Deputies have agreed that the Treaty should contain a definition of German assets. The Russians still insist that this definition should be their own, but they have at least agreed to the principle that definition is a matter for four-Power agreement and not solely for Soviet dictation to the Austrian Government. Under Soviet pressure in Vienna the Austrian Government have agreed to draw up and discuss lists of German assets about whose status there should be no doubt, but they have decided not to make transfers until the question is settled in Moscow.

In connection with this burning problem a New Times article on the 10th March has sought to disprove the Austrian Government's contention that the Austrian economy suffered from the Nazi occupation and to show that German capital was well established in Austria before the Anschluss; it has also condemned the Austrian law of the 26th July, 1946, nationalising German assets, as an attempt to revise the Potsdam decisions and as giving Anglo-American monopolies the chance of buying up nationalised enterprises. Other points recently discussed by the Ministers' Deputies at Moscow include the size of Austria's land army and the Soviet proposals for the limitation of the number and supply of airfields and the limitation of armaments to those of national manufacture. The last proposal would seriously hinder for some time the armament of the Austrian forces. No agreement was reached on any of these points.

At the Allied Council meeting on the 15th March there was an inconclusive discussion on measures to be taken against the infiltration into Austria by German-speaking and other "national" groups from Hungary and Yugoslavia. The British Representative referred to the embarrassment caused both to the Austrian State and the Occupying Powers by the continued arrival of Volksdeutsche from Yugoslavia, due to the Yugoslav Government's policy of expelling all Volksdeutsche from their country. With regard to the considerably reduced March allocation of liquid fuel for the Austrian Government, the Soviet representative refused to accede to a British request for an explanatory statement, maintaining that questions relating to Austrian fuel concerned the Soviet element and the Austrian Government alone. It was the British view that the Soviet representative's attitude was incorrect, since the shortage of oil affected the whole of Austria; General Winterton's question as to whether the oil was being sold to Czechoslovakia or elsewhere was left unanswered. The reduction in the liquid fuel supply has caused the Austrian Government to take strict economy measures in the use of motor spirit.

In his report to President Truman on the food situation in Austria Mr. Hoover estimated that rations in Austria are better balanced than in Germany and that, with supplementary unrationed food, the normal consumer's daily ration reached 1,900 calories. Mr. Hoover recommended that relief should be limited to food, medicine and agricultural supplies at a total cost for fifteen months of 155 million dollars, of which 86 million should come from the United States. He concluded that if land and industrial equipment were freely restored to Austria under the Peace Treaty and the occupying forces withdrawn, Austria could contribute to the cost of food imports in the second half of 1948 and could become self-supporting within two or three years.

On the 13th March the Austrian press announced that Herr Piesch, the Provincial Governor of Carinthia, had resigned his post at the request of the Austrian Socialist Party in order that Yugoslav disapproval of him personally might not prejudice Carinthia's interests at the Moscow Conference. In effect Piesch's resignation has been ordered by the Federal Chancellor as a result of the discovery of certain incriminating evidence regarding Piesch's pro-Nazi activities during the war. When the case was investigated by the Allied Council in mid-February, at the request of the Deputies in London, the available evidence did not warrant Western support for the Soviet/Yugoslav accusations against Herr Piesch.

The Prince-Archbishop of Salzburg, Dr. Rohracher, has denied Austria's responsibility for her part in Hitler's war on the grounds that Austria did not exist at that time and that both the U.S.S.R. and the Western Powers had acquiesced in Austria's annexation by Germany. He has also protested that "thousands of political prisoners" in Austria are still awaiting interrogation and has advocated leniency in the application of the new National Socialist Law to those who succumbed to propaganda and force of circumstances. Dr. Rohracher has attributed the slowness of Austria's reconstruction to the country's division into four zones.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The case expounding the moderate Czechoslovak claims upon Austrian territory—a matter which it is hoped the two Governments primarily concerned will be able to solve satisfactorily on a basis of direct negotiation (see Summary No. 380)—has recently been given much publicity. The immediate reason has been the presence in Vienna of a Czechoslovak delegation to discuss frontier rectification. Taking into account the long years of frustrated national aspirations under the Habsburgs and the past influence of Germany upon Austria, relations between the latter country and Czechoslovakia have on the whole been surprisingly amicable. Consequently the Czechoslovak Government bases its case on purely strategic and economic arguments. and not out of any desire to reap revenge. These claims, insignificant in all conscience, are as follows :—

(a) A shortening of the frontier along the Dyje (Thaya) river in Southern Moravia. This area covers the southern approaches to the historically famous and strategically important Moravian Gap which unites the plains of the Vistula and the Austrian Danube.

(b) A minute frontier adjustment along the Dyje in order to enable the Czechs to construct a dam for the purpose of generating electric power.

(c) The right to use a road connecting two communities on Czechoslovak territory. This road is cut by the present frontier.

(d) Finally, a request for a small frontier rectification on the south bank of the Danube to the west of Petržalka, opposite Bratislava.

In none of these areas, it is alleged, will any Austrian settlement be affected.

From the Czechoslovak viewpoint this last demand is perhaps the most important, for it directly concerns the projected construction of an Elbe–Oder–Danube canal which will connect the Baltic with the Black Sea and which will debouch into the Danube near the village of Devin slightly to the west of Bratislava. The area claimed, a very small one, will enable the Czechs to erect administrative premises serving the canal and, from the strategic angle no doubt, to cover the approaches to the canal. The Czechs bolster their demand with the plea that Bratislava, a rapidly growing town with a future as a riverine port, can no longer expand with advantage on the north bank of the Danube. It will be remembered that similar arguments prevailed at the Paris Conference when a strip of Hungarian territory in the same area was ceded to Czechoslovakia.

The construction of the canal will considerably improve Polish communications with Central Europe and the Mediterranean. Hitherto Poland's main outlet to these regions has been by rail through the Moravian Gap. An examination of the railway system in the Czechoslovak Republic will show that improved water communications should lead to a noticeable increase of trade in this part of Europe where the much-publicised incursion of the State into economic planning, and the schemes—tentative as yet—for wider regional integration, have assumed a new significance in the post-war period. In this respect it is interesting to note the remarks of the Czech premier, M. Gottwald, on the prospect of greater economic co-operation between Poland and Czechoslovakia—the two most highly industrialised countries in Eastern Europe. It is hoped soon to conclude an agreement, covering common industrial, transport, scientific and planning problems, which will prove of far-reaching importance to these two countries.

SOVIET UNION

The work of the Council of Foreign Ministers is being given the fullest publicity in Moscow, the meetings being reported in detail in the press, in contrast to the brief summaries considered sufficient for Soviet readers during the meeting of the Ministers in New York. On the whole the reporting has been fair in tone and although the speeches of Soviet delegates have certainly been given greater prominence, many of the others have been reported verbatim. The only serious distortion was in the account of the session of the 12th March, where tendentious glosses were inserted on the Secretary of State's speech and the passages concerning the Soviet failure to destroy German ships were omitted entirely.

Comment has hitherto been limited and has mainly consisted in repetition of the familiar charges against Great Britain of maintaining German and other military formations. Pravda re-stated the Soviet case for a treaty "with" instead of "for" Germany. Izvestiya was mildly optimistic in tone. It joined with Pravda in castigating the British and American press for disturbing the calm atmosphere necesary for the solution of difficult problems by its demands for a revision of the Potsdam decisions. Krasnaya Zvezda expressed great satisfaction with the decision to liquidate the Prussian State, eternal enemy of the Slav people. Izvestiya discussed the situation in China with reference to M. Molotov's raising of the Chinese question, pointing out that the deterioration in China since the Moscow Conference of December 1945 showed that a check on the implementing of the decisions then reached was clearly necessary. The Soviet-controlled press in Germany has given detailed reports of the Conference, but by judicious manipulation of headlines and summaries has set forth a righteous M. Molotov in the rôle of a public prosecutor accusing his colleagues of lapses which they are unable to deny and often obliged openly to admit. One paper maliciously reported the amusement caused in Moscow by the fur caps and coats of the British delegation, coupled with the slacks worn by French typists, British appetites also came in for censure; it would appear from the quantity consumed at the Hotel Moskya the article in question said, that food conditions in England must be the worst in the world.

The honour of being the first Foreign Minister to be received by Generalissimo Stalin has fallen to M. Bidault, who went to the Kremlin on the 17th March.

Pravda and Izvestiya have each devoted a two-column front page unsigned leader to President Truman's recommendation to Congress of financial aid for Greece and Turkey. This treatment is only accorded to quite exceptional developments in foreign affairs. The passages in Mr. Truman's message most directly critical of Soviet methods were omitted from the articles and from Tass reports, and the attention of Russian readers has been focussed instead on the theme of American expansionism. The President was in particular criticised for failing to fulfil the obligations assumed by the U.S.A. to the United Nations, in that he had omitted to consult that body over the Greek situation.

Great Britain, acting on "Churchill's initiative," had maintained anti-democratic elements in power in Greece and brought the country to bankruptcy; stepping into British shoes the Americans would now become masters of the country, and Greek sovereignty was at an end. As for Turkey, Mr. Truman's references to threats to her integrity were quite unjustifiable and merely a pretext for forwarding American designs in the Middle East. The U.S.A. had usurped the place of Hitler in hiding expansionist plans under the cloak of defending smaller States against Bolshevism, though the U.S.A. used the word totalitarianism.

On the 1st March the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. approved a State Plan for 1947 which set standards of performance for this year in the light of the results of the first year of the Five-Year Plan (see Summary No. 379). This provides a key to the present economic position of the Soviet Union and to the most urgent tasks of the coming year. The purport of the new annual plan is that, notwithstanding the average over-all fulfilment of the previous one, the tempo of production in a number of industries is still insufficient and must be raised. Plans for individual industries must therefore be calculated on a good average, i.e., a selective rate of output rather than on a purely arithmetical over-all average rate. This obviously raises the figure of the norm, as the inefficient worker no longer influences its calculation. The following salient points emerge. The coal industry is lagging behind and retarding development in other industrial fields. An increase in the fuel industry is set as the first priority task of the 1947 plan. By the end of 1946 the output of industry in the former occupied areas had not yet reached half of the pre-war level. As a result of the drought, production of grain, sugar, beet and sunflowers declined, except in Western Siberia and Kazakhstan. The output of consumer goods was much less than might have been expected from the resources made available by reconstruction and reconversion. The housing plan for 1946 was not fulfilled. Housing difficulties are preventing a rise in labour productivity. Production in many pivotal industries, such as agricultural machinery, electrical machinery, pipes for the oil industry &c., is also lagging far behind requirements. This is also true of the lumber industry (a point of special interest to this country), and mechanisation is to be sharply speeded up so as to increase the output of timber. The raising of the new output standards for 1947 is most noticeable in electrical machinery and agricultural machinery. Finally, the seriousness of the agricultural position was brought out in the description of measures consonant with those contained in an important decree for the rehabilitation of agriculture adopted by the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party at the end of February. The emphasis on increased production of tractor and agricultural machinery strikes at the present basic weakness of the machine tractor stations which has been hampering the post-war reconstruction of agriculture. Many other industries, such as transport, are covered by the Plan's provisions, and in all this the needs of the population receive more attention than in the past. They have not yet received the highest priority, but it is now realised that the population must be given some material benefits if the workers are to increase their productivity and fulfil the Five-Year Plan.

The net is tightening round Soviet artists, the performers on the stage and concert platforms being now the victims. The Committee for Art Affairs has just issued a special order putting an end to anti-State practices in concert work; apparently artists and musicians have been giving private performances for large sums and evading their official obligations. One actor was singled out for censure for touring Omsk and Northern Kazakhstan under a false name and advertising his ability to cure all suffering from smoking, alcohol, hiccupping, warts, or persecution mania. One well-known film star appears to have been arrested, but two of the singers who were the object of criticism are announced as being shortly due to appear in Moscow.

As might have been anticipated, dissensions have again broken out in the Russian Orthodox Church of America after the decision of the Cleveland Sobor last autumn to seek reunion with the Moscow Patriarchate. Metropolitan Theophile, head of the Church, is himself not satisfied with Patriarch Alexei's answer to his message and is proposing to refuse to deal with Metropolitan Grigorii of Leningrad, who is being sent from Moscow to the U.S.A. as special negotiator. (It was he who headed the delegation to the Middle East last autumn.) Meanwhile, some of the more extreme of Metropolitan Theophile's bishops are preparing to cause a split by insisting on maintaining their connection with the Karlovtsy Synod.

An interesting account of Church life inside the U.S.S.R. has been given by Archbishop Adam of Philadelphia, who has just returned from a visit which included the Western Ukraine. This hierarch has a somewhat dubious ecclesiastical past, and was at one time linked with the Living Church movement in the U.S.A. Since the restoration of the Moscow Patriarchate he has taken a pro-Soviet line. He described a service in the former Uniate Cathedral of Lvov at which he concelebrated with the new Archbishop of Lvov, Makarii, who was formerly a Professor at Kiev. According to Archbishop Adam, only three-quarters of the Uniate parishes had returned to Orthodoxy. Among the irreconcilables was the brother of the late Uniate Metropolitan Sheptitsky, who appeared to be continuing to live in his Studite monastery. A member of the American Embassy in Moscow who recently visited the Ukraine was told that there were fifteen Churches open in Kiev and the same number in Kharkhov and Odessa; nearly all apparently had only been opened during the German occupation. The famous Pechersky monastery had also been open since 1941 and had now 75 monks. Membership was not, however, being allowed to expand by the authorities, though there were many applicants. He found also a monastery in Odessa with 10 monks and a theological seminary with 30 students. According to an interview given by Metropolitan Nikolai Krutitsky on the 7th February to the Soviet Information Bureau, the well-known Pochaev monastery in Volhynia is also functioning. Before the war this was the main centre of Ukrainian Orthodox Church life in Europe and had an important printing press for liturgical and theological works.

SCANDINAVIA

Sweden

After long-drawn-out discussions in the Riksdag on measures to counter inflation—discussions which ended in a deadlock on the 12th March—and following a memorandum on the situation handed to the Government by the Directors of the National Bank, the Swedish Government have been forced to assume sole responsibility for extensive import prohibitions on luxury and non-essential goods. Measures to reduce home consumption of certain export articles such as pulp and paper will also be introduced.

M. Unden, the Foreign Minister, M. Erlander, the Premier, and M. Gjoeres, the Minister of National Economy, made public statements on the Government's decision and emphasized that no change in the principles of Sweden's trade policy was involved, the aim merely being to bring the Swedish standard of living more in line with world conditions to-day and to combat the threatening inflation. Although the Government and the opposition parties were unable to agree on a joint anti-inflation programme there was, according to M. Erlander, no divergence of opinion on the purely practical measures to be taken, and he expressed the hope that they would, therefore, cause no political differences between the parties. Of the opposition elements the Communist Party alone supported the Government wholeheartedly, whether from conviction or as a matter of general policy it is difficult to say.

Among the measures to be introduced are the recruitment of new labour, including the import of foreign labour, inducements to increase private and public saving; a "wage stop," closer foreign exchange control and control and concentration of imports; and increase of exports. M. Gjoeres, commenting on these measures, explained that while in the present situation Sweden could, for instance, not even afford to maintain so large a fruit consumption and would have to curtail the import of fresh fruit, it was intended to increase the import of certain raw materials and semi-manufactured goods important to Swedish industry. These included hides, cotton, wool, yarns, agricultural machinery and spare parts, coal, oil and other fuels. At the same time the Government decided to reintroduce, with immediate effect, the rationing of coffee, tea and cocoa, in order to reduce their consumption by 70 per cent. as compared with that of 1946.

At a Social-Democrat meeting at Linköping, M. Unden refuted the allegations that Sweden was endeavouring to profit by the Spanish-Norwegian estrangement. Official statistics, which he quoted, showed that in normal years Swedish exports to Spain were double, or even treble, those of Norway, while Norwegian shipping engaged in trade with Spain far exceeded the volume of Swedish tonnage employed in the same trade. M. Unden concluded by expressing the hope that these facts would be noted by those who were anxious to make Sweden the scapegoat.

The appointment of M. Boheman as the new Minister to the Court of St. James will be welcomed by those who had the opportunity of working with the new Minister during the war, when he showed himself a most able diplomat and a good friend to the Allied cause. M. Boheman held the position of Head of the Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs during the war and was subsequently Swedish Minister in Paris. Another diplomatic appointment of interest is that of M. Rolf Sohlman, as Swedish Minister to Moscow, where he will replace M. Hägglöf. It may be assumed that M. Sohlman also will be welcome in the country to which he is appointed, since he was largely responsible for the successful conclusion of the Russo-Swedish trade negotiations which ended in the recent Russo-Swedish trade agreement, and is known to be friendly disposed towards the U.S.S.R. In fact, there are circles in Sweden which were rather apprehensive lest his pro-Russian leanings might affect his usefulnes to his country by inducing him to take a too rosy view of the position in the Soviet Union.

Denmark

According to the Danish press the Danish contingent to be employed in the occupation of Germany, has been allotted an area in East Friesland between Wilhelmshafen and Emden. The brigade will receive exclusively Danish supplies. Major-General Richard Allerup, who will be in charge, explained that while fraternisation would not be forbidden the men would be warned of the risks involved. The troops will receive military training and will only go into action when called upon by the German police.

Renewed labour troubles have broken out in Denmark, this time among the printers; owing to a strike on the 1st March by the Copenhagen branch of the Printers' Union all the newspapers of the capital ceased to appear, with the exception of Social-Demokraten and the Communist Land og Folk, which are not affiliated to the Copenhagen Master Printers' Association. In view of the forthcoming elections to the Upper House the criticism has been made that this strike represents an attack on the freedom of expression, and the Federation of Danish Trades Union actually joined in an appeal to the strikers to make arrangements for the production of election material and the printing of the daily press. This appeal was, however, rejected on the grounds that the dispute was non-political and that election material could be printed by Copenhagen printing houses not affected by the strike or by provincial houses. The main demand of the men for a reduction in working hours is not likely to be strongly supported by the Danish Trades Union Federation, as it is argued that a small country like Denmark can hardly take the lead in pressing for a reduction in working hours at the present time. So far the Government have shown no inclination to avail themselves of their right to intervene in the matter and to appoint a board of arbitration. It remains to be seen whether the dispute, so far purely industrial, will develop into a political issue, in which case it might spread to other unions.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

The long-expected fall of the Huysmans Cabinet has at length come to pass (see last week's Summary). It follows closely upon the heels of another defeat in the Senate and two more than usually critical speeches from M. van Acker and M. van Cauwelaert, the Catholic President of the Chamber, which M. Huysmans interpreted as a personal attack upon him. His long and somewhat rambling reply to his critics can hardly have carried conviction, but served rather to emphasize his apparent inability to break away from party politics and his tendency to gloss over difficulties. The length of his period of office (7 months) exceeded the estimates of many: the defection of the Communists, who all but resigned some time ago, made it impossible for him to carry on. On the day of his Cabinet's resignation (12th February), M. Huysmans told the Press that he did not anticipate a "long crisis." Asked about parties in the new Cabinet and about his own successor, his reply to the first question was that the problem was "now less of a party affair than an issue connected with the drafting of a new programme"; and to the second: "Do not look for a name containing several syllables!"—by which, presumably, he meant: "Do not look for M. van Acker!" In this last observation, at any rate for the present, he is correct: the lot has fallen upon M. Spaak, who has lost no time in setting about his none-too-easy task. While it is probably still true that the longed-for Cabinet stability cannot be satisfactorily achieved except by means of a four-party coalition, M. Spaak may experience difficulty in obtaining the whole-hearted support either of his own party, the Socialists, or of the Liberals, owing to the influence of the left wings of these two parties which enjoyed representation in the late Cabinet. (M. Huysmans belongs to the Socialist left wing, M. Spaak to the right wing.) The Communists will, in any case, return to the Opposition. At the time of writing, the Christian Social Party had not issued any statement; but its participation once more in a Cabinet—so strongly advocated by M. van Acker in the interests of stability—can surely be taken for granted. The question royale, hitherto so great an obstacle to Christian Social inclusion, is said to have been shelved sine die by agreement with the Socialists (presumably the right-wing Socialists) during the winter. This rapprochement, which is apparently the work of M. Raymond Scheyven, a prominent younger member of the Christian Social Party, had for its primary object the re-entry of the party into a coalition Cabinet.

Later reports suggest that the Liberals have refused to accept office under M. Spaak. Thus, a four-party coalition now seems to be out of the question, although M. Spaak has not entirely given up hope. At a press conference on the 15th March, he said that a programme had been "worked out" which, he believed, was acceptable to "both sides." He could not see "any really insurmountable obstacles." He added that delegates of the Socialist and Christian Social Parties had met and tentatively discussed allocation of portfolios.

FRANCE

At the Conference of Foreign Ministers (see under "The Moscow Conference") M. Bidault has been playing a more active rôle than at previous meetings. The French feel that they are no longer mediators, but vitally interested participants in the discussions on Germany, and there is anxiety lest the open conflict of interests between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S. and U.K. should obscure the real issues involved. On the 16th March M. Bidault outlined one of these fundamental issues when he dealt with the problem of the over-crowding of population within the frontiers of a diminished Germany. He was preoccupied with the danger to French security of a Germany whose density of population would be three times that of France, and the remedies he proposed included the provision in Germany of a standard of living high enough to ensure political and economic stability, the settlement of displaced persons outside Germany and the encouragement of German emigration. In this task, said M. Bidault, France was ready to play her part. This open admission of France's willingness to accept German immigrants is of great interest and no doubt indicates that Communist opposition to this step has been withdrawn.

The question of French recruitment of German civilian labour in the U.S. zones of Germany and Austria is now under discussion, and agreement has been reached on the recruitment of displaced persons in the U.S. zones for work in France.

In the matter of the German prisoners-of-war lent by the U.S. Army to the French at the end of hostilities, an agreement for their progressive repatriation and liberation was signed in Paris on the 13th March. The agreement is only provisional and does not apply to prisoners employed as miners (except in so far as the French agree to give them the same wages and rations as French miners) whom the French wish to hold on to as long as possible. There are 56,000 German prisoners employed in the French coal-mines, of whom 23,000 were captured by the Americans and 33,000 by the British, and the loss of these men, numbering nearly 20 per cent. of the French mining force, would cause a serious fall in coal output. The agreement, according to press reports, recognises the French wish to retain a proportion of the prisoners; all prisoners except the miners will be given the choice of repatriation to Germany or liberation in France with the status of foreign workers. They will have three months in which to decide, and inspectors of the International Red Cross will ensure that they have a free choice. Those who choose repatriation will be sent back at a minimum rate of 20,000 a month, beginning at once, and those who choose to remain in France will be released at a maximum rate of 25,000 a month. The total number of prisoners involved is not known exactly, but is estimated by the Americans at 450,000.

The French request for an increase in coal exports from the Ruhr beginning next month has been met by the U.K. and U.S. authorities. Provided that a minimum average production is maintained, exports are to be increased by 50,000 tons in April, by 200,000 tons in May and by 300,000 tons in June, and France will receive her due share of the increase. The French are not satisfied with this increase, although it represents a considerable sacrifice on our part, and in Moscow M. Bidault told the Foreign Secretary that the French attitude at the Conference would be affected by what we and the Americans could do for them over coal. In his proposals for economic control of Germany, outlined to the Conference on the 18th March, he asked that Germany should be required under the peace treaty to export a definite part of her coal production. France could only agree to a rise in the level of German industry if this provision were accepted.

A French Institute, attached to the University of Nancy, was opened at Homburg in the Saar on the 10th March by the Minister of Education. For the moment it consists only of a School of Medicine, but other Faculties will be added, and it will eventually acquire university status. This move is in keeping with the policy of spreading French culture and education in Germany and illustrates the importance attached by the French Government to the Saar itself.

The Paris press resumed publication on the 17th March after an interval of thirty-three days. Its reappearance is a victory for the Government which refused to allow the printers to be given higher wages except in return for increased work. The men have gone back to work at their old rate of pay, and newspapers will still appear on six days a week only, but negotiations on their demands are to continue. The strike has not so far caused the anticipated disappearance of some independent papers. The number of papers is, moreover, likely to increase now that papers may appear without prior Government authorisation (see last week's Summary).

The High Court has continued its operations by sentencing Raphaël Alibert, Vichy Minister of Justice in 1940, to death in absentia; and Admiral Robert, Vichy High Commissioner in the French West Indies, to ten years' imprisonment with a recommendation for a reprieve. The new High Court, which is a political jurisdiction exercising functions enjoyed by the Senate under the 1875 Constitution, is a definite improvement on that which tried Pétain and Laval, and its president, M. Noguéres, a Socialist deputy, conducts the proceedings with more dignity and despatch than his predecessor, M. Mongibeaux. The main defect of the present constitution of the Court, as laid down in a law of the 27th October, is the system of drawing the jury by lot from lists of deputies put forward by the parties in proportion to their strength in the Assembly. This introduces an element of chance as was seen in the trial of Baudouin, when ten out of the twenty-four parliamentary jurors were Communists, who pressed for a heavy sentence.

If it was in the anticipation of trouble that the Government put off for so long the debate on Indochina, their fears have been justified in the event. Scarcely was the debate opened on the 11th March, when a deputy of the Right, after deploring the importance of the functions attributed last month to the Communist Minister of National Defence, passed to a history of the Communist party. When he reached the well-worn theme of M. Thorez' behaviour before and during the war there was an uproar ending in a scuffle in the lobby as the sitting was suspended. The Communists were scarcely less vociferous the next day in defence of the Viet Nam Government, very strongly attacked by M. Reynaud. The debate was, however, resumed after an interval, but without the Communists. On the third day a deputy of the left-centre group, U.D.S.R., criticised Communist activity in Indochina in a manner which was declared by the Bureau of the Assembly to be within his rights, but which roused the Communists to such noisy objection as to warrant another suspension. Afterwards M. Herriot, who had performed with distinction his thankless task as President of the Assembly, and M. Ramadier, who had intervened in the interests of national unity, spoke in conciliatory terms. In a calmer atmosphere M. Mayer (Socialist) spoke in general terms of the desirability of renewing negotiations with the Annamese. The debate was resumed on the 18th and concluded in the early hours of the 19th with a big vote of confidence in the Government. The Communists, however, abstained and their action may have wider implications (see also under "Germany" and "Bulgaria").

SWITZERLAND

Switzerland joined her protest to that of Great Britain, the United States, France, Italy and Sweden against the Bulgarian Government's decree of the 7th March withdrawing from circulation a large section of their paper currency (see Summary No. 384, "Bulgaria"). According to a Swiss broadcast the Federal Political Department issued a statement on the 1st March, declaring that it had already expressed to the Bulgarian Minister to Switzerland its astonishment and grave concern at the treatment to which the Swiss Legation in Sofia had been subjected. However, as the monies tended by the Legation had now been exchanged for banknotes of the new Bulgarian issue, the incident could now be considered closed.

Representatives of the Treasury and the Bank of England held discussions with the Swiss Authorities in Berne from the 24th February to the 1st March with the object of reviewing the Anglo-Swiss Monetary Agreement of the 12th March, 1946. The limit of sterling to be held by Switzerland in the first year was exceeded in eight months. This was due not only to the heavy tourist traffic and to certain large non-recurring items, but also to substantial imports from Switzerland by sterling countries other than the United Kingdom. There are also suggestions that the allowance of £10 a day for businessmen visiting Switzerland may have been abused.

It has been stated in a Swiss broadcast that negotiations are proceeding with Sweden and Eire for the abolition of visas and that similar proposals will be submitted to the United Kingdom and Canada, and ultimately to certain other countries, provided that reciprocal concessions are made to Swiss nationals.

A conference of the International Association for Patents and Copyrights, attended by representatives of thirty-two countries, was held at Neuchâtel last month. Agreement was reached regarding patents and copyrights not registered during the war.

An exchange of trade exhibitions has been arranged with Italy. Swiss products will be on view in Milan from the 8th to the 27th March: Italian products will be shown in Geneva from the 14th May to the 2nd June.

Polish assets in Switzerland, which were blocked last October, have now been released.

