Italy has been at war with Japan since the 15th July. The Ministry for Foreign Affairs issued a statement to the effect that diplomatic relations were broken off between Japan and the Italian Royal Government in September 1943, when the Japanese arrested the Italian diplomatic and consular personnel in Japan but maintained contact with Mussolini's Government. On the 22nd June, 1944, the Tripartite Pact between Italy, Germany and Japan was denounced at the first Council of Ministers held under the presidency of Signor Bonomi, and on the 18th January, 1945, the Council of Ministers denounced Fascist Far East policy and declared its recognition of the National Government of Chungking as the sole legitimate Government of China. It has been clear for some time that the Italian Government was only waiting for the right moment to declare war on Japan. Signor Prunas, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has explained that the Italian Government had decided to act just before the meeting of the Big Three in Potsdam in the hope of creating a good impression on public opinion, particularly in the United States and China, where it would be realised that Italy was sincerely desirous to share in the war effort of the United Nations. Signor Parri also expressed Italy's aspirations in his message to President Truman, where he said: "The fact that Italy's lining up with the United Nations coincides with the Potsdam meeting is for the whole nation a reason for faith and hope in that future justice of which you are the highest sponsor."

The Council of Ministers, at its meeting on the 11th July, agreed on the need for special guarantees for citizens speaking other languages than Italian, and promised that, in addition to the official recognition of other languages in relations with political administrative and legal authorities, the teaching of the mother-tongue would be guaranteed in schools in those areas where there are a considerable number of non-Italian-speaking citizens. The Val d'Aosta received special consideration, and the Council decided "to establish a special régime of local autonomy." Signor Parri explained to a meeting of foreign journalists on the 13th July that the Val d'Aosta problem was urgent, that the Government must repair the errors of the Fascist régime, and that it would not be regarded as a precedent for other claims to regional autonomy, which would have to be decided by the Constituent Assembly.

The economic situation in the north is causing serious anxiety both to the Italian Government and to Allied Military Government. Political interest has yielded with most people to absorption in acute economic problems, particularly in regard to the incompatability between wages and prices. Even if the proposed increase of 100 per cent. is made in workers' wages, these will only be eight times as high as 1939 wages, while the cost of living is fourteen times as much as it was. This incompatability, together with the growing menace of unemployment, causes an increasing feeling of uneasiness among all classes of the population. Organised but orderly demonstrations for higher wages have taken place, particularly in Milan. The situation of the industrialists is also very difficult, as they have on their pay-roll very large numbers of unemployed workers, e.g., 60 per cent. of 429,000 workers in engineering, 70 per cent. of 376,000 textile workers. The Economic Commission of the National Committee of Liberation has pointed out to Allied Military Government that the difficulties of the economic situation are aggravated by the fact that in North Italy the economic structure is inter-regional, whereas Allied Military Government control is on a regional basis.

THE VATICAN.

The Vatican has still further explained its recent policy by publishing documents which deal with the German persecution of Catholics in the Warthegau, and Polish Catholic Workers in Germany, up to March 1943. Apart from the strong and detailed Vatican protests, the most interesting letter is Cardinal Bertram's reply to the Papal Secretary of State. It shows German bishops and priests risking concentration camps and charges of disloyalty to help Polish workers. Nothing could be done in face of the "Party Chancery," which controlled all Government and "did not hold itself bound by the Concordat." The documents, besides justifying papal policy against charges of weakness and reaction, prove the existence of a large body of men in Germany who had the courage to maintain Christian standards in face of the totalitarian State.

The Vatican has just announced that Cardinal Bertram died on the 13th July. Born in 1859, he had been Prince-Archbishop of Breslau since 1914, and was President of the Bishops' meetings at Fulda—a man of wide learning and deep piety, and fearless in the face of the Nazis.

For the latest attempts of Moscow to identify the Vatican and the Roman Catholic Church with Nazism, &c., see under "Soviet Union." The underlying reason for these attacks and the Church's answer could be seen in the Pope's speech to U.N.R.R.A.: "Has man certain God-given rights which the State is bound to protect? Or has the individual only what rights the all-powerful State finds it useful to confer?"

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Press continued to criticise sharply the treatment of the Hungarian minority in Czechoslovakia, making allegations of persecution. The Foreign Minister, in a statement on the 4th July on the exchange of population between Hungary and Czechoslovakia, said that Hungary would never propose such a measure except on the basis of international agreement, considering it to be contrary to the spirit of democracy and humanity. If the Slovaks living in Hungary wished to return to Slovakia, they were free to do so, but Hungary offered them full equality in political, economic and cultural life.

An agreement was concluded with Czechoslovakia whereby Hungary supplies petrol against Czechoslovak sugar in the proportions of 4 litres of petrol to 1 kilogram of sugar.

Hungary's relations with her other neighbours remained friendly: under an agreement reached between Hungarian and Roumanian Health Trade Unions, Hungary will receive from Roumania pharmaceutical goods and condensed milk and hospitality for 50 children at the sea-side.

The Russian censorship of the Press was removed as from the 14th June and the responsibility passed to the Hungarian Foreign Minister. At a Press Conference he outlined the policy to be followed as (i) cultivation of friendship with the U.S.S.R.; (ii) cautious use of news material showing disagreement between the Big Three, and (iii) moderation in dealing with the delicate question of the Hungarian minority in Czechoslovakia.

American Independence Day was celebrated in Budapest with a meeting before the Washington monument attended by the whole Cabinet and the leaders of the political parties, at which a prominent part was played by members of the Allied Control Commission.

The Prime Minister, in an interview with the head of the British Political Mission in Budapest, stated that there were 100,000 soldiers of Szálasi's army held by the Russians in concentration camps in Hungary. They were not being released, but deported to the U.S.S.R.

Hungary is said to have demanded the extradition of two German generals; one was G.O.C. of German troops in Hungary from October 1944; the other was in command of German troops in the Budapest area, and responsible for the destruction of the Budapest bridges. The arrest was reported of a group of people involved in the preparation of a demonstration in favour of the imprisoned members of the Volksbund and Arrow Cross. Statistics published on the activities of the political police show that 22,000 people have been arrested, 9,700 interned and 5,400 placed under police supervision. 2,150 were transferred by the Political Police to the People's Court.

The Russians are gradually returning industry to Hungarian control; it was stated that after 1st July, only 12 factories would remain under Russian management, and all coal mines have been restored to Hungarian administration. The Minister of Industry made a statement on the progress of industrial reconstruction, with particular reference to industry's contribution to the payment of reparations to the U.S.S.R. The total value of plant to be dismantled amounts to 10 million dollars, and industrial products will account for a further 155 million dollars. Thus 80 per cent. of heavy industry will be producing for reparations and there will only be a small surplus for home consumption. The oil wells of Lispe were producing 80 per cent. of their pre-war output and 1 million tons of oil would be available for reparations in the next six months.

Under a recent decree, all fit men between 18 and 60 and women between 18 and 48 are liable for four days' compulsory labour on clearing away débris every month, but can be exempted on payment of a fine scaled in proportion to earnings. The Russian commentator, Fedorov, in an article on speculation and the black market in Hungary, urged that the law should be enforced to make it impossible for "black-market adventurers" to shirk public work, so that food and industrial products would return to the market and prices would fall.

Dr. A. Valentin was replaced as Minister of Justice by Dr. I. Ries, another Social-Democrat and former legal advisor to the Party. The Social-Democrat Party explained that this was caused by inconsistencies between Dr. Valentin's policy and its own.

The International Red Cross is to send thirty lorries with food and medical supplies to Hungary. In Summary No. 300, figures of the increased bread rations were given, and the population of Budapest has now been informed that its bread supply is assured for two months.

Roumania.

Negotiations continue for the working out of details of the Russian-Roumanian Oil Combine. So far it has been provisionally agreed—it does not amount to more than that—that two companies from each country will form the combine.

It is announced by the Bucharest Radio that a Soviet-Roumanian Transport Company is also in process of formation, which is to include all land and air transport enterprises.

It is also announced that a congress is to be convened in Bucharest to form a Balkan Trades Union Federation. Countries on the edge of the Balkans, such as Hungary and Czechoslovakia, are to be invited to take part.

The Roumanian Radio is strictly under Soviet control and announcements cannot be taken at their face value. But a mental glossary of technical terms is in process of formation amongst regular listeners, and with this help it is possible to read between the lines. It is learned that the gendarmerie is to be reorganised on a " democratic basis " similar to that of the recent reorganisation of the police. This police reorganisation was effected by taking over and enlarging the unofficial guards of the Communist Party, which escaped being disbanded when the other political party guards were disarmed. Just before it came to the turn of the Communists, the Soviet authorities discovered that to disarm this guard would be to " interfere with the internal affairs of Roumania," and therefore, of course, it could not be done. The gendarmerie is to be " a democratic institution working honestly in the service of the people." Some units, who have been " trained in the democratic spirit," have been despatched to Moldavia and Transylvania " to stop criminal and reactionary activities threatening the progress of the people." It is on precisely the same lines that the Iron Guard worked under the late king and during the Antonescu régime. Always in Roumania, plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose!

Yugoslavia.

The policy of Allied Military Government includes the restoration, in accordance with International Law, of the Italian civil tribunals of before the 8th September, 1943, with Slovene magistrates for Slovene areas, and a special court for the trial of Fascists, collaborators and war criminals. The Yugoslav clandestine organisation does its utmost to obstruct and discredit A.M.G. The news agency Tanyug has been operating, unlike other agencies and correspondents, without A.M.G.'s leave. It reported that the " Liberation Assembly of Trieste " sent to Field-Marshal Alexander a " demand " for the immediate release of their president, Dr. Pogassi, whose arrest they described as a provocation and as the climax of Allied insults. The Belgrade press has included an accusation from Opcine, near Trieste, that New Zealanders have stolen bicycles, food, wine and furniture and assaulted persons, completely without provocation.

For the press campaign about Greek Macedonia, sustained with masses of corroborative detail, see " Greece."

At the request of the Yugoslav Government, the only British naval officers in a Yugoslav port, those at Split, are being withdrawn. This will not facilitate the sailing of Allied merchant vessels to the port.

On the 28th June the Belgrade press printed a law for the dissolution of the courts in Serbia for the trial of offences against national honour. On the 5th July Borba said that these courts had been valuable in convicting of collaboration persons, such as industrialists, intellectuals, merchants and bankers, with whom the pre-1941 courts would have sympathised; but that now a return to normality and regular courts was possible. Similar provisions for Montenegro and Macedonia were announced two days later. As, however, the law in question merely transferred the functions of the courts of national honour to district courts, with newly appointed judges, the change seems to amount to little or nothing. A state of nervous tension was reported still to prevail in Belgrade in July.

On the 5th July there was a meeting at Belgrade of the " Liberation Fronts " of the six federated regions of Yugoslavia, to form an organisation for the central direction of policy. Pijade, in Borba, described the conference as " marking the beginning of a new political era for Yugoslavia," and wrote that " reaction " would be harmless " if isolated from the outside world." (Tito developed the latter point when, addressing the united Balkan Youth Congress (8th–15th July), he said: " There can be no peace in the Balkans if reaction is strong in the other European countries.") The " Liberation Front " is the name of the party at present all-powerful. A.V.N.O.J., the partisan assembly, is to meet on the 2nd August, accept numerous new laws and prepare for the election of the Constituent Assembly. What is being decided is whether, behind this façade of Assemblies, the Front is to represent, as now, the dictatorship of one party, or is to be a coalition of various parties, even if under Communist leadership. The distinction may appear unreal. The only third possibility appears to be an unequal civil war of unarmed insurgents against the armed authorities.

An U.N.R.R.A. ship has arrived at Trieste with 6,500 tons of wheat, 450 tons of flour and 40 tons of peas and beans. Welcoming the arrival, the Minister of Trade said that delivery at Trieste had been specially requested, as goods could now be transported thence to the larger cities. The problem of transport to the most devastated areas remains.

Greece.

The propaganda campaign conducted by Belgrade, Tirana and Moscow against the " monarcho-fascist terror " said to reign in Greece has continued without intermission. The material on which it is based comes almost exclusively from the E.A.M./K.K.E. press. This campaign has at last provoked some response from the Greek Government. On the 11th July the Regent, in a widely reported interview given to the Athens Vradyni, spoke highly of the present Government, which he described as " composed of upright officers, university professors and high officials who do not and will not make politics," and cited the freedom of the Greek press (of which, as noted above, full advantage is taken by Greece's enemies) as evidence that accusations of " fascism " were unfounded.

The following afternoon, on his return from a flying visit to Salonica, where he conferred with the Governors-General of Macedonia and Thrace, M. Voulgaris broadcast a carefully worded speech to the nation. Except in references to the sufferings of northern Greece under Bulgarian occupation the tone of the speech was one of studied moderation. After emphasising the " inextinguishably " Greek character and sentiments of the population of Greek Macedonia, the Premier continued, " I discovered after enquiry and solemnly declare that in the frontier regions absolute quiet prevails. From the Greek side no reprehensible activity has been observed. Therefore any pretension to the contrary is, if not malevolent, surely based on malicious information and intentions." Though making it plain that Greece was aware of the hostility of her neighbours and prepared if necessary to defend herself, M. Voulgaris wisely refrained from any direct reference to Tito's 7th July speech (see Summary No. 301, " Yugoslavia "). Instead he made a cordial reference to the long-standing friendship between Greece and Yugoslavia and expressed the hope that it would be preserved. Athens radio enlarged on this theme the following day, with the comment that Voulgaris had put the question of Greek-Yugoslav relations in its proper perspective, ridding it of temporary misconceptions.

A less oblique reference to Yugoslav provocation was made by the Socialist Professor Svolos, himself a Macedonian, who declared that the only autonomists in Greek Macedonia were persons who feared punishment for collaborating with the Bulgars during the occupation: " The idea of an autonomous Macedonia is inadmissible—Macedonia is Greek, the Macedonians are Greeks. Though some may speak Slav languages, they nevertheless remain Greek: they fought excellently like Greeks."

Athens radio statement that the General Officer Commanding British Forces in Macedonia had assured M. Voulgaris that all allegations of incidents on the Yugoslav-Greek frontier were unfounded is unconfirmed from British sources. The situation in Western Macedonia is still unsatisfactory. There is considerable coming and going across the frontier in the Florina–Monastir area and armed bands continue active. A report from Greek Army Headquarters, Salonica, to the Athens General Staff estimates the number of ex-E.L.A.S. who have joined the Yugoslav forces as 13,000. Rigorous measures have recently been taken against armed organisations. By a new law published on the 9th July, which is to remain in force until the 31st December, 1945, leaders of armed bands are punishable with death, and other members with imprisonment. Death is also the penalty for armed resistance to authority. The old Greek banditry law has been reimposed, and all licensed firearms are to be surrendered by the 31st July.

Bulgaria.

The Communist Party's calculations have been unexpectedly upset by an act of defiance, which must have called for some courage, on the part of some prominent Agrarians of the more genuine, independent sort, headed by two members of the Government, M. Nikola Petkov and M. Asen Pavlov, by M. Asen Stambuliski (son of Bulgaria's national leader who was assassinated in 1923) and by the chief organiser of the Agrarian Union, M. Georgi Yordanov. These gentlemen have sent a circular letter to all chairmen of local Agrarian associations throughout the country, in which they candidly set forth their grievances against the Communists. They complain of persistent interference with their lawful party concerns, high-handed and unwarrantable treatment of loyal party members, and systematic suppression or distortion of their views. They say the consequent loss of many honest Agrarians to the Patriotic Front is to be deplored, and go on to demand really democratic elections, with each party free to nominate its own canidates without any interference from outside. If this condition is not met, the Agrarian Union will have no alternative but to present independent candidates of its own; and local chairmen are asked to explain the situation fully to all members of the party in their districts. It is difficult to predict future developments, but information of this kind travels quickly in Bulgaria, and it will by now be clear to all members of the Union, which claims a million or more adherents, that the newly-intruded party secretary, Obbov, has overplayed his hand.

It has recently become known that the Bulgarians are broadening the railway-line running south from Sofia along the Struma valley to Kula on the Greek frontier. The work is being organised by a new State Railways director named Sakelarov, who, like numerous other Bulgarian Communists, fled to Russia in 1924–25 and has lived there until quite recently as a Soviet citizen. At a recent press conference Sakelarov stated that intense efforts were being put into the work and that it was hoped to finish it by the end of August. The implication was that the Army's needs required it. While it seems to be the case that in spite of paragraph I (d) of the Armistice the Bulgarian Army is being maintained and even increased instead of being demobilised, the fact remains that there is obviously no military justification for this activity. Indeed, the railway material expended should surely have been delivered by Bulgaria to Greece in part settlement of her well-justified reparation claims.

In the course of the last two or three weeks a fairly considerable number of Russian troops have been moving through Sofia by night, and a strict "curfew" has been in force. When this was made an excuse to restrict still further the movements of the British Military Mission—whose position, along with that of their United States colleagues, has from the first been one of great delicacy—General Oxley lodged a strong protest with General Biryusov. Since then both the British and the American Military Missions have been notified by the Soviet authorities on the Control Commission that not only are they to enjoy the right to move freely about Bulgaria but in future they will be called into consultation by the Chairman of the Control Commission at least once every ten days. While our representatives naturally welcome any sign of greater cordiality or readiness to co-operate, it is not the first time that similar assurances have been received.

Turkey.

Turkey has intimated that she is unable to accept the proposals put forward by the Soviet Government—as a prerequisite to the conclusion of a new Treaty of Friendship and perhaps of alliance with her. The Turkish Government is therefore marking time, while the discussion is carried to a higher level at Potsdam. Meantime M. Saracoglu has made a pronouncement on the situation at a private meeting of the Parliamentary Group of the Republican People's Party. The Government's policy was unanimously approved.

The press agreed in declaring that Turkey refused even to discuss any changes in her frontiers and rejected any suggestions of bilateral talks on the subject of the Straits. Russia was accused of seeking to dominate her neighbours —not with the object of ensuring her own security, but of preparing bases for further imperialist expansion. It was stated in Angora that Russian troops were concentrating in Bulgaria and that preparations were being made for joint Russian-Bulgarian military manœuvres in the neighbourhood of the Turkish frontier.

The identical Declaration of the 10th August, 1941—whereby Britain and Russia confirmed their fidelity to the Montreux Convention, disclaimed any aggressive intentions with regard to the Straits, and undertook to observe the territorial integrity of Turkey—was promiently featured in the press.

A Bill to assist the Government in carrying out the provisions of the new Land Reform law has been laid before the Assembly. Land Commissions, consisting of a president and two members appointed by the Ministry of Agriculture, will be set up in each Vilayet; and itinerant judges will be appointed whose duty it will be to settle legal disputes on the spot. It is estimated that the reforms will take twenty years to carry out.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

On the 9th July, the day following that on which the French issued their declaration on the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales (see Summary No. 301), the Lebanese and Syrian Governments published a joint communiqué on the subject, framed in correct but rather frigid terms. After stating that they "have taken cognisance of the declaration" and noted its contents, the two Governments "announce the satisfaction which they feel at taking over their troops. The two Governments have each decided to appoint a technical commission for the taking over of these troops." The wording of the communiqué as published differs considerably from that of the original draft, which was much longer and contained objectionable passages inserted by the Syrian Government but finally omitted on our representations.

Without consulting His Majesty's Legation, the Lebanese Government, on its own, published a second communiqué, containing a declaration by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the following effect: "The Lebanese Government has received with satisfaction the announcement made by the Provisional Government of the French Republic for the transfer to the Lebanese and Syrian Governments respectively of locally recruited troops. Regarding the services which are due to be restored to us, I hope that their transfer will neither be delayed nor occasion any difficulty. As regards the withdrawal of foreign troops, this will form the subject of a simultaneous arrangement between the interested parties." According to the Syrian authorities, the Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs tried to persuade them to insert a reference in the joint communiqué to the withdrawal of foreign troops, but the Syrian authorities refused to agree on the grounds that this would imply the withdrawal of British as well as French forces. The Syrians did not regard the presence of British forces, which they welcomed, as constituting a danger to their independence.

During the early part of July the Levant nationalist press continued to urge the withdrawal of all French troops. Press comment on the French declaration of the 8th July and the States' joint declaration of the 9th July suggests that France has only handed over something that rightfully belongs to the States, and that if the transfer had been made earlier, the disturbances with their serious loss of life and the consequent atmosphere of extreme tension might have been avoided. The Damascus press in particular emphasises that this latest move does not imply the resumption of negotiations with the French, and that Syria will continue to press for the complete withdrawal of all French troops from her soil.

The first meeting between the French and the States' authorities to discuss the details of the transfer took place on the 12th July. At this meeting the only point of difference that arose concerned the so-called "Avenantaires" i.e., those Syrian or Lebanese nationals engaged on regular French terms of service, for whose transfer the French representatives said they had no authority. They would, however, give a further reply at the next meeting. Three commissions were appointed to deal respectively with barracks, personnel and services.

The recent announcement in Egypt that the Royal Palaces in Cairo and Alexandria are again to be opened to the public during the month of Ramadan—an indication that King Farouk is still anxious to court the masses—will no doubt be accepted without demur by the present Egyptian Government, though the Wafd may well take up the challenge.

The trial of Mahmoud Issawi, for the assassination of Ahmad Maher Pasha, has been resumed in the Supreme Court of Martial Law, and the Public Prosecutor has demanded the death sentence. According to the Egyptian press the accused stated that the murder was committed because the declaration of war by Egypt had been made at Great Britain's request. It is said that the Prime Minister and other prominent Egyptians, including Nahas and Ali Maher, are to be called as witnesses for the defence.

According to the Egyptian Prime Minister the report on the alleged misdemeanours of Nahas Pasha is still before a Parliamentary Committee, but will come sooner or later before the Chamber of Deputies. While deprecating any "victimisation" of Nahas and his colleagues, Nokrashi Pasha recently told His Majesty's Ambassador that prosecution was not the same as persecution, and seemed to indicate that he was not unwilling to have Nahas prosecuted if the Chamber so decided. On the other hand, an independent Deputy—himself a bitter opponent of Nahas—has expressed the view that the majority of his colleagues in the Chamber are now opposed to Nahas being tried, since the charges against him do not, in fact, constitute offences punishable under the penal code, and are in any case largely unsupported by proof.

There are indications that the Soviet authorities are endeavouring to obtain mastery over Persia, or, at any rate, that part of it in which they are mainly interested, before the time of military evacuation arrives. On the 9th July Pravda published a violent article entitled "Reactionary elements increasing their activity in Persia," attributing the repeated Government crises in Persia that have occurred of late to "the activity of the reactionary and pro-Fascist elements headed by the notorious adventurer, Seyyid Zia ud Din." No changes for the better had been made since the abdication of the late Shah; peasants remained landless; workers were exploited; no educational or electoral reforms had been introduced. But hope lay in the "democratic movement of Left-wing parties headed by the Tudeh Party." This article seems to have been evoked by a recent speech of Seyyid Zia, accusing the Tudeh Party of seeking to overthrow the independence of Persia. It now looks as if the efforts of the Tudeh Party to foment industrial unrest may be backed by a Russian trades union delegation which recently arrived in Tehran, and which, after visiting Isfahan, may tour other places and make trouble for the Persian Government.

There seems to be no doubt that in parts of Northern Kurdistan, to which the Russians will not allow Persian troops to be sent, the Kurdish independence movement is being encouraged, and that emissaries of the Tudeh Party are stirring up trouble in the north and north-west, where they show complete independence of official control. The Russians, moreover, are using Radio Tehran for political propaganda. This has driven the Persian authorities to cut off a recent Soviet broadcast in Persian and to suspend completely all foreign broadcasts, including those to the Indian troops stationed in Persia. This order, though it means a loss to us, also means that the Russians can no longer attack the Persian Government on its own radio or indulge in objectionable wireless propaganda. We ourselves gave up broadcasting from Radio Tehran in Persian in March of this year.

On the 10th July several grenades are said to have been thrown at the house of Dr. Keshavarz, a leading Tudeh Deputy. Since, however, only one grenade exploded, and since all the inhabitants of Tehran (except perhaps the Tudeh Party) want the Russians to leave Persia as soon as possible and are therefore anxious not to give them any pretext for remaining, it is difficult to believe that the grenades were thrown by an opponent of Dr. Keshavarz. It may well be that it was a put-up job on the part of the Tudeh Party itself to prove to the world how real are the dangers depicted by Pravda on the previous day.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese press is full of descriptions of the reception awaiting the Allies when they invade Japan. These accounts suggest an anxiety to bolster up civilian morale; there is a great deal of talk about the "indomitable fighting spirit" of the Japanese. "We are able to fight an overwhelming enemy without the least fear," said one broadcaster, "because we think we are fighting a righteous war. It is quite impossible for the Americans to understand the mental attitude of our heroes—that when they commit hara kiri they die heroically—in other words because they find calm and resignation and not because of despair and helplessness. . . . The enemy may have taken some prisoners. We recognise that a few Japanese have not the true Japanese mental attitude or Japanese spirit."

The Nippon Times writes: "Should the enemy land on the mainland, we shall have numerical superiority. In Europe the United States used 18 tons of shipping for each soldier, but for the Japanese landing she will need 54 tons of shipping for each soldier. Even supposing 18 tons should be sufficient, the navy will need 18 million tons of shipping to transport one million men in their landing operation, and she has only 5 million tons of shipping available for this campaign. But whether or not the enemy land this number, we can meet them with several times as many. We have accumulated enough aircraft in preparation for this decisive battle. Our aircraft factories have already hidden themselves underground. Our topography, with its numberless paddyfields and mountains, will prevent the enemy using mechanised forces to any great extent. We have absolute conviction in ultimate victory."

Nomura, formerly Japanese Ambassador to the United States, was reported by Domei as saying that the "initial brilliant successes achieved by the Japanese were nothing but the foundation for the process of bleeding the enemy in future operations." The enemy was at present "riding on the crest of his power," but there was "no short cut to victory." If the demand for surrender was persisted in, "there is no other recourse but to make the enemy take useless blood-letting . . . and he will be terror-stricken when he suffers several millions of bloody casualties." The Mainichi Shimbun believed that the American losses on Okinawa had completely upset the American time-table, but cautiously adds: "We have tended to dismiss the loss of these strategic islands with superficial optimism." The rest of the article emphasised the necessity of turning Japan into an "iron fortress" and stressed the American desire for a quick victory for fear of heavy casualties. A naval spokesman has stated that the invasion will be very different from that of Okinawa; "everything that Japan lacked in Okinawa will be available to her on the Japanese mainland," where "an armed force of millions of soldiers, in addition to 40 million civilians mobilised as Civil Defence, stand ready to anticipate an invasion." If necessary, women and children would help. Air bombardment, he maintained, had not affected Japanese war potentiality to any marked degree and had only added to the determination of civilians to repel all invaders.

Some speculation has appeared both in the Chinese and Japanese Press on the possibility of the Japanese withdrawing their forces in China. The New China Daily has reported that the Japanese Policy is (1) to "scorch" South China, (2) to fight hard in Central China, (3) to wage a life-and-death struggle in defence of North China. The Japanese were said to have selected the Shanghai zone as battlefield on which to meet Allied landings and to have taken emergency defence measures on the 700 miles of coastline between Haichow and Ningpo. The Tairiku Shimpo, an organ of the Japanese army in China, has produced an editorial in which it says: "Japan will never withdraw her troops from China unless the East Asia war ends. Of late press circles in Central China seem to have abandoned their attitude of reticence and have frequently commented on this question, which they usually dare not talk about. . . . . Some commentators have advocated that Japan should withdraw her troops from Java, Borneo and Sumatra to Malaya and then from Malaya and Burma to South China, and then from South China to Central China and North China and possibly to Manchuria. Such views are unrealistic and beneath contradiction."

A wide hostile publicity has been given in the Soviet Press to a statement by General Ho Ying-chin, in which he is quoted as saying in an interview at Kunming on the 27th June that the Chinese could not evict the Japanese from their country until the Americans landed in China, and that, even then, it would take a long time, as the Japanese, even without communications by sea, could continue the war in China from their resources in Manchuria. There does not appear to be anything particularly reprehensible in this statement, even though it may be used by the Japanese for purposes of self-reassurance; it is a fair estimate of the situation. But the Communists, who regard Ho as their most formidable enemy, have long represented him as secretly pro-Japanese and have busily promoted the idea that nothing but anti-Communist and pro-Japanese intrigues in Chungking stand in the way of an overwhelming Chinese offensive.

There is a growing concern in Chungking at the penetration of Communist forces into territories occupied by Japanese or Nanking troops, and a tendency to suggest that the Japanese are conniving at their moves. While this suggestion may be part of the Kuomintang anti-Communist propaganda, there is no doubt that Japanese interests would be served by any action calculated to increase the antagonism that already exists between Chungking and Yenan, and any increase of Communist strength south of the Yellow River cannot fail to aggravate the tension.

In Chungking the People's Political Council has held continuous sessions, at which various ministers have reported and have been questioned. At the second meeting held on the 8th July 170 members were present. The resolutions of the first meeting were read and were followed by a speech of the Director of the War Production Board on the position of Lease-Lend materials and the problems of supply. On the 10th July Dr. Chu Chia-hua, the Minister of Education, gave a report on the year's progress of his department. He admitted the responsibility for the inadequacy of the equipment in many institutes because of the difficulty of replacement owing to the war, and said that the state of undernourishment of some of the students was giving him some anxiety, but that the shortage of teachers in the middle and primary schools was the most pressing problem confronting the Ministry. The Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs followed with the statement that the abrogation of the "unequal treaties" between China and other foreign Powers was nearing its final stage. Switzerland and Portugal had previously agreed that in the event of the abolition of "unequal" treaties with other Powers their treaties with the Chinese Government should also lapse. The Chinese Government were therefore intending to make formal notification to this effect to the Governments of these two countries. At the meeting on the 13th July General Chen Cheng, the War Minister, was closely questioned by several representatives of the Assembly on measures for improving the treatment of officers and men in the army and on the methods of recruiting students. Mr. Ku, Minister for Social Affairs, spoke on problems of demobilisation. Little of interest is revealed by the published reports of the proceedings of the Council but unofficial information indicates that the members of the Council are not entirely satisfied with the attitude of the Government towards them. The member selected to reply to Chiang Kai-shek's opening speech apparently made some allusion to the political situation which was unpalatable in high quarters, as he was not elected, as had been intended, to the Praesidium of the Council. The absence of Soong and of news of his doings in Moscow has robbed the meetings of some of their interest; the Council seems to have expected him to be more forthcoming than his ministerial colleagues dare to be. But he may yet attend the latter meetings of the session, as he had left Moscow to return to Chungking by the 14th July.

A joint Soviet-Chinese communiqué issued on the 14th July said that the conversations in which both Stalin and Molotov had participated on the Soviet side, and which had had as their aim the "improvement of Soviet-Chinese relations," had been "interrupted" owing to the departure of Stalin and Molotov to the Potsdam conference. "Questions of the highest importance and interest to the two countries" were said to have been examined and a "wide mutual understanding" revealed. Conversations would be continued in the near future. Nothing was said, however, about any formal agreement having been reached.

Dr. Kung has arrived in Chungking, but has made no public announcement. There is no question but that his return has been unsettling, but at present there is no evidence that he has begun to intrigue against Soong in his absence at Moscow.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

This week there is an atmosphere of hushed expectancy. It is clearly recognised that many problems which have been debated for weeks and months now await decision at the Big Three meeting. The outcome of the meeting is awaited with optimism.

President Truman, accompanied by Mr. Byrnes, has arrived at Potsdam. The American Press and radio continue to emphasise the vital significance of this conference. Among the many subjects to be discussed, the control and future of Germany is generally singled out as the most immediate and pressing. It is emphasised that the lack of coal, food and the means of distribution may result in utter chaos in Europe, unless the Big Three can work out an adequate programme of relief and reconstruction. There is some uneasiness lest the zonal occupation may lead to friction between the major allies, though the solution of the recent Berlin episode has caused the press to contrast Russia's "realistic" and "planned" approach with the "timidity and unpreparedness of the Anglo-Americans." There appears to be no disposition on the part of the press to blame Russia. On the contrary, the press recalls Russia's "demonstrated willingness" to co-operate at San Francisco, and it is generally hoped that President Truman's "innate shrewdness" will enable him to reconcile divergent policies and allow him to continue the rôle which President Roosevelt is thought to have played with such success, that of middleman between the "old energy represented by Britain and the new energy represented by Russia."

There is a growing recognition that the food situation in Germany and in liberated Europe as a whole is becoming desperate. While Mr. Clinton Anderson, the new Secretary of Agriculture, has stated that the United States must do all it can to help, he has added his voice to those raised in Congress which point out that it cannot and should not try to feed and clothe the world.

Although the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee voted 20 to 0 last Friday to accept the United Nations Charter without amendments or reservations, one or two members of the committee who were absent have subsequently announced their dissent. The aged Senator Hiram Johnson (Republican, California), who was one of the leaders in the fight against the League of Nations and the Treaty of Versailles, continues to oppose United States participation in international agreements. Of the other two absentees, Senator J. E. Murray (Democrat, Montana) recorded a favourable vote by telegram while Senator Shipstead (Republican, Minnesota) still has not revealed his position. Meanwhile, however, the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Senator Connally, has estimated that not more than six votes will be cast against the ratification when the Senate votes on this in a week or so's time.

The Charter has given way for the moment to consideration of the Bretton Woods Agreement. Senator Barkley (Democrat, Kentucky), majority leader of the Senate, has disclosed that he hopes the Bill will be disposed of this week in order to "clear the track" for consideration of the United Nations Charter. There are several irreconcilables in this field—all Republicans—notably Senator Taft (Ohio), who maintains that the International Monetary Fund and Bank would not solve the economic problems of the world but "merely waste our money and accomplish nothing." These are urging postponement of this Bill and the convening of another international conference. They also advocate the provision of American credits to Great Britain and other nations—credits which, they say, may never be repaid. Several newspapers have pointed out that the opposition to Bretton Woods is an attempt to sabotage the United Nations Organisation by withholding United States participation in international economic co-operation. However, it is expected that the Bill, despite this opposition, will be passed while the President is in Germany, and thus strengthen President Truman's bargaining position. Mr. Robert Wagner (Democrat, New York), chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, has issued an appeal for the speedy passage of the Bretton Woods monetary plan. "This Bill offers," as he said, "the opportunity to initiate constructive steps to outlaw competitive currency devaluation and other economic warfare devices; and to substitute co-operation for unilateral action in dealing with international problems."

The nomination of Mr. Frederick M. Vinson to be Secretary of the Treasury in succession to Mr. Morgenthau was sent by radio to the Senate, which has already unanimously confirmed it. Originally, Mr. Morgenthau agreed to serve at the Treasury until after the President's return from the Berlin Conference. However, he had later telegraphed to the President stating that there were so many Treasury problems calling for prompt decision that he felt that Mr. Vinson would be placed at a disadvantage unless he took over immediately. The President, after consideration, agreed with this view, and expressed his appreciation of the "fine spirit and great sense of public responsibility" in which Mr. Morgenthau approached the matter. Mr. John W. Snyder has been nominated to succeed Mr. Vinson as Administrator of the Office of War Mobilisation and Reconversion. It is only a few weeks since Mr. Snyder succeeded Mr. Vinson as Federal Loan Administrator.

Mr. Artemus L. Gates, who since 1941 has been Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Air, has been sworn in as Under-Secretary of the Navy. He succeeds Mr. Ralph A. Bard. Mr. Gates is a former director of the Pan-American Airways Corporation, and he has been responsible for the supervision of the building of the Navy's Air Arm to its present striking-power in the war against Japan.

Recently in the Senate there was a debate on the Fair Employment Practices Committee (F.E.P.C.). This produced the traditional filibuster and the proposal to convert this committee into a permanent body provoked particularly bitter speeches. In particular, Senator Eastland, of Mississippi, made some very disparaging remarks about the negroes, which have been taken as showing that the traditional southern sentiment on this topic has not greatly changed. Congress has opposed the creation of a permanent agency, but has passed compromise legislation to continue the F.E.P.C. for another year.

The release of the British Empire casualty figures has been given wide publicity in the United States. Many commentators stressed the high share borne by the United Kingdom. On the radio, in particular, there have been tributes to the British. One spokesman exclaimed: "We want to say Bravo to the people of Britain. We know they have suffered in a way we have been spared, but we would not be spared if there were another war." Another radio commentator pointed out that "in the last dramatic sweep of the American armies across Germany we may have lost sight of the fact that the British have done most of the dying . . . . for a long time the British, alone and single-handed, held off the foe. They made it possible for us to win."

LATIN AMERICA.

Despite the somewhat soothing remarks of General Farrell last week, the atmosphere of make-believe which persists in Argentina has been heightened by a melodramatic statement from Colonel Perón and a no less theatrical performance by Trade Union leaders in his honour. Both of these seemed designed to give the impression (which the President has denied) that Argentina is on the verge of civil war and so apparently to intimidate opponents of the régime. Thus in interviewing a Cuban journalist, the Vice-President is reported as saying that he hoped that there would be bloodshed, and that the working classes would murder the Argentine newspaper-owners. This may be taken to show just how galling the present comparative freedom of the Argentine Press is to Colonel Perón. The Cuban Ambassador, who was present at the interview, has said that the Vice-President's remarks were in fact even more violent than the report appearing in Chilean papers has suggested. The interview was not published in Argentina, and presumably Colonel Perón was content to leave it to rumour to have the desired blood-curdling effect. Meanwhile, an ovation for Colonel Perón, lasting over two hours and widely broadcast, was prepared by the Railway Workers and other Unions. One orator, the President of the Railway Unions, strongly attacked Argentine capitalists who were trying to rob the workers and keep them down, and said that the people wanted a return to constitutional morality, but not the constitutional methods by which reactionary capitalists seized power and used the machinery of Government against the working-classes, "as was done before." Another speaker added that the working-classes would fight the "reactionary offensive" of "elements which the workers regard as disturbers of social peace and public order." A third speech was to the effect that both the constitutionalists and "certain great newspapers" had been conspicuous by their absence when the rights of the Unions needed defending from the Ramírez Government. Colonel Perón, duly acclaimed, was no less bellicose, and stated: "We are all pledged to fight for truth, right and justice: some may fall in the struggle, but others will go on." He himself, it would seem, is struggling vigorously to be among the others.

Sr. Padilla, the Mexican Foreign Minister, has resigned, and his place has been taken by his capable Under-Secretary, Sr. Manuel Tello, a career diplomat. It has been reported that the ex-Foreign Minister would run for the presidency in 1946, but according to broadcast reports, he himself has stated that he has not this intention. On present form it would appear that his position is much less favourable than that of his rivals, such as the Minister of the Interior, Sr. Alemán.

The Venezuelan Cabinet has resigned, and it has been stated that the reason is to give President Medina a free hand in facing elections, also due next year.

The Brazilian cruiser Bahia blew up at sea early in July, with some loss of life. The First Lord of the Admiralty has sent a message of condolence. Meanwhile, a German submarine, U 530, surrendered to the Argentine naval base of Mar del Plata on the 10th July.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

MORE than usual vitality has been shown during the past week by German political groups in Berlin and the Russian zone generally, and the tempo of their activities has obviously been quickened to coincide with the meetings of the Big Three at Potsdam. The determination of the German political parties to "regain the confidence of all other nations and establish relations with them on the basis of mutual respect" was emphasised by the Chairman of the German Communist Party, Wilhelm Pieck, in a statement on the aims of the new "united front" of the four German parties which he published in the Deutsche Volkszeitung of the 17th July and which the Berlin radio broadcast two days later. The "hope that the occupying Powers will show understanding for the immeasurable plight and distress of the German people and that they will render material aid to restart Germany's economic life" was expressed in a new version of last month's manifesto of the Christian Democratic Union which was rebroadcast by the Berlin radio in its "Forum of Democracy" programme on both the 18th and the 21st July. The necessity of repentance for the crimes of the Nazis and of reparation for the damage inflicted on other nations was likewise generally emphasised. Pieck repeatedly referred to reparations as the prerequisite of reconstruction in his statement of the 17th July, while the Christian Democratic Union manifesto insisted that the "loyal fulfilment of our obligations resulting from the lost war" was the only possible basis for co-operation between Germany and the rest of the world.

On questions of internal reorganisation, the four German political parties constituting the "united front" in the Russian zone continue to speak with striking unanimity. In its manifesto, the Christian Democratic Union called for "State control of the mines and other monopolies" and the use of the large estates to "provide the greatest possible number of Germans with land of their own and independent work." It added, however, that it "affirmed the right of private property" and stood for "the maintenance of a free peasantry." Identical principles are professed by the Communists and by the Social Democrats, who would seem to remain the most radical group within the new coalition. As far as may be judged from their public pronouncements, the Liberal-Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union are as enthusiastic for the "united front" as the Communists and Social Democrats, and Andreas Hermes, the former Centre Party Minister of Finance who holds the official position of head of the Berlin Food Department and who is rapidly emerging as the main spokesman of the non-Socialist parties, is at present in the public eye as much as Pieck, the Chairman of the Communist Party, who has played a leading rôle among the German émigrés in Moscow since 1933. (The two men were, of course, the most uncompromising of opponents under the Weimar Republic.) In the Berlin radio programmes to commemorate the first anniversary of the abortive Putsch against Hitler of the 20th July, 1944, Hermes was honoured as an active participant in that event. The Putsch of the 20th July was interpreted as the real beginning of the "united front" in Germany, when men of all political creeds combined to rid the country of Nazism.

The administrative division of the German capital between the three major Powers has brought the broadcasting station of the Berlin radio which, in contrast to the ban on political activity enforced by British and American Military Government, serves as the principal mouthpiece of German political agitation over the Russian zone, within the area of Berlin under British control, although it continues to be governed by its original Russian sponsors. The station itself studiously avoids, wherever possible, all reference to the division of Berlin into zones and even to the presence of the Western Allies in the city. One of the first official accounts of conditions in the British zone of Berlin describes how, as a result of the almost total destruction of the city centre, the suburbs are tending to think in terms of an independent existence and to take on the character of provincial towns. Factories are not working, and in many cases, as, for example, at the Siemens works, all the machinery has already been removed by the Russians. The decision of Military Government on the 19th July to remove a number of propaganda billboards erected by the Russians has been sharply criticised by Allied press correspondents. Yet, after the indiscriminate looting in which some Russian soldiers have indulged, the native population is not stated to have been seriously impressed by the assurances given by the Red Army on some of these billboards.

The sudden increase in black market activities, particularly as between the German population and Allied troops, has in the past few days constituted a problem that has occasionally demanded the combined intervention of Military Government and the German police, and even of the German religious bodies. Allied press correspondents have been struck by the extent to which, after the relaxation of the non-fraternisation ban, a system of open barter has sprung up between British and American soldiers and the inhabitants of Berlin, with the Germans making fantastic offers of cameras and jewellery for cigarettes, chocolate, soap and food from the troops. On the 20th July it was stated that this system of surreptitious trading had reached such proportions that the British, American and Russian military authorities had agreed to take joint action to suppress it, and that the resources of the Berlin civil police would be combined with those of the Allied military police to the same end. In a pastoral letter which he had originally circulated in Bavaria on Ascension Day and which the Vatican rebroadcast to Germany on the 19th July, Cardinal Faulhaber condemned black-market trading in food-stuffs as one of the worst forms of sin, and said that all members of his congregation who sold their produce for "usurious prices" would take a heavy responsibility upon themselves. In Bavaria, the German price-control police now have authority to impose fines up to 2,000 Reichsmarks and the temporary suspension of business on shopkeepers who accept more than the maximum prices laid down by Military Government.

Some impatience continues to be shown by small German political groups in the West at the alleged tardiness of Military Government in eliminating the last minor Nazi officials from public life. In some places the ranks of the agitators have been swollen by the return of former concentration camp inmates and their clamour increased by the formation, as at Bonn and Stuttgart, of political prisoners' clubs to act as local pressure groups. Persons at Düsseldorf describing themselves as "anti-Fascists" have gone so far in recent weeks as to evict forcibly from their homes a number of fellow-citizens whom they accuse of being Nazis. Other anti-Nazi groups are stated to object to the appointment of the local German Nationalist leader, Dr. Vagts, as acting Oberbuergermeister of Bremen, although Dr. Vagts himself claims never to have joined the Nazi Party, despite the fact that he apparently held public office under Hitler until February of this year. Wherever they are available, Military Government detachments are now using captured Nazi membership files to check the bona-fides of smaller officials who deny ever having belonged to the party and to eliminate those who have practised deliberate deception. Of the original 1,114 German mayors in Schleswig-Holstein, 550 have now been removed from office by British Military Government for their former association with the Nazi Party.

Permission to hold public meetings—which has so far been generally withheld in both the British and American zones—was stated on the 18th July to have been granted by the Military Government authorities in Württemberg to facilitate the formation of a trade union movement among the working population. Military Government, it was added, would accept the aid of the trade unions in purging public life of Nazi influences. Details of the newly constituted Württemberg Trade Union Association were published on the 22nd. The Christian trade unions were said to have joined the Association, and the Protestant Bishop Wurm of Württemberg to have promised his support. Leading industrialists, artisans, businessmen and farmers were described by the President of the Association, Markus Schleicher, as already working closely with trade union representatives at the district labour office. A "free German Trade Union Association" was stated on the 22nd to be in process of formation by permission of the British authorities in Brunswick, and a representative of this body had been promised a seat on the executive committee of the local chamber of commerce. Membership would be compulsory for all workers in industry, agriculture or public offices. One of Germany's leading Catholic trade unionists, Dr. Adam Stegerwald, who was Head of the League of Christian Trade Unions from 1903 to 1929 and Reich Minister of Labour in the Brüning Government after 1930, was stated on the 22nd July to have been appointed to the new post of Regierungspräsident of Würzburg.

Considerable progress by Military Government in breaking the virtual deadlock in German economic life that has resulted from the absence of an adequate transport system is now reported from both the British and American zones, although a further restoration of the German railways may be necessary to cope with the harvest. A programme to convert 200 lorries a month to producer gas has been put forward at Stuttgart, where a transport pool has already been provided for vital civilian needs. More than 200 trains have so far been used to bring food into the Ruhr, and Hamburg is receiving about 530 tons of coal daily from the Ruhr for its public services and essential industries. In Schleswig-Holstein the railway system is undamaged and is working with slightly reduced services. Oil for transport purposes is being produced from German wells at Hanover and Heide, and an adapted German "People's Car," which is being manufactured at the Volkswagen factory at Fallersleben, is to be used for the reorganised German postal system.

Information has now been received that the Polish authorities have taken over the administration of the port of Stettin, which they have for some time claimed along with all German territory east of the Oder–Neisse line. Complete silence regarding the fate of Stettin and the more eastern territories of the Reich—other than the brief warnings of the German Communist Party that refugees from these areas cannot hope to return home (see last week's Summary)—has been maintained by the Russian-controlled press and radio in Germany. One competent observer from East Prussia confirms that the German population there has already been largely moved out, although in some places columns of dispossessed peasants may still be seen travelling westwards along the main highways.

AUSTRIA.

General Winterton, with his United States and French colleagues, held meetings with the Soviet authorities in Vienna on the 16th July. The Soviet representatives maintained that the agreements reached in the E.A.C. on the control machinery for Austria and the zones of occupation had not been ratified by their Government, and that consequently they could not discuss the occupation of Styria by British troops, and the movement of British, American and French advance parties into Vienna. Since then, however, British forces had begun to occupy Styria and the establishment of the Allied Commission in Vienna is probable within the immediate future.

Innsbruck Radio on the 18th reported the arrival there of General Bethouard, the commander-in-chief of the French forces of occupation. Austrians were assured that while the French authorities would rigidly suppress everything Nazi, and would allow no obstruction of their military and administrative organisations, they had sympathy and respect for Austrian culture, religion and civilisation.

The interview in Paris by "Lambert" on the 16th July (see last week's Summary) has aroused prompt and strong criticism from the Communist Party in Vienna. On the 21st its spokesman said that Lambert, whose real name was Dr. Ernst Lemberger, was an international adventurer, who had posed as the envoy of various agencies and governments, including the British and American High Commands. "Lambert's" alleged statement that there were only two parties in Austria, the Social Democrats and the Christian Socials, and that Communist influence was even less than before 1934, was indignantly refuted, as were his statements about Russian activities and the food supply in the Russian zone, which were described as "false and distorted rumours." "Lemberger" never mentioned, said the Communist spokesman, that on the whole only German property in Austria had been treated as war booty, or that "in hundreds of cases the Russians have returned requisitioned goods to Austrians." It was denied that there was an epidemic in Vienna, due to bad water, and the help of the Soviet Government in supplying food to Vienna was emphasised. Dr. Renner is to publish a categorical statement that the State had not charged "Lemberger" with any mission and that his claim to be Renner's special envoy is false. Dr. Renner has said, according to this broadcast, that Lemberger was charged with restoring contact between the Austrian and French Socialist parties, and is thus an emissary of the Austrian Socialist Party; but he had no instructions from that party to take any part in public demonstrations and discussions. The speaker concluded by saying that this "patent attempt to drag Austria into international intrigue must be nipped in the bud," and Austrians must "act with great determination before serious harm is done to our country."

In spite of these emphatic denials of "Lambert's" description of Viennese life, it would appear that conditions there are indeed bad. The schools in Vienna have had to be closed, "owing to the continuing heat-wave and the reduced mental and physical capacity of the children, caused by insufficient nourishment, which make it unlikely that the pupils can derive any benefit from a continuation of lessons." Teachers will be expected to help in the Ration Card offices. The announcement of the closing of the schools was made by Kunschak, formerly announced as the Christian Social Minister of State in the Renner Government. He no longer holds that office, and is described simply as "Deputy Lord Mayor, and acting President of the Municipal School Authority."

At a Cabinet meeting on the 18th, Dr. Renner announced the appointment of Dr. Heinrich Wildner as "Envoy extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary" to the Austrian Foreign Office. Wildner was a civil servant until 1938, attached to the Austrian Foreign Office. He is a specialist on economic questions, with a distinguished record.

On the 22nd the Council of Ministers approved Dr. Renner's report about the abolition of German regulations concerning area subdivisions in Austria. A law concerning the transfer of administrative and judicial institutions of the German Reich to the Austrian Republic was also approved.

In the British zone, the first steps have been taken in abolishing and renaming titles and offices introduced by the Nazis into Austria. Subject to the eventual quadripartite decision, Gau for instance, will be in future Land; Reichsstatthalter and Gauhauptmann will be Landeshauptmann; Landkreis becomes Bezirk; and Regierungspräsident becomes Landesamtdirektor.

In the American-occupied zone, the Landesgericht in Linz has been reopened, as well as three district courts at Wels, Ried, and Steyr.

From Linz, too, it was announced that the bank accounts of Austrians have been unblocked, although holdings belonging to foreigners are still restricted. On the 20th the Military Government Finance department broadcast a denial of rumours which were circulating to the effect that the Military Government would refuse to recognise Reichsmark currency in Austria. From Vienna there are continued appeals to the public to deposit hoarded money in the Savings Bank.

A report of the formation of the Land Salzburg branch of the People's Party says that the new party conforms to a pattern set by the Vienna branch. Most of the members of the committee are former Christian Trade Union members, and are well to the left of the traditional party line. The organisers of the branch believe that the party will absorb the former Landbund, Democrats both Christian and Liberal, and the Monarchists. The two points of the party programme which were revealed were the attainment of a compromise traditional Liberal position and a new programme providing for the socialisation of big business; and the complete separation of Church from State.

It is reported from Bolzano that the South Tyrolese party has begun to conduct active propaganda, for the reunion of South Tyrol with Austria, although there is a split amongst the German population, due to fear of extreme Left tendencies in Vienna. Some attempts are being made to establish a new German-speaking party, the Christian Peasant Party. Local authorities are following a policy of toleration and conciliation. On the 11th July the Italian Government guaranteed the free use of language in bilingual areas, in schools as well as in commercial relations, public meetings, press, religion, and relations with administrative and judicial authorities. Some French officers appeared in Bolzano after the surrender of Germany. One, who was reported to have discussed plans with the head of the South Tyrolese Party for the formation of a Greater Bavaria, including Vorarlberg, the Austrian Tyrol, and Bolzano province, was later arrested by the Allied military authorities for an obscure financial transaction with the former Prefect of Bolzano. The French authorities have disclaimed all knowledge of his activities. It is known that since the French took over their zone, some separatist notices have been posted by them in Bolzano province. A clandestine radio station has been broadcasting in German to Bolzano, apparently from Austria. According to Radio Paris and Reuter, this station broadcast a report that an ex-prefect and mayor of Bolzano were to go to Paris, London and Washington to discuss the future of Bolzano. This report appeared in the Italian press, and caused considerable indignation, and has been officially denied as wholly without foundation.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

A Czechoslovak Government delegation has been visiting the industrial areas of Northern Moravia and Teschen during the past few days. The delegation, which includes two of the Vice-Premiers, Gottwald and David, and two Ministers, Nejedly and Hala, has obviously been selected to give it as representative a political character as possible. It described its own function as a committee of enquiry into the needs of, and complaints raised by, the region. Its coincidence with the Potsdam Conference may be accidental, but it does reflect the anxiety of the Government over the fate of Teschen, as well as other disputed districts along the frontier with Poland and Germany. All members of the delegation emphasised the unanimous resolve of the Government to retain the Czechoslovak part of Teschen, which the Poles are claiming. A desire for friendly relations with Poland was also voiced, and promises were made to the Polish minority of recognising its civic and national rights. The provision of Polish schools was already guaranteed by an order of the Minister of Education on the 26th June. A warning was given to "provocateurs of unrest and dissatisfaction" in the zone. Friendlier relations between Poland and Czechoslovakia may be presaged by the arrival of a Polish representative at the All-Slav celebrations in Bratislava; he was conspicuously absent from the great Dévín Rally on the 7th.

Munich (American-controlled) Radio broadcast on the 18th a report which suggests that the organised transfer of Sudeten Germans across the American zone of Western Bohemia has already been taking place, similar to that across the Russian zone reported last week. In a Reuter interview of the 21st, Dr. Beneš said that 200,000 of the most active Nazis had left voluntarily, and the immediate deportation of other Germans was due to "the Czechs' accumulated bitterness after years of brutal treatment." The President is reported as having given the figure of between 300,000 and 500,000 of those who would be given the option of remaining in the republic. As regards the possible transfer of Czechoslovak minorities from abroad, the Trades Union newspaper Práce recently gave figures of Slovaks who "desired to return home." These were stated to be 80,000 in Roumania, 150,000 in Yugoslavia and 200,000 in Hungary. The last differs from the 345,000 put forward by the Czechoslovak Government against an exchange of 400,000 Magyars from Slovakia (see Summary No. 301). There is a movement on foot also for the return of Czechoslovak workers from France, mainly miners.

Dr. Ripka, Minister for Foreign Trade, arrived in London on the evening of the 18th to conduct preliminary negotiations with regard to the re-opening of trade relations. Czechoslovakia hopes to purchase certain raw materials such as wool and rubber, and industrial equipment, from Great Britain. At present, the Soviet Union is absorbing a large part of Czechoslovak manufactures, particularly textiles.

M. Majer, the Minister of Food, is reported by Mr. Nichols as being fairly confident about the general situation in Czechoslovakia. He acknowledged the valuable help rendered by U.N.R.R.A. and by the Red Army, in the matter of domestic animals and food supplies for the industrial area of Moravská Ostrava. U.N.R.R.A. supplies up to the 1st July totalled 30,000 tons, and another 15,000 tons are in transit. Dr. Lilico, British health expert with the U.N.R.R.A. mission, described the state of health as better than expected. In this respect, the Czechoslovak Ministry of Health has however shown concern over the spread of tuberculosis; Dr. Ungar, head of a Czechoslovak medical mission, has said that child tuberculosis is raging in some parts of the country. M. Majer hopes to increase the bread and flour rations by at least 20 per cent., and meat and fats by one third during the next year, provided transport and import difficulties can be overcome.

Mr. Laurence Steinhardt, the American Ambassador, arrived in Prague on the 16th. He was received, together with the entire diplomatic staff, by President Beneš at the Hradčaný on the 20th.

POLAND.

The eighth session of the National Homeland Council—which serves as a provisional legislative assembly in Warsaw—opened on the 21st July. Among new members admitted were MM. Mikolajczyk, Grabski and Stanczyk, from this country; and MM. Zulawski, Kutrzeba, Kiernik, Krzyzanowski and Kolodziejski, who had joined in the Moscow conversations. At the same session the Presidium of the Council was announced as President: M. Bierut; Deputy Presidents: MM. Witos, S. Schwalbe, Grabski; other members: MM. Roman Dabrowski and J. N. Miller, and General Rola-Zymierski.

At the opening session M. Osobka-Morawski, the Prime Minister, reviewed the situation of Poland. By the formation of the Provisional Government an end had been put, he said, to discussions about two different political conceptions, and to the ten-year-long dispute about the 1935 Constitution. He referred to the growth of the Polish democratic parties, and added: "Political circles also contemplate the emergence of groups connected with the Labour Party (i.e., the Christian Democratic Labour Party). These may find scope either within the framework of a widened Democratic Party or as a separate Party." He stressed the importance of friendly collaboration between all Slav nations, and of the repatriation of Poles from the U.S.S.R. and from Western and Northern Europe and the Americas. "The liberated country," he said, "awaits the return of all its citizens, who are needed for reconstruction. . . . It also will welcome the return of Poles, who, living abroad, have assumed foreign citizenship."

As to the Polish armies abroad, he said: "We have great admiration and respect for those soldiers, sailors and airmen who, far from Poland, fought for her with the Americans, British or French. To-day we await their speedy return to their homes, mothers and children."

On the 17th July a Co-ordinating Committee of the four "democratic" parties (Peasants, Socialists, Communists and Democrats) decided to invite to the next meeting MM. Popiel and Olczak from the "Labour" Party.

On the 20th July a formal parade was held in Warsaw of Red Army troops which were passing through on their way back to the U.S.S.R. The occasion was used to emphasise the importance of Slav solidarity.

Reports that General Paszkiewicz, formerly second in command of the Polish Corps in Great Britain, had been summarily dismissed for announcing his adherence to the Warsaw Government, are put in a different light in the Polish London daily of the 23rd July, which states that he informed his commander-in-chief of his intention to return to Poland and that the latter accepted his declaration and accordingly took his name off the strength of the Polish officers under his command.

The attitude of the United States Government to the Polish Provisional Government has been the subject of a letter from Senator Vandenberg of the 9th July; to which Acting-Secretary Grew replied in a letter published on the 20th July. Mr. Grew stated in particular that the fact of the formation of the Provisional Government did not of itself free the United States from further responsibility incurred at the Yalta Conference. As to the holding of unfettered elections, Mr. Grew stated that the United States Ambassador would make reports on the situation in Poland and on the basis of these reports his Government would consider the question whether supervision of elections would be advisable. If it were decided to supervise the elections, the United States Government would insist on its right to participate on an equal basis with other Powers.

SOVIET UNION.

The 22nd July was celebrated in the U.S.S.R. as Red Navy Day. Generalissimo Stalin, as Supreme Commander-in-Chief, issued an Order of the Day, in which he referred to the Red Navy's help in covering the Red Army's flanks which rested on the sea, in attacking enemy merchant shipping, and in maintaining Soviet communications. "The Soviet people," he added, "wishes to see its Navy still stronger and mightier. Our people will create new fighting ships and new bases for the Navy." The People's Commissar for the Navy of the U.S.S.R., Admiral of the Fleet Kuznetsov, issued an Order of the Day along similar lines, in which he declared "it is necessary by strenuous military preparation to study and consolidate the experience of naval warfare" accumulated by the personnel of the Red Navy during the war. The First Lord of the Admiralty sent a message of greeting to the Soviet Chief of Naval Staff and to all officers and men of the Red Navy and Fleet Air Arm on behalf of the Board of the Admiralty and the Royal Navy. Coming at a time when the régime of the Straits, the disposal of the German fleet, and possibly bases in the Far East, are all likely to come under discussion in the near future, this emphasis on the importance attached by the Soviet Government and people to the Red Navy has an obvious significance.

Considerable apprehension over the machinations of German business men has found expression in the Soviet press during the past week, particularly over Hugenberg's plan for the economic reconstruction of Germany reported in the Daily Herald and said to have been drawn up at the request of the British authorities. "Living political corpses like Brüning, Strasser and Hugenberg, must not be allowed to pollute the political atmosphere of post-war Europe." A Moscow broadcast (18th July) stated that the German imperialists were still dreaming of a combine stretching from Bordeaux to Odessa; they would strive to subdue Europe with golden bullets now that they had failed with lead. An article by M. Mihailov in Krasnaya Zvezda (17th July) castigated Richard Dimbleby for indulging in absurd forecasts of the "insurmountable difficulties" that would be involved in the setting up of an Allied administration in Berlin. While mainly optimistic over Allied co-operation, which had confounded Dimbleby and his followers, M. Mihailov went on to point out the problems that did still exist in Germany; he listed in particular the report that one and a quarter million Germans were still retaining their arms in Schleswig Holstein, that a clash between German and Danish sentries had taken place in Frederickshaven, and that neither the disarmament nor the evacuation of German troops from Norway had been started.

The new Syrian Minister in Moscow, Faix al Khury, has just had his first interviews with President Kalinin and MM. Dekanozov and Kavtaradze. In answer to the Minister's expression of hope that the Great Powers had no aggressive designs on his extremely small country, M. Dekanozov gave the standard reply that the Charter of the United Nations was sufficient protection for all the smaller Powers; the Big Three meeting, according to him, was mainly to discuss German questions. M. Dekanozov and his colleague both disclaimed on behalf of the Soviet Government any special interest in Middle Eastern countries with the exception of Persia, in which that interest had already been made known.

M. Khury later explained to the head of the Press Department of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs certain inaccuracies in the recent Krasnaya Zvezda article on the Arab League (see last week's Summary) and was promised an interview with the author to expound his views in more detail.

Some interesting sidelights were given by M. Khury on the position of the Orthodox Church. He had hoped to get help in Moscow from Patriarch Alexei, who had recently been given such a cordial reception of his visit to Syria, not only by the Syrian authorities but by the Soviet Minister himself. While in Damascus the Patriarch had apparently emphasised the frequency of his contacts with Generalissimo Stalin and clearly succeeded in impressing the Syrians with his importance. In Moscow, however, M. Khury found the Patriarch relapsed into insignificance; instead of being able to assist the Syrian Minister, he actually begged him to tell the Soviet Government how useful the visit of the ecclesiastical delegation to Syria had been.

The claims of the Armenian S.S.R. to the former Russian territories of Kars, Artvin and Ardahan continue to be indirectly presented. (For the statements of the Armenian Council in the United States reported by Tass see under "Middle East.") Great prominence was given in the Moscow press (21st July) to an article from the Christian Science Monitor by Stevens, a former Moscow correspondent, supporting these claims and pointing out that most Armenians would choose Russian rather than Turkish rule. The same article went on to justify the Soviet demand for a revision of the Montreux Convention in the Straits, and Tass quoted in detail the passage asserting that the peril of the present Soviet-Turkish situation consisted less in the Soviet Union's demands than in the British sensitivity to anything likely to affect the Mediterranean balance of power. From a perusal of the Tass extracts the Soviet reader could hardly fail to draw the conclusion that the British are trying to build up a Turkish-Greek bloc to keep Russia out of the Mediterranean. The opportunity of suggesting a difference of view between the British and Americans afforded by the article has clearly been seized with a certain relish.

No doubt the British ex-prisoners of war and other inhabitants of liberated Europe who have had to hand over their watches to Red Army men will read with a certain nostalgia that watch production in the U.S.S.R. is to be stepped up, and that 400,000 watches are to be produced in 1946. Besides the old factories in Moscow and Chelyabinsk, new ones are being set up in Erevan and Sverdlovsk. The design of the proposed watches sounds attractive, though the fact that mortar factories are being switched over to watch production has a slightly ominous ring.

SCANDINAVIA.

M. Tuomioja, Minister of Finance to the Finnish Government, has resigned, in order to become governor of the Bank of Finland in succession to M. Ryti. M. Torngren, of the Swedish People's Party, has been appointed Finance Minister in his place.

The Hornborg Committee, appointed to enquire into the events leading to Finland's entry into the war, has submitted its findings to the Diet, but they have not been made public. They are understood not to be unanimous. According to Helsingin Sanomat, the report exonerates M. Tanner and Professor Kivimäki. Vapaa Sana, referring to this statement, says that such an amnesty is more than premature, and that the Committee had no authority to take decisions on this matter. It has now been reported from Helsinki that M. Ryti, the former President, is to be impeached, together with ten members of the former Government, including the Premier, M. Linkomies, M. Ramsay and General Walden. The charge will allege violations of the Finnish Constitution, presumably in connexion with the agreement with Ribbentrop not to conclude a separate peace, since this was made without reference to the Diet.

In connexion with the establishment of secret arms dumps, there are now stated to have been more than 1,000 arrests, including General Airo, Chief of the General Staff, and two of his subordinates, Colonels Nihtilae and Ahti. The official statement alleges that dumps are still being found daily in different parts of Finland, and that investigations are therefore continuing.

On the 20th July, the Minister of Finance in the Danish Government broadcast an explanation of the drastic proposals laid before the Rigsdag, for a large-scale investigation of the capital possessed by Danish citizens. The primary object seems to be to check the evasion of taxation, which is said to have reached startling proportions, running into hundreds of millions of kroner. An expert committee has estimated the annual loss at nearly £350 million. It is also designed to trace Danish currency which has illegally passed into German hands, with a view to its recovery, and to disclose the funds in the hands of collaborationists. Private citizens and companies, with a few exceptions, have to return the amount of their capital as on the 23rd July, while, as a further check, all existing currency notes are to be withdrawn from circulation from the above date, and must be surrendered to the banks by the 30th July. The amount which can be exchanged for cash is limited, for each individual, to 500 kroner (about £25). The excess is to be put into banking accounts, which will be temporarily frozen.

Captain Fjölsen, formerly Danish Naval Attaché in Berlin, has created a sensation by the publication of a booklet entitled The Overture to April 9th, in which he discloses information which he passed to the Danish Government as to the imminence of a German invasion, which he asserts was ignored. His action is strongly criticised in official quarters as a breach of his obligations to secrecy.

According to a press report, M. Günther, the Swedish Foreign Minister, has been appointed Swedish Minister in Copenhagen from the 1st October. The dissolution of the Coalition Government is now imminent, and there have already been forecasts of its successor in the Swedish press. It is expected that the Ministry for Foreign Affairs will be entrusted to M. Osten Unden, who held the same post in the Sandler Government of 1925–26, and achieved an international reputation as the Swedish representative on the League of Nations. In a speech delivered on the 22nd July, M. Undén stated that Sweden was prepared to join the United Nations Organisation created at San Francisco, though to do so would involve the abandonment of neutrality and the acceptance of military obligations. To act otherwise would indicate lack of confidence in the new security organisation, and would create differences between Swedish foreign policy and that of the remaining Scandinavian countries, with a detrimental effect on Nordic solidarity—which was in no way incompatible with membership of the United Nations.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Agreement with the Rotterdam dock-workers is reported to have been reached, nearly all the demands of the "urgency programme" having been conceded by the employers. Efforts are to be made to secure uniformity of wage-levels and of working conditions in all Netherlands ports. Nevertheless the Unity Trade Union is still dissatisfied at its non-recognition by the Government and called a "protest" stoppage, of an hour's duration, on the 23rd July.

Fraternisation between Allied troops and German civilians is being sharply criticised in the Dutch press. Perhaps the most striking comment is to be found in the Brabant paper Nieuwsblad van het Zuiden: "To watch or to play the guardian is strange to them [the British and Americans]. And non-fraternisation was something entirely new. . . . . They have not been occupied as we have been; . . . . and they have seen but a fraction of Europe's misery. Fraternisation is now being permitted, and British soldiers will . . . . visit the houses of German families whose fathers and sons have devastated our countries and persecuted our people."

In Belgium, the question of the King still awaits an answer. After the Government Bill amending the Constitution (see last week's Summary) had been adopted by the Legal Commission of the Senate, it was passed in the Senate itself by 77 votes to 58 with 5 abstentions.

Two days later on the 20th July, the promised debate on the "question royale" began in the Chamber of Representatives. On a point of order, M. Behogne (Catholic), asked for a postponement of the debate until the 24th July, on the ground that the morrow (21st July) was the Belgian National Day; but the motion was defeated on a show of hands by 96 to 87. The main feature of the proceedings was the long speech in which the Prime Minister outlined the history of the negotiations with the King during the past three months and stated the reasons which had led him to the conclusion that the King ought to abdicate. These, in general, were the indecision manifested by the King after his liberation and the evidence of his attitude during the Occupation. There was no question of disloyalty on the Government's part towards the Monarchy; and the Prime Minister himself did not look upon the King as a traitor. Nevertheless, M. Van Acker maintained that the King, convinced of a German victory, had displayed, during the occupation, a lamentable indifference towards the fate of his country and people: he had neither followed the Government into exile nor supported it; he had failed actively to resist the enemy; failed to encourage the reconstitution of the Belgian Army in the United Kingdom; refused to declare war on Italy; and disapproved of participation in the war by the Congo. He had not remained a prisoner at Laeken, but of his own will had paid visits to Austria. He had also made an unfortunate second marriage. More serious still were his visit to Hitler at Berchtesgaden and his failure to make an immediate an energetic protest against the deportation of Belgian workers to Germany. Moreover, M. Van Acker asserted, King Leopold had "voluntarily accepted if not caused" his own removal to Germany because he did not want to face the responsibilities he might be called upon to meet if he were in Belgium when the country was liberated. The documentary evidence would be at the disposal of Party leaders and members of the bureaux of the Chambers: to give it wider publicity could only harm the national interest. In conclusion, M. Van Acker stated that he had not the slightest intention of allowing the question to become an election issue. In view of the evidence, the Government had no right to advise the King to return, as this would "plunge the country into civil war for a lost cause." The debate was resumed on the 24th July, when the Chairman of the Chamber announced that it would end the following day: it will be considered in next week's Summary.

A highly critical situation exists in the Luxembourg steel industry, which (with the exception of two blast furnaces at Differdange) has been idle for the last nine months. Through this period the various concerns—the great ARBED works in particular—have continued to pay their employees; but their resources are rapidly approaching exhaustion. There is grave danger therefore of widespread unemployment in the industry, together with the possibility of political upheaval. The remedy lies exclusively in the provision of adequate supplies of coke, of which 90 per cent. was formerly imported from Germany.

FRANCE.

The long-awaited trial of Marshal Pétain on a comprehensive list of charges of collusion with the enemy and plotting against the internal security of France opened in Paris on the 23rd July. In spite of the Consultative Assembly's request that the proceedings should take place at the Luxembourg, the trial is being held in the small Court Room in the Palais de Justice in which the cases of Esteva and Dentz were heard. The aged Marshal and his wife are being lodged in the building and special precautions have been taken to ensure their safety. At the opening of what the President of the Court called "the greatest trial in history," the counsel for the defence denied the competence of the Court and criticised as arbitrary the composition of the jury from parliamentarians and members of Resistance groups. His contention was, however, overruled and, after the lengthy indictment drawn up by the Public Prosecutor had been recited, Pétain read a statement declaring that he was addressing himself to the French people; the Court did not represent the French people and he would not answer any questions. He claimed that he had "inherited a catastrophe" for which he was not responsible and that the Armistice of 1940 had saved France and contributed to the victory of the Allies by ensuring a free Mediterranean and the integrity of the French Empire. He once again professed to have given his person for France and maintained that he represented a Christian tradition "against all the tyrannies." Unity and reconciliation among Frenchmen had been his one aim. Finally he protested his innocence and urged that if he was to be condemned his condemnation should be the last and that no other Frenchman should ever again be imprisoned or condemned for having obeyed the orders of his lawful Chief. The first witness for the prosecution, M. Paul Reynaud, gave a long account of his relations with Pétain and Weygand during his Premiership in 1940, and was followed by M. Daladier.

The Government's constitutional proposals have continued to meet with criticism in the press of both Right and Left. Moreover, the State Reform Commission of the Consultative Assembly has unanimously agreed to put three resolutions before the Consultative Assembly; the first rejects the draft Ordinance and Bill proposed by the Government; the second proclaims the absolute necessity in all circumstances for direct and complete ministerial responsibility to the people's elected representatives; and the third favours a sovereign Constituent Assembly. As it is clear, however, that the critics are sharply divided, the Government are unlikely to be willing readily to modify their plan. Indeed, in a speech at Brest on the 21st July the General not only explained the proposals again but unequivocally expressed his hope and belief that French men and women will answer "Yes" to both questions of the referendum.

The press has again been stressing the importance of reparations and expressing regret that France is not represented on the Commission now sitting in Moscow. Particular concern has been caused by an American report that 90 per cent. of the reparations demanded from Germany would be divided between the three major Allies and only 10 per cent. allotted to other countries, including France.

According to a Paris statement broadcast in German on the 22nd July 175,000 German prisoners of war were working in France on the 1st July: they included 90,000 in agriculture, 16,000 in forestry, 15,500 in mines and 15,000 in building work.

The Monde of the 20th July published a letter from the Maronite Patriarch of Antioch expressing anxiety about the future of the Christians in the Middle East and voicing the hope that the independence of the Lebanon would be under the special protection of France, who had always had a care for their vital interests. This would not prevent other Allied Powers from supporting France in her "intervention humaine." "I have already said, and I repeat," wrote His Beatitude, "that it is to the interest of the Lebanon to conclude a treaty with France safeguarding the interests of the two countries without impairing the independence of the Lebanon. This is the wish of all our Christians." (See also "Middle East.")

SWITZERLAND.

The Full Powers Committee of the National Council met during the week. Among the subjects discussed were the abrogation of active military service on the 20th August and whether death sentences already passed should be carried out after that date (see Summary No. 302). The majority advocated the substitution of penal servitude for life instead of the death penalty. The opinion was also expressed that the application of military law to civilians should be curtailed as far as possible.

It is reported that Swiss authorities are preparing a White Paper on the anti-democratic activities carried on in Switzerland both before and during the war by foreign organisations and their adherents. The paper will explain the dangers that confronted the Swiss nation and the efforts made to combat them.

At a Press Conference on the 20th July, the Italian Prime Minister, Signor Parri, stated that no official decision had yet been reached regarding Switzerland's request for the use of the port of Genoa. It was, however, a legitimate desire which Italy wanted to satisfy. Suggestions have also been made that, if Genoa is too badly damaged for use in the near future, the port of Savona might be put at Switzerland's disposal.

Switzerland has accepted the position of Protecting Power for Japan in the United States, relinquished by Spain last March. The Swiss Legation informed the United States Government that Switzerland would assume the protection of Japanese interests only if Japan was willing to admit Swiss representatives to all prisoner-of-war and internment camps in Japan and Japanese-occupied territories. This permission, which has hitherto been denied to Switzerland as the Protecting Power of United States interests in Japan, has now been granted, and it is therefore expected that the treatment of American prisoners in Japanese camps will improve.

The negotiations have been concluded for the reception in Switzerland of United States troops on leave, and it is officially announced that complete agreement was reached on all questions. The scheme, which will come into operation on the 25th July, will apply provisionally for one year. A special Swiss Travel Centre has been set up to deal with the arrangements.

The Federal Council has cancelled the decree of the 29th August, 1939, which placed broadcasting under the control of the State.

A delegation of Swiss publishers has been discussing with the trade in London plans to facilitate the exchange of publishing and translation rights. It was stated in a Swiss broadcast that exhibitions of books would be arranged in both countries early in 1946.

The new Belgian Minister to Switzerland, Vicomte de Lantsheere, presented his credentials on the 20th July.

SPAIN.

For once Spanish rumour has not lied, and General Franco's much-heralded Cabinet changes—the first general shuffle since 1942—have come to pass. On the 19th July, two days after his speech to the National Council marking the anniversary of the civil war, the Caudillo announced the composition of the new Government. Only four of the old Ministers—those of Interior, Finance, Labour and Education—remain in office. The Secretary-General of the Falange, Arrese, who held the post of Minister without Portfolio, goes out, and his office apparently is not to be filled. Señor Lequerica, the Foreign Minister, is also relieved of his post which is taken over by Señor Martín Artajo, hitherto President of "Catholic Action" and a former member of Gil Robles' C.E.D.A. group which he left to join Franco. With Lequerica goes Señor Aunós, Minister of Justice; apparently they both had to be thrown overboard as compensation to Arrese. The other new appointments are: War—General Dávila, formerly Chief of the General Staff, Justice—Señor Fernández Cuesta, Marine—Rear-Admiral Francisco Regalado, Air—General Eduardo González Gallarza, Industry and Commerce—Señor Juan Antonio Suances, Public Works—Señor José María Ladreda, and Agriculture—Señor Carlos Rein Segura. The departure of Carceller is a surprise: the idea may be—since he is known as an anti-Monarchist—to present Franco's own attitude to a Restoration in a better light. His successor, Señor Suances, was Minister of Industry and Commerce for a short time in 1939 in the first post-civil war Government. He maintained thereafter close connexions with German industry, and, as President of the National Institute of Industry, he has been associated with ambitious plans for the development and modernisation of Spain's industrial equipment by State intervention and controls.

Most of the new men are comparatively unknown, and only one, Fernández Cuesta, is a politician. The general purpose of the changes seems, as was suggested last week, to have been to present to the Spanish public—and especially to the world outside—a Government of mainly non-Party moderates representing Spain's "evolution" which Franco has always maintained is in consonance with the post-war world. The disappearance of Arrese is certainly a superficial improvement which may be followed by a lessening of the political power of the Falange. It is a step in the right direction. But the retention of Girón, the extremist Party thug, and above all the reappearance on the political scene of Fernández Cuesta, a flamboyant "Old Shirt" of doubtful reputation who, as Minister of Agriculture, was involved in a financial scandal in 1939, will do much to lift up the hearts of the hollow men. The substitution of this man for Aunós at the Ministry of Justice will not mean more justice in Spain. And unless there are changes in the Civil Governors, who are also provincial delegates of the Falange, local administration will still be controlled by the Party. It should be noted that the Minister of the Interior, who will now doubtless control the Civil Governors as in pre-civil war days, is one of the old Cabinet; and Blas Pérez González, though a moderate, is nevertheless a Falangist. The other members of the new Government are merely pliant "Franquistas." The façade of respectability has been laid on, but behind it nothing very much has been changed.

There is no sign here that Franco is suffering as yet from a surfeit of power; he firmly believes that "il faut aimer sa place. Si tu es roi, aime ton sceptre." And the only one who has any right to the sceptre is not at all impressed by the Caudillo's specious and circumlocutory affirmations that one fine day he really will be restored to the throne of his fathers. What Franco has to say now to Don Juan amounts to little more than asking him "Vhether he'll have it now, or vait till he gets it." However irritating this game may be to the Monarchists, they are holding their horses—a gesture with which they are not unfamiliar—with cheerful and confident patience. Perhaps they are right; it must be an encouragement to Don Juan to know that Franco apparently wished to give the new Government a more strongly Monarchist complexion and approached several Royalists all of whom refused to accept office.

On the face of it Franco's latest move is natural and not unskilful. The indication given at San Francisco that Spain would be blackballed for the World Organisation came as a jolt; so, before the Potsdam Conference is over—and the anniversary of the civil war makes for convenient timing—the Caudillo produces, as the free gesture of a generous man, a nice new Government which will surely disarm the most unfriendly criticism. He forgets only one thing: he is still head of it. That is what the outside world—if not Spain—cannot swallow. The shifting of a few portfolios does nothing to solve the Spanish problem; what is wanted is not a new Government, but a new regimé.

ITALY.

The Regina Cocli prison in Rome has already been the scene of riots amongst the political prisoners confined there, and on the 22nd July a further outbreak occurred. Order is now said to have been restored. According to Signor Togliatti, the Minister of Justice, who visited the prison, the trouble was caused by turbulent elements but principally by excessive overcrowding. There have also been further outbreaks of lawlessness in the North. During the trial of five former partisans in Milan, accused of murder, armed aggression and robbery, the crowd attempted to break into the Court and set free the prisoners merely because they had formerly been partisans. The attempt was fortunately frustrated. But 33 former partisans, who were being held for trial in the San Vittore prison in Milan for illegal possession of arms, have escaped with the connivance of the prison guards, themselves former partisans. These guards have now been dismissed and their place taken by Carabinieri. Signor Parri, in his broadcast speech on the 23rd June, drew particular attention to the seriousness of this situation and made a direct appeal to all former partisans to co-operate for the defence of law and order and not to allow their reputation to be sullied by such acts. The revival of the old Turin newspaper Stampa as an independent paper, under the auspices of A.M.G., has also caused trouble. A crowd broke into the office, burnt the paper and smashed the printing machinery. The opposition to the revival of Stampa is said to be due to the fact that this paper became an organ of Fascist propaganda during the Fascist régime, but the political parties may also fear competition for their party papers.

The Council of Ministers, on the 4th July, approved a draft legislative decree concerning the membership of the National Consultative Assembly. This decree contains various modifications of the decree approved on the 30th April, necessitated by the liberation of the North. In general, the representation of the partisan movement is widened by the increase, from 6 to 16, of the members of the National Association of Partisans, and the number of Anti-Fascist ex-Deputies and ex-Senators is limited to 80. The Assembly will be constituted as follows:—

From each of the 6 parties of the C.L.N.—26	156
From each of the 5 parties of the C.L.N.A.I.—11	55
From parties outside the C.L.N.	20
From the Syndical organisations	46
From ex-Servicemen's organisations (including partisans) ...	22
From representatives of the professions and technicians ...	10
Anti-Fascist ex-Deputies and ex-Senators	80
	389

In addition, all ex-Ministers and Under-Secretaries who served in the various Governments formed since the liberation of Rome.

Signor Parri had stated recently in answer to enquiries about the situation in the Tyrol that all the information he had, which was admittedly scanty, was satisfactory as it indicated a rapprochement between the local Austrian and Italian inhabitants, but irresponsible interference from other sources in the Bolzano area has caused disquiet in Rome.

[For a further account of recent happenings in the Tyrol see under "Austria."]

THE VATICAN.

The Vatican is showing a new resolution in replying to the attacks of Moscow and its friends. In his address to United States pressmen on the 21st July the Pope gave the positive answer:—"the success of your profession depends on your fidelity to truth . . . . but what shall we say of deliberate falsehood?" Osservatore Romano boldly dealt with the word "reaction." "We wonder if the nations are not tired of this word, this bogy, used by certain people as a pretext for destroying all that displeases them." Vatican broadcasts in French stressed the need to resist campaigns of falsehood with exact knowledge; for the suppression or distortion of such knowledge was a prime cause of the war; and Osservatore Romano's comment on the Potsdam Conference—may deeds not contradict words—struck a similar note. The Vatican's constant fear that revolutionaries may exploit the ignorance of the people and dissolve society is seen in the Pope's latest request to the United States envoy, that Allied troops might remain in Italy as a symbol of law and order, until conditions are normal.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The "second stage" in the occupation of Hungary having been reached, the Russians have proposed revised arrangements for the working of the Allied Control Commission. The Soviet, British and American members of the Commission will hold regular meetings. The communication addressed to the British Commission states that directives to be handed to the Hungarian Government will be agreed with the British and United States Commissioners. Similar communications addressed to British representatives in Bulgaria and Roumania have however, made it clear that in those countries we can expect only discussion in the Commission and no guarantee that our views will not be overruled. Steps are being taken to discover whether the Russians really intend to give us, as their communication indicates, genuinely tripartite control in Hungary. In other respects also the British and American representatives will have a larger voice in policy, and be subject to fewer restrictions, than heretofore.

It is understood that a full copy of the Hungarian reparations agreement will shortly be made available to His Majesty's Government.

The Soviet authorities have restored to Hungarian control all the Hungarian oil-wells and installations. General Miklós and Generalissimo Stalin have exchanged further telegrams.

The Hungarian Government has asked the Allies for the extradition of persons listed by Hungary as war criminals for trial in Hungary. The request, which Marshal Vorishilov has endorsed, is under consideration.

The Government is still pressing for permission to deport to Germany some 200,000 disloyal "Swabians" (members of the German minority in Hungary).

The People's Court has sentenced to death General Beldy, the former "Youth Leader."

To the account of Gyöngyössy's speech, given in last week's Summary, protesting against the deportation of Magyars from Slovakia, should be added that he was followed on the platform by a local Slovak who affirmed the loyalty of the Hungarian Slovaks to Hungary; while after the meeting a deputation of Slovaks presented Gyöngyössy with a memorandum asking to be protected against compulsory deportation.

In domestic politics, tempers are getting seriously frayed. Not only are the Bourgeois Democrats entirely excluded from participation in political life, but a few days ago very harsh words were exchanged between the Left-wing of the Communists, under J. Révai, and the Right-wing of the Smallholders, under Varga. The more moderate leaders, Rákosi for the Communists and Tildy for the Smallholders, have tried to prevent a breach while the Social Democrats also mediated, reaffirming their old alliance with the Smallholders. The Communists had been accusing the other parties of "fostering reaction," and some concessions were made to them. The resignation of Social Democrat Minister of Justice, Valentiny, reported last week, is now known to have been due to pressure from the Communists, who thought him too lenient to "fascists." It has been followed—admittedly for the same reason—by the resignation of the Smallholder Finance Minister, Vásáry, whose successor is I. Oltvanyi, formerly President of the National Bank. Finally after the attacks of the Left on General Faraghó had gone crescendo to fortissimo, he was at last removed, to be replaced by S. Rónai (Social Democrat). This arrangement puts the Social Democrats on an equal footing with the Communists and Smallholders with three portfolios each.

The cost of living fell a further 6·3 per cent. in June and the President of the National Bank has described fears of inflation as unfounded. The yield of this year's harvest (wheat and rye) is forecast at only 10 million quintals, which, when reserves for seed are deducted, will hardly cover more than half the normal peacetime needs.

Roumania.

The Soviet authorities have announced certain modifications in the method of work of the Allied Control Commission in Roumania. These new arrangements include the calling of regular meetings, a provision that directions on matters of principle are to be issued by the Chairman after "discussion," but not necessarily with the agreement of the British and American representatives, and the concession that freedom of movement throughout the country is permitted to British and American representatives, on condition that dates and routes are notified beforehand. Moreover, the British and Americans are to have the right to fix the number and select the personnel for their own staffs. The despatch of mails, supplies and diplomatic couriers is to be carried out in the manner prescribed by the A.C.C. It is obvious that a good many loopholes are left, and that much depends upon what the Soviet intentions may be. This move appears to have been precisely timed to forestall discussion at the Potsdam Conference.

The agreement setting up a Russian-Roumanian Oil Combine was signed at Moscow on the 17th July.

A draft agreement has been drawn up for the formation of a Russian-Roumanian Shipping and Harbour Company. The details both of this and of the Oil Combine require careful study and will be dealt with more fully in the next Summary.

The President of the Roumanian Armistice Commission announces that he has been informed by the Soviet authorities that they intend to keep an army of 1,000,000 men in Roumania for at least a year, and that Roumania will be responsible for the provisioning of this force.

In an article in the Sunday Times of the 15th July, Mr. Gibson, who was recently allowed to leave Roumania after a long period of waiting, reports that the Roumanian Prime Minister told him on the 23rd May that he had had as many as 90,000 people under arrest but that the figure had recently fallen to 2,300. Dl Patraşcanu, the Minister of Justice, is quoted as putting the number at 60,000 last April. Another source which should be trustworthy puts the figure at over 50,000, of whom many are followers of Maniu.

Yugoslavia.

Although the situation in and around Trieste remains disturbed, the Italian inhabitants are recovering some confidence, food conditions seem to have improved and prices have fallen about 15 per cent. The arrests of 49 agitators on the 9th July provoked no immediate reaction; but a general strike for one day was called for the 19th. The Yugoslav Government have protested to the British and American Ambassadors against the Allied Military Government's suppression of Yugoslav-sponsored authorities.

Ribnikar, the Minister for Education, in an editorial article in Politika, let himself go against Greece, Turkey and the Western Allies. He wrote, "The behaviour of the great Western Allied Powers in liberated Europe is diametrically opposed to what they solemnly proclaimed during the war and are still repeating —freedom, democracy, national self-determination." With the Western Allies he contrasted the Soviet Union, which "neither demands territory nor military bases . . . . because it is not an imperialist conqueror State." His article was supported by other denunciations of the "reactionary" West, representing the European war as a revolution against all Governments except that of the Soviet Union. A cartoon showed E.A.M. as Hercules bound and threatened by a hydra, whose heads included the Greek King, the Greek Archbishop and John Bull. The News Chronicle was quoted for evidence that the British were not surrendering "war criminals" and neutral States were threatened for the same reason.

The Yugoslav Ambassador in London has received some straight talk in the Foreign Office about this propaganda. The British Ambassador has expressed himself similarly to Tito. He also enquired the reason for the constant hostility of Yugoslav military and civilian officials, and received Tito's assurance that orders would be issued to remedy the situation and that His Majesty's Embassy should be allowed to maintain touch with its consulates by aeroplane.

In Serbia not only have the functions of the courts of national honour passed to the district courts (see Summary, No. 302, p. 16), but in some cases the same personnel continue to act as judges.

The president of A.V.N.O.J., which the Crimea Conference recommended should include members of the last Yugoslav parliament, has said that it will be enlarged by the inclusion of "patriots from within the Front." A congress of the Front will also be held in August. No members of the former Governments in London are included in the Committees of the Congress, which will be a gathering of the partisan movement.

Before the Conference at Potsdam King Peter sent a letter to Mr. Churchill protesting that Yugoslavia was the victim of the tyranny of one party, in violation of the Tito-Shubashitch Agreement, which the King had been induced to accept last January.

The Head of U.N.R.R.A.'s Yugoslav Mission has given a warning about the harvest. The maize crop will be only two-thirds of the pre-war average; beet sugar less than a third. Above all, 6,000 lorries are needed before October, if the devastated western areas are to be supplied, and U.N.R.R.A.'s allocation to Yugoslavia is 1,650. Meanwhile the official Borba said that the chaos in the markets of Belgrade was the fault of selfish merchants and of "the people's authorities," who had done nothing to check the rise of prices, e.g., of fruit and vegetables. The stagnation in the Serbian textile industry is attributed to the failure of the new committees to carry out the State wool-purchasing drive, which only collected 18,000 kilog. of wool, instead of 200,000 expected, in a month. In view of the country's economic needs men over 35 and all women, except some specialists, are to be demobilised from the army in the next two months.

The entire output of the British-owned Trepca mines, which are operating on a reduced scale under the temporary administration of the Yugoslav authorities, is reported to be destined for Russia.

Greece.

The Foreign Minister, M. Sophianopoulos, who returned from the United States on 22nd July, announced his resignation the following day after a long meeting with the Regent and the Prime Minister. His resignation had been expected by the majority of Athens politicians since, contrary to his instructions, he voted against the United States and British Delegates at San Francisco over the Argentine issue (see Summary No. 292). M. Sophianopoulos told the Press that his conversations abroad had confirmed his belief that Greek interests called for the immediate formation of an all-party Government. Only such a Government could inspire a feeling of security among all classes and make possible free elections the results of which would be beyond dispute in Greece and abroad. His resignation was designed to emphasise these views. While in the United States, M. Sophianopoulos conversed both with M. Molotov and M. Gavrilovitch, whose Governments continue to display marked hostility to the present Greek Government and would no doubt welcome its replacement by one in which the Communist party was represented. It is, however, difficult to believe, with the failure of the post-liberation all-party Government of M. Papandreou in mind, that a political Government would be better suited to handle the real problems of Greece (see Summary No. 301). There is therefore reason to suspect that M. Sophianopoulos' resignation was dictated by party rather than international considerations.

His action may well be connected with a new campaign in all the non-Royalist press to represent the internal situation in Greece as completely out of control. While this is nothing out of the ordinary for the Communists—E.A.M. on the 10th July sent an "appeal" to the peoples of Britain, America and Russia, and the resistance movements of Europe, which represents the country as at the mercy of Right-wing terrorist bands—it is a new topic for the Republican press. Its adoption is probably due to the realisation by Republican politicians that the Government, which is proceeding steadily with the compilation of electoral rolls, intends to hold elections and a plebiscite in the autumn or at all events this year. It is generally accepted that the probable result of autumn elections would be a Royalist victory since, with the events of December 1944 still vividly in mind, the majority of voters consider the issue to be the King or Communism, not Monarchy or Republic. Thus, while the Royalist parties view the preparations for early elections with equanimity, the Republican politicians are doing all they can to postpone them or to discredit them in advance. M. Kaphandaris recently told the Press that his party would not participate in "rushed elections." Rizospastis had already stated, on the 16th June, that the Communist party would abstain from voting "if there were no guarantee for the free expression of the people's wishes." Early elections are, however, among the prerequisites of Greece's return to normality, and their supervision by the United States and British, and possibly also the Soviet and French, Governments should provide a sufficient guarantee of their fairness.

On the 22nd July the Yugoslav Legation in Athens presented a note drawing the attention of the Greek Government to the alleged persecution of Slav Macedonians by regular and irregular Greek forces. It goes on to say "The Yugoslav Government expects the Greek Government to give the necessary orders to put an end to all acts of terrorism and persecution of the population of Yugoslav origin in Ægean Macedonia, and that the Greek Government will respect the rights of our minority." There is no Yugoslav minority as such in Greece, and His Majesty' Consul-General, Salonica, recently confirmed, after a recent tour of the frontier area, that there is no persecution of Slavophone Macedonians. The Greek Government cannot accept such a document which, they observe, gives no particulars in support of its allegations and reads more like an article from Borba than an official communications between civilised, let alone Allied Governments. Such documents had in recent years been preludes to acts of aggression by their authors. At the Greek Government's request the matter has been referred to His Majesty's and the United States Governments, and no reply will be sent until their comments are received.

Albania.

Some ten weeks ago an American official, Mr. Joseph Jacobs, was sent to Albania by the State Department in order to investigate and report on the situation. It is understood that he has now sent in his recommendation, which is likely to be that the United States Government should inform Enver Hoxha that they will be prepared to accord de facto recognition to the F.N.C. régime subject to his first agreeing to hold free elections.

It is announced from Tirana that Enver Hosha has sent his close associate Colonel Hisni Kapo to Belgrade as his representative accredited to Marshal Tito's Government. Kapo has been a member of the National Liberation movement in Albania from the beginning, and it was he who organised the first armed bands near Valona. One of his duties will presumably be to do what he can to persuade Yugoslavia, in spite of her own grave shortages, to supply Albania with some of the grain of which she is now so sorely in need. In normal times Albania (without Kosovo) had to import 400,000 quintals annually, and the F.N.C. has not only to make the grain available quickly but also to pay for it somehow.

No fresh U.N.R.R.A. developments have been reported.

The press and wireless campaign against Greece—here as in Bulgaria—has continued with unabated virulence.

Bulgaria.

Two stormy Cabinet meetings followed the issue of M. Petkov's circular letter (see last week's Summary), but he and his two remaining Agrarian colleagues have so far refused to resign, backed up (it is thought) by the widely respected Regent Ganev. The existing tension cannot continue indefinitely, but it is hard to foresee what will happen next. Meanwhile the leader of the not very influential Democrat Party, M. Stoicho Mushanov—whose two chief lieutenants, Bourov and Nikola Mushanov, are incidentally in prison—has made a formal request to the (Communist) Minister of the Interior for his party to be permitted the right of legal individuality under the terms of the new Electoral Law, but has been told categorically that no organised opposition would be tolerated.

The Ex-arch Stefan, fresh from his visit to Moscow, told Mr. Houstoun-Boswall on the 21st July that from conversations which he had held there with Georgi Dimitrov and various eminent Soviet personages he was convinced that it was not the intention of the U.S.S.R. to precipitate a crisis in Bulgaria, particularly of such a character as to disturb His Majesty's Government or the Government of the United States. Dimitrov, he declared, speaks every evening direct with Sofia "and he is the mouthpiece of the Generalissimo, to whom he is very close indeed."

Four days earlier, however, General Oxley called on General Biryusov and asked him point-blank whether it was true that the Russian Army of Occupation in Bulgaria had been increased, and if so what did it signify? General Biryusov replied that the Russian Armies in South-East Europe were in process of being regrouped as a result of withdrawals from Hungary, Austria and Yugoslavia, and went on to explain that the troops being withdrawn north-east from the southern part of this area had necessarily to cross Bulgaria. General Oxley then asked if these troops were being moved back to Russia. After a pause General Biryusov said he had no knowledge of the plans of the General Staff, but "there were other countries, too, beyond Bulgaria." Had he not heard that we ourselves had largely increased our garrison in Greece? The Greek press were putting out highly inflammable statements, one of which was to the effect that they proposed to march through Bulgaria to Moscow. He presumed they could be likened to a flea on the back of an elephant, which feels that much stronger. General Oxley thereupon endeavoured to allay his fears, assuring him that there had been no increase of British troops in Greece. This assurance General Biryusov accepted, and the meeting ended in many professions of mutual esteem.

Turkey.

The Turkish Government has continued to withhold information from the public concerning the recent Russian proposals. So much so that the press has complained that on such a vital issue it has had to rely on agency telegrams from abroad.

Direct attacks on Turkey by the Russian press and radio have somewhat diminished since the opening of the Potsdam Conference. Moscow radio has, however, reported in detail an appeal by the American National Committee of America to President Truman, Mr. Churchill and Marshal Stalin for the return of "the Armenian Provinces, now forming part of Turkey, to their rightful owners, Soviet Armenia." It contrasted the miseries which the Armenians had suffered under the Turks, with their present security and economic advancement under the Armenian Soviet Republic. The appeal referred to the valour of the Armenian troops who fought in the Soviet and American armies and contrasted their deeds with "the traditional double-faced policy of Turkey"—which had led her to postpone her declaration of war on Germany until the last minute.

Yet another political party—to be known as the Party of National Restoration—has made its appearance. Its leader is Nuri Demirağ, a wealthy merchant and contractor who took an active part in Turkey's railway development, in the Air League and in aircraft production. The programme of the party includes freedom from Government interference in commerce and industry; the abolition of conscription and its replacement by a small, highly trained, technical army; direct, in place of indirect, voting; and the "adoption of a policy which, while conforming with Turkish traditions, would be modelled on the internal and external policy of Britain."

Turkey has appointed a delegation of four prominent merchants to represent her at the Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, which is to take place shortly in London.

A fortnightly Turkish steamship service will shortly be established between Istanbul and Egypt. The vessels will call at Smyrna, Piræus, Alexandria, Port Said, Haifa, Beyrouth, Alexandretta, Mersin, Antalya and Rhodes.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The transfer of the Troupes Spéciales to the Levant Governments has been proceeding with greater speed than was at first thought probable. In fact, progress may have been too rapid. It is by no means a simple matter for one controlling authority to hand over to another so many troops, to say nothing of their barracks, stores and equipment; nor will it in any case be easy for the local Governments to arrange for the feeding and training of those troops that they require for the formation of their national army. Once the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales has been completed it will be time enough to consider the possibility of discussions on other matters. Count Ostrorog himself fully recognises the impracticability of reopening negotiations at present, and even appears to think that little or nothing can be done in that direction for some time.

During the past week the Syrian authorities in Aleppo have begun to show more energy in countering the activities of local anti-French extremists. On the 11th July, for instance, the Governor of Aleppo spoke to the leading men of the town on the importance of spreading counsels of moderation among the population. He also urged restraint on the editors of the local press, as a result of which some of the Aleppo newspapers, for the first time since the crisis began, have published quite moderate articles on the local situation. For these satisfactory developments due regard must be paid to the representations made both in Aleppo and in Damascus by His Majesty's Legation and the British Military Authorities. (See also under "France.")

It is reported from Cairo that on the 3rd July a meeting was held under the auspices of the Young Men's Moslem Association to discuss the situation of French North Africa. Representatives of various bodies interested in Moslem–Arab affairs were invited to the meeting, at which speeches denouncing French policy in Arab countries are said to have been made. Among the resolutions passed at the meeting were those advocating intervention by the United Nations to prevent French "terrorism" in North Africa; support of the claims of Morocco, Algeria and Tunis for complete independence and membership of the Arab League, and the holding of a general conference to make propaganda in favour of these North African territories.

The trial of Mahmoud Issawi for the murder of Ahmad Maher Pasha was resumed in Cairo on the 18th July. According to the press, Nahas Pasha excused his attendance as a witness on the grounds of ill-health, but wrote to the president of the Court repeating the declaration of the Wafd made in February last, that his party disapproved of Egypt's declaration of war. Among other witnesses summoned, who were heard in camera, were the Prime Minister, Nokrashi Pasha; and Ali Maher and Makram Ebeid, all three of whom are said to have stated that they were in favour of Egypt's declaration of war, Nokrashi and Ebeid emphasising that it was not made at the behest of Great Britain. Ebeid added that it was due to the wish of President Roosevelt, a statement that not unnaturally caused some sensation, but was later denied by Nokrashi.

In an interview granted to a Reuter correspondent in London by the Regent of Iraq shortly after his arrival in this country, His Royal Highness is reported to have said that the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty should be revised and would be discussed with his Majesty's Government while he was in London. (It is, on the face of it, unlikely that the Regent actually said this to a correspondent, but it is just possible that he did so.) The interview has been prominently and favourably featured in the Iraqi press, which has expressed satisfaction that on the question of treaty revision the Regent contradicted an earlier pronouncement by the former Iraqi Minister in London (who incidentally is attending the Regent on his travels) that the treaty was good and should be left unaltered. It is not unnaturally assumed in Bagdad that the amendment of the treaty is actually being discussed in London with His Majesty's Government, which, of course, is not the case. It may well be that, in view of recent speeches in the Iraqi Parliament and of the press campaign on the subject, the Regent may wish to raise the matter in private conversation with the Secretary of State or some senior official of the Foreign Office; but it is most unlikely that there will be any fomal discussion of the question. The Regent was also reported as saying that Rashid Ali would be hanged on his return to Iraq—a statement which was not so favourably received. Meanwhile the campaign for the revision of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty is gathering volume in the Iraqi press, and while most of the articles deal with the problem in general terms, there have been references to the existence in Iraq of British "military bases" which are regarded as incompatible with complete independence.

Faiz al Khury, the newly appointed Syrian Minister to Russia, stopped in Bagdad on his way to Moscow and was received in audience by the Acting Regent, the Amir Zaid, on the 5th July. On the following day he held a press conference at the Syrian Legation in Bagdad, at which he expressed his own and his Government's views on Franco-Syrian relations, stressing the impossibility of resuming negotiations with the French as long as their troops remained in Syria, and his distrust of any proposals for a "cultural" treaty which the French might put forward. (See also under "Soviet Union.")

The new Persian Government was presented to the Majlis on the 17th July, when at last a sufficient number of members attended to form the necessary quorum. This, however, does not imply that the minority supported M. Sadr's Government, and the Prime Minister is inclined to think that he had better retire unless he succeeds in getting at least 70 votes. Many Deputies are already on the look-out for a successor.

The order by the Persian Government to suspend foreign broadcasts (see Summary No. 302) has been cancelled, and foreign broadcasts from Radio Tehran may now be resumed, provided that the script is submitted beforehand to the Persian censor. Our broadcasts to Indian troops may therefore be renewed, subject to Persian censorship. It remains to be seen whether the Persian censor will be strong enough to prohibit objectionable references to us or to the Americans broadcast under Soviet auspices, as has occurred several times recently.

THE FAR EAST.

In Japan the Potsdam Conference is clearly regarded with apprehension for its possible effect on the policy of the Soviet Union. Japanese publicity has shown some vacillation on the subject. On the 22nd July a Japanese broadcast claimed that Russia was "shying away from all attempts to force her to enter the conflict," and predicted that President Truman would be gradually driven to modify the foreign policy he had inherited from the Roosevelt Administration. On the other hand, a Tokyo broadcast on the following day uttered a warning to the nation to be prepared for a communiqué after the Potsdam Conference containing "provisions considerably unfavourable for Japan" and calling for a "fresh, vigorous policy towards the Soviet Union."

Mr. Elmer Davis, head of the Office of War Information, declared on the 22nd July that there was no special significance in a broadcast to Japan on the 20th by Captain Zacharias, an American naval officer, and said that mistaken inferences had been drawn from it.

Captain Zacharias commended the unconditional surrender peace formula as "a humanitarian gesture of great constructive value," and urged "Japanese leaders who are sincerely interested in terminating the war with honour" to study American historical precedents, notably "the honourable surrender of General Lee in 1865. He declared that Japan had a choice between "the virtual destruction of Japan followed by a dictated peace" and, on the other hand, "unconditional surrender, with its attendant benefits as laid down by the Atlantic Charter." He also assured the Japanese that "if they should initiate the cessation of hostilities without further delay it may be assumed that it will be the United States which will enforce the formula and ensure the peace."

The session of the People's Political Council in Chungking closed on the 20th July. A vast number of resolutions have been passed. Among these were proposals that twenty-year treaties should be concluded with Great Britain, France and Russia; that the Emperor Hirohito should be declared a "war criminal"; that the existing political organisation in Mongolia and Tibet should be strengthened; and that the land laws should be revised. Dr. Soong, who addressed the Council on the last day, is reported to have expressed the view that owing to the Allied bombing of Japan and the well-co-ordinated Chinese and Allied military operations, it was possible that Japan would surrender unconditionally this year or at the latest by next spring. He did not reveal what questions had been under discussion during his visit to Moscow, but he explained that no definite decisions had been reached. Referring to China's internal situation, Soong said that after Japan's defeat the problems of administering the liberated territory and of national reconstruction would arise. It would be necessary to decide what economic enterprises should be developed in the next few years and then to negotiate with friendly Powers for loans for this purpose. The United States, Britain, the U.S.S.R., Canada, France and Belgium were mentioned as being in a position, and willing, to help China in this respect. Soong said that during his visit to Washington he had succeeded in securing "a large quantity" of United States gold, which would be used to strengthen China's currency reserve, and that big consignments of cloth had been secured for transshipment to China from the United States, Mexico and Brazil.

Dr. Soong hopes to return to Moscow about the end of the month and renew the interrupted negotiations with the Soviet Government. He has intimated his intention of visiting both Washington and London after the conclusion of the Moscow talks. He professes optimism as to the ultimate result of the Moscow talks, but it appears that their course so far has not been easy. Meanwhile, Chungking's relations with Yenan remain as bad as ever. Both sides are now busy jockeying for position on or near the coast, with their eyes on the eventual control of the great coastal cities, which in normal times produce the bulk of the Chinese revenue. Each side is thinking of its own strategic position in event of an American landing on the coast of China, for whichever is the better placed for assisting the Americans in such operations would expect to get the lion's share of arms and support for its local administrative authority; such American support would be given to either side for strategic motives but the eventual consequences to China would be political. Much, therefore, depends on where landings are made. South of Shanghai the Chungking Third War Zone forces under General Ku Chu-tung, an old supporter of Chiang Kai-shek, appear to have the upper hand outside the Japanese-garrisoned areas, but most of the coast of Shantung (except Weihaiwei, Chefoo and Lungkow, where there are Japanese garrisons) is now controlled by the Communist forces, who have ousted the Chungking guerrillas. Apart from the forces now adhering to either Chungking or Yenan, there are the numerous troops of the Nanking puppet régime and their commanders who are likely to break with Japan as soon as it seems safe to do so and try to bargain themselves into safety.

A full account has now been received of the proceedings of the Seventh National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party (see Summary No. 298). In the course of his review of the political situation, General Mao Tse-tung claimed that the Communist troops, numbering some 910,000 men, had become the main force of resistance to Japan and that in contrast to this the Kuomintang areas had nothing to show but a long tale of "military defeats, loss of large territories and economic and financial crisis." He claimed that since 1939 it was the Communists who had borne the brunt of the Japanese attack. He said that in 1943 64 per cent. of the Japanese forces operating in China and 95 per cent. of their Chinese puppet troops had been engaged by the Chinese Communists and that 56 per cent. of the Japanese forces in China and most of the puppet troops were so engaged. These are figures which have often recently been quoted in the British and American Press; they are, however, largely meaningless, because they do not compare numbers of troops on different fronts; as the Communists operate almost entirely behind the Japanese lines, they can count all occupation troops not actually at the "front" as engaged against them, but strong occupation forces would in any case be necessary for garrisons and lines of communication in the wide territories superficially conquered by the Japanese since 1937. Mao went on to voice the old grievance that the Nanking puppet troops were receiving "moral and organisational" support from the Kuomintang and that they were encouraged to attack the Communist-held areas, which were at the same time blockaded by 800,000 of the Kuomintang's forces. "Many people know of the Mihailovitch in Yugoslavia," he added, "but they never hear of the scores of Mihailovitches in China." Owing to the strict censorship imposed by the Kuomintang it was impossible to make this state of affairs known to many Chinese or to foreign public opinion.

As against Mao Tse-tung's charge that the Nanking puppet troops are receiving Kuomintang support, it is interesting to note that the Chungking military spokesman claimed recently that the Communist troops were receiving tacit, if not active, Japanese support in the occupation of areas vacated by the Japanese. While it is no doubt in the Japanese interest to promote civil strife between Communist and Chungking troops, there is nothing to show that the Communists are in fact acting in collusion with the Japanese.

On the 24th July Yenan broadcast a statement that Chungking troops had attacked Communist positions 65 miles north of Sian, that fighting had been going on for three days and that General Chu Teh, commander of the (Communist) 18th Army Group had cabled to Chiang Kai-shek demanding a cessation of the attacks. So far there has been no confirmation of this report from Chungking sources.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A further milestone in acceptance by the United States of responsibility for participation in world affairs and further evidence of the determination of the American people to help the world back on to its feet is the ratification by the Senate by a vote of 61 to 16 of the Bretton Woods Monetary Agreements. It has usually been granted that the proposal to set up a World Bank and International Monetary Fund for Reconstruction and Development was a more controversial issue than ever the United Nations Charter. But despite persistent opposition from Senator Taft (Republican, Ohio), incidentally and unexpectedly supported in some of his manœuvres by the internationalist Senator Ball (Republican, Minnesota), who produced a last-minute amendment to the effect that nations failing to abolish discriminatory currency practices within three years should be banned from the use of the fund, the final votes were more favourable than even the most optimistic earlier dared to hope. Indeed, the vote of the House of Representatives approving the legislation as passed by the Senate was unanimous. The Bill now only needs the President's signature to become law. Mr. Morgenthau, the late Secretary of the Treasury, greeted the final passage of these proposals with the statement that "The American people are united in their determination to co-operate with other countries in the settling of international problems by the method of discussions and agreement," and expressed the hope that other nations would promptly follow the United States lead.

The Senate has also approved legislation to make the Export-Import Bank an independent, permanent agency of the Government with resources increased from 700 million dollars to 3½ billion dollars. These increased lending powers are necessary in order to finance the delivery of industrial equipment and supplies to Europe, which have hitherto been granted under Lend-Lease. Mr. Crowley, Administrator of the Federal Economic Administration, in urging the grant of increased lending powers, remarked that the need was the greater because the proposed International Bank contemplated under the Bretton Woods Agreement could not be put into effective operation for another year or eighteen months.

A further expression of the readiness and willingness of the United States to do all it can to restore international prosperity is the approval by a voice vote of the completed Congressional action on a resolution authorising United States participation in the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organisation (F.A.O.).

Meanwhile the United Nations Charter is now being debated on the Senate floor and speedy ratification seems certain. Devout internationalists, however, fear lest public complacency may enable an isolationist minority to cause trouble over the subsequent enabling legislation. The three points over which controversy might arise in the future are finance, the powers of the United States delegate on the Security Council and the size and conditions of the use of the United States quota forces. Senator Vandenberg, who has wholeheartedly supported, and has, indeed, proved a tower of strength to, the Administration on this issue has himself suggested that later legislation should require the President to notify Congress whenever he authorises the United States delegates to commit United States forces; and it is of interest that ex-President Hoover, while advocating immediate ratification by the Senate of the United Nations Charter, has suggested that " somewhere along the line Congress must define (the) delegate's powers " for Congress should never part with its powers to declare war.

As the New York Times has pointed out, these events in the United States, strengthen the hand of Mr. Truman at Potsdam; as to Potsdam, however, the American people have so far had to be content with the bare announcement that " the work of the conference is going ahead and much serious business has been done." Naturally there is some (but surprisingly little) criticism of the secrecy which surrounds the Conference, and an immense amount of speculation concerning the topics that may have been or are being discussed. Thus it is reported that " President Truman has succeeded in putting the Pacific War first on the agenda of the Potsdam Conference," and, more cautiously, that there is " increased discussion of developments in the Far East and on the possibility of an early peace." The press, for its part, continues to pronounce strongly against any contemplation of a negotiated peace, though certain papers, for instance, the Luce publications, and such responsible commentators as Mr. Ernest Lindley and Mr. Mark Sullivan, are urging a clarification of the unconditional surrender terms in order to save American lives; despatches from Washington, which have been echoed by such columnists as Drew Pearson, maintain that President Truman has taken to Potsdam a report by Acting Secretary Grew, outlining the minimum peace terms for Japan.

Rumours of Japanese peace feelers also continue in spite of the denials by Mr. Grew and his insistence that the policy of unconditional surrender remains unchanged; and despite official discouragement a good deal of emphasis is placed on Japan's impending defeat. Closely allied to this are tributes to the part that the British are playing in the Far East war and in particular the contribution made by the Royal Navy, though in certain quarters it is still alleged that Britain is not pulling her full weight. A recent Gallup Poll revealed that 77 per cent. of those interviewed wish to see Soviet Russia join in the war against Japan, but at the same time only 39 per cent. (as against 65 per cent. immediately after Yalta) believe she will come in. Speculation on Russia's rôle in the Far East continues.

Mr. Ickes has announced that if possible six million tons of American coal will be shipped to Europe for civilian use between now and the 1st January (see last week's Summary). This decision, Mr. Ickes said, was reached because of the " desperate " coal situation in Europe. " The race in Europe to-day is one between coal and anarchy. I do not think it is going too far to say," he maintained, " that a coal famine of such severity as to destroy nearly all semblance of law and order is certain to occur in certain countries in North-West Europe next winter unless immediate and drastic action is taken now." Mr. Ickes has also appealed to the army to release at least 30,000 miners.

Dr. Vannevar Bush, Director of the Office of Scientific Research and Development has presented a report, which was requested last November by President Roosevelt, proposing the establishment of a National Research Foundation by Congress for the purposes of promoting a national policy for scientific research and scientific education. Representative Randolph (Democrat, W. Virginia) and Senator Magnuson (Democrat, Washington), have introduced Bills into Congress to create such a foundation, which, it is estimated, will cost nearly eight million pounds a year.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine masquerade continues. According to Press reports, pamphlets attacking the United States Ambassador as " the cowboy tamer of South American Governments," and insinuating that Al Capone was to be found in the United States Embassy, have been distributed in the streets. Posters, similar to those which are issued by the Secretariat of Labour and Welfare, are reported to have been exhibited urging workers to " unite against Wall Street imperialism." The Government have denied responsibility for the posters and, according to broadcast reports, Sr. Ameghino, the Foreign Minister, has ordered an investigation. Nevertheless, the incident is far from creditable to Colonel Perón.

Meanwhile two more German firms are stated to have been taken over, and the winding-up of German insurance companies has been ordered.

In the Dominican Republic the distribution of leaflets attacking Generalissimo Trujillo has led to arrests among students: persons who sought sanctuary in the Colombian Legation have left Ciudad Trujillo under safe conduct, but the sheltering of others in the Venezuelan Legation seems to have revived the old tension between the Dominican Republic and Venezuela.

The election of Dr. Bustamante Rivero as President of Peru, which has been virtually certain for several weeks (see Summary No. 298), has been officially proclaimed, and the new President will take office on the 28th July. Dr. Bustamante, who had a majority of two to one over General Ureta, is a native of Arequipa and a lawyer by profession. He entered politics in 1930, and served as Minister of Justice. Since 1934 he has been successively Minister at La Paz, Ambassador in Montevideo, and Ambassador at La Paz.

GERMANY.

THE Allied Control Council for Germany took up its permanent duties on the 30th July, after holding its first formal meeting in Berlin under the chairmanship of General Eisenhower on that day. At the conclusion of this meeting an official communiqué was issued, stating that future sessions of the Control Council would be held regularly on the 10th, 20th and 30th of each month and at any time on request of any member of the Council. The Council, it added, "took note with approval of the arrangements reached for an allocation of the sector in Greater Berlin to the forces of occupation of the French Republic." The area allocated, however, was not specified.

Considerable interest has been shown by the Russian-controlled press of Berlin in the results of the British parliamentary election. In the view of the Communist Deutsche Volkszeitung, the advent of a Labour Government in Britain "might influence the political development of many European countries, including Franco Spain." According to the Berliner Zeitung, the official organ of the German municipal administration in Berlin, the fundamental principles adopted for their reconstruction by liberated countries like France and Czechoslovakia had now also been endorsed by the British people. The same paper expressed a hope that the new Labour Government would "grant permission for anti-Fascist parties to operate in the British zone" as well as in the Russian. Tägliche Rundschau, the mouthpiece of the Red army authorities in Berlin, confined itself to quoting the somewhat non-committal Pravda leader of the 28th July, emphasising that the main issue of the election turned on questions of British home policy.

A move to bring some of the newly-formed trade unions in the Russian zone "into line with the international trade union movement" was announced from Dresden on the 27th July, with the constitution of a "Preparatory Trade Union Committee" to foster the growth of labour organisations in the province of Saxony. A similar "Preparatory Committee" was stated on the same day to have been set up at Rostock, and will presumably exercise the same functions in the province of Mecklenburg. The principles and aims of these committees are substantially the same as those of the new trade unions in Berlin, and their members are drawn exclusively from the Social Democratic and Communist parties. All provincial organisations of the Social Democratic party throughout the Russian zone are at the moment rigidly controlled from Berlin, where the party now claims a membership of 60,000 and where headquarters have been planned as the eventual central authority of the party for all Germany. In the absence of any serious division or even, it would seem, discussion on ideological issues, all the political parties and trade union groups in the Russian zone are at the moment concentrating their main energies on plain domestic tasks like the provision of labour for this season's harvest. Despite the establishment of native German administrations for Brandenburg, Mecklenburg and Saxony at the beginning of July (see Summary No. 301), it is clear that Marshal Zhukov is keeping executive responsibility very firmly in his own hands. On the 26th July, with a view to "improving the administration of Brandenburg," he ordered the subdivision of the province into four new Verwaltungsbezirke, centred in the towns of Brandenburg, Bernau, Eberswalde and Kottbus, to replace the existing Regierungsbezirke of Potsdam and Frankfurt-an-der-Oder. These Verwaltungsbezirke contained none of the old territory of Brandenburg east of the Oder.

On the 25th July Marshal Zhukov issued an order compelling private citizens, business concerns and public institutions in the Russian zone to hand over to the "field offices" of the State Bank all gold, silver and platinum in bar or coin, and all foreign currency and "documents relating to property and precious objects" in their possession. Those failing to comply were threatened with severe penalties. In many of the German cities property-owners as a class have been virtually destroyed. 80 per cent. of private dwelling-property in Berlin is now regarded as a total loss, according to an estimate by the Berlin radio of the 24th July. A recently established "Office for the Disposal of Salvaged Property" at the moment disposes of entire businesses and factories which have been classified as "ownerless." To the impoverished city dwellers of Russian-occupied Germany are slowly being added several millions of ruined business people and dispossessed peasants driven from the East. Some 34 per cent. of the 2,300,000 Germans who are due to arrive completely destitute from East Prussia, and some 30 per cent. of the 4,700,000 who are due to arrive in a similar state from Silesia, are persons who were described in the last German census as "selbständig," that is, townsfolk with their own businesses or peasants with their own farms. In a community so poverty-stricken and déclassé, even non-Socialist German political parties like the Liberal-Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union may genuinely be losing their bourgeois character as their recent proclamations would suggest.

The most recent meeting of the Inter-Allied Executive Military Council, which took place in the Berlin suburb of Zehlendorf on the 25th July, was the first of its kind to be reported in full by the Berlin radio, which still remains studiously silent on many of the administrative changes that have taken place in the German capital in the past weeks. Problems of food, fuel and labour, it stated, had been discussed and commissions had been appointed to standardise prices and wages. The Oberbürgermeister of Berlin, Dr. Werner, whom Col.-Gen. Gorbatov formally presented at the meeting to his British, American and French colleagues, was instructed to arrange within the next month for an orderly registration of the entire Berlin population so that a systematic distribution of food could be undertaken. On the day that the Military Council met, the Russian-controlled news agencies in Berlin made much of the burden which the Red Army was stated to have borne in the feeding of the city. In the first 24 days of July the Soviet authorities were said to have sent 43,128 tons of food, principally meat, fats, sugar and flour to Berlin. The city's meat supply was described as "exclusively in the hands of the Red Army," which had ordered large herds of cattle to be driven in from the surrounding countryside, so that at times about 70,000 head were available for feeding the population—a situation not easy to reconcile with other reports of how the Red Army has driven the best German cattle eastwards or slaughtered it indiscriminately to satisfy its own day-to-day needs. On the 30th July Col.-Gen. Gorbatov alleged that "Nazi wolves in sheep's clothing" had been attempting to sabotage Allied plans for food distribution in Berlin, among other things by misdirecting supplies. He added that Dr. Andreas

Hermes, the leader of the Christian Democratic Union and former Centre Party Minister of Finance, had "asked to be allowed to resign his post" as head of the Berlin food office as a result of investigations which had been made.

Under a new plan published in the Hamburger Neue Presse on the 28th July, certain perishable food-stuffs grown by the German population for German needs but difficult to store owing to the destruction of the packing plants will be placed at the disposal of the British Army in Germany, in exchange for tinned British food which can be kept by the Germans for winter. Policy at the moment is stated to be to raise local German food supplies to a level sufficient to maintain the health of the population, but no more. The high death-rate in the dysentery epidemic which is at present threatening Berlin and other cities is described as symptomatic of the general undernourishment there. In the week ending the 21st July, 475 cases of dysentery were noted in the British zone of Berlin alone. A milder incidence is reported from Munich and there is a marked seasonal outbreak at Frankfurt-am-Main. Following a considerable increase in the number of typhoid cases in Berlin for which the refugees from the East are believed to be largely responsible—Marshal Zhukov on the 27th July prohibited all further migration into the German capital (which he estimated at between 4,000 and 5,000 daily) and ordered the Red Army authorities to turn back at the railway stations all persons arriving without permits.

It is now estimated that no less than 600,000 displaced persons, principally Poles, will have to go on being fed and accommodated in the British zone during the autumn and early winter months. Nearly 600,000 Russians have so far been delivered to the Russian zone, but 400,000 remain, their return being entirely dependent on the rate at which the Soviet authorities will accept them (which amounts to 4,000 to 5,000 a day at the moment). All "westbound" repatriation is now virtually complete. More than half a million German troops have so far been demobilised for work of reconstruction in the British zone under the so-called Operations "Barleycorn" and "Coalscuttle," while under the Operation "Shuttlecock" 50,000 more have been sent to their homes in the American zone in return for 20,000 of those from the American prisoners-of-war cages whose homes are in the British zone.

Further details of the general plan of administration now being followed by the United States Military Government authorities in the South were published by the United States District Commander in Stuttgart, Colonel William Dawson, on the 24th July. The United States Military Government authorities, Colonel Dawson stated, "intended to use a system of German civil administration, jurisdiction and executive bodies as soon as possible." As a general principle, Military Government would enforce its will by indirect means. Although the National Socialist Party and all its organisations had been dissolved, the new administration might use these dissolved organisations when they served important needs, such as public assistance, health and sanitation, though without Nazi staffs and Nazi methods. Daily discussions "on the manifold problems of reconstructing the German administrative apparatus" were stated on the 23rd July to be taking place between all the German Landräte and members of the United States Military Government in Württemberg. The American-controlled Stuttgart radio is also inviting the German public to send in its views on the reconstruction of local government and similar matters of political interest. A certain measure of administrative decentralisation in Bavaria was announced by the Bavarian Prime Minister, Dr. Friedrich Schaeffer, on the 28th July. The main authorities for all public affairs, except railways, posts and finance, would, it was stated, in future be the five local Regierungspräsidenten and not the central State administration in Munich.

On the 25th July it was announced from Paris that M. Emile Laffon, Secretary-General in the French Ministry of the Interior, had been appointed "General Administrator" under General Koenig for the French zone of Germany. The French administration in Germany would, it was stated, comprise some specialised departments "almost equivalent to Ministries"—especially those charged with the recovery of property stolen in France and with compensation for losses borne by France during the occupation. Native German "cadres" would be used to assist the French administration. Though reports from the French zone are very scarce, one neutral observer has expressed considerable satisfaction at the way in which the French occupation is being managed and has claimed that German rations in the French zone are "in some respects bigger than the Parisians'." There were no reprisals against the German population, but some French officers apparently "regretted the relatively lenient occupation." Relations between the French and Swiss frontier authorities in South Baden and Württemberg would seem to be excellent, and members of the French Military Government are said to be supporting a plan of the Swiss Committee for Aid to Germany, devised under the guidance of Professor Ernst Stähelin of Basle, to open a number of Swiss-controlled schools and colleges in South Germany.

AUSTRIA.

The joint Allied occupation of Vienna is nearer to becoming an accomplished fact, with the arrival there of advance parties of British, United States, and French troops on the 27th July. They have taken up quarters in their respective zones, which are, however, only billeting areas; the administration of Vienna is to be on a joint basis. The administration of the entire city will, however, remain under Russian control until the meeting of the Allied Council, which is likely to be further delayed owing to the indisposition of Marshal Koniev, and the temporary absence of General Mark Clark in Brazil. When the administrative machinery is in operation, representatives of each of the four Allied Powers will preside in turn over the governing authority for one month. The advance parties are preparing for the arrival of larger units which are expected to arrive soon. The difficulties of finding suitable accommodation are considerable—many houses are destroyed, and essential services such as water, light, and sewage are still disrupted. The famous palace of Schönbrunn is likely to be the headquarters of the British administration. A report from Radio Linz pointed out that in the name of the Allied authority to be set up in Austria—the Allied Commission for Austria—the word "control" is missing. The contrast with Germany was, of course, deliberate.

British troops received a warm welcome on their entry into Graz (formerly occupied by Russian troops), on the 25th July, when General McCreery broadcast a message to the people of Styria. Machold, the Landeshauptmann of the Styrian Provincial Government set up during the Russian occupation, and which acknowledged the authority of the Renner Government, tendered his resignation and was invited to form a new provisional Provincial Government under British supervision. Elementary schools in Styria are to be reopened on the 10th September, and new text-books are being printed.

In Carinthia,, the Consultative Committee under Dr. Piesch has been recognised and elevated to the status of a Provisional Provincial Government, which held its constituent meeting on the 25th July, under the Chairmanship of Piesch as Landeshauptmann. This brings Carinthia, where the Committee previously had advisory powers only, into line with the other Austrian provinces, in each of which there is now a provincial administration under a Landeshauptmann. It is not yet clear how many members of the Consultative Committee hold office in the new government, but the distribution as between the parties is: 4 Social Democrats, 3 Volkspartei, 1 Communist, and 1 Carinthian Slovene, Dr. Tischler, who is responsible for minority questions. The list of offices announced includes Security, Agriculture, Minorities, and Reconstruction.

Neues Österreich reported an unofficial visit by Böhm (the Social Democrat Minister of Social Welfare in the Renner Government) to Czechoslovakia. Böhm spoke favourably of his friendly welcome there, of his hopes that Austria might expect some assistance from Czechoslovakia in the coming months, and of the good treatment accorded to Austrians by the Czech authorities.

The first Austrian trials of war criminals are scheduled to begin in Vienna at the beginning of August. Among the first cases will be that of a group of S.A. men accused of shooting Jews from a detention camp; and an accusation of sabotage against Professor Lange, of Vienna University, who is alleged to have smashed an electron microscope and other valuable equipment immediately before the Red Army's entry into Vienna.

At a conference of the Austrian Socialist Party in Vienna on the 29th, the serious food situation was discussed, and it was stated that the Red Army's help in supplying food was soon to end. According to Allied press correspondents who are now in Vienna, Russian supplies are expected to last until the 1st September.

In all four zones of Austria there were commemorative speeches and ceremonies on the 25th July, on the anniversary of the Nazi Putsch and the murder of Dollfuss in 1934. A memorial mass for Dollfuss was held in Salzburg.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

"After seven terribly long years," as he himself described it, Jan Masaryk, the Czechoslovak Foreign Minister, arrived in Prague on the 30th July. He was met at the airfield by the British, American and Russian Ambassadors, and Mme. Beneš. He passed through London last week, after concluding his work in the United States, where he was leader of the Czechoslovak delegation at San Francisco.

The Prague press has reacted favourably to the change of Government in Britain, while at the same time expressing admiration for the great genius of Mr. Churchill. References to Munich were numerous, and the opposition of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden to the Chamberlain policy was praised. Dr. Clementis, the Under-Secretary of State, sent a congratulatory telegram to Mr. Bevin before he left for Potsdam. The outcome of the conference continues to be a matter of prime concern to the Czechoslovak Government, whose task of post-war reconstruction largely depends on the satisfactory solution of the problems of the minorities and territorial security. The German frontier has been temporarily closed, so that the movements of deportees into the Russian and American zones of occupation have ceased.

No clear picture of the situation in the Border Regions can be obtained; but the Czechoslovak authorities have been concerned about outbreaks of terrorism and the murder of officials appointed to administer these areas, as, for instance, the assassination of Dr. Rychlík, the emissary in charge of the transfer of Sudeten industry. The raising of a new Czechoslovak army is proceeding, and the moment when the assistance of Allied armies can be dispensed with is approaching, but local authorities are obviously experiencing great difficulty in obtaining satisfactory and disciplined personnel. This administrative and military complication is the background into which fits the Stefan Litauer report (News Chronicle, 30th July) on the existence of an irregular Polish unit in the forest country west of Plzeň. A Czech Government spokesman in London described Litauer as a very accurate reporter, but had no confirmation of the story so far. Stop-press news has just been received of further terrorist activity, involving heavy damage and loss of life in the industrial town of Ustí (Aussig) on the Elbe north of Prague.