One of the results of the Swiss-Argentine Commercial Agreement of the 20th January, described at the time of signing as an exceedingly important step towards the improvement of Switzerland's food supply, has been the arrival of butter from the Argentine. The Swiss monthly ration has been increased by 100 grammes, and for the time being best-grade local butter has been withdrawn from the Swiss market.

A Federal loan of 150 million fr. has been issued.

According to statistics for 33 towns, 6,751 dwelling-houses were built in 1946, while 12,514 new buildings have been approved for the current year.

The general tendency for wages and prices to rise continues. It is particularly noticeable that in the retail trade, prices are speedily increased as soon as the official control is removed.

The Federal Council has taken steps to meet the demand for agricultural labour by granting permits to foreign workers.

The number of Italians who took up employment in Switzerland during 1946 was approximately 48,000, of whom 15,000 were employed in hotels, 10,500 in agriculture, 7,700 in building, 4,200 in the metal industry and 4,000 in the textile industry.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

President Truman's dramatic gesture in seeking authority from Congress for American assistance to Greece and Turkey has created some excitement in Spain, where, of course, any challenge to "Soviet imperialism" is grist to the official mill. The press hacks have seized upon it as proof of General Franco's wisdom in holding to the course which was sketched out in his famous communication to Mr. Churchill at the end of 1944. One of the radio commentators makes a comparison with the events of 1933 "when Roosevelt sent his first warnings to Germany and Japan to make them desist from expansion" . . . No speech of Roosevelt stopped Germany or Japan, and we believe that speeches alone will not suffice to bar the Soviet impetus . . . By the customary roundabout expedient of an Efe message from Rome quoting from an "International News Service" cable appearing in the press there (which based itself on the familiar "London diplomatic circles") Spaniards were given to understand that the balance of power in the Mediterranean had become a burning question, and that neither Great Britain nor the United States, therefore, had any interest now in a change of régime in Spain.

There is nothing new in this narcissism and complacency. What is remarkable in the recent antics of the Spanish press—and rather shocking—is a return to the tone of cheap braggadoccio vis-à-vis this country which was abandoned in the summer of 1944 when the Caudillo and his intimates finally convinced themselves of an Allied victory. Arriba published prominently on its front page on the 2nd March a patronizing Comentario on the British economic crisis which was little less than insolent. "If the British were surprised by what was happening to them," said the writer, styling himself "Macaulay," "it was no surprise for us who have been watching the sun go down for them with their outworn systems, which may once have had some reason in them but now have grown sterile and ineffectual. The great British tragedy is that the British people refuse to understand that they have lost the war . . ." The writer then, after exclaiming that because of all the harm done to Spain in the course of history and of her unjust treatment in the international sphere, Spaniards had a perfect right to chortle at Britain's discomfiture, deplored her "melancholy situation" and hoped nevertheless that she would recover and set her house in order, taking a lesson from the measures of restriction and conservation which had been practised by the Franco regime.

H.M. Embassy in Madrid report that this and a whole crop of pseudonymous articles that have recently appeared are the work of the Caudillo's immediate entourage. It is quite clear that he and his friends at any rate are not at all abashed by Spain's isolation in the international domain—or indeed by the evidence that Spanish conservative and business circles are more and more turning away from the régime. General Franco's ostentatious homage to Catholicism—he recently sent an address to the Pope begging for the formal definition of the doctrine of the Assumption to be made a dogma of the Faith—is said to be considerably embarrassing the leaders of the Church. He knows, however, that abroad it is in Catholic circles, and there alone, that his régime gets support, and he loses no opportunity of "plugging" this appeal. Apart from Peronist Argentina, which, of course, is very much in favour these days—the advent of the new Labour Attaché to the Argentine Embassy, Señor Ramon Vera, has provided an excellent occasion for mutual complimenting—someone on the Caudillo's staff (probably Manual Aznar, recently back from Washington) has reminded him of the substantial Catholic population in the United States, and so we have had within a month two outsize interviews granted at El Pardo, one to the egregious Constantine Brown, representing the Washington Evening Star on the 15th February and the other on the 5th March to a correspondent of the (Hearst) International News Service. The first, which contained all the usual clap-trap about Spain's clean bill of "neutrality," Soviet intervention in the civil war, the depredations of the Reds, &c., was notable only for the statement: "Had I believed that to resign my leadership would be in my country's interests, I should have done so without hesitation and with pleasure . . . ." The second, after a comment on the "shameful" judgement passed by the United Nations, made some attempt to estimate the achievements of the régime in the political and economic sphere—"never was there a more socially-minded Government or greater co-operation between the Head of the State and his people." It dismissed as "empty words" the suggestion that there was any such thing as a "Democratic Alliance" in Spain, or any Christian-Democrat Party or indeed any Monarchist opposition.

General Franco may still profess to think that Monarchist opposition is negligible. But he seems to have been in two minds about allowing a number of well-known Royalists to make the journey to Lisbon to attend the unofficial "Crown Council" which Don Juan has convoked there this week (see Summary No. 383). Juan Ventosa, the Catalan business magnate and former Minister of Finance, and Count Rodezno, the Traditionalist leader, are among those who have gone. The Duke of Alba is reported to have been refused a visa on the ground that he was a "freemason" and had been colloguing with Republican exiles. Don Juan, by the way, has stamped hard on the suggestion that he is weakening in his opposition to Franco and all his works. And, in connexion with the Right-Left negotiations which are continuing, he has very sensibly counselled one of the Left leaders not to worry any of the Foreign Missions in Madrid with details, since "they are only interested in knowing the solution that the Spaniards themselves have been able to find for their national problems." There is no further development in the story of the Republican Government-in-exile. Señor Llopis (and the President) have had talks with MM. Ramadier and Bidault and have attended a reception at the Palais-Bourbon at which M. Herriot did the honours. He has also had a trip to Brussels where he had interviews with MM. Huysmans and Spaak. He seems to have had a cordial reception from Belgian Socialists; but the only noteworthy event in his visit was a remark, attributed by the news agencies to M. Spaak, that the "reasonable time" within which the United Nations Recommendation of the 12th December gave Spain to solve the problem of Franco's removal (before the Security Council had another go at it) might be taken as "six months."

Portugal

Dr. Salazar has, somewhat surprisingly, embarked on a scheme for the reorganisation of Portuguese defence. Stating that he proposes to table a Bill on the general question of mobilisation during the next legislative period, he has sent forward to the National Assembly now a Bill for the formation of a Supreme National Defence Council. The idea, apparently, is that the Ministry of War will in future be flanked by a Ministry of Civil Mobilisation to deal with emergency situations. It is stipulated, too, that the directing of military operation should be the exclusive responsibility of the commanders of the forces concerned. Whether Lt.-Col. Santos Costa, the present Minister for War, is happy about thus "shedding the load" remains to be seen. The National Defence Commission of the Corporative Chamber met on the 14th March to begin the preliminary examination of the bill.

At long last the Committee of Inquiry into the country's Corporative Organization, which was set up by the Government early in 1945, has produced its report to the National Assembly. It was published the other day as a supplement to the Diario das Sessões. The report appears to be a sensible and useful document and contains an admission that there have been serious defects in the functioning of the Organization, not all of which could be attributed to the exigencies of the War period.

In his capacity as President of the Central Committee of the National Union Dr. Salazar made a speech on the 4th March welcoming the new Executive Committee. It was the usual apologia pro domo suo, well-phrased and, within its limits, convincing, with the addition, however, of an interesting avowal that the Government had hitherto been rather too engrossed in carrying out necessary large-scale administrative reforms to the neglect of political doctrine and organization.

ITALY

The Constituent Assembly has now begun to discuss the draft Constitution. The draft is meeting with criticism from all parties. There is a general feeling that it is too obviously the result of compromise and is lacking in clarity. Moreover although parts of the draft are vague in the extreme other parts are too detailed and include matter which should not be included as part of the Constitution. Benedetto Croce has said that the draft is badly written because it was written by too many people and that whatever else might be collectivised the art of writing could not. What was needed was not a series of dangerous compromises but a series of juridical rules which would guarantee the rights and the freedom of all citizens, irrespective of political opinion or social status. He went on to say that the Lateran Treaties should not have been included in the Constitution because there was nothing in common between a Constitution and an international treaty. Croce also said that he did not approve of regional autonomy because the unity of the State must be maintained. Togliatti, on behalf of the Communists, said that there were three points from which the Constitution could not depart—the freedom and sovereignty of the people, the political and moral unity of the Italian people, and social progress and the advent of a new ruling class. He expressed himself as opposed to the inclusion of the Lateran Treaties in the Constitution. And he, too, declared that he disapproved of any form of federalism, although he believed in autonomous régimes for certain regions.

Signor Terracini, the President of the Constituent Assembly, has sent to the Parliaments of France, Great Britain, the U.S.A., and the U.S.S.R., messages with a view to obtaining, "within the ambit of U.N. and by means of peaceful agreements between the Powers concerned, the revision of the terms inflicted on Italy, which contain territorial mutilations that hurt her national sentiments, ungenerous humiliations to her Army, Air Force and Navy, which did not spare themselves while fighting side by side with the Allied combatants, and financial and economic burdens that will hinder her recovery and social progress." Count Sforza, while on a visit to Florence, in reply to an enquiry as to what Italy's future policy will be within the framework of U.N. stated that she will have to do what Cavour did at the Paris Congress (1856) when he advocated the advent of liberty and true peace in Europe: "Shortsighted individuals accused him at the time of not having made specific mention of Italy. They were wrong. He rendered a service to Italy just because he identified her with those supreme principles which were bound to triumph. History proves that he was right."

Signor Giannini, the Qualunquist leader, has been trying for some time, not without success, to secure the support of the Vatican for his Party. It transpired some time ago that Giannini himself had never been received into the Church, as his English mother had been a Protestant. He therefore went to the Vatican and beat Solomon Grundy's record by being received into the Church and married on the same day!

The Italian Press continues to proclaim Italy's right to secure the return of her colonies. A correspondent of the independent right-wing Tempo at present in Eritrea reports from Massawa that the party which is in favour of union to Ethiopia is fairly strong but less numerous than that of the Independence Party, the majority of whom "look to Italy as the Power that offers the greatest guarantees and is more apt to safeguard the progress of Eritrea and to stimulate it, in other words to continue the work of half a century which a few years of mistaken administration cannot efface."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Roumania

In these days it is pleasant to be able to detect a lightening of the atmosphere in Roumania. There are indications that certain developments may lead to a modification of Communist policy. Some groups within the Government show faint signs of asserting their independence. The Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Supply has resigned and has explained to his Social Democrat supporters that he is unable to carry on owing to Communist interference. The danger here is that there is no effective leadership of the opposition, and that these anti-Communist activities may provoke reprisals while they are still in the formative stages. At the same time the slighting treatment by the Yugoslav authorities of the Roumanian mission in their country has been explained by the Counsellor of the Yugoslav Legation, in conversation with the British Representative, as being due to the fact that Roumania is not sufficiently communised to please the Tito Government.

The Government are a little anxious about the chances of the Industrial Bureau Bill. Some changes have been made in its provisions, but the Social Democrats and the Dissident Liberals are acting together to secure its rejection.

A number of trade agreements have been signed at Moscow. The Treaty of Commerce and Navigation confers unusual privileges upon the Russian Commercial representatives in Roumania. They are to have diplomatic privilege, and to be allowed to establish themselves at Constanţa, Galaţi, Iaşi, Cluj and elsewhere in premises which are to be regarded as extra-territorial. A Trade and Payments Agreement provides for the despatch of steel to Roumania for manufacture in Roumanian mills and return to Russia. 21,000 tons of steel is to be supplied for internal use in Roumania, and of this 6,500 tons are to be delivered to Sovrompetrol as oil-well tubing. 250,000 tons of petroleum products in all and 100,000 cubic metres of timber are also to be supplied to the U.S.S.R. Prices are to be calculated in U.S. dollars. A Convention dealing with a credit to Roumania of 10,000,000 dollars which is the estimated difference between the values of goods supplied on either side, is to be repaid over four years with interest at 3 per cent. A Protocol for Economic Collaboration envisages the creation of further Sovrom companies, and enlists the support of Roumania for the Russian interest in the Petroşani Coal Mines recently acquired from Hungary. Finally, there is a Protocol dealing with the execution of Article 12 of the Armistice which provides for the return to Russia of property taken by Roumania during the war. The balance owed by Roumania on the 1st January, 1946, is estimated at 100 milliard lei, and payment is to be completed by 1951.

An extension of time for the deposit of Roumanian Bank shares held by foreigners has been granted up to the 1st July.

Yugoslavia

The Director of Food Supply has held a press conference on the food situation. In spite of all the measures taken to make the best use of available resources it was not possible, he said, to satisfy even the essential needs of the population, and help from UNRRA, or from any organisation which was to continue UNRRA's work, was indispensable and urgent. As was stated in last week's Summary the head of UNRRA in Yugoslavia, M. Sergeichik, had appealed to Washington for the dispatch of grain. In reply the Director-General of UNRRA has promised to supply the grain if the British and American representatives in Belgrade can guarantee that Yugoslavia's need is genuine.

For various reasons the extent of that need is difficult to assess. The Government's difficulty in persuading the peasants to surrender their stocks of grain has already been mentioned here. In February only 45 per cent. of the estimated quantity of maize and 77 per cent. of other grains had been collected. Bad weather and a shortage of coal have hindered transport. The inefficiency and inexperience of Yugoslavia's new bureaucracy have also contributed to the maldistribution of foodstuffs. But a more serious aspect of the situation arises out of the Government's new policy of developing the export trade in order to obtain foreign exchange for the purchase of the goods and materials required to fulfil the five-year plan of industrialisation. Some of Yugoslavia's most marketable goods are farm products. Turkeys and poultry have within recent months been exported to Great Britain, Czechoslovakia and Switzerland. The United Kingdom has been offered, too, deliveries of cheese, butter and condensed milk. 30,000 pigs have been offered to Poland. Dried fruit has been sent to Russia. It may be that by the sale of such foodstuffs the Yugoslav Government hope to earn sufficient foreign exchange to buy grain. On the other hand in January 20,000 tons of wheat were shipped in some secrecy to Roumania. The Yugoslav representative on the Financial Commission for Trieste affirmed that his country could provide 89 per cent. of Trieste's food requirements, and in the recent trade agreement with Czechoslovakia Yugoslavia has promised to supply foodstuffs of a high calorific value. Yet the Director of Food Supply said that "there can be no talk of regularly supplying the population with fats, vegetables and meat. The calorific value of food for the consumer is scarcely sufficient to maintain a bare existence."

Thus, although Yugoslavia's shortage of foodstuffs may be genuine, it does not seem to have been unavoidable.

Greece

President Truman's speech to Congress urging help to Greece has been welcomed with deep satisfaction by all Greek political circles except the Communists. Messages of gratitude to the President have been sent by the King of the Hellenes, the Premier and M. Tsaldaris who described the speech as "realistic and objective, giving a true picture of the present situation in Greece." Meanwhile the House of Commons has agreed to a Supplementary Estimate of £19,000,000 for aid to Greece and, in order that the Greek Government may proceed with their proposed reorganisation of the Greek Army, His Majesty's Government have agreed to make available free of charge a further £2 millions worth of equipment. Moreover, in order to cover maintenance during the period between the 31st March and the 14th April—by which time it is hoped the U.S. Government's aid may become effective—His Majesty's Government have agreed to release £1 million of certain Greek funds now blocked in London against an equivalent sum of debts owed by the Greek Government to the U.K.

The Army have already reported considerable success in their anti-bandit sweeps in the region of Vermion and Mt. Ossa and also North of Kilkis. There have, however, been two raids by bandits near the Albanian frontier; another large band which attacked near Xanthi withdrew only after an eight-hour battle with the Army; and a train running from Drama to Alexandroupolis was derailed and attacked by bandits. There has been little response during the week to the Government's amnesty offer but it is probable that the bandits' morale will be considerably lowered if and when Congress approves any loan to Greece.

The United Nations Enquiry Commission in Salonica continued their hearing of witnesses whose depositions were included in the Greek White Book of Evidence. Cross-examination of witnesses has been mainly confined to questions by the Albanian, Bulgarian and Yugoslav representatives and by the Russian and Polish delegates who have all aimed at discrediting the witnesses by endeavouring to pick holes in minor details of the statements. All questions of serious matters of substance, however, have been answered by witnesses with a considerable amount of circumstantial evidence. Most of them, by standing up so well to this cross-examination by the Slav bloc, have made a good impression on the neutral delegates and have, on occasions, made the Slavs look ridiculous. It seems that the two teams who have been conducting operations in the field have also had experience of Slav partiality, especially during what turned out to be a fantastic wild-goose chase in search of Markos Vafiades.

It was agreed that the main body of the Commission would visit the Yugoslav frontier on the 15th and 18th March and would then leave for the Bulgarian frontier, continuing to Sofia and Belgrade. Meanwhile a team would continue to hear evidence in Salonica and would proceed to Belgrade at the end of March together with the teams now in the field. All should reach Geneva about the 10th April.

They are to have diplomatic privilege, and to be allowed to establish themselves at Constanța, Galați, Iași, Cluj and elsewhere in premises which are to be regarded as extra-territorial. A Trade and Payments Agreement provides for the despatch of steel to Roumania for manufacture in Roumanian mills and return to Russia. 21,000 tons of steel is to be supplied for internal use in Roumania, and of this 6,500 tons are to be delivered to Sovrompetrol as oil-well tubing. 250,000 tons of petroleum products in all and 100,000 cubic metres of timber are also to be supplied to the U.S.S.R. Prices are to be calculated in U.S. dollars. A Convention dealing with a credit to Roumania of 10,000,000 dollars which is the estimated difference between the values of goods supplied on either side, is to be repaid over four years with interest at 3 per cent. A Protocol for Economic Collaboration envisages the creation of further Sovrom companies, and enlists the support of Roumania for the Russian interest in the Petroşani Coal Mines recently acquired from Hungary. Finally, there is a Protocol dealing with the execution of Article 12 of the Armistice which provides for the return to Russia of property taken by Roumania during the war. The balance owed by Roumania on the 1st January, 1946, is estimated at 100 milliard lei, and payment is to be completed by 1951.

An extension of time for the deposit of Roumanian Bank shares held by foreigners has been granted up to the 1st July.

Yugoslavia

The Director of Food Supply has held a press conference on the food situation. In spite of all the measures taken to make the best use of available resources it was not possible, he said, to satisfy even the essential needs of the population, and help from UNRRA, or from any organisation which was to continue UNRRA's work, was indispensable and urgent. As was stated in last week's Summary the head of UNRRA in Yugoslavia, M. Sergeichik, had appealed to Washington for the dispatch of grain. In reply the Director-General of UNRRA has promised to supply the grain if the British and American representatives in Belgrade can guarantee that Yugoslavia's need is genuine.

For various reasons the extent of that need is difficult to assess. The Government's difficulty in persuading the peasants to surrender their stocks of grain has already been mentioned here. In February only 45 per cent. of the estimated quantity of maize and 77 per cent. of other grains had been collected. Bad weather and a shortage of coal have hindered transport. The inefficiency and inexperience of Yugoslavia's new bureaucracy have also contributed to the maldistribution of foodstuffs. But a more serious aspect of the situation arises out of the Government's new policy of developing the export trade in order to obtain foreign exchange for the purchase of the goods and materials required to fulfil the five-year plan of industrialisation. Some of Yugoslavia's most marketable goods are farm products. Turkeys and poultry have within recent months been exported to Great Britain, Czechoslovakia and Switzerland. The United Kingdom has been offered, too, deliveries of cheese, butter and condensed milk. 30,000 pigs have been offered to Poland. Dried fruit has been sent to Russia. It may be that by the sale of such foodstuffs the Yugoslav Government hope to earn sufficient foreign exchange to buy grain. On the other hand in January 20,000 tons of wheat were shipped in some secrecy to Roumania. The Yugoslav representative on the Financial Commission for Trieste affirmed that his country could provide 89 per cent. of Trieste's food requirements, and in the recent trade agreement with Czechoslovakia Yugoslavia has promised to supply foodstuffs of a high calorific value. Yet the Director of Food Supply said that "there can be no talk of regularly supplying the population with fats, vegetables and meat. The calorific value of food for the consumer is scarcely sufficient to maintain a bare existence."

Thus, although Yugoslavia's shortage of foodstuffs may be genuine, it does not seem to have been unavoidable.

Greece

President Truman's speech to Congress urging help to Greece has been welcomed with deep satisfaction by all Greek political circles except the Communists. Messages of gratitude to the President have been sent by the King of the Hellenes, the Premier and M. Tsaldaris who described the speech as "realistic and objective, giving a true picture of the present situation in Greece." Meanwhile the House of Commons has agreed to a Supplementary Estimate of £19,000,000 for aid to Greece and, in order that the Greek Government may proceed with their proposed reorganisation of the Greek Army, His Majesty's Government have agreed to make available free of charge a further £2 millions worth of equipment. Moreover, in order to cover maintenance during the period between the 31st March and the 14th April—by which time it is hoped the U.S. Government's aid may become effective—His Majesty's Government have agreed to release £1 million of certain Greek funds now blocked in London against an equivalent sum of debts owed by the Greek Government to the U.K.

The Army have already reported considerable success in their anti-bandit sweeps in the region of Vermion and Mt. Ossa and also North of Kilkis. There have, however, been two raids by bandits near the Albanian frontier; another large band which attacked near Xanthi withdrew only after an eight-hour battle with the Army; and a train running from Drama to Alexandroupolis was derailed and attacked by bandits. There has been little response during the week to the Government's amnesty offer but it is probable that the bandits' morale will be considerably lowered if and when Congress approves any loan to Greece.

The United Nations Enquiry Commission in Salonica continued their hearing of witnesses whose depositions were included in the Greek White Book of Evidence. Cross-examination of witnesses has been mainly confined to questions by the Albanian, Bulgarian and Yugoslav representatives and by the Russian and Polish delegates who have all aimed at discrediting the witnesses by endeavouring to pick holes in minor details of the statements. All questions of serious matters of substance, however, have been answered by witnesses with a considerable amount of circumstantial evidence. Most of them, by standing up so well to this cross-examination by the Slav bloc, have made a good impression on the neutral delegates and have, on occasions, made the Slavs look ridiculous. It seems that the two teams who have been conducting operations in the field have also had experience of Slav partiality, especially during what turned out to be a fantastic wild-goose chase in search of Markos Vafiades.

It was agreed that the main body of the Commission would visit the Yugoslav frontier on the 15th and 18th March and would then leave for the Bulgarian frontier, continuing to Sofia and Belgrade. Meanwhile a team would continue to hear evidence in Salonica and would proceed to Belgrade at the end of March together with the teams now in the field. All should reach Geneva about the 10th April.

Bulgaria

At the beginning of this week the situation resulting from the events of the 7th and 8th March, described in last week's Summary, was that while no apology had been received from the Bulgarian authorities for their discourteous and uncalled-for treatment of the Allied representatives, and while M. Dimitrov had publicly repeated his assertion that certain missions had been engaged in illegal traffic in gold and foreign exchange, he had so far yielded to the strong representations made to him as to settle satisfactorily the purely financial aspect of the matter: that is to say, he had authorised the immediate payment of the remainder of the funds presented by foreign missions for exchange into the new currency. At first it had appeared that their seven more or less identical notes of protest sent in on the 8th March were going to be ignored; and moreover, when the Foreign Ministry did deign to reply, they did so in a completely unsatisfactory manner; but before that the heads of the missions concerned—those of Great Britain, the United States, France, Sweden, Switzerland, Italy and Turkey—had met on the 11th and drafted a collective note protesting still more emphatically, and it was this sharp collective protest which wrung M. Dimitrov's withers. Some further steps were taken by the French Government on account of the assault made on the French Minister (since then recalled to Paris to report) and the expulsion from Bulgaria, at 24 hours' notice, of a French woman journalist (Bulgarian by birth) who had been struck in the face on the same occasion. In retaliation two Bulgarian journalists were expelled from France, privileges were withdrawn from eight others, and the negotiations for a commercial agreement which had been going on in Paris for some weeks were broken off.

On the 16th March the new British Political Representative, Mr. J. C. Sterndale Bennett, arrived at Sofia from Istanbul. During the previous ten days the Bulgarian frontier had remained closed, while the withdrawal of the old currency notes was proceeding. The authorities do not believe in leaving anything to chance. The Government press and the wireless have been daily warning the public about the penalties in store for those who try to evade the regulations, and explaining to the peasants (especially) that they are not going to be impoverished in consequence of the monetary reforms. For throwing doubt on this—and perhaps also for recommending in a leading article that Bulgaria should take note of the latest American moves and modify her policy accordingly—one of the two surviving Opposition newspapers has been suspended for ten days. When a Parliamentary Question on this subject from the Opposition benches was ignored and a fairly stormy protest was made in consequence, the whole of the Opposition were sentenced to exclusion from the Assembly for three sittings. One little nigger-boy was now left—the organ of the Social Democrats: that dared to mention these occurrences a little disapprovingly, and its whole issue was instantly confiscated. Even the next day it was not allowed to appear.

With some effrontery, in all the circumstances, the Bulgarian Government have sent letters to each of the four Foreign Ministers attending the Moscow Conference, in which they coolly ask for reparations from Germany on the ground that Bulgaria declared war on Germany [in September 1944], fought against her with 340,000 men, and suffered losses amounting to 40,000 dead, wounded or missing.

Turkey

Deep satisfaction has been caused in Turkey by President Truman's request to Congress for authority to use American funds and American military and civilian personnel in assuring the independence and economic soundness of Turkey, on the principle that free peoples must be helped "to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian régimes." Although they have stood firm under the war of nerves which the Soviet Union has been waging against them for the last two years, the Turks have in their heart of hearts been counting on concrete American help for the lifting of the Russian cloud which has so long been overshadowing them. The inefficiency of the Turkish forces is due not only to the lack of modern equipment—particularly transport—but also to complacency, inertia and lack of experience. The Turks need more up-to-date weapons, and perhaps more instructors than Great Britain can supply. Further, they need financial and economic support if they are to keep their economy sound despite the continued mobilisation which Soviet pressure imposes on them. One of their chief internal schemes is their new five-years' industrialisation plan. President Truman's gesture brings them hope of having not only the finance but also the security for pursuing the modernisation of their country.

Owing to a mistranslation the first reports received in Turkey suggested that

C267100

His Majesty's Government were asking the United States to take over our obligations under the Anglo-Turkish treaty of 1939. Considerable consternation resulted, but when it was found that H.M. Government held as closely to the alliance as ever, it was readily recognised as natural that, in view of Great Britain's strained economy, the required economic and financial support should come from the United States.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The whole of the sitting of the Senate on the 11th March was devoted to a debate on a motion by Abdul Hamid Abdul Hakk (Independent) regarding the Prime Minister's statement on the breaking-off of the Treaty negotiations on the 3rd March. The Senator congratulated the Government on the attitude they had taken up with regard to the evacuation of British troops and the unity of the Nile Valley, but complained that they were silent on the subject of the 1936 Treaty, which should have been abrogated, a step on which all Egyptians were agreed and one which it was within the rights of Egypt to take. He then asked what the Prime Minister had meant by his reference to self-government for the Sudanese and the restoration of Egypt's rights in the administration of the Sudan. If he meant that Egyptians would share the administration with the British, that implied recognition of the 1899 Agreement; the demand for the evacuation of Egypt and the Sudan should have been more precise. He regarded the term "self-government" as an unfortunate one, since it could properly be applied only to a country detached from another and not to a part of the territory of one country. The law provided severe punishment for "separatists." Nokrashy's statement that Egypt desires that the Sudanese shall be able as soon as possible to express their views freely, which they can do only after British troops have left the Sudan, opened the door wide to the destruction of the unity of the Nile Valley. He claimed that the whole question had been inadequately studied, and that complete and immediate evacuation should have been demanded from the outset of the negotiations. In conclusion he asked the Prime Minister whether he was demanding the evacuation of Egypt and the Sudan, and said that the unity of the Nile Valley must be complete, as it was before 1880, when Egyptians and Sudanese sat side by side on the Legislative Council. In his reply Nokrashy Pasha claimed that he had, in fact, expressed in full all the rights of Egypt in his statement of the 3rd March; that he had said that evacuation should be complete and immediate, and that this demand would be forcefully presented to the Security Council. He declared that "self-government" meant that the administration of the Sudan would be taken away from the British and put in the hands of the Sudanese. Although this step must be taken within the framework of the unity of Egypt and the Sudan, Egypt had not demanded domination of the Sudan. He said that the prospect of the Sudanese expressing their aspirations caused him no alarm, but that British troops must be withdrawn before they did so. He claimed that his demand in this respect strengthened rather than weakened the unity of the two countries. After a plea by another senator for national unity (the only means by which national aims could be achieved) the debate was adjourned until the 18th March.

Sidky Pasha, in an interview with the Ahram, maintains his view that Egypt has more to gain from negotiations with His Majesty's Government than from reference to the United Nations, but the general tone of the press remains as anti-British as before. The Ikhwan al Muslimin and the Young Men's Muslim Association have been giving a religious turn to the campaign of anti-British propaganda, in which the Government and the Wafd vie with one another in extremism, while the attitude of the Palace is clearly one of encouragement.

According to the press Egypt's case for presentation to the Security Council has now been prepared, and copies have been circulated to the Arab and other foreign legations in Cairo. The Muqattam asserts that these memoranda have been described by some foreigners who have seen them as constituting a convincing argument for the unity of the Nile Valley. The Dastur says that the case will be before the Council before the end of the month, and that the delay has been due only to a desire that it should first come before the Arab League, whose Council met on the 17th March.

Palestine

On the 16th March it was announced that the period of martial law imposed on certain areas would be brought to an end at noon the following day. It had then been in force for fifteen days, the maximum period for which it was estimated that the restrictions could be maintained. The economic effects are certainly serious, but they cannot at present be estimated. Allegations that the intention of the Government was to strangle Jewish economy were reported last week, and it is probable that it will now be claimed that the attempt has been defeated. The Jewish Chronicle, commenting last week on the succession of "Operation Hippo" (evacuation of civilians) by "Operation Elephant" (martial law), remarked that "the mark of failure is stamped on a policy which sets out thus to trample and to squash," and suggests that "this amiable zoological nomenclature emphasises the virtues of bulk rather than those of cerebration." At the same time there appears to have been no slackening in public denunciations of the terrorists in the areas affected, and many individuals have shown willingness to give information which, it is hoped, will lead to important results in the apprehension of terrorists. Since the Order was made, twenty-four known terrorists have been arrested, the majority outside the martial law area. Although there seems still to be little chance of the Jewish institutions withdrawing their refusal to co-operate with the Government, there are signs that the Yishuv may not continue to follow their lead, and there is some feeling that any action to bring terrorism to an end should be taken, even though it might lead to an open clash.

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency report a new line of argument by the Hagana to persuade the terrorists to cease their activities. In an "ultimatum," said to have been issued on the 15th March, they are told that their help will shortly be required in an "all-out effort" to ensure large-scale immigration which is to start immediately, and they are urged to use their forces in a constructive manner for defying the Government's "illegal immigration law." Reuter has reported the sailing from the United States of a small fleet of illegal immigrants' ships, said to have been purchased by the Hagana, but nothing further is known about them except for a report that one, the President Warfield, had put back with engine trouble.

A meeting of the Jewish Agency Executive started on the 15th March at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, where Ben Gurion is undergoing treatment. Dr. Silver had arrived from the United States of America the previous day, and the meeting had been postponed on account of the delay which he had experienced. In a statement made in Jerusalem on the 14th March Dr. Silver said that future policy would have to be decided as well as the course of action to be taken "if and when the Palestine problem is brought before the United Nations." It is thought that the position of Dr. Weizmann will also come up for discussion, and that the enlargement of the Jewish Agency Executive to include all schools of Zionist thought may be considered.

Acts of terrorism continue, and include attacks on road transport and on the railway. A Jewish bank in Tel Aviv was held up on the 13th March, and £P.14,000 was stolen. On the night of the 16th March the press conference room of the Jewish Agency was blown to pieces. It has been generally assumed that this was the work of the Stern Gang.

On the 12th March the Susannah, an illegal immigrant ship, ran ashore at a point a few miles north of El Mejdal in the Gaza district. The majority of the passengers reached the shore and mingled with the colonists, who were ready to receive them. A military and police cordon was thrown round the area, and over one thousand persons were taken into custody preparatory to screening, which was made very difficult by the unhelpful attitude of both immigrants and settlers. Eventually nearly two hundred were recognised as local residents, and the remainder were transported to Cyprus. A broadcast from the Kol Israel station claims that about two hundred local residents have been sent to Cyprus with the immigrants, and that "several hundred illegal immigrants have been absorbed in the settlement." The broadcast added that "scores of thousands" of immigrants are expected in the near future.

Iraq

As was expected the Iraqi elections have resulted in a triumph for the Government candidates. The Government resigned on the 12th March, but Nuri Pasha, the Prime Minister, was asked by the Regent to retain office until a new Government could be formed.

Arab League

The Sixth Meeting of the Council of the Arab League began in Cairo on the 17th March under the Presidency of Yusuf Yasin, representing Sa'udi Arabia. In his opening address the Chairman expressed the hope that the aspirations of Egypt and of the inhabitants of the Nile Valley would be fulfilled. According to press reports subsequent discussions were held in camera, and it was then announced that a Political Committee had been formed.

Persia

Although a sufficient number of deputies have now been elected to form the necessary quorum for convening the new Majlis, it appears unlikely, according to the British Military Attaché, Tehran, that it will be convened before the end of April. The Minister for War (General Ahmedi) has given as a reason for the delay the fact that the Cabinet wished first to see the results of the Moscow Conference. The delegates so far elected are, almost without exception, either members of the Persian Democrat Party or on the Prime Minister's list of approved candidates. A fuller report on the election results and on the elected deputies will appear as soon as details are available.

The work of the delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions (see last week's Summary) is still impeded by the obdurate attitude of Borisov. On the 13th March he again refused either to proceed to Abadan or to meet the Government before El Aris had arrived. Mr. Harries, the British member, then announced his intention to visit Abadan in company with Naficy, Under-Secretary in the Ministry of Labour (who was going there to study the application of labour laws by the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company) and, if necessary, to conduct an independent investigation. The other delegates met on the 14th March to consider this development, but their decision is not yet known.

Reports from Kurdistan indicate that the Barzanis, under Mulla Mustafa (see Summary No. 382) have made very slow progress in their return trek to Iraq. They are being delayed by sickness, snow, lack of animal transport, and by transit negotiations with the Pizhdur Kurds of 'Iraq. Meanwhile, the disarming of the Persian Kurds (see Summary No. 379) continues. Four columns of the Persian Army are engaged in these operations, which have so far been directed solely against one section of the Herki Kurds under Zero Beg. The Chief of the General Staff has stated that, by early March, 40,000 rifles had been collected in Kurdistan and Azerbaijan.

Farouhar, the Minister of Roads and Communications, has stated that he has secured enough money to start work immediately on the completion of the standard-gauge railway from Mianeh to Tabriz—a task which, by reason of the limited amount of money available each year, would take three years. When completed, the line will extend from Tehran to Tabriz, where it will connect with the existing 5-ft. gauge line linked to the Soviet railway system via Julfa. Other railway construction projects were mentioned in Summary No. 362 of the 2nd October, 1946.

THE FAR EAST

China

The initial step toward the long-promised broadening of the Nanking Government has been taken in the appointment of 81 third-party delegates to the Legislative Yuan, the Control Yuan and the People's Political Council. It is expected that further reorganisation will be effected before the end of March, thus bringing to an end the periods of Kuomintang political tutelage. Unfortunately, however, this step may be too late to play any immediate part in arresting the general spirit of discontent and restlessness that is now manifesting itself, particularly throughout southern China.

On the 7th March, the Communist delegation left Nanking for Yenan by air, despite the hope they had expressed to the United States Ambassador, Dr. Stuart, that they might finally be permitted to retain their delegations in Nanking and Shanghai. They had gone so far as to hint that Yenan was contemplating some modification of the two Communist demands which had made further attempts at negotiation impossible—the dissolution of the National Assembly and a return to the military positions that maintained in January 1946. When the chief Communist Delegate, Tung Pi-wu, called before leaving, Dr. Stuart entrusted him with a message to Yenan that he was prepared to transmit to General Chiang Kai-shek any proposal which they might send him for the resumption of negotiations and, provided he considered the suggestion fair and reasonable, to urge the Generalissimo to accept it. He even expressed his willingness to travel to Yenan in person for discussions if it would help to put an end to civil war. The Communist representative for UNRRA and his staff are being permitted to remain in Shanghai and it is through this channel that Tung Pi-wu expects to be able to communicate Yenan's reply to Dr. Stuart. General Chiang Kai-shek, on the other hand, has clearly given up all hope of arriving at any settlement with the Communists by means other than by force. In a speech at Nanking on the 15th March he is reported to have stressed the finality of the split with the Communists and to have declared that the Government had no option but to use armed force, since the Communists were deliberately trying to enlarge their sphere of influence by fomenting disturbances in areas under Government control.

Press reports credit official sources in Nanking with the expression of opinion that Yenan has been acting in co-operation with the Soviet Union in attempting to get the Chinese problem placed before the Moscow Conference and that in an effort to impress the "Big Four" Foreign Ministers with the extent of their strength, Mao Tze-tung has issued orders to his forces to conduct a full-scale offensive in an endeavour to capture as many strategic points as possible during the Conference. What substance there is for this assertion it is not stated. If, as it would seem, however, the Communists did intend the launching of a more than usually vigorous offensive to coincide with the opening of the Moscow Conference, it can scarcely have served its purpose. In Shantung the Government would appear to have sustained reverses along the railway line between Tsinan and Tsintao; and Tsinan, itself, is still being heavily attacked by a large Communist detachment. In Manchuria the defeated Communist forces were able to re-group and, after crossing the Sungari River under the protection of a snowstorm, succeeded in making some progress in their attempt to recapture Tehwei, the town generally regarded as the gateway to Changchun. This success, however, was short-lined and they were once again driven off with substantial losses. In Shensi, too, Kuomintang troops, crossing from southern Shansi, are reported to have captured the Communist capital, Yenan, although reports state that they have inherited an empty shell. The city, which was reported previously to have been bombed from the air, had been stripped and was almost deserted—the Communist forces having gone into the surrounding hills, no doubt to follow their established practice of waging guerrilla warfare.

At Moscow M. Molotov has already suggested, first, that the Council of Foreign Ministers should formally examine reports on implementing the decisions arrived at regarding China at the Moscow Conference of December 1945, and, failing that, the Ministers concerned should exchange opinions at a private sitting. These two suggestions have been rejected by Mr. Bevin and the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Marshall, in deference to the wishes of the Government of China that on this occasion her internal affairs should not be discussed either formally or informally (see Summary No. 383). Mr. Marshall, however, agreed to furnish information concerning the execution of the provisions of the Moscow declaration regarding China; this, Mr. Bevin pointed out, was not applicable in the case of H.M. Government, who had had no troops in China. In this connexion it is of some interest that the Soviet Ambassador to China should have enquired recenty of Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, Minister for Foreign Affairs, whether China is now prepared to resume control of Dairen and participate in the operation of the Manchurian Railway in accordance with the terms of the Agreement entered into in August, 1945.

On more than one occasion General Chiang Kai-shek has expressed confidence in his ability to restore peace and unity to the country within a period from six months to a year. This, however, is not the view taken by Mr. Marshall, whose expression of opinion to Mr. Bevin in the course of a recent confidential conversation was gloomy in the extreme. He said that he thought the existing situation could scarcely be worse for the Kuomintang and that it seemed to him to offer every opportunity to the Communist Party. Months ago he had warned General Chiang Kai-shek that unless the Government modified their policy they were faced with military and economic chaos. Instead of heeding this warning, however, and confining military operations to essential objectives, they were fast exhausting their best American-trained troops in costly operations fore-doomed to failure. The local inhabitants of rural districts refused to co-operate with occupying Government units because they were terrified of the measures that would be taken against them when the Communists reappeared in the districts concerned after the Kuomintang forces had moved forward. One General on the Government side had seen eye to eye with Mr. Marshall in realising where they were headed, but had been over-ruled by the reactionaries in the Kuomintang Party, who were not merely digging their own graves, but also bringing their country to ruin. The economic crisis was already with them and must, in his opinion, inevitably be succeeded shortly by a state of hopeless military chaos. As the position stood at present, he felt it could only be a matter of time before the whole of China north of the Yangtsze Valley was taken over by the Communists and, since the economic life of the larger towns was so entirely dependent on coal supplies from the north, it was not unlikely that the Communists might even extend their hold to areas further south.

In this connexion, however, it is of interest to note that at the end of the year 1946, the Communists controlled approximately 70,000 square miles less territory than at the end of 1945.

Despite the Executive Yuan's order to local governments to refrain from action calculated to cause public resentment, wholesale arrests in Peiping, which began on the 14th February, and which are reported still to be continuing, are causing widespread alarm. These arrests, which do not appear to have been confined to Communists, have been accompanied by forcible entry into houses on the pretence of police search for "unauthorised persons." Victims have included distinguished scholars, students and a Buddhist Abbot, and immunity or release from prison has been obtained only by payment of heavy bribes.

So far no official reason for these arrests has been given, the only public statement in the matter to date being, in fact, a joint protest to the local authorities by twelve Peiping University professors, alleging that about the 17th February no fewer than 2,000 arrests were made. H.M. Ambassador in Nanking reports that this sudden severity appears to have been a temporary spasm, but that the feeling of insecurity which has thus been created will take some time to subside, especially among the student body who consider themselves the main targets. Much nervousness prevails in Shanghai where similar arrests are feared as the result of the Government's sudden and unexplained decision to suspend the issue of passports for abroad.

In the meantime trouble has broken out in south China which, unless carefully handled, may have far-reaching consequences. In Formosa long smouldering resentment against the repressive measures of General Chen-yi's administration has culminated in an ugly situation. On the 27th February, serious rioting occurred at Taipei and Keelung, apparently as the result of a search conducted by officials of the Tobacco Monopoly Bureau for stocks of smuggled cigarettes. Angry mobs are reported to have surged through the streets with Government buildings as their objectives. In Keelung the local Customs residential quarters were looted and the staff compelled to take refuge in a Customs cruiser. The Government Authorites, unable to rely on the local police force, were powerless to quell these disturbances, which spread quickly to the southern part of Formosa and assumed the proportions of an organised revolt. Although the intensely unpopular Governor, General Chen Yi, made known his readiness to accede to the demands presented by the Formosan delegates for a greater measure of self-government and the abolition of the existing military régime, as well as other reforms—including the dismissal of officials accused of acts of undue harshness against the people—well-armed bands of Formosans continued to attack the Government Headquarters at Taipei and Keelung. On the 9th March, the general situation had become so serious that martial law had to be proclaimed in both these towns. The Government's position is now reported to have been eased by the arrival of large numbers of reinforcements. Unfortunately it is also reported that General Chen Yi is not keeping his promise to treat the matter leniently. The liberal newspaper, Wen Wei Pao, published at Nanking quotes the delegates of the six Formosan public bodies deputed by the Government to assist in restoring order as reporting that the Governor is now taking drastic reprisals against the leaders of the uprising.

Philippines

The plebiscite to ratify the amendment to the constitution granting parity to Americans in the development of Philippine industries and the operation of public utilities (see Summary No. 366) was held on the 11th March, 1947, and although the results will not be known for a month, President Roxas has issued a statement to the press that the amendment has been overwhelmingly approved. The President engaged in an active campaign to popularise the amendment while the opposition, headed by the former guerrilla leader, Senator Tomas Confessor, no less energetically condemned it as binding Philippine economy to the United States and thus making a mockery of independence. But the knowledge that American assistance to put the islands on their feet could be obtained only by passing the amendment, good or bad, lent an air of unreality to the campaign. At an open-air meeting addressed by the President on the 10th March a small bomb was thrown at him but fortunately he escaped unhurt.

The agreement concerning military bases was signed in Manila on the 14th March. It provides for a 99-year lease by the U.S. of 5 major bases (one army and four navy) and 10 auxiliary training and service establishments. In the interests of international security any of the bases may be made available to the Security Council of the United Nations by prior mutual agreement of the two countries. Nichols Airfield, Fort McKinley and other U.S. establishments in the Manila area will be turned over to the Philippine Government.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Discussion of President Truman's message to Congress of the 12th March (see last week's Summary), in which he asked for financial and technical aid for Greece and Turkey, has overshadowed all other topics in the public interest in the United States during the past week. It is evident that the seriousness of the political implications contained in the message and the fundamental change in American foreign policy which is involved have been fully appreciated. Outright opposition to the President's proposals has come only from the extreme Right and the extreme Left. The Communist party press described the proposed new American policy as "empire-grab masked by anti-Communist hysteria," while, on the extreme Right, there has been a tendency for the more bewildered to take refuge in isolationist doctrines of the pre-war type. The New York Daily News, endorsing the views of Mr. Joseph Kennedy, former Ambassador to Britain, as reported by Mr. Arthur Krock, has expressed the fear that the present policy may lead to "more and more loans in more and more countries if to nothing worse," and the Chicago Tribune asserts that "the outcome will inevitably be war."

Nevertheless the majority of conservative and middleroad opinion supports the President's plan. The internationalist New York Herald Tribune, answering the isolationist and left-wing charges, finds that the President's statement was "not a proclamation of American imperialism. It is emphatically not a declaration of war on Russia." It feels that the President's move was calculated rather to prevent than to invite conflict. Likewise the conservative commentator, Mr. David Lawrence, foresees that "Russia will hesitate and change her ways, for she is too weak to fight a war or want to provoke the United States into war." A few liberals, on the other hand, criticise the President's proposals on two main grounds: (1) that the United States was being asked to support a reactionary government in Greece, and (2) that no attempt was made to use the mechanism of the United Nations to achieve the desired ends. Mr. Henry A. Wallace said, in a radio address of the 13th March, that he was opposed to any American loan to "undemocratic and well-fed Turkey" or to Greece "until a representative government can assure us that our funds will be used for the welfare of the Greek people." Senator Claude Pepper, the liberal Democratic Senator from Florida, not unexpectedly felt that "although everybody wants to help Greece and Turkey," this was not the way to do it and that the United States ought more properly to call for an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council. Senator Morse, the liberal Republican from Oregon, however, has wholeheartedly endorsed the President's proposals.

Although there is some difference of opinion among members of Congress on the methods by which aid to Greece and Turkey should be extended, it is confidently expected that the funds for which President Truman has asked will be forthcoming. Only about seventy-five members of the House of Representatives are believed to be likely to offer outright opposition to the President's plan. Leaders of both parties have already shown their awareness of the urgency of the situation. Senator Robert A. Taft, chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, has stated that the Republican leaders realize the necessity for Congressional action, whether favourable or unfavourable, before the 31st March, and has announced that the Senate will sit daily instead of thrice weekly in order to ensure speedy action. When, however, he introduced a Bill to authorize aid to Greece and Turkey, Mr. Charles A. Eaton, the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, expressed doubt whether this would be given full approval by the 31st. On the 14th March Senator Vandenberg discussed the contents of the President's message at a Republican "policy conference," which was attended by all fifty-one Republican members of the Upper House. Following the conference, Senator Millikin disclosed that, in Senator Vandenberg's view, there would be less risk if Congress followed Mr. Truman's plan than if it rejected it, and that aid to Greece was being discussed "at Greek, not British, request." The Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate have already had meetings with Mr. Acheson, Mr. Forrestal and Mr. Patterson. The Democratic National Committee has called upon its Republican counterpart to issue a joint statement in support of Mr. Truman's plan. Some concern has been expressed with regard to the extent of the military aid which President Truman proposed sending to Greece and Turkey, but Mr. Forrestal, the Secretary of the Navy, gave his assurance, at a press conference, that American naval aid would be "of a staff character" only, and expressed his belief that military aid would be of "the same character."

Senator Vandenberg has asked his fellow-Republicans to draw up a list of questions on various points involved in the President's plan which might be submitted to members of the Cabinet for clarification at the forthcoming Congressional hearings. The State Department is apparently concerned about possible questions in Congress regarding Turkey, and Mr. Acheson has been bombarded with queries on this subject. He has therefore requested His Majesty's Government to furnish him with as much information as possible about Turkey's military requirements. At the same time the State Department has informed Mr. Ethridge, the United States representative on the United Nations Commission of Inquiry in Greece, that it considers it important that the Commission's final report should recommend the setting up in Greece of a more or less permanent Commission of the United Nations. Mr. Acheson has also asked for an assurance from His Majesty's Government that the British military missions in Greece will remain there indefinitely, although British troops may be withdrawn. He has been closely questioned on this point by Congressmen who realize the impossibility of replacing them by Americans. The United States Ambassadors to Greece and Turkey have been urgently recalled for talks with the President, as has also Mr. Paul Porter, head of the American economic commission of inquiry to Greece.

As regards the Moscow Conference, the expectation that a satisfactory treaty for Germany will be concluded have not been pitched high. At most it is anticipated that agreement might be reached on a treaty for Austria and on "some fundamental principles to govern the writing of terms for Germany." According to the liberal newspaper P.M., the "objective of Secretary Marshall's mission to Moscow, though officially directed to peace with Germany, is actually directed towards peace with Russia." This view is supported by other shades of opinion, and there have been warnings that failure to find a "common meeting-ground for harmonious discusion of great issues" might result in a parting of the ways "too ghastly to contemplate." On the other hand, a few liberal commentators see grounds for hope in the fact that the "Russian need for a peace settlement is grave," and feel that an "impasse is not inevitable." M. Molotov's suggestion that the Big Four should discuss the China situation has made a uniformly bad impression. Mr. Bevin, on the other hand, has received warm praise for his part in the discusions, being described by the Scripps-Howard press as "easily the star in the first period of the tough diplomatic game which the Big Four are playing."

The stiffer American attitude towards Communism abroad as shown in the support for the President's action with regard to Greece and Turkey, and in the firm stand taken by the State Department on Soviet interference in Hungary, has been reflected in a further hardening of sentiment against the extreme Left at home. The once Russophil New York Herald Tribune now goes so far as to say that the "Communists represent about as subversive an element as any in the history of the country. The question is not whether the nation should get rid of them and their increasingly serious threat to our institutions, but how." It is anticipated in some quarters that the drive against Communist infiltration in the Labour unions may be pursued with renewed vigour as a result of President Truman's message. Mr. Lewis B. Schwellenbach, the Secretary of Labour, in testifying before thus making a mockery of independence. But the knowledge that American assistance to put the islands on their feet could be obtained only by passing the amendment, good or bad, lent an air of unreality to the campaign. At an open-air meeting addressed by the President on the 10th March a small bomb was thrown at him but fortunately he escaped unhurt.

The agreement concerning military bases was signed in Manila on the 14th March. It provides for a 99-year lease by the U.S. of 5 major bases (one army and four navy) and 10 auxiliary training and service establishments. In the interests of international security any of the bases may be made available to the Security Council of the United Nations by prior mutual agreement of the two countries. Nichols Airfield, Fort McKinley and other U.S. establishments in the Manila area will be turned over to the Philippine Government.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Discussion of President Truman's message to Congress of the 12th March (see last week's Summary), in which he asked for financial and technical aid for Greece and Turkey, has overshadowed all other topics in the public interest in the United States during the past week. It is evident that the seriousness of the political implications contained in the message and the fundamental change in American foreign policy which is involved have been fully appreciated. Outright opposition to the President's proposals has come only from the extreme Right and the extreme Left. the House of Representatives Labour Committee on the 11th March, has already come out with the sweeping proposal that Communists should henceforth be excluded from "any type of public activity, including the right to run for office, to sit in chambers of commerce or to hold office in trade unions."

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

A report by members of the American Federation of Labour delegation which visited Argentina at the end of January has now been delivered to the United States press. It declares that though there is "little formal action by the Government to suppress civil liberties" and though Argentina's economic situation has allowed the Government to carry through a large number of overdue reforms, there has been "a wholesale usurpation by the Government of ordinary trade union functions." The Argentine Confederación General del Trabajo (CGT) is a political arm of the Government; it cannot elect its officers independently of the Government; it cannot and does not determine its policies or carry on collective bargaining or administer its affairs independently of Government direction. This has resulted in a steady reduction of the "area of free activity" in industry and labour. Independent trade unions, though often deprived of legal status, continue to exist and to struggle to preserve their independence.

The policy of the A.F. of L. seems to have been to make contact with the labour movements in Latin America which are anti-Communist and hostile to the Latin American Confederation of Labour (C.T.A.L.) and the C.I.O. As the Argentine C.G.T. is the strongest Latin American body unrecognized by these last two, it seemed to offer the most practical starting-point for an anti-C.T.A.L. drive. The present adverse report, however, seems to reduce greatly any possibility of success, and the C.T.A.L., which vituperated vigorously against the scheme at their last conference in Costa Rica, may be relieved.

The experiences of the delegation, as far as they are known, suggest that their visit was not a happy one. The invitation was jointly made by the Argentine C.G.T. and the Government, but the Government appears to have been determined from the first to control the tour. Arriving on the 19th January in a blaze of publicity and official "good will," the delegation were faced, three days later, with violent press attacks, arising partly from the translation of the delegation's purpose ("to make our own surveys" being rendered as "para hacer nuestras propias investigaciones"); partly from American resentment at the "conducted tour" method, partly, too, from purely personal reasons and as a result of the curious "resignation" of the secretary of the C.G.T., Señor Luis Gay, which followed the delegation's arrival. A secret meeting of the C.G.T. elected Sr. Aurelio Hernandez to succeed the energetic and independent Sr. Gay, all of whose supporters have disappeared from the executive board. According to the United States press, the A.F. of L. delegation were unable to make contact with Sr. Gay after his sudden removal.

Following the publication of the A.F. of L.'s report, the Argentine C.G.T. and other Peronist unions made counter-declarations. President Perón had already declared in a speech that his labour policy could not be called intervention, since the Government was "merely the continuation of the working-classes in Government House." He did not refer to the continuation of Government House in the Secretariat of Labour, where Señora Perón has her offices; the Secretary of Labour, Sr. Freire, an elderly and well-meaning worker, is now hardly more than a rubber-stamp in the hands of an unscrupulous and designing woman.

Paraguay

According to press reports the outbreak of a revolt against President Morínigo's Government has been followed by the declaration of a state of siege and fighting at various places. Recent reports suggest that the Government's position is weakening, as the rebels gather strength. President Morínigo, who took power in 1940, relied on military support alone until June 1946, when he fell foul of Colonel Benítez Vera, the tough cavalry commander, and Major Stagni of the aviation. Last August the President permitted political parties to re-form, though without founding a party of his own. His association with the Colorados, who entered his cabinet, drove the Liberals into open opposition, and periods of vigorous political activity then began (see Summary No. 356). At the end of September the Paraguayan Communist Party had got itself suspended for a month, and in December an anti-government demonstration was broken up by a party of specially-released convicts, so that the police might have an excuse to intervene. By then President Morínigo seems to have been regretting that he had allowed the politicians to return. In January he failed to settle a quarrel between the two political parties who supported him, the Colorados and Febreristas, and was obliged to drop the latter. An imaginary plot was attributed to the Communists and Febreristas, and a state of siege was declared on the 13th January for 30 days. A new cabinet composed almost entirely of Colorados was appointed (see Summary No. 377). The state of siege was in itself a sign of weakness. Even the Colorados, though fully associated with the Government, displayed a certain nervousness about the future. Certainly, General Morínigo's position was an unenviable one, for he had powerful enemies in the army and few friends among the politicians.