At the Czechoslovak Institute in London Dr. Ečer, Czechoslovak representative on the United Nations War Crimes Commission, gave a lecture on the subject of war criminals. Dr. Ečer has been in charge of the interrogation of such war criminals as Karl Frank, and expressed his Government's keen desire to bring them to trial in Czechoslovakia as soon as possible.

The British Ambassador, Mr. Nichols, has visited Bratislava recently. Previous reports from Slovakia agree that this part of the republic has suffered the most acutely from the war; the aftermath of its recent political history has left many scars, and the new administration does not seem to be yet firmly established. Slovakia's relations with the Vatican is one of the subjects under discussion in Rome. The Czechoslovak Government does not wish to accord to Mgr. Ritter the full status of Papal Nuncio until preliminary questions can be regulated.

On the 20th President Beneš signed the decree concerning the resettlement of agricultural land formerly belonging to Germans, Hungarians and "other enemies of the country" by Czech, Slovak and other Slav peasants. This follows the decree of confiscation and foreshadows large-scale settlement of peasants from interior districts in the border areas.

A Prague Radio report on the 28th referred to the recent visit of Dr. Ripka to London, which was concerned with the development of foreign trade. Other Czechoslovak trade delegations are now in Göteborg and Moscow, while M. Alphand of the French Foreign Office is now in Prague to discuss economic matters with Government officials there.

POLAND.

It is expected that the first official conversations concerning the transfer of Polish Government assets in this country will shortly take place between the Interim Treasury Committee for Polish Questions (see Summary No. 301) and representatives of the Polish Government from Warsaw. It is likely that one of the first questions to be discussed will be the position of the Polish mercantile marine.

It was announced in a Polish Embassy broadcast from Moscow on the 28th July that Cardinal Hlond, who was reported in Summary No. 302 as having left Rome on his way to Poland, had arrived by air in Poznan, the seat of his diocese. Other notable persons who have returned to Poland include Dr. Henryk Sztrasburger, former Polish High Commissioner at Danzig and recently a member of the Sikorski and Mikolajczyk Governments; and Professor Estreicher, of Cracow University.

According to a Moscow broadcast of the 25th July the Soviet-Polish Joint Repatriation Commission, set up in accordance with an agreement of the 6th July, 1945, has now begun work under the chairmanship of one of its Polish members, Dr. Henryk Wolpe. According to a Warsaw broadcast of the 29th July, 815,000 Poles have already moved from the western territories of the U.S.S.R. into Poland west of the Curzon Line.

As has now been stated in the press, Polish representatives were invited from Warsaw to the Potsdam Conference last week in order to state their attitude in regard to the question of Poland's western frontier. It will be remembered that, as Mr. Churchill stated in the House of Commons on the 27th February, 1945, the three Powers agreed at the Crimea Conference that Poland should "receive the important industrial province of Upper Silesia and, in addition, such other territories to the east of the Oder as it may be decided at the peace settlement to detach from Germany after the views of a broadly based Polish Government have been ascertained."

Another German murder camp has been recently reported at Niemodlin (Falkenberg) on the border between Upper and Lower Silesia. It is stated that some 80,000 victims, mostly Russian prisoners of war, are buried there.

M. Stefan Litauer, who is now acting as correspondent of the News Chronicle, has reported a visit recently paid by him to a body of Polish irregular forces belonging to the N.S.Z., a body independent of the London Government's authority, which has made its way westwards from Southern Poland through Upper Silesia and across Bohemia to the American-occupied border zone west of Pilsen. They are reported to be well armed, to be living on the country, and to be hoping—somewhat optimistically—to be allowed to join up with the Polish forces in the west.

SOVIET UNION.

Soviet comment on the results of the general election in this country has been cautious and restrained. Surprise at the size of Labour's majority was frankly expressed by some commentators, especially in view of Mr. Churchill's own "undoubted popularity." M. Yermashev, broadcasting in English on the 28th July, thought that the results gave "a pretty fair picture of political sentiment in Britain," and pointed out that most of the Labour candidates were elected by large majorities. "A new chapter is opening in the life of Britain," said M. Mihailov on the 26th July; and unofficial comment has expressed even more gratification at the swing to the left in Great Britain, which has strengthened Soviet confidence in the desire of the electorate to co-operate with the U.S.S.R. in eradicating fascism from the world. All commentators insisted, however, that the change of government would bring about no fundamental change in British foreign policy, of which the main points would continue to be the continuance of the war against Japan, the further strengthening of Anglo-Soviet relations, and collaboration of the three Great Powers for the establishment of peace and security. The general view was that, as Izvestiya put it, "the British elector has advanced problems of internal policy to the forefront." A certain amount of nationalisation, the maintenance of controls, the prevention of unemployment and above all housing were listed as the principal problems in this field.

The thorny question of the repatriation of Soviet nationals from Central Europe has now been taken up in a memorandum submitted by the Russian delegation at Potsdam. The memorandum complained that in British and American zones in Austria and in the French zone in Germany émigré Russians were engaging in organised propaganda to hinder the return home of Soviet citizens. Special mention was made of the activities of Ukrainian nationalists, who were alleged to be organised in an Ukrainian Central Committee under that notorious veteran, Hetman Skoropadsky. This committee apparently had branches in all the main German towns, to which it issued certificates bearing the seal of "the President of Free Ukraine." It is of interest to note that the comparatively defunct Hetman organisation should have been mentioned and not the much more active Union of Ukrainian Nationalists headed by Colonel Melnik. It appears to be a fact that emigré Russians have to some extent been made use of as interpreters in the camps of Soviet nationals awaiting repatriation.

Preliminary data on the repatriation of Soviet citizens from Norway have been given in a report by Major-General Ratov, head of the Repatriation Commission (Tass, 29th July). By the 25th July 82,972 Soviet citizens were said to have been repatriated and 1,097 sick persons left in Norway. Further, there were some 5,000 Soviet citizens from Western Ukraine, Western Byelorussia and the Baltic Republics, whose repatriation was being delayed owing to the Allied High Command regarding their citizenship as "disputable." It was alleged in the report that these persons were detained in special camps where Soviet representatives were not allowed, and that propaganda was being conducted among them to induce them to go to Latin America or Britain. The report ended by expressing the gratitude felt by the repatriated persons to the Norwegians for their assistance and kindness throughout the war.

The problem of Soviet Baltic citizens was dealt with separately in an Izvestiya article (28th July) which commented with great asperity on the position of the Baltic refugees in Sweden. Izvestiya maintained that Sweden was making a complete abuse of the right of asylum. Though Soviet representatives had been allowed to visit the refugee camps, petty obstacles were constantly being put in their way. Protests made in the Swedish press about Russian pressure being put on these Baltic exiles were dismissed by Izvestiya as "an abominable Fascist racket of slave traders." Izvestiya went on to claim that these Soviet nationals were being deliberately detained by the Swedish authorities, were being converted into a kind of hostage and used as labour under compulsion of the worst possible kind. This problem could not be written off, as Morgontidningen suggested. It was time, according to Izvestiya, to solve it fully and completely—provided there was no deliberate intention of complicating Soviet-Swedish relations. This threatening note towards Sweden was echoed in a Pravda article sharply criticising alleged Swedish views of a Northern Bloc (see under "Scandinavia").

Into the uncomfortable atmosphere thus created comes the news that Mme. Kollontay, who had been Soviet Minister in Sweden since 1930 and Ambassador since 1943, had retired and been replaced by a former Counsellor at the Stockholm Embassy, M. Ilya Chernyshov. It was officially stated that Mme. Kollontay had retired owing to ill-health, and this is probably true, for she is 73 and has long been frail.

SCANDINAVIA.

Though the official policy of Denmark, and of the Foreign Minister, Mr. Christmas Möller, continues to be strongly opposed to any extension of the present Danish frontiers, a considerable propaganda has been started by the Danish minority party in Schleswig, and its organisation, the "Slesvigske Forening." The latter is reported to be preparing a petition to be presented to the Allied authorities and the King and Government of Denmark, urging an immediate Danish mandate over south Schleswig and even the ultimate restoration of the territory to Denmark. A curious feature of this agitation is that it is supported by the German "Südschleswigscher Verein," and that a number of Germans, including former Nazis, are attempting to become members of this association. The Danish-language paper in Flensborg—Flensborg Avis—is reported to have doubled its circulation in the last six months.

It was announced on the 26th July that the British Government has offered assistance to Denmark in the training and arming of the enlarged defence forces which the exigencies of the future will require.

The Swedish Coalition Government resigned, as expected, on the 31st July, and was immediately succeeded by a purely Social Democratic Cabinet. The Premiership remains in the hands of M. P. A. Hansson, and the charge of Foreign Affairs is entrusted, as anticipated, to M. Undén. It would be premature to discuss further the composition of the new Government this week.

The Soviet press has recently directed a strong attack upon the idea of a Scandinavian defence alliance, mainly founded upon some remarks imputed to

M. Günther, the Swedish Foreign Minister, in a speech delivered to the Swedish Navy League (Föreningen Sveriges Flotta) on the 4th May. The speech itself, however, seems to have been completely misunderstood. Though described in Pravda as "a proposal for the foundation of a Scandinavian military alliance," it is actually in the main concerned to criticise the proposals of the San Francisco Conference, and to urge that Sweden should maintain her former neutrality and abstain from association with any alliances, though M. Günther repudiated the suggestion that this was an expression of the "icy egoism of neutrality," and was willing that Sweden should play her part in a general League for the preservation of peace. The only reference to inter-Scandinavian relations came at the end of the speech, in a passage which suggested that the prospects for any form of northern association in foreign policy were at present unfavourable. Though M. Günther hoped that conditions in this respect might change, the idea of a military alliance was never even suggested. M. Günther prefaced his remarks with the statement that he was expressing personal views, which must in no way be regarded as official. The Pravda article makes the further mistake of asserting that Professor Ohlin had welcomed Dr. Funk's plans for a new economic order: in fact, Professor Ohlin subjected these plans to searching criticism in the columns of Stockholms-Tidningen.

The alliance of the Norwegian Communists with the Labour Party has now been agreed, with the object of strengthening the Socialist vote in the forthcoming elections.

Though Norway has escaped from many of the economic difficulties with which she at one time seemed threatened, the effect on employment of the sudden termination of the work hitherto carried on in the interests of German war production is undoubtedly serious, and the actual situation is only masked at present by the standstill order of the Government forbidding the discharge of workmen. The changeover to normal production is mainly impeded by the lack of fuel; the prospect of unemployment has long been foreseen by the Norwegian Government, and plans to deal with the problem were initiated during the stay of that Government in England.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The debate on King Leopold was resumed in the Chamber of Representatives on the 24th July, and was concluded on the 26th. The principal speakers were M. de Vleeschauwer (Catholic), Minister of Colonies in the London Government, M. Spaak (Socialist), the present foreign Minister, and M. Van Glabbeke (Liberal), the present Minister of the Interior. In a spirited defence of the King, M. de Vleeschauwer asserted that the Prime Minister's statement was "intended to strike at the Monarchy and the dynasty," whatever he might say to the contrary; and went on to suggest that M. Van Acker had deliberately prevented the King's return "immediately after his liberation." M. de Vleeschauwer also cast doubts upon the reliability of the documents used by the Government "to discredit the King," which he alleged included "Nazi statements." He then recalled the meeting at Berne in June 1940 between a representative of the King and a Government representative, at which the former remarked that the King's signature to the instrument of surrender in May constituted "not a political, but a military, act." That Belgium did not go the way of France between June and August 1940 was, M. de Vleeschauwer believed, entirely due to the King, whose behaviour he sought to justify by citing the example of King Albert's refusal to forsake the Army when it was threatened with encirclement near Antwerp in 1914. On the question of deportations, M. de Vleeschauwer said that the King had been warned by Hitler that measures would be taken against him if he attempted to interfere, and reminded the Chamber that despite the Prime Minister's charge of tardiness against the King in this matter, M. Van Acker had admitted that "the King's attitude saved many compatriots." As for the King's visit to Berchtesgaden, this had been made at Hitler's request. Towards the end of his speech, M. de Vleeschauwer read a letter from Canon Leclef, Cardinal Van Roey's secretary, which reaffirmed the King's determination to remain in Belgium and to be present at the moment of liberation; and another from the King himself, protesting to Hitler against his removal to Germany: he also read the King's widely-circulated message to the Belgian people. M. Spaak, who began his 4½-hours' speech by emphasising that he was a Monarchist both by "experience" and by "reason," pointed out that the present situation had arisen through the King's failure to take the advice of his constitutional advisers. M. Spaak dealt at length with the events of May 1940, and then revealed that on two occasions—in November 1942 and November 1943—the London Government had established contact with the King. On the first, the King was urged to make a resolute stand against deportations; on the second, his attention was drawn to the problems which would have to be solved on liberation. M. Spaak maintained that the present debate would have been superfluous had the King, "as early as May 1940," declared the country's intention of pursuing its policy of friendship towards the Allies. He also described the dramatic final interview at the Château de Wijnendaale, when the King rejected M. Pierlot's insistent appeals to leave the country, in general the King's attitude left them in no doubt that it was "impossible for the Government to wait one day longer without revealing the truth to Parliament." As soon, therefore, as it was clear that the King had decided against the formation of a Government, they issued what are known as the "Berne Documents." "As this case has been opened," declared M. Spaak, "I think abdication is imperative"; the controversy had made it impossible for King Leopold to be King of the Belgians, but the monarchy had to be preserved. M. Van Glabbeke devoted most of his speech to somewhat startling revelations concerning the family of the King's second wife, the Princess de Réthy, née Baels. There was no validity in her title, as it had yet to be countersigned by a Minister: there was none in her morganatic marriage—she was, in fact, legally Queen. Referring to the King's dismissal of her father from the Governorship of West Flanders in May 1940, M. Van Glabbeke stated that in April and May 1941, Mlle. Baels had applied to Romsée, then Secretary-General of the Ministry of the Interior, for her father's dossier, which had subsequently vanished. Baels himself had been in receipt of half-pay from the beginning of the Occupation until June 1945, during which period over 500,000 francs had been paid to him. The debate closed on the evening of the 26th July with the passing of a motion of confidence in the Government by 95 votes to 68, two Deputies abstaining. The Chamber then adjourned, sine die.

The 26th also witnessed the conclusion of the important trial—begun on the 23rd—of Robert Poulet, former editor-in-chief of Le Nouveau Journal (founded and owned by the notorious quisling Paul Colin) and director of its political service. Poulet—who has been likened to Charles Maurras—was charged with having (i) incited persons to take up arms against the State; (ii) actually or tentatively recruited men for service with the enemy; (iii) participated in the enemy's transformation of legal institutions; (iv) denounced compatriots to the enemy. Poulet was sentenced to imprisonment for life and to the loss of civic rights, and also ordered to pay 5,000,000 francs damages. His service in the 1914–18 war was taken into account.

The Labour Party's victory has been hailed with great enthusiasm by the Left-wing press in the Low Countries; but at the time of writing, Right-wing papers are conspicuous for their silence.

FRANCE.

The constitutional problem has been confused rather than clarified by the debate which began in the Consultative Assembly on the 27th July. General de Gaulle delivered a closely reasoned speech in defence of the Government's proposals. He said that there were only three ways in which to create a Constituent Assembly "from scratch," namely, to revive the machinery of the Constitution of 1875 and arrange for the Senate and Chamber meeting as a National Assembly to embark upon the reform of the constitution; to elect a single Assembly on which the country would be wholly dependent; or else "while proceeding at the beginning with the election of a single Assembly and without in any way influencing future institutions—which I think should include two Chambers—to ensure that this Assembly should be invested with a formal mandate to draft a constitution within a definite period and that meanwhile the administration should be carried on by agreement." He then proceeded to defend the proposed referendum, saying that the Government by themselves did not feel competent to decide between these various alternatives. "To ascertain which of the three the nation prefers we have only to consult it—and in doing so the Government are convinced that they are taking the most democratic—the only democratic course." Moreover, after so many changes of régime there was a danger that France might feel "something like distrust of her institutions." It was advisable, therefore, that the people should be directly associated with the new Constitution "not only by ratifying it, but also by participating in its formation." The General then went on to repeat his personal preference for a single Assembly with limited powers. If the institutions of the 1875 Constitution were revived "would it not be rather hazardous to expect that of their own initiative and without the immediate pressure of harsh events they would agree radically to reform themselves?" As for a single Assembly with unlimited powers, he was convinced that it would lay the country open to the most serious disorders.

Nevertheless, in spite of this clear expression of the General's wishes, of his final hint that he might feel compelled to resign if he were not supported on such a grave question, and of the loud applause with which his speech was greeted, the Assembly by large majorities adopted the three resolutions put before it by the State Reform Commission (see last Summary). In other words it rejected the Government's draft Bill and ordinance. It also rejected three counter-proposals, though one put forward by the Socialist, M. Vincent Auriol, and acknowledged by General de Gaulle as deserving most serious consideration, was defeated only by a narrow margin. This negative result of the Assembly's debate has met with adverse criticism from several papers. Combat points out that the referendum was rejected by "the strangest coalition imaginable"—one of Radicals and the Right, who both favour two Chambers, with the Communists, who are eager for a single sovereign Assembly. This coalition opposed the Socialist Party and various Resistance groups who defended the principle of the referendum while they were at the same time anxious to amend the Government's proposals. In the absence of any clear positive guidance from the Assembly the Government will have to decide whether they will persist with their proposals in spite of the Assembly's vote or whether they will modify them to meet M. Vincent Auriol's plan or other suggestions. It is unlikely that General de Gaulle will give up the referendum or carry out his threat to resign.

The Pétain trial has continued with the hearing of the evidence of numerous further witnesses for the prosecution. The most notable have been MM. Lebrun, Jeanneney, Louis Marin, Léon Blum, Charles-Roux, Secrétary-General at the Quai d'Orsay until October 1940, General Doyen, Head of the French Delegation to the Armistice Commission at Wiesbaden from September 1940 to April 1941, M. Caous, President of the Supreme Court at Riom, and M. Herriot. The impression given by the speeches of many of these witnesses has been that they are in the nature of apologies for the conduct of the speakers themselves rather than of precise and detailed statement about the conduct of the accused. Moreover, the handling of the case so far suggests that the prosecution have no clear notion of what they are attempting to establish against Pétain, and whether he is to be condemned on his record after the collapse of 1940, on his failure to take adequate measures to prevent defeat, or on his relations before the war with the enemies of his country. In consequence, the proceedings have wandered inconclusively from the policy of Montoire to the history of the Cagoule, and from the history of the Cagoule to the decisions of the French Parliament and of the Conseil Supérieur de la Guerre ten years ago. A disquieting feature of the trial has been the partiality of the Presiding Judge, whose vindictive statements against Pétain on the second day of the trial suggested that his mind was already made up. The Marshal himself has persisted in his refusal to answer questions. He appears to be intermittently aware of what is going on around him, but to be unable to concentrate on the proceedings for any length of time.

The result of the British elections caused great surprise and has given rise to widespread press comment and speculation. While papers of all shades, except the Communist Humanité, paid tribute to Mr. Churchill, the Left and Resistance journals have generally welcomed the advent of a Labour Government and hope that it will lead to an improvement in Anglo-French relations.

SWITZERLAND.

The Soviet delegation to investigate the conditions under which Russian military and civilian internees were living in Switzerland and to examine the question of their repatriation arrived in Switzerland during the week. The delegation, which consists of eighteen officers and two non-commissioned officers, is under the leadership of Major-General Vikhorov. At a press reception, the head of the Swiss delegation stated that, if the necessary transport was available and the Allies were willing to lend their assistance, the Russians, who number some 10,000, could be repatriated at the rate of 1,000 a day. As for the conditions of internment, Switzerland had nothing to hide, and was anxious that all possible light should be shed on the whole affair. It was emphasised that the Russian mission was of a purely military character, and had nothing to do with political or economic questions. A radio spokesman declared that speculation had arisen in some quarters whether the visit might not pave the way for negotiations for the resumption of normal diplomatic relations between the two countries.

On the 20th July, the Federal Department of Justice and Police refused the request of Herr Köcher, former German Minister to Switzerland, for an extension of his time limit in Switzerland. The Minister then asked to be interned, but this was also refused by the Federal Council, and the 31st July has been fixed as the date by which Herr Köcher must leave the country.

On the 26th July, a trade agreement was signed between Switzerland on the one hand and Belgium and Luxemburg on the other. In view of the situation created by the war in regard to the industrial production of Belgium and Luxemburg, provision is made for deliveries in advance from Switzerland, together with a credit of 50 million frs.

Telegraphic communication has been re-established between Switzerland and Bulgaria, Poland, and Yugoslavia. A somewhat restricted telephone service has been resumed with France and Northern Italy. It is also reported that telephonic communication with Britain will be resumed during the first week in August, but that it is at first likely to be available only for diplomatic and press conversations.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Sir Victor Mallet arrived in Madrid last week and presented his letters of credence on the 28th July. He saw General Franco immediately afterwards for three-quarters of an hour. The Caudillo listened as blandly as ever to the tale of mistrust of the present Spanish régime—and its consequent isolation—which His Majesty's Ambassador had to tell. He protested that the degree of Spain's allegiance to the Axis Powers had been grossly exaggerated, and he maintained that it had never been his intention, even in 1940, that Spain should become an ally of our enemies. That may be true enough, since the country could scarcely have stood the strain of further war-making. But, after all, there is a difference only of degree between the status of declared ally and that of non-belligerent associate.

Although Franco made no direct allusion to the British general election he was at pains to cry up his Government's work in the fields of social reform and education, which he appeared to think was more in line with the purposes of the Labour Party than with the policy of the Conservatives. This "social" note of the régime in Spain does indeed justify Franco's reiterated claim that it is not to be identified with black reaction; but, whatever he says, or does, he will get no credit from progressive forces in the other countries, any more than the Fascists or Nazis did. Meanwhile he is evidently determined to continue along the road towards respectability. The ministerial changes, though they do not amount to very much, were clearly designed as one more step in a gradual process of evolution. Franco would like the outside world, at any rate, to believe that the wings of the Falange are being clipped. One further step, which is of some importance, was the decree of the 29th July whereby all the services under the arch-Falangist Vice-Secretariat for Popular Education are transferred to the Ministry of National Education. (Señor Arrese, by the way, has ceased to be Secretary-General of the Party, though he becomes a member of the Junta Política of Falange.)

There will undoubtedly be an under-current of nervousness in Spain as a result of the Labour landslide in Great Britain. But the press and radio have adopted a surprisingly moderate tone. Even Arriba proclaims that the advent of a Labour Government will not signify any important change in British foreign policy. And Spanish broadcasters, while picking up the remark by Professor Laski at the Central Hall meeting that the Government would give no support to "decaying monarchs or obsolete social systems," are engaged in reassuring their listeners that they need not expect the new men to make any attack on the Crown or the Church—or indeed to make a dead set against private property. What has happened in Great Britain, they say, does not signify the victory of communism. This is shrewd tactics. Since, however, most Spaniards are incapable of distinguishing evolutionary British socialism from the Marxism of the continental parties, they will be easy victims of any subsequent propaganda painting the Bolshevik devil on the wall. Because of their fears the effect of the change of Government in England may well be to strengthen Franco's position internally. Mr. Churchill's eclipse will certainly come as a great shock to the Monarchists.

On the morning of the 31st July Pierre Laval, accompanied by his wife, left Barcelona airport in the same aircraft in which he arrived there on the 2nd May (see Summary No. 292), and a few hours later landed at Hörsching, near Linz, in the United States zone of Austria. The German crew who originally flew Laval from Austria also piloted him back. Shortly after his arrival he was handed over to the French authorities who occupy the neighbouring zone of the Tirol. On the same day the Spanish press, which had not hitherto mentioned Laval's three months' villeggiatura in Montjuich Prison, published an official statement explaining the reason for his expulsion from Spanish territory. The communiqué is a dignified and skilful piece of drafting. No mention is made of the Spanish refusal to hand Laval over the frontier direct to the French Government, nor of the British disinclination to receive him in "transience" at Gibraltar. Laval's wish to surrender to the "United Nations" is given as the reason for his being allowed to remain, incomunicado, on Spanish soil. The statement continues: "More than enough time has elapsed since then (the date of his arrival) for the Governments of the United Nations to determine their attitude. When the aforesaid Governments expressed a lack of interest in such a delicate problem . . . . the Spanish Government did not consider it convenient to prolong his stay." Thus ends an episode not at all discreditable to the Spanish Government.

His Majesty's Ambassador to Lisbon, Sir Owen St. Clair O'Malley, has also taken up his new post. He may find Dr. Salazar and Catholic anti-Socialist elements in Portugal rather nervous. But in Portugal, too, the first reactions of the press have been remarkably calm—and even sympathetic to the Labour Party. There is the usual lull in political activity at this time of the year, and interest has centred on the visit of the Minister of the Colonies, Dr. Marcel Caetano, to Mozambique to attend the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Lourenço Marques Railway. Field-Marshal Smuts, on his return from San Francisco, also made the journey to Lourenço Marques and had a very cordial reception. Dr. Caetano continued his journey to the Transvaal, and the two had further meetings at Pretoria.

ITALY.

Lively satisfaction has been expressed in many quarters throughout Italy at the Labour Party's success in the British general election. Signor Parri, in an interview with a Reuter correspondent, also expressed his satisfaction and Signor Nenni, the Socialist Party leader, has sent a telegram of congratulation to Mr. Attlee and to the Labour Party in London.

In a broadcast speech in Milan on the 29th July Signor Parri reminded the Italian people that Italy's status would be decided within the next few weeks and that although the nation could go on hoping for mild peace terms it must not delude itself into believing that the Fascist bill had been finally paid and that, for this reason, mild peace terms were now its due. Signor Parri therefore made another appeal for discipline in every sphere and in any situation that might arise. The formation of the Consultative Assembly was being pushed on as quickly as possible since it was a preliminary step to the Constituent Assembly, but, said Signor Parri emphatically, the elections would be free—there would be no machine-gun election. Referring to the massacre at Schio, where forty-seven prisoners awaiting trial were murdered by a gang of partisans who broke into the prison and to other similar events in North Italy, Signor Parri expressed the deep humiliation he felt when the Allied Military Governor of the region said that never before had Italy sunk so low in his estimation. Signor Parri asked the people whether they realised the untold damage such incidents did to the nation. Turning to Italy's financial situation, Signor Parri said that in order to achieve a basic reorganisation, the Government must be able to count on the maximum amount of milliards required for the purpose without recourse to inflation and not in the distant future but within the next few months. These milliards the Government hoped to get through the loan, which had been extended to North Italy and it counted on North Italy to produce them. It was a good business proposition, said Signor Parri, and, although there had been some adverse propaganda, he guaranteed that the loan was a safe investment and would pay the dividends. Signor Parri then turned to the question of the wheat pools. In this case he admitted that it was not a good business proposition but for unalterable reasons the Government could not now change the fixed price. The harvest was not good but might, he thought, turn out better than at first expected. In any case, large quantities of wheat would have to be imported but Italy could not ask the Allies for this unless she could show that she had done her duty. Since prices could not be changed the Government proposed to issue vouchers to those farmers who brought their wheat to the pools. These vouchers would give them the right to purchase textiles at a very cheap price compared to that ruling in the market.

The Council of Ministers has approved the extension of the new 5 per cent. loan to the provinces of North Italy with one modification, the loan will be issued at 99 instead of at 97·50. Subscriptions from Central and South Italy amounted to 31·015 milliard lire and a conservative estimate puts the probable subscriptions from the North at 50 milliard.

The figures of the budget estimates for the year 1945–46 covering the 36 provinces of Central and Southern Italy have been published. Revenue is estimated 29,908·9 million lire, expenditure at 113,593·5 million lire, i.e., a deficit of 83,684·6 million lire. Expenditure is divided into two budgets, one normal of 57,357·3 million, one extraordinary of 56,236·2 million. The extraordinary budget covers expenditure which arises immediately from the present emergency.

THE VATICAN.

Osservatore Romano of the 25th July again noticed Moscow's attacks: "unless they furnish proofs, let decent people give no credence to such slander." Moscow itself broadcast an article, attractively entitled "the Trail of the Hyena." The Trail, it said, differed in different countries, it "could be traced in the Vatican in the provocative sermon on the Christian doctrine of loving one's enemy."

The Vatican has expressed to His Majesty's Minister its alarm at the fate of Italians and Slavs in concentration camps in Venezia Giulia, where many have died; and has asked the Allies to investigate and to send relief. There may be some connexion between this action and the arrival at the Vatican of the Holy See's special envoy to Yugoslavia. The only Yugoslav representative to the Holy See left recently. In Albania, another country where Tito has great influence, the Apostolic Delegate was expelled late in June.

(For recent discussions between the Vatican and the Czechoslovak Government, see under "Czechoslovakia.")

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Lieut.-General V. Petrovitch has been officially appointed Deputy Chairman of the Allied Control Commission in place of General Starhusky.

The inter-party disputes outlined in last week's Summary continued, though with somewhat abated vehemence. The departure of the three ministers was acclaimed by the Communist Révai as a victory over reaction which should be followed up by increased severity in the People's Courts and thoroughness in the purge of the Civil Service, economic life and education, saying: "He who is anti-Communist is reactionary." I. Ries, the new Minister of Justice, proclaimed it to be his most important duty to fight implacably against any form of reaction. He intends to introduce reforms of the procedure of the People's Courts and the Purge machinery. The country police is to be reorganised, to abolish the abuses which have been so violently criticised recently. The force is to be raised to 40,000 men, who will be equipped with arms and uniforms.

The first list has been published of the 61 war criminals whose extradition for trial in Hungary has been requested, and it is headed by the names of Szálasi and members of his Government.

The draft of the Electoral Law is now said to be complete; by its provisions many persons are deprived of the right to vote, including those who committed offences against the people, who held any sort of office in a Right Radical Party or who re-Germanised their names. The actual date of the elections is still the subject of party friction. The Smallholders are now anxious for an early election, as they believe that postponement would allow the Communists to strengthen their hold on the machine. They believe that elections now would give their party over half the votes in the country, while the Social Democrats would obtain about 20 per cent. and the Communists and National Peasants together another 15·20 per cent. The President of the National Assembly announced that the Provisional Assembly would be convoked after the harvest was in.

New measures of industrial control include the vesting of the Ministry of Industry with authority to requisition any privately owned plant or raw materials needed for reparations or national reconstruction which is not being fully used. The requisition may be temporary, against payment of rent, or permanent, against compensation. A second decree provides that all textile factories must devote a minimum of 60 per cent. of their production to utility goods. Rákosi, the leader of the Communist Party, declared that the fight for the nationalisation of mines had begun. The national coal consumption was rising and was now 1,100–1,200 wagons a day, though only 600 wagons daily could be moved owing to transport shortages; the peace-time production figure was approximately 3,000 wagons daily.

According to figures supplied to the British Military Mission by the Ministry of Agriculture, the wheat harvest is expected to yield 907,000 tons (35 per cent. of normal harvest) and the rye harvest 408,000 tons, or 53 per cent. of normal harvest. Oats and barley may yield 906,000 tons, which is 95 per cent. of the peacetime level. These figures must be considered in relation to the estimated total requirements of 2,144,000 tons of bread grain in Hungary for the year 1945–46, of which 145,000 tons are set aside for the army of occupation, 66,000 tons for reparations payments and 400,000 tons for seed. The prospects for the fruit harvest are said to be excellent and the potato crop promises to be unusually heavy. The Ministry of Agriculture has promised a loan of 4 milliard pengö to small farmers.

The cost of living rose again, being, on the 20th July, 1,351·15 pengö, as against an index figure of 214·13 pengö.

Roumania.

The agreement for the Russian-Roumanian Oil Combine has now been signed, and every effort is being made to complete the agreement on the proposed Shipping Combine, the proposed details of which are available. The constituent members of the Oil Combine are, on the Russian side, the Oil Corporations Querneft and Sojusneftexport, and on the Roumanian side Creditul Minier and Redevenţa, which are the most Roumanian of the concerns operating in the country, together with all other small Roumanian companies. The contributions in shares and material are to be on the Russian side, material confiscated from Roumania under the Russian interpretation of the armistice agreement, valued at 740 million lei, and shares previously owned by Germans in a number of companies to the value of 1 milliard, 760 million lei. On the Roumanian side the contribution consists of assets of the two companies mentioned to the value of 1 milliard, 100 million lei, together with 50 per cent. of State royalties over a period sufficient to complete the full Roumanian contribution of 2½ milliard lei. Shares owned by Germans in Roumanian companies are to be reckoned as part compensation for war damage, and are to be handed over to the Ukrainian Petroleum Company for incorporation in its holdings. The Combine may acquire concessions from private landowners in the same way as other oil companies, it may lay down pipe-lines wherever required, and is to be given most favourable terms for dealing in foreign exchange. By a secret protocol the figure of 50 per cent. of State royalties mentioned above is increased to 75 per cent. These terms are described as amounting to the extinction of all foreign interest, other than Russian, in Roumanian oil.

A Russian-Roumanian Shipping and Harbour Company has been formed with a capital of 3 milliards of lei. The Roumanian contribution consists of the assets of State-owned companies for Danube and Ocean shipping together with the assets of harbour companies and a privately-owned river transport company. The Russian contribution consists of river- and sea-going vessels, and harbour equipment. Each partner will also contribute 250 million lei to form a reserve fund. Roumania is to rent to the Combine for thirty years, docks, harbour facilities and buildings at Constanţa, Galaţi, Braila, and Giurgiu, up to 50 per cent. of all available facilities, and the Combine will have preference for the renting of the remainder. The Soviet Government grant most favoured treatment for the use of Russian ports. By a secret protocol the general manager, who will be a Russian, has the right to dispose of the property of the Combine as he thinks fit.

At present rates a milliard lei amounts to about £84,000 sterling.

In what looks like a fit of unwary optimism, the Roumanian Government permitted the holding of municipal elections in some districts of Moldavia. The combined Liberal and National Peasant vote averaged nearly 80 per cent., and the Communist vote 8 per cent. The holding of further elections was promptly prohibited.

A Russian-Roumanian Air Transport Company is in process of formation.

Yugoslavia.

The propaganda campaign against Greece and Allied Military Government in Venezia Giulia and Carinthia continued unabated. On the 19th July the British Ambassador, acting on instructions, took Tito to task for this threefold campaign and pointed out that complaints against Greece should be addressed to the Greek Government, but that, pending exchange of Ministers between Greece and Yugoslavia, His Majesty's Government would willingly act as intermediaries. On the 21st the British Ambassador received a Yugoslav Note, dated the 18th, protesting in vague terms against persecution in Greek Macedonia; and on the 25th another Note, similar to one presented to the United States Ambassador, alleged that on eight occasions Greek troops had fired across the frontier. The Minister for Foreign Affairs asked that the contents of the latter Note should be communicated to the Greek Government.

On the 27th the British and United States Ambassadors received a letter from Tito and Shubashitch, addressed to Mr. Churchill and Mr. Truman, protesting against the suppression of Yugoslav-sponsored civil authorities in Venezia Giulia. The letter insisted that Venezia Giulia was not occupied territory, but "liberated territory" (a term and conception unknown to International Law), and proposed that elections should be held in the Allied-occupied zone. (Elections would impose an intolerable burden on A.M.G. and could not be held for several months. Meanwhile, the Yugoslavs can continue to represent their supporters as "the people".) The letter did not suggest that elections should similarly be held in the Yugoslav-occupied zone.

The Yugoslav press of the 27th hailed the electoral victory of the British Labour party with delight.

The trial of 25 members of Mihailovitch's Central National Committee by the Supreme Military Court has begun. Tanyug reported that when the accused entered the court-room there were shouts of "Traitors," "Hang them," "Death to the butchers," "Down with the occupiers' hirelings."

An interview with Matchek, who is in France, appeared in the New York Times of the 23rd. Matchek described Tito's Government as aiming at Communist dictatorship, and as lowering an iron curtain over Yugoslavia, obviously because their deeds were evil. He intended to return to Yugoslavia some day, with or without Tito's permission. He could not understand why his Croat colleagues, Shubashitch and Shutej, had joined Tito's Government and supposed that they must have received guarantees of democracy.

The Cabinet met on the 25th after many weeks. Shubashitch and some of the non-Communist Ministers succeeded in gaining agreement in principle that a committee of Ministers should sit daily to revise the draft laws, which are to be submitted to A.V.N.O.J. after the 7th August, and report to the Cabinet. The Committee includes the former members of London Cabinets, Grol, Shutej and Kosanovitch.

In a press conference Kardelj, the Vice-Premier, explained that A.V.N.O.J. could not take in more than a very few of the members of the last Yugoslav parliament, most of whom, he said, had "collaborated with the enemy." Instead A.V.N.O.J. would admit deputies of various democratic groups. He did not explain how these deputies would be selected. Asked about the possibility of a free press, Kardelj replied that a draft law on the press was in preparation.

Recently elections for National Liberation Committees were held in Vojvodina. The electoral law provided ample means for disfranchising persons on the ground of "collaboration," and confined the proposal of lists of candidates to organisations which had participated in the partisan movement. As in Macedonia the number of those who voted was published, but not the results. At Subotica the only opposition candidate was struck off the list, on the ground that his nominator was not qualified to act, and that his own morals were bad.

Greece.

Though both the Regent and the President of the Council are well aware of the motives behind M. Sophianopoulos' resignation and the recent démarches by Republican leaders on the security situation, Admiral Voulgaris has been led by his anxiety as to their effect on Greece's already strained foreign relations to inform the Regent that if it were thought desirable in Greece's interests to set up a political Government he would be ready to resign. His offer was not accepted. Pressure by political parties for the formation of an all-party Government, however, continues unabated. The Communist party have repeatedly approached the Republican leaders, MM. Sophoulis, Kaphandaris, Plastiras, Tsouderos and Mylonas, with offers to support without asking to participate in such a Government. Republican enquiries whether the Popular (Royalist) party would participate in a political Government have however met with flat refusals from all Popularist politicians. Meanwhile, M. Zachariadis, the Communist leader, has made an open attack on the Regent, accusing him of chauvinism in foreign affairs, of supporting war criminals and monarchist reaction at home, and representing him as the major obstacle to the restoration of democracy in Greece. It is natural to connect this new Communist move with a remark made by M. Molotov, during his conversations with M. Sophianopoulos in the United States, deploring the Regent's "Anglomania." Wishful thinking in many quarters that the result of the British elections, in which they fondly believe the Greek question was a major issue, heralds a change in British policy in Greece has no doubt contributed to the renewal of political unrest.

The law dealing with the punishment of collaborators laid down that charges must be filed within six months of the publication of the law. This time limit expired on the 21st July. The Government are aware that the leniency shown to collaborators is a point on which they are most vulnerable to attack; their vindication was attempted by the United States Secretary of State for Information in a long explanatory speech on the 24th July, which was subsequently broadcast in full. He admitted the slowness of Greece's "moral purge," which was to be attributed mainly to confusion caused by the December rebellion, but after recounting at length the various measures taken and sentences passed, concluded that "the hesitant, slow and noiseless application of sanctions against collaborators reflects the degree of moral culture of the Greek people."

On the 28th July Athens radio broadcast a summary of a Foreign Affairs Committee statement on Northern Epirus. Its tenor is identical with that of the Memorandum (see Summary No. 301) presented to the Governments of Great Britain, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and France, which also emanated from this committee. After the usual historical résumé, the statement goes on to describe the systematic persecution of the Greek element by the present Albanian régime "with the aim of changing the ethnological character of Northern Epirus," and to recommend, as the only solution, that the three Great Powers should order the occupation of this area by Greek and other Allied forces until the final settlement of Albania's frontiers at the Peace Conference. There is still widespread public anxiety in Greece and in Greek communities abroad over the fate of the Albanian Greeks, and the amount of time recently devoted by the Albanian radio to describing the perfect contentment of their minorities is sufficient proof that this anxiety is well-founded.

Bulgaria.

The Fatherland Front has now issued its official list of candidates for election to the National Assembly on the 26th August. It is nominally a joint list, but admittedly an exclusive one. It looks bad enough even on paper. There are 276 seats to be filled, and for these 95 Communists, 95 Agrarians, 31 Social Democrats, 46 Zvenars and 9 so-called Independents are proposed: this despite the fact that the Agrarians have at the smallest estimate five times the popular support of the Communists. Moreover all the Agrarians being nominated are Obbov's men and all the Social Democrats are Neykov's men, and every one has been hand-picked in consultation with the Communists. The Zveno group, always somewhat totalitarian in character, has been steadily losing influence, but clings to office and is by now entirely subservient to the Communists. Finally, apart from the present Finance Minister, Stoyanov, who is a Professor of Political Economy and Banking, all the nine chosen "Independents" are near-Communists or (like the Ministers of Propaganda and of Education) ex-Zvenars of the Left. The elections themselves will merely be a plebiscite for or against the Patriotic Front; no organised opposition is to be tolerated, and the result is a foregone conclusion.

As no genuine Agrarian or Social Democrat leader has been included in the list—not even the three present Cabinet Ministers, Petkov, Pavlov and Cheshmedzhiev—it has been necessary for those of them still at liberty to apply to stand as unofficial Independents. Petkov and his associates are evidently bent on forcing the issue and have now addressed a letter to the Bulgarian Prime Minister, in which they remind him of the necessity for completely free elections under the Yalta Declaration and urge him to arrange for them to be held under inter-Allied control. As preliminary conditions they ask for a purge of the Militia and the restoration of free speech and a free press, and they recommend a postponement of the elections until after the harvest.

A question which our A.C.C. representative is likely to bring forward soon is the unsatisfactory position regarding the admission to Bulgaria of British trade representatives. Difficulties over their entry have continually arisen and there is no sign of improvement. Meanwhile, under the Bulgarian-Soviet Trade Agreement Bulgaria has exported to Russia so far 10 million kilog. of tobacco, iron and zinc ore, hides and beans, receiving in exchange 50 million kilog. of petroleum products and large quantities of mineral oils, iron, tinplate and chemicals. (It may be added that, according to Radio Sofia, the Germans removed from Bulgaria between 1941 and 1944 nearly 55,000 tons of coal, 11 million kilog. of silk, 3 million kilog. of skins, over 455 million kilog. of meat, 128 million kilog. of tobacco, 275 million kilog. of fruit, over 375 million kilog. of cereals, 918,000 kilog. of fats, 4½ million sheep, 132,000 pigs, 165,000 head of poultry, and 130 million eggs. These Bulgarian figures must no doubt be taken with a good deal of reserve.)

Turkey.

Mr. Churchill's personal prestige stands so high in Turkey, and the position of his Government was regarded as so secure, that the result of the election was received with astonishment and consternation. The more so because the Conservative Party was regarded as being particularly identified with a policy of friendship towards Turkey. Commentators consoled themselves, however, with the statement that Britain's foreign policy—by which they meant her policy in the Eastern Mediterranean—would remain unchanged. The renown of Mr. Churchill, they declared, was undimmed by his defeat.

Moscow Radio continued to quote, without comment, passages from the Turkish press affirming the imperialistic character of Soviet policy, and emphasising Turkey's determination to resist any attempt to weaken or destroy her sovereignty and independence.

It has been reported from Angora that, owing to the lack of rain, the 1945 harvest would be about 40 per cent. below that of last year. Steps are being taken to preserve the existing stocks of grain, which are considerable.

In laying the foundation stone of the new harbour works at Eregli—one of the two ports used for the shipment of Zonguldak coal—the Minister of Public Works stressed the importance for Turkey of the modernisation of her harbours. He declared that, in addition to the works at Eregli, plans were already advanced for similar undertakings at Trebizond and Samsun.

Turkey is about to begin building her first aero-engine plant. The plant is designed to produce 200 engines in 1947 and ultimately to produce 600. Its cost is estimated at 1 million liras.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Nahas Pasha, as leader of the Wafd, has sent to His Majesty's Ambassador a six-page letter in Arabic, expressed in moderate language, but emphasising the importance of a final settlement of questions still outstanding between Egypt and Great Britain. Nahas believes that these questions should be settled before the general "Peace Conference," since Egypt would not wish to face such a conference unless she was first in complete accord with Great Britain. In this connexion, Nahas recalls the declaration made by Mr. Eden in 1942 that we would undertake to secure Egyptian participation in any peace conference that affected her interests. The two most important claims that Egypt wished to be settled in her favour were the military evacuation of Egypt and the question of the Sudan.

Though he does not explicitly refer to the necessity for negotiating with the Wafd as representing the Egyptian people, Nahas no doubt hopes that no revision of the treaty, in the drawing up of which he was a principal party, will take place, without at least the Wafd having an important share in the deliberations. Nahas at first intimated that he intended sending the letter to the press. Such action would be, to say the least, discourteous; but so far the contents have not been made public, though the Wafdist press has announced that a statement on Egypt's national aspirations will shortly be made.

The trial of Mahmoud Issawi was concluded in Cairo on the 24th July, when the Court decided to send the case to the Grand Mufti, which is known to be tantamount to a sentence of death. The death sentence was duly passed on the 28th July. The trial failed to establish the existence of any accomplices.

Last week, Drew Pearson, the notorious American columnist, published a syndicated article in which he referred in lurid and distorted terms to the Palace incident in Cairo of February 1942. "Few people outside Egypt," he writes, "had known that the British battered down the gates of the Royal Palace and forced the King to appoint a British-picked Prime Minister." After stating that Sir Miles Lampson had called on King Farouk with "advice" that Nahas Pasha be made Premier, and that the Egyptian Cabinet had sent a protest against political interference, the article goes on to say that "Sir Miles asked for an immediate audience; a brigade of British troops carrying machine guns appeared outside the Royal Palace. British tanks battered down the gates. Sir Miles then repeated his demand that Nahas be made Premier of Egypt at once. Nahas was appointed. Shortly after, Sir Miles was made Lord Killearn." (For what actually occurred on the occasion, and for the story leading up to it, the reader is referred to Summary No. 123 of the 11th February, 1942.)

According to the Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs, three commissions are to be appointed, French, Syrian and Lebanese, to settle the transfer to the Levant Governments of those "common interests" not yet handed over by the French. So far as is known discussions will be confined to the following: the broadcasting station known as Radio Levant; details concerning the transfer of control (already settled in principle) of the D.H.P. ("Damas–Hama et Prolongements") railways in the Lebanon and the Port of Beirut; and the civil telephone system. This last is French military property, and the States now wish to purchase it for their own use.

It appears that Count Ostrorog recently made an official statement, under instructions from his Government, that the French would withdraw their troops from the Levant States as soon as British troops were withdrawn by us.

The result of the general election in Great Britain has naturally created surprise in Iraq, where people cannot understand the reason for the Conservative defeat, involving as it does the fall of Mr. Churchill. It has, however, pleased the Left-wing Nationalists, who see in it a blow at what they call "Western imperialism." One Iraqi newspaper describes the election as "a bloodless revolution of the British people against capitalism," the effects of which will be felt in due course all over the world. Comment in official and political circles has so far been restrained, but there is deep anxiety lest the new Labour Government should adopt a pro-Zionist attitude over Palestine.

Whether Iraqi fears on this last point are well founded or not remains to be seen, but the Labour victory has been hailed by the American Zionist Emergency Council, representing all the principal Zionist organisations in the United States, as foreshadowing positive action on the Palestine question. Last week the Council declared: "The election gives hope that the intolerable régime in Palestine of the White Paper will now end, and that the sorely-tried Jewish people may at last look forward to effective action on behalf of the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish commonwealth." On the other hand, the Baltimore Sun wonders whether things may not seem less clear-cut from the Treasury Bench than they did from the other side of the Chamber, and cites the problem of Palestine as a case in point.

Meanwhile the Jews in Palestine seem to be more interested for the moment in the increase of immigration than in the immediate creation of a Jewish State; while Arab politicians in that country are so unable to compose their differences that the various parties are as far from coming together as ever.

Before Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden left Potsdam it was agreed at the conference that British and Russian forces should be withdrawn from Tehran at once, and that the further steps to be taken in connexion with the withdrawal of Allied forces from the remainder of Persian territory should be discussed at the first meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, to be held in September next. Up to the 30th July, however, the Russian Ambassador at Tehran had received no instructions on the matter from his Government; and, as we cannot allow the matter to drift indefinitely, by the 2nd August at latest, whether word has been received by then from Moscow or not, His Majesty's Ambassador will inform the Persian Government of the decision reached at Potsdam. The article by the diplomatic correspondent of The Times published on the 23rd July, advocating the evacuation of Allied forces from Persia, has been eagerly taken up by nearly the whole Persian Press, even the Tudeh newspapers no longer daring to oppose evacuation.

An important meeting of the party led by Seyyid Zia, which was to have taken place at Meshed on the 22nd July, could not be held owing to interference by the Soviet authorities. Early that morning Russian soldiers, accompanied by Persian police, arrested a number of the committee of the party, including Seyyid Zia's brother. Their houses were searched and documents relating to the party were confiscated. Meanwhile the Tudeh party continues under Russian protection to take measures adverse to the Persian Government.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 30th July it was announced in Chungking that Dr. T. V. Soong had been relieved of his post as Minister for Foreign Affairs, which he had been holding concurrently with the office of President of the Executive Yuan, that he had been replaced at the Foreign Ministry by Dr. Wang Shih-chieh (previously Minister of Information), and that he had been appointed to succeed Dr. H. H. Kung as Vice-Chairman of the Board controlling the four Government Banks of which Chiang Kai-shek himself is Chairman. It was also stated that Sheng Shih-tsai had been replaced as Minister of Agriculture by Ku Cheng-kang.

A dispatch from the Washington correspondent of The Times stated that the removal of Soong had caused great surprise there, as there had been no hint in reports from Chungking that any such changes were impending. On the other hand an Associated Press report declared that the change of Foreign Minister had caused no surprise in Chungking, as it had been long expected. The changes in the Chungking Government actually come at the end of a week of very sultry atmosphere in China. Following the return of Soong from Moscow without having reached any agreement with the Soviet Union, Yenan radio on the 24th July, as mentioned in last week's Summary, declared that Chungking forces had attacked Communist positions to the north of Sian, and that the Communist Commander-in-Chief, Chu Teh, had cabled to Chiang Kai-shek demanding a cessation of hostilities. Subsequently Yenan radio declared that fighting had broken out also in Suiyuan and in Chekiang, and made accusations that the Kuomintang had long planned the operations now begun. Yenan asserted that early in April "after General Hurley's announcement in Washington" (i.e., his statement at a press conference that the United States recognised only the Chinese Government in Chungking and could not supply arms separately to the Communists as an armed political party) Chungking officers in the Paotou area (Suiyuan) talked to their troops of recovering lost territory from the Communists and setting up an anti-Communist zone in Suiyuan and Chahar to prevent the Eighth Route (Communist) Army from reaching Manchuria. Yenan also gave out a "rumour" that several American military officers disguised as journalists had arrived south of Paotou to help train Kuomintang troops and direct operations.

Chungking did not deny that fighting had taken place against the Communists, but claimed that the Chungking forces in Shensi were only engaged in recapturing a strategically important position (Chunhua) which had been seized by the Communists, while in Chekiang the Communists had no right to have armed forces at all, as the province was outside the zone assigned to them for military operations in 1940. At a press conference on the 26th July, the Government spokesman said that the Communists made a habit of attacking and occupying districts lightly held by Government troops, and that, if the latter then attempted to dislodge them, the Communists accused them of aggression. Government reticence in giving publicity to these incidents had merely encouraged such "poaching"; nevertheless, the Government had not changed its policy of seeking a settlement by political and not military means.

As regards the events at Chunhua, a Yenan broadcast on the 27th July referred to a mutiny of Chungking troops there and claimed that the Yenan authorities had maintained strict neutrality, but had sent a detachment to "maintain order" in accordance with the request of "the people"; afterwards these had been withdrawn and some of the mutineers had fled into the Communist zone. A telegram sent to General Hu Tsung-nan, the commander of the Chungking forces in Shensi, accused him as follows: "You mismanaged your armies and, when disorders broke out, wanted to lay the blame on others. Regarding friend as foe, you secretly dispatched a large army and are fighting an undeclared war . . . . It is said that you have long intended to attack the Border Region, but could not find a pretext. The Chunhua mutiny was your machination for supplying the pretext."

It remains to be seen whether the clashes which have taken place can be localised or whether they will develop into general civil war. Now that the Japanese in China are either in retreat or on the defensive, the uneasy truce which has been imposed on the rival Chinese armies by the pressure of the common enemy is in any case likely to be exposed to an ever greater strain unless some settlement is quickly reached, and all efforts to achieve such a settlement have so far failed.

A proclamation calling upon Japan to surrender was released on the 26th July from Potsdam. The text of this ultimatum, which was signed by President Truman and Mr. Churchill, was communicated to Chungking, and a reply was received from Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in the form of a personal message to President Truman, concurring in the terms of the document. The first clause of the proclamation says that the Allies have agreed that Japan should be given an opportunity of ending the war, and the second that the Allies will prosecute the war until Japan ceases to resist. The third clause dwells on the results of the futile and senseless German resistance to the Allies which "stand forth in awful clarity as an example to the people of Japan" and threatens them with the "inevitable and complete destruction of their armed forces" and the "utter devastation" of their country unless they surrender. The fourth clause states that "the time has come for Japan to decide whether she will continue to be controlled by those self-willed militaristic advisers, whose unintelligent calculation has brought the Empire of Japan to the threshold of annihilation, or whether she will follow the path of reason." Clause 5 states that the terms of surrender which follow in clauses 6–13 are final, and that there is no alternative to them. They are as follows:—

"Clause 6.—There must be eliminated for all time the authority and influence of those who have deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest, for we insist that a new order of peace, security and justice will be impossible until irresponsible militarism is driven from the world.

"Clause 7.—Until such a new order is established and until there is convincing proof that Japan's warmaking power is destroyed, points in Japanese territory designated by the Allies shall be occupied to secure the achievement of the basic objectives we are here setting forth.

"Clause 8.—The terms of the Cairo declaration shall be carried out and Japanese sovereignty shall be limited to the islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu and Shikoku and such minor islands as we determine.

"Clause 9.—The Japanese military forces after being completely disarmed shall be permitted to return to their homes with the opportunity of leading peaceful and productive lives.

"Clause 10.—We do not intend that Japanese shall be enslaved as a race nor destroyed as a nation, but stern justice shall be meted out to all war criminals, including those who have visited cruelties on our prisoners. The Japanese Government shall remove all obstacles to the revival and strengthening of democratic tendencies among the Japanese people. Freedom of speech, of religion, of thought, as well as respect for the fundamental human rights, shall be established.

C266454

"Clause 11.—Japan shall be permitted to maintain such industries as will sustain her economy and allow exaction of just reparations in kind, but not those industries which will enable her to rearm for war. To this end access to, as distinguished from control of raw materials shall be permitted. Eventual Japanese participation in world trade relations shall be permitted.

"Clause 12.—The occupying forces of the Allies shall be withdrawn from Japan as soon as these objectives have been accomplished and there has been established, in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people, a peacefully inclined and responsible Government.

"Clause 13.—We call upon the Government of Japan to proclaim now the unconditional surrender of all the Japanese armed forces and to provide proper and adequate assurances of their good faith in such action. The alternative for Japan is complete and utter destruction."

In a press interview Admiral Suzuki, referring to the ultimatum, said that it was nothing but a rehash of the Cairo declaration and would be ignored by the Japanese Government. There was no change whatever in the Japanese Government's established policy of fighting this war to a successful conclusion. General Minami, President of the Dai Nippon Seijikai, said in a press interview: "The Japanese will be ready to talk peace only when the whole of East Asia is freed from Anglo-American colonial exploitation, and Japan, with other nations in the world, is assured of a peaceful life based on justice and equality." The general professed to believe that the Potsdam ultimatum was designed to checkmate the war-weariness prevailing among the peoples of enemy countries, which made the continuation of the war difficult. The Asahi said that the ultimatum aimed at intimidating Japan, and that it betrayed "the enemy's day dream illusions." The Yomiuri Hochi called the surrender terms "ridiculous." Japanese comment stressed the fact that the Soviet Union had in no way associated itself with the proclamation, although it issued from the Potsdam Conference.

Meanwhile, Dr. Evatt, Australian Minister for External Affairs, has protested strongly against the procedure of issuing the proclamation without consultation with Australia. "The ultimatum was of fundamental importance to Australia," said Mr. Evatt, "yet our first knowledge both of its terms and of its publication came from the press. . . . The actual peace terms foreshadowed in the ultimatum appear to treat Japan more leniently than Germany, although the slightest sign of any tenderness towards Japanese imperialism is entirely misplaced. . . . There are still people who do not realise that the post-war security for the peoples of Australia and New Zealand is still integrally bound up with the destiny of South-East Asia."

The virtually unanimous verdict of the American press on the Potsdam proclamation was that it was "our last and best offer" to Japan, a final answer to Japanese peace feelers, and that "the next move prior to invasion is up to Japan." The Springfield Republican, however, expressed concern that the Soviet Union was not associated with the proclamation and declared that the unconditional surrender formula "seems to have been breached."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The United Nations Charter has been ratified by the Senate by a vote of 89 to 2 and the United States thus becomes the first major power to confirm its adherence to the new organisation. The negative votes were cast by two Republicans, Mr. William Langer (N. Dakota) and Mr. Henrik Shipstead (Minnesota), and the aged Mr. Hiram Johnson (Republican, California) indicated that had he not been ill in hospital he too would have opposed the decision.

Virtually no one has directly challenged the Charter itself, though one or two internationalists have complained that it does not go far enough. The question which is exercising discussion, however, is the constitutional procedure involved in implementing it. Shortly before the vote was taken President Truman sent a message from Potsdam declaring that on any agreements involving the use of military forces, he would "ask Congress by appropriate legislation to approve of them." This has been interpreted by the press as meaning that the President will ask for resolutions of both Houses necessitating simple majorities. The point, however, was made in subsequent debate that even if the President did adopt this method, it would still be open to the Senate to reject a joint resolution and insist on the submission of the agreement to the Senate alone for ratification as a treaty. The point is not of importance in connexion with the Charter itself, but it is likely to assume greater importance as time goes by, and Senators Connally and Vandenberg have themselves indicated that they would like the use of American quota forces to be decided by a treaty requiring a two-thirds support from the Senate.

"It is deeply gratifying that the Senate has ratified the United Nations Charter," cabled President Truman, "by a virtually unanimous vote. The action of the Senate substantially advances the cause of peace." Mr. Grew, the Acting Secretary of State, described it as a "most important step towards establishing peace and security throughout the world," while Mr. Cordell Hull, who, with President Roosevelt, has done so much to bring about this historic event, said: "May this resounding vote of the Senate be followed by speedy approval of the Charter by the other United Nations and its early entrance into force to carry out the noble purposes for which it was conceived." Although there are still dangers ahead and isolationist rocks still strew the path, the achievement is a milestone in American history, and if it reflects deeper currents of opinion, it is also due in no small measure to Mr. Roosevelt's shrewdness in appointing a bi-partisan delegation to San Francisco, to the skilful use of publicity, and to the personal popularity of President Truman with Congress.

The results of the British election came as a profound shock to the majority of the American public. A Conservative majority, although a small one, had been confidently expected, and the first reaction was of wonder at the strange "ingratitude" of the British electorate towards Mr. Winston Churchill. Nowhere is the late Premier forgotten. As the Baltimore Sun says: "It is easier to see his virtues than his faults and they are great virtues. He will live in history as a very great man indeed, a great soldier and a great civilian." Tributes to his leadership during the war have been paid by practically the whole of the press. "The defeat of Mr. Churchill's party is not in any way a defeat for Mr. Churchill as an individual," Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt declared. "His place in the hearts of the British people is safe for all time." But now that the first shocked surprise is over, the general reaction in the United States has taken the form of hoping that there will be little change in Anglo-American co-operation and in foreign affairs generally, though it is expected that there will be more encouragement of "Leftist" groups in Europe and stronger condemnation of régimes such as the Spanish and Argentinian, as well as possible changes in the British attitude towards, for instance, Greece, Italy and India. There was some slight apprehension lest the new Government might be less interested in the Far Eastern war than their predecessors, but Mr. Attlee's first statement has set these fears at rest. In many quarters, however, the view has been expressed that the "swing to the Left" will make Anglo-American co-operation in the field of foreign affairs easier. In others there is, however, some anxiety lest the economic policies of the new Government may make more difficult the expansion of freer trade envisaged in Article VII of the Lend-Lease Agreement to the achievement and ratification of which Bretton Woods and the recent tariff Bill are regarded as substantial American contributions. The heads of the organised Labour movements have naturally expressed warm satisfaction over the results and some papers have argued that this new orientation is likely to place Britain in the part of mediator between the Communist State of Russia and the capitalist United States. Even those papers who are somewhat alarmed over the result, however, refer to the English genius for compromise, and it is not expected that violent policies will be pursued either at home or abroad.

Mr. Attlee, of whom there have appeared a number of favourable profiles, is now being compared with Mr. Truman and the general reaction, apart from the extreme Conservatives, is one of friendly analysis of the reason for the change. The Detroit Free Press describes it as a revolution which has taken place "by ballots instead of bullets," while Mr. Raymond Swing has described it as "Britain's middle-class revolution by consent." In general the radio commentators have been far more jubilant than the press, though the majority of the Republican organs, such as the New York Herald Tribune and the Baltimore Sun, independents such as the New York Times and of course the democratic and liberal press, have commented favourably on the change.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina, the recent crude attempts to discredit the United States Ambassador (see last week's Summary) have greatly increased Mr. Braden's popularity in "opposition" circles, and Argentine "society" went out of its way to welcome him on his return to Buenos Aires from a provincial visit. The Argentine Foreign Minister has now explained that the police did not immediately prevent the circulation of the lampoons in question, because they were unaware of their contents. Meanwhile, the release of small batches of political prisoners has been announced, together with intervention in isolated German firms; and according to press accounts, a manifesto of the Civic Union branch of the Radical Party has definitely expressed its opposition to the Government, declaring that members who have accepted or accept posts under the existing régime will be expelled.

A demonstration in favour of women's suffrage is reported to have lent its support to the Statute for Political Parties; Colonel Perón appeared, on request, and gallantly expressed his approval of votes for women.

Dr. López, the President of Colombia, has once again sent his "irrevocable resignation" to the Senate, and this time, the Foreign Minister, Dr. Lleras Camargo, has been appointed first designate to the Presidency, and will apparently take over Dr. López's functions on the 7th August. According to broadcast reports, the Liberal Party has selected Dr. Gabriel Turbay, a former Foreign Minister and Ambassador in Washington, of Syrian descent, as presidential candidate for the forthcoming elections.

The Ecuadorean Government resigned on the 28th July. The Foreign Minister, Sr. Ponce Enríquez, is reported to have accused the Minister of the Interior, Sr. Carlos Guevara Moreno, of sabotaging the work of the Government. This suggests an imminent parting of the ways between the varied groups which have hitherto supported Dr. Velasco Ibarra.

GERMANY.

MORE than half the formal declaration issued at the termination of the Tripartite Conference of Berlin on the 2nd August is devoted to the "political and economic principles to govern the treatment of Germany in the initial control period." Two territorial questions of major importance were dealt with. The Conference agreed in principle to accept, and President Truman and Mr. Attlee agreed to support at the final peace settlement, the claim of the U.S.S.R. to an extension of the Russian frontier to incorporate that part of East Prussia, including Königsberg, north and east of a line running from Braunsberg to Goldap (see Map 1). It also agreed, "pending the final determination of Poland's western frontier," to leave the territories east of the Oder–Neisse line, with an extension west of the Oder to take in Stettin and Swinemünde, under Polish administration and not to regard them as part of the Russian zone of occupation. Since it is very unlikely that either of these decisions will be reversed, despite the provisos inserted, the fait accompli for which both the U.S.S.R. and the Polish Provisional Government have striven has been successful in securing acceptance by the Western Powers. As a result the future Germany, for which the Council of Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R., France and China are to prepare a peace settlement, will be shorn of between one-fifth and one-quarter of the territory of the Reich as constituted under the Treaty of Versailles. The tide of history has been reversed and the Teuton's Drang nach Osten is replaced by a Slavonic Drang nach Westen.

Some of the Conference decisions envisage the wider application of principles of control which experience in tackling individual problems—as, for example, the joint administration of Berlin—has already shown to be vital if Military Government is to operate with a minimum of difficulty. Such are the clauses of the declaration providing for the treatment of Germany during the occupation as a "single economic unit," for the "equitable distribution of essential commodities between the several zones," and the adoption of a common Allied policy with regard to industry, agriculture, wages, prices, rationing, currency and transportation. The decision to set up "certain essential central German administrative departments, headed by State Secretaries . . . . particularly in the fields of finance, transport, communications, foreign trade and industry" represents a more practical alternative to the establishment of a central German Government, which the Conference has postponed for the moment. The method which the Conference has agreed shall be employed in meeting the Soviet claims for reparations—that is, by the removal of an unspecified amount of industrial capital equipment not needed for the German peace economy from the areas of Germany occupied by the Soviet Union and by the further removal of 25 per cent. (15 per cent. of which is to be paid for in kind) of similar equipment from the areas occupied by the United Kingdom and the United States—represents an entirely new departure in the exaction of reparations from Germany which cannot fail to strengthen Russian economic (if not political) interest in the British and American zones.

A number of important measures to revive German economic life in the Russian zone have been carefully timed to coincide with the last meetings of the Berlin Conference and with the promulgation of its decisions. On the 30th July it was announced that Marshal Zhukov had given instructions for all factories in Berlin which were still equipped to produce solid and liquid fuels, electric power, fertilisers and raw materials for other industries to resume work by the 15th August, and that he would hold the German local government authorities responsible for the provision of the supplies, power, transport and labour with which they were to operate. On the 4th August he ordered the establishment by the provincial administrations of adequate financial machinery to "develop the national economy and eliminate all obstacles to the development of trade and agriculture." Rates and taxes were to be levied according to the old scale; provincial, district and city banks were to be opened; and insurance to cover life and property was to be provided. From this order, and from another decree of the 2nd August under which the President of the Provincial Government of Brandenburg took over all local revenue and customs offices, it is clear that the Soviet authorities now regard the German Provinzialverwaltung as the supreme fiscal authority in their zone. On the 1st August it was stated that Marshal Zhukov had established German Railway Directorates at Berlin, Dresden, Erfurt, Halle, Schwerin, Pasewalk, Wittenberg and Magdeburg (all except the last three being old Reich Railway Directorates) and Waterways Directorates at Frankfurt-an-der-Oder and Brandenburg to speed up the resumption of transport. Postal communications between Berlin and other cities of the Russian zone have also been resumed.

No marked advance has been made during the past week in the development of various political organisations in Berlin and it is too early as yet to see how the decision of the Berlin Conference to permit the organisation of political parties throughout Germany will affect their future. Vigorous support is at the moment being given by the Communists to the drive of the Soviet Military Government to resume essential industries, and their party organ, Die Deutsche Volkszeitung, has expressed approval of the decision of the Berlin Conference to destroy the German war industries, arguing that this would in the end benefit the German people by enabling their national economy at last to serve the people's needs. The Liberal-Democrats are now being allowed to publish their own party newspaper, Der Morgen, which appeared for the first time on the Berlin streets on the 4th August, but without the usual publicity from the Russian-controlled Berlin radio. The future of Dr. Andreas Hermes, the leader of the Christian Democratic Union, who last week resigned under a cloud from his post as head of the Berlin food administration, is not clear beyond the fact that the inter-Allied Kommandantur accepted his resignation as final on the 1st August, and confirmed the appointment of an obscure right-wing Social Democrat, Gustav Klimpel, as his successor. In an order of the 31st July, authorising the establishment of youth committees in the German towns, Marshal Zhukov firmly resisted any demand for the formation of political youth organisations. He placed the new youth committees under what he called the "Bürgermeistereien," and expressly forbade even the trade unions and the Socialist parties to form their own youth groups.

A marked improvement in the delivery of coal from the Ruhr mines is expected to result from the reopening of the Rhine north of Coblenz to barge traffic, which it is now hoped will take place on the 1st September. Lack of adequate transport is at the moment one of several obstacles to a further increase in coal output in the Ruhr, where the production of hard coal has already risen from 35,000 tons a day at the beginning of June to almost double that amount by the end of last month, and where the production of brown coal is now approaching 50,000 tons per day. 145,600 miners are now employed in the industry and, as a result of the increased rations provided by Military Government, the average output of coal per man has risen steadily from ·32 tons to ·51 tons a day (as against 1·5 tons, however, in normal times) in the past two months. Three training schools for miners have now been opened in the British zone. The arrival of four coal trains from the Ruhr was acknowledged on the 6th August by the Berlin radio, which stated that quantities of lignite and anthracite were also being received from the Lusatian and Weissenburg mines respectively. In the absence of adequate transport, attention is now being given to the exploitation of local coal deposits which have not hitherto been considered of paramount importance. On the 3rd August it was stated that lignite deposits in the Taunus region might be opened up in the near future to supply the Wiesbaden area. The Bavarian mines are now stated to be producing 10,000 tons per month, and all privately-owned mining companies in the State have been taken over by the United States Military Government authorities.

The tendency of Military Government in the American zone to decentralise authority, and at the same time to delegate administrative responsibility to native German officials has become even more pronounced in the past few days. On the 2nd August it was stated that preparations were being made to re-establish in Bavaria the old State Ministry of Justice, which was abolished with the other surviving sovereign institutions of the individual German Länder under the Gleichschaltung decrees of 1934. Its re-establishment will follow closely upon the reconstitution of the Bavarian State Ministry of Labour and the elevation of the head of the Bavarian Office for Food and Agriculture to ministerial rank. A decision to make the public health and welfare of the German people in the American zone solely the concern of the local German medical and administrative authorities has been announced by the Director of the Public Health and Welfare Division of the United States Group Control Council, Major-General Stayer. German "examining magistrates" (Untersuchungsbeamte) are being employed in the current drive of Military Government to purge the local administrations of their last remaining Nazi elements. In his message of the 6th August to the population of the American zone, General Eisenhower emphasised the readiness of the United States authorities to permit the Germans to publish their own newspapers, elect their own shop stewards to represent them in the factories and "develop local political activities."

In a similar personal message to the population of the British zone on the 6th August, Field-Marshal Montgomery promised the German people "freedom to get down to their own way of life, subject only to the provisions of military security and necessity." It was, he said, the policy of the Allied authorities "to encourage democratic political parties which may form the basis of an ordered and peaceful German society." Confident estimates of the number of followers which they are soon likely to have are already being made to Military Government by some of the surviving leaders of the old Weimar parties. Dr. Kurt Schumacher, the former Social Democratic editor and Reichstag Deputy in Württemberg, who is now residing in Hanover, predicts that his party will regain its former predominance in Hanover and possibly a working majority in Brunswick, Württemberg, Baden and Hessen-Nassau. Dr. Pfad, the leader of the Centre Party in Hanover, estimates that his following has risen by 5 per cent., despite the Nazi régime; and even the separatist German Hanoverian Party claims that it will collect two-thirds of all votes cast when the first elections are held.

Representatives of 21 Army Group and of the Soviet authorities in Berlin have now reached an agreement whereby the rate of repatriation of displaced Russians from the North-West of Germany will be doubled in the next two or three weeks. (At present between 4,000 and 5,000 such Russians are repatriated daily.) The results should be to clear the British zone of Russians by the end of this month, so that higher priority can be given to the repatriation of the Poles, among whom there has lately been an increase of unrest and lawlessness. Considerable trouble is at the moment being caused by the Warsaw and Lublin broadcasts encouraging the Poles in Germany to band themselves into small groups and make for home on their own initiative. The woods on the Anglo-Russian zone frontier in Germany are stated to be full of Poles who have been influenced by these broadcasts, only to find themselves driven back by the Soviet guards. In places like Lübeck, which still has some 20,000 Poles, the situation is expected to become even more difficult if the agitation from Warsaw and Lublin continues.

AUSTRIA.

The brief paragraph concerning Austria in the Terms of Agreement at the Berlin Conference contained the statement that a proposal by the Soviet Government on the extension of the authority of the Austrian Provisional Government to the whole of Austria was examined. The three Governments agreed that they were prepared to examine this question after the entry of the British and American forces into the City of Vienna.

Although this does not imply recognition of the Renner Government by the Allies, Vienna Radio on the 5th August claimed that while no definite date had been fixed for recognition of the Government, in "proposing that the authority of the Provisional Government be extended to cover all Austria, the Report de facto recognises the existence of that Government."

Dr. Renner himself issued a long memorandum on the 5th, explaining the events which led to the formation of his Government. He described the entry of Russian troops into Gloggnitz where he was living, on Easter Sunday. The German troops had fled, and there was no fighting, nevertheless, said Renner, "the occupation was a hard experience for the population. Patrols searched house after house and what took place during those searches the people are not likely to forget. I experienced in my own house for two days and two nights just what any other inhabitant experienced." On Easter Tuesday Renner went to see the Russian commanding officer, to seek protection for the people.. An order was given for the abuses complained of to cease, and Renner was taken to see a senior officer, to whom he explained that while the majority of Austrians had at first a hopeful attitude towards Hitler, they "took a dislike to the mere idea of union with the Reich" when Hitler's methods of oppression and warlike aims became obvious, and for a long time they had been longing for the establishment of an independent Austrian Republic. Renner himself had reckoned for some years that Austria might some day want his experience as Chancellor from 1918 to 1920, and his reputation as the Austrian leader at St. Germain. Therefore he had done all he could not to attract Nazi persecution. He said that now he had not the means for action, and the Russians replied that the Red Army could help in many ways. Renner was asked whether he was prepared to fulfil his long-cherised plans. After much reflection he "decided to take the risk of jeopardising my reputation and that of the party, and my existence as a politician." Two days later he was taken to meet "an astonishing number of senior officers," to whom he refused to hand a memorandum of his proposals, because "on no account could or would I act as a mandatory of Russia." He proposed instead to issue a number of proclamations to the Austrian people. He arrived in Vienna on the 21st April, and leading members of the democratic parties were invited to a conference next day. Renner found in Vienna the "foundations of a new democratic city Government ready laid, and the only task remaining was the establishment of a central Government for the whole country." From this statement interesting for Renner's implied criticism of Russian actions, it is clear that the setting up of the Provisional Government was not altogether the spontaneous Austrian action it is claimed to be, and that in fact the Russians had a considerable hand in the matter; and that they knew of Renner's intention of forming a Government some time before they informed the other Allies.

Renner obviously hopes that his Government will be recognised by the British and United States Governments and a possible move to broaden its basis with this end in view has been reported. He has been particularly insistent on the necessity of overcoming the internal barriers presented by the zone boundaries and of administering Austria as a single unit. On the 15th July, a Herr Moeser, who claimed that he was touring Austria as the special representative of Renner, visited Piesch (chairman of the Carinthian Consultative Committee and now Landeshauptmann of the Provincial Government). The object of the visit was stated to be to find suitable candidates for the Renner Government who would be acceptable to the Allies. Berlin Radio reported on the 5th August, as from Vienna, that Renner had requested the Provincial Governments to arrange for the appointment of representatives to Vienna in connexion with the administration of Austria as a whole. A possible opposition move is reported from another source. It was said that a meeting was planned to take place in Salzburg on the 29th July, attended by members of the Volkspartei and some small groups of the Right, and including the Landeshauptmann of the Tyrol, Gruber, to discuss the relationships between the various provincial governments and the Renner Government. The meeting was expected to be strongly in favour of a broadening of the Vienna régime. In view of the decision as to its future which must soon be taken by the four major Allies, Renner and his colleagues are intensifying their efforts to demonstrate the energy and efficiency of their administration. A political review, broadcast by Radio Vienna on the 2nd August said that ninety-four legislative Acts had been passed by the Provisional Government during the four months in which it has held office. Among the latest of these to be announced are laws reconstituting the Austrian Chamber of Lawyers, and reinstituting the Austrian penal code and criminal procedure; a Bill introduced by Honner, the Communist Minister of the Interior, concerning the revival of political parties and activities; and the restoration of workers' councils.

If the legislation introduced by the Provisional Government is theoretically sound, however, it is doubtful how far it is able to implement it even in those parts of Austria in which its writ runs—that is in the Russian-occupied zone. Emboldened, perhaps, by the arrival of advance parties of British, American, and French troops in Vienna, some speakers from Vienna have been more outspoken recently. One of these complained, on the 5th, of the requisitioning of farms and crops, which made it impossible to fix farmers' surrender quotas. The Austrian Government, he said, required the sole and uncontested right of disposal over the harvest, without outside interference, to be able to fulfil its obligations towards the Austrian people and the Red Army.

There has been an increasing tendency, too, to appeal to the Western Allies to help in Austria's desperate economic plight. One of Renner's Ministers on the 3rd said that only 4,000 tons of coal out of the 15,000 tons per month needed in Vienna and Lower Austria for bakeries, hospitals, and similar essential services were being produced in the region. The Red Army had supplied coal for the railways, but even this import had ceased during the last few days as the railways were being used for "major troop movements." The first train from British-occupied Styria, bringing 600 tons of coal to Vienna to be distributed mainly to bakeries by the Russians, arrived there on the 5th. It was reported that the British and American zones in Austria were to get 15,000 tons of coal from Germany in July, if transport could be provided, and that this offer might be repeated in August and September.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The conflagration in Usti (Aussig), resulting in the destruction of many important factories, is now regarded as the outcome of sabotage: the damage is estimated at 200 million crowns. As anticipated, this led the press to agitate for the speedy removal of the Germans and to emphasise the fact that the incident is not an isolated example, but is merely an added argument to accelerate the German exodus.

The general dissatisfaction was heightened by Litauer's report in the News Chronicle on the presence of a Polish Brigade, some 1,500 strong, in the Bohemian Forest. This came as a surprise to the public, although the Czech military authorities claim to have been long aware of the facts. The press refer to the former London Polish Government's contention that this force was part of the regular Polish army which fought in Western Europe and Italy, whereas the Czechs regard it as being definitely Nazi in sympathy. General Patton, on his recent visit to Prague, promised to have the brigade removed from the affected area.

The discontent was relieved, however, by the Potsdam communiqué which was widely acclaimed in so far as the recognition by the Big Three of Czechoslovakia's moral right to evict the Germans is hailed as a great victory for Czech policy. Only Práce, the Trade Union organ, strikes a dissonant chord as it features the Potsdam news with the headline: "Transfer of Germans temporarily stopped." The same paper states that conditions in the border areas are settling down, thanks to the devoted labour of Czech workers. On the other hand, the Deputy-Chairman of the Most District National Committee, commenting on the serious housing problem, considered that German labour is still a vital necessity in the border areas.

President Beneš recently signed the Decree concerning the withdrawal of Czechoslovak citizenship from German and Hungarian nationals, the measure coming into force on the day of its promulgation. It revives the theme that those who remained loyal will be safe, but that those who acquired German or Hungarian nationality under the occupation forfeit, ipso facto, Czech citizenship. Two categories are exempt: Germans or Hungarians who declared themselves Czechs or Slovaks after the 21st May, 1938, and those Czechs and Slovaks who assumed enemy nationality under duress; with the proviso that their reliability is assured by the competent authorities.

The first mass transfer of Czech repatriates from England has already taken place and Czech Air Force personnel have begun to arrive in Prague. The three Czech fighter (Spitfire) squadrons and the Liberator squadron were due to return on the 7th August. Dr. Beneš has always been anxious for his fighting forces to return as soon as possible, in order that they might form the core of the new Republican army.

The economic prospect is rather marred by the serious coal shortage and the hesitancy of the peasants to claim land formerly owned by the Germans. In Slovakia, M. Husák, the Commissioner for the Interior, referred, in his speech at Trenčín on the 6th August, to the occurrence of a series of political demonstrations and disturbances in several Slovak towns. He condemned the subversive activities of the dispossessed Fascists, and gave a warning about the continuance of anti-Semitism in the province. Reliable accounts by visitors who have recently returned from Slovakia confirm the fact that a number of Hlinka Guardists are attempting to infiltrate into the political life, and that an anti-Jewish attitude is quite common.

Mr. Nichols, the British Ambassador, is continuing his series of visits to provincial centres. After visiting Moravská Ostrava and Bratislava he is now at the famous spa of Karlový Vary (Karlsbad), the centre of former Sudeten German political activity.

POLAND.

The Official Report of the Tripartite Conference of Berlin, issued on the 2nd August, resumed and confirmed recent developments in Poland and gave Allied authority to the Polish administration of large areas in Eastern Germany.

The report first states that the conference "took note" of the agreement which made possible the formation of a Polish Provisional Government of National Unity, and noted that its recognition by the British and United States Governments had "resulted in the withdrawal of their recognition from the former Polish Government in London, which no longer exists." The British and United States Governments "have taken measures to protect the interest of the Polish Provisional Government . . . in the property belonging to the Polish State located in their territories and under their control."

The Three Powers, the communiqué continues, "are anxious to assist the Polish Provisional Government in facilitating the return to Poland as soon as practicable of all Poles abroad who wish to go, including members of the Polish armed forces and the merchant marine." . . . They note that "the Polish Provisional Government . . . has agreed to the holding of free and unfettered elections as soon as possible on the basis of universal suffrage and secret ballot, in which all democratic and anti-Nazi parties shall have the right to take part and to put forward candidates; and that representatives of the Allied press shall enjoy full freedom to report to the world upon developments in Poland before and during the elections."

On the question of the frontiers the three heads of Government reaffirmed "their opinion that the final delimitation of the western frontier of Poland should await the peace settlement." They then agreed that, "pending the final determination of Poland's western frontier, the former German territories east of a line running from the Baltic Sea immediately west of Swinemünde, and thence along the Oder River to the confluence of the western Neisse and along the western Neisse to the Czechoslovak frontier, . . . shall be under the administration of the Polish State and for such purposes shall not be considered as part of the Soviet zone of occupation in Germany."

The communiqué stated that the territory thus placed under Polish administration included Danzig and "that portion of East Prussia not placed under the administration of the U.S.S.R." under a previous provision of the same communiqué, which defined the boundary between Soviet and Polish zones in East Prussia as running "from a point on the eastern shore of the Bay of Danzig . . . north of Braunsberg-Goldap (i.e., presumably north of a line between these two places) to the meeting point of the frontiers of Lithuania, the Polish Republic, and East Prussia." The city of Stettin, which is situated on both banks of the Oder, is wholly included in the area placed under Polish administration.

The statement was warmly welcomed in Poland. M. Bierut, in welcoming the United States Ambassador, Mr. Arthur Bliss Lane, on the 4th August, said "You are coming to us at a moment when the Potsdam Conference . . . has confirmed our just claims to frontiers on the Oder and Western Neisse." The Provisional Government, on the 5th August, in a message of greetings to Generalissimo Stalin, spoke of "one of the greatest achievements in the history of the Polish nation—the de facto recognition of the western frontiers on the Oder and the Western Neisse—the guarantee of its real independence and prosperity.

The Polish London Daily, formerly the organ of the London Polish Government, while chiding the Anglo-Saxon Powers for their consistent reluctance to extend Polish frontiers to the west, states that territory now placed under Polish administration "must be degermanised. When the Polish peasant once gets his teeth into those old Polish lands, no power on earth will force him to let go. . . . Their return is in itself a fact which cannot be ignored, and may yield a splendid harvest in the future."

Agitation continues in Poland for the return of Poles in Western Europe to their country. Fresh appeals have been made both by the Provisional Government and by M. Popiel, the leader of the Christian Democrat ("Labour") party. A Council of London Poles, who support the Provisional Government, has been formed to give information and make arrangements in this country.

Dr. Alfred Fiderkiewicz, formerly a member of the Left-wing Peasant party in Poland, and recently Mayor of Cracow, has been appointed chargé d'affaires in this country and reached London on the 4th August. M. Jedrychowski, Minister for Foreign Trade, and M. Stanczyk, Minister of Labour, are in London as delegates to the meeting of the Council of U.N.R.R.A.

SOVIET UNION.

Soviet comment on the Potsdam decisions, though copious, has contained nothing of note. The Pravda and Izvestiya leaders were couched in terms of sober optimism and satisfaction, Pravda pointing out that the results of the conference showed that the collaboration of the Three Great Powers rested on "the firm basis of community of basic interests, which at the same time correspond to the interests of all the freedom-loving peoples." A later Pravda international review described the Conference as a blow to all the "professional sobsters," whose doleful prognostications were due not so much to weak nerves as to deliberate provocation, the Swedish press being particularly censured for its pessimistic criticisms.

It was announced in Moscow on the 6th August that the Soviet Union had resumed diplomatic relations with Roumania and Finland. Simultaneously, certain terms of the Finnish armistice were relaxed by the Allied Control Commission "in view of the changes in the general situation consequent on the termination of hostilities against Germany." The restrictions on the right of movement of Finnish war and merchant shipping have been cancelled, and Finnish planes are to be allowed unhindered flights inside Finland. The aerodromes at Kotka and Turku have also been turned over to the Finnish command. Finally, representatives of the United Nations and of neutral countries in Finland are to be allowed open telegraph, mail and telephone communications.

Recent Tass reports from Copenhagen have expressed disquietude at the situation in Denmark. The Danish population was said to be extremely dissatisfied with the slow progress of the purge, since only one traitor had so far been condemned to death and high-placed Danish Nazis were being left unmolested. Further, it was reported that the Germans in Denmark, far from having left the country after the surrender, were actually strutting freely about the streets in uniform, with the meagre disguise of a Red Cross armlet; many S.S. men were said to have been found in German hospitals. The German Red Cross had nothing to do with medical aid, but was a typical propaganda institution on Goebbels lines and was distributing pro-Hitlerite literature.

Strong indignation has been voiced in the Soviet press at the remission of the death sentence on a German, Captain Blell, who had shot a Russian in a camp in Norway.

According to Tass the death sentence had been pronounced by the Norwegian authorities, but was remitted by General Thorne. "A British General has unexpectedly laid down that a German officer can kill with impunity, especially if the victim is a Russian, but that no German officer can be killed." Apparently General Thorne commuted the death sentence passed by the Allied Military Court on Blell to imprisonment for life, after strong representations from his advisers, on the ground that there was no proof of premeditation. Blell had shot a Russian trespasser into a German camp. This attack by Tass continues the campaign against the Allied authorities in Norway noted in last week's Summary.

Much activity has been going on in the Soviet Trade Union world during the past weeks. Roumanian and Bulgarian Trade Unionists, following on the Poles, have just concluded a lengthy visit to the U.S.S.R., that of the Roumanians in particular being given a great deal of publicity. Delegates of the British Iron and Steel Union have also been in the Soviet Union. The last delegation to arrive is that of the Italians, which reached Moscow on the 2nd August.

Meanwhile, Soviet trade union delegations are continuing their visits abroad. One delegation has recently been in Persia, and another is now in the United States on the invitation of the C.I.O. A vigorous attack on the American Federation of Labour in an English broadcast from Moscow has coincided with this visit, in which Green and his followers are castigated for obstructing the formation of the World Trade Union Federation. The leaders of the American Federation of Labour are said to be playing "more than second fiddle" in the reactionary orchestra composed of Argentina, Spain, and Greece with an admixture of American isolationists, Belgian reactionaries and the Catholic press.

The World Trade Union Federation in general has been discussed in a recent interview given to Trud (4th August) by M. Tazasov, Secretary of the All Union Central Council of Trade Unions. After describing how the objection of the Amsterdam International had been overruled, and the final form of organisation for a new World Federation adopted Tazasov lamented that representatives of the Administrative Committee of the World Trade Union Conference had not succeeded in getting permission to attend the San Francisco Conference, which was all the more unjust, since of the Big Five only the U.S.S.R. had included a Trade Union representative in its delegation. The President of the C.I.O. had merely been at San Francisco as an adviser. M. Tazasov, however, expressed the hope that as under Article 71 of the United Nations Charter the Economic and Social Council was authorised to consult with non-governmental organisations, the door to the participation of the World Trade Union Federation in the new United Nations Organisation was not quite closed.

The Soviet delegation to the Tangier Conference has just arrived in Paris. It is headed by M. Kozyrev, who has been Secretary-General of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs and principal private secretary to M. Molotov. Since the war he has been Counsellor to the Allied Governments in London, and later Minister in Algiers and Counsellor in Paris. At Potsdam he was present as Head of the 1st European Department of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs.

SCANDINAVIA.

The new Swedish Government is of interest rather for the new personalities included, than as an indication of any drastic changes of policy in Sweden. To interpret its formation, as some British newspapers seem inclined to do, as a significant move to the Left is altogether mistaken. After all, it was not the result of any electoral change in the balance of political parties. On the contrary, the latest elections—of the 17th September, 1944—actually resulted in a diminution of the strength of the Social Democarts by nearly 20 seats and about 133,000 votes, and a loss by that party of a clear majority it had previously enjoyed. The change to a purely Social Democratic Government merely means that the war-time expedient of a coalition has been discarded for the normal practice of entrusting the administration to the strongest political party. The Government's domestic programme foreshadows no startling changes in policy, which, it must be remembered, has been controlled by the moderate socialism of M. Hansson and his party since 1932. Unlike the Governments of Denmark and Norway, this one has found no place for the Communists, a fact which inspires the bitter comment of the Finnish Vapaa Sana that Sweden "lags behind as an island of conservatism in the midst of Democratic Europe."

The six principal new members of the Government replace two Liberals, two Conservatives, one Agrarian and one non-party (M. Günther), while among the Ministers without Portfolio one additional appointment has been made and a Conservative and an Agrarian retire, but two men described as non-party, MM. Quensel and Danielsson, retain their former posts.

Perhaps the most interesting of the new Ministers is M. Torsten Nilsson, the Minister of Communications, who has been described in Sweden as "the Crown Prince" of the Social Democrats; he is the youngest of the new entry, being only forty years of age, but has been secretary of the Social Democratic Party since 1940. The appointment most open to criticism seems to be that of M. Allan Vougt, who replaces M. Sköld in the Ministry of Defence, while the latter is transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture, of which he has had considerable previous experience. M. Vougt is accused of being a careerist and is regarded as politically unreliable. His defence of the press censorship during the war was unpopular, and his articles in Arbetet were regarded as far too favourable to collaboration with Germany. His previous record as a pacifist makes his appointment as Minister of Defence the more remarkable.

The new Minister of Trade, Professor Gunnar Myrdal, is regarded as a brilliant economist, but lacking in political stability and realism. He has been chairman of the post-war planning commission. In August 1944, he created some sensation by the publication of a book "Warning against Peace-Optimism," which expressed scepticism as to the power of Great Britain and the United States to construct a satisfactory international economic order, and also as to the permanence of collaboration between the United Nations and the "Big Three" in particular. In some Swedish quarters, however, these views were regarded as an attempt to dispel suspicion that the author had become too strongly influenced by the United States.

The Minister of Justice is a recruit from the legal profession new to politics, being an appeal court judge whose father occupied a similar position; and the new Minister of Education, M. Erlander, does not appear to be politically important. M. Undén at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs is a welcome improvement on M. Günther, and his appointment promises a sincere intention on the part of Sweden to collaborate in the security policy of the United Nations.

The Finnish Government has issued a summary of the conclusions of the Hornborg report on the Foreign Policy of Finland during the war, and is believed to be contemplating the publication of the whole report. It appears to be drawn up with impartiality and moderation, and abstains from charges against individuals. It condemns, however, as breaches of the constitution, a number of actions undertaken by the Government without previous consultation of the Diet, and the signature of the Ribbentrop pact by President Ryti. The fact that the choice of Dr. Hornborg as chairman of the Commission is criticised by organs of the left is probably a tribute to his objectivity. There is a severer minority report by the Communist Eino Pekkala and Professor Ruutu.

The removal of Germans from Norway is now proceeding smoothly and rapidly. On the 5th August, M. Gerhardsen, the Premier, estimated that Stavanger and Bergen would be clear by the middle of this month, and that all Germans should be out of Norway some time in October. Numbers of Germans are now being sent by rail through Sweden.

Difficulties have arisen about the manning of some 2,500,000 tons of Norwegian shipping, available for war transport in the Pacific, owing to lack of transport for Norwegian seamen at present in Norway, Great Britain and the United States.

King Haakon's 73rd birthday was celebrated in Norway on the 3rd August.

(For complaints in the Russian press as to Allied leniency to Germans in Scandinavia, see under "Soviet Union".)

LOW COUNTRIES.

Recent reports from Holland—especially from the frontier provinces—reveal a condition of increasing irritation at the delay in restoring property seized by the Germans. The British military authorities are blamed, with the result that British popularity is said to be declining.

Broadcasting on the 3rd August, on the subject of the new Dutch Army, the War Minister, M. Meynen, stated that a total of about 200,000 men would be needed—100,000 for an Expeditionary Force, destined for service in the North-East Indies; 27,000 (inclusive of N.I.C.A. personnel) for battalions to be stationed there and 50,000 for occupation duties in Germany. The remainder would be absorbed by " the air forces and additional units." These figures did not include marines, of whom about 8,000 were now undergoing training in the United States. The Expeditionary Force was to be trained in the United Kingdom, but training of the North-East Indies battalions was to take place probably in Australia: the occupation troops were to be trained in Holland. In connexion with these training schemes, " several hundred " Dutch officers had already left for British training centres, and were " shortly to be followed by many hundreds of N.C.O.s."

After a few days' deliberation, the Belgian Prime Minister's formal request that the six Catholic Ministers rejoin the Government was rejected by the Catholic Party on the 30th July. When it had become clear that the Catholic Ministers were on the point of resigning, no efforts were spared to persuade them to remain in the Cabinet. The matter had apparently been discussed by the Regent and Cardinal Van Roey, the Regent emphasising the extreme difficulty of his position should he have to carry on with a Government of purely Leftist elements. The Regent's worst fears, however, were not to be confirmed, as the vacancies have been filled by four members of the Union Démocratique Belge—a Catholic group (albeit representing the extreme Left-wing of the Party)—and two Liberals. (The U.D.B., which is independent, was jointly founded by M. Antoine Delfossé, Deputy for Liége and Minister of Information and Justice in the London Government, and M. Marcel Grégoire, barrister of the Appeal Court, Vice-President of the U.D.B. and one of the new Ministers.) The primary reason for the Catholics' decision to resign seems to have been their acute embarrassment at the Baels revelations in the speech of the Minister of the Interior, M. Van Glabbeke, during the debate on the King (see last week's Summary). Accordingly, the Party now finds itself in the equivocal position of having to vote against a Government with whose programme it is in complete agreement. The Ministerial vacancies have been filled as follows:—Justice, M. Marcel Grégoire (U.D.B.); Colonies, M. Robert Godding, Senator for Antwerp (Liberal); Finance, M. Frans de Voghel, " technician " and Director of the Banque Nationale (U.D.B.); Agriculture, M. René Lefèbvre, Deputy for Ath-Tournai and President of the Union Professionnelle Agricole (Liberal); Civilian War Victims, Baron Adrien van den Branden de Reeth, Deputy-Advocate-General (U.D.B.); and War Damage (a new Ministry), M. Jacques Basyn, barrister and Secretary of the U.D.B. Baron van den Branden de Reeth is additionally described as a " résistant," M. de Voghel (sometimes) as a non-party man. The new Ministers (with the exception of M. Godding, who is at present in the Congo) were introduced to the Regent by M. Van Acker on the 2nd August, when they took the Constitutional Oath. The Ministry of Information—held by one of the ex-Ministers—has been abolished; but the number of Ministries remains unchanged through the formation of the new Ministry of War Damage.

Replying to questions at a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber on the 2nd August, the Foreign Minister, M. Spaak, said that no decision had been reached in regard to the Peace Conference. As far as claims to reparations from Germany were concerned, Belgium, in agreement with the Netherlands and Luxemburg, had stated her case in a memorandum which had been presented to the British Foreign Office in August 1944. For the time being, at least, great difficulties were being experienced in recovering property—such as livestock and machinery—looted by the Germans during the Occupation; but a military and diplomatic mission was about to leave for Berlin, where it would make representations to the Great Powers. No information had reached the Government as to what percentage of reparations might be allowed. Asked about the extradition of Léon Degrelle, M. Spaak replied that hitherto this had been impossible owing to the Spanish Government's insisting that the charges against Degrelle were of a political character; but nevertheless, a few days ago, the Belgian Government (encouraged, no doubt, by the departure of Laval) had made a fresh demand for Degrelle's extradition—this time based upon offences against the Common Law, mostly committed during Von Rundstedt's counter-offensive in the Ardennes.

Dr. Elias, the former V.N.V. leader and Burgomaster of " Greater " Ghent during the Occupation, has been arrested by the State Security Police and confined in the St. Giles Prison in Brussels. He had fled the country shortly before its liberation and had been sentenced to death in absentiâ. The Advocate-General has asked for his transfer to Ghent. Meanwhile, it is reported that Robert Poulet is to appeal against his sentence (see last week's Summary).

The lifting of the temporary ban (imposed in February) on the Walloon extremist newspaper Le Gaulois was announced on the 2nd August. The paper is expected to reappear towards the end of this week.

FRANCE.

While the French press has welcomed the invitation to France to be represented on the Council of Foreign Ministers set up by the Potsdam Conference and her admission to the Reparations Commission at Moscow, other decisions of the Conference have been viewed more critically. The Minister of Information and the Press Department of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs have given a press conference, in which the results of the Conference are surveyed in the ironical vein familiarly associated with General de Gaulle's own utterances on foreign affairs. In this most of the solutions proposed by the " Big Three " were described as " incomplete and transitory." It was pointed out that the Austrian question was unsolved, that the Straits question was left in suspense and that, " although there was much talk of reparations, the proposals on this subject are not distinguished for their clarity." Moreover, the settlement as a whole was still under " the baneful influence of Yalta. The system of Yalta survives in that, if the five Ministers for Foreign Affairs find themselves in difficulties, the Ministers of the Three Great Powers reserve the right to hold separate meetings. The French Government also protest against their exclusion from the settlement of Balkan and Eastern European questions." The invitation to France to take part in the peace settlement with Italy, while acceptable, was said to have been couched in " rather casual terms." Finally, although the French Government approved the decisions about Germany in so far as concerned disarmament, the purge of Nazi elements, administrative decentralisation and the help to be given to local Governments, they were " especially perturbed " by the apparent intention to maintain German unity. This anxiety has been reflected in the French press, and more than one paper has pointed out that a united Germany has cost France three invasions in seventy-five years. There is also a fear that under the Potsdam arrangements France will get little or nothing by way of reparations, since her zone of occupation in Germany is largely agricultural.

The Consultative Assembly held its last sitting on the 3rd August. General de Gaulle made a short speech at the closing ceremony, in which he congratulated the Assembly on its labours and said that the nation was now approaching a decisive stage in its history when it would again take its destinies into its own hands. " Both you and I have done our duty." The next Assembly with which the General has to deal will be the Assembly produced by the general elections in October, and its powers and functions will be conditioned by the result of the referendum with which there can be little doubt that the General is determined to proceed. It remains to be seen whether the Government will take any account of the Consultative Assembly's recent vote in favour of proportional representation or of the recommendation of the Assembly's Foreign Affairs Commission that they should sever diplomatic relations with Spain.

The Pétain trial still drags on. The manner in which it is conducted has made a sorry impression on the foreign press. Much time has been taken up by irrelevant arguments, such as the protracted debate on the eighth day of the trial between General Weygand and M. Reynaud upon their respective responsibilities in demanding an armistice and urging a cease fire or capitulation in June 1940. Apart from General Weygand the most prominent of the many witnesses to be heard was Pierre Laval, who was flown from Austria (see last Summary under " Spain ") to France on the 1st August, imprisoned at Fresnes, and then brought to the court to give evidence at the request of the jury. Although he embarrassed the defence by his repeated affirmation that he had acted with Pétain's full agreement, the effect of his evidence was to corroborate that of other witnesses in showing that the Marshal, in fact, knew very little of what was going on around him at Vichy and that his opinion on any subject was invariably that of the last person who had spoken to him.

During the year that has passed since the liberation of Paris the economic situation in France has improved far less than might have been expected. The lack of coal and raw materials has been aggravated by the unsatisfactory functioning of the administrative machine and by the unhealthy state of fatigue and apathy which is the legacy of the German occupation. The most pressing food shortages are of sugar, meat and fats, and the French have asked us for immediate loans of sugar and fats in order to meet the rations.

As regards long-term planning M. Pleven has laid great emphasis on the need to modernise industrial methods and equipment. He recently stated in the Consultative Assembly that the average age of French industrial and agricultural equipment was 30 years as against 8 years abroad, and M. Lacoste, the Minister of Production, has declared that the Government plans to invest 70 milliard francs in the manufacture and import of machine-tools.

On the 31st July the Assembly adopted the Government's social security plan, which, it is claimed, will cut down the present costs of administration and pave the way for a simplification of the existing legislation.

Following the agreement on economic co-operation signed earlier this year between France, Belgium, Luxemburg and the Netherlands (see Summary No. 282), a secretariat has now been formed. The French representative will be M. de la Baume, who was head of the economic department at the Quai d'Orsay until 1940 and afterwards Ambassador in Spain and Switzerland. The Ministry for Foreign Affairs has set up a special department to handle questions relating to this agreement, and the officials concerned have made clear their anxiety to keep in touch and in step with the United Kingdom. (See also "Middle East.")

SPAIN.

The statement included in the Report of the Tripartite Conference in Berlin barring Franco Spain from the ranks of the United Nations has dotted the i's and crossed the t's of the Resolution which was adopted in Commission I of the San Francisco Conference (see Summary No. 299). The present Spanish Government stands condemned as unfitted for membership (1) because of "having been founded with the support of the Axis Powers," and (2) on account of "its origins, its nature, its record and its close association with the aggressor States." Nothing could be more categorical. And, for good measure, the régime was openly trounced on the same grounds by an Assistant Secretary of the State Department, Mr. Archibald Macleish, broadcasting on the 4th August from Washington.

This public reproof has unquestionably put the cat among the pigeons. General Franco, who is resting at his country-house in Pazo de Meiras, near La Coruña, at once sent despatch-riders after the Foreign Minister, already on his way to San Sebastian, to obtain from him the full text of the communiqué. (The press version had reported the bare fact of exclusion.) At the week-end an indignant official statement was issued complaining of the "unprecedented allusion" to Spain in the Berlin communiqué, declaring that any such charges were "arbitrary and unjust" (and obviously inspired by the calumnies of expatriate Reds) and invoking the usual claim to have contributed notably to peace ". . . . by having remained neutral, free and independent in the two greatest and most terrible wars which history has recorded." Spain, the statement goes on, "neither begs for a place in international conferences nor would she accept any which was not in consonance with her history, her people and her services to peace and culture." There follows a reference to the occasion when, from a similar sentimiento de honor, the Primo de Rivera régime, in 1926, suspended Spanish membership of the League of Nations.

Some such draft on Spanish pride was only to be expected. But it is a disingenuous performance—and will be so recognised. For the observations of the Big Three are pointedly directed not to Spain but to the present Spanish régime. Italy by contrast—in the same section of the Report—is now regarded as eligible for membership of the United Nations because she has cast off past associations and has what is everywhere recognised to be a democratic Government. Even General Franco must now realise that he has exhausted his credit.

What will he do? His past the Caudillo cannot live down. But we may perhaps witness a speeding-up of the provision of "democratic" trappings. Last week, for instance, there took place the second stage of the "Syndical elections" held in October 1944, the establishment of "Social Reporting Commissions" which in their turn have now elected their representatives on the Standing Committees of the Social Section of the National Syndicalist structure. The next stage of evolution towards a representative system, in the peculiar Franco sense, will be the holding of municipal elections some time next year. In this connexion the press has recently been lavishing its superlatives on the new Local Government Law which was passed by the Cortes on the 14th July. This Ley de Bases, eulogised by General Franco in his speech to the National Council of Falange, as the product of five years of research and discussion, vests the appointment of mayors in the Government, while the remainder of the local councils will be made up of persons elected by heads of families or the syndicates and notables chosen by the respective Civil Governors.

This, of course, is so much wurzel-flummery. More significance attaches to the decision which General Franco now appears to have reached to appoint new men in local executive positions and to separate the position of Civil Governor from that of Provincial Delegate of the Falange Party (see Summary No. 303). One of the first victims, apparently, was to be the able and popular Civil Governor of Barcelona, Señor Correa Veglisón. When the news of his enforced resignation became known the other day, however, there were angry demonstrations in Barcelona, and a small crowd, which had been booing Franco and singing the Falangist hymn, had to be dispersed by mounted police. This sort of thing suggests that the Falange will certainly not take lying down measures designed to strip them of political power. Indeed, since the Allies have shown that they are not impressed by his trimming, General Franco may well desist from even trying to rid himself of the Falange incubus. The truth of the matter is that in Spain to-day, so long as the present régime remains, State and Party are so closely intertwined that "de-falangización" is, necessarily, an empty gesture.

ITALY.

Signor Parri has expressed satisfaction that Italy's efforts to "work her passage" have been recognised at Potsdam. Signor de Gasperi, the Foreign Minister, speaking at the Christian Democratic Party's congress, referred to the question of Italy's future frontiers. Signor de Gasperi drew attention to the general calmness of the Italian people on the question of Trieste and Venezia Giulia but turning to the other area in dispute, the Alto Adige, he stated that he, as a native of Trent, had always been opposed to the Italian frontier being pushed forward to the Brenner. Italy, however, had now spent large sums on hydro-electric plants in the Alto Adige and he explained that the Germans in this area had never had the chance to choose between Fascism and liberty but only between Fascism and Nazism.

A resolution was passed at the Socialist Party Convention to prepare a fusion of the two main working-class parties, the Socialist and the Communist, which will be submitted at the next Socialist Party Convention. Signor Saragat and Signor Silone's resolution in favour of maintaining the Socialist Party's independence only gained a quarter of the votes. It remains, however, to be seen whether in present circumstances this fusion will ever take place and also whether it really meets with Signor Nenni's approval. Signor Nenni is rather inclined to have two points of view, one for public and the other for private consumption.

Subscriptions to the 5 per cent. bond issue are coming in well in Lombardy and Piedmont. That subscriptions to the loan are so satisfactory is thought to be due more to its being considered an important deflationary measure rather than to confidence in the lira, and also to the hope that the forthcoming tax on capital will be in proportion to the success or failure of the loan.

A deputation from the Val d'Aosta, headed by Signor D'Entrèves, late Prefect of the Valley, has been in Rome to negotiate about the conditions of the grant of autonomy. The original demands of the Val d'Aosta were (1) administration and cultural autonomy, (2) all public waters to become the property of the Valley, (3) fiscal autonomy, (4) the Valley to be a free customs zone. These demands were not wholly acceptable to the Italian Government, but it is understood that agreement has been reached on the following:—(1) Administration and cultural autonomy has been granted; (2) the Valley is to be administered by a Council of 25 elected by the Communal Councillors of the towns and villages. The Council to nominate its President and a Giunta of 5. (3) The President of the Council is to assume the powers normally invested in the Prefect. The Council is to be responsible for public order and administration and to be consulted by the Government on all laws and decrees affecting the Valley; (4) French and Italian are to be the official languages; (5) schools are to be under the control of the Valley; (6) the Government is to retain administration of the Army, Justice and Communications; (7) the Budget is to be under the control of the Council; (8) while, in law, all public waters remain State property, full, permanent concessions are to be granted to the Valley; (9) the same concessions are to apply to mines; (10) State forests are to become the property of the Valley; (11) taxes are to remain a State privilege and the Government pledges itself to help the Valley with cost of local public services and reconstruction. The question of the free customs zone is a major issue and has not yet been settled.

Signor Parri has stated that 242,000 tons of coal will be delivered in August. This amounts to about half Italy's present monthly requirements.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

No information has been received on the reaction in Hungary to the decisions of the Potsdam Conference to conclude peace treaties with the ex-satellite States and the possibility of resumption of diplomatic relations with them. Federov, commenting from Moscow on the implications of the decisions for Hungary, said that it would be taken into account that "she has entered upon the road of democracy and that she has a democratic Government which endeavours to comply with the Armistice terms concluded with the Allied Powers."

The Hungarian Government has, however, protested to Voroshilov against the extensiveness of the demands made by the Russians under Article 11 of the Armistice terms, contending that war devastation, the removal of stocks, plant and national and private wealth by the Germans, followed by the appropriation of further stocks and plant by the Russians as war booty, had so reduced the country's productive capacity that it could not fully honour these demands as well as make reparations payments; further, the Government considered that the end of the war in Europe should bring modification of Hungary's liabilities under this article; her obligations should now be confined to providing for the needs of the occupational forces stationed in Hungary.

It is not possible to report the reaction in Hungary to the new decree of the Czechoslovak Government depriving Hungarians of Czech citizenship (see "Czechoslovakia"). Further instances of Hungary's close relations with her other neighbours included a visit of a Trade Union representative to Belgrade to establish contacts between the Hungarian and Yugoslav Trade Unions and a visit to Bucharest of a delegation headed by G. Illyes, President of the Hungarian Writers' Association, to arrange closer cultural relations between the two countries and to discuss the position of Transylvanian Hungarians who have recently earned rebuke for chauvinist activities. There have also been friendly exchanges between Hungarian and Roumanian Civil Servants' Organisations. The first consignment of United States medicines for the Hungarian Red Cross arrived in Hungary.

Roumania.

Roumania, as was to be expected, came in only for a small share of the attention of the Potsdam Conference. The Soviet Government (see the Summary for the 25th July) had already proposed changes in the methods of the Control Commission. The Conference "took note" of this, and "agreed" that the revision of procedure should now be undertaken. However, as far as Roumania is concerned, no change of any importance has yet taken place. The preparation of Peace Treaties with Roumania and other countries is to be proceeded with. It is stated that the conclusion of a Peace Treaty with a "recognised democratic Government" will open the way for membership of the United Nations. The term "democratic" is used several times in the Potsdam communiqué, but is not defined. According to Russia the present government of a communist minority in Roumania is "democratic"; other people take a different view. The communiqué also fails to make it clear what is meant by recognition and who is to do the recognising, and what degree of recognition is to qualify a country for admission to the United Nations.

In the neighbourhood of Brasov are a number of resorts, notably Poiana. The inhabitants of these places depend largely upon visitors for their living. The Prefect of the Judet of Brasov has issued an order forbidding visitors to the district this summer and ordering those who are already there to leave. The district is one of those which have been selected for occupation by Marshal Tolbukhin's army.

Yugoslavia.

Greece and Allied Military Government continued to be violently attacked. The rift between the Italian and the Yugoslav-Communist workers' organisations at Trieste seems to be growing. The latter issued a proclamation denouncing those who asserted that the Yugoslav-sponsored Trade Union committees represented a minority and were the product of faked elections; and their press accused the Italian Unions of being "demagogic" and aloof from the workers. Many stories are current about atrocities by the Yugoslavs and their early return to Trieste, and the Italian population is evidently intimidated.

The Yugoslav Government have requested the withdrawal of the R.A.F. detachment at the Yugoslav aviation school near Zara, and also of the British and American Air Force units at Zemun, near Belgrade, which perform functions of great value to the Allies and to Yugoslavia.

The Yugoslav Government have arranged for a party of British, American, Russian, French and Czech journalists to be brought from Moscow for a conducted tour of Yugoslavia. The party arrived on the 1st August.

The congress of the National Liberation Front (the party supporting the régime) began on the 5th. The Front was described by the Minister of Finance as "the force upon whose shoulders rests the future and policy of our peoples and country." On the 4th the Cabinet adopted the proposed electoral law for the Constituent Assembly, to be submitted to A.V.N.O.J. That A.V.N.O.J. is expected only to sit for three days shows the purely formal nature of this temporary supreme legislature. Moderate elements have expressed regret that the communiqué of the Potsdam Conference did not comment on the failure to carry out the Tito-Shubashitch Agreement.

The Finance Minister, speaking on the Budget, for July to December, emphasised the great expenditure necessary for economic revival and the construction of the State machine. Fortunately the chief industrial areas, in Slovenia and Croatia, had suffered less than other districts. The estimates showed a deficit of 2,700 million dinars. They did not include the costs of reconstruction, nor State economic enterprises. Every source of revenue would have to be exploited. Nevertheless, he said, "We can satisfy pretty well all our country's requirements."

On the 5th a general amnesty to all minor opponents of the régime was published, accompanied by a general remission of part of their penalties to those serving sentences. The decree contains so many qualifications and exceptions that it is not possible to assess its probable effects.

The trial of the Mihailovist leaders (see Summary, No. 304, p. 15) proceeded. The accused were stated to have admitted their guilt. They were also reported to have argued that, when joining Mihailovitch, they had intended to save Serbian lives and to wait for Allied help. A reference by one prisoner to Mihailovitch's contact with the British caused the court to hold a secret session at which so delicate a matter could be heard. Meanwhile the press emphatically declared the accused guilty.

Greece.

The uneasy situation created by M. Sophianopoulos's resignation, Communist and Republican attempts to overthrow the Government, and the continued manifestations of Yugoslav and Soviet hostility, and the general feeling of suspense induced by hopes and fears of a new British attitude towards Greece, have produced the not unfamiliar atmosphere of a political crisis. Royalist politicians, to whose interest it is to keep the present Service Government in being, have so far refrained from fishing in these troubled waters, but the Royalist press, by almost daily leading articles on the imminent "Third War"—i.e., between the Anglo-Americans and the U.S.S.R.—contributes not a little to popular uneasiness. These so-called "revelations" are the more pernicious in that they are represented as the fruits of their authors' recent visit to Great Britain.

The Regent, while anxious to retain the Voulgaris Government, is not averse from replacing the Minister of Justice, the Under-Secretary for War, and possibly the Minister of the Interior. His series of conversations with the political leaders, including the Communists, has led him to the conclusion that the formation of an all-party Government would be impossible, since the Royalists and the majority of Republicans would not sit in the same Cabinet with E.A.M./K.K.E. representatives. Nor is a coalition of all non-Communist parties any more practicable since the Popularist leaders have refused to participate. The Communists have followed up Zachariadis's attack on the Regent (see Summary No. 304) with an almost equally forcible attack on the Republican leaders, MM. Plastiras and Sophoulis in particular, for their overtures to the Royalists. In contradiction of their former offers to support, without participating in, an all-party Government, they now propose that the Central Committee of E.A.M. should take the initiative in forming a representative Government with such Left-wing, Democratic, and Resistance Movement personalities as agree to join them. In the dearth of outstanding non-Communists who would join such a Government, it would be generally regarded in Greece as representative of little but K.K.E. This change of tactics has had little effect on the public demands of Sophoulis and Plastiras for a political Government, but has deprived them of practical significance.

Political uneasiness has inevitably had economic repercussions. The price of the gold pound rose from 14,000 drachmas on the 21st July to 18,000 on the 4th August, and many commodities are becoming scarce, in spite of the steadiness of controlled prices. The Supply Ministry has issued a circular urging the public not to buy food-stuffs at more than controlled prices and appealing for the denunciation of hoarders. The Government is meeting with opposition from manufacturers over its cotton control scheme, designed to ensure the production of utility rather than luxury goods, and with producers and merchants over the control of olive oil. These persons, hoping no doubt that a change of Government will bring with it a lifting of controls, have adopted delaying tactics. Amendments to the extraordinary taxation measures (see Summary No. 299) came into effect on the 2nd August and payments are due by the 10th August. The effect of these amendments will in general be to increase the amounts payable by large industrialists and to give relief to small businesses and devastated areas.

Bulgaria.

In the course of a discussion at the Potsdam Conference about the situation in the Balkans Stalin himself admitted candidly that Bulgaria had done considerable harm to our Allies in Yugoslavia and Greece; that she must be punished for it; that under the Armistice terms Bulgaria was required to pay reparations, and that Russia, together with the other Great Powers, would certainly see to this. There was no mention of such matters in the official communiqué issued at the close of the Conference, which, however, did contain a very vague aspiration that representatives of the Allied press might be admitted to Soviet-controlled ex-enemy countries before long. The question of making peace and establishing diplomatic relations with them is to be examined by the three Governments "in the near future, in the light of the conditions then prevailing."

It was interesting to observe how a month ago, on the eve of the Conference, the Bulgarian Communists received instructions from Moscow urging for once "Surtout pas trop de zèle!" A letter from there, signed by Georgi Dimitrov, appeared in the Sofia press on the 6th July bidding them for the present to devote themselves to the task of healing the dissensions [caused by themselves] within the ranks of the Patriotic Front and to show more toleration and discrimination. Precisely the same tactics were adopted shortly before the Yalta Conference: the same caution and restraint were enjoined then.

Now, however, the dogs are unleashed again: Petkov has been hounded out of the Cabinet: for besides "inciting the peasants against the workers" he had "put personal ambition above national interests and honour" by "signing a document asking for foreign interference in the country's internal affairs"—daring to request, "like the reactionary Polish émigrés," that foreign [United Kingdom and United States] troops should supervise the elections.

It is apparent that those who control what is still called the "Patriotic Front" place great hopes on the change of Government in the United Kingdom. Some very extravagant statements, based on wishful thinking and pure ignorance, have been made on the subject by more than one Bulgarian Minister. Very different in tone was a note dated the 19th July—a week before the results were known—and addressed by the Foreign Minister (Stainov) to the heads of the Allied Control Commission, for transmission to Potsdam. Here complaint was made of "absolute and wilful misrepresentation" by "responsible factions in certain foreign countries"—although "the Bulgarian Government wishes to believe that the Allied Governments would take pains in acquainting themselves with the country's true situation."

The country's true situation would seem to be less tranquil than the Bulgarian Communists like to pretend. It appears, for instance, that at Stara Zagora a number of soldiers belonging to the 12th Infantry Regiment have been arrested on a charge of being supporters of Dr. G. M. Dimitrov; that at Karlovo over seventy people have been arrested for belonging to unauthorised armed bands; and that at Yambol a big meeting was recently organised by the Communists, when all members of the party in the district were called upon to put themselves at the disposal of the Militia in order to help in dealing with similar armed bands there. But with roughly 14 Bulgarian divisions still armed in the country, as well as about 12 Russian divisions and 300 aircraft to support them in case of need, it ought not to be too difficult for the Militia to maintain the sort of order which they desire.

Turkey.

Turkey's interest in the Potsdam Conference was centred upon an expected pronouncement on the recent Russian proposals. The silence of the communiqué on this subject was a disappointment; but on the other hand some satisfaction was expressed that no decisions had, apparently, been taken in Turkey's absence, upon questions which primarily concerned her. It was presumed that these questions had been referred to the Council of Foreign Ministers which is to meet shortly in London, where Turkey would be given an opportunity of expressing her views.

Mr. Yalçin continued his outspoken criticism of Russian policy in Tanin. In Vatan, a newspaper of the left, Mr. Yalman called for a more moderate and friendly attitude toward Russia. Nevertheless, he expressed approval of Mr. Yalçin's warnings, which had aroused public opinion and had strengthened Turkey's defensive forces. Having decided with dignity and courage to meet every emergency, Turkey should, Mr. Yalman declared, prove her good will in her negotiations with Russia by going to the limit of conciliation.

A Tass telegram from Bucarest described a meeting of "several thousand Armenian refugees from Turkey" which was alleged to have taken place in the Roumanian capital. Violent speeches were stated to have been made on the subject of Turkey's brutality to the Armenians; and the incorporation of the ancient Armenian lands in the Armenian Soviet Republic was demanded.

Two articles have recently appeared in the Turkish press—one by Dr. Rüştü Aras, a former Foreign Minister—drawing attention to the strategic importance for Turkey of the Dodecanese and advocating the grant of autonomy to the islands. The articles aroused some resentment in Greece. The Greek Press Department issued a statement expressing surprise at the publication of the articles and declaring that they did not represent the feelings of the Turkish people on the future of the islands. The Central Committee of the Dodecanese Islands was reported to have sent telegrams to President Inönü and Mr. Saracoğlu protesting against the views expressed by the Turkish press.

On his way home from San Francisco the Turkish Foreign Minister stopped at Beirut where he was warmly welcomed. It is understood that the question of recognition by Turkey of the independence of the two Syrian Republics was examined by the representatives of the Turkish and Lebanese Governments. Although Turkey has been in sympathy with the aspirations of the two Republics, she has hitherto withheld her recognition because of Syrian claims to Alexandretta. It was reported that the Lebanon will send a delegation to Angora to mediate on Turco-Syrian differences.

It is reported from Angora that the Turkish Government has decided to recognise the Polish Government in Warsaw.

A Commission from the Ministry of Communications is about to leave for Britain to place orders, valued at £300,000, on behalf of Turkey's mercantile marine.

It was reported in Angora that a regular aeroplane passenger service would be maintained throughout the winter between Angora, Istanbul and Smyrna.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Reference to revision of the Anglo-Egyptian treaty was made by the Egyptian Prime Minister, Nokrashi Pasha, in a speech in the Senate on the 6th August. "We have not the least doubt," said Nokrashi, "that Britain shares with Egypt the conviction that the moment is propitious for such negotiations. There remains only the question of the date of the negotiations." But whether the Egyptian Government will press the matter in the immediate future remains to be seen.

On the anniversary of King Farouk's assumption of constitutional power (29th July), substantial gifts of money from the Royal Family were announced for the foundation of a "University City" in Egypt; while on the following day the King entertained a number of students, upon whom he is said to have impressed the importance of their bearing in mind the welfare of the poorer classes both in town and village.

The Egyptian public were greatly impressed by the sweeping victory of the Labour Party in the recent British elections. While sympathising with Mr. Churchill, many people paid tribute to the result of the elections as a convincing manifestation of democracy. Representatives of the Parliamentary Opposition party suggest that such an example might well be followed by Egypt; supporters of the Government, on the other hand, are thought to be afraid lest the new British Government may wish to encourage a more practical application of the principles of democracy in Egypt.

Now that a Labour Government is in power, fears have been expressed in Egypt, as elsewhere in the Arab world, that a more favourable attitude will be shown by His Majesty's Government to Zionist aspirations in Palestine. Arab fears on this score will not be removed by the final passage of Dr. Weizmann's speech at the opening of the World Zionist Conference in London on the 1st August. This was the first occasion since 1939 that the various and widely scattered sections of the Zionist movement had been able to assemble under one roof, and delegates attended from Central Europe, Palestine, America and all the liberated countries.

Dr. Weizmann, who presided, began by saying that their reunion took place in the shadow of the greatest Jewish catastrophe that had befallen their people since the destruction of the Temple. The great and powerful European Jewry of ten or fifteen years ago was no more. Palestine was indeed the one hope for their perishing people in Europe. It was the only country where Jews had been given the opportunity of organising their war effort on a national scale. Referring to the White Paper of 1939, Dr. Weizmann said that the most tragic result of this policy had been the preventable loss of life. Had it not been for the impediments placed in their way by the White Paper policy, tens of thousands of Jews, over and above the 65,000 that Palestine had been able to admit during the war, might have been saved. The White Paper set a gulf between the British Government and the Jewish people.

"Our appeal," went on Dr. Weizmann, "goes out to all the United Nations, and more especially to the two major allies of Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R., on whose harmonious collaboration the hopes of the world are to-day pinned, to give their approval and active support for the righting of an ancient wrong." Most urgent of all was the question of immigration, upon which a decision should be given speedily. From all corners of Europe the outcry for immigration permits was persistent and growing. The immigration quota under the White Paper was practically exhausted. Were they to read over the gates of Palestine "No Jews need apply"? Finally, in reference to the new British Government, Dr. Weizmann said that Zionists recalled with gratification the unequivocal support given to them by the leaders of the Labour Party, the solid vote of that Party against the White Paper in 1939, and the recent resolutions of the Labour Party conference endorsing their political aims.

Dr. A. H. Silver followed this up later by saying that now Mr. Roosevelt was dead and Mr. Churchill out of office, he was glad to know that the Labour Party stood pledged to support Zionism. "If our rights are denied us," said Dr. Silver, "we shall fight for them. We want a Jewish State, not a shadow of statehood. We shall not resort to terrorism, but the Government will have to use violence to enforce the White Paper régime."

Superficially at any rate the situation in the Levant States has slightly improved. But the feeling against the French has in no way seriously diminished. The Syrians are convinced that recent French action was intended to coerce them into signing an unequal treaty, and thus to perpetuate French control, which was originally imposed upon them by force and against their will, and which they have increasingly resented ever since. They are therefore as much opposed as ever to resuming negotiations with the French until all threat of French force is removed.

While in the Lebanon the feeling of the Christians and especially of the Maronites may be less antipathetic to the French, mainly on religious grounds, the desire for independence is as strong as it is in Syria. Too much attention need not perhaps be paid to the recent letter to the Monde from the Maronite Patriarch (see Summary No. 303 under "France"), in which he expressed a desire for an independent Lebanon under the special protection of France, but it is noteworthy that the signatories of the letter to The Times on the 25th July from the Lebanese-Syrian press delegation now on a visit to this country, dissociating themselves from the Patriarch's views, did not include the editor of Al-Hadiss, himself a prominent Maronite.

While the political situation in the Lebanon has been markedly calmer during the last few months than in Syria, there is little doubt that the general attitude of the Lebanese as regards negotiations with the French is in line with that of the Syrians, though the Governments of both States would no doubt be ready, after the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales is completed, to discuss with the French authorities any further unilateral concessions that the French Government might be willing to offer. It is indeed highly improbable that local negotiations for a final settlement will take place with any prospect of success before some considerable time has elapsed. Meanwhile the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales is nearing completion, but there is a large number of so-called "Avenantaires," estimated at between 3,000 and 6,000, who have expressed the wish to remain under French control, but of whom many it is believed may change their minds and elect to remain in Syria.

The situation in the Barzan area of Iraqi Kurdistan is once more giving cause for anxiety. Mulla Mustafa is again on the march with some 150 armed followers, and his truculence and defiance of authority have convinced the Iraqi Cabinet that unless he is finally suppressed there will be no peace in the north. While this is probably true, punitive action against Mulla Mustafa must be properly planned and prepared if it is to be effective. An adequate force must be assembled and other arrangements put in hand. The Iraqi Government has been advised by us accordingly, and has been urged not to take precipitate action. At the same time a warning has been sent to Mulla Mustafa by His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, telling him that, if he persists in ignoring it, the consequences will be upon his own head.

As by the 2nd August the Soviet Ambassador at Tehran had still received no instructions from Moscow, His Majesty's Ambassador informed the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs of the decision reached at Potsdam that British and Russian forces would be withdrawn from Tehran at once. This news caused serious disappointment to the Persian Minister, who had been confidently hoping for much more. He wondered why he had heard nothing on the matter from the Soviet Ambassador, and thought that it would be unwise for the Persian Government to make any public announcement before receiving confirmation from the Soviet Government. The next day, when we informed the Soviet Ambassador of the communication made to the Persian Foreign Minister, he had still received no instructions on the matter.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 6th August it was announced in Washington that the first atomic bomb to be used in war had been dropped on the city of Hiroshima in Honshu. Thirty-six hours later it was reported that an impenetrable cloud of dust and smoke still covered the area, making accurate observation of the damage impossible. The new bomb was stated to have an explosive equivalent of 20,000 tons of T.N.T. and a blast power more than 2,000 times that of the heaviest bomb previously used. The Japanese Cabinet met on the 7th August and Tokyo radio admitted that a bomb "of a new type" had caused "considerable damage" at Hiroshima.

The announcement of the use of the new weapon has naturally had the effect of greatly increasing the already widespread expectation in this country and in the United States that the end of the Far Eastern war is close at hand. It is indeed possible that the frightfulness of the atomic bomb added to the continual outpouring of ordinary explosives and incendiaries may suddenly crack Japanese morale and produce an early capitulation. It is, however, too soon yet to estimate the effect on the Japanese capacity for resistance, firstly because it is not yet known whether the bombs are available in sufficient numbers for keeping up anything like a bombardment, and secondly, because, according to an explosives expert in New York quoted by the Daily Telegraph, the atomic bomb is essentially a "super-blast" and not a penetrating weapon. The terrific blasts it produces may wreak unprecedented havoc on the surface of the earth, but this may merely intensify the previous tendency of aerial bombardment to retransform mankind into troglodytes. A few years ago it was inconceivable to the normal human mind that a nation could carry on as an organised entity with its principal cities reduced to rubble, but Germany's performance has already shown that human beings under ruthless leadership are more adaptable in this respect than had been generally supposed. Factories can be put underground and a "dehoused" population can still live in tunnels, trenches and foxholes; life and industry may thus be reduced both literally and metaphorically to a very low level, but resistance to an invader is still possible as long as the will remains. In their defence of various positions in Pacific islands the Japanese have shown a mole-like propensity for digging themselves in; according to a recent report from a reliable source the force of 38,000 men holding the Rabaul area in New Britain had a system of caves and tunnels of a total length of 150 miles.

Japanese publicity has been dwelling on the "utter cruelty" of the bomber offensive against Japanese cities and has claimed that the majority of the victims have been women and children. It was stated that of 540 people killed in a raid on Toyohashi 323 were women and 159 children. These figures are not remarkable, considering the high proportion of adult males who would be absent on military service. By American claims more than 100 square miles of built-up urban areas have now been burnt out, and all the principal cities, with the exception of Kyoto, have been visited.

Although the Japanese newspapers have gathered some consolation from the fact that the U.S.S.R. did not participate in the Potsdam declaration calling upon their country to surrender to the Allies, and although they continue to harp on the invincibility of their country to invasion, it has not been always easy for them to hide their gloom. On the 2nd August the Mainichi, in an editorial, declared that "The Japanese people are now in the middle of their greatest trial since the foundation of the Empire. Arrogant enemy attacks have been continuing day and night by sea and air. However, it is impossible to decide the outcome of the war simply by the bombing of towns . . . . The fact that Japan has had to make certain cuts in staple food rations owing to the decisive battle has meant a serious trial for our spirits. Moreover, the international situation surrounding Japan does not warrant any optimism . . . . Frankly, we had been under the impression that the war was to be fought on foreign territory. The Sino-Japanese war and the Russo-Japanese war were fought on foreign soil and the Manchurian and Chinese 'affairs' were no exceptions. Even the East Asia War was fought in the initial stage on foreign territory . . . . Now it is clear that the rise or fall of the Empire is to be decided by fighting on or around the mainland. Only by fortifying the mainland and smashing the invading enemy can we hope to protect our land and achieve our great mission of liberating and rebuilding Asia. We must master without flinching the cruel and unprecedentedly serious trial."

Japanese transmissions continue to direct much attention to, and to draw unconcealed satisfaction from, the aggravated conflict between Chungking and Yenan. They speak of the "political dilemma" now facing Chiang Kai-shek, who, it is alleged, cannot prevent his "high-ranking generals" from carrying out an anti-Communist policy, which he had himself fostered in the past, despite his appreciation of the "dire necessity of coming to terms with Soviet Russia." Yenan is represented as opposing the idea of American landings in China, "as they would eventually strengthen United States imperialism in China." The puppet Shun Pao (Shanghai), discussing the prospects of peace between China and Japan, follows the Japanese lead and says that all Chinese are opposed to the landing of American troops in their country and are "yearning for peace." The Hsi Chung Kuo Pao (Shanghai) remarks that, if Chungking were to launch a peace campaign "on the basis of justice towards Japan," peace might be realised and that the Soviet Union would "certainly welcome it more heartily than any peace imposed by the Anglo-Americans." Domei professes satisfaction at the first speech of Chungking's new Foreign Minister, Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, at a foreign press conference after taking over his new post, especially his declaration that Chungking was fighting Japan not with the idea of "vengeance," but to see that the "requirements" of justice and security were adequately met. "Wang's utterance impressed the foreign correspondents as being relatively mild, compared to the vindictive statements on Japan issued hitherto by Chungking leaders," was the Japanese comment.

While Japan makes every effort to conciliate Russia and avoid any Press or radio comment which might offend Moscow, Japan's Nanking puppets, with an eye on Chungking, continue to beat the anti-Communist drum. Chen Kung-po recently declared in a press interview that the aims of his "Government" were "peace, anti-communism and establishment of the nation." The Nanking puppets presumably hope, on the collapse of Japan, to work their passage by making common cause with Chungking against the Communists on the lower Yangtze; these would be embarrassing allies for Chungking, but, failing a definite settlement with Yenan, Chungking may not be in a position to refuse their services.

The fighting in Shensi between Chungking troops and Communists appears to have died down, but mutual recriminations continue. At Chungking, as reported in last week's Summary, Dr. T. V. Soong has taken over from Dr. H. H. Kung the vice-chairmanship of the Board of Control of the Four Government Banks, while relinquishing the Ministry for Foreign Affairs to Dr. Wang Shih-chieh. By giving up the Foreign Ministry Soong will be able to give more time to economic affairs, which are extremely urgent and in which his special field of competence lies. He has, however, returned to Moscow together with Wang Shih-chieh for renewed negotiations with the Soviet Government, and it may be that one of the motives for the change of Foreign Minister was to provide Soong, who is too independent politically for the Generalissimo's liking, with a regulator who, while liberal-minded and progressive in outlook, is also a man in good Kuomintang party standing and from Chiang's point of view more reliable.

News has now begun to trickle through from the Philippines, where the political scene is at present dominated by the economic difficulties with which the Islands are faced following three years of occupation and exploitation by the Japanese; by the immense destruction wrought in Manila and in other major cities during the battles for their liberation; and by the threatened withdrawal of American economic protection. The only source which can provide the compensation for war damages, the capital equipment and the skill and energy necessary for reconstruction is the United States, which is at once the main supplier and the main market of foreign trade on which the rehabilitation of the Philippines must depend. Many Filipinos, encouraged by speeches of some American politicians, appear to believe that American assistance will be limitless; but others fear that even a generous America may not adequately cushion the shock of separation from the American tariff area. On the whole, independence has decreased in popularity, since it has been made clear both by Senator Tydings and by President Osmena, that the United States Government was determined to grant it not later than July 1946 in any circumstances, and that the Filipino Government will not be permitted to change its mind at the last minute if the balance sheet looks favourable. A Commission headed by Senator Tydings with a strong delegation of American experts visited Manila in May, in order to examine on the spot conditions relevant to the future of American-Filipino relations, and to decide upon the programme of American assistance, which has not yet been made public.

President Osmena announced on the 25th May that the National Elections would be held in the Philippines in November 1945. There appear to be at present three discernible political groupings in the country. The first of these consists of President Osmena and his entourage, politically affiliated with Cebu and the Visayas, whose strength lies in the confidence which the American Administration places in them, but who, like other Governments from exile, are not entirely in touch with popular sentiment; secondly, there are the guerrillas, whose strength is an unknown factor, and who will not willingly give up the position which their gallant lawlessness has won for them in the provinces—Mr. Thomas Confesor, first Secretary of the Interior, is their principal representative in Manila; lastly, there are the remnants of the old Quezón faction, whose main strength is in Luzon and who probably comprise the most capable politicians and administrators in the country, but who have been greatly weakened both by the recent death of their leader and by the complete or partial defection of many of their number to the Japanese. The principal figure of this group in future is likely to be Brigadier-General Manuel Roxás, Secretary of Finance in the last Admiinstration before the Japanese invasion.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The United States is eagerly awaiting President Truman's forthcoming broadcast to the nation. In response to questions from the press representatives who are accompanying him on the U.S.S. Augusta, the President is reported as stating flatly that there were no secret agreements of any kind resulting from the Three-Power Conference. Meanwhile, the preliminary American comment on the lengthy Potsdam Declaration, which proved too complicated to be taken at one gulp, is mixed and cautious. On the whole, it has been greeted by the press and radio with approval though not with any great enthusiasm. The tendency is to appraise it as much for what it omits as for what it contains.

There is disappointment over the silence on Russia's rôle in the Pacific, though this is alleviated to some extent by the terse reference in the final paragraphs of the Declaration, which refer to the meetings of the Chiefs of Staff "on military matters of common interest." It has also been noted that one of the points in favour of Italy is that she has declared war on Japan. Incidentally, the friendly reference to Italy is welcomed and the concession of lenient terms to the mother country of an important section of the American population is seen as a victory for the United States. Attention has been drawn to other areas omitted from the declaration which are frankly seen as "danger spots": in particular Yugoslavia, Austria, the Rhineland, Persia and the Dardanelles. The New York Times assumes that the silence on those issues indicates disagreement.

On the whole, however, there is general satisfaction that the declaration stands as a proof of "the high degree of understanding" and unified policy reached at the Tripartite Conference. It is seen, moreover, as the end of the purely war phase in the relationship of the Allies, for the triumvirate "has given place to a Council organised on a broader base, broader even than the addition of the two Powers suggests," according to the New York Times, "for the inclusion of France brings a European State into the negotiations deciding the fate of Europe, and the inclusion of China, gives Asia a voice in the reorganisation of the world." The establishment of the Council of Foreign Ministers with a secretariat in London is hailed as a most important step in providing the necessary machinery for the transition period.

While the full implications of the German sections have not yet been digested and have still to receive detailed analysis, they have been generally approved as imposing hard but not intolerable terms on Germany. (Mr. David Lawrence is one of the few critics who maintains that the reparations provisions impose impossible conditions on Germany and will "promote anarchy".) "The Germany of blood and iron and conquest is gone. Germany will be weak. The rest of Europe will be strong" is the way one radio commentator summed it up. "Germany, with all its conventional attributes of nationhood—Government, army, industrial apparatus, educational system and so on," declares the New York Herald-Tribune, "is put into bankruptcy." There has, however, been some Congressional criticism at the idea of forced German labour, and it is possible that this issue and the reparations question, as a whole, may yet prove to be a source of trouble.

Not unnaturally, the press and radio have welcomed the promise to provide freedom of reporting in Poland and Eastern Europe. The Washington Post expresses the hope that this agreement will usher in a new period of free communication of information.

The condemnation of Franco-Spain is everywhere approved, and this is hailed by P.M. as the "most dramatic and hopeful decision of the conference."

The most severe critic to date is Senator Taft (Republican, Ohio) who declares that President Truman has "assumed to speak for the United States in settling many of the most controversial boundaries and terms to be imposed upon Germany without consultation with the Senate or the people" of the United States. And he assumes that "all other questions will be settled by the Council of Foreign Ministers." The transfer of East Prussia to Poland will, he maintains, sow the seeds of a future war. Grudgingly he concedes, however, that the provision for the administration of Germany "accords with the general opinion of the people of the United States."

It is likely that further study of the Declaration may cause modifications of the views so far expressed, but the first reaction in the United States seems favourable and the establishment of machinery for the conclusion of treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland, as well as for dealing with the manifold problems which will arise in the transition period, is generally applauded. It is felt that Potsdam has opened up new fields of potential co-operation, and that this is perhaps its major accomplishment. As the New York Times says: "No one weighing the communiqué as a whole can doubt that in the realm of international co-operation we have moved a long way from Teheran and Yalta."

The ultimatum to Japan which was issued earlier from Potsdam continues to be acclaimed, but as a "clarification" rather than a "modification" of the unconditional surrender formula. Failure to call for measures against Emperor Hirohito is however criticised. Japan's rejection of the terms was not unexpected and caused no great concern.

Congress is now in recess. Both Houses will return to work on the 8th October. In reviewing the work of the last session, Senator Barkley, the Democratic leader, said that although the Senate had been prompt in dealing with matters of foreign policy its accomplishments in dealing with domestic problems had not been remarkable. He went on to outline some of the "more pressing problems" awaiting attention. They include the organisation of the executive branch of Government; the extension of unemployment compensation; the emergency Federal Housing programme; changes in the administration of the Surplus War Property Board; the full employment programme; the extension of the social security programme; tax reduction and the economic bill of rights for servicemen which was recommended by President Roosevelt in January 1944.

A denial of reports that the Administration had immediate plans to ask Congress to approve large credits to Britain has been issued by Mr. Grew, the Acting Secretary of State, who told Mr. Emmanuel Celler (Democrat, New York) that Britain had not approached the State Department about a loan. Nevertheless he declared that the United States should help to solve British financial problems "in all reasonable ways. . . . Any credit granted should be backed by satisfactory arrangements with respect to the timely relaxation of restrictive financial and trade practices which had grown of necessity during the war."

Senator Hiram Johnson (Republican, California) one of the most ardent of American isolationists, has died at the age of 79. A few days ago he announced that he did not agree with the ratification by the Senate of the United Nations Charter. In 1944 President Roosevelt described Senator Johnson as one of the Senators who killed international co-operation in 1920.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine Government have issued three decrees which approve and bring into force the Statute for Political Parties (see Summary No. 296), though with certain modifications. The main changes in the Statute are the suspension of proposed alterations in the old Sáenz Peña electoral law, the abandonment of the section dealing with the punishment of electoral crimes, and the recognition of the special claims of long-established political parties. (This last point simply means that new parties or fractions of old parties will not be allowed to steal accepted party names by getting in first with registration.) But the Government has clung to its plan for the introduction of "electoral courts," a novelty which has aroused opposition because the new electoral magistrature will obviously be Government appointed and can influence the reorganisation of parties and the acceptance of candidates. The Government have denied that the electoral courts will infringe the jurisdiction of the national courts. They have also promised to raise the state of siege "in due course."

The Nación has pointed out that this electoral propaganda cannot in any case begin without the raising of the state of siege. But the Minister for the Interior, in addressing journalists, refused to give a date for lifting the state of siege, and admitted that the decree prohibiting political activities had not yet been annulled, though he maintained that the Government were leading up to this. He added that the question of women's suffrage (see last week's Summary) would require separate legislation. He left it to the Supreme Court to decide whether the Communist Party could function under the Statute. According to press reports, however, Rear-Admiral Teisaire received the legal representative of the forbidden Communist Party and, while referring the legal question to the Supreme Court, told him that the police would no longer persecute the Communists.

The circumstances in which the new decrees were promulgated give some scope for speculation. It was freely rumoured at the end of July that there would be changes in the Government, including the departure of Colonel Perón, either under compulsion or voluntarily, in order to devote himself to his political campaign. According to press and wireless reports, a group of high naval and army officers visited General Farrell and dissociated themselves from the Government's internal policy as pursued by Colonel Perón, asking for immediate elections; one version of this interview was that the Army and Navy would support General Farrell in his decision to call elections, as long as no member of the present Government stood. An official communiqué, however, states that "the meetings of admirals and generals called by President Farrell some days ago to ascertain their views on the Government's political orientation have emphasised the absolute unity of aims among members of the Government and the solidarity of the armed forces with them." In any case, the promulgation of the Statute for Political Parties was closely followed by the appointment of a new Minister for the Interior. Since the resignation of the obnoxious General Perlinger, over a year ago, this post has been held, conjointly with the Ministry of Marine, by Rear-Admiral Teisaire. The portfolio of the Interior now goes to Dr. José Hortensio Quijano, a Radical associated with the late President Irigoyen. It may help the Government to have detached someone from the Radical Party.

Meanwhile the campaign of defamation against the United States Ambassador has proved completely contraproducente: representatives of the trade unions have called on Mr. Braden to express their disapproval, and to assure him that the vast majority of the Argentine people are in sympathy with him and his country. Colonel Perón has harangued his tame unions, but it seems clear that some of the gilt is off his gingerbread.

In Brazil, the Minister for War, General Eurico Dutra, has been relieved of his duties, and General Goes Monteiro has been appointed in his stead. It thus appears that General Dutra will present his candidature for the presidential election in December.

It is reported from Brazil that a meeting of Foreign Ministers of the American Republics will be held at Petropolis in October, for the purpose of elaborating the agreement of Chapultepec.

UNITED NATIONS.

The Potsdam Conference (17th July–2nd August)—now officially designated the Tripartite Conference of Berlin—has resulted in agreement between the Governments of Great Britain, the United States and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics both as to the method whereby the European peace settlement is to be worked out, and also as to certain elements in the substance of that settlement.

The method of peace-making foreshadowed in the report of the Conference differs significantly from the practice of 1919. After the first World War the representatives of all the Allied Powers, great and small alike, assembled in Paris without prior agreement between the great Allied Powers on the substantive territorial and economic problems. The unwieldy Conference was confronted with the entire range of questions involved in the peace settlement. For the new settlement a more circumspect procedure is proposed. The peace treaties are to be drawn up by a Council composed of the Foreign Ministers of the five principal Powers. It is not proposed that the Foreign Ministers shall participate equally in the preparation of each treaty; the responsibility is assigned to those Foreign Ministers whose Governments have signed the terms of surrender with the enemy State concerned, with the proviso, however, that other Members of the Council will be called in when matters concerning them are under discussion and that France specifically shall participate in the making of the settlement with Italy. Provision is also made for the participation of States not members of the Council in the discussion of questions of direct concern to them, while the eventual submission of the draft treaties to the United Nations as a whole is envisaged. A joint secretariat for the Council is to be established in London, where the Council will normally meet. This flexible organisation of the Council will facilitate full and frank exploration of individual problems between the Powers concerned.

As regards Germany, progress towards a settlement lies not in the formulation of terms but in the tutelage of the German people under the régime of occupation. The purposes of the occupation are defined: the positive aim of the reintegration of a peaceful and democratic Germany within the international community crowns the negative aims of complete disarmament and the eradication of Nazi influences. With a view to the pursuit of "a co-ordinated allied policy toward defeated Germany," political and economic principles are enunciated for the guidance of the Allied Control Council. The political rules are far-reaching: uniformity of treatment throughout Germany, control of education, the establishment of the impartial rule of law, freedom (subject to military exigencies) of speech and of association, encouragement of political decentralisation through the restoration of democratic local self-Government, without central Government for the time being save for certain essential central administrative departments under the direction of the Control Council. The broad economic rules are that, in the reorganisation of German economy, the development of agriculture and peaceful domestic industries is to be accentuated; the production of arms, aircraft and sea-going ships is to be prevented; other industrial production of direct military importance is to be controlled and restricted; and German authorities are as far as possible to be made responsible for the administration of such economic controls as may be necessary for the achievement of Allied objectives.

These political and economic principles foreshadow the nature of the eventual settlement with Germany. Other pointers are the sections on Reparations and on the territorial claims of the Soviet Union and Poland. (See under "Poland" and "Germany.")

United Nations Organisation.

The Berlin Conference has also resulted in agreement concerning the admission to the United Nations Organisation of States other than those entitled to join as original members. Support is to be given by the three Governments to applications for membership from suitable neutral States—Spain under its present Government being specifically excepted from this category—and from Italy and minor enemy States after the conclusion of peace treaties with recognised democratic Governments.

The meeting of the Executive Committee of the Reparatory Commission of the United Nations Organisation, which was to have been held in London on the 9th August, has been postponed for a week at the request of the United States Government.

Educational and Cultural Organisation.

In November it is proposed to hold in London a conference with a view to the establishment of an Educational and Cultural Organisation in association with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Draft proposals for its constitution prepared by the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education in co-operation with the United States Government have been distributed. The principal functions of the organisation would be to facilitate consultation among educational and cultural leaders, to assist in the free flow of ideas and information among the peoples of the world, to foster the growth of educational and cultural programmes which support peace and security, to develop and make available educational and cultural plans, to conduct and encourage research on educational and cultural problems, and to assist countries that require help in developing their educational and cultural activities. The term "cultural" is used in a broad sense to include all that relates to the sciences, the humanities and the arts.

GERMANY.

IT is still too early to gauge the full effect of the Berlin Conference declaration of the 2nd August on either the political or the economic future of Germany. At the moment the mass migration westwards of dispossessed Germans from the territories east of the Oder and Neisse, which are now recognised as under Polish administration, threatens to overshadow all other developments in both Berlin and the surrounding Russian zone. Such is the magnitude of this migration that even the combined local resources of the Red Army have apparently been impotent to enforce Marshal Zhukov's order of the 27th July forbidding the entry of the refugees into the Berlin area. According to the assistant director of the Berlin Municipal Department for evicted persons, Dr. Karl Baier, there are anything up to 6 million persons still on the move in Eastern Germany; and between 25,000 and 30,000 have been arriving daily in the German capital. Deaths from malnutrition, especially among the children, are said to be numerous. Vast congregations of refugees from the East are stated to be held up near the boundaries of the British and American zones, which are now sealed against them pending the final repatriation of displaced Allied nationals. Reports of conditions in the territories from which the refugees have been expelled are at the moment equally disconcerting. One of the few Allied press correspondents so far able to record his observations in the territory east of the Oder states that the country is dead, the towns apparently empty and the fields untended. Unharvested crops are rotting as a result of the inability of the authorities to bring in Polish settlers at anything like the rate at which they have been expelling the Germans, and Polish officials admit that a large part of the harvest may be lost. All evidence received so far would seem to confirm that the local Polish military commanders are not responding fully to the Allied request to suspend expulsions pending further study of the situation by the Control Council.

Evictions from Danzig are stated to be taking place street by street. No large-scale expulsions, however, have apparently been attempted from the port area of Stettin, where all hands are needed for the work of reconstruction, but where the food situation is reported to be very grave.

A few German democratic leaders from the Polish-occupied East who have managed to survive the Nazi terror are at present endeavouring to rebuild their political futures in Berlin or the West. The former editor of the Königsberger Volkszeitung, Werner Lufft, who was one of the Social Democratic Deputies for East Prussia in the Reichstag up to 1933, is now helping to reorganise his party in Berlin. The former Social Democratic Police President of Königsberg, Dr. Tietze, has become Oberbürgermeister of Regensburg. The new Social Democratic President of the Province of Brandenburg, Dr. Steinhoff, also originates from East Prussia, where he held office as Oberpräsident up to 1933. Hans Ziegler, the former metal workers' leader in Breslau and Social Democratic representative of that city in the Reichstag, has just been installed as Bürgermeister of Nürnberg (the new Oberbürgermeister being a local Social Democrat, Martin Treu).

Some of the major difficulties of meeting the Soviet Union's reparations claim of 25 per cent. of the industrial capital equipment in the British and American zones that is not needed for the work of reconstruction are already becoming apparent. In the British and American zones of Berlin the situation has been complicated by the wholesale removal by the Russians of equipment before the inter-Allied declaration of the 2nd August had been agreed upon. 90 per cent. of the machinery, plant and raw materials of factories in the British zone had already been removed, with the result that the early resumption of any form of production there will be impossible. Of the 50,000 persons previously employed by the two great Siemens concerns, only 250 are stated to have been put back to work so far, and then only on the manufacture of crude agricultural implements. As regards the zones of Western Germany, one expert has suggested that there is no plant or machinery available for reparations if the country is to be permitted anything like the peace economy which the Berlin declaration has envisaged. The Ruhr is said to need the whole of its damaged industrial capacity to be able to pull its weight in even a limited economic revival. The demand for its iron and steel products, particularly heavy bridges, locomotives and coal wagons, is likely to remain considerable for a long time to come.

One of the first big public demonstrations to pledge acceptance by the German people of the Berlin declaration was held by representatives of the four political parties in the Great Hall of the Berlin broadcasting station on the 12th August. Speakers included the Oberbürgermeister of Berlin, Dr. Werner, who welcomed this first big rally of the new "united front" as a "landmark in the revival of German political life"; the Chairman of the German Communist Party, Wilhelm Pieck, who appealed to the Germans to accept reparations "without argument or indignation"; and the leader of the Christian Democratic Union, Dr. Andreas Hermes, whose recent resignation as head of the Berlin food administration (see last week's Summary) does not appear, after all, to have seriously prejudiced his political future, and who expressed a hope that the "world-wide religious bodies which were represented in Germany" would see their way clear to assist with her rehabilitation. An unnamed Social Democratic spokesman praised as another "historic turning-point in German political life" the decision of the Communists not to call for the establishment of the Soviet system in Germany. In a joint declaration, published at the conclusion of the demonstration, the four parties pledged themselves to see that the Germans "accept responsibility for the results of the Hitlerite régime and the abominable consequences of Hitler's war" and "avoid the mistakes made after 1918" (when even the Left spent considerable time demonstrating that, whatever Germany was called upon to pay in the form of reparations, she could not pay it).

An optimistic picture of reconstruction in the former Prussian Province of Saxony (Provinz Sachsen), which suggested that the Soviet authorities are so far well satisfied with their recent decision to set up native territorial administrations throughout their zone, was provided by the Berlin radio on the 8th August. The mines, especially the rich copper mines of this region, were stated to be working again, the "factory chimneys smoking," and passenger and goods trains running. Prussian Saxony was "one of the best-preserved provinces in Germany." The Soviet authorities had encouraged the Province to become "autonomous," with Halle as its capital (and not Magdeburg, as previously). Their decision to appoint the pre-Nazi Landeshauptmann, Dr. Friedrich Huebener, as President of the Province had apparently been a happy one. Although describing himself as an adherent of the long-extinct Democratic Party, Dr. Huebener is better known as an economist and as the author of one of the first comprehensive studies of the Soviet system to appear in Germany after the last war. A brief announcement of the establishment of German provincial administrations in Prussian Saxony and in Thuringia (the latter with its capital at Weimar) was originally made on the 17th July. Since then the pattern of German government in the Russian zone at the higher level has been completed, the decision to set up provincial and regional administration in Brandeburg, Mecklenburg and the State of Saxony (Land Sachsen, with its capital at Dresden and separated since 1815 from the Prussian Provinz Sachsen referred to above) having been announced on the 4th July (see Summary No. 301). The picture of German government in the Russian zone outside Berlin now remains most obscure at its lowest level—that of the Commune (Gemeinde). In the rural areas, it would seem that the Russians intend the peasant co-operatives to have an important voice in the government of the community. The Raiffeisen Co-operatives, which were originally formed in the latter half of the 19th century as an instrument of self-help among the peasants and which managed to weather the storms of the Nazi period much better than many other German economic institutions, are referred to with particular approval by the Russian-controlled press and radio. They are said to have united the peasants against the Nazis and to have "always conformed to strictly democratic principles."

Considerable progress towards the institution of a centrally-directed agricultural economy in the British zone has now been made with the establishment at Obernkirchen of a Central Office for Food and Agriculture (Zentralstelle für Ernährung und Landwirtschaft bei der britischen Militär-Regierung). This is presided over by a Military Government officer and staffed with German food experts and representatives of the five regional farming administrations (Landesbauernschaften). Its functions cover the entire zone, but it is so far merely advisory and has no executive power that would permit it to be regarded as a successor to the former Reich Ministry of Food and Agriculture. The first reliable assessments of this season's harvest in the British zone have also been made. Even if all the crops are successfully harvested, it is estimated that it will be possible to support the population during the next twelve months only on a semi-starvation ration scale of 1,200 calories a day and that imports will be needed to maintain the present slightly higher but quite inadequate ration of 1,250–1,300 calories a day. A slight increase in the meat ration at Munich and the standardisation of rations at a somewhat higher level in certain areas of the West—for example, in North Baden and Württemberg—would seem to suggest that in the American zone the harvest prospects are now better than was at first expected. The decision of the United States authorities to preserve in some areas for the time being the rationalisation of smallholdings (the so-called Landnutzungstausch) enforced by the Nazis was announced from Frankfurt on the 8th August. Under this rationalisation, scattered peasant holdings in the villages have been united into one estate to be farmed more economically, but many of their conservative owners have resented the experiment as approximating too closely to the Soviet collectivisation.

On the 11th August it was announced that the acting Oberbürgermeister of Bremen, Dr. Erick Vagts, had been relieved of his post for "contravening instructions of the United States Military Government" and for leaving many Nazis in leading positions. For some time previously anti-Nazis in an area of western Germany much wider than the American-controlled Bremen enclave had pressed for the removal of Vagts, a well-known German Nationalist who held office under Hitler until February of this year (see Summary No. 303), and had come to regard his future as a test case of Military Government's good intentions. Bremen under Vagts's administration is reported to have become the scene of the first overtly patrician political organisation in Germany, the Hanseatische Aufbau-Gemeinschaft, constituted by the city's wealthiest merchants, although ostensibly ready to co-operate with other "democratic" organisations. Nevertheless, Bremen is also the scene of a most thorough process of "de-Nazification" by Military Government, and the latter is, among other things, using the Nazi's own ruthless Reichsleistungsgesetz of the 1st September, 1939, to requisition the homes of Party members for the benefit of the community generally. In other parts of both the American and British zones the purge of Nazi officials from local government is being pursued with unabated vigour. More than 100,000 officials with Nazi antecedents are expected to have been removed in Bavaria alone by the end of this month. The most notable high-ranking Nazi to be traced inside the Reich since the detention of Ribbentrop on the 14th June is the former leader of the National Socialist Association of Journalists and editor-in-chief of the Völkischer Beobachter, SA-Obergruppenführer Wilhelm Weiss, whose arrest near Berchtesgaden was announced on the 11th August.

AUSTRIA.

The Governments of Great Britain, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and France issued a statement on the 8th August on the control machinery in Austria. The Allied Commission for Austria will consist of an Allied council of four military commissioners, who will jointly exercise supreme authority in Austria in respect of matters affecting Austria as a whole; the council will be assisted by an executive committee and staffs appointed by the four Governments concerned, who will advise the council and carry out its decisions. Each military commissioner in his capacity as commander-in-chief of the forces of occupation furnished by his Government will exercise full authority in his zone subject to the general decisions of the Control Council.

The primary tasks of the Allied Commission will be to achieve the separation of Austria from Germany; to secure the establishment, as soon as possible, of a central Austrian administrative machine; to prepare the way for the establishment of a freely-elected Austrian Government; and meanwhile to supervise the administration of Austria. As soon as departments of a central Austrian administration are in a position to operate satisfactorily they will be directed to assume their respective functions as regards Austria as a whole, and will fulfil them under the control of the Allied Commission.

The administration of the city of Vienna will be directed by an inter-Allied governing authority of four commandants, operating under the general directions of the Allied Council, and assisted by a technical staff which will supervise and control the activities of the local organs. Military missions may be appointed by other United Nations Governments chiefly interested.

Preliminary discussions between the Allied Chiefs of Staff in Austria have been held in Vienna on matters that must be settled before the formal setting up of the Allied Commission in Vienna. Arrangements for communications were discussed, but the most difficult question is that of food supplies. Russian supplies for Vienna are expected to last until the 1st September. These foodstuffs brought in by the Russians are now stated not to be free gift, but to be chargeable to the city. It is explained that machinery which the Russians have removed will be credited to the city in part payment of this account. There is much complaint among the civilian population of Vienna that the meat ration in particular is not available, and Radio Vienna on the 9th August announced that the weekly meat ration would "once more be substituted by an allocation of pulse."

The Salzburg Festival was held again this year. Dr. Scherner, head of the Salzburg Provisional Government, made a speech of welcome at the opening ceremony, which was attended by General Mark Clark. General Clark, in his speech, said that the work of re-establishment of a free and independent Austria was already well under way.

Linz is now divided into two zones under the zoning agreement, the major part on the right bank of the Danube being under American occupation, and the suburbs on the left bank under Soviet occupation. Only workers holding permits may cross the river from one zone to the other. The United States zone is supplied with electricity from the power station in the Russian zone.

On the 7th August more than 2,000 Austrians captured by the Allies in Norway arrived in Salzburg on their way to discharge camps.

Reinhard Machold, the Landeshauptmann in the Styrian Provisional Government, said in a speech from Graz on the 9th that his new Government (see Summary No. 304), was almost identical with its predecessor, and that his contention that continuity of government was necessary had been conceded. He appealed for loyalty and harder work from all Styrians, and said that to believe that those Nazis who fled and are now returning are safe is mistaken. "Just retribution for former Nazis" was being prepared in agreement with the Military Government.

From Vienna it was reported that three more newspapers are now appearing there—making a total of five: the Arbeiterzeitung, the Socialist Party paper, is re-established; the Kleines Volksblatt is the organ of the Volkspartei; and Volkstimme is a Communist paper.

In May 1945, according to a Vienna broadcast, talks on the reconstruction of Chambers of Labour were held within the Austrian Trade Union Association, and a draft of the law for this purpose has now been submitted to the Provisional Government, which has incorporated it in its continued flow of legislation. Chambers of Labour are also being set up in the American zone.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Karl Frank has been handed over to the Czech authorities for interrogation, after which he will be "lent" to the Allied Investigation Commission who need him as a witness in the approaching trial of major Nazi war-criminals. Frank will then be returned to Prague, and it is expected that his trial, limited by Presidential Decree to three days, will take place in the latter half of September before a People's Court. The Ministry of the Interior has issued a circular containing the names of 63 Nazis wanted for the crimes of Lidice and Lezaky: every effort must be made to trace these individuals.

Dr. Ripka, Minister of Foreign Trade, has expressed Czechoslovakia's need for expanding her foreign trade, and he described the satisfactory nature of his negotiations in London and the contacts made with certain South American and Scandinavian countries. Impending arrangements include negotiations with America and Canada, whilst trade-delegations will leave shortly for Berne, Bucharest and Sofia. Dr. Ripka is confident that the main obstacle to this programme of commercial expansion—the chaotic condition of European railways—will soon be overcome.

Dr. Jan Masaryk has returned to London to attend the discussion of the U.N.R.R.A. Council and to participate in the conference of the Executive Committee of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations' Organisation.

Field-Marshal Montgomery is to visit Prague towards the end of August, but existing conditions will compel his stay to be limited to one day only.

With reference to the Border Regions, His Majesty's Ambassador to Prague submitted a very interesting report, summarising the impressions gained from his recent tour of these areas. He is convinced that the Czechs, although desirous of a drastic solution to the minority problem, wish to treat the Germans humanely; maltreatment of the Germans is singularly rare and is then only due to the more irresponsible Czech elements. There is much bad blood between the Bohemian and Reich Germans, the latter accusing the former of responsibility for the war. All Germans within the Republic must wear some distinctive badge, but they are permitted to move comparatively freely. War-damage is extensive; the countryside, however, appears well-cultivated and a good harvest should be gathered. Everywhere there is admiration for the Western Powers coupled with a deep-rooted wish to renew cultural contacts with Britain: English papers and periodicals would be particularly welcomed. Factories are derelict, there being a serious shortage of labour and transport.

Speaking in Nachod, Dr. Ripka again stressed the urgency of clearing the Border Regions of Germans; a far more important task, however, is the colonisation of these areas—hence "nobody must shirk the duty to go there." As there are still signs of reluctance to settle there, the afforestation of large areas is advocated on strategic grounds.

A Government Delegation, headed by Premier Fierlinger, visited Bratislava to discuss with the Slovak National Council Præsidium the formation of the Provisional National Assembly. It was agreed that Slovakia would hold one-third of the seats in this Assembly.

Several members of the Hungarian Arrow Cross Party in Slovakia have been arrested following the blowing-up of the premises of a local National Security Organisation. The Hungarian Fascists are suspected as they have lately adopted a provocative attitude towards the Czechoslovak Republic.

The vanguard of the Czech Air Force, returning from Britain, has already arrived in Prague. Furthermore, it is reported that all Czech workers in the British zone of occupation in Germany have been repatriated.

SOVIET UNION.

The Soviet declaration of war on Japan was handed by M. Molotov to the Japanese Ambassador M. Sato, on the 8th August and was broadcast to the Soviet people on the same day (see "Far East"). The wording of the declaration (unlike the press comment which followed it) was singularly unbellicose and stated that the Soviet Union had decided to join the war against Japan "to shorten the period of the war, to cut down the number of victims and to contribute to the quickest restoration of general peace." No reference was made to the neutrality pact with Japan due to expire in April of next year, nor were any breaches of this pact on the part of Japan alleged. At a press conference on the same evening, M. Molotov revealed that the Japanese had approached the Soviet Government with a proposal for mediation in the form of a special message from the Emperor in the middle of July. According to the declaration of war this mediation "lost its foundation" when Japan declined the Anglo-American demand for unconditional surrender at the end of July.

The first Soviet communiqué on the Far Eastern war showed that Soviet troops had crossed the frontiers of Manchukuo on a broad front stretching from Trans-Baikalia to the Khabarovsk Region and had achieved success in all sectors, especially in smashing the Japanese ferro-concrete zones of defence in the Maritime Province. The Soviet advance into Manchuria has subsequently continued on all fronts and the important towns of Hailar and Manchuli have been occupied as well as the Korean port of Rashin. Many messages broadcast from the front mentioned "the emaciated appearance" of the Manchurians and Koreans and the welcome given by the Koreans to the Red Army in Korea. The Commander-in-Chief of the Soviet forces in Manchukuo is Marshal Vasilyevsky (according to a Soviet communiqué of the 11th August); the first Far Eastern front in the Maritime Province is under Marshal Meretskov, the 2nd Far Eastern front (further north), is under Army-General Purkaev, and the Trans-Baikalian front is under Marshal Malinovsky.

According to the Soviet press the Declaration of War on Japan was "greeted with enthusiasm" by the Soviet people throughout the factories and farms of the Soviet Union. Since the 8th August reports have poured in of meetings acclaiming the Government's decision to go to war. Eye-witnesses accounts from Moscow, however, stress the lack of public enthusiasm for the war when the news was announced there. During the past week the Moscow press has been filled with articles recapitulating "Japan's treacherous record," "bloody atrocities," and "bandit interventions against the Soviet people." In all this recrimination there is surprising little mention of China or of China's wrongs at the hands of Japan. The 1904 attack on Port Arthur and the misdoings of Japanese interventionists in the Soviet Far East loom far larger and more frequently in the indictment. Japan is attacked for her "anti-Soviet provocative activities" in contravention of the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact (though no specific instances of these activities since 1941 are quoted). The magnitude of the part played by the Soviet Union in inducing the surrender of Japan has been enhanced in the U.S.S.R. by the fact that the Soviet press has completely ignored the influence of the Nagasaki atomic bomb, up-to-date, in this connexion. "The military might of the Red Army proved so overwhelming that the Japanese rulers began to talk of surrender after the first blows of the Soviet arms," declared Pravda (12th August), in a statement typical of many. "Unconditional surrender is unconditional surrender. There can be no play of words," was Moscow radio's comment on Japan's offer of "conditional surrender" on the 10th August.

According to the unanimous decision of the Little Khural and the Council of Ministers of the Mongolian People's Republic, Outer Mongolia declared war on Japan on the 10th August. The declaration of war (as reported by a Tass message from Ulan Bator) stated that the Government of the Mongolian People's Republic, true to their pledges under the Mutual Assistance Agreement concluded between the Mongolian Republic and the U.S.S.R. in March 1936 and inspired by "the eternal wish of the Mongolian people for freedom, independence and complete sovereignty, originating from the desire of the Mongolian tribes to live as one family in peace with their democratic neighbours . . . . and anxious to make our contribution to the cause of the United Nations," has declared a holy war against Japan. The omission of China and the call for unity of "the Mongolian tribes," in this declaration may be of future significance and is worth noting.

Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's telegram of congratulations to Generalissimo Stalin following the Soviet declaration of war against Japan, expressed China's gratitude for former help from the Soviet Union, admiration for the Soviet victories over Nazi Germany, and the honour felt by his country's armies to be fighting side by side with those of the Soviet Union. This telegram was broadcast by Moscow radio. The Soviet publicity organs apparently did not reproduce the telegram sent at the same time by the leaders of the Chinese Communists, "on behalf of the Chinese people" to Generalissimo Stalin. Signed by General Chu Teh and Mao-Tse-Tung, this telegram stated that 100,000,000 Chinese people and troops in liberated areas would co-operate to the utmost with the Red Army and other Allied armies.

After the resumption of relations announced last week the Soviet and Roumanian Governments have lost no time in nominating their reciprocal envoys. The appointment to Bucharest of M. Kavtaradze, deputy People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs and head of the Middle Eastern Department since 1943, is of interest, particularly in view of his mission to Persia to negotiate for an oil concession in the autumn of 1944. On the Roumanian side agrément was apparently originally asked for M. Ghelmegeanu, chairman of the Commission for fulfilling the Armistice terms and one of M. Tatarescu's right-hand men. The appointment has, however, gone to the less colourful Professor Iorgu Iordana; he was a Professor at Iași before the war and since the Armistice has been active in Arlus. The award by King Michael of the highest Roumanian military order, the Mihai Viteazul, to Marshal Malinovsky for his "brilliant leadership of Soviet and Roumanian arms," has followed closely on the bestowal by the Soviet Government of the Order of Victory on the King. The Marshal's presence on the Japanese front disposes of the rumours that had recently been rife in Bucharest concerning his disgrace.

This Roumanian award is one of a series of exchanges of decorations that are going on at present between the U.S.S.R. and her neighbours. The Polish General Rola Zymierski has now become the fourth foreigner to receive the Order of Victory (see Summary No. 301 for its award to King Michael). The highest Polish decorations have in turn been bestowed on Marshals Zhukov and Rokossovsky on their recent visit to Warsaw. In Czechoslovakia, General Svoboda has been given the order of Suvorov, and the same award has been made to the Commander of the Bulgarian First Army, General Stoychev. Altogether 40 generals and officers of the Bulgarian army and 12 Roumanian generals have received Soviet decorations.

The accusations put forward by the Soviet Government in a memorandum submitted at Potsdam concerning the attempts of Ukrainian nationalist organisations in Germany to suborn Soviet citizens are almost certainly exaggerated (see Summary No. 304). There is, however, considerable evidence that these organisations are not inactive. Oddly enough it appears to be the Hetman Organisation, thought to be moribund, which has shown the greatest signs of life. The old Hetman Paul Skoropadsky appears to have died in April 1945, having been shot while allegedly attempting to reach the Allied lines. Some of his followers are now approaching the Allied authorities asking to get in touch with his son and successor, Danilo, who has been living in England throughout the war.

Switzerland is another country whither several of the Ukrainian nationalists have escaped, and whence they are trying to get into touch with their fellows in the Argentine, having been rebuffed by the Ukrainian organisations in Canada and the United States. Among these émigrés in Switzerland is Metropolitan Illarion of Cholm, one of the heads of the Ukrainian autocephalous Orthodox Church appointed under the auspices of the Nazi authorities.

(For the visit of a Hungarian Trade Delegation to Moscow, see under "Hungary.")

M. Maisky has been relieved of his post as Soviet representative on the Reparation Commission to take up other duties. M. Kyril V. Novikov has been appointed in his place. M. Novikov was head of the Second European Department of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs dealing with British Empire affairs. He was a member of the Soviet Delegations at San Francisco and at Potsdam.

SCANDINAVIA.

The news of the discovery and the employment of the atomic bomb naturally formed one of the main topics of the week in all the Scandinavian countries. As a whole, the press confined itself to publishing a great deal of scientific and historic details about the development of the bomb, though in Sweden one or two papers expressed relief that the discovery had been made by the Anglo-Saxon Powers and not by the Nazi "gangsters." Stockholms-Tidningen deprecated exaggerated comments on the significance of the discovery; if the bomb alone were decisive in war, then the world power position would have radically changed, in that the Anglo-Saxon Powers would have become masters of the world while Russia and the other States could be disregarded. Obviously, however, it was only a question of time before other States would have exploited the new discovery. Aftonbladet, formerly a notorious pro-Nazi paper, condemned the atom-bombing of Hiroshima. "The so-called rules of warfare which were hailed in 1939 must brand [sic] the bombing of that city as a first-class war crime. The experiment with the population of an entire city as guinea pigs reflects no martial glory on its authors."

On the 16th July the first death sentence in Norway since 1857 was passed on Reidar Haaland, a member of the Gestapo and of the Quisling police, who had been convicted of torturing Norwegian political prisoners and of fighting for Germany on the Eastern front. The findings of the court were unanimous. On the 9th August the sentence was confirmed by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court Judge Arne Vislie has been appointed to prosecute all Supreme Court Judges who took office during the occupation. The Norwegian T.U.C. has issued directives for the treatment of collaborators which will prevent them from holding any office in trade-union organisations for a first period of one year.

In Denmark also the interest in the trial of collaborators continues, and strong protests have been made by the Resistance Movement against the numerous aquittals of persons arrested as suspected collaborationists. There are indications that the Danish Social Democrats are more ready than the Communists to reach an early agreement on the amalgamation of the two parties. Hr. Hedtoft Hansen hopes to achieve a decision, at any rate in principle, before the party congress of the 19th August, but it appears as though the Communists prefer to protract the negotiations until after the elections, when they hope to increase their bargaining power. M. Christmas Møller, on his return from this country, has been publicly attacked by the chairman of the Co-operative Slaughter Houses, who accused the Foreign Minister of having acted entirely on his own responsibility in the London Price Negotiations, the result of which was bound to affect Danish agricultural production and foreign trade unfavourably. The Minister of Trade, M. Fibiger, refuted this allegation and pointed out that the Agricultural Delegation which had returned home had realised that prices would have to be decreased, but was not prepared to give way. It was consequently decided that a higher authority would have to handle the matter and a delegation sent to London by the Foreign Minister.

In Finland M. Paasikivi, on the 10th August, received a deputation from a citizens' meeting at Helsinki, which urged a decision on the question of the trial of war criminals. The deputation threatened that any further delay in the matter would result in a strike being called by the trade unions.

On the 5th August it was announced in Helsinki that certain relaxations of the armistice terms had been granted by the Allied Control Commission. These relaxations mainly consist of freedom of movement for Finnish naval and merchant ships and for aircraft within the Finnish frontiers. However, the Soviet authorities alone are responsible for this decision, the British members of the Control Commission not having been consulted beforehand. A further announcement on the 7th August stated that in view of Finland's loyal fulfilment of the armistice terms the Soviet Union desired to re-establish diplomatic relations with that country.

LOW COUNTRIES.

There is a growing demand in the Netherlands for early elections. A number of people including the foreign editor of Vrij Nederland and the Political Correspondent of Het Parool have sent an open letter to the Prime Minister urging that elections should be held this year, and that postponement is not justified by either technical or political considérations. Meanwhile, the question has been considered by the recently created National Advisory Commission: but it is reported only to have referred it back to a "preparatory" Commission.

In a broadcast on the 10th August the Dutch Prime Minister spoke of the Commission for Devastated Areas. Its object, he explained, is to co-ordinate all relief work in conjunction with the Ministry of Social Affairs. Young men with nothing to do would be to put to work in the devastated areas and, if the supply of bachelors were insufficient, married men would be drafted for relief and reconstruction work in these districts.

The Rotterdam dockers belonging to the Unity Trade Union, which claims to incorporate "nearly all" dock workers, called a protest strike of 24 hours on the 13th August. About 1,000 men in the Amsterdam docks are also reported to have struck. The Unity Union complains that the conditions of the port workers have not improved at all in spite of the recent agreement (see Summary

No. 303) and says that the dockers had now been forced to the conclusion that no help could be expected from the Government. The Government have countered by a declaration insisting on State arbitration in all labour disputes, and by an urgent appeal to the workers not to support the Unity Union.

On the 7th August M. Van Acker presented his reformed Ministry to the Belgian Chambers and made a statement on the policy of the new Government. He said that it should be posisble to hold general elections in March. In the meantime the Government would ask for approval of a draft Bill depriving "unworthy citizens" of the right to vote. The work of "financial purification" would also be continued and a budget would be submitted to the Chambers early in November. The Government hoped soon to be able to relax various restrictions on trade and the rationing of certain food-stuffs. They proposed to revise the salary scales of all civil servants and public employees and to proceed with the purge of the administration. So far as foreign affairs were concerned, they intended to assert Belgium's right to her share of German reparations as well as her right to participate in the exploitation of certain German resources. The Belgian army would soon be reorganised and modernised, and it would take part in the occupation of Germany. In the course of the debate which followed M. Carton de Wiart (Catholic) pointed out that his party was now called the "Christian Social Party," and affirmed that this title showed the importance it attached to social reform. The party was not opposed in principle to the nationalisation of certain forms of activity, but it would not indiscriminately accept nationalisation as a system. At the end of the debate M. Van Acker gave further information about the economic position of the country. In particular, he said that the average yield of the coal miner had now reached the pre-war level. "We are the first country to attain such a result." The coal output would continue to increase, since arrangements had been made with the Allies for between 30,000 and 40,000 prisoners of war to be employed in the mines. Moreover, the quota of 70,000 tons of imported coal promised for September had now been further increased by the Allies. The debate ended with the passing of a vote of confidence in the Government.

FRANCE

The prospect of the end of the war in the Far East has caused pleasure and relief rather than excitement in France. An article by the diplomatic correspondent of the French Press Agency which appeared in the papers of the 12th August pointed out that it was hoped that the restoration of Indo-China to the French Commonwealth and the liberation of other Far Eastern territories would soon make an appreciable difference to the food situation in France. It also said that French official circles hoped that France would be represented at the signature of the Armistice with Japan, and that French troops already on the spot would be used to clear any pockets of resistance especially in Indo-China. Vice-Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu has been appointed Governor-General of Indo-China in place of Admiral Decoux, whose whereabouts are unknown.

General de Gaulle has been touring Northern France. After visiting Beauvais, Amiens and Doullens he arrived at Béthune on the 11th August, and made a speech to the miners which was also broadcast. He referred to the improvement in coal production, which had now reached 75 per cent. of the pre-war level, and to the relative improvement in industrial activity, although this was still less than half the pre-war level. Turning to foreign affairs, he deplored the absence of France from decisions regarding the fate of Germany, but stated: "This time last year there was not even any recognised French Government. To-day France is governing German territory with the three other great Powers. She is strongly installed on the Rhine and the Danube." In this connexion it may be noted that the ceremonial transfer from British to French control of the Reinickendorf and Wedding area of Berlin took place on the 13th August. In Austria General Béthouard, Commander of the French forces there, has decided, according to a Paris broadcast in German, to found a French university at Innsbruck, and to open French schools for the children of the occupying forces; Austrian children will also be allowed to attend them.

After long deliberations the Cabinet finally reached a decision on the constitutional question on the 10th August. The new solution is still more complicated than the first plan (see Summaries Nos. 301 and 302), but it makes important concessions to the supporters of a sovereign Constituent Assembly, and comes close to the Vincent-Auriol amendment which was defeated in the Consultative Assembly. The referendum will still offer the choice (1) between a Chamber and Senate and a Constituent Assembly; and (2) between the Government project for a Constituent Assembly with limited powers and a sovereign Assembly. But under the revised Government project the new Government will be partially responsible to the Constituent Assembly, and it will have to resign if a vote of censure is passed by an absolute majority of the Assembly. The Assembly will have power to initiate legislation concurrently with the Government and will vote the Budget, but will not be able to propose expenditure. As in the previous plan the new Constitution must be drawn up within seven months and submitted to the country by referendum. The Cabinet also decided that the system of proportional representation on a departmental basis should be used in the general elections which will be held on the 21st October.

The constitutional question has further disturbed the already delicate relations between the Communist and Socialist Parties and their respective allies. The Radical–Communist alliance, which defeated the Socialists and their Resistance supporters in the Consultative Assembly (see Summary No. 304) has now been further exemplified by the report that M. Herriot has joined the Comité d'Initiative of the Communist-backed Mouvement Unifié de la Renaissance. The opposing body, the Democratic Socialist Resistance Union (U.D.S.R.), has, on the other hand, drawn closer to the Socialist Party, and with it and the Young Republic Party has subscribed to a joint manifesto published on the 31st July. At the Socialist Party Congress, which started on the 11th August in Paris, M. Daniel Mayer, the general secretary, succeeded in carrying a motion proposing a close alliance between the Party and the U.D.S.R.; while M. Léon Blum followed up a series of articles in the Populaire by a speech which appears to have turned the scales against the acceptance of the Communist proposal for a complete fusion of the Socialist and Communist Parties (see Summary No. 300). The Party leaders were, however, at least temporarily overruled by the adoption of a motion urging the resignation of the Socialist Ministers should the Government not modify their constitutional scheme, and the matter is to be discussed again.

The British delegation to the Socialist Congress is headed by Mr. Harold Laski, who spoke to the Congress of the Labour victory in Britain, and said that a big Socialist victory was also needed in France "so that we can form a single State out of the two nations, with the same objectives and the same methods."

The Pétain trial reached its final stage on the 11th August with M. Mornet's summing-up for the prosecution. The witnesses last week for the defence included several generals, M. Peyrouton, M. Jacques Chevalier, who referred to yet another "Vichy–London Agreement" negotiated at the end of 1940 through the Canadian Minister to Vichy, M. Dupuy, and General Bergeret. MM. de Brinon and Darnand were also heard on the request of the jury. M. Mornet announced that the charge of plotting against the security of the State had been dropped, since Pétain's complicity in the Cagoule had not been established, but he accused the Marshal of treason in the form of accepting the Armistice, betraying the nation's trust, scheming to overthrow the Republican régime, helping Germany against Britain and persecuting Frenchmen. He demanded the death penalty. MM. Payen, Lemaire and Isorni in effective speeches for the defence claimed that the Armistice had been preferable to capitulation, and beneficial as regards both the fate of France and the issue of the war. The Marshal's policy had been to safeguard, defend and acquire material advantages at the price of moral concessions. Before the jury retired Pétain himself broke silence and read a brief statement declaring that throughout his long life his only ambition had been to serve France.

After the jury had deliberated for several hours the verdict in this historic trial was pronounced early on the morning of the 15th August. The Marshal was found guilty on all charges and sentenced to death, but the court made a recommendation to mercy on account of his great age. In view of the attitude of the judge and the composition of the jury the death sentence was to be expected. At the same time it seems certain that General de Gaulle will exercise his prerogative of mercy.

SWITZERLAND.

The question of Swiss neutrality has again been brought to the fore by the Potsdam decision that support will be given to applications from neutral States who are able and willing to accept the obligations of membership. It was pointed out by Swiss radio commentators that any action on the part of Switzerland could be taken only as a result of a referendum. The question was also raised whether the resumption of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. should not be discussed first, since it would appear to be somewhat paradoxical for Switzerland to belong to a new International Organisation without first achieving normal relations with the major Powers which would exert a decisive influence in it. As the indications seemed to suggest that the majority of the Swiss people remained attached to the nation's traditional policy of neutrality, it was thought possible that Switzerland might ask that the special position in which she was placed by both nature and history might be taken into account. She was, nevertheless, anxious to play her rightful part in the task of ensuring world security.

On the 3rd August a bilateral air transport agreement was signed in Berne between Switzerland and the United States, by which authorised American airlines obtain transit rights across Swiss territory, as well as the right of commercial entry for international traffic at Geneva or another suitable airport. The proposed air route serving Switzerland is one of several recently announced by the Civil Aeronautics Board, and extends from the United States to the Middle East via Ireland, France, Switzerland, Italy, Greece and Egypt. Reciprocal rights are granted to Switzerland for an airline to operate over the North Atlantic to New York.

On the 7th August a preliminary conference took place between the Swiss and the Russian delegations who are investigating the treatment of the 10,000 Russians interned in Switzerland. Representatives of Britain, France and the United States participated. All parties were reported to have given the impression that both the investigation into conditions and the removal of grievances were well under way. On the 10th August the first train, carrying 1,000 Russian repatriates, left Berne, and it was considered that the entire repatriation would be concluded in about two weeks.

A trade agreement was signed at Berne on the 10th August between Switzerland and Italy dealing with the regulation of payments and the mutual exchange of goods. To facilitate the resumption of trade relations and to assist Italy in her work of reconstruction, provision is made for an advance of 80,000,000 Swiss francs.

On the 10th August the Japanese Minister conveyed to the Swiss Government the first Japanese offer of surrender for transmission to the Governments of the United States and China. The final acceptance of unconditional surrender, addressed to the four Allied Powers, was received in Berne on the 14th August and was immediately despatched to Washington.

The new Swiss Minister to Czechoslovakia, Dr. Girardet, presented his credentials on the 8th August.

It is reported from Geneva that Herr Walter Thurnheer, Swiss Minister in London from 1940 to 1944, has died at the age of 61.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The Potsdam declaration regarding the non-eligibility of the Franco régime for admission to the United Nations organisation has caused no little excitement inside Spain, while it has naturally aroused great hopes among the expatriate Spaniards. It does not seem likely, however, that the Berlin declaration will have any immediate effects. (For one thing it is much too hot at this time of the year in Madrid—and indeed all over central and southern Spain—for sustained political activity!) Nevertheless, to scotch the manifold rumours, the Government in its radio service to Latin America has thought it wise to deny reports of unrest and, specifically, to repudiate a French agency story that a Military Directorate had been formed to oust General Franco and to institute a normal Spanish Army dictatorship. That is, of course, the most likely development one day. But there is no evidence at present that the Army leaders are spoiling for a fight with Falange; and Franco is back at his old game of playing off one against the other. Thus it is entirely in accordance with present trends that the new Civil Governor of Barcelona, replacing Señor Correa Veglisón, should be a soldier, General Bartolomé Barba, now taking up his first civil appointment. He has made a statement to La Vanguardia promising strict military discipline.

In mingled accents of pride and injured innocence the press has supplied appropriate glosses upon the official Note of protest which was discussed in these pages last week. On the wireless the insufferable Eugenio Montes has been indulging in a comparison between the aristocrats of the Congress of Vienna and the "sham democrats" of Potsdam. Spaniards, he says, are great aristocrats—"as Churchill knew"—who before attending any peace conference would themselves impose conditions. Spain "is so sure of herself that she does not in the least care if she comes into contact with other countries or not .... To-day Spain is at peace with herself, entrenched in her castle, in her nobility." A.B.C., the organ of the solid middle classes—not, be it noted, the Falange party organ Arriba—has been chosen as the vehicle for the principal outpourings. An article in that paper on the 8th August, with the title "Irrefutable Realities" purports to set out the "plain facts" of Spanish neutrality. In the first place, says the writer, there was the Pact of Friendship with Portugal—the Iberian Bloc policy—which was in itself a guarantee of the maintenance of Spain's friendship with Great Britain. Then Spain's ties with the American nations precluded her from association with a Europe obedient to the will of Germany; and, moreover, Spain resisted all pressure which was brought to bear upon her to join the Tripartite Pact. Spain's non-intervention in North Africa is likewise cited as evidence in her favour, while her "intervention" in Tangier is represented as the gesture of a neutral nation seeking to preserve an African territory from the war. Following up this liberal splash of whitewash A.B.C. of the 11th came out with an imposing statistical analysis of Spain's "gigantic aid" to the United Nations in the way of trade. The upshot of the numerous articles is that the United Nations ought to be very grateful to Spain for the way she behaved during the war, Spanish resistance to Axis pressure having been a big factor in their victory. In comparison with last year's efforts, when the object was to authenticate Spain's neutrality, there is a new note of hyperbole.

With the departure of Señor Lequerica the way is clear for better relations between General Franco's régime and the de Gaulle Government. But it will be hard going. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the French Consultative Assembly has again passed a Resolution (on the 3rd August) calling for a formal rupture of Franco-Spanish diplomatic relations. However, efforts are being made to renew the trade connexions broken off at the end of June following the Chambéry incident (see Summary No. 299). A French Delegation has arrived at San Sebastian to try to work out the bases of a Franco-Spanish Commercial Agreement.

While Dr. Salazar has so far made no pronouncement, O Seculo, in an editorial article "After Potsdam," has expressed gratification at the decision in Berlin that the neutral States (other than Spain under the present régime) will be welcomed into the United Nation's fold. Comment on the atomic bomb and the negotiations for the surrender of Japan has so far been sparing, and the interest of Lisbon appears at the moment to be centred upon the arrival of contingents of the Brazilian troops who are on their way home from the Italian front. An important conference for the adjustment of spelling differences in the Portuguese and Brazilian languages has just concluded its work.

TANGIER.

The conversations in Paris about Tangier, which were suspended on the 3rd July, following the request of the Soviet Government to take part, were resumed on the 10th August. A fortnight ago His Majesty's Government acceded to the Russian request and arranged with the French Government for a joint formal invitation. It was necessary, however, to wait for the conclusion of the Berlin Conference and for confirmation of our representatives' instructions by the new British Government. At Berlin, in the absence of the French Government, no useful discussion of the Tangier question was possible.

The first step would seem to be for the four Powers' meeting in Paris—Great Britain, France, United States and Soviet Russia—to authorise the first two, the only States having any locus standi, to communicate with General Franco's Government in order to arrange for Spanish evacuation of the International Zone and for the establishment of a provisional régime on the basis of the Statute of 1923. His Majesty's Government are chiefly concerned now to fix a date for the full-scale conference of all the interested Powers, and they contemplate a quite simple arrangement to tide over the interim period. But it is not going to be plain sailing. The Spanish Government have formally protested in a note verbale (dated the 9th August) against the negotiations being carried on without reference to them. They invoke their understanding with His Majesty's Embassy in Madrid that Spain's interests would be safeguarded in any future discussion of the Tangier question, and also the assurances given at the time of the Anglo-American landings in November 1942. And, without mentioning any names, the note goes on to complain of the invitation to "a European Government which on no previous occasion has participated in the administration of Tangier." This phrase is, of course, equally applicable to the United States or the U.S.S.R.

The Soviet attitude in regard to the participation of Spain in either the interim régime or the subsequent International Conference remains to be seen.

ITALY.

The Italian Government is having a difficult time trying to stop the numerous outbreaks against law and order which are now occurring throughout Italy. Signor Parri has himself addressed various appeals to the nation in an effort to persuade the people not to take the law into their own hands, but so far he has had little apparent success. Undoubtedly the conditions under which some of the partisans lived have something to do with the present situation but, in view of past history, one cannot help regarding these outbreaks with considerable misgiving. Before the Risorgimento brigand bands were more or less accepted as an integral part of the countryside, particularly in the mountains of the South. Baron Ricasoli, Cavour's successor, had to adopt the most drastic measures before the situation was finally cleared up, and it looks as if a similar situation might arise again unless strong action can soon be taken. The difficulty is, of course, a lack of good trained Carabinieri. Enough men are, apparently, available, but they do not seem to be up to standard either in training or morale. It must, however, be remembered that, compared with the police in this country, the police and the Carabinieri work at a considerable disadvantage. In Great Britain the average citizen takes the side of law and order; whereas in Italy the exact opposite occurs. And at the moment the Carabinieri have an added handicap in that they are considered to have been pro-Fascist, which does not simplify their work in present circumstances.

The latest outbreak took place in Messina, where a mob of ex-soldiers and repatriated workers from Germany broke into the Prefecture because the prefect refused to receive a deputation from their ranks. The cause of the trouble was a complaint that ex-Fascists were still employed on the prefect's staff, and the mob demanded that they be dismissed and that ex-servicemen should be given their work. Before admittance was gained a free fight took place and several Carabinieri and others were wounded.

THE VATICAN.

The Vatican has again called attention to the cruelties and starvation practised in Tito's concentration camps and has asked Allied aid in persuading Tito to allow the Bishop of Gorizia to take a relief mission to the camps. His Majesty's Government is supporting the Vatican's request, but without much hope that the Yugoslav Government will allow any relief to be sent.

Monsignor Montini has told Sir D'Arcy Osborne that, in spite of all reports, the Vatican has made no official pronouncement on the Potsdam decisions. Many of these it could approve, though it would not favour the transfer of such obviously German cities as Königsberg and Breslau. It applauded the proclamations made to the German people by Generals Eisenhower and Montgomery. It has not condemned the use of the atomic bomb, which the Pope forecast with scientific precision in his address to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences on the 21st February, 1943. Its attitude was best shown in a Vatican broadcast in French on the 8th August: "If we wish to save ourselves, our spirituality must prove equal to the material discoveries ready to revolutionise our history."

The French Semaines sociales have been revived after a gap of six years. In a letter to this thirty-second session, the Pope said that "men rightly expect a profound amelioration of their conditions of existence," and he hoped that the necessary social and economic rebuilding would be carried out according to Christian standards, and that the grave dangers which atheistic pretensions cause to the reconstruction of the world would be avoided. In his inaugural sermon that indomitable champion of the Resistance movement, Archbishop Saliège of Toulouse, boldly recognised the truth in the Marxian insistence on the importance of the economic factor in the formation of man; but, by combining it with the Christian view of the eternal value of the individual, he avoided the dwarfing doctrine of economic determinism, and gave Christians a fresh and truer interpretation of man: "We can no longer ignore the truth that there is a certain solidarity between the economic technique and the spiritual, nor that the former can, over a longer or shorter period of time, modify the latter. A new humanity has become conscious of its social power." Both Pope and Archbishop insist that man has certain inalienable rights which no society or group may deny. For them, the dignity of man is a condemnation of intolerance.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Hungarian Government has, as was reported in last week's Summary, informed the U.S.S.R. of its inability to satisfy demands by the Russian military authorities under Article 11 of the Armistice Terms as well as make reparations payments under Article 12. It may be in this connexion that the Ministers of Industry and Trade and Communications went to Moscow for trade negotiations. The Minister of Industry stated that Hungary wished to procure raw materials from the U.S.S.R., including timber from Carpatho-Ukraine, on a barter basis, in order to maintain industrial production for reparations deliveries. In view of the Russian decision to exact 5 per cent. interest if payments are not made punctually, efforts are being made to increase production. A new wage system, based on piece rates and production bonuses was introduced.

Count Teleki has resigned from the presidency and membership of the Bourgeois Democrat Party. It has often been suggested that he has only retained the portfolio of education so long because he was the sole representative of this party in the Government. As he has recently been strongly criticised by the Communists and Social Democrats and by Federov, the Russian commentator, for not pursuing an energetic policy of purge and reform of education, it will be interesting to see whether he remains in office.

Rákosi, the leader of the Communist Party, in a speech at Szeged, demanded that inflation should be checked. Wages have risen to correspond with the price level, and any further rise in prices must be prevented. He attached great importance for the success of the present economic policy to the farmers delivering grain in excess of the compulsory minimum. He concluded his speech by stressing the necessity of co-operation between workers, peasants and "intellectuals."

The Jewish Relief organisation published statistics on the persecution of Hungarian Jews since March 1944. At that time there were 1,000,000 people who came within the definition of Jews laid down by the Jewish Law of 1939. Of those, 780,000 were deported and 80,000 died in camps and ghettos in Hungary; the total number killed outside Hungary is estimated to be 600,000. At the time of liberation there were 110,000 Jews in Budapest and 30,000 in the provinces, but since then 45,000 deportees have returned and there are still about 80,000 deportees in territories held by the Allies.

A report on Health shows an alarming increase in venereal disease. Medical supplies are short and only 3,800 doctors are now practising in Budapest, as against 6,000 before the siege; of 21,000 hospital beds, only 9,800 can be used.

Roumania.

Russia has resumed diplomatic relations with Roumania.

It is reported in reliable quarters that, in accordance with the desire of the Russian Control Commission that there should not be a military attaché in Turkey, the military staff of the Roumanian mission in Ankara has been withdrawn.

The convention setting up the Soviet-Roumanian Air Transport Company has been signed in Moscow.

Yugoslavia.

The Congress of the Front (see Summary No. 305, p. 15) continued. A 32-point programme was submitted and adopted unanimously. "8. Peace among all nations." was followed by "9. The struggle against Fascism and reaction." Point 11 committed the Front to a Republic, thus virtually announcing that the electorate will vote republican. Most of the other points expressed approval for peace, prosperity and democracy. A central committee of 16 was elected, of whom at least 9 are Communists and 2 more are near-Communists. Tito then spoke, as President of the Front. He bitterly attacked "reactionaries" abroad, who criticised Yugoslavia, and maintained that the new democracy of social reform was an improvement on that of voting papers. He spoke at length on the Monarchy, rejecting the institution and especially King Peter for having supported Mihailovitch. He warned insurgents that they would be mercilessly suppressed.

A.V.N.Q.J. assembled on the 7th August. It included 107 new members (making 489 in all), of whom 36 were Deputies in the last Yugoslav Parliament. Its name was changed to the "Temporary National Parliament of Democratic Federal Yugoslavia." Tito addressed it, paying a warm tribute to the help received in the war from the Western Allies. He claimed $61,000,000,000 as reparation from Germany and Italy, the former's debt to be paid mainly in the form of entire German factories. He spoke of the brotherly relations with Bulgaria and Albania, and expected to have the friendliest relations with the new Polish and Czechoslovak Governments. The alliance with the Soviet Union, he said, was the most important event in Yugoslav history. With the Western Allies Yugoslavia had normal diplomatic relations. On Greece he was silent.

On the 8th King Peter issued a statement in London saying that he had accepted the Tito-Shubashitch Agreement, in January, on the advice of the great Allies. It was now clear that the Agreement had not been kept, and that Tito's régime was a dictatorship, supported by special police and allowing no freedom of the press or of association, &c. As the Regents were helpless to perform the royal function, he announced that he withdrew their mandate and himself resumed the duty of defending the rights of his people. In the Temparory Parliament Kardelj read a statement saying that King Peter had appointed the Regents to act till the Constituent Assembly had decided the form of government and that he could not withdraw their mandate. On the motion of Pijade the assembly ignored the King's statement.

The Electoral Register Bill was introduced on the 10th. It allows those over 18, of both sexes, to vote and to be elected; also those under 18 who served in the partisan forces. "If a youth can carry a rifle, he is mature enough to vote and be elected," said Pijade. The armed forces are also enfranchised. Disfranchised are all collaborators with the enemy and opponents of the partisan movement. Membership of what organisations entail disfranchisement will be decided not by the courts, but by the Federal and Regional Governments. Grol, the Vice-Premier, boldly argued that the Civil Rights Bill should be discussed first. The Electoral Register Bill was then carried, nem. con.; Grol and one other member having the courage to abstain from voting. A Land Bill followed on the 11th. Its object is to confine the ownership of land to those working it, except for the large landed property of the State. Pijade urged immediate adoption of the Bill. Despite some mild opposition from Grol and another, the Bill was unanimously accepted in principle. It is a sweeping measure for a provisional parliament to carry.

Other events were the condemnation, on the 10th, of the Mihailovist leaders (see Summary No. 305, p. 15), seven to death and the rest to prison for from 18 months up to 20 years; the incorporation of Vojvodina in Serbia; the announcement of the release, at five centres, of 2,862 imprisoned chetniks under the recent amnesty; and the lifting of the censorship from outgoing press copy.

The attacks on Greece and Allied Military Government continued. Allied authorities have received countless appeals from relatives of Italians allegedly deported to Yugoslav camps and have lists of about 2,000 of such deportees. About 140 deportees are reported to have returned in late July.

Greece.

The Regent concluded his series of conversations with the political leaders on the 7th August, the final day having been devoted to representatives of Resistance organisations. The following evening Athens radio broadcast a message from His Beatitude to the nation expressing his conviction that an all-party Government could not be formed, and his consequent decision once more to entrust Admiral Voulgaris with the formation of a Service Government.

By the 11th August the reformation of the Government was practically complete. Five Ministers and two Under-Secretaries have been dropped from the Cabinet; these are the Ministers of Education, Professor Balanos; Health, Dr. Sbarounis-Trikorphos; Justice, M. Soliotis; the Interior, Professor K. Tsatsos;

Communications, Professor Karandasis; and the Under-Secretaries of Press, Professor Zakynthinos, and for War, Lieut.-General Drakos. There are few changes in the new Government. Admiral Volugaris has himself taken over the portfolios of Foreign Affairs—vacated on the 23rd July by M. Sophianopoulos—and the Interior; as Under-Secretary in this all-important Ministry he has appointed General Georgoulis, who was military member of the Greek Delegation to the San Francisco Conference. The other key Ministry, Justice, has been entrusted to Professor Kasimatis, a young and able lawyer who founded his own resistance organisation during the occupation, and who in the previous Voulgaris Government held the post (in which he has not yet been replaced) of Minister of Social Welfare. The new Minister of Health is another Professor of Medicine, M. Voilas, and Professor Oikonomos, an archæologist of repute, becomes Minister of Education. The Under-Secretary to the Presidency of the Council, Captain (R.H.N.) Lambrinopoulos, has temporarily undertaken the Ministry of Communications, and M. Pesmazoglou combines the Under-Secretaryships of Finance and the Press. It is doubtful whether General Merenditis, who is Admiral Voulgaris's choice for the vacant War Ministry, will be willing to leave his present position as Governor-General of Northern Greece.

The policy of the new Government was explained in a speech broadcast by the President of the Council on the 11th August. He emphasised that his single object in once more accepting the Regent's mandate to form a Government was the restoration of Greece's normal political life. To this end the Government must make preparations for a free and fair plebiscite and elections, complete the re-establishment of law, order and security throughout the country, and continue to fulfil the financial and economic reconstruction programme already adopted; the Greek Army must also be reformed on the basis of military not political qualifications. One of the Government's main preoccupations at the peace conferences forecast by the Potsdam declaration, must be to obtain satisfaction for Greece's national claims. M. Voulgaris spoke at length on this point, on which (he said) the whole nation, including the extreme Left, was united, but he discreetly refrained from defining what these claims were. With the object, no doubt, of forestalling Republican criticisms that national claims could not properly be presented by a Service Government, he drew attention to the assistance given to the Government on all questions of foreign policy by the political Foreign Affairs Committee.

The most important declaration of policy concerned the administration of justice. The dictatorship, the occupation and the abuse by extremists of the "incomparable" Resistance Movement, which had culminated in the December civil war, had, he said, left an evil inheritance of personal and party hatreds, reprisals, and excesses which had crowded the prisons with persons awaiting trial. The Government now proposed to dispose of all cases as soon as possible, administering exemplary punishment to those against whom there was clear evidence, and releasing the rest. He recognised that this step would shock the majority of Greeks, but was convinced it was essential for the tranquillity of the country.

The decision to grant this measure of amnesty was a wise one. During the last four years Greece has in some ways gone back half a century, and has reverted to the evil traditions of armed brigandage and the blood-feud. Brigandage is being gradually stamped out by the deployment of Gendarmerie; the release of political prisoners will show that the State refuses to be a party to the paying-off of private scores.

Bulgaria.

The Fatherland Front and Opposition lists of candidates for the elections have been approved. The Moscow Communists Georgi Dimitrov and Vasil Kolarov head the Government lists. The Opposition includes the former Agrarian Ministers Petkov and Bumbarov, the Social Democratic Minister, Cheshmedzhiev and Kosta Lulchev, former Secretary-General of the same party. The Independent Minister of Finance, Petko Stoyanov, by leading the Opposition list has now come out openly on the side of the "dissidents." Asen Pavlov, the Agrarian Minister of Agriculture, has withdrawn his name from the Opposition and the fourth Agrarian Minister Darzhanski figures on neither side. There have been other withdrawals besides that of Pavlov.

While using all the resources of propaganda in favour of the Fatherland Front and neglecting no opportunity for discrediting their opponents, the powers-that-be are patently anxious to preserve the appearances of democracy in the conduct of the elections. The Regional Courts, in approving the lists, rather ostentatiously ignored the objections raised to a number of Opposition candidates. The curfew has been raised. Not only have the Opposition been promised equal opportunities with the Government in the election campaign, but the Prime Minister has announced that orders have been issued to local authorities to put the promise into effect. Previously possessing no facilities for publicity, the Opposition are being granted "complete freedom" to print election bulletins or appeals and to hold meetings. Permission has been given to the Union of Journalists to publish as soon as possible a non-party independent daily paper for the expression of the views of all those—Opposition candidates and others—"who for one reason or another are unable to use existing papers."

But there is evidence that in fact the usual "Balkan" methods are being applied in the election campaign. Government canvassers are reported to be eliciting support by such forms of pressure as the threat to withdraw fuel permits, and to be paying unwelcome attention to electors who do not commit themselves. It is believed that many people have been removed from their constituencies—contrary to the Electoral Law—by conscription or internment in labour, educational and concentration camps. The outlook for the Opposition, in fact, is such as to give rise to the rumour that Petkov contemplates withdrawing all his lists on the grounds that it is pointless to participate in the elections under present conditions.

It is reported that the Bulgarian Army is being put on a peace-time footing, with reversion to pre-war organisation. For the time being, however, one Partisan division and the system of assistant commanders (political commissars) are being retained.

The Press and wireless have given much publicity to the celebration of Saint Elijah's Day (Ilinden) by Macedonians within and without Bulgaria, and anti-Greek propaganda continues.

Turkey.

President Truman's recent pronouncement in favour of the free and unrestricted navigation of certain European waterways, including the Straits—the navigation to be directed by the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and France, plus those States which border the waterways—was received in Turkey with relief, if not with complete satisfaction. Her leaders already regarded as inevitable some change in the present régime of the Straits. They rejected the recent Russian proposal for bases there, because its acceptance would, in their view, have been tantamount to a surrender of Turkey's independence. But the control of the navigation by the Great Powers in association with Turkey is regarded as quite another matter. Reaction in Angora to this proposal has not been unfavourable. Turkey would, however, insist on her sovereignty remaining unimpaired and would expect a change in Russia's attitude towards her. Fuller details of the practical application of the proposal are now awaited.

A Commission is on its way from Angora to London to consult with British aircraft manufacturers regarding the preparation of plans for the proposed Turkish aircraft factory. The Commission was accompanied by five engineers and six skilled workmen who will receive technical instruction on the manufacture of aircraft engines.

Mr. Maxwell, of the Middle Eastern Department of the British Overseas Airways Corporation, has arrived in Angora to continue discussions with the Turkish authorities on the establishment of B.O.A.C. air lines through Turkey and beyond.

A good fig and raisin crop is expected in Turkey this year. The cotton crop, on the other hand, will be below average.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Further details have now been received of the speech made by Nokrashi Pasha in the Egyptian Senate on the 6th August, to which brief reference was made in Summary No. 305. The Prime Minister was replying to certain interpellations made in the Chamber of Deputies and in the Senate, and his statement in both Houses was the same. In the course of his speech Nokrashi said that the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of Alliance had prepared the way towards the complete realisation of Egyptian aspirations. During the war Egypt had loyally supported her ally, Great Britain, and her assistance had been recognised by the United Nations.

This was the best justification for the breaking of those bonds that still fettered Egyptian independence, and for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Egyptian soil. As for the unity of the Nile Valley, "which was Egypt and the Sudan," the principles of the new era could ensure its realisation in accordance with the aspirations of all people dwelling in the Valley of the Nile. Nokrashi went on to say that the Egyptian Government did not believe there would be any difficulties in its negotiations with Great Britain, and that there was no doubt that Great Britain herself agreed that the present circumstances were opportune for such negotiations. "It only remains to determine the time when negotiations should begin."

The Egyptian Parliament concluded its session the same day (the 6th August), and now that the fasting month of Ramadan has begun, the tempo of political activity will probably diminish. It is clear, however, that the Wafd intend to continue their pressure for revision of the treaty and for a free election under a neutral Government. The Wafdist press has criticised Nokrashi's statement of the 6th August (quoted above), which it regards as an admission of inertia. On the other hand, the pro-Government press comments unfavourably on the letter addressed by Nahas Pasha on the 23rd July to His Majesty's Ambassador (see Summary No. 304), which was published by the Wafd a few days later in the local press, and which stressed the importance of settling all outstanding questions between Egypt and Great Britain.

In a Ramadan broadcast by King Farouk to the Moslem and Arab nations, the King emphasised the need for social reform. For whatever reason, King Farouk has recently paid more serious attention to the importance of social reform in Egypt; and there are probably many Egyptians who agree that internal reform, both social and administrative, is in fact a far more urgent matter than the adjustment of Egypt's foreign relations.

The economic and agricultural committees of the Arab League began discussions in Cairo on the 15th July, with delegates from Syria, the Lebanon, Transjordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, the Yemen and Egypt taking part. In welcoming the delegates, Abdul Rahman Azzam, the Secretary-General of the Arab League, stressed the need for ensuring that Arab lands in Palestine should remain in Arab hands; this was not merely a technical problem of economics or agriculture, he said, but was the material manifestation of a bitter and ruthless struggle between the policy of international Zionism and the rights of a sedentary race confirmed by thousands of years' ownership.

Arab sentiment on this question will not be eased by the declaration issued on the 13th August by the World Zionist Conference in London. After condemning the White Paper policy as "a concession to Arab terrorism which raged in Palestine from 1936 onwards with the support of Hitler and Mussolini," the declaration goes on to state that the Jews could not in any circumstances acquiesce in the continuation of the White Paper; nor could there be any solution of the problem "except by constituting Palestine, undivided and undiminished, as a Jewish State, in accordance with the purpose of the Balfour Declaration." It ends by endorsing the requests made to His Majesty's late Government by the Jewish Agency in May 1945, including an immediate decision to establish Palestine as a Jewish State, and appeals to His Majesty's present Government to carry them out forthwith.

Nor will the Arabs be consoled when they learn of the appointment of the former Senator Gillette of Iowa, who accepted it against the advice of more orthodox Zionists, as Chief Political Adviser to the Hebrew Committee for National Liberation at a salary of $10,000 a year. Gillette is an honest Presbyterian and a typical Mid-Westerner of considerable character. In announcing the appointment, Peter Bergson, the head of the organisation (which is regarded in some quarters as disreputable), said: "As Lafayette and Kosciusko were to the American people, and Lord Byron to the Greeks, so will Gillette be to the Hebrew people"; while in a prepared statement for the press Gillette himself said: "Now that a new Government has come to power in Great Britain, which is publicly and officially committed to the abrogation of the Chamberlain White Paper under which Palestine is administered, Britain's sin of having kept Palestine closed to the martyred Hebrews of Europe, at a time of their greatest ordeal and need, should be immediately ended."

Conversations have recently taken place in Beirut between the Syrian and Lebanese Ministers for Foreign Affairs on the one hand, and the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs on the other, on the question of the recognition by Turkey of the independence of the Levant States (see Summary No. 305 under "Turkey"). The Syrian Foreign Minister told his Turkish confrère that, as recognition was already technically covered by the presence of Syrian and Turkish representatives at the San Francisco Conference, there was no need for an exchange of notes on this point, and that diplomatic relations should be arranged forthwith. He thought that the question of the Hatay should be left for future discussion. The Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, on the other hand, rejected the proposal that the frontier question should be discussed apart from that of recognition, and said that, if it were to be raised at all, Turkey would also put forward her claims.

The Emir Feisal, second son of King Ibn Saud, who has been attending the San Francisco Conference on behalf of his father, arrived in England on the 11th August, accompanied by his son and three of his brothers. Their short visit to this country is unofficial, but arrangements are being made, as in the case of the Regent of Iraq, for offering facilities for their enjoyment and profit.

The situation in the Barzan area of Iraqi Kurdistan, to which reference was made in last week's Summary, continues to deteriorate. In spite of our advice to the Iraqi Government that they should go slow in any contemplated action against Mullah Mustafa, in order to allow time for training and planning, the Iraqi authorities decided to take immediate action against the insurgents. It is possible, however, that wiser counsels may still prevail. His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires has urged upon the Iraqi Government the importance of undertaking widespread political propaganda in order to prove to the inhabitants of Barzan and to the adjacent Kurdish tribes that, in spite of military operations, the Iraqi Government has no ill will against them, but that law and order must be maintained.

At long last, on the 9th August, the Soviet Ambassador informed the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Potsdam decision that Allied forces would evacuate Tehran. It is believed that the Soviet forces will leave Tehran very shortly. In this matter the Russians have an advantage over us and the Americans, since they have no assets of importance in Tehran itself, and their headquarters are not in the capital, but at Kasvin which may not be evacuated by the Russians until we leave Kermanshah.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 8th August M. Molotov delivered to the Japanese Ambassador in Moscow a communication in the following terms: "After the rout and capitulation of Hitlerite Germany, Japan remained the only Great Power insisting on the continuation of the war. The demand of the three Powers—the United States, Great Britain and China—on the 26th July this year for the unconditional surrender of the Japanese armed forces was rejected by Japan, and thereby the request by the Japanese Government to the Soviet Government to mediate in the war in the Far East became groundless.

"Taking into consideration Japan's refusal to capitulate, the Allies have addressed to the Soviet Government a proposal to join in the war against Japanese aggression, thereby shortening the duration of the war, reducing the number of victims, and assisting in the speediest restoration of general peace.

"True to its duty to the Allies, the Soviet Government has accepted the proposal of the Allies and has associated itself with the Allied declaration of the 26th July of this year.

"The Soviet Government considers that such a policy on its part is the only means capable of bringing peace nearer, freeing the peoples from further sacrifices and sufferings, and giving the Japanese people the opportunity to avoid those dangers and destructions which have been suffered by Germany after her refusal to capitulate unconditionally.

"In view of the foregoing, the Soviet Government declares that, with effect from to-morrow, the 9th August, the Soviet Union will consider itself in a state of war with Japan."

For this declaration see also under "Soviet Union." The emphasis in it was laid on the Soviet Union's loyalty to her Allies, who had requested her intervention, and to her humanitarian desire to shorten the duration of hostilities. No reference was made to any specific Soviet grievances against Japan, nor was there any statement of Soviet objectives as regards territories previously under Japanese sovereignty or occupation and now to be invaded by Russian armed forces. Hostilities, in fact, immediately involved Russian offensives into Karafuto (southern Sakhalin), Korea and Manchuria. Karafuto, having been ceded by Russia to Japan in 1905 as a result of the Russo-Japanese war, and excluded in the Potsdam Declaration of the 26th July from the definition of territory to be left in future under Japanese sovereignty, was a fairly obvious territorial objective. Korea is destined under the Cairo Declaration to become an independent State "in due course," but the nature of its independence may be conditioned by the character of the preliminary military occupation. As for Manchuria, it is by the Cairo Declaration to be restored to China. Russia accepted the Potsdam Declaration, which expressly states that the terms of the Cairo Declaration shall be carried out. Manchuria is known, however, to have been one of the subjects of discussion in the Sino-Soviet negotiations in Moscow interrupted three weeks ago (see Summaries Nos. 301–303) and resumed on the 7th August with the return of Dr. T. V. Soong, President of the Executive Yuan, accompanied by Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, the new Chinese Foreign Minister. At the time of the Soviet declaration of war no agreement had yet been reached between the Soviet and Chinese representatives, though M. Molotov expressed at a Press conference his confidence that a treaty would be signed. The position of the Chinese negotiators is not a happy one now that Russian has entered the war without any prior agreement with China, for with every square mile of Chinese territory overrun by Russian forces the Russian bargaining position becomes stronger and the Chinese weaker.

No definite information is so far forthcoming of the extent of Soviet demands on China, but it appears that they traverse what the Kuomintang has hitherto claimed as China's sovereign rights never again to be compromised by "unequal treaties" concluded under duress with foreign Powers. The Times Diplomatic Correspondent on the 13th August stated that "it is generally taken for granted that the Chinese will recover Port Arthur." The original Russian lease of Port Arthur (the Kwantung territory including also Dairen), however, was for twenty-five years from 1898 and therefore expired in 1923; its renewal was one of the concessions extorted by Japan in the notorious "Twenty-one Demands" of 1915, and in the Chinese view has been annulled by China's declaration of war against Japan. Russia's reported aspiration for "recovery" of this area would, therefore, be regarded by Chinese nationalists as a fresh seizure of Chinese territory, and it would be difficult for the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek, whose whole political programme has turned on "rights recovery," to consent to any new diminutions of China's sovereignty without seriously weakening their position. On the other hand, they are faced with the danger that refusal to accept Russian demands may cause the Russians to extend even more support to the Chinese Communists than they otherwise would. Soviet forces are reported to be striking south towards Peking and may soon establish contact with the Communist Eighth Army in North China.

Yenan has already broadcast appeals to Japanese troops in China to surrender to the Communists. This has caused great alarm in Chungking; Chiang Kai-shek has issued an order to the Communist forces (still nominally under his supreme command) to stay where they are unless given instructions to move, and has proposed to the American Government that a clause in the surrender terms to be imposed on Japan should require Japanese forces in China to surrender and hand over their arms only to authorised representatives of the Central Government. A United Press despatch of the 13th August from Chungking spoke of the "growing threat of large-scale armed conflict between the Government and the Communists for possession of territory to be evacuated by the Japanese and for arms and equipment the Japanese are going to give up," and remarked that "China to-day is as unprepared for peace as she was unprepared for war in 1937."

The mention of an Allied Supreme Commander in the singular is of great significance, for it implies that the military Government of Japan will be in the last resort under the control of a single Power instead of being a condominium of four Powers as in Germany. It is generally expected that General MacArthur will be appointed to the post. The claim of the United States to this primacy is entirely reasonable on account of her predominant rôle in the Pacific war; the Soviet Union was at first unwilling to agree, but finally gave way.

The Potsdam Declaration, the text of which was given in this Summary No. 304, laid down that only certain "designated points" in Japan would be occupied by Allied forces. This again is in contrast to the state of affairs in Germany, where the entire country is under military occupation. It implies not only that there will be unoccupied zones in Japan, but also that some sort of armed force will be left to the Japanese Government, because the task of maintaining order in these zones will rest on the Japanese authorities and considerable elements of disorder are likely to be present. This limitation of the occupation in the terms demanded has probably been a factor in persuading the Japanese military leaders to submit to the humiliation of surrender.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

This week has witnessed a succession of violent impacts on the United States which have left the people more breathless than exultant. While the press and radio were beginning detailed and sober analyses of the long-awaited Potsdam communiqué, news of the atomic bomb burst on an astonished America and monopolised the front pages. Then came Hiroshima, followed in quick succession by the Russian declaration of war on Japan, the atomic bomb attack on Nagasaki, President Truman's broadcast to the nation, the Japanese offer of surrender, the subsequent negotiations and the end of the second world war.

It is impossible to overstate the impact of the announcement of the use of the atomic bomb. The potentialities of this new weapon for good and evil immediately caught the imagination of the nation-wide press and radio. Some people were incredulous, some shocked, some jubilant, all regarded it as "awful" in the biblical sense of that word. As a result of its discovery everyone agreed that the Japanese war would be immeasurably shortened. It was felt that, faced with the threat of its continued use, the Japanese militarists were unlikely to hold out long. There is little open criticism of the atomic bomb and its use is regarded as the implementation of the Potsdam ultimatum.

While there was relief that the secret of the bomb is and will remain in Anglo-American hands (and incidentally there is generous appreciation for the part that this country and Canada have played), there is an underlying fear lest the principles of the new weapon should become more widely known, and possibly fall into the hands of a hostile aggressor. On the other hand, the basic humanitarianism of the American people is beginning, it is reported, to assert itself in private conversation, and Mr. John Foster Dulles, Governor Dewey's adviser on International Affairs, and one or two other leading Churchmen, have urged the temporary suspension of its use on moral grounds. The vast majority of editorials have emphasised that this new weapon spells the end of any isolationism on America's part, and it was widely recognised that its advent made it imperative that there should be no more war, and that if civilisation were to survive the United Nations Security Council must succeed. There is considerable emphasis on the necessity of keeping moral responsibility ahead of scientific discovery. Otherwise the fate of man is seen as too terrible to contemplate.

Coming on top of the atomic bomb, Russia's declaration of war was welcomed as doubly sealing the fate of Japan. These two happenings were thought to provide a sufficiency of "face-saving opportunities" to enable the Japanese to accept the unconditional surrender formula. Comment on the Russian declaration has followed expected lines. The Internationalists and Liberals, who are friendly to Russia, praise the "perfect timing" of the declaration and welcome this last link in the Russo-Anglo-American unity in peace making. The majority of comment, however, expresses itself as dubious of Russia's aims. The Washington Post, for example, asked "What does Russia hope to get out of the war in the Far East?" It is expected that she will undoubtedly seek to recover the position she occupied in 1895 in Manchuria and Korea, but there is considerable worry over the fate of China, and the hope is being fervently expressed that the talks in Moscow between Generalissimo Stalin and Mr. Soong will produce a solution of the outstanding Sino-Russian problems. The extremists fear lest China should become another Poland.

The Japanese surrender offer following the delivery of the second atomic bomb and the Soviet military operations was received with wild delight, and the public decided that the war was virtually over. Several premature rejoicings and celebrations took place in many cities, one as a result of an incorrect report which was issued by an American news agency which stated that President "Truman announces Japan surrenders." Although this report was quickly denied, on the strength of it, the Canadian Broadcasting Commission put on a record specially made by Mr. Mackenzie King announcing that Sunday, 19th August, would be a national day of prayer and thanksgiving in Canada. The official announcement of Japan's final acceptance of the Allied terms was made public simultaneously at midnight London time on the 14th August.

The public is too flushed with victory and too delighted at the news that further bloodshed is unnecessary to bother much about the problem of Japan's administration. The fate of Hiroshito, however, showed clearly how the nation, and the Senate itself, was divided on this particular issue. Senator Tom Stewart (Democrat, Tennessee) maintained that the Emperor was "a war criminal, and I'd like to see him hung up by his toes." This was the line largely taken by the radio commentators who were overwhelmingly opposed to the acceptance of the Japanese offer in conditional form. One speaker stated bluntly that "the Potsdam provision regarding war criminals fits Hirohito like a glove," and Mr. Max Lerner maintained that the Allied offer constituted "a soft peace" for Japan and that by "leaving the Emperor and the warrior caste" the peace would "be packed with dynamite."

On the other hand approval for the Government note was expressed in several other quarters, and in particular in circles which had some knowledge of Japan and the Far East. "Only the super-sensitive and super-suspicious will quarrel with the Big Four reply," said one commentator, while several others pointed out that the Emperor would not be a sovereign: he would be merely a figurehead and puppet, taking orders from the Allied Supreme Commander. However divergent the views on this question, it is clear that the people would have resented any considerable prolongation of the war over this issue.

The momentous news from the Pacific stole the limelight also from President Truman's broadcast on the Potsdam meeting. The passage affirming the United States' determination to secure adequate strategic bases in the Far East and elsewhere was welcomed as clarifying the President's earlier remarks at Berlin that the United States did not seek one inch of territory. The need for American aid to devastated Europe was also noted sympathetically.

The momentous developments this week have also intensified the mounting anxiety on the subject of reconversion, and there is considerable worry lest the Japanese surrender will "produce temporary chaos." Congress has been criticised for going into recess until October. After consulting the President, Senator Barkley, the majority leader, has now announced that, if the emergency legislation is ready, Congress will meet as soon as practicable, probably on the 4th September. The legislation referred to covers unemployment compensation, the Surplus Property Disposal Act, the "Full Employment" Bill,, the classification of the status of war agencies and the Bill initiated by the President to give him extensive powers to reorganise the executive departments. The majority of comment has stressed the ability of private enterprise to meet the problems of reconversion if given freedom from "government policies which strew the path of industry with difficulties and obstacles," to quote the New York Journal of Commerce. The financial papers even go so far as to state that "an early peace will be helpful to business." The President has issued a five-point programme for reconversion to peace-time production, which includes a vigorous drive to expand the production of materials which are in short supply to meet civilian as well as military needs.

The Liberals, however, are demanding Government action and are pressing particularly for action on the Murray Bill and for legislation to cushion the shock of reconversion. The results of the British election continue to be quoted as "a lesson" on the necessity for economic security.

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 6th August the new Argentine Minister of the Interior announced that the state of siege was to be lifted: a decree to the same effect, published on the following day, stated that the "extraordinary reasons for the state of siege have partially disappeared, and that the Government is now able to guarantee public order by normal, legal and administrative methods." When journalists asked if this meant that political parties could carry on activities previously prohibited by decree, both the Minister for the Interior and Colonel Perón assented vigorously. The Government can, however, always have recourse to the decree dealing with crimes against the State published in January (see Summary No. 278) by virtue of which it is endowed with very wide powers. Shortly before the raising of the state of siege the Minister of the Interior was expelled from the Radical Party, which, like the Conservatives and Socialists, has refused to accept the Statute for Political Parties. The Radical Party apparently intends to carry its opposition to the length of abstaining from any elections that may be held. It is still not clear whether the Government have been able to split off any considerable section of the rank and file of the Party, or indeed whether the opposition groups can agree on anything more concrete than their hostility towards the Statute.

On the 10th August President Farrell left Buenos Aires on an official visit to Paraguay. For the period of his absence President Farrell delegated his powers to the Vice-President, and Colonel Perón's first act was to promote the President from the rank of Brigadier to that of General of division. Since then, Colonel Perón has presided at a cabinet meeting, delivered himself of a statement on post-war economic policy, addressed a meeting of workers, and received some 300 senior officers, who came to present their compliments at the Casa Rosada.

The Senate and Chamber of Deputies of Peru—which have undergone a complete change of complexion since the result of the recent elections has been declared, and contain a large representation of the hitherto outlawed A.P.R.A.—have passed motions approving the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. and the breaking off of relations with the Franco régime. The latter decision is reported also to have been taken by the Government of Uruguay.

The tension arising from the harbouring of Dominican oppositionists in the Venezuelan legation (see Summary No. 303) appears now to have been lessened: the refugees will now be allowed to leave the country, but the Venezuelan Minister in Ciudad Trujillo will be replaced.

UNITED NATIONS.

U.N.R.R.A.: Third Session of the Council.

The third session of the Council of U.N.R.R.A. is now proceeding in London. At the first Plenary Session on the 7th August the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs delivered a speech of welcome. On the 8th August the Director-General presented his report to the Council on the work of the administration. The Director's survey of the current situation is supplemented by the reports of the Combined Food, Raw Materials, and Production and Resources Boards, and by statements made in Plenary Session on the 9th August by representatives of the Allied military authorities on operations concerned with military relief and displaced persons. On the 10th August the Council proceeded to discussion of the Director-General's report, and on the 13th August of his programme of operations.

Brief reference may be made to the salient problems. Several delegates have expressed appreciation of the work of U.N.R.R.A. "The real work which U.N.R.R.A. is doing has tended to pass unreported," observed Mr. Bevin. But the Council meets in no mood of self-adulation. The financial situation is grave. The U.S.S.R. has requested assistance to the value of $700 million for a twelve-months' period. Yet, independently of assistance to the U.S.S.R., the modest programme of relief and rehabilitation for 1946 presented by the Director-General will entail expenditure of at least $1½ billion in excess of the resources available to U.N.R.R.A. on the present basis of contributions. No less difficult it the procuring of supplies—food, clothing and raw materials. Virtually, all basic food-stuffs are in short supply, though substantial quantities of all important food-stuffs except meat have been set aside for the liberated countries by reductions in civilian consumption in the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand below the 1944 levels. But the most urgent need is the provision of lorries—"the life-blood of organised society," in Mr. Noel Baker's epigrammatic phrase. If aid is not forthcoming, concluded the Director-General, "the name of the United Nations will be a mockery in Europe this winter."

Delegates have submitted a variety of criticisms and constructive comments. Mr. Noel Baker dwelt on the need to widen the area whence supplies are received, and remarked that it may soon prove necessary to set time-limits for the completion of U.N.R.R.A. operations as targets for planning purposes. Others have expressed their conviction of the need for closer and more effective collaboration between U.N.R.R.A. and the Combined Boards in order to ensure that relief is given requisite priority in the allocation of supplies. Mr. Bruce (Australia) urged the immediate establishment of a regional office for the Far East. Vicomte Obert de Thieusies (Belgium) echoed Mr. Noel Baker's conclusion that "as we plan for tailing off the help from U.N.R.R.A., so we must plan working the economy of the assisted countries into the new forms of international economic co-operation which will be developed."

The International War Crimes Tribunal.

The Moscow Declaration of the 1st November, 1943, regarding German atrocities distinguished between acts of brutality and terrorism committed in specific places, the perpetrators of which were to be sent for trial within and according to the laws of the countries where such acts were committed, and major offences having "no particular geographic localisation," punishment for which was to be administered "by the joint decision of the Governments of the Allies." The agreement of the 8th August between the Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. regulates the procedure for the trial of this second category of war criminals. An international military tribunal is to be established. Each signatory is to appoint one member of the tribunal. Its permanent seat is to be in Berlin, but Nuremberg will be the scene of the final trial. Proceedings will be conducted in four languages. The tribunal's verdict of guilt or innocence will be final, but the Control Council for Germany may mitigate sentences.

Juridically the innovation of greatest interest lies in the designation of certain types of military and political action as criminal acts for which individuals shall be held responsible before the tribunal. The crimes within the jurisdiction of the tribunal are classified as (a) Crimes against peace, such as the preparation and conduct of aggressive war or of war in violation of international obligations; (b) War Crimes, of which the killing of hostages and the wanton destruction of towns are examples; (c) Crimes against Humanity, such as deportation of civilians.

Much preparatory work for the trials remains to be done. This is entrusted to four chief prosecutors, one to be appointed by each signatory. Individually, but in collaboration, the chief prosecutors are to amass evidence, to prepare indictments, and to conduct preliminary examinations of witnesses and defendants. The final designation of major war criminals and the final approval of indictments is entrusted to a committee composed of the four chief prosecutors deciding by majority vote.

"Major war criminals of the European Axis" are to be tried by this procedure. Additional identical tribunals may be established.

GERMANY.

MOST Germans have been too immersed in their own immediate economic problems to react very perceptibly to the end of the war in the Pacific. So far, the most notable German pronouncement on the termination of hostilities—and that not a particularly outstanding one—has been a declaration issued by the Free German Trade Unions League in Berlin, welcoming the fact that, with the victory of the democratic nations, mankind can once again begin to hope for a better future, and reaffirming the determination of the unions to bear the "sacrifices and privations" demanded by reparation and reconstruction in the knowledge that they would in the end promote "a new political and social order." The Berlin radio on the 15th August devoted a substantial part of its programme to the causes and circumstances of Japan's defeat, and gave particular emphasis to the part played by the Soviet Union in bringing about the common victory of what it called "the united front of the democratic peoples." In Munich the Bavarian Prime Minister, Dr. Friedrich Schaeffer, greeted the news of Japan's surrender with a brief statement to the press in which he expressed the hope that the end of the war in the Far East would exert "a beneficial influence on developments in Germany."

Two important decisions which should help to place the shattered finances of the city of Berlin on a more stable basis were announced after the sixth meeting of the inter-Allied Kommandantur on the 16th August. The British and American representatives on the Kommandantur, it was stated, had each agreed to advance a credit of 25 million marks to the Stadtkontorbank to assist the city treasury and also to finance certain essential private enterprises. A further 25 million marks which had previously been deposited with the bank by the Soviet military command would be used to the same end. The Kommandantur at the same time accepted a scheme of the Oberbürgermeister of Berlin, Dr. Werner, to organise a public lottery to finance the work of municipal reconstruction. On the 15th August the Allied commanders in Berlin had issued a joint order reminding the population that paper money put into circulation by the military authorities must be accepted on a par with Reichsmarks as legal tender for all purposes, and that the conclusion of commercial agreements calling for eventual payment in foreign currencies was prohibited. During the past few weeks the value of the mark, including the Allied military mark, is stated to have fallen slightly—at least a fall is reflected in the fluctuation of Berlin black market prices—and the principal decline of confidence in the currency is said to have been caused by the huge quantities of military marks with Soviet code markings that have been brought into circulation by Red army officers and men who have in many cases recently received their first pay in three years.

Harvest reports which have been coming in during the past few days from many parts of Germany are in some cases even more discouraging than was hitherto expected. On the 15th August, the Berliner Zeitung, the official journal of the Berlin Magistrat, stated that the harvest in Brandenburg would be quite inadequate to feed both the province and the population of Berlin during the coming year, the rye crop being only two-thirds and the potato crop only slightly more than half of the normal. Only one-fifth of the former livestock of the province remained. The area under cultivation, according to the provincial food and agricultural administrator, Heinrich Rau, has declined in the past twelve months from 60,000 to 28,000 hectares. The poor harvest is already being used by the Left-wing parties as a further pretext for pressing their demand for immediate land reform, and for blaming for some of the present depressing conditions the "lamentable agricultural policy of the Weimar Republic," which failed to carve up the large estates. In the West, the oil-plant crop is stated to be below expectations. Serious shortages of fats and sugar are anticipated in Bavaria, but the cereal crops there are apparently more satisfactory, and quantities of bread grain have even been sent by the United States authorities during the past month to the American zone of Austria. Nearly all this season's threshing in Bavaria, as in most other parts of the Reich, will have to be done by hand, as less than 200 threshing machines remain available in the entire State. Even in the relatively rich agricultural province of Schleswig-Holstein, owing to the shortage of fertilisers and the progressive exhaustion of the soil during the war, the yield per acre this year is not high. Heavy rains have added to the difficulties of harvesting in Westphalia and have rotted considerable quantities of corn that had been cut but not garnered. An inter-Allied team of experts, on which the United Kingdom is represented by Sir Jack Drummond, is in future to pay quarterly visits to all three zones of western Germany and to regularly report its findings and recommendations on the agricultural and food situation to the military commanders-in-chief.

A full statement of the conditions which will in future govern the resumption of trade union activity throughout the American zone has now been issued by the United States authorities at Frankfurt and Munich. The United States Military Government insists that employers must not be allowed to influence the election of trade union officials or works committees; that elections inside the trade unions must be held according to democratic principles; that no former member of the Nazi Party or German Labour Front must be permitted to hold office; and that any group which has the support of 25 per cent. of the employees of a factory will be entitled to formal recognition as a works committee. Decisions on wages and hours of work are to remain the exclusive prerogative of Military Government, and the main object of the unions for the time being must be to co-operate with Military Government in purging industry of its Nazi leadership. In the Hamburg region of the British zone, the twenty reorganised unions have recently been issued with questionaires asking them to supply details of persons in industry whom they have reason to regard as Nazis and whom they can assist Military Government to eliminate in this way. At Dortmund a special office has been opened under the direction of Military Government to advise the working population on the organisation and government of a trade union system. Its activities are being supervised by the well-known Social Democratic journalist and Reichstag deputy, Fritz Henssler, who under the Nazi régime spent seven years in a concentration camp.

In the Ruhr particularly, the permission granted by Military Government to proceed with the organisation of trade unions has met with an immediate response. The eagerness of the miners for a thorough clean-up of the local industrial managements is, however, tending in some ways to complicate the purely technical problems of increasing coal output, which Military Government regards as its most pressing task at the moment. So thorough has been the concentration of economic power in the Ruhr coalfield in the hands of a few syndicates during the past twelve years that it is now virtually impossible to dispense at one stroke with the organisations which the Nazis have favoured, and at the same time to obtain from the mines the large deliveries of coal for which many Allied countries of Europe are waiting. The key agency in the Ruhr coal industry is still to a large extent the highly-suspect Rhenish-Westphalian Coal Syndicate, which has in the past given generous support to Hitler and the Nazi Party treasury, but which cannot be dispensed with until a complete reorganisation of the Ruhr industry is undertaken. Nevertheless the higher ranks of the syndicate have been purged of a number of prominent Nazis and the rest of its staff is now working under close British supervision.

On the 16th August the Vatican radio broadcast the text of the first Pastoral Letter to be issued by the Catholic Bishop of Berlin, Konrad Count von Preysing, since the Allied occupation. In this document, which was dated the 24th June, Mgr. von Pressing dwelt at length upon the "grave injuries" which the Church had sustained during the twelve years of Nazi persecution, the "devastation and confusion wrought by the Nazi Party doctrine in the souls of men," and the sufferings of Catholic prelates like the Provost of Lichtenberg who had met his death at Dachau for protesting against the persecution of the Jews and the killing of the insane. In the new era that lay ahead—"of which we know nothing except that over it, too, the Lord's hand would reign"—Mgr. von Preysing stated that he "would not shrink from any effort to rebuild the Catholic press . . . . and claim again the rights of organisation and assembly for the Catholics." By insisting that "all political activity must be guided by Catholic principles" he mildly rebuked those members of his congregation who have recently committed themselves deeply to the idea of a "united Christian front" under the ægis of the Christian Democratic Union, the major non-Socialist political party in Berlin and the Russian zone.

What may prove to be a far-reaching development in the unification of all Protestant religious bodies in Germany was foreshadowed on the 14th August by an announcement in Die Zeit, the organ of the Christian Democratic Union, that the regional Evangelical Churches (evangelische Landeskirchen) had opened negotiations to form a "Common German Evangelical Church" (Gemeinsame Deutsche Evangelische Kirche). A united Evangelical Church has never yet existed in Germany, for the German Evangelical Church League, founded in 1922, made no pretensions to provide a central government for the Evangelical Churches. Instead, there have been a number of regional Churches (Landeskirchen), each with its own constitution (Kirchenordnung) issued by the sovereign political heads of the various States in consultation with the Church authorities.

AUSTRIA.

The unveiling of the Red army memorial on the Schwarzenbergplatz on the 19th August has been made an occasion to demonstrate once again to the outside world the cordiality of the relations between the Renner Government and the Soviet Military authorities. Dr. Renner himself spoke fervently on this occasion of the way in which the deeds and sacrifices of the Red army had "brought about the resurrection of the Austrian State and given its people once more the right of self-determination." Other warm tributes to the Russians were paid by members of his Cabinet and by the Oberbürgermeister of Vienna, General Koerner. On the Russian side, General Kornyakov suggested that the new memorial would "immortalise the struggle of the democratic peoples against barbarism, and the Austrians' debt of gratitude to their liberators."

Much publicity has been given by the Russian-controlled news agencies in Vienna to the trial before the Austrian People's Court of four Nazi storm troopers who were accused of shooting 102 Hungarian Jews during a "death march" from the Engerau concentration camp in Lower Austria when the Russians first approached the frontier. The trial—the first of its kind to be held before the new Court and under the recently-enacted "War Criminals Law"—opened on the 14th August and ended on the 17th with three of the defendants being sentenced to death and the fourth to eight years' penal servitude. Its most notable feature was a passage in the main speech of the Public Prosecutor in which he digressed from the principal purpose of the trial to plead the innocence of the Austrian people as a whole regarding the atrocities mentioned in the indictment.

A grim warning to the population of Vienna not to "indulge in false hopes about its food prospects for the next few weeks" was given by a member of the city council at a press conference on the 14th August and repeated by the Vienna radio on the following day. The local yield of this season's harvest, it was stated, was not yet certain, but it would in any case hardly suffice for more than three months. The assistance given by the Russians under the Stalinaktion would ensure the city's bread supplies for three weeks longer than had originally been promised, and negotiations with Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union for further quantities of food would be continued. The ration cards for the coming period, however, would no longer promise any fixed amounts of food, although there might be the possibility of an increase in the bread ration of 50 grammes a day for children and normal consumers.

The allusion to negotiations with Czechoslovakia, as well as with Russia, for food was accompanied on the 14th August by a suggestion by the Secretary of State for Education and Culture, Ernst Fischer, at a concert of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, that Austria's Czech neighbours were now "ready to go with her on her historic road." Fischer, who before his return to Vienna with the Red army was one of the principal exponents of Soviet policy in the German and Austrian broadcasts from Moscow, went on to explain that the Austrians "would have nothing to do with the German imperialists . . . but they held out their hands to Czechs and Slovaks, Yugoslavs and Russians."

An agreement whereby Austrians would in future be permitted to travel freely between the British, American and French zones, provided that they first obtained the authorisation of their local Military Government office, was announced from Linz on the 15th August. This agreement, which will undoubtedly be welcomed as an earnest of Military Government's determination to administer Austria as one country, stated that Austrians wishing to move permanently from one zone to another would also be permitted to do so. The concessions, however, did not apply to the Russian zone, and the question whether persons in Vienna would be given similar permission to move to other parts of the country under British, American and French occupation had yet to be decided.

On the 14th August it was announced that the former Gauleiter of Oberdonau and one of the most prominent of the Austrian Nazi leaders, August Eigruber, had been arrested by the American military police at St. Pankraz. Despite the many weeks which he had spent as a hunted man, Eigruber was stated at the time of his capture to be as arrogant as ever and to have vowed that he was still and would remain a Nazi. His arrest should do much to reassure those Austrian democrats in the American zone who have recently been inclined to complain that the action of Military Government there against prominent Nazis has not been more expeditious. At the moment there is still criticism of the American authorities for permitting the former Austrian Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Dr. Guido Schmidt, who is generally regarded as having "sold out" his country to Hitler in 1938, to remain at liberty in their area. In Carinthia the purge of Nazis from all branches of public administration is being pursued with the utmost vigour by the British authorities, despite the repeated insinuations to the contrary by the Belgrade radio, and more than 2,300 officials of the former régime have already been detained there.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The death was announced last Thursday of Dr. Krofta, Foreign Minister from March 1936 until shortly after the Munich Agreement. During the occupation he was a member of the Triumvirate which guided the Resistance Movement in the Protectorate. He had only recently been released from a concentration camp, the rigours of which, no doubt, had accelerated his death at the age of 69. Dr. Ripka refers to him as "one of our most deserving patriots."

A vigorous campaign has started for the recolonisation by Czech peasants of the Border Regions. The first groups of Czech peasants are expected to arrive there early in September, by which time German property should either have been allocated to Czechs or taken over by the Land Reform Fund. In the meantime, German Fifth Columnists are attempting to cause unrest among the peasants and to obstruct the Land Reform Scheme by spreading false reports.

The problem of coal and labour is still one of the gravest in the economic reconstruction of the Republic. In pre-war times there were 80,000 miners; to-day there are only 30,000. Emphasis is laid upon the fact that the miner has a social duty to fulfil, and that the "Revolution can only succeed if it succeeds economically." To help to overcome the labour shortage, all unproductive industrial, as well as agricultural, enterprises will be abolished, whilst unemployed labour can, when necessary, be conscripted by special Decree for harvest-work. The first Germans have already been put to work in the mines at Moravská Ostrava.

The recent Anglo-Czech commercial talks in London have now been satisfactorily concluded, and the terms for the new £5,000,000 Loan were agreed upon. In addition, the possibilities of entering into a Monetary Agreement and of the liquidation of the remaining Czech Government Offices and Missions in London were discussed. A Trade Agreement has been reached between Czechoslovakia and Hungary, whereby Hungary, in return for Czech industrial products, will deliver oil and other commodities. U.N.R.R.A. has begun fresh negotiations with Czechoslovakia and an import-programme is being prepared, to be effective from the 1st November. Goods of every description which Czechoslovakia needs from abroad will figure in the Agreement.

The Slovak Communist Party Conference in Zilina has terminated. The Party decided to increase its efforts to mobilise all available man-power for the reconstruction of the Republic, and to gain the support of all who share responsibility for development in Slovakia. Reports of unrest continue to arrive from Slovakia, but reliable information is scanty. The superficial reason is the food, housing, and transport situation: the real reason, according to some quarters, is the attempt by "subversive Fascist elements" to undermine faith in the Republic and the Slovak National Council. Former members of the Hlinka Party will receive full national, democratic, and religious rights, but reaction in the guise of religion will not be tolerated.

General Harmon, Commander of the 22nd American Army Corps, has announced the departure of the Polish Brigade from Czechoslovak soil (see Summary No. 305).

Air Marshal Sir Sholto Douglas, escorted by other high-ranking R.A.F. officers, has arrived in Prague.

POLAND.

In his review of foreign policy in the House of Commons on the 20th August, Mr. Bevin pointed out that the decision taken at Potsdam to hand over provisionally to the Poles the administration of the zone between the Eastern and Western Neisse was a necessary measure if the economy of the region was to be restored and enabled to make its full contribution as soon as possible to provisioning a devastated Europe. He went on to say that the final delimitation of the frontiers would depend largely on how many of the Poles from the areas ceded to Russia, and of the Polish troops and civilians in Western Europe, would return to Poland in the future. In their conversations with the representatives of the Polish Government at Potsdam, the Prime Minister and he had received assurances that all Poles returning would be accorded personal rights and rights of property on the same basis as other Poles; that the elections would be free, secret, and conducted in accordance with the 1921 Constitution, and that it was hoped to hold them as soon as possible and not later than early 1946; and that religion was free and would remain so. They had, further, been assured of the right of entry for the Press of the world and of the sending out of uncensored news, and had come to an arrangement for the establishment of reciprocal air services between London and Warsaw to serve official needs, and that service had now begun; they had made it clear to the Polish representatives that they would expect, in particular, that the principal democratic parties should be allowed full liberty to make up their own programmes and put forward their own candidates in the elections, and that freedom of speech and impartial justice should be guaranteed to all Polish citizens. Marshal Stalin had stated that the Soviet troops would be withdrawn from Poland, with the exception of a small number required to maintain the communications necessary for the Soviet troops in Germany. The question of the prisons and secret police in Poland still needed to be cleared up; but, with these assurances, the Secretary of State urged Poles oversea, both military and civilian, to go back and assume their responsibilities in building the new Poland.

On the 8th August a delegation headed by MM. Bierut, Morawski, and Mikolajczyk arrived in Moscow to discuss reparations and the final delimitation of Poland's eastern frontier; on the 16th August a Frontier Treaty and a Reparations Agreement were signed. The Frontier Treaty lays down the Curzon Line frontier, with the minor rectifications in Poland's favour provided for by the Crimea agreement, and with two more substantial concessions to Poland: namely,

(a) in Eastern Galicia, an area not exceeding 30 kilom. in depth lying east of the Curzon Line and between the rivers Bug and Solokya (this area, which the Poles claim to be oil-bearing, was left in German-occupied Poland by the Ribbentrop-Molotov Line of 1939); and (b) in the Bialystok region, part of the Forest of Bialowieza lying east of the Curzon Line to a depth not exceeding 17 kilom., and including the towns of Niemirow, Gainowka, Jalowka and Bialowiez. A provisional frontier through East Prussia has also been agreed upon, running eastward from a point on the eastern shore of Danzig Bay, and north of Braunsberg-Goldap, to the point where the Lithuanian, Polish and East Prussian frontiers meet.

Under the Reparations Agreement, the Soviet Government relinquishes in Poland's favour all claims to German property and other assets, and also to shares in German industrial and transport enterprises throughout Polish territory, including the German territory which passes to Poland. In return for a 15 per cent. share of all reparation deliveries accruing to the U.S.S.R. under the Berlin Conference decisions, Poland is to deliver annually at an agreed price prescribed quantities of coal throughout the entire period of the occupation of Germany.

The Provisional Government has appointed Professor Henryk Raabe, Rector of the Marie Curie-Sklodowska University in Lublin and a prominent Socialist, to replace M. Modlewski as Polish Ambassador in Moscow, and M. Adam Ostrowski, also a Socialist and hitherto Governor of Cracow, as Minister in Stockholm. A Polish delegation to the European Inland Transport Conference, headed by the Minister of Communications, M. Rabanowski, arrived in London on the 18th August.

M. Mikolajczyk's former Cabinet and Party colleague Professor Kot, has recently arrived in Warsaw from London, accompanied by five members of the London Socialist Party group. U.N.R.R.A.'s delegation in Poland has been touring Silesia.

SOVIET UNION.

The text of the Japanese capitulation was read over the Moscow Home Service early in the morning of the 15th August and was published in the Soviet press of the same date. A statement was issued later in the day by General Antonov, Red Army Chief of Staff, to the effect that the Japanese Emperor's announcement was only a declaration of unconditional surrender, but that Japanese armed forces had not yet been ordered to cease military operations and that there had been no effective capitulation of Japan's armed forces; Soviet forces in the Far East would therefore continue their offensive operations against the Japanese until they laid down their arms. Two days later, Marshal Vasilievsky broadcast a message to the Commander-in-Chief of the Kwantung Army proposing that it should cease all operations and surrender at midday on the 20th August. Subsequently Soviet communiqués daily announced the advance of the Red Army on all three Far Eastern fronts until a communiqué on the 19th August declared that the Kwantung Army in Manchuria had ceased resistance on most sectors of the front and that the general surrender had commenced. It was announced on the 20th August from the General Staff of the Red Army that General Derevyanko had been appointed representative of the Soviet troops to General MacArthur and would arrive at his headquarters in Manila in a few days. Japan's surrender has been analysed from many angles by the Soviet press and radio. A broadcast in English from Moscow stated that the fact that the Kwantung Army had to be maintained in Manchuria played a vital rôle in China's struggle and later in the hostilities with Great Britain and the United States of America. The situation in the Pacific might have been greatly complicated had this army been at Tientsin or the Burma–India frontier. The Soviet commentator Victorov asserted that the Red Army was now coming into contact with Japanese reserves which were inaccessible even to atomic bombs.

The Soviet press acclaimed the Soviet-Polish Frontier Treaty as the consolidation of Soviet-Polish friendship. It was described as being of great international importance, and a typical expression of Soviet foreign policy which, incidentally, removed obstacles between the two peoples and guarded the interests of the Soviet Union and of peace frontiers claimed to be even more favourable to Poland than those decided at Yalta. (See also under "Poland.")

Commenting on the Soviet-Chinese Treaty, Izvestiya (15th August) assured its readers that the "alliance will undoubtedly become a most important factor determining a stable peace in the Far East." (See under "Far East.")

On the 20th August the U.S.S.R. Supreme Council Præsidium ratified the United Nations Charter, signed in San Francisco on the 26th June, 1945.

The current number of New Times (No. 5) contains an article entitled "After the Failure of the Simla Conference," which blames His Majesty's Government for the breakdown of the recent negotiations. "Many Indian observers," says the author, "are inclined to believe that the Simla Conference was on the whole only an election stunt of the British Conservatives." It was moreover stated that British interests played a notable part in encouraging the Moslem League to reject the Wavell plan. "The political atmosphere in India," concludes the article, "remains very tense." A recent article in New Times also commented sharply on the contrast between the living conditions for the white and native populations in India and mentioned American sympathy for the Indians.

General Eisenhower's visit to Moscow was very fully and cordially reported in the Soviet press. He was entertained to dinner by Marshal Stalin on the 13th August, gave a press conference on the following day and attended the big Physical Culture Parade on the Red Square. As reported by Moscow wireless, General Eisenhower expressed himself in the most eulogistic terms about the Soviet Union and its people. He left Moscow for Berlin accompanied by Marshal Zhukov on the 15th August.

Post-war depression in the United States is anticipated on a huge scale by Trud (15th August), following the cancellation of shipbuilding contracts running into millions of dollars and the closing down of a large number of war industries, although the reconversion of industry will absorb many workers. A later article in Trud came out strongly against some American industrialists who, it is alleged, not only do nothing to prevent unemployment, but contribute to the creation of a cheap labour reserve and have concocted the Federal Industrial Relations Act, now before the Senate, solely in the interests of employers.

The forthcoming Trades Union Conference in Paris is the subject of lively and sustained interest in the Soviet press, while Trade Union activities in other countries are followed with the usual close attention. The accounts of the recent visits of the Soviet Trade Union delegations both to the United States and Persia show that nothing is being left undone to ensure eventual support for the Soviet delegation at the Conference. The three weeks' visit of the Soviet Trades Union Delegation headed by Kuznetsov to the C.I.O. (terminating on the 13th August) was reported in all the Soviet papers, which stressed the growth of fraternal feeling between the two organisations and the keen interest of American workers in the Soviet Trades Union system. In his speech in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the 6th August, M. Kuznetsov stressed the democratic principles of Soviet Trade Unions and described them as voluntary organisations (which they are not) run on democratic lines. The far-reaching and unusual powers which the Soviet authorities are claiming for trade unions in countries now under Soviet occupation were summarised in an article on "Trade Unions, Strength of Roumanian Democracy" in Trud (24th July). It stated that the new Trade Unions were helping to democratise the country, purge Government departments and reorganise the police. The Trade Union movements everywhere are represented as spearheads in the struggle not only for improved material conditions for the working class, but also as a rallying point for all the "progressive democratic" forces of the nation.

Mr. Justice Birkett's verdict in favour of Mr. F. A. Voigt in his recent libel action against the News Chronicle was criticised in violent and even defamatory terms by New Times. "Actually," stated the article, "Voigt brought the action not against the News Chronicle but against public opinion in Britain and other democratic countries which had long ago made up its mind that its magazine was a vehicle of Dr. Goebbels's propaganda." The article concluded by asserting that as Voigt's magazine was the favourite paper of Lord Haw-Haw, Mr. Justice Birkett may become the favourite judge of those of Hitler's hirelings who do not succeed in escaping trial. "He has not made a bad start in this direction."

Interviewed regarding the position and prospects of the Soviet civil airfleet (of which he is chief), Marshal Fedor Astakhov stated (as reported by Moscow wireless) that whereas before the war Moscow had air contact with only three European capitals, Soviet aircraft fly regularly to-day from Moscow to Berlin, Prague, Warsaw, Bucharest, Sofia, Vienna, Budapest and Belgrade. There is also a regular Moscow–Tehran service. Many new routes are now operating in the eastern parts of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Civil Air Fleet, according to Marshal Astakhov, is to be improved and expanded beyond the pre-war level.

Commenting on the Soviet-Chinese Treaty, Izvestiya (15th August) assured its readers that the "alliance will undoubtedly become a most important factor determining a stable peace in the Far East." (See under "Far East.")

On the 20th August the U.S.S.R. Supreme Council Præsidium ratified the United Nations Charter, signed in San Francisco on the 26th June, 1945.

The current number of New Times (No. 5) contains an article entitled "After the Failure of the Simla Conference," which blames His Majesty's Government for the breakdown of the recent negotiations. "Many Indian observers," says the author, "are inclined to believe that the Simla Conference was on the whole only an election stunt of the British Conservatives." It was moreover stated that British interests played a notable part in encouraging the Moslem League to reject the Wavell plan. "The political atmosphere in India," concludes the article, "remains very tense." A recent article in New Times also commented sharply on the contrast between the living conditions for the white and native populations in India and mentioned American sympathy for the Indians.

General Eisenhower's visit to Moscow was very fully and cordially reported in the Soviet press. He was entertained to dinner by Marshal Stalin on the 13th August, gave a press conference on the following day and attended the big Physical Culture Parade on the Red Square. As reported by Moscow wireless, General Eisenhower expressed himself in the most eulogistic terms about the Soviet Union and its people. He left Moscow for Berlin accompanied by Marshal Zhukov on the 15th August.

Post-war depression in the United States is anticipated on a huge scale by Trud (15th August), following the cancellation of shipbuilding contracts running into millions of dollars and the closing down of a large number of war industries, although the reconversion of industry will absorb many workers. A later article in Trud came out strongly against some American industrialists who, it is alleged, not only do nothing to prevent unemployment, but contribute to the creation of a cheap labour reserve and have concocted the Federal Industrial Relations Act, now before the Senate, solely in the interests of employers.

The forthcoming Trades Union Conference in Paris is the subject of lively and sustained interest in the Soviet press, while Trade Union activities in other countries are followed with the usual close attention. The accounts of the recent visits of the Soviet Trade Union delegations both to the United States and Persia show that nothing is being left undone to ensure eventual support for the Soviet delegation at the Conference. The three weeks' visit of the Soviet Trades Union Delegation headed by Kuznetsov to the C.I.O. (terminating on the 13th August) was reported in all the Soviet papers, which stressed the growth of fraternal feeling between the two organisations and the keen interest of American workers in the Soviet Trades Union system. In his speech in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the 6th August, M. Kuznetsov stressed the democratic principles of Soviet Trade Unions and described them as voluntary organisations (which they are not) run on democratic lines. The far-reaching and unusual powers which the Soviet authorities are claiming for trade unions in countries now under Soviet occupation were summarised in an article on "Trade Unions, Strength of Roumanian Democracy" in Trud (24th July). It stated that the new Trade Unions were helping to democratise the country, purge Government departments and reorganise the police. The Trade Union movements everywhere are represented as spearheads in the struggle not only for improved material conditions for the working class, but also as a rallying point for all the "progressive democratic" forces of the nation.

Mr. Justice Birkett's verdict in favour of Mr. F. A. Voigt in his recent libel action against the News Chronicle was criticised in violent and even defamatory terms by New Times. "Actually," stated the article, "Voigt brought the action not against the News Chronicle but against public opinion in Britain and other democratic countries which had long ago made up its mind that its magazine was a vehicle of Dr. Goebbels's propaganda." The article concluded by asserting that as Voigt's magazine was the favourite paper of Lord Haw-Haw, Mr. Justice Birkett may become the favourite judge of those of Hitler's hirelings who do not succeed in escaping trial. "He has not made a bad start in this direction."

Interviewed regarding the position and prospects of the Soviet civil airfleet (of which he is chief), Marshal Fedor Astakhov stated (as reported by Moscow wireless) that whereas before the war Moscow had air contact with only three European capitals, Soviet aircraft fly regularly to-day from Moscow to Berlin, Prague, Warsaw, Bucharest, Sofia, Vienna, Budapest and Belgrade. There is also a regular Moscow–Tehran service. Many new routes are now operating in the eastern parts of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Civil Air Fleet, according to Marshal Astakhov, is to be improved and expanded beyond the pre-war level.

SCANDINAVIA.

A proposal to replace the Swedish Minister in Copenhagen, M. Dardel, by the former Foreign Minister, M. Günther, was cancelled at the latter's own request in the face of Danish public opinion. It is probable that outside extreme Resistance circles the hostile reaction was due more to the popularity won by M. Dardel during the war than to personal animosity against M. Günther. The Swedes, however, were loud in their criticism of the Danish viewpoint, particularly when they read in their press that the Danish Government had offered the post of Minister in Stockholm to M. Svenningsen, the Director of the Danish Foreign Ministry. The Swedes, as well as the Danish Resistance Movement, pointed out that he had been far more friendly with the German authorities in Denmark than his position necessitated, and that he could hardly be sent to any Allied country. It is reported that he has refused the appointment.

At the opening of the Danish Social Democratic Party Congress on the 19th August the chairman, M. Hedtoft Hansen, reiterated that the unity of the Labour movement could only be achieved on a democratic basis. He urged the cessation of illegal strikes and acts of violence and said that, while the party's election programme would be a bold Socialist one, it would not be an ultimatum to other democratic forces in the country. It was subsequently announced that negotiations with the Communists had been broken off.

At noon on the 17th August an explosion occurred in Oslo harbour while German prisoners were transferring explosives from a warehouse to ammunition ships. Casualties are estimated at over fifty killed, chiefly among the Germans engaged, though it is feared that some British soldiers were also killed. The passing at the time of a column of German troops was not apparently connected with the incident. A joint British, American and Norwegian commission is investigating the incident.

The trial of Quisling by a Norwegian court began on the 20th August. Press reports will not be censored. Quisling is charged with breach of Norwegian military and civil law, high treason before and after the German invasion, breach of the Norwegian Constitution, murder and theft. He has pleaded not guilty.

The war guilt question in Finland is now nearing its climax. On the 13th August the Helsinki papers reported that it was the intention of the Government to present a special Bill to the Diet, in order that this question could be dealt with to the satisfaction of the victorious Powers. According to preliminary reports, the War Guilt Bill contains provisions for the establishment of an extraordinary court for the trial of the so-called "war guilty," i.e., leading politicians who held office during the war period, and it also introduces retroactive criminal legislation. Both these provisions are in conflict with, and constitute amendments in, the Finnish Constitution.

These measures have been given an enthusiastic reception by the Democratic League, but there can be little doubt that the vast majority of the people view the development with anxiety and regret. The spontaneity of the great "popular demonstrations" held in Helsinki and other towns, which urged the Government, under threats of a general strike, speedily to settle the war guilt question, has been doubted, and the demonstrations are thought to be the result of organised agitation. It is certainly not Finnish public opinion which has forced the Paasikivi Government to adopt this course, and the reasons for it must, therefore, be sought in fear of outside intervention.

The Bill will be submitted to President Mannerheim on the 21st August and to the Diet on the following day, when, it will probably be made the subject of a vote of confidence.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs announced in the House of Commons on the 20th August that His Majesty's Government had invited the Finnish Government to appoint a political representative in this country with the personal rank of Minister, and to regard the British political representative in Finland as having the personal rank of Minister in Helsingfors. For constitutional reasons that was as far as we could go at the moment until a peace treaty was made. The State Department, in Washington, have informed His Majesty's Government of the United States Government's intention to resume full diplomatic relations with Finland. The United States Government having never been at war with Finland, there need be no obstacle to this step.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Netherlands Government has addressed a Note to the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and France, formally submitting the Netherlands claim to reparations from Germany. Losses and damage on an unprecedented scale had been sustained by the Netherlands; over 8 per cent. of the arable land had been flooded; over 2 per cent. laid waste through the construction of German fortified zones, minefields and airfields; and another 6 per cent. made useless for immediate cultivation by military operations. In addition, the Note refers to the vast amount of capital equipment and consumer goods looted by the Germans, and formally reiterates the unofficial demands for their immediate restoration which earlier had appeared in the Press and elsewhere (see Summary No. 305). Fair and equitable shares of Germany's internal and external assets and of her cargo vessels were also claimed—the latter to compensate the Dutch Merchant Navy for its heavy losses during the war. The Note again mentions the right reserved by the Netherlands Government to claim neighbouring Prussian territory by way of further compensation for German aggression. In connexion with this possible annexation of German territory, it may be noted that the Government has recently appointed a State Commission to report on this question as soon as possible.

A settlement has been reached in the Rotterdam and Amsterdam dock strikes (see last week's Summary). Work in both ports was resumed on the 20th August.