UNITED NATIONS

The Corfu Incident

The Committee of Three, composed of the delegates of Australia, Columbia and Poland, which the Security Council set up on the 27th February to examine all the available facts of the dispute, issued an entirely non-committal report. It requested the Council to consider whether a minefield existed in the swept channel on the 22nd October, and whether this minefield was laid by Albanians or with their connivance. It could not agree whether the mines which damaged the British ships were part of the minefield discovered in the sweeping operations of the 13th November. Poland's representative added a memorandum, questioning the trustworthiness of Captain de Mestre's evidence, and refusing to accept British statements as to the existence of a minefield on the 13th November. It is the normal Slav defence of flat denial, carried rather further than usual. The Committee questioned the Albanian, Greek and other representatives, and among the replies the following were worthy of note: Albania recognised the Hague Convention of 1907. Albania believed that the U.K. itself might have laid the mines, to further its anti-Albanian policy. Greece's representative, M. Dendramis, said that the sudden stoppage of Yugoslav traffic through the Corfu Channel suggested that Albania had warned her friends of the presence of the new minefield. It will be observed that the Slav bloc has suggested (a) that Greece laid the mines, (b) that the U.K. laid the mines and (c) that the minefield did not exist on the 13th November.

Japanese Mandated Islands

The United States wishes the Islands to be entrusted to her before the terms of a Japanese peace have been settled. Russia has agreed, on the ground that the U.S. played the major part in the defeat of Japan. Australia and the United Kingdom have not felt entirely satisfied with the legality of the proposed transaction, which involves a principle of wide application. Sir Alexander Cadogan touched on this legal difficulty when the Council met on the 7th March, saying at the same time that he would not oppose the U.S. receiving at once what all agreed they should receive eventually, if the majority of the Council so wished. Australia's representative welcomed U.S. control of the islands, but considered that the final settlement should be approved in a Peace Settlement in which all belligerents took their share. The Lebanese delegate argued that Japan had forfeited her legal rights when she left the League of Nations. Senator Austin maintained that trusteeship did not affect the question of ultimate ownership.

The discussion was resumed on the 17th March when the Australian delegate brought forward an amendment to the U.S. Draft making the Security Council's decision subject to confirmation in the Peace Treaty. It was pointed out that the Council's decision could not be made subject to the decision of another body, and the Australian amendment was modified on U.K. initiative so as to make the Trusteeship Agreement enter into force when a Peace Treaty had recorded Japan's surrender of her rights. Senator Austin contended that Japan had already renounced her rights by the original deed of surrender; but Sir Alexander Cadogan at once explained the essentially provisional nature of "surrenders," no matter how closely their terms might be followed in the actual Peace Treaty. To transfer the Japanese islands before a general settlement, he pointed out, might justify similar piecemeal transfers in Europe at a time when the Foreign Ministers of the U.K. and the U.S. are resolutely fighting against piecemeal decisions.

International Wheat Conference

The Conference, called in accordance with a resolution of the International Wheat Council, opened in London on the 18th March. This Council was established jointly in 1942 by the principal wheat-exporting countries, Argentina, Australia, Canada and U.S.A., with the addition of the U.K. as the chief importing State, and was expanded in 1946 by the inclusion of certain other countries interested in the production and trade in wheat. Though the pre-war wheat surplus, which occasioned negotiation of the draft International Wheat Convention of that year has long since vanished and the Convention has never come into force, the prospect of another unmanageable surplus in a few years' time, with its natural consequences of depressed prices and unprofitable agriculture, is already perturbing the great producing countries, especially U.S.A. and Canada, and they are pressing strongly for a new agreement. The objects of the present meeting are to reach an agreement which will accord with principles generally agreed in connection with F.A.O. and I.T.O.—viz.: the provision of adequate supplies at all times for all at prices which are fair to producers and consumers alike; the promotion of stability in wheat prices; adequate reserves in both exporting and importing countries, the avoidance of burdensome surpluses, security for efficient producers and provision for world requirements to be met from sources which can supply them most effectively; consumption to be increased and the nutritional level to be raised where necessary.

The U.K. agreed to summon the conference in accordance with the recommendations of the F.A.O. General Preparatory Commission and the I.T.O. Preparatory Committee concerning commodity arrangements. A moment like the present when wheat prices are at a very high level is not however in our view a good time for the conclusion of a wheat agreement, particularly as world conditions are still so unsettled. The import of wheat and its price are so important to the U.K. that we cannot agree to enter a wheat agreement at the present time unless our position is fully safeguarded. Among the matters to which the U.K. attaches importance are the immediate reduction of prices from their present high levels and hence the conclusion of the agreement in the very near future, the progressive reduction of prices over the following years, the holding of adequate reserves, and flexibility in the operation of export quotas to safeguard the position of importers.

Some 40 nations are represented at the Conference, as well as the F.A.O., the United Nations Organisation and the International Monetary Fund. Sir Gerald Clauson, an Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office, was appointed Chairman, and Mr. L. A. Wheeler, head of the U.S. Delegation, vice-chairman. Meetings are being held in private.

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

In the first eight meetings of the full Conference differences have been defined and policies made clearer, so that what agreements are reached should be based on reality and not on equivocation. Mr. Marshall is far less approachable than was Mr. Byrnes, nevertheless the line he has adopted has coincided to a remarkable extent with that of Mr. Bevin. Both have repulsed Soviet charges and made counter-attacks—Mr. Bevin with exceptional vigour and armed to the teeth with facts—upon the shrouded Soviet zone, where Russians and Germans live in mysterious partnership of industry, and "current production" sends a stream of reparations to Russia, while, as Mr. Marshall said, America pumps in money at one end of Germany, and Russia draws reparations from the other. Both are determined that Germany owes it to Europe, her own people and to the taxpayers of America and Great Britain to become at least self-supporting. Both therefore denounce the Russian economic policy, which indefinitely defers the recovery of the Western Zones and gives no promise of relief to the American and British taxpayer. Both favour treating Germany as an economic whole, as paragraph 14 of the Potsdam agreement laid down. If this proves impossible, and indeed in any case, both insist that the level of German industry will have to be raised until Germany can pay for her own imports. Both, and Mr. Bevin in particular, contend that all the factors of the German problem must be taken together and the problem seen as a whole, and both reject the uncompromising Russian technique of establishing agreement on parts of a problem which in the Anglo-American view lose their significance when divorced from the whole. Both contend that no plan for all Germany is possible until M. Molotov discloses the true position in the Russian Zone, and the exact relationship between German and Russian industry. M. Molotov's figures, as Mr. Bevin pointed out, signify nothing; and when M. Molotov replied to Mr. Bevin's questions on the 12th March, for all his sweet reasonableness, and distress that technical difficulties had prevented his country from destroying "fully" the German naval vessels, he ignored the vital subject of production in the Soviet Zone. The United Kingdom realised the dangers of a policy of reparations from current production when the terms of the Italian treaty were being discussed, while the U.S. could not then be brought to realise all that the policy implied in the way of interference in Italian economy. At Moscow, however, Mr. Marshall realises what is involved in the Russian demand for ten billion dollars' worth of reparations. The reparations are to be calculated at 1938 prices, a device which Russia has already employed to magnify the total of deliveries due to her. They are to be spread over 20 years, and they are to come largely from current production, supplemented by bulk removal of industrial plant and a share of German assets abroad. Neither Mr. Bevin nor Mr. Marshall is prepared to see Germany become a kind of Russian milch cow, fed on Anglo-American fodder. Both reject M. Molotov's attempt to quote Yalta as justifying Russian demands; Mr. Marshall stating flatly that he will not retreat from Potsdam to Yalta, for Potsdam superseded Yalta.

It seems that, once a fact has been asserted by the exponents of Soviet foreign policy, it assumes a life dependent only upon Soviet will. No contradiction can kill it. Mr. Byrnes had refuted the Yalta statement. Mr. Bevin explained on the 12th March that the "Royal Yugoslav Army," of which M. Molotov had complained, had been disbanded. Yet, later in the same meeting, M. Molotov solemnly asked that it should be disbanded.

For some time a story has circulated in Germany that the Western Allies had already helped themselves to thousands of millions of dollars worth of reparations from Germany. The story was not unknown in Russia. At Moscow, on the 18th March, M. Molotov trotted it out; he asserted that the Western Allies had taken more than ten billion dollars of reparations from Germany, i.e., all the gold in their zones, German patents, German external assets, a large proportion of Germany's merchant fleet, and coal and timber which the Western Allies obtained at absurdly low prices. Mr. Bevin showed that the patents were published and available to Russia, which was more than could be said of the "secrets" of the Russian Zone. Mr. Marshall explained that the gold was merely "held" at the disposal of the Inter-Allied Reparation Agency pending a Four-Power decision on reparations. Mr. Bevin promised exact figures of what his country had received, and hoped for similar disclosures from M. Molotov. And yet the story will not die.

Russian policy, according to M. Molotov's exposition, aims at the unity of Germany and condemns "federalism." It requires Four-Power control of the Ruhr, a demand which Mr. Bevin is prepared to meet if joint control is extended to the industries of the Russian Zone. The unity is to be achieved gradually, and as a first stage Trade Unions and "Democratic" Parties are to be permitted to organise on the basis of a united Germany. Elections should be held for all Germany, on a system of proportional representation. Mr. Bevin was quick to show how this method of voting for a "list" of candidates all chosen by Party bosses, had tended to Hitler's benefit, and how essential it was to preserve the link between locality and candidate, and to allow a free choice of candidates. He contrasted the British conception of democracy with practice in the Russian Zone where, in so many cases, those who had not joined the Socialist Unity Party had been disfranchised. The United Germany of Russia's dreams would not be a democracy in the Western sense, nor would it be an independent State.

So far M. Bidault has pursued a line distinct from East and West. Like the Russians, he is acutely conscious of the danger of a German revival, but his country is small. As he explained, the density of population in the overcrowded Western Zones was three times that of France. He opposed an increase in German steel production, which Russia would like raised for the sake of reparations and the British and Americans for the sake of a stable Germany. He would like France to produce the extra steel from Lorraine ore fired with coal which Germany must

This Council was established jointly in 1942 by the principal wheat-exporting countries, Argentina, Australia, Canada and U.S.A., with the addition of the U.K. as the chief importing State, and was expanded in 1946 by the inclusion of certain other countries interested in the production and trade in wheat. Though the pre-war wheat surplus, which occasioned negotiation of the draft International Wheat Convention of that year has long since vanished and the Convention has never come into force, the prospect of another unmanageable surplus in a few years' time, with its natural consequences of depressed prices and unprofitable agriculture, is already perturbing the great producing countries, especially U.S.A. and Canada, and they are pressing strongly for a new agreement. The objects of the present meeting are to reach an agreement which will accord with principles generally agreed in connection with F.A.O. and I.T.O.—viz.: the provision of adequate supplies at all times for all at prices which are fair to producers and consumers alike; the promotion of stability in wheat prices; adequate reserves in both exporting and importing countries, the avoidance of burdensome surpluses, security for efficient producers and provision for world requirements to be met from sources which can supply them most effectively; consumption to be increased and the nutritional level to be raised where necessary.

The U.K. agreed to summon the conference in accordance with the recommendations of the F.A.O. General Preparatory Commission and the I.T.O. Preparatory Committee concerning commodity arrangements. A moment like the present when wheat prices are at a very high level is not however in our view a good time for the conclusion of a wheat agreement, particularly as world conditions are still so unsettled. The import of wheat and its price are so important to the U.K. that we cannot agree to enter a wheat agreement at the present time unless our position is fully safeguarded. Among the matters to which the U.K. attaches importance are the immediate reduction of prices from their present high levels and hence the conclusion of the agreement in the very near future, the progressive reduction of prices over the following years, the holding of adequate reserves, and flexibility in the operation of export quotas to safeguard the position of importers.

Some 40 nations are represented at the Conference, as well as the F.A.O., the United Nations Organisation and the International Monetary Fund. Sir Gerald Clauson, an Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office, was appointed Chairman, and Mr. L. A. Wheeler, head of the U.S. Delegation, vice-chairman. Meetings are being held in private.

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

In the first eight meetings of the full Conference differences have been defined and policies made clearer, so that what agreements are reached should be based on reality and not on equivocation. Mr. Marshall is far less approachable than was Mr. Byrnes, nevertheless the line he has adopted has coincided to a remarkable extent with that of Mr. Bevin. Both have repulsed Soviet charges and made counter-attacks—Mr. Bevin with exceptional vigour and armed to the teeth with facts—upon the shrouded Soviet zone, where Russians and Germans live in mysterious partnership of industry, and "current production" sends a stream of reparations to Russia, while, as Mr. Marshall said, America pumps in money at one end of Germany, and Russia draws reparations from the other. Both are determined that Germany owes it to Europe, her own people and to the taxpayers of America and Great Britain to become at least self-supporting. Both therefore denounce the Russian economic policy, which indefinitely defers the recovery of the Western Zones and gives no promise of relief to the American and British taxpayer. Both favour treating Germany as an economic whole, as paragraph 14 of the Potsdam agreement laid down. If this proves impossible, and indeed in any case, both insist that the level of German industry will have to be raised until Germany can pay for her own imports. Both, and Mr. Bevin in particular, contend that all the factors of the German problem must be taken together and the problem seen as a whole, and both reject the uncompromising Russian technique of establishing agreement on parts of a problem which in the Anglo-American view lose their significance when divorced from the whole. Both contend that no plan for all Germany is possible until M. Molotov discloses the true position in the Russian Zone, and the exact relationship between German and Russian industry. M. Molotov's figures, as Mr. Bevin pointed out, signify nothing; and when M. Molotov replied to Mr. Bevin's questions on the 12th March, for all his sweet reasonableness, and distress that technical difficulties had prevented his country from destroying "fully" the German naval vessels, he ignored the vital subject of production in the Soviet Zone. The United Kingdom realised the dangers of a policy of reparations from current production when the terms of the Italian treaty were being discussed, while the U.S. could not then be brought to realise all that the policy implied in the way of interference in Italian economy. At Moscow, however, Mr. Marshall realises what is involved in the Russian demand for ten billion dollars' worth of reparations. The reparations are to be calculated at 1938 prices, a device which Russia has already employed to magnify the total of deliveries due to her. They are to be spread over 20 years, and they are to come largely from current production, supplemented by bulk removal of industrial plant and a share of German assets abroad. Neither Mr. Bevin nor Mr. Marshall is prepared to see Germany become a kind of Russian milch cow, fed on Anglo-American fodder. Both reject M. Molotov's attempt to quote Yalta as justifying Russian demands, Mr. Marshall stating flatly that he will not retreat from Potsdam to Yalta, for Potsdam superseded Yalta.

It seems that, once a fact has been asserted by the exponents of Soviet foreign policy, it assumes a life dependent only upon Soviet will. No contradiction can kill it. Mr. Byrnes had refuted the Yalta statement. Mr. Bevin explained on the 12th March that the "Royal Yugoslav Army," of which M. Molotov had complained, had been disbanded. Yet, later in the same meeting, M. Molotov solemnly asked that it should be disbanded.

For some time a story has circulated in Germany that the Western Allies had already helped themselves to thousands of millions of dollars worth of reparations from Germany. The story was not unknown in Russia. At Moscow, on the 18th March, M. Molotov trotted it out; he asserted that the Western Allies had taken more than ten billion dollars of reparations from Germany, i.e., all the gold in their zones, German patents, German external assets, a large proportion of Germany's merchant fleet, and coal and timber which the Western Allies obtained at absurdly low prices. Mr. Bevin showed that the patents were published and available to Russia, which was more than could be said of the "secrets" of the Russian Zone. Mr. Marshall explained that the gold was merely "held" at the disposal of the Inter-Allied Reparation Agency pending a Four-Power decision on reparations. Mr. Bevin promised exact figures of what his country had received, and hoped for similar disclosures from M. Molotov. And yet the story will not die.

Russian policy, according to M. Molotov's exposition, aims at the unity of Germany and condemns "federalism." It requires Four-Power control of the Ruhr, a demand which Mr. Bevin is prepared to meet if joint control is extended to the industries of the Russian Zone. The unity is to be achieved gradually, and as a first stage Trade Unions and "Democratic" Parties are to be permitted to organise on the basis of a united Germany. Elections should be held for all Germany, on a system of proportional representation. Mr. Bevin was quick to show how this method of voting for a "list" of candidates all chosen by Party bosses, had tended to Hitler's benefit, and how essential it was to preserve the link between locality and candidate, and to allow a free choice of candidates. He contrasted the British conception of democracy with practice in the Russian Zone where, in so many cases, those who had not joined the Socialist Unity Party had been disfranchised. The United Germany of Russia's dreams would not be a democracy in the Western sense, nor would it be an independent State.

So far M. Bidault has pursued a line distinct from East and West. Like the Russians, he is acutely conscious of the danger of a German revival, but his country is small. As he explained, the density of population in the overcrowded Western Zones was three times that of France. He opposed an increase in German steel production, which Russia would like raised for the sake of reparations and the British and Americans for the sake of a stable Germany. He would like France to produce the extra steel from Lorraine ore fired with coal which Germany must be told to send in agreed quantities. (Mr. Bevin and he agreed that it was not easy to draw the line between the industrial potential appropriate to a Germany geared for peace or for war.) M. Bidault was, in the nature of things, disposed to take less risks than his Allies. He had no rooted objection to reparations from current production. On the other hand, he declared, with French logic, that the boundaries and the nature of Germany must be determined before he could say whether he agreed to a unified Germany. And, in any case, the Saar must become a part of the French economy. He would like the U.S. Draft Treaty to include "industrial disarmament." His main economic statement was made when the Conference met on the 18th March. Of his previous remarks the most striking was an offer to take German immigrants into France. Both M. Bidault and Mr. Bevin have made it clear that their respective Zones can accept no more people from the East, beyond the exact number already agreed upon, and in this connection Mr. Bevin could not help remarking on the amazing dearth of able-bodied men among those who came from the Eastern areas to the British Zone.

Despite M. Molotov's appeal to Yalta, Potsdam remains the Holy Writ which all say they would observe, did not heretics prevent them.

Some of the most critical problems relating to Germany's future were discussed in the second week of the Moscow Conference. The most exacting moments of the Conference, however, seemed to lie ahead, as the ministers had not really begun the task of seeking to reconcile their views. After some sharp exchanges the week ended on a more cheerful note with delegates drawing attention to points where disagreement was less fundamental than expected, although there was no weakening of the Russian conception of reparation or of the French demand for coal.

On the 17th March Mr. Bevin discussed the need for economic unity and its dependence on other factors. He did not reveal all the stringent conditions on which His Majesty's Government's acceptance of economic unity would depend, but mentioned as an example freedom of movement throughout Germany. Mr. Bevin justified the bi-zonal arrangements and made it perfectly clear that Great Britain would stick to the agreement until there was economic unity and would not accept any additional financial burdens. Nobody was satisfied with reparation deliveries, Mr. Bevin remarked, and matters must be speeded up, but the scope of the present plan was such that it could not be achieved within a reasonable time and was in any case hampered by the fog of uncertainty surrounding Germany's future and conditions in the Soviet zone. Mr. Bevin did not ask the Powers to desert Potsdam, but to confirm its general principles in this respect. They should enable the Control Council to publish by the 15th August, 1947, a fresh and complete list of equipment to be removed, based on a revised permitted level of industrial production.

M. Molotov contemplated increasing annual steel production to between 10–12 million tons, the former figure being acceptable to Great Britain. Mr. Marshall, however, seemed unwilling for any great increase, and the French are even more opposed to the scheme. M. Molotov also

Some of the most critical problems relating to Germany's future were discussed in the second week of the Moscow Conference. The most exacting moments of the Conference, however, seemed to lie ahead, as the ministers had not really begun the task of seeking to reconcile their views. After some sharp exchanges the week ended on a more cheerful note with delegates drawing attention to points where disagreement was less fundamental than expected, although there was no weakening of the Russian conception of reparation or of the French demand for coal.

On the 17th March Mr. Bevin discussed the need for economic unity and its dependence on other factors. He did not reveal all the stringent conditions on which His Majesty's Government's acceptance of economic unity would depend, but mentioned as an example freedom of movement throughout Germany. Mr. Bevin justified the bi-zonal arrangements and made it perfectly clear that Great Britain would stick to the agreement until there was economic unity and would not accept any additional financial burdens. wanted an increase of exports to secure imports and financial reform (of a type unspecified), points on which all are agreed. Otherwise, he concentrated on attacking once again the failure of reparation deliveries from the West and on upholding the Russo-Polish claim for 10 billion dollars in reparation, basing this on a clause in the Yalta Agreement which was not agreed by Mr. Churchill—and which in any case the U.K. and U.S. representatives now consider to have been superseded by Potsdam. Figures for other countries, M. Molotov suggested, should be determined by the Control Council and should include reparation from current production. This meant that under the Soviet scheme demilitarisation should be completed in the Soviet zone by 1st July, 1947, and elsewhere a year later, but reparation obligations, he said, could continue for 20 years after the signing of the Potsdam agreement. He made regular fulfilment of deliveries a condition for permitting unfettered peaceful production. As Mr. Marshall bluntly told the Russians, the British and U.S. public are not going to agree to a scheme of this sort which meant them paying reparation to an ally. M. Molotov also attacked French action in the Saar and, as expected, asked for the Ruhr to be put under four-Power-control and for German mills and combines to be transferred to State ownership. Mr. Bevin pointed out later that Great Britain did not favour basic industries being made a powerful weapon in the hands of a Central Government but thought they should be owned by some such authority as the Laender. The most unhelpful contribution of M. Molotov's speech was to ask for the annulment of the bi-zonal Agreement.

Mr. Marshall's theme was that the reparation issue could not be solved without economic unity—the core of the problem. He demanded freedom of movement throughout Germany and equitable use of indigenous resources together with agreed restrictions on their supply to the occupying Powers. In a particularly downright attack, later supported by Mr. Bevin, he demanded proper four-Power supervision over the Soviet-owned industries in the Eastern zone which appeared to his Government to represent extra-territorial principles inconsistent with the Potsdam Agreement. By contrast M. Bidault who spoke on the 18th March was preoccupied chiefly with the French need for coal and fear of German industry. He wished Germany to be obliged by treaty to export a certain amount of coal and threatened that the French Government would not agree to a higher level of industry unless supplies were assured. Let Germany sell her coal to smelt iron in France rather than France send iron to Germany. If coal and steel were controlled under a special régime for the Ruhr, other products, said M. Bidault, need be less severely limited. It was not surprising that M. Bidault in his concern for reparations supported their payment from current production. The principles of economic unity, he said, must be defined before any central economic departments were established. The remainder of the meeting on the 18th March was taken up in a wearisome enumeration by M. Molotov of various false allegations which have already blossomed in the Berlin press about reparations taken by the West. He was roundly trounced for this, probably with little effect, by Mr. Marshall and by Mr. Bevin, who later showed exactly how little Great Britain had received.

On the 19th March Mr. Bevin replied to M. Molotov and noted a number of points on which they agreed such as the need for a revision of the level of industrial production. One great difference was that M. Molotov only seemed to consider particular aspects of economic unity and not the whole problem. Mr. Bevin rejected the Russian reparation demand and also the demand for a special régime in the Ruhr, but pointed out that if there was economic unity there would be four-Power control of industry. He was forced with regret to oppose also M. Bidault's coal demands. M. Bidault varied this request on the 20th March when he alleged that coal was being wasted in Germany. (This is not strictly true although present conditions in some factories make uneconomic use of fuel inevitable.) He then said that France was willing to modify the level-of-industry plan provided that it did not reduce coal exports. All this is putting the cart before the horse, and Mr. Bevin had again to point out that such conditions, which might impose new financial burdens on this country, were impossible. Mr. Bevin, however, sought to help the French in a paper circulated on the 22nd March which said that the rate at which German production increased should be in relation to the need for coal exports. This paper covered economic principles in general and included a demand for equitable sharing of the costs of occupation both in the past and in the future. Mr. Bevin re-emphasised Mr. Marshall's preoccupation with the need for an export-import plan, for central German economic administrations and for the pooling of indigenous resources and the fulfilment of the Potsdam agreement. A moderate speech by M. Molotov on the 20th March greeted Mr. Bevin's views as a useful contribution. M. Molotov thought that the views put forward about economic unity were not irreconcilable but then restated Russian claims on reparations and the Ruhr and also stood by the original French proposals on coal. Mr. Marshall expressed his readiness to consider M. Molotov's proposals. Mr. Bevin was ready to agree that industries purely warlike in character should be liquidated without waiting for a new industrial plan and concluded that he thought this the most important session of the Council and that they would never again have such a good opportunity to settle Europe peacefully.

Great Britain took the initiative decisively on the 21st March by presenting detailed suggestions for the political structure of Germany. Mr. Bevin stressed that this was a practical plan avoiding as far as possible slogans or generalisation about federalism. The relations between the Centre and the States is essentially the same as that defined for the British Zone in November 1946. All powers will be vested in the Laender except those specifically reserved to the centre. At the Centre two chambers are proposed, one representing the nation, the other the separate Laender, the latter having the right of absolute veto on constitutional matters and suspensory veto on other legislation. The president should only exercise the function of a constitutional head of State. Constitutional democracy might have to be established by gradual stages. The Control Council should reserve to themselves for the time being subjects such as demilitarisation and reparations and foreign affairs. A statement making many similar points was delivered by Mr. Marshall, but as the first stage he wished the Germans to organise a Provisional Government composed of the heads of the Laender, thus placing greater emphasis on federal rights. M. Bidault remained firmly opposed to a Provisional Government or even central administrations at this stage.

On the 22nd March M. Molotov made his plea for a centralised Germany, claiming that the imposition of federalism—unless freely chosen by the Germans—might leave the popular alternative of centralism as a plant for the political agitator. Much of this speech was obviously addressed to the German public. He wished the (partly discredited) Weimar Constitution to be taken as a basis for discussion though not in its entirety (the Russians have previously hankered after Weimar on questions of electoral procedure). This is not surprising when it is recalled that Grotewohl described the Socialist Unity Party's Draft Constitution as based on Weimar, but eliminating its more "objectionable" features. M. Molotov suggests there should be a President, though presumably not with executive powers, and that he should be elected by Parliament (not by a referendum as under Weimar, where the procedure weakened the powers of the elected legislature). The main difference from the SED Draft Constitution is that M. Molotov wants a second chamber but gives no definition of whom it is to represent nor how much real power, if any, it is to exercise, so that in fact it may represent little divergence from the SED plan. Under Weimar the rights of the Laender were strictly limited. It is significant that M. Molotov wished the non-party democratic organisations and the Trade Unions (all Communist-controlled in the East) to be associated in the drafting of the Constitution.

Mr. Marshall thought there was much in common between the proposals of all four delegations. Perhaps it was a question of words; for M. Molotov's design for the new Germany seemed to the American Delegation, in point of fact, to indicate a federal system, and divergencies between the various plans were rather of degree than of substance. Mr. Bevin and M. Molotov also expressed assent, but both Mr. Bevin and M. Bidault objected strongly to taking the Weimar Constitution as a basis for discussion. It was agreed that by the 25th March a sub-Committee should co-ordinate all the proposals already made, listing points of agreement and disagreement, for a further meeting of the Ministers.

The most submissive German comments on the conference came from the Communist-controlled Neues Deutschland which asserted blithely that no one had thought of querying the figures of prisoners-of-war in Russian hands until Dr. Schumacher had had the "effrontery" to do so. Dr. Schumacher spoke in Berlin during the week and gave another warning against the "new nationalism" which was the gravedigger of Germany and European order and world peace, but which, he declared, sprang from the mercilessness of the world. Meanwhile the Christian Democratic Union has invited the leaders of the main German parties to prepare for overall representation of German interests, a move welcomed by the Communist (KPD) and by the Liberal groups who have now united as the Democratic Party of Germany. Dr. Schumacher, while agreeing in principle, thought the scheme useless until the Social-Democratic Party (SPD) were re-admitted in the Soviet zone. The French representative in the Control Council has objected that the whole thing is illegal while there is no law permitting interzonal party union. A KPD conference for the three Western zones was held from the 22nd to the 25th March in which Socialist Unity Party speakers figured prominently. All territorial losses (except presumably in East Prussia) were again rejected. Emphasis was laid on the need for wide trade union influence, and Ulbricht claimed that trade unionists in the West were being used to cover up the interests of big capital by appointing them to executive boards without granting them responsibility. Numerous allegations were made against the West, and Helmut Lehmann then admitted that the Germans had not yet grasped the meaning of "democracy" (as understood by the SED). In support of a Centralised Germany he said that this provided the only guarantee that the workers would influence the shaping of events.