The Belgian Chamber of Representatives assembled on the 16th August, when the Government's draft financial Bills were debated. The new Finance Minister, M. de Voghel, declared that the Belgian franc—"at present one of the safest currencies in the world"—had been saved primarily thanks to the steps taken by the Government in October 1944. Whilst the country's economy continued to stagnate, its current expenditure had "steadily increased." The flow of imports was slow and, in addition, Belgium had contracted obligations towards her Allies in respect of certain supplies. Monetary reorganisation was progressing satisfactorily, and the Minister deprecated "the fantastic rumours about the Government's alleged intention to order further withdrawals of banknotes or even a devaluation of the franc." There would be no solution to the problem of the unfreezing of accounts until the successful completion of monetary reorganisation. In the national interest, therefore, it was essential that the present economic policy be continued. M. de Voghel then turned to the draft Bill on monetary reform which was designed to convert frozen accounts, up to a maximum of 60 per cent. into loan securities—a principle which, the Minister believed, "would greatly allay the misgivings felt about the future of these holdings." In the second part of the Bill there was provision for owners of frozen accounts to transfer up to 40 per cent. of them in banknotes to financial houses of the owners' choice, where they would be kept on deposit. Once credited with the full amount of these frozen accounts, the Treasury would issue Bonds to the financial houses concerned, interest and term to be decided by the Minister. The third part of the Bill proposed a lengthening of the validity of Treasury Bonds issued before the Liberation. There was also provision for the introduction of three new taxes: (i) a special tax on all deliveries to the enemy; (ii) a special tax on all accumulations of capital and other excess profits; and (iii) a National Solidarity Tax, to be paid by all citizens—together with several provisions affecting non-payment of taxes. In conclusion, M. de Voghel asked for a vote of confidence. The debate was resumed on the 17th.

The new Catholic Popular Party, which takes the place of the Catholic Party, met in Brussels on the 18th and the 19th August, under the chairmanship of M. Auguste de Schrijver, a former Deputy Prime Minister, who stated that the Party was founded on "national, Christian, social and democratic principles," and that it would "protect the family and all spiritual values." The Party also claims to be undenominational. A Federal Committee, consisting of twelve Walloons and twelve Flemings, was elected by secret ballot on the 19th: it includes prominent Catholics such as MM. Moyersoen and de Vleeschauwer. The meeting unanimously expressed its loyalty to King Leopold and its desire to uphold the Monarchy.

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle left Orly airfield at midnight on the 20th August to pay his promised visit to President Truman in Washington (see Summary No. 294). He was accompanied, among others, by M. Bidault, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, General Juin, the Chief of Staff, and MM. Palewski, Dennery and Alphand. The French press, which attaches great importance to the visit, expects that Germany, the Far East and economic problems are likely to be the main topics of discussion.

The King's particularly cordial message to General de Gaulle on the occasion of the end of the Japanese war was greatly appreciated in France, and the hopes that it would herald a period in which outstanding differences would be overcome and there would be still closer co-operation between the two countries have been strengthened by Mr. Bevin's references to forthcoming Franco-British conversations in his speech in the House of Commons on the 20th August.

The French Government have informed His Majesty's Government of their wish to take part in any discussions concerning the surrender of Japan and to sign the formal act of surrender. At the same time, the French press and wireless have devoted considerable attention to the problem of Indo-China, and are much concerned that the French authorities and troops should be given adequate facilities for re-establishing French control in the various territories of the Indo-Chinese Union. General Leclerc has arrived in Burma to take up his post as Supreme Commander of the French forces in the Far East.

The French Government ratified the United Nations Charter on the 14th August. A communiqué issued by Ministry for Foreign Affairs on the 18th pointed out that, after the United States, France was the second country to ratify the Charter and that the rapidity with which she had done so was a further instance of the French Government's desire to participate actively, within the framework of collective security, in the World Organisation for peace.

According to a Paris broadcast in German, on the 16th August, the French wireless and about 500 newspapers have published an appeal by the Friends of Austria for the formation of an Association of Friendship of French prisoners of war and slave workers who have returned from Austria. This organisation is to be a section of the Friends of Austria Association of which M. Herriot is President, and one of its main aims is to develop Franco-Austrian relations. The Paris broadcast service to Austria has also announced that the First Battalion of Austrian volunteers was to leave for Austria on the 18th August to do duty with the French Army of Occupation, and that a second battalion is to be formed. It pointed out that all the officers are Austrians, except the battalion commander, who is a Frenchman, and that the formation of such a unit proved France's intention to give the Austrians the greatest possible share in the administration of their own country.

On the 17th August General de Gaulle signed a decree commuting the death sentence on Pétain to life imprisonment. The ex-Marshal—for the sentence involved loss of his rank—has been confined in the Fortress of Portalet where he himself imprisoned MM. Blum and Mandel. The verdict pronounced by the High Court has met with general approval in the French press with the exception of the Communist Humanité which deplored the Court's recommendation to mercy.

The 37th Socialist Party Congress ended on the 15th August. A motion advocating unity of action with the Communists, as in 1936, for the purposes of the forthcoming elections, but opposing any immediate fusion between the two parties, was carried by an overwhelming majority. The motion pointed out that the conditions which the Socialist Party considers essential if fusion is to be achieved were far from being fulfilled by the Communists. One of these conditions is that both parties should "devote themselves exclusively to the service of the working world whose freedom necessitates that of the Nation," and that in consequence they should "neither be bound to or even influenced by a foreign Government and should preserve their full liberty of criticism and judgment." The Socialists' motion, however, left the door open for further negotiations about fusion, and, in spite of Communist indignation at its terms, conversations will no doubt be resumed after the elections. The Congress also adopted, by a large majority, a resolution renewing its protests against the voting arrangements made by the Government for the elections, recording its dissatisfaction with the Government on various counts, including their "sytematic postponement" of structural reforms, and declaring that it would have called upon the Socialist members of the Government to resign had it not been reluctant to weaken France on the eve of General de Gaulle's visit to the United States.

The 36th Congress of the Radical Party opened in Paris on the 20th August, under the presidency of M. Albert Sarraut. The first day's proceedings were mainly remarkable for a vigorous speech by M. Anxionnaz in praise of Republican legality and a bicameral constitution, together with "a physical separation of the President of the Republic and the Head of the Government." M. Anxionnaz also denounced the "huge administrative police apparatus," which he alleged was daily taking a firmer grip of the nation.

SWITZERLAND.

The Russian delegation to discuss the repatriation of the Russian refugees in Switzerland and the question of the treatment they received during their internment has been in Switzerland for about a fortnight. The first trainload of refugees left on the 10th August, and it was expected that the repatriation would be virtually accomplished by the 20th, though about 100 sick interned soldiers will remain until the end of the month for transport by hospital train. It would appear that, since the visits of the delegation to the internment camps, the emphasis of the Russian mission has changed over from investigation into the alleged ill-treatment to that of repatriation, and that the negotiations have been conducted throughout in an amicable spirit. Indeed, the Russian General who heads the delegation is said to have agreed that there appeared to be little legitimate ground for complaint.

In view of political developments in the Far East and the resulting uncertainty concerning the legal position of Japanese property in Switzerland, the Federal Council decided on the 14th August to freeze all Japanese accounts in Switzerland. Payment to such accounts may be effected only by deposits with the Swiss National Bank. Japanese citizens in Switzerland, however, may accept payment and dispose of their funds within the limits of their normal business transactions and their normal personal needs.

The Federal Department of Justice and Police has issued new instructions governing the activities in Switzerland of foreign political organisations, which must henceforth supply the authorities with specified particulars regarding their nature and membership. Foreign organisations of an exclusively party character are prohibited, as is the wearing of uniforms or arm-bands to indicate political allegiance. It is also laid down that foreigners may not organise parades or public assemblies of a political nature without special permission.

From the 20th August the Swiss Army ceased to be on an active service footing. General Guisan, the Commander-in-Chief, who is now retiring, took the salute at a ceremonial parade in Berne on the previous day.

Rumours persist concerning the intention of King Leopold of Belgium to take up residence in Switzerland. Professor Jacques Pirenne, one of the King's advisers, is reported to have arrived in Geneva. No official Swiss confirmation of any such plans has, however, been forthcoming.

The International Committee of the Red Cross reports that the repatriation of Italians interned in Switzerland ended on the 8th August.

The Federal Council has appointed M. Robert Kohli Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Netherlands Government in succession to M. de Pury.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Franco Spain joined in last week's general victory celebrations with a certain uneasy bravura. Orders were given for the national flag to be flown for three days on all Government and municipal buildings, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs paid a courtesy call on the United States and British Embassies now in their summer quarters at San Sebastian. The press played up nobly, though one could detect a faint note of disquiet about the ostracism recently proclaimed at Potsdam. The special ties of Spain with the Philippines are duly emphasised, but the dominant theme is the triumph of Christian and Western civilisation "to which we belong" over Oriental barbarism. The peace and victory attained in present circumstances, according to Arriba, "is no mere episode in diplomatic and political history, but signifies a revolutionary metamorphosis of the nations' life, and therein resides for Spain, by natural right, her peace and, indeed, her victory" [sic]. Spanish writers are ever faithful to the idiom of the traditional jurisprudence associated with the names of Vitoria and Suarez, and the Falange had maintained with the Far Eastern partner of the Axis the Serrano Súñer (in a press interview) to justify the seizure of Tangier in 1940 (see Summary No. 66).

Such glib Podsnappery is all very well. But this attitude to the Japanese barbarians, we should remember, dates only from March of this year, when the press suddenly launched an anti-Japanese campaign on account of outrages against Spanish nationals and property in the Philippines. (It was on the 11th April that diplomatic relations were broken off.) Until then General Franco and the Falange had maintained with the Far Eastern partner of the Axis the ties of a common ideology—and Spain had cheerfully assumed charge of Japanese interests throughout Latin America.

Dr. Salazar, punctilious as ever, lost no time in congratulating the ambassadors of the United Nations on the victory, and the Official Gazette of the 15th August promptly published an order freezing all Japanese State and private assets. In Lisbon they have much more reason than in Madrid for rejoicing at the end of the war in the Far East, because of the Portuguese possessions which were directly involved. The invasion of Portuguese Timor by Japanese troops took place on the 20th February, 1942, and the colony has been occupied ever since, while in Macao, which was never invaded by the Japanese, Portuguese sovereignty has been precarious. On the 17th August the Portuguese Ministry for Foreign Affairs were able to announce that the Japanese Minister reported his Government's agreement to a suggestion that the Japanese should surrender to the Governor of Timor, that the Governor should assume full administrative authority over the territory and that communications with Portugal should be restored as soon as possible, if necessary by way of Macao. Behind this anodyne official statement lies a flurry of excited anticipation.

For three and a half years the Portuguese Government have had to swallow their pride and patiently wait, but they have never abandoned the idea that their good relations with the United States and Great Britain would make possible a restoration of the status quo ante. Their concern was to be in at the finish. When, therefore, the hour of Japan's doom struck, a fortnight ago, the Portuguese Government asked urgently for facilities for two Portuguese sloops to be allowed to proceed towards Timor so that they could at the right moment show the flag. His Majesty's Government acceded to this request, suggesting, however, that the two vessels should first proceed to Colombo where they would obtain the latest naval intelligence and all facilities—a suggestion which has been warmly received in Lisbon. They have, however, intimated that Anglo-American support for the landing of Portuguese troops was not covered by the original staff conversations.

Sir Owen O'Malley presented his credentials to General Carmona at the Belem Palace on the 17th August.

ITALY.

On the 20th August the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated in the House of Commons that the question of the peace treaty with Italy would come before the Council of Foreign Ministers when they met in London next month. Mr. Bevin said that His Majesty's Government's intention was that the treaty should be made on fair terms, and that the Italian nation should be given the chance to start again on a basis of freedom. Although Great Britain could not forget the lives lost in the war against Italy, a policy of revenge would not be wise, particularly since many Italians had, before the end of the war, revolted against Fascism and had joined the Allies in the war against Nazism. Italy had now repudiated Fascism and, although a similar system of government must never be allowed to return, His Majesty's Government did not intend to approach the problem as if Mussolini still existed. Mr. Bevin said that he hoped that government in Italy would be re-established on the basis of free elections and that the elections for the Constituent Assembly would be held at the earliest possible moment.

As regards the elections for the Constituent Assembly, it would appear that the Left-wing parties wish them to take place before the municipal elections, while Signor Parri, the Right and Centre, would prefer to hold the municipal elections first.

The executives of the Socialist and Communist parties met on the 2nd August and formed a national liaison committee with provincial and local branches. The two parties agreed to use all their influence to ensure free elections as well as freedom of speech, freedom to hold meetings and to make propaganda. The Communist party later published a resolution calling on all parties to collaborate in a campaign against lawlessness. The resolution further explained the necessity for disarmament and for the abandonment of partisan methods. The National Association of Italian Partisans was the only partisan organisation which should be recognised, all others should be dissolved and not be allowed to reappear under any guise whatever. Unità naturally applauds the initiation taken by the Communist party. Risorgimento Liberale, while welcoming the resolution, rather drily recalls that when it suggested the same line of action, it was labelled "revolutionary and anti-Communist."

The Council of Ministers has approved the draft decree which grants a certain measure of autonomy to the Val d'Aosta. The text has not yet been published, but according to the Press it would seem that most of the demands made by the Val d'Aosta have been met (see Summary No. 305 of the 8th August).

THE VATICAN.

The attitude of the Vatican to the new Polish Government will depend on that Government's attitude to the Catholic Church in Poland. If Cardinal Hlond reports favourably, the Pope will send a representative to Warsaw, and thus transfer recognition from the old to the new Government. Meanwhile the Vatican finds Dr. Papee's insistence on his rights as ambassador from Poland somewhat embarrassing.

In an address to Italian Catholic Women Workers, the Pope said that woman's true vocation was her home, and that the husband should have sufficient wages to maintain a decent household. Industrial development forced many women to work in factories. This he regretted, "but we could not turn back." Such women must receive "equal pay for equal work"; for "to exploit female labour as cheaper would injure not only the woman, but also the working man."

Finally the Pope denounced all who invented barriers between the Church and the workers, whose cause she had always championed.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The political situation in Hungary continues to be profoundly disturbed. The Left seems, indeed, satisfied with the position resulting from the recent Ministerial changes; the Communist leader, Révai, has declared that the Communist party "looks on the present Government as its own Government," and is willing to continue the present coalition, within which the Communist-Social Democrat alliance forms an inner fortress. The Smallholders equally profess their loyalty to the coalition. Nevertheless, continuous bickering goes on even between the party leaders, and much more among their followers, to whom their respective leaders address repeated appeals for moderation and discipline. Moderation is urged also by the Social Democrats, who, if they place their alliance with the Communists first, yet continue to recall their old pact with the Smallholders. Incidentally, the Socialists, recently entirely overshadowed by the Communists, seem to be recovering a little ground. Besides their third Ministerial portfolio, they have now secured for one of their members the important post of Secretary of State which carries responsibility for preparing the electoral law.

The question of the forthcoming elections is the chief current political issue. The Left is anxious to hold elections quickly, while the presence of the Soviet troops and authorities would give them an overwhelming advantage. Marshal Voroshilov has "advised" Zsedényi to hold the elections immediately, saying that the Allies could not recognise or make peace with the present Government. The Right is correspondingly anxious to postpone the elections or at least to ensure that they should not be held without Anglo-Saxon, as well as Soviet, control.

Dominating all is the catastrophic economic situation. All parties say that inflation must be fought, but the cost of living goes up 20–30 per cent. monthly. Wages in industry have been raised by another 40–50 per cent., but the middle classes starve. Factories still stand idle for lack of raw materials, coal and transport, although the Hungarian delegation now in Moscow hopes to obtain from the U.S.S.R. some raw materials for the textile and other factories. This will relieve unemployment, but most of the products will go back to the U.S.S.R. as reparation payments. The bread-grain harvest is now said to be even smaller than anticipated—10–11 million quintals, of which a substantial proportion must be reserved for seed. Moreover, shortage of labour, machines, &c., is making it hard to thresh and store even this small quantity. The peasants are holding back supplies, and already further bread shortages are reported from Budapest and the industrial centres. Other food-stuffs have never ceased to be short or extremely scarce.

The Soviet authorities have restored to Hungarian control the great Manfred Weiss works, which dominate Hungarian heavy industry.

Roumania.

Recent events both at home and abroad have had the effect as far as Roumania is concerned in throwing light on her problems. Just over a month ago the Potsdam Conference charged the Council of Foreign Ministers with the task of preparing peace treaties with Roumania and her neighbours, which would prepare the way for their admission to the United Nations. The Potsdam text states that a condition for membership of the United Nations will be the existence of "recognised democratic Governments" in these countries. The Secretary of State made it clear in the House of Commons, on the 20th August, that we did not regard the present Roumanian Government as sufficiently democratic to make possible the resumption of any form of diplomatic relations.

Subsequent happenings add strength to the statement of the Foreign Minister that "the much overworked word democracy" appears to need definition. On the 6th August the U.S.S.R. resumed diplomatic relations with Roumania. From the Soviet point of view the Communist minority Government, which was imposed on Roumania by force is a "recognised democratic Government" supported by the will of the whole people. The United States and Great Britain have not followed the Soviet lead. Their omission to do so has contributed to a crisis in Roumania. The leaders of the traditional parties who represent the great majority of the people, have been quick to get busy. No doubt their motives are mixed. They are actuated as always by a desire for friendship and alliance with Great Britain; they would like to see themselves leaders of a party in power; and they would like to strike a blow at Communism and, incidentally, at Russia. D-ii Brătianu and Maniu have had audiences of the King, who himself has indicated that he would value Anglo-American backing in replacing the present Government by one which would satisfy the Anglo-American definition of democratic.

Meanwhile, on the 18th August the United States Government presented a note to the Bulgarian authorities saying plainly that the present Bulgarian Government was not regarded as democratic (see Bulgarian Summary). This action may be expected to have repercussions in Roumania. The conditions in the two countries are much the same. In neither is Communism strong, but Bulgaria has not the traditional detestation of Russia and all her works which characterises Roumania.

General Susaikov who has been in Moscow has returned to Bucharest. It was anticipated that he might attempt a repetition of the violence by which Vyshinsky imposed the present Government on the country if the King decided to dismiss Groza. Susaikov's return coincided with a military demonstration in the capital which may or may not have been designed to hint at the use of force. There is some risk of the Communists provoking an outbreak of riot, and of course, explaining afterwards that the "fascist" elements were in reality to blame.

Yugoslavia.

Dr. Milan Grol resigned from the Government on the 19th August. His position, he declared in a letter to Marshal Tito, had become impossible: the new laws, which promised to perpetuate the one-party system and which he felt he could not support, had been rushed through with no time for proper discussion, although previously no meeting of the Cabinet had been held for months. His letter also drew attention to the serious economic situation which the Government had failed to alleviate.

Dr. Grol, a former Deputy of the Opposition, and twice a Minister in the Royal Government in exile, is the leader of the Democratic party, which has not joined the National Front. He returned to Belgrade in February with Dr. Shubashich and was included in the Provisional United Government of the 7th March, as Vice-Premier. There have been several indications since then that he was finding his position difficult, for he had accepted the post in the hope of exercising a moderating influence. As a member of the Legislative Committee which has been discussing the draft laws mentioned above, he has raised almost the only dissentient voice and has abstained from voting both in the Legislative Committee and in the Temporary Parliament, as much in criticism of the summary procedure as of the substance of the laws. Up to the moment of writing his resignation has not yet affected his position as a representative of his party in the temporary National Parliament, but it is notable that a number of so-called "Democrats" within the National Front have denounced him.

The laws to which Dr. Grol referred have all been passed by the Legislative Committee, and concern the Electoral Register (see Summary No. 306, p. 15), the Constituent Assembly, Military Tribunals, Citizenship, and the Nationalisation of Mines. The Law for the Constituent Assembly provides for a Central Chamber and a National Chamber, the former representative of the people on the basis of one Deputy for 40,000 inhabitants, and the latter of the federal units. Each unit is to elect twenty-five Deputies; the two autonomous regions of the Vojvodina and Kosovo-Metohija fifteen and ten Deputies respectively. Serbia, therefore, in which these two regions are incorporated, will have a representation of fifty. The Law of Citizenship confers equal rights on men and women, and on legitimate and illegitimate children, and provides for the retention of her original nationality by a woman marrying a man of another nationality. Under another law Yugoslav officers and n.c.o.s imprisoned or interned abroad, who refuse to return, forfeit their citizenship. But loss of citizenship or return to Yugoslavia does not preclude any person from being charged as a traitor to his country.

The draft law for the nationalisation of the mines and for the cancellation of mining concessions was introduced to the Legislative Committee, without previous consultations with the Cabinet, by the Minister of Industry, who spoke of the detrimental political influence exercised by foreign concessionnaires, of the "inhuman" conditions of work and of the enormous profits realised, from which Yugoslavia derived no benefit. The British-owned Trepcha and French Bor mines were mentioned specifically.

The removal of the censorship on outgoing Press copy (see Summary No. 306, p. 15) is replaced by a much stricter control over the entry of political correspondents.

Greece.

A number of additional Government appointments were announced on the 18th August. The Ministry for Foreign Affairs has been entrusted to M. Ioannis Politis, who was Greek Minister in Rome in the period leading up to the Italian attack on Greece in October 1940, and, after his escape from Greece in the autumn of 1943, Greek representative on the Advisory Council for Italy. He is an able and ambitious man and a convinced Republican. M. Kasimatis, who remains Minister of Social Welfare, has been replaced as Minister of Justice by M. Vasilios Kyriakopoulos, Vice-President of the Supreme Court, who has already drawn up proposals for dealing with the congestion in Greek prisons and the shortage of judges. Colonel D. Makkas has been appointed Minister of Transport, with Admiral Christos Louis as Under-Secretary for Posts and Telegraphs. M. Pesmazoglou has relinquished the Under Secretaryship of Press in favour of M. Vasilios Dendramis, until recently Greek Minister in Buenos Aires, whose diplomatic experience should preserve him from the indiscretions committed by his predecessor. The President of the Council still hopes that General Merenditis will accept the War Ministry.

The references to Greek affairs in Mr. Bevin's statement in the House of Commons on the 20th August should do much to clear the air in Greece. The invitation to the Regent to pay a visit to London (which it is hoped will coincide with the meeting of Foreign Secretaries in September) will reinforce his position at a moment when he is under attack from the extremists of both Left and Right. Similarly, the reformed Government's prospects of survival have undoubtedly been increased by the statement that, while the object of British policy in Greece remained the establishment of a stable democratic Government, in His Majesty's Government's view no purpose would be served by forming a new Greek Cabinet before elections could be held; the Voulgaris administration should carry on until conditions had been created in which the Greek people could determine their future Government and Constitution. Mr. Bevin pointed out that Greece would never recover while her leaders devoted their time to incessant attempts to change the Government.

The conduct of plebiscite and elections has been removed from the arena of party politics by the announcement made on the 20th August in London, Washington and Paris that the United States, Great Britain and France have undertaken to assist in their supervision. The British statement recalls that Article 9 of the Varkiza agreement (see Summary No. 280) provided that elections and a plebiscite should be held in any case during 1945, and recorded the desire of both parties to the agreement that the Great Allied Powers should send observers; the United States and British Governments accordingly suggested, with the concurrence of the Greek Government, that supervision should be exercised jointly by themselves, the Soviet and the French Governments. Regret is expressed that the Soviet Government, owing to their opposition in principle to the supervision of national elections by foreign States, did not feel able to take part.

Soviet and French agreement is also being sought to a United States proposal for a joint American, British, Soviet and French Commission to investigate the Yugoslav allegations of frontier infringements by Greek forces and ill-treatment of the Slavophone population of Northern Greece (see Summaries Nos. 303, "Greece," and No. 304, "Yugoslavia"). Reports from the British military authorities in Greece do not bear out the charges of frontier infringement, and deliberate Greek provocation is intrinsically improbable since there is at present only one field Division in being.

Bulgaria.

The most important event in connexion with Bulgaria during the past week has been the American Note to the Bulgarian Government, which was delivered on the 13th August. After referring to paragraph 10 of the Potsdam communiqué, the Note mentioned the coming elections and the desire of the United States Government to resume diplomatic relations with a Government representative of the democratic elements in Bulgaria; but, it stated, there was evidence that a minority group in power were using methods of force and intimidation in such a way as to exclude from effective participation in the elections a large part of the electorate. Any Government established thereby would hardly be representative. The text was broadcast by the Bulgarian wireless on the 17th and a statement on similar lines was published in the American press of the 18th.

The Bulgarian Prime Minister replied with a declaration to the Bulgarian press, in which he referred to the American Note, to M. Petkov's letter of the 26th July asking for international supervision of the elections and to a subsequent letter (14th August) from the Opposition leaders to the Regents, in which the former announced their decision to withdraw their candidature on account of their conviction that, in spite of M. Georgiev's recent promises, the elections would not represent the free will of the people. He had also received, he said, a letter from the "dissident" Ministers threatening their resignation if the elections were not postponed. In view of all these communications, the Prime Minister explained that the decision to hold the elections had been taken in the presence and with the approval of the whole Cabinet, that measures had been taken to ensure the complete freedom of the elections and that it was obvious that certain persons were hoping to secure foreign intervention in the internal affairs of Bulgaria. The Government, therefore, would not postpone the elections and appealed to the electorate to support the Fatherland Front.

The Ministers concerned—MM. Pavlov, Darzhanski, Cheshmedzhiev and Stoyanov—resigned on the evening of the 15th and were subsequently replaced by MM. Obbov (Minister without Portfolio and Agriculture), Stefan Tonchev (Railways)—both are Agrarians—and Georgi Popov (Social Affairs)—a Social Democrat. Professor Cholakov, Minister of Education, was placed temporarily in charge of Finance.

The American Note had a profound effect in Bulgaria and nearly resulted in the postponement of the elections. But the Communist elements in the Government, on whom the issue depended, were further encouraged on the 14th August by the decision of the Soviet Government to re-establish diplomatic relations with Bulgaria. The Bulgarian Foreign Minister, in a public speech, suggested that the Russian action might shortly be followed by a similar move on the part of Britain and America. The Prime Minister was reported to believe that His Majesty's Government did not share the views expressed in the American Note, but could be expected to follow the lead of the U.S.S.R.

Such insinuations, however, will be effectively discredited by Mr. Bevin's statement in the House of Commons on the 20th August, in which he criticised and questioned the representative character of the régimes in Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary, and by a communication, even stronger than the American Note, which His Majesty's representative in Sofia has been instructed to deliver to the Bulgarian Government.

Turkey.

The Note addressed by the State Department to the Provisional Government of Bulgaria expressing the dissatisfaction of the United States with the arrangements for the forthcoming General Election in Bulgaria was regarded in Angora as an indication that the United States and Britain were averse to signing peace with any ex-enemy Government whose authority did not rest upon a free vote of the people. Following so closely upon President Truman's proposal regarding the international control of navigation in the Straits, the Note has tended further to allay the recent anxiety.

The Charter of the United Nations was ratified on the 15th August by a unanimous vote of the Grand National Assembly. In moving the resolution for ratification, the Foreign Minister praised the work which had been accomplished at San Francisco. He declared that the assembled delegates had shown commendable restraint and an accommodating spirit, without which no agreement would have been possible. The aim of the Turkish delegation had been to save the world from anarchy; a partly ordered world was a better place to live in than a world in a state of chaos. Turkey had signed the Charter relying on repeated assurances by the sponsoring Powers of their attachment to principles of justice and good faith.

The recognition by Turkey of the independence of the Levant States is still in abeyance (see Summaries No. 305, p. 17 and No. 306, p. 18). Meantime, it was reported in the Turkish Press that manifestations for the return of the Hatay to Syria were increasing in the two Republics, and the Armenians were supporting anti-Turkish activities there. His Majesty's Government take the view that normal diplomatic relations might with advantage be established between the Syrians and the Turks, without reference by either side to the question of the Hatay.

The protests of the Greek Press against the suggestion that the Dodecanese should become autonomous territory (see Summary No. 305, p. 17) were prominently featured in Turkish newspapers. It would appear, therefore, that the suggestion did not represent the official view. This has since been confirmed by the writer of the article, Dr. Rüstü Aras, who has stated that the suggestion was his own and that he had no desire in any way to impair Græco-Turkish relations.

It was reported in Angora that the Svilingrad–Pithion section of the railway between Istanbul and Sofia—which runs through Greek territory but has been administered by Turkey since the German occupation of Greece—will shortly be handed over to the Greek Government.

A bumper crop of sugar beet is reported from Turkey. It is estimated that the production of sugar will reach 110,000 tons, against 89,000 tons last year. This should be sufficient to cover Turkey's requirements.

The news of the surrender of Japan has brought about a general fall of prices in Turkey. Speculators and operators on the black market have been attempting to unload, but without much success, because buyers anticipate a further reduction in values. The general opinion appears to be that the end of the war will produce a large influx of goods, particularly from the United States.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

At his first press conference after the Japanese surrender, President Truman disclosed that at the Potsdam Conference the United States had proposed that as large a number of Jews as was consistent with the maintenance of civil peace should be permitted to enter Palestine. The President stated that he had discussed the question of the Jewish National State both with Mr. Churchill and with Mr. Attlee, and added "we are still discussing the question." President Truman went on to say that the United States wished to work with the British and the Arabs for a peaceful solution of the problem, but "he did not want to send 500,000 troops to keep the peace."

This announcement was followed by a statement from the Jewish Agency, which expressed its gratification at learning that the claim for the Jewish State of Palestine was now under active consideration. "Jews everywhere," the statement went on, "appreciate the American Government's recognition of the justice of the Jewish desire to bring into Palestine as many Jews as possible and to re-establish there their National State"; but it added that the suggestion that large military forces would be required in Palestine "had no relation to the realities of the situation.'' The statement ended by saying that the Jewish Agency, '' representing the Jewish people in all matters Palestinian, must claim to be a party to all discussions and negotiations on an equal footing with any national Government.''

The President's words were, on the other hand, severely criticised in Cairo by Abdul Rahman Azzam, as reported by Reuter. All Arabs, he said, had '' a complete right '' to object to such a statement. '' We would like to remind President Truman,'' he went on, '' of one of the last promises made by President Roosevelt, when he put his hand in the hand of King Ibn Saud, and promised him that he would not support the Jews in Palestine.''

When the results of the British general election first became known in the Levant States, the main reaction was a belief that, in view of the known sympathy of the Labour party for Zionist ideals, the White Paper of 1939 would be modified in favour of the Jews. Fears were expressed that as a consequence a new wave of Arab terrorism might sweep over Palestine. Although some sections of the press suggested that Labour sympathy for Zionism was largely inspired by electoral considerations, and that Arab friendship was too valuable to Great Britain for her to risk losing it by adopting a pro-Jewish policy for Palestine, the Zionist question continues to cause apprehension in the minds of all, Moslems and Christians alike. There can be no doubt that any change of policy in favour of Zionism would cause very acute reaction in the Levant States.

With regard to the French, the situation, in appearance slightly easier on the surface, is, in fact, no more than an uneasy lull. Except for their discussions over the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales and of the other French-controlled services, the Syrian Government has had no contact with the French authorities. Nor will the Syrians have any dealings with the French troops or political officers, whose presence they regard as anomalous in an independent country. Now that the war with Japan is over, agitation may well increase in both States, and especially in Syria, for the complete removal of French troops from Levant territory. No Government in either State would at present resume negotiations on French desiderata. Indeed, hatred and mistrust of the French in Syria are still so deep-rooted that it is unlikely that any Syrian Government would do so for a long time, unless possibly under cover of an international conference. General Beynet himself regards any attempt to negotiate with the Syrians as hopeless, and even Count Ostrorog, who, it is believed, is anxious to improve Franco-Syrian relations, realises that some time must elapse before such an attempt could be made with any chance of success.

The Lebanese Chamber of Deputies was convened in extraordinary session on the 14th August to decide on a vote of confidence in the Government. Although the vote of confidence was passed by a majority of thirty-four to nine, the position of the Government is far from stable.

(For Turkish-Syrian relations, see under '' Turkey.'')

There is little change in the situation in the Barzan area of Iraqi Kurdistan, where Mulla Mustafa has again raised the standard of revolt. The Acting Prime Minister of Iraq seems to be rather more hopeful of the outcome, one satisfactory feature, in his view, being that the insurgents have not received the support they expected from the tribes. He has given His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires an assurance that the Assyrians resident in the area will be given all possible protection.

Reports of unrest continue to be received from Northern Persia and other parts of the country, where clashes have taken place involving the Tudeh party. One incident that recently occurred in the Shiraz area was the looting and burning of the Tudeh Club. Some time ago the Tudeh headquarters were burned in similar circumstances at Yezd and Isfahan. Though there may have been provocation, these attacks on the Tudeh party by their opponents are, in view of the Russian attitude, dangerous. This latest incident, and others alleged to have occurred elsewhere, were described in violent terms by Tass.

On the acceptance of the Japanese offer of surrender, instructions were given by us to the Persian authorities for the immediate release of all Persian fifth columnists who had been interned on our suggestion. This we were morally bound to do the moment hostilities with Japan ceased. The only one of these mischief-makers likely to cause further trouble is the notorious Abu'l-Qasim Kashani, who was elected a member of the Majlis when he was actually on the list for arrest and a fugitive from justice. In order to upset Kashani's would-be pose as a martyr, His Majesty's Embassy is publishing a facsimile of a letter that he wrote to the Mufti of Jerusalem and Rashid Ali when they were in Germany, in which he declared that he fully shared their aims. This may also help to restrain others of a like kidney.

In accordance with article 5 of the Tripartite Treaty, the Allied occupation of Persia is due to terminate within six months of the end of the Japanese war, i.e., by the middle of February 1946. In his speech in the House of Commons on the 20th August, Mr. Bevin said that the view of His Majesty's Government was that since Persia had allowed Great Britain and Russia to use her territory for the purpose of defeating the enemy, the territory should be returned as soon as the Allied purpose was accomplished. It was not the policy of His Majesty's Government to take advantage of facilities given by agreement other than for the purpose for which they were given. Neither, he believed, was it the policy of our Allies.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 10th August Japan signified her readiness to accept the terms of the Allied declaration of the 26th July, '' with the understanding that the said declaration does not comprise any demand which prejudices the prerogatives of His Majesty the Emperor as a Sovereign ruler.'' On the 11th August, after consultation with other Allied Governments, the United States Government replied that '' from the moment of surrender the authority of the Emperor and the Japanese Government to rule the State shall be subject to the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers, who will take such steps as he deems proper to execute the surrender terms,'' and that the ultimate form of government in Japan, in accordance with the Potsdam Declaration, would be established by the freely expressed will of the Japanese people. On the 14th August Japan accepted the terms as thus amplified, and on the 15th the Emperor took the unprecedented step of broadcasting in person an Imperial Rescript announcing the decision to the nation.

The original decision to offer acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration, conditional on recognition of the Emperor's sovereignty, was apparently taken by a majority vote of a '' Peace Committee '' of twenty-one members convened by the Emperor, including the Emperor's brothers, Princes Chichibu and Takamatsu, several '' Elder Statesmen,'' the Prime Minister, and the War, Navy and Foreign Ministers. The decision was thus taken, not by the Cabinet as such, but by a body created for the purpose; the mention of a majority vote shows that the opinion was not unanimous, and Tokyo radio reported that there were disturbances in the capital when the proposal to surrender was first announced. It appears that the War Minister of the Suzuki Cabinet, General Anami, opposed the surrender. On the 15th August the Suzuki Government resigned, and General Prince Naruhiko Higashikuni, son-in-law of the Emperor Meiji, uncle of the present Empress and a member of the Supreme War Council, was appointed Prime Minister by the Emperor; he took over concurrently the vital post of War Minister. General Anami committed suicide at his official residence '' to atone for his failure in accomplishing his duties as His Majesty's Minister.'' Such a suicide in Japan can be a sign either of expiation or of protest, and in this case there was probably something of the latter. The Navy Minister, Admiral Yonai—although presumably under an even darker cloud of failure (since the Navy had been nearly wiped out, whereas large parts of the Army, including the entire Home Forces were intact)—did not feel obliged to kill himself, but remained as Navy Minister in the new Cabinet.

inexperience of Prince Higashikuni, will run the Cabinet politically. The latter, who is stated to have been appointed directly by the Emperor without the usual procedure of consultation with the Elder Statesmen, presumably owes his elevation to the fact that he is at once a member of a branch of the Imperial family (Higashikuni-no-Miya, created in 1906) and a leading personality in the Army, and is thus the most suitable person available for enforcing the capitulation. Nothing but the Imperial authority exercised by such a person as Prince Higashikuni could compel the Japanese Home Army to lay down its arms and admit foreign troops to Japan without a battle, and even this authority may prove insufficient, for in Japan those who most strongly assert the Emperor's supreme authority commonly claim a right of rebellion if the Emperor is, in their opinion, acting under duress or misled by evil counsel. A Toyo broadcast on the 20th August stated that acceptance of the surrender terms was "resented by a considerable portion of the military," and expressed the fear that "some of the hotheads may allow their emotions to get the better of their judgment," since "to disarm and disband while Allied troops disembark on the shores of Japan may be too much for some military officers to bear." American reconnaissance aircraft have, indeed, been attacked over Japan since the Japanese official acceptance of surrender, and it is reported from Manila that the Japanese delegates sent there to arrange the surrender at General MacArthur's headquarters emphasised the importance of disarming the Home Army quickly, for, with the country in a state of confusion, these troops constituted a "menace to the security of the Japanese homeland."

A complication which must arise as soon as Allied control is established in Japan is the question of the Meiji Constitution and the status of the Diet. The Allied Note of the 11th August referred only to "the authority of the Japanese Emperor and Government to govern the State" (which is to be subject to the orders of the Allied Supreme Commander), but said nothing about the Diet. On the other hand, the new Japanese Prime Minister has stated in his first broadcast that the Emperor's instructions are that "above all the Constitution must be observed." The Diet, as recorded in this Summary No. 297, only two months ago reluctantly passed the Extraordinary War Measures Act, transferring its legal powers to the Government for the duration of the war, though at the same time appointing a committee which the Government was to consult on the use it made of its abnormal authority. It may be claimed that with the end of hostilities the Diet should now resume its constitutional functions. If the Allies deal only with the Emperor and his appointed Government, and deny any rôle to the Diet, they will be in the position of actually increasing monarchical autocracy. The present House of Representatives, having been elected under strong Government pressure without independence of political parties, cannot be regarded as satisfactory from a democratic point of view, but it includes a large number of members of the old parliamentary parties, and without it there is no body at all in Japan with any legal claim to speak on behalf of the Japanese people as distinct from the Imperial Court.

The surrender of the Japanese Army, which is spread over several different countries and has been fighting on a number of different fronts, has raised some complicated problems of procedure. General MacArthur himself is taking the surrender of the forces in Japan itself and in certain areas elsewhere. The Soviet Union is taking the surrender of the Kwantung Army in Manchuria, which has a separate command from that of the Japanese forces in China (including Japanese-occupied Inner Mongolia). The Japanese China Command, under General Okamura, is to surrender to Chiang Kai-shek as Supreme Commander of the China Theatre of Operations, while the Japanese Southern armies under the supreme command of Field-Marshal Terauchi (with his headquarters at Saigon) are to surrender to Allied South-East Asia Command under Admiral Mountbatten. A special difficulty arises here over Indo-China, since it was agreed at Potsdam to allot Indo-China north of latitude 16° N. to the China Theatre for operational purposes, but this line does not correspond either to any administrative division of Indo-China or to any division between Japanese command areas. The Chinese have expressed a wish to participate at Saigon in the surrender of the Japanese forces north of latitude 16° N. We have informed the Chinese Government in reply that we shall welcome the presence at Saigon of a representative of the Generalissimo as an observer.

Within China a critical situation has arisen over the refusal of the Communist armies to obey Chiang Kai-shek's orders to them to remain in their positions. The Communists have explicitly rejected Chiang's order as "contrary to the interests of the nation," and have issued formal orders to to their troops to take the offensive, capture Japanese troops and arms wherever possible and set up their own military administration in all territory which they can occupy. They have also addressed to the British, American and Soviet Governments a protest against the authority given to Chiang Kai-shek to receive the surrender of the Japanese forces in China; they demand the right not only to participate in the surrender in China but also to share as a separate contingent in the Allied occupation of Japan. In their offensive they claim to have captured several Japanese and puppet garrisons and to have taken a place only 50 miles from Nanking; in Shantung they claim to have captured Weihaiwei. They are reported to be driving towards Peking and Tientsin; near Taiyuan they are stated to be engaged in fighting with the troops of Yen Hsi-shan, who have held an area of Shansi throughout the Japanese occupation. The Chungking counter to the threat of this danger that the Communists will forestall the Chinese troops is apparently to order the surrendering Japanese and Nanking puppet forces to keep their arms and hold their ground until Chungking troops can take over from them. This implies that the puppets can work their passage home by resisting the Communists. The Nanking Government has conveniently dissolved itself and appointed a committee for arranging administrative transfer to the Chungking authorities.

Dr. T. V. Soong left Moscow on the 16th August after signing a treaty with the Soviet Union on the 14th. The provisions of the treaty are to be published after it has been ratified by both contracting parties.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Following a week of excited anticipation, which strained public patience to the utmost, VJ-day in America was celebrated with delirious junketing, which totally eclipsed the previous celebrations on VE-day. In San Francisco in particular the rejoicings turned to rioting, and there were many who agreed with President Truman, in proclaiming the 19th August as a day of prayer, that after two days of celebrating America needed a day of prayer.

The press and radio, however, are becoming increasingly concerned and alarmed over the "refusal of the Japanese leaders and people to accept defeat." On the whole, apart from the Left-wing press, the decision to use Hirohito, at least temporarily, is approved, though there is considerable anger at the sequence of arrogant statements emanating from Japan. On nearly all sides, however, and in conservative papers in particular, there is the utmost confidence in General MacArthur's ability to deal with any Japanese temporising and "double talk."

Nearly every newspaper has also echoed the thought expressed by Admiral Leahy that the United States is now the most powerful nation in the world. To the internationalists this is seen as a challenge to accept the responsibility for leadership in the various instruments of international collaboration to restore peace and prosperity in the world. To the nationalists, however, this new power becomes an excuse for a new brand of "America-firstism." It is perhaps significant that a sub-committee of the Home Naval Affairs Committee, after a 21,000-mile tour of inspection, recommends the retention of (and claims full title to) Pacific islands where there are American bases, many of which are under French, British (including New Zealand and Australia), Portuguese, Chilean or Dutch sovereignty. The loss of American lives in taking these bases, together with the expenditure of vast sums of money, the great dependence of the world on the United States for maintaining world peace, and the apparent preference of the natives for United States government, are cited as justification for these claims.

The "awful implications" of the atomic bomb are still discussed, and it is generally conceded that the failure of international co-operation for peace would now ultimately lead to world destruction. Misgivings, on moral grounds, of the use of the bomb continue to be expressed, and thirty-four religious and educational leaders have written already to the President condemning its use, and asking for the discontinuance of its production and the outlawing of its future employment. Meanwhile Senator Thomas (Democrat, Utah), Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, reveals that a Bill to control all aspects of the development of atomic energy is in process of being drafted. Senator O'Mahoney (Democrat, Wyoming) has asked that the Government controls must be so devised "as to make sure that there will be no opportunity for cartel domination of the production and use of atomic energy."

Most newspapers proclaim the sweeping removal of war-time controls and, on the surface, Americans are pleased with the way in which the task of the reconversion of industry is being handled, despite the sudden ending of the world war. In response to the public mood, war agencies are now plunging with gusto into reconversion. The War and Navy Departments announce drastic cancellation of contracts and the speed up of demobilisation, while the War Production Board have announced the removal of 210 production controls, which prevented or restricted the manufacture of many products.

Behind all this, however, there lurks the fear of vast unemployment. Mr. John Snyder, Director of Reconversion, caught the public mood when he declared that a clean stroke causes less pain than "cutting a dog's tail off an inch at a time." He himself, however, has prophesied that the present estimated million unemployed will jump to five millions in three months and eight millions by the spring, and Mr. Sidney Hillman, of the Congress of Industrial Organisation, has forecast 10 millions unemployed within the next six or eight weeks. Left-wing critics apart, there is, however, abundant faith in the capacity of the American system of private enterprise to tackle this problem successfully. Mr. Snyder, who announced the appointment of Lieut.-General Lewis Campbell, Chief of Army Ordnance, as his assistant on reconversion matters, has issued a statement covering a broad range of activities to facilitate the return to peace-time production and to prevent inflation, while the President has issued an amplification of Mr. Snyder's statement and expanded his own earlier remark that "the Government has a major responsibility to assist in the achievement of an orderly transition from war production to civilian production."

President Truman has ordered the extension of war-time labour, price and inflation controls into the reconversion period, but has given the War Labour Board permission to break the Little Steel formula on wages ceilings, provided that this does not result in price increases. In the final stages of war economy the President states that it is necessary to "assume general stability of prices and costs and the maintenance of purchasing power, which are indispensable to the shift of business enterprises from war-time to peace-time production and of individuals from war-time to peace-time employment."

The President has also announced that he intends in the near future to convene a meeting of the representatives of labour and management in order to minimise interruptions by labour disputes during the reconversion period. Meanwhile, the War Labour Board, which would be terminated soon after this proposed conference, would be given authority in all labour disputes, whether in war factories or not.

President Truman has directed the Foreign Economic Administrator, Mr. Crowley, to take steps immediately to discontinue all Lend-Lease operations and to notify foreign Governments concerned of this action. He has also directed the cancellation of all outstanding Lend-Lease contracts except where Allied Governments are prepared to take them over, or where it is in the interest of the United States to complete them. The Foreign Economic Administrator has been instructed to negotiate with Allied Governments for the possible government by them of Lend-Lease inventories now in process of delivery. The military authorities will be responsible for the procurement of Lend-Lease supplies still required for troop movements.

Mr. Joseph Grew, the Under-Secretary of State, has resigned, to the unfeigned delight of the Liberals, and in some quarters it is being predicted that he will be appointed political adviser to General MacArthur. He has been succeeded by Mr. Dean Acheson, formerly one of the six Assistant Secretaries. Two other Assistant Secretaries, Mr. Archibald MacLeish and Brigadier-General Julius Holmes, have also resigned.

LATIN AMERICA.

The end of the Japanese war, like the end of the German war, was received with rejoicing in Latin America, and this time the Argentine Government refrained from attempts to check victory celebrations. Inevitably, therefore, these were turned into demonstrations hostile to the Government and particularly to Colonel Perón. Groups of "nationalist" thugs clashed with the demonstrators, and an attempt was made to stone Government House. Two newspaper offices were besieged. At least four persons were killed and one hundred injured, and more than 260 arrests have been made. It is indeed clear that the opposition to Colonel Perón is mounting: the Colonel was significantly absent from the great Argentine Livestock Show, when the United States Ambassador delivered a veiled attack on the Government; and much now depends on the extent to which he can rely on the Campo de Mayo garrison. Much depends also on the extent to which the Opposition can succeed in uniting and so preventing the country falling into a state of complete disruption. Meanwhile Argentine political life seems to move in a circle rather than a spiral.

Another U-boat, U–977, has surrendered at Mar del Plata.

UNITED NATIONS.

U.N.R.R.A.: Third Session of the Council.

The principal decision of the Council of U.N.R.R.A. in the second week of its deliberations relates to the relief of displaced persons. Resolution 57, approved by the Council last September, provided that, alike in the care and repatriation of displaced persons, U.N.R.R.A. should act "in agreement with the Government of the country of which they are nationals." Under the new Resolution the condition of agreement with the relevant Government is dispensed with as regards the care of displaced persons, though maintained as regards their repatriation, which U.N.R.R.A. is charged to expedite. This new instruction to U.N.R.R.A., which is to be reviewed at the end of six months, has been the subject of acute controversy, at first within the Committee on Policy and thereafter in Plenary Meeting. After prolonged efforts to effect a compromise had failed, the resolution was put to the vote and carried by a large majority. Only the delegates of the U.S.S.R., Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Poland voted against it. The Soviet delegate entered a formal reservation in the following terms: "Authorising the Director-General to act with regard to the displaced persons without the consent of the member Governments concerned, in particular with regard to those displaced persons who do not desire to return to their homes or country of previous place of settlement, must be considered as undermining the fundamental principles of U.N.R.R.A. and leading to a position in which U.N.R.R.A. will place itself in opposition to some member Governments. Such policy will involve U.N.R.R.A. in the sphere of political activities. In view of the above, the Soviet delegation will vote against the adoption of such resolution and reserve its full rights in this matter." The United Kingdom delegation, on the other hand, contended that it was the Soviet desire to give member Governments the power to veto the grant of relief to their nationals who were not willing to be repatriated, which would really involve U.N.R.R.A. in political discrimination. In support of the new instruction the British delegates also contended that on humanitarian grounds the starving must be fed and the sick healed regardless of political affiliations; that administratively it is not practicable to investigate in concert with the relevant Governments the attitude of individuals to the question of repatriation before giving them food; that the displaced persons must, indeed, be encouraged to return—but to return of their free will, and not through coercion by the refusal of relief.

This decision with regard to displaced persons resolves one of three main issues before the Council. With the other two—the extension of relief to Italy, Austria, Korea and Formosa, and the provision of additional funds—little progress has been made. These two issues are closely related. Mr. Clayton has expressed his belief that Congressional approval could be obtained of an additional United States contribution of approximately 1 per cent. of the national income. British willingness to make a further contribution of unspecified amount has also been expressed, though it is felt that means must be devised to enable contributing countries to exercise more stringent control over expenditure. But it has been made clear that these additional contributions are conditional on the extension of relief to Italians and Austrians. A United States proposal that U.N.R.R.A. shall operate in Formosa and Korea is also before the Council. The objection has been raised that nothing in the U.N.R.R.A. agreement authorises free relief operations for the benefit of enemy and ex-enemy nationals. This issue has been raised in Plenary Session, but discussion has for the time being been deferred.

Certain constitutional changes have been accepted. Whereas the admission of new members has hitherto required the assent of the Council, the Central Committee is now empowered to admit those Governments which are signatories of the United Nations Charter. The Council itself has admitted Denmark and the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics to membership and has included them in the Committee for Europe. Complaints of inequitable distribution between recipient countries have been met by enlarging the membership of the Committee on Supplies—twenty members, including Czechoslovakia and Poland, as compared with eleven hitherto—and by adding to its duties that of discussing with the Director-General "broad programmes for securing the equitable distribution of supplies." The reconstitution of the Central Committee is under consideration, while approval has been given in principle to the dissolution of certain of the Technical Committees. These Committees, composed of experts appointed by their Governments to give technical advice to the Administration regarding the areas within which the Administration would be called upon to operate, were essential in the planning of U.N.R.R.A. operations. Consultation on technical matters such as agriculture or welfare can now take place directly between U.N.R.R.A. missions and the Governments of liberated countries. The structure of Technical Committees requires adjustment to the new situation, which necessitates the creation from time to time of ad hoc Committees to deal with precisely defined problems such as the clearance capacity of ports.

Preparatory Commission of the United Nations.

The Executive Committee of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations held its first meeting on the 16th August, at Church House, Westminster. The Committee has appointed Mr. H. M. G. Jebb Executive Secretary. The Chairmanship is to rotate at fortnightly intervals between the representatives of the five major Powers. The task of the Commission is to make arrangements for bringing into being the new Organisation of the United Nations. The Executive Committee has approved the formation of Technical Sub-Committees to prepare reports on those aspects of the new Organisation which require priority of treatment.

GERMANY.

ALTHOUGH it is now more than three weeks since Field-Marshal Montgomery issued his order permitting the formation of political organisations (see Summary No. 305), no outstanding progress has as yet been made by any of the parties in the British zone. They are, of course, still considerably handicapped by the lack of normal communications and by the general uncertainty regarding the future. No active political campaigning can, in fact, be expected for some time, as elections are unlikely to take place before the spring and a census cannot be organised before February. In Berlin, the veteran Communist Chairman, Wilhelm Pieck, has stated that his party aims as a membership of a million throughout the Reich, although he admits that it has so far not enlisted more than 120,000 supporters in Berlin and the Russian zone. The party is known to have headquarters and an elaborate subordinate organisation at Essen and Hanover. Its secretary at Hanover, Theo Nagel (an old associate of Karl Liebknecht and one of the original founders of the party), has, however, criticised the Berlin leaders for their complete subservience to the Russians, and, like other Communists in the West, would seem to resent the domination of the national executive by former Moscow émigrés like Pieck and Ulbricht. Although comparatively unorganised, the Social Democrats appear to have the largest following in the British zone, especially in Hamburg, Brunswick and throughout the province of Hanover. Some of the most promising native officials installed by Military Government are members of this party. Cologne, where one of its leaders, Dr. Konrad Adenauer, officiates as Oberbürgermeister, is rapidly re-emerging as a stronghold of the Centre Party. In this city the influence of the Centre Party is apparently so dominant that the Commonists have made little attempt to entice it into a "united front," as they have, for example, in Westphalia. The party is still vulnerable to criticism from members of the Left, who have not forgotten that, before 1933, it managed to produce a number of chauvinist reactionaries—among them von Papen—who eventually rendered considerable service to Hitler. Attempts have been made at Remscheid to broaden the basis of the Centre Party by bringing in non-Catholics along the lines attempted by the Christian Democratic Union in Berlin. Dr. Andreas Hermes, the leader of the Christian Democratic Union, is said to be anxious to regain touch with the Centre Party leaders in the West. (He was, it will be remembered, the Centre Party's Reich Minister of Agriculture in 1920–22 and of Finance in 1922–23.)

A notable attempt to exploit politically the present administrative dismemberment of Prussia between the various Allied zones is now being made by the traditionally anti-Prussian German-Hanoverian Party, lately renamed the "Lower Saxon Territorial Party." Constituted after the war of 1866 to keep alive the traditions of Hanoverian autonomy and to resist the encroachments of Prussian bureaucracy, this party warmly approves the decision of Military Government to administer Hanover as a separate province, and is ostensibly pro-British. In its ranks, however, are a number of landed aristocrats like Baron Kramer von Glausbrueck and the President of the Landwirtschaftskammer, Baron von Reden, who have vested interests to protect.

The persistent desire on the part of what remains of the German middle class to regain the independent political representation which it enjoyed under the Weimar Republic has been revealed in a recent interview between the Chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party, Dr. Waldemar Koch, and a British representative in Berlin. At this interview, Dr. Koch admitted that his party—which apparently already has between thirty and forty district offices in Berlin alone—expected very little support from the working-class, but hoped to gain its biggest following from the professional classes, the civil service and even from the "Nationalists." Dr. Koch is himself distinctly anti-Russian and highly critical of the Communists. (He was Reich Minister of Economics for a brief period in 1918 and thereafter for some years connected with the big German electrical combines.) In a recent article in Der Morgen the Berlin organ of the Liberal Democratic Party, he rejected any suggestion that the Germans were collectively responsible for the war crimes of their late Nazi leaders and complained bitterly that "the end of the war, for which we have so long waited in the hope that it would bring us freedom from the tyrant, has been a sad disappointment to us, and it has also brought the end of Germany."

Attention has again been focussed on the problem of displaced persons in Western Germany with the publication on the 21st August of a warning by Field-Marshal Montgomery that he was determined to put an end to the serious crimes against the German population which have in certain instances been committed by Allied nationals awaiting repatriation. British troops, he said, had received orders to take "drastic measures" against all persons committing acts of rape, murder or looting. Similar orders have been given by General Eisenhower in the American zone. It is now estimated by the Combined Displaced Persons Executive—the inter-Allied body at Frankfurt which has replaced the Displaced Persons Division of S.H.A.E.F.—that a total of 900,000 Allied nationals may have to remain in the British, American and French zones throughout the winter, although nearly $4\frac{3}{4}$ millions have already been sent home. The latest available statistics show that there are still more than 859,000 Poles awaiting repatriation in Western Germany as a whole, although their number may be appreciably diminished as the result of negotiations between Military Government and representatives of the Polish Provisional Government (see also under "Poland").

In the Russian zone, the problem of displaced Allied nationals is overshadowed by the even greater task of accommodating the German homeless from the East whom the Poles are apparently still driving westwards in complete disregard of the Berlin decisions of the 2nd August. The seriousness with which the local German administrations working under the Soviet authorities have come to view the problem of resettling these refugees was reflected in the sudden decision to summon all heads of rural districts and municipalities in the province of Brandenburg for special discussions at Potsdam on the 26th August. They were asked to bring with them exact details of the number of refugees already settled permanently in their areas, an estimate of the number of refugees still on the move and a survey of the accommodation available for the settlement of others. The results of their deliberations are not yet available.

What was officially described as a three days' "conference of orientation" for leading United States Military Government officers was opened at Frankfurt by General Eisenhower on the 27th August. In a speech that followed the opening address of his chief, General Lucius D. Clay stated that he expected serious trouble in the American zone when the reparations programme became effective and when the Germans saw their capital assets being moved. Important problems emerging from the past three months of Military Government and from the Berlin decisions of the 2nd August are stated to have been discussed by the conference. One of the most important administrative measures to be carried out in the American zone at the moment is the compulsory registration of all German males between the ages of 14 and 65 and all females between the ages of 16 and 45, which must be completed through the local labour offices by the 10th September. The provisions of a new order excluding persons who were more than purely passive members of the Nazi party from important business, professional and academic posts—as well as from public appointments (where the emphasis of the purge has so far rested)—were published by the United States Military Government authorities on the 25th August. They forbid all active Nazis to enter academic life or the professions or to receive posts from private firms which would permit them to acquire wealth or exercise any influence in the community. Public funds are not to be made available for their maintenance, and their property is made liable to confiscation and control by Military Government.

On the 21st August, the Bavarian State Ministry of Finance issued from Munich an order imposing an "emergency levy" (Notabgabe) of 25 per cent. in addition to normal income-tax on all incomes over 2,160 marks a year. This levy was stated to be necessary "to prevent the collapse of the economy and finances and to enable further measures of stabilisation to be undertaken." In explaining the order over the Munich radio on the 25th August, the Bavarian Prime Minister, Dr. Schaeffer, expressed the hope that similar steps would be taken in the other German provinces. (They may, indeed, have to be taken if the Bavarian levy is maintained long enough to cause a migration of population away from the State, and if the decision of the Berlin conference of the 2nd August to pursue a "common policy of central taxation" is not to be jeopardised.) The way in which the initiative in imposing the levy has been left to the Bavarian Ministry of Finance would seem to suggest that the United States Military Government authorities are not at present inclined to dictate a uniform fiscal policy for their zone but rather to encourage the individual German Laender to work out their own salvation.

The first Fulda Conference of the German Catholic Bishops to be held since the Allied occupation opened on the 21st August with an address by Cardinal Archbishop Faulhaber of Munich, who appealed for a Christian revival as the most effective means of ridding Germany of all Nazi influences. An American army captain is stated to have attended the conference "as an observer of those Church affairs which have a bearing on politics." Representatives of the German Evangelical Churches were also reported on the 22nd to be meeting at Sachsenhausen, near Frankfurt-am-Main, to undertake a thorough purge of all Church officials who co-operated with the Nazis. (In those communities which were dominated by the so-called Deutsche Christen such collaborators were particularly numerous.)

AUSTRIA.

The four Allied Commanders-in-Chief met in Vienna on the 23rd August, on the invitation of Marshal Koniev, to discuss a number of questions which must be settled before the Allied Council for Austria is set up. Agreement was reached on measures to which immediate effect will be given. As an interim measure, each of the four occupying Powers will, from the 1st September, contribute certain supplies for the city of Vienna in proportion to the population in their respective zones. Preliminary consideration was given to the question of removing economic and other barriers between the four zones of occupation in Austria. The assurance of food supplies for Vienna for the immediate future was warmly welcomed by the Austrians, and the Mayor of Vienna, General Körner, sent a special message of thanks to the Allied Commanders.

The announcement of the decision of the U.N.R.R.A. Council to extend U.N.R.R.A. relief to Austria was similarly received in Vienna with great enthusiasm, although Mr. Lehmann has said that it will be some time before U.N.R.R.A. will be able to start relief work in Austria.

The serious supply situation in Vienna has led to rapid growth of the black market, and on the 26th August the Renner Government introduced stringent measures to combat this. All lorries and carts will be examined as they enter Vienna, and unless proof is produced that any food they are carrying has been acquired legally, those concerned will be prosecuted and the goods seized. Lorries will also be stopped and searched as they leave Vienna.

Radio Prague reported on the 18th August that the American military command in Austria had completed arrangements by which Austria would receive 150,000 tons of coke from Czechoslovakia in three months in exchange for 350,000 tons of Austrian iron ore. The barter arrangement was to start on the 1st September, provided the necessary transport was available.

Hans Piesch, the head of the Provincial Government in Carinthia, broadcast an appeal to Carinthians on the 24th August to use wood, thus helping to ease the fuel situation in the large towns. The efforts of the Military Government and the Provincial Government to get coal from abroad had failed, he said. Austria was producing 2,750,000 tons of lignite per annum, 2 million tons of which were used by the railways. The greater part of the remaining 750,000 tons goes to industry, and the rest to the big towns, especially Vienna. "Vienna has no gas, no industrial electric power, and no power for heating purposes; nor is there any firewood in Vienna. If we do not give every ton of coal we can save to Vienna, that city will be hit by grim disaster."

Honner, the Communist Minister of the Interior in the Renner Government, has been negotiating with the Soviet authorities for the repatriation of Austrian prisoners-of-war in Russian hands. Commissions of Austrian doctors and State police officials are now visiting Soviet prison camps, to investigate the physical condition and political outlook of prisoners. The commissions' reports will be examined by the Ministry of the Interior, and approved prisoners will then be repatriated. Nazis, officers, and volunteers will not be released. If this scheme has satisfactory results, it should help to ease the difficult labour situation.

Dr. Adolf Eigl was arrested on the night of the 22nd August by the United States Military Government of Upper Austria. Eigl has held office under the United States authorities, as Landeshauptmann of the Provisional Government of Upper Austria, for three and a half months, since the arrival of American troops there. It was stated that Eigl's arrest was not due to his activities during the American occupation, but is part of the programme to eliminate from office any personalities with Nazi associations. Twenty-four hours after Eigl's arrest, Dr. Anton Reibecker (or Russegger), his colleague and Verwaltungsjurist in the Upper Austrian administration, who had also held office under the Military Government, was arrested.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The problem of economic reconstruction continues to occupy a major place in the chronicle of recent events. The press unceasingly emphasises the need for hard work and a measure has been adopted compelling every able-bodied citizen to participate in re-establishing the country's economic security. An interesting suggestion has been to transfer certain industries from the Border Regions into Slovakia, thereby easing the labour difficulty. Furthermore, as railways are not yet functioning properly and as a considerable proportion of Czech products are destined for Eastern Europe and the Balkans, the Danube, a ready-made trade-route close at hand, will play a more important rôle than hitherto.

M. Hromadko, chief delegate at the recent trade discussions in Moscow, appeared pleased with the progress made in adjusting economic relations between the two countries. A Trade Agreement, negotiated for 1946, will secure a market for Czech finished products and Russian raw materials.

Mgr. Fordi is expected soon to arrive in Prague to take over his new duties as Chargé d'Affaires of the Holy See. His appointment meets the desire of the Prague Government to settle outstanding religious problems before the arrival of a Papal Nuncio; the Vatican had previously take steps to secure the reappointment of Mgr. Ritter in that capacity, but Dr. Beneš carried his objection. A particular dispute is the secularisation of schools in Slovakia. This brings Slovakia into line with the rest of the republic where religious instruction has been run on a voluntary basis in the schools, but outside school hours.

The preparations for the holding of elections in Czechoslovakia have caused increasing activity behind the scenes recently. The Government-in-exile foresaw the interim period, which is about to end, and during which the prime necessities were order and unanimity of policy among the four main political parties. The national coalition Government formed by President Beneš on his return has been supported by the local district and provincial committees. These committees sprang up under varying conditions among the underground workers, resistance movements and liberated citizens, not as a result of elections, but out of the needs of the moment. It was expected that the Provisional Assembly, which is to meet soon to consider the best method of electing a fully Constitutional Assembly, would arise out of these committees in a similar fashion. President Beneš was anxious to avoid the disturbing effects of an election at a time when the nation's energies should be wholly devoted to resettlement and rebuilding. The preponderance of the Soviet ally and the bad reputation of many of the Right-wing political groups made it easy for the more intransigent and doctrinaire of the Left-wing to penetrate the committees. It was even reported that in Slovakia former members of the Fascist Hlinka Guard had succeeded in joining local committees—after persuading their fellows that they were Communists. Since these early days the popularity of Russia has declined somewhat, and while not abandoning friendship with the Soviet Union as the cornerstone of their foreign policy, the Czechs are turning more towards the west, and the more moderate political groups are pressing for greater influence in affairs. Last month, a member of the moderate Socialist National Party suggested to the British Ambassador that the Provisional Assembly would take the form of an all-party congress with the addition of non-party representatives of the Churches, universities and so on. Now Prague Radio has come forth with a statement that democratic elections at all levels will be held early in the autumn and promises that there will be no "tricks or campaigns." Details of the Presidential Decree on elections are not yet to hand.

POLAND.

Negotiations are in progress for an ad hoc meeting to be held as soon as possible in Berlin between representatives of the Polish Provisional Government and the British, United States, Soviet and French authorities, to discuss at the military level detailed arrangements for the repatriation of such persons in the British zone as may now wish to return to Poland, on the understanding that the existing machinery for repatriation through the Soviet zone will be used for this purpose and that the Polish Government will specify the rate at which they are prepared to receive repatriates. The problem is indeed becoming increasingly urgent, by reason not only of the virtual completion of the repatriation of Soviet citizens in Germany and the impending approach of winter but also of the fact that a far greater number of displaced Poles (so far some 378,000 out of approximately 500,000 in camps in the British zone, according to recent Military Government estimates) than was at first expected is now willing to go home. In the meantime a representative of the United States group on the Control Council is understood to have reached an agreement in Warsaw with the Polish Vice-Minister for War, under which transfers of displaced persons and officer prisoners of war from the United States zone will be effected at the rate of 10,000 per diem, by way either of the Soviet zone or of Czechoslovakia; existing liaison officers in the United States zone would be offered the opportunity to declare adherence to the Polish Provisional Government.

Provisional Government propaganda continues, meanwhile, to allege conspiracy among émigré opposition elements to prevent the return of the Polish forces in the West, and to press for immediate recognition of the Warsaw Supreme Command's authority over Polish units abroad. In an interview broadcast on the 21st August Marshal Rola-Zymierski stated that "as soon as the National Unity Government was formed we approached the British Government, suggesting sending our officers to take over Polish units abroad. So far we have had no answer"; and on the 23rd August the Polish Military Attaché in London (Colonel Wągrowski) told a press correspondent that statistics showed some 89 per cent. of the Poles serving in the West and in the Middle East were ready to return, while many high-ranking officers in this country had told him they recognised only the authority of the Warsaw Administration. Apart, however, from the reiteration of such general assurances as that given by Marshal Rola-Zymierski on the 23rd August (that "every Polish soldier and true democrat who offers faithfully to serve democratic Poland . . . . will find the door to the Polish army open to him"), the Provisional Government has not yet made any explicit and comprehensive statement such as would enable those Poles who are still in doubt about their reception to make up their minds. Thus, in reply to questions in the House of Commons on the 24th August concerning the possibility of a general amnesty in Poland, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had to state that he could not give a firm reply, adding: "but I can say that this has been engaging the attention of His Majesty's Government, and that they continue discussion of that point through the normal channels."

The Provisional Government has been at pains to recommend to the public the Soviet-Polish Reparations Agreement (see last week's Summary). At a press conference on the 24th August M. Bierut emphasised that the Soviet Government, had they wished, could have claimed reparations from "the Western Territories joined to Poland" and, in renouncing their claim, had sustained a serious economic loss; the value of the investments alone which Poland had acquired in these territories were estimated at $9,500 million, although about $500 million should be deducted to cover material removed prior to the Berlin Conference. An agreement was also signed ceding 15 per cent. of commercial shipping to Poland from the share falling to the Soviet Union. The Polish commitments for coal deliveries would be carried out at cost price [Note: the "special price" fixed is understood to have been 1 dollar 22 cents per ton], and, to enable their execution, the Soviet Government would put 50,000 war prisoners at Poland's disposal.

Mr. Victor Cavendish-Bentinck presented his credentials as His Majesty's Ambassador to the Provisional Government to M. Bierut on the 24th. The Provisional Government's first Ambassador in London, M. Henryk Strasburger, arrived from Warsaw on the 22nd.

SOVIET UNION.

Generalissimo Stalin summed up the Soviet achievements in the Far East, which included the complete occupation of Manchuria and Southern Saghalien, and the occupation of the islands of Shumshu and Paramushir in the Kurile group in a special Order of the Day published on the 23rd August (a communiqué of the 26th August announced the occupation of the islands of Onekotan, Shashikotan and Matsuwa). The Mongolian Army of Marshal Choibalsan was given special mention for co-operation with Marshal Malinovsky's Trans-Baikalian Front troops in their 950 kilom. advance through the "waterless steppes of Mongolia" to Mukden, Jehol and Port Arthur. Twenty-four salvoes from 324 guns were ordered to be fired in Moscow on the 23rd August in honour of the Soviet Far Eastern troops, the Pacific fleet and of the Mongol Army. Moreover, a special tribute to the operational manœuvres of the Mongolian Mechanised Cavalry, and its mastery of modern warfare in fighting the Japanese appeared in Krasnaya Zvezda. Throughout the week, the Soviet press continued to recount the willingness of the Japanese to surrender, and the enthusiastic welcome given to the Red Army by the Koreans and Chinese alike. Izvestiya (23rd August) issued a warning against the phraseology of divine uniqueness and constitutional perfection still found in Japanese public declarations and the retention of certain ministers and ministries intimately associated with Japan's predatory record.

A hint of the Soviet Government's attitude towards the Korean émigré groups in Chungking and America is found in a recent review in New Times, of Robert Oliver's book A Forgotten Nation (Washington 1944). Oliver's alleged opinion that the Korean people at home cannot produce the necessary post-war leadership themselves is denounced, while the Korean exiles are described by New Times as "pursuing private interests which do not in the least coincide with the task of safeguarding the real independence of the Koreans" and their American sponsors as "reactionaries."

The text of the Soviet-Chinese Treaty of Friendship and Alliance was published by Moscow wireless on the 26th August (see also under "Far East"). A Pravda leader (27th August) hailed it as "an important stage in the development of Soviet-Chinese relations," and dwelt on the comradeship in arms of the Soviet Union and China during the "great war of liberation," when the Red Army struck a crushing blow at the Japanese, after which Japan's hopes of resisting the Allies finally collapsed." China is reminded by Pravda that "the Soviet State was the first great Power in the world to base its relations with her on the basis of equality of rights and respect for Chinese sovereignty," and that "the Chinese people always saw in the U.S.S.R. its true and disinterested friend." The "common vital interests" of the U.S.S.R. and China and the defence of these interests for a period of thirty years by the Treaty, were finally stressed. But the very valuable and far-reaching economic advantages secured by the Soviet Union in Manchuria were not specially emphasised. The Soviet public has been told categorically that the Chinese National Government is regarded as the Central Government of China, and there has been little or no recent reference to Chinese communism.

British foreign policy, especially in the Balkans, was the target for considerable Soviet press and wireless comment last week, much of it being distinctly unfavourable. In the first place, Mr. Bevin's speech was criticised both directly and indirectly by frequent references to alleged dissatisfaction with it in "progressive circles" in Great Britain and elsewhere. Writing in Krasnaya Zvezda (24th August), Hofman said that judging from the British press reactions, Mr. Bevin's speech has been very satisfactory to the Conservatives, but by no means so to all Labour members. The British masses, continued Hofman, would expect a clearer statement from the Foreign Secretary about collaboration with the Soviet Union in destroying the remnants of Fascism in Europe and supporting countries such as Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Roumania where Fascist elements were being radically purged. Signs of Soviet anxiety regarding the effects of the British Labour victory on Socialist-Communist unity in Europe have not been lacking. In the above-mentioned article by Hofman, for example, the recent rejection of the proposal to merge the Socialist and Communist parties in France was linked up by Hofman with the realisation, in co-operation with the present French Socialist Party, of the old British plan of a Western European bloc.

The British attitude to the forthcoming elections in the Balkans was also the subject of much acrid comment by the Soviet press and wireless. Following the resignation of the Petkov group of so-called "traitors and reactionaries" in Bulgaria before the postponement of the elections, Moscow wireless accused this group of anti-democratic intrigues in Bulgaria and of endeavouring "to place the Bulgarian Parliamentary elections under the control of foreign Powers." On the other hand the democratic basis of the present Bulgarian Government was indignantly proclaimed. No comment accompanied the announcement that the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet had granted the request of Georgi Mikhailovich Dimitroff to renounce his citizenship of the U.S.S.R. "in view of his candidature for the Bulgarian National Assembly." This step recalls another decree of the Supreme Soviet of the 22nd June, 1944, which permitted the inhabitants of Eastern Poland and Soviet citizens of Polish descent to assume Polish citizenship, a unilateral action which has since considerably affected the course of Polish politics. The Soviet press (26th August) published the Bulgarian Prime Minister's statement on the postponement of the national elections, without comment.

Izvestiya (22nd August), in a rather offensive two-column article entitled "Elections in Greece and Foreign Observers," analysed Mr. Bevin's announcement that Great Britain would send observers to supervise the forthcoming Greek elections. The article pointed out the serious political importance of this decision, its incompatibility with the sovereign independence of any country and the lack of confidence thereby shown in the ability of the people concerned to express their will freely. The refusal of the Soviet Government to participate in such electoral supervision was based, according to a Tass statement, on the Soviet Government's respect for other States great and small and democratic principles. Izvestiya described the situation in Greece on the eve of the elections as dominated by the terrorism of Greek reactionaries, making the free expression of the people's will at the elections impossible.

Up to the time of writing there has been no direct Soviet press comment on the recent American communication to Roumania. Tributes to the Groza Government and its success in improving the general economic situation (and the workers' lot) in Roumania frequently appear. Analysing Soviet-Roumanian friendship on the occasion of the presentation of credentials to King Michael by the new Soviet Minister, M. Kavtaradze, Moscow wireless was at pains at once to defend Soviet policy against current charges of interference in Roumanian affairs, and to incriminate Maniu and Bratianu as "Roumanian reactionaries, preferring to resuscitate the anti-democratic lines of past Roumanian policies": "their intention of provoking outside interference in Roumanian affairs," was also stressed. "The high moral force exercised by the U.S.S.R. regarding the peoples' rights to solve their vital problems alone cannot be contested," it was asserted (though the course of political events in Roumania since the Armistice suggests that this assertion might at least be queried).

SCANDINAVIA.

The chief sensation at the trial of Quisling was the evidence of his activities before the occupation. According to documents, such as Rosenberg's diary, which were provided by the Allied legal authorities in Germany, and to statements obtained from prominent Germans, he worked for a German invasion of Norway from the outbreak of war, and at an interview in December 1939 he convinced Hitler of the need to forestall a British attack. Keitel and Jodl state that he constantly urged the danger of delay, and provided detailed information about Norway's military position early in April 1940. In cross examination, Quisling's replies have been evasive, the witnesses so far called for the defence have testified only to his good character in early life. Though psychiatrists appointed by the court state that he showed no signs of insanity, the trial has been postponed for another mental examination.

At the Danish Social Democratic Congress the Premier, M. Buhl, reaffirmed that his Party would oppose any attempt to bring South Slesvig under Danish administration. He admitted that difficulties existed within the Government but believed it had the strength to maintain order.

The Director of the Danish Foreign Ministry, M. Svenningsen, was appointed Minister to Stockholm on the 27th August. The Foreign Minister M. Christmas Møller, has deprecated the recent attacks made on M. Svenningsen (see last week's Summary).

Labour unrest continues in both Norway and Denmark. In spite of agreement on a cost of living bonus between the Danish Trade Unions and the Employers' Federation, Copenhagen is still threatened with a shortage of bread owing to a strike in the milling industry. In Norway the Unions and employers failed to reach agreement after State mediation, and a wage tribunal has been established to settle the dispute.

As in Denmark, negotiations have been broken off between the Norwegian Labour and Communist Parties, though provisional arrangements for a joint election campaign were made in July. M. Hambro has been elected chairman of the Norwegian Conservative Party and Professor Worm-Müller of the Liberal Party.

In Stockholm, the chairman, secretary and treasurer of the (Nazi) Swedish Socialist Party were sentenced on the 22nd August to heavy fines and to terms of hard labour up to twenty months for receiving illegal foreign support, and for intelligence activity.

The War Guilt Bill was presented to the Finnish Diet on the 22nd August, and provides for the trial and punishment of "any member of the Government who, in a decisive manner, contributed to Finland's entry into the war, in 1941, against the Soviet Union and Great Britain, or who during the war obstructed the attainment of peace." The Government will name the persons to be indicted for trial by the Court of War Responsibility (see last week's Summary). This Court, it is proposed, will consist of three Law members, appointed by the Government, and twelve members chosen by the Diet from among its own members.

All parties, with the exception of the Democratic League, strongly condemned the Bill as departing from all established principles of Finnish justice, but none had the courage to oppose the Government. Finland's delicate foreign political position, it was argued, had to be the deciding factor, over-riding all legal considerations, no matter how weighty.

The Democratic League, also withheld its support, but for diametrically opposite reasons. Certain amendments had been made in the original draft of the Bill, of which the Party could not approve, and in the opinion of the Democratic League, the proposed Law Members were entirely superfluous since the Diet included a sufficient number of eligible men with legal experience.

The Diet passed the Bill to its Constitutional Law Committee without a division, and the Committee has, in its turn, sent a request to the Supreme Court for an opinion on the Bill.

The newly-appointed Soviet Minister to Finland, M. Orlov, presented his credentials to President Mannerheim on the 26th August; and the first Deputy-Speaker of the Diet, M. Cay Sundström, has been appointed Finnish Minister to Moscow.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

At a meeting of the Belgian Cabinet on the 24th August M. Kronacker, Minister for Imports, reporting on the results of his mission abroad, stated that in the first six months of this year 155 ships unloaded in Belgian harbours cargoes totalling 1,144,000 tons, including 679,000 tons for civilian consumption and 465,000 tons for use by the Allied armies. At a press conference on the following day he forecast imports for civilian consumption of as much as 1,500,000 tons for the period July to September. These would include 275,000 tons of coal. In this connection M. Kronacker emphasised the vital importance of an increase in Belgium's own inadequate coal output.

Referring to the forthcoming cessation of Lend-Lease deliveries, M. Kronacker stated that Belgium was in the peculiar position of being the only European country which would be left with a deficit. Since the liberation, and up to the 18th August, 1945, Belgium had supplied the United States authorities with 165 milfion dollars worth of deliveries. On that date the total of United States shipments of Lend-Lease goods to Belgium amounted to 47·5 million dollars. At the same time, orders placed by Belgium in the United States and not yet delivered amounted to a total value of 105 million dollars, including 80 million dollars worth of industrial products and 25 million dollars worth of food-stuffs.

The debate in the Chamber on the Government's draft financial bills was concluded on the 24th August (see last week's Summary). The draft bill concerning the transference of blocked accounts into compulsory loan securities was adopted by 110 votes to 2; and the bill creating a special tax on the profits arising out of dealings with the enemy was adopted unanimously. The rate of interest for the compulsory loan securities was fixed at 1 per cent. for 1946, increasing progressively to reach 3·3 per cent. in 1949. At the end of a long debate these figures were adopted by 80 votes to 61, with 3 abstentions, after the Government had asked for a vote of confidence.

Professor Schermerhorn's reference, in a broadcast on the 17th August, to the desirability of releasing certain categories of political prisoners in view of the difficulties of speeding up trials and of providing decent conditions in the internment camps in the coming winter aroused vehement protests in the Left-wing press and from the Association of the Netherlands Forces of the Interior and the Communist party. In some places riots occurred when the released prisoners returned home. On the 24th, however, a statement issued by the Government Information Bureau assured the public that the high figures for releases quoted in current rumours were untrue, and that the categories referred to in the broadcast included only those cases in which it could be assumed that trial would lead either to acquittal or to terms of imprisonment so short that they would be covered by the period of internment. The whole matter would be dealt with in close co-operation with the resistance groups and the camp leaders. A similar assurance was given by Professor Schermerhorn himself, who explained that there would be a thorough investigation of each case. As Het Parool pointed out, the public concern was due to a misunderstanding arising out of the way in which the Prime Minister had dealt with the matter in his speech. It was now clear that the Government had never intended to make lack of camp space a criterion for release.

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle and his party reached Washington on the 22nd August and remained there until the 25th. The joint statement issued by President Truman and the General on the conclusion of the visit was not very illuminating. It said that the two Chiefs of State had had "a thorough discussion of a wide range of subjects, among them those of most immediate interest to the two Governments." At their request Mr. Byrnes and M. Bidault had also had "a full and frank discussion of political and economic questions in which the two countries are deeply interested." Finally, in the course of a further meeting, all four men had "fully recognised the fundamental harmony between French and American aims in the construction of the post-war world, and have expressed their readiness to act in accordance with this mutual understanding by establishing an even closer co-operation between the two countries." In fact, the atmosphere in which the talks were conducted seems to have been generally friendly as well as frank and both sides appear to regard the outcome with satisfaction. In particular the American authorities are understood to have welcomed the opportunity to dispel French misgivings about the United States attitude to continued French sovereignty over Indo-China and to the questions of economic aid and a possible American claim to a base at Dakar.

On the 24th August General de Gaulle gave a press conference at which his readiness to answer questions made, as it did in July 1944 (see Summary No. 241), an excellent impression on the journalists present. The main burden of his talk was a vigorous restatement and amplification of his views on Germany and the Far East. France, he said, had no wish to annex any German territory but there were parts of Germany which had long served as gateways for German aggression against France. "France now controls some of these territories and she must continue to control them and others, in particular the territory on the left bank of the Rhine." He also repeated his desire for inter-Allied control of the Ruhr, and said that, in general, French policy towards Germany would largely depend on Germany herself: the Allies would be wise not to hurry into deciding what Germany would be. In the Far East, he declared, France intended to maintain full sovereignty over Indo-China and New Caledonia. His further statement, that any arrangements for a permanent American naval base at Noumea would have to be made by the world security organisation, was no doubt in the nature of a reply to the recent demand by a group of members of the Naval Affairs Committee of the American House of Representatives that the United States should have full title to all bases it had established on Allied territory in the Pacific area (see last Summary under "United States"). Finally, in answer to a question, the General disclosed that President Truman had complained to him personally, as well as publicly in a press conference, of the attitude of the French press to the United States. The General raised a laugh when he commented "I must say that during the last five years I have also been struck by some articles in the United States press about French policy."

On the 27th August General de Gaulle was made an honorary citizen of New York where he had a very warm welcome. Later in the day he went to Chicago and on the following evening arrived in Canada for a brief visit as the guest of the Governor-General at Government House, Ottawa.

M. Pineau, the Minister of Food, who made an excellent impression during his recent visit to Washington, broadcast on the 23rd August about the results of his mission to North and South America. He said that the United States and Canada had undertaken to supply 150,000 tons of wheat a month to France and 200,000 tons to North Africa. The sugar position caused him great anxiety but Great Britain had agreed to make an immediate advance of 50,000 tons, to be repaid from French stocks in the Antilles. The import allocation of 200,000 tons of fats for the last six months of 1945 would enable rations to be increased from October. In addition, purchases of butter had been made in the Argentine; 60,000 tons of meat had been bought to meet the needs of the remainder of the year; and Great Britain had agreed to allocate 10 per cent. of her Argentine meat purchases to France in 1946 and for as long afterwards as was necessary. Furthermore, the import programme included many goods essential to agriculture, such as cattle food, fertilisers and insecticides, agricultural machinery and tractors, "not to mention coal." Altogether, 1 million tons of goods would arrive in France each month and this quantity would rise to 1,500,000 tons as French port facilities improved. M. Pineau concluded a guardedly optimistic broadcast with an appeal to agricultural producers to assist the Government in drawing up a programme of home production for 1946.

The abrupt termination of Lend-Lease supplies has caused a good deal of comment in France. In a broadcast relaid from Washington on the 25th August, M. Offrey, head of the Press Department of the Quai d'Orsay, who was in the United States for General de Gaulle's visit, sought to reassure his countrymen. He explained that in the agreement of February (see Summary No. 282), France had stipulated that most of the goods required for the rebuilding of French industries should be supplied by means of loans and not under Lend-Lease. It was therefore to be hoped that most of these goods would be delivered on the terms agreed. Goods already ordered under Lend-Lease would be forwarded as before, but there would be a different system of accounting. For those which had not yet been ordered France would "for the time being" have to pay cash. This might be inconvenient, but the essential point was that the cessation of Lend-Lease would not entail any delay in the delivery of essential supplies. There were good reasons for hoping that the new financial arrangements satisfactory to both countries would be made in the near future.

The Radical Party Congress ended on the 23rd August after some lively of Munich, M. Herriot's speech in defence of the institutions of the Third trative Presidents of the party, showed that the elders still dominate the Radical Republic—he said that although France had been freed the Republic had yet to be liberated and that he would devote himself to this task—and the election of MM. Herriot, Steeg and Mazé respectively to be Political, Honorary and Administrative Presidents of the party showed that the elders still dominate the Radical scene, and caused certain Resistance papers to make caustic references to "old idols" and "solemn ghosts." The election to the post of Administrative President was, however, hotly contested, and M. Anxionnaz, one of the Party's leading young Resistance members, gained 247 votes against M. Mazé's 272. The programme read at the final session included a declaration of the Party's opposition to a single Assembly which "might either lead to adventure as in the past, and to the eclipse of the Republic and internal peace, or prolong the present de facto régime." It also expressed the wish for "a treaty of close collaboration with Britain."

SWITZERLAND.

The repatriation of the Russians interned in Switzerland is almost completed. Some delay has been caused by the reluctance of a number of them to return home, in spite of the promise of an amnesty and the assurance that none of them would be arrested on returning to Russia. Although the majority accepted these guarantees, some 300 remained unconvinced and simply refused to leave Switzerland. This creates an extremely delicate situation, for, while the Soviet Government claims the right to dispose of all its subjects with or without their consent, Switzerland is most unwilling to eject against their will persons claiming sanctuary within her frontiers.

The peaceful nature of the repatriation was further marred by an incident at Villars-sur-Ollons, where a dispute arose between an inn-keeper and a number of Russians who were awaiting repatriation. The quarrel, which is stated to have been caused by the excessive consumption of alcohol, resulted in the death of two of the Russians. A court of enquiry was set up, and the head of the Swiss delegation which has been discussing the whole question of internment and repatriation, together with the entire Russian delegation, visited the camp where the Russians were awaiting repatriation.

Other refugees are also returning home. Three thousand Yugoslavs left Switzerland between the 24th and 28th August. The repatriation of Czechs will take place on the 29th.

A society for the promotion of cultural relations between Austria and Switzerland has been founded in Zürich with the Swiss radio commentator, Professor von Salis, as its chairman.

M. Skylstad, the new Norwegian Minister to Switzerland, presented his credentials on the 24th August.

Mr. Bevin's speech on foreign policy was warmly approved by the Swiss Press, especially for the evidence it gave that the continuity of Britain's foreign policy was to be maintained.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Spanish official circles have derived considerable relief from Mr. Bevin's statement of British foreign policy in the House of Commons on the 20th August. Characteristically they take comfort from the Foreign Secretary's refusal to countenance any action from outside that might "promote or encourage" civil war; and they conveniently ignore the plain intimation that His Majesty's Government would look favourably on some development inside Spain which would remove the Franco cum Falange incubus. Indeed, that part of Mr. Bevin's speech has been carefully excised from the published text, and the specific reference to a change of régime has been freely paraphrased by the blessed word "evolución."

The new Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs has seized the occasion to furnish, through the two principal Spanish press agencies, a comprehensive apologia pro domo suo. In the concluding passages Señor Artajo discourses on the theme of the flexible and evolutionary character of the régime, which will enable the country eventually to co-ordinate itself with the "Anglo-Saxon" systems, but he insists that Spain must be allowed to "evolve" in her own time and at her own pace, reaching final equilibrium, in accordance with the Caudillo's pledge of the 17th July, with a restoration of the traditional monarchy. (He has spoken in similar vein to a special correspondent of Reuter, with honeyed words about the present remarkable example given by Great Britain.) Hope springs eternal. . . . It remains to be seen whether real progress towards elimination of the Franco régime will now take place. The forces in favour have certainly received encouragement, and there have been some signs of a manœuvre which might produce results.

In a speech to a Fisheries' Congress on the 23rd August at Vigo, General Franco confirmed that the next stage of evolution towards what Señor Artajo calls "new forms of popular representation and political liberty" is the holding of municipal elections. Señor Artajo told His Majesty's Ambassador the other day, in a conversation at the Minister's private villa, that these elections might be expected to take place in the late autumn. He also dropped hints that they might be used as a means of restoring the monarchy. That would indeed be to come full circle, since, it may be recalled, it was municipal elections in April 1931 —supposedly non-political—which brought about the fall of the monarchy.

Meanwhile the Republican exiles have reached at last a measure of agreement. As a result of Dr. Negrín's journey to Mexico City it has been found possible to carry out the plan which proved abortive last January (see Summary No. 280). A meeting of the Cortes was convened in the City Hall on the 15th August, and was attended by nearly a hundred Deputies. The Mexican Government provided every facility and arranged for extra-territorial privileges, and the diplomatic representatives of ten countries, including the U.S.S.R. and France, were present. Señor Martinez Barrio was duly installed as President of the Cortes—and this conferred on him automatically, under the 1931 Constitution, the status and authority of Acting President of the Republic. To him, then, as President, Dr. Negrín resigned the powers of his Government, whose mandate, he claimed, was derived from the last meeting of the Cortes on Spanish territory at the end of the Civil War. Señor Barrio appointed to the premiership Dr. José Giral, a political nonentity who, as a personal friend of President Azaña, headed the Cabinet which came into office—though not indeed power—at the outbreak of the military rebellion in July 1936. Giral has succeeded in forming an all-party Cabinet, which includes Indalecio Prieto and Alvaro de Albornoz, of the Committee of Liberation (J.E.L.N.), and two or three other eminently respectable Republican leaders. The Catalans are represented by José Terradellas, and the Basques by Manuel Irujo. Señor Prieto himself represents the Socialist trade unions (U.G.T.), and a place has been left for a representative of the C.N.T. (Syndicalist trade unions); but there is no Communist included. Dr. Negrín, also, is excluded. It is, in other words, a Government which makes its appeal on broad democratic principles, but one which is unlikely to arouse enthusiasm in the Soviet Union. Negrín has been temporarily worsted in his private war—part personal, part political—with Prieto.

In Lisbon the welcome given to Mr. Bevin's speech has been extremely cordial. Dr. Salazar, in conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador, characterised it as "well-thought-out, constructive and courageous." He was particularly pleased, it appears, at the warning about the need for a more careful definition of the term "democracy." The press has unreservedly endorsed Dr. Salazar's words of praise.

ERRATUM.

See last week's Summary. 15th line down should be replaced by the following:—

and the same principle of "natural right," it may be recalled, was invoked by

ITALY.

The Italian Government is still divided on the question of the desirability of holding the national elections for the Constituent Assembly in the near future. At a meeting of leaders of the Christian Democrat Party held at Frascati on the 26th August, Signor de Gasperi declared that the question of precedence of local over political elections or vice versa was a matter of opinion, and added that the British Foreign Minister thought it opportune to speed up political elections but made no mention of municipal elections, while the United States Government stressed the desirability of setting in motion the electoral machine and of beginning with the re-establishment of democracy in the Communes. Signor de Gasperi went on to say that in many Communes local elections could take place immediately, provided the Parties pledged themselves to respect the freedom of the elections and provided the Government had the strength to maintain order. The holding of municipal elections would not delay elections to the Constituent Assembly, but would create an atmosphere of democratic competition.

Signor de Gasperi has made it clear to Sir Noel Charles that he himself very much wishes the municipal elections to be held first. He does not think highly of the political education of Italy, and fears the influence of armed Communists in keeping voters away from the polls if the political elections were held in the near future. Since the Constituent Assembly election would be the most important election ever held in Italy, Signor de Gasperi thought it desirable that it should not be held before the return from abroad of prisoners of war and internees, and he pointed out that once elections were held the powers of the Lieutenant of the Realm would automatically cease. It is reported in the press that Signor Parri has stated that, while welcoming Mr. Bevin's invitation to hold the Constituent Assembly elections as soon as possible, this could not be done until peace was concluded.

On the 23rd August the Office of the President of the Council issued a statement on the grant of autonomy to the Val d'Aosta. After explaining the measure, the communiqué added that the way to local legislation had been opened, but that general decisions on decentralisation must be made by the Constituent Assembly. It pointed out, however, that the Government was not content with generalisations on autonomy, but had shown by the action it had taken in regard to the Val d'Aosta that it would proceed to put theory into practice in areas where linguistic and ethnical differences necessitated decentralisation as a protection for minorities. The Government intended to proceed with similar plans for areas on the eastern and northern frontiers. The Cabinet had already referred to the Alto Adige and was now proceeding with consultations on regional autonomy for the whole of Venezia Tridentina, where its need was widely felt. Thus the new Italian State gave evidence of its rigorous and conscientious spirit of democracy and pacification.

Senator Federico Ricci has been appointed to succeed the late Signor Soleri as Minister of the Treasury. Senator Ricci was born in 1876, he is a trained economist with business experience, and has been greeted as a real financial expert as well as a strong anti-Fascist. As Sindaco (Mayor) of Genoa in 1922, he played an important part in putting the city's finances in order and in directing public works. He was driven from the office of Sindaco by Fascism, but continued to be an active member of the Senate, to which he had been nominated in 1922, and was noted for his courageous criticism of Fascist financial policy both in public session and in committee. Although not formally attached to the Liberal Party, he is believed to be in sympathy with that party's policy.

Il Lavoro brought out a special edition on the 25th August publishing a telegram from Signor di Vittorio, President of the Italian Trade Union delegation now in the U.S.S.R. The telegram stated that the Deputy Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Lozovsky, had informed Signor di Vittorio that the Government had decided to repatriate all Italian prisoners-of-war, totalling about 19,000, in the U.S.S.R. The repatriation would take place as quickly as transport, which would be provided by the U.S.S.R., permitted. Di Vittorio added that the prisoners were in good health and well fed.

THE VATICAN.

In an audience granted to Sir D'Arcy Osborne, the Pope warmly praised Mr. Bevin's speech; but he put no trust in the assurances of fair elections, equal rights for Poles returning home and of lasting security for the Church in Poland. He had received no word from Cardinal Hlond since he reached Poland. Sir D'Arcy Osborne pointed out that the assurances had been given to and not by His Majesty's Government, though Mr. Bevin had said in his speech that failure to carry them out could spoil Anglo-Polish relations. The Pope was convinced that the position of the Church in the Balkans could not be more serious, and he was oppressed more than ever by his fear of atheistic communism combined with Russian imperialism. Speaking recently to United States Congressmen, he said that the peace and revival of the world was impossible if a single nation was left prostrate. See also under "Czechoslovakia."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Mr. Bevin's assessment of Hungarian democracy was received with considerable indignation and disappointment by the Communists and Social Democrats and with discreet satisfaction elsewhere. On the 19th August, just before the speech became known, the convocation of the Provisional National Assembly had been announced for the 5th September. The Assembly, it was said, would hear statements from the Minister President and Party leaders, legalise decrét-lois enacted since last December (including decrees enacted in connexion with the Armistice, and the Land Reform) decide (perhaps) the future form of the State, and debate the draft Electoral Law for the Constituent Assembly. All concerned were anxious that the Electoral Law (which Erdei, the Minister of the Interior has pledged himself to introduce) should be passed by Parliament, not enacted by decree. The elections would probably be held on the 28th October. The Communists have said that they will, if necessary, officially ask for early elections and are resolved that these shall be free and democratic.

The anticipation of elections overshadowed the Social Democrat, Smallholder and Bourgeois Democrat Party Conferences, all held on the 19th–21st August. The Communists had no Congress, but Rákosi in an important speech pleaded most vigorously for working-class unity, and suggested that at the local elections for Budapest, due to be held in September, the Communists, Socialists and Trade Unions should put forward a joint list. The Socialists seem reluctant to accept this, and at their Congress, while maintaining their alliance with the Communists, and laying much greater weight on this than their pact with the Smallholders, rejected the suggestion that the two parties should fuse. In short, they felt bound to continue as partners with the Communists, for fear of giving its chance to the "reaction" (which would be worse); but they did not conceal that the partnership was often uneasy, and would not give up such independence as they still possessed. For the rest, their domestic policy was: democracy now (with reassurances to provide capital), socialism later; their foreign policy orientation towards the Soviets. The Smallholders were distinctly belligerent. They held by the original programme of the Indeepndence Front, and were willing to maintain the existing coalition, but demanded that they be treated, within it, as equal partners, with proper respect for their interests; also requiring an early end to the purge, a strong central Government, and an end to abuses and excesses from quarters which were indicated plainly enough. The future of Hungary lay in democracy, but this must be the specific Hungarian form of democracy. They welcomed Allied assurances that Hungary would keep her national independence. The Democrats insisted on their right and their wish to continue members of the Independence Front.

The towns are again short of bread, and it is now stated that the present harvest will provide only 4 million quintals of bread-grains (about one-third of the minimum needs) for domestic consumption.

Inter-Allied negotiations for revision of the Control Commission Statistics are proceeding. Some American journalists have entered Hungary.

Roumania.

The way has not yet been found out of the difficulties in which Roumania found herself as a result of the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between her and the U.S.S.R. and the decision of the British and United States Governments not to recognise her present Government.

Following the communication of the United States to Bulgaria, the State Department indicated to Roumania its willingness to re-establish relations, but with a more representative Government in accordance with the Crimea declaration, either as a result of Roumania's own initiative, or with the assistance of the Allies. The King decided to interview the leaders of the various parties, in order to ascertain their views on a change of Government which would make the way clear for Allied recognition. As a result of interviews with Bratianu, Maniu, Stirbey, Petrescu and Sraier, the King requested Dr. Groza to resign so that the Government could be reconstituted. This step the Prime Minister refused to take. The Soviet Government expressed itself in the most categorical manner against Groza's resignation. With this support the Roumanian Communists naturally felt very sure of themselves and were appropriately truculent. They had "no intention of being colonised by the Western Powers." "The opinion of the United States Government is unimportant and can be disregarded." There is no need for Anglo-American interference: Russia can look after Roumania's interests."

On the 23rd August, the anniversary of the coup d'État which brought the Antonescu régime to an end, the King proposed to take part in a day of national thanksgiving. But when it became evident that it was the intention of the Government to convert this occasion into an N.F.D. demonstration, and when on top of this Groza refused to accede to the King's request for his resignation, the King decided not to take part in the proceedings. The American and British representatives on the Control Commission indicated that they would not be present. The demonstration took place on the familiar Roumanian lines, with organised applause and portraits of Stalin and others carried through the streets by the former Iron Guard rabble, now all convinced Communists. The proceedings were claimed as a spontaneous testimony to the popularity of the Government. The Military Governor of Bucarest refused to take part and was superseded by General Rascanu, the Minister of War. Fifty other officers declined to be present if the King was not, but one of these, the Commander of the Roumanian 1st Army, was browbeaten by General Rascanu into taking part. All Roumanian troops were deprived of ammunition, but the streets were filled with troops of the N.K.V.D. with tommy guns held at the ready.

Amongst the reactions to these proceedings is that of the Social Democratic party, a leftist party, but not wholeheartedly Communist, which declared that it could not agree to a Government which is not acceptable to the Three Powers, and that the Groza Government should resign. Fears are entertained for the safety of such leaders as Maniu and Bratianu. It is reported that General Radescu, the former Prime Minister who left the sanctuary of the British Legation on a guarantee that he would not be molested, has been placed under house arrest. That is the position of affairs at the moment of writing.

One of the first acts of the Soviet Government after the Armistice was to remove, without notice to the British and American members of the Control Commission, large quantities of material, mainly pipe-line and drilling equipment, from the oilfields. Protests were met by assertions that the material was war booty, by promises of further consideration, and of reference to Moscow, and by a variety of procrastinating dodges. And all the time the work of removal went serenely on, and the only point on which there was any semblance of meeting the arguments of the Anglo-Americans was that the Astra high-octane plant, which was in course of being dismantled, was allowed to remain and continue in production. Eventually, ten months after the first removals began, the Potsdam Conference decided to set up a Commission to discuss the matter. Action was to be taken within ten days. Needless to say, at the end of the ten days nothing had been done. The British and American representatives have now been nominated. In the hope of achieving some progress, the British and American representatives have agreed to aim at limiting the inquiry in the first place to certain well-defined questions. The usual complications arise over the interpretation of such expressions as "booty," "reparations," and "war trophies." The greatest difficulty is the question of what constitutes German property. When these difficulties have been surmounted, the problem of how to procure the return of the property looted from the British and American oil companies remains to be solved.

The confident hope expressed by the Potsdam Conference that representatives of the Allied press would enjoy full freedom to report to the world on developments in Roumania have not yet been realised.

Yugoslavia.

In its session from the 10th to the 26th August the Temporary Parliament achieved much legislation. As Kardelj truly said, "No Parliament of Yugoslavia has ever worked with anything like this speed." The list of Bills finally approved, 21st to 26th August, included the following:—

1. Constituent Assembly Bill, carried by 375 to 13.
2. Land Bill, carried unanimously.
3. Election of Deputies Bill, carried by 370 to 16.
4. Press Bill, carried by 358 to 17.
5. Military Courts Bill, carried unanimously.
6. Citizenship Bill, carried by 319 (4 abstained).
7. Charter of United Nations Bill, carried by acclamation.
8. Right of Association Bill, carried by 353 to 12.
9. Political Crimes Bill, carried by 326 (8 others present).
10. Organisation of Judiciary Bill, carried by 313 to 11.

The core of the minute opposition consisted of Grol and a few other courageous Serbian Democrats. They have incurred much abuse and ridicule. They opposed Bill No. 3 on the ground that the elaborate requirements for a technically valid list of candidates could be fulfilled only by the official party. They opposed Bill No. 1 on the ground that only elected representatives, and not a nominated body, could decide that the future legislature should consist of two Houses, based respectively on the principles of unity and of federation. The Government's reply was that since there are six Yugoslav peoples federation was essential. Bill No. 4 proclaims the freedom of the press, but adds a number of qualifications capable of very wide interpretation. It was criticised on the ground that the Government held all the available printing plant. Bill No. 6 denationalises the Yugoslavs who prefer not to return to Yugoslavia at present and provides for the nationalisation of nationals of other States, domiciled abroad, who apply. Bill No. 8 grants freedom of association, but "Fascist" or "pro-Fascist" parties can be forbidden and meetings (of which forty-eight hours' notice will be required) can be prohibited if dangerous to law and order. Concerning Bill No. 9, the Opposition asked that forced collaboration with the enemy should be distinguished from voluntary. The Government rejected the distinction.

Pijade, Vice-President of the Temporary Parliament, addressing the Front, said: "Anybody who is against the Front is against the State." And in Parliament he said that if the Constituent Assembly did not protect the gains won in the Liberation struggle, the army should be used to sweep the Assembly away.

In connexion with the Anglo-Saxon Powers' criticism of the Bulgarian and other régimes, there have been signs of official disquiet lest those Powers should also express disbelief in the independence of Yugoslavia.

The press has maintained its campaign against Allied Military Government, and has alleged much popular indignation in Venezia Giulia at A.M.G.'s dissolution, on the 15th August, of the Yugoslav-sponsored civil authorities. Incidents on the Trieste-Pola road, where Allied officers have been relieved of their arms or shot at by Yugoslav troops, have not ceased. Controversy rages between Communist and non-Communist Italian newspapers over the rumour that of the Italians who disappeared during the Yugoslav occupation of Trieste, many were thrown down a shaft at Basovizza on the Carso. A.M.G. have initiated scientific experiments with a view to rendering fertile parts of the barren Carso in the Allied-occupied zone.

Greece.

The Voulgaris Government, already strengthened by the publicly expressed support of His Majesty's Government (see Summary No. 307), has been further reinforced by General Merenditis's acceptance, on the 23rd August, of the post of War Minister. Both he and the new Minister of Justice have now publicly outlined their policy and programmes which should result in an accession of public confidence. General Merenditis's main task is the establishment of political impartiality as a military principle, a task which at once brings him into conflict with those members of the General Staff who, like General Ventiris, combine military efficiency with the unscrupulous promotion of the royalist cause. Their main instrument has naturally been the manipulation of officer appointments. Now, however, according to Athens radio, the War Ministry will control the army through the medium of the Supreme Military Council (which will include the head of the British Military Mission), whose main competence, and exclusive prerogative, will be the appointment of officers. The General Staff is to concern itself with the organisation and training of the army and with schemes for frontier defence. The War Ministry will supervise the revision of the active service and reserve lists of officers and vacant establishments will be filled by officers selected from both lists.

A summary of M. Kyriakopoulos's programme for clearing Greece's prisons, which received Ministerial approval on the 24th August, was broadcast the following day. More courts are to be established to try collaborators with a fixed date for the termination of their work; those imprisoned for offences committed during the E.L.A.S. rebellion are to be immediately released without trial if they have been six months in prison. Persons accused of non-political misdemeanours committed before the Varkiza agreement will, with a few exceptions, be released without trial, while those accused of crimes, other than murder, will be released on bail pending trial, and, if not brought to trial within two years, released altogether. Article 5 of the 1911 Constitution forbidding arrests without warrant, which under the Varkiza Agreement was temporarily suspended except in Athens/Piræus, is now to be in force all over Greece. The Government have found it impossible to meet the publicly expressed wish of His Majesty's Government for a general amnesty; feeling runs so high both among the relatives of those killed by E.A.M./E.L.A.S. before and during the December insurrection and among the Left-wing victims of collaborators that any more general release of prisoners would lead only to private acts of vengeance.

It is now possible to assess the reaction in Athens to Mr. Bevin's speech (see Summary No. 307). While all but the Communists welcomed British support against Yugoslav allegations concerning Macedonia, the Republicans are not satisfied with the promise of Anglo-United States-French supervision of the plebiscite and elections, since they claim that the electoral lists, &c., are being systematically falsified in the Royalist interest in the preparatory, unsupervised stage. The violence of the Communists' reaction is a measure of their disappointment. Zachariadis, the leader of the Greek Communist party, who is now visiting Northern Greece, went so far as to accuse the British Government of final responsibility for Right-wing terrorism and of applying a "colonial" policy to Greece; he asserted that British troops assisted "monarcho-Fascist" bands to oppress the Greek people, and reiterated his old assertion that if the British authorities in Greece so wished they could radically improve the situation in twenty-four hours. He was no doubt encouraged in this outburst by recent expressions of the Soviet attitude to Greek questions (for which see "Soviet Union").

The increasingly serious implications of the Government's inability to carry out their plans for the collection and distribution of olive oil will be dealt with in next week's Summary.

Bulgaria.

The first reports in Bulgaria of Mr. Bevin's speech omitted his references to the Balkans, and the full version was not published until the 22nd August. Meanwhile the British note had been presented to the Bulgarian Government. The press and wireless attributed the British and American attitude to insufficient knowledge about conditions in Bulgaria and to the "slanders" of the Petkovists. The Bulgarian Foreign Minister declared that, although the British and American notes were of great political significance, they could be regarded only as expressions of the opinions of the respective Governments. Although they implied a request for the postponement of the elections, such a demand could only be made through or by the Allied Control Commission, and unless one were received by midnight on Saturday, the 25th August, the elections would be held as arranged.

The election campaign continued unabated up to Saturday, and an official statement in the press of the 24th denied rumours of a postponement of the elections. Two of the new Ministers made speeches, as did the Organising Secretary of Zveno and two prominent Communists. A large public rally was arranged to be held in Sofia on the 22nd at which an important address from Georgi Dimitrov, whose resignation from the Supreme Soviet and relinquishment of Soviet citizenship had just been made known, was to be read and broadcast throughout Bulgaria. But when the time came it was announced that his speech could not be read "for technical reasons," and a message received from him two days later merely stressed the importance of the elections and asked for support of the Fatherland Front.

The atmosphere of melodrama was increased by the activity behind the scenes of the heads of the British and American Military Missions who had approached General Biryusov, Deputy Chairman of the Allied Control Commission. The outcome of their discussions at last was an intimation from the Bulgarian Government that they were prepared to postpone the elections, if so instructed by the Control Commission, and a note to that effect was sent from the Commission to the Government.

Shortly before midnight on the 24th, an official communiqué announced the postponement of the elections due to take place on the 26th. It was explained that the Government had come to this decision after serious consideration of the notes of Great Britain and the United States, and in view of their desire to facilitate the conclusion of peace. Fuller statements were issued afterwards by the Prime Minister and by the National Committee of the Fatherland Front, in which the latter frankly questioned the accuracy of the information supplied to the British and American Governments about conditions in Bulgaria.

An interesting sidelight is thrown on the election campaign, showing the importance attached to the military vote, by the instructions for electioneering in the Armed Forces which concluded with the warning that the efficiency of every assistant commander (political commissar) would be judged by the election results in his detachment.

For reasons of age and health, Nikola Mushanov and Atanas Burov, two former Ministers, who were sentenced as "war criminals" to one year's imprisonment in the Sofia trials last January, have been released from prison and placed under house arrest.

Turkey.

Mr. Bevin's speech of the 20th August on foreign affairs—particularly his references to Turkey, the Balkan countries and the Middle East—has been warmly welcomed in Angora. Official circles made no attempt to conceal their satisfaction, and press comment was wholly favourable. Ulus observed that whatever party might be in power in Britain—whether of the Left or Right—it bore the imprint: "Made in England." Mr. Eden's declaration that he would support the foreign policy of the new Government indicated that both Conservatives and Socialists would support democracy and oppose totalitarianism.

The postponement of the elections in Bulgaria has created an excellent impression in Angora. It is regarded as a victory for a policy of sense and moderation, and as a good augury for the persistence of inter-Allied co-operation.

The collapse of the Nazi régime and Turkey's recent close association with Britain and the United States have weakened—as they were bound to weaken—the attachment of her leaders to the one-party system. The movement for the adoption of a more democratic régime continues to gain ground. The press has devoted many columns to the subject. Ulus has recently expressed what may perhaps be regarded as the official view. It pointed out that there was nothing in the Turkish Constitution which precluded the formation of a second political party. Indeed, the founders of the Republic had never contemplated the establishment in Turkey of a dictatorial, single-party régime; they had, on the contrary, welcomed the formation of an Opposition. If the plans for it had failed, the blame was not theirs: failure had been due to the political immaturity of Turkey at the time. Ulus insisted, however, that the new party should be "republican in character" and should acknowledge the "self-imposed discipline of the Turkish nation." Turkish democracy could not be accused of being an enemy of freedom if it prohibited political parties which might disrupt the country. The movement towards democracy had not been possible during the war, but the field was now clear for a further advance. The Republican Party viewed with satisfaction the return to conditions favourable to the introduction of "the characteristics of Western democracy." Referring to the freedom of the press, M. Atay quoted Atatürk's dictum that "the evils which arose out of freedom of the press could only be vanquished by freedom of the press."

In conformity with the general fall in values, the Government has reduced the prices of a number of controlled commodities and products of the State factories. Vakit declared that coal was the only Turkish product which, in relation with world prices, was comparatively cheap.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Since the end of the war in the Far East, the Egyptian Government has had under consideration the abolition of the etat de siège (a modified form of martial law), which was proclaimed in Egypt in September 1939, and has been maintained ever since. Other matters connected with the end of the war are also being taken up by the Egyptian Government. The British expert attached to the quarantine administration in Alexandria has, for instance, been informed of the termination of his contract; while it is reported that all British members of the Egyptian police force will have to leave by the 1st September. Under the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936 the European element in the police force was to have been gradually eliminated by 1941, but owing to the war the Egyptian Government agreed to retain temporarily a limited number of British officials.

The death of Ahmad Ziwar Pasha, G.C.M.G., on the 21st August, removes from the Egyptian scene a well-known figure who, after serving in various capacities in successive Ministries, became "Chef du Cabinet Royal" to King Fuad in 1934. But he soon fell out of royal favour, and retired in the summer of 1935, since when he had not been employed in any Government capacity. He was chiefly famous for his amazing indiscretions and his predilection for European society.

Another well-known Egyptian whose death was reported last week was Shaikh Mohammed Mustafa al Maraghi, who was first appointed Rector of Al Azhar in 1928. A man of high character and enlightened views, his zeal for Islamic social reform had already found expression in proposals for changes in the Sharia law, and his draft law for the reform of the Azhar University was devised both to extend the horizon of the Azhari student, and to ensure him wider opportunities of employment on leaving the university. King Fuad, however, delayed signing the decree so long that Shaikh al Maraghi felt compelled to resign. He was reappointed Rector in April 1935, but again offered his resignation to King Farouk in 1943, as the result of Wafdist endeavours to undermine his position and to provoke unrest among the students. His resignation was, however, never formally accepted by the King, with whom he had considerable influence.

The Egyptian press reports the conclusion of a treaty of friendship between Egypt and the Yemen, providing for mutual diplomatic and consular representation at the "opportune time." If effect is given to this provision, it will be the first time that the Yemen has been permanently represented abroad, or a foreign State at Sanaa.

Considerable feeling has been aroused in Egypt by President Truman's statement on Palestine. Apart from the counter-blast issued to the local press by the Secretary-General of the Arab League (see Summary No. 307), Egyptian newspapers have expressed concern and indignation that the question of Palestine should have been discussed at all at the Potsdam Conference, where there were no Arab representatives present. The news has also upset Ibn Saud, who has asked the United States Legation at Jedda to clarify for his benefit the official American attitude to Zionism. In Iraq, too, sharp resentment has been expressed. The local press has protested vigorously against what it believes to be President Truman's strong support for a Jewish State, and the President's carefully balanced provisos are either overlooked or misrepresented.

The Lebanese Government resigned on the 20th August. Although, as reported in last week's Summary, the Chamber of Deputies recently passed a vote of confidence in the Government, the Cabinet's position was known to be unstable, and its resignation was not unexpected. On the 23rd August a new Ministry was formed, headed by Sami al Solh, a former Prime Minister who held office from July 1942 to March 1943. He is a well-meaning, impulsive, but fundamentally foolish man, whose extreme vanity makes him unreliable and a bad judge of character. On the 23rd he told the press that the foreign policy of his Government would not differ from that of its predecessor; and that he would continue to work for the "evacuation of Lebanese territory" (presumably by foreign troops), and the ratification of the United Nations Charter.

The Syrian Government has also resigned and a new Cabinet has been formed under the same Prime Minister, Faris al Khouri. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Jamil Mardam, has been dropped, but no change of policy need be expected.

The reaction to the end of the Japanese war shown by the people of Iraq has been disappointing. The surrender of Japan, like that of Germany, has been received by the general public in Iraq with a calm that can hardly be distinguished from complete indifference. On the other hand, the Amir Zaid, who has been acting as Regent during his nephew's travels abroad, was warm in his congratulations to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires on the Allied victory; and the Acting Prime Minister, no less than the Minister for Foreign Affairs (who has since resigned), paid eloquent and sincere tribute to Great Britain's efforts and sacrifices.

The situation in the Barzan area has not yet materially changed. Though Mulla Mustafa has gained some supporters, he has not, it is believed, succeeded in organising a substantial force. But one Iraqi column, engaged apparently in a foolish and ill-prepared venture, has already suffered 100 casualties, and there is no knowing what may happen if the many Kurds now sitting on the fence come down on the Mulla's side. We have strongly urged the Iraqi Government to concentrate on the occupation of Barzan, and not to indulge in any more of these ill-conceived diversions. It has also been made clear that in no circumstances can the Iraqi authorities count on British material assistance.

The Regent of Iraq, who has spent seven weeks in London on his way back from the United States of America and Canada, left this country on the 25th August, travelling overland to Italy. Thence he intends to proceed by sea to Turkey, where he is to pay an official visit, and after a few days at Angora he will return to Bagdad towards the end of September.

Mr. Bevin's statement in the House of Commons on the 20th August on the evacuation of Persia (see Summary No. 307) caused great gratification in that country; and Mr. Eden's strong support of the Secretary of State was also well received. The Shah and others have expressed satisfaction and relief at the British attitude; the only Persians who object are the small minority who expected the Labour Government in London to share the views of Moscow.

Persian nerves recently received a shock from which the public is gradually recovering, thanks in part to the hopes for the future instilled by the speeches of Mr. Bevin and Mr. Eden. On or about the 15th August a mutiny broke out among certain Persian officers and men stationed at Meshed, seventeen officers with twenty men deserting and taking with them motor vehicles, wireless apparatus, and arms and ammunition. They later disarmed a cavalry detachment, whose officers joined them. The whole band of mutineers was allowed to pass the Russian posts on the road without let or hindrance but later they came into conflict with a Persian gendarmerie post, and lost seven officers killed, two wounded, and all their material. Three of the deserting officers, with four men, were captured later. Fearing that this mutiny, coupled with recent disorders in Azerbaijan and incitements to violence in the press, might affect the volatile population of Tehran, the Military Governor issued a notice informing the public that the military government law would henceforth be strictly applied.

THE FAR EAST.

When, on the 15th August, the Japanese Emperor read the Imperial Rescript to the nation, accepting the Potsdam Declaration, it was the first time in the history of Japan that a Japanese Emperor had spoken to the nation on the radio. The most important passages of this Imperial Rescript were those dealing with the entry of Japan into the war and the atomic bomb. On the former subject the Rescript remarked: "Indeed we declared war on America and Britain out of our sincere desire to ensure Japan's self-preservation and the stabilisation of East Asia, it being far from our thoughts either to infringe upon the sovereignty of other nations or to embark upon territorial aggrandisement." On the atomic bomb the Rescript declared: "Moreover, the enemy has begun to employ a new and most cruel bomb, the power of which to do damage is indeed incalculable, taking toll of many innocent lives. Should we continue to fight, it would not only result in an ultimate collapse and obliteration of the Japanese nation, but it would also lead to the total extinction of human civilisation." It is hard to read into either of these statements any repentance for the Japanese entry into the war or any sense of normal military defeat.

According to the Japanese estimate the two atomic bombs dropped on Japanese cities killed 90,000 people. Japanese propaganda had made the most of the devastation caused and the great loss of civilian life. It is plainly implied that Japan was not beaten in fair fight, and that the army cannot really be blamed for the collapse. Nevertheless, the fact that Japan was unable to win the war is regarded as formally a responsibility of the people as a whole, who have failed their Emperor. A Domei broadcast thus described the scene in Tokyo after the announcement of the decision to accept the Allied terms: "The Palace grounds are quiet beneath the dark clouds. Honoured with an Imperial Edict from the sublime Palace grounds, a crowd of loyal people bow to the very ground in front of the Nijubashi Bridge. Their tears flow unchecked. Alas, how can the people raise their heads. With the words 'Forgive us, oh Emperor, our efforts were not enough,' their heads bow lower and lower as their tears flow unchecked."

The formal signing of the surrender was to have taken place on the 31st August on board an American warship in Tokyo Bay, but, owing to typhoon conditions, it has now been postponed till the 2nd September. The first American airborne troops landed in Japan on the 28th August.

A Domei transmission has reported that an Extraordinary Session of the Japanese Diet is to be convened on the 22nd September. During this session, it was stated, the Government would concentrate on "bringing home to the nation the stern reality that Japan had been completely defeated." Efforts would also be made "to promote freedom of speech," and "to rally the whole nation to the herculean task of rebuilding Japan on a new basis." Prince Higashikuni has already summoned the Presidents of the House of Peers and the House of Representatives to his official residence to make preliminary arrangements for the next session of the Diet.

Japan has still a Foreign Minister and a foreign policy. The Suzuki Cabinet, desperately hoping to keep the Soviet Union neutral, had as its Foreign Minister Togo, who was considered to enjoy more favour in Moscow than any other Japanese diplomat of high standing. The Soviet Union having entered the war, the new Higashikuni Cabinet restored Shigemitsu, who had held the post under Tojo and Koiso, and who had never been persona grata with the Russians.

While Moscow radio on the 24th August described the Higashikuni Cabinet as composed of "the most prominent war criminals, colonisers and members of the generals' clique," Tokyo radio broadcast in Russian on the 26th a strong protest against "regrettable events in China, Sakhalin and Manchuria." It was alleged that despite the surrender of the Kwantung Army "robberies and excesses" and "brutal acts of violence on the part of Soviet soldiers" were continuing in Manchuria, and that Japanese refugees in Sakhalin had been massacred. Imperial Headquarters also protested to General MacArthur against the Russians announced intention to land airborne troops in the Hokkaido. It is not clear whether a Russian occupation of the Hokkaido has been authorised by General MacArthur as Supreme Commander or not. It has been denied in Washington that the Allied occupation of Japan itself is to be by zones as in Germany, but if the Russians occupy the Hokkaido, while other Allied forces land in southern and central Japan, zones will in fact be established.

In contrast to the tension with the Soviet Union, the Japanese Government's attitude towards China is one of cordiality, and this attitude appears to be reciprocated from Chungking to an extent which is at first sight remarkable after eight years of warfare. In his first broadcast after taking office as Prime Minister, Prince Higashikuni said: "We must among other things make a clean sweep of the deplorable relations which have existed in the past between Japan and China, and build up a new society based on close co-operation between the two countries, without their being unduly influenced by victory or defeat." On the Chungking side there seems to be an awareness of the advantages of an arrangement with the Japanese forces in China more like a partnership than a surrender. As revealed in a remarkable Chungking broadcast of the 23rd August, the Chinese know that they are taking the surrender of an army more powerful than their own, an army which is substantially unbeaten in the field, and is laying down its arms only because of events which have occurred outside China. In addition to this, Chungking also knows that it has little prospect of establishing its authority as against the Communists in the areas which have been under Japanese occupation, unless the Japanese keep the Communists out until Chungking is ready to take over. In these circumstances the surrender negotiations between the Chinese High Command, headed by General Ho Ying-chin, Chief of Staff to the Generalissimo, and representatives of General Okamura, the Japanese Commander-in-Chief in China, which began on the 21st August, seem to have resulted in a measure of that Sino-Japanese co-operation which Japan has so long professed to be seeking. It was announced in Nanking on the 25th that the Japanese forces would continue to maintain order in all occupied areas, and would "guard against the activities of undesirable elements," i.e., the Chinese Communists. In Peking the Japanese military authorities have given full scope to the branch of the Chungking Ministry of Information which had previously been working underground, and have sent a sharp note to Yenan saying that the Japanese Army will take all necessary steps to prevent the Communists from "illegally" occupying such places as Peking, Tientsin and Tsingtao, and calling on them to cease trying to provoke civil war in China.

The text of the Chinese-Soviet treaty and supplementary agreements signed in Moscow on the 14th August was published on the 26th. The main treaty is one of alliance against Japan both during the war and subsequently. Article IV pledges each party not to conclude any alliance or "take part in any coalition" directed against the other. Article V binds the parties to mutual respect of sovereignty and territorial integrity and non-intervention in each other's internal affairs. In Article VI the parties agree to render each other "all possible economic aid in the post-war period." The treaty is valid for thirty years and is renewable.

The supplementary agreements cover six main points: (1) the principal railways of Manchuria—the old Chinese Eastern and South Manchurian lines—to be jointly owned by the Soviet Union and China for thirty years with a Soviet general manager; (2) Port Arthur is to be jointly used as a naval base by the Soviet Union and China, the former being responsible for its defence and the latter for civil administration subject to Soviet approval of the appointments; (3) part of the port of Dalny (Dairen) to be leased to the Soviet Union and the harbour chief to be a Soviet citizen; (4) the Soviet Union recognises Manchuria as a part of China and agrees that "the National Government of the Chinese Republic will assume all authority in civil matters" there as the territory ceases to be a zone of active military operations; (5) China agrees to recognise the independence of Outer Mongolia after a plebiscite affirming the Mongols' desire for it; (6) as regards "the recent events in Sinkiang," the Soviet Union declares it does not intend to interfere in China's internal affairs.

Success and failure are relative, and because of the extreme apprehension of future Soviet actions which has long prevailed in Chungking, the treaty appears to be regarded in Chinese official circles almost as a diplomatic victory. It specifies in one pasasge that the moral and material support promised by the Soviet Union are to be given to "the National Government as the Central Government of China," and this is considered a political defeat for the Chinese Communists. Taken as a whole, however, the treaty certainly belongs to the type which Chinese nationalism has hitherto denounced as unequal.

On the ground that it was covered by General MacArthur's order that Chiang Kai-shek should take surrender of all Japanese forces "within China," China proposed to nominate a representative to accept the surrender in Hong Kong, but after conversations between London and Washington, General MacArthur publicly announced on the 24th August that a British naval force under Admiral Harcourt would take Hong Kong's surrender. On the 24th August, just before the publication of the terms of the Chinese-Soviet treaty, Chiang Kai-shek made a speech to the Supreme National Defence Council in which he said that China had refrained from occupying Hong Kong in order to avoid misunderstanding between the Allies, though she would raise the whole question of Hong Kong through diplomatic channels. Referring to Indo-China, the northern half of which China is to occupy, as being within the China theatre of operations, he said that it should be given friendly help in its independence movement in the letter and spirit of the Atlantic Charter and the People's Three Principles. General Leclerc, the French representative with South-East Asia Command, has protested in strong terms against British or American acquiescence in the occupation of northern Indo-China by the Chinese, and has appealed to General de Gaulle, now visiting Washington, to intervene with the American Government. Meanwhile, if Chinese reports are correct, the Chinese have already entered French territory, and have arranged with the Japanese to occupy Hanoi in advance of Field-Marshal Terauchi's formal surrender to South-East Asia Command. A new "Government" of the Chinese-supported Annamite Revolutionary party has been formed in Annam, presumably as a result of Japanese-Chinese agreement, as the Japanese are still in control at Hue and no approval for the step has come from British or American quarters.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Lend-Lease, which was characterised by Mr. Churchill as "the most unsordid act in the history of the world," and which may prove to be one of Mr. Roosevelt's most successful innovations in creative statesmanship, has been terminated. President Truman has ordered the immediate suspension of shipments and other forms of relief under the Lend-Lease Act. The Prime Minister has stated, and this view has been fully endorsed by Mr. Churchill, that while His Majesty's Government had anticipated the end of Lend-Lease they had hoped that "the sudden cessation of this great mutual effort would not be effected without consultation and prior discussions." It is true to say that while the British have been surprised by the abruptness of the action taken, Americans as a whole are equally surprised that the British did not realise that Lend-Lease was only a war-time measure, and that the "abruptness" of its termination is due to the sudden end of the Japanese war. Our difficulties have come in for considerable notice, and there is increasing recognition of the fact that this country now faces the most serious economic future unless the United States continued to afford us assistance.

It is hoped, however, that consultations which have been suggested by Mr. Crowley, the Foreign Economic Administrator, will lead to some reconsideration of this situation and will assist the rehabilitation of our economic position, which must itself necessarily produce repercussions in the United States itself. In some quarters it has been suggested that the United States Administration might be "jerking the rug" from under the new Labour Government, thus presenting it with insurmountable economic difficulties. This view, however, has been hotly denied by the President. Lord Keynes has now left for the United States and Lord Halifax is expected to return there in a day or two. While there is, on the whole, considerable sympathy for the position in which this country, through no fault of its own, finds itself, there are also expressions of opinion that Britain is, to some extent, putting on an "act."

Interest in the King's Speech to Parliament, which was prominently reported, was a little overshadowed by the news from the Pacific. The majority of comment, with the exception of the extremists in both camps, insisted that the Government obviously proposed to approach Socialism "slowly and circumspectly." But American fears about the implication of a Labour victory have certainly receded, and the Government's programme has been received with unconcealed relief. In the opinion of the conservative Scripps-Howard press the Socialist programme has been diluted from "fire-water to tea without lemon."

On the other hand, Mr. Bevin's speech on foreign affairs aroused widespread interest from both press and radio, and important papers such as the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune reprinted the text in full. In general there is considerable praise for Mr. Bevin's forthright and unambiguous language, and particular pleasure has been expressed by many of the responsible middle-of-the-road papers such as the Washington Star, the Baltimore Sun and the New York Times, as well as by certain radio commentators, for the vigorous stand which Mr. Bevin took in favour of the freedom of the Balkans. This was felt to echo what is seen as the official United States attitude. "British commonsense," remarked Miss Dorothy Thompson, "is indestructible, and Bevin, like Left." Several newspapers made the comment that it was clear that Mr. Bevin, just Churchill, does not think a police State is progressive even if established by the as much as Mr. Churchill, had not been appointed a King's Minister to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire. But while there was considerable approval of the speech among Conservative and moderate opinion, which stressed the continuity and stability of British foreign policy, the Left wing and the Liberals were openly and deeply disappointed. These maintained that Mr. Bevin made a complete surrender to the worst part of Mr. Churchill's policy and "betrayed prejudice against the Soviet Union," while the Daily Worker went so far as to suggest that Mr. Bevin's address was an appeasement to American banking circles. As regards the Balkans, P.M. and its associates, who are a small though vociferous minority, accuse the British of playing into the hands of the Russophobes. The point most singled out for criticism by the extremists, however, was Mr. Bevin's passage on Spain, which was endorsed by President Truman, and his reference to Hong Kong—a colony which seems to have become the symbol of Britain's "ill-gotten gains." There was also disappointment at the omission of any reference to India and Palestine, concerning which Liberals had vaguely hoped for some change of British policy.

The Japanese "stalling" and the revengeful tone of the Japanese official statements and broadcasts have led to renewed uneasiness among Americans, and the general public is increasingly impatient with every sign of Japanese procrastination. The tenour of most comment has been admirably summed up by Van Devander's report of the Washington quip: "Do you think Japan's surrender is going to shorten the war?" However, concern has been considerably allayed by the nation-wide confidence in General MacArthur, by supposed indications that the delay is due to internal dissensions in Japan, and by the curt treatment accorded to the Japanese envoys in Manila. General MacArthur is being freely advised to "rub the Japs' noses in the dirt." The decision to retain the Emperor is accepted in all except Liberal circles, who draw parallels with earlier negotiations with Darlan and Badoglio.

This week has seen further changes in the State Department. On Friday Mr. Nelson Rockefeller made a speech at Boston denouncing the present Argentine Government. A day or two later, however, Mr. Rockefeller resigned his position as Assistant Secretary of State in charge of Latin American affairs, and, in his place, President Truman has appointed Mr. Spruille Braden, the United States Ambassador to Argentina. Mr. Byrnes, the Secretary of State, immediately issued a statement saying that Mr. Braden's appointment was "particularly a recognition of his accurate interpretation of the policy of this Government in its relations with the present Government of the Argentine. It would be his duty in his new post to see that the policies which he has so courageously sponsored in the Argentine are continued with unremitting vigour." Recently Mr. Braden was violently attacked in leaflets strewn in the streets of Buenos Aires, a campaign which he himself thought to have been instigated by foreign Nazi elements, and, on the face of it, his new appointment would seem to indicate that the United States attitude towards the Perón Government has considerably hardened. In place of Brigadier Holmes, who recently resigned as Assistant Secretary of State in charge of Administration, the President has announced, subject to Senate approval, the appointment of Colonel Frank McCarthy. Colonel McCarthy, who is only 33 years old, has acted as Liaison Officer between the White House and the General Staff, and in January 1944 was appointed Secretary of the General Staff. He will presumably be responsible for

LATIN AMERICA.

After the recent disturbances in Buenos Aires the Argentine régime continues afloat, though there are signs that suggest the sinking ship. The Finance Minister, Dr. Irigoyen, has taken his departure, because, according to his own version, an army officer had demanded that he should sign a decree or resign. The Government has since issued an explanation vindicating the attitude of the officer, said to be the Commissioner for State Railways. Dr. Irigoyen has been succeeded by Dr. Antille, a former Senator, who, like the new Minister of the Interior, was promptly expelled from the Radical party. The Foreign Minister, Dr. Ameghino, has since tendered his resignation; and his successor is Dr. Juan Cooke, also a Radical, and indeed the most prominent political figure who has yet been willing to associate himself with the present régime.

As a sequel to demonstrations following the Agricultural Show, the police raided and searched the Rural Society's headquarters, alleging that leaflets attacking the Government had been printed there. This baiting of the eminently respectable Rural Society enables Colonel Perón to keep up his attack on the "forces of reaction" and he has again addressed and received support from his tame Trade Unions, while the Government has announced its refusal to permit an opposition meeting organised by the Socialists and has warned persons "who might go innocently" not to be "embroiled in clashes with the police which extremists may provoke." Demonstrations against Colonel Perón have been staged by lawyers at the law courts and by university students.

While the atmosphere in Argentina thus remains tense and overcharged, the régime will find little consolation in the speech delivered by Mr. Nelson Rockefeller at Boston, in which he roundly accused the Argentine Government of failure to fulfil the undertakings made at Mexico City. Still less comfort will it find in the resignation of Mr. Rockefeller as Assistant Under-Secretary of State in charge of Latin American Affairs and in the appointment in his place of Mr. Spruille Braden, who, as United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires, has won his spurs at Colonel Perón's expense. UNITED NATIONS.

U.N.R.R.A.: Third Session of the Council.

The third session of the Council of U.N.R.R.A., which has been meeting in London, ended on the 24th August. This third session is notable for having brought U.N.R.R.A. through a crisis which threatened an untimely termination of U.N.R.R.A.'s activities. U.N.R.R.A. is now charged with additional commitments. It has been resolved that Austria, Korea and Formosa shall be dealt with by U.N.R.R.A. as liberated areas. But more significant is the extension of relief to Italy. A programme of assistance "adequate to meet the urgent needs of the Italian population" is to be set on foot. This assumption of liability for Italian needs, though strenuously opposed by certain delegations, notably that of Yugoslavia, was in fact a condition of the provision of the additional funds which are indispensable if U.N.R.R.A. is to continue in operation. Hitherto the burden of Italian relief has fallen exclusively on the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada; and to these Governments, themselves principal contributors to U.N.R.R.A., it has appeared only equitable that Italian relief should be included in the general scheme. The Council's agreement to this transfer accordingly smoothed the way for the resolution on additional contributions. The Council has recommended a second contribution by member Governments of approximately 1 per cent. of their national incomes; and the delegates of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada have expressed their intention of recommending to their respective Governments compliance with the Council's recommendation. This financial resolution provides also for the more stringent control of expenditure which, as noted in the preceding Summary, constitutes a necessary condition of further British contribution. Henceforward programmes of operations will be subject to approval by the Central Committee, which will be advised by standing committees charged with the task of reviewing the financial situation of receiving countries.

GERMANY.

SUPREME authority over Germany, which has been exercised de facto since the capitulation, was assumed de jure by the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union, and by the Provisional Government of the French Republic, in a proclamation signed by the Allied Control Council at its fourth meeting in Berlin on the 30th August and broadcast to the German people at eight o'clock the same evening. This supreme authority, the proclamation stated, would be vested in the Control Council for all matters affecting Germany as a whole, but all military laws, orders and decrees issued by the Commanders-in-chief for the administration of their respective zones would remain valid in those zones.

By far the most pressing problem which has to be tackled in the Russian zone at the moment is the accommodation of the several millions of homeless and dispossessed Germans who have streamed in from the East. At the eighth meeting of the Inter-Allied Kommandantur in Berlin on the 30th August, Colonel-General Gorbatov stated that measures were being taken to accommodate the refugees. Yet the Soviet authorities have admitted that it is only in Berlin and Dresden in their zone that the German population receives fixed food rations and that elsewhere it has to fend for itself. Under such circumstances the chances of the refugees obtaining anything like regular relief and assistance would appear to be extremely slender. No confirmation has been received so far of an alleged order by the German provincial administration expelling all refugees from Saxony by the 31st August, although the local authorities may be expected to take such drastic measures if they are left to tackle the problem with only their own very limited resources. In Brandenburg the provincial President, Dr. Steinhoff, has had to forbid local authorities to expel refugees who have been settled there for some time. The situation has now been complicated by the sudden decision of the Soviet authorities, announced on the 30th August, to demobilise and repatriate some 412,000 German prisoners of war. These are already drifting westwards with the refugees and adding to the difficulties of feeding the population in all the Allied sectors of Berlin. Several thousand Protestant clergy are also stated to have been evicted by the Poles along with other Germans from the East, and about 100 of them have been permitted to settle in Berlin.

A hint that the British and American zones of Western Germany should be thrown open to the refugees was given in a broadcast on the 29th August by the head of the Social Affairs Department of the Berlin City Council, Ottomar Geschke, who is also a leading member of the Communist Central Committee. The Russian zone alone, Geschke said, would be insufficient to accommodate them. Complaining that "there was no clear-cut central directive how and where the refugees are to be passed on," he added that much had been left to local initiative and that the only general instruction was to send the refugees as far as possible to the northern parts of Brandenburg and to Mecklenburg. Although Geschke made no specific mention of the fact, the Military Government authorities in the British zone of Berlin are doing all that is possible to alleviate the sufferings of the refugees who pass through. The Political Directorate of the Control Council is also studying, along the lines laid down by the Berlin Conference decisions of the 2nd August, the whole question of the transfer of populations from Eastern Germany.

The tendency of the Communist Party to seize the initiative in formulating economic policy for the local German administrations in the Russian zone has again been apparent in a number of statements made on the 29th August by Walter Ulbricht, of the Communist Central Committee, on the question of reconstruction. Ulbricht said that in the new order of priorities for the rebuilding of Germany the production of coal and synthetic petrol, the repair of communications and the manufacture of building materials and agricultural equipment would come first. Employers who failed to co-operate to the best of their ability would be "weeded out" by the works councils, which were playing an active part in getting the factories back into production. Considerable divergence of views between the Communists and the other parties, despite the apparent similarity of aims which the "united front" has produced, was revealed in the various statements which were issued on the sixth anniversary of war by the German political leaders in Berlin. Only Wilhelm Pieck, the Chairman of the Communist Party, conceded that the Germans as a whole were responsible for the acts of their late Nazi leaders and that they "had to atone for the many crimes perpetrated against their neighbours." Dr. Waldemar Koch, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, made no reference to the war guilt of anyone except Hitler, and complained that the Germans "had got rid of Hitler, but Germany has been dragged into the abyss." Even Otto Grotewohl, the Social Democrat, claimed that there were "hundreds of thousands who only accepted against their will the war into which they were driven by Hitler." The Communists in Berlin are said to view with considerable antipathy, and to regard as a possible "Trotskyist" opposition, a closely-related group of anti-Nazis who call themselves the "Organisation of Soviet-German Activists" (Organisation Sowjet-Deutscher Aktivisten). This group, which professes to desire good relations with the Soviet occupying forces and pays lip-service to the Communist policy of reconstruction, is led by a hitherto obscure individual by the name of Dr. Kurt Gessen, but has apparently organised some opposition to the Nazis in the course of the war.

At its three-day conference at Frankfurt, which closed on the 29th August (see also last week's Summary), the United States Military Government has been able to complete much useful stocktaking, both of actual material resources, and of the experiences so far gained by the officers most intimately concerned with the administration of the American zone. Among the notable pronouncements of the conference was an intimation by the Director of the Reparations and Restitution Division of the United States Group Control Council, Colonel L. W. Jefferson, that it would be the aim of the American authorities to remove entire factory units from Germany in payment of reparations, and that "no plant would be rendered useless because one or other of the four Powers requires only specific pieces of machinery." Other spokesmen of Military Government revealed that about 25 per cent. of the German population would be dependent on some form of public relief this winter; that public utilities would have to manage on about one-third of their normal coal supplies, with no coal whatsoever for ordinary domestic consumption; and that the value of the food rations distributed in the American zone at the moment varied between 940 and 1,200 calories per person daily and could not be increased to the desired level of 2,000 calories daily without the import of 1¼ million tons of wheat to supplement this season's harvest.

The possibility of holding some form of political elections in the American zone this autumn was mooted by General Eisenhower at a press conference after the meeting of the Control Council on the 30th August. At the same time the American Commander-in-Chief intimated that the number of United States troops in Germany would be reduced before the end of winter from the present strength of approximately 2½ million to a fixed occupation force of about 400,000, and although it was impossible to estimate the probable duration of the occupation, the Americans "did not expect to stay long." Permission to organise regular political parties in preparation for the return of self-government has now been granted by the United States Military Government authorities at Frankfurt-am-Main and Stuttgart. At Stuttgart, however, membership of the parties is to be confined to persons residing within the city limits.

More information is now available on last week's Fulda Conference of the German Catholic bishops, and gives some indication of the way in which the bishops are likely to make their influence felt in post-war Germany. The Conference was attended by all bishops in the British and American zones, as well as by Bishop von Preysing of Berlin, who was flown as far as Frankfurt-am-Main in an American aircraft. One of the main items of discussion was the validity of the Concordat which the Nazis concluded with the Vatican on the 8th July, 1933, and which the bishops so far regard as binding. They would, however, appear to be satisfied if the three previous Concordats which this replaced were recognised by the Allies. The bishops requested to be allowed to pay visits to Rome. They also decided on the early reorganisation of Catholic instruction in the schools and on the immediate foundation of a new Catholic press, and considered the establishment of a relief unit (Hilfswerk) to assist the German refugees from the East and Sudetenland. The Papal Nuncio, Mgr. Cesare Orsenigo, was in attendance at the Conference, although, as is customary, he took no part in the deliberations and it has been suggested that the bishops would not object to his recall. (He was a close friend of Ribbentrop.) Archbishop Joseph F. Rummel of New Orleans, a native of Baden, has been mentioned as a possible successor.

Two notable developments during the week in the reorganisation of the German Evangelical Churches are the reappearance of Pastor Martin Niemoeller as one of the leaders of a Church Conference held at Treysa, near Marburg, between the 27th and 31st August, and the return to the American zone of Germany of the distinguished Swiss theologian Karl Barth, who led the Protestant opposition to the Nazis in 1934. During his subsequent ten years stay in Switzerland, Dr. Barth is said to have been closely associated with the Swiss branch of the "Free German" Committee. In the course of an outspoken address to the Treysa Conference, Pastor Niemoeller warned both the Allies and the Germans that there could be no real guarantee of what might happen in the Reich in another twenty years from now. "The germ of Nazism," he stated "is not one with which the Germans alone were infected. It has spread so widely that you can never eradicate it totally." The form of democracy suitable for Germany, he added, had not yet been found. "Weimar made the mistake of choosing the French form of democracy rather than the American or British."

AUSTRIA.

The Allied Council in Vienna will be established shortly. The Russians began on the 1st September to withdraw their administrative officials from the British, French and American sectors of Vienna, and to hand over the administrative headquarters in each sector. The Western Allies will now be responsible for the practical administration of their own sectors, but the distribution of food from the pool of supplies which have been arriving in Vienna under the agreement reached at the meeting of the Allied Commanders-in-Chief on the 23rd August (see last week's Summary) continues to be a Russian responsibility throughout Vienna. Long-term supply arrangements for Austria and the use for this purpose of supplies from Austria, Hungary and Roumania will be discussed at the forthcoming meeting of Foreign Secretaries.

M. Fierlinger, the Czechoslovak Prime Minister, speaking on the 28th August, said that Czechoslovakia intended to collaborate closely with the Austrian and Hungarian Governments. His Government desired to respect the rights of Austrian nationals in Czechoslovakia, and had no intention of compelling all Austrians to leave. Those Austrians with dependants, for instance, would not be compelled to go. The rights of the "representative of the Austrian Government in Prague" were being respected, and "to all intents and purposes he is already exercising the functions of a Minister." There was an Austrian consul in Brno, Moravska Ostrava was supplying coal to the Austrian railways, and Czechoslovakia would soon receive crude oil from Austria. The economic relations of the two countries, concluded M. Fierlinger, would gradually develop in conformity with their needs as close neighbours.

On the 29th August, the Cabinet Council of the Renner Government decided that people of non-Italian extraction from the part of the South Tyrol ceded to Italy in 1919, who emigrated to Austria after 1939, and who have not changed their domicile since the 27th April, 1945, and who have acquired German citizenship, should be treated, if they so request, as though they had held Austrian citizenship on the 13th March, 1938. This ruling does not apply to Nazis. On the 1st September the Viennese paper Neues Österreich quoted a report from the Tiroler Tageszeitung (published by the French Military Government of the Tyrol), of a petition to the Allied Governments by the Bishop of Brixen (Bressanone) and all parish priests of the South Tyrol, declaring that the German-speaking and Ladin population of the South Tyrol wished for the return of the province to Austria. Neues Österreich also reported the existence of a "League of Tyroleans in Vienna," whose slogan is "From Kufstein to the Salurner Klause, the linguistic border. We do not want the Italian-speaking part of the Tyrol." On the 2nd September Radio Vienna reported, as from Innsbruck, that there would be a South Tyrol rally on the 4th September, with demonstrations in the major district towns. Special trains would be run, and the Landeshauptmann and other important people would speak at Innsbruck.

A further step in the breaking down of the barriers between the zones in Austria was taken on the 1st September, when postal communications between the United States, British and French zones were resumed.

An important extension of the powers of the Communist Minister of the Interior in the Renner Government is contained in a law passed by the Provisional Government on the 29th August on the control of newsprint. A permit for the supply of newsprint must be obtained from the Minister of the Interior, who will only grant it if the periodical is "politically or economically important enough to warrant publication." This obviously gives Honner complete control of all publications wherever the writ of the Renner Government runs in Austria.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The recently signed Presidential decree, when promulgated, will vest the legislative power for the whole of Czechoslovakia in the Provisional National Assembly. It authorises the setting-up of a Provisional Assembly with its seat in Prague and a single House of 300 members. To protect the interests of Slovakia, 100 will be Slovak; a majority of the votes of these members will be required to authorise any decision concerning the constitutional position of Slovakia. According to the decree, the Provisional Assembly will continue in office "until such time as the Constitutional National Assembly shall meet, elected by general, direct and secret elections based on the principles of proportional representation." Thus we have from the President's own desk a promise in black-and-white of return to the western democratic form of government.

The exact method of appointing members to the Provisional Assembly is still in doubt. Apart from conferring the vote upon all citizens over 18 and fixing the lower age limit for members at 21, the decree states that further regulations will be introduced concerning electors and candidates. A fear expressed is that the Communists might gain undue influence in the Provisional Assembly and prolong its life indefinitely. It is doubtful if such a plan is contemplated, all recent reports indicating that the Communist leaders have been taking a more moderate path—even to the extent of counteracting the younger Communists in U.R.O. (the Central Council of the Trade Unions). The most acceptable form of Assembly appears to be an all-party congress, each of the four political parties selecting an equal number of representatives from the already existing national committees and from such organisations as U.R.O. and the Youth Movement. The parties, if the National Socialists had their way, would be reduced to three by the disappearance of the Social Democrats, who would be forced to choose between the Socialists and the Communists. The Socialists have secured a victory quite recently in the re-election of their chairman, Dr. Zenkl, as Lord Mayor of Prague. Undoubtedly, too, the report that Jan Masaryk intends to remain in his post as Foreign Minister is a reflection of the growing confidence felt by the non-Communist groups.

On the 20th August, the Czechoslovak Government handed a note to the Polish Government complaining about the behaviour of their authorities towards the Czech minorities in the areas of Kladsko (Glatz) Hlubčice (Loebshutz) and Ratibor—all parts of Silesia to which the Czechoslovak Government intends to lay claim at the Peace Conference. (See Summaries Nos. 297–303.) The fact that Potsdam confirmed the continuance of Polish civil administration in these areas does not, in the Czech view, prejudice the Czechoslovak claim. The Polish administration is accused of attempting to remove the Czech minorities, thus invalidating the Czechoslovak ethnographic argument and weakening its case at the Peace Conference. The methods used are said to be arbitrary and brutal; the plunder and maltreatment of Czech nationals under the wretched conditions obtaining have resulted in many deaths and in flight across the frontier; and, if continued, such methods would lead to the devastation and devaluation of any territory which might eventually be transferred. Prague has, in a note addressed to Mr. Nichols on the 26th August, requested the assistance of His Majesty's Government. So far, this note is the only account of the incidents affecting the Czech minorities, which, it must be remarked, are not numerous.

In a press statement at Brno last week, M. Fierlinger dealt with his Government's relations with Austria and Hungary. He claimed that only a "final, orderly and friendly" transfer of the German and Hungarian minorities would remove the causes of friction which had persisted between the wars. In the meantime, he aimed at the closest collaboration with the two countries; economic life was already reviving, as for example the export of coal from Moravská Ostrava to Austria; the rights of Austrian nationals were being fully respected, except that their claims in the industries and banks fell under the nationalisation decree; the Austrian representative in Prague was, practically speaking, already functioning as Minister.

M. Fierlinger is expected to arrive in London on the 4th September for a short visit as the guest of His Majesty's Government. His party includes Jan Masaryk, the Foreign Minister, and representatives of the Ministry of Information and the Slovak National Council. Czechoslovak film representatives are also visiting London with a view to augmenting the very small supply of British films which have so far been able to reach Prague; this is only one aspect of the lively interest which Czechoslovakia is showing in strengthening cultural relations with the west, and indicative of the serious cultural famine in Central Europe which many years of Nazi suppression and perversion have produced.

POLAND.

Trade agreements were concluded during last month with Sweden (21st August), Norway (29th August) and Denmark (30th August). Poland undertakes to supply mainly coal and coke during the period October 1945 to April 1946, and is to receive from Norway and Denmark mainly agricultural produce and fish; from Sweden mainly iron ore, pulp and machinery. Poland will receive assistance in regard to means of transport.

The system of political parties in Poland seems to be slowly evolving. There is still opposition in the Christian Democratic ("Labour") Party between M. Popiel, who went to Warsaw from London, and M. Felczak, who belongs to the Lublin group. Provisional Government circles apparently hope that those National Democrats who are ready to take part in politics will help to strengthen the Christian Democrats.

The main bulk of the Peasant Party has recently re-established its organisation, as the "Polish Peasant Party," under the leadership of MM. Witos, Mikolajczyk and Kiernik, and has issued a programme which expressly includes "full co-operation with the Government of National Unity."

This development had been preceded by several attempts to form a united Peasant Party which would also include the Peasant Group in the Lublin coalition, headed by M. Banczyk. According to the latter, such a united Peasant Party is still hoped for. The organs of the "Workers" (Communist) and (Lublin) Socialist parties have accused the Polish Peasant Party of splitting the party and the Government Coalition. Actually there is no split, as the regular Peasant Party had not given its support to M. Banczyk and the group that joined the Lublin Committee.

It is hoped that arrangements for the repatriation of displaced persons and military personnel from western Germany will shortly come into operation. Repatriation from the Russian-occupied zone of Austria is reported to be almost complete.

SOVIET UNION.

The signature of the instrument of unconditional surrender by Japan was announced to the Soviet people by Generalissimo Stalin in a special broadcast on the 2nd September. The 3rd September was declared by a decree of the Præsidium of the Supreme Soviet to be a non-working day and a day of national celebration in the Soviet Union, as "the Day of Victory over Japan." In his broadcast Generalissimo Stalin stressed the uttter defeat of Japan by land and sea and recalled the "special accounts" his country had to settle with Japan dating from her treacherous attack on Port Arthur in 1904 to the Lake Khasan and Khalkin-Gol conflicts in 1938–39. In particular, he dwelt on the Japanese occupation of the Soviet Far East in 1918, and the advantages then gained by Japan owing to "the hostile attitude of Britain, France and the United States towards the Soviets." He claimed that, as a result of the defeat of Japan, Southern Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands would now pass to the Soviet Union to serve "not as a means of isolating the Soviet Union from the ocean and as a base for a Japanese attack on our Far East, but as a means of direct communication for the Soviet Union with the ocean and as a base for the defence of our country against Japanese aggression." In the name of the "few veterans of 1904" surviving, Lieut.-General A. A. Ignatiev, in another broadcast, hailed the destruction of predatory Japanese imperialism and the elimination of the Russian people's heavy memories of former defeat. (General Ignatiev was a young officer in the Tzarist Army during the Russo-Japanese war which he described in his recently published "A Subaltern in Old Russia".) A full account of the surrender ceremony in Tokio Bay and President Truman's speech (including his references to the atomic bomb) was broadcast on the 2nd September. Many Soviet press articles on the Far Eastern situation last week dwelt on "the ideology of the Japanese Samurai" and the necessity for the Allies to enforce complete moral and political defeat on Japan. "The voice of the Japanese people has not yet been heard" declared Pravda (2nd September). Articles in Krasnaya Zvezda described the difficulties overcome by the Soviet forces landing in the "strongly fortified Kurile Islands"; Japanese atrocities on Soviet soldiers as well as the civilian population of Korea and Manchuria were also frequently mentioned.

Criticism of the policy of His Majesty's Government as outlined in the Foreign Secretary's speech of the 20th August still figures prominently in the Soviet press. Further critical comment on the recent House of Commons debate, with special reference to Spain, South-Eastern Europe and the suggestions that the Governments of Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary do not represent the majority of people, also appeared in Izvestiya. A Tass message from Stockholm (27th August), published in most papers, summarised a leader in the Communist daily Ny Dag criticising Professor Laski's attitude regarding Dmitroff's return to Bulgaria, and the Labour Government for defending Fascists . . . . "contrary to expectations." In contrast to the publicity given to British foreign policy, the Soviet press devotes little attention to British post-war economic problems apart from brief factual reporting of recent lend-lease statements. So far the internal programme of the Labour Government, including the nationalisation proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has not even been mentioned in the Soviet press. As already reported (see Summary No. 307), American post-war economic difficulties loom large in the Soviet press. The general impression given to the Soviet public, therefore, is that the Soviet Union alone among the Great Powers can face post-war economic problems with confidence.

The appeal for "closer bonds than correct diplomatic relations" among the Western nations which concluded the analysis of the political differences between Western and Eastern Europe in two recent articles in The Times on "The New Europe" (written by a correspondent, not the diplomatic observer of The Times as reported by the Soviet press), received very rough handling and considerable abuse from Soviet critics. The garbled version of these articles presented to the Soviet public ignored the sympathetic historical analysis of "eastward" trends in South-Eastern Europe, and accused The Times of acting as the mouth-piece of the British Conservatives and preparing public opinion for the creation of a Western bloc to act as a new cordon sanitaire against the Soviet Union. Finally, the articles were said to reflect the struggle for a revision of the Potsdam and Yalta decisions, waged by certain circles in the interests of international monopolies. However unjustified, these polemics may be regarded as a further indication of Soviet anxiety about the possibility of the consolidation of progressive democratic forces in western Europe under Anglo-Saxon leadership.

Instead of the usual evening bulletin on the 29th August, Moscow wireless broadcast a list of the twenty-four war criminals to be tried at Nuremberg, with short biographical notes and a brief account of the four-Power talks which led to the formation of the War Crimes Commission. Commenting on this first list of war criminals, Pravda stated that it represented the three pillars of Hitlerite Germany: the Nazi Party, the generals and the plutocracy. "Punishment is not simply retribution," concluded Pravda, "it is justice and the peoples expect and demand its speedy relentless execution."

The spate of material concerning the alleged "capitalist-monarchist terror in Greek Macedonia" (mostly quotations from the Yugoslav press) continues to appear in the Soviet papers. Izvestiya (30th August) describing its special correspondent's tour in Yugoslavia mentioned a visit to "Burkes village, which has become the home of more than 4,000 anti-Fascist Greek exiles and refugees." The correspondent was asked (according to Izvestiya) to report the disappointment of those Greeks who had fought the ideals of the United Nations, and their gratitude to Marshal Tito for granting them sanctuary. Fifteen thousand were alleged to be in Yugoslavia and many thousands in Bulgaria.

An Albanian anti-Fascist Youth Delegation is now visiting the Soviet Union, and has left for Baku after spending two weeks in Moscow. While in Moscow this Delegation was brought in touch with a Delegation from the Democratic Delegation of Finnish Youth, also visiting Moscow at the same time.

On the resumption of diplomatic relations between the U.S.S.R. and Roumania, an agreement was concluded for tranforming the Soviet Legation in Roumania, and the Roumanian Legation in the U.S.S.R. into Embassies and to raise the Ministers to the rank of Ambassadors, according to a Tass message of the 28th August.

The Soviet press for the 21st August reports that by an order of the People's Commissariat for Trade, prices for foodstuffs in commercial shops in Moscow, Leningrad and other towns of the centre and north are to be reduced by an average of fifteen per cent. from the 21st August. Commercial shops are also to reduce prices on a number of other commodities from the 21st August. Enamel and aluminium kitchen utensils will be 50 per cent. cheaper, cosmetics 34 per cent., electrical appliances 26 per cent., men's shoes 20 per cent. and ready-made woollen clothes 15 to 20 per cent. In spite of these reductions, Soviet prices for food and other consumption goods in the commercial shops will remain relatively high.

SCANDINAVIA.

Dissatisfaction at the slowness of the purge in Denmark makes it increasingly doubtful whether the Coalition Government can survive in its present form until elections are held. The two Ministers representing the Dansk Samling Party have stated that they will leave the Government unless a Bill for the confiscation of war profits is introduced within a few days, and the other Ministers from the Resistance Movement are said to be pressing for such action, though they may not be prepared to resign on the issue. Recent appointments by M. Christmas Møller at the Foreign Ministry are also tending to undermine confidence in the Government.

The Danish Conservatives propose in their election programme joint Scandinavian citizenship and self-determination for the Faeroese people. M. Christmas Møller has rejoined the Conservative Party though he has refused the chairmanship.

The Danish Council in London held its final meeting on the 29th August.

Sentence of death on Quisling was demanded by the Norwegian Public Prosecutor on the 31st August. According to a document prepared by Quisling's Minister of Commerce in March 1944 and discovered by the prosecution, Germany received from Norway during the occupation goods to the value of 2,000 million kr., apart from those delivered to the army of occupation, while Norway received from Germany goods to the value of 393 million kr.

On the 28th August, the Constitutional Law Committee of the Finnish Diet received the opinion of the Supreme Court on the War Guilt Bill. This opinion is believed to be unfavourable, and it is interesting in this connexion to note that, according to an unconfirmed report from Copenhagen, the President of the Supreme Court, M. Neovius, has resigned from his post as a protest against the unconstitutional nature of the Bill. Three days later the Committee completed the first reading of the Bill, the scope of which, reports say, it intends to enlarge. No final decision has, however, been made and no further details are available.

The British Labour Party's telegram, on the 28th August, to the Finnish Social Democratic Party was received with enthusiasm. It is easy to understand that the Social Democrats, who, in contrast to the Democratic League, do not enjoy any support from abroad, should have been pleased by this friendly gesture from the Party which recently attained power in Great Britain.

The appointments of the Minister of Communications and Public Works, M. Vuori, and the Minister of Agriculture, M. Jutila, as Finnish Ministers to the Court of St. James's, and at Washington respectively, are a little surprising. Neither is a diplomat by profession, and it can, therefore, only be assumed that as these posts are regarded as key positions by the Finns, it has been the desire of the Finnish Government to appoint men with exceptional understanding of Finland's present-day problems. In the case of M. Vouri, the thought that his appointment was influenced by the result of the British Parliamentary Elections readily presents itself to the mind.

LOW COUNTRIES.

In a statement on the first phase of the general monetary reorganisation in the Netherlands, Professor Lieftinck, the Minister of Finance, has announced that the withdrawal of the 100 fl. notes had reduced the note circulation by 1,750 million fl. At the same time the measure had caused the public to hand in to the banks hoarded notes of other denominations, the total result being a drop in circulation from about 5,000 fl. to about 2,700 million fl. (The 1939 figure was 1,000 million fl.) A larger circulation was, however, necessary in view of the fact that the price level had risen by 50 per cent. With the increase in deposits the banks had been able to purchase large amounts of Treasury paper, thus greatly strengthening the Treasury's position and enabling it not only to redeem Treasury paper directly entrusted to the Netherlands Bank amounting to 600 million fl. at the beginning of July, but also to clear an advance of 13 million fl. creating instead a credit of 309 million fl. Referring to the difference between bank note and total money circulation, the Minister pointed out that the only real reduction in the latter was represented by the value of the withdrawn notes not handed in, which, on the 20th August amounted to about 500 million fl. The national debt, the Minister stated, had risen during the war from about 5 to about 23 milliard florins.

Vice-Admiral Helfrich has been promoted to the rank of Lt.-Admiral and appointed Commander of the entire Royal Netherlands Navy in succession to Lt.-Admiral Furstner, who has been honourably discharged on his appointment as a member of the Council of State.

The position of M. Spaak, the Belgian Foreign Minister, has been greatly strengthened both at home and abroad by his success in winning the support of the opposition in the Senate debate on foreign affairs, at the conclusion of which a vote of confidence was moved by the chief opposition spokesman, M. Nothomb, was carried unanimously. Dealing first with the economic aspect of Belgium's foreign relations, M. Spaak announced that he would shortly be accompanying M. Kronacker and M. Gutt to the United States to discuss the problem of Belgium's Lend-Lease position (see last week's Summary). The financial negotiations with France, the Netherlands and the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg were on the point of completion. M. Spaak emphasised that Belgium's desire for close association with her neighbours in the defence of Western European security must always be considered as falling within a system of world security which provided the only real assurance of peace. The debate on the bill for the ratification of the San Francisco agreements would take place the following week. Negotiations for the establishment of a Belgian sector in the British zone of occupation in Germany were in progress. Discussing the question of reparations, M. Spaak pointed out that Belgium's case would have to be dealt with in conjunction with that of all the other Allies. A mission would shortly be leaving for Berlin to put forward Belgian claims. These would not include any demand for large-scale annexation of German territory, but would be limited to the request for certain frontier adjustments, and for a share in the international exploitation of the Ruhr and in the electric power resources, the products of the forests and of the coal and the lignite mines adjacent to her eastern frontier.

FRANCE.

General Leclerc signed on behalf of France when the Japanese surrender was formally received by the Allied leaders in Tokyo Bay on the 2nd September. The position in Indo-China, however, appears to be causing some anxiety in France. French Indo-Chinese troops under the command of General Alessandri are accompanying the Chinese troops of occupation into northern Indo-China (see last Summary under "Far East"), and Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu is shortly to arrive in the country at the head of a body of colonial administrators now waiting in Ceylon, while a French expeditionary force is also being prepared in Madagascar. But it is admitted that there is a certain amount of anti-French agitation, fostered by the Japanese, particularly in Annam. In Laos loyalty to France appears to be strengthened by the hope of regaining the provinces lost to Siam in 1941, and the French Government is taking a firm stand on this issue, which it wishes to settle directly with the Siamese Government.

General de Gaulle arrived in Ottawa from Chicago on the 28th August, and on the following day he held a press conference, had conversations with Mr. Mackenzie King and attended an official luncheon given by the Governor-General. On the 30th he arrived back in Paris by plane and later reported to the Cabinet, emphasising particularly the long discussions on economic questions and the arrangements made for the grant of long-term credits amounting to 650 million dollars by the United States and for Canadian economic assistance to France.

Official circles in France continue to be preoccupied by the German problem. M. Bidault, accepting the Foreign Secretary's invitation to the Conference of Foreign Ministers in London, has stated that the French Government considered that the problems of occupation and control of Germany should take first place on the agenda of the Conference.

After meetings called in Paris by the Confédération Générale du Travail (C.G.T.) it was agreed to send a delegation representing the Radical, Socialist and Communist parties and the C.G.T., led by M. Léon Jouhaux, to General de Gaulle to ask him to substitute for the proposed voting system in the general elections a more complete system of proportional representation. General de Gaulle, however, refused to receive the delegation on the ground that such a political démarche did not lie within the scope of activity legally allowed to the C.G.T. On the question of the referendum and the Constituent Assembly (see Summary No. 306) the Communists, Socialists, Radicals and Mouvement Républicain Populaire have now defined their attitude; only the Radicals will vote for a return to the 1875 Constitution; the Socialists and M.R.P. will vote "yes" to the second question proposing a Constituent Assembly with limited powers, but the Communists will vote against it.

The Communist Party Central Committee has passed a resolution regretting the Socialist rejection of its proposals for fusion but agreeing to united action by the two parties at the forthcoming elections (see Summary No. 307).

A satisfactory agreement signed on the 29th August has been reached between the British and French Governments for the restoration of the bank balances and other property previously held by the Custodian of Enemy Property and his French equivalent.

Following on M. Pineau's optimistic pronouncement of the 23rd August (see last Summary), the Cabinet decided on the 28th to raise the prices of potatoes, sugar-beet and wine, and to grant bonuses for quick delivery of wheat. The present system of quotas for deliveries of meat is to be abolished from the 1st October for all farmers who have met their obligations by that date, and farm meat prices will become free again. The monthly fat ration will be raised from 500 to 600 gr. from the 1st October. It is even hoped to abolish bread rationing in November. In consequence of these decisions black market prices for meat and fats are said to be falling.

SWITZERLAND.

A Swiss hospital train carrying the last few hundred Russians who were too ill to go with the main body of the repatriates, left Switzerland on the 30th August. The hope was expressed that the return journey might be utilised for the repatriation of Swiss at present in Russia.

The deportation of Nazis and Fascists continues hampered, but it is by the large numbers of appeals that have been lodged against the expulsion orders. A Socialist resolution has been forwarded to the Federal Department of Justice and Police demanding the immediate internment in labour camps of those whose appeals have not yet been heard. Countess Edda Ciano, whose presence has been the subject of prolonged and vehement criticism from the Swiss Left Wing, left the country via Chiasso during the night of the 29th August. She was received at the Italian frontier by American military authorities who will hand her over to the Italian Government. This, however, has been described by the Swiss authorities as a case of repatriation rather than expulsion.

At the Swiss Abroad Congress, Federal Councillor Petitpierre, head of the Political Department, stated that the war had caused the death of 376 Swiss living abroad, while another 55 were missing; 2 had been executed in Germany, and 10 in France; 16 had died in prison. Many thousands of Swiss in Central and Eastern Europe were to-day cut off from contact with their own country. The Federal Council was occupied with the question of obtaining indemnities for the losses sustained by Swiss living abroad, but the problem was proving a very complex one. So far about 35 million Swiss francs had been spent on relief for Swiss returning from abroad.

The Swiss Relief Organisation has been active in supplying help for the stricken countries. Food has been sent to Austria, mainly for children and invalids. A consignment of food and medicines will leave in a few days for Hungary. A vessel chartered by Switzerland has left Genoa for Lisbon, where it will be loaded with food-stuffs belonging to Switzerland, which are to be conveyed to Italy for the alleviation of the population's distress. A welfare mission of the Swiss Help-for-Poland Organisation, taking with them medical equipment and supplies, left St. Margrethen on the 30th August to visit Polish prisoner-of-war camps in Austria and South Germany.

SPAIN.

General Franco has called a meeting of the Spanish Cabinet for the 7th September. Troubles there are in plenty, apart from the question of Tangier. The prolonged drought in certain regions has created serious unemployment, and evidence of growing economic distress accumulates. There is the Republican Government set up in Mexico City, which the Caudillo may affect to ignore for the moment but which casts its shadow over the future. And the new upsurge of Monarchist sentiment which is reported from the chief Spanish capitals is a sharp reminder that there are forces inside Spain capable of deciding, after the Potsdam Declaration and Mr. Bevin's statement, that the Head of the State has outlived his usefulness.

It is now known that three weeks ago General Franco took the initiative in reopening negotiations with the claimant to the Throne. First the distinguished Catalan, Señor Mateu (de facto Spanish representative in Paris and Ambassador-elect against the time when and if Franco-Spanish relations emerge from their present negative state) went to Lausanne with certain proposals which Don Juan, apparently, brushed aside. Then Señor J. M. Oriol Urquijo, a Basque industrialist and former Civil Governor of Bilbao, was summoned by the Caudillo and asked to convey to Don Juan a definite invitation to return to Spain so soon as satisfactory arrangements for the change-over to the Monarchy could be made. It was understood that the Falange Party would first have to be formally dissolved. The support of the army for this plan, said the message, was assured. General Franco wanted only some guarantee that his work would be continued, and that he himself be allowed to live on quietly in Spain in some honorary capacity.

The reports brought back by these two emissaries must have been somewhat chilling. Don Juan, advised by Señor Lopez Olivan, has, it appears, rejected a suggestion for a personal meeting, and has demanded a formal renunciation of their powers by Franco and his principal associates. He insists, that is to say, on a clean cut. In his laudable desire to avoid civil war Don Juan is said to be thinking in terms of a "caretaker" Government—a military junta—which would institute within three months free elections for a Constituent Assembly combined with a plebiscite on the issue of Monarchy or Republic. Some such procedure is undoubtedly the best, if not the only, chance for establishment of a stable Monarchist régime. Whether the timorous Generals will be prepared to play that hand remains to be seen. Everything depends on them. Nothing in Franco's past behaviour, in any case, suggests that he will accept what is tantamount to dismissal.

And now, just at the right moment, Franco has secured a powerful reinforcement in the shape of a Pastoral Letter (on the occasion of the end of the war) by the Primate of Spain, Mgr. Pla y Daniel, which has an uncommonly political flavour. This document, published in all Spanish papers on the 2nd September, offers first a solemn assurance on the part of the prelates and the community of the faithful that, whatever the critics may say, the Church in Spain maintained during the war "the most perfect neutrality." Then comes a long passage regarding the political evolution of the country and the final form (estructuración) which the Spanish State should assume. It would be well, writes His Grace, to eliminate from the Spanish State anything that might give ground for distrust of external forms, even when the spirit was different. The country should not, however, be exposed to violent political fluctuations which would lead her to chaos, though new channels should be opened for the expression of legitimate opinions. And facilities should be given for the return to Spain of all Spaniards who would not disturb the peace of the country: past "responsibilities" should be considered as cancelled. These Christian sentiments are unexceptionable, but they do not go further than General Franco's own professions. Once again, "mucho ruido, pocas nueces," even though the nuts be archiepiscopal. (See also "Latin America.")

TANGIER.

The Final Act embodying the conclusions of the Paris Conference on the subject of Tangier (see Summary No. 306), together with an Anglo-French Agreement providing for restoration of the international status of the Zone, was signed by representatives of the four Powers—France, Great Britain, United States and the Soviet Union—on the 31st August. This Agreement contains (a) particulars of the proposed Interim International Administration, scheduled to come into force on the 11th October next, (b) an invitation to the United States and Soviet Governments to participate in the provisional régime, and (c) arrangements (set forth in Resolution I of the Final Act) for summoning a Conference of all the Powers signatory to the Act of Algeciras, to be held in Paris within six months from the 11th October, to consider any necessary revision of the Statute of 1923 or changes in the pattern of the International Administration on the understanding, however, that the conference will be postponed if the present Spanish régime is still in power (see last paragraph below). The signatory States not represented in the conference which has just concluded—Belgium, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Sweden—have been duly notified of these decisions and have been informed that the Franco-British Agreement is open to their adherence. It is contemplated that the principal administrative posts under the provisional régime shall be filled by nationals of those Powers having least direct interest in the Zone.

The text of the Agreement was communicated to the Spanish Government on the 4th September. General Franco is requested to make the necessary arrangements for termination of the present régime and for transfer of all the functions of the present Spanish administration to the Committee of Control redivivus. Participation of the Spanish Government in the Interim Régime is assumed. His Majesty's Government regard such participation as necessary (a) for the sake of legal continuity—reversion to the status quo being a necessary preliminary to any future modification of the Statute, (b) because of the considerable Spanish interests in the Zone, and (c) for the severely practical reason that Spain has responsibility for provisioning the Zone, and, should that duty devolve on Great Britain and the United States, it would be an embarrassing addition to their supply commitments in liberated Europe.

It was not found possible, however, to obtain the concurrence of the Soviet Government in this view. The Russians have therefore inserted in the Final Act a Declaration setting out their view that Spain should not participate in the administration of the Tangier Zone until General Franco's régime has been replaced by a "democratic" régime. The Act also includes a separate Declaration by the other three Powers, showing that they, too, are by no means oblivious of the Potsdam communiqué and indicating that there will be a postponement of the full Conference if General Franco is in fact still in power at the end of the six months' period. There would seem to be no difference of opinion with the Russians on the question of a Spain which had shed the Franco régime taking her due share in the future international administration of Tangier. Incidentally, in deference to Spanish susceptibilities, the Final Act is not being communicated officially to the Spanish Government.

ITALY.

At a press conference in Rome on the 27th August, Signor Parri, the Italian Prime Minister, gave his views on the holding of elections in Italy. Signor Parri is clearly of the opinion that it would be a mistake to hold the election to the Constituent Assembly before the Peace Treaty is signed or before Italy has a satisfactory international status. Signor Parri went on to say that he, personally, felt that certain conditions were necessary before the Constituent Assembly could be summoned. Not only does Italy need to attain to international status but the technical details of an election must be thoroughly prepared, since, for the first time, all citizens above a certain age, including women, would vote. This would raise the electorate to the imposing figure of 30 millions. Moreover, a free and honest election must be guaranteed, and this could only be done if the political parties would pledge themselves to co-operate to this end. For these reasons it was extremely difficult to fix a date but, said Signor Parri, not only the Government but he personally, was pledged to hold the election to the Constituent Assembly at the earlier possible moment. Signor Cattani, the Secretary-General of the Liberal Party, in a statement to the press, raised another difficulty in the way of holding the election this autumn. Signor Cattani expressed his gratification at Mr. Bevin's statement that the problem of the repatriation of the Italian prisoners of war can be solved because, in Signor Cattani's opinion, it would be impossible to hold an election of such importance while a million young men were out of the country and because time would in any case be needed for them to get a balanced view of the situation in Italy. According to Signor Cattani the preparatory work for the holding of the election has hardly begun nor has a start been made in drafting the necessary electoral laws. This, in conjunction with the lack of communications and of public order, precluded any possibility of holding the election this autumn.

A statement issued by the United Press in Rome to the effect that His Majesty's Government would invite the Council of Foreign Ministers not to proceed with the consideration of the Italian Peace Treaty until there existed an Italian Government elected on a democratic basis has been categorically denied by the British Foreign Office.

On the 1st September Signor Parri addressed the Congress of the Committees of National Liberation held at Milan and dealt with a large number of problems. In reference to the Committees he said that he did not believe that they constituted a threat to the authority of the State, for they were mainly concerned in carrying out tasks of a provisional nature. They must recognise the limits of their powers; final responsibility belonged to the State. Co-ordination between local, provincial and regional committees was essential, and they could only carry out their tasks if they transcended Party differences. Discussion in the Congress emphasised the importance of free elections and linked with this the demand for the surrender of hidden arms before elections were held. Both points were taken up by Signor Parri, who declared that the Constituent Assembly would be the crowning point of the struggle of the National Liberation Movement, but added that he would be the first to quash an election vitiated by violent pressure or threats: "a freely-elected Constituent Assembly is a pledge of honour for the Government, for me and for the whole country."

Signor Parri also spoke of the over-centralisation of the Italian State, and said that the Government was still working with machinery inherited from Fascist and pre-Fascist days, machinery which could not be transformed overnight.

Signor Parri returned to the question of excessive centralisation in a speech which he made to a delegation from the Val d'Aosta at Turin on the 2nd September. He said that the grant of autonomy to the Val d'Aosta was bound to evoke similar demands from other parts of Italy, and mentioned specifically Sicily, Sardinia and Venezia Tridentina. This last region had good reasons for asking for autonomy, and the Government would endeavour to ascertain its real needs.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Hungarian-Soviet Trade Agreement was signed in Moscow on the 27th August. The Hungarian signatories were the Ministers of Industry (Social Democrat) and Communications (Communist). It is, however, subject to ratification. Valid for five years, it provides for a reciprocal exchange of goods to the value of 30 million dollars between September 1945 and December 1946. Hungary will receive fertilisers, raw materials for her metal industries and textile raw materials, and will supply finished textile and other products. The agreement also provides for "economic collaboration" which takes the form of most far-reaching Soviet participation in and control of Hungarian industry, oil and coal production, communications and banking.

The Soviets have announced that they will repatriate to Hungary all Hungarian prisoners of war except those who served with the S.S., &c. Some thousand prisoners "who during their captivity learned the Soviet Union's true character, so often maligned by reaction," are apparently on their way. The agreement seems also to apply to soldiers who surrendered to Tito.

The Hungarian Government has again protested to the Allies against the alleged persecution of Magyars in Slovakia, and the press of all colours contains many indignant articles on the subject.

The important municipal elections for Budapest are now announced for the 7th October. An inter-party conference secured various last-minute alterations in the draft Electoral Law, which is to serve as a basis for the law for the later national elections.

Credit for these modifications is claimed by both the Smallholders and the Communists. Generally they are in the direction of moderation: other parties besides the five in the Independence Front may, if approved by the National Committee for Hungary (to which the Bourgeois Democrats have been readmitted), put forward candidates; the enormous list of disqualifications has been drastically reduced; and the Trade Unions will apparently not have the separate representation hitherto enjoyed by them. The age-limit has, however, been lowered to 20.

In the Budapest elections the Social Democrats have, with ill-concealed reluctance and by a narrow majority vote, agreed to put forward a joint list with the Communists. This concession does not necessarily apply to the national elections. Meanwhile a considerable fraction of the Socialists continue to affirm their loyalty to their allies, the Smallholders, between whom and the Communists mutual recriminations fly daily.

The cost of living rose another 14·5 per cent. between the 10th to 20th August; but the Minister of Finance has said that there is no prospect of dangerous inflation. Potato rationing is to be introduced and there are more bitter complaints of the bread shortage. Railway communication with Vienna has been reopened.

Roumania.

No way out of the Roumanian impasse has yet been found. The following is an outline of the course of events during the last few days. Following on the Communist demonstrations of the 23rd August comes the news of the "discovery" of a "terrorist plot" to overthrow the Government. An enormous mass of "evidence" has come to light in an incredibly short space of time. Some of the leaders, all of them entirely unheard of people, have been arrested and have confessed. The whole business runs on familiar lines. For a long time past the ruling clique has been seeking an excuse for taking action against Bratianu, Maniu and Radescu. Radescu has not actually been placed under house arrest, but has withdrawn into seclusion of his own accord. The Roumanian Radio gives thrilling details of the activities of the "terrorists," with a promise of more to come. Roumanian methods of extorting confessions from accused persons are crude, but in this case show signs of being less so than usual.

Next come certain suggestions for the reconstitution of the Government. Some surprise was felt in certain quarters that Dl Petrescu and his colleagues of the Social Democratic party did not withdraw from the Government when the administration of the Tangier Zone until General Franco's régime has been replaced by a " democratic " régime. The Act also includes a separate Declaration by the other three Powers, showing that they, too, are by no means oblivious of the Potsdam communiqué and indicating that there will be a postponement of the full Conference if General Franco is in fact still in power at the end of the six months' period. There would seem to be no difference of opinion with the Russians on the question of a Spain which had shed the Franco régime taking her due share in the future international administration of Tangier. Incidentally, in deference to Spanish susceptibilities, the Final Act is not being communicated officially to the Spanish Government.

ITALY.

At a press conference in Rome on the 27th August, Signor Parri, the Italian Prime Minister, gave his views on the holding of elections in Italy. Signor Parri is clearly of the opinion that it would be a mistake to hold the election to the Constituent Assembly before the Peace Treaty is signed or before Italy has a satisfactory international status. Signor Parri went on to say that he, personally, felt that certain conditions were necessary before the Constituent Assembly could be summoned. Not only does Italy need to attain to international status but the technical details of an election must be thoroughly prepared, since, for the first time, all citizens above a certain age, including women, would vote. This would raise the electorate to the imposing figure of 30 millions. Moreover, a free and honest election must be guaranteed, and this could only be done if the political parties would pledge themselves to co-operate to this end. For these reasons it was extremely difficult to fix a date but, said Signor Parri, not only the Government but he personally, was pledged to hold the election to the Constituent Assembly at the earlier possible moment. Signor Cattani, the Secretary-General of the Liberal Party, in a statement to the press, raised another difficulty in the way of holding the election this autumn. Signor Cattani expressed his gratification at Mr. Bevin's statement that the problem of the repatriation of the Italian prisoners of war can be solved because, in Signor Cattani's opinion, it would be impossible to hold an election of such importance while a million young men were out of the country and because time would in any case be needed for them to get a balanced view of the situation in Italy. According to Signor Cattani the preparatory work for the holding of the election has hardly begun nor has a start been made in drafting the necessary electoral laws. This, in conjunction with the lack of communications and of public order, precluded any possibility of holding the election this autumn.

King asked for Groza's resignation. Dl Petrescu has now explained that while five out of nine members were originally in favour of withdrawal, the party Committee eventually decided by six votes to three that this step should not be taken while the matter was under consideration by the Allied Powers. He was in favour of trying to form a coalition Government. Dl Vişoianu, who was a member of General Sanatescu's Government, suggests a single party Government responsible solely to the King, subject to the general supervision of the Allied Control Commission and concerned only with administrative and non-political matters. Dl Durma, the Minister of Finance, has announced his resignation. He is inclined to be a "professional resigner," and has threatened resignation on previous occasions. If he really means it this time, his going would at the moment complicate the difficulties of administration.

It is reported, but it is only a report, that Tatarescu is concerned with a move to bring back the former King, Carol. It now appears that he has not been granted a residence permit for France. The Portuguese authorities have, therefore, cancelled their visa, and Carol did not sail from Rio de Janeiro on the 3rd September as he had arranged to do. It is felt by responsible quarters in Roumania that at all costs Carol should be prevented from reappearing on the scene.

Dr. Groza and Dl Tatarescu are due to arrive in Moscow on the 6th September.

It is reported from Constanţa that there has been an almost complete stoppage of unloading of U.N.R.R.A. supplies for Poland and Czechoslovakia. This is apparently due to mismanagement on the part of the Roumanian authorities. No American ships will be allowed to proceed to Constanţa for the present.

Yugoslavia.

Radio Belgrade (2nd September) announced that the Constituent Assembly will finally decide the country's form of government (i.e., there will be no plebiscite on the Monarchy), and that the Assembly "will ratify all the laws passed before it was convened." [Thus the views of the Assembly have been already decided for it.] The elections for the Assembly are to take place on the 11th November. On the 1st September the register of electors was closed and had to be submitted to inspecting commissions on the 2nd. Fourteen days are allowed from the 20th September for corrections and alterations in the register. Many persons have already been disfranchised (and thereby also rendered ineligible for any representative body) by votes of public meetings or by delation, including over 14,000 in Belgrade. One of the small opposition group of Democrats in the Temporary Parliament has been disfranchised by the vote of a meeting at his town.

On the 26th August the Temporary Parliament unanimously passed a resolution claiming for Yugoslavia the whole of Venezia Giulia, together with a small portion of Udine province and the uninhabited island of Pelagosa.

The press campaign against Greece was violent. Borba (2nd September) said that Mr. Bevin had been misinformed about the Slavs in Greece. This, however, may have conveyed little to Borba's readers, since the parts of Mr. Bevin's speech (20th August) dealing with Greco-Yugoslav relations, as well as those on Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania, were suppressed by the Belgrade censorship. To the United States Government's proposal for an inter-Allied commission of investigation into Greco-Yugoslav frontier incidents, the Yugoslav Government replied accepting, provided that the commissioners represented France, Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R., that Yugoslavia should only accept the unanimous decisions of the commission, and that the commission's main task should be to investigate the "terror of the Greek Monarcho-Fascists upon the Slav population."

The Yugoslav Government applied for visas for a delegation to the "Peace Conference" at London. It has been explained to them that the Council of Foreign Ministers is a Five Power body, and that it is for the Council to invite representatives of other Powers.

The movement of first-line troops from Slovenia to Macedonia has been reported. So have the storage near Belgrade of large quantities of oil from Russia and Roumania and the working, twenty-four hours a day, of factories with stocks of war material. Yugoslavia continues to keep so large an army mobilised as greatly to add to her economic difficulties.

The flight or "liquidation" of the German Minority in the Vojvodina, numbering over 300,000 in 1944, has left much land, which they had rendered extremely fertile, available. The Belgrade radio has said that 40,000 families, of whom half are to come from Bosnia and Montenegro, are to be settled in the Vojvodina. It was stated that for the present the land is to be tilled collectively, and it was added that "the State expects the settlers to show the same enthusiasm as they did when fighting for their freedom."

Greece.

The Greek Government has been shaken anew by the resignation, on the 2nd September, of M. Varvaressos, Vice-President of the Council and Minister of Supply. In a statement issued the same day Admiral Voulgaris explained that, in the interests of stability and in view of the Regent's imminent departure for London, the Government would not, as in normal times, also resign, but would remain in office and find new means of carrying out M. Varvaressos's economic programme. M. Varvaressos on the 3rd September declared that he had for some time been under attack from powerful economic and industrial interests who showed themselves determined, by a concerted campaign costing millions of drachmæ, to sabotage his economic policy. He hoped that his resignation would bring this campaign to an end, and with it the suffering imposed on the Greek people by the artificial scarcities and soaring prices it had involved.

This, however, is not the whole story. It may be, though British observers are inclined to doubt it, that there has been such a conspiracy—a recent spate of hostile criticism directed against Varvaressos personally by the previously favourable Right-wing press lends some support to this hypothesis; but M. Varvaressos also contributed to his own downfall. The policy of economic control he inaugurated in June (see Summary No. 297), with the support of nearly all sections of the community, depended for its ultimate success first on the efficiency with which the controls were applied, and secondly on the confidence and co-operation of producers, manufacturers and public. He failed, partly for reasons outside his control, to secure the fulfilment of these conditions. Efficient Government control on the British model has seldom if ever been achieved by any Greek Government; but M. Varvaressos, instead of extending existing machinery to a more adequate scale, concentrated more and more functions in his own hands. Thus, when the commodity market was emptied, and hoarding renewed by public uneasiness during the Government crisis early in August, the Ministry of Supply found itself powerless to do more than issue warnings against the black market. Olive oil, the key commodity of Greek economy, practically disappeared from the open market, although, according to Varvaressos's own estimate, stocks in the hands of Ægean Islands producers amounted to some 18,000 tons; a Government olive oil mission to Crete collected only 200 tons. M. Varvaressos's request of the 21st August (which could not immediately be met) for 4,000 tons of oil or fats, 2,000 tons of soap, and 2,000 tons of cheese from Allied stocks was a clear admission of failure to ensure the distribution of local supplies.

M. Varvaressos also failed to secure the co-operation of Greek industrialists; how far this failure should be attributed to their resentment of his extraordinary taxation measures is difficult to guess, but he has not shown readiness to understand their difficulties, and on one occasion refused to discuss proposals put forward by leading members of the Federation of Greek Industries. Whatever the cause, the effects have been inordinate delay in the production of textiles, &c., from the raw materials imported by U.N.R.R.A., and a great scarcity of consumer goods. This in its turn, by offering the producer no return for his goods except the currency that years of inflation have taught him to distrust, has increased the tendency to hoarding.

Admiral Voulgaris hopes to meet this situation by a number of new appointments and the creation of an advisory economic council on which important industrial interests will be represented.

The appointment of M. Petros Gounarakis as Minister of the Interior has caused little comment. There have been few political developments, though the northern tour of M. Zachariadis and his entourage has not been free of incident. The Regent Archbishop is expected to leave for London this week.

Albania.

It has now been confirmed that in October 1944 Albanian military authorities occupied the small Italian island of Saseno, which lies about 10 miles west of the Albanian port of Valona.

It has been reliably reported that the Yugoslavs have one military mission in each of the following Albanian towns: Tirana, Scutari, Durazzo and Argyrokastro. The head of the Argyrokastro mission claims that his purpose is to repatriate Yugoslavs. It is, however, understood that there are, in fact, no stranded Yugoslavs in this area at all.

Under the agreement signed with Hoxha on the 1st August U.N.R.R.A. arranged to provide Albania with 10,000 tons of goods monthly. Complaint is made in the F.N.C. newspaper that this quantity is barely sufficient for the country's needs, and that by the 27th August "only 1,286 tons" had actually been delivered. In reality, the main problem is that of distribution. In a backward, mountainous country like Albania lorries make the entire difference between the success or failure of the relief programme.

Bulgaria.

The last-minute postponement of the Natonal Elections was only the most remarkable of several salutary effects which the combined stand taken up by the United States and this country quickly had upon affairs in Bulgaria. For one thing, Mme. Tsola Dragoitcheva and her associates on the National Committee of the Fatherland Front actually admitted in their public declaration on the 26th August that Bulgaria had brought some of her misfortunes upon herself. "Our country," they say, "through the fault of its former Fascist rulers, placed itself in the Hitlerite robber camp and is, consequently, a defeated country." Naturally, all the opposition elements were greatly encouraged, and already by the afternoon of the 25th a number of manifestos signed by Nikola Petkov and his adherents had been affixed in the streets of Sofia and were being read with interest. One declaration by Petkov, Stoyanov, Cheshmedzhiev, Pavlov, Bumbarov and Derzhanski explained the reasons for their resignation from the Government and contained the following passage: "It is never too late to correct mistakes. . . . . The Fatherland Front and its component political organisations will now be cleansed, the elections postponed, and the course set for the faithful execution of our programme, such as alone will really lead us to a free, independent, democratic and strong Bulgaria." The Zveno party newspaper quoted extensively from this and other similar pronouncements on the 26th and concluded: "All these free manifestations by political organisations and persons show that the country is returning to a completely normal political life." In another issue it boldly referred to Petkov as being still Secretary of the Agrarian Union, and then indicated as an afterthought that another Agrarian Union did exist with Obbov as its Secretary. At least two other Sofia newspapers began taking a similar line.

Then on the 27th it became known that, acting on instructions from Washington, Mr. Maynard Barnes, the American political representative (who had taken a prominent part in the events of the previous week), had addressed two letters, one to the Bulgarian Prime Minister and the other to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, warmly congratulating them on their decision to postpone the elections and informing them that the United States Government would welcome the immediate appointment of Lieut-General Stoichev—who was in command of the Bulgarian First Army which fought against the Germans in Hungary—as informal Bulgarian representative in the United States. Profiting by this wholly unexpected windfall, the authorities are already trying to give the impression that full diplomatic relations with America have been re-established, while press and wireless commentators are busily insinuating that most of Bulgaria's present troubles are the result of "British suspicions" or "tales started by the London Government," whereas America has "shown more goodwill." (A fortnight ago almost the very opposite was being said: see Summary No. 307, page 10.) Actually, all that the Bulgarian Government have done is to submit, much against their will, to a joint decision that they should not for the present hold entirely unfair elections; and even this modified success could clearly not have been obtained by either Government acting alone.

There are already signs that the Communists are preparing to resist by force any curtailment of their powers. Apparently arms and ammunition have been dumped in localities close to Sofia and also widely distributed to party members in the capital itself. Furthermore, it has been ascertained that there are at least two brigades in the Rila mountains where young Communists are given suitable training as gangsters. It is also understood from a good source that most of the principal military commands are to be taken over by Bulgarian officers who have had a long residence in Russia. When these are firmly settled in the saddle some reduction and reorganisation of the Militia may be agreed to. The inference from all this is that preparations are being made to secure the continued domination of the country by the present Communist minority in power in the best Balkan tradition.

Turkey.

The rumours which have been circulating in Angora of a possible change of Government in Turkey are regarded as premature. So long as the present unsatisfactory relations with Soviet Russia continue, it is felt that such a change might be interpreted as a submission to Russian pressure.

The Turkish Government has not yet received from the United States Government any elucidation of President Truman's suggestion regarding the international control of navigation in the Straits. It is understood that this question will be raised at the forthcoming meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London.

It was reported in Angora that the much criticised Article 50 of the Press Law—which gave the Government the power to suspend newspapers—is to be amended. The power is to be taken out of the hands of the Government and confided to a special tribunal, which will be established for the purpose.

There have been complaints in the press of the meagre results which have followed the signature of the trading agreement with Britain. The Ministry of Commerce was blamed for not realising that the British and American markets were not prepared to pay the prices to which Turkey had become accustomed in her former trading with Germany. The commercial journal Birlik pointed out that the policy of maintaining a high level of internal prices had paralysed Turkey's foreign trade and had given her a cost-of-living index which was the third highest in the world. These conditions, it declared, must be changed—even at the cost of some hardship.

The Turkish Sports Association has invited foreign athletes to compete in athletic contests to take place in Angora on the 29th and 30th September. Acceptances have been received from the United States.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Before proceeding to this country on leave, His Majesty's Ambassador last week discussed, in a farewell talk with King Farouk, the question of social reform in Egypt—a subject in which the King still remains interested, though he has no clear ideas of how to put it into effect. In Lord Killearn's final talk with the Egyptian Prime Minister, Nokrashi Pasha raised the inevitable question of treaty revision, and insisted that the first thing to do was to remove every British soldier at once from Egyptian soil. As usual, he placed upon us the blame for all the evils from which he said Egypt was suffering. In short, Nokrashi once more proved himself a tough customer whose extreme nationalistic sentiments amount almost to an obsession.

Though treaty revision till recently held first place in the Egyptian press and among the general public, equal if not greater interest is now being shown in the question of Palestine, stimulated as it has been of late by President Truman's statement on that country; and it looks as if the Egyptian Government may be unable to resist much longer the pressure from neighbouring Arab States to take some action in defence of Palestine against Zionism.

In the United States of America also there are indications that the Palestine problem will soon become a live issue. American delegates returning to the United States from the recent Zionist conference in London have expressed confidence in the renewal of Jewish immigration into Palestine, while the American Zionist Emergency Council has vigorously denied the statement made in Cairo by the Secretary-General of the Arab League, alleging that President Roosevelt promised Ibn Saud that he would not support Zionist claims (see Summary No. 307). Finally, Senators Taft and Wagner have canvassed their Congressional colleagues about the possibility of producing an American equivalent of the "Balfour Declaration." What the result of this will be cannot of course be seen as yet. But while Zionism in the United States habitually creates its own counteraction, it must be remembered that the argument of military expediency, by which General Marshall last year forestalled Congressional action, will no longer avail.

The Iraqi Prime Minister too is showing concern on the subject of Palestine. In a recent interview with His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, Hamdi Pachachi told Mr. Thompson that it was impossible to find a solution satisfactory to both sides and that, provided Jewish immigration were stopped and no more land sold to the Jews, he would like Great Britain to continue the administration of the country, in agreement with the Arab League, for the next twenty or thirty years. Of all the solutions proposed, the one he dreaded most was the creation of a Jewish State.

In Palestine itself the Jews no less than the Arabs, both of whom expected the change of Government in Great Britain to cause an immediate re-orientation of policy, now realise that His Majesty's Government are likely to give fresh and serious consideration to the problem, and are consequently both nervous about the future. While Arab opinion hardened as a result of President Truman's statement, Jewish opinion, which welcomed his hopes for increased immigration, resented his reference to the non-employment of American troops. Nor were the Jews pleased with the President's suggestion that the problem should be solved in co-operation with the Arabs.

There is still hope among members of the "Palestine Arab Party" that the Mufti may be allowed one day to return to Palestine. For some time there has been little fresh news of Haj Amin. Recently, however, we learnt through Fuad Hamza, former Saudi Minister to the Vichy Government, who has been visiting Paris to wind up the Saudi Legation there, that the Mufti, accompanied by Ishaq Darwish and Rasem Khalidi, is under open arrest at St. Maur. According to Fuad Hamza, the French, feeling embarrassed by the Mufti's presence, but fearing that they would incur odium with the Moslems if they handed him over to the British, were trying to induce some Arab State to offer him hospitality. If they succeeded in this, they hoped that the Arab Governments would then collectively request His Majesty's Government to allow the Mufti to proceed to the asylum selected. Fuad Hamza added that he did not think the French were getting very far in their project, and that, so far as he was concerned, he had refused either to call on the Mufti or to interest his Government in the French proposal.

Since the new Syrian Government was formed on the 26th August, it has had more than one rough passage. On the 28th August, the Chamber passed a motion, after a heated debate, declaring that the Ministry of eight members must be reduced to seven under the Constitution, and on the next day the Prime Minister took action accordingly. After an all-night debate he obtained a vote of confidence by 52 to 29 votes, but his Government is in no stronger position than its predecessor. The appointment of Michel Elian as Minister for Foreign Affairs in the place of Jamil Mardam is especially criticised.

The Amir Feisal accompanied by his eldest son and three of his brothers, after spending three weeks on an unofficial visit to this country, left by air for Cairo en route for Saudi Arabia on the 31st August. They seem to have enjoyed their stay here. They could not, of course, help noticing the difference between living conditions in America and England, but they were quick to appreciate the reasons for this difference.

The Iraqi Government is still taken up with the revolt of Mulla Mustafa, and is planning to make a military advance into Barzan this week. Though further delay might have been advisable in order to allow of more detailed preparation, the Ministers concerned wish, if possible, to finish off the business before the Regent's return to Iraq towards the end of this month. If they were more willing to listen to our advice in making their plans with greater care and forethought, they would perhaps be more likely to succeed in their object.

By the 29th August there was still no sign of the Russians withdrawing their troops from Tehran. We, on the other hand, have already begun to despatch our stores from the town and to arrange for the disposal of our assets there. The main body of our combatant troops will be leaving Tehran on the 15th September.

The attitude of the Russian military authorities in Northern Persia continues to cause anxiety to the Persian Government. The latter has protested to the Soviet Embassy at Tehran at the action taken by the Russians in Mazandaran, where Persian gendarmes, who had been sent to restore order, were stopped on their way by Soviet troops. Even more striking than the protest itself is the fact that the Persian Government has published it in the local press. This is the first time that the Persian Government has made a real effort to state its case to its own people. It has probably been emboldened to do so by the abolition of censorship on press telegrams, as a result of which objective messages can now be sent to the outside world. But the protest is not likely to have much effect. The occurrence at Mazandaran and similar incidents elsewhere show that liaison between the Russian Embassy and the Soviet military authorities, never very close, is now less so than ever, as the Russian Ambassador has apparently left for Moscow without appointing a Chargé d'Affaires, all the counsellors have disappeared, and the only person left in the Embassy is a secretary who indicates, truthfully enough, that he does not know anything about anything.

Mr. R. W. G. Reed, Headmaster of Victoria College, Alexandria, died on the 20th August. He had been associated with Victoria College for thirty-four years, and had been its Headmaster since 1922. Many prominent nationals of Egypt and of other Middle Eastern countries, who had been educated at Victoria College, owed much to his influence and guidance. Latterly he became Representative of the British Council in Egypt, and did much useful work in that capacity. Tributes have been paid from many quarters to his work in the cause of Anglo-Egyptian friendship.

THE FAR EAST.

The formal signature of the overall surrender terms by Japan took place on board the U.S.S. Missouri in Tokyo Bay on the 2nd September. The flag flown by Commodore Perry at Uraga in 1854 and the flag flying over the Capitol in Washington at the time of the attack on Pearl Harbour were both hoisted in the Missouri. Mamoru Shigemitsu, the Foreign Minister and former Japanese Ambassador in London, led the delegation for the Government, and General Umezu, Chief of the Army General Staff, for Imperial Headquarters. Umezu wore uniform and signed standing; Shigemitsu wore morning dress with a top hat and sat down to sign. A British correspondent present described the Japanese delegates as looking "rather pathetic"; their only consolation was that they were able to point out that three of the Allied delegates had signed the document in the wrong place.

Although Domei had announced that Prince Higashikuni, the Prime Minister, would lead the delegation, he did not in fact appear. The Allies refrained from requiring the Emperor to sign the surrender, and it may have been thought in the palace that it was better for an Imperial Prince not to do so either. Higashikuni, however, issued a statement in which he said: "Our sorrow knows no bounds, especially when we come to think of the fact that the Imperial forces, with their long and glorious traditions, are about to be disarmed and disbanded. But now that the Imperial order has been issued to accept formal surrender, we loyal subjects of his Majesty must squarely face the fact of our defeat and suffer even the insufferable in conformity with the Imperial proclamation."

American marines with memories of the fanatical Japanese resistance on Saipan, Iwojima and Okinawa were somewhat disconcerted to see, on landing amid the ruins of Yokohama, the greeting in English in large letters: "Three cheers for the United States Army and Navy!" So far no incidents have occurred, except that aircraft over some parts of Japan are still liable to be shot at by anti-aircraft guns. The problem seems to be not so much to disarm the Japanese forces as to keep men with the colours for the orderly liquidation of units as required by the surrender terms. Most of the sailors of the Navy are reported to have deserted and gone home when they heard the war was over. Foreign correspondents report a feeling of general relief at the end of hostilities combined with an idea that the Emperor has graciously restored peace to mankind by a noble gesture of national self-sacrifice. The mental satisfaction of aggressive warfare appear to have been exchanged for that of voluntary martyrdom without excessive psychological dislocation.

General MacArthur as Allied Supreme Commander has gone to Tokyo and will set up his headquarters in the buildings of the American Embassy. He held a long conference with Shigemitsu in Yokohama on the 3rd September, and it seems likely the latter will be the principal medium for Allied-Japanese relations, and therefore the most important political figure in Japan in the coming period. Of the other personalities in the Cabinet, Higashikuni has had no real political or diplomatic experience and holds his position chiefly because of his Imperial lineage, while Prince Konoye, though still influential in Japanese political circles, is probably regarded as having too heavy a responsibility for Japan's past policies to be suitable for Allied confidence. In spite of his activities as Foreign Minister in 1942–45, Shigemitsu has a relatively good record and, unlike Konoye, he is a man of strong character.

General MacArthur is to create an Advisory Board of American, British, Soviet and Chinese representatives to assist him in the exercise of his authority over Japan. This is not the same thing as the Allied Control Council in Germany, as the latter is the ultimate authority, there being no Supreme Commander for the whole of Germany, whereas in Japan General MacArthur will retain the right of final decision, the Allied representation being only advisory.

The 88th Session of the Japanese Diet opened on the 4th September without any Allied interference. Allied journalists were invited to attend it. One motive for convoking the Diet is no doubt to impress upon the Allies that Japan has a Parliament and is trying to get back to, or advance towards, parliamentary government as soon as possible after accepting the Potsdam Declaration. But it is probable also that the Government wishes to share the burden of responsibility which it is now carrying alone, and to associate the nominal representatives of the people with its measures for carrying out the surrender terms. Actually the present House of Representatives is far from representative, as it is based on the elections of 1942, which were held without freedom of political parties and under the influence of the early victories of the Pacific war; however, it includes a number of the genuine parliamentarians of the old parties from the days of (relatively) free elections, and as the more nationalist candidates of 1942 will now be in a chastened mood, it should be capable of doing useful work. There seems to be no reason why fresh elections to the Diet should not be held in Japan as soon as new voting registers have been compiled for the bombed cities; the fact that Japan, unlike Germany, is not to be divided into occupational zones should facilitate the holding of elections on a nation-wide scale under Allied supervision.

Marshal Stalin's broadcast of 2nd September (see under "Soviet Union") stated that Southern Sakhalin and the Kuriles would pass to the Soviet Union and "from now on" would serve as a means for direct Soviet access to the ocean and as a base for defence against Japanese aggression. The Japanese are no doubt resigned to losing both territories, though they seem to have hoped to keep the Kuriles. Both Sakhalin and the Kuriles were originally no man's lands, sparsely inhabited by savage tribes; early in the nineteenth century Russia and Japan began to dispute their possession, and by a treaty of 1875 Sakhalin was recognised as Russian and the Kuriles as Japanese. As a result of the Russo-Japanese war Russia ceded the southern half of Sakhalin to Japan. The Potsdam Declaration implied that both South Sakhalin and the Kuriles would be taken away from Japan, but Stalin's speech was the first intimation to the world that the Kuriles (on which the recently published Report of the Naval Affairs Committee of the American House of Representatives proposed post-war American air bases) as well as South Sakhalin were to be annexed by the Soviet Union.

Marshal Stalin also said that "we men of the older generation have waited for forty years for this day" since the Russo-Japanese War and that Japan's career of aggression had begun with the attack on Russia in 1904. In the early days of the Soviet régime the war which resulted from the Russian military occupation of Manchuria at the beginning of the century used to be classified as one of the imperialist wars of an aggressive Tsardom, but in the new version of Russian history it is a purely defensive war in which the brave fight of the Russian people was betrayed by the incompetence and cowardice of Tsarist leadership.

Conversations have been going on in Chungking between Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communist leader, Mao Tse-tung, who, after two refusals, finally accepted Chiang's invitation to a conference. So far no definite result is known to have emerged from the talks, and meanwhile the date for the formal surrender of the Japanese forces, fixed for the 6th September, is approaching; if no agreement allowing Communist participation has been reached by then, Chiang's representatives will alone take the surrender. Despite Communist offensives and appeals, it does not seem that any considerable body of Japanese troops has surrendered to the Communists; the war has ended too soon for them to make contact with American forces and get lease-lend supplies, and the Soviet Union has, at least formally, disinterested itself in their cause. Their position thus seems to have greatly weakened, and Kuomintang circles are jubilant. It remains to be seen, however, just how the Soviet Union will interpret its new treaty obligation not to interfere in China's internal affairs. The Soviet Union has recognised Chungking's authority in Manchuria, but it will be up to Chungking to enforce its authority when the Soviet troops are withdrawn, and this may not be so easy if the Communists are once established there.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

President Truman's broadcast announcing that the Jepanese delegates had just signed the surrender terms came from Washington late on Saturday night, the 1st September, when it was Sunday morning, the 2nd September, in Tokyo. There was comparatively little excitement in the United States on the Sunday, which the President proclaimed as VJ-day, partly on account of the earlier unofficial celebrations, and partly because Monday, the 3rd September, was Labour Day and a public holiday anyway. Referring to a topic very much in the minds of Americans at this time, the President said, "We shall not forget Pearl Harbour. The Japanese militarists will not forget the U.S.S. Missouri . . . . that small piece of American soil anchored in Tokyo Harbour."

It was appropriate that the lengthy reports of Army and Navy Boards of Inquiry into the Pearl Harbour disaster should have been made public a few days earlier (on the 29th August). They have provided the expected sensation in the United States, for not only are the two field commanders, Rear-Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and Lieut.-General Walter C. Short, severely censured, but Admiral Harold Stark, Commander-in-Chief of the American Pacific Fleet at the time, and General George C. Marshall, the Army Chief-of-Staff, are criticised. Even Mr. Cordell Hull's action in delivering counter-proposals to Japan on the 26th November, 1941, is stigmatised because "it was used by the Japanese as a signal to begin the war by the attack on Pearl Harbour. To the extent that it hastened such attack it was in conflict with the efforts of the War and Navy Departments to gain time for preparations for war." The Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, in a statement accompanying the Army report, declared that he did not agree with all the Board's conclusions, particularly the "entirely unjustified" criticism of General Marshall and the "uncalled for" comment on Mr. Hull.

In press conferences on the 29th and 30th August President Truman associated himself "wholeheartedly" with the Secretary of War's remarks. He made no mention, however, of the Navy Secretary's directions concerning the retired Admirals Stark and Kimmel, neither of whom is in future to hold "any position in the United States Navy which requires the exercise of superior judgment." The press and radio have taken up the question avidly. Advocates of a single Defence Department have gained powerful new arguments. Some newspapers, notably old enemies of the late President, such as the Patterson and Hearst groups, have tried to make political capital out of the findings, attributing ultimate responsibility to President Roosevelt and his closest advisers. The general view, however, supports Mr. Truman's conclusion that "the country is as much to blame as any individual in the final situation that developed in Pearl Harbour." It is felt that Service inquiries are insufficient, and that whether courts martial follow or not, a full-dress Congressional investigation is imperative.

American opinion is much happier about the whole Far Eastern situation than a week ago. The smooth conduct of the Occupation so far and the chaotic conditions discovered in Japan have answered those who wondered if the Japanese people realised their defeat. But with gruesome stories of ill-treatment related by rescued prisoners of war and interned civilians, there are no signs of tenderness towards the defeated developing. As regards China, the terms of the Sino-Soviet pact were hailed with expressions of immense relief. China's territorial integrity is considered to be ensured and the requirements of both the Cairo Declaration and the San Francisco Charter fulfilled. It is appreciated, especially since the Russian announcement concerning Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands, that, in the words of Mr. Sumner Welles (3rd September), "Russia is once more a major factor in the Pacific." While, with Japan defeated and Sino-Russian harmony achieved, two of the three threats to Far Eastern harmony are felt to have been removed, there is a tendency, both in Conservative and Left-wing circles, to opine that the third—the colonising mentality of the western imperial Powers—should not again be allowed to develop into a threat to security. The theme of "Asia for the Asiatics" finds support in these circles and was developed at length by Mr. Welles in the article mentioned.

There has been little adverse comment on the actual occupation of Hong Kong by British forces, though the majority of radio and press commentators, Conservative as well as Liberal, would clearly like to see the island returned to Chinese sovereignty, if only as "a gesture of British goodwill." Some radio speakers, notably Kelsey and Heatter, and a few newspapers, such as the New York Herald Tribune, Washington Post, Kansas City Times and Seattle Times, have given factual accounts of the British connexion with Hong Kong and conclude that the island does in fact belong to Great Britain, but even they declare that the restoring of the status quo would be a convenient starting-point for "the next development," an agreement between China and Britain, or, failing that, consideration by the United Nations Organisation.

Although the proclamation of VJ-Day in the United States does not officially end the war—a joint resolution of Congress will be required for that—it does, in the view of the United States Government, justify the termination of Lend-Lease. While most responsible comment deplores the "reedy, raucous note" on which it has ended, there is fairly general support for the President's action. On the other hand, a certain unease about what Mrs. Roosevelt has termed the "ungraciousness" of the procedure appears to have softened attacks on the President's subsequent hint that since "the overwhelming portion" of the American contribution of 42,000 million dollars had been "directly consumed by our Allies in this war," attempts at repayment might drive "our chief fighting partners into desperate measures." This suggestion occcurred in the last quarterly report on the operation of Lend-Lease presented to Congress on the 30th August. The Secretary of State was quick to correct any misapprehension this might cause, by deprecating "hasty generalisations" about cancellation of all Lend-Lease debts. Mr. Byrnes issued a press statement explaining that, although the United States might not seek "paper contracts to pay dollars which will not be available to our debtors," this did not mean that "there are no Lend-Lease settlements to be made." After a visit to the President, Senator Barkley, the Democratic Leader in the Senate, spoke in a similar sense; and a number of newspapers, both Democratic and Republican, are insisting that concessions must be made by Great Britain, perhaps in the form of abandoning Imperial preference and "sterling areas." It is noteworthy that influential financial papers, such as the Wall Street Journal and, in lesser degree, the Journal of Commerce, are increasingly critical of the British attitude.

It is clear that the session of Congress which opens on the 5th September is going to be a very much more stormy one than its predecessor. The honeymoon period, granted to President Truman in his difficult first days, is definitely over. Besides the Lend-Lease controversy, there are numerous critics, many of them in the President's own party, of the "reckless" way in which demobilisation and reconversion are being handled. The Full Employment Bill, which the President sponsors, has been before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee during the recess and public hearings began on the 21st August. Its chances of passing in some form early in the session are regarded as strong, since it has the support of many leading Congressmen of each party, as well as labour organisations, prominent businessmen and bankers. The New York Times and the National Association of Manufacturers are, however, in opposition. More uncertain is the fate of the Unemployment Compensation Scheme of the Administration, which, with its plan of levelling up rates of relief throughout the Union, guaranteeing 25 dollars a week for 26 weeks to those out of work, and opening Federal Employment Exchanges, will come into conflict with champions of States rights and free enterprise at every turn.

LATIN AMERICA.

Despite the warning against unauthorised political meetings issued by the Argentine Government last week, the various parties have now been suffered to foregather. A meeting of the Radical Civic Union led to clashes in which Dr. Sanghiotto, a former Ambassador, and others were injured; the Radical leaders have published a statement alleging that the police attacked the meeting. The Communist rally at Luna Park was the first legal assembly of the Party for fifteen years and went off quietly. It is curious to note that this meeting was attended by Conservatives. Right-wing politicians seem to be prepared to line up against the existing régime, which increasingly resembles a tertulia of expelled Radicals. Meanwhile, a considerable proportion of the Argentine exiles in Uruguay have returned to their own country. On leaving Montevideo Sr. Alfredo Palacios said that the hour had come to demand that power should pass into the hands of the President of the Supreme Court, and Sr. Nudelmann supported the same idea as the only means of bringing a return to constitutional normality, adding that further delay would not only compromise the future of Argentina,

"but also the prestige of the armed forces in whose name the Government was ruling." The Supreme Court has come somewhat into evidence on its rejection of the sentences passed on General Espindola and other officers in connexion with the alleged plot of April last (see Summary No. 297).

Meanwhile, Dr. Cooke, the new Foreign Minister, has made a statement for the Press. Its insistence on solidarity with the United Nations suggests that Dr. Cooke may be anxious to pursue a policy of co-operation with the United States.

In Mexico, President Avila Camacho is reported to have accepted the resignation of General Lázaro Cárdenas, Secretary for National Defence. Considerable interest attaches to the attitude ex-President Cárdenas may adopt towards next year's Presidential campaign. Dr. Francisco Castillo Nájera, Mexican Ambassador to the United States, has been appointed Foreign Minister; since the resignation of Sr. Ezequiel Padilla the post has been temporarily held by Sr. Manuel Tello. Dr. Castillo, aged 59, is a doctor and former director of the Army Medical School. Between 1922 and 1935 he represented Mexico in China, Belgium, Holland and France, and became Ambassador to the United States in 1935. He has represented Mexico at the Lima Conference in 1938, and assisted Dr. Padilla at San Francisco.

The setting up of a Spanish Republican Government in exile in Mexico stands against a background of sympathetic gestures in a number of Latin-American countries. Motions in favour of a rupture of relations with General Franco's régime have been carried in the legislatures of Uruguay, Peru and Panamá. The Foreign Minister of Uruguay has intimated that his Government will probably not take this step unilaterally, though they might well do so in concert with other Latin American countries.

UNITED NATIONS.

United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation.

The First Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations is to be held on the 16th October in Canada. Invitations have been sent to the forty-four Governments represented on the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture. This Conference is the outcome of the work of the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture which was held at Hot Springs, Virginia, in May 1943. In accordance with Resolution II of the Final Act of that Conference, a Constitution for a Permanent Food and Agriculture Organisation was drawn up by the Interim Commission in Washington and duly presented for acceptance by the Governments and authorities concerned. More than twenty nations, the minimum required to set up the Permanent Organisation, have now agreed to accept the Constitution of the Organisation and are, therefore, entitled to send official delegations to the Conference. It is expected that several other Governments will have agreed to ratify the Constitution by the time the Conference convenes. The signing of the Constitution will be the first act of the Delegates to the Conference in October, thereby bringing the Permanent Organisation into being. The new Organisation will seek to improve efficiency in production and distribution of all food and agricultural products; to raise the levels of nutrition and standards of living; to better the condition of rural populations and to contribute by these means towards an expanding world economy. The Member Nations will agree to "report to one another on measures taken and progress achieved in these fields of action."

ELECTIONS at the highest level since the occupation were held in the US zone on the 30th June when Constituent Assemblies for the three Laendar were chosen. Final results are not available but surprises are unlikely. As in rural district elections last April, the CDU was victorious in Bavaria and Wuerttemberg-Baden, while the SPD led in Hesse. Once again the KPD and LPD have not materially strengthened their position; the KPD even being beaten by the Demokratische Volkspartei in Wuerttemberg-Baden. KPD leaders, anticipating defeat, had criticized the elections as premature, proclaiming that "Democratic elections decreed from above do not guarantee a real democracy. . . . A democratic Constitution is no panacea for the present misery." Hesse Draft Constitution, published on the 23rd June, reveals important contrasts with that of Bavaria (see last week's Summary). No mention appears to be made of the controversial questions of a second chamber and a State President. There is no defined period of office for the Premier, who may be deposed by a non-confidence vote. On the other hand, it is proposed to give the Government considerable power over the Diet, as it may veto laws passed by the Diet. One article would compel "every capable person" to work. There are a number of Socialist-inspired economic clauses. Of peculiar interest is the reproduction of the sentence in the Kellogg-pact outlawing war as a means of settlement of international disputes. Further information on the complex Wuerttemberg-Baden Draft Constitution shows that the Diet alone is responsible for passing laws. A Second Chamber and a State President are envisaged, the latter having limited powers to dissolve the Diet. Most of the adverse criticisms of these preliminary constitutional plans have come from the KPD. Despite the provision that the constitutions may not interfere with the future structure of Germany the KPD is preoccupied with Bavaria's supposedly separatist tendencies and rejects its Draft Constitution as inferior to that of Weimar. The party objects particularly that German national unity is never mentioned and that one clause provides for the Premier to represent Bavaria externally. It also criticized the power of the Premier to appoint Ministers. The KPD opposes any second Chamber or State President.

In Saxony State the much publicized referendum on the expropriation of property belonging to "National Socialists and War Criminals" took place on the 30th June. Preliminary reports claim that in a very heavy poll about 78 per cent. voted "Yes"—in some cases less. While it was out of the question that a majority would oppose a step embodied in Military Government decrees, the percentage does not show that pattern of complete subservience exhibited in Hitler's referendums. Every assurance was given that polling would be scrupulously fair. It was preceded by a tremendous campaign to which all the main parties and anti-fascist organisations gave their public support. The Protestant Church issued a somewhat nebulous statement which might be interpreted as approval. Typical slogans were that those voting "Yes" were voting for German unity and for a peaceful future; those against were for reaction. Considerable publicity was given to certain reactionary elements who had tried to sabotage the referendum; a number of arrests were made. Kaiser (CDU) stated in private that his party supported the measure with reluctance but would be classed as "reactionaries" if they opposed it. He feared that many innocent people would lose their property and that it was a trick to secure wholesale nationalisation—this he had sought to prevent, apparently with considerable success. At the first meeting of Saxony Advisory Committee on the 25th June it was stated that confiscated property on list "B," belonging to nominal Nazis, had been returned to the owners. The Committee also stated that only suitable undertakings, like mines, would be administered directly by the State, the rest would go to such organisations as cooperatives or to private persons.

In the Soviet zone and Berlin, political activity is already overshadowed by the forthcoming elections. The SED has issued an election message in the Soviet zone, perhaps its most interesting passage being that which refers to the need for aiding the middle class. In Berlin, where the SED is now assiduously courting the SPD, the latter party is apparently very optimistic about its prospects. The actual position is not satisfactory, however, as the Berlin SPD still lacks real leadership and the existing leaders seem relatively inexperienced and over-optimistic. Fusionist campaigns are not yet making real headway in the British zone, although Pieck and Grotewohl have been given permission to attend a pro-fusion meeting in Essen. It is reported that Schumacher will shortly visit the French zone to ensure that Baden SPD leaders support the official party line of non-fusion. The political isolation of the French zone is further reflected in information that the French authorities permitted delegates to the CDU conference in Berlin to come from the East but not from the West bank of the Rhine —a distinction which aroused the deepest suspicions among the Germans—and permission was anyway granted too late to be effective. A split has occurred in the Rhenish People's Party; a section of the members have now joined with the French zone Democratic Socialist Union in support of federalism and in rejection of the separatist aims of Dr. Opitz, who himself seems to be wavering in his views. The Free Democratic Party has denied that fusion with the Lower Saxon Union has been completed and the FDP leader, Heile, who originally announced fusion has now been kicked upstairs to the position of President, instead of active chairman (see Summary No. 345).

A directive was issued on the 29th June to British and US zone commanders to seek agreement for the implementation of the communiqué published on the 17th May which spoke of the desirability of working towards common food ration measures in Germany. Commanders are to try for agreement on a quadripartite basis if possible, and as a minimum between the three Western occupying Powers. The first main objective will be to introduce as soon as possible uniform ration scales, but unfortunately the present directive does not commit either the United States or United Kingdom Governments to pooling their food resources for the purpose of maintaining these equal levels of issue. In the Russian zone it was announced on the 29th June that increased rations will be given to certain heavy workers, expectant mothers and sick persons. The Berlin SPD paper "Telegraf" comments with appreciation on the introduction of bread rationing in Britain.

The latest exhibition of anti-British feeling has been a series of demonstrations against the projected move of the British Control Commission HQ to Hamburg, a step which entails requisitioning a number of houses. The population of Hamburg has been warned that disorders will not be tolerated.

AUSTRIA.

The new control machinery agreement for Austria was signed at the Allied Council meeting on the 28th June, and was handed to the Austrian Chancellor. The main effect of the new agreement is the widening of the Government's legislative and executive power. In future the Allied Council will take measures only through the Austrian Government or other Austrian authorities "except in cases where action has to be taken in the interest of maintenance of public order or in the interest of the Allies." Laws and Government decrees will come into force automatically if the Council raises no objection within a month. The Allied Council's unanimity requirement means that all members of the Council must now agree to veto a law, whereas previously there had to be unanimous agreement to approve it. De-militarisation, the security of the Allied Forces in Austria, the question of German property, foreign trade relations, and permission to enter and leave the country are among the matters remaining under the direct authority of the Allied Council. The frontiers between the zones are abolished for the exchange of goods and all traffic restrictions within Austria are abolished. The Austrian Government is free to exchange diplomatic and consular representatives with any of the United Nations, and may also resume such relations with other Governments than those of the United Nations subject to the specific consent of the Allied Council. The administration of Vienna is to be handed over as soon as possible by the Allied Kommandatura to the Vienna Municipality. While the agreement, especially the abolition of zone barriers, is officially welcomed by the Austrians, to many of them it is only as a long overdue recognition of the fact that Austria freely elected a Government in November 1945 recognised by the four occupying powers. Austrian hopes are now centred on the proposed discussion of an Austrian treaty by the Foreign Ministers in Paris, which would settle the outstanding questions left untouched by the Control Agreement—the total withdrawal of occupation troops, the problem of German assets, the final definition of Austria's frontiers, and the restoration of her full sovereignty and independence.

In announcing the Foreign Minister's decision on the South Tyrol Herr Figl said that Austria would not give up her claim and that a statement by the Government would be issued shortly. The Tyrol Diet adopted a "solemn resolution" on the 26th June, saying that it expects that it will be Austria's foreign policy to appeal against the decision to the main Allied Powers and to the Peace Conference, and if necessary to the United Nations. It is now common knowledge that the Austrian Foreign Minister, Dr. Gruber, was approached by Dr. Bebler, the Yugoslav Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs while he was in Paris, with an offer of support to Austria on the South Tyrol question, as well as of the return of Austrian prisoners-of-war still in Yugoslav hands, if Austria would openly support the Yugoslav claim to Trieste. This the Austrian Government has refused to do.

A batch of 527 prisoners from Yugoslavia recently returned to Austria, all in very bad health. The Yugoslav Military Mission in Vienna has announced that no more prisoners will be returned "until a treaty has been concluded between Austria and Yugoslavia." There are also between two and four hundred thousand Austrian prisoners still held by the Soviet Union. It is impossible to give a reliable estimate, and it is probable that the Russians have not separated Austrian from German prisoners, except the comparatively few politically reliable men who presumably produce the "Bulletin of the Anti-Fascist Bureau of Austrian prisoners-of-war" in Russia. (The Communist Volkstimme puts this forward as evidence of the liberty accorded to Austrian prisoners in the Soviet Union, and supports the Soviet line that if the Austrian Government pursues a policy favourable to Russian interests they may expect sympathetic consideration in return.)

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

A month has elapsed since the elections were held and still M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister designate to whom President Beneš entrusted the task of forming a new Government, is unable to reach agreement with the remaining parties concerning its composition. This delay is significant in so far as it leads one to the conclusion that the non-Communist parties, including even the Social Democrats, are at long last stiffening their resistance to the Communists. All parties were asked to criticise in advance the new Government's programme: hence to expect general and immediate agreement would be too optimistic. There remains, too, the tricky problem of allotting portfolios fairly and equitably, so that no party wields more ministerial power than is warrantable on a proportional basis. The Communists, however, have already gained one post-election success: M. Zapotocký, Chairman of the Central Office of the Trade Union Movement, was elected Speaker in succession to the Czech Socialist, M. David.

Although dissension exists among the Czech parties, the agreement recently concluded between the Czech and Slovak National Fronts should contribute greatly towards a settlement of one of the Republic's outstanding difficulties—a final definition of relations between Slovakia and the Central Government. This latest agreement (for the two previous agreements see Summaries No. 296, June 6th, 1945, and No. 341, May 1st, 1946) redefines (a) the legislative and executive competence of the Slovak National Council, (b) the powers of appointment invested in the President, and (c) stipulates that, on the basis of the elections, changes shall be made within two months in the composition of the Slovak Council. Finally, with a view to securing unified economic control throughout the Republic, a Supreme Accountancy Office shall be set up in Prague; its executive organ in Bratislava shall be the Supreme Control Board.

POLAND.

The Polish Provisional Government has been officially informed that the financial agreement of the 24th June, reported in the last Summary (for details see Summary No. 342) will not be ratified until His Majesty's Government has received assurances that elections in Poland, in accordance with the Yalta and Potsdam agreements of 1945, will be held this year at a given date, and that the stipulations of these agreements, concerning the actual holding of the elections, will be fulfilled. In particular the note suggests that these stipulations would not be fulfilled, if there were any indications that measures had been taken to suppress any of the existing political parties, to obstruct their usual activities, or to discriminate unfavourably against one or more of them as regards freedom of organisation, assembly or public expression.

Meantime, on the 25th June, the Polish Provisional Government was informed by the United States Government that the suspension of the agreement to transfer surplus property to Poland, had been cancelled (see Summaries No. 341, 342, and 346). As to the Export Import Bank Loan, however, the Department of State felt that final action on this should wait until the United States Government had received assurances that the Polish Provisional Government had fulfilled all the conditions of the agreement of April 24th, 1946, under which the credits were to be extended.

At the time of writing, no official statement on the results of the referendum of June 30th has been issued. It had been forecast that as much as 50 per cent. of the electorate might abstain from voting, partly from a feeling of distrust over the whole procedure, partly because of the underground movements' propaganda against voting, and also because of a fear of reprisals by supporters of the Bloc. In general, it was expected that nearly everyone would vote affirmatively on the second and third questions, relating to the new economic structure, and the Oder–Neisse frontier. As to the question on the abolition of the Senate, the leaders of the Bloc are credited with the conjecture that the "Ayes" would have a majority of 60 per cent.

Fractional votes are expected from the underground right-wing movements WIN ("Freedom and Independence") and NSZ ("National Armed Forces"), the former advising "Yes" to the third question only, the latter "No" to all three.

Correction.

In Summary No. 347, p. 5, line 20, the words "led by M. Wojcik, the general secretary," should read "led by M. Rek, the former deputy general secretary."

THE SOVIET UNION.

The Paris Conference has been in the forefront of the news during the past week, and has, on the whole, been well covered, the main emphasis being laid on the alleged efforts of the Soviet delegation to secure a fair deal for Italy, which were said to be much appreciated by the Italians. Generally, the reports of the negotiations were mildly optimistic in tone, though the Trieste question continued to be put forward as the key to the whole situation, and no suggestion was given of any progress having been made on this matter. The French plan was described as excessively complex and as liable to create instability owing to its temporary character. (See under "The Paris Conference.") Several hints have been thrown out that the British need Trieste as a foothold in South-Eastern Europe; a very unpleasant article on the Mihailovich trial, refuting the statements of Colonels Bailey, Hudson and Macdowell actually connected their alleged activities with the present Anglo-American attitude over Trieste.

Criticism of the United States plan for the control of atomic energy and praise of the Soviet plan have continued; apparently the main Soviet observer at Bikini described himself as not greatly impressed by the results of the test. A Moscow broadcast took the line that the Bikini bomb though it had not brought Doomsday on the world, had blown up something more important than a couple of obsolete ships—it had blown up every vestige of confidence in the seriousness of American talk about atomic disarmament. In general the United States has come in for a large share of attention; attacks were maintained on the American search for bases, and the plan for inter-American military collaboration was described as an attempt to create a military bloc at a time when there was no threat to the American continent; such a plan would endanger the vital interests of the Latin Americans and did not correspond to the interests of universal peace and security. Reactionaries in the U.S.A. were also accused of attempting to make their country use food as a weapon to enforce American foreign policy, this charge being called forth by Mr. Dirksen's amendment to the U.N.R.R.A. allocation bill proposing that the despatch of U.N.R.R.A. supplies should be conditional on the free admission of American correspondents into the receiving country. Publicity was also given to the prosecution in Washington of the Chairman of the U.S.-Soviet Friendship Council for refusing to submit his files to the Dies Committee. The Soviet Government has rejected the American protest at the refusal to admit four American newspapermen into Roumania.

The Executive Committee of the W.F.T.U., which has just concluded its meetings in Moscow, ran into some rough waters. M. Tarasov, in the course of stormy exchanges with Sir Walter Citrine, accused the latter of supporting an American plan for dividing the W.F.T.U. into a western and an eastern grouping, the former of which would in effect, be a revival of the Amsterdam International. M. Kuznetsov, however, appeared anxious to avoid a breach and treated the British delegation with marked consideration at the official reception. At that reception, which was held in the Government Guest House, it was observed that the painting of the signature of the Anglo-Soviet alliance, which had hitherto dominated the main room, had been removed; correspondents' messages merely reporting the removal were passed, whereas those which ventured on comment have hitherto been held up. The Greek delegation never reached Moscow. The Russians have withheld a visa from the negro representative from the Gold Coast. The French delegation usually supported the Russian point of view at the sessions.

The new Swedish Minister to the U.S.S.R., M. Gunnar Högglöf, has reached Moscow. (For the Soviet-Swedish trade negotiations see under "Sweden.") The Soviet-Danish trade agreement is still being negotiated (see under "Denmark").

The Mongolian People's Republic has applied for membership of the United Nations in a telegram to Mr. Trygve Lie from Marshal Choi Balsan, the Mongolian Prime Minister. Since its establishment as a People's Republic under Soviet auspices in 1921, Outer Mongolia, closely linked as it is with the Soviet Union, has had no independent relations with other Powers; the very small number of foreign contacts are maintained through the intermediary of the Soviet Union and directly controlled by the latter. There is a Mongolian Legation in Moscow, but it is not allowed any contact with other diplomatic missions with the sole exception of the Chinese Embassy. The application seems obviously designed to increase Soviet voting strength, while many important and independent European countries, neutral and ex-enemy, are still outside the United Nations.

A bill has now been passed by the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. abolishing the former Checheno-Ingush and Crimean Soviet Socialist Republics. The former Crimean A.S.S.R. is demoted to the status of a region or krai of the R.S.F.S.R. but no mention is made of the new status of the Checheno-Ingush territory. It was publicly admitted for the first time in the U.S.S.R. during the discussion of these measures that many Chechens and Crimean Tatars joined volunteer detachments set up by the Germans during the war. In view of this disloyalty to the Soviet Union the Chechens and the Crimean Tatars were transported to other districts of the U.S.S.R. The deportation of the Crimean Tatars from the Crimea, where they have been for many centuries the basic agricultural population, must result in far-reaching changes in the aspect of the country and the structure of its population. It is curious that silence is still preserved officially in the Soviet Union regarding the fate of the Kalmyks, though it was indirectly revealed by the last Soviet election lists that the Kalmyk A.S.S.R. had been abolished; a political-administrative map of the U.S.S.R. published in 1946 contains no Kalmyk national unit.

Three decrees have just been published in the Bulletin of the Supreme Soviet stating that former citizens of the Russian Empire or Soviet citizens having lost their citizenship living in France, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria can recover it by applying to their respective Soviet Legation or Embassy before the 1st November (for Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, the 1st October). There seems to be some eagerness to receive new citizens, as the decrees provide that persons failing to make application within the prescribed period may be granted Soviet citizenship "on general grounds." Meanwhile, Armenians continue to be gathered in. 1,806 have just reached Batum from Beirut and two representatives of Soviet Armenia have arrived at Braila to establish contact with the President of the Armenians of Roumania with a view to arranging repatriations.

The Five Year Plan has now been extended to Transcarpathian Ukraine; it provides, apart from agriculture, for the development of the timber and pulp industry and for the mining of brown coal. The plan made no mention of oil, though earlier reports stated that in the Bitkor [sic] area more oil was already being produced than before the war.

In view of the current interest in Arctic problems and development the award of Stalin prizes to two Soviet scientists for meteorological studies of the Central parts of the Arctic Basin is noteworthy. According to an interview given by the Minister for Higher Education, Kaftanov, their studies "radically change existing ideas on the general circulation of the atmosphere in the Arctic Basin." The greatest Soviet oceanologist, Vize, was also awarded a Stalin prize for his work: "The principles of Long Ice Forecasts." The award of a Stalin prize to A. P. Zhdanov for his discovery of new forms of splitting of atomic nuclei produced by cosmic rays should also be mentioned.

The U.S.S.R. Ministry of State Control has announced that following an inspection of the financial administrative activities of numbers of enterprises and institutions many gross abuses have come to light. It was disclosed that bonus money was being allocated for improper purposes, money and material appropriated by individuals, and money and bonuses unlawfully obtained. Among the worst offenders were the heads of the Russian Diesel Works, who cooked the factory accounts in such a way as to enrich themselves substantially. In this case and in several others of the same nature the guilty parties were punished by fines and dismissal. Similar financial scandals were recently revealed by Pravda Ukrainy (1st June) in the Ukraine. These cases of financial chicanery have been increasingly noticeable in recent months in the Soviet press. They probably reflect the present strained economic conditions in the Soviet Union and the temptation to peculation to which responsible officials are exposed and apparently succumb.

The Ministry of Trade has decreed new price reductions averaging 40 per cent. for various light industry products and consumer goods. The existing price rebates for industrial goods obtained formerly by ration books are abolished.

By decree of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Council Præsidium, the Ministry of Electrical Industry is to be divided into the Ministry of the Communication Means Industry and the Ministry of the Electrical Industry.

A series of measures (e.g., scholarships, renaming of towns and institutions) have been passed, designed to perpetuate the memory of ex-President Kalinin among the Soviet peoples. Most noteworthy among them is the renaming of Königsberg as Kaliningrad.

Errata.

It was stated in error in last week's Summary (see "Soviet Union," p. 6) that "Detailed Anglo-Soviet trade discussions are taking place in Moscow." Page 6, line 21, of the same Summary should read: "an annual credit of 200,000,000 for five years."

SCANDINAVIA.

Sweden.

The Swedish Riksdag has unanimously passed a resolution authorising the Government to take the necessary steps for Sweden to join the United Nations Organisation. In moving the resolution M. Undén emphasized that application for membership implied acceptance of the United Nations' obligations without reservation and rejected any idea of Sweden seeking to re-insure herself by joining any Great Power bloc. According to a Swedish broadcast, M. Günther, Swedish Foreign Minister during the whole of the war, has been appointed Swedish envoy in Rome. It will be remembered that his appointment as Minister in Copenhagen immediately after the end of the war met with a good deal of opposition in Denmark partly because in Danish minds he was held largely responsible for Sweden's appeasement policy towards Germany. This Danish opposition finally led to his resignation from his appointment. It remains to be seen whether this renewed attempt to restore M. Günther to the diplomatic scene will be more successful.

Denmark.

M. Rasmussen announced at a Danish Press Conference on the 28th June that M. Stalin had offered to accept in the Russian Zone of Germany half of the more than 200,000 German refugees still in Denmark, provided the other half is received in the other Allied zones. It has been confirmed from Washington that the Danes have approached the State Department on the subject and that General Clay has been instructed to show himself sympathetic towards the proposal if it is raised in Berlin. It looks, however, as though once again Great Britain will be expected to shoulder the lion's share of the burden, since according to American calculations the Americans and the French together do not anticipate to be asked to accept more than 20,000 out of the approximately 100,000 refugees to be received in the Western zones. This calculation is based on the perhaps rather arbitrary assumption that they would only give refuge to those Germans who have previously been domiciled in their zones. Most of these refugees have, however, come from the east of Germany.

On the 27th of June it was said in Copenhagen that the signing of the Dano-Russian trade pact was only a matter of hours.

Finland.

According to figures supplied by SATEVA (War Reparations Commission) goods to the total value of 74,500,000 dollars were delivered to the U.S.S.R. by the end of May, leaving a balance of 12,600,000 dollars to be settled before the second term of reparations programme expires on the 19th September. While the scheduled quantities of cables, timber and wood products were exceeded, the deliveries of plant and machinery fell short by 590,000 dollars owing to the difficulty in obtaining laminations for electric motors from abroad. The next few months are regarded as critical and it is feared that Finland will not be able to complete the full quota of machinery and ships within the stipulated time.

Indonesia.

On the 25th June, Mr. Sjarir arrived in Djokjakarta for discussions with Soekarno, Hatta and other leaders. Then, on the 29th, Soekarno suddenly broadcast the news that Mr. Sjarir had been kidnapped two days earlier by persons whom Soekarno described as "fifth columnists," in consequence of which he had himself assumed full powers. The "snatch," which apparently took place in Mr. Sjarir's hotel in Soerakarta, was carried out by armed men, believed in Batavia to be followers of Tan Malakka, the former Communist leader, and of Soebardjo, the former Republican "Minister of Foreign Affairs," both of whom are still under house arrest for conspiracy against the "Government." Mr. Sjarir's six companions—two "Ministers," a "major-general" and three advisers—were also removed. A "Government" spokesman was careful to point out that Mr. Sjarir still enjoyed the full support of Soekarno and the rest of the "Cabinet," and that the necessary steps were being taken to obtain his release. These proved successful, and all seven men were returned to Soerakarta by a detachment of the "Republican National Army," none the worse for their experience. Mr. Sjarir has since arrived at Batavia, where, after a long interval, he and Dr. van Mock will resume negotiations.

Belgium.

After an interval of five weeks [see Summary No. 345, 29th May, 1946], Belgium is once more faced with a serious outbreak of strikes. On the 26th June, a considerable number of men employed in the steel and metal industry in the Liége area came out on strike with demands for wage increases, the structural reform of the industry, and immediate convening of the National Labour Conference. So far, the strikes have mainly been confined to the Liége area, but within it, they have spread with great rapidity. By the evening of the 27th, no less than 50 metal works, 26 coalmines, 6 power stations, a tramway company and 14 miscellaneous works, employing a total of 35,536 men, had been affected. This total was appreciably increased during the 28th, when employees from another 27 concerns joined in. As in the previous outbreak, there are rumours of an imminent general strike. Giving these figures to journalists at a Press Conference in Brussels on the 28th, M. van Acker observed that it might be wondered why these strikes had occurred in the Liége area "rather than elsewhere." The reason was that they had been organized there. When strikes were organized, he continued, there came a moment when the workers could no longer be held back. So often, the men who engineered the strikes were the "unwitting tools" of persons who wanted to "harm the country." The Trotskyist Party (whose sponsors are known)," said M. van Acker, "has, according to my information, decided to stage strikes with a view to creating revolutionary conditions. This party has decided to arm its agitators; in addition, it will try to infiltrate into the coming National Labour Conference." He was aware that the strikers hoped to get wage increases; but he was also aware that the "majority of the workers" asked "nothing better than to remain at work." That applied to the strikers just as much as to the men still at work." The Government had issued orders for the taking over of the staffs of the concerns involved in the strikes, and had also issued appropriate instructions in regard to strike pickets. In conclusion, M. van Acker emphasised that wage increases were at the moment quite "out of the question." The fruits of the Government's price control policy were just beginning to be gathered; but much still remained to be done. Obviously, not all wage scales were fair, and those that were not had to be reviewed—but at the "right time." So long as he remained head of the Government, he would act according to his conscience, and in the best interests of the country.

FRANCE.

The decision of the Foreign Ministers' Conference on the 27th June to give to France the areas she claimed from Italy, Tenda and Briga, and the Mont-Cenis plateau (see under "The Paris Conference"), was received with satisfaction in France where a surprising importance has been attached to the acquisition of these two small districts.

M. Bidault presented his government to the Constituent Assembly on the 27th June and received a vote of confidence of 516 votes to 2; the Parti Républicain de la Liberté abstained from voting. Leaders of the Communists, Socialists and Radicals all spoke in support of the new Government, and accepted M. Bidault's insistence on the need for establishing a permanent régime, after the holding of the new referendum and the general elections, in October at the latest. The programme of the Government, which M. Bidault read to the Assembly, was unusually modest. It expressed disappointment at the failure of the efforts made to secure a still broader basis for the Government but claimed that the new Cabinet was imbued with the spirit of the Resistance movement. It declared that the main task of the Assembly was the adoption of a new constitution. The programme of the Conseil National de la Résistance had been put on the statute book by the last Assembly; the Government would preserve the reforms thus obtained. As for the urgent problem of wages, the Government recognised the needs of the workers and would alleviate their distress as far as the economic situation permitted. The only real solution was an increase in production, and the Government would encourage this by their execution of the nationalisation measures already passed, by the gradual removal of controls and by encouragement of the spirit of enterprise.

The immediate measures aimed at improving the position of the poorest workers were drawn up at the cabinet meeting of the 2nd July and are to be presented to the Assembly on the 4th. On the same day an economic conference will open, under the ægis of the Ministry of National Economy. It will include representatives of the main employers' and workers' organisations and will discuss the wider problem of wages and prices, including agricultural prices. The C.G.T. is maintaining its demand for a general 25 per cent. increase in wages and certain big unions such as the metal-workers, the state employees and the teachers (who are badly underpaid) are already stating their claims. Consequently the new Government is faced with a problem which M. Gouin's Cabinet was able to avoid, but, on the other hand, as M. Blum has pointed out, they will benefit by taking office at a time when the economic situation generally is improving and when the main body of legislation demanded by public opinion has been put through.

M. Yves Farge has accepted the Ministry of Food but has added that he will resign if he is not given the necessary powers to carry out his task.

M. André Philip, who presided the Constitutional Committee of the first Constituent Assembly until he entered the Government, has been elected president of the new Constitutional Committee. The rapporteur is again a member of the M.R.P., this time M. Coste-Floret, one of the leaders of the right wing of the party. This fact illustrates the stiffening of opinion that is to be expected from the M.R.P. on the constitutional question; the prospects of speedy agreement between the three main parties are therefore doubtful.

The coal situation continues to create some tension between this country and France (see Summary 347). The French have put forward a plea for more coking coal to meet the needs of their steel industry and for coal for domestic consumption next winter. They suggested that there should be four-Power discussions in Paris on this question but were persuaded by H.M.G. to leave out the Russians, at least for the present. Talks are planned between British, French and U.S. experts at which constructive proposals will be put forward by the U.K. delegates.

SWITZERLAND.

The financial agreement concluded in Washington on the 21st May between Great Britain, France, the United States and Switzerland concerning the disposal of German assets in Switzerland (see Summary No. 346, 5th June) was discussed in the National Council for several successive days. The President of the Council, M. Robert Grimm, told the members that it was not a question of modifying the Agreement, but only of accepting or rejecting it. The debate was marked by much bitterness. Indignant references were made to "dictated terms," "economic pressure" and "might overriding right." One journalist described the attitude of some of the speakers as marked by a sort of fatalism which impelled them to accept the Agreement even while bitterly criticising the injustice of its provisions. The whole debate, he said, left "une impression de malaise et de tristesse." M. Petitpierre, head of the Political Department, on the other hand, declared that concessions had been made on both sides and that neither party had endeavoured to impose its will upon the other by force or by threats. It would be a mistake to regard the Agreement merely from the standpoint of victory or defeat.

At the close of the debate, the National Council ratified the Agreement by 142 votes to 29, with six abstentions.

The Federal Council has decided to take all possible steps to prevent a sudden crisis resulting from a reaction to what is regarded as a present phase of "over-employment." Expenditure on non-essential public works is to be stopped; and industrial organisations have been asked to recommend to their members restraint both in investment and in undertakings which would help to maintain the balance of employment at a later date.

Following on the decision of the Swiss Government to establish an independent Legation in Uruguay, M. Hans J. Gremminger, who has been Swiss Consul-General in Uruguay for many years, presented his credentials in Montevideo on the 14th May as Swiss Chargé d'Affaires.

Improvements in the food rations include the decontrolling of chocolate, sweets, honey and candied fruit, although jam, syrups and artificial honey with a high sugar content still require coupons. Goat meat may now be sold without coupons, and horseflesh is reduced to half the former rate. Since the 13th May, only two meatless days are compulsory in restaurants, instead of three.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Basking in the (temporary) sunshine of patriotic emotion General Franco faces the future with confidence. Supporters of the régime have continued to find substantial comfort both from Mr. Bevin's defence of his policy at the Labour Party Conference and from the inconclusive outcome of the Security Council's deliberations in New York (see under "United Nations"). It is worth noting that, while the news of Mr. Bevin's statement was prominently displayed, the Spanish press refrained from any sort of effusive comment. This was, it appears, directly in accordance with instructions from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, who had the wit to realise that the usual ebullience, carrying with it inevitably violent abuse of Russia, would be anything but helpful to the British Foreign Secretary. Comment on the futility of the proceedings of the Security Council was on the expected lines.

Now that the Spanish press censorship is firmly in the hands of the non-Falangist Catholic disciples of Señor Artajo, the Foreign Minister, there is some evidence of an improvement in its working. One comes across leading articles actually originating in the offices of the respective newspapers instead of the rubber-stamp specimens required by the authorities. ABC, in particular under its new editor, Ramón Pastor, has recovered a modicum of personality. It has come to bear unmistakably the stamp of its proprietor, the Marquis Luca de Tena, an uncompromising Monarchist, who was summarily removed from the Board of Directors in May, 1944 for championing Gil Robles against the Falange press office (see Summary No. 247). Nevertheless, it must be said that General Franco, who is considerably impressed by the success of Colonel Perón in Argentina, is not at present disposed to do anything to encourage the Monarchists; it was as a result of injunctions from El Pardo, apparently, that a whole section in praise of the British monarchy was excised from an admirable account of the Victory parade in London by the London correspondent of ABC.

All this euphoria—the adventitious result of developments in the international field which are presented as justifying General Franco's policy—has not been without its effect on the negotiations in Madrid for the expulsion of obnoxious Germans from Spain and the liquidation of German interests there. The attitude of the Spanish Government on both these matters continues to be far from satisfactory. The Spaniards are jibbing at being asked to hand over many of these Germans whom they regard as having been "incorporated into Spanish life," and, at a recent meeting on the technical level, representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were harping on the difficulty in recognising the fiat of the Allied Control Commission in face of the virtual outlawry of the Spanish Government by the United Nations. When challenged on the fact that only a small number of the Germans whose names were on H.M. Embassy's lists were removed in the s.s. "Highland Monarch" in March Señor Artajo could only say that his civil governors were doing their best to round up these "wanted" Germans but that all this forcible repatriation was most unpopular and he was having a lot of trouble with his colleagues. With the dispatch to Bilbao early in June of a U.S. merchant vessel, the "Marine Perch," capable of taking some 950 of these Germans due for repatriation the Spanish Government were given another chance of proving their good faith in their public pronouncement of the 6th May and also the Note of protest of the 5th June, it may be recalled, they claimed to have done everything possible to facilitate the action of the British and U.S. Embassies. But this vessel sailed from Bilbao on the 9th June, with no more than 341 Germans on board, and of these only 83 altogether were on the Allies' "priority" lists, 37 of them on the first three lists presented before the departure of the "Highland Monarch" and 46 on supplementary lists presented in May. This means that out of the 734 Germans whose records as Nazi agents is particularly bad only 192 have so far been repatriated. These facts were the subject of a statement in the House of Commons by the Minister of State on the 24th June in reply to a Parliamentary Question. The Minister placed on record that H.M. Government "take a serious view of the failure of General Franco's Government to cooperate in this matter. . . ." On the question of German assets he gave notice that formal negotiations would not be opened in Madrid until an agreement with Sweden on German properties in that country had been made. The delay is unfortunate, since the Franco Government is not likely to be as compliant as it was last year when the European war ended or indeed this spring before the meetings of the Security Council.

If in Spain Monarchist stock has assuredly slumped since the beginning of the year, in Portugal it remains steady, with a tendency to rise. Reuter reported last week the arrival in Lisbon from Switzerland of Dom Duarte Nuno, the claimant to the throne of Portugal, with his wife and son; it is too early yet to say whether this journey has anything to do with Dr. Salazar's failing health.

ITALY.

On the 28th June Signor De Nicola was elected provisional President of the Italian Republic. Signor De Nicola is a Neapolitan, aged 69, a lawyer, who for thirty years was a prominent figure in South Italy. He had some ministerial experience in pre-Fascist Cabinets and was President of the Chamber of Deputies from 1919 to December 1923. After September 1943 he refused to serve in a Government under Victor Emmanuel III and played a leading part in the negotiations which resulted in Victor Emmanuel's withdrawal and the appointment of Prince Umberto as Lieutenant of the Realm. There was a strong feeling among politicians of all parties in favour of having as President a Southerner who would understand the monarchist tendencies of the South. Signor De Gasperi spoke of him to Sir Noel Charles as a man of great depth and foresight, whose advice would largely determine his own decision on the possibility of forming a Cabinet.

Agreement was reached by the Foreign Ministers on the 29th June to examine M. Bidault's plan for an autonomous territory of Trieste (see under "The Paris Conference"). In Italy, opinion remains on the whole bitterly opposed to the idea of internationalisation. Signor De Gasperi himself has continued to attack the suggestion. At a meeting of the Christian Democrat Party on the 24th June he said that if Pola and the towns of Western Istria were to be ceded to Yugoslavia and if Trieste and the rest of Venezia Giulia "were to be detached from the motherland under the guise of internationalisation, the Italian Government and people would not accept this iniquitous solution and would resist with all their strength and by all possible means." The Italian Prime Minister went on to say that Italy would submit her case to "every court including that of world opinion, which cannot permit that a war fought in the name of the liberty of people and of international justice should end in an oppressive and unjust peace." This statement corresponds very closely to that made in Paris by Herr Gruber, the Austrian Foreign Minister, who said that, in view of the rejection of Austria's claim to the entire Tyrol by the Foreign Ministers, Austria would bring her case to the notice of world opinion. Each Minister has pointed out that the ethnic question is being ignored in the case where their own nationals would form a minority.

On the 27th June the Foreign Ministers finally settled the Franco-Italian frontier in France's favour. The question of the wishes of the inhabitants of the villages of Briga and Tenda does not appear to have been seriously considered, the frontier has been settled on economic and strategic grounds. In the Briga–Tenda area France has obtained the large power-station of San Dalmazzo and in the Mont-Cenis area she will now control the water supply for large power-stations which provide electric power for industry in Piedmont. The news was received in Italy with great bitterness. Signor De Gasperi said that he had been astonished by the strength of Piedmontese antagonism to the Briga–Tenda decision in particular, and added that it was no good expecting the same cool common sense from the Italians as from the Anglo-Saxons.

In general the attitude adopted by the Italian Ministers to the Paris Conference and to the Treaty has been such that Mr. Bevin has felt it necessary to point out to them and to the Italian Press that the prevalent Italian view that their Government will shortly be called upon to sign the Peace Treaty on the dotted line is a misconception. The Italians should understand that when the full Peace Conference finally meets, the Italian Government will be able to attend and to make whatever representations they like in regard to all sections of the draft Treaty. H.M. Government are anxious that the new Italian Government should shoulder their responsibilities and look forward not backward.

Signor De Gasperi admits that he is aware of the difficulties of the United Kingdom and of the U.S.A., but he is himself faced with a very difficult problem. He is the leader of the largest party in Italy and feels that he cannot go against the wishes of that party or of other parties on whom he must depend for a majority. He is afraid, on the one hand, of the Communists and of Signor Nenni and his following among the Socialists, and, on the other hand, he fears the Right wing, particularly Signor Giannini and the Uomo Qualunque people, who polled quite a heavy vote. Signor De Gasperi points out that this Party numbers more than Mussolini's Fascists did when they were creeping up, though fortunately Giannini is not of Mussolini's calibre.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Prime Minister's press statement on his return to Hungary was designed not to arouse optimism about the results of his visit to Washington, London and Paris, and it did little more than summarise the questions discussed (these have already been reported in previous Summaries). He made, however, a special point of denying the remark attributed to him by the American press that he supported Mr. Byrnes' proposal for international control of the Danube, and this was emphasised in the version given by Moscow radio. In a later speech he announced that, besides returning Hungarian assets, the United States were prepared to increase their loan to Hungary for purchasing surplus war material.

The press greeted with caustic comments the announcement that a new Catholic party is being formed "on the precepts of the Gospels" and ridiculed the Party's badge—a white cross—saying that it stands for conspiracy and anti-semitic demonstrations. The Roman Catholic Church is constantly attacked for "undermining the democracy"; the Corpus Christi procession arranged for the 20th June was cancelled suddenly and without explanation, probably from fear lest it might provoke hostile demonstrations. While there is a lull at the moment in the disputes between the Left-Wing bloc and the Smallholders' Party, it is disconcerting to learn that the Social Democrats are organising a party guard.

The new British Political Representative, Mr. A. K. Helm, arrived in Budapest on the 29th June. France also now has a representative in Hungary, for, on the 19th June, the French Minister, M. Gauquié, presented his credentials to the President.

UNRRA has already delivered about one-quarter of the total consignment to Hungary; this includes 1,290 tons of fish, 851 tons of sugar, 136 tons of condensed milk, 276 tons of fats, 20 tons of baby food, 100 lorries as well as supplies of penicillin and inoculin.

The currency has lost all meaning; the Government seem to be making no special effort to curb monetary circulation, and to be basing their hopes for stabilisation on the new currency to be introduced in a few weeks' time. Meanwhile, notes bearing a face value of 10,000 billion pengö are in circulation, and the value of the taxation pengö, which a week ago was worth 22,000,000 paper pengö, has now risen to 27,000,000,000 pengö.

Rumania.

The Rumanian public accepted the trial of Antonescu as a matter of course. The reaction to the execution was one of shock, accentuated by the clumsy fashion in which it was carried out by the Communist gendarmes who provided the firing squad. It was probably this incident which led to the circulation of a report that the execution had been carried out by Jews, as the army refused to have anything to do with it.

There have been a number of outbreaks since that reported in Summary 347 of the 19th June at Cluj. On the 9th June at Craiova Groza attended a meeting of the Ploughman's Front and the local school children demonstrated in favour of the King. Police and Communists started shooting but the only casualty was one Russian officer who was shot by accident. A number of school children were arrested and four of them were sentenced to terms of imprisonment up to three years hard labour. On the 21st June a meeting was arranged to take place at Ileanda, a village 20 miles North West of Dej in the judet of Somes. The approaches to the village were blocked and some 1,500 people were prevented from attending on the ground that there was an outbreak of typhus in the village. This is an old trick which has been used to disfranchise districts which were suspected of being unfavourable to the government in power. In the course of outbreaks of fighting six people were hurt including two girls. On the 10th June Communist employés in the Gura-Ocniţei oilfield made an assault on the village of Topolovemi, the home of Mihalache and killed three villagers with axes. Much importance is attached in Rumania to freedom of association, but under conditions such as prevail at present when gatherings can always be misrepresented and used as weapons against the promoters, it seems a pity that the saner elements do not decide to abstain from demonstrations which can do no good.

In consequence of the difficulty of keeping up to strength the Military Police who have provided the guards for the British Political Mission, it was decided to replace them by detachments of Guards. Permission for these small bodies of troops to enter Rumania has been refused by Russia. Representations on the subject are being made in the proper quarter.

Yugoslavia.

Radio Belgrade broadcast an interview with Tito on Trieste and Venezia Giulia, in which he said that the representatives of the Western Powers at the conference in Paris "completely lack understanding for Yugoslavia's justified demands," and "we shall not agree to any half-way solution, which would be detrimental to Yugoslavia." He denounced a suggestion that the whole matter might be left to the Peace Conference or to U.N.O., since then Yugoslavia would be out-voted, which "might result in very serious changes in Yugoslavia's attitude to U.N.O." The Tanjug agency added that the reported attitude of the Western Powers' delegates, "particularly Byrnes and Bevin, have provoked the greatest resentment in the Yugoslav public"; and quoted an article in Borba saying that "the internationalization of Trieste would represent a hotbed of new conflicts."

It may be observed that the Yugoslav 4th Army, in and near Venezia Giulia, is being strengthened and armed with Russian material.

During April parties of Jewish displaced persons, numbering 582, were brought by rail through Yugoslavia to the Morgan line. Others have since arrived in circumstances which indicate the existence of a plan to promote unauthorized immigration into Italy, where the food situation precludes the admission of aliens.

In the Yugoslav-occupied Zone B of Venezia Giulia the peasants are reported to be much disillusioned about Tito's régime, by their own experiences and by reports of conditions in Yugoslavia. The passive peasant opposition continues in Slovenia, where Dr. Marushitch, Yugoslav Minister of Posts, has failed in an effort to create a new Peasant Party within the Communist-led Front.

On the 30th June fighting broke out in Trieste. The Venezia Giulia police were promptly armed, and British troops brought up to support them. Only one fatal casualty, an Italian, was reported, but a number of civilians and police were wounded. On the 1st July a general strike was called.

Hoxha, the Albanian Premier, arrived in Belgrade on the 23rd June. He was decorated with the highest Yugoslav order; and he and his suite were much fêted. (For a Bulgarian comment on the visit, see under "Bulgaria").

The negotiations over the conversion of H.M. Embassy's R.A.F. courier service to a civilian basis make no progress. The Yugoslav Foreign Ministry refers the matter to the Department of Civil Aviation, which exists only on paper, the matter being really within the province of the General Staff. But the General Staff says that the subject can only be discussed with the Foreign Ministry. The matter has not been made easier by the arrival of a British courier aircraft from Bari with insulting remarks about Tito scribbled on its tail. The British Chargé d'Affaires promptly tendered an apology and asked the R.A.F. in Italy to investigate the matter with a view to punishing those responsible. He subsequently received an indignant Note from the Yugoslav Government demanding satisfaction.

In the Mihailovitch trial a number of secondary figures have been interrogated, without any remarkable developments.

Greece.

The hopes, aroused by the conciliatory attitude of the Greek Government, that some compromise could be reached on the plebiscite question were not realised. Debate on the plebiscite Bill continued, marred by a number of unseemly incidents, through two all-night sittings of the Chamber; towards the end of the second M. Sophoulis and his party, having tabled a protest against the Government's continued refusal to put the constitutional issue squarely before the voters, and to declare in advance that they would accept the results of the plebiscite as decisive, walked out in a body. After their departure the Bill was passed, at 6 o'clock on the 26th, by a show of hands, General Zervas voting with the majority of EPE members against it. The ghost of the Metaxas dictatorship continues to haunt the Chamber's proceedings, and the noisiest incident of the debate was provoked by the attempt of M. Tourkovasilis, the leader of the small group of extreme Royalists, to speak in praise of it.

The decision taken by the Paris Conference on the 27th June to assign the Dodecanese to Greece, with their demilitarisation as the sole condition, was received in Greece with immense enthusiasm. The Cabinet decided the next day to set up a commission to prepare to take over their administration, and according to Athens radio, an all-party Parliamentary delegation is to visit Rhodes in the near future. M. Tsaldaris told the press that, if the islands' incorporation into the Greek state were concluded in time, their inhabitants would take part in the plebiscite. [See also under "Turkey."]

By a happy accident, the news of the Foreign Ministers' decision was received while the Chamber was discussing the Government's recent decision to exchange diplomatic representatives with Italy. The exchange of letters between the two Governments took place on the 24th June; the Greek representative with the Italian Government is to be M. K. Vatikiotis, at present assistant delegate to the Allied Council for Italy, who has the personal rank of Counsellor. The Italian representative has not yet been designated. The resumption of relations has been generally welcomed in Greece, on the understanding that Greek reparation claims against Italy receive satisfaction (according to a Paris broadcast, the figures submitted to the Conference of Foreign Ministers under this heading were 800,000 dollars general reparations, 223 million dollars Italian occupation costs, and 1,855 million dollars Greek war costs, total 2,078·8 million dollars). Indeed, now the stumbling-block of the Dodecanese has been removed, there is sufficient community of interest between the two countries to make possible a new and fruitful relationship between them.

The budget for the fiscal year 1946–47 was presented to the Chamber on the 7th June, but has not yet been debated. Expenditure was estimated at 1,576,714 million drachmae, revenue at 1,401,284 million, leaving a deficit of 175,430 million drachmae. In his very long introductory speech the Finance Minister, M. Khelmis, explained the importance, from a budgetary point of view, of increasing production both in agriculture and in industry, which, he said, in Greece could only be done by stimulating private enterprise; largely for this reason, the chief source of normal revenue was to be indirect taxation. He emphasised the impossibility of meeting the costs of reconstruction, for which only 100,000 million drachmae were allotted, from normal revenue; reparations payments from Italy, Germany and Bulgaria were the only source from which these could be met.

Albania.

Although in present circumstances reliable information about Albania is hard to obtain, there is good reason to think that the following points can be vouched for:—(1) The Albanian Army remains at least partially mobilised. (2) While there has been no mention in the local press, or on the wireless, of H.M.G.'s protest about the Corfu Channel incident, it is rumoured that it was a Russian officer who gave the order to the shore batteries to fire. (3) Dissident Albanian forces are believed to be increasing their hold in remoter districts in the north and north-east. (4) In the south comparatively large numbers still attempt from time to time to cross the border into Greece.