Five Berlin University students were arrested by the Soviet authorities in the middle of March; one has since been released. The majority are members of the CDU who in February were active in defeating the Socialist Unity Party candidates for the Berlin Students council. It is possible, however, that the Russians have more substantial charges against them. Further arrests are stated to have taken place among members of the CDU in the Soviet zone.

AUSTRIA

In Moscow the Foreign Ministers have agreed to Mr. Marshall's proposal that Austrian representatives be invited to Moscow. The Austrian Ministers for Foreign Affairs and for the Protection of Property, and the Austrian Envoy to Britain, were expected to leave for Moscow on the 25th March. They are to be followed by Chancellor Figl and representatives of the three political parties. The Deputies have dealt with certain military, political and economic clauses of the Treaty, but have on the whole made little progress. It has been agreed that airfields are to be strictly limited in number and size to correspond to the tasks of the Austrian Air Force and to the requirements of civil aviation. An attempt by M. Gusev to secure the setting up of an expert committee to study the Yugoslav claim for a frontier revision was successfully opposed by the other Deputies, and the Soviet Deputy was also persuaded to agree to the use of the term "Nazi" instead of "Fascist." Agreement has not yet been reached, however, on the important question of the maintenance of the rights of the Occupying Powers within their Zones between the signature of the Treaty and the final withdrawal of troops. The Control Agreement of June 1946 must lapse when the Treaty comes into force, but, on the other hand, all the Powers need and desire the temporary retention of certain rights. A tentative British proposal to regulate the withdrawal of troops by means of a separate Four-Power Agreement, and not by the Treaty itself, has been formulated with the intention of enabling troops to begin withdrawal immediately, completing the process within 90 days, the Treaty itself then containing a provision that it would not come into force until 90 days after signature.

At the meeting of the Executive Committee in Vienna on the 22nd March a British paper (supported by the French member) designed to secure immediate action to establish armed forces for Austria was placed on the agenda. The British member suggested that the present situation, in which the Foreign Ministers' Deputies were discussing the size of the Austrian armed forces while the Military Directorate regarded with suspicion any Austrian who dared mention the word "army," was bringing ridicule on the Control Authorities in Austria: he insisted on submitting the problem to the Allied Council. The Soviet member refused to discuss the problem, no doubt being anxious to prevent Austria from being able to resist Yugoslav threats when British troops withdrew.

Lack of Allied unanimity on food policy for Austria was clearly demonstrated at the Economic Directorate's meeting on the 11th March, when the French and Soviet members pressed for the implementation of the Austrian proposed increase of livestock by 100,000 head during 1947. The British and Americans, who do not live off the land and who have to subsidise the cost of food imports into Austria, have already strongly criticised the Austrian Government's restocking programme. The Directorate also dealt with a letter from the Austrian Government complaining that the Soviets had interfered with an Executive Committee decision by attempting to curtail the amount of bread grains being removed from their zone.

POLAND

The text of the Polish Constitution which has now been issued has yielded more exact information on some of its provisions (see Summary No. 382). To a considerable degree the powers and prerogatives of the State Authorities have been defined by a simple re-enactment of many articles of the 1921 Constitution, upon which the present one is allegedly based.

Thus, Article 13 of the 1947 Constitution, concerning the position of the President, has revived thirteen articles of the former document. Some of them relate to formal matters such as limited legal immunity, deputizing in the case of Presidential incapacity, etc., and for the procedure of diplomatic representation common to most heads of states. But it should be noted that the President is also vested with the power of pardon and respite, and has the position of titular head of the armed forces. As regards the process of government, the President will exercise his executive power through Ministers responsible to Parliament. All laws are to be signed by the President and the Ministers concerned. The President also has the power of appointing, cancelling or revoking the appointment of the President of the Council of Ministers (the Prime Minister). How much attention, if any, the President must pay to the wishes of Parliament in this matter is uncertain: it is provided elsewhere, however, that the Government as a whole, or any Minister, shall resign if Parliament so decrees. On the Prime Minister's suggestion the President is to appoint the other responsible ministers, as well as officials of Civil and Military authorities established by the Law on the advice of the Council of Ministers. Finally, the President has the power to convene, open, adjourn and prorogue Parliament, which will probably not sit for more than three months in the year, one month in spring and two in the autumn.

A similar re-enactment of clauses of the 1921 Constitution defines the Government's position. The Council of Ministers is to be collectively responsible, politically and constitutionally, for the Government's policy. Each Minister will be individually responsible for acts committed by himself and his subordinates in the normal course of the exercise of his or their functions. As mentioned above, any Minister or Government can be forced to resign by Parliament. Two obvious theoretical limitations on such a power are first, the probable shortness of Parliamentary sessions, as mentioned above, and second, the authority granted to the Government, acting under the President's direction, to advise the Council of State to declare a state of emergency. And, it should be recalled, 394 out of 444 seats in Parliament are held by the Government's supporters.

The chief function of the Council of State, which is the real innovation of the whole Constitution, appears to be the control of local government at all levels. This power derives from the law of the 11th September, 1944, one of the first decreed by the then existing "Homeland National Council," which was the parent of the new Government. The September law was also based on the 1921 Constitution, but the present Government's powers over local authorities are vastly greater than those of the 1921 administration, and amount to absolute control.

Supervision of public finance and expenditure is to be in the hands of a Supreme Control Chamber. Apart from the fact that its President will be elected by Parliament, the composition and competence of this body have still to be defined. To this, as yet, amorphous organization the Council of State has the power to entrust the control over any State or semi-State undertaking.

Questions of constitutional interpretation, arising out of the legal aspect of administrative acts and the responsibility of Ministers and President, are to be decided by the appropriate organs, which will be established by a separate law. The Constitution itself can be changed only by a two-thirds majority of the number of deputies.

In the 1947 Constitution there are thus combined the doctrine of governmental responsibility to Parliament and the provision for rule by decree, to be exercised by the Government and Council of State. Such apparent contradiction presents, on paper, a nicely-balanced equation of the liberal and authoritarian principles of the Constitutions of 1921 and 1935. Of which set of principles the Government will, in practice, make the greater use will be shown only by time; their past record makes it a virtual certainty that the Pilsudskian

Finland

The long-heralded opening-up of the Saimaa Canal and the Porkkala railway to Finnish transit traffic was brought a step nearer realisation by the arrival in Moscow, on the 12th of March, of a delegation headed by the Minister of Communications, M. Kaijalainen. The negotiations, conducted by M. Vyshinsky on behalf of the Soviet Union, are, it is believed, mainly concerned with such technical questions as tariff rates and the volume of traffic. The importance which the Finns attach to the concessions that they hope to gain, was illustrated by a statement in one of the Helsinki newspapers that 258,244 tons of goods passed through the Porkkala area in 1939, while during the previous year more than 750,000 tons were shipped through the Saimaa Canal in the direction of the sea alone.

Many Finns have been counting on an early restoration of greater freedom for the Press after the ratification of the Peace Treaty, when certain defence regulations will automatically lapse. These hopes received a rude shock with the presentation before the Diet of a Bill amending existing press laws. The Government, it is said, consider that the present regulations afford insufficient protection against irresponsible newspaper comment which might harm Finland's relations with foreign Powers. The Communists have hailed the Bill with satisfaction, despite the fact that their own papers have been the chief offenders in this respect, frequently adopting an abusive tone towards Great Britain and the United States. Though the matter has no bearing upon foreign relations, it is interesting to note that the two chief organs of the Folk Democrats, Vapaa Sana and Vapaa Pohjola, have recently been sued for libel by the imprisoned former leader of the Social Democrats, M. Väinö Tanner. This led Vapaa Sana strongly to condemn the insolence of M. Tanner, a convicted war criminal, who had dared to bring an action against the main mouthpiece of the new "democratic" trend.

Four members of the House of Commons arrived in Helsinki on the 15th of March as guests of the Finnish Inter-Parliamentary Union. Two members of the delegation, Mrs. C. S. Ganley, M.P., and Mrs. B. A. Castle, M.P., participated in the celebrations marking the 40th anniversary of the achievement of the franchise by the women of Finland. The British visitors were given an extremely friendly welcome and in the course of their brief stay were received by President Paasikivi.

The current month has proved of particular significance to Finnish foreign trade, and important agreements have been concluded with Poland and France. From the former country Finland will receive one million tons of coal, valued at 12 million dollars, during the next three years. In exchange Finland will send to Poland 4,000 pre-fabricated wooden houses, 10,000 tons of pulp and quantities of raw copper and copper products. The agreement places Finland, for the time being, third in degree of importance as a receiver of Polish exports.

The Franco-Finnish agreement is valued at one and a half milliard francs in each direction, with France supplying much needed fertilisers, steel, scrap iron, machinery and other goods, in exchange for cellulose, sawn timber, paper and furniture.

A Finnish trade delegation also visited London recently and a commercial agreement with this country was reached. Anxious to secure raw materials for their hard-pressed reparations industries, the Finns were prepared to negotiate only on a steel-for-timber basis. Great Britain consequently agreed to deliver 45,000 tons of steel during 1947, plus a further 20,000 tons during the first quarter of 1948. In exchange she will receive 175,000 standards of timber.

Denmark

It was announced in the press of the 26th March that, by agreement between H.M. Government and the Government of Denmark, the two countries' Ministers have been elevated to the rank of Ambassadors.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

Although unable to form a four-party Cabinet (as he had wished), M. Spaak had little difficulty in forming a Socialist-Christian Social coalition, which he completed on the evening of the 19th March. The new Cabinet, which was sworn in next morning (20th), consists as before of 19 Ministers (including M. Spaak)—eight Socialists, nine members of the Christian Social Party, and two non-party "technicians." Its two-party basis is thus identical with that of the Beel Cabinet in the Netherlands. M. Spaak's Cabinet will enjoy majorities of 122 seats (162 to 40) in the Chamber, and 109 (138 to 29) in the Senate: very different from the paltry and insecure majorities of 17 and 1 commanded by M. Huysmans' Cabinet. Inevitably there are numerous changes of personnel. Almost half the Cabinet consists of men without previous ministerial experience: this, however, applies only to the C.S.P. Ministers, of whom M. Eyskens alone has previously served in a Cabinet. He again becomes Minister of Finance, a portfolio which he held in M. van Acker's first Cabinet until July, 1945, when, together with his C.S.P. colleagues, he resigned over the question royale. Most of the other C.S.P. Ministers are, however, well-known men (notably M. Struye, the new Minister of Justice, who, it will be recalled, made an unsuccessful attempt to form a Cabinet last July). Apart from M. Spaak, only five members of the old Cabinet are included in the new—MM. Huysmans, Merlot, Troclet and de Groote (Socialists), and Col. Defraiteur (non-party). While M. van Acker makes a welcome reappearance, the retention of M. Huysmans' services is, in the circumstances, perhaps a little unwise: it is interesting to note that he, a left-wing Socialist, has been given the distinctly "controversial" portfolio of Education—an appointment which is hardly calculated to please the more clerically-minded supporters of the C.S.P. The two remaining Socialists, MM. Vermeylen and Delattre, have each held Ministerial appointments, each having served under M. Spaak—M. Vermeylen in March 1946, M. Delattre in 1938 and 1939. M. Moens de Fernig, one of the two non-party Ministers, was a colleague of M. Vermeylen in March 1946. The continuance of a Cabinet of 19 has been made possible by separating the Ministry of Overseas Trade from that of Foreign Affairs (both previously held by M. Spaak), and by amalgamating the Ministries of National Re-equipment and Economic Co-ordination (the latter a new Department).

The list of Ministers and their portfolios is as follows:—

M. P.-H. Spaak (Soc.): Prime Minister and Foreign Affairs.
M. C. Huysmans (Soc.): Education.
M. P. Vermeylen (Soc.): Interior.
M. J.-J. Merlot (Soc.): Budgets.
M. L.-E. Troclet (Soc.): Labour and Social Welfare.
M. A. van Acker (Soc.): Communications.
M. P. de Groote (Soc.): Economic Co-ordination and National Re-equipment.
M. A. Delattre (Soc.): Coal and Power.
M. G. Eyskens (C.S.P.): Finance.
M. P. Struye (C.S.P.): Justice.
Baron J.-M.-F.-X.-H.-G. van der Straeten-Waillet (C.S.P.): Overseas Trade.
M. P.-A. Verbist (C.S.P): Health and the Family.
Professor P. M. Orban (C.S.P.): Agriculture.
M. O. Behogne (C.S.P.): Public Works.
M. R. de Man (C.S.P.): Reconstruction.
M. P. Wigny (C.S.P.): Colonies.
M. J. Duvieusart (C.S.P.): Industry.
Col. R. Defraiteur (non-Party): Defence.
M. G. Moens de Fernig (non-party): Food and Imports.

In a statement issued on the 21st March the Secretariat of the C.S.P. welcomes the "end of government by the Left" and hails the fusion of the two major parties as a "victory of common sense." The new Cabinet's "comfortable majority," the statement continues, had given it the strength which it needed to solve "great post-war problems." The C.S.P. rejoiced to see the end of Communist influence in government; and believed that the absence of the Liberals would enable a "progressive social policy to be carried out." Private enterprise had to be freed from "superfluous and cumbersome State intervention," and the foundations of a "comprehensive family policy" laid down. Although the C.S.P. conceded nothing of its own programme, it would "loyally implement the Government agreement." With regard to the question royale, the C.S.P. remained "faithful to its pre-election position," and still believed that this problem had to be solved "constitutionally."

FRANCE

At the Conference of Foreign Ministers (see under "Germany" and "The Moscow Conference") M. Bidault made a second and more conciliatory statement on economic control of Germany, on the 21st March. While disclaiming any desire to interfere in the running of the British Zone, he suggested that international control of the Ruhr should be introduced during the period of Allied military occupation since it would be more difficult to do this later on. He returned to the question of coal, asking that Germany should not be allowed to retain a proportionately larger supply of coal than was available to her former victims. On the question of political organisation M. Bidault emphasised the need to avoid the mistakes made after the war of 1914–18 when a strong centralised Government had retained the administrative powers of the German empire and paved the way for the Third Reich. French press comment on Moscow has been pessimistic, and many writers have stressed France's isolation from the other three Powers. M. Stalin's reception of M. Bidault, however, and M. Molotov's remarks in favour of the French demand for the export of a definite proportion of Ruhr coal output, have encouraged hopes of Soviet support. For the Communists Mr. Bevin is inevitably the villain of the piece; their emphasis on his "negative" attitude, however, is paralleled in most of the Paris press. Meanwhile, M. Bidault has continued to set a guarantee of supplies of coal as the price of any French concessions at Moscow, and M. Massigli has now written to the Prime Minister asking for increased allocations of Ruhr coal.

If the Moscow Conference had not been in session it is probable that M. Ramadier's Government would have broken up last week-end. The crisis caused by the Communist attitude in the debates on Indo-China (see below) has thrown into relief the conviction of the Communist leaders that they must for the time being remain in the Government. Only this idea can account for their acceptance of the unsatisfactory compromise whereby at the end of both debates the Communist Ministers voted with the Government while the Communist deputies abstained. M. Ramadier, himself, emerges from the crisis with his reputation increased. He was careful not to encourage the vociferous demands of the Right for the departure of the Communists from the Government, but he told the latter that "if you maintain your attitude of abstention you will reduce French politics to that fundamental opposition between Communism and anti-Communism which we have done our utmost to avoid."

The debate on Indo-China (see last week's Summary) was continued on the 18th and 19th March, when M. Moutet replied for the Government. He said that the Viet Minh Government was no longer representative of the Annamese people: "If Ho Chi Minh is still the head of a Government, let him speak like one, and communicate with our representatives": he spoke of the "ill-fated ideology" which encouraged flood and famine by the refusal to maintain the French-built dykes; and he mentioned "the problem of the reunion of the three Annamese countries." The Minister was followed after an hour's suspension requested by the Communists for deliberation, by M. Duclos (Communist), who said that since a change of policy was evidently not intended and since, if negotiations were further delayed, the gap between French and Annamese could only widen, the most the Communist could do would be to abstain from voting. The Prime Minister then made his statement defining the Government's position and said that France must remain in Indo-China; the March 1946 agreement was now superseded and future policy and negotiations would be based on the provisions of the Constitution concerning the French Union, such as those placing the responsibility for the defence and foreign policy of the Union with France herself. He referred to his former statement that the union of the three Annamese countries "will be realised if those countries so wish, and in the form they choose." The task of the new High Commissioner was to enable the Annamese people to choose their leaders, and with them the French would negotiate. The Government motion was passed unanimously by 421 votes, but while the Communist Ministers, including M. Thorez, Deputy Prime Minister, voted in favour, the Communists as a party signified their desire for immediate negotiations with Ho Chi Minh as President of the Viet Minh Government, by abstaining.

Although the Communist members of the Assembly's finance committee had passed the military credits for Indo-China, M. Duclos had hinted that the Communist group in the Assembly might not vote them, and the Central Committee of the Communist Party passed on the 19th a resolution "considering impossible the vote of military credits for the pursuit of a war against Viet Nam." The Socialists at the meeting of their national council which opened on the same day showed themselves divided on whether to negotiate with Ho Chi Minh. It was not surprising therefore that M. Ramadier demanded that the vote be treated as a matter of confidence in the Government, thus ensuring the lapse of a clear day required by the Constitution before such a vote can be taken. This gave the Communists time to appreciate their position as a dissentient party within a coalition Government carefully composed and maintained from considerations of national economy and external affairs. It also brought into full play the well-proved mediatory powers of M. Vincent Auriol, President of the Republic. When the debate opened on the 22nd, M. Duclos explained that the Communists found themselves unable to vote the military credits for Indo-China, but in order that the coalition Government might survive "ministerial solidarity would not be broken." The five Communist Ministers accordingly voted with the majority of the Assembly and M. Ramadier gained his vote of confidence by 411 votes, 195 deputies abstaining.

The Government's decision to fix a minimum wage but not to raise other wages in proportion (see Summary No. 383) was not at first accepted by the trade unions; but when the National Confederal Committee of the Confédération Générale du Travail (C.G.T.) met on the 12th March it passed a resolution which virtually accepted the fait accompli and asked only for a raising of the limit for exemption from income tax. The Communist Party's political bureau had already announced its support of the Government's decision and the Party has evidently been successful in bringing the C.G.T. to heel. This action is yet another illustration of the Communist anxiety to remain in the Government so long as the Moscow Conference continues. The Government have also held out against the C.G.T. over the question of collective contracts. The C.G.T.'s claim to be recognised as the only trade union organisation qualified to engage in collective bargaining with employers was contested by the Catholic trade union confederation and by the confederation of senior staffs whose membership, although much inferior to the C.G.T., is still considerable. Both organisations enjoy the tacit support of the M.R.P. and a compromise has now been reached whereby the smaller organisations will be allowed to participate in collective bargaining where they represent a specified proportion of the workers concerned.

The task of reducing the budgetary deficit is proving as difficult as was anticipated, and will be aggravated by the fact that the ordinary budget cannot now be voted until the end of June so that the Government are asking the Assembly for a further three months' ordinary credits on the basis of the 1946 estimates. The planned budgetary economies, therefore, will only take effect in the last six months of the financial year. The first instalment of 60 per cent. of the extraordinary budget, including credits for the Monnet Plan (see Summary No. 381), was passed by the Assembly on the 7th March.

M. Gaston Monnerville, Radical Councillor for French Guiana and former Under-Secretary for the Colonies in 1937 and 1938, was elected President of the Council of the Republic on the 18th March. He defeated the Communist candidate at the second ballot.

ITALY

The Constituent Assembly is continuing its debates on the new draft Constitution, the text of which was published in the press of the 13th March.

The provisional Constitution at present in force is based on that promulgated in 1848 for the Kingdom of Piedmont-Sardinia by King Charles Albert, although the link-pin of that constitution, the monarchy, was swept away as a result of the Referendum held in June 1946, and although the Senate has also been abolished. The Constitution of 1848 was gradually extended to other parts of Italy as they joined the Piedmontese Kingdom, and when the unification of the country was achieved in 1871 to the whole country. Between 1871 and 1915 constant demands were made for revision as it was obvious that a Constitution suited to a single region was not well adapted to a country containing such very different areas and people at such different levels of development as Italy.

During the Fascist régime the Constitution was retained but its provisions were twisted out of all recognition by Mussolini who, by means of decree laws, usurped to himself special powers as the Head of the State, wrecked the electoral system both for Parliament and for local government by the adoption of the principle of appointment from above on a hierarchical basis, and in 1939 substituted for the Chamber of Deputies a new Chamber of Fasci and Corporations. These Fascist excrescences were for the most part swept away by the Badoglio Government within a few days of the fall of Mussolini. Others were dispensed with at a later stage and the country is consequently now governed by those provisions of the much abused Constitution of 1848 which remain in force.

One of the chief weaknesses of the 1848 Constitution was the vagueness of its terms which facilitated its violation. Steps have therefore been taken in the new draft to evolve a Constitution which is both concrete and detailed. The result has been to run to the other extreme and to include within the draft much unnecessary detail and many provisions, such as the clauses dealing with the organisation of labour, which it would probably have been wise to have left out of the Constitution in order to facilitate amendments rendered necessary by changing circumstances. Moreover, the draft is obviously the result of compromise and at times bears clear marks of the Communist, at others of the Christian Democrat imprint. The result is not always happy, nor is it always consistent. There are signs that the draft will have a stormy passage in the Assembly although its various parts have already been approved by specific Commissions. Nevertheless it may be well to take note of the salient features of the draft as presented to the Assembly.

The Draft Constitution

Articles 1 to 7 consist of general provisions. Italy is proclaimed to be a democratic Republic based on labour, and she renounces war as an instrument of conquest agreeing to a limitation of sovereignty necessary to enable an international organisation to secure peace and justice. The State and the Catholic Church are declared to be independent and sovereign each in its own sphere, their relationship being regulated by the Lateran Pacts, but any modification of the Pacts agreed on bilaterally shall not necessitate a revision of the Constitution. [The inclusion of these provisions in the Constitution is already meeting with bitter opposition which is not confined to the left-wing parties but is also expressed by certain Liberal elements.] Other religious faiths have the right to organise themselves according to their own statutes. All citizens are declared to be equal before the Law.

Articles 8 to 51 deal with the Rights and Duties of Citizens. Provisions are made to safeguard the liberty of the individual. The right to emigrate is guaranteed, and it is stated that the Republic will protect the labour of Italians abroad. The right of political asylum is accorded. Censorship is prohibited. No one may be punished except in accordance with the law in force at the time of the alleged crime. Punishment must be such as to help to re-educate those condemned, and the death-penalty, introduced by the Fascist Penal Code, is abolished. Family rights are recognized and the State will interest itself specially in large families. The indissolubility of marriage is proclaimed. Rights of illegitimate children are to be equal to those of lawful children. [This seems to have been a concession made by the Christian Democrats to the Communists in a sub-Commission in order to secure support for the inclusion of the Lateran Pacts in the Constitution.] Rights of which private schools were deprived under Fascism are restored. Education is compulsory and free for eight years. The rights of labour are dealt with and the freedom of trade union activity and of striking is guaranteed. Provision is made for Social Assistance which hitherto has largely remained a dead letter in Italy. The right of private property is guaranteed. The law authorizes the expropriation of private property in the general interest but compensation must be paid. All citizens who have attained majority may vote.

Articles 52 to 125 deal with the organisation of the Republic. Parliament is to consist of a Chamber of Deputies elected by direct, universal suffrage and a Chamber of Senators elected on a Regional basis, both for five years. Legislative functions are exercised by the two Chambers collectively. In certain circumstances a referendum may be held. The President of the Republic is elected for seven years by both Chambers meeting as a National Assembly with additional representation from the Regions. Provisions are laid down for the formation of the Council of Ministers. Judges are not removable from office, special tribunals such as those instituted by Fascism are forbidden, juries are to be restored and popular (lay) judges may sit with professional judges in non-criminal cases.

Considerable space is devoted to the proposals for Regional autonomy. The Republic remains divided into Regions (22 instead of 18 as formerly) and Communes. Statutes conferring special forms of autonomy are to be granted to Sicily, Sardinia, Trentino-Alto Adige and the Val D'Aosta. [The proposal to make one Regione of Trentino and Alto Adige together is likely, if adopted, to cause serious trouble with the German-speaking population in the Alto Adige (South Tyrol) and with Austria.] Specific account is given of the Regional organs of Government, their functions and powers, which are considerable, though subject to fairly close supervision by the Central Government. It is to be hoped that the stranglehold of Rome on the Regions will be considerably lessened by these measures. As regards the four special régimes of autonomy considerable apprehension has been expressed by all parties with regard to the possible effect of these clauses on the unity of the State. It may be, therefore, that this section of the Constitution may be altered considerably.

The concluding Articles 126 to 131 lay down constitutional guarantees. A Constitutional Court is to decide on the constitutionality of any law which may be referred to it. Any revision of the Constitution must be passed by both Chambers and on demand must be submitted to a popular referendum. The final article declared that the Republican form of State is fixed and cannot be the object of constitutional revision.

Tacked on to the draft are nine supplementary articles. The reorganization under any form whatever of the Fascist Party is prohibited, and restrictions are placed on those who held certain offices during the Fascist régime. Others of these articles are concerned with the House of Savoy. Descendants of the House are ineligible for public office, and members of it may not reside in Italy. The property of the House is confiscated.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Recent reports from Hungary state that a decision has been reached to hold a General Election early in May on the basis of a new electoral register. This alleged development is the more surprising in view of the agreement signed by the leaders of the four Coalition Parties and welcomed by the entire press as a solution of the political crisis. Smallholder concessions previously referred to (see Summary 383) included yet another purge which has already deprived the Party of five more prominent members—one of whom is M. Pfeiffer, the former Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Justice—as well as the "democratization" of education by standardizing text-books and relegating religious teaching to the rank of an optional subject. In addition the Agreement provided for the establishment of a joint three-year economic plan of Communist and Social Democratic origin, the central control of co-operative organizations and the extension of social insurance, particularly among agricultural workers. M. Nagy found it no easy task to persuade his followers to comply with the demand for a further reduction of their numbers, but he finally carried his point by stressing the need for unity.

The U.K. and the U.S.A. have addressed a second Note of protest to General Sviridov. As happened before, only the U.S. Note appeared in the Hungarian press, and again not until it was accompanied by the Soviet answer. The U.K. Note repeats the earlier request for an enquiry into the arrest of M. Kovács and the situation arising out of left-wing attempts to coerce the majority Party. It stops short, however, of the specific U.S. accusations, some of which, unfortunately, shewed a certain bias and were easily met by General Sviridov. The U.S.A. complain that investigations have been conducted by the Communist-controlled Political Police, that the Smallholders' request for a political Committee of Enquiry was refused, and that the scales of justice were weighted against the Smallholders, since three out of the four members of the People's Court belonged to the left-wing bloc. In reply General Sviridov contended that the proceedings were entirely constitutional and that the Court was set up in accordance with the Law for the Defence of the Republic. To this he might have added that the Smallholders made no great effort to obtain the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee, and that not only does the composition of the People's Court represent each Coalition Party fairly, but the real power rests with the presiding Judge who is, theoretically at least, above party considerations. Moreover, the issues are not so clear-cut that the three members of the left-wing bloc will inevitably vote together on all occasions. Allegations of anti-Semitic behaviour, for instance, would presumably be viewed leniently by the National Peasant Party which attaches great importance to the doctrine of racial purity. There is more justification for the U.S. complaint that the question of espionage was introduced only after the Communists had failed to obtain the raising of M. Kovács' parliamentary immunity, since he submitted to "voluntary" interrogation on the understanding that this would remain unprejudiced. Nor is the guilt of M. Kovács established by the Russian statement that he has admitted crimes against the Republic and the Army of Occupation.