Further confused allegations involving British army officers have been made during the trial of the 37 so-called "Fascist traitors" now going on at Tirana; but none of them can be said to amount to very much, apart from one defendant's sensational tale—which of course lacks all confirmation—to the effect that a major attached at the time to our Military Mission remarked to one of the would-be insurgents that he and his friends could hardly expect any support from the British as they had not yet achieved anything worth while. To this the reply was that they had organised the murder of a young man at Kruja. Thereupon the major is supposed to have said that it would have been more useful to assassinate Professor Malleshova or General Xoxe [Enver Hoxha's two principal supporters and colleagues]. Other defendants denied this.

The Albanian wireless and press have been eloquently silent on the subject of the indiscreet message about Albania's future relation to Yugoslavia which was sent last week from Belgrade to Sofia and is referred to below under "Bulgaria." In a statement made to the Belgrade press Enver Hoxha has once more asserted his country's "right" to membership of the United Nations and complained of the inadequacy of UNRRA supplies.

Bulgaria.

If it has really been the object of the Communists during the last few weeks to provoke the hitherto most patient and law-abiding ranks of the Opposition into open rebellion while they themselves still have a really large Russian army of occupation to succour and reinforce them—and there has certainly been every indication that this has been the case—then it can only be said that they have once more gravely miscalculated. Well led by Petkov, who has shown both sagacity and courage, the Opposition have stolidly bided their time. On the 22nd June the British and American Political Representatives at Sofia were handed by Petkov a memorandum setting out in restrained and dignified terms what may be called the Agrarian Party's Grand Remonstrance. Ten former Cabinet ministers and five other leading officials belonging to Bulgaria's most representative party subscribe their names to this document, in which the chief factors in an intolerable situation are summed up and the tyranny and oppression exercised by Communist bullies in all parts of the country are once more exposed. There is every reason to think that should the question of fresh elections be brought up again at this juncture by the Great Powers, the Opposition as a whole would be only too glad this time to take part.

In accordance with a decision taken on the 27th June by the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Bulgarian navy is to be reduced to 7,250 tons and 2,500 men, i.e., roughly two-thirds of the present strength.

There are grounds for anticipating that a Russian proposal is likely to be put forward that the Bulgarian army, now believed to be about 60,000 strong, should be reduced to 30,000 men. If this were carried out, the army would on political grounds almost certainly lose its soundest elements, and it would moreover be overshadowed at once by the militia, who are thought to number about 40,000 men now and are armed with machine-guns and tanks. A law unto themselves, these Communist toughs are under the sole direction of the Minister of the Interior, and it is they, of course, who keep the countryside in the prevailing state of terror.

It will be remembered that it was because of the outspoken way in which he had written criticising the Communists for their constant interference regarding training and promotion in the army that Kristiu Pastuhov was arrested last February. His trial for fostering disaffection was concluded last week, when in spite of his good solid record as a public man and his 72 years of age he was sentenced to five years' solitary confinement, with deprivation of civic rights for a further five years. Hearings in the G. M. Dimitrov case have been resumed.

The British Political Representative reports that an organised campaign is being conducted against all Bulgarians who have anything to do with the British or the Americans. Such unwary people have their homes or premises periodically searched: they are frequently held up and questioned, and in some cases they have been flung into prison without any justification and subjected to gross indignities. Meanwhile on the 29th June Kolarov tried his best to ingratiate himself with both Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes in Paris without turning a hair.

On the 25th June the Zveno paper, Izgrev, published a message from its Belgrade correspondent alleging that General Hoxha's visit to Marshal Tito was believed to foreshadow the impending incorporation of Albania into Yugoslavia. For spreading this "tendentious and malevolent report" the correspondent has already been expelled from the Bulgarian Journalists' Union.

Turkey.

Although, under the treaty of Lausanne of 1923, Turkey surrendered sovereignty over the Dodecanese, she is not unnaturally interested in the fate of these islands. In recent years the Turkish Government have seemed to have themselves no territorial ambitions in the Dodecanese and to entertain no objection to the islands passing to Greece with whom their relations are so close. But the Foreign Ministers' decision on the 27th June to award the Dodecanese to Greece has prompted the Turkish Government to evince some fear with regard to Symi and Kos, which lie particularly near the Turkish coast, and Castellorizo, which, besides being close to the mainland, is a long way from the Dodecanese proper. As the Turkish Government have never objected to Greece holding Samos, Chios and Mytilene—which are also very near to Turkey—subject to demilitarisation, it may be that, as regards Symi and Kos at any rate, the Turkish Government will on reflection find that demilitarisation meets the case (see also under "Greece").

Quite apart from the question of the Dodecanese, Turkey and Greece do not see eye to eye about Imbros and Tenedos at the mouth of the Dardanelles. To the tiny Greek communities in these two islands the Turks pledged themselves under the Lausanne treaty to grant a small measure of autonomy. But the pledge has never been honoured, and now some clamour in a section of the Greek press and an official demand of the Greek Government have induced Angora to promise Athens full satisfaction.

No progress has been made with the question of the Straits. The Soviet Government is evidently anxious to inveigle the Turks into a bilateral discussion and in particular into an admission of the paramount importance of the Straits for Russia. The Turks continue to maintain that until the Russian demands for a base on the Straits and for Kars, Ardahan and Artvin are withdrawn they will not discuss the Straits. But the Soviet Government show no sign of dropping their demand for a base.

It now appears that in the municipal elections on the 26th May, although the new Democratic Party did not participate as such, individuals belonging to that party beat candidates of the dominant People's Party at various places, notably Afyon-Karahisar, Uşak, Isparta and Osmaniye in Western Anatolia. This was symptomatic of a prevailing discontent with the continued mobilisation which turns a million potential producers into consumers, with the high cost of living and with the continued restrictions on trade. The present Government seem to reckon that when the general election takes place on the 21st July this discontent may produce an Opposition of 100 in the total of 457 seats. There is no reason to doubt them when they say that they would welcome such a result as a healthy political development. But, although President Inönü has declared that the People's Party must frankly face the prospect of surrendering power in the event of defeat, there is little doubt that Party expects no such thing and would be extremely loth to be brought to it. An event which may have some influence on the elections is the announcement that Marshal Fevzi Çakmak is going to stand as a Democratic Party candidate. The Marshal is a diabetic old gentleman of 72, but as the man who was Chief of Staff during all Atatürk's time he remains one of the outstanding personalities of Turkey. His adherence to the Democratic Party might win it the support of many waverers. In particular it might serve to dispel the evil odour in which the Democratic Party has been enveloped by effusive but unsolicited Soviet support.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Egypt.

The apathy of the Egyptian public regarding the Treaty negotiations, which had become apparent, has now been broken by a series of articles in the press expressing some anxiety at the adjournment. Ali Shamsi Pasha, in an interview with the Ahram published on the 25th June, said that he thought the position was very disquieting and that the present conduct of the negotiations in Cairo and London amounted to temporisation, which was not in Egypt's interest and would soon become intolerable. Hussein Heikal Pasha, in an interview given to the weekly Akhbar al Yom, warned Mr. Bevin that, while his difficulties are understood, the patience of peoples is limited. He criticised the failure to reduce the British garrison immediately after the end of hostilities leaving only the 10,000 troops allowed by the 1936 Treaty, who could have been restricted to the Canal Zone, so as to create a really favourable atmosphere before negotiations were started. Public interest was now focused on the proposal for a Common Defence Committee, which had been accepted in principle, but the Egyptian negotiators would insist on total evacuation. Makram Ebeid also referred to the Defence Committee in an article in his paper, the Kutla, on the 29th June, but labelled it as a new attempt by His Majesty's Government to make Egypt a zone of British influence. He asked whether it meant that Egypt would be under a disguised protectorate, and said that, although Egypt preferred an alliance with Great Britain to one with any other Power, she would prefer not to make such an alliance if it carried with it any restriction on her independence. He mentioned the class of Egyptian who sees no need for such a Treaty at all and considers that the United Nations Charter does away with the necessity for a military alliance. The number of people with this view will, he thinks, increase if the negotiations fail or even if the conclusion of a Treaty on a sound basis is delayed. This article seems to have started a rumour that Makram Pasha intends to resign from the delegation, but he denied it in an interview given to the Bourse Egyptienne. The Musawwar, a weekly illustrated review, after recording his disagreement in principle with his colleagues on several major issues, asked him why he continued to negotiate. He replied: "I am fulfilling my duty to the end; at the moment of signature I shall leave my place blank!"

Palestine.

In the early hours of the 29th June the Jewish Agency's building in Jerusalem was occupied and searches were carried out in a number of offices in Tel Aviv and in settlements in various parts of the country. Five senior officials of the Jewish Agency were arrested and a large number of other persons detained for investigation. Resistance was slight, and a communiqué issued late on Saturday afternoon reported that there had been no serious incidents and practically no use of firearms. Three Jews and one British soldier were killed, and a small number of Jews was admitted to hospital for injuries.

His Excellency the High Commissioner broadcast a statement in which he pointed out that the measures previously taken to check the outrages committed by some members of the Jewish community had been restricted and localised in the hope that reason would prevail. This hope had not been realised. He went on to give a solemn warning of the Government's determination to stamp out violence and terrorism from whatever quarter they came. The occupation of the premises of the Jewish Agency was necessitated by evidence of the part it had played "in the organisation and direction of, and in co-operation with," the forces of disorder. It was not the intention at this time to proscribe or close the Agency. He ended with an appeal to all classes of the people of Palestine to co-operate in the tasks of restoring normal conditions.

The Chief Secretary, Sir John Shaw, gave a press conference at which he said that Dr. Weizmann was not amongst those detained, but that he had been received by the High Commissioner during the afternoon. He announced the imposition of a temporary censorship to prevent the despatch of inaccurate or tendentious reports.

The Times, in a leader, remarks that the evidence of the complicity of the Jewish Agency in the acts of violence is "an unhappy commentary" on the view expressed by the Anglo-American Committee that the Agency "should at once resume active co-operation in the suppression of terrorism and of illegal immigration, and in the maintenance of that law and order throughout Palestine which is essential for the good of all."

A statement was issued by the Executive of the Jewish Agency in London on the 29th June, in which the measures taken in Palestine are characterised as an act of aggression against the Jewish people, and as provocative action "which is a culmination of a policy of violating obligations undertaken under the Mandate." After an expression of the opinion that such a step could have been taken only to appease the Mufti and on the advice of his Arab and British friends in the Middle East, the statement, characteristically passing over in silence the views of the Committee, ends with what is tantamount to an admission that the action was justified: "The Jewish people and its leaders will not be intimidated and will continue the struggle for the right of Jews to enter their homeland and live as a free and independent nation in the Jewish State." A combined meeting of the Vaad Leumi (National Council) and the Inner Zionist Council was held in Jerusalem on 1st July, attended by representatives of Jewish communities throughout Palestine, including the non-Zionist

Agudath Israel. The meeting denounced the arrests of the Jewish leaders and the desecration of the Sabbath resulting from the Government's action and declared that such a government could not expect co-operation.

The Prime Minister made a statement on the operation in the House of Commons on the 1st July and further defended the steps taken by the Government in the debate which followed.

Iraq.

On 28th June a demonstration was staged outside the British Embassy in Baghdad by a crowd of five or six hundred persons carrying banners with anti-British slogans and shouting for justice for Palestine. The police fired in the air and there was said to be some firing from the crowd. There were nine casualties of which one was fatal.

Persia.

Two communiqués issued during the past week by the Prime Minister seem to indicate that he is becoming impatient with the activities of the Tudeh party and is thinking of trying to put it in its place. The first contains a warning to landlords of villages in the Tehran district to deal fairly with their tenants but bids tenants disregard attempts being made by some political parties to persuade them to refuse payment of legal dues. Tudeh incitement to villagers to refuse to give up the landlord's share of the harvest has apparently been endangering the Government's grain-collecting plans on which the feeding of Tehran depends. The second communiqué draws attention to the abuse of the goodwill and indulgence extended by the Government to certain workers' organizations and conveys an emphatic warning that they will no longer be permitted to exceed their proper functions to the detriment of the public welfare. The Tudeh party have reacted strongly and in an article in Rahbar, have reminded Qawam as Saltaneh that he owes his present position to them and holds it at their pleasure.

The Prime Minister broadcast an important address to the nation on the 29th June. After a review of the policy pursued by his Government since its access to power he announced the formation of the "Iranian Democratic Party." The programme of the party was subsequently announced; it covers in considerable detail the aims in all fields of internal reform, and, after outlining the basis of foreign policy to be the preservation of friendly relations with all the Allies, particularly the Soviet Union, Great Britain and the United States of America, the intention is announced of "supervising the activities of foreign political representatives in Iran."

There are signs in Tabriz that the recent agreement does not satisfy all the local Democrats. A split in the party may result although present differences are being hushed up. The withdrawal of Pishavari appears certain to have a bad effect on the administration of the province which is already weak and muddle-headed and likely to become more so.

His Majesty's Ambassador called on the Persian Prime Minister on the 26th June and handed him an aide-memoire referring to the situation in the Anglo-Iranian oil-fields (see last Summary) and pointing out that His Majesty's Government hold the Persian Government responsible for ensuring that full protection is given to the company's employees and for taking immediate action against any who try to incite employees to strike or to commit acts of violence. Qawam as Saltaneh accepted full responsibility on behalf of his Government and said that he hoped that deficiencies on the company's part such as the housing at Agha Jari, would be remedied.

The report that the Provincial Council of Khuzistan had asked for privileges similar to those granted to Azerbaijan turns out, as expected, to be exaggerated. The President of the Council sent a telegraphic request without any reference to his colleagues, six of whom have now explained that they ask only for constitutional powers and certainly do not request the use of the local language (Arabic). A report of an Arab association, to be known as the Khuzistan Farmers' Union, has appeared in the press, but the Arab shaikhs, who are the leaders of the movement, which they style the "Arab Union," do not intend to change its name. They claim rights similar to those given to Azerbaijan and have announced that, while not opposed to the workers, they are against a gang of exploiters who are not workers themselves. The Tudeh are naturally somewhat alarmed at the creation of this opposition movement and have telegraphed to Tehran asking for "protection"; failure to provide it, they say, will make it necessary for them to have permission to make their own arrangements. At the same time the Tudeh have somewhat reduced the outward signs of their activity, and, while they are trying to find out the attitude of the British Government to the Arab movement, they are issuing pamphlets amongst the Arabs warning them that it is a British anti-Tudeh measure and advising them to rely on the Tudeh to solve their difficulties.

The situation in the oil-fields has not improved in spite of the arrival of the representatives of the Government on the 24th June. Further trouble has occurred at Agha Jari and the officials of the Company were expecting a general strike on 1st July which they feared might lead to serious disorder and bloodshed. Their fears so far have not been realised.

FAR EAST.

Philippines.

On the 4th July, the Philippines take their place among the nations of the world as a free and independent Republic.

In response to an invitation from the United States Government and the Government of the Philippines, the King has been graciously pleased to appoint Lord Killearn, Special Commissioner in South-East Asia, as His Majesty's Special Ambassador to attend the proclamation of Philippine Independence, and the inauguration of His Excellency Señor Manuel Roxas as President of the Republic, and to convey His Majesty's congratulations and good wishes to President Roxas.

An invitation to appoint Delegates to attend the ceremonies was also extended to the Australian Government, which has selected Commodore J. A. Collins, R.A.N., and Mr. H. A. Peterson, the Australian Consul-General at Manila, as its Representatives. Commodore Collins will bear a special message of good wishes from the Australian Prime Minister to President Roxas.

With the declaration for independence, the present High Commissioner to the Philippines, Mr. Paul McNutt, becomes the first American Ambassador to the Republic. General MacArthur will also attend the independence ceremonies and has already arrived at Manila.

Señor Manuel Roxas was elected President on the 27th April, when he polled 958,294 votes against 822,836 votes cast for the re-election of the outgoing President, Señor Osmena. President Roxas, who enjoys the support of many of the followers of the late President Quezon, is a dynamic speaker and conducted a vigorous campaign against his 68 years old rival, who made but one election speech.

In 1916, the "Philippine Autonomy Act" stated that "it is, as it always has been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognise their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein." Half a century has elapsed in the endeavour, and it was not until 1934 that the first really concrete steps to fulfil this promise took shape in the "Philippine Independence Act," frequently referred to as the "Tydings–McDuffie Act."

This Act provided for the holding of a constitutional convention in the Philippines and the establishment of commonwealth status for a transitional period of ten years, on the expiry of which, on the 4th July, 1946, the Philippines were to enjoy full political and economic independence as "a separate and self-governing nation." The withdrawal of the American army on the expiration of the transitional period was specifically provided for, although the question of the continued maintenance of American naval bases after that period was held open for further consideration. The continuance of free trade between the Philippines and the United States, subject to certain quotas, until 1940 was also provided by this Act. From 1940 a gradually increasing scale of export duties, rising from 5 per cent. in 1940 to 25 per cent. in 1946, was to be imposed until the date of independence, after which payment of full taxes would be imposed.

Subsequent events, however, brought about substantial modifications to the main provisions of the Act; and, almost at the eleventh hour, two additional bills concerning Philippine trade and rehabilitation were signed by President Truman.

In 1944, President Roosevelt declared that the "Philippine Independence Act" allowed for "a situation wholly inadequate to meet the conditions of modern warfare" and that the measure approved by Congress in a restatement of its policy towards the independence of the Philippines "will permit the acquisition of air and land bases in addition to naval bases and fuelling stations" and "is most welcome to Commonwealth authorities." In recent articles the American Press has stressed that from a military and naval point of view United States' relations with the independent Philippine Republic will become even closer than was the case when the latter enjoyed colonial status; and General Eisenhower is reported as stating that " we shall maintain no less than 79,000 troops there after July 1, in contrast with the less than 30,000 we had prior to Pearl Harbour."

President Roosevelt had expressed the hope that the Philippines might be granted independence " the moment the power of our Japanese enemies is destroyed," and that Congress would take the necessary steps to provide such rehabilitation and trade assistance as might be required to fulfil his promise that the new Republic would be " assisted in the full repair of the ravages caused by the war." Nevertheless, when the war in the Pacific ended and the Philippines were recovered from the Japanese there were some among those in responsible positions who believed that the political and economical state of the Philippines rendered it advisable that the date of independence be postponed for a further period. Mr. Paul McNutt called for an economic re-examination of the question of Philippine independence, and warned the Filipinos against " stepping off into an uncharted sea," which, he declared, might deprive them of ever regaining their economic liberty. The Philippine Commonwealth authorities, however, vigorously opposed any suggestion to depart from the scheduled date of independence, unless, indeed, the President should choose to advance the date.

A Commission of three, headed by Senator Tydings, proceeded to the Philippines to investigate and report on rehabilitation requirements; and, on their return two new bills were presented for deliberation by Congress, namely, the " Philippine Trade Act " sponsored by Congressman Bell, and the " Philippine Rehabilitation Act," sponsored by Senator Tydings. The Trade Act provides, subject to certain quotas, for eight years of free trade between the Philippines and the United States, followed by twenty years of tariff duties, gradually increasing each year by successive equal steps until full tariff rates have been reached. The Rehabilitation Act makes provision for a grant from the United States of U.S. $500,000,000 to meet war damage payments to private persons in the Philippines and the reconstruction and rehabilitation of public property. A further provision guarantees possession to the United States of property now held or to be acquired for the Army, Navy, or other Government Agencies.

The two bills depend one upon the other and have far reaching issues. The Trade Act requires the Filipinos to amend the Constitution which was approved by President Roosevelt with the " Philippine Independence Act of 1934," and during his recent visit to the United States President Roxas is reported to have stated that the Trade Act " is, in general, acceptable to us." But the average Filipino is not quite so sure that he is prepared to alter his Constitution in order to confer on Americans exceptional privileges in their future rights in his country and, in particular, their business undertakings in the natural resources of the Philippines. Certain sections of the community have given voice to outspoken criticism in unveiled suspicion that these measures are but a preparatory step towards American exploitation of their newly found independence.

It is interesting to note that the Rehabilitation Act contains a clause requiring that " no payments in excess of $500 shall be made until an executive agreement shall have been entered into between the President of the United States and the President of the Philippines, and such agreement shall have become effective according to its terms, providing for trade relations between the United States and the Philippines," so that assistance in respect of war damage is made conditional on Philippine acceptance of American free trade requirements; and, just as for Great Britain the discontinuance of Empire preference was a sine qua non to the American Loan, so for the new Philippine Republic is the acceptance of what is virtually an Empire preference agreement a sine qua non to financial provision for war damage and rehabilitation.

The passage through Congress of these bills was attended by considerable opposition; they were amended on no less than five occasions, and there appears to have been considerable reluctance among some to involve the United States in a preferential trade agreement, while others complained that the financial provision for rehabilitation purposes was not sufficiently generous. Left Wing opposition to both bills was particularly articulate. When finally they came before President Truman for his signature on the 30th April, there was an apologetic note in his statements that he had " to-day signed the two bills which constitute the heart of the programme for Philippine Rehabilitation and Recovery," and that " we are providing for the establishment, through an executive agreement, of an unprecedented plan of preferential trade relations with the Philippines to last for twenty-eight years . . . . This is unprecedented legislation for the United States, but the situation itself is unprecedented. We are about to grant political independence to these people. To-day we are giving them a chance to preserve and develop their nation on a temporary economic basis of trade preferences. Political independence without economic stability would be totally ineffective. I am happy to approve these two measures, which give notice to the people of the Philippines and to the entire world that we are redeeming our promises to the heroic Philippine people." By his emphasis on the " unprecedented " nature of this legislation President Truman seeks to blunt the edge of criticism from the free trade champions who are so vocal in the U.S. these days and at the same time to provide cover for attacks on Empire preferences.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Comment on international affairs has been divided between the Paris Conference, the Security Council, and the Atomic Energy Commission, and, in the absence of any sensational developments during the greater part of the week, has run on familiar lines. Discussion of the Foreign Ministers' Conference maintained its tone of unwonted sobriety and restraint. While disappointment was shown at the repeated failures to reach agreement with Russia on any major issue, particularly on Trieste, the majority of commentators remained determinedly optimistic that a general peace conference would shortly be convened. Though the New York Herald Tribune pointed out that prior agreement between the Big Powers was requisite if a general conference were to succeed, a number of its colleagues were more hopeful and felt that such a conference might somehow be able to solve the problems which had so far baffled the Big Four. Mr. Byrnes' ultimatum regarding a decision on the Conference date has accordingly been welcomed by most Americans who agree with the Secretary of State that the question must be finally settled " one way or the other."

The prolonged wrangling over the Evatt resolution on Spain and the confusion in which the debate terminated have increased misgivings regarding the ability of the Security Council to fulfil its role. In particular Mr. Gromyko's intemperate use of the veto brought to a climax by its application three times in one day, has made the veto problem the dominant topic in all discussion on the Council. The ranks of the original critics of the veto have been strengthened by a considerable number of Americans, who, indignant at its abuse by Russia, have apparently forgotten the earlier insistence of their own country on reserving this right. A number of more realistically minded commentators, however, have been at pains to point out that the fault lies, not in the existence of the veto but in the way it has been used by Russia to block ail agreements in which she is in a minority. The broadcaster, Mr. Vandercook, for example, sees the veto as a " kind of atomic bomb, a rare and deadly weapon " which " has been used by the Russians as casually as if it were a pea shooter." These commentators point out that it is highly improbable that the United States Senate would agree to its abolition or indeed that any of the Great Powers would be prepared to do so.

While Conservatives in general remained opposed to revision of the veto power in the Security Council they were indignant at Russia's refusal to give up her veto rights in the proposed machinery for atomic control, alleging that any nation taking this stand marked itself as suspect. A number of Liberals, however, including Mr. Swing and the New Republic, agreed with Mr. Lippmann in deploring the emphasis which had been given to this issue both by the Americans and the Russians, whereas the important points were the rights of inspection and the central control of atomic energy resources. Though nationalists were only too ready to treat the Pravda article as the final word from Russia and to abandon further efforts to achieve international control, the majority of writers were greatly relieved when Mr. Gromyko agreed to Dr. Evatt's suggestion for the establishment of a Working Committee to iron out the differences and produce a draft plan. At the same time President Truman's message to Mr. Baruch on 28th June assuring him of his full support was interpreted by some as an indication that the United States was not prepared to make material alterations in the Baruch plan.

A considerable amount of interest has been shown in the announcement of Great Britain's bread rationing programme. While, from the American point of view, the ration is regarded as an adequate one, the decision to introduce such an unpopular measure was regarded as an earnest of Britain's determination to play its full part in meeting the world food crisis. Radio speakers, in particular, paid tribute to British courage and generosity. This sympathetic note was struck by speakers of all political shades including some, like the left-winger Johannes Steel, usually notable for their bitter attacks on British foreign policy. At the same time great satisfaction has followed the announcement that America's grain export goal for the first half-year would be reached. A number of writers, however, thought it wise to underline President Truman's warning that "The crisis is not over. Co-operation and determined effort by the Public . . . . must be continued during the coming months of hunger abroad."

President Truman's unexpected veto of the Price Control Bill on the grounds that it would provide Government responsibility for, without Government control of, inflation, has provided the major sensation of the week. In the long drawn out struggle between the Administration and Congress on this issue the President has enjoyed the greater measure of popular support though Congress has had the backing of business circles. Thus his decision to veto the emasculated Bill, following the resignation of Mr. Chester Bowles, Director of the Office of Economic Stabilisation, has been applauded by a large body of opinion. Mr. Truman's fighting speech on this occasion is described as the best in his career and he is praised for showing both "wisdom and courage in electing to veto the Bill" (Washington Post, 1st July, 1946). Few people have been prepared to predict the consequences of an interim period of unrestrained price rises before Congress can (if it will) vote emergency legislation. Even business men who profess a belief that there will not be any immediate large scale rise in prices admit that food prices at least will increase. Congress has also been criticised for its compromise Bill to extend compulsory service, which is described as an "unprincipled political approach" to America's military responsibilities. Internationalists deplore the parochial attitude of Congress and its failure to provide the necessary means to enable the country to fulfil its world commitments in either the political or economic sphere. The New York Herald Tribune bitterly refers to "the fag end of a confused session with some Congressmen with their ears so close to the ground due to the coming election that they cannot hear anything."

LATIN AMERICA.

Argentina.

General von der Becke has now left the United States without making any statement about the result of his visit. The speculations of the United States Press include references to an Argentine request for a loan, and the omniscient Mr. Drew Pearson has affirmed that General von der Becke brought a long memorandum demanding that Argentine be licensed to manufacture all sorts of United States arms. General Perón ridiculed the suggestion of a loan by asserting that the United States owed Argentine some $600 millions (it is now reported that the United States has "unfrozen" Argentine assets to approximately this value): he added that the von der Becke mission was purely military and had resulted from information that the Inter-American Defence Committee wished for the discussions. Elsewhere, the President stated that his policy was to favour the development of the Argentine arms industry and that careful account would be taken of the question of standardization recommended by the Inter-American Defence Committee.

It seems clear that General Perón does want a settlement with the United States. Mr. Acheson's suggestion that there should be "deeds, not promises" in fulfilment of the Act of Chapultepec (see last week's Summary) has not called forth any protest from Buenos Aires. On the contrary, the treatment of German institutions and enterprises in Argentina has been discussed by the United States Ambassador, Mr. Messersmith, and the Argentine Foreign Minister, Dr. Bramuglia. Perón himself has declared that some Nazis have been tried, and that more will be tried. However, Perón has also taken care to point out that negotiations for a settlement are being carried on "under the direction of President Truman, Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Messersmith" on the one side, and himself and Dr. Bramuglia on the other, "without the intervention of third parties and especially of those whose past activities" had been harmful to Argentine sovereignty and Argentine–United States relations. This broadside at Mr. Braden has been accentuated by friendly references to Mr. Messersmith.

There is every reason to suppose that General Perón would take a truly Latin delight in unhorsing the perpetrator of the Blue Book, but there is no further report of a forthcoming resignation on the part of Mr. Braden: it has, however, been rumoured that if Mr. Messersmith were successful in bringing about a settlement in Buenos Aires, he might then succeed Mr. Braden in Washington.

Meanwhile General Perón has declared in an interview that too much weight should not be given to the establishment of relations with the Soviet Union (see Summary No. 347), and that there was no danger of "" idealogical contamination" because of Argentina's "genuinely Christian spirit." This seems destined to smooth the hackles of the large block of Catholic voters who supported Perón in the elections because the Communists where then in the other camp.

Brazil.

The reappearance of Dr. Vargas on the Brazilian scene has created a pother appropriate to the importance of the occasion. It will be recalled that, having maintained himself in power since 1930, Dr. Vargas was prevailed upon last year to consent to the holding of presidential elections, and that, having selected his War Minister, General Dutra, to be his successor, and having superintended the creation of the necessary political parties, Dr. Vargas began to wonder whether he need resign after all, and the army was constrained to see to it that he did. With Dr. Vargas out of the way, General Dutra was duly elected, though a large proportion of his presidential votes were Vargas votes, while his Social Democratic Party (PSD) was built up under Vargas' eye and the Labour Party (PTB) which also supported Dutra was originally a purely Vargas machine, incorporating the "Queremistas" or Vargas claque. Vargas himself was elected a senator for both the PSD and the Labour Party. A piquant complication is the fact that it was Vargas who, in order to split the liberal opposition, released the Communist leader, Carlos Luis Prestes, and thus originated the wave of Communist demagogy that has caused his successor many headaches and at least one sleepless night.

While General Dutra and his cabinet have been floundering in economic and political difficulties, and the new Constituent Assembly has appended three thousand amendments to a constitution drawn up largely by adherents of Dr. Vargas, the late dictator stayed at home and bided his time. Finally on the 1st June, he arrived in Rio de Janeiro to take his seat for the PSD. Greeted by a tremendous display of not unsolicited enthusiasm, Dr. Vargas may well have felt that the Brazilian in the street regretted the golden prime of good Haroun al-Rashid. He himself declared that he would give General Dutra his full support and stand aside from political struggles, though when asked about the success of Communism he took the opportunity of recommending Brazilian workers to join the Labour Party.

General Dutra and his Government can hardly have over-estimated these professions of detachment. The effect of Dr. Vargas' return to the house was in fact electric. On his first appearance the President of the Constituent Assembly happened to be absent, and Dr. Mangabeira, the Opposition leader, who was acting as deputy, took the opportunity to refuse to administer the oath. When on the 5th June Dr. Vargas took the oath, Dr. Mangabeira at once delivered a speech on the ex-dictator's misdeeds and put forward a motion approving the action taken by the armed forces in October when they secured Vargas' resignation. In the debate on this motion one member recalled the various occasions on which the ex-dictator had forcibly dissolved the Chamber and attributed Brazil's present difficulties to the selfish policy of the Vargas régime. The leader of the PSD, Sr. Nereu Ramos, sought a way out by proposing an expression of gratitude to the armed forces without reference to the occasion of the 29th October. However, the original motion against Vargas stood and was approved by 133 votes to 131. This vote is of considerable interest since it shows an important split in the PSD, 36 of whom joined with the Opposition (UDN) in favour of the motion, while 98 voted against. Needless to say, the Communists voted bodily in the Vargas interest.

It is interesting to note that no split occurred in the Labour Party. The present Minister of Labour is a member of this party, and he recently told H.M. Ambassador that he was leading an anti-Vargas wing of the party: this, it now appears, does not exist.

Since this event there has been considerable coming and going. General Dutra has expressed his confidence in Sr. Nereu Ramos, whose offer to resign has not been accepted. There has been much talk about the formation of a coalition government, in which General Dutra might bring together the anti-Vargas wing of his own party and the Opposition UDN. However, reports of interviews between General Dutra and opposition and PSD leaders have been denied, while the UDN press on the whole appears to have taken the line that General Dutra's difficulties are his own affair and that the UDN could only collaborate if all the Queremistas were removed from power.

Chile.

President Ríos died on the 27th June at the age of 58. His disease had been known to be incurable for a considerable time, and for the past six months his duties have been carried out by Vice-President Duhalde. A native of Arauco, Juan Antonio Ríos was for long a Radical Deputy and Senator, holding the posts of Minister of the Interior and of Justice as well as directing a number of national institutions. Elected to the Presidency in April 1942 when the first Popular Front President Sr. Aguirre Cerda died in office, President Ríos was the nominee of the Radical Party. He found, however, that there was considerable difficulty in holding together the coalition and was driven more and more to rely on cabinets of experts and technicians, renouncing the support of his own party and seeing the gradual disintegration of the Popular Front.

Since the virtual retirement of President Ríos, and the appointment of a Vice-President, Chile's internal affairs have passed through a severe crisis when the prolonged strikes engineered by the Communist Unions led to violence last February. The cabinet was then reconstructed and now consists of Socialists and technicians. Acting-President Duhalde derives no support from his own Radical Party. President Ríos' condition of health has long been public knowledge and there has been considerable jockeying for positions. It now becomes the Acting President's duty to call elections within 60 days, and there is considerable speculation about the possible candidates. Sr. Duhalde himself, it has been reported, would wish to stand if he could find a party. The parties of the Right have, according to press reports, nominated their candidates; the Conservatives, Senator Cruz Coke; the Liberals, Senator Maza; and the Agrarians, Senator Larraín. It has also been reported that Sr. Arturo Alessandri might run: Sr. Alessandri's adventurous radicalism has now mellowed into a rather militant conservatism: despite his 77 years, Sr. Alessandri is still extremely vigorous. It is reported that the Radical choice is Sr. González Videla.

UNITED NATIONS.

Security Council.

The session of the 26th June considered the work of the drafting Committee of three which had been set up (see last week's Summary) to try to secure an agreement on an amendment to the Polish resolution on the Spanish question. The Australian and the United Kingdom members had agreed on the following text, Dr. Lange of Poland making reservations:—

> "(1) Whereas the Security Council on the 29th April, appointed a sub-committee to investigate the situation in Spain, (2) and whereas the investigation of the sub-committee has fully confirmed the facts which led to the condemnation of the Franco régime by the Potsdam and San Francisco Conferences, the General Assembly at the first part of its first session, and by the Security Council by resolution of the date above mentioned, (3) and whereas the sub-committee was of opinion that the situation in Spain is one the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, (4) it is hereby resolved that, without prejudice to the rights of the General Assembly under the Charter, the Security Council keeps the situation in Spain under continuous observation and maintains it upon the list of matters of which it is seized, in order that it will be at all times ready to take such measures as may become necessary to maintain international peace and security. Any member of the Security Council may bring the matter up for consideration by the Council at any time."

The discussion got beyond the chairman's control, and became so confused that those present could not be certain of what votes had been taken, until they had studied the 39 foolscap pages of the verbatim report. Russia and Poland raised ceaseless objections. First, was the text an amendment of the Polish draft? The Chairman ruled that it was, and should be taken first. Dr. Lange said that it was a new motion, and after the Assistant Secretary-General (in charge of Security Council Affairs), M. Sobolev, had been asked to explain the rules of procedure, the Chairman's ruling, being challenged, was voted upon. It was upheld by 9 to 2. At this point the verbatim account becomes confused; but it seems that the text—or draft resolution—was immediately carried, also by 9 votes to 2. M. Gromyko then declared that as he had voted against it, it was vetoed, since in his opinion the matter was one of substance where the veto operated, and not one of procedure, where it did not. The question was put to the vote, and by 9 to 1 the Council held that it was procedural; but both the Chairman and M. Gromyko maintained that proceedings in such a case were governed by a statement made by the Four Powers in San Francisco on the 7th June, 1945, that, in case of dispute, for a question to be declared procedural or of substance the concurring votes of all the five veto-carrying Powers were required. Russia had just voted against, and her veto was valid. Dr. Evatt and M. van Kleffens argued that this 'statement' did not bind the United Nations, since it was not in the Charter, and Dr. Evatt summarized the futility of the position when he said that apparently Russia by a single vote could change a matter which 9 members had found procedural into one of substance. From this point onwards, M. Gromyko, by a kind of scissors-and-paste process, tried to transform the draft resolution back into the Polish resolution which had failed to secure agreement on the 24th. He was attempting, as Sir A. Cadogan said "if I may use a vulgar expression, 'to put it across us'." The Soviet delegate wished to reinsert a date, the 1st September, by which the Council must act. More important by far, he wished to eliminate not only the Sub-Committee's conclusion—see paragraph 3 of the text above—that the Franco régime was not an immediate threat under article 39 of the Charter; but also any reference to the rights of the Assembly. He argued correctly that the Council would do nothing against the rights of the Assembly, but he considered it unnecessary to say so. The U.K., Dutch, Australian and U.S. view, on the contrary, was that the reference to the Assembly must be left in, to remind the Council to drop the question from its agenda when the Assembly was ready to deal with it, the point being that article 12 of the Charter forbids the Assembly to "make recommendations" about any dispute or situation in respect of which the Security Council is exercising the functions assigned to it.

The position at the end of the meeting was that paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Evatt–Cadogan text were adopted, paragraph 3 deleted, and the last sentence of 4 adopted. M. Gromyko vetoed Dr. Evatt's proposal to adopt the "without prejudice to the Assembly's rights" formula as a new motion. Constitutional issues of the greatest importance were raised amidst the confusion of the debate. If the veto question is not soon dealt with, it will render the Council's procedure a mockery.

Atomic Energy Commission.

At the conclusion of the meeting on the 25th June it was agreed that the Chairman, Dr. Evatt, should make proposals for setting up a Working Committee to draft the main principles of a Charter, for a World Authority to control and develop atomic energy. The Committee would study both Mr. Baruch's plan and the statements the various other members had made. In the discussion the French and the Netherlands' delegates had declared that they saw no incompatibility between the U.S. and the Soviet plans: the Egyptian delegate had approved of the Baruch plan in toto, and had described the veto as the concept of a master race. Dr. Evatt himself saw no reason why the veto which existed in the Security Council should appear in an Atomic Development Authority. M. Gromyko asked for the Committee which had drawn up provisional rules of procedure to re-examine them, since he had various amendments to propose. On the 27th June four of these were adopted, one modified, and three rejected. Of the rejected the most important was the proposal that decisions on substantive questions and also whether a question came under "substance or procedure," should require a two-thirds majority of members present and voting.

The Working Committe held its first meeting, in private, on the 28th June, and decided to set up a sub-Committee, called No. 1, to examine the substance of proposals, made or to be made by Governments represented on the Atomic Energy Commission, and to make recommendations to the Committee for a plan of work suitable for the Commission.

Sub-Committee No. 1, consisting of the representatives of France, Mexico, U.K., U.S.A., and U.S.S.R. met on the 1st July under Australian chairmanship. The Soviet representative wanted a convention to outlaw atomic weapons taken first; but the others held that such a convention could not be isolated from the problem of control, &c. He next maintained that the American proposal to have no veto violated the rules governing the Security Council. To this the American reply was that the Security Council was not affected and that America would make no agreement which could be stultified by the right of veto.

Economic and Social Council.

The Nuclear Commission on Human Rights which completed its labours on the 2t0h May, suggested among other things that an "agency of implementation" should eventually be established. The Drafting Committee of the Economic and Social Council which finished its work on the report on June 16th, felt that the international implementation in each individual country of the human rights of the citizens of that country was a matter of extreme delicacy and complication requiring further investigation before any recommendation was made. The Committee accordingly asked the Human Rights Commission to make suggestions to help the Economic and Social Council to "work out arrangements for such implementation with other appropriate organs of the United Nations." The purpose of this request was on the one hand to ensure that the matter of implementation was pursued but that, on the other hand, the whole question of the relationship between implementation and domestic jurisdiction as defined in Article 2 (7) of the Charter was fully examined before action was taken and that the position in this matter of the other organs of the United Nations, particularly the Security Council which would be responsible for enforcement action, was fully safeguarded.

2. The Drafting Committee passed one resolution which broadened the previously defined scope of the activities of the Commission on Human Rights by empowering the Commission to direct its work not only towards such specific subjects as the drafting of an International Bill of Rights, Protection of Minorities, etc., but also towards "any other matter concerning human rights not covered by the items already enumerated." This means in fact that the Commission is not in any way limited in the scope of its recommendations to the Economic and Social Council on this subject.

3. Other items of particular interest in the final resolution of the Economic and Social Council endorsing the recommendations of the Drafting Committee, were the recommendation to include a human rights paragraph in the Peace Treaties, a request to Governments to consider the desirability of establishing information groups or local human rights committees within their respective countries to collaborate with them in furthering the work of the Commission on Human Rights. The Chairman assured the Russians that no Government would be compelled to set up such groups, and the U.K. representative understood that these groups would not be in direct communication with the Commission. Finally the recommendation empowering the Commission to set up Sub-commissions on the Freedom of Information, on the Protection of Minorities and on the Prevention of Discrimination. The Sub-commission on the Freedom of Information was proposed largely at U.S. initiative; the Soviet Delegation which had opposed the recommendations regarding international treaties and the setting up of information groups took the initiative in proposing the Sub-Commissions on the Protection of Minorities and the Prevention of Discrimination.

4. The Economic and Social Council finally accepted a recommendation of the Drafting Committee to promote the Sub-Commission on the Status of Women to be a full Commission.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS.

The Special Committee set up under a resolution of the Economic and Social Council dated the 16th February, 1946, to make a thorough examination of the problem of refugees and displaced persons, sat in London between the 8th of April and the 1st June, 1946. It proved impossible for the Committee to arrive at unanimous conclusions and the lengthy Report of the Committee brings out clearly the wide divergences between "Western" and "Eastern" views.

2. The Special Committee did, however, recognize that the problem of refugees and displaced persons was of international importance and that an International Refugee Organisation should be set up as soon as possible. The principal points of difference were:—

(a) What classes of persons should qualify for aid from the I.R.O., and (equally important) from what classes of persons such aid should be withheld; and

(b) Whether the I.R.O. should be established as an agency under the direct control of the United Nations; or whether it should be a specialized agency, financed and controlled separately, and in the latter case, whether it should or should not be under ultimate United Nations control.

3. In its Report the Special Committee recommended that the Organisation to be set up should be a specialized agency with no special control by U.N.O. There was no satisfactory definition of the classes of persons eligible for international aid. The Slav countries led by Russia and Yugoslavia were opposed to persons who were out of sympathy with the political régimes in their countries of origin as eligible for international aid. There was also considerable disagreement on questions of organization and finance, for example whether separate budgets would be approprate for large-scale resettlement schemes. On this last point the British Delegation entered a minority report ruling that such schemes might well be among the principal tasks of the I.R.O. and must therefore be subject to the same "ratio of contribution" as "normal" operational expenditure.

4. Included with the Report was a draft Constitution. The Special Committee owing to lack of time was unable to elaborate this in detail, and in particular the question of finance was left open, though the U.K. Delegation tried hard to secure the inclusion of some form of budgetary control by the United Nations Organisation.

5. When the Report was presented to the Economic and Social Council on the 13th June many of the points of difference were again argued at considerable length but the U.K. Delegation were able to secure the amendment of what they considered some of the worst features of the Report. In particular the finance provisions of the draft Constitution were amended to allow for the possibility of the administrative budget of the I.R.O. being submitted to the United Nations Assembly for approval, which would give the necessary degree of budgetary and administrative control. The U.K. Delegation also succeeded in getting large-scale operational expenditure subjected to the same ratio of contributions as normal operational expenditure, and in each case there is to be agreement about a ceiling, so that there will now be a proper limitation of the U.K. contribution.

6. The U.K. Delegation further succeeded in securing the deletion of an objectionable clause in the draft Constitution providing for a peripatetic Commission, including members of the countries of origin to visit refugee camps, etc., in the "British and American zones in Germany" and Austria and elsewhere.

7. The Economic and Social Council having now decided to establish an International Refugee Organisation, the next step is for the Report on this subject by the Economic and Social Council to be submitted to all members of the United Nations Organisation in time for their observations before the subject comes up at the General Assembly in September. The Secretary-General has been instructed to draft such technical clauses as are necessary to complete the draft Constitution of the I.R.O. from a legal point of view. A Committee on the Finance of the new International Refugee Organisation has been set up and is to meet in London on the 5th July with the task of preparing a report before the 20th July on the provisional administrative and operational budgets for the first financial year of the Organisation and on the ratio of contributions for the members of the I.R.O. The Secretary-General of the United Nations is to transmit this Report as soon as possible thereafter to members of the United Nations.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

On the 25th June the Deputies met in the morning and reached agreement on various minor problems. They also drew up a long list of matters still to be decided in the Italian Treaty. These the Ministers began to discuss in the afternoon, with M. Molotov bent, as usual, on delay, so that no major political problem was reached. On the question of Compensation for damage to Allied property in Italy they made no headway, M. Molotov reiterating that compensation should be limited to a third of the damage suffered, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes pressing for full compensation. M. Molotov discerned a discrepancy between the U.S. and British drafts on Italian property in the States members of the United Nations, and thought that these should be harmonised. It was done, and this problem seemed about to be solved.

Wednesday the 26th was a day of disappointment. In the morning the special deputies failed to agree upon a method of postponing the question of the Italian Colonies. In the early evening the Ministers met, in M. Bidault's absence, to discuss the Balkan treaties, and made no progress. It was an important meeting because it showed clearly M. Molotov's reason for insisting that the Riparian States should be left free to regulate Danube navigation, with no attempts to interfere with their sovereignty (see last week's Summary). The Ministers sought a formula, in which they could recommend the Danubian States to keep the Danube 'open.' M. Molotov insisted again that if the Ministers "expressed confidence," all would be well. Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Bevin, who were afraid lest the Danube become part of a closed economic area, wanted a guarantee inserted in the peace treaties, or failing that, a far stronger resolution than M. Molotov's pious hopes. To meet M. Molotov Mr. Bevin proposed a resolution of his own in the following words :—

> "The Governments of the U.S., U.K., U.S.S.R., and France consider it essential that, in the interests of world peace and world commerce, navigation on the Danube, its tributaries and the canals connected therewith, shall be maintained by the Riparian States in such a way as to be free and open on equal terms to the nationals, vessels of commerce and goods of all States in regard to all navigation matters, for example, rights of transit and transport, the use of port, harbour and navigational facilities, and the levying of tolls and dues and other similar charges. So long as Allied forces protecting lines of communication to Austria are stationed on the Danube, this principle should be operated in accordance with such navigational instructions as shall be issued by the officers commanding such forces in the respective zones of occupation. The four Governments, for their part, will accordingly act in conformity with this principle, and will also take the necessary steps to secure the adherence of all the Riparian States of the Danube to this declaration."

In the debate that followed M. Molotov objected to bringing in States not represented at the Conference. In other words, he was objecting to any attempt to tie down the Riparian States to a promise of free navigation. Mr. Bevin emphasised the extent of his concessions; but when he asked that his draft should be taken as a basis for discussion, M. Molotov said that he had not had time to study the draft. This statement would have carried more weight if the draft had not been handed to all the Ministers the day previously. No agreement was reached.

Late on Wednesday night the Ministers began a Session which ended only at 1·0 a.m. on the 27th. The subject was Trieste. M. Molotov explained that his minimum was Yugoslav sovereignty, and he suggested an autonomous district under Yugoslav sovereignty and administration, with a statute approved by the four Powers. A House of Representatives would be chosen by universal suffrage; but Yugoslavia would choose the Governor. The frontier should be the Soviet line with "minor rectifications" in Italy's favour. Mr. Bevin contented that, on the evidence available, the Western part of the Julian March was Italian. Mr. Byrnes said that if no agreement were reached the matter should be referred to the Peace Conference. No agreement had been reached when the meeting adjourned.

Thursday was a day of surprises. M. Molotov agreed to Tenda and Briga going to France. Encouraged by this, Mr. Byrnes jokingly suggested that the moment was favourable for a decision on the Dodecanese. M. Molotov reduced Mr. Byrnes almost to a state of speechless amazement when he replied at once that he withdrew his previous caveat to cession of the islands to Greece. In addition to this, the Ministers agreed to differ over compensation for United Nations property in Roumania, and to remove the transport, shipping and civil aviation clauses from the Roumanian treaty. They also agreed on the size of the Bulgarian navy. On Friday afternoon the Ministers made no appreciable progress. M. Molotov would not consent to any form of compulsory arbitration for settling disputes about property. Hope of agreement on the postponement of the Italian colonial question receded. The Russians aimed at a scheme which would give them rights of supervision in the interim period, the sovereignty being vested in the Four Powers. France, U.S. and Britain opposed this Four-Power supervision, although France thought that nominal sovereignty might be vested in the Powers. Mr. Bevin wanted a clear ruling that the present administration should continue until the final disposal was arranged.

Saturday, the 29th June may well prove to have been the turning-point of the whole Conference. M. Bidault offered his solution for the Trieste problem, and M. Molotov gave it what for him was a most friendly reception. "It was not satisfactory. It would wound the national feelings of Yugoslavia," nevertheless he would, "subject to certain amendments" consider the possibility of accepting it "as a basis." The French proposal was :—For ten years Trieste and neighbouring territory to form an autonomous area administered by the Four Powers, who, for this purpose, associate with themselves Italy and Yugoslavia : the United Nations Security Council to guarantee its integrity : a Governor, to be agreed on by Italy and Yugoslavia, or failing that, by the Four Powers : an Assembly, elected by secret ballot, on a basis of universal suffrage, to exercise the legislative power : a Council of six members nominated by the Four Powers and Italy and Yugoslavia, presided over by the Governor, to exercise the powers of government and administration : the laws and the judiciary in the territory to guarantee the rights of the inhabitants, language, schools and access to the public service : the representatives of the Four Powers on the Security Council of the United Nations to form a Control Council to which the governing council would submit a yearly report, and which would supervise the application of the Statute of Trieste : within ten years, the Four Powers to review the situation : the matter finally to be submitted to the United Nations. M. Molotov's first ideas of amendment were that the Statute should be permament, and that Czechoslovakia should be joined to the number of the responsible Powers. M. Bidault's proposal was received coldly by Mr. Byrnes but with warm congratulations from Mr. Bevin who, in view of this apparent willingness to consider a new solution, "neither Italian nor Yugoslav," was prepared to seek his Government's authority to proceed on some such lines.

At this point Mr. Byrnes made a speech, no doubt intended more for the New York Sunday press than for his fellow Ministers, demanding that a Peace Conference be called for the 20th July. He seemed to have prepared the speech before M. Molotov's new attitude had raised such fair hopes of present success. Mr. Bevin felt obliged to support Mr. Byrnes' appeal though fully aware that M. Molotov had removed its urgency. M. Molotov himself wanted to take the Trieste question a little further; but he hoped that the Conference's date would be fixed in a few days.

Beside Trieste the other subjects of Saturday's discussion seemed unimportant; yet there appeared to be a prospect of M. Molotov agreeing to a very slightly modified version of Mr. Bevin's Danube declaration, in which case the famous curtain would be penetrated. M. Molotov agreed to his three colleagues' proposals for the Italian fleet. Only on reparations was no progress made.

M. Molotov continued to dumbfound his colleagues. He began Monday's session by handing round a map, obviously made in Yugoslavia, which internationalised not even the whole of the town of Trieste. Tarvisio and Gorizia were assigned to Yugoslavia. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes answered that the proposal was impossible. M. Molotov then blandly offered to include Muggia in the area. Then, when this was rejected, he said that he would agree to the Morgan line south of Trieste. There was no response, and he asked for counter-proposals. M. Bidault at once suggested adoption of the French line in its entirety, all the territory west of the French line, and south of a line joining Duino to the French line to be internationalised. M. Molotov immediately agreed. Mr. Bevin was prepared to accept in principle the French proposal and also M. Molotov's re-drafting of M. Bidault's original Trieste "statute." Mr. Byrnes, not having recovered from the new shock M. Molotov had given him, was not prepared to go so far. It was therefore decided to study the new proposal and to resume discussions on Tuesday, the 2nd July.

GERMANY.

THE Foreign Ministers' discussions on Germany have ended in deadlock. Although some achievements were recorded on the second day of debate, the other three days were disappointing. The meetings were more fruitful than those in May in that they gave some indication of Russian long term policy, but was offset by failure to agree on immediate problems, particularly the urgent question of economic unity and reparations. The grave concern of Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes with the need for Germany to support herself ran counter to Russian determination to exact the utmost limit of reparations. This led to British and American warnings that they might be forced to run their zones on a separate economic basis, thus foreshadowing a turning-point in policy towards Germany.

Misgivings aroused by M. Molotov's statement on the 5th July that he had a declaration to make on the German problem were fulfilled when talks began four days later. After M. Bidault had reminded the Ministers of French plans for Western Germany (see Summary No. 344) M. Molotov launched into a highly critical, though not entirely damning, review of the American proposal for a 25 year treaty to prevent German rearmament after the withdrawal of occupation forces. He recognised the need for a treaty on disarmament and demilitarization

GERMANY.

THE Foreign Ministers' discussions on Germany have ended in deadlock. Although some achievements were recorded on the second day of debate, the other three days were disappointing. The meetings were more fruitful than those in May in that they gave some indication of Russian long term policy, but was offset by failure to agree on immediate problems, particularly the urgent question of economic unity and reparations. This led to British and American warnings that they might be forced to run their zones on a separate economic basis, thus foreshadowing a turning-point in policy towards Germany.

Misgivings aroused by M. Molotov's statement on the 5th July that he had a declaration to make on the German problem were fulfilled when talks began four days later. After M. Bidault had reminded the Ministers of French plans for Western Germany (see Summary No. 344) M. Molotov launched into a highly critical, though not entirely damning, review of the American proposal for a 25 year treaty to prevent German rearmament after the withdrawal of occupation forces. He recognised the need for a treaty on disarmament and demilitarization but felt it should last for at least 40 years. The Draft needed radical revision and was entirely inadequate, owing to its omission of measures for military and economic disarmament as laid down at Yalta and Potsdam. Familiar criticisms of the Western zones followed. M. Molotov then complained that the Allies had not agreed on an investigation of disarmament and that they should at once establish a procedure for eliminating those branches of German industry which formed the basis of aggressive power. He accused the American Draft of evading the task of "denazification" and "democratic reconstruction." The treaty seemed to suggest that troops might be withdrawn before these tasks were completed, a remark no doubt emphasized in view of General Eisenhower's statement to Congress on the 20th June that the occupation would last "a minimum of three years."

The Russian bombshell was then dropped. It was announced that the U.S.S.R. claimed $10,000,000,000 in reparations from Germany and that this sum was accepted as a basis of discussion by the Americans at the Yalta Conference. Moreover, M. Molotov said "obviously these reparations must include . . . . goods from current production," a claim on which the Russians have already refused to yield in the Control Council and to which they have adhered in practice for many months. This reparations demand recurred at intervals throughout the talks, and Mr. Bevin joined with Mr. Byrnes in opposing it adamantly. While it was agreed that at Yalta $10,000,000,000 in reparations had been suggested by Russia it was maintained that any such proposal was superseded by the Potsdam Agreement, which mentioned no fixed sum but said: "Payment of reparations should leave enough resources to enable the German people to subsist without external assistance . . . . the proceeds of exports from current production and stock shall be available in the first place for payment for such imports (as are approved)." Under the Russian demand this Potsdam condition could not be fulfilled, since there is a large deficit in export/import payments in the Western Zones.

Mr. Byrnes voiced his disappointment at M. Molotov's failure to appreciate the advance on American policy of 20 years ago. The suggested treaty, confined to guarantees against military rearmament was based on the Allied declaration of the 5th July, 1945, and was not intended to be exclusive of decisions reached at Yalta and Potsdam. He stressed the need for economic unity, which had not been mentioned by M. Molotov, and showed that the Americans were this year contributing $200,000,000 to the U.S. zone. In proof of willingness to meet M. Molotov's objections, he circulated a revised proposal for special deputies to consider the German problem.

The second day began well, when M. Bidault accepted Mr. Byrnes' Draft treaty as a basis for discussion, whereas, when the subject was mentioned last May French reaction was very reserved. He also accepted provisionally the idea of economic unity, even though at present this included the Ruhr and other western territories, and he was willing to discuss central administration as soon as the framework of Germany had been fixed. He made it clear that France desired a confederation rather than a federal state. Mr. Bevin in a careful exposition of U.K. policy welcomed discussions on the American draft treaty. In reply to complaints on disarmament by M. Molotov, he reminded him as Mr. Byrnes had already done, that the disarmament commission was killed by Russian objections to economic investigation. Mr. Bevin concluded with a remark which unmasked a new battery though without firing a broadside: he had received reports he said, alleging that war material was being manufactured in the Soviet zone; he did not accept these reports as accurate, but a Four Power Commission ought to investigate them and satisfy the public by refuting them. Mr. Bevin then gave an important warning on the need for economic unity. "The U.K. will co-operate on a fully reciprocal basis with the other zones, but in so far as there is no reciprocity from any particular zone, or agreement to carry out the whole of the Potsdam Protocol, my Government will be compelled to organize the British zone in such a manner that no further liability will fall on the British taxpayer." He later circulated a paper calling for equitable distribution of indigenous resources throughout Germany; those resources surplus to the approved requirements of one zone must be made available to meet deficits in another and may be exported as reparations only if there is no deficit in the balance of payments of any zone.

Despite Mr. Bevin's hard-hitting speech M. Molotov's second round opened with agreeable surprises. He agreed that the U.S. draft treaty should be examined. He at last proclaimed Russian policy on the Ruhr which, as expected, entailed desertion of the French Communists. The fashionable talk of federalization, he said, was designed to destroy and pastoralize Germany; the Ruhr, said M. Molotov, should not be separated from Germany, but it was necessary inter alia to put the area under Four-Power control. He conceded that if a plebiscite showed a desire for federalism, the Allies of course would not oppose it. Precautions must be taken, including a plan for reparations—which, he insisted, had not yet been prepared, despite the agreement of the 27th March for the elimination of many industries. In a somewhat obscure statement, which will be made much of by the SED, he implied that German peacetime industry could develop "on a wider scale"—presumably above the level of the present industrial plan—provided there was inter-Allied control over German industry and the Ruhr in particular. Central administrations should be set up immediately. Characteristically, he opposed the plan for special deputies and made unacceptable proposals on the disarmament commission.

Thereafter debate declined into confused discussion described by M. Bidault as a "merry-go-round." Mr. Byrnes, whilst decrying a long occupation, stated that control and small security forces should remain for a long time. This is in line with the arrival of special constabulary in the U.S. zone who will finally take over from the occupation troops on the 1st July, 1947. Mr. Bevin killed the reports that H.M. Government would present the conference with a federal plan, by stating that the Government had an open mind on the future of the German state as between federalized and centralized solutions, but tended to favour the grant of considerable powers to provincial administrations. They would support the French views on the Saar—at the same time as other German frontier questions were settled, but Mr. Bevin objected to M. Molotov's plans for a control of German industry which singled out the Ruhr; any such control must be on the basis of reciprocity. When M. Molotov had, inevitably, rejected the proposal for equitable distribution of indigenous resources, Mr. Bevin reiterated his warning that the British zone would have to be organized on an economic basis and production ploughed back into the zone. Mr. Byrnes, hoping to avert this, suggested that Central Admnistrations would help and that they were willing for the French to administer the Saar separately until the boundaries were settled. He made the decisive statement that, failing agreement, the U.S. zone would join with any other zone as a unit pending a quadripartite solution. This would not interfere with Control Council administration. M. Molotov and M. Bidault did not comment, but Mr. Bevin gave an assurance that the proposal would receive urgent consideration.

Finally rejecting M. Molotov's interpretation of the Berlin protocol on reparations Mr. Bevin then said he would circulate a paper on the reparations question. He further reminded the Ministers that the U.K. had made a reservation when accepting the industrial plan of the 27th March, that this assumed that Germany would be treated as an economic whole. Confused arguments followed on proposals to proceed with the establishment of Central Administrations, from which it emerged that the French would agree to Central Allied offices with German executive personnel, provided the Saar was excluded, but that M. Molotov refused to commit himself on this latter question. The talks thus ended after reluctant assent to M. Molotov's proposal that the Ministers should meet again after the United Nations Assembly but without any prior study of the German problem.

The SED press has exuberantly acclaimed M. Molotov's early speeches as disproving malicious gossip about Soviet Foreign policy; other speeches are scarcely reported. Particular prominence is given to the statement on the Ruhr, but there is no comment on the reparations demands. Spandauer Volksblatt (SPD) is cautious, but takes the line that Germany is no less destroyed than Russia and that $10,000,000,000 seems an enormous sum.

The SED have now formulated their policy for local government, which they wish to be uniform throughout Germany. While agreeing on the need for decentralisation, they strongly criticize the separation of the legislature and the executive in the British zone and the installation of "non-party" officials, and propose to set up a single chamber for each commune. In Saxony State, court proceedings against administrations have been forbidden except in cases of personal embezzlement. In response to an appeal by the SED, substantial increases in the bread and cereal rations were granted in the Russian zone on the 14th July. This was evidently intended to accentuate the contrast with the West, as on the 12th July the British zone fat ration was cut by half, although other foodstuffs were increased. The Zonal Advisory Council has commented that it is more and more difficult to convince the population of the good-will of the occupying Power.

A report has now been received of a speech by Schumacher in Darmstadt on the 24th June, which is well in line with recent outbursts. For the first time he publicly condemned the expulsion of Germans from the East as a greater injustice than that inflicted on the world by Hitler. This is almost verbatim the language used in the latest Pastoral of the W. German Catholic Bishops. Schumacher also said that it was useless for the KPD to ignore the question of the Eastern frontier. Separatists he chastised as "camouflaged nazis," who should be given short shrift. After speaking of the senseless destruction of Germany's peace-time industries he declared that they should prepare the future structure of the Reich as if there were no foreign troops on German soil. Following its conference in Erfurt the LDP has declared itself the first All-Reich party since the capitulation and has elected an executive committee with representatives from all zones (except the Southern part of the French zone) headed by Dr. Kuelz.

AUSTRIA.

The Foreign Ministers came to the discussion of Austria on the 13th July, almost at the end of their Conference, and in the short time left to them they failed to reach any agreement on the subject. Mr. Byrnes proposed that the Foreign Ministers' Deputies should be instructed to consider the draft of a Treaty with Austria. M. Molotov immediately circulated a resolution containing four points: (1) that the Council of Foreign Ministers noted that the new Control Agreement for Austria considerably extended the jurisdiction of the Austrian Government and helped to "accelerate the elimination of the remnants of Hitlerism and the final detachment of Austria from Germany as well as to consolidate further democratic order in Austria"; (2) that the Council of Foreign Ministers had observed that there was in the western zones of Austria a concentration of 437,000 aliens, "the so-called displaced persons," including Yugoslav Chetniks and Ustachis, "Fascist Anders soldiers," Russian and Ukrainian White Guards. The immediate evacuation of these aliens from Austria was imperative and urgent; (3) that the Foreign Ministers felt that the successful accomplishment of the above-mentioned tasks—i.e., denazification and the evacuation of displaced persons—was necessary to make possible the transfer of full authority to the Austrian Government and the restoration of the full independence of Austria, which was the main objective of the Allied Powers in Austria; and (4) that the Foreign Ministers should instruct their Deputies to proceed without delay, after the drafting of the treaties with Germany's ex-satellites, to the preparation of a Treaty with Austria. Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Bevin tried hard to obtain agreement that the Austrian treaty should first be remitted to the Deputies for discussion, but M. Molotov continued to insist that his proposal should be considered first. Pressed by Mr. Bevin to define the meaning of his resolution more clearly, he made the familiar Soviet allegations about the slowness of denazification in Austria. Finally M. Molotov said that the most he could do would be to ask the Allied Control authority in Austria for a report on those parts of his resolution referring to denazification and displaced persons (which Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes refused to accept), and when that report was available, to consider the drafting of a treaty. This is the expected Soviet attack on displaced persons—or political refugees—in the western zones of Austria (see last week's Summary), and is, of course, directed against the Western Allies as much as against the Austrian Government.

As it was plainly impossible to reach agreement on a treaty, Mr. Bevin raised the question of German assets in Austria just before the end of the meeting. He said that, as there was probably no time for the Council of Foreign Ministers to decide the question immediately, they should at least agree that a Four Power Commission should be appointed to go into the matter in detail and to advise the Ministers on an agreed definition. Mr. Byrnes agreed to Mr. Bevin's proposal, but M. Molotov, after an unsuccessful attempt to claim that the question was not on the agenda, could not be drawn further before the end of the meeting.

Meanwhile the question of German assets has remained the burning topic in Austria. General Clark, the United States Commander-in-Chief, sent a letter to the Soviet Commander-in-Chief on the 6th July protesting against the Soviet action (see last week's Summary): and one to the Austrian Chancellor on the 10th July, telling him that the United States Government proposed to hand over all German assets in the United States zone of Austria to the Austrian Government as trustee. His letter indicates that, although the United States Government have not definitely renounced their claim to these assets, they will consider doing so as part of a general negotiation for settlement. Following the publication of a Tass interview with the Soviet Deputy C.-in-C., General Tsiniev, General Steele protested to General Kurasov that the definition given by General Tsiniev was not contained in any existing agreement between the Allies and that therefore its unilateral implementation would be contrary to the Control Agreement. The Soviet interpretation as published by Tass is that German assets are all assets in Austria which belonged to "German physical or juridical persons" until 1938; all assets which the Germans brought to Austria after the Anschluss or established there with German capital since that time, and assets which were bought by Germans in Austria after 1938 "at a fair sale price." This last category in particular is open to question, in view of the Nazi policy of forcing sales of Austrian property.

The Chancellor addressed a crowded meeting of the Austrian Chamber on the 10th July, protesting strongly against the Soviet action. He re-asserted the Austrian claim that the only property liable for seizure was that which was owned by Germans before 1938, claiming also that even in this category, and in all three categories named by the Russians, there were many disputable cases and that sufficient must be left to Austria for her reconstruction and the maintenance of her economic life, according to the meaning of the Moscow declaration. The House approved Herr Figl's resolution asking the House to approve the attitude of his Government in this question with only the four Communist members dissenting.

Meanwhile the British authorities in Vienna have issued an order forbidding the transfer of German property in their zone. The United States authorities have begun to hand over 280 allegedly German concerns to the Austrian Government.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Following up the detailed election programme of the Communist Party—the only one to offer the electorate anything concrete—the Prime Minister, Klement Gottwald, opened the Constituent Assembly in Prague on the 8th July with an elaboration of his plans for the next two years. His long address dealt with two main points, the new draft constitution and the economic plan. His speech for a Communist was notable for its moderateness. He went out of his way to guarantee the maintenance of all those personal and political rights and liberties guaranteed by the Masaryk Constitution. The economic plan puts more stress upon the need for increased individual output than upon innovations. This was a call directed particularly to the Trade Unions, whose members are well aware that the pre-war level attained in the output of coal, for instance, has been achieved only by dint of a much swollen labour force, a position which cannot be sustained as increasing numbers of Germans are expelled. In the matter of foreign policy, M. Gottwald did not emphasize the Russian alliance much more than his predecessor, and expressed his country's desire for the continuance of friendly relations with the Western democracies, and for extension of the same neighbourliness in relations with Poland as with Yugoslavia. There is nothing new in his insistence—not only to the Assembly but on earlier occasions to both the British Ambassador, and to the British Parliamentary delegation now touring Czechoslovakia—upon settling the Slovak-Magyar dispute with Hungary.

There are indications, however, that the sugar-coating is not distracting the other parties from being wary of the pill they are asked to swallow. This has become particularly apparent in local politics. In both Plzeň and Olomouc, two of the largest cities of Bohemia and Moravia, the Social Democrats and National Socialists combined to defeat Communist candidates for local offices. Rowdy demonstrators were called out by the Works Councils—under Communist instigation—in order to intimidate the voters. Very strong protests were made by the two combining parties, and the Communist Party was obliged to discountenance the action. More lively incidents of this kind are to be expected.

Great public interest was aroused by the British Ambassador's recent tour of Slovakia. A warm welcome was received everywhere, and it is apparent, from both the official account and from the enthusiastic press, that Slovakia is deeply interested in her connections with the Western world. The country is described as flourishing generally, and in fairly good order; communications which were seriously disrupted are now restored, and there is comparatively little war damage in the towns. The Slovaks seem to have been notably impressed by the war-time broadcasts of the BBC, and are appreciative of the excellent work done by UNRRA.

POLAND.

The results so far published of the referendum voting (see Summary No. 350) show considerable discrepancy. On the 12th July, Warsaw radio gave the following official figures. Of those entitled to vote, 85·3 per cent. did so. The affirmative answers to the individual questions were: first question, 68·2 per cent.; second question, 77·3 per cent.; third question 94·2 per cent. M. Mikolajczyk is reported as having stated to foreign correspondents, on the 6th July, that negative replies to Questions 1 and 2 averaged 85 per cent. and from 55 per cent. to 65 per cent. respectively, and as having claimed, on the 13th July, a total of 2,770,351 votes for himself, as against 545,755 for the "Lublin Bloc." On the 8th July, however, the Polish Prime Minister, M. Osobka Morawski, in an interview with representatives of the foreign press, stated that the majority in favour of the "Lublin Bloc" was not less than 60 per cent., that about 15 per cent. of the votes had gone to M. Mikolajczyk's Peasant Party (PSL), and that the "reactionary underground" organisations, NSZ and WIN, had polled about 25 per cent. This calculation is based on the assumption that those who voted "No" on Question 2 and 3 did not vote for M. Mikolajczyk, but for the so-called "reactionary right-wing," and that their negative votes on Question 1 should not therefore be credited to M. Mikolajczyk.

M. Mikolajczyk has demanded that the referendum be declared invalid, and has said that his party was seriously considering an appeal to the guarantors of the Yalta agreement, in order to prevent a repetition at the forthcoming elections of the methods employed in the referendum.

The trial at Kielce of persons implicated in the "pogrom" of the 4th July, when 41 Jews were killed, has brought out the highly irrational basis of the attack on a house in which it had been rumoured that a Christian boy was being detained for "ritual murder." The incident illustrates the fact that, despite the great sympathy for Jewish sufferings which the German mass murder of the Polish Jews provoked throughout Poland, and the further fact that only some 80,000 survived in the land, anti-semitic feeling is still latent in the community. This is attributed by well-informed persons, among them no less a figure than Cardinal Hlond, to the general dislike of the present Government policy, and the association of that dislike, whether rightly or wrongly, with a number of the members of the Jewish race forming part of the government.

On the 9th July, after a trial lasting ten days, the former Gauleiter, Artur Greiser, was condemned to death by the Supreme National Court at Poznan (Summary No. 348). President Bierut has rejected his appeal against the sentence.

THE SOVIET UNION.

The Soviet press has given special prominence to reports of the negotiations at the Paris Conference to the now familiar theme of the influence of militarist circles on United States foreign policy. The line taken on the Paris Conference has been that the success achieved is due mainly to Soviet concessions in the face of Western obstinacy and that the Soviet delegation has consistently resisted attempts to turn the forthcoming Peace Conference into a "rubber stamping machine." Discussion by the Foreign Ministers of the German Peace Treaty was heralded in the press by renewed accusations against the Western Powers, on the score that they were harbouring in the Western zones Nazi administrators, military units and anti-Russian refugee organisations.

M. Molotov's statement on Germany has provided the occasion for renewed discussion of the German problem in the Soviet press and wireless. No fresh arguments have been forthcoming. Pravda, after extolling the success achieved in the Soviet zone in the liquidation of Fascism, the union of democratic forces and the carrying through of land reform, brought up the familiar charges that the other zones had failed to carry through either de-nazification or the destruction of German war potential. The policy of the British and Americans, however, was singled out as their chief error. The new proposals of the Western Powers did not provide, said the commentator, for any change in policy; American plans for de-nazification were represented as a step backwards since they by-passed the main problem of setting up a democratic Government and guaranteeing reparations deliveries. Pravda made a special point of the illogicality of the Western nations in proposing the dismemberment of Germany while urging economic unity. A broadcast to the U.S.A. criticising the American plan for controlling German disarmament in more detail followed much the same line; the speaker observed that the American draft envisaged the possibility of ending the occupation, but how could it logically be ended before its objects had been fulfilled? Moscow broadcasts have not failed to make capital out of the recent disquieting demonstrations in Hamburg, attributing them to the British failure to comb out Nazis from the administration.

The activities of Ukrainian Nationalist organisations among displaced persons in camps in the U.S. and British zones of Germany, alluded to from time to time in Soviet statements, have now been attacked in detail by Pravda, in an article giving the news of the principal leaders and Regional Centres of the Ukrainian Committees. It is, in fact, true that Ukrainian nationalists are considering the present moment opportune for renewing their activities. A central Ukrainian Committee is functioning in Europe (it is believed that the headquarters are in Rome) and has actually opened up a "foreign affairs" department which issues official bulletins. Pravda also referred to various Baltic nationalist organisations; General Kubiliunas, Lithuanian Prime Minister under the German occupation, was said to be working in one of the Lithuanian Committees, but no confirmation is available of this assertion. Among the White Russians who were said to have formed a Russian emigré committee, Sergei Yuriev and Zhevelev were named as leaders. Pravda concluded on a warning note suggesting that the British and American occupation authorities were violating the Potsdam Agreement and urging that they should be called to heel by their Governments. The Soviet press has recently been giving more attention to UNRRA, although it has been careful to keep in line with the Soviet view of the world food crisis, which is that it is being used by the British and American Governments for their own political ends. The suspension of UNRRA relief to China and the protest by representatives of the organisation, both on the grounds of misuse of UNRRA assistance, were both reported prominently. At the same time the Soviet press has taken advantage of the explanation given by Mr. McDuffie for resigning from the UNRRA Mission to the Ukraine and White Russia. In an article entitled "Food Supplies and Politics," Izvestiya (the 10th July) published a bitter attack upon the British and American Governments.

While the recently concluded trade negotiations with Denmark were still in progress, New Times published some travel notes "Features of Contemporary Denmark," by Zaslavsky. This virulent publicist was more controlled than usual in describing the bourgeois basis of Danish life and the prosperity of Danish farmers. He runs true to form, however, in his gibes at Anglo-American influence in Denmark and in his fictitious description of "the hidden export drama" of Denmark—the latter bogey being presumably evoked with a view to stressing the importance for the Danish export market of coming to terms with the Soviet Union.

A belated review of the recent World Federation of Trade Unions conference appeared in Trud on the 9th July. The Secretary-General's declaration was quoted to show that the results were completely satisfactory and that unanimous decisions had been reached despite the original disagreement on Spain, Greece and representation at the U.N.O. Statements were also published on July the 10th on the admission of the W.F.T.U. to the Economic and Social Council and on the attitude of this W.F.T.U. to the Franco régime.

A Soviet-Czechoslovak repatriation agreement was signed on the 6th July, providing that citizens of Czechoslovakian nationality residing in Volhynia should be able to opt for citizenship of Czechoslovakia and to move to that country while people of Ukrainian, Russian or Byelorussian nationality domiciled in Czechoslovakia could opt for Soviet citizenship. The transfers were to be completed not later than the 15th November of the present year and it was emphasised in the agreement that they were to be entirely voluntary. The Volhynian Czechs here referred to are the descendants of the colonists invited into Russia by the Tsarist Government in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

Much publicity was given in Moscow last week to the 25th anniversary of the Mongolian People's Revolution and to the subsequent social and economic transformation of the country, including "the elimination of feudal oppression," and to the contribution made by the Red and Mongolian Armies to smashing

Japan and liberating Inner Mongolia. The importance of Soviet-Mongolian friendship for strengthening "peace and security in the East" was stressed in a telegram of congratulations from Generalissimo Stalin to the Mongolian Premier Choi Balsan.

The heads of the Committees for Cultural and Educational Institutions attached to the Councils of Ministers of the Dagestan, Udmurt, Chuvash, Bashkir, Mordvinian, Kabardinian and North Osetian Autonomous Republics and the Komi A.S.S.R. have met in Moscow to discuss cultural and educational work among the peoples of these Republics in their native languages and, in particular, ways and means of improving propaganda work for the new Five Year Plan. In view of the fact that there has been little or no indication hitherto of regional association between this mixed group of non-Russian peoples, this inter-Republican drive for the Five Year Plan is worth noting.

A delegation of the U.S.S.R. Red Cross Society has come to Britain to attend the session of the Council of the League of Red Cross Societies. The delegation is headed by the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Union of the U.S.S.R. Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, Dr. Sergei Kolesnikov and includes Professors Semyon Sarkissov, Georgi Rudnev and Dr. Sergei Bagotsky.

M. Mikhail Grigorievich Sergeyev has been appointed first Soviet Ambassador to the Argentine. Mr. Sergeyev has filled several posts in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and has served in Greece, Belgium and Luxembourg.

SCANDINAVIA.

Denmark.

A Danish-Russian Trade Pact, valid for two years with a provision for a possible prolongation, was signed in Moscow on the 8th July. At the same time the two countries agreed on the supply of certain consignments of goods during the period from the 1st July, 1946, to the 31st December, 1947.

The agreement is the outcome of long-drawn-out negotiations between Denmark and the U.S.S.R., during which much pressure was brought to bear on Denmark by the Soviet Union and the Danish Government was faced with conflicting opinions at home about what was most advantageous for the country. The Soviets were said to have been prepared, and to have originally offered, to take over the whole of Denmark's agricultural exportable surplus over the next six years, making payment in oil cake and gold. They also offered slightly better prices than the U.K. for butter and pork, but, according to Aarhus Stifstidende, these were not so high as to cover fully the production price of these commodities. While, in theory, such an offer might have been rather attractive to Danish farmers, it seemed from the outset exceedingly doubtful that the Soviets would be able to make good their promise of supplying the oil cake, thus forcing Denmark to accept payment in gold. This would have eased her currency situation, but would have left her closely bound to the Soviet economy—to the exclusion of the Western countries. In that way she would have lost her claim to special consideration with regard to certain articles in short supply and not obtainable from the U.S.S.R., e.g., overseas food products, coal, textiles, rubber, etc.

From information so far available, it appears as though the agreement is nothing like as extensive as was expected. It is understood that Denmark is to supply Russia with 15,000 tons of butter at Kr. 4·71 per kilo., pork at Kr. 2·84 per kilo., some cattle, horses and quantities of cheese, as also 60 fishing cutters to a total value of Kr. 20,000,000 and other Danish industrial products to a value of about Kr. 80 million. Russia on her part is to supply certain industrial raw products, such as potash, sawn timber, veneer, cotton, raw iron, copper, silver, nickel, zinc, manganese, etc. The quantities of the Danish industrial supplies will be fixed by agreement between the individual Danish industries and Russian purchasing representatives. Prices will be those current on the world market. The Danish Ministry of Foreign Affairs states that in the course of the coming months negotiations will be resumed regarding further supplies to the U.S.S.R. of butter and meat against supplies of fodder cake and corn from the Soviet Union. (See also under "Soviet Union.")

The resolution on the subject of South Schleswig passed by the Danish Rigsdag on the 10th July by 97 votes to 3 (Dansk Samling against), was a rather vague and on the whole innocuous compromise between the Premier's violent—and much criticised—views, and the more reasonable views of the remainder of his Government and the Rigsdag. The statement demanded (1) the greatest possible freedom for the "constantly growing" Danish-minded section of the South Schleswig population, (2) the removal of the refugees from South Schleswig, and (3) renewed representation to the Allied Powers to afford Denmark an opportunity during the forthcoming international negotiations of safeguarding her national interests which are linked up with the future settlement of conditions in South Schleswig. During the debate the Prime Minister again tried to insist on his right to advocate an eventual revision of the frontier, while M. Rasmussen, followed by spokesmen of the other parties, including the communists, stipulated only for some mention in the resolution that the present frontier stood. Although M. Rasmussen's statement was as a whole one long complaint, it did include an appreciation of British difficulties in Germany and of the efforts she had made to meet Danish wishes in certain respects. The reason for the adverse vote of Dansk Samling was the defeat of an amendment put forward by them to the effect that attempts should be made at international negotiations to secure an early referendum among the resident South Schleswigian population on the future national relations of their district after the Military Government period had ceased. M. Christmas Moeller, the leader of the Conservative Party, who was particularly bitter in his criticism of the irresponsible attitude of the Prime Minister, decided to abstain from voting, though he explained that his party must naturally take its own line. According to reports received, he has since resigned the Chairmanship of his Party.

The original intention of the Danish Government to communicate the text of the resolution to the four Allied Powers was dropped after pressure had been exerted by H.M.G. on the ground that the questions raised in the resolution were the sole concern of H.M.G.

Norway.

The Foreign Minister, M. Lange, revealed in Oslo, on the 12th July, that an invitation extended by H.M. King Haakon for Mr. Churchill to visit Norway was cancelled following the latter's speech at Fulton and the criticism which it had evoked from Generalissimo Stalin. According to M. Lange, King Haakon thought that Norway's homage to Mr. Churchill might not in the circumstances have been free from elements of discord, and for this reason he wrote Mr. Churchill a letter explaining the position. The fact of the matter is, however, that it was the Norwegian Government and not King Haakon who feared that the Soviet Union might interpret the hospitality extended to Mr. Churchill as an unfriendly act. An attempt by M. Lange to have the cancellation conveyed to Mr. Churchill through official British channels was frustrated by H.M.G. The spineless attitude of the Norwegian Government is brought into sharp relief when Mr. Churchill's visit to the Netherlands is recalled and the fact considered that, as far as is known, no attempts at intimidation were made by the Soviet Union.

Iceland.

After the recent general elections in Iceland the position of the Althing remains virtually unaltered, the only change being that the Progressive Party has lost two seats to the Social-Democrats. The constitution of the Althing is, therefore, as follows:—

Independents	20
Progressives	13
Communists	10
Social-Democrats	9

The Icelandic Government has been informed that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will be glad to support the candidature of Iceland for admission to the United Nations at the next General Assembly if the Icelandic Government should decide to make the necessary formal application before the 15th July.

Sweden.

Sweden has revalued the krona vis-à-vis the £ Sterling and the American dollar by about 14 per cent., the sterling selling rate having been fixed at Kr. 14·50 as against 16·92, that of the dollar at Kr. 3·60 as compared with 4·20. M. Myrdal, the Minister of Commerce, explained that the lowering of the foreign exchange rates had long been considered, and that the wave of inflation released in the United States at the expiry of the price stabilisation law on the 1st July made it imperative to raise the value of the Swedish currency as a precautionary measure and to counteract threatening inflation at home.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Netherlands.

On the 10th July the Dutch Prime Minister, Dr. L. J. M. Beel, replied to questions raised in the previous day's debate in the Second Chamber on the Government's statement of policy [see last week's Summary]. After having related how he had set to work to form his Cabinet, Dr. Beel then gave his reasons for not having consulted the Communist Party. He had failed to find, he asserted, in the ranks of the Communists, "any real conception of the dignity of the individual or of the high value of moral standards." Turning to affairs in the N.E.I., the Prime Minister drew attention to the fact that preparations for the Imperial Round Table Conference were not yet complete: the "consequences of war" still formed an obstacle. The Malino Conference had yet to open, and the discussions with the Indonesian Republicans so far had not provided "a sound basis for co-operation." For that reason, the Cabinet was contemplating the establishment of a new administrative body, which would take the shape of a General Commission, be empowered to complete the preparations for the Round Table Conference, and be directly responsible to the States-General. In the territory of the N.E.I., the General Commission would fall within the administrative ambit of the Supreme Administration, and would work "side by side" with the Lieutenant-Governor-General, whose function is mainly concerned with general administration. With regard to the N.W.I., Dr. Beel said that the discussions with the delegations from Surinam (Dutch Guiana) and Curaçao had "run smoothly": proposals would be laid before the Chamber "in due course." Dr. Beel next dealt with the vexed question of political delinquents. Many of these had already served heavy sentences, and he thought that the time had now come when "compassion" might be exercised. Accordingly, the Cabinet planned to reduce the number of persons detained for political offences to about 25,000 by the 1st October. Those released would, however, be given their freedom "conditionally": if "other facts" subsequently "came to light," they would again be detained. In conclusion, the Prime Minister promised that nationalisation of the mines would be carried out "as soon as the present investigation proved that it was in the public interest."

Belgium.

Pending the formation of a new Cabinet, the Prince-Regent has asked M. van Acker to remain in office for the administration of current business. The executives of the two major parties, the Christian Social and Socialist Parties, have already met, after which M. van Acker received the Christian Social leader, M. de Schrijver (10th July), the attitude of whose party in the present crisis is obviously of the utmost importance. That its participation in a new Cabinet is doubtful emerges from M. de Schrijver's statement after the party executive meeting, in which he said that since his party had not been responsible for the crisis, it had "no special wish" to enter a new Cabinet. Meanwhile, M. van Acker has issued an urgent warning against the effects of undue delay in finding a solution: "All that has been obtained in the matter of price reductions is gravely threatened. Wisdom demands that the crisis be ended within a week."

FRANCE.

At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers on the 10th July M. Bidault confined himself to reiterating the French views, now well-known, on Germany, the Ruhr and the Saar (see under "Germany" and "The Paris Conference"). French opinion was greatly disappointed at the refusal of the other three Foreign Ministers to agree to the political separation of the Ruhr and the Rhineland from Germany, and the Cabinet unanimously decided to maintain the original French demands. The long-awaited revelation of the Soviet attitude towards the question of Western Germany came as a considerable shock and so far embarrassed the French Communists that the Humanité waited several days before making any comment and then attempted to explain away the difference of opinion by concentrating on M. Molotov's proposals for German disarmament and for four-power control of the Ruhr. Most papers were resentful of the Soviet failure to provide the diplomatic support which the Franco-Soviet Pact of 1944 had been designed to elicit, but some sympathy was shown with the British point of view. The Socialist Populaire was able to point to the stand made by the Socialist Party against the dismemberment of Germany, and declared that the Soviet decision had rendered impossible the maintenance of French demands.

M. Bidault did achieve one success at the Foreign Ministers' meeting; he secured acceptance of a resolution instructing the Allied Control Council in Berlin to appoint a committee of experts to draw up a report by the 10th August on "the steps to be taken to increase the German output of coal, and the general principles which should govern the apportionment of the German output as between domestic consumption and exports." M. Bidault had devoted part of his speech to the coal question, saying that since the matter was one of high policy he considered that it should be dealt with by the Foreign Ministers rather than by the Control Council in Berlin. The meeting of U.K., U.S. and French experts in Paris to discuss coal (see last Summary) ended inconclusively on the 9th July.

Mr. Churchill visited Metz on the 14th July to receive the honour of the town and spoke of the links between Britain and France and the need for a strong France. M. Robert Schuman, Minister of Finance, represented the Government. On the following day Mr. Churchill arrived in Paris and was entertained to dinner by M. Bidault.

The Constitutional Committee is making good progress, and the Assembly plans to start its constitutional debate at the end of this month. Some of the M.R.P. amendments in the Committee have been rejected by a combination of the Socialists, Communists and Radicals, but the most important innovations have been adopted by Socialists and M.R.P. against Communist opposition. This was the case with the decision to take control of the judiciary out of the hands of the National Assembly, and to give the President of the Republic the right of dissolution, with the consent of the Cabinet, after the first year of the Assembly's life. Socialists and M.R.P., in opposition to Communists, also agreed on the principle of safeguarding the constitutional character of laws concerned with the machinery of government. The Committee has also discussed the procedure for calling a constituent assembly of the French Union, the present Assembly not being competent to draft a constitution for the whole Union.

The economic conference mentioned in last week's Summary continued its work all last week and the representatives of the employers and the trade unions in the sub-committee for prices, wages and production hammered out the details of the incidence of a 25 per cent. wage increase on prices in different industries. The C.G.T. maintained its demand for a general 25 per cent. increase and threatened to call mass demonstrations of workers this week to support this claim. Finally, however, on the 13th July, an encouraging communiqué was issued by the sub-committee, stating that agreement now seemed possible and appointing three members, representing the C.G.T., the employers, and the agricultural confederation, to draw up a draft report. The committee believes that it will be possible to increase wages by 25 per cent. and to raise certain agricultural and industrial prices without substantially affecting the cost of living, by the use of various devices such as increased production of utility goods and the diversion of goods from the black market to legal channels of trade. It is generally believed that the raising of agricultural prices, combined with the increase in agricultural output this year, will prove the best means of destroying the black market. Energetic co-operation can be expected in this matter from the new Minister of Food, M. Yves Farge.

A minor cabinet crisis has been caused by the application of the social insurance plan of October 1944 which was due to enter into force on the 1st July. The details have been worked out by the Communist Minister of Labour, M. Croizat, and have roused the opposition of the M.R.P. which declares that under the new system the C.G.T. and its Communist representatives will have complete control of the social insurance funds. The M.R.P. ask that the social insurance system should not be too rigidly unified and should give room for the representation of organisations other than the C.G.T. on the boards which are to manage the insurance funds. A compromise is being worked out within the Cabinet.

SWITZERLAND.

Last January the Federal Council presented to the Federal Assembly part one of a report dealing with anti-democratic activities in Switzerland during the war. The first part concerned the activities of the German National Socialists in Switzerland and of their Swiss supporters. Parts two and three, issued in May, dealt with the Fascists and Communists respectively, and emphasised that, while the Italian Fascists had been active in the Italian-speaking canton of the Ticino and the Italian-speaking portion of the Grisons, they had never during the war years constituted for Switzerland so serious a threat as did the German National Socialists. In 1941 and 1942, the Italian authorities tried to form, within the existing centres of Fascist sympathisers, groups of Fascist militia which might become a "fifth column" in the event of an attack upon Switzerland by the Axis; the Fascist Political Police Organisation, "Ovra," moreover, carried out limited operations on Swiss soil, while Fascist propaganda took its cue from the National Socialists. In comparison, however, the Italian mischief was always on a minor scale. It could be stated positively that there were no longer any Fascist organisations in existence in Switzerland. The part of the report which dealt with Communist activities declared that both before and during the war the Communist movement had supported the idea that an "Imperialist" war could be converted into a civil war and used as a means of setting up the "dictatorship of the proletariat"; that Communist propaganda was intensified on the outbreak of war, especially within the army; and that the Federal Council, after taking various measures to prevent such activities, had passed a decree on the 26th November, 1940, dissolving the Communist party, whose work, however, had continued underground.

The Swiss press has made much capital out of this report on anti-democratic activities, which furnished new ammunition for their attacks on the Workers' Party. The Party's newspaper, La Voix Ouvrière, has found no more plausible counter-attack than the suggestion that the object of the Federal Council's report was to divert public attention from "the German-Swiss financial traffic during the war"—a reference to the recent Washington discussions on the disposal of German assets in Switzerland.

The three reports will be examined and debated by the Federal Assembly.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

On the 15th July the second Cortes Españolas closed for the summer recess, having achieved nothing remarkable during the nine weeks since General Franco's record inaugural speech of the 14th May. In his speech winding up the proceedings the President, Señor Esteban Bilbao, singled out for mention an amendment to the rules providing that in future members of the Cortes may put questions in writing to the Government and may expect answers from Ministers, orally or in writing. The Government, too, have shown no great signs of activity during the period, while the press has, of course, chiefly dilated on the confusion at the Security Council, making its principal theme the assumption that Spain, thanks to her present régime, is secretly regarded by the Western nations as a welcome bulwark against Communism in the Mediterranean. This dangerous nonsense is being repeated all the time throughout the Continent by Communists and anti-Communists alike.

Politically-minded Spaniards (and there are still a good number of them, despite food difficulties and torrid conditions) are all agog to know what sort of rabbit their conjurer-Caudillo will bring out of his hat on Thursday next, the 18th July, the tenth anniversary of the "Glorious Movement." So far it is known only that the occasion is to be signalized by charity benefits in the form of a considerable increase of the third-class bread ration and the release of another 3,000 political prisoners. It has not yet been officially stated that the National Council of Falange will be meeting on that day, as usual, to hear an address from its President, the head of the State. General Franco delights in getting everybody guessing. It is considered likely that he will at any rate fix a date—probably the early autumn—for the holding of the much-advertised "referendum"; the wags have given the name of peronada to the preliminary caperings. The electoral register for the plebiscite closed on the 6th July: originally it was understood that all adult Spaniards, male and female, with the substantial exception of the politically outlawed, should have the opportunity to express their assent, but now it seems likely that the suffrage will be confined to heads of households. Circumstantial rumours continue of the plan for installing a Council of the Realm which would act as a sort of Regency to prepare the transition to Monarchy; but all the evidence goes to show that the deadlock is complete between Don Juan and the Caudillo. The wind has not yet set in the Monarchist quarter.

At all events General Franco feels himself strong enough to penalize a distinguished representative of the House of Bourbon, who has been convicted of black market trafficking on the grand scale. On the 26th June the Official Gazette announced the dismissal of Lieut.-General Don Francisco de Borbón y de la Torre, Duke of Seville, Captain-General of the Seventh Military Region (Valladolid). No reasons were given in the press announcements. But it is an open secret that the General had been appropriating considerable quantities of olive oil destined for the troops under his command. After the incident had been reported by the Civil Governor, it appears, the Minister of War did his best to hush it up, advising the General to resign his appointment; this, however, he refused to do, and an enquiry followed, bringing out a lot of damaging evidence. While admitting guilt, the General is said to have threatened, if proceedings were taken, to make known the extent of similar black market operations being carried out by a number of other Generals.

On the 3rd July the General Council of the T.U.C. endorsed the demand of the Executive Committee of the World Federation of Trade Unions that the Assembly of the United Nations should "take decisions favouring the restoration of democracy in Spain, breaking off diplomatic relations with the Franco régime and recognising the Giral Government."

In conjunction with the Order of the Board of Trade of the 6th July revoking the "trading with the enemy" black lists, arrangements have been made with Spain and Portugal for the partial abolition of navicerts. They will no longer be necessary for shipments between Portugal and her colonies or on Portuguese exports to liberated countries or between Spain and her colonies or territories. Navicerts will still be required, however, for the importation of controlled foodstuffs.

ITALY.

Signor De Gasperi announced the composition of his new Cabinet on the 13th July as follows:—

Prime Minister, Minister of Interior and Foreign Minister: De Gasperi (Chr. Dem.).
Minister without Portfolio: Nenni (Socialist).
Minister without Portfolio: Macrelli (Repub.).
Justice: Gullo (Communist).
Finance: Scoccimarro (Communist).
Treasury: Corbino (Independent).
War: Facchinetti (Repub.).
Navy: Micheli (Chr. Dem.).
Merchant Navy: Aldisio (Chr. Dem.).
Air: Cingolani (Chr. Dem.).
Education: Gonella (Chr. Dem.).
Public Works: Romita (Socialist).
Transport: Ferrari (Communist).
Agriculture: Segni (Chr. Dem.).
Communications: Scelba (Chr. Dem.).
Industry and Commerce: Morandi (Socialist).
Labour: D'Aragona (Socialist).
Post-War Assistance: Sereni (Communist).
Foreign Trade: Campilli (Chr. Dem.).
High Commissioner for Food: Mentasti (Chr. Dem.).
Commissioner for Public Health: Reale (Communist).

The most notable absentee is Signor Togliatti, the leader of the Communist party and Minister of Justice in the last Government. His place is taken by Signor Gullo, another Communist, who has been Minister of Agriculture since 1944. According to the press Signor Togliatti refused to take office as he wished to concentrate on party organisation. There are, however, five Communists in the Cabinet. Signor Nenni, who still hankers after Communist–Socialist fusion, is Minister without Portfolio. A press report states that Signor Nenni will act as Deputy Prime Minister and will probably take over the Ministry of Foreign Affairs after the Peace Conference. The name of Admiral De Courten, who has been Minister of the Navy ever since Marshal Badoglio's first Government in 1943, is also absent from the list. The Foreign Ministers' plans for the disposal of the Italian Fleet are believed to be the cause of his retirement as he felt his position vis-à-vis the Navy to be no longer tenable.

Among the new members of the Cabinet, nothing is yet known of Signor Macrelli, one of the two Ministers without Portfolio. Signor Facchinetti, the Minister of War is reputed to be a journalist rather than a politician. He was exiled by the Fascists and took part in the partisan movement. He was appointed President of the Federazione Nazionale della Stampa last February. Signor Micheli, Minister for the Navy, was elected President of the North Italian Christian Democrats in July 1945. Signor Aldisio, who takes charge of the newly created Ministry for the Merchant Navy, was Minister of the Interior in Marshal Badoglio's Government in 1944 and later in the same year was appointed High Commissioner for Sicily. He resigned this post in order to fight the elections and was returned for Palermo. Signor Cingolani, Minister for Air, took an active part in politics before the advent of Fascism. In 1944 he was appointed Deputy High Commissioner for the expropriation of illicit fortunes. Signor Gonella, Minister of Education, is a well-known journalist and a former Editor of the Osservatore Romano. Since June 1944 he has been editor of his Party's paper, Il Popolo. Signor Segni, Minister of Agriculture, was Under-Secretary for Agriculture under Bonomi and in late Government. No information is available on Signor Campilli, Minister of Foreign Trade, Signor Ferrari, Minister of Transport, or Signor D'Aragona, Minister of Labour. Signor Morandi, Minister of Industry and Commerce, is a Professor of Economics. He was imprisoned by the Fascists and took a prominent part in the liberation of Turin from the Germans. In February 1946 he was elected President of the CLN Association. Signor Sereni, Minister of Post-War Assistance, was an organiser of Communist resistance against Fascism for which he served several sentences of imprisonment. He is a member of the Communist Party Executive. Signor Reale, Commissioner for Public Health, was Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the second Bonomi Government and was appointed Ambassador to Poland in July 1945.

Italy's first President, Signor de Nicola, read a message to the nation at a session of the Constituent Assembly on the 15th July. The President began his message by swearing that he would fulfil his mission with the sole ideal of serving his country faithfully and loyally. Signor de Nicola then went on to say that all Italians must unite, otherwise Italy would fall, never to rise again. Those who were about to decide Italy's fate must remember, said the President, that any further humiliation to Italy's honour, independence and unity would produce "not the collapse of a nation but the eclipse of a civilisation." A sound international order, he concluded, could not be built on injustice. Signor De Gasperi also spoke indicating Italy's willingness to collaborate with regard to both her eastern and western frontiers.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Left-wing politicians and press, reinforced by Moscow radio, have never ceased to urge Hungarians to prosecute the fight against "reaction" in Hungary, and they have recently found a target for their attacks in the discovery of scapegoat fascist plots, the importance of which was probably much exaggerated and the shooting of two Soviet officers reported in Summary No. 348. The climax of this campaign came on the 28th June, when the Russian Deputy Chairman of the Allied Control Commission, without the knowledge of his British and American colleagues, addressed to the Hungarian Government a demand on behalf of the Soviet High Command that, in view of the spread of fascism, the Hungarian Y.M.C.A., Boy Scout's Association, the Smallholders' youth organisation and certain youth organisations of the Roman Catholic Church should be suppressed or reorganised; that the tone of the Press must be changed and certain writers should not be allowed to publish articles in any Hungarian paper; that the State machinery, especially in relation to certain Under-Secretaries of State and Lord Lieutenants, should be purged; and that three deputies charged with fascist crimes should be brought to trial. Although the Hungarian Government were informed—and expressed due appreciation—that the British and American Commissioners were to protest that the order should ever have been issued without consulting them, and to ask for its suspension, they have nevertheless yielded to pressure from the Left and replied offering full satisfaction to the Soviet demands though temporising over the trial of the deputies, and the dismissal of the Under-Secretary of State for Justice. The leaders of the Smallholders' youth organisation have already been replaced and the Press reported, even before the reply was sent, that a Catholic Students' organisation and numerous other associations were dissolved and the executive of the Boy Scouts Association was reorganised. M. Nagy has reaffirmed his belief that the coalition must be maintained; M. Szakasits, the leader of the Social Democrat

C266621

Party, shares this view, but is reported to have said at an inter-party meeting that this could only be achieved if these intermittent political crises are avoided. The National Assembly may meet in a few days' time, for, according to the press, M. D. Sulyok's new "Freedom Party" (now sanctioned by the Allied Control Commission) has presented a petition, supported by the requisite number of signatures, asking that it should be convoked.

The names of the Hungarian delegation to the Peace Conference have been announced. They include M. Gyöngyössi, the Foreign Minister, who will lead the delegation, M. Auer, Hungarian Minister in Paris, and M. Bede, Hungarian Government Representative in London.

With the complete collapse of the pengö the taxation pengö (now valued at 40,000 billion pengö) has been declared legal tender until the introduction of the new currency, but circulation of even these vouchers has at times been inadequate. Although they are also fast losing their value, they are still accepted by shopkeepers. The new currency is regarded as a panacea; measures for rationing food, clothes and soap, however, to be introduced concurrently, together with the improved harvest prospects, may increase its chances of remaining stable—and, what is particularly important, of winning the confidence of the farmers. Better weather during the harvest has raised the estimated yield of bread grain to 19,000,000 quintals—6,000,000 quintals more than the preliminary estimate. Hungary's grain stocks are almost exhausted, but the Soviet Union has come to her assistance with a loan of 3,000 tons of wheat to tide her over until the new crop is available.

It is now officially confirmed that the U.S. loan to purchase surplus war material was increased from 10 to 15 million dollars, and that Hungary may now recover property taken abroad after 15th October, 1944—not 21st January, 1945, as was first suggested.

The official Hungarian figures of war casualties assess the number of those killed in battle or died of wounds at 136,000 and those wounded in battle at 68,296. 220,000 died in concentration camps and 46,000 in air raids.

Yugoslavia.

Comment on the Trieste decision has been relatively subdued, and there have been no spontaneous demonstrations yet nor telegrams of protest from "all sections of the population." The opinions of the Press have been those of M. Kardelj, paraphrased; all agree that it is up to the Peace Conference to reverse the decision of the Foreign Ministers.

A sensational report from Rome on the 12th July about an attempt on the life of Tito seemed to have been disproved by the news of his arrival the following day at Podgorica, where he made his fourth speech of the week. Except for one or two sour remarks about Allied ingratitude, a rejection of the Trieste decision and some condemnation of Mihajlovitch and the London Government these speeches, commemorating the anniversary of his first call-to-arms in July 1941, were devoted to internal affairs. They consisted largely of Communist platitudes and promises of a rosy future, seasoned with references to unavoidable mistakes in the past and necessary restrictions in the present. That starvation had been avoided during the winter was to the credit of the "people's authorities" who had arranged for the importation of grain. Although he mentioned U.N.R.R.A. cotton he said not a word about the food supplies received from U.N.R.R.A. which, it is now clear, have so greatly helped to consolidate the régime during a period of uncertainty.

Marshal Tito also complained about the dearth of professional men; and his injunction of patience "until the coming of the rising generation" well illustrates the Government's educational policy, which is to insulate that generation from all but Communist influences. To this end unadaptable school children are liable to "educational" imprisonment and even torture, while higher education is gradually being barred to all but the privileged Partisan class.

The trial of Mihajlovitch was enlivened on the 8th July by M. Joksimovitch's fiery speech for the defence, which caused an uproar by its courageous criticism of the conduct of the trial and of the attitude of the Prosecutor. With dramatic contrast Mihajlovitch spoke for over four hours, in a manner of quiet dignity, almost of diffidence. He stressed his consistently pro-Russian attitude, his early desire for agreement with Tito, which was frustrated by their unsurmountable difference of opinion, and his lack of control over some of his subordinates. He presented himself as a man carried out of his course by the tide of events. The expected death sentence was pronounced on the 15th July. In the House of Commons on July 16th Mr. Bevin denied the charges, direct and implied, which have been brought against British Liaison Officers in the course of the trial.

Although Borba has emphasised the "objectivity" of the trial, there have been grounds for M. Joksimovitch's criticisms. "Full publicity" has meant the admission of acceptable journalists, the broadcasting of the trial only during the prosecution, and biased reporting in the Yugoslav press. "Every facility for the Defence" has amounted to limited opportunities for consultation with their clients, and then always in the presence of high Partisan officials, interruptions during the examination of witnesses and the refusal, as being irrelevant, of requests to call witnesses such as British Liaison Officers and Allied airmen.

Greece.

The first stage of the preparations for the plebiscite was passed on 12 July when, after being twice extended, the period for registration in the electoral rolls and the submission of complaints and petitions came to an end. The Observer Mission do not, however, expect to be able to express any opinion on the validity or completeness of the revised and recompiled registers until these take legal shape, i.e., about the middle of August. M. Tsaldaris has told the London press that, in his personal opinion, more than 70 per cent. of the Greek people will vote for the return of the King.

On 28 June, a draft law was tabled in the Chamber for a comprehensive purge of all public services. If it becomes law, all persons employed by the State, with the exception of officers and N.C.Os of the armed and Security forces, and of officials appointed since the last elections, will be made liable to dismissal; grounds for dismissal include, as well as the less controversial ones of collaboration with the enemy, professional incompetence and moral unsuitability, participation in or assistance to the revolt of December 1944, and any subsequent activity directed against law, order, or the State. It was explained that irregularities due to the dictatorship and the occupation made it necessary to reorganise the civil service, and indeed it is essential to reduce the enormous number of redundant officials on the Government's payroll (Vima stated, in April, that there were over 68,000 Greek civil servants). In execution, however, the law is clearly open to political abuse and the Opposition, both inside and outside the Chamber, have not been slow to condemn it as an instrument of political blackmail, as unconstitutional, and (by the elimination of all non-royalists from the public service) a new step towards a falsified plebiscite.

The financial circumstances of nearly all civil servants have for some time been wretched, and the Government sought to win their approval of the impending purge by suggesting that only after their numbers have been reduced would any real improvement be practicable. Meanwhile, since they fear the possibly inflationary effect of an all-round increase in salaries they have announced their intention of making a free distribution to civil servants of U.N.R.R.A. food and clothing. This however has landed them in an unfortunate controversy with the U.N.R.R.A. Mission to Greece, who have in any case for some time been dissatisfied with the disparities in the distribution of goods and in standards of living. Two letters were sent to the Greek Government by the head of the Mission, Mr. Maben, complaining not only of the intended discrimination in favour of civil servants, but also of the failure of successive administrations to introduce a full rationing scheme, to embrace local as well as imported products, and of certain cases where the local authorities have withheld supplies from the families of outlaws or from villages (in Thessaly) in which conditions are unsatisfactory to the Government. M. Stephanopoulos, Minister of Economic Coordination, while agreeing to enquire into and correct the improper withholding of supplies, stated on the 11th that the Government stood by their plan for free issues to civil servants and would, if necessary, make good from home produce the U.N.R.R.A. supplies in that category. The existence of this controversy became public property from the first; on 13 July Athens radio broadcast a rather injured talk, reminding its listeners that the Greeks are proud and do not like to be constantly reminded that they are dependent on outside help, and asserting that Greece would be able to do without U.N.R.R.A. "if her enemies were compelled to make good the destruction they inflicted on her productive resources"—the usual reference to reparations.

Another international body with which the Greek Government bids fair soon to be embroiled is the WFTU. Not only did the Greek delegation to the Moscow congress (cf. Summary No. 349 of 3 July) which only arrived, after an unexplained delay, just before the Congress ended, tell the Executive the usual stories of "terrorism" against workmen's organisations; on 26th, a decision of the Council of State, the highest judicial authority in Greece, declared the present executive of the Greek General Confederation of Labour to be improperly constituted. This is the more serious in view of the part played by WFTU representatives—Louis Saillant in December 1945, and a French, British and Russian delegation in March 1946—in the negotiations which produced the present Trade Union position in Greece, and in accepting the present executive, with its communist preponderance, as properly representative of the Greek trade union movement. The Greek Government are in something of a cleft stick over this matter, since they cannot offend their own supporters and contravene a legal decision by allowing the present executive to remain, nor do anything else without bringing the WFTU like a hornets' nest about their ears.

Albania.

The twenty years' treaty of Friendship and Mutual Assistance concluded by the Yugoslav Foreign Minister with the Albanian Government at Tirana on the 9th July bears the marks of Soviet inspiration which were to be expected in view of the subservience of each Government to Moscow. According to the published text, the two countries will concert measures to ensure their independence and integrity, to prevent any repetition of aggression, like that of the Nazis and Fascists, by a third Power intending to enslave them or to seize part of their territory. They will collaborate closely in all international action for safeguarding peace and will follow the principles of the United Nations. In case one party is attacked the other will lend military aid and all other assistance possible. Each party promises to make no other alliance and to join no coalition directed against the other. Disputes are to be settled amicably and special agreements are to deal with economic and cultural matters.

From press reports its appears that the trial of thirty-seven Albanians for treason during the war (see Summary 349) has resulted in the usual savage verdict: nine death sentences, five sentences to imprisonment for life, fourteen sentences to thirty years' imprisonment and two acquittals.

There have been several armed clashes on the southern frontier in the last few weeks (see "Greece" in last Summary). The Albanian press attributes them to regular Greek forces, but more probably they are Albanian attempts to provoke Greek counter-measures which could be exploited as Greek aggression.

Bulgaria.

The situation in Bulgaria continues to be tense. Vasil Kolarov, the speaker of the Sobranie, returned from Paris and was given a great reception. He has been formally thanked for "his brilliant defence of our national cause" and seems to have taken some trouble to make a good impression on both Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes, and to have departed superficially from conventional communism to the extent of keeping his "collar on." Three leading members of the Opposition have been arrested, and it seems likely that the elmination of opposition is being undertaken in full confidence that the Government will receive Russian support for all they do.

According to the Bulgarian press the Sobranie has sanctioned an "Extraordinary Budget" amounting to 17 milliard leva. The public are reminded that Extraordinary Budgets were passed during the "Fascist Régimes" but were not used in the true interests of the people. This one is, of course, "creative" and is to be used for new power stations, railways and machinery, and for roads and buildings. The Fatherland Front can be depended on to provide the necessary funds, and, by way of adding a sting to the tail, "control must be tightened so that no income tax remains unpaid."

Good results from the harvest are anticipated, so good in fact that the peasants are suspected of concerning themselves with the problem of preventing a large part of the crop from falling into Russian hands. The army has received instructions to prevent hoarding, and it is being suggested that the idea of hoarding has been put into the heads of the peasants by enemies of the Fatherland Front. If the peasants and the enemies of the Fatherland Front are to a large extent the same people this may very well be fairly near the truth.

Turkey.

With the new Democratic Party in the field as a definite, if young, rival to the old-established People's Party, the general election of the 21st July promises to be less of a farce than Turkish elections have necessarily been during the years of the People's Party's monopoly. The local authorities have been particularly instructed to maintain order, but they have for so long had to regard the government as identical with the People's Party that they have some excuse if they now fail to keep a fair field. In any case an active electoral campaign is in progress, and party passion seems to translate itself rather easily into physical violence. On the 8th July M. Saracoğlu, the Prime Minister, broadcast an important election speech. After reviewing the achievements of the Turkish revolution in every field of national life since 1918, he claimed that since 1942 his own Cabinet had successfully overcome four crises—the war, finance, famine and the fuel shortage. His only reference to foreign relations was the statement—obviously intended for Moscow—that in case of need Turkey would not hesitate to shed "torrents of blood" for its existence, its alliance with Britain and its international engagements.

Some stir was caused by a report from Paris of a meeting held there under Communist auspices, which not only supported the familiar demand for the annexation to Soviet Armenia of Kars and Ardahan, but also formulated claims for the autonomy of Cilicia and of Kurdistan. The press took this up with some warmth—no doubt in the hope of making the French Government forbid the further meetings which were announced for Marseilles, Lyons and other provincial centres.

Turkey has always taken an interest in the Crimean Tatars, which incidentally can hardly have commended them to the Russian authorities. The deportation of these people (See under "Soviet Union" in Summary No. 349) has been fully and bitterly criticised in the Turkish press.

According to all reports this year's crops are good, and wheat, barley and rye should be available for export.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Egypt.

On the 8th July Sidky Pasha handed to Lord Stansgate a new draft treaty prepared by the Egyptian delegation, and discussions were resumed in a more friendly and co-operative atmosphere than had prevailed previously. In a statement made to the Senate on the 15th July Sidky Pasha explained that the British Government had consented to drop the idea of a military convention for that of a joint defence board, and he expressed confidence in the speedy conclusion of the negotiations.

The local situation has been further disturbed. When the President of the Moslem Brethren visited Port Said on the 6th July to address members of the association, a large crowd of Wafdists tried to break up the meeting. Shots were fired and grenades thrown, and the Moslem Brethren were severely handled, not only by the Wafdists, but also by the police. Next day a procession of Wafdists returning from the funeral of one of their number who had been killed, developed into a Wafdist demonstration, in dispersing which the police killed one more person and injured another ten, besides suffering casualties themselves. On the night of the 10th July a grenade was thrown at some British soldiers crossing Qasr an Nil bridge at Cairo, and seven of them were injured. In two other cases bombs were thrown at members of the British forces at Alexandria, killing two and injuring others; and two grenades were thrown at a N.A.A.F.I. vehicle entering Alexandria after dark on the 11th July, but did no harm. In all these cases the perpetrators seem to have escaped.

In the early hours of the 11th July the police raided premises at Cairo, Alexandria, Port Said, Ismailia and Suez occupied by persons and organisations suspected of Communism. Nearly one hundred people were arrested, including Greeks and other foreigners. The Minister of the Interior suspended indefinitely the Wafd-al-Misri (the official organ of the Wafd) and seven minor reviews of a Communist complexion. Eleven organisations were also closed down, and among them were cultural associations long suspected of Communist tendencies. In explanation of this drastic action Sidky Pasha issued a statement to the effect that, since he assumed office, there had been extraordinary Communist activity directed to upsetting law and order, and to fomenting revolution. These things were contrary to an Islamic régime based on high moral values, tolerance, understanding and charity, and the Government would introduce a bill to put a stop to such abuses.

Palestine.

After a meeting of the Zionist Committee at Jerusalem on the 9th July Dr. Weizmann expressed his confidence that the Jewish people would emerge triumphant from the present crisis. He had been asked, he said, to use a restraining influence, and he was determined to do so; but he felt obliged to say that the primary cause of the present dreadful happenings lay with those who had allowed the situation to drift. A commentary on these remarks may perhaps be found in the fact that on the 21st June an arms dump containing machine-guns, a mortar, pistols, ammunition and explosives, was discovered under the floor of a shed in the premises of the Palestine Potash Company by the Dead Sea. On the 10th July the Zionist Committee in Jerusalem decided not to co-operate with the authorities until arrested Jews had been released and "attacks" on Jewish institutions discontinued. The premises of the Jewish Agency at Jerusalem were handed back by the police on the same day.

Persia.

On the 14th July a general strike developed at all the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company's refineries and oil-fields in southern Persia, and succeeded in bringing production to a temporary standstill. According to the Company's report of the strike at Agha Jari, the Tudeh ringleader, an irresponsible maniac, was in complete control there, having seized the telephone and all transport, and picketed the houses of the British staff. At Ahwaz all the Company's employees struck on the morning of the 14th July, and servants were stopped from coming to the houses of the staff by persons wearing ribbons marked "Provincial Workers' Union." The Soviet Consul is reported to have visited the Company's compound on the evening of the 13th July and, according to the police, to have offered to supply the Ahwaz Labour Union with arms if necessary. At Abadan, where the ostensible issue was Friday pay, the Tudeh declared a general strike, held processions and meetings in defiance of authority, confined Europeans to their houses, and did everything they could to provoke the Arabs, attacking their union headquarters, burning cars and so on. Firing which started on the night of the 13th July developed into a general mêlée between the Tudeh and the Arabs, and the Tudeh mob brutally murdered two prominent Arab merchants and their families. Thereupon the Tudeh seem to have withdrawn with their pickets to their clubs, but thousands of Arabs appeared, armed with staves and hatchets.

The whole strike was remarkably well organised. The Prime Minister, who seems to have foreseen it, gave the Governor-General full power to proclaim martial law, but troops and reliable officers were few, and the chief of police at Khorramshahr was pro-Tudeh and did nothing. Nevertheless, some reinforcements were sent from Tehran, martial law was proclaimed at Abadan, and twelve Tudeh leaders were arrested at Ahwaz. Ahwaz was quiet by the 15th July, and the Governor-General, who seems to have shown commendable energy, hoped to have Abadan under complete control soon after that.

FAR EAST.

China.

The fifteen days' truce between the Central Government and Communist forces, which was extended almost at the eleventh hour for a further period of eight days, expired on the 30th June. Whether another extension of this truce has been, or is to be, agreed upon is obscure. The Minister of Information at Nanking declared at a press conference that, although the period of truce had expired with the differences between the two parties still unsettled, negotiations towards a peaceful settlement would be continued. He added, however, that if the Communists continued their attacks on Government troops, the latter would be compelled to resist and to counter-attack for the sake of maintaining peace and order. As one of the conditions governing the expired truce bound both parties to remain in their existing positions, provided the forces of the other side did the same (which the other side seldom did), it would not appear to make a great deal of practical difference whether the so-called negotiations are pursued with, or without, an official "truce." Both in Manchuria and in China proper, particularly in the Province of Shantung, the twenty-seven days' truce period was marked by continuous and heavy fighting, which, despite the presence of American "field teams," has shown little sign of cessation.

In the north the Communists have been consolidating their positions in the Jehol, Chahar and Hopei Provinces and have declared Kushan in Shansi a military zone. In Manchuria the Communist Commander has refused to evacuate Harbin, despite American persuasive pressure. In Shantung, generally the situation is regarded as serious. Fighting on a heavy scale has continued all along the railway line and particularly in the Tsinan area, as the Communists have consolidated their hold on strategic points of communications. On the 20th June, Central Government forces took possession of the Changshan Islands with the object of cutting the Communists' line of communication between the Shantung Peninsula and Dairen; but the move was made too late in the day to be of real value. The threatening situation in the immediate vicinity of Tsingtao showed some slight improvement during the latter part of June, and the city itself was thought no longer to be in danger of Communist attack; this improvement was due, no doubt, more to American intervention and the presence of large numbers of United States marines coupled with the routine visit of the American fleet for the summer months, than to a desire on either side to implement the "cease fire" order. According to the New York Times of the 29th June, in a statement on United States policy Mr. Dean Acheson told reporters that 20,000 marines would remain in China to guard supply lines from coal-producing areas to the main coastal cities.

There is no doubt that both in Nanking and Yenan there is an increasingly tense atmosphere of mutual mistrust and recrimination. Central Government authorities are convinced that the Communists are completing plans for a nation-wide uprising and that Yenan has already appointed military leaders to conduct operations in various areas. They assert that huge stocks of ammunition have been built up at all strategic points. Communist leaders, on the other hand, maintain that the deadlock in the peace negotiations has been brought about deliberately by the Nanking officials to suit their own ends at a time when many points of difference were susceptible of solution. They are particularly incensed that in the face of such strained relations the Government should have chosen this moment to announce that the National Assembly will meet on the 12th November. The decision, they say, was made without consultation of their representative in Nanking and affords proof of the Government's set intention to continue the one-party system. The Communist press is vociferous in its accusations against the American Government, from whom, it is maintained, the Nanking Government are receiving financial, material and moral support for the conduct of civil war. This outburst obviously has reference to the bill now before Congress for American military aid to China.

Speaking on the 15th December, 1945, President Truman said: "As China moves towards peace and unity . . . . the United States would be prepared to assist the National Government in every reasonable way to rehabilitate the country . . . . and establish a military organisation capable of discharging China's national and international responsibilities for the maintenance of peace and order." And, in pursuance of this policy, the State Department introduced in Congress early in June a bill providing for United States advice and assistance to the Chinese Government in the creation of a modern, moderately-sized Chinese army for the fulfilment of obligations which may devolve upon that country under the United Nations Charter. In testifying before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. Dean Acheson said that "General Marshall had recognised the compelling necessity of combining into one army the military forces operating in that country. . . . Communist forces are lacking in the type of organisation, training and equipment which would have made practicable their incorporation into the new non-political national army. Therefore, the Communist leaders have asked; and General Marshall has agreed, that their integration with the other portions be preceded by a brief period of U.S. training and by supply of minimum quantities of equipment. Any such assistance in the months ahead will hinge upon progress of the plans for amalgamation of all the armed forces." Under General Marshall's plan, the present combined Chinese forces of 325 divisions would be reduced to about 60 divisions, of which 50 would be Nationalist troops and 10 Communist groups. Mr. Acheson continued that "the heart of General Marshall's programme will be the sending to China of a United States military advisory group of about 1,000 men"; and he concluded his statement by saying that the President had stated that a disorganised and divided China would be an "undermining influence to world stability and peace" and would invite outside interference in Chinese affairs.

The American Aid to China bill also provides that "arms and ammunition, supplies and equipment and other property, except naval vessels" may be placed at China's disposal "by sale, exchange, lease, gift or transfer for cash, credit or other property."

In his press conference statement Mr. Dean Acheson mentioned the existence of a United States lend-lease agreement with China for approximately U.S. $ 58,000,000 to regularise the understanding arrived at soon after V.J. Day "that China would purchase those Lend-Lease supplies which were being processed or were en route to China." And Mr. Acheson went on to say that the United States Government "has felt that some measure of economic assistance could not be held in abeyance pending agreement among the Chinese political parties to come together in a unified Government."

While Communist leaders profess admiration for General Marshall's endeavours towards a peaceful settlement, they are frankly suspicious of this gesture of generosity from the American Government. They maintain that American arms, equipment and transport are being placed at the disposal of the Central Government for use against them; they see in the bill now before Congress the prospect of substantial aid to the Nanking Government and some small benefit to the Communists only if and when unification has taken place and the Communist armed forces have been reduced to a state of impotency in a ratio of 5 to 1; Mr. Acheson has made it quite clear that if the plan for unification is not carried out, training will not be given to Communist units; and the Communists declare that they want but one thing only of the Americans, that they should withdraw their forces and leave the internal affairs of China to the Chinese. Nor have they been appeased by the statement by Mr. Dean Acheson that

> "recent press reports from China indicate a misunderstanding or misconception by various Chinese elements of our objectives and policies in affording assistance to China. The various moves taken by this Government to aid China . . . . cannot rightfully be interpreted as current support of any factional military group . . . . their purpose is to cement rather than destroy unity; to encourage the Chinese to find a solution of their internal problems by the democratic process of peaceful agreement rather than by resort to military force."

Articles criticising American policy in China have appeared in all the leading Soviet papers on the basis of Tass messages from Chicago and Shanghai. The purpose is to show that United States military aid to the Nanking Government has been the chief cause of the breaking out, continuation and expansion of large-scale civil war. Prominence is given to the argument that, if Moscow had given aid and supplies to Yenan, Washington would undoubtedly have considered this a fresh instance of intervention by the Kremlin in affairs which are not the concern of Russia; and that it is not clear whether General Marshall is in China as American intermediary or Commander of United American and National troops against Yenan.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The Anglo-American Financial Agreement, extending a "line of credit" of $3,750 million to Great Britain, was finally ratified by the House of Representatives in Washington by a vote of 219 to 155 on the 13th July. At the White House on the 15th President Truman signed the Bill making the Agreement effective. Despite the delay that has ensued since the Agreement itself was originally signed last December the final decision of Congress is gratifying for more than purely economic reasons. Regarded in its wider aspects, the relatively large majority which the Agreement secured—exceeding as it did the most sanguine predictions of the Administration leaders in the House—represents a clear endorsement of that policy which would make this country the principal political as well as business partner of the United States in the post-war world. This endorsement is all the more remarkable in that it was given by a body of men on Capitol Hill who have refused their unconditional assent to almost every other major item of legislation requested by the United States Government during the past few months.

With the shadow of the Paris Conference and, in particular, of the intransigent form of M. Molotov hanging over the House, the vote of the 13th was in many respects a political decision. Less effect had been produced in the course of the debate by the erudite economic reasoning in favour of the loan than by such dramatic utterances as the final remark of Mr. Sam Rayburn, who, stepping down from his Speaker's desk, said that he did not want Western Europe pushed towards an ideology that he despised and expressed the fear that, if the United States were "not allied to the great British democracy. . . ., somebody may be." With the thoughts of many Congressmen running along these lines, the speeches made by the loan's opponents, particularly the Anglophobe tirade of Representative Jessie Sumner of Illinois, sounded more than ever remote from reality. In any case the isolationists were smarting under the resounding defeat of their principal Middle Western spokesman, Senator Henrik Shipstead, at the hands of the internationalist State Governor, Mr. Edward Thye, in the Minnesota Republican primary election of the 8th July. The elimination from national politics of Mr. Shipstead, who has sat in the Upper House since 1922 and who was one of the only two Senators who voted against the United Nations Charter in 1945, represents the hardest single blow which the forces of isolationism have sustained since the war.

What seemed to be the most serious threat to the loan during the four days debate came from the efforts of the Zionist extremists to wreak vengeance upon His Majesty's Government for the arrest of the Jewish Agency leaders in Palestine. These took, inter alia, the form of a new crop of advertisements appealing to members of the House to "kill the loan" which were inserted in the New York newspapers by the Political Action Committee for Palestine. They coincided with the presentation by Representative Emanuel Celler, a New York Democrat, of an amendment making the loan contingent upon the immediate admission to Palestine of the 100,000 Jews and with the publication by the Chairman of the Democratic party in New York State, Mr. Paul Fitzpatrick, of a declaration that no Democratic member from his territory would vote for the loan unless the immigration proposal were previously accepted. Nevertheless, as events before the final vote proved, the Zionists overplayed their hand. Two influential members of the Congressional Advisory Board of the Political Action Committee publicly severed their connection with that body because of the unwarranted use of their names in the anti-loan campaign, and Rabbi Stephen Wise and the President of the American Jewish Committee, Mr. Joseph Proskauer, issued statements supporting the loan and thereby virtually repudiating the blackmail tactics of their fellow-Zionists. Mr. Fitzpatrick's threat remained largely a dead letter and Mr. Sol Bloom, the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, was among those influential New York Democrats who voted for the loan.

Apart from the clear-cut decision on the British loan, the past week has been one of continued doubt and uncertainty for most Americans in both foreign and domestic politics. Almost the only positive result seen to be emerging from the Foreign Ministers' meeting was the agreement to convene the full peace conference on the 29th of this month. All hope of agreement on the future of Germany was dashed by M. Molotov's onslaught of the 9th July on Mr. Byrnes' Four-Power treaty proposal and by the ensuing clash of views between the two statesmen. Commentators saw only the most sinister implications in the Soviet Minister's counter-proposals. Coinciding as it did with the latest seizures of "Reich" property in Austria and with the systematic campaign to wreck the new Government in Hungary, his claim to $10,000 million worth of reparations from Germany was generally interpreted as the first step towards bringing the whole of Central Europe under permanent Soviet domination.

At home the failure of Congress to enact the legislation asked for by the Administration has left the price control situation as confused as ever. Nevertheless, although the outcry against Congress has been loud and sustained in the urban areas, the United States is as much a "house divided" on price control as it was on other issues when Lincoln made his classic utterance eighty-eight years ago. In those twenty-eight States where the agricultural population outnumbers the industrial, and where farmers hope to reap quick profits from a sharp rise in food prices, there is relatively little regret at the undignified demise of the Office of Price Administration. It was, in fact, the members from these States who managed to secure the exemption of farm products from the revised price control bill which the Senate passed on the 13th July and which is so remote from the original legislation requested by the President that he is expected to veto it if it is submitted for his signature in its present form.

LATIN AMERICA.

Argentina.

The entry into power of the Peronists has caused the greatest confusion in Buenos Aires. The proportion of the civil service that has been sacrificed to the requirements of political patronage seems to be greatly in excess of the usual, and while the city hums with rumours of intrigues the Government departments are reduced to the minimum of efficiency. There have been reports that the ruthless Chief of Police, General Velasco, is at the head of a group opposed to the prevailing corruption, and that he is working with the Minister of War, General Sosa Molina, and a number of deputies. It is also reported that Perón is aware of this conspiracy and may remove the ringleaders to Patagonia, though the fact that he has not already done so suggests that he is not entirely sure of himself.

Meanwhile, there is no further news of a settlement between the State Department and Argentina. Mr. Messersmith has been ill for some days, and though the shadow of a serious operation seems to have lifted, he is less sanguine than when he arrived of inducing what he believes to be a well-disposed Colonel Perón to be firm with his more unscrupulous backers. According to Mr. Messersmith, the question of ratifying the Act of Chapultepec (see Summary No. 348) is to go before an ignorant and inexperienced congress without any lead from Perón himself, though the President professes to desire ratification.

An Argentine deputy has submitted to the Chamber a draft declaration calling on the Argentine Government to submit claims to the Falkland Islands to the Security Council and demanding that Great Britain should "return" them. The speaker professed admiration for the freedom of English institutions, and hoped "to see the same spirit applied to international affairs." The motion was unanimously approved, and a declaration was drafted to the respect that the Chamber "would view with pleasure that the executive power should opportunely and with due urgency address itself to the Security Council asserting the sovereign rights of the Argentine Nation over the Islas Malvinas . . . ." A subjoined article "reaffirms Argentine sovereignty over the Antarctic sector."

Chile.

Broadcast reports suggest that the right-wing candidates for the Chilean presidential election will be Dr. Cruz Coke, whose name was approved after the elimination of Sres, Alessandri, Larraín and Maza (see Summary No. 349). Dr. Cruz Coke was Minister of Health from January 1937 till September 1938, and was elected as Conservative Senator for Santiago in 1941. He was a delegate to the San Francisco Conference in 1945, and is president of the Chilean-British Medical Centre. His chief opponent, Sr. Gabriel González Videla, was one of creators of the Chilean Popular Front, and led it until the election of Sr. Aguirre Cerda as President. He unsuccessfully competed with the late Sr. Ríos to become Radical candidate for the Presidency, and has since been Ambassador to Brazil; he was also a delegate to the San Francisco Conference. Sr. González Videla has been associated with a number of left-wing organisations, and is president of the Chilean Society for aiding Spanish Republicans.

Guatemala.

The President of Guatemala recently gave an interview to a Mexican journalist in which he is alleged to have stated: "We shall try to obtain the return of Belize through diplomatic channels, but if we fail we shall break off relations with England when this is necessary. We cannot continue to drink toasts with an Empire which has taken our territory," and "I am awaiting the opportune moment to say to them either they return our territory or they go to London." According to Excelsior, President Arévalo also spoke of a Mexican claim to British Honduras and added: "We shall not fight with Mexico, but we shall insist on our rights." These rather surprising statements were reproduced in the Guatemalan semi-official Mediodía under a banner headline stating that Guatemala was ready to break off relations.

H.M. Minister had a special audience the following morning with the Guatemalan Minister for Foreign Affairs, who declared himself taken completely by surprise, having only read the President's statement in the press. He had already pointed out to Sr. Arévalo that the effect on present negotiations would be disastrous, and the President, while admitting that there was some truth in the report, explained that he meant that action would only be taken if negotiations failed. The Foreign Minister told Mr. Hughes Hallett that he was taking steps to have a statement published in the local newspapers to the effect that negotiations were proceeding with the possibility of success: should he not obtain the President's assent his only course would be to resign, which might cause the Government to fall.

The internal situation in Guatemala is very strained. The President has the support of Congress, but sections of the army and conservatives might well seize any opportunity to remove him.

Mexico.

The Presidential elections took place on the 7th July. The press has declared with great satisfaction that these were the first peaceful elections that Mexico has known, and indeed, with the exception of an incident at Pachuca in which four persons were killed, it does not appear that the carnage was less than usual. While final results are not yet known, it seems virtually certain that Lic. Miguel Alemán has won an easy victory over Dr. Ezequiel Padilla—for the reasons indicated in Summary No. 344.

Venezuela.

The Government has given a promise that the elections for the Venezuelan presidency and Constituent Assembly (see Summary No. 342) will take place before the end of the year. All Venezuelans over 18, without distinction of sex or literacy restrictions, will be entitled to vote.

The four major parties which have now taken shape in Venezuela are the Government party, Democratic Action, a left-wing or moderate socialist organization; the Democratic Republican Union (URD), to a large extent built up out of ex-President Medina's Venezuelan Democratic Party; COPEI, or Committee of Political Electoral Independent Organization, a right-wing and clerical group; and the Venezuelan Communists, or Unión Popular. The Communists, who were permitted by General Medina to come out into the open, consist of two wings, the drawing-room and the authentic or Muscovite, the latter being prominent in the organization of the oil-workers.

In June the Government's education decree, which gave Government schools a virtual monopoly of the examination system, was vigorously opposed by COPEI and led to a strike on the part of private schools. Although the Government party indulged in rather wild recriminations, and the Communists took advantage of the opportunity to express their dislike of the clerical COPEI, the Minister of Education was at length forced to resign and the decree was duly modified.

As a number of political rallies ended in disorder and shooting, it was agreed at the end of June by all four parties that meetings should not be held until the electoral lists are ready.

UNITED NATIONS.

Security Council.

On the 10th July the Council approved the provisional rules of procedure for the Atomic Energy Commission. When the President read out the Canadians' request, as an interested party under article 31 of the Charter, to take part in the discussions without voting, the Russian delegate asked for a postponement. The President, however, called for a vote, and the Canadian request was granted by 9 votes to one (Russia), with Poland abstaining. The Russian representative then argued that substance and not procedure was involved and that his adverse vote carried a veto; to which the chairman replied that he had ruled the matter to be procedural and that M. Gromyko would have to get a majority (of which there was no prospect) in order to have the ruling reversed. General McNaughton was then invited to take his seat, and the President passed on to the next business, which was the conditions under which the International Court of Justice should be open to States not parties to the Statute. The matter was referred to the Committee of Experts.

The President, Señor Najera (Mexico) is due to retire on the 17th. In his farewell speech he mentioned the frequent Russian employment of the veto and the growing desire of the Smaller Powers for a more democratic voting procedure. He made the interesting suggestion that the Security Council was not "exercising its functions" by merely retaining the Spanish question on its Agenda, and that, consequently, the General Assembly was not debarred from proceeding to action under Article 12 of the Charter. The effect of this on Russia was felt when, into the midst of the bouquets which the delegates were offering the retiring President, M. Gromyko made the thrust that the President would be gravely mistaken if he thought his remarks would have any result.

Atomic Energy Commission.

The Working Committee decided on the 12th July to set up the following Committees: (1) Committee No. 2, to examine the problem of control in its widest sense: (2) A Legal Advisory Committee, and (3) A Scientific and Technical Committee. The Soviet Representative objected to the relationship between controls and the United Nations coming within the province of the Legal Committee. He also asked for a specific prohibition of the production of atomic weapons; but he was outvoted in both cases.

The General Assembly.

When the Peace Conference was fixed for the 29th July, it became obvious that the German Assembly of the United Nations would have to be postponed. The Secretary General has now circulated a proposal that the date be the 23rd September. If the postponement is accepted, the Economic and Social Council will probably put off the opening of its Third Session from the 31st August to a date in September.

The International Institute of Agriculture.

The International Institute of Agriculture, which has been established in Rome since its foundation in 1905, held its last General Assembly on the 8th and 9th July, 1946. During the war and since the liberation of Rome the Institute has been working under increasing difficulties, particularly as regards finance. With the creation of the Food and Agriculture Organisation in 1943, the undesirability of having two international bodies covering the same field became apparent; and a resolution adopted at the F.A.O. Conference at Quebec in October 1945 recommended in effect that the duties and assets of the I.I.A. and of the International Forestry Centre attached to it, should be taken over by the F.A.O. which would also assume certain powers vested in the I.I.A. under a number of international Conventions, such as those on Locust Control (1920), Plant Protection (1928) and others.

Although considerable difficulty in obtaining agreement on some of the questions involved would not have been surprising, the Assembly passed off without a hitch, and the Resolution for winding up the Institute was adopted unanimously. A Liquidation Commission of seven members was appointed, to undertake, in close collaboration with the F.A.O., the various measures needed and to report to the Permanent Committee of the Institute. This Committee will remain in being until it effects the juridical dissolution of the Institute by a formal announcement to the Governments concerned. This is expected to take place about the end of December.

A resolution thanking the Government of Italy for their hospitality to the Institute since its foundation was approved. A further resolution was introduced by the Italian Delegation requesting that the F.A.O. give careful consideration to the wish of the Italian Government that the European office of the F.A.O. might be situated in Rome. Approval of this by the Institute's Assembly does not mean, however, that the Italian desire will necessarily be gratified. The matter is solely for F.A.O. to decide.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

The deadlock of Monday morning, the 8th July, over the question of a procedure for the Peace Conference, yielded that afternoon to an agreement which Mr. Bevin could describe as "the first concrete manifestation in the post-war world of a common Great Power policy." For once M. Molotov revealed some of the apprehensions which held his generous impulses in prison. Could a Peace Conference procedure be right, he asked, which allowed eleven countries that did not fight Finland to outvote ten that did? This revelation enabled Mr. Bevin to find a solution to the voting problem which allayed Russian fears and yet preserved the rights of each of the 21 nations. In the Plenary Conference matters of procedure will be decided by simple majority, all else by a majority of two-thirds.

The Draft Treaties will be submitted to the Plenary Conference which will refer them for detailed examination to the appropriate Commissions. Subsequently the reports and recommendations of the Commissions will be considered by the Plenary Conference. Commissions will be set up for Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland, to study political and territorial clauses in the treaties; and each will consist of representatives of the drafting Four Powers, and of member States who were at war with the enemy in question. There will be two economic commissions, one for Italy, composed of States at war with Italy, one for the other four countries, consisting of the drafting Four and States at war with any one of the four enemies in question—an arrangement less narrow than that proposed by the Russians. On the remaining three commissions each of the 21 nations will be represented; a Military, a Legal and Drafting and a General Co-ordinating Commission. It will be recalled that Mr. Bevin had favoured 'no voting' in the commissions. His agreed wording now showed him the stout champion of the rights of minority and of individual opinion: "Should a two-thirds majority be obtained in any commission, the commission's report will be presented as a recommendation, but the minority will have the right to present its views and to ask for a decision. Should a two-thirds majority in any commission not be obained, the commission will submit two or more reports to the Conference, each member retaining his full right to present his own point of view and to request that this should be subject of a decision in the Conference." A clause which may compare favourably with the procedure at Versailles runs: "The Conference will invite Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland to state their views in accordance with conditions which will be laid down. The Conference may invite other countries which are not members to state their views." Finally, none of these rules bind the Conference inescapably, as the last paragraph somewhat grudgingly admits: "The Conference may decide to amend or suspend the provisions of the rules of procedure after their adoption."

The agreement, reached in principle on Monday by the Ministers, was shaped by the Deputies on Tuesday morning and ratified by the Minister on Tuesday afternoon. Invitations were sent out before lunch time on the 9th July. At the Deputies' meeting the U.K. representative, Mr. Jebb, finding the other three set on excluding China from the list of sponsors, acquiesced under protest. At the afternoon meeting the position was somewhat redeemed by Russia, who had first refused China as a sponsor, agreeing that she should share equally with the Four Powers in the chairmanship of the Conference, which, starting with France as host, will be held by the representatives of the Big Five in rotation in French alphabetical order. Tuesday afternoon's meeting also decided that any points left unsettled after the night of the 12th (and on Tuesday some twenty remained) should be included in the drafts to be circulated to the 21 Powers. The drafts cannot reach the Powers before the 18th July, and the Conference is called for the 29th. Thus ten months' firm refusal to despair have borne fruit which good will alone can bring to maturity.

The 21 nations of the Peace Conference include besides the Big Five, Australia, Belgium, Byelo-Russian S.S.R., Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Union of South Africa, Ukrainian S.S.R. and Yugoslavia.

The three Ministers could have found no surer corrective to their elation at the "first common Big Power Policy" than to discuss Germany and Austria with M. Molotov, as they did from the afternoon of Tuesday the 9th until Saturday the 13th. With the German problem unsolved, it is difficult to see a speedy way to the recovery of Europe; yet M. Molotov rejected every attempt at a solution. He would not allow Mr. Byrnes' "special deputies" to examine the political and economic difficulties which he himself had raised; nor would he consent to Mr. Bevin's 'commission' arranging the proposals of the various governments on Germany, so that the Minister might see more quickly what they were to discuss. He would only agree to an unprepared meeting of the Foreign Ministers immediately after the end of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Fruitless as the discussions appeared, they did show Russia on the one hand and U.K. and U.S.A. on the other pursuing what promise to be irreconcilable policies. (For a detailed treatment see under "Germany," "Austria" and "France.")

As Mr. Bevin indicated on the 10th July, the Potsdam Agreement which he said Russia was not carrying out provided that Germany should be treated as an economic whole: that her economy should be balanced in such a way that she was no longer a financial burden to the Allies. Her resources should therefore be distributed fairly between the different zones of occupation, and the proceeds of exports be used in the first instance to pay for approved imports, no matter from what zone the exports came nor to what zone the imports were destined. Only when all imports and debts outstanding on imports had been paid did the taking of "reparations from current production cease to be excluded" by the Potsdam Agreement. The contrary was happening. The British zone was receiving nothing from the other zones, with the result that during the current financial year their zone would cost the United Kingdom 320 million dollars. Mr. Byrnes gave the corresponding figure for his zone as 200 million. Disquieting reports were reaching Mr. Bevin of war material being manufactured in the Russian zone. All enquiry was refused even on the terms of complete reciprocity. By appearing to regard the zonal divisions as permanent, Russia was in fact cutting Europe in two. His conclusion contained the very serious warning that, failing treatment of Germany as an economic whole, the United Kingdom would be compelled to organise the British zone in such a way that no further liability would fall on the British tax-payer. In a subsequent statement he referred especially in this connection to coal.

Mr. Byrnes, besides reviving his offer of a 25-year treaty for control of Germany's disarmament said that he was ready to work the U.S. zone as a unit with any other zone or zones. He made this last proposal immediately after expressing the hope that the U.K. would not have as Mr. Bevin had said, to "plough in production in their zone, including coal, in order to increase the value of their exports."

M. Bidault favoured a confederation for Germany, wherein the various States could resist any Prussian centralising tendency. He insisted that the Saar be joined forthwith to France's economy, and urged the internationalisation of the Ruhr. In this last, he came near the point of view of the Russians, who, maintaining an exclusive economy in their zone, yet made the cool proposal that the Ruhr should be put under Four Power control, since "responsibility for it could not rest with one ally only."

According to M. Molotov's long statements, the Russian attitude seems to be that Yalta promised Russia 10 billion dollars in reparation from Germany. Mr. Bevin said that the U.K. had made no such promise; Mr. Byrnes said that the U.S. took the figure as only a basis for discussion. Russia would get these reparations from installations etc. or else from current production over a great many years. They would thus exert over their zone of Germany the economic control which H.M. Government considered them to be aiming at in Italy when they persuaded Mr. Byrnes and M. Bidault to agree to their taking so much of their Italian reparations from current production. With regard to Mr. Bevin's contention that Potsdam laid down an Economic unity for Germany, M. Molotov contended that the Russian zone was not bound to send supplies to the Western Zones, because it was not receiving reparations from the three zones as promised.

Austria (which it had been so difficult to persuade the Russians to allow on the agenda of the June–July Conference) was discussed on Saturday, the 13th. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes wished the U.K. and U.S. draft treaties with Austria remitted to the Deputies to be studied when they had concluded work on the other five treaties. M. Molotov countered with a proposal which Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes could not possibly have accepted, and succeeded in preventing a decision. He also evaded Mr. Bevin's attempt which Mr. Byrnes supported, to set up a Commission to study the urgent problem of German assets in Austria, and agree upon a definition. Article two of the Russian proposal, curiously reminiscent of the agitation against the "menace" of the Polish army in Italy, described "the presence of the so-called displaced persons in the Western Zone as a danger to democratic Austria and to the neighbouring democratic States," and made discussion of the draft treaties depend on their removal.

The course of these long debates suggests that Russia's deeds and intentions are often revealed in the charges she makes against her Allies.

CIVIL AVIATION IN ITALY.

On the 18th January at the Bermuda Civil Aviation Conference, the U.S. delegation informed the U.K. delegation that T.W.A. (Trans-World Airways) were in negotiation with the Italian Government with a view to participating in the rehabilitation of their internal air services, and enquired whether U.K. interests would wish to participate also. The U.K. delegation replied that, subject to permission being granted to the Italians to operate civil air services, British interests would certainly wish to participate.

On the 31st January H.M. Ambassador in Rome asked the Italian Government for particulars of the capitalization of the proposed company and requested that no contract should be signed until H.M. Government had decided whether they wished to participate in the scheme. At the same time Lord Halifax informed the State Department of this démarche; and by February the 4th the State Department had signified to the U.S. Ambassador in Rome its acquiescence in British participation. Nevertheless, on the 11th February the T.W.A. agreement was signed; it provided for the formation of an Italian company with 40 per cent. T.W.A. participation and a monopoly of internal (and possibly external) air services.

Strong representations by H.M. Government succeeded in holding up legislation ratifying the T.W.A. contract. The State Department, while ostensibly favouring the British case, did not intervene effectively; there seems little doubt that T.W.A. pressure in Congress made it difficult for them to do so. Mr. d'Erlanger of B.O.A.C. discussed the question with the Italian Government on 10th March and with General Wilson of T.W.A. in Rome on the 23rd March. While the Italians had no objection to a British share, General Wilson proved entirely obstructive to the suggested re-draft, which provided for B.O.A.C. capital participation to the extent of 20 per cent. or half the share that T.W.A. would have if the sole participant.

On the 5th April the State Department was requested to instruct the United States Chargé d'Affaires at Rome to inform the Italian Government that the United States Government would welcome British participation in the proposed company; this course being consistent with the previous attitude of the State Department. The latter did not reply to the British aide-mémoire until the 13th May; it is evident that exhaustive discussion with T.W.A. took place in this interval. In its reply the State Department pointed out that it had no authority to compel a private U.S. corporation to modify a legal contract; and T.W.A. opposed the formation of a mixed Anglo-American-Italian company as being impracticable on technical grounds. The U.S. Government could not therefore accede to the request of H.M. Government but had informed T.W.A. that, provided the objectionable clause granting exclusive rights were deleted, the U.S. Government would urge the Italian Government to ratify the agreement. The Italian Government could then conclude with British European Airways an agreement setting up a mixed Anglo-Italian company to operate certain internal air routes.

In his reply of the 31st May H.M. Ambassador in Washington recalled the original suggestion made at the Bermuda Conference for mutual participation in Italian airways and the fruitless negotiations between B.O.A.C. and T.W.A. and expressed surprise and regret at the State Department's reversal of its former attitude. He maintained the belief of H.M. Government that Italian interests as well as those of friendly collaboration between the United Kingdom and the United States would have been best served by the proposal submitted in January; but felt that in the circumstances H.M. Government had no alternative to the solution suggested by the State Department. They were accordingly proposing to the Italian Government the formation of a mixed Anglo-Italian company to operate, first, certain internal air routes (some of which may be at present in the L.A.I. schedule) and secondly, certain external air routes in Europe, as soon as authority to re-open them should be granted.

Negotiations on behalf of B.O.A.C. had already been opened when the above communication was made. They were assisted by Italian labour agitation directed against the grant of a monopoly. The Italian Air Minister who, unlike the Prime Minister, had favoured T.W.A. from the first, saw the threat to his own position and became more cooperative. The agreement between B.O.A.C. acting on behalf of British European Airways (which as yet has no independent existence) and the Italian Government was signed on the 8th June. It provides for the creation of a new company, A.I.I. (Aerolinee Italiane Internazionali) the capital, Lire 900,000,000 being subscribed 60 per cent by the Italian Government and/or Italian persons or companies and 40 per cent. by B.O.A.C. All rights and privileges of L.A.T.I. (Linee Aeree Transcontinentali Italiane) are transferred to the new company. The British share is to be held in sterling in London to the credit of the company and used (i) for the purchase of aircraft, etc., in the United Kingdom insofar as equipment is not available in Italy; and (ii) thereafter to meet such sterling expenditure as may be incurred in the course of the company's operations. B.E.A. is to act as agent in the United Kingdom for A.I.I. At least 75 per cent. of personnel is to be recruited from Italian air lines operating in 1940. The Italian Government will be required to provide facilities for 10 years at minimum rates, unless subsequent International agreements require the modification of this clause. At any time after 3 years, B.E.A. have the right to require the purchase by the Italian Government of their holding. The possible participation of foreign capital is explicitly admitted.

Routes.

Of 15 intra-European routes classified in two groups (first and second importance) the company will be entitled to 3 in each group. Other external services to be definitely assigned are :—

Between Italy and British Commonwealth territory;
Between Rome and Amsterdam;
Between Italy and South America;
Between Italy and North Africa (which is understood to include Egypt);
Between Italy and Greece;
Between Italy and France (unless some alternative arrangement is desired by the French Government); and Former Aviolinee (a F.I.A.T. interest) and Airone routes, subject to agreement with the companies, and to Italian Government permission to participate.

General Wilson had endeavoured to incorporate Aviolinee in L.A.I. (the company in which T.W.A. are participating) as far back as January and subsequently to prevent their participation in A.I.I. To this end he had threatened to use his influence to block certain dollar credits needed by F.I.A.T. He did not withdraw from this position until warned that such obstruction might result in further delay in the ratification of the T.W.A. agreement.

The traffic on the route Turin–Milan–Venice–Trieste is to be shared with L.A.I. by mutual agreement.

Both the B.E.A. agreement and the parallel one with T.W.A. were approved by the Council of Ministers in Italy on the 24th June.

The present position in Italy is as follows : L.A.I. has 40% American capital. A.I.I. has 40% British capital and is open to admit French participation as and when further capital is required. A French proposal to participate from the outset by contributing Ju. 52s did not meet with the approval of the Italian authorities.

The solution represents a compromise which T.W.A. have accepted with bad grace. They started first, in advance of any inter-Governmental discussions about the future of Italian civil aviation; they worked quickly, secretively and unscrupulously. Only the State Department's aversion to monopolies prevented them from securing exclusive rights in Italy.

B.E.A. has secured its footing in Italy on a competitive basis instead of the cooperative one which the United Kingdom originally favoured. The measure of success achieved through the representations of H.M. Government is unlikely to be easily forgotten or forgiven by T.W.A. interests.

GERMANY.

THE American proposal that the U.S. zone should join with one or more of the other zones in Germany as an economic unit was presented to the Control Council on the 20th July. General McNarney's statement followed closely that made by Mr. Byrnes in Paris (see last week's Summary). The text was designed to reassure the Russians that the United States Government desired fulfilment of the Potsdam agreement and that, as when suspending reparations deliveries, they did not intend to divide Germany "but rather to expedite its treatment as an economic unit." Failing quadripartite agreement for treating Germany as a whole they must seek to prevent the "creeping economic paralysis" threatened by air-tight separation of the zones. General McNarney therefore suggested "as a prelude to economic unity" administrative agreements with any or all of the occupying Powers in the fields of finance, transport and communications, industry and foreign trade. In addition he proposed arrangements which "with the support of all the occupying Powers" could develop into central German administrative departments headed by State secretaries. Finally, any agreement made with any one zone would be open on equal terms to the other occupying Powers at any time.

The statement was received without comment by the Council, and the proposal is now being examined in London. General McNarney has already published his memorandum and in a press interview has surveyed the benefits which he expects from the scheme, including, of course, equal ration scales for which H.M. Government have negotiated for months with only partial success. Other advantages, he considered, would be free movement of German business men between the zones, more steel and increased exports. Considerable efforts have been made already to foster exports from the U.S. zone. Frankfurt Radio announced on the 20th July that the Chief of Military Government Foreign Trade Department is to visit the United States to make personal contact with importers, some of whom may be invited to Germany. Meanwhile U.K. efforts to maintain firm relations with other occupying Powers is shown in the announcement that the headquarters of the Control Commission in the British zone will henceforth be known as the Zonal Executive Office of the Control Commission, while Berlin will become the Main Headquarters. Further concrete evidence is that work on reparations deliveries has not yet been discontinued. The first consignment from the British zone is now being assembled and is to be sent to Russia, following the arrival of packing material from the Soviet authorities.

Meanwhile the Russian attitude continues to be mysterious. M. Molotov, in an interview with Sir Maurice Peterson, reiterated his statement at the Paris Conference that Russia would not oppose a federal solution for Germany, if Germany or any part of it voted for a Federation through a plebiscite, but Russia did not wish to impose such a solution on Germany. Moreover, the British and American views on the subject were still not clear. He then said that everyone realized the need for economic unity from the economic point of view, but that the means of achieving it were lacking and had not been explained by the British and American delegates.

The Co-ordinating Committee on the 18th July had to postpone the setting up of a committee of experts to discuss coal distribution owing to the Soviet representative's lack of instructions; this matter had been referred to the Control Council by the Foreign Ministers (see last week's Summary "France"). A paper on coastal shipping to be left to Germany encountered objections from the U.K. and U.S. representatives and was also deferred. At the Political Directorate meeting on the following day the Soviet representative was, for the second time, unable to approve the Draft Law for the abolition of Prussia, stating that he was still without instructions. The British representative pointed out that it was difficult to see any objection to legalizing a state of affairs which already existed and which was in accordance with the Potsdam agreement of decentralisation, the full implication of the Russian attitude, indeed, is not yet apparent.

The most important event in the British zone has been General Robertson's announcement on the 17th July that Westphalia and North Rhineland will in future form a single province. This step, taken after careful deliberation, facilitates control of the Ruhr area by enclosing it in a single administrative region, although this does not exclude the possibility of an inner area containing only the principal industries, which might come under special control. The borders of the new area and those of the former provinces—except that Lippe, already transferred to the Military Administration of Hanover, will now be permanently associated with that province. The Capital of the new province will be Duesseldorf. No Oberpraesident has yet been selected. As was to be expected Schumacher, when informed of the step, did not welcome any scheme which placed the Ruhr within a single Land; this consideration weighing more with him than any dislike of a large province. He appeared reassured, however, that the step did not entail political or economic separation and he has not yet commented publicly. Both Dr. Adenauer and Kaiser have approved the decision but are anxious that consideration should be given to ultimate reunion with South Rhineland, now in the French zone. Alterations in the boundaries between the Saar and Rhineland took place on the 19th July when parts of the Regierungsbezirk of Trier, including a number of Gemeinden in the districts of Saarburg and Wadern, were transferred by French decree to the Saar administration. Such a transfer, presumably envisaged as a permanent extension of the Saar area, had already been hinted at by General Koenig on the 21st May (see Summary No. 345 "France"). It is not yet clear whether the area links the Saar with the Luxembourg border, but if so it was that which was tentatively claimed by the French in 1918 in order to provide a strategic frontier. The reason now given by the French Governors, however, is that these Rhenish areas supplied labour and agriculture produce for the Saar. Such arguments could be used to support further extensions to the East, if the present move is accepted by the other occupying Powers. It is also reported that railways in the French zone have been linked with those of France by means of a liaison office which replaces the main directorate of German railways in the French zone.

The SED have now abandoned their cry for economic unity—always less shrill than their support for political amalgamation—as being likely to embarrass the Russians, and have by tactical juggling adopted the line best suited to Russian policy. Pieck, visiting Essen on the 21st July, said that economic difficulties could be mastered by an understanding across the zone frontiers rather than by the frontiers' immediate abolition. The aim remained a united Germany with a Central Government and a decentralised administration. With an eye likewise to tactical advantage, Pieck openly faced the Eastern question on which Communists have hitherto preserved a discreet silence. The German people, he said, must resign themselves to the loss of much German territory in the East, gambled away by Hitler through his war. Grotewohl at the same meeting attacked the "disastrous party particularism" in the West, yet declared that the SED did not wish to make "three parties out of two" and that the will for a united party would come from the workers themselves. The SED and KPD have now recovered sufficiently from the shock of Russia's reparations claim to make suitable comment. The Communist "Hamburger Volkszeitung" faces the demand for $10,000,000,000 by admitting that every German was horrified when he heard the figure, but then points out that far greater damage was inflicted on Russia, and far more spent by Hitler on armaments, while with a proper economic and social policy the burden can be paid. A similar line is taken by Dr. Steinhoff, President of Brandenburg.

Some interesting sidelights have been thrown on Russian policy towards the CDU. After the party's interzonal conference in June the Russians invited prominent members to a lavish feast at Karlshorst calculated to impress the less stable Christian Democrats from the West. At the same time Kaiser reports that during the conference the NKVD searched the houses of several delegates from the Soviet zone, while according to Lemmer, the NKVD told a member of "Neue Zeit" to spy on fellow Christian Democrats including Lemmer. Kaiser states that he has presented the Russians with a list of members now languishing in the hands of the NKVD. Kaiser has apparently also raised with the Russians the question of ex-officers and soldiers returning from the West who are said to be arrested by the Russians and sent to Sachsenhausen camp, after which the officers are usually not heard of again. This has been reported from numerous independent sources. A Russian spokesman apparently explained the need for these arrests as arising from the lack of a combined Allied plan for demobilisation. The Russians, he said, therefore did not know the basis on which the Western occupying Powers released soldiers and had to take them into custody. Kaiser's attitude towards the Russians, as described by himself, is plain-spoken and courageous. In meeting with Schumacher and Adenauer he represented himself as the sole defender of Western civilisation in Berlin and criticized the failure of Western leaders to realise the dangers and importance of the position. It seems unlikely that he can retain this independent line without the Russians curtailing the CDU's activities. The meeting of Kaiser with Schumacher also seemed to show the lack of any fundamental disagreement between the two, whereas Adenauer has now definitely rejected the term "Christian Socialism" in his interpretation of his party's programme.

Two SPD officials, Scherrf and Loewenthal, who disappeared in the Russian sector of Berlin at the end of June have not been found. "Taegliche Rundschau" has stated that Loewenthal was arrested by the Russian authorities as a former Gestapo agent.

AUSTRIA.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Mr. John Hynd, has visited Austria. In a broadcast to Austrians on the 18th July, he told them of Britain's desire to help to rebuild a free and independent Austria, of her efforts to do this in spite of her own difficulties, and of British understanding of the hard task ahead of Austria. Mr. Hynd said that most of the Austrian prisoners of war from this country had already returned home, and more were returning every day. On the same day Mr. Hynd had conversations with the Austrian President and Chancellor and other members of the Government, during which all the Austrians emphasised their concern about the problems of displaced persons and of German assets in Austria.

Mr. Edwin Pauley, personal representative of President Truman, arrived in Vienna on the 15th July. He told the Press that in his opinion all industrial plant with the exception of that devoted solely to the production of arms should be retained by Austria for the reconstruction of the country. He did not agree with the Soviet view that the Zistersdorf oilfields should be taken away from Austria because of their alleged German ownership but insisted that they must be used much more for the benefit of Austria. Herr Figl complained to Mr. Hynd that Austrian workers in Zistersdorf and other concerns taken over by the Soviet authorities were being given large additional rations. Heavy industry workers at Zistersdorf were said to be receiving 5,000 calories, in contrast to the precarious 1,200 calorie ration of the ordinary Austrian. This is, no doubt, part of the Soviet campaign to provide evidence of "model conditions" in undertakings seized by the Soviet Union. The Communist Volksstimme joins with Tass reports broadcast from Vienna in describing Soviet financial and material help in rebuilding firms taken over by the U.S.S.R. The latest indication of the Soviet interpretation of "German assets" is contained in a letter to the Austrian Government from the Soviet Chief-of-Staff on the 16th July. This goes considerably further than the statement published by Tass after an interview with General Tsiniev on the 9th July (see last week's Summary), about which General Steele has addressed a further letter to General Kurasov. The new statement could be interpreted to include almost all property and industry which became German after 1938. Meanwhile the Austrian Government have appointed a committee to divide German assets into three catgories; assets which they consider indisputably German and to which the Soviet claim can be recognised; assets which they consider must remain Austrian; and those which are open to discussion.

The Austrian Chamber is to consider the draft Bill for the Nationalisation of Industry on the 24th July. The Bill, based on a compromise between the three parties, includes within its scope the three major joint stock banks, the coal and metal mining industries, oil production and the refining industry, locomotive and shipbuilding works, and the Danube Steamship Company. Although the Socialists and Communists have said that the draft law does not entirely satisfy them—they wished to include several other branches of industry, and have accepted only reluctantly the People's Party plan for cooperative ownership as an experimental measure in a limited number of cases—the two parties have indicated that they will vote for the law. It is notable that several industries already taken over or claimed by the Russians, such as the oil industry and the Danube Steamship Company, appear in the list.

The Austrian Chancellor handed to Mr. Hynd during his visit a copy of a report from the Ministry of Agriculture describing the latest confiscations of land in the Soviet Zone. The total amount confiscated in now almost 31,000 hectares, not including the former German army training-ground at Dollersheim. The land has all been confiscated without any official notification to the Austrian Government; what happens is simply that Russian officers appear and inform the farmer that his land is now Soviet property. Local farm administrators, acting on instructions from the Austrian Government, have refused, in spite of threats, to sign documents presented by the Russians. The Ministry of Agriculture estimates that the Russian action involves 4·6% of the potato crop in Lower Austria and 8% in the Burgenland, and from 4·5% to 20·5% of the rye, wheat, barley, oats, maize and sugar beet crops. In many cases farms had been handed back to the Austrians following earlier seizure by the Russians and now they are being taken again as the harvest is near. There is reported to be considerable unrest among the people.

The question of denazification came into prominence again when, in the discussions on the Austrian treaty in Paris, M. Molotov complained of unsatisfactory denazification as well as the alleged existence of Nazi laws and the expression of Pan-German sentiments. Figures of arrests made and the small number of convictions resulting from them—given by M. Molotov—have been denied by the Austrian Ministry of Justice, which said that between July 1945 and June 1946, 10,545 cases were started in the People's Courts in Vienna, Linz, Graz, and Innsbruck. 1,935 Nazis were indicted and 848 convicted. At present 4,230 Nazis were under arrest and proceedings had been begun against several thousand war criminals. The new Bill on denazification has been passed through its committee stage in the Austrian Parliament. It divides Nazis, except war criminals, into two categories, "guilty" and "less guilty." Those in the first category include all party officials, members of the SS, and others who held Party distinctions. They are subject to an "expiatory" levy, are barred from all leading positions in economic life or from managing their own firms. Civil Servants are liable to be dismissed without pension. Their houses may be requisitioned and they will be subject to compulsory labour. The "less guilty" Nazis, the rank-and-file of the Party members, are to receive much milder treatment. They must pay a levy, but may under certain circumstances remain in public service. They are disqualified until 30th April, 1948, from being elected to any official position.

As a result of the new Control Agreement British Military Government in Styria and Carinthia has given place to "Civil Affairs" administration.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

It is announced that a Czechoslovak delegation, headed by Prime Minister Gottwald and accompanied by Foreign Minister Masaryk, together with the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, M. Clementis is now in Moscow at the invitation of the Soviet Government. The purpose of this visit is primarily to discuss relations between the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia, but the delegation will also endeavour to win Soviet support for the Czechoslovak plan of expelling the Magyar minority. As a result of their victory in the recent elections, the Czech Communist Party, who have adopted a chauvinist attitude in their relations with Hungary—as with Poland—believe that they are now in a strong position to gain Russian sympathy for their claims. Their optimism has possibly been further strengthened by the alleged attitude to this problem of the Soviet Ambassador to Prague, M. Zorin. The Ambassador is said to be wholeheartedly in favour of the Czechoslovak viewpoint, maintaining that the Czechs cannot be expected to grant minority rights to the Magyars and that Hungary, in so far as she is expelling the Suabian Germans and parcelling out the large estates, can now easily absorb 200,000 Slovak Magyars. If M. Zorin's attitude is a true reflection of official Soviet policy towards this transfer of population, it would seem to be directly in contradiction with the optimism of the Hungarian Prime Minister on the occasion of his recent visit to Washington. Up to the present the Russian standpoint has been by no means clear: the Kremlin, proud of the manner in which it treats its own numerous minorities, cannot perhaps afford to favour the Czechoslovaks too much to the detriment of the Hungarian minority and has thus endeavoured to play off one party against the other. Hence the Czechoslovak Government would welcome an elucidation of Soviet policy.

Criticisms of the treatment of the Magyar minority in Slovakia continue to be voiced by Budapest Radio Station and other official Hungarian sources. The Czechs in their turn complain of the sufferings of their compatriots in Hungary. If the contending parties, as seems likely, are unable to reach a solution to this problem which is vital to the future welfare of the middle Danubian basin, the Great Powers will probably—and against their wish—have to intervene. The Hungarian paper Magyar Nemzet has indeed cited a B.B.C. report that the Czechoslovak Government desire provisions for the exchange of populations to be included in the peace treaty with Hungary.

POLAND.

On the 15th July, in answer to a Question in the House of Commons, Mr. Hector McNeil said there had been full and constant exchange of information between H.M. Government and the United States Government with regard to speedy implementation of the promise of free elections in Poland, and the honouring of the Yalta agreement. In a written answer to the question whether the case of Polish elections might be brought before UNO, Mr. McNeil stated that such action seemed inappropriate at present. The Polish Provisional Government had officially assured the United States Government of its intention to hold elections this year, in accordance with the Yalta declaration, and in conformity with the pledge given as the condition of recognition by the United States Government and H.M. Government. There did not seem any reason why elections should not be held as now planned, and H.M. Government were concerned at the delay.

A celebration in honour of the 14th July was held in Warsaw, at which were present M. Garreau, the French Ambassador, M. Rzymowski, the Polish Foreign Minister, and other eminent French and Polish officials. M. Garreau said that both countries were affected by the danger of a German revival, but Poland's position might be considered the happier, since her Western frontiers were fixed, whereas France's frontier with Germany had secured so far no guarantee of any kind.

In commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the Spanish Civil War (18th July), a ceremony, arranged by the Spanish-Polish Society, was opened by General Walter-Swierczewski, who, as General Walter, had commanded the International Brigade during the Spanish civil war. The other notable Polish representative was Professor Lange, Ambassador to the United States, whose efforts on behalf of Spain at the Security Council were praised by General Swierczewski. The Spanish participants in the ceremony were representatives of the émigré Republican Government of Dr. Giral, led on this occasion by Señor Sanchez Guerra. In his speech Señor Guerra declared that the Spanish Republic would soon be restored, and that Spain's gratitude towards Poland would be everlasting.

The Polish Democratic Party, at whose head stands M. Rzymowski, the Foreign Minister, opened its first National Congress on the 13th July. One of the leading guests was M. Gomulka, the Communist Vice-Premier, who, in accordance with present-day Polish custom, has attended the opening of other Party Congresses. M. Gomulka said that, to facilitate collaboration between the Democratic and Communist parties within the Government bloc, concessions would be made by each side. The Democratic party is to receive two specially created Vice-Ministers' Posts, one in the Department of Private Industry, the other in the Ministry of Education. In his speech, Vice-Minister Chajn, one of the Democratic Party's foremost members, said that Polish democracy differed both from the Western form as well as from Soviet proletarian democracy. The Polish Democratic Party, he said, took the view that there was room for private enterprise, as the State could not take over the whole of the national economy. It was on the motion of their Party that the reservation in favour of the legal claims of private enterprise was inserted in the second of the three Referendum questions.

The rift between the right and left wings of the SP (Labour Party), led by M. Popiel and M. Widy-Wirski respectively, seems now to be coming to a head. This process has been accelerated since the death of M. Felczak, the former leader of the party's left-wing, who had succeeded in maintaining a moderating influence during his lifetime.

On the 21st July, the former Gauleiter, Artur Greiser, was publicly hanged at Poznan in the presence of 15,000 people. The Warsaw press strongly criticised an appeal for clemency on Greiser's behalf from the Vatican. (See under the "Vatican.")

SOVIET UNION.

The line taken by New Times (17th July) in summing up the results of the Foreign Ministers' Conference was unusually mild. Satisfaction was expressed that agreement had been reached on the peace treaties with Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria and Finland. The preparation of the Italian treaty was stated to have presented most difficulty because of Italy's central position in the Mediterranean and Europe and because influential circles in certain countries tended to treat Italy as at any rate a potential colony. The Peace Conference was going to be required, said the article, to solve the outstanding issues, but hope was expressed that it would be successful in its labours if the Allied Powers followed the path of collaboration for the settlement of international problems. According to New Times a positive solution could be found for the most complex problem of contemporary world politics—i.e., Germany—only if influential circles in Anglo-Saxon countries abandoned their attempts "to use the German card in the dangerous imperialist game of force." Unlike much other Soviet criticism and pro-Soviet propaganda in regard to the Conference, this article made no attempt to claim that final success at the Conference was due to concessions from the Soviet Government nor was there any raking-up of past disagreements.

The attempt made a few days previously in Pravda (15th July) "to expose" what is going on behind the "velvet curtain," i.e., in countries in "the British sphere," was much more uncompromising and was markedly hostile to British policy. The main points were that a state of war was still continuing in Indonesia five months after the Security Council had been told that agreement might be reached "in the near future." In India negotiations on the Indian problem had broken down "in accordance with British desires"; in Palestine disagreements between Arabs and Jews were allegedly used as an excuse for not granting independence, while Transjordan had been granted nominal "independence" but remained a British military base. British policy in Syria, Egypt, Iraq, Greece and Cyprus was described from the same standpoint so as to complete the Soviet picture of British activity in its "sphere." The article concluded with the sentence: "the heavy fall of the velvet curtain muffles the sound of shots, human groans and the murmur of discontent—muffles but cannot stifle." The Indian case has also been taken up in an attack on the recent South African legislation concerning the Indian community, which was described as a Nazi racial law.

The meaning of the "right of veto" was recently the subject of a special English commentary by Dr. Lemin on the Moscow radio. The principle did not "just emerge like Minerva from the head of Jupiter" he said; "condensed in it is the experience of the recent war." Dr. Lemin further defended the veto as a means of holding the balance between different ideologies and social orders and, in particular, as a weapon for defeating the machinations of "reactionary imperialist groups." The attacks upon the right of veto, it was asserted, are actually directed against the principle of equality and concord on which international co-operation is founded. "Attacks on the right of veto are nothing but a smoke-screen for the machinations of the enemies of peace."

The U.S.A. has come in for the major share of Soviet publicity during the past week. Ehrenburg's two lengthy articles summing up the impressions of his trip, although outspoken, could not be called unduly hostile; his somewhat impish criticisms were certainly not on the stereotyped Soviet lines. He concluded with the truism, surprising perhaps from the pen of a citizen of the U.S.S.R., that the fundamental need of the American was the raising of his spiritual level to that of his technique.

The abolition of price control in the U.S., and the consequent threat of inflation, has aroused a volume of unfavourable comment, which made the obvious point that the position of the American working class, once regarded as an object of envy to all, was rapidly deteriorating. The passing of the loan to Britain was briefly reported; it was treated as above all an indication of the weakening of the economic position of the British Empire. The main target for attack, however, has been American policy in the Far East; the anger of the Soviet Government, it seems, is being increasingly aroused by United States opposition to Russian tactical moves in that sphere.

Meanwhile there are indications of awakening Soviet interest in the Franco-Siamese dispute over the frontier between Siam and Indo-China, on which silence has hitherto been observed. On the same day that the Soviet press published the text of the Siamese appeal to the United Nations, "New Times" came out with a long article criticising Annamite ruling circles and French colonial rule in general.

There have been other signs of growing Soviet displeasure with the French in contrast to the recent wooing of France by the U.S.S.R. The important rôle played by M. Bidault at the Paris meeting has been ignored, and items generally critical of France have been reappearing in the press since the M.R.P. success at the elections and the re-entry of General de Gaulle on to the political scene. The French attitude over the Ruhr, and over Germany in general, is probably responsible for this change of front.

Moscow is lively with a series of distinguished visitors. M. Trygve Lie arrived on the 20th July, and another recent arrival is M. Gottwald, the Czechoslovak Prime Minister, who has already been received by M. Stalin (see under "Czechoslovakia"). The Persian Princess Pahlevi has been accorded the same honour, and has been decorated with the Order of the Red Banner of Labour.

A Nonconformist Minister, the Rev. Oyler Waterhouse, member of the delegation of the British-Soviet society now visiting the U.S.S.R., has broadcast an enthusiastic account of a service in the Baptist Church in Moscow. According to him, that church had a membership of 3,000, of whom about 1,200 attended the service. The church would only hold 500, but, according to Mr. Waterhouse, the Soviet Government had granted materials for extending it on favourable terms, and had acceded to the request of the congregation for permission to erect a second building. It now appears that M. Gulyaev, deputy chairman of the Russian Baptists, did after all go to Sweden accompanied by one of his colleagues, and that his community has received permission to send delegates to the World Baptist Conference which is to be held in Copenhagen in August.

A Ministry of Luxury Industries of the U.S.S.R. has just been formed with M. N. I. Pronin as Minister; its sphere will include hard and soft drinks, perfumery and cosmetics and tobacco.

M. Rud, the first Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Moldavian Republic, has been released from his duties and appointed Chairman of the Moldavian Council of Ministers in succession to M. Koval.

Academician Bogomolets, President of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, heralded as the inventor of a serum for prolonging human life to a startling length, has died at the untimely age of 66. He was widely credited with having been engaged in rejuvenating Generalissimo Stalin.

SCANDINAVIA.

Denmark.

A stream of propaganda dealing with Great Britain's alleged complete misunderstanding of the Slesvig position and her "unfriendliness to Denmark" is emanating from that country at present. That this agitation has succeeded in persuading even more reasonably-minded Danes to take an active interest in the South Slesvig question is proved by an appeal published on the 17th July in Berlingske Tidende. It is addressed to the Danish Government and warns against the serious threat to Danism and the Danish frontier of the influx of the refugees into South Slesvig, promising the Government full support in all its efforts to remove the danger. The appeal is signed by leaders of all Danish political parties (excepting the Communists), the heads of the Army and Navy, the Protestant and Catholic Bishops of Copenhagen, the President of the High Court and other judges, leading businessmen and, in short, all other leaders of Danish life. It is perfectly obvious that the Danes as a whole have succeeded in deluding themselves that the South Slesvig question is one of the most important questions which face the world at present to the exclusion of all others. No attempt is noticeable to see the question from a general, European point of view or to realise the difficulties with which Great Britain is faced in endeavouring to find a home for the hundreds of thousands of refugees from the East who have arrived and are still arriving in the British Zone.

The Norwegian Foreign Minister, M. Lange, apparently also succumbed to Danish South Slesvig propaganda. In an interview with the Danish press in Copenhagen, he stated that the Norwegian Government would willingly consider the question of intervening in London on Denmark's behalf concerning the treatment of the Danish minority in South Slesvig. The removal of the pressure of the refugee population on the Danish frontier was in M. Lange's view not only a question for Denmark but for the whole of Scandinavia; but he also stated that it was in the Scandinavian interest that the Danish southern frontier should remain firm.

Sweden.

On the 14th July the Foreign Minister, M. Undén, dealt with Swedish-Norwegian relations in a speech at Eda on the Swedish-Norwegian frontier. He admitted that Sweden's policy during the war had been the cause of much ill-feeling in Norway but emphasized that the responsibility for this policy was that of the Coalition Government, representing all parties, and that no party was entitled to claim that, had it been in power, Germany would have been held more effectively in check. He also admitted that he had always championed, both during the war and now, the right of the press to publish facts as they occurred and express opinions on them, but he thought a certain discretion was desirable when the question of publishing State documents arose. In the case of Swedish-Norwegian relations, however, he favoured the publication of such material as would serve to sift out facts from idle rumours and help to clear the atmosphere.

M. Undén also dealt with Norwegian arguments that Norway was bound up with the United Nations Organisation, while in Sweden there was more speculation as to what might happen if the members of the Security Council fell out. Although not yet a member of the United Nations, Sweden was from now onwards prepared to undertake all the responsibilities which such membership would imply; but she would not join any great Power bloc. Consequently, in the event of a break-up of the United Nations, Sweden—and, it appeared, from Norwegian official statements, Norway too—would not be bound by undertakings to any particular group of Powers.

M. Undén also mentioned that Sweden, whose relations with her Nordic neighbours were traditionally friendly in the sphere of foreign affairs, was striving to develop similar relations with Poland and Soviet Union by a considerable increase of trade with those countries. The Coalition Government could claim the credit for having initiated conversations with the Soviet Union in June 1945.

Finland.

Sentences passed by the Supreme Military Court on Lt.-Gen. Oesch, Col. Oinonen and other Finnish officers accused of War Crimes were announced on the 19th July. All the accused were found guilty. Lt.-Gen. Oesch, who for many years was Chief of the General Staff, was directly implicated through an order which he issued in November 1941, authorising the shooting of prisoners-of-war in certain circumstances. This order led to the execution of some thirty to forty Soviet prisoners in violation of international agreements to which Finland was a party. Lt.-Gen. Oesch and Col. Oinonen were accordingly sentenced to 12 years', and 11 years and four months' penal servitude respectively. The incidents revealed by the trial have been strongly condemned by the Finnish Press, which describes the murders as a stain on Finlands' honour.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Belgium.

The Belgian political crisis continues, notwithstanding M. van Acker's appeal to end it within a week, the various parties being preoccupied with holding meetings and issuing statements. On the 16th July, M. de Schrijver, leader of the Christian Social Party, was received by the Prince-Regent and later again by M. van Acker, with whom he stayed an hour. To journalists, who pressed him for an account of his interview with the Prime Minister, M. de Schrijver would only say that he had not been "charged with any mission, either for inquiries or for the formation of a Cabinet": the object of his interview had been merely to discuss the "political and Governmental position." Next day, however, he did receive an invitation to form a Cabinet, but declined it for what he described as "personal reasons." It was then M. van Acker's turn to be invited: he, too, refused, but on very different grounds. The radical wing of the Socialist Party had raised categorical objections to a Cabinet which should include Christian Social Ministers, and, since M. van Acker is not now prepared to lead a Cabinet in which the Christian Social Party is not represented, he had no alternative but to refuse the Prince-Regent's invitation. He resisted all attempts made by his party at its meeting on the 20th to induce him to change his mind: his decision, he said, was "irrevocable." The thankless task of trying to form a Cabinet was next given to M. Paul Struye, leader of the Senate Group of the Christian Social Party, who discussed the situation with MM. van Acker, Spaak and Buset, and with the Liberal leaders, MM. Motz, Dierck and Mundeleer on the 18th July. The Liberal Party is divided, some of its members preferring the idea of a four-party coalition, others the present three-party left-wing coalition, but re-shuffled. The Communists, on the other hand, have quite made up their minds that they will have nothing to do with a Cabinet which includes members of the Christian Social Party: indeed, it was their intransigence which determined the attitude of the radical wing of the Socialists. For that matter the Christian Social Party is none too anxious for Communist participation; but M. Struye has admitted that, if their inclusion prove to be the only way out of the difficulty, it would "obviously" be his "duty" to confer with the Communist leaders.

But after the Socialists had rejected M. Struye and repudiated M. van Acker, the Prince-Regent turned to M. Spaak (21st July). At a Press conference on the 22nd, M. Spaak sounded rather more hopeful. He is trying to form a three-party Cabinet on the lines of M. van Acker's Cabinet; but his success depends upon the Liberal attitude. He told journalists that, if everything went well, the Government would have to obtain a vote of confidence from Parliament before Sunday (28th July), to enable him to leave in time for the Peace Conference. Asked whether M. van Acker would be a member of the new Cabinet, M. Spaak replied that he was "under no obligation to assume the leadership" of the Government, and "everybody would like to see M. van Acker taking part in it."

The Liberal attitude—so eagerly awaited by M. Spaak—was made known later the same day (22nd July), but contributes little or nothing to the immediate object of resolving the crisis. By an overwhelming majority (70 votes against 2, with three abstentions) the party Executive adopted a resolution "empowering its negotiators to offer the support of the Liberal Party to any Government" which would be prepared, "without further delay, and exclusive of all other controversial matters," to deal with a number of questions demanding urgent attention—such as "war damage, assistance to war victims and sinistrés, financial reconstruction and the defence of the franc, a speedy return to freedom of trade and agriculture, relaxation of controls, assistance to the middle classes, defence of the legitimate rights of manual and intellectual workers, and increased production and export." Of these eight points, the first five are admitted by the resolution to have "formed part of the previous Government's policy."

FRANCE.

Since the end of the Foreign Ministers' Conference (see under "The Paris Conference") the question of French policy towards Germany has become a burning issue in French party politics. M. Léon Blum, in the Populaire, pointed out with a certain malicious delight that for once the Socialists were in agreement with Moscow in opposing the dismemberment of Western Germany, while the Communists, together with the M.R.P., disagreed with the Soviet view. The Communists have so far stuck to their guns, but they insist that the divergence between French and Soviet policy is far less than that between French and British policy towards Germany. It is in any case clear that the French are anxious to avoid committing themselves to support of either side in the dispute over Germany between Russia and the West, although their interest in Ruhr coal should lead them to co-operate in plans for the economic integration of the three Western zones.

M. René Mayer, High Commissioner for German and Austrian Affairs, has resigned, and his duties have been taken over by M. Pierre Schneiter, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

A debate similar to that of the 5th July when M. Paul Reynaud's mandate was confirmed (see Summary No. 350) took place on the 18th July over the validity of the election of M. Daladier. Although it was generally agreed that M. Daladier's election had been quite regular, the Communists demanded his invalidation on political grounds. M. Daladier spoke for two hours defending the Munich agreement as inevitable and attacking Communist policy. He was heard in silence and received little applause, but his mandate was confirmed by 311 votes to 132. The Socialists have covered themselves against accusations that they countenance the pre-war policy of men like Daladier by tabling a bill proposing that an official enquiry be made by the High Court of Justice into political developments in France and the French Empire from 1933–45 in order to discover where the responsibility lay for the disaster of 1940. The Communists at once proposed an amendment which would have the effect of placing the conduct of the enquiry in Communist hands.

The letter sent by the Pope to the President of the Semaines Sociales (see under "Vatican") with its condemnation of nationalisation of industry, is significant for the effect which it may have on the relations between the Church and the M.R.P. The latter has supported the measures of nationalisation already passed in France, although it lays more emphasis on the ideas of association and co-operation, in accordance with Catholic doctrine, than do the parties of the Left.

M. Yves Farge, the new Minister of Food, secured the agreement of the Cabinet on the 13th July to the principle of making certain black market offences punishable by death. He was also authorised to apply a system of meat marketing which will allow the actual meat ration to be sold at a low price, while extra supplies may be obtained at uncontrolled prices. This system of a legalised black market may also be applied to other commodities. Already the contrast between the legal market and the black market, which is used so extensively to supplement the official rations, is disappearing in many country districts owing to the increase in the quality of foodstuffs available. M. de Menthon, Minister of National Economy, told the Finance Committee of the Assembly on the 17th July that conditions would soon allow a considerable drop in the price level.

The economic conference (see Summaries No. 350 and 351) completed its allotted task at the weekend and sat in full session on the 22nd July, in the presence of M. Bidault and other Ministers, to hear the report of the recommendations of its three sub-committees. The findings of the conference, which go considerably beyond what the Government had declared to be possible, were examined by the Cabinet on the 23rd July. M. Bidault, in an interview with the drafters of the report on the 16th July, had already told them that neither the Government nor private enterprise could afford to raise wages by more than 15 per cent., and that no increase could be made in the subsidies for food and other products. (These subsidies were voted for the first 6 months of 1946 at the yearly rate of 85 milliard fr.—i.e., one quarter of the total budget revenue—but most are now due for renewal, and the Minister of Finance has declared that he is resolved to cut down the food subsidies.) M. Bidault said, however that purchasing power could be raised further by other means, notably through the general fall in prices which the coming harvests and the increase in industrial production would allow. Nevertheless, the economic conference, with the agreement of the employers' representatives, has recommended the 25 per cent. wage increase originally demanded by the trade unions, the increase to be calculated on the average maximum wage and added to the existing minimum wage to give a new minimum. The other recommendations include proposals for a drive for increased efficiency in production and distribution, for increases in some industrial and agricultural prices and decreases in others. To achieve these results, however, State subsidies amounting to the enormous figure of 87 milliard fr., including 10 milliards for coal, and 11 for gas and electricity, both nationalised industries, are proposed.

The High Court of Justice began a new session at Versailles on the 8th July and is to try twelve accused, including M. Flandin and Admirals Auphan and Abrial. Jean Berthelot, Vichy Minister for Communications from 1940 to April 1942, was condemned to two years' imprisonment, but as he has been imprisoned since the liberation he is considered to have served his term and will be released. Paul Charbin, a colourless Lyons businessman, who was for a short period Vichy Minister of Food, was condemned only to 10 years' deprivation of civic rights. [See under "Germany."]

SPAIN.

A dictator is a law unto himself, and General Franco has elected to let the tenth anniversary of the pronunciamiento of the 18th July, 1936, pass without any fanfares or processions. The National Council of the Falange, which has met on the eve of that day for nine years, was not convoked this year, and there was no speech. For the nonce the Caudillo's view recalls Alfred de Vigny in that memorable passage of La Mort du Loup: "Seul le silence est grand; tout le reste est faiblesse."

The Head of the State did bestir himself, however, on the 17th to preside over an official ceremony celebrating the reconstruction of Brunete, a township west of Madrid, which was the scene of one of the fiercest battles of the civil war. His architects and builders have certainly done a good job of work in the model village built on the old site—in the matter of physical reconstruction, by the way, the régime deserves all praise. And he gave a perfunctory interview to Arriba for its anniversary issue (all the newspapers brough out portentous special editions for the occasion!). The interview was almost entirely concerned with the heritage of economic difficulties from the civil war and the wonderful way in which—in spite of the drought which did not allow a full harvest for six years—the régime had weathered these difficulties. This progress report, which included an apologia for the swollen budget, contained nothing new and was discreetly silent on the actual figures of the recent increase in the cost of living. (The index figures published in April showed a rise from 306 to 391 in a year and a 24 points increase since January.) At a press conference following a Cabinet meeting on the 18th July the Minister of Education had something to say about the Government's determination "to fight the battle of prices in order to bring about a necessary decrease in the cost of living." The acid test for the régime, indeed, will come this autumn after the harvest has been got in; it is by no means certain that inflation can be arrested and the country gradually freed from the tentacles of the black market.

It should perhaps be recorded that the Minister of Labour, Señor Girón de Velasco, was put up to orate on the significance of the 18th July as henceforth, by the grace of the Caudillo, "Labour Day." And, finally, it may be mentioned that the Minister of Foreign Affairs received telegrams of congratulation on the anniversary from the Foreign Ministers of Argentina, Chile, Ecuador, the Dominican Republic and El Salvador.

Despairing of finding any fellow-feeling among the nations of old Europe the "national-seminarists" i.e. those Catholics, like Señor Artajo, who have hitched their waggon to General Franco's star, have been busy recently wooing the Latin-American States. On the 16th July a reception in honour of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Education was held in the name of the Latin-American Diplomatic Corps at the residence of the Minister of El Salvador and was attended by one other Minister and eight Chargés d'Affaires. The propagandists have skilfully used the recent Congress at Salamanca of the International Catholic Association, Pax Romana, to suggest that the newly-established Instituto de Cultura Ibero-Americana derives from that sodality. The transparent purpose is to revive the defunct (Falange-controlled) Consejo de Hispanidad, under the cloak of religion. Latin-American visitors who are prepared to say nice things about the régime are much fêted these days.

On the occasion of Independence Day for the Philippines on the 5th July a Te Deum was sung in the church of San Francisco, and a special exhibition was opened showing the first sketch maps of the Spanish discovery of the Isles, while the press poured out columns of glutinous verbiage. The Caudillo had seized the opportunity provided by the State Department to send out to Manila a special Embassy Extraordinary under Señor Goichoechea, and he followed it up on the day with a message of "sisterly affection" transmitted through the U.P. Agency—though he was careful on this occasion (remembering the hullabaloo following the message sent from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the quisling President Laurel in the autumn of 1943) to divest his greetings of any official character.

Another batch of 56 men and one woman accused of sabotage, the possession of arms and explosives, and murder, were tried by court martial at La Coruña last week. All were said to be active members of the Communist party. Two were given death sentences, three imprisonment for 30 years, and the others sentences from 1 to 25 years. These penalties are, of course, subject to confirmation by the Captain-General of the Military Region.

ITALY.

On the 12th July, following discussions with UNRRA in which Mr. Keeny gave his agreement in principle, an official announcement stated that the High Commissioner for Food had instructed all prefects to increase the bread ration from 200 grammes to 250 grammes and the pasta ration to 2 kg. monthly. The cereal position was explained by Mr. Keeny, Head of the UNRRA Mission in Italy, in a broadcast on the 15th July in which he congratulated the High Commissioner for Food and the Italian authorities on the way in which they had tackled the threatened cereal shortage and prevented a breakdown in distribution. UNRRA fully realised the importance of the larger ration both for the health of the people and as a weapon against the black market. In a previous statement on the 12th July Mr. Keeny had pointed out that the increase in the bread ration was the sole responsibility of the Italian Government.

According to Italian calculations, Italy needs 7½ million tons of wheat for all requirements until the next harvest. About 345,000 tons of wheat from the new harvest has been brought into the Amassi (Government pools) for the month of June, from the stocks available and the Government hope to receive 2,215,000 tons of wheat, 300,000 tons of rice and 600,000 tons of corn (presumably maize) for the full year. (These amounts of rice and corn are reckoned to be equivalent to 675,000 tons of wheat, so that if hopes are realised, the Amassi should produce a total wheat equivalent of 2,800,000 tons.) The estimated consumption requirements of the rationed population on the old ration scale, are about 4 million tons, and the difference between 2,800,000 tons produced by the Amassi and the 4 million tons required—i.e., 1,200,000 tons—must be imported. A further 300,000 tons are also needed to provide a working stock for the end of the crop year (June 1947) so that, in all, 1½ million tons must be imported. To this end UNRRA have requested 750,000 tons to be delivered in 1946 as their quota and have also requested a further 250,000 tons to be paid for by Italy, from her foreign currency resources, leaving 500,000 to be found later. It is not certain to what extent the increased ration mentioned above will affect these import requirements.

The Italian Government have also proposed reducing the wheat extraction rate from 91 per cent. to 85 per cent. As this would bring the extraction rate in Italy below the present rate of 90 per cent. in the U.K., Sir Noel Charles has been instructed to make vigorous representations to the Italian Government to refrain from this step.

According to a press report Signor Nenni, Minister without Portfolio in the present Government and the Foreign Minister-designate (after the Peace Conference), has left Rome on a tour of European capitals in order to try and convince the various Foreign Ministers that Italy does not deserve such a punitive peace treaty as that drafted in Paris. Oslo is to be his starting-point and from there he will go to the Hague, Brussels and then Paris. In Paris he hopes to meet the Polish and Czech Foreign Ministers. Count Sforza is visiting the South American republics on a similar mission and by personal contacts hopes to gain as much support for Italy as possible.

THE VATICAN.

Writing to the President of the French Semaines Sociales, the Pope discussed the problem of nationalisation. He started from the Church's conception of the "human person as the root and end of every social life," and applied it to "the particular case which interests you at the present, the nationalisation of industry." "Nationalisation," he said, "risks accentuating the mechanical character of the life in common." The profit which it brings is, therefore, "suspect." The true ends of society are more readily attained by the creation of associations and co-operative societies. They are in accordance with the Christian doctrine of the human person. What is wanted, he concluded, to-day as never before, is a strong, living, national community which does not exclude or level legitimate autonomy, but which respects the rights of all and which tends towards that mighty community which is mankind.

The much publicised Vatican appeal on behalf of the notorious Arthur Greiser (see under "Poland") was a Christian's inevitable response to a condemned man's plea, not, as was asserted, a manifestation of pro-fascist policy. Professor Kot, Polish Ambassador to Italy, handed Greiser's appeal to the Nuncio in Rome. The Vatican at once instructed the Nuncio to make to the Polish Ambassador the following carefully worded reply:—"Herr Arthur Greiser, condemned to death, has implored by telegram the august intervention of His Holiness to obtain grace. The said gentleman, as is known, was a most bitter enemy of the Church, and he carried on severe persecution in the Wartheland. However, His Holiness, following the example of the Divine Master, who prayed on the cross for his crucifiers, having received the plea of the condemned man, addresses to the competent authorities his paternal prayer that the condemned man's life be spared."

Hungary.

The British and American Commissioners on the Allied Control Commission have protested that the instructions issued by General Sviridov to the Hungarian Government (see last week's Summary) constituted a violation of the statutes of the Allied Control Commission in that they were issued without the knowledge of the British and American representatives, and, moreover, they were not satisfied that the Russian allegations were justified since the Allied Control Commission had recently been informed that Hungary had fulfilled Article XV of the Armistice Terms requiring her to dissolve Fascist organisations.

There is so far no indication whether the Hungarian Government's reply, outlined in last week's Summary, was acceptable to the Russians. The Hungarian Minister of the Interior has continued to carry out his Government's promises of administrative reform and suspension of "reactionary" associations with such vigour that according to press reports, the Political Committee of the Smallholders' Party felt bound to protest; this may necessitate a resumption of the inter-party discussions which had resulted in some show of unity within the coalition. The Hungarian Government decided not to publish the Russian note and their reply in the press; indeed, beyond a brief announcement that a demand for disciplinary measures to tighten up public security had been made "by the Allied Control Commission," neither press nor radio gave any hint of the real reason for the reports of protracted inter-party discussions, the lists of associations suspended or the rumours of impending Cabinet changes.

It has been suggested that in issuing the demands General Sviridov was merely the mouthpiece of the Hungarian Communists who had failed to impose their terms on the Smallholders by direct methods.

The National Assembly has been convened for the 23rd July. The petition (organised by M. Sulyok's party) for its convocation to discuss the recent arrest of a Deputy has the support of at least some sections of the Smallholders' Party, and Mgr. Balogh declared that the Smallholders will insist on the Assembly having more opportunity to express itself. The Social Democrat paper, Népszava, however, condemns those Smallholders who signed the petition as setting themselves up in opposition to their party, and points out that the Assembly would in any event have been convoked shortly, since the special mandate to the Government to rule by decree expires on the 31st July. There has recently been considerable criticism that the Assembly was not in session when such decisive measures as stabilisation of the currency were inaugurated. The Cabinet has approved a draft Incompatibility Bill making it illegal for a deputy to hold public office.

All parties are anxious that the new currency to be introduced on the 1st August should succeed, and they appeal for public confidence, threatening severe penalties for speculators, black-market dealers and others who sabotage the efforts to improve food supply when the harvest becomes available. Meanwhile, with the taxation pengö quoted at 20,000,000 billion pengö, it is difficult to conceive how any business at all is transacted. According to a press report, Budapest municipality is unable to allot any money to hospitals and institutions, and may not even be able to continue feeding patients.

M. Nagy has hinted in a recent speech that the Soviet Union may grant Hungary some relaxation of her reparations requirements; also it is announced that the U.S.S.R. has promised to repatriate about 25,000 Hungarian prisoners of war. [For the Magyar Minority in Slovakia, see under "Czechoslovakia."]

Roumania.

Roumania, as far as the promised election is concerned, seems to have settled down to a "cloud-cuckoo" sort of existence, completely remote from reality. The King, on the insistent demand of General Susaikov, has signed the electoral law as finally amended. D-ni Maniu and Brătianu go about tearing their hair and indulging in wordy wrath, but when tackled have no concrete proposals to make. Dl Ionescu, the Minister for Mines, is said to have announced at a meeting at Ploiești that even if the Government do not obtain a majority they intend to remain in power—if necessary by force. Peasant women are being warned, it is said, that if they vote against the Government their children may be taken away from them. Various people get worked up about details of the law, which leave the way open for intimidation and for every sort of trickery. But why all this fuss and bother? When all is said and done, the fact remains that the election issue is simplicity itself. Roumania has, and always has had, her own way of managing these affairs. All that is necessary is for the Government to decide what majority they would like and then to arrange matters so that they get it.

The Minister of Information, Professor Constantinescu-Iași, is visiting London. Apart from the round of entertainment which is usual on such occasions, he has been in touch with the Board of Education, with UNESCU and others. He held a press conference at the Roumanian Mission. The entertainment part of this function left nothing to be desired. The general attitude of the meeting was critical, but it cannot be said that the representatives of the press made the most of their opportunity. Many of the questions asked were incredibly stupid. But the audience learned that Mr. Markham, the correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, had been expelled from Roumania because he was acting as an election agent for the Opposition, also that all representatives of the press could obtain permits to enter Roumania without difficulty. Asked why the British and American Notes of protest at the non-fulfilment of the Moscow decisions had been withheld from publication, the Minister rather cleverly assumed that the question referred to the earlier protests on the same subject and replied that the Government delayed the publication so that the notes and the replies could be made public at the same time. Asked if it was true that there were ex-Legionaries in the Government he said that, if he could be supplied with the names, he would investigate the matter on his return to Bucarest and see that such persons were dismissed. Some of those present were anxious to obtain information about the alleged failure to prosecute persons who were guilty of anti-semitic activities.

The death is reported of D-na Maria Antonescu, the wife of the Mareșal. Proceedings were to have been taken against her in connexion with the mismanagement of Consiliul de Pratronaj. It is probable that this organisation, as indeed most public "charities" in Roumania are, was a convenient means for enriching those who had the control of it. But the reputation held by D-na Antonescu makes it extremely improbable that she would be a party to corrupt practices of this sort, and the most that can be said is that, assuming that she became aware of what was being done by her colleagues on the Directorate and the Central Committee, she did not at once sever her connexion with them. The property of the late Mareșal has been confiscated by "the State," whatever that term may stand for in such a connexion.

Yugoslavia.

Marshal Tito's attitude to the decision on Trieste is more cautious than that of M. Kardelj, the Deputy Prime Minister. "We shall defend our rights," he said at Cetinje on the 13th July, "but always, of course, within the limits of possibility." On the 17th Kardelj, in answer to a question in the National Assembly, repeated the gist of his earlier statement (see Summary No. 350). In Belgrade there has at last been a "spontaneous demonstration." H.M. Chargé d'Affaires, having got wind of the arrangements beforehand, warned the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that H.M. Government would take a poor view of any "untoward incident" and was gratified to see a posse of soldiers stationed outside the Embassy during the proceedings.

An incident on the Morgan Line, in which American troops exchanged shots with Yugoslav frontier guards, causing the death of two of the latter, provoked the Yugoslav Government to protest to the U.S. Embassy in Belgrade. They accused the Americans of being the first to fire according, they hinted, to a pre-arranged plan, and they stated that the incident occurred in Zone B, whereas in fact it was due to an infringement of the Morgan Line by Yugoslav troops who had illegally entered Zone A.

The general strike in Trieste, organised in protest against the "Fascist riots," has been called off, but Yugoslav propaganda about the Fascist activities of the Allied authorities, has become, if anything, more hysterical.

Kardelj, as leader of the Yugoslav delegation to the Peace Conference, is to be accompanied by such pillars of the Yugoslav Communist Party as Mosha Pijade, Boris Kidritch, Dimitr Vlahov and Vladimir Bakaritch, as well as by the Foreign Minister and the Ambassadors in London and Washington, and some smaller fry.

Preparations have begun for an All-Slav Congress to be held in Belgrade in December. Representatives of the Slav countries held a preliminary meeting in Belgrade on the 17th July. The aims of the Congress are said to be the strengthening of the ties between the Slav countries and the continuation of the fight against Fascism. This may have some connection with Tito's promise at Cetinje of the "settlement" of relations with Bulgaria, as soon as she was released from her "special position."

This speech of Tito's, when he said some very unpleasant things about M. Joksimovitch (who defended Mihailovitch on orders, but so far exceeded his instructions as to put his heart into the job) was largely an attack on enemies who had penetrated the National Front. It is clear that chief among these "enemies" is now Dr. Dragoljub Jovanovitch the left-wing Peasant leader, who a year ago thought he could organise a "legal" opposition within the Front without getting his fingers burnt. Now his opposition to the Bill for Agricultural Cooperatives on the grounds that it is premature and against the peasants' interests, and his criticism of the Public Prosecution Bill, have earned him some sinister abuse from Mosha Pijade and the Public Prosecutor. Other enemies, according to Tito, are those who gather under the names of the Croat Peasant Party and of the Catholic Church. So, though they have got rid of Mihailovitch, the Yugoslav Government still do not feel secure.

Greece.

The visit of the Greek delegation ended on the 17th July, when the whole party left London for Paris. M. Tsaldaris intended to visit Brussels before returning to Athens, while M. Venizelos and some other members of the delegation may go on to Washington, in hopes of obtaining further credits from the Export-Import Bank. The subject of a 6,000 million dollar reconstruction loan was broached in London, but it was made clear that this would not be forthcoming from the United Kingdom. The Greeks may, however, congratulate themselves on having persuaded H.M. Government that some external financial help is essential for the work of reconstruction; the official communiqué published on the 18th stated that it was the Greek Government's intention to submit this question to the International Bank for Reconstruction, and added that "such a submission would undoubtedly merit the support of all the Allied Governments."

One very satisfactory result of the visit is that negotiations are to be put in hand immediately for the purchase by the United Kingdom of 10 million pounds of Greek tobacco, 50 per cent. for domestic consumption and 50 per cent. for the British zone in Germany. This is substantially in excess of any British yearly purchase before the war, but not of course equal to the amounts regularly sold to Germany (e.g., kilogrammes 22,897,148 in 1934/5, 21,829,140 in 1935/6).

M. Papandreou arrived back in Athens on the 19th, after five weeks' absence abroad, bearing three proposals from M. Tsaldaris (whom he met in Paris) to the leaders of the Parliamentary Opposition parties; they were invited to enter the Government, to assist in forming an all-party commission to supervise the plebiscite, and to participate in the Greek delegation to the Peace Conference. According to Athens radio M. Papandreou had himself refused to join the Government, on the ground that, "since there is a united front in support of our national claims," this would be superfluous. The proposals are to be discussed as soon as M. Tsaldaris returns. Meanwhile, there are credible reports that prominent members of the centre and non-communist Left parties, having rejected communist overtures for a united "democratic" front, are somewhat tardily constructing their own front to campaign for the republic. There are other strong rumours, indicative of a more defeatist spirit, that M. Sophoulis and the Liberal party intend to boycott the plebiscite unless the Government shows itself more accommodating over the date, and the preparation of the registers, and succeeds in re-establishing law and order.

The UNRRA storm seems to have blown over. Mr. Maben and M. Stephanopoulos held a joint press conference on the 17th July, at which the latter reaffirmed the Government's respect for UNRRA principles, and the former denied the existence of any misunderstanding. According to the press, Mr. La Guardia, during a flying visit to Greece, stated that every complaint brought to UNRRA's notice had been taken up with the Greek Government and that matters had been put right. Athens radio has used the interval between the publication of Mr. Maben's letter and this happy ending to describe several cases of communist and EAM peculation in connection with UNRRA supplies.

The bread ration is to be increased by one-eighth on the 1st August, presumably as a result of the gathering of the harvest. No reports are yet available of the success of the Government's grain collection scheme. Prices have remained high but stable, and the gold market has been quieter than ever before; a welcome sign of returning confidence has been a steady trickle of sales of sovereigns for drachmæ to the Bank of Greece.

Bulgaria.

The Council of Ministers has increased the general bread ration to 500 grammes, for those engaged in physical labour it goes up to 750 grammes, for those engaged in heavy manual labour to 1,000 grammes and for underground workers in mines to 1,200 grammes. The new order comes into force on the 18th July. Meanwhile the supplying of food to British and American representatives serving in an official capacity in Bulgaria under the Potsdam agreement and the Armistice terms has become a problem requiring consideration by the Control Commission. By an order dated the 1st July the Bulgarians, acting on Russian instructions, have ceased to supply free food to the staff of the Political Representative. Both the American and British representatives are arranging for the time being to pay for rations supplied to them.

Atanas Noskov, the acting editor of Svoboden Narod (The Free People), has been arrested. He was the last survivor of the Opposition press to remain at liberty. In spite of difficulties the paper continued to appear until July 18. After a brief interval it has re-appeared, but in view of the fact that two of the editorial staff are in prison and two more in hiding, the prospects of the paper appearing regularly in the near future cannot be said to be bright.

On his return from Paris M. Kolarov, in a statement to the press, had announced that the present Government who are responsible for the ruthless suppression of all opposition—are the only force that can ensure the development of Bulgaria along the way of progress and democracy. With the help of her true friend and mighty protector, and with the moral support of the freedom-loving nations, whose sympathies towards the new Bulgaria are increasing the better they get to know her, he says, Bulgaria will surely obtain a just and honourable peace. And all this apparently in spite of "the treacherous activities of the cliques of the opposition."

This statement of Kolarov has since been repudiated by H.M. Government as a completely misleading account of the conversations in Paris. Kolarov was left in no doubt about the dissatisfaction of the British authorities at the present situation in Bulgaria, and in particular at the undemocratic measures which are being taken against the Opposition and the Opposition press.

Turkey.

The general election duly took place on the 21st July. For various reasons the People's Party lost a good deal of ground a few weeks ago, but on the eve of the poll it expected its only serious rival, the Democratic party, to get something between 80 and 120 of the 460 seats. M. Celal Bayar, the Democratic leader was reported to have said that he would be pleased with 50 seats. As leader of the People's Party President Inönü broadcast an election speech on the 17th July. Answering criticism of his being at the same time leader of the dominant party and head of the State, he pointed out that nothing in the constitution forbade such a combination of offices. With some justification he claimed credit for the Government's policy as regards education, land distribution and forests, and he promised measures to harmonise fixed salaries with the high cost of living. Turning to foreign affairs he claimed that ever since he became President Turkish policy had been steady. But, he continued, the country was in a delicate situation, and the question of Istanbul and the Straits was likely to be raised and committees—obviously meaning the Armenians—all over the world were agitating about the Eastern provinces. But the army was strong and must not be demobilised.

The line taken by Soviet propaganda was that the People's Party was thoroughly reactionary, employed terroristic methods and had estranged the Turkish people from their true Russian friends and lined them up with the British against whom Mustafa Kemal fought the war of independence. Yalçin is perhaps not far off the mark in commenting that the whole trouble between Russia and Turkey is that Turkey will not drop her British alliance.

In an effort still further to improve relations with Greece the Turkish Government have recently agreed to redress old-standing grievances of the 80,000 Greeks of Turkish nationality who still remain in Istanbul. Two churches and a hospital which had been taken over under various pretexts have now been returned to the Greek community and Greek churches and schools have been declared free of certain taxes.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish Air Force, with the Under-Secretary for Air and a number of officers, arrived in England on the 16th July on a visit to British aircraft factories. The British air service to Angora is to begin with weekly flights of which the first will arrive via Istanbul on the 22nd August.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Egypt.

Two more bomb outrages occurred in Alexandria, on the 13th and 17th July, leading to the death of a British soldier and causing injuries to other members of the British forces and to civilians. On hearing of the second incident Sidky Pasha telephoned to the Journal d'Egypte expressing his abhorrence and promising a reward of £5,000 for information leading to the arrest of any of the culprits. But there was little doubt that the judicial authorities' regrettable release of individuals arrested in connection with earlier outrages had encouraged a notorious murder gang. Accordingly, Sir Ronald Campbell made a strong protest, and Lord Stansgate impressed on Sidky Pasha the deplorable effect which a continuation of the outrages must have on the British attitude to a new treaty. On the 21st July Sidky Pasha wrote to Sir Ronald Campbell expressing his profound indignation and regret, his conviction that the outrages did not spring from Egyptian sentiment, but from persons seeking to create disorder for political purposes, and his determination to punish the guilty in accordance with King Farouk's desire. On the night of the 21st July the police did in fact arrest eleven youths whom they believed to be the entire murder gang. They seem to belong to the Young Egypt Party. There is not much doubt that this gang has been working at the behest of those—whether Communists, Wafdists or Nationalists—who want the treaty negotiations to fail.

Sidky Pasha's promised bill against Communism was duly submitted to Parliament. It proposes additions to the penal code which forbid revolutionary societies or subversive propaganda. As Communism is already illegal under the constitution, the Prime Minister hopes to be able to check the spread of dangerous doctrines which, though contrary to Islam, have been preached since the establishment of Soviet Consuls in the Middle East, particularly by certain intellectuals and professional people who exploit the poorer classes. Account must also be taken of the effect produced on the native mind by the campaign of the Soviet press and wireless, which incessantly accuse Great Britain of seeking to dominate the Middle East with the support of local reactionary elements, and to assure her imperial communications, while ignoring Arab aspirations to freedom.

The ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, who sought refuge with King Farouk, is living at a house belonging to the King near Aboukir. He told Sidky Pasha that he was not anti-British and had no desire to cause trouble to His Majesty's Government or embarrassment to Egypt. He also expressed the intention of refraining from political activity and from affording a pretext for any such activity or propaganda.

Palestine.

During the 17th July shops were closed and work was suspended in Jewish settlements as a protest against delay in the release of arrested Jews. On the 22nd July the retort of the Jewish extremists to the British attempt to restore order was seen in the explosion of a large bomb, which Jews had introduced into the basement of the King David Hotel at Jerusalem. A wing of the building, which contained the Government Secretariat and the Defence Security Office, was blown up, and there were many persons killed and injured, British, Arab and Jewish.

Persia.

No more disturbances occurred in Khuzistan after those recorded last week. Workmen returned to their jobs on the 17th July, and the general situation continued to improve. But, although superficially all was quiet, the Tudeh, on the one hand, seemed by no means to have given up the struggle, and, on the other hand, the Arabs were greatly excited and waiting to see whether the Government would deal faithfully with the Tudeh ringleaders. In all this a sinister part was played by Muzaffar Firuz, a notorious turncoat and double-crosser who fulfils the function of political assistant to the Prime Minister. Pretending to be acting on Qawam as Sultaneh's instructions, this individual overrode the local authorities and ordered the release of some of the arrested agitators. In general he tried to undermine the authority of the Governor-General and of the military commanders whose firm action alone prevented the disturbances from resulting in more than seventeen people being killed, and a hundred and fifty wounded This was in line with Tudeh propaganda, which was directed at obtaining the dismissal of the high officials opposed to them. As to the origin of the trouble, there is little doubt that this strike of the Company's 50,000 employees arose primarily from the Tudeh party's political ambitions, and the correctness of this view is by no means impaired by a declaration which the Soviet Ambassador saw fit to publish denying that the Soviet Union was trying to obtain a port on the Persian Gulf.

FAR EAST.

Siam.

The mystery surrounding the death of King Ananda Mahidol on the 9th June gave rise to an internal political crisis which is only now beginning to show signs of subsiding.

It is particularly unfortunate that, in a mistaken endeavour to protect the prestige of the Royal Family, the Government should have decided to assume that the King had met his death as the result of a gun accident and that they should have issued a succession of communiqués in support of this unconvincing theory. Rumours and whisperings in political circles regarding the true cause of death alternated between suicide and regicide, the latter theory becoming quickly fanned into full voice by political enemies of the Prime Minister. Democracy, a leading local newspaper, published an article declaring the young King to have been shot through the head and demanding the immediate resignation of the Prime Minister. Although the Commissioner of Police had issued a statement declaring that the result of investigations conducted under his supervision afforded conclusive proof of accidental death, so disquieting did the insistent and widespread rumours to the contrary become that the Government found themselves obliged to make it known that the Commissioner of Police was continuing his investigations and that a special Committee of Enquiry had been set up.

Immediately on its formation the Committee of Enquiry appointed a Medical Board to endeavour to establish the cause of death by a post-mortem examination. Report quickly spread that the verdict of this Board was "murder" and led to a revival of agitation against the Prime Minister. Finally the Government decided to take action against those bent on turning to their own political purposes the mystery surrounding the late King's death. The homes of a number of leading Democrats were searched by the police, as were those of several newspaper editors. A number of people were taken into "preventive detention" for inciting the public to a distruct calculated to undermine the stability of the Government, while others have been given a timely warning. Public opinion showed an immediate and favourable reaction to this firmer stand, and some of his erstwhile popularity returned to the Prime Minister, who earlier had expected that the situation would bring about his downfall.

On 3rd July, the Medical Board's report was published with a statement that each of the doctors concerned would be required to give evidence at a public sitting of the Committee of Enquiry. Although the conclusions arrived at were not unanimous, the majority of those serving on the Board supported the murder theory. Simultaneously with the Medical Board's report, three other official statements were published. In the first the Prime Minister declared that, although the war was over, a state of internal emergency still existed, and he appealed for public co-operation in suppressing "the evil influences of certain hostile elements that are constantly hindering the task of national reconstruction." In another statement the police promulgated an order reimposing press censorship; while a third statement contained instructions issued by the Minister of the Interior, prohibiting election agents from making use of the news of the King's death to stir up misunderstandings liable to ferment disturbances and riots in the Kingdom.

Meanwhile there has been no improvement in the strained relations with France over the disputed territories, while frontier incidents along the Mekong remain a continual source of irritation, bringing in their wake accusations and counter-accusations with monotonous regularity and similarity. Mutual recriminations have been particularly vigorous concerning "unfounded" press and radio reports of fresh incidents on both banks of the Mekong. Although probably exaggerated, there is no doubt that these incidents are occurring and that they are closely linked with the major question of the ceded territories (see Summary 344). On more than one occasion the Prime Minister has hinted that Siam is prepared to welcome any proposal for the peaceful settlement of the disputed territories which is not calculated to entail loss of national prestige and the risk of internal disorders, against which the Government could not hope to stand. In other words the Siamese Government are convinced that they could only return the ceded territories to France if popular opinion were satisfied that the surrender had been performed as an act of force majeure. This being so, Siam has now decided to make a formal appeal to the United Nations based on Article 35 of of the Charter.

On 5th July the Siamese Government issued a communiqué stating "their readiness to submit the territorial questions as well as all other issuing problems to the United Nations Organisation and to abide by whatever decision or recommendation that Organisation shall deem it expedient to make." And, on 16th July, the Siamese Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed a communication to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, stating that, under authority conveyed by the National Assembly on 17th June, the Siamese Government desire to bring the dispute between France and Siam formally to the attention of the Security Council; to accept unreservedly the obligations imposed by Article 35, paragraph 2 of the Charter of United Nations; and to request that the matter be placed upon the agenda of the Security Council. It is of interest to note that in the communiqué issued to the Siamese public the question for consideration is not confined to the "disputed territories," but embraces "territorial questions as well as all other issuing problems."

A Siamese Delegation to the United Nations is scheduled to leave Bangkok as soon as the elections are over in the early part of August. This Delegation will be headed by H.R.H. Prince Wan Waithaykorn, who was educated in this country (Marlborough and Balliol College, Oxford) and later in Paris, and who, until quite lately, acted as Legal Adviser to the Siamese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Delegation is made up of representatives of each of the more important political groups. It includes Prince Svasti and Luang Kovit Abhaiwongse, an engineer who proved his ability as Minister of Communications, has twice acted as Prime Minister since the Japanese capitulation and is at present the Leader of the Democratic Party.

Although calm prevails outwardly, there is an atmosphere of tension throughout the country which has reacted adversely on the general economic situation and brought about a serious falling off of movements of rice. Fortunately the Prime Minister, in his newly found self-confidence, has taken the situation in hand and has announced that, unless deliveries of rice to the millers are resumed immediately at the agreed price, the Government may find it necessary to requisition stocks at 10% less than the regulation price; and that all stocks of rice in the country which millers themselves are withholding will be taken over at fixed prices. It does not appear that so far the action threatened in this warning has been put into effect. But in view of the urgency to maintain the regular flow of rice if the officially sponsored schedule of deliveries is to be prevented from breaking down altogether, the Prime Minister has asked his Cabinet to agree that all rice and paddy in the country be declared national property.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

With their thoughts clarified by Mr. Byrnes' outspoken broadcast of the 15th July and by the equally frank report which Senators Vandenberg and Connally delivered to the Senate on the 16th and 19th respectively, the American press and public continued during the past week to ponder the lessons of the recent Paris Conference. Commentators concentrated as before upon Germany as the crux of all efforts to reach understanding between the four main Powers, and they were for the most part in complete agreement with the observation of Senator Connally that the Foreign Ministers had "merely skirted the edges" of this major European problem during their discussions in Paris. Applauding Mr. Byrnes' decision to instruct the American representatives in Berlin to co-operate with "any one or all three" of the other interested Governments in an attempt to overcome the present impasse in the Allied control system, the majority saw in his determination to "secure economic co-operation between the zones or place the responsibility for the failure of the Potsdam Agreement," a possible hope that Soviet resistance to the application of a workable plan of occupation for Germany might at last be overcome.

In some quarters this partial reorientation of the State Department's policy with regard to Germany was taken as a further indication of the estrangement that is taking place between the Western Powers on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other. For the majority, however, the signs of a growing rift had been too numerous recently for this latest development to cause undue anxiety. A more premeditated blow to Allied unity was recognised in the execution of General Mihailovitch, whose trial had been described in one representative newspaper editorial as "a propaganda demonstration in the interests of Soviet foreign policy, directed only incidentally against Mihajlovitch and his followers and primarily against Britain and the United States." In the eyes of most Americans, the Chetnik leader's real crime had been his attempts to save Yugoslavia from Communism, and for that reason no one in the United States or Great Britain could, in the opinion of the Washington Post, "have an easy conscience" regarding the fate that had overtaken him. A similar, though less violent affront to the democracies was detected by some in the recent removal of Marshal Zhukov from his Berlin command. Marshal Zhukov, they pointed out, had been the close associate of General Eisenhower and Field-Marshal Montgomery and was therefore "perhaps too firm a believer in co-operation with the Western Allies."

It was perhaps their growing uneasiness regarding Soviet intentions that caused those newspapers which had at one time been most vehemently opposed to the British loan to refrain (with the not unexpected exception of the Chicago Tribune) from violent recriminations against the 219 members of the House of Representatives who voted on the 13th July for the Anglo-American Financial Agreement. Two Middle-Western journals in this category actually decided to give the action of Congress on the loan their grudging approval in the belated recognition that it would strengthen Great Britain as a bulwark against possible Soviet aggression. On the other hand, the rejoicing of the liberal-internationalists over the success of the loan was considerably more heartfelt. Emphasising the wider significance of the favourable decision which Congress had reached, they pointed out that it carried the plan of international economic co-operation drawn up at Bretton Woods an important step forward. At the State Department also there seems to be a strong desire to see the principles inherent in the loan Agreement become paramount as soon as possible in the regulation of economic relations between the United States and other countries. For this among other possible reasons, the Assistance Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Mr. William L. Clayton, has remained unenthusiastic regarding the Anglo-Canadian Wheat Agreement, which he feels to be at variance with the proposals for the expansion of international trade and employment transmitted to H.M. Government by the State Department when the Anglo-American Financial Agreement was signed last December. H.M. Government have, however, given the State Department an assurance, for Mr. Clayton's benefit, that the Wheat Agreement will not be discriminatory against other countries and that they will be willing to conclude similar agreements wherever wheat is offered at a competitive price.

A further significant indication of the swing of American opinion away from isolationism, which several commentators hastened to link with the vote on the British loan and the recent elimination of Senator Shipstead from national politics, was provided on the 16th July by the defeat of the inveterate isolationist, Senator Burton K. Wheeler, in the Montana primary elections. Senator Wheeler's successor as the Democratic Party candidate for the Senate next November will be a comparatively youthful internationalist, Mr. Leif Erickson, who has hitherto been a justice of the Montana supreme court. The Senator's defeat was all the more remarkable in that, despite his association with every major attempt to prevent the United States from playing a more active rôle in world affairs during the past twenty-four years, his earlier record as a liberal in domestic politics had won him the respect of many present and past members of the Senate—among them Mr. Truman himself, who for this reason had been one of those who endorsed his unsuccessful candidature last week.

The prospects of bringing some form of order out of the present confusion on price control brightened perceptibly on the 20th July, when a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives agreed upon a draft bill to revive the Office of Price Administration for a further period of twelve months. This bill, which, incidentally, would leave all important foodstuffs still exempt from control until the 20th August, fell considerably short of the legislation originally requested by the Administration. Nevertheless, the President's advisers were stated to be urging him to accept it when it reached the White House for signature, as it was probably the best that Congress would be likely to agree upon in the circumstances now prevailing.

LATIN AMERICA.

Pan American Organisation.

The proposal for the institution of some form of "multilateral collective intervention" which was enunciated by Dr. Rodríguez Larreta, the Uruguayan Foreign Minister, last year, appears to have been definitely repudiated as the result of a Declaration approved unanimously on the 17th July by the representatives of all Governments accredited to the Pan American Union: this declaration included the statement that intervention by one or more States directly or indirectly and for whatever reason in the internal or external affairs of another state is inadmissible. It will be recalled that though the Uruguayan proposal was baptized "the Larreta doctrine," it was at once endosed by the United States and subsequently rejected by almost all the sister-nations. This aroused suspicions that the doctrine was the unacknowledged child of Mr. Spruille Braden, then deep in his vendetta against the Argentine Government.

Argentina.

The administrative confusion in Argentina (see last week's Summary) shows little or no sign of abatement. Perón, despite his exhibition of dynamics when a presidential candidate, has been unimpressive during his first two months as president. Lacking political background himself, he is surrounded by a rough and unscrupulous clique who are without knowledge or ability to govern. The most enlightened member of the Government appears to be the Foreign Minister, Dr. Bramuglia, though he is not of strong character and his influence is overshadowed by that of Sr. Miranda, the director of the nationalised Central Bank. Though not a member of the cabinet, Sr. Miranda is at present the source of all authority on economic affairs; described as an ignorant know-all, he is tougher than Perón and less open-minded.

Against this background the discussions between the British Treasury Mission and the Argentine authorities are proceeding. As was anticipated, the bargaining is hard, and, owing to the peculiar circumstances prevailing in Buenos Aires, unconventional. Thus Perón's rather aggressive private address to his supporters in Congress the other day may have been intended to assist the Argentine delegation in putting over its views. More probably, however, he was only, as is his wont, speaking before thinking and he has since denied that some at least of the words attributed to him on this occasion by the Press, were ever uttered.

is to be prevented from breaking down altogether, the Prime Minister has asked his Cabinet to agree that all rice and paddy in the country be declared national property.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

With their thoughts clarified by Mr. Byrnes' outspoken broadcast of the 15th July and by the equally frank report which Senators Vandenberg and Connally delivered to the Senate on the 16th and 19th respectively, the American press and public continued during the past week to ponder the lessons of the recent Paris Conference. Commentators concentrated as before upon Germany as the crux of all efforts to reach understanding between the four main Powers, and they were for the most part in complete agreement with the observation of Senator Connally that the Foreign Ministers had "merely skirted the edges" of this major European problem during their discussions in Paris. Applauding Mr. Byrnes' decision to instruct the American representatives in Berlin to co-operate with "any one or all three" of the other interested Governments in an attempt to overcome the present impasse in the Allied control system, the majority saw in his determination to "secure economic co-operation between the zones or place the responsibility for the failure of the Potsdam Agreement," a possible hope that Soviet resistance to the application of a workable plan of occupation for Germany might at last be overcome.

In some quarters this partial reorientation of the State Department's policy with regard to Germany was taken as a further indication of the estrangement that is taking place between the Western Powers on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other. For the majority, however, the signs of a growing rift had been too numerous recently for this latest development to cause undue anxiety. A more premeditated blow to Allied unity was recognised in the execution of General Mihailovitch, whose trial had been described in one representative newspaper editorial as "a propaganda demonstration in the interests of Soviet foreign policy, directed only incidentally against Mihajlovitch and his followers and primarily against Britain and the United States." In the eyes of most Americans, the Chetnik leader's real crime had been his attempts to save Yugoslavia from Communism, and for that reason no one in the United States or Great Britain could, in the opinion of the Washington Post, "have an easy conscience" regarding the fate that had overtaken him. A similar, though less violent affront to the democracies was detected by some in the recent removal of Marshal Zhukov from his Berlin command. Marshal Zhukov, they pointed out, had been the close associate of General Eisenhower and Field-Marshal Montgomery and was therefore "perhaps too firm a believer in co-operation with the Western Allies."

It was perhaps their growing uneasiness regarding Soviet intentions that caused those newspapers which had at one time been most vehemently opposed to the British loan to refrain (with the not unexpected exception of the Chicago Tribune) from violent recriminations against the 219 members of the House of Representatives who voted on the 13th July for the Anglo-American Financial Agreement. Two Middle-Western journals in this category actually decided to give the action of Congress on the loan their grudging approval in the belated recognition that it would strengthen Great Britain as a bulwark against possible Soviet aggression. On the other hand, the rejoicing of the liberal-internationalists over the success of the loan was considerably more heartfelt. Emphasising the wider significance of the favourable decision which Congress had reached, they pointed out that it carried the plan of international economic co-operation drawn up at Bretton Woods an important step forward. At the State Department also there seems to be a strong desire to see the principles inherent in the loan Agreement become paramount as soon as possible in the regulation of economic relations between the United States and other countries. For this among other possible reasons, the Assistance Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Mr. William L. Clayton, has remained unenthusiastic regarding the Anglo-Canadian Wheat Agreement, which he feels to be at variance with the proposals for the expansion of international trade and employment transmitted to H.M. Government by the State Department when the Anglo-American Financial Agreement was signed last December. H.M. Government have, however, given the State Department an assurance, for Mr. Clayton's benefit, that the Wheat Agreement will not be discriminatory against other countries and that they will be willing to conclude similar agreements wherever wheat is offered at a competitive price.

A further significant indication of the swing of American opinion away from isolationism, which several commentators hastened to link with the vote on the British loan and the recent elimination of Senator Shipstead from national politics, was provided on the 16th July by the defeat of the inveterate isolationist, Senator Burton K. Wheeler, in the Montana primary elections. Senator Wheeler's successor as the Democratic Party candidate for the Senate next November will be a comparatively youthful internationalist, Mr. Leif Erickson, who has hitherto been a justice of the Montana supreme court. The Senator's defeat was all the more remarkable in that despite his association with every major attempt to prevent the United States from playing a more active rôle in world affairs during the past twenty-four years, his earlier record as a liberal in domestic politics had won him the respect of many present and past members of the Senate—among them Mr. Truman himself, who for this reason had been one of those who endorsed his unsuccessful candidature last week.

The prospects of bringing some form of order out of the present confusion on price control brightened perceptibly on the 20th July, when a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives agreed upon a draft bill to revive the Office of Price Administration for a further period of twelve months. This bill, which, incidentally, would leave all important foodstuffs still exempt from control until the 20th August, fell considerably short of the legislation originally requested by the Administration. Nevertheless, the President's advisers were stated to be urging him to accept it when it reached the White House for signature, as it was probably the best that Congress would be likely to agree upon in the circumstances now prevailing.

were barbarously done to death when crowds stormed the presidential palace. The situation is still obscure, but a new Junta is reported to have been formed under Dr. Nestor Guillén, a judge of the Supreme Court of Justice, with the support of students' organisations and trades unions. It is said that the casualties in La Paz have been heavy, and there are also press reports of an Indian rising and bloodshed at the mining and garrison town of Oruro, the epicentre of so many revolutionary disturbances.

Bolivia, a large country with a population of 3 millions, of whom a tenth are white, a tenth mestizos and the rest full-blooded Indians, has staggered from one revolution to another throughout the course of her history. Since losing her only outlet to the sea to Chile, she has been landlocked, and the effects of her physical lack of balance and remoteness have been accentuated by a lop-sided economy: for foreign trade and taxation she is dependent on a number of tin-mines owned by international companies and a handful of native Croesuses. There are thus ample reasons for a national sense of frustration, rendered acute by her failure to defeat the little State of Paraguay in the futile Chaco war. The Chaco war left behind it considerable discontent, especially among the younger officers who bore the brunt of the fighting under rigorous conditions, and in recent years a good record in that war has become an indispensable condition of political advancement.

Lieut.-Colonel (then Major) Villarroel's reputation for gallantry in the field was, indeed, his only claim to prominence when he attained power as a result of the coup d'état of the 20th December, 1943. His friends were a gang of young officers inspired by a violent mixture of idealism and ambition, who had combined with the Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario (M.N.R.), an autocratic and semi-fascist minority party founded in the doubtful days of 1941 by Sr. Victor Paz Estenssoro. M.N.R. had had relations with the local Nazis: Major Villarroel's own background was less suspicious, though he was a friend of Major Elías Belmonte, the pro-German Bolivian Military Attaché in Berlin. On seizing power, the Villarroel Provisional Junta denied any pro-Axis sympathies and announced their intention to uphold the policy of the overthrown Peñaranda régime as regards the war effort and support for the United Nations. Nevertheless, for some time the régime was not recognised by any foreign Government except that of Argentina—a recognition that was more embarrassing than advantageous. When, however, M.N.R. members of the Junta resigned and elections were fixed for July 1944, the State Department sent Mr. Avra Warren to La Paz to report and he recommended that recognition should precede the holding of elections. The "elections" resulted in the return of M.N.R. as the strongest party together with a large number of "independents" supporting the Government. Major Villarroel was duly elected constitutional president, and the M.N.R. returned to the cabinet, holding at the end of 1944 five cabinet posts while the remaining four were occupied by soldiers. In November 1944 an attempted insurrection was savagely repressed; under a state of siege several well-known Bolivians were assassinated, an escaping ring-leader was murdered on Chilean soil, and there were rumours of the use of torture. This infringement of the basic rules of live-and-let-live shocked the sister-republics, and the Villarroel régime remained something of an outcast.

The M.N.R., conceived in the spirit of malaise left by the Chaco war and born in the unlucky year of 1941, was nurtured on ideas which were fast growing unpopular. One of its aims had been a campaign against the wealthy mine-owners, a good rabble-rousing policy, but hardly a practical one for a governing party in a country dependent on the mines for an estimated 70 per cent. of its revenue. In fact, the M.N.R. lost popularity more rapidly than did the President; but his continued reliance upon them proved his undoing. The opposition "anti-fascist front" abstained from the recent elections, a sure sign of trouble; and though the M.N.R. increased its representation, those returned also included a popular opposition newspaper-editor elected from "prison to parliament" and a relative of one of the victims of 1944 who demanded a full enquiry into the assassinations. Since then the temperature has steadily risen: after a recent attempt at revolt, the Government pounced on and confiscated Opposition papers, but in so doing they seem to have over-estimated their strength. An unsuccessful attempt on the life of Sr. Paz Estenssoro was followed by a students' strike. President Villarroel changed his cabinet for one entirely consisting of soldiers, but not in time to placate public feeling. Exacerbated by the brutality of certain of Villarroel's officers, the mob displayed what has been called an almost European savagery. Certainly the death of President Villarroel suspended from a lamp-post in La Paz recalls the end of Mussolini.

The "anti-fascist front" presumably counts on the support of all parties outside the Villarroel–M.N.R. combination. It is built around the Left Revolutionary Party (P.I.R.) led by Sr. José Antonio Arze, who was himself wounded in July 1944 and took refuge in the United States and Chile.

UNITED NATIONS.

Atomic Energy Commission.

Sub-Committee No. 2, whose task is to study the problem of control in all its aspects, held its first meeting on the 17th July. Captain da Motta Silva, of the Brazilian Navy, was elected Chairman. The Legal Committee met for the first time on the 18th, and Mr. Hasluck of Australia was chosen provisionally as its chairman, the Soviet delegate having questioned the wisdom of appointing as chairman the representative of a country which had so recently held the chairmanship of the Whole Commission. The Working Committee is to decide the terms of chairmanship at its next meeting. On the 19th, the Scientific and Technical Committee elected Dr. Kramers (Netherlands) chairman. It was agreed that the Committee should hold informal meetings at which members speak for themselves, and formal meetings, at which they speak for their Governments.

Economic and Social Council.

The International Health Conference has agreed upon a draft constitution for the World Health Organisation, and set up an Interim Commission pending the establishment of the World Health Organisation. The Interim Commission will be composed of delegates from 18 States, of which the U.K. is one. One of its many duties will be to convoke the first session of the W.H.O. not later than six months after the constitution comes into force. At the Commission's first meeting Dr. Chisholm (Canada) was elected Executive Secretary. At the second meeting Dr. Stampar (Yugoslavia) was elected Chairman, and three committees were appointed to examine urgent problems. The next meeting of the Commission itself will be held at Geneva in November. The various committees will begin their work immediately.

U.N.E.S.C.O.

The fifth session of the Preparatory Educational, Scientific and Cultural Commission set up by the United Nations, and commonly known as U.N.E.S.C.O., was held in the basement of the Royal Empire Society from the 5th to the 12th July. All the vigour of the President, Miss Ellen Wilkinson, the ceaseless perambulations of Dr. Julian Huxley who succeeded Sir Alfred Zimmern as Executive-Secretary, and the remarkable speed of the French and English translations were needed to get through a crowded agenda. High praise is due to the deputy secretaries, Howard Wilson (America) and Jean Thomas (France) for having evolved a sane programme out of the mass of some 140 projects put up to them by the tireless zealots of the fringe. The Conference accepted most of the priority ratings suggested by the Secretariat for the approved projects in the fields of Natural Sciences, Libraries and Museums, Social Sciences, Mass Media of Communication (press, radio, films), Fine Arts, Letters and Philosophy into which the work of U.N.E.S.C.O. has been divided. The majority of the projects will not be undertaken before U.N.E.S.C.O. is fully established in Paris as a Specialized Agency of the U.N. At present the necessary twenty acceptances of the Constitution have not yet been received. The agreement between the United Nations and U.N.E.S.C.O. was adopted unanimously, and will now go before the September session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and the General Conference of U.N.E.S.C.O. in November. According to this agreement, the Economic and Social Council must consider all applications for membership of U.N.E.S.C.O. submitted by States outside the United Nations, and U.N.E.S.C.O. must act on the Council's recommendations. I.L.O. and F.A.O. are under no such obligation.

When the question of continuing to help countries in intellectual distress with books, &c., was raised, the extraordinary generosity of private citizens and societies in U.S.A. contrasted sharply with the rigid refusal of the U.S. Government to spend a cent.

AFTERMATH OF THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

The Foreign Ministers' Deputies and their attendant experts are working at high pressure to make ready for the Peace Conference which opens in Paris on the 29th July. The drafts of the various treaties were completed on the 18th after Russia had once more played her part as the reluctant bride. This time the difficulty was an American reservation over Hungarian reparations. Russia objected to its inclusion, and yielded only when it was decided, ingeniously if dangerously, to put the full version of it in the English and French texts, but to leave out the greater part of it in the Russian text.

M. Sobolev's proposal that the Secretary General of the United Nations should be invited to the Peace Conference as an observer, has been supported by U.S. and France. The United Kingdom does not object, and the Russian Deputy, M. Gusev, is waiting for his Government's instructions.

China, Poland and Yugoslavia have already given the names of their delegates to the Conference. The Yugoslav delegation is formidable in ability and in number. Its outstanding personalities include the Deputy Prime Minister, who will be head of the delegation, Kardelj, Bebler and Vilfan, all Communists. Flahov, the veteran Macedonian agitator, reported to have been a member of the Comintern, is also one of the party.

The Trieste Special Commission has the task of working out the main provisions of the Statute and the Port Convention. It met first on the 15th July. On the 18th it heard the Yugoslavs and the Italians. The Yugoslav proposals would result in making the Free Territory a sub-state of Yugoslavia. They show a complete contempt for the Foreign Ministers' decisions. According to them the Legislature shall have absolute power and the right to promulgate the constitution, subject to the International Statute. The Governor, nominated by Yugoslavia, would be a Yugoslav national. His powers would be limited to a suspensive veto on all unconstitutional acts of the Government. The High Commissioner, appointed by the Security Council, may veto the Governor's actions, and do little else. If the Governor disagrees with the High Commissioner's Veto, the case goes to the Security Council, where of course Russia can use her own veto. In the Yugoslav plan no-one may vote in the first elections, unless he or his parents lived in the Territory before 1914. Effective power will reside in the elected assembly, and every precaution would be taken to ensure it returning a Yugoslav majority. As Bebler pointed out in the course of the meeting, democracy was impossible so long as A.M.G. remained. Democracy, in the Western view, on the other hand, would be impossible if some impartial authority such as A.M.G. did not remain. Thus, again, the danger of agreements which use the term 'democratic' is manifest. A disquieting aspect of the Yugoslav attitude was their obvious readiness to employ the threat to cut off the port from the hinterland. The significance of this became more apparent when it was found that the Soviet draft regulations for the Free Port contained no provision for freedom of transit between Trieste and its neighbours. Indeed, the aim of the Soviet proposals for the Port and for the Territory are essentially the same as the Yugoslav, i.e., to use a "democratically elected assembly" to achieve control not by the Security Council or its Governor, but by Yugoslavia; and the whole problem, which the Foreign Ministers once appeared to have settled, seems likely to be re-opened once more, with the Slav group able to champion the Council's ruling that both legislature and executive shall be on democratic lines, and the U.S., and U.K. an easy target for accusations of anti-democratic tendencies, because they will champion the Governor's powers, in the interests of United Nations control, the freedom of minorities and the possibility of stable government. Unlike the Yugoslavs, the Italians made no proposals, constructive or destructive.

Details will be discussed by representatives of the two Governments on the spot, and arrangements will include joint administrations for agriculture, trade and finance. Announcing this decision in the House of Commons on the 29th July Mr. Noel-Baker emphasized that it represented no deviation from the UK policy of working for fulfilment of the Potsdam agreement on economic unity, nor did it entail any lessening of cooperation with other Allies on the Control Council. The French Government had previously informed Mr. Duff Cooper in private that they were unwilling to accept the American scheme as they would have difficulty in joining an arrangement which appeared to divide Germany in two, with the West opposing Russia. On the other hand they were ready to enter into ad hoc trading agreements between the three Western zones and considered this would achieve the American aim. They hoped that any agreement reached would be made away from Berlin, so that the French representative would not be forced to give a definite answer in the Control Council. Apart from France's political difficulties, owing to Communist influence, she has not the same inducement as Britain and the United States to join the plan since the French zone is not such a heavy burden to the French taxpayer, if indeed a burden at all. The Director of Finance in the French zone in an interview with Stars and Stripes said that exports balanced imports; chiefly because the food ration is very low and industry has been exporting a large part of its current production to France. GERMANY.

HIS Majesty's Government have approved in principle the American proposal for economic union between two or more zones of Germany. Details will be discussed by representatives of the two Governments on the spot, and arrangements will include joint administrations for agriculture, trade and finance. Announcing this decision in the House of Commons on the 29th July Mr. Noel-Baker emphasized that it represented no deviation from the UK policy of working for fulfilment of the Potsdam agreement on economic unity, nor did it entail any lessening of cooperation with other Allies on the Control Council. The French Government had previously informed Mr. Duff Cooper in private that they were unwilling to accept the American scheme as they would have difficulty in joining an arrangement which appeared to divide Germany in two, with the West opposing Russia. On the other hand they were ready to enter into ad hoc trading agreements between the three Western zones and considered this would achieve the American aim. They hoped that any agreement reached would be made away from Berlin, so that the French representative would not be forced to give a definite answer in the Control Council. Apart from France's political difficulties, owing to Communist influence, she has not the same inducement as Britain and the United States to join the plan since the French zone is not such a heavy burden to the French taxpayer, if indeed a burden at all. The Director of Finance in the French zone in an interview with Stars and Stripes said that exports balanced imports; chiefly because the food ration is very low and industry has been exporting a large part of its current production to France. The French Government are being informed that the UK decision is directed neither at them nor at Russia and is not a step towards the final division of Germany or Europe into two camps. It is indeed hoped that Russia and France will join the scheme and that in any case union between the British and American zones will be accompanied by an increase in trade with other zones. An example of this is the recent trade agreement between the British and French zones, which provides for an exchange of goods to the value of 85 million RM.

As promised by Mr. Bevin at the Conference of Foreign Ministers HM Government have sent to the other three Powers a full statement of UK views on the treatment of Germany as an economic whole and on reparations. This does not lay down new principles but refutes the Russian interpretation of the Potsdam agreement (see Summary No. 351). Heated arguments on reparations and economic disarmament have again taken place in the Co-ordinating Committee as the result of Russian complaints that equipment in the Western zones scheduled for reparations was being pillaged or sold to German firms. In pleasing contrast is a report that the Russian representative on the Reparations Directive on the 26th July, after stormy meetings earlier in the month, went out of his way to be friendly; he stressed that the Allies must stick together in Berlin and not allow minor differences to cloud their relations.

Neues Deutschland, organ of the SED, on the 23rd July makes a comment on General McNarney's proposal for economic union which is interesting as a confession of the party's long term policy. "We welcome," says Neues Deutschland "all efforts directed towards the creation of a uniform economy in Germany." The problem was often treated as if it were merely a question of transferring food from East to West, but the fact that rations are rising in the East was due not to natural advantages but to a planned agricultural policy based on land reform. Therefore real economic unity could exist only "when the same economic principles are applied to all the zones." This is an advance on the similar threat uttered by Ulbricht reported on 21st March (see Summary No. 339). It seems clear that Neues Deutschland does not mean that economic uniformity will be achieved merely by land reform, since this is already under active consideration in the British and US zones. The paper implies that economic unity will be permitted only when the whole of German economy can be cut to the pattern dictated by the SED. Some confusion has arisen between Grotewohl and Pieck (SED) in presenting this problem to the British zone. Grotewohl, according to Hamburg Radio of the 22nd July, declared that zonal barriers should be abolished, whereas Pieck had spoken against their immediate removal (see last week's Summary). Pieck on his return to Berlin denied that he had said that he wished to retain the barriers, but wrote, somewhat naively, in Taegliche Rundschau that without the barriers they would not have been able to achieve land reform in the East. Apart from the usual call for fusion, Pieck said in Duesseldorf, that a Central Reich Government must be re-established. While no alteration could be made in reparations the SED was trying to negotiate the best possible deal for Germany. These statements, designed to impress the West with the SED's ability to form the future government of Germany, gain additional significance from a remark by Neues Deutschland that: "As the biggest German party, the SED realises its responsibility for the entire German Fatherland." Documentary evidence of the SED's policy for supremacy of the Party over the State is found in the district organisation of the party in one part of the Soviet zone. This organisation comprises not merely a party secretariat but a wide range of commissions concerned with such matters as administrative policy, justice, police, industry, agriculture, refugees and education, thus forming a second skeleton administration parallel with that of the State. This has a striking resemblance to the organisation of the Nazi Party, and differs completely from that of the pre-1933 SPD organisation, which was that of a purely political party.

The population of the Soviet zone does not appear to be moved by that unanimity of feeling reflected in the press. Dr. Buschmann, holder of a key position as head of the Central Administration for Trade and Industry, is reported by a press agency to have stated: "It is quite impossible for Germany ever to deliver the $10,000,000,000 worth of goods claimed by M. Molotov. This is specially true since the dismantling of factories in the Russian zone has already reached enormous proportions and new dismantling is continuing." This, if accurate, is a sensational divergence from the "official" view and contradicts Marshal Sokolovsky's statement of the 21st May that dismantling had ceased (see Summary No. 347). Another important official in the Soviet zone has privately told of growing antagonism towards the Soviet Military Administration among wide circles of the population. A sense of insecurity hangs over nearly all classes except the KPD. Every day, the official said, people are arrested by the NKVD or German police, and are then generally borne off to the internment camp near Torgau; no reason is given or seems to exist for their arrest, and their relations receive no news of their fate (see Summary No. 347). They are denounced by NKVD spies paid from the funds of the local German authorities. These spies are said frequently to be SS men or active Nazis. The population find this hard to reconcile with the fact that purely nominal Nazis are often dismissed from their positions. Further unrest is caused by the dismantling of industries. This official, like Buschmann, stated that this was continuing, including work on factories not connected with war industries. There is apparently an increasing tendency to expropriate properties whether the owners were Nazis or not, the excuse being that they were "militarists" or "reactionaries." (Other sources claim that in Saxony a good deal of trickery has taken place by which some non-Nazis were expropriated and some Nazis retained their property.) The official stated that propaganda against the Western zones has at present little effect as sufficient numbers of Germans have arrived from the West to tell the truth. The propaganda value of food increases has been counteracted by large-scale Russian requisitioning, particularly of sugar which is sent out of the zone. Presents of food to Germans increase ill-feeling as they are given only to Communists and NKVD spies (see Summary No. 347). Finally the official states that there is a fear that the zone will be incorporated into the Soviet Union by means of a "demonstration" or a "request by the people."

The Co-ordinating Committee on the 23rd July agreed to set up a Committee to investigate the coal situation in Germany (see last week's Summary). Its terms of reference have not yet been decided. The British, French and US representatives proposed to the Co-ordinating Committee on the 27th July that a quick investigation of technical matters should be made, as agreed at Paris, and a report issued on the 17th August. The Russian representative wanted a thorough study of the coal industry, including measures of control and de-nazification. He thought a large team of investigators should begin their study with the British zone and work until October. The British representative was unable to agree to this. General Clay, however, supported by the French, said he favoured a detailed enquiry into the coal industry, which should follow the preliminary technical report. When the British were unable to give immediate assent to this suggestion, General Clay indulged without warning in a heated expostulation in which he referred to the Co-ordinating Committee as "a girl's school." This unfortunate American outburst was fully exploited by the Russian representative. American anxiety about coal is reflected in an amplified report of General McNarney's press interview on the 21st July, in which "he assumed that the British and American zones would have an equal say in the disposition of resources," which might mean more coal for the US zone.

Such hopes are hardly encouraged by the report of the Select Committee on Expenditure which has just visited the British zone. It is a grave testimony to the need of economic unity, without which the Committee could not recommend any substantial reduction in the burden of £80,000,000 annually to the British taxpayer. They did recommend, however, a temporary reduction in coal exports to help break the vicious downward spiral of lack of food, lack of consumer goods, increased costs and lowered morale. This reduction has long been advocated by Germans and British within the zone, but will provoke great controversy with the French. The Committee commented forcibly on the need for rapid completion of the process of "screening" Germans, 40,000 of whom are in internment camps without trial. The Committee recorded that the continued absence of prisoners of war is having a bad effect on German morale. The return of the first few prisoners of war from Russia is being well publicised in the SED press.

The lull in the duel between the SED and SPD has been broken by a vituperative article in Taegliche Rundschau, accusing SPD leaders of placing themselves in the same camp as Nazis and war criminals. Relations are not likely to be improved by the British being forced to withdraw interzonal passes issued to the SED, owing to Russian failure to provide similar facilities for the CDU and SPD.

An international delegation of the WFTU has made a confidential report on its visit to Germany. Sir Walter Citrine on the 18th July giving some account of the report, criticized the centralised type of Trade Union Organisation, such as the FDGB at present represents. This implies an interesting divergence of opinion between the Russian member of the delegation and the Russian member of the Manpower Directorate in Berlin. No such criticism was made by a Russian Trade Union delegation which recently visited the Soviet zone.

AUSTRIA.

Mr. Bevin's statement on Austria in the House of Commons on the 25th July has had an extremely depressing effect on the Austrian people, especially in the Eastern zone, and an effect on the Austrian Government which was described by the Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor as "shattering." The sentence in Mr. Bevin's speech: "Austria is not yet free and independent, and one does not yet know whether the Eastern part of Austria will be separated. The position is still very delicate," has come as a blow from the West to the Austrian Government, who felt that they were doing their best for Austria and were always deeply conscious of the key position of their country in Europe to-day. The recent intensification of Soviet pressure on Austria and such Soviet actions as that at Zistersdorf (see below) has increased the fears of the Austrian Government of increased Communist strength. Herr Figl told the British Diplomatic Representative in Austria that immediately after the news of Mr. Bevin's statement the Communists had run round urging everyone to join the Communist Party at once so as to be on the band-waggon before the separation of Eastern Austria took place. He added that he feared an exodus at any time now from the Soviet zone to Western and Southern Austria. Dr. Gruber, the Foreign Minister, has appealed through the British and U.S. Diplomatic Representatives for a strong public declaration to be made immediately by the Western Allies that no doubt exists concerning their desire to maintain an indivisible and independent Austria.

On the 25th July the Austrian Parliament unanimously adopted a resolution, appealing to the United Nations Organisation for permission to send a delegation to its next meeting "to acquaint the United Nations with the Austrian people's position."

Meanwhile, the Soviet attitude confirms the fears of the Austrian Government. Since the signature of the new Control agreement the Russians have shown an apparent determination not to be co-operative on important questions in the Allied Council, as well as increasing pressure on the Austrian Government.

At the beginning of the session of Parliament on the 26th at which the Nationalisation Bill was to be considered (see last week's Summary), the Chancellor read two Notes, one from the Soviet Commander-in-Chief in Austria, and one from the acting Soviet Political Representative. These Notes protested against the inclusion of German concerns, alleged by the Russians to be German and claimed by them, in the list of firms to be nationalised, such as the Zistersdorf oil wells and the Danube Steamship Company, and the letter of the political representative concluded with the warning that German property in Eastern Austria was controlled by the Soviet military authorities, who would "take strong action against any infringement of their orders concerning such property." After the Chancellor had read the letters Parliament adjourned for party consultations. When the debate was resumed the Communist Deputy Honner suggested that the question of the disputed concerns should be left open until a friendly agreement could be reached in direct negotiations, or that a nationalisation law should be framed to give unified treatment to all foreign interests and "to avoid the impression of a demonstration against any one Power"—(which the timing of this Bill and the firms listed in it have unfortunately done). The four Communist deputies in the Chamber supported the Bill, however, which was passed unanimously. The French occupation authorities have also protested against the nationalisation of the Länderbank in Vienna, one of the concerns listed in the Bill, on the ground that there is a large amount of French capital invested in it. (General Cherrière, the French member of the Executive Committee, has assured the Austrian Chancellor that the French Provisional Government intends to settle the question of German assets in the French Zone "in a manner favourable to Austria's reconstruction.") The Nationalisation Bill is now referred to the Allied Council, and will become law unless the four occupying Powers agree to veto it unanimously within 31 days, according to the new Control Agreement.

While the Russians remain in physical possession of some of the most important industries scheduled for nationalisation it is difficult to see what effect the new law can have on the concerns. The Communist and Soviet-controlled papers in Vienna have announced the signature of a wage increase contract for Zistersdorf and "Soviet oil firms in Austria." Oesterreichische Zeitung says that it provides for wage increases up to 82 per cent. This action is considered by the Austrian Government to be a direct breach of the recent Soviet assurances that concerns operated by Soviet authorities would be subject to Austrian trade and labour legislation, and it will undoubtedly have an unbalancing effect on the Austrian economy. Other Soviet assurances that the concerns would be run for Austria's benefit—the Deputy Director of the "Soviet Oil Administration" at Zistersdorf was quoted as saying that "what the Austrian Government asks from us it gets"—are not borne out by the failure of the Soviet Government to fulfil their promises to supply oil to the Western zones of Austria. When the matter, which has always been a prickly subject, was discussed in the Allied Council on the 26th the Soviet member said that he was ready to send up to 1,300 tons to the Western Zones provided that this was regarded as a question between the Soviet authorities and the Austrian Government and that the oil question would never be raised again in the Allied Council. He said "I am ready to discuss this with the Austrian Government but I will not discuss it here now or later or ever." General Winterton had submitted a statement to the Council giving the British and American view that the Austrian Government should be given control of the oil industry and allowed to make plans for the production, distribution and export of Austrian oil. There are ample supplies of most types of oil except motor spirit, and the exportable surplus of heavier oils could be used to pay for the import of the motor spirit necessary.

The Bill on the treatment of National Socialists was passed unanimously on the 24th July. The Chancellor, Dr. Schaerf (representing the Minister of Justice) and the Under-Secretary for the Interior appeared before the Allied Council on the 26th to make statements on denazification. The Soviet member said that he did not consider the position satisfactory, but it was agreed that when the new Austrian law had been studied by the Allied Commission the question would be discussed again at the next meeting of the Allied Council on the 9th August. General Steele's suggestion that it would now be useful for the Council to submit a short interim report on denazification to the Council of Foreign Ministers was rejected by the Soviet High Commissioner in the absence of instructions from his Government.

Dr. Schaerf, the Austrian Vice-Chancellor and a Socialist leader, has made several speeches in recent months underlining points of discord between the parties. At a Socialist conference in Styria on the 23rd July he said that the present Government could rather be termed a "proportional Government" than a "Coalition Government," for there was no question of extensive co-operation between ministers of the three parties. Communist delegates often voted in the Chamber against a measure which had received Communist approval in the Council of Ministers. Although he attacked the Communists Dr. Schaerf said that the decisive opponent in internal affairs was the People's Party. He said that in the next election returned prisoners-of-war and re-enfranchised National Socialists might play a decisive part, and gave the interesting figure that the Socialist Party's strength in Vienna was only 44 per cent. of its 1932 strength in Vienna, although the Party was gaining strength in the provinces—if such a trend was maintained it would lessen the unhappy gulf between Red Vienna and the Catholic provinces of Austria between the wars.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

One of the principal objectives of the new Czechoslovakia's foreign policy is, in effect, the erection of a cordon sanitaire which will contribute towards European security in the event of renewed German aggression. In her quest for such security Czechoslovakia has already concluded treaties of friendship and alliance with the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, and it now seems probable that a further link in the chain of protective agreements will soon be forged by the conclusion of a similar pact with France. In the summer of 1944 the French and Czechoslovak Governments issued a joint statement to the effect that, as soon as an opportune moment arrived, those political agreements which in the past helped to cement the traditional friendship between the two nations would be readapted to meet post-war conditions. Prime Minister Gottwald in a recent interview with representatives of the Agence France-Presse has intimated that this declaration should now be translated into concrete form. The conclusion of such a pact would indeed be a logical sequel to the Franco-Soviet Agreement, and such a new bond in conjunction with the protective agreements already entered into by Czechoslovakia and the appearance of Soviet Russia in the Danubian basin—a factor that will greatly influence developments in Central and Eastern Europe—should have the effect of dissipating any fears about future relations with Germany. As for Hungary, she can no longer seriously threaten Czechoslovakia's security without the aid of Germany. The one weakness in the chain is the Polish-Czechoslovak frontier dispute and its attendant psychological effects.

The reception accorded to the Czechoslovak delegation to Moscow (see last week's Summary) was cordial. Subjects upon which agreement was reached included: Soviet support for Czechoslovak claims against Hungary; the material and financial aid to be given by Russia in rebuilding the Republic's army; the return, without compensation, of Soviet war booty acquired in Czechoslovakia—this comprises numerous machines and factories, among them the huge synthetic oil plant at Most; the restoration of all property in the Soviet occupation zone which was formerly owned by Czechoslovaks; and the signing of an Air Agreement. A final Trade Agreement and a Railway Agreement will be concluded later. The Russians are generally satisfied with present conditions in Czechoslovakia, but some criticism has been voiced in the Soviet Press against Dr. Beneš and his contention that the Republic should serve as a "balancing factor" between East and West.

SOVIET UNION.

The inclusion of the Foreign Ministers of the three Baltic Republics in the Soviet delegation to Paris has caused some surprise and embarrassment. They have, however, been listed as members of the Russian delegation, in contrast to the delegations of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Republics which figure separately.

M. Trygve Lie, Secretary-General of the United Nations, was received by Marshal Stalin on the 23rd July. Before his reception he had complained privately that none of the Soviet leaders had seemed serious about UNO and that they had tried to turn his visit mainly into a social occasion. He came away, however, having achieved the concrete result of obtaining permission to set up a United Nations Information Centre in Moscow, and with the feeling that he had received a sympathetic hearing for his complaint of excessive Soviet use of the veto on secondary matters, as also for his plea that the Russians should be better represented in United Nations activities in general. He was annoyed, however, that the Soviet leaders insisted on treating him as a Norwegian personality, and on discussing Norwegian questions with him.

As was to be expected, Pravda has come out strongly against the plan for unifying the British and American zones of Germany, describing the proposal as a reactionary scheme directed against the USSR and the Potsdam decisions. In contrast to the harshness of the official publicity on this subject the atmosphere in the Reparations Directorate in Berlin, hitherto stormy, has suddenly become cordial. At a party in celebration of the conclusion of the Russian month in the chair the Soviet delegate went out of his way to make protestations of friendship, asserting that the Allies must stick together in Berlin and not allow their intentions to be clouded by minor differences.

The main point of attack against the USA has been the administration of the American zone of Germany, where fascist and anti-Soviet organisations were said to be flourishing among displaced persons, in particular Poles and Ukrainians. This complements earlier attacks in Izvestia on similar activities in the British zone (see Summary No. 351) and shows Soviet awareness of the growing Ukrainian nationalist movements. It is perhaps significant that a Delegation of the Soviet Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries should have just left Moscow to take part in an all-Canada Ukrainian festival early in August.

The trial of the Soviet naval officer Redin on a charge of spying was another count in the indictment against the USA, the whole affair being described as "a dirty plot against democracy," no credit being given to the American authorities for his acquittal. Tass has issued a lengthy denial of President Truman's statement that American press representatives and educationists were unable to get permission to travel freely in the Soviet Union, citing in support of its thesis the recent trips of various American public figures to various parts of the USSR.

The American Embassy in Moscow have just been informed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that they must move their Naval Missions from Murmansk, Odessa, Vladivostock. This decision was not unexpected, as it is normal that the Soviet Government should desire a withdrawal of Naval Missions which are a survival from the War and Lease-Lend. What is more discouraging is the additional proviso in the Soviet note to the effect that American representation outside Moscow should be restricted to a Consul, who must be a civilian, at Vladivostock. The Americans had asked a year ago for authorisation to open a Consulate at either Leningrad or Odessa.

The United Kingdom has had on the whole a milder handling, except in connection with policy in the Middle East. A broadcast commentary on the first year of power of the Labour Government complained of the "touching accord" between His Majesty's Government and His Majesty's Opposition on matters of foreign policy, and asserted that on the home front also the Government's popularity was being undermined by delays over nationalisation. The old attacks accusing the Western Allies of dilatoriness in opening the Second Front were revived in a long Pravda article, which used as a peg on which to hang the theme an obscure book by one John Dalgleish, which was alleged to give unconscious support to the unpopular conclusions of Ingersoll in "Top Secret."

Cordial notice has been taken in the Soviet press of the arrival of Admiral Sir Bruce Fraser for the Red Navy Day celebrations, tribute being paid to his work during the war in safeguarding Allied communications in the north.

Much publicity has been given to the statements of Mr. Silverman, M.P., and Mr. Schaffer of the British-Soviet Society on their visit to Riga, in which they praised the tempo of Latvian reconstruction. Mr. Silverman, M.P., asserted that a large majority of the British people and of M.P.'s recognised the incorporation of the Baltic States in the USSR as final and correct.

Attention has been focussed on Britain's activities in the Middle East, her strategic aims in Egypt and Palestine, and the alleged dark deeds of the Anglo-Iranian oil company being singled out for attack, but so far there has been no Soviet comment. Tass has reported the King David Hotel outrage.

It is of interest that in a lecture delivered on the 17th July, the Soviet Palestine expert Lutsky came out clearly on the side of the Arabs, making a strong attack on Zionism as a henchman of British and American imperial interests. The only solution offered was that Jews and Arabs should be left without foreign interference to decide their own fate. The Jews as such were not attacked, and it was suggested that America should admit 10,000 from Europe, though there was no hint that the USSR might follow suit. It is noteworthy that in the press reports of the lecture the speaker's support of the Arabs and condemnation of Zionism were omitted.

The groans of the Soviet customer appear to have reached official ears, for the Minister of Trade of the RSFSR has just issued a long statement complaining that the cultural standards of Soviet Trading were falling far short of requirements. He reaffirmed earlier statements by Soviet spokesmen of the proposed abolition of bread and cereal rationing in the coming autumn and of all other products in 1946–7, a consummation which hardly seems likely to be reached.

M. Lozovsky, who had been Deputy Director of the Soviet Information Bureau under M. Shcherbakov since the beginning of the war, earning great unpopularity among foreign correspondents, has now been appointed Director. He has been relieved of his post of Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs which he had held since 1936.

Patriarch Alexei has held his first press conference. His answers to questions, which were mainly concerned with the dreary subject of the patriotic activities of the Orthodox Church during the war, give a constrained impression. He stated that there were now 59 bishoprics (as against 66 in 1917) and mentioned as many as 89 monasteries (see also under "Czechoslovakia," "Hungary" and "Turkey").

SCANDINAVIA.

Sweden.

On the 18th July it was agreed between the Allied and the Swedish Governments that Kr. 150 million should be made available by Sweden for financing Allied purchases on Germany's behalf. This sum represents the balance of an estimated Kr. 378 million which is the liquidation value of German assets in Sweden after the deduction of certain German obligations to that country and it includes the Swedish clearing debt to Germany of about Kr. 15 million together with other German claims on Sweden.

A further 75 million kronor will be allocated by Sweden to the Inter-Allied Reparation Pool, and 50 million to the rehabilitation of non-repatriable Displaced Persons, while gold looted by the Germans, to the value of approximately $8,000,000, will be restored to the Allies. The 50 million kronor will be paid in cash, while the form of the other two transfers will be negotiated separately between Sweden and each recipient country.

As a quid pro quo the United States, for their part, undertake to release Swedish holdings blocked since 1941, and the Allied "Black Lists" have been withdrawn.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Netherlands.