For the moment, however, the U.S. Government will probably merely express regret at the refusal to permit a joint enquiry and renew their request that the Soviet authorities should refrain from further unilateral interference in Hungarian internal affairs.

The recent ministerial re-shuffle did not affect the proportion of portfolios allocated to the different Parties. M. Veres of the National Peasant Party has taken over the Ministry of Reconstruction—an appointment which had remained vacant for many weeks following the arrest of the former Smallholder Minister, M. Mistéth—but the Ministry of Education is now in the hands of the Smallholders, M. Ortutay having succeeded M. Keresztury, who was a member of the National Peasant Party. The three other new Ministers, MM. Mihalyffi, Pinnyes and Nyarady, who hold the portfolios of Information, Defence and Finance respectively, are Smallholders like their predecessors.

The Freedom Party has started to publish a fortnightly periodical entitled Holnap, the appearance of which was delayed by lack of funds. M. Rákosi is alleged to have countered M. Sulyok's bold and uncompromising attitude to the conspiracy by refusing him the initial grant of 250,000 forints, which is the right of every newspaper irrespective of its party affiliations. It may be supposed that M. Sulyok has since obtained financial backing from capitalists and the Church.

Roumania

Adversity is fulfilling its time-honoured function in Roumania, but so far it has not got beyond the point of leading Gheorghe Tătărescu and Iuliu Maniu to opposite sides of the bed, where they are considering whether or not to risk the next step. Naturally their motives vary with the character and abilities of the two men. Dl Tătărescu dislikes the Industrial Bureaux Bill, and has gone so far as to say that the bill will not pass "as long as he is a member of the Government." There has been some modification of the measure, and in the view of some people, the Government intend to force it through Parliament. As noted in last week's Summary, the Government are not too happy about things in general, and may be feeling that the moment for action is now—or perhaps never. It would be a mistake to place too much reliance on this, for the fact remains that the Groza Government is backed by Russia, and Russia has shown no signs of relinquishing her hold. Roumanians as always, are hoping for the best, and Dl Tătărescu is emphatic that things will be altogether different "the very day following the ratification of the Peace Treaty." There is certain to be strenuous opposition to the Bill, and the Social Democrats are at one with Dl Tătărescu's Liberals on the subject. What is even more to the point is that the United Nations could if they wished take exception to the bill on the ground that it would adversely affect the provisions of Article 31 of the Peace Treaty.

Dl Maniu is taking rather a different line, which however, is also dictated by the assurance that everything will be different when the Treaty is ratified. Together with D-ni Brătianu and Petrescu he has addressed a memorandum to the Four-Power Conference at Moscow. This memorandum begins by recalling the conditions under which the election was held and the consequent indignation of the Roumanians and goes on to protest against the numerous arrests of opposition officials which have taken place. It accuses the Government of having taken this action from ulterior motives and primarily with the object of keeping themselves in power. The memorandum appeals to the Conference to bring this situation to an end, as being a violation of the Crimea, Potsdam and Moscow agreements, as well as infringing the Peace Treaty. Dl Maniu does not stop there. He would like to head a movement to overthrow the Government, which he thinks could be carried out with only a limited amount of bloodshed, and which he believes would have the support of the King. The U.S.A. whose advice he has tentatively asked have given him no encouragement. What is quite certain is that if such a coup is to be organised and carried through, Maniu is not the man to do it. He has failed too often when it has come to the point of taking action. He can write notes, but leaders will have to be found amongst the younger members of the Peasant Party if Maniu's verbosity is to be translated into action. And it is in the matter of capable leadership that Roumania most conspicuously fails at the present time.

The representatives of the Jewish Agency in Roumania have denounced terrorism and its results and have expressed their condolences with the relatives of the victims. The terrorist campaign, they say, prejudices the Jewish national cause.

An article in Semnalul on the forthcoming budget says, "Year after year with each changing Government we have increased the number of our civil servants.

We have now the greatest number of civil servants in Europe in proportion to the population . . . . Let us reflect seriously on the present state of the country . . . . Can we afford to spend three-quarters of our budget on staffs and experts?" Verb. sap.

The value of individual shares in the National Bank of Roumania which has been nationalised is stated to be 57,531 lei. This meticulous exactness is striking. In English money it amounts to something less than 2*s*. 6*d*. The claims of British holders for repayment do not seem likely to bring in a great deal.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav appeal for emergency relief has fallen on deaf ears. The State Department, having come to the conclusion that Yugoslavia's present difficulties are the outcome of high rations and maladministration, have decided that her need is not sufficiently great for her to qualify for emergency relief. They suggest that Yugoslavia should be able to obtain part of her requirements in reparations deliveries of foodstuffs from Bulgaria and Hungary. For the rest she should be able to finance her own purchases abroad, although the supply situation does not permit of such purchases being made in the United States.

Official anti-American feeling in Yugoslavia is now such that this statement could hardly arouse any greater bitterness. Since President Truman's speech America has been clothed with the garb of Hitler.

The food crisis as a topic of news has given precedence to the draft budget, which has been balanced, in contrast to last year's budget in which there was a deficit of seven milliard dinars. But the estimates total the large sum of 85,854,000,000 dinars, more than twice the figure for 1946. The difference may be accounted for by the enormous increase of direct State control over the national economy as the result of the Law of Nationalisation. It is intended that the State sector of economy should be the main source of revenue, and for this purpose, so it is explained, there is to be a rigid system of price control, with elimination of all non-productive expenditure.

There is a significant contrast between recent broadcast transmissions to D.P. camps, in which a special appeal has been made to "Nedíc men, četnici and members of the Serbian Volunteer Corps" to return, and an article in Politika, for home consumption, on the revision of the electoral registers. According to the paper, it is essential to prevent all those "who have ever been the enemies of the people" from taking part in the affairs of the country. Such persons may be disfranchised, therefore, at the request of indivduals or organisations.

Meanwhile General Danijanovic has placed a reward of 2,000,000 lire on the head of Pavelic, the money having been raised by the sale on the Rome black market of coffee saved from the British Army rations supplied to the Eboli camp.

Reserve officers have been ordered to report for two months' military service, beginning on the 1st April.

The Yugoslav Government have been informed that in the view of His Majesty's Government a Mixed Commission is necessary to settle the question of British property in Yugoslavia (see Summary No. 382, 26.2.47). Meanwhile the signature of the Property and Monetary Agreements which have been negotiated in London, and in which the Yugoslav Government have shown considerable interest, is held in abeyance.

Greece

Lawlessness in Greece continued and outrages by both Right and Left were reported. In the Peloponnese the notorious right-wing leader, Katsareas, and several of his officers were ambushed and murdered by a Communist band near Sparta on the 20th March. On the 21st, presumably as a reprisal, 200 right-wing adherents, fully armed, surrounded the prison at Gythion. They disarmed the guards and removed 27 Communist prisoners detained for ordinary crimes. Others surrounded the police station and removed five Communist deportees. The 32 prisoners were then taken to the central square of the town and shot dead. There are reports of other minor reprisal incidents in Laconia and the authorities fear further bloodshed. Martial law has, therefore, been proclaimed throughout the province and gendarmerie reinforcements have arrived in Sparta and Gythion.

In Northern Greece the bandits are said to hold the initiative in Western Thrace where 200 of them attacked a gendarmerie company in the Kerdilion area and a train was derailed at the Kirki tunnel. Two more presidents of communities have been murdered, making in all 25 village presidents who have been murdered in Macedonia and Thrace during the last six months. In Salonica itself Zevgos, one of the leading members of KKE and a member of the Central Committee of EAM, was murdered on the 20th March by a man who recently returned from Yugo-Slavia. He has said that his motive was revenge against the Communists for his sufferings in the training camp at Boulkes.

Military operations to clear several areas of bandits have begun and successes have been reported, particularly from the areas of Kilkis, Vermion and Larissa. Near Grevena, the Greek Army has attacked a band 800 strong.

The United Nations Commission have made several journeys into Yugoslavia and Bulgaria and have visited the scenes of various incidents including Skra. They also investigated the Sourmena incident of the 20th September and Greek officers showed them that the geography of the terrain proved that the bands could not have retired before the Greek forces otherwise than over the Yugoslav frontier. It was felt that the Yugoslav witnesses were "clearly subject to strict control and unwilling to commit themselves to anything beyond the prepared statement."

The Soviet and Polish delegates and the three liaison representatives who remained in rebel-territory last week returned to Salonica on the 22nd March, claiming to have met Markos.

Albania

While in New York M. Hysni Kapo has been trying his best to convince the Security Council (as a Times correspondent neatly put it) that "the British Navy on the 12th–13th November last laid the mines that blew up the destroyers three weeks previously," Enver Hoxha himself has helped to keep the ball rolling by bringing a fresh complaint to the notice of M. Trygve Lie. This time he alleges that on the 13th March a tanker coming from the direction of Italy without flag and without warning penetrated into Albanian territorial waters near Valona. He says that when an Albanian motor launch tried to approach her, the unknown ship went off at full speed without having been identified. In the absence of any better explanation he jumps to his usual conclusion. "At a time when previous repeated violations by British ships are before the Security Council for discussion, this new violation constitutes a premeditated and inadmissible act of provocation against Albanian sovereignty." Once more he asks, why does not the Security Council act?

Mr. Murphy and Sir William Strang came in for some sharp criticism from Bashkimi on the 19th March for having put forward objections to Albania's claim to a small share in reparations from Germany. The suggestion that Austria could make out as good a case as Albania was particularly resented.

Yet another "treason trial" has been going on. Seven men were convicted at Koritsa on the 21st March of having plotted against their country in the interests of "a Greek terrorist fascist organization" called E.A.V.I. They were sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from twenty years to three years.

Bulgaria

In answering a Parliamentary Question on the 17th March about the events of the 7th at Sofia, Mr. McNeil stated that His Majesty's Government regarded the Bulgarian Government's reply to the collectively signed protest presented to them by the seven heads of missions on the 11th as being "in no sense satisfactory." He also said that after making rigorous enquiries he was satisfied that our mission had been involved in no transactions designed to make illegal profits from currency. It is hoped that the whole disagreeable incident may be terminated this week by the publication in the Sofia press of a joint statement to be agreed between the Bulgarian Government and the foreign missions involved. At the time of writing the Bulgarian Government have, however, not given their consent to this course, which would involve their publicly undertaking not to act without prior consultation with the missions in any parallel case that might occur in the future.

When the Bulgarian Foreign Minister received the new British Political Representative on the 19th March, he tactfully enquired when he might hope to address him as H.M. Minister. M. Georgiev was politely told that he must wait until after the ratification of the treaty.

For the second time since the New Year, it has been found necessary to reduce the standard bread ration: it will now be 300 grammes of white bread or 370 grammes of wholemeal a day. At the same time the meat ration has been increased from 200 to 300 grammes a week. It is possible that the necessity of repaying last year's loan of cereals by the Russians may be behind the bread cut.

The suspension of the Opposition newspapers continues. M. Petkov was ordered out of the Assembly for complaining about it and told he might not resume his seat for three days. The entire Opposition thereupon marched out of the Chamber in a body.

Turkey

The Turkish press greeted President Truman's message to Congress about Greece and Turkey, with a paean of praise. No doubt was expressed but that substantial help would be forthcoming. The United States were believed to have understood the Soviet danger at last, and it was hoped that a firm American and British stand would produce results at Moscow. At the same time the Turks betrayed misgivings not only as to the value of Britain as an ally, but also as to limitations of their freedom which American help might connote. To their mentality it is almost inconceivable that British withdrawal from India and Egypt should be due to anything but weakness. On the other hand they are genuinely perturbed lest American help should mean American domination, and fears of a virtual return of the capitulations or of "Egyptianisation" have been seriously entertained. Upon all these misgivings Soviet propaganda has been trying to play. It has long been insinuating that the alliance with Great Britain is valueless to Turkey—unlike what one with Soviet Russia would be. Now Soviet broadcasts also suggest that American capitalism is trying to take Turkey under its control. However, the vulnerability of Turkey is such that even the Turk in the street cannot fail to realise how momentous for his country and the whole Middle East it will be if the United States step actively into an arena where Great Britain and Russia have hitherto been face to face.

The Minister of State announced in the House of Commons on the 17th March that, since the end of the war with Germany, Great Britain had supplied two destroyers, a submarine, a score of smaller vessels and more than £500,000 worth of equipment for the Turkish navy; small quantities of equipment for the Army; and 400 aircraft. All this had been furnished against payment except in so far as it was covered by the unused portion of the 1939 armament credit. A number of naval, military and air advisers had also been provided for purposes of training and supply.

The Turkish Government are not in the habit of paying much attention to the Turks of Cyprus who form some 18 per cent. of the population. Some importance may therefore attach to a leading article in the Ulus of the 28th February on the subject of the recent visit to the United Kingdom of a delegation of Cypriot Greeks who begged for union with Greece. After dwelling on the strategic importance of the island the semi-official paper remarked that the 60,000 Cypriot Turks would see great disadvantage in annexation to Greece and would not consent to it. It might therefore be taken for certain, the Ulus continued, that there was no question of any change in the status of the island.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Although Hussein Heikal Pasha, after a meeting of the Liberal Constitutional party on the 18th March, said that the Egyptian Government might still consider the mediation of the Levant States if His Majesty's Government would make some further acceptable concession, and there seemed at one moment to be a chance that the Arab League meeting might be used to cover a retreat from an appeal to the United Nations, it now seems likely that the Government will go forward with this project. The debate in the Senate, which was adjourned on the 11th March, was resumed on the 18th, when the Wafdist Opposition leader, Sabri Abu Alam Pasha, challenged the Government to declare their attitude to mediation proposals, and questioned the finality of the decision to appeal to the United Nations. He rejected on principle the possibility of a plebiscite in a part of the Nile Valley on the ground that the idea of submitting the question of the unity of Egypt and the Sudan under the Egyptian Crown to a plebiscite was inadmissible and would be rejected by the nation. He demanded from the Prime Minister an answer, "yes" or "no" to the question whether he guaranteed that, after the evacuation, a treaty would not be concluded with Great Britain to fill the vacuum of which Mr. Bevin had spoken. In conclusion he protested that those who had approved of the Sidky–Bevin proposals could not appear before the United Nations, since they would be faced with the approval with which they had bound themselves. Nokrashy Pasha merely suggested reference to his previous statement about mediation. Taufiq Doss Pasha gave as his opinion that previous proposals would not be binding on the present Government, but that the United Nations might be influenced by Mr. Attlee's announcement that the Egyptian Government had approved of them, and thought that steps should be taken to avoid this risk either by a resolution in the Chamber of Deputies, or by some other means. On the closure of the debate a motion signed by a number of Senators "to pass to the Order of the Day" was put to the vote, the ayes standing up, and the noes remaining seated. The President estimated that there was a majority for the motion, which precluded taking a vote on a second resolution tabled by Abdul Hamid Abdul Hakk, who had opened the debate. This read:—

> "The Senate decide that Egypt and the Sudan are one and indivisible, and that the demand of the country is the complete evacuation of Egypt and the Sudan without an Anglo-Egyptian Military Alliance."

The vote on the first resolution was challenged and a number of Wafdist and other Opposition Senators walked out of the Senate in protest. Although Nokrashy Pasha has demanded evacuation free of any conditions laid down in a treaty, the resolution appears to have gone further than he and his Government probably desire, and was designed to embarrass them.

King Farouk, in an audience on the 18th March, had already told His Majesty's Ambassador that what Nokrashy meant was that a treaty should not a sine qua non of evacuation, since he knew the people felt that His Majesty's Government had used the question of evacuation as a means of pressure to get a treaty and did not relish it. His Majesty added that there would be nothing to prevent a treaty of alliance once the evacuation question was out of the way—a remark which lends itself to the obvious interpretation that the present régime does not want to negotiate any treaty so long as there are any British troops in the country, but that they will be glad to enter into negotiations after they have all gone. The value, from a military point of view, of an alliance concluded in such circumstances (judging from the present state of opinion) may well be doubted.

The Qasr an Nil Barracks in Cairo are to be handed over to the Egyptian Government towards the end of this month without ceremony, and with as little publicity as possible.

Palestine

There have been no important developments in Palestine during the week. The Jewish Agency Executive have elected a committee to formulate Jewish demands to be raised before the United Nations "if the Palestine problem is considered on an international basis" (Jewish Telegraphic Agency), and a memorandum is to be prepared for forwarding to the United Nations in June or July. As the meeting of the Zionist General Council, which was to have been held in Jerusalem within the next few days, has now been postponed until the end of April or the beginning of May, and will be held in New York, it may be presumed that this memorandum will figure on the Agenda.

The Jewish Agency Executive, regarding the immigration question as the most vital issue at the moment, have been considering what legal means they could take to secure an increase in the quota. This, they believe, may be feasible as a result of the increasing pressure of illegal immigrants in Cyprus and in Athlit camp in Palestine. Rumours which have been circulating in Jerusalem that authorisation for an increased immigration quota had been received from His Majesty's Government—the figure of 2,500 a month had been mentioned—have been officially denied. A statement was issued by the Jewish Agency Executive on the 24th March calling upon the Jewish community to "make a united effort to expand its economic position in town and country, to increase its help for immigration and the absorption of immigrants, and to provide, as hitherto, pioneer men and women for new settlement, security services, Zionist missions abroad, and any other tasks the emergency may demand." The executive says it will maintain uncompromising opposition to the "iniquitous, repressive White Paper régime." It notes with deep anxiety that the appeals made by the Zionist congress to the terrorists have fallen on deaf ears, and it emphasises the grave moral and political damage caused by their outrages, and calls upon them to accept national discipline.

At a press conference in Jerusalem on the 21st March a representative of the Palestine Communist party said that his party were in favour of the abrogation of the British Mandate and the evacuation of British troops, and favoured an independent Palestine under a democratic régime guaranteeing full equality to Jews and Arabs. They oppose partition and unrestricted immigration on the ground that "emigration solves no national problem." The speaker attacked Zionist leadership for its "imperialist policy." These sentiments were expressed also at the meeting of the recent Congress of Empire Communist Parties held in London, where Zionism was stigmatized as a device of British and American imperialism in pursuit of their aims at economic penetration, and at the establishment of a strategic base against the Soviet Union.

Arab hopes of the support of the Soviet Union when the Palestine case comes before the United Nations seem to be reflected in the current issue of the Arab News Bulletin, which contains not only a lengthy account of the Congress of Empire Communist Parties, but a first instalment of extracts from Russian publications giving views on Zionism and a review of a book condemning Zionism by an Iraqi Jew who is Chairman of the "Anti-Zionist League," which is strongly Leftist in politics. "Progressive" Arab youth will find it hard to resist the appeal afforded by a combination of anti-British and anti-Zionist prejudice with belief in Soviet omnipotence.

Iraq

His Royal Highness the Regent opened Iraq's Eleventh Parliament in extraordinary session on the 17th March. In the Speech from the Throne it was announced that, as the majority of the members were Independent, the new Cabinet would be chosen from them. Salih Jabr has been elected President of the Senate, but there is some expectation that he will occupy a Cabinet post. It has been stated in the press that the Democratic party has issued a manifesto saying that it has decided to withdraw all its deputies from the new Parliament.

Arab League

A communiqué issued by the Secretariat-General after the Second Meeting of the Council, held on the 19th March, stated that note had been taken of a communication from the "Freedom of Libya Organisation," which drew attention to the economic plight of Libya and begged the Council to help in famine relief. Examination of this matter was deferred to later in the session, when the question of Tripolitania comes under consideration.

After discussion on the Secretary-General's report the question of land purchase in Palestine and the gifts made by the Arab Governments for this purpose were considered. Jamil Mardam Bey, for Syria, presented a cheque for £1 million Syrian (about £112,000 sterling) to be put at the disposal of the Council, and Riad as Solh stated that the Lebanese Parliament had approved a credit, and that the Lebanese Government were willing to double the sum.

On the 23rd March an official communiqué was issued by the Arab League Council, which announced that the following decision had been taken unanimously:—

> "Whereas the Arab Powers have repeatedly expressed their total support for Egypt as regards her cause and national claims, and whereas they confirmed that support at the meeting of the Heads of their States at Zahrat Inchass on 28/29th May, 1946, and affirmed it in the extraordinary session of the League Council which met at Bludan from 8th June to 12th, 1946, whereas the negotiations between Great Britain and Egypt have not realised an agreement, and whereas the Egyptian Government has proclaimed its decision to submit its cause to the United Nations Organisation, the League Council takes the opportunity of its present session to reiterate once again the absolute support of the Arab Powers for Egypt in her national claims, namely immediate and total evacuation and permanent unity of the Nile Valley under the Egyptian Crown."

Thus, once again, the members of the Arab League have shown their inability to oppose a resolution expressing opposition to Great Britain, in spite of their previous protestations that they were reluctant to do so and very doubtful of the wisdom of the course of action proposed by the Egyptian Government. The Egyptian Cabinet is reported to be delighted at the result; the reception of the news by Government circles in other Arab countries may be less enthusiastic, for there was everywhere evidence that Egyptian demands were not accepted without qualification. and, in particular, a feeling that the rights of the Sudanese to decide their own future must be recognised. Such, indeed, was the basis of the intervention of the Levant States and of Nuri Pasha's insistence that Iraq supported Egypt's just demands. Yusuf Yasin, who was in the chair at the League Council meetings, has been playing an ambiguous rôle which will surprise no one with a knowledge of his career; full of sweet reasonableness, goodwill and plausible explanations of his inconsistencies in conversation with British officials, he has been more Egyptian than the Egyptians in his statements to the Cairo press. It remains to be seen how ibn Sa'ud reacts to his behaviour.

Jamil Mardam Bey, for Syria, presented a cheque for £1 million Syrian (about £112,000 sterling) to be put at the disposal of the Council, and Riad as Solh stated that the Lebanese Parliament had approved a credit, and that the Lebanese Government were willing to double the sum.

On the 23rd March an official communiqué was issued by the Arab League Council, which announced that the following decision had been taken unanimously :—

> " Whereas the Arab Powers have repeatedly expressed their total support for Egypt as regards her cause and national claims, and whereas they confirmed that support at the meeting of the Heads of their States at Zahrat Inchass on 28/29th May, 1946, and affirmed it in the extraordinary session of the League Council which met at Bludan from 8th June to 12th, 1946, whereas the negotiations between Great Britain and Egypt have not realised an agreement, and whereas the Egyptian Government has proclaimed its decision to submit its cause to the United Nations Organisation, the League Council takes the opportunity of its present session to reiterate once again the absolute support of the Arab Powers for Egypt in her national claims, namely immediate and total evacuation and permanent unity of the Nile Valley under the Egyptian Crown."

Thus, once again, the members of the Arab League have shown their inability to oppose a resolution expressing opposition to Great Britain, in spite of their previous protestations that they were reluctant to do so and very doubtful of the wisdom of the course of action proposed by the Egyptian Government. The Egyptian Cabinet is reported to be delighted at the result; the reception of the news by Government circles in other Arab countries may be less enthusiastic, for there was everywhere evidence that Egyptian demands were not accepted without qualification. and, in particular, a feeling that the rights of the Sudanese to decide their own future must be recognised. Such, indeed, was the basis of the intervention of the Levant States and of Nuri Pasha's insistence that Iraq supported Egypt's just demands. Yusuf Yasin, who was in the chair at the League Council meetings, has been playing an ambiguous rôle which will surprise no one with a knowledge of his career; full of sweet reasonableness, goodwill and plausible explanations of his inconsistencies in conversation with British officials, he has been more Egyptian than the Egyptians in his statements to the Cairo press. It remains to be seen how ibn Sa'ud reacts to his behaviour.

Persia

El Aris (see last week's Summary) arrived in Tehran on the 18th March, and has had long conversations with Reza Rusta and Jodat of the Central Committee of Trade Unions. He has now left Tehran for Abadan, accompanied by Borisov and Malfettes. Mr. Harries, who had flown to Abadan on the 15th March and intended to leave for Isfahan on the 18th, may by now have rejoined his colleagues.

Saiyid Zia un Din Tabatabai, who has been detained in résidence forcée since the 20th March, 1946 (see Summary No. 337 of 26th March, 1946), was permitted to leave prison on the 18th March and go to his house, where he remains under guard. He is said to be seriously ill.

On the occasion of the Persian New Year (No-ruz) on the 21st March His Majesty the King sent a telegram of cordial greetings to His Imperial Majesty the Shahinshah of Persia.

ASIAN RELATIONS CONFERENCE

The Conference (see Summary No. 383) opened in Delhi on the 23rd March. The following countries are reported to have sent delegates on behalf of cultural organisations to take part in the discussions: Lebanon, Syria, Palestine, Persia, Afghanistan, Nepal, China, the Philippines, Burma, Siam, French Indo-China, the Malayan Union, Indonesia, Ceylon, and the Mongolian, Azerbaijani, Kirghizstan, Armenian, Georgian, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan republics of the Soviet Union. The Chinese Government originally protested at the inclusion of Tibet among those countries invited to attend the Conference, but an assurance was given them that the Conference was non-official and non-political, and that the invitations had no bearing upon any country's territorial or political status. The Chinese Government particularly rquested that the question of Tibet's national status would not be raised at the Conference. They aslo requested that the Tibetan representatives should form part of the Chinese delegation, and a press report states that two "representatives of the Tibetan communities" are included in the Chinese delegation.

The following Governments are reported to have sent observers: Turkey, Lebanon, Palestine, Persia, Afghanistan, Tibet, Nepal, Bhutan, Egypt, China, Siam, Indonesia, Ceylon. The Arab League, Great Britain, the United States of America, Australia and New Zealand have sent non-governmental observers.

The press reports that Mr. Nehru, in his inaugural speech, emphasised the potential contribution of a united Asia to world peace, as contrasted with the moral bankruptcy of the West which had led the world into wars and conflicts and was threatening further wars. "The idea underlying this Conference," he said, "is in no way aggressive or directed against any other continent or country. . . . Ours is the great design of promoting peace and progress all over the world." Mr. Nehru stated that, as a result of Western imperialism, the countries of Asia had been largely isolated from each other, but that to-day this isolation was breaking down.

Although Mr. Nehru is described as the Vice-President of the Conference all invitations have gone out over his name, which has also been prominent in press references to it. Mr. Jinnah and the Muslim League appear to attach some sinister significance to these facts, and, in spite of the large representation of non-Indian Muslims, are refusing to attend the Conference themselves.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The Japanese Premier has published a message of thanks to General MacArthur for the sympathy towards Japan's plight and the understanding of the Japanese people shown in his statement on the urgent need of an early peace treaty. At the same time fears are being expressed in Japan that the withdrawal of the forces of occupation might be the signal for a burst of activity by extremists both of the Right and of the Left.

In the Allied Council the Chairman, Mr. Atcheson, who has been on a visit to the United States, stated, according to a Press report, that American businessmen were ready to assist in the development of Japanese economy and of international trade. So are British businessmen, it may be added, on whose behalf His Majesty's Government have for some time past been urging the need of the resumption of private trading at the earliest time practicable.

Korea

March 1st is known in Korea as Independence Day because on this day in 1919 patriotic leaders, inspired by President Wilson's doctrine of self-determination, "demonstrated" and demanded, with disastrous results, independence for their country. It was feared that there might be serious disturbances this year, but, though there were minor clashes between Right and Left throughout Southern Korea, the day passed off comparatively quietly. A plot to issue a proclamation of a "Korean National Provisional Government" was discovered on the 3rd March and nipped in the bud.

According to the Central News, Tokyo, the arrival of Liu Yi-wan as Chinese Consul-General in Seoul has been followed by negotiations between the Chinese Government and the U.S. authorities for the re-opening of trade. Korea needs tobacco, rubber, hemp and piece-goods from China and has ginseng (a medicinal plant highly prized by the older Chinese) and marine products to offer in exchange. Cultural and commercial relations between Korea and China have always been close.

It is stated that the U.S. Military Government have decided to authorise the use of national flags by Korean ships in the near future.

General Christiakov has replied to General Hodge's letter of the 24th December, 1946, suggesting terms on which the Joint-Commission might be reconvened (see Summary 376). While couched in comparatively friendly terms, the reply detailed conditions which would bar various groups from participation and repeated the desire to exclude individuals who had compromised themselves by active opposition to the Moscow decision.

French Indo-China (see under "France")

Reports from Indo-China suggest that the military situation has been stabilised. The total French force available on the spot is said to be 120,000 which is regarded as adequate. Garrisons in Tonking have been relieved and communications restored. In the extreme south of the Province not only is Huë secure but a column—no doubt using Route Coloniale 9—has struck across from Quangtri on the coast to Savannaket on the river Mekong in Laos. By this action, it is claimed, the Viet-Nam line of communication between Tonking and Annam has been cut. It was reported in the Cochin-Chinese Assembly that the new State Army, which is significantly stated to be for the purpose of fighting Viet-Nam guerrillas, would consist of four regiments and five squadrons or a total of 20,000 men. Ten per cent. of the effectives would be French, and training of Cochin-Chinese officers would be carried out at Dalat.

Indonesia

On the evening of 25th March, the long and difficult period of negotiation for a peaceful settlement between the Netherlands Government and the Indonesian nationalist leaders—which had all too often trembled on the brink—ended happily in the formal signing of the Linggadjati Agreement at the residence of the Commission-General in Batavia The signatories to the Agreement on the Netherlands side were Professor Schermerhorn, M. van Poll and the Lieutenant-Governor-General, Dr. van Mook (M. de Boer did not sign, having already tendered his resignation from the Commission-General); and on the Indonesian side Mr. Sjarir, Dr. Gani and Messrs Roem and Soesanto.

After the Agreement had been signed, Professor Schermerhorn, in a short speech, stressed the importance of the step which this event marks in the history of the two nations, since it sealed the determination to pursue a policy of peaceful co-operation; he also drew attention to the pitfalls which inevitably lay ahead and pointed out that the beginning of the gigantic task on which they were embarking was not to be found merely in the letter of the 17 Articles of the Agreement, but in the spirit in which they are interpreted—a spirit which alone has made possible the present moment. Replying, Mr. Sjarir agreed that the signing of the Agreement marked an important step forward and expressed the hope that in practice it would act as a shining light in the path of peace. Dr. van Mook brought the ceremony to an end in a speech in which he dwelt on the necessity to maintain a constructive outlook, regarding their quarrels as belonging to the past and looking forward to a future dominated by mutual friendship and co-operation.

The events immediately preceding the signing of the Agreement are not without interest, the more especially since the ill-timed action of the Dutch military authorities all but brought about yet another deadlock.

On the 13th March, Mr. Sjarir returned to Batavia after attending the Provisional Indonesian Parliament session at Malang. Two days later he addressed a letter to the Commission-General, reaffirming the Indonesian Delegation's inability to accept the so-called "Jonkman interpretation," but suggesting that they should compromise by signing the Langgadjati Agreement first and discussing M. Jonkman's statements afterwards. Mr. Sjarir stated that on his side there was no objection to the Netherlands Government considering themselves bound by their own interpretation of the Agreement, but that he and his Cabinet were not prepared to accept these statements and explanations as binding on them. Two days later the Commission-General notified Mr. Sjarir that the Netherlands Government had authorised them to sign the Agreement on the basis of the suggested compromise.

Meanwhile, however, late on the night of the 16th March, Dr. van Mook quite suddenly informed Mr. Sjarir by letter that, to his sincere regret, it was considered necessary that Netherlands military units should occupy the inundated territory within the Republican perimeter in order to check further flooding of the Sourabaya area. (Netherlands forces had recently advanced 15 kilometres beyond the demarcation lines to occupy the important hydro-electric power station at Kratjak, justifying their action on the ground that it had been left unguarded by the Indonesians). At dawn the following day the territory in question was duly occupied—The Netherlands Army Information Service reporting that the sluices were secured intact, thus completely safeguarding the key position for the water supply of the Porong Delta. (This move by the Dutch military authorities gave the impression of being part of a deliberate plan to establish a firm foothold in the Krian–Porong triangle before pushing on, eventually, to the occupation of Modjokerto.) In their official communication notifying Mr. Sjarir of the fait accompli, the Commission-General also informed him that the state of the floods necessitated a greater area than the actual delta being covered in the operation and that they had also occupied Modjokerto. (Modjokerto is an important railway junction some 35 miles south of Sourabaya.) In this connexion it is of some interest to note that the only remaining hydro-electric station in West Java which is not held by the Dutch is that at Oeroeg, three kilometres from Tjibadak in the Buitenzorg area. On the day of the occupation of Modjokerto the local Netherlands Commander at Buitenzorg notified the Indonesian Commander that unless the headman of a village in Republican control was handed over within a time-limit of three days, Dutch military forces would proceed to occupy Tjibadak. The Republican Commander complied with the demand before the ultimatum expired.

It can have provided little consolation to the Indonesians that both Dr. van Mook and the Commission-General wrote to M. Sjarir expressing their regret for the Porong Delta action, promising to limit it to the prevention of improper manipulation of the sluices and stressing their hope that no delay might be occasioned thereby to the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement. Mr. Sjarir lodged a formal protest, made it clear that he was not prepared to sign before he had investigated the situation at Modjokerto and discussed the whole question with Dr. Soekarno and other members of his Cabinet, and left immediately for Jogjakarta.

On the 22nd March a full meeting of the Indonesian Government took place and on the following day the Republican Ministry of Information announced that, in accordance with the decision taken by the K.N.I.P. at the session recently held at Malang, the Indonesian Delegation would sign the draft Agreement in its original form and at the same time would press for a solution of the several breaches of the "truce" committed by the Netherlands forces. Reports from Dutch sources also claim that an amicable compromise has been reached on the Modjokerto problem, but, if this is so, its terms are not yet known.

In the meantime the Hague decision to authorise acceptance of the "face-saving" loop-hole provided in Mr. Sjarir's letter has resulted in the resignation of one member of the Commission-General, M. de Boer, and of both its two recently appointed Advisors, Professors Posthuma and Verzijl. No reasons for these resignations have been stated officially yet, but newspaper comment describes M. de Boer's action as a protest against the manner in which the Indonesian question has been conducted at the Hague since the draft Agreement was initialled in November, 1946, and to irritation over the delay resulting from the motion sponsored by, and the recent speech-making activities in Java of, Professor Romme. Reports from Indonesian quarters express appreciation of M. de Boer's understanding of the situation and sound a note of genuine regret at his withdrawal. Just the opposite reason is said to have prompted the resignations of Professors Posthuma and Verzijl. They are recorded as holding the opinion that the Netherlands Government's decision to authorise the Agreement to be signed on the basis of Mr. Sjarir's letter is incompatible with the motion of Professor Romme and Jonkheer van de Goes van Naters which was adopted at the Hague as the condition of acceptance of the draft Agreement (see Summary No. 381), and on which understanding they had taken up their appointments to advisorships.

Originally it had been intended by the Republican Government that Mr. Sjarir should head the Indonesian Delegation to the Inter-Asian Relations Conference at New Delhi (see Summary No. 383), but it was finally decided that the recent political events rendered this inadvisable and, for the same reason, it was also considered better not to adopt the suggestion that Vice-President Hatta should go in his place. Finally M. Haji Agoes Salim, the Republican Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, headed the Delegation, which was scheduled to leave Java on the 20th March.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

President Truman's request for 400 million dollars in aid to Greece and Turkey continues to preoccupy the press and the leaders of Congress in the United States. A bill to meet the President's requirements was introduced by Representative Charles A. Eaton, the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, on the 18th March. It provides for amounts not exceeding 100 million dollars to be advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation until such time as the total appropriation of 400 million has been approved by Congress. It authorizes the President to send a limited number of military and civilian experts to Greece and Turkey in an advisory capacity and to transfer to those countries such goods, services and information and to extend to them such "instruction and training of personnel" as he may deem advisable. Representatives of the American press and radio are to be permitted to "observe freely and report fully regarding the utilization of such assistance," and the President is to make quarterly reports to Congress on all the "expenditures and activities" involved.

Hearings on Mr. Eaton's bill opened in the House Foreign Affairs Committee on the 20th March and in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the 24th March. On the 20th Mr. Dean Acheson read to the House Committee a prepared statement on the developments in Greece and Turkey which had led to the appeal for assistance and on the considerations which made it imperative for the United States Government to take the action proposed. Mr. Eaton is striving to get his bill through the House in the shortest possible time. On the 19th his Committee reported out favourably the 350 million dollars general relief bill (see Summary No. 383), thereby preparing the way for consideration of the new measure. The Senate likewise is endeavouring to clear its calendar for the coming debate on the foreign relief programme. The general impatience among Senate leaders to increase the pace of proceedings led on the 18th March to a clash between the Republican President pro tempore, Senator Vandenberg, and the ranking Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Connally. Senator Connally felt that, after the precedents established by the loans to Great Britain, France and Italy, the Senate could proceed with its debate on the plans with regard to Greece and Turkey without waiting for the answers to the questionnaire which Senator Vandenberg had invited his colleagues to submit to the State Department. There was also an uneasy moment on the same day when Senator Vandenberg stepped down from the rostrum to denounce a proposal by Mr. Gael Sullivan, the executive director of the Democratic National Committee and Assistant Postmaster-General, that the chairman of the rival Republican National Committee should subscribe to a joint proclamation in support of President Truman's policy. Senator Vandenberg asserted that when bi-partisan policy got into the hands of national committees it was "in grave danger of losing its precious character," which derived from the fact that it was "not the result of political coercion but of non-political conviction." He also took the occasion to remind Mr. Sullivan that the present bi-partisan approach did not extend to "China policies or Pan-American policies," with both of which he had at times been dissatisfied.

There is still much concern at the possible effect which the proposed direct action with regard to Greece and Turkey may have upon the prestige of the United Nations. Mr. Acheson endeavoured to dispel anxiety on this score in his statement of the 20th March when, after pointing out that the United Nations organization did not of itself possess the funds which the Greeks and Turks required, he emphasized that the State Department was, nevertheless, giving serious consideration to the ways in which the United Nations might take over the problem when the present emergency was past. Senators Vandenberg and Connally have also endeavoured to bring the Eaton bill into line with the considerable body of sentiment which feels that the United States ought at least to seek the "moral backing" of the United Nations for its policy. This they have done by adding a draft preamble expressing the belief that the proposed aid to Greece and Turkey will "contribute to the freedom and independence of all members of the United Nations in conformity with the principles and purposes of the Charter."

Some surprise was caused on the 23rd March when copies of hitherto secret State Department documents relating to the present situation in the Eastern Mediterranean were handed to the press in Washington, and when one of these was found to contain a statement favouring the cession of Cyprus to Greece. The documents had already been in the hands of the House Foreign Affairs Committee since the beginning of its hearings. In reply to inquiries on the subject by His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington Mr. Acheson has admitted that he did not know what all the documents in question contained when they were first submitted to Congress, and he has been most emphatic that the Cyprus statement does not represent his Government's considered viewpoint. The document was apparently prepared by the Division of Research and Publication of the State Department, and was passed on to Congress and the press without the knowledge of the political sections. In any case the proposal with regard to Cyprus appears to be completely at variance with current State Department policy, which is to maintain British influence at its maximum in the Eastern Mediterranean. This policy has caused the State Department inter alia to continue to press His Majesty's Government to keep intact the British training mission with the Greek army, even though the other British troops may be withdrawn.

The proceedings of the Foreign Ministers' Conference are being followed with sustained interest in the United States, although only on M. Molotov's demand for 10,000 million dollars worth of reparations from Germany has any strong line of comment tended to develop. Here Conservatives and Liberals are unanimous in rejecting the Soviet claim on the ground that payment would reduce Germany to a condition of "industrial servitude" to the Soviet Union and that it would in any event be most undesirable to permit the Russians to draw upon current German production for reparations purposes at a time when American and British taxpayers were pouring money into Germany from the West to keep the country from collapsing. The New York Times points out that Russia has already compensated herself "quite liberally" for her war losses by annexing more than 250,000 square miles of territory, by looting Eastern Europe and Manchuria and by "collecting direct reparations through seizure and slave labour whose value former Secretary of State Byrnes has estimated at no less than 14,000 million dollars." General Marshall is therefore warmly commended for his refusal to compromise on the Soviet reparations plan. His prestige has risen considerably as a result of his performance at the Conference—his robust and positive definition of what the United States understands by democracy in relation to Germany at the meeting of the 14th March winning him particular praise and admiration.

At home the drive against disloyal elements on the extreme Left, which has come to be regarded as the natural corollary to Mr. Truman's insistence that help must be given to democratic nations abroad "against movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian régimes," has received a fresh impetus from the Executive Order which the President issued on the 22nd March to purge the civil service of members and "fellow-travellers" of "totalitarian, Fascist, Communist or subversive" organizations. Under this Order every Government department is to have a "loyalty board" to investigate charges brought against its members, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation is to prepare and maintain up-to-date a list of subversive organizations throughout the country. The President's hand has been strengthened in this matter by the rejection by the Supreme Court on the 17th March of the appeal of a War Manpower Commission employee who had been dismissed for belonging to the Communist-inspired "American Peace Mobilization" group.

At its same session the Supreme Court made effective, as from the 20th March, its order requiring Mr. John L. Lewis and the United Mineworkers to withdraw their notice terminating their contract with the Government. This had been the condition imposed by the Court on the 6th in reducing the union's fine from 3,500,000 to 700,000 dollars (see Summary No. 384). On the 19th Mr. Lewis complied "unconditionally" with the order of the Court. He is believed thereby to have removed the threat of a new strike in the soft coal industry on the 31st of this month, the date up to which he provisionally continued his agreement with the Government when he ordered the miners back to work last December.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

An exchange of notes between H.M. Embassy and the Argentine Ministry for Foreign Affairs has extended indefinitely the Anglo-Argentine commercial agreement, though rendering it subject to summary termination. The Argentines refused an extension subject to three months' notice, but offered an extension until April. This would entail negotiations for a new agreement, which, if unsuccessful, would threaten Britain's food supply. Moreover, present Argentine policy suggests that it would be impossible to negotiate a new agreement compatible with Britain's obligations to the International Trade Organization. The possibility of inducing Argentina to enter into the same obligations appears to be faint. Owing to the attitude of the United States Administration Argentina was not invited to take part in the preliminaries of the I.T.O. last summer. Following that exclusion the Argentines adopted an increasingly nationalistic attitude in economic matters, and they have used their economic strength to rally Latin American support against the policies of the United States. Thus, in addition to the proposed agreement with Chile, Argentina has signed a Commercial Treaty with Bolivia and is negotiating one with Peru.

While the fact that Argentina has agreed to send delegates to the International Wheat Conference now meeting in London suggests a possibility of her being gradually drawn into other international agencies, it is difficult to believe that she will do anything contrary to her own immediate material interests, for no policy could be more popular in Argentina than one which combines profiteering and nationalism.

Brazil

It seems likely that negotiations about the treatment of Brazil's sterling balances may be resumed after an awkward break caused by Brazil's sudden decision to suspend purchase of sterling by the Bank of Brazil. This attempt at blackmail seems to have been due to a hasty decision by the Ministry of Finance, and to have afforded some embarrassment to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. In reply to a British Note pointing out that the Brazilian action was a violation of the Anglo-Brazilian Payments Agreement, Sr. Raul Fernandes told H.M. Ambassador that there had been no intention to exert pressure in the negotiations, and that, if his explanations were accepted and the resumption of negotiations was not made conditional on the withdrawal of the Brazilian suspension order, all would be well within a very few days.

Chile

The proposed Argentine-Chilean treaty has been the subject of much discussion in which the danger of excessive dependence on Argentina is balanced against the need for Chile to escape from her present plight; the second of these considerations seems likely to prevail. Conditions are bad enough to induce the Communists, who are part of the Government, to oppose strikes, and the Ministry of Finance has asked other Ministries to reduce expenditure. As 65 per cent. of the budget goes on the bureaucracy, this is necessary; but the Chilean Congress have passed a bill raising military pay and some salaries are being increased—so that the inflation is likely to go on.

Hostility to the Communists has increased and there are rumours that President González Videla may eject them from the Cabinet. In two speeches delivered at the end of February, however, the President declared that though the present ministerial combination was unsatisfactory to Liberals, Radicals and Communists, he was resolved to proceed with it, since Communist support was indispensable and any attempt to govern with the Radicals alone might plunge Chile into revolution. The Communists, for their part, are dissatisfied with the bill providing for agricultural workers' unions, which they regard as inadequate.

Ecuadorean governments, President Velasco Ibarra has remained in power since the overthrow of the Arroyo del Rio régime in 1944. Having run through his liberal and left-wing support after the promulgation of the Constitution of 1945, the President went over to the Conservatives, calling another Constituent Assembly which gave birth to a new Constitution in December 1946. The President's relations with both Constituent Assemblies were strained. The last ended in less disorder than the first, but this is partly due to the fact that the second Assembly was a packed house of Conservatives, the Liberals having refused to take part in the elections. More recently Dr. Velasco has been in touch with the Liberals again. Their leader, Dr. Humberto Albornoz, is ready to collaborate, and the party directorate, after at first forcing Sr. Albornoz to resign, appears to have come round to his way of thinking. The Liberals are still the strongest party in the country, and a new supply of Ministers might soon be acceptable to Dr. Velasco, who has now quarrelled with a fair proportion of those at present available for office. In January the Minister of Defence, Colonel Marcheno, resigned. The Minister for Public Works, Sr. Jorge Montero Vela, one of the President's favourites, on being called before Congress to explain certain appropriations of public funds was finally constrained to agree that the money had disappeared, and resigned. In the excited session, two shots were fired in the public gallery; the man responsible was arrested, and when the President insisted on his release, the Minister of the Interior also resigned. At the beginning of the year a local attempt at an armed rising took place, but on the whole the season has been a poor one for revolutions.

UNITED NATIONS

Disarmament

The Security Council's "Commission for Conventional Armaments" held its first meeting on the 24th March. All countries which are represented on the Security Council have representatives on the new Commission. Each country supplies a chairman for a month, the order of succession being alphabetical, beginning with Australia (Mr. Hasluck). Sir Alexander Cadogan said that his Government would be submitting practical proposals in the near future. Meanwhile he laid down some principles. Disarmament depended on international confidence. To say that confidence depended on disarmament was putting the cart before the horse. The arrangements for collective security contemplated in Article 43 of the Charter must be carried out before disarmament could begin, and, in the same way, a system of international control and verification must precede disarmament. Sir Alexander Cadogan then drew upon his experience in the League of Nations Disarmament Conference, where he played a leading part, to recall how the French had argued that since defensive armaments were maintained to give security, no country would reduce them without the certainty of an alternative source of security. Unfortunately, he added, the French had not succeeded then in teaching us wisdom. This whole question of the relation of disarmament to security had occupied much of the League's time. It was vital, and he only hoped that no Power today would follow in the steps of Fascist Italy who sneered at the whole contention as "sophistry disarmament." Confidence developed gradually. It needed sound Peace Treaties and continuous proofs of co-operation. It needed good faith and a refusal to impugn the motives of others. It needed time, for the pursuit of quick results would in fact be a sure guarantee of ultimate failure. One step, however, could be taken without delay. Article 43 could be fulfilled. International inspection and control meant the loss of some elements of National Sovereignty; but so did every treaty! It was strange, he concluded, how loath the nations were to renounce the right to plunge the whole world into chaos.

The U.S. representative followed similar lines, using Japan's evasion of the Washington Naval Treaty to demonstrate the urgent need for the international control and inspection of the production of Atomic Energy.

Atomic Energy Commission

Something in the nature of a model discussion took place when the Commission met on the 19th March. The Chairman (Soviet Representative) introduced the following resolution: "Having received the resolution of the Security Council of the 10th March, 1947, adopted in connection with the discussion of the report of the Atomic Energy Commission, the Commission resolves that its Committees, and in particular the Working Committee and Committee No. 2, consider the questions following from the Resolution, and first of all the questions relating to the establishment of international control of atomic energy on which the necessary agreement among its members has not yet been reached." The United States Representative supported the resolution, considering it fruitful. Sir Alexander Cadogan also supported it; but saw a danger that the words "first of all" might prevent the Committees emerging from the difficult problems of control, whereas the wiser course had already been shown to be to continue with the clarification of technical problems, hoping that time would allow common sense to solve the problem of control. The Chairman was for dealing with difficult problems first; but he was accommodating. The French Representative supported his U.K. colleague. Finally the Representatives of Syria and Colombia proposed to cut out the words "the necessary" before "agreement," and to put "in particular" for "first of all." Thus amended, the Resolution was passed unanimously, though M. Gromyko remarked that he still believed that what he thought first things should be taken first.

THE COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

When the Ministers adjourned on Tuesday the 25th March to go to the Bolshoi Theatre the future seemed to promise well; for M. Molotov, after listening to Mr. Bevin on peace Conference procedure, said that his general view coincided with Mr. Bevin's; but so far the weather at the Ministers' meetings has had an April-like quality, and neither showers nor sunshine have lasted long.

On Monday the 17th Mr. Bevin, M. Molotov and Mr. Marshall gave their views upon economic affairs and Mr. Bevin enunciated his doctrine that German economic unity was indivisible. M. Bidault replied with the French case on Tuesday. The discussion continued on Wednesday and Thursday. On Wednesday Mr. Bevin, M. Molotov and Mr. Marshall made careful statements on economic unity and on reparations, M. Bidault again following the day after his colleagues. Mr. Bevin showed how His Majesty's Government had refused to consent to any reparations figure being settled at Yalta, and had objected to the sum of 20 billion dollars discussed between the Americans and the Russians, as far in excess of what Germany could pay. In support, he quoted a telegram which the Cabinet had sent to Mr. Churchill, and which Mr. Churchill had read to the Conference: "We shall find ourselves paying for the imports necessary to keep Germany alive, while others obtain the reparations." Potsdam, Mr. Bevin added, had superseded Yalta, and Potsdam mentioned neither a reparations total nor the vexed question of reparations from current production. He defined the difference between M. Molotov's and his own views. Both regarded the matter of economic unity as fundamental; but M. Molotov inclined to concentrate on certain aspects to the exclusion of others. Unity was indivisible, and this indivisibility meant that Mr. Bevin must reject Russian demands for joint control of the Ruhr and for the dissolution of the fusion of the British and U.S. zones until unity was achieved. He welcomed M. Molotov's suggestion to raise the level of steel production to between 10 and 12 million tons. His Majesty's Government had all along advocated 11 million tons! He did not, however, approve that the new level should be made dependent on the payment of reparations. Here Mr. Marshall joined Mr. Bevin, and recalled the fatal consequences of stimulating German production after 1918 in order that reparations might be paid. Mr. Bevin also drew attention to the danger lurking in proposals to place German heavy industry under the control of the central Government. International security would be better served if the Laender had the control. M. Molotov was conciliatory. While he declared that no economic unity would satisfy Russia that did not provide for reparations, he admitted that the new level of industry should (1) meet German internal needs, (2) pay for imports, and (3) pay for reparations. He did not lay down the order in which the three obligations should be met. He foresaw the possibility of agreement on the major problems. Mr. Marshall, like Mr. Bevin, saw things whole. He also recalled how at Potsdam the Soviet had proposed a steel production of only 3·5 million tons.

On Thursday the 20th M. Bidault made his country's agreement to economic unity and higher levels of industry dependent on the amount of coal Germany exported to France. He laid down two principles (1) that Germany should not retain a proportionately larger supply of coal than was available to her former victims, (2) that the steel production of Germany's neighbours should always be superior to that of Germany, since German steel had been an essential element in German aggression; and he noted that recently every increase in the coal output of the Ruhr had meant a decrease in the export of coal from Germany. He obviously did not believe that Germany would produce enough coal for export, unless she were compelled to do so. Mr. Bevin based his rejection of M. Bidault's request for coal on his doctrine of the indivisibility of German economic unity, of which the Ruhr constituted only a part, and on the rights of the British taxpayer.

On Friday the 21st the Ministers first heard a progress report on the work of the Austrian Deputies, and agreed to invite Austrian representatives to come to Moscow for consultation. They then began a two-day exchange of views on the future political structure of Germany. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall spoke on Friday, M. Molotov and M. Bidault on Saturday. There was a clear distinction between the ideas of the Russians and the others. M. Molotov desired a centralised, "democratic unitary State" which would give certain powers to the Laender. The Control Council would draw up a provisional constitution, "aided by democratic parties, trade unions and representatives of the Laender." A Central Government was essential to fulfil Germany's obligations to the Allies. He suggested the Weimar constitution with the autonomy it gave to the Laender "as a starting-point." M. Bidault, himself a historian, had no difficulty in showing that Weimar gave less power to the Laender than had any previous German constitution, and that it had paved the way to Hitler. In his view all power should belong to the Laender who would delegate the essential minimum to a Central Government. But the present subject was the provisional organisation of Germany, stage 2 in the problem. It was premature to deal with stage 3, the provisional Government, before stage 1, "Local Governments," were working properly. The main features of Mr. Bevin's and Mr. Marshall's proposals were almost identical. Both emphasised the fact that a policy of decentralisation was in accord with paragraph 9 of Potsdam, that the Control Council was not a substitute for a proper German Government, based on human rights, and the rule of law. Mr. Marshall would limit the powers of the Central Government strictly, leaving residual authority with the Laender. Mr. Bevin's scheme was at once practical and imaginative. All powers would be vested in the Laender, except those delegated to the Central Government to secure the necessary political, legal, economic and financial unity. In the eventual German constitution there would be two Chambers, one representing the nation, one the Laender, and the latter would have the means to safeguard all Laender rights. Further, a Supreme Court would be set up to watch over the constitution. The President would have only the powers of a constitutional ruler. The practical approach to the problem can be seen in the care taken to ensure that Germany evolves towards freedom, first under guidance and control and, when these become redundant, by her own will. Mr. Bevin's appreciation of the perils which beset the path towards freedom can be seen in the "rights" which he would have guaranteed during the period of growing up, freedom not only to express oneself, but, far more important, freedom to inform oneself. He is alive to the perils of over-centralisation in Germany, and recalled from his own experience, how the bureaucratic centralisation which the Allies set up in Germany after 1918 provided part of the machinery which Hitler used. He is alive, also, to a subtler danger, of Nazism being replaced by a so-called freedom-loving, democratic, but none less totalitarian and exclusive Party. "We want to encourage the interplay of democratic forces and parties which we believe will provide the necessary protection for the Allies." Here the practical mingles with the imaginative, and the aim of Allied policy is shown again to be the conversion of Germany from war to peace. The possibility that Russia's conception of a German constitution may be fundamentally different is suggested in an article which Zalavski wrote in Pravda of the 23rd March. He was discussing the Conference: "Before Bismarck Germany had been evolving on the right lines towards unity under the leadership of Marx, Engels, Lassalle, Liebknecht and Bebel. Unfortunately Bismarck and Hitler brought about this unity by the means, i.e., blood and iron."

No real progress on German affairs was recorded during the third week of the Moscow Conference, although discussions were held on the procedure for drafting a treaty (see under "Moscow Conference"). The Ministers had to wait until the 28th March for the Sub-Committee's report on points of agreement and disagreement, since its members had been unjustifiably led astray by M. paid for at a fair price. Mr. Marshall announced on the same day that his country had so far taken in reparation only 275,000,000 dollars making, with the British figure, a total of less than £100 million. So the matter rests—for the time being. A paper designed to help German economy was tabled by Mr. Marshall on the 24th March when he advocated reducing the occupation forces to a minimum in progressive stages; the first review of troops to be in July of this year. The need for compensation for United Nations property affected by industrial removals was also raised, and Mr. Marshall enunciated the important principle that there ought to be no compensation for enterprises organised exclusively for war production. The French delegation tabled proposals for dealing with cartels. M. Molotov's contribution was to give a definite promise that the overdue demolition of damaged German warships would be completed by August 1947.

The German press and radio has given full coverage to reports of the Conference. The Socialist Unity Party (SED) press has rejected outright M. Bidault's proposal for organised emigration of Germans. Berlin am Mittag of the 17th March called it an attempt to revive Hitler's spurious theory of "ein Volk ohne Raum," but, surprisingly enough, the idea was welcomed by Pieck, a veteran leader of the Party. The American-licensed Tagesspiegel cautiously approved the plan if meant as a conciliatory gesture, but obviously feared that it might turn out to be a scheme for concealed deportation. The British-licensed paper Telegraf saw in it chiefly a welcome fillip to the morale of the refugees. The French Government now wish the subject to be discussed at a conference before July 1947. Apart from comments on reparations and figures for prisoners-of-war in the Soviet Union the other main Moscow news interesting the German press and radio were the proposals on the structure of German Government. That some members of the SED were disconcerted by M. Molotov's proposal for a bi-cameral Parliament was shown by Berlin Radio on the 24th March. The commentator objected, if only on the ground that the second Chamber would not be elected in the usual parliamentary way. However, forced into conciliation, he stated that if this proposal was likely to provide a basis for agreement, all such objections would have to recede into the background. He still insisted that a second Chamber would only serve a purpose if designed to promote German unity, and provided that it did not become the first Chamber. Clearly recognizing that M. Molotov had left the question of centralism or federalism completely in the air, the commentator declined to accept Mr. Marshall's view that there might only be a difference of interpretation between the proposals of the Soviet Union and the United States. Mr. Bevin's proposals were given prominence by all sections of the Berlin press. Soviet-controlled organs reacted cautiously, although they opposed any attempt to put the clock back by giving the Laender as much independence as in the pre-Weimar period. Comment may have been restrained by Mr. Bevin's insistence that the German people should be fully associated in drafting a constitution.

The Eastern Zone still appears to present the most solid front in its clamour for German unity, whereas discordant voices are raised from the Western Zones on many subjects. Bavaria in particular is a thorn in the flesh of German unionists. Yet it is evident that in the West a consensus of opinion on the structure of Germany now has some hope of forming. A fortnight ago it was recorded that the SPD made proposals for a united but decentralised system of Government which seemed to draw nearer to the views of His Majesty's Government. The Rhineland-Westphalian Diet has unanimously approved a federal system. Now the Christian Democrats all over Germany have agreed that there should be a federal structure, in which a second Chamber representing the Laender should have equal rights with the Chamber elected on a nation-wide basis. This goes further than the SPD would wish, since presumably the Laender have the right of absolute veto on all matters, whereas even under Mr. Bevin's scheme the Laender would be limited to a suspensory veto except on constitutional matters. The Left wing of the Christian Democrats, however, is likely to support a system giving less power to the Laender. Another important point is that, although the Social Democrats were forced to refuse the Christian Democrats' invitation for four-party meetings, because it would have meant sitting down with the Socialist Unity Party, the Christian Democrats, and Social Democrats, together presumably holding the allegiance of 80% of the German electorate, are conferring on possibilities of further cooperation in representing Germany's interests.

The Germans are not alone in these activities. The Soviet Authorities have been making active preparations for some months past in order to take the initiative if the opportunity arises for setting up a Central German Government. The first step might be the establishment of a number of Central German Administrations under Allied Control. In either case the Russians would wish to be first in the field in proposing candidates suited to themselves, but not necessarily all stamped as followers of the Socialist Unity Party. Such candidates are now being sought. Foremost among those reported to have been selected for a post in the Central Government, presumably for that of Foreign Minister, is Herr Nadolny. His name has already been mentioned in this connection by the press of the Western Zones. Nadolny was Ambassador to Russia for some months after September 1933, but retired in June 1934. He was a strong advocate of Russo-German understanding. He had represented Germany for a time at the Disarmament Conference in Geneva, when Germany demanded equality of status. He is believed to be a strong nationalist of the traditional type, whose views are unlikely to be wholly palateable even to Russia. Other possible candidates are Otto Grotewohl, the Socialist Unity Party leader, and less probably Karl Germer of a Berlin SPD opposition group.

Whatever the activities of politicians the ordinary population throughout Germany is infected with bitterness and depression. In the Soviet Zone the population lives under a cloud of uncertainty. The Soviet Authorities have now stated that the arrested Berlin students were charged with secret fascist activities. Two more arrests were reported on the 28th March. In the Soviet Zone proper the deportation of prisoners to Russia has increased in recent weeks, many of the prisoners being members of the Intelligentsia who were not deeply involved with Nazism. German apprehensions were described by a Social Democratic Speaker in Berlin City Council on the 27th March, when she said that "the shadow of the régime whose . . . illegal methods left everybody in doubt at what a sudden ring at the door might portend still hangs over us." Inhabitants of the U.S. Zone, although probably less hopeless, live in an atmosphere darkened with corruption and intrigue. In the French Zone there is apathy engendered by food shortages and the heavy drain of exports. The British Zone is probably the most marked by bitterness. One day strikes and other demonstrations have occurred in Ruhr towns. During a mass food demonstration of 30,000 people in Duesseldorf on the 28th March, unruly elements smashed windows of British offices and overturned into a lake a Volkswagen in the British service. An orderly demonstration in Dortmund the following day demanded the resignation of Dr. Schlange-Schoeningen, the head of the food administration in the Zone (all internal food distribution is in German hands). Every effort is being made to increase supplies in an area which has been living from hand-to-mouth since last May and is further hampered by mismanagement by German authorities. The Regional Commissioner supported the German view that the demonstrations were not directed against Military Government but in order to call attention to the food situation. Dr. Schumacher has called on the people to show discipline or perish and declared that Germans, particularly farmers, were to blame for past failures, as well as the Occupying Powers. The first serious example of non-co-operative policy has come from Essen where the Town Council is refusing to evacuate accommodation required owing to re-distribution of occupying forces. In such conditions the people will be particularly open to inflammatory election speeches preceding the poll for State Assemblies on the 20th April. Adenauer (CDU) spoke on the 23rd March against transferring industries from the dangerous hands of private monopolists to the equally dangerous clutches of the State rather than of less centralised bodies. He asked, however, for an all-party truce on those questions in which the German people should show a united front in their dealings with the Allies. He spoke disparagingly of the Moscow Conference where the German people was "merely one of the pawns being pushed here and there" as the interests of the Powers demanded. He added a salutary reminder, however, that "nothing good for us can come out of differences between the Allies."

AUSTRIA

The Council of Foreign Ministers, acting on the proposal made by Mr. Marshall in his memorandum of the 21st March, have held two further meetings in an attempt to resolve the deadlock reached by the Deputies on certain of the economic clauses in the Austrian treaty, in particular the problem of the "German assets" in Austria. The definition of this term has still not been agreed, and indeed at the beginning of the discussions it seemed as though M. Molotov might go back on the agreement previously reached by the Deputies that the treaty should include some definition of this term. M. Bidault eventually put forward a three-point proposal, according to which the Deputies should be instructed:—

1. To prepare an article providing for the recognition in the Austrian treaty of allocation of German assets in Austria under the provisions of Potsdam.
2. To prepare a definition of German assets in Austria, excluding all property taken under force or duress or, more generally, all property unduly taken from United Nations nationals or from Austrian nationals, for racial, religious or political reasons.
3. To prepare an arbitration clause on the basis of article 50 of the draft treaty.

M. Molotov expressed his willingness to accept the first clause, but wished to exclude the provision for arbitration and to amend the definition of the assets so that it should only exclude property "seized by the Germans from the United Nations or from Austrians as a result of forcible action or in the process of Aryanisation without any compensation." Such a definition would, of course, extend very considerably the scope of the Russian claims and, as Mr. Bevin has pointed out, would penalise those owners who had, in so many cases, received only nominal compensation or who had been obliged to surrender their property by intimidation. The Soviet rejection of the arbitration clause in the proposal is based on the assumption that, as Great Britain and the United States have renounced any claim on German assets in Eastern Austria, the Soviet authorities have the right to deal with these assets as they please. The other three Powers are anxious to see that German assets in Austria are acknowledged to come within the competence of the four Powers and to be relevant to reparations from Germany, not reparations from Austria. According to press accounts the Ministers were unable to reach agreement on the problem, and the matter has been referred back to the Deputies. M. Molotov is reported to have urged that the Ministers should not refer to the matter again until the Austrian treaty as a whole is reached on the agenda; in view of the amount of work to be got through before this point is reached, this would mean a considerable lapse of time during which the Deputies would be left without guidance on this important issue.

The Deputies have been continuing their discussions and have reached agreement on some comparatively unimportant points. The British compromise figure of 53,000 for the size of the Austrian armed forces has now been accepted, but the armament of these forces with war material of non-Austrian origin or design is still under discussion and is being opposed by the Russians. Efforts to achieve a compromise on the article concerning the preservation of Austria's independence have been unavailing, the Soviet Deputy objecting to the whole article. While admitting the validity of the Potsdam decision that no reparations should be exacted from Austria, M. Gusev has sought, but without success, to obtain a hearing for the Yugoslavia claims for reparations. The Soviets have also supported Yugoslav claims to keep Austrian property in Yugoslavia. In regard to Yugoslav territorial claims Soviet propaganda continues to maintain a cautious attitude.

Reports in the Soviet press of a recent clash in Eisenkappel (Carinthia) between members of the Slovene Liberation Front (the OF) and the local inhabitants did not commit the Soviet Union to support Yugoslav claims. According to the report of the Director of Public Safety in Carinthia, the clash occurred as the result of the holding of an unauthorised procession by the OF. In view of the negative attitude to Yugoslav claims hitherto publicly maintained by the Austrian Communist party, it is of interest that the version of the incident given by the Communist Volksstimme omitted all reference to the provocative behaviour of the OF officials.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Despite the President's recent warning on the dangers attending yet another internal Czech-Slovak crisis (See Summaries 372 and 382), the approaching close of the Tiso trial in Bratislava—a verdict is expected shortly after Easter—has thrown perhaps even more sharply into relief the unsatisfactory relationship between Conservative Slovakia and the Socialist Czech Lands. As far as the Slovak scene itself is concerned the trial amounts to nothing more than a phase in the struggle for political supremacy between the Slovak Democrats and the Communists, since both parties are energetically making ideological capital out of the cause célèbre. In its wider aspect where questions of national security are involved the trial has a far greater significance. Public sympathies in Slovakie are so overwhelmingly in favour of Dr. Tiso that competent Czech observers believe that, if the death-sentence is pronounced, Czech-Slovak relations will be hopelessly ensnarled for years to come. Consequently any prospect, it is thought, of reaching agreement on the new Constitution would be grievously damaged—unless, of course, the Communist stock slumps in the 1948 elections. The news of pro-Tiso demonstrations, notably in Pieštany, shows that Hlinka extremists and agents provocateurs are still at work, although it is not impossible that the incidents were deliberately inspired by the Communists. Among those arrested as the alleged instigators of the demonstrations is the Secretary of the Freedom Party which was formed shortly before the 1946 elections to cater for the discontented Catholic elements in the Democrat ranks.

In retaliation the Slovak Nation Front, reinforced by representatives of the Slovak Trades Union Council and the Partisan Organisation, staged a counter-demonstration in Bratislava. The principal theme of the many speeches delivered was that of fidelity to a united Republic and the need to purge the province of all subversive elements. General Ferjenčik, the non-party Commissioner of the Interior, has been empowered to take severe measures to prevent the recurrence of similar disorders.

M. Masaryk, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, has reviewed in the course of a lengthy speech to Parliament his country's relations with foreign Powers. The tone of his speech was optimistic, though he urged that effective control over Germany is vital. No new disclosures were made; the Soviet Union continues to be the keystone of Czechoslovak foreign policy. Regarding Anglo-Czech relations M. Masaryk welcomed the increasing political interest and cultural collaboration between the two nations; the signing of the Anglo-French Treaty he regarded as proof that Great Britain has not cut herself adrift from the Continent. In the debate which followed M. Masaryk's exposé, the Czech Communist, Popular, and Socialist parties deplored the American attitude towards the new Republic.

The Government have approved the Central Planning Commission's proposal that there should be a general price reduction—to be effective as from the 1st April—in foodstuffs and essential goods. The cost of living is expected to fall by 5 per cent.

(See also under "Hungary.")

POLAND

It now seems likely that the differences of opinion among the leaders of M. Mikolajczyk's Peasant Party, the P.S.L., have led to a definite breach. The subject of such differences was the question whether the P.S.L. ought to have joined the united electoral "bloc," proposed by the Government parties or, as actually happened, taken part in the contest as an independent opposition. That the party adopted the latter course was due to M. Mikolajczyk himself, who, finally realizing the extent to which the Government parties would certainly go in their programme of electoral chicanery and dishonesty, decided not to be associated with them in such a procedure. Instead, he thought that the P.S.L. should present itself to the country as the party standing for the traditional democratic principles of freedom of thought and expression, in relation to Poland's domestic affairs, while fully accepting the fact that a considerable limitation would have to be placed on the claim to an independent foreign policy in so far as that an alliance with Russia, while certainly not completely to the liking of the majority of Poles under present conditions, was rendered inevitable precisely by those same conditions, and therefore outside the range of discussion.

The opinion that the P.S.L. should have joined the "Bloc" was, and still is, held by a group led by Dr. Kiernik and M. Wycech, Ministers of Public Administration and Education respectively in the provisional government prior to the elections. Both men spent the war in Poland as members of the underground forces acting against the Germans, and were among those admitted to the provisional government when it was re-formed on a "broader" basis, in accordance with the Yalta agreement.

For a long time such a diversity of views did not appear to imperil the party's unity to any great degree, and seemed to be one of those points of controversy which normally, and often inevitably, occur in any political organization founded on the commonly accepted principles of democracy.

Indeed, had the government parties showed any genuine respect for the spirit of the Yalta postulate of free and unfettered elections, the contention of M. Kiernik and M. Wycech might well have been more reasonable, on the ground that Poland's unsettled state did not permit the luxury of party politics.

The conduct of the government, however, before and during the elections of January of this year proved that far greater principles were at stake than mere inter-party arrangements. The division within the P.S.L. therefore assumed a fundamental character. At the end of February the supporters of M. Kiernik and M. Wycech openly declared their opposition to M. Mikolajczyk, and started to publish a new weekly newspaper "The Peasants and the State." In this paper M. Dec, one of the opposition leaders, maintained that it was only the obstinacy of M. Mikolajczyk which had prevented the P.S.L. from joining the Government "bloc," and that it was in the interests of the peasants to co-operate with the workers' parties. There have also been reports of spontaneous dissolutions of the P.S.L. in various parts of Poland, especially in the regions of Bialystok, Wroclaw (Breslau), and other Silesian districts. The dissidents are said to have joined either the "Bloc" Peasant Party (S.L.) or the ranks of the moderate Socialists. That M. Mikolajczyk will resign himself to such a state of affairs seems unlikely. On the 14th March the P.S.L. Executive suspended the editors of "The Peasants and the State" from their party membership, on the ground that they had started publication of a paper without the Executive's permission, and that their action was detrimental to the Party's interests.

According to Warsaw Radio and the official Soviet news agency "Tass," General Karol Swierczewski, the Polish Vice-Minister of Defence, was murdered by Ukrainian Fascists near Sanok on the 28th March. (Sanok is in the south of Rzeszow province, some fifteen miles from the Polish-Russian frontier.) Swierczewski, who was born in Warsaw at the end of the last century, was one of the Poles of Russian Poland who became almost more Russian than Polish. Between the two world wars he became a Soviet officer, graduating at the Frunze Academy. In July 1936, under the name of General Walter, he commanded one of the International Brigades in the Spanish Civil War, and was later in charge of the Polish contingent. During the recent world war, he acted as deputy to General Berling, the Polish Commander of the Polish troops fighting in Russia. He was placed in charge of the Second Polish Army, promoted to the rank of Colonel General by the Soviet Government and, according to Warsaw radio, distinguished himself during the battles for the Western Neisse, the river now claimed by Poland as part of its frontier with Germany. He became Vice-Minister of Defence in March 1946.

SOVIET UNION

Mr. Bevin was received by Generalissimo Stalin on the 24th March. On the whole, attacks on Great Britain in the Soviet press have been on a smaller scale than before the Moscow Conference, though specific criticisms continue. The tour of the delegates of the Supreme Soviet visiting this country has been reported in daily Tass messages; the Prime Minister's dinner on the 24th March was given one and a half columns, Mr. Attlee's speech being condensed into fifteen lines, and M. Kuznetsov's reply being reported in full. It is of interest that this is one of the very rare occasions since the end of the war when the Soviet public has been allowed to read any praise of the British war effort or expression of confidence in British intentions.

Mr. Truman's proposals for aid to Greece and Turkey have been kept before Soviet readers, but there has been no further comment after the original Pravda and Izvestiya leaders, which themselves were relatively mild in tone. It does not seem that a major press campaign is to be launched comparable with that devoted to Mr. Churchill's Fulton speech. The atmosphere in Moscow would seem to indicate a feeling that the Soviet Government may have pushed its policies rather too hard since the war, as such a strong American reaction has been provoked. The line put forward by Soviet citizens in conversations with H.M. Embassy staff is to point out how right the Soviet Government has been about the expansionist tendencies of the U.S.A. and to suggest Anglo-Soviet co-operation in resistance to American domination.

M. Molotov reaffirmed on the 24th March his Government's view that it would be expedient for the present Council of Foreign Ministers to discuss the fulfilment of the Moscow Agreement on China, and on the following day the first Soviet press comments on the question began to appear. A long Tass message from Shanghai emphasised that "democratic" Chinese circles were in favour of the proposal to discuss China, and the same point was elaborated in a Krasnaya Zvezda article, which denounced American imperialist interference in Chinese affairs.

Reporting of the Conference of Foreign Ministers has continued on the same lines as hitherto, though the account of the proceedings of the 25th March was deliberately distorted so as to give the impression that it was the U.S.S.R. which had taken the initiative in inviting the participation of Persia. The Secretary of State's proposal to associate Persia was completely omitted. The bulk of comment on the Conference in the press has been devoted to different aspects of the German problem. The main attacks on British policy in Germany have been concerned with the question of patents and of the Ruhr coal. Patents were described as a very important article in reparations, in contradiction to the Secretary of State's statement, and Great Britain and the U.S.A. were said to have already received more than a milliard dollars under this heading. As for the Ruhr, the British were said to be deliberately restricting Ruhr coal production to prevent further competition on European markets, in view of Britain's present lack of coal for export. The most important articles on the German problem have been two in Izvestiya and Pravda by the well-known writers Tarle and Zaslavsky. Tarle attacked federalisation on the usual lines, but while highly critical of this country and the U.S.A. he never referred to the French. Zaslavsky, surprisingly enough, in view of his usual unrestrained invective, devoted himself exclusively to the political structure of Germany without criticising the Allies. He actually allowed some virtues to the Weimar Constitution, saying that the restoration of many of its features would be useful, as it would be utopian (the greatest condemnation from the lips of a Marxist), to attempt to return to the pre-Bismarck structure of Germany. He concluded by affirming the responsibility of the German people themselves for the future structure of their country. Nothing permanent could be imposed on them from outside.

The decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. prohibiting marriages between citizens of the U.S.S.R. and foreigners was only published in the official bulletin on the 18th March, though it was dated 15th February. It does not appear as yet to have been reproduced in the Soviet daily press. H.M. Ambassador had spoken to M. Molotov concerning such marriages on the 31st December to the effect that it might be better to forbid them than to refuse to allow wives to join their husbands. The decree may, however, be mainly designed to prevent marriages between Soviet occupation troops and civilian employees abroad and foreigners. No success has so far been achieved in securing permission for Soviet wives of British husbands to leave the U.S.S.R.

The negotiations between this country and the U.S.S.R. over fish supplies have at length been concluded, and a contract signed providing for the shipment over two years of 150,000 cases of tinned salmon and 25,000 cases of tinned crab weighing 48 lbs. each from the Soviet Union to Great Britain. Before the war the United Kingdom imported 2½ million cases of salmon of which 700,000 came from Russia. The main obstacle encountered during the course of the recent negotiations, apart from the price, was the Russian demand for 1,000 tons of tinplate; only 500 were necessary for the amount of salmon offered.

General Golikov has issued a statement on Italian prisoners-of-war in the U.S.S.R., asserting, in contradiction of earlier reports, that the repatriation of Italians from the U.S.S.R. had been completed by the end of 1946. He gave a total of 21,065 and stated that a further 146,756 Italians had been liberated from German captivity by the Red Army in Poland, Germany and Austria and had been repatriated. According to Italian sources, 60,000 Italian prisoners have disappeared in the U.S.S.R. without trace and are believed to have died in concentration camps.

The serious agricultural situation in the Ukraine was discussed at a recent plenary session of the Ukrainian Communist Party; M. Kaganovich, who has recently been sent specially by the Central Committee to become Chairman of the Communist Party of the Ukraine (replacing M. Khrushchev, who remains Chairman of the Ukrainian Council of Ministers), drew special attention to the serious lagging behind in the production of summer wheat and emphasised the importance of restoring the sugar beet acreage. The provincial committees of the Ukrainian Communist Parties and the local Soviets in certain districts were held responsible for many of the deficiencies in agricultural production.

Norway

In the complete absence of any Soviet reaction to the Norwegian note conveying the Storting's resolution on Spitsbergen (see Summary No. 383) the most important repercussions so far have taken place at home. Considerations of foreign policy forbade the proceedings in the Storting on the 15th of February from being made public until more than two weeks later, when it was disclosed that the Government's resolution had been adopted by 101 votes to 11. The Communist members were found to have been the only dissenters, favouring a draft resolution drawn up by the Party's representative in the Foreign Affairs Committee, M. Strand-Johansen. This motion, as might have been expected, urged the Government to continue the bilateral discussions with the Soviet Union regarding the joint defence of the Islands. The action of the Communists, so clearly demonstrative of where their true allegiance lies, has evoked bitter criticism throughout the country, and the chief Government organ, Arbeiderbladet, has not hesitated fairly and squarely to condemn them as fifth-columnists prepared to subordinate the interests of Norway to those of the Soviet Union. Whatever the outcome of the whole affair may be, and there is no reason to suppose that the Storting will feel inclined even to reconsider the matter, it may already be said that the Communist Party has suffered a serious, though as yet inestimable, loss of popularity.

An important debate on reconstruction was resumed on the 4th of March. Concerned mainly with the work in the war-ravaged provinces of Finnmark and North Troms, the debate formed the occasion for a determined and concerted attack upon the Government. Members of the Opposition, one after another, alleged gross incompetence on the part of the administration, and M. Utheim of the Liberal Party, went as far as to call upon the Minister of Supply, M. Torp, to resign. The same speaker also urged the appointment of a special committee to investigate the malpractices revealed, most of which concerned the evasion of regulations, particularly by timber contractors. Freights paid to shipowners were also far in excess of the maximum rates stipulated, and the Opposition brought the charge that the Ministry of Supply had, though perhaps unwittingly, encouraged black market transactions which it was the avowed intention of the Government to stamp out. Government speakers ridiculed the contention of the Opposition that the debate was non-political, and asserted that the speeches in which the Government had been criticised revealed a gleeful desire to make political capital out of the difficulties in the North. Answering the charges, M. Torp admitted that a certain amount of unlicensed building had taken place, and timber had been obtained by persons evading the regulations. This, however, showed a lack of social conscience on the part of individuals and firms who were supporters of the doctrine of private enterprise, for which the Government could hardly be held responsible since this policy was advocated by the Opposition itself. Excess freights, the Minister agreed, had been paid in a number of cases but these had been recovered; the Department was continuing its investigations into other cases, and proceedings would be instigated against offenders. M. Utheim's proposal for the appointment of a special investigation committee was a challenge and he, M. Torp, considered the question to be one of confidence. M. Utheim's motion was rejected with 82 votes to 54, and the investigations left in the hands of the Ministry of Supply. The Communist members voted with the Government.

Denmark

Denmark is at present in the throes of the forthcoming elections to the Upper House, the Landting. The elections to this body are rather complicated and far less democratic than those to the Lower House, which is one of the reasons why the abolition of the Landting has been repeatedly mooted and forms one of the planks of the Communist platform. Of the 76 members of the Landting nineteen are elected by an electoral college composed of members of the retiring Landting, while the remainder are elected in the seven Upper House constituencies, each division electing an electoral college. In practice, however, the electoral colleges carry out the decisions of the party organisations, since the parties hold meetings immediately prior to the official deliberations of the electoral colleges and impose on their members the duty to vote for candidates selected by the party. Thus it would seem as though it were possible to work out accurately the number of Upper House members which each party will gain, but there exist certain means of "eking out the votes" and parties know how to exploit these possibilities. If, for instance, two parties jointly can secure a mandate, they may do so in association on previously agreed conditions. While it is possible that an agreement may this time be made between the middle class parties it seems hardly likely that the Conservatives and Radicals will be able to come to an arrangement, and M. Hedtoft, the leader of the Social-Democratic Party, has rejected a Communist proposal for a joint list, although he tempered his refusal by explaining that his Party did not wish to form a list with any party. It is rather difficult to forecast the result of the elections, as the strike in the printing trade is severely handicapping any expression of opinion, but there seems little likelihood that the Government Party will lose any votes—they may even show a slight gain.

The outgoing Landting consists of 34 Social-Democrats, 19 members of Venstre, 14 Conservatives, 8 Radicals and one Member for the Faeroes.

On the 25th of March, M. Rasmussen, the Danish Foreign Minister, announced the Government's intention of terminating the United States-Danish Greenland treaty. This decision may well be one of the most popular that the present Danish Government has taken, as rumours emanating from the United States that it was intended to purchase Greenland were very much resented all over the country and had been described by the Foreign Minister himself, as absurd and contrary to Danish tradition.

The expression of Danish opinion on President Truman's message to Congress was also handicapped by the printers' strike. On the whole, however, those papers which have appeared seem to have confined themselves to reporting the speech without comment, which is probably partly due to the usual Danish lack of interest in foreign affairs and mainly to the intense Danish desire to avoid being forced to take sides in any dispute between East and West. Nevertheless, one may wonder whether the sudden firmness displayed by the Danes in their demand for payment under their agreement with Soviet Russia—and a very recent approach to the American Ambassador in Copenhagen about inter-Scandinavian defence—is by any chance connected with Mr. Truman's declaration.

Sweden

In Sweden, on the other hand, the latent dislike and fear of Russia has led to a widespread welcome in the Liberal and Conservative press for Mr. Truman's declaration of defiance. The Government papers, however, and the Communist Ny Dag, deplored Mr. Truman's speech as signifying a challenge to Moscow which might conceivably lessen the chances of the peace settlement between the Great Powers.

Iceland

An Icelandic Trade Delegation has arrived in Moscow, but its coming has not yet been announced in the Russian press. It will be interesting to see whether, taking their cue from the Danes, the Icelanders will use these parallel negotiations for trying to exert pressure on His Majesty's Government during the trade conferences at present taking place in this country.

Finland

Signs that the fortunes of the Social Democratic Party may be reviving can be detected in the resolution adopted at a recent congress of the Party's Swedish branch, which for a considerable period has been opposed to the central leadership, and at times carried on a vigorous flirtation with the Folk Democrats. The meeting at which the Swedish-speaking workers considered the future affiliation of their organisation, decided by 90 votes to 31 to remain within the Social Democratic Party, and, at the same time, reached the conclusion that their paper, Arbetarbladet, must in the future follow a line more in conformity with the remainder of the Party press, and not lend itself to attacks upon the Social Democratic Movement. The Editor, M. Atos Virtanen, who, it will be remembered, last autumn, together with Mme. Kilpi, resigned from the Party, was consequently replaced by M. Gunnar Henriksson. The Congress further expressed the hope of speedily reaching a better understanding with the majority of the Party, thus ensuring that the minority will receive a satisfactory representation in the Party leadership. In view of the fact that a very real danger at one time existed of the Swedish branch detaching itself and perhaps joining the Folk Democratic camp, the decision of the Congress must be regarded as an important step towards the unity of the Movement, and should greatly strengthen it during the critical months ahead.