The joint session of the States-General was opened by Queen Wilhelmina in the Ridderzaal at The Hague on the 23rd July. In the course of her Speech from the Throne, the Queen said:—

> "We have steadily progressed along the road to this great goal [that of laying the foundations of Dutch "spiritual and material recovery"], and in our efforts to reach it, we are by no means behind other nations that have been struck by the war. Nevertheless, many and great difficulties are before us. I recommend you, as well as the entire nation, to consider them seriously and constantly. These difficulties can be conquered only if everyone dedicates himself enthusiastically to the common task.
>
> "There is an improvement in the development of events in the Netherlands Indies. The Allied Supreme Command has handed over to us the responsibility for administration of the Outer Territories. Discussions are taking place with representatives of the population of these territories with a view to meeting national desires in a loyal and peaceful manner. In Java and Sumatra, however, the conditions for such consultation are still lacking . . . . The Allied Supreme Command in these territories, and in the Riouw Archipelago, has not yet completed its task . . . . The removal of the after effects of the Japanese invasion and the return of law and order, particularly in Java and Sumatra, are necessary conditions for enabling the Netherlands to give herself entirely to her vocation: to build, together with the Indonesian peoples, a state structure for these peoples, within the frame-work of the Netherlands Kingdom, a structure in which they can freely develop their own strength and by means of which they can win their own place in the ranks of the United Nations. It is self-evident that in this Indonesian state structure, the rights and interests of all groups of the population and of minorities must be protected and looked after . . . . Pending the restoration of economic life, the monetary and trade difficulties which confront the East Indies will be surmounted only with support from the Netherlands and by close co-operation between the two parts of the Kingdom, obviously on a basis of equality . . . . In the West Indies, too, there is an urge towards a revision of the political institutions. What can already be done to satisfy that urge, without modification of the constitution, will be expedited, in order that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles (Curaçao) may be able to start on a new basis their own life, their partnership in the Kingdom, and especially their task in their own countries . . . .
>
> "The Netherlands and Belgian Governments are aware of the fact that, with regard to a number of international problems, their interests coincide more and more, and this realization contributes towards a strengthening of the close co-operation between them . . . . The Netherlands plans to lay claim to limited frontier corrections along her eastern border.
>
> "The reconstruction of both our naval and land forces will also be continued . . . . In both services, special attention will be paid to discipline, morale and spiritual and social welfare. Revision of the conscription law and the laws governing promotion in respect of personnel of the Regular Army and of the Reserve Army will be submitted to you.

Belgium.

M. Spaak has had to leave for the Peace Conference without having been able to form a new Cabinet, as he had hoped, before the week-end [see last week's Summary]. At a Press conference in Brussels on the 26th July, he stated that the Christian Social Party, whose leaders he had met that morning, had "accepted his invitation to discuss his experience during the recent negotiations of the conditions under which co-operation would be possible." The object of the meeting had been to discuss the Government programme. M. Spaak also revealed that the Socialist Party which, until very recently, had insisted on the formation of a left-wing coalition Cabinet, had since changed its mind. But there is still strong Communist opposition to the proposed inclusion of the Christian Social Party. Meanwhile, King Leopold has announced, through the medium of his Secretariat in Brussels, the setting up of a commission of nine prominent Belgians, which has been ordered "to draw up an objective and circumstantial report, strictly conforming with the truth, on his attitude since 1936—the year in which Belgian neutrality and independence in the sphere of foreign affairs was announced." The statement of the King's Secretariat adds that the commission, whose existence had been a secret, held its first meeting on the 14th July.

Belgian delegates accompanying M. Spaak to the Peace Conference include MM. Fernand van Langenhove, Secretary-General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, G. Kaeckenbeeck, Head of the Peace Conferences and International Organization Department, and his No. 2, Roland Lebeau, Counsellor of Legation, Walter Loridan, Chef du Cabinet to M. Spaak, H. de Vleeschauwer, Baron H. de Gruben, Director-General of the Political Department, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and Professor Fernand Dehousse, of Liége University, specialist in International Law, and Belgian delegate to the Economic and Social Council of U.N.O.: an impressive team.

FRANCE.

The Minister of Labour broadcast on the 29th July an outline of the Government proposals regarding wages. The result of the last two months' negotiations will be an average increase of 18 per cent. in the wages of factory and office workers, to take effect from the 1st July. The adjustments whereby purchasing power will be increased without serious repercussions on the Treasury and on prices include a 50 per cent. increase in family allowances. Also the amount of income exempt from tax will be increased from 40,000 fr. to 60,000 fr.

It was thought that the Cabinet would itself come to a decision on the methods by which the recommendations of the economic conference (see last week's Summary) and the limitations it had itself imposed on Government expenditure could be reconciled, but beyond entrusting that unenviable task to the four Ministers concerned, with the assurance that it could be done, and a note of the difficulties to be borne in mind, there was nothing to show for their many hours' deliberation, which included a session lasting almost the whole of the 23rd July and until 3 a.m. the next day. There seems to be good grounds for the assumption that the Government have agreed not to break down, whatever else they do. Both the Communists—who are said to have supported the recommended increase unequivocally, and who were impatient of talk of rise in prices—and the Socialists, were unhappily conscious that they were inescapably bound by their initial agreement as members of the Government to limit the increase.

The Minister of Transport has been authorised to re-classify wages of railroad workers and to arrange for an increase in fares and charges. The price fixed for this year's wheat harvest shows an increase of 60 per cent. over last year's admittedly unsatisfactory price. Taking into account the higher cost of living, it would seem to be a fair price, particularly in view of the 50 per cent. better harvest which is expected this year, and the grant of bonuses for early returns.

M. Bidault made a speech at St. Etienne on the 28th July, in which he justified to his constituents the Government's attitude in internal and external affairs. He foreshadowed a new system of priority for raw materials as part of the effort to increase production, and also a revision of prices and profit margins. From the point of view of obtaining security for the French people he referred to the Government's opposition to the idea of a German central Government " before the boundaries of Germany are marked and its organisation defined."

On the same day, the eve of the peace conference, General de Gaulle made his third speech since his retirement. The occasion was a commemorative ceremony at Bar-le-Duc in Lorraine. He spoke first of the need to " put Germany out of harm's way "; his proposals were for nine federated states—Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Württemburg, Baden, Hesse, the Palatinate, the Rhineland and the north-western provinces, each responsible for its own administration. This, he said, with the incorporation of the Saar in the French economy, and the compensation of Poland on the western frontier for her losses in the East, would ensure peace, provided that " no one has an ulterior motive to make use of the rebirth of Germany against others." As one holding no official position, and therefore free to incur the suspicion of favouring the creation of a Western bloc, the General referred openly to the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. as " the only States in a position to play a capital part." For a world, he said, which tends to be divided between these two Powers, the old world, " old Europe," should provide a necessary element of balance, with an understanding between France and Britain as its basis. On the subject of an entente between Paris and London, he made veiled references to what he called " traditional intrigues " in the Arab States and the East, and said that, above all, the two countries must first reach an agreement on Germany, failing which France would have to reserve the right to act in her zone of occupation according to her rights and interests " as, it seems, our Allies have decided to do."

The French people await the General's declarations with more eager anticipation than any Ministerial pronouncement, and as a Presidential election campaign they could not be better timed or spaced. Some secondary meaning might be read into his closing appeal to Frenchmen to work for the " higher interests of the world "—" the future depends on us," but it is more reasonable to suppose that once more he is merely saying " This is what I stand for."

The High Court of Justice has passed the death sentence upon MM. Bonnefoy, Vichy Under-Secretary for Information, and Rochat, Secretary-General of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, both of whom were tried in absentia. A sentence of hard labour for life was passed on M. Lagardelle, one of the founders of the Socialist party, whose enthusiasm for trades union rights suffered a sea-change while he was on the staff of the French Ambassador in Rome. At the Ministry of Labour from 1942, he was one of those responsible for the deportation of French workers to Germany. M. Cayla, late Governor of Madagascar, who was evidently prepared to continue the struggle in Africa, was given five years' hard labour. On the 24th July, a charge of civic unworthiness was brought against M. P.-E. Flandin, other charges against him having been dropped (see Summary No. 329). The prosecution admitted that no criminal charge could be brought, but submitted as evidence a telegram sent to Hitler after the Munich Conference and a speech made during the occupation. A letter from Mr. Churchill, and the personal testimony of Mr. Randolph Churchill to M. Flandin's helpful attitude towards the Allies, particularly over the North African landings, was followed by brilliant advocacy by his counsel, and the sentence of loss of civil rights for five years was cancelled by an immediate reprieve. As a protest against M. Flandin's acquittal the Communist jurors refused to take their place on the 30th July, but it is generally felt that the Court's decision weakens the distinction between the pro-Munich and the anti-Munich Frenchmen, and is a welcome step towards la réconciliation française.

M. Eirik Labonne, appointed Resident-General in Morocco four months ago, made an important speech at the opening of the Government Council at Rabat on the 22nd July. He dealt first with the economic situation—" to feed, to clothe, remain the primary and daily preoccupations of the Government "—which was to be met by the application of new methods designed to increase the productivity of the country, and by making available on an increasing scale fertilizers and sources of industrial power. He announced the floating of a loan of 5 milliard fr., 2 milliard of which would be invested in Morocco. In the political field, he said, the Government's main duty was to ensure that any necessary reforms should be introduced carefully and with respect for Moroccan traditions; instruction should proceed from the elimination of illiteracy to arrangements for higher education with access to all careers; administration needed to be decentralized, regional life encouraged and municipal reform extended. This speech aroused interest in France, where the constituent committee of the Assembly is now discussing the status of the French Union. In Rabat it had a mixed reception, two of the three electoral colleges—those representing French agriculturalists, traders and industrialists—absenting themselves from the remainder of the July session. The only definite reason given for their action was that they had not been consulted in the matter of the loan, and they have maintained discussions with the Resident-General independently.

SWITZERLAND.

Judging from wireless reports, the Bikini experiment has been followed with close attention in Switzerland, and there are already many indications that that nation does not intend to be left behind in atomic research. Last November a committee of specialists was set up under Government auspices to study the whole question of atomic energy in relation to Switzerland's needs. A schedule of work for the current year was drawn up, which included exploring the possibility of the existence of uranium in Switzerland. In a broadcast on the 24th July it was stated that the Federal Council had submitted to the Federal Assembly a report and a draft Bill dealing with the promotion of research work on atomic energy. A central experimental station was to be set up for this research work, and credits to assist it would be provided in the Budget. The report added that it was most unfortunate that to-day the whole question of atomic energy was so closely bound up with the Atomic Bomb, resulting in an international embargo on the use of uranium. It was hoped in Switzerland that the efforts being made in the United States to get all work connected with the development of atomic energy placed under international control would prove successful. Otherwise, the problems which would arise would be many and various.

According to reports from Zürich published in the American Press, there are no indications that the Swiss franc is to be revalued in the near future, in spite of the persistent rumours which followed such action on the part of Canada and Sweden. The President of the National Bank of Switzerland is reported to have stated that the Government, the National Bank and the Swiss people are " unanimous in rejecting the principle of trying to influence economic trends by manipulation of the value of the Swiss franc."

The supply situation has recently shown considerable improvement, both in regard to industry and the distribution of consumer goods. The Authorities have repeatedly declared their intention of abolishing as rapidly as possible the very comprehensive system of war economy controls created to supervise and direct industrial and agricultural production, the use of fuel and raw materials, and the distribution of goods in short supply. By the end of 1945, no less than 150 decrees and regulations within this category had already been rescinded.

On the 21st June, Dr. Feisst, Minister of Agriculture and Food, in an interview with the Press, stated that recent prolonged rains had seriously compromised the hay harvest, which would react unfavourably on milk production. Reserves of butter and cheese were very low, and the butter which the Allies were able to allow Switzerland to import was quite inadequate. Milk and butter rationing, could not, therefore, be abolished in the near future. Reserves of cereals were also low, so that, although this year's crop promised to be better than the last, there was no likelihood of bread rationing ending this year. The present stocks of oils and edible fats were lower than at any time during the war.

As against this not too rosy picture, it should be remembered that the present ration of bread, fats, cereals and farinaceous foods is larger than normal pre-war consumption, and that bread, breadstuffs, cereals, fats, milk, meat, sugar and soap are the only commodities still rationed in Switzerland. There is, indeed, said to be a tendency to exchange a substantial proportion of the coupons at the end of the rationing period for larder stocks, rather than for immediate use. The price of bread, fats and milk is kept down by means of subsidies, while meat and potatoes are distributed to the poor at reduced prices to ease their difficulties under rationing.

ITALY.

After a ten days' session the Constituent Assembly has adjourned until the end of the Peace Conference. The drafting of the new constitution has been left in the hands of a special committee of 76. The Government won a vote of confidence on its foreign and home policies, the first by unanimous vote, the second by 388 out of 441 votes. The result was no longer in doubt after Signor Togliatti, the leader of the Communist Party, had made a speech in which he said that, although he himself was not in the Government, his party would support it.

Speaking of the two blocs in the Constituent Assembly—the Christian Democrat bloc and the Communist-Socialist bloc—Signor Togliatti said that although the latter was numerically superior, the Communists and Socialists could not, and would not, unite with sufficient solidarity to prevail in the Government. As regards foreign policy, his party had never disagreed with the Government's aims, but only about the relative importance of certain problems, and he made a general appeal to the Italian people to understand and accept the realities of Italy's situation. As regards Trieste the Communist leader proposed that Italy and Yugoslavia should reach a direct agreement. Signor Togliatti then turned to home policy. The most important point was to bring wages and salaries and also pensions into line with the cost of living. A compromise had been accepted in the " Republic " bonus while, at the same time, efforts were to be made to reduce the cost of living. The Republic bonus to which he referred is the outcome of a Cabinet decision whereby heads of families will receive 3,000 lire and others 1,500 lire in two monthly instalments in August and September. State employees, both civilians and servicemen of the three branches, are entitled to the bonus provided that they are not on active service. Dependants or prisoners-of-war and internees still abroad, as well as disabled ex-Servicemen and also persons above a certain age, are eligible together with employees of local and semi-public services, and the unemployed. Anyone earning more than 25,000 lire a month, however, is not eligible. Signor Togliatti ended his speech by a criticism of Signor Corbino's financial policy. This policy had been explained in the Constituent Assembly by Signor Corbino, Minister of the Treasury, who began by stating that, according to the figures so far available, the 1945–46 financial year closed with a deficit of 350,000 million lire. After listing the various allocations Signor Corbino pointed out that this had been accomplished without printing a single paper lire above the total monetary circulation on the 12th December, 1945. The Minister now proposed to issue Treasury Bonds in order to tide over the present financial crisis. Signor Togliatti described Signor Corbino's policy as being too conservative and advocated a change of currency which, he said, everyone had agreed on, but, in the opinion of the Minister of the Treasury, this step should not be taken until sufficient confidence in the new Government was assured.

The general strike of petrol distribution workers, which began on the 16th July, is still going on, as no agreement concerning wages has yet been reached. Since the coastal petrol storage depots have not been cleared, it may be impossible to take in the supplies which are due to arrive this month. UNRRA, in fact, threatens to divert the 10 tankers expected in July, since it will neither consider paying demurrage charges nor the delaying of the tankers until agreement is reached. Signor De Gasperi had asked the Confederazione Generale Italiano di Lavoro to intervene to bring about a resumption of work by the 17th July, but, either through unwillingness or inability, it refused to denounce the strike. Signor De Gasperi, as Minister of the Interior, therefore telegraphed to all prefects and military commands concerned to take over all the petrol storage depots in question. Strikers were to be ordered to resume work under civil penalty, and if this order were not obeyed military and naval personnel were to take charge in order to meet the demands of essential services, including UNRRA. This is by no means the only strike which has taken place during the past fortnight. The press reports that three weeks ago there was a crisis in the C.G.I.L. on the issue whether the Confederation should adopt the policy of widespread strikes in order to force an increase of wages. Despite the threatened resignation of Achille Grandi, the Christian Democrat Secretary, Di Vittorio, the Communist Secretary, who sponsored this policy, won his point, the result being the present epidemic of strikes.

SOUTH-EAST EUROPE.

Hungary.

In March of this year the United States presented to Moscow a stiff note, with which H.M. Government associated themselves, complaining that Russian intervention in Hungarian economic affairs was arbitrary and excessive, prejudiced unwarrantably American interests and placed Hungary in imminent danger of complete collapse. The note went on to ask that the Allied Control Commission should draw up a programme for the economic rehabilitation of Hungary, but this proposal was firmly rejected by Russia on the ground that this was outside the scope of the Commission. The United States, dissatisfied with the negative result of this protest and concerned at the deterioration of Hungary's economic plight, has repeated her complaint in Moscow and is now invoking the reservation she made at the time of signing the Armistice to re-open the question of reparations, and at the same time renewing her suggestion that the Allied Control Commission should be appointed to advise on possible remedies. The refusal of the Soviet Union to publish this reservation was one of the reasons for deferring the publication of the texts of the Peace Treaties. Hungary seems to consider that any adjustment of reparations is a matter for settlement between Russia and herself, for it is reported that the Hungarian delegation to the Peace Conference was not briefed or documented on reparations. This is borne out by a report from Budapest radio that Hungary has obtained from Russia permission to spread payment of some of her reparations dues for 1946, 1947 and 1948 over later years at agreed rates, and has been released from her obligation to pay the stipulated 6,000,000 dollars' interest for defaulted payments. Further, Russia will accept the valuable shares of the Petrozseny mines in Transylvania (confiscated by the Roumanian Government) as payment of part of the 1946 and 1947 accounts.

On hearing the protests by the British and American Commissioners that his note to the Hungarian Government (see last week's Summary) was sent without their knowledge, General Sviridov could not agree that his action was incorrect, maintaining that as the demands were made on behalf of the Soviet High Command and particularly affected Soviet interests there was no need for prior consultation with his colleagues; he promised, however, to inform them if any further demands were made. When asked to explain why he had reported to the Allied Control Commission in April that the Hungarian Government had complied with Article XV of the Armistice, he said that it really did then seem that Hungary was trying to fulfil her obligations to suppress fascist organizations.

Meanwhile the purge has continued. The Minister of the Interior was taken to task by the National Assembly for excesses, and he admitted that some worthy civil servants had been unjustly dismissed, and that in some cases staffs had been so reduced as to bring administration to a standstill. He promised to rectify mistakes. Replying to protests from the Primate and Episcopate, as well as from Deputies, against the dissolution of religious associations, M. Rajk averred that no association had been dissolved without good cause. Although extensive Government changes had been expected, only the Smallholder Minister of Reconstruction, M. Antal, resigned, to be replaced by another Smallholder, M. E. Misteth, who had been Under-Secretary for Industry. Three high officials of the National Bank—the President, the General Manager and the Director of the Banking Department—are reported to have resigned also. The sudden death of the Minister for National Defence, M. Jenö Tombor, has caused another vacancy which has not yet been filled.

The Allied Control Commission has sanctioned the resumption of diplomatic relations between Hungary and Switzerland, Italy, Bulgaria and Roumania, and of trade relations with Italy, Norway, Holland and Belgium.

Roumania.

The traffic in illegal immigration to Palestine has been on the increase, and has reached proportions which have called for vigorous measures on the part of the British authorities. The matter is the more complicated since it has become evident that the Russian authorities in Roumania are giving this traffic every encouragement and assistance. No fewer than 440 visas for Jews to proceed to Costa Rica are alleged to have been obtained from the Costa Rican representative at Budapest. It has been ascertained on inquiry that there is no Costa Rican representative at Budapest, and the Costa Rican Government state that they will not permit the entry of these people. One of the vessels chartered for this purpose, the "Agia Anastasia"—which is at Brăila and ready to sail—is a hulk which could not remain at sea for more than a few days and certainly could not cross the Atlantic. As was the case with the ships which left recently with emigrants with Mexican visas, the destination is certainly Palestine. Colonel Borrisov, the head of the Soviet Administrative Section of the Control Commission has refused point blank to withdraw permission for the vessel to sail. He professed himself uninterested in the ultimate destination of the emigrants.

The difficulty in obtaining clearances for British aircraft operating to Bucarest is increasing. The Russians are obstructing in every way the operation of the new route via Vienna.

A delegation consisting of four members has left for Paris to assist Dl Franasovici who is acting as observer at the Conference.

Dl Mihai Ralea, the Minister for Arts and Religion has been appointed as Minister to Washington, and Dl Vasile Stoica as Minister to the Netherlands.

A congress of elementary school teachers has been taking place. "Frontul Plugarilor" (the Ploughmen's Front) has characteristically announced that the teachers have at last broken with the past and pledged themselves to serve democracy. The Minister of Education announces that since March 1945 the number of illiterates has fallen by 300,000. He did not explain how he arrived at that figure. The number of illiterates in 1940 was well over 6,000,000, so this small improvement is a step in the right direction. The Minister also announced that a sum of 6,000 million lei was available for stocking the school teachers' supply bureaux with goods and clothing. This provision may, of course, assist their willingness to "serve democracy."

The "first modern Roumanian motor road" is to be constructed between Bucarest and Braşov. To give Roumania its due, the existing road between Bucarest and Braşov is one of the very few first-class roads in Roumania—even if it was constructed in those bad old, reactionary, fascist days so unceasingly denounced.

Yugoslavia.

The text of the military agreement of the 9th June, 1945, by which Yugoslav troops were withdrawn from Trieste, was not published in Yugoslavia. Within a few days of the signature of the agreement by Marshal Tito, the Yugoslavs, attributing to it a fictitious clause concerning the retention of the Yugoslav-imposed civil authorities, had accused the Allies of breach of faith. At Dubrovnik on the 21st July this year, Tito revived this old argument and produced others based on similar false premises, in order to declare that "they" had destroyed the agreement. With reference to the Foreign Ministers' decision he implied that France had made a mockery of her traditional friendship by failing to support the Yugoslav claim; but he placed his hopes on Yugoslavia's strong delegation to the Peace Conference and her "weighty arguments." He also spoke of the treaties with the U.S.S.R., Poland, Czechoslovakia and Albania as making Yugoslavia economically independent of the Western Powers, who sought to exert political pressure by means of trade.

During his tour of Dalmatia, which, with the revival of the international tourist trade, may well become the showcase of Yugoslavia, Tito's speeches were of a distinctly bellicose nature. The main targets of his criticism were the Church (or "clerico-Fascists") and National Front dissidents. He particularly stressed that the Church must keep out of politics and that the youth of the country must be preserved from their reactionary influence. He described the Pioneers organisation (a purely Communist creation) to which this task is assigned, as having no political character. Youth, in fact, must be brought up in the pure atmosphere of "creative work" and knowledge of "our social collectivity." At Split he denounced those who would form "splinter groups" (his own words!), evidently having in mind Professor Dragoljub Jovanovitch who has just been deprived of his mandate as Deputy in the Serbian National Assembly for being too critical of recent Bills (see Summary No. 352).

The Yugoslav Ministry of Foreign Affairs have been informed, in firm tones, by H.M. and the U.S. Chargés d'Affaires that the unfriendly and unco-operative attitude of the Yugoslavs over the question of air communications are completely poisoning Anglo-American relations with Yugoslavia. The U.S. spokesman went so far as to indicate that the continuation of this state of affairs would postpone indefinitely the arrival of the U.S. Ambassador in Belgrade.

The harvest, which is being gathered, promises to be good, and various concessions have been made in order to induce the farmers to deliver their surplus grain to the Government.

Greece.

A conference to discuss M. Tsaldaris's three offers to the Opposition was held on the 24th July, the day after his return to Athens. The Opposition leaders showed themselves critical of the Government's activities to date, and had their own proposals to make for the future. The chief speakers were MM. Sophoulis, Papandreou, and Kanellopoulos, who agreed in refusing to enter the Government unless it were recast on a coalition basis, with a common programme set out in advance; they likewise refused to take part in an all-party plebiscite commission unless it were given power to decide anew such questions as the date and formula of the referendum. These proposals accordingly came to nothing, since, even if M. Tsaldaris himself had been willing to consider such conditions, he was precluded from doing so by his knowledge that they would be quite unacceptable to the body of his party. M. Zervas was also present, but his comments were non-committal, perhaps because he is known to covet the Ministry of Public Order, from which, in the premier's absence, he has been trying to oust the younger Theotokis.

Discussion of the less controversial proposal for an all-party delegation to the peace conference was also unfruitful. The Opposition leaders and press have been very critical of the Government's handling of Greek national claims, and seem to have wished to dissociate themselves from responsibility for it. Nevertheless prominent personalities of the Opposition parties have finally been included in the delegation, whose members, with perhaps two exceptions, seem to have been chosen for their experience of foreign affairs rather than for political reasons. M. Tsaldaris is to lead the delegation, and its other principal members are M. Venizelos (one of the exceptions!) and three former Foreign Ministers, MM. Rendis (Liberal), Politis (Venizelist Liberal), and Dragoumis (Populist): they are supported by the Greek Ambassadors to London, Paris, and Moscow (MM. Aghnides, Raphael, and A Politis), the Greek representative on the Allied Council for Italy, M. Exindaris, M. Pipinellis, the able diplomatic adviser to H.M. the King of Greece, and—the other possible exception—rather surprisingly, the historian George Ventiris, who from his retirement in Lausanne has acted as political adviser to his two remarkable younger brothers, Nicholas, the editor of the Athens royalist daily, Embros, and Lt.-General Constantine Ventiris, the most controversial figure in the Greek army.

Opposition to the Government had by the 27th given way to more patriotic feelings, and at a dignified session of the Chamber spokesmen of all parties agreed that public controversy over Greek claims was harmful, there was general approval for a declaration that the whole Greek people were united in supporting the efforts which the Government and the Greek delegation were about to make to obtain satisfaction for Greece at the Peace Conference.

The question of public security occupies a place second only to national claims in the public mind. In Macedonia the gendarmerie have been placed under army command, and in a series of combined operations the two forces have killed or captured several prominent Left-wing bandits, including the ex-ELAS "Capetan Baroutas," who was responsible for the Litochori incident on the 30th March (see Summary No. 339) and for many murders of nationalists in western Macedonia. The activities of Left-wing and autonomist bands have showed no sign of slackening, however, and there have been more than usually credible reports of the reconstitution of ELAS; speaking to the press on the 20th, M. Theotokis stated that the number of armed bands had jumped from 66 in May to 78 in June. The most disquieting feature of the situation, and the one which is now most widely commented on in the Athens press, is the evidence which it seems to provide of a carefully prepared plan of action designed to present Greece as in a state of anarchy. Documents captured on dead or arrested bandits, presumably genuine, establish beyond doubt the connection of the Greek communist party, via the NOF—Macedonian Autonomy Movement—with Yugoslavia, and responsible Ministers have stated publicly that the bands operating in Greece are being supplied with arms "from abroad." It seems clear that, as long as physical or moral support from abroad is forthcoming, the Greek communists will not give up their present policy of trying to make the Greek Government's position untenable, however drastic the means used to suppress them. And it is equally clear that the Greek Government, as long as they are not abandoned by their Western Allies, particularly Great Britain, will not be intimidated by incipient revoluiton at home and Slav hostility abroad into throwing in their hand.

Bulgaria.

On the 19th July the Bulgarian Government announced that a plebiscite for or against the Monarchy would be held on the 8th September, and that this would be followed by elections for a Grand National Assembly on the 27th October. Bills incorporating these two decisions have been laid before the Sobranye and are sure to be passed unanimously. It was at first supposed that by the "Grand National Assembly" a mere rubber-stamp constitution-making body was meant, called together ad hoc and lacking any control over the executive. However, this expectation appears to be wrong: for although the full texts of the two bills have not yet been received by H.M. Government, they are now known to provide that when the Grand National Assembly first meets it will automatically take over the functions of the Sobranye (which will ipso facto be dissolved) and that it will retain those same functions for a period not exceeding one year, when fresh parliamentary elections are to be held. Meanwhile the anticipated Republic is to be proclaimed on or before the 15th September, when Vasil Kolarov, as Speaker of the Sobranye, will become the Acting Head of the State.

The purge of the Bulgarian army is well under way, and may by now even be completed. Unconfirmed reports allege that about one officer in every three is being dismissed, and that many have been sent to Russia.

The process of purging Sofia University and the Academy of Arts has also been begun, with a view to tightening the Communists' control over education.

Turkey.

The final result of the general election on the 21st July was: People's Party 396, Democratic Party 62 and Independents 7. President Inönü was returned for Angora, the leader of the Democratic Party (M. Celal Bayar) for Izmir (Smyrna) and Marshal Fevzi Çakmak, as an Independent, for Istanbul. There are reports that at Angora the voting was 80 per cent. for the Democratic Party, but that the Government had no intention of allowing this and therefore faked the counting. In Istanbul, where both voting and counting were perfectly fair, the Armenians and Jews voted solidly for the Democratic Party, but the Greeks' vote was split by the Government's recent concessions to the Greek community. Among the 23 Deputies elected for Istanbul there figure one Greek and one Jew, but no Armenian.

M. Celal Bayar issued a statement charging the Government with committing irregularities, especially in Angora, Izmir and three other towns. Whatever substance there may be in these accusations, it is clear that in any case the Government would have had a large majority. Although all previous general elections have been conducted in two degrees, the actual polling on this occasion appears to have been well managed all over the country. Great enthusiasm, running sometimes into violence, had been engendered on all sides, but on the day of the poll no disorders seem to have occurred. However, after the military commandant of Istanbul had warned the press to avoid inciting to disorder, two minor daily papers which were echoing criticisms from Moscow, were closed down by virtue of the "state of siege" which is still in force in the Straits area.

To suppose that these elections have been as free as those in Western countries would be a big assumption. But in any case the Opposition long desired by the leaders of Turkey for the health of the body politic has now been born. Its size proves, after all, not to be such as need alarm the People's Party thanks to whose complaisance it has come into being. But it is in great measure an artificial creation. The new Democratic Party is at one with the People's Party in matters of foreign policy, and in home affairs it takes no violent exception to the People's Party's programme. The one respect in which it seriously disagrees with the People's Party is that it challenges the privileged position which the latter had acquired by both law and practice. Whether it will develop into an effective Opposition remains to be seen. Meantime it has at any rate canalised in a constitutional direction a certain amount of discontent which had been fostered both by economic hardships and by Russian inspiration. While leaving the Government an overwhelming majority it enables them to refute accusations that they suppress all opposition.

Throughout the election campaign Soviet broadcasts decried the People's Party and backed the Democratic Party, although it had repudiated all sympathy with Moscow and probably suffered, rather than profited, from this unsought support. When all chance of a Democratic victory seemed excluded, the Moscow wireless concentrated on the theme that the elections could not represent the Turkish people's will, because the Government was reactionary—and served those very foreign countries whom Atatürk had fought—and employed the administrative machine to oppress and gag the people. Small incidents which occurred before election day were magnified and distorted to support charges of terrorism, murder, arrests, threats and general coercion, and the votes were alleged to have been given without secrecy and counted without honesty. In commenting on all this Turkish newspapers linked it up with the wider Soviet propaganda offensive in the Middle East. The main attack, they considered, was against the Arab countries, but Turkey and Greece were among the principal objectives. Russian tactics in the Arab countries consisted in fostering resentment against Great Britain and exploiting Anglo-Arab differences. The Turkish elections had seemed to offer another field for propaganda, but Russia had failed to create the trouble she had wished.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Egypt.

During the debate in the Senate on the action taken by the Government to put down Communist activity, the President, Heikal Pasha, unexpectedly intervened with a long statement in which he challenged the right of the Government to suppress newspapers except in cases where it was necessary for the protection of social order. Sidky Pasha replied on the 23rd July promising to examine the question and to present legislation in due course to cover such cases. He said, however, that he did not consider that the Government had gone beyond the limits of their constitutional rights.

The optimism expressed by Sidky Pasha about the Treaty negotiations in his statement to the Senate on the 15th July (see Summary No. 351) has been followed by a period of depression. The main obstacles to agreement now are the scope and nature of the obligations of the parties in the event of an outbreak of hostilities involving either of them; the setting of a time-limit for evacuation, and the terms of the protocol regarding the Sudan. The predominant fear on the Egyptian side is that Egypt might be dragged into a war which she could otherwise avoid, but it is hoped that argument will result in a more realistic attitude and in the acceptance of provisions designed to obviate the risk of a vacuum created by premature withdrawal of British forces.

Palestine.

Proposals for the future of Palestine resulting from the Anglo-American discussions recently concluded in London, will be presented to Parliament during the week. Meanwhile the press in both countries has published articles forecasting a federal solution to be discussed with Jewish and Arab representatives at an early date. The Arab Higher Committee, through its Secretary, Dr. Hussein al Khalidi, has immediately rejected partition as a solution, and, although admitting that no invitation to a conference has been received, proclaims its refusal to sit with Jews in any discussions on Palestine. In accordance with their previous undertaking, His Majesty's Government have now issued invitations to the Governments of the States members of the Arab League to send a delegation to London to enter into negotiations on the subject of Palestine. It is hoped that conversations can take place before the session of the United Nations General Assembly in September. The Arabs of Palestine and the Jews will also be invited to send representatives.

Expressions of horror and grief at the King David Hotel outrage (now known to have caused over one hundred deaths) coming from both Jews and Arabs contain criticisms of the British policy, of which it is alleged to be a result. Azzam Pasha, the Secretary-General of the Arab League, sees an encouragement to the Arabs to use force—which the League is doing its utmost to avoid—and claims that the failure of the British Government to administer the country effectively gives the right more than ever to the Arabs to rule Palestine. Dr. Altman, head of the new Zionist Organisation and the Revisionists in Palestine, alleges that the Government's decision to pursue an anti-Zionist policy has inevitably driven Jewish youth to the conclusion that violence is the only means of securing justice. In his reply to a letter from Dr. Altman, expressing "profound grief" at the outrage, Sir John Shaw, the Secretary of the Palestine Government, said that, according to their own published boast, this revolting crime was perpetrated by the National Military Organisation, which is associated with the New Zionists. In the circumstances he was unable to accept expressions of regret and sympathy which emanated from the central office of the New Zionist Organisation.

In a White Paper published on the 24th July evidence is given of the implication of the Jewish Agency in the previous acts of violence in Palestine which led to the temporary closure of the Agency offices and the arrest of leading officials on the 29th June. The Jewish Agency immediately denied the authenticity of the documents quoted, and challenged the British Government to prove its responsibility for "the composition, authorising or despatch . . . . of this curious collection of telegrams, broadcasts and publications."

Iraq.

A strike of workmen of the 'Iraq Petroleum Company began at Kirkuk on the 3rd July and lasted for fourteen days. The Minister for Economy met the strike leaders on the 7th and told them that the Government would consider their demands sympathetically, but would not countenance disorder. Demonstrations which occurred on the 12th in defiance of the Mutassarif's orders resulted in clashes with the police, and five workmen were killed, in addition to a number of injured on both sides.

The Regent left England on the 23rd July. In a conversation with Mr. Bevin on the 19th July, he spoke of his Government's anxiety over Left-wing activities. The Prime Minister has also expressed his concern (see Summary No. 350), and has had in mind a campaign against partisan newspapers with subversive tendencies. He believes that the Kirkuk strikers were financed from Communist sources. The month of Ramadhan has now begun: fanaticism is intensified during this month of fasting, and feelings are easily aroused by agitators preaching in the mosques. Recent events give some reason to fear a further increase of political unrest in the country.

Persia.

The presence of two of His Majesty's ships in the vicinity of Abadan caused the Persian Government to address a note of protest to His Majesty's Ambassador, in which reference was made to a law of 1934 governing the entry and stay of foreign warships in the coastal waters of Persia. This law requires eight days' warning of visits other than for the purpose of oiling only. The note went on to say that the Persian Government would regard the arrival of British warships at the present time as an unfriendly act. Comments in the Tehran press on the alleged presence of British warships were unanimous in declaring that it was a breach of international regulations and an infringement of Persian sovereignty. The whole topic was dropped, however, after three days.

The situation in Khuzistan remains tense, but there have been no more incidents. The arrest at Agha Jari of one Hafiz Ullah, a Bakhtiari peasant who has been responsible for much of the trouble there, had a good effect, but the Governor-General has been much discouraged by his release in Tehran. A judicial commission of enquiry sent from Tehran to find out the cause of the casualties during the strike has done nothing to restore the situation. It contains at least one Tudeh partisan, against whose presence the Governor-General has protested to the Prime Minister. The A.I.O.C. officials are still apprehensive of further trouble.

The Governor-General of Kermanshah was unexpectedly called to Tehran on the 25th July, and it was expected that he would not return. It is feared that extremists may take advantage of his absence to create disorders in the town and amongst A.I.O.C. employees at the refinery there.

FAR EAST.

Indonesia.

Immediately following the kidnapping of Mr. Sjarir from his hotel in Solo on the 27th June it was announced at Djokjakarta that, in view of the state of emergency, unlimited powers of government had been conferred upon "President" Soekarno to last until conditions should permit the "Cabinet" and other Government Departments to resume their normal functions. A

C266678

"Defence Council" was installed, comprising Mr. Soedirman, Indonesian "Commander-in-Chief," six other Ministers and three "representatives of the people." Both Mr. Sjarir and Mr. Sjarifoedin, his "Minister of Defence," are reported to have been present at the inaugural meeting, which was addressed by Dr. Soekarno. Commenting on the President's speech, the Republican Agency, Antara, is reported as stating "He (Soekarno) desires to remain Dictator only as long as is absolutely necessary . . . . The Cabinet is no longer the "Sjarir Cabinet." The President considers his Ministers to be his helpers. He intends to form a new Cabinet, which he hopes will secure him complete support."

No official announcement has appeared to the effect that Mr. Sjarir has either resigned or been removed from the "Premiership"; but on the 4th July Dr. Soekarno vouchsafed that the release of the Premier did not mean that the President would relinquish "State power" for the time being. Furthermore, at a press interview on the 10th July, Mr. Sjarir, himself, said that "as all power formally lies with Dr. Soekarno, the present Cabinet has virtually ceased to function," adding that he did not expect that Dr. Soekarno would head a new Cabinet, but would appoint him (Mr. Sjarir) to undertake the task and that, in the meantime, he would continue to negotiate with the Dutch authorities as Dr. Soekarno's "personal representative." On the 17th July, the "Free Indonesia" radio reported that Mr. Sjarir had been invited to form a Cabinet; and a week later the Indonesian paper, Merdeka, published an unofficial forecast of the new Cabinet, in which the future Prime Minister is not named, although Mr. Sjarir is named as continuing to hold the portfolio for Foreign Affairs. It is further reported that Mr. Sjarir and a number of others expect to sail from Batavia to Cheribon, en route for Djokjakarta, in the British merchantman Empire Favour, which is carrying a cargo of "inducement goods" required by the Indonesians in exchange for rice which the ship will take back to India.

Although it is reported that the Indonesian reply to the Dutch proposals, which was handed to Dr. van Mook by Mr. Sjarir, contained a request for a truce during the period of negotiations, the Dutch press continues to report sporadic Indonesian attacks on British and Dutch forces. Indonesian reports, on the other hand, complain of Allied aggression. Rakjat draws attention to the continuous inflow of Dutch reinforcements as evidence of the Dutch intention to settle the Indonesian political issue by force of arms rather than by peaceful negotiation. And on the 27th July The Times carried a telegram from Batavia stating that an "official" Indonesian protest had been lodged with the Allies, which contained the threat that, unless a written undertaking were given that Allied troops would cease their offensive actions, the evacuation of internees would be suspended. The telegram further reported that the Indonesians had already begun to carry their threat into practice, and that Allied Headquarters took a serious view of the matter and were taking it up with Mr. Sjarir, who was then in Batavia.

Meanwhile the Conference convened by the Dutch Government to discuss the inclusion of Borneo and the Groote-Oost (north-eastern part of the Archipelago) within the framework of Indonesia and to elect representatives of the territories concerned to sit at the coming Round Table Conference in the Netherlands, has taken place at Malino in the Celebes. Intense antagonism was displayed against the Conference in the Java press, as much as in political circles. The newspaper Merdeka dismissed the Conference as "eye-wash" and declared that all Indonesians who are not "quislings" will repudiate its decisions; while Rakjat in a particularly caustic comment stated that "the world which is witnessing the Indonesian struggle for full independence will not be taken in by this naïve Dutch pantomime." Nevertheless, the Conference was attended by some thirty-four Delegates claiming to represent 15 million people of the Outer Provinces. And, although a number of Delegates spoke in favour of complete independence with a possible alliance with Holland, the result of the Conference has been acclaimed as a triumph in Dutch circles. Generally speaking, it may be said that the Conference showed that the Moslem communities were behind the Republican Government, while the Christian, Chinese, Dyak, Arab, and other minorities inclined towards the security of Dutch protection.

What method was employed for the selection of the Delegates attending the Malino Conference is not clear, but when local councils already existed the Dutch allowed them a free hand. There has been some criticism of the inclusion in their number of five Sultans and nine senior officials of native rulers. The Dutch explanation is that they were the natural choice of the people.

On the 16th July, Dr. van Mook opened the Conference with a long address in which he stressed the following points: the necessity for agreement in the preparatory stages; the need for unity and the creation of as few separate units as possible, since a small autonomous unit lacked the force and man-power to cope with its own affairs; the Dutch Government considered that the three main points essential to the work of construction are rehabilitation of the people, the formation of forces from all sections of the autonomous community which will eventually have to accept the responsibilities attached to self-government, and the economic and cultural development of Indonesia as a whole. Dr. van Mook said that he anticipated the holding of a second Conference with a greater number of Delegates, thus making it possible to select a body representative of all sections of the population of the entire territory to work out a political structure in close consultation with the "General Government Commissariat" for Borneo and the Groote-Oost. In concluding his address Dr. van Mook said that: "Whatever be the new organisation of Indonesia, a large measure of local and regional autonomy will be essential. The choice lies between a single State and a federal system." He added that the Netherlands Government favoured a federal system as being the less likely to result in internal discord; but that it was essential to treat Indonesia as a whole, endeavouring to instil a spirit of harmony and to prevent any single part from dominating another . . . . If, after well-organised democratic consultation, any region of Indonesia should wish to have an organisation of its own, this will be fully taken into account. The Republicans want to begin with an independent Government; the Dutch Government desire to reverse the process, believing that it is in the interest of the population that the building of the Indonesian State should take place "within the precincts of the Kingdom, wherein the Indonesians no longer take part as pupils of the Dutch, but as partners."

In the general discussion which followed Dr. van Mook's address, the Delegates are reported to have ventilated their views freely in an atmosphere unhampered by restraint.

Dr. van Mook, who had intended withdrawing almost immediately after his opening address, suddenly changed his mind and announced his intention of remaining to the end of the Conference "in view of its importance." Replying to speeches in favour of immediate independence, Dr. van Mook said that until such time as a Government had been set up which not only was recognised and obeyed throughout Indonesia, but which was also likely to endure, the Dutch Government neither would nor could abandon their responsibilities to the Indonesian people. In asserting that a five or ten years' period of transition was on the short rather than long side, Dr. van Mook proposed the appointment of a Committee of Seven Delegates for the preparation of constitutional reforms. He also urged that seats on the Committee should be reserved for representatives from Java and Sumatra, should it be found possible to reach agreement with them. The suggestion for a Government Commissariat presided over by the Chief Civil Affairs Officer and advised by the "Committee of Seven" as "Extraordinary Departmental Heads" was also adopted.

On Dr. van Mook's advice a secret session was held to determine if a transition period was necessary and, if so, for what length of time; and to outline the proposed relationship between Indonesia and Holland after expiry of the transition period. The Malino Conference was then brought to a close with the exchange of telegraphic messages of congratulation and goodwill with the Dutch Government on the 25th July, after a number of resolutions had been adopted, the more important of which are:—

The establishment of a federation embracing the whole of Indonesia under the name of the United States of Indonesia.

The proposed Federation to consist of four parts, namely Java, Sumatra, Borneo and the Groote-Oost. The position of the Lesser Soenda Islands, the inclusion of the self-governing territories of East Borneo in the whole of Borneo, and the position of Bangka, Billiton and Riouw to be conditional, depending on their possible inclusion with Sumatra.

To convene as soon as possible a second conference of Delegates selected from all groups of the population of Borneo and the Groote-Oost to deal with proposals for political reform of that territory.

Appointment of a Committee of Seven to work on plan for the political reform of Borneo, the Groote-Oost, Bangka, Billiton and Riouw; and to take part in discussions and the drawing up of necessary ordinances pending the formation of a temporary central parliament. (The exact significance of the use of the word "parliament" is not clear.)

C266680

A motion comprising eight points, urging that import, export, and inter-island trade and shipping be left to private enterprise, and that support be given in these enterprises to Indonesians.

That private enterprises doing business in Indonesia, whether controlled from within or without Indonesia, be staffed by Indonesians.

Before closing the Conference expressed the hope that, for the good of a Greater Indonesia, co-operation with Mr. Sjarir and his followers might speedily be established. Most Dutch newspapers stress the conviction that it was generally agreed among the Delegates to the Conference that a period of transition is essential and that after that period continued co-operation with the Dutch will remain a necessity. It must indeed be a source of considerable satisfaction to the official world at The Hague that, in their freedom from restraint, the Delegates to the Malino Conference should so readily have grasped the wisdom of Dr. van Mook's suggestions.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Although the departure of Mr. Byrnes for Paris on the 27th July was marked by an impressive ceremony which President Truman, Senators Connally and Vandenberg and a host of other eminent Americans attended, the opening of the Peace Conference evoked little optimism in the United States as a whole. Even the liberal internationalists, who had so warmly welcomed the decision to lay the unresolved issues of the peace-making before the full gathering of the twenty-one nations engaged in the war against the Axis, were now inclined to fear that the result might in the end be an unprofitable alignment of the smaller countries behind the conflicting viewpoints of the Great Powers. Characteristic of the reserve which they thus displayed was the remark of Mr. J. Roscoe Drummond, of the Christian Science Monitor, that the meeting was "better than no conference at all, but not much." For their part, the conservatives and Russophobes were more firmly convinced than ever that the Conference would "only continue the Big Four feud." They therefore suggested that the most the Western Powers might hope to achieve would be to make the Russians aware for all time of their determination to face up fairly and squarely to any further Soviet policy of aggression. Commentators were generally agreed that the emphasis given to Soviet-American differences on the eve of the Conference by M. Gromyko's peremptory rejection of the American scheme for the international control of atomic energy, by Mr. Edwin Pauley's two outspoken attacks on the Soviet methods of exacting reparations in Germany and Manchuria and by the State Department's unusually vigorous protest to Moscow on the effect of Soviet depredations in Hungary, in any case hardly augured well for the development of better relations in Paris. (See also under "Soviet Union".)

The news of the bomb outrage at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem on the 22nd July inevitably brought the question of Palestine back into the forefront of press and radio discussion this week. Opinion was almost unanimous in condemning this latest criminal act of the Jewish terrorists, and President Truman's own statement of the 23rd that it might well retard the efforts that were being made to bring about a peaceful solution of the difficult Jewish problem was typical of the reproaches that were heaped upon the perpetrators. Nevertheless it remained as difficult as before to gauge the feelings of the inarticulate mass of non-Jewish Americans on the Palestine question. As was to be expected, the New York Zionists lost no time in injecting every possible element of confusion into the already disordered picture prevailing in the minds of their fellow-countrymen. Unchastened by the shock which the bomb outrage had administered to world opinion, they poured scorn on the evidence in the London White Paper linking members of the Jewish Agency with the terror in Palestine, and the American League for a Free Palestine even delighted in adding insult to injury by publishing photographs of the ruined British headquarters in Jerusalem side-by-side with what purported to be Jewish coffins in Poland under the caption: "Thank Britain for Kielce and King David Hotel." One indication of American sentiment outside the Zionist orbit was, however, provided by the forthright comments of the veteran broadcaster, H. V. Kaltenborn, who, although speaking from New York, did not hesitate even before the White Paper was issued to lay a full share of the responsibility for the bomb outrage of the 22nd on the shoulders of the Jewish Agency. A little of the prevailing attitude among the non-Jewish majority could also be judged from the unwillingness of less partial observers to make common cause with the Zionists against the provincial autonomy pian for Palestine drawn up by the Anglo-American experts in London.

Absorbed as they were in the situation in Palestine and in the preparations for the Paris Conference, and with the rest of their main headlines devoted to the results of the second atomic bomb test at Bikini and to the last round of the Congressional battle on price control in Washington, the newspapers tended to give little more than a passing mention to the announcement on the 25th July of the American intention to withdraw from the International Air Transport Agreement. This apparent indifference was all the more remarkable in view of the keen interest displayed in the original signing of the Agreement at Chicago in December 1944 and in the marked differences between the American and British delegations which had preceded it. According to the announcement of the 25th, the decision to withdraw had been dictated by the failure of the principal aviation Powers to agree multilaterally to the "five freedoms" specified in the Chicago Agreement and by the fact that the conclusion of bilateral arrangements had subsequently proved more satisfactory in the establishment of international air routes over which American companies could operate. Another important consideration, however, appears to have been the refusal of certain Senators to ratify (as they have since done) the International Civil Aviation Organisation—the main creation of the Chicago Conference—as long as the accompanying "five freedoms" Agreement offered foreign signatories unlimited liberty to fly their planes to American airports. In discussing the new decision with His Majesty's Civil Air Attaché in Washington, Mr. Garrison Norton, of the Office of Transport and Communications Policy of the State Department, has expressed the view that the Chicago "five freedoms" Agreement—to which His Majesty's Government have never concealed their strong aversion—had in any case been largely superseded by the decisions of the Bermuda Civil Aviation Conference and of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organisation this year (see Summary No. 331). Mr. Norton nevertheless tempered this gratifying admission of a change in the American viewpoint with a hint that the air negotiations which the United Kingdom had since entered into with Argentina, Eire and Sweden were not regarded in Washington as strictly in accordance with the Bermuda principles and that the terms offered to the United States in respect to India were felt to be more restrictive than those of the Anglo-American Agreement of the 11th February of this year.

At his press conference on the 25th July and in a message to Congress of the same day, the President made it clear that it was only "with reluctance," and after being advised that it was the best measure upon which both Houses could be expected to agree, that he had signed the compromise Control Bill which might free the American public from the orgy of rising rents and prices through which it had passed since the beginning of the month. Mr. Truman objected in particular—as did the majority of American liberals—to the clauses in the new legislation transferring the control of farm produce from the Office of Price Administration to the Department of Agriculture and authorising the establishment of a three-member board to decide before the 20th August whether maximum prices for meat, poultry, cereals, tobacco and petroleum should be restored. In his message of the 25th he took the opportunity of reading to members of Congress what might be construed as a lesson on their irresponsible handling of the bulk of his legislative programme during the past six months in that he expressed his profound regret that they had not refrained "from compelling administrative changes that will make our task more difficult" and reminded them that "good government requires that a law be administered consistently in all fields where it is applicable."

LATIN AMERICA.

Argentina.

The administrative confusion, described as worse than anything previously experienced (see last week's Summary), continues to affect the Anglo-Argentine negotiations. For lack of guidance, the Ministers are incapable of making binding decisions, and there is a general atmosphere of uncertainty about who is empowered to do what. The Argentine Government have retreated from their (implied) intention to buy the British-owned railways, but their attempt to insist on treatment of sterling balances in isolation from other subjects before proceeding further has been successfully resisted. It unfortunately appears that one of their main objects is to profiteer at the expense of the hungry countries, for the purpose of subsidizing the local cost of living.

One thing that may upset Argentine complacency is the recent revolution in Bolivia. In Congress the Argentine opposition were quick to present a motion hailing the revolution in the name of democracy, and Radical speakers described at length those features of the fallen Bolivian régime which might provide an advantageous parallel with Argentina. Government speakers secured the postponement of the motion, arguing that the nature of the new Bolivian Government was still not clear and expressing suspicion that it might have been engineered by the Bolivian tin-magnates in league with Mr. Spruille Braden (!).

Bolivia.

The situation is now quiet. The revolutionary junta issued a declaration on the 22nd July declaring that it would respect the country's obligations and would hold elections as soon as indispensable reforms could be made in the electoral laws. Two days later the junta took the form of a Provisional Government. The President of the junta, Dr. Nestor Guillen, dean of the Superior Court of La Paz, took over the portfolios of Defence and Agriculture; Dr. Cabrera García, a magistrate, that of Interior; Dr. Aniceto Solares, those of Foreign Affairs and Education; Professor Luis Gonsálvez, those of Finance and National Economy; and Sr. Aurelio Alcoba (of PIR) those of Labour and Public Health.

The new Minister of Foreign Affairs addressd a note to all foreign missions stating that the Provisional Government would continue to maintain existing relations. The Diplomatic Body agreed that there is so far no evidence that the Provisional Government can maintain public order, and decided to request that the latter should make arrangements for the safe departure of the numerous refugees at the missions. This in itself will provide a test of the junta's power to keep order. Since the destruction of the military police in the fighting the junta has been relying on armed students to do their work.

Mexico.

The elections of the 7th July (see Summary No. 351) resulted in the election as president of Sr. Miguel Alemán, the candidate of the Government Party, (Partido Revolucionario Institucional). Sr. Alemán will take office on the 1st December for six years.

Though the elections were unusually peaceful (the Army having been given the task of guarding the polls), there is no reason to suppose that they were more honest than usual. Sr. Alemán's rival, Dr. Padilla, has denounced the results as fraudulent, but, since as he might well have lost even if they had not been fraudulent, his denunciation has not attracted much attention. Nevertheless, in the elections for Congress, the Government party may be said to have done itself unusually proud. Padilla's Partido Democratico, the Conservative Acción Nacional and the Synarchists all expected some representation, but it appears that the PRI candidates have almost all been returned. Although it was generally believed that the opposition parties had elected several representatives in the Federal District, the "results" gave the PRI handsome majorities. Since the Government, the labour bosses and business interests had agreed on the desirability of Sr. Alemán, the voting may be regarded as a formality.

Licenciado Miguel Alemán, who is forty-four years old, is the first Mexican president for some time who cannot boast the title of general. The omission is partially repaired by the fact that his father, formerly the owner of a grocery store, became a general in the Mexican revolution and was killed in the revolution of 1923. The present Sr. Alemán studied law, and was appointed a Supreme Court Judge, becoming in 1930 a Senator for Veracruz on the recommendation of Portes Gil. Still patronised by Portes Gil, Alemán was in 1936 Governor of Veracruz (where he built up a useful political machine) and in 1939 was recommended as campaign manager to Avila Camacho, on whose election to the presidency he became Minister of Interior. Sr. Alemán's record in that position was not conspicuously pro-Allied, and the escape of various German internees suggested that there might be something in a name. However, Sr. Alemán's politics are largely a matter of convenience. His election on such a broad ticket could, of course, only be achieved by the issue of rather conflicting promises, but, as long as no improvement in the general standard of Mexican public probity is looked for, these may be reconciled.

Paraguay.

Paraguay is for the moment the only country in South America with a military dictatorship, and pressure has been brought to bear on President Morínigo for a return to constitutional Government. He himself is reported to be seeking a compromise so that he may remain in power presiding over a cabinet in which the liberals (Colorados) and followers of Colonel Franco would be represented. There are broadcast reports that the new cabinet will be formed this week.

The only Latin American state in which an Indian language predominates, Paraguay has a population of about a million in her area of 154,000 square miles. Though, like Bolivia, she is land-locked, she has access by river to the Plate estuary, and does not therefore entertain Bolivia's ambition for a sea-port. Possibly owing to the theocratic tradition of the Jesuit reductions, the Guaranis accept a paternalistic form of Government. Thus having rejected union with the provinces of La Plata in 1811, the Paraguayans tolerated the dictatorships of Rodríguez Francia from 1813 to 1840, Carlos Antonio López from 1840 to 1862, and Francisco Salano López from 1862 till 1870, without undergoing any of the democratic or constitutional tribulations experienced in the rest of the continent. However, the military megalomania of the second López turned Paraguay into a South American Prussia, and led him into an expansionist war with Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay (1865–1870), by the end of which Paraguay's population was halved. Its territory was also considerably reduced, and would have been still further had not Brazil, having taken her cut, resisted Argentina's demands. There followed half a century of "democracy" accompanied by corruption and rebellions. An improvement occurred with the régime of President Eligio Ayala (1924 to 1928), but towards the end of his régime the question of the ill-defined Chaco boundary with Bolivia was raised, and despite attempts at arbitration by Pan American and League of Nations representatives, a series of frontier clashes degenerated into war in July 1932. By 1934 both sides were exhausted; Paraguay held most of the disputed territory and had suffered less in casualties, her Indians being more suited to jungle conditions than those of the Bolivian highlands, but she could not pursue the war into Bolivian territory, though some officers, notably Colonel Rafael Franco, were willing to try. After the truce of 1935, the moderate Paraguayan Government was overthrown and Franco brought in as provisional president. Franco proposed a sweeping reform including expropriation of land for family smallholdings and nationalisation of natural and industrial wealth. This programme proved too radical for the conservatives and too authoritarian for the liberals, and Franco was forced to resign in August 1937, after eighteen months in power.

A liberal provisional junta then governed the country until the election as president of General Estigarribia, who had been commander-in-chief during the Chaco war. In August 1940 a new constitution was promulgated, but immediately after, Estigarribia was killed in an aeroplane accident. Congress appointed the Minister of War, General Higinio Morínigo, as provisional president. Though he at first promised elections, he quickly assumed dictatorial powers, and dissolved the liberal party for "treason." He was then elected President in 1943, a feat which was much simplified by the fact that there were no other candidates.

Since then Paraguay has been governed by General Morínigo on behalf of the army, the civilian ministers remaining in office just so long as they retained the confidence of the soldiers. During 1945, the Opposition and labour movement seems to have been strengthened by the rising cost of living, and President Morínigo's invitation to Uruguayan journalists to inspect his concentration camps was hardly a success. However, difficulties for the Government have recently come from the other side, the Commanders of the Cavalry Division (Colonel Benítez Vera) and of the Air Force (Lieut.-Col. Stagni) being much more totalitarian-minded than Morínigo himself. Morínigo appointed the swashbuckling Benítez Vera to go to President Peron's inauguration, and sought in his absence to persuade the cavalry to do without their commander. Benítez Vera at once flew back and attempted to stage a revolution. When this failed, he tried to represent to Morínigo that he had only desired to restore his authority in the president's interests. This excuse was not accepted, and Benítez Vera and Stagni were compelled to go into exile. Their disappearance seems to have led to the removal of their civilian friends in the Cabinet, and, the balance being destroyed, the liberals and Franquists have now demanded representation.

UNITED NATIONS.

Atomic Energy Commission.

At a meeting of the Committee No. 2 on the 24th July, M. Gromyko made a speech strongly critical of the so-called U.S. third memorandum and amounting to a refusal to accept it as a whole or in part. The memorandum had urged among other things that the body controlling atomic energy would need certain specified powers not given by the Charter to any organ of the United Nations. It also insisted that, while there should be no interference with the powers given to the Security Council, it would be ridiculous to exempt a possible atomic aggressor from punitive action and to leave such retribution partly to the conscience of the Power in question.

The Soviet argument was the now familiar one that the existing organs of the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council, contained all powers necessary for the control of atomic energy. The U.S. proposal to create a new authority was therefore unnecessary. It was also an attempt, by excluding atomic development from the range of domestic concerns governed by article 2, para. 7 of the Charter, to infringe the sovereignty of member States. This principle of sovereignty, he said, was of the essence of the United Nations. Any attack upon it might well destroy the organisation itself. At San Francisco it was safeguarded by the rule of the unanimity of the permanent members, or, as it is generally known, the veto.

The Chairman pointed out that the atomic bomb had not burst upon the world at the time of San Francisco. In any system of control all States must be treated alike, and none enjoy the immunity which the veto gives to the five permanent members. When the same Committee met on the 26th, M. Gromyko put forward the Soviet plan for a Convention to outlaw the use of atomic weapons, and for the destruction of existing bombs. The Netherlands representative told the sad story of broken conventions and declared that the weakness of the Soviet plan lay in placing the outlawry and destruction of bombs before the establishment of the system of control. The United States representative thought that there was no disagreement on fundamental principles between the Soviet and U.S. Governments, but that there might be some disagreement about when existing bombs should be destroyed.

The Commission's Scientific and Technical Sub-Committee held its first informal meeting on the 25th, and the U.K. representative, Sir George Thomson, described it as successful on the whole.

Economic and Social Council.

The Temporary sub-Commission on the Economic Reconstruction of Devastated Areas held its first meeting at the premises of the Royal Empire Society in London on the 29th July. It is the present expectation that, after sitting for a week in London, delegates will go in field parties to Eastern and Western Europe, returning to London to consider their report, which must be submitted to the Council not later than the 2nd September. Twenty Nations are represented on the sub-Commission, including (from the British Commonwealth) Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. (See Summary No. 348, under "United Nations.")

The General Assembly.

The Acting Secretary-General has officially stated that the "General Assembly will be convened for the second part of the first session on the 23rd September at Flushing Meadows, New York City." As a consequence the Committee which will consider applications for membership of the United Nations has been postponed for three weeks and applications will, it is understood, be accepted up to and including August 3rd.

The Secretary-General.

Mr. Trygve Lie has been invited to attend the Peace Conference "as an honoured guest and observer" (see under "Soviet Union").

International Health Conference.

Under a resolution of the Economic and Social Council, dated 15th February 1946, a preliminary technical conference was held in Paris between the 18th March and the 5th April to prepare for an international health conference at which a World Health Organisation should be established. The proposal to hold this Conference was approved by the Economic and Social Council on the 10th June, and invitations to attend the Conference as observers were issued to sixteen States not Members of the United Nations, to three Allied Commissions, and to ten international Organisations interested in Public Health.

The International Health Conference met at New York between the 19th June and the 22nd July, to consider the report of the preliminary technical conference on the proposed Constitution of the World Health Organisation including the terms on which existing international health organisations should be brought within its scope, and also to consider the Economic and Social Council's resolution of the 10th June which contained certain recommendations.

That a World Health Organisation should be set up, to take over the duties, powers and facilities of existing international health bodies and, where necessary, to extend their work, has been common ground since "Health" was written into the Charter of the United Nations at San Francisco. The chief questions calling for debate have arisen over the form this organisation should take and in particular its relations to the international bodies already in existence.

International action to organise sanitary measures against the spread of plague and other infectious diseases (e.g. in the Mecca pilgrimage) dates from 1831, and the measures then taken at the request of the Khedive, Mohammed Ali, have developed into the present Sanitary Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt. Throughout the nineteenth century, many conferences were held, and in 1907 the Office International d'Hygiène Publique was set up in Paris. It became a clearing-house for epidemiological information on the incidence, treatment and control of plague, cholera, typhus, yellow fever and small-pox and it has also tried to get rules internationally agreed to prevent such diseases being transmitted by air passengers who may arrive before the symptoms declare themselves. One of the chief tasks of the Paris Office was the administration of the various International Sanitary Conventions; during the war it was unable to fulfil this task, but temporary protocols were signed after discussion at the UNRRA Council at Atlantic City in 1946, extending the life of the Conventions, and empowering UNRRA to administer them pending the establishment of the World Health Organization.

Alongside this international technical body, the Health Organisation of the League of Nations came into being in 1921. Working in close touch with the chief national health administrations, including that of the U.S.A. and with the Office International, it continued and expanded the principles of the ad hoc Epidemic Commission set up in 1920 to combat the threatened westward spread of typhus in Europe. It had a forward post in the Far East at Singapore, where an epidemiological centre was opened in 1925. The League Health Organisation also collaborated with Governments to initiate medical research and to arrange combined work by institutes throughout the world.

The regional centre of co-ordination and information in the field of public health for the twenty-one American Republics is the Pan-American Sanitary Bureau, which dates from 1901. Its work in the Americas is linked with that of the Office International d'Hygiène Publique in Paris, and with that of the League Health Organisation.

These arrangements by no means represent a complete or streamlined world organisation to deal with all the problems likely to arise. Moreover, in the nature of things, many of the diseases and the conditions affecting them which require international action are localised in certain areas, so that regional questions are bound to loom large.

Little difficulty was found in agreeing that the World Health Organisation should be a specialised agency, autonomous in its own field, with its own General Assembly and its own Director General, and that regional offices and committees of the organisation should be set up, wherever needed, but only one for each specified area. The main subjects for debate turned on the constitutional question of the degree of independence to be accorded to the regional bodies, and on the allied question of how various territories, widely different in social and political conditions, were to be represented at the centre and in the regions. This main question appeared in several forms, complicated by special circumstances in each case.

Disease knows no frontiers and medical science should recognise none; but opinions may (and do) differ as to what is proper and practicable in world and regional organisation: whether the existing organisations should retain some or all of their separate identity, how territories which have their own health problems and services are to be represented at the centre and in the regions, whether non-self-governing countries are to be represented directly or are to rely on their parent States (not necessarily in direct touch with local health matters) to speak for them, singly or in groups.

The course of the discussions may be illustrated by three examples:—

(a) Most of the delegations were willing to have the headquarters of the World Health Organisation in Europe, many of them favouring Paris. A decision in this sense would delight the French, who though willing to see the Office International d'Hygiène Publique absorbed into the World Health Organisation would welcome the prestige to be derived from Paris becoming the world's health capital. The view of the U.K. Delegation, however, was that headquarters should be near or at those of the United Nations. The question has been left open.

(b) The chief regional body to be brought within the ambit of the W.H.O. is the Pan-American Sanitary Bureau. A stubborn fight was put up to retain the practical independence of this body and to avoid any commitment as to when, if at all, it should be integrated in the W.H.O. The divided interest of the U.S. was revealed by the contrast between the strong regionalism of Dr. Thomas Parran, president of the Pan-American Bureau and concurrently leader of the American Delegation in New York, and the wider outlook of the State Department revealed when representations in regard to Dr. Parran's attitude were made by His Majesty's Embassy, Washington, at the request of the U.K. Delegation. The outcome of this test case was an agreement that the integration of Pan-American, as a regional body of W.H.O., should be effected "in due course" and, by implication, that the principle of regions being subordinate to the centre should be preserved.

(c) The Chinese delegation proposed that all colonies should be "Associate" (i.e. non-voting) members of the World Health Assembly at headquarters. The United Kingdom, whilst preferring that such territories could more effectively be represented at the regional level, supported the Chinese proposal, but pointed out certain practical difficulties. The Dominions and France strongly supported regional representation only. The Liberian delegate successfully added a rider to the effect that the representatives "should" be "natives" of such territories. In the end, "associate" membership was accepted.

The legal nexus between the W.H.O. and the United Nations is a further question of some moment, at least in the United Kingdom view. Much would be gained and a useful precedent set if the World Health Organisation were set up by a resolution of the U.N. Assembly. Nevertheless, the urgency of getting a world organisation to work in health matters over-rides other considerations, and this point has not been insisted on for the present.

The outcome of the International Health Conference is the approval of a Constitution for the future W.H.O. The Organisation itself has not yet been established, but an Interim Commission. to proceed at once with pressing business and to prepare for the first World Health Assembly (probably in November), has been appointed and has held its first meeting. It will next meet in Geneva in November. Meanwhile it has set up three Committees to consider urgent problems.

It is interesting to note that the U.S.S.R. attended the Conference and that throughout these discussions, the Russians have been co-operative and understanding, and have spoken strongly in favour of a single world organisation though a danger has been sensed that in the event of regional organisations being set up they might be tempted to claim Eastern Europe as the field for a regional organisation under their control.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Paris Peace Conference, that witness to the patience and persistence of the four Foreign Ministers, opened on the afternoon of Monday, the 29th July, in the Luxembourg Palace. M. Bidault, Prime Minister of France, welcomed the delegates. With that French genius for clarity, or the elimination of the inconvenient, he attributed the short life of the Versailles Treaty to the absence of Russia from the Conference table and the abstention of America from the Settlement. Both Powers were present to-day, and the United Nations were already organised. The prospects of this Second Paris Conference were bright. And yet M. Bidault's first proposal, that a Committee on procedure should meet at the same time as the Plenary Conference, at once raised the whole question of the rights of the twenty-one nations. It will be remembered that the Russians had insisted on the Foreign Ministers of the Four Powers drawing up rules to guide the procedure of the Twenty-One (see Summary 350 under "The Paris Conference"). For instance, recommendations from the Plenary Conference to the Big Four, who are to make the final draft of the treaties, require a two-thirds majority. Thus there was a likelihood of a big Power with its friends or satellites being able to nullify the wishes of the majority, and to hold up proceedings by a kind of veto process. At the same time, the draft rules of procedure laid it down that the Twenty-One could suspend or change the rules.

Dr. Evatt of Australia objected to M. Bidault's proposal on the ground that procedure was so important that the chief delegates would wish to attend the committee. This they could not do if Committee and Conference sat simultaneously. Mr. Byrnes supported him, and it was agreed that the Committee should sit at 10·0 a.m., the Conference at 4·0 p.m. on the 30th. Dr. Evatt declared in strong terms his preference for voting by simple majority. He would rather have no voting at all than the two-thirds majority of the draft rules.

On the face of it, the Twenty One have only the right to discuss, and to make recommendations which the Big Four are at liberty to reject. Messrs. Bevin's and Byrnes' undertaking, given on the 8th July, to support the major decisions of the Conference of Foreign Ministers, seems to have reduced the scope of the Twenty-One still further. On the other hand, when France agreed to the Moscow decisions of December 1945 which named the Twenty-One and stated that the draft treaties should be submitted to them, Mr. Byrnes promised on behalf of the U.S., U.K. and U.S.S.R., that "no final treaty would be concluded which arbitrarily rejected the recommendations of the Conference." In the background is the principle, familiar in the constitutional history of this country, and fundamental to all responsible government, that "what touches all must be approved by all." Mr. Bevin relied on it on the 9th October 1945, when explaining the failure of the London Conference :—"the difference of view with the Soviet delegation involved" he said "a big question of principle, to what extent are the Big Three to exclude other nations from the discussion of matters of grave concern to them?" Australia and S. Africa were acting on the same principle when they had claimed, a few days earlier, on the 26th September, that nations which had shared in the war had a right to share in making the peace. It was appropriate that the Australian, Dr. Evatt, should be the first to champion the principle at the Peace Conference.

In the absence of Mr. Bevin who has been ordered a complete rest, Mr. Attlee leads the U.K. delegation. Mr. A. V. Alexander, Mr. Glenvil Hall and Mr. Hector McNeil accompany him. The French delegates under M. Bidault's lead are M. Schneiter, General Catroux, M. Massigli, M. Henri Bonnet, M. Couve de Murville and M. Alphand. Mr. Byrnes leads the American delegation, which includes Mr. Averell Harriman and Mr. Bedell Smith. On the Soviet delegation are Messrs. Molotov, Vyshinski, Gusev, Bogomolov, and Novikov, the Ambassador to U.S.A. M. Spaak leads a particularly well-equipped Belgian delegation. M. Jan Masaryk leads the Czechoslovak delegation. There are five Greek delegates, led by M. Tsaldaris. M. Kiselev, Minister of Foreign Affairs leads the ByeloRussian delegation, M. Manuilski the Ukrainian, M. Rzymowski the Polish. The Yugoslavs have as many as 137 persons all told in their delegation.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

AT the Control Council Meeting of the 30th July the French representative was unable to give any reply to the American proposal for economic union between two or more zones. Marshal Sokolovsky, although more subdued in his criticism than might have been expected, said that the proposal bore no relation to the achieving of economic unity, since this could not be brought about by splitting Germany into two or three parts. He regretted that political unity was not mentioned. The Soviet Authorities, he maintained, had always intended to achieve economic unity by means of inter-zonal collaboration and desired the growth of inter-zonal trade, thus assisting in the creation of central German administrations. The Control Council agreed to study means to increase inter-zonal trade, it being pointed out by General McNarney that this was not inconsistent with economic union of two zones. Marshal Sokolovsky's strange confusion of economic unity with mere inter-zonal barter may be read in conjunction with an article in Pravda International Review of the 14th July, which stated that Germany could only achieve economic unity under a central Government, the pre-conditions of which were democratisation and the creation of a central administration. This gives some idea of the likely Russian time-table in which it seems that inter-zonal trade would have to suffice until central administrations, satisfactory to the Russians, were in a position to organise the political and economic unity of Germany.

The Control Council on the 30th July decided also the terms of reference for the Coal Committee (see last week's Summary). The British representative stated that, while the Soviet proposals were not unreasonable, they affected the principle of the responsibility of Zone Commanders for their Zone and would thus give rise to discussion on subjects other than coal. that the Committee should issue a preliminary report for submission to the Council of Foreign Ministers by the 1st September and a final report by the 10th October. Investigations will be made on any necessary points in the Soviet proposal, but they will be based on the proposal of the other three Powers and will, in any case, be confined to technical matters. Following the Select Committee's recommendation that coal exports from the British zone should be decreased, the Zonal Economic Advisory Board has given warning that political chaos can be expected if the zone does not receive more coal. Nevertheless, His Majesty's Government have decided that, in view of political repercussions, no change in exports will be made at present, but the matter will be considered again before the October allocations are made.

Dr. Amelunxen (CDU), formerly Oberpräsident of Westphalia, has been appointed to the corresponding post for North-Rhineland–Westphalia. Lippe Diet on the 29th July protested against the incorporation of their state in Hanover. Comment on the new state has been mixed. The Communists, greatly indignant, refer to it as the first step towards a federal Germany, whereas Christian Democrats have so far given unanimous approval and the Social Democrats appear divided in their opinions. According to Hamburg radio, Schumacher, writing in the British zone weekly Die Welt, suggests that all the rest of the zone should form a single state; this is a reversal of his earlier ideas recorded in Summaries Nos. 350 and 352. This would entail, he says, a change in the set up of Germany, which while making the struggle for German unity extremely difficult, would make it easier than if some outsize states existed alongside those that were too small. He also declared that there was a danger in too many parliamentary institutions, since people might tire of a system in which there were too many elections. He contended that the "primitive egotism" of states would have to be counteracted by the Reich which in turn would have to yield some of its authority to an international order.

The Central Office for Food and Agriculture and the Central Economic Office in the British zone have been given some executive responsibilities, thus bringing them more in line with corresponding German authorities in the US zone, although even now Germans have far fewer responsibilities in the British than in the US zone. A Zonal Economic Council has been set up in the US zone composed merely of the three State Ministers of Economic Affairs. It will co-operate with the Central Economic Office in the British zone. This council, together with the Special Delegate for Food and the Special Delegate for Price Control, who have wide powers over the whole zone, increases the degree of centralisation in the US zone.

The SED offensive in the US zone has been launched by Fechner and Ulbricht, who spoke in Munich on the 29th July. A joint SPD/KPD Committee formed to organise the visit was prohibited by the military authorities, but some SPD members attended the meeting. In contrast to Pieck's statement that Germany must accept her losses in the East (see last week's Summary), Ulbricht declared that the party had not yet determined its attitude towards the Eastern Frontier. The Munich branch of the KPD was suspended for seven days after the meeting for repeatedly disobeying Military Government regulations. In Hesse, Hans Venedey, Minister of the Interior, has been dismissed following his expulsion from the SPD. He is in favour of fusion with the KPD.

Further details are now available of election procedure in the Russian zone. Under a new election order in Thuringia men and women will vote separately in some constituencies. It is hoped that the results will give a conclusive picture of political trends among women. This is an infringement of the principle of universal secret ballot and if extended to other groups of the population might well make nonsense of the ballot system. Prisoners of war returning from Russia are to be allowed to vote. The SED are taking full credit for this concession, thus hoping to win support from another group of the population besides those already members of the party or belonging to the Communist-controlled "non-party" organisations. An interesting indication of conditions in the zone was given by Bechler, Vice-President of Brandenburg, when welcoming the prisoners of war. He sought to forestall criticism of dismantling operations by saying that there was no unemployment and industrial production was rising daily. Prisoners would hear too frequently people in food queues grumbling at those who had achieved reconstruction, but if the harvest continues normally they could expect a good crop although they had "no horses, no tractors, nothing. Our people have had to dig the fields with spades because they had no ploughs."

German opinion on the South Schleswig problem (see Summary No. 347) is crystallising rapidly. The provincial leaders of the main parties are unanimous in denouncing separatist tendencies. The line generally taken by the left wing is that inhabitants of South Schleswig who desire union with Denmark are composed of Fascists or reactionaries who seek to escape justice in Germany. The resentment felt over the food parcels, sent from Denmark to the South Schleswig Association (see below), is summed up by a Conservative resolution: "Bacon is used to catch mice, but to try to use it for enticing German citizens . . . . is an endeavour which is a slap in the face for every conception of honour." The local population, however, have not remained impervious to the attractions of the South Schleswig Association, and some party members, particularly among the SPD have joined the Association. For instance, the Flensburg branch of the SPD recently rejected a resolution against separatism which declared the 1920 frontier to be just and final.

The South Schleswig Association applied for recognition in August as the organisation protecting the interest of citizens of Danish descent. Since then considerable dispute has arisen over the terms of its statute and has not yet been resolved. The military authorities have declared that membership must be restricted to persons, or their descendants, who joined before the 1st January, 1946, or who were already members of the sixty other Danish organisations in the area. This provision, designed to prevent the infiltration of a large number of Germans who joined out of self-interest, has not yet been accepted by the Association, though non-acceptance could of course entail dissolution. Unfortunately the Association in its eagerness to extend its membership has not kept a careful check on entrants, one of whom was recently discovered to be a high-ranking SS man who had escaped from a British internment camp. The authorities have also stated that the Association must restrict itself to cultural and social activities, although members may stand as independent candidates in the local elections. This again has not proved acceptable and the Association has not yet presented its statutes to the authorities although ordered to do so by the 30h July.

The quadripartite Displaced Persons Directorate agreed on the 29th July to transfer to Germany those refugees in Denmark who previously lived within the present German frontiers. No decision has been taken on the graver problem of those Germans who came from the Eastern territories.

AUSTRIA.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 2nd August, Mr. Noel-Baker made a statement on the policy of His Majesty's Government towards Austria which should help to allay the anxiety aroused in Austria by Mr. Bevin's speech on the 25th July (see last week's Summary). Mr. Noel-Baker emphasised that His Majesty's Government had subscribed to the Moscow Declaration of October, 1943 and to the Control Agreement signed on the 28th June, 1946, which stated that one of the primary tasks of the Allied Commission for Austria should be to "maintain the independent existence and integrity of the Austrian State and, pending the final definition of its frontiers, to ensure respect for them as they were on December 31st, 1937." His Majesty's Government had for some time done their best to secure a treaty with Austria to end the occupation and in the meantime to reduce the effect of the boundaries between the zones. They would regard as a matter of grave concern any action which might intensify the effect of the division of Austria into zones, the more so if such action "appeared likely to infringe the internal or external integrity of Austria which all the four occupying powers have agreed to maintain."

There has been a little progress on the way to Austria's goal of full sovereignty. The Allied Commanders-in-Chief have taken the title of "High Commissioners" in accordance with the new Control Agreement: the Diplomatic Representatives of the occupying powers will shortly take the position of accredited Ministers in Vienna: and it was announced on the 29th July that, except for the legal, security and education departments, more than fifty per cent. of the British Civil Affairs officers are to leave Styria. It is reported from Styria, however, that these changes have made little impression there. It is generally assumed that the situation is little changed, that the same people will carry out the same jobs though under different names, and the disappointment felt at the failure of the Foreign Ministers to reach any decision on Austria has contributed to this lack of enthusiasm.

Mr. La Guardia, Director-General of U.N.R.R.A., has had talks with the Austrian Chancellor and some of his Ministers. He announced that U.N.R.R.A. relief for Austrian industry would start soon. His statements at a press conference on German assets and displaced persons (he described the Communist figure of 437,000 displaced persons in U.N.R.R.A. camps as a "misprint," saying that the real number in camps was 43,700) have aroused criticism from the Red Army paper Oesterreichische Zeitung, which said that his remarks were "a gross refutation of the allegation that U.N.R.R.A. was non-political," and praise from the Socialist Arbeiterzeitung, which hailed Mr. La Guardia as a "fighter for democracy."

The Austrian Trades Union Federation has been invited to send a delegation to Moscow. The delegation, which will leave on the 20th August, will consist of four Socialist members, two People's Party, and two Communist.

An extraordinary meeting of the Allied Council was held on the 2nd August, at which General Kourasov, the Russian High Commissioner, proposed a resolution to the effect that the Allied Council considered that the Austrian Government and Parliament had infringed the new Control Agreement by their action in presenting and approving the Nationalisation Bill (see Summaries No. 352 and No. 353) without the previous written consent of the Allied Council. General Kourasov proposed therefore that the law should be vetoed by the Allied Council. The main Soviet argument is that as the law deals with assets claimed as German by the Russians, it deals with one of those matters reserved in the Control Agreement for direct control by the Allied Council. The French member of the Council agreed that some of the firms listed in the Bill are undoubtedly German assets, and may support the Soviet wish to veto it when the subject comes up for renewed discussion at the next meeting of the Allied Council. Under the Control Agreement, however, any law which is not constitutional comes into force thirty-one days after it has been submitted by the Austrian Government to the Allied Council, unless it is vetoed unanimously by the four members of the Council.

At the end of July the Italian Government informed His Majesty's Government that the Prefect of Bolzano had received a written statement signed by leaders of the People's Party in the South Tyrol, saying that in consequence of the Foreign Ministers' decision on the South Tyrol the People's Party would no longer request local plebiscites, would collaborate with the Italian Government in settling local problems, and had already helped in the drawing up of the autonomy plan envisaged by the Italian Government. This surprising apparent reversal of South Tyrol People's Party policy is in contrast to other reports of continued resistance to the decision of the Foreign Ministers. A large meeting of South Tyrolese was held in Innsbruck on the 31st July and adopted a resolution of protest to be sent to the Peace Conference at Paris.

The People's Party newspaper in Vienna has vigorously attacked the "one-sided and unbridled control" by Social Democrats in the Vienna Town Hall. The clash between Socialist Vienna and the mainly Christian Socialist provinces was of course one of the features of pre-Anschluss political life.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The National Court in Prague, which observers praise as being notably impartial, has announced its verdict on the trials of some former members of the Protectorate Government. The Court's decisions are remarkable in their clemency, particularly at a time when the passing of the death sentence has become an almost daily occurrence in the capitals of Europe. The sentences passed on the 31st July, and which caused so much surprised comment, are as follows: Krejči, ex-Prime Minister and Minister of Justice, 25 years' imprisonment; Bienert, last Protectorate Premier, 3 years; Hruby, Minister of Agriculture, a life term; Kamenický, Minister of Transport, 5 years. Dr. Kalfus, Minister of Finance, was acquitted. The Communist press was quick to attack the Court for its mildness and asks: "The National Court has passed its verdict. Are the sentences really the judgment of the nation?" The Partisans' Organisation declared itself outraged by the disproportionally mild sentences and accused the examining authorities of "gross negligence in collecting incriminating evidence." Other party organs, however, accept the verdicts as proof that the Court is independent and that Czechoslovak Justice remains serenely unaffected by the opinions of the Government and the political parties, all of which expected harsher treatment.

The mixed Czechoslovak-Hungarian commission sitting at Starý Smokovec reached an agreement in the last week of July, after a month's deliberations, on problems arising out of the proposed population transfer. The transferees, both Slovak and Magyar, will be allowed to take as much of their movable property as they desire, provided the planned economy of the State is not affected; they may take property coming under the latter qualification sufficient to last one year; immovable property will be compensated at rates valid in Czechoslovakia. A commission of financial experts will take further decisions regarding the transfer of money, jewellery and objects of historic and artistic value.

Slovakia, which is now coming more frequently into the news, has recently been toured by a group of Czech journalists who confirm that conditions in this part of the Republic are remarkably quiet, despite some clashes between the defeated Communists and the triumphant (at least in the May elections) Democrats. Particular publicity was given to an interview with the Bishop of Spiš, who is reputed to be a Hlinka sympathiser. The Bishop protested against the nationalisation of Slovak Catholic schools, a fate which has not yet overtaken their counterparts in Bohemia and Moravia, but which, according to the report of an interview between President Beneš and the Catholic Action Committee, is certain. An American report states that the Government has, under the terms of the Modus Vivendi governing relations with the Holy See, rejected the nomination of the Bishop of Hradec Králové as Archbishop of Prague—again chiefly on account of his opposition to the nationalising of the Catholic schools. This question is undoubtedly one of those perplexing the minds of the People's Party and contributing to its internal weakness. Criticism of Mgr. Šrámek, the Party leader, centres around his continued collaboration with the Communists and Socialists of the National Front; a Right Wing is rumoured to be developing around Dr. Adolf Procházka, former Minister of Health, and his wife who was forced to resign her mandate on account of her disagreement with Government policy.

POLAND.

There has been a noticeable sharpening of the issue between the Peasant Party of M. Mikolajczyk (P.S.L.) and the parties of the "Lublin Bloc."

A recent law transferred the control of all agricultural boards to country and district offices from the Ministry of Agriculture, the chief ministry allotted to the P.S.L. Three reasons were officially given for this step, according to press accounts.

(a) Local Governors, who have a fuller knowledge of local conditions than the Ministry of Agriculture, ought to be able to make immediate decisions without having to wait for the Ministry's sanction.
(b) M. Mikolajczyk, as one of the political heads of Parliament, has not had enough time for his departmental duties.
(c) M. Mikolajczyk is known to favour a policy of large farm holdings, detrimental to the poorer peasants.

This law was accepted by all members of the Cabinet, with the exception of the three members of the P.S.L.

Since its enactment, it has been announced that the post of Vice-Minister of Agriculture is to be occupied by M. Podedworny, a member of the satellite peasant party belonging to the "Lublin Bloc."

Glos Ludu, the chief Communist newspaper, gave M. Mikolajczyk a very sharp warning, that the time had come for him to choose between the democratic camp and the "forest bands" (the underground terrorist movement). By joining the latter he would be going over to foreign forces inimicable to Poland, together with the "Fascist underground" and General Anders' bands.

The Gazeta Ludowa, the chief newspaper of M. Mikolajczyk, accepted this challenge eagerly with the prophecy that "Interesting and hot times are coming."

The crisis in the affairs of the S.P., the Labour Party (see Summary No. 352) has developed further.

On the 18th July, M. Popiel, the party's leader opposed to the "Lublin Bloc," caused the Central Committee of the party to order a suspension of all political activity, until "a change in the political atmosphere" had occurred. The causes of this step lie in the long-standing friction between the supporters of M. Popiel and those of the late M. Felczak and his successor M. Widy-Wirski, both of whom favoured complete collaboration with the "Lublin Bloc." Matters came to a head shortly before the Party Congress, which was to have taken place on the 19th and 20th July.

M. Widy-Wirski, who is the Voivode of Poznania, demanded that the Congress be postponed, and that his group be given 40 per cent. of the seats in the Central Committee. In his demands he was supported by the Socialist Prime Minister, M. Osobka-Morawski, and, with the help of the Socialist Party's Press, published an announcement that the Labour Party's Congress was postponed.

M. Popiel protested to M. Osobska-Morawski against M. Widy-Wirski's action, but, failing to receive any satisfaction, convened the meeting of the 18th July, at which it was decided to suspend the Party's activity.

The Party's weekly newspaper, which, despite strict censorship, acted as M. Popiel's mouthpiece, ceased to appear since the crisis in the Party became apparent. Since the session of the 18th July, M. Widy-Wirski has also become Vice-Minister of Propaganda.

The end of August has also been chosen for an important session of the K.R.N. (Homeland National Council), according to its Vice-President Stanislaw Szwalbe, as reported by official Polish Press Bulletins. The Council will then be discussing the acceptance of the electoral law, and if the question is settled at this session, it may be believed that the elections themselves will be scheduled for November.

At a Press Conference for foreign correspondents held on the 24th July, the Director of the Polish Foreign Ministry's Press Department, General Grosz, is reported as having made various allegations concerning the direct subordination of the Polish underground movement to General Anders.

According to information received from persons arrested in Poland, communications with General Anders were maintained by means of centres in Czechoslovakia and at Regensburg, in the American zone of occupation in Germany.

Through the former centres, agents were said to have been sent into Poland from abroad, and also to Britain, in order to be trained as parachutists. Regensburg was described as a centre for the training of agents in sabotage to be carried out in Poland, and also as a liaison post with the Headquarters of General Anders' Second Polish Corps in Italy. Many arrests have already been made, and the trials were to begin some time in August.

According to the official Warsaw radio, a military court at Wrocław (Breslau) has already begun the trial of thirty-nine members of a secret German organisation, "Freies Deutschland." The Headquarters of the organisation was said to be in Germany, and its activity chiefly in Lower Silesia, especially in the district of Boleslawiec (Bunzlau). One of the accused Germans is reported as saying that the organisation's aims were to separate Lower Silesia from Poland by force, and to free all Germany from occupation. These aims were to be pursued by sabotage, and by creating discord between Poles and Russians.

The second anniversary of the Warsaw rising was celebrated in Poland by various civic and religious ceremonies. The official view of the tragedy, represented by President Bierut's statement as quoted in the paper Rzeczpostpolite, is that the heroism and gallantry of the people of Warsaw at that time must be contrasted with the reactionary policy of Bor–Komorowski and his friends. who directed a completely premature rising in order to cover their own political bankruptcy. A warning note was sounded by the Socialist paper Robotnik: "The lesson of the Warsaw rising is that, alongside an impetuous love of liberty, ready to stake its life, political wisdom must govern our nation."

SOVIET UNION.

The Soviet press has accorded its readers a week of comparative quiet. Reports of the Peace Conference were not pessimistic and contained no sensations, though their tone was on the whole astringent; Dr. Evatt came in for the most consistent criticism, being accused among other things of trying to drive a wedge between the U.S.S.R. and France.

Attacks against Great Britain, greatly diminished in volume, again centred around the Middle East; the old charges against the Anglo-Persian Oil Company were once more brought forward, and the activities of the British consulate at Khorramshah were said to be reminiscent of "the well-known imperialist diversionist, Colonel Lawrence."

The British Labour Party mission, headed by Mr. Laski, which recently arrived in Moscow, has been received by Generalissimo Stalin; the Soviet scientists who have just returned from the Newton celebrations in Great Britain gave a favourable account of their visit, being apparently much gratified by the popularity of Academician Vinogradov.

The delegates of the British-Soviet Society now visiting Armenia have given their views to the Soviet press; they declared that the unification of the whole

Armenian people was only possible under Soviet rule, and that Soviet Armenia would not be able to receive the hundreds of thousands of Armenians returning from all over the world without the return of the territory annexed by Turkey.

The issue by the Canadian Royal Commission of its report on the Gouzenko spycase has provided Zaslavsky with material for a long vitriolic article describing the "atmosphere of savage terror against democracy" which had been created in Canada. He was most insistent that the Commission had been unable to find evidence that Soviet agents had given directives to Canadian political workers, and alleged that far from there being a secret Comintern organisation in Canada, there was an organisation very similar to the Gestapo and provided with large funds, whose object was to undermine friendly relations between the Canadian and Soviet peoples.

The press campaign against the U.S.A. has also died down, though Izvestia has recently indulged in angry and childish abuse of American work in the Allied Council in Japan and of Mr. Acheson in particular, calling him "a pigheaded fascist slanderer."

Soviet-American relations have also been somewhat strained over the Hungarian situation (see under Hungary). The Soviet reply to the American note appeared in the local press several hours before it was received by the American Embassy in Moscow.

The Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Mongolian People's Republic, M. Naidanhugiin Idamyab, presented his credentials to M. Shvernik on the 4th August.

The famous White Sea-Baltic Canal named after Stalin was formally reopened for navigation on Red Navy Day, the 28th July, the work of restoration having been carried out under the direction of the NKVD. The destruction was so serious that it had been doubted whether it was worth restoring the canal along its old course.

The U.S.S.R. Prosecutor's office has just announced the trial of a number of officials, for taking bribes, the convicted mainly being concerned with railways and the illegal issue of tickets.

The traitor General Vlassov, of whom little had been heard since the liberation of Prague, was hanged together with 11 of his associates on the 1st August.

SCANDINAVIA.

Denmark.

The terms of the Anglo/Danish Trade Agreement have now been settled, though not yet published. The Daily Telegraph of the 29th July suggested that "the Danes have accepted the British price," but unfortunately, it would be more correct to say that we had to concede most of the Danish terms. The prices now agreed upon are those submitted by the Danish Government in a memorandum handed to our representatives on the 20th July. They are 220*s.* and 150*s.* per cwt. f.o.b. for butter and bacon respectively, and 15*s.* 6*d.* and 19*s.* 6*d.* for eggs. The butter price compares with 247*s.* 7*d.* payable by the Russians under their trade pact with Denmark. Other terms which we were obliged to accept were the curtailment of the period of duration of the pact to the 30th September instead of the 31st December, 1947, and a proviso that the prices might be reconsidered for the second six months of the agreement at the request of either Government, if such request reached the other before the 1st April, 1947. This latter condition was originally unilateral in favour of Denmark and was due to a lively Danish fear of a possible world inflation in the not very distant future.

The negotiations which culminated in this none too satisfactory agreement were carried on under the shadow of the Russo/Danish negotiations, which went on simultaneously, and under the pressure exercised by the Danish farmers on a Government representing their own interests. But the influence of the exchange rate and the disparity between British and Danish price levels also exercised a restraining influence on the undoubted readiness of the Danish Government to come to a reasonable agreement with us. Moreover the desire in certain circles, which was expressed very clearly by M. Federspiel, a Member of the Resistance movement, to "make hay while the sun shines," though not shared by the Government cannot have failed to harden their determination to hold out for terms satisfactory to their ruthless taskmasters, the Danish farmers. Thus the prices now accepted, while not as high as originally demanded by the Danes, yet represent the Danish view of what would be the minimum price they could accept rather than our feeling of what we could afford to pay.

H.M.G. in consequence pointed out privately that we could not regard the Danish terms as generous but would rather describe them as grasping, in that they showed no appreciation of (1) the extravagant prices we had paid to the Danish farmers after the liberation; (2) the sacrifices we had made, and were still making, to assure Danish industrial supplies and hard currency necessary to obtain certain essentials; and (3) the unfairness of Danish expectations that we would bear all the cost of supporting Denmark's main industry when our own situation was directly traceable to our unparalleled war effort. The Danes contended in reply that they would actually have to bear a considerable part of the burden, a contention since borne out by press reports from Copenhagen that the Government subsidy to agriculture has had to be substantially increased. Moreover, M. Rasmussen, who, as always, showed himself most well-disposed to this country, assured our representatives that his Government fully appreciated our motive of wishing to avoid inflation and realised that uncontrolled inflation would in fact harm Danish interests no less than British.

It may be conceded, however, that, as a slight quid pro quo, the Danish Government have met us over the quantities involved in the Agreement. In accordance with our wishes they are prepared to determine the quantities to be delivered to the United Kingdom in 1947 in such a way as to constitute 62½ per cent. (instead of 60 per cent.) of exportable surplus up to 80,000 tons (instead of 75,000), plus 90 per cent. of quantity of export in excess of 80,000 tons. H.M.G. has furthermore reserved the right to make subsequent representations on the question of securing for the United Kingdom any supplies promised to third countries but subsequently not taken by them. This, we emphasized, was also in Denmark's interest as facilitating a reduction in Denmark's large and increasing sterling liabilities.

M. Rasmussen has once again raised the question of communicating the text of the Danish Rigsdag's resolution on South Schlesvig to the Four Allied Powers (see this Summary No. 351, pp. 8–9). H.M.G. has reiterated their contention that the matter was one for agreement between this country and Denmark alone and that the Danish step would therefore greatly embarrass H.M.G. Upon further pressure being exercised M. Rasmussen agreed to hold the matter in abeyance for two weeks. If it is remembered that the Danish Foreign Minister finds himself in this case between the upper and lower millstone in that pressure is exercised on him by ourselves and by his pertinacious Prime Minister, his attitude in this matter is deserving of great praise. Incidentally, it now appears from Danish press reports as though M. Christmas Moeller will after all for the time being remain Chairman of the Conservative Party. (See this Summary No. 351.)

Norway.

At a time when the Antarctic whaling season is about to begin, the Norwegian Seamen's Union has adopted an attitude towards British companies which can only be described as unreasonable. The Norwegian trade unions have refused to negotiate jointly with Norwegian and British employers as in 1939 and 1945, and will not allow their members to sign on British expeditions until certain demands have been met. These include the condition that only Norwegians should be employed on board British whale catchers. Though excluded from negotiations, British Whaling Companies are prepared to apply whatever terms are reached between the Norwegian National Whaling Board and the Norwegian Seamen's Union to Norwegian personnel on board British catchers, but it is quite obvious that H.M.G. cannot sanction any measure which discriminates against the employment of British subjects on British ships. Strong representations have accordingly been made by His Majesty's Ambassador in Oslo and to the Norwegian Chargé d'Affaires here.

Taking into consideration that Britain favoured the allocation of a German whale factory to Norway, and that this country discouraged a plan to bring Swedish interests into whaling and refused to support Dutch whaling schemes, greater understanding might have been expected from the Norwegians in return. The Norwegian Government should be able to influence the unions in question, but should they fail to do so H.M.G. will be compelled to take steps to safeguard their own position. The behaviour of the Norwegian unions is, however, to be particularly deplored at a time when the oil and fats situation is so critical and it is essential to obtain all the whale oil possible in the forthcoming season.

Finland.

Following the scoop made by the New York Herald Tribune, all the Helsinki papers printed the texts of the draft peace treaties on the 23rd July. Particular prominence was, naturally, given to the Finnish Treaty. The complete absence of any alleviations in the terms of the Armistice certainly came as a great shock to most Finns, many of whom until quite recently entertained the most sanguine hopes including expectations of territorial concessions. Disillusionment is great and whatever consolation is felt is derived from the acknowledgment in the preamble that Finland has loyally fulfilled the terms of the Armistice. Though perhaps unknown to the Finnish public, similar acknowledgments were given to all the ex-satellites.

On the 2nd August Lahti Radio announced that the Finnish delegation to the Paris Conference would be headed by Prime Minister Pekkala, Foreign Minister Enckell, and Minister of the Interior, Leino. MM. Pekkala and Leino have without a doubt been delegated because of their pro-Soviet inclinations, whereas the inclusion of M. Enckell was probably dictated by the necessity of the delegation possessing an expert on foreign affairs.

During July and while the arms dumps case was still awaiting final settlement, Minister of the Interior, Leino, made another sensational revelation of the activities of Finnish "reactionaries." He contended that following the cessation of hostilities between Finland and the Soviet Union a number of Finnish citizens maintained contact with the Germans and were preparing to overthrow the Government in order to continue the war. The protagonists in this alleged villainy are an Army officer, Lt.-Col. Fabricius and a civilian, P. Forsström. The former is said to have travelled to Germany in a U-boat and later returned to Finland by air for the purpose of organising a pro-German resistance movement. M. Forsström, a leading industrialist and, incidentally, one of Field-Marshal Mannerheim's few personal friends, is accused of having aided two German agents in their escape from the Finnish State Police. Several other persons have also been detained in connexion with this affair, and, rightly or wrongly, the impression is gaining ground that the Communists, through the State Police, are ridding themselves of their opponents by having them arrested on charges which may not be fully justified. Under an emergency decree still in force, the Law for the Protection of the Republic, a person may be detained for an indefinite period without trial and many of the persons arrested a year ago as suspects in the arms dumps case are still in gaol without any indication of when their trial will begin.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

Belgium.

M. Spaak's failure in the task of Cabinet-making has been followed by the success of M. Camille Huysmans, the well-known Socialist elder statesman and Burgomaster of Antwerp, now in his 76th year, to whom the Prince-Regent turned on the 1st August. The parties represented in M. Huysmans' Cabinet remain the same; but its personnel has slightly changed. Four new Ministers have taken the places of MM. Devèze (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Economic Affairs), van Glabbeke (Minister of Justice), de Voghel (Minister of Finance) and de Smaele (Minister of National Re-equipment). The portfolios of Economic Affairs and Justice continue to be held by Liberals—M. Henri Liebaert (a Deputy and Ghent industrialist) and M. Albert Lilar (a Senator and Brussels University professor), those of Finance and Re-equipment by extra-parliamentary experts—M. Jean Vauthier and M. de Groote (the latter another Brussels University professor). Otherwise there is no change. The four new Ministers took the oath on the 3rd August. The wisdom of perpetuating the three-party left-wing coalition—even though (according to M. Huysmans) the new Cabinet's programme meets with the Catholic Opposition's approval—remains to be seen: as M. Huysmans has admitted, he himself favoured a four-party Government, as did M. van Acker. Some of the damage which Belgian economy has sustained in consequence of the delay is probably reflected in the sharp rise in the number of registered unemployed during the week ended the 27th July—55,234 as against 43,881 during the previous week, an increase of 11,353—after a long period of almost uninterrupted decline.

Grand-Duchy of Luxembourg.

A plot to overthrow the Luxembourg Government was discovered in time towards the end of last week. The coup d'état, which had been planned to take place on the 3rd August, appears to have been the work of persons who had suffered imprisonment in concentration camps and of former résistants. The underlying cause is stated to be the Government's alleged slowness in carrying out the " purge " of unpatriotic officials, a grievance claimed by the Government to be without foundation. Amongst those arrested for complicity were three army officers—one of them, a major, has since been cashiered—and a Socialist schoolteacher named Winghert, who is also a communal councillor at Schiffelingen (Schifflange) and a resistance hero. Failure to carry out the coup d'état did not, however, prevent some 20,000 people from demonstrating in Luxembourg City on the 4th August to demand Winghert's release: he is the only conspirator still under arrest, but is shortly to be released. According to the official inquiry, members of the present Cabinet were to be placed under arrest until a new Cabinet had been formed. At no time had the conspirators considered taking any action in respect of the Luxembourg Dynasty.

FRANCE.

The French delegation to the Paris Conference (see under " The Paris Conference ") is headed by M. Bidault and includes M. Schneiter, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs; MM. Moutet and Billoux, Ministers for Overseas France and for Reconstruction; General Catroux; MM. Massigli and Bonnet; and MM. de Murville and Alphand of the Quai d'Orsay.

The Government decision, mentioned in the last Summary, to increase average wages by 18%, secured the acceptance of the National Economic Conference and the C.G.T. and was published in the Journal Officiel on the 30th July. It is, in fact, a compromise between the original Government proposals for an average wage increase of 15% and those of the Economic Conference for a 25% increase of minimum wages averaging out at a general increase of about 20%. The new increase will be distributed in such a way as to give the lowest-paid workers a rise of as much as 35% and to give only a small increase to those who are better off. A further battle was waged over the question of the salaries of Government employees which have for some years been out of relation with the general wage-level. The Post Office workers staged an inconvenient strike on the 30th July in many parts of the country and stoppages occurred again on the 2nd August. However, on the 31st July the Cabinet decided to raise the basic wages of Government employees by 25%, with a minimum monthly increase of 1,800 fr., and to carry through after the end of this year a complete overhaul of their system of remuneration. The Constituent Assembly discussed these proposals on the 2nd August, and after sitting till 4·30 a.m. finally voted them with, however, the amendment that allowances and pensions were similarly to be increased by 25%.

Some important price increases will inevitably follow from these measures and the Government will be hard put to it in trying to control the already large budget deficit, strained as it will be by price subsidies and a heavy Government pay-roll. The price to the producers of meat, milk and wheat has already been raised, and a considerable increase in the price of electricity is awaited. The meat subsidy has been removed and M. Yves Farge is allowing butchers in Paris and elsewhere to sell extra meat at " free market " prices off the ration, in addition to the weekly meat ration which must be sold at the controlled price. Meat production is almost back to its pre-war level, the vegetable and fruit crops are good, and the harvests of sugar-beet and cereals are estimated to be 50% higher this year than last year. If the price question can be solved, these products should therefore now reach the official markets in sufficient quantities.

The Constituent Assembly on the 1st August voted unanimously for the ratification of the American loan agreements. Trade agreements have recently been signed with Eire, Sweden, Roumania, Belgium and Luxemburg, and Poland. The last, signed in Paris on the 1st August, provides for deliveries of Polish coal to France amounting to 100,000 tons a month. For the first six months of this year France's imports amounted to 15 million tons to a value of 105 milliard fr., and her exports to 4½ million tons to a value of 33⅓ milliard fr.

The sessions of the High Court of Justice have been suspended until the 12th August as a result of the refusal of the Communist jurors to appear, in protest against the leniency of the sentences passed (see last week's Summary). The Communist Parliamentary Group says that its members will not take part in a performance which is a " parody of justice " and the Party has proposed measures which would make the procedure of the Court even more political than it already is. This action has been severely criticised by the Socialist Party which holds the Presidency of the High Court in the person of M. Noguères; and this incident, following the Communist attempts to unseat MM. Reynaud and Daladier (see Summaries 350 and 352), has again shown up the Communist conception of justice as a political instrument.

The Constitutional Committee, after finishing its discussion of the draft on the machinery of government, turned to examination of the problem of the French Union. The Committee is almost equally divided between those, led by the M.R.P., who wish the present Constituent Assembly to establish the constitution of the French Union, and those, including the Socialists, Communists and native representatives, who wish the territories of the Union to have power to decide their own future. The latter point of view finally won the day but the decision may be reversed in the general debate.

The Franco-Viet-Nam discussions at Fontainebleau were declared " provisionally suspended " on the 1st August following a protest by the leader of the Viet-Nam delegation against the proposal of Admiral d'Argenlieu, High Commissioner for Indo-China, to open a conference on that day at Dalat, in South Annam. This conference, consisting of delegates from France, Cambodia, Laos, Cochinchina and the Moi population of South Annam, was to be preparatory, the aim being to define the status of the Indo-Chinese federation. It is said to have been convened at the request of the Cochinchinese provisional government, whose right to negotiate is certainly questionable, since the future of Cochinchina is not yet decided (see Summary No. 335). The French press has pointed out the discrepancy between the conduct of affairs in Paris and events in Indo-China, recalling that it was at the very moment when the Viet-Nam President was leaving for Paris, that the High Commissioner sponsored the creation of a provisional autonomous government in Cochinchina. Le Populaire, which should reflect the views of the Socialist Minister of Overseas France, goes so far as to say that Admiral d'Argenlieu called the Dalat conference without consulting Paris, and urges the Government to disown him.

At the Fontainebleau conference, progress has been slow. There has been no decision about the subjects to be dealt with by the federal administration. The Annamese are particularly anxious to have separate diplomatic representation abroad, while agreeing that economic affairs shall be a federal matter, but the French wish the federal system to be both political and economic.

SOUTH-EAST EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Soviet Union has replied to the Note presented by the United States (outlined in last week's Summary), and has refuted the allegations that the bulk of Hungary's products are absorbed by Russia in reparations or through requisitioning. The Soviet Note advanced, rather unconvincingly, as proof of this, evidence that Hungary had only paid 10,000,000 dollars for 1945 out of her total reparations commitments to Russia of 33,500,000 dollars. The Note also denied, without on the whole specifically disproving, the charges of heavy requisitioning by the Army of Occupation, and contended that the American accusations were based on false information—the value of the war enterprises transferred from Hungary, for example, was 11,000,000 and not 124,000,000 dollars as the American Note had alleged. The U.S.S.R. drew attention to their recent reparations concessions to Hungary (outlined in last week's Summary) which were made at the request of the Hungarian Government, but although these concessions were announced five days after the presentation of the U.S. Note, there is no evidence that they are connected with it. The U.S.S.R. then reaffirmed its belief that the chief responsibility for Hungary's plight lay with the United States for not having yet returned the Hungarian property in their zones of Austria and Germany. Once again Russia rejected the suggestion that the Allied Control Commission should work out a plan for Hungary's rehabilitation, maintaining that this was the concern of the Hungarian Government alone.

The publication of the draft Peace Treaty brought renewed disappointment but no surprise to Hungary. M. Nagy, in a statement to the Press, described the settlement for Transylvania as injurious and disquieting for the Hungarian people and as carrying the germ of future conflict.

The promise of the Minister of the Interior to remedy acknowledged excesses and abuses during the purge ordered by the Soviet High Command seems to have satisfied the Smallholders, and the Government is now trying to placate the Churches. A broadcast appeal, in which it was at last admitted that the purge was instigated by the Soviet High Command, exhorted the clergy of all the Churches to secure in their own sphere " confidence in our democratic institutions and good relations with the U.S.S.R.'' and assured them that the State would guarantee their rights and support them in the execution of their religious duties. It seems that the State is trying to secure the almost mutually exclusive advantages of ecclesiastical support on the one hand and a—political churches—on the other.

An unpleasant incident occurred in Miscolc when some Jewish black-marketeers were so mauled by a crowd that one of them died. Some of the ring-leaders were arrested, and to obtain their release, a party of demonstrators seized and murdered the Chief of the Political Police. This is further evidence of the restlessness caused by economic insecurity, and the success of the forint currency, introduced on the 1st August, will be interesting to watch.

This new currency was introduced at a gold parity of 1 kg. standard gold equal to 13,210 forint, that is to say, at an exchange value of approximately 47 forint to the pound sterling, and the conversion rate from the old to the new currency has been fixed at 1 forint for every 200 million tax pengö. By June, the Hungarian inflation had assumed the proportions of the closing phases of the German inflation of 1923; then, the final exchange rate was 20 million million Marks to the pound. Last week the pound sterling could technically be calculated in milliard milliard milliard pengö, although in practice the pengö had been replaced in current circulation by the tax pengö, an adjustable monetary unit which was issued in January for fiscal purposes at a parity of one to one ordinary pengö, and which by mid-July was worth 7 milliard milliard pengö.

The introduction of the new currency is shortly to be followed by the re-establishment of a system of price control.

Rumania.

The Communist Party have opened their ''election campaign.'' On the 1st August about 200 ''workers,'' protected by police officers in uniform, attacked the printing works of the newspaper Dreptatea, destroyed the type for the day's issue and damaged some of the machinery. Employés were then taken to the headquarters of the General Confederation of Labour and forced under threats of violence to sign a promise that they would cease to work for the National Peasant Party and would offer their services to the Communists. It is suspected that one reason for the outrage was that Dreptatea was suspected of being about to publish the text of the peace treaty.

The question of applying for permission to have official observers at the elections has been considered. It is most unlikely that permission would be granted. An alternative plan of asking for permission for an unofficial team of Members of Parliament and journalists is being considered. This might prevent irregularities which otherwise would take place. The refusal of permission for official observers would indirectly do good, for it would create the impression that the Rumanian Government had something to hide, and would put us in a stronger position if we desired later on to take exception to the results.

To give—everybody—his due, it is learned from a reliable source that some of the women of Saxon origin who were deported to Russia have been returned. It is those who are less able-bodied who have been sent back home. They appear not to have been badly treated, and they have ''been respected as women.''

Yugoslavia.

The problem of preventing the disappearance of U.N.R.R.A. goods in transit through Trieste to Yugoslavia and Central Europe has lately been worrying the local U.N.R.R.A. authorities, who have been trying to settle it on an operational level with A.M.G. and A.F.H.Q. The main difficulty, they consider, lies in the provision of an adequate guard during the transport of the goods from the docks to the railway. This state of affairs has not been ignored by the Yugoslavs who, shortly before the arrival in Yugoslavia of Mr. La Guardia, the head of U.N.R.R.A., published an exaggerated account of the thefts, alleging that members of the civil police and persons wearing British uniforms were involved. Mr. La Guardia's reaction was vigorous. He bluntly informed A.F.H.Q. that the existing arrangements were inadequate, that the thefts could not be taking place on such a large scale without the knowledge or connivance of the police, and that if A.F.H.Q. could not allow armed guards to be used he would have to take up the matter with the British and American Governments. He is reported to have told the Yugoslav Press that '' with twenty New York cops '' the situation could be very quickly altered. General Morgan replied that the recipient countries were responsible for the protection of the goods from the docks onwards, that Yugoslavia had refused to co-operate unless the guards were armed, which was unnecessary and unacceptable, and that the situation was being exploited by the Yugoslavs for obvious reasons. It has since transpired that only 1·3 per cent. of the goods have disappeared instead of the alleged 25 to 30 per cent.

Once again the Yugoslav Government sent notes to H.M. and the U.S. Chargés d'Affaires concerning the behaviour of the Allied authorities in Trieste, on this occasion protesting against attacks by '' neo-Fascists '' on various minor Yugoslav officials and institutions. A number of incidents were quoted to show that not only did the police fail to intervene but that even requests for British military protection were ignored. British military police were also accused of ill-treating some innocent Yugoslav soldiers.

Another '' traitors' trial '' has opened in Belgrade, with some prominent Neditch officials in the dock.

The Bank of England has transferred to the Yugoslav National Bank the gold which the Royal Yugoslav Government brought to London in 1941. (See also '' Albania.'')

Greece.

There has been a further development of the situation referred to in Summary No. 351 of the 17th July. On the 30th July Government officials ordered the G.C.L. to hand over its archives and funds to Government custody. On this demand being refused, the Secretary-General and others were arrested, and the archives found and taken possession of. The arrested officials were brought before the Athens Correctional Court and sentenced to four months' imprisonment. They have appealed against this sentence and have been released pending appeal. The incident appears to be one phase of the antagonism which exists between the Government and the W.F.T.U., but is due mainly to the determination of the Government to act against political domination of the Trade Unions by the Communists. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the particular case, the action of the Government seems to be incredibly stupid just at the moment when Greece needs all the support she can get for the claims she is putting forward at the Peace Conference.

The Minister of Labour has issued a statement to the effect that the Trades Unions were suppressed during the occupation and were unable to function. The Government-in-Exile then re-enacted the law which was in force before 1936. Leftist groups succeeded by violence in gaining control of all the Executives and during the outbreak in December 1944 Trade Union leaders were murdered. When order had been restored a provisional Executive was formed, the activities of which were completely nullified through the action of the Minister of Labour in the Voulgaris and Sophoulis governments. The Minister's decision was set aside by the recent judgment of the Supreme Court with the result that (a) complete liberty of association under the Constitution was secured, (b) interference with Trade Union liberties by the Government was forbidden, and (c) elections to the Executive committees were safeguarded.

At the first meeting of the Provisional Executive the General Confederation elected officers. It appeared that the account books of the Confederation had not been handed over by the official who had charge of them. The possession of these is necessary, as the Minister of Labour may be called upon to check accounts.

Government armed forces and Leftist bands have been in conflict in the Olympus region. Exaggerated accounts of the operations have been circulated, probably for propaganda purposes, charging the army with subjecting villages to artillery fire. It seems that the '' villages '' were groups of huts on mountain tops where some of the bandits had dug themselves in, but were not permanent dwellings.

Papayiannis, the president of the Salonica Labour Centre, has been arrested and charged with instigating one hour strikes, with urging the gendarmerie not to obey orders, and with inciting disorder on the part of the populace. He is shortly to be tried by a special Court Martial.

The Government is exhibiting an extreme sensitiveness over the question of the admission of Albania to the U.N. It is felt that if this should happen Albania's present frontier would be automatically guaranteed and that all hope of Greece gaining Northern Epirus would be lost. It does not seem to be certain that the admission of Albania would necessarily prevent Greece from having her claim heard. Greek public opinion has been led to believe that the claim will have the wholehearted support of Great Britain.

Albania.

On the 31st July, at the Paris Peace Conference, the Yugoslav delegate formally asked that Albania should be invited to send a delegation to the Conference, as she has been clamouring to do. The question has not yet been decided; but meanwhile another of her persistent demands looks like being satisfied, for (according to reports from Belgrade) the Albanian Government has now received an invitation from the United Nations to appoint a representative to discuss the country's application for U.N. membership. Colonel Tuk Jakova, Minister without portfolio, is stated to have been chosen for the purpose.

It is now nearly 12 weeks since the two British cruisers, H.M.S. Orion and H.M.S. Superb, were fired on without warning by Albanian coastal batteries in the Corfu channel (see Summary No. 344); but as even now no satisfactory reply to His Majesty's Government's protest has been received from the Albanian Government, a final note has been sent to them by His Majesty's Government warning them that should such a thing occur again, fire will be unhesitatingly returned.

There are grounds for believing that the recent Pact of Mutual Assistance between Albania and Yugoslavia contained a secret clause in which Yugoslavia undertook to construct a strategic railway from the Kossovo area to one of the Albanian ports.

Bulgaria.

Under the terms of the draft Peace Treaty Bulgaria's frontiers are to be those which existed on the 1st January, 1941 (so that she is confirmed in her possession of Southern Dobruja); but the Greek and Bulgarian Governments are to present their views on the Greco–Bulgarian frontier to the peace conference (Article 1 and note). Losses caused to Yugoslavia and Greece are to be made good direct to those countries by Bulgaria. A decision on the amounts to be paid, in consideration of Bulgaria's having ultimately waged war on Germany, was postponed by the Council of Foreign Ministers until the Yugoslav and Greek Governments could state their views (Article 20). Bulgaria is to be allowed an army of 55,000, including frontier guards, with 1,800 additional men for anti-aircraft artillery. She is to have a navy of 7,250 tons and 3,500 men; and an air force (including naval air arm) of 90 aircraft—not more than 70 of them combat types—and 5,200 men (Article 9). No reference is made to the militia, which is now thought to number about 40,000 men, armed with machine-guns and tanks and at present under the sole direction of the Minister of the Interior. The only check upon them in the treaty as drafted would appear to be Article 11, which forbids anyone in Bulgaria outside the army, navy or air force to be given any form of military training. If any clause is more likely than another to be ignored, it is assuredly this one; for the militia is the principal prop and weapon of the Communists and is used solely to terrorise the public.

Vasil Kolarov, the Speaker of the Sobranye, is once more in Paris at the head of a small party of Bulgarian "observers."

Charges of slander have been laid against Nikola Petkov and Asen Stambolisky in connection with articles which they wrote nine and six months ago respectively. A purge is now being prepared at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Seven former army officers, described as members of a secret organisation named "Tsar Krum," were accused of plotting to overthrow the Government when their trial opened at Sofia on the 5th August. According to a Reuter report, Colonel Anton Krustev, who is said to be the leader and founder of the organisation, pleaded guilty, but said: "I have never opposed the authority of the Fatherland Front, but I was always decidedly against the Communists exercising terror."

Turkey.

It was a foregone conclusion that the People's Party majority in the new Grand National Assembly would re-elect General Ismet Inönü as President of the Republic, the Democratic minority voting for Marshal Fevzi Çakmak, who sits as one of the new Independent Deputies. What was more surprising was the Government of M. Saracoğlu, which had been returned by an enormous majority at the recent general election, resigned according to custom. President Inönü asked a different member of the victorious People's Party to form a government. M. Recep Peker, the new Prime Minister, is a bluff personage of fifty-seven, who was a friend of Atatürk and has at various times been secretary-general of the People's Party, Minister of the Interior and Minister of Defence. The Foreign Minister, M. Hasan Saka, is one of four members of the former cabinet to retain office. Foreign policy is therefore unlikely to be changed. Although the withdrawal of M. Saracoğlu, against whom the Kremlin seem to nourish a particular animus, might have been held to improve the chance of an understanding with Russia, it is likely that M. Peker, who is a strong supporter of the Anglo-Turkish alliance, will defend Turkish interests with no less tenacity, but less flexibility, than his predecessor.

C266702

M. Saracoğlu's suppression seems to have been decided on after a long discussion in the People's Party. Whatever the motive for the decision, the new Government will start free of the considerable unpopularity which M. Saracoğlu had gained—though his sweeping electoral victory might not suggest this—by the shortcomings of his internal administration. The main purpose of the change is perhaps to make the position of the Government as strong as possible for the anticipated diplomatic struggle with Russia.

The resignation of the Chief of Staff, General Kâzim Orbay, seems to have been due to private reasons. He has been succeeded by the Deputy Chief of Staff, General Salih Omurtag.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Egypt.

The intervention of Heikal Pasha and his criticism of the action of the Government in the suppression of subversive movements appears to be part of an intrigue between him and Sabri abu Alam Pasha, the Secretary-General of the Wafd Party. A compromise was reached on the main subject, as reported last week, and permission has been given for the publication of a Wafdist paper, known as the Saut al Umma (Voice of the People) to take the place of the suppressed Wafd al Misri. But it is anticipated that Heikal Pasha will continue to work against Sidqi Pasha whom he has the ambition to replace in the premiership. His chance of doing so would appear to be prejudiced by the fact that the King has been much annoyed at his recent behaviour.

Preoccupation with these internal complications adds to the natural difficulty of the Treaty negotiations. Although agreement on the "Defence" articles has not yet been reached, the Egyptians have now raised the question of the Sudan. Whatever they may accept as a plan to continue the present policy of Sudanization they demand recognition of Egyptian sovereignty as a prerequisite to all discussion. This applies equally to discussion with the Sudanese although no Egyptian from the King down has any intention of asking Sudanese opinion on the question of sovereignty. At the same time, as Lord Stansgate has pointed out, unqualified recognition of Egyptian sovereignty prejudges an issue which, to follow both the letter and the spirit of the United Nations Charter, the Sudanese should ultimately decide themselves, and such recognition might lead to difficulties and even to disturbance in the Sudan.

Agitation against the Joint Defence Board continues in the Egyptian press where a generally pessimistic view is taken of the progress of the negotiations. The Ahram, however, has published a hopeful statement by the Prime Minister and has given the main differences of view as (a) British insistence that evacuation will take five years, (b) the demand that Egypt should participate in preparations for defence when either party was threatened, not necessarily in Egypt or near the Egyptian frontier, (c) disagreement on the Egyptian proposal that the Joint Defence Board should meet only when specially convened and (d) British refusal to refer to the Sudan as an immediate problem. The Ikhwan al Muslimin and the Saut al Umma think that the time has come to break off the negotiations altogether.

Suggestions that Egypt has a right to a place at the Peace Conference have been made both officially and unofficially since hostilities ended. According to the Egyptian press of 31st July a delegation is now to be sent to Paris to put forward the Egyptian point of view.

Palestine.

The Lord President made a statement in the House of Commons on the 31st July reporting the recommendations of the British and American officials on the policy to be adopted on the report of the Anglo-American Committee. The third recommendation of the Committee, that Palestine as a whole can be neither a Jewish nor an Arab state, is accepted, and on this ground, proposals are made for a Central Government with Arab and Jewish provinces enjoying a large measure of autonomy. The country would be divided into four areas, an Arab Province, a Jewish Province and districts of Jerusalem and the Negeb. Final control of immigration would rest with the Central Government although it would be exercised on the basis of recommendations made by the provincial governments. This, it is thought, would make possible the admission of the 100,000 Jews as recommended by the Committee. The Committee recommended also that an effort should be made to improve the economic and social conditions of the Arabs; this is accepted, but the delegates give warning of the heavy capital expenditure involved and suggest that the United States Government should make a substantial grant for financing Arab development projects not suitable for self-liquidating loans and for meeting exceptional expenditure during the transitional period. The budgetary deficiency would be made up by His Majesty's Government until increased revenues made this unnecessary. The delegates consider that Palestine's need for economic development should be viewed against the background of the Middle East as a whole and suggest that the United States Government might authorise development loans to interested governments who had difficulty in obtaining the necessary capital from other sources. Large-scale development of benefit to Palestine could best be undertaken in co-operation "at least with Trans-Jordan and probably with Syria and Lebanon."

Arab critics have so far made no attempt to find points in the recommendations favourable to the Arab cause but condemn the whole plan with varying degrees of vehemence. In spite of the Palestinian Committee's refusal "to sit with Jews" there is little doubt that the Arab States invited will send representatives to London, although a Syrian suggestion for a single delegation representing all the Arab countries does not find favour in the Lebanon. According to the Journal d'Egypte Azzam Pasha has had a message from Iraq demanding the convocation of the Arab League Council to examine the Palestine question. He is said to prefer a meeting of the Arab Foreign Ministers.

Zionists appear to be equally hostile (see also under U.S.A.). The Jewish Telegraph Agency says that a quick survey shows that the plan has not a ghost of a chance of being accepted. A big Zionist meeting was held in London on 28th July when the outline of the report was already generally known. Professor Brodetsky referred to the rumours about a federal plan and said that the only practical way of dealing with the problem of the Jewish people was the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish State. He criticised the Government's invitation to the Arab States and asked what they had to do with the Jews in Europe or with Palestine. At a formal meeting of the Jewish Agency Executive held under Ben Gurion in Paris on 1st August it was agreed to convene a larger body, including parties not represented on the present Executive, to consider events of the last few weeks. An announcement rejecting the British Government's proposals was made on 5th August.

At dawn on the 30th July Tel Aviv was surrounded by troops and all communications were cut off. A curfew order was issued but the restriction on movement in the town was withdrawn for short periods to allow for the purchase of food. Meanwhile a house-to-house search was carried out which was continued until 2nd August. Many arrests were made of men and women required for further examination. A broadcast message from the High Commissioner made it clear that the operations were a direct result of the King David Hotel crime and that the object was to rout out terrorists believed to be in the town.

A considerable stir has been caused by an order issued by the General Officer Commanding, Palestine on the 26th July. In it he refuses to absolve the Jewish community of Palestine from responsibility for the long series of outrages and expresses the determination that they should suffer punishment and be aware of the contempt and loathing with which their conduct is regarded. He put out of bounds all Jewish establishments and prohibited social intercourse by the troops with all Jews. It is his final sentence, in which he expresses his belief that these measures will punish the Jews "in a way the race dislikes as much as any, by striking at their pockets and showing our contempt for them" which has raised the storm. In the House of Commons on 30th July Mr. Morrison said that "the Government feel that they must dissociate themselves from the actual terms in which the letter is couched."

The arrival in Palestinian waters of ships carrying illegal immigrants from various ports in Europe continues, and strong representations on the subject are being made to a number of governments in the hope of enlisting their co-operation to put a stop to a traffic which is already creating a very serious problem.

Iraq.

His Majesty's Ambassador has officially informed the Regent and the Prime Minister of the decision to send troops from India to Basrah to be ready to defend British interests in South Persia (see under "Persia"). Both expressed satisfaction at a step which they think will encourage our friends although they expect complaints from some quarters.

A report on the Kirkuk strike (see last week's Summary) says that things are now normal although there is still much anti-government and anti-British talk. The prominent part played by Chaldeans in strike propaganda and the sympathy of the Army with the strikers are also particularly noted.

Persia.

On 31st July all members of the Cabinet resigned in a body. Their action was preceded by no ministerial crisis and the only explanation given is that it was taken in order that Qawam might be free to reconstitute his Cabinet, which he did on the following day including three members of the Tudeh Party.

The Government of India announced on the 2nd August that troops are being sent from India to Basrah in order that they may be at hand for protection, should circumstances demand it, of Indian, British and Arab lives, and in order to safeguard Indian and British interests in South Persia. The Persian Government, to whom, of course, no official notification of the move has been given, reacted strongly. A statement was issued by the Fars agency on 3rd August which referred to the news of the troop movement and announced that, in order to avoid misunderstanding in the public mind, it was necessary to make it clear that the affairs of Khuzistan are an internal Persian matter and that the Persian Government will, under no circumstances, permit foreign intervention. The Prime Minister on the same day published details of his programme of reform which includes orders prohibiting Persians, official or unofficial, from contact with foreign embassies or legations unless specially authorized or engaged on necessary business. The isolation of foreign embassies appears to be designed to facilitate the activities of the Tudeh Party which is plainly responsible to the Soviet Embassy. The Rahbar on 4th August published a statement by the Central Committee of the Tudeh making it clear that the appointment of the three Tudeh Ministers was designed to give security for the party. It is as yet impossible to estimate the significance of the Prime Minister's move. It appears to have been made without the general agreement of the Tudeh Party some of whose leaders are criticising their three colleagues for taking office under Qawam. The absorption of the Tudeh by the Democrat Party on the Azerbaijan model does not appear to be imminent. A mass meeting of Democrats in Tehran on 5th August which was addressed by Muzaffer Firuz was attacked by Tudeh members with sticks and knives. The police dispersed the crowds by firing in the air but there were six killed and many injured.

The situation in the oil-fields area is outwardly calm, and the Governor-General has received an encouraging telegram from the Prime Minister advising him of the despatch of detectives and troops. Both he and the Divisional Commander are, however, very anxious about the Tribunal which is enquiring into the causes of the strikes and disorders. This anxiety is shared by British officials on the spot. H.M. Consul-General, Ahwaz, has been in Teheran and gained an admission from Qawam that Muzaffer Firuz had been wrong to release Tudeh ringleaders, but Tudeh influence in the Tribunal is strong and an unbiased report on the events leading to the strike is not likely to be forthcoming from them.

FAR EAST.

China.

Breaking a political silence of two years, Madame Sun Yat-sen has created quite a flutter of surprise and not a little resentment by a public statement in sharp criticism of American activities in China.

Madame Sun declares that China is neither pro-Kuomintang nor pro-Communist, but requires immediately a democratically constituted all-party coalition Government, and that. if the Kuomintang fails in the task of forming a coalition Government, it must bear the responsibility for civil war, which can result only in spreading chaos, hunger and destruction, and which the Kuomintang cannot win. She contends that reactionary elements within the Kuomintang hope that full scale civil conflict in China will eventually incite war between America and the Soviet Union, when American forces would be used to eradicate Communism in China. Madame Sun urges that Americans be told that the presence in China of American armed forces is not strengthening peace and order, and that loans should go only to a truly representative Chinese Government; and she concludes her statement with an appeal to Chinese of all parties to form a coalition now, and to America to foster this endeavour by stopping all military supplies and providing assistance only to a Government which is truly representative of the Chinese people.

This statement, which coincides with another appeal on much the same lines addressed to the American public by fifty-six prominent Chinese, has attracted considerable attention throughout the United States. Left-Wing adherents in the United States are inclined to share Madame Sun's contention that the American Government's action in providing military aid to China serves to encourage the efforts of the Central Government to suppress the Communists. But the more general reaction on American public opinion has been resentment of the unjustness of the implications placed upon American motives. It is felt that Madame Sun echoes the Moscow charges of American imperialism in China and there is an uncomfortable feeling that her statement may not have been entirely home inspired. That American susceptibilities have been badly stung and that the origin of the sting is placed beyond the voice of Madame Sun is seen in the following comment of the New York Times: "There can be little doubt that the danger of large-scale civil war in China is growing, and that such a war would present a grave peril to peace in general. But it takes two to make war and, since the National Government of President Chiang Kai-shek is not only the recognised Government of China, but has a pledge of aid from the United States as a wartime ally, and quite specific pledges of exclusive moral and military support from the Russian Government under the Russo-Chinese treaty, it would seem that any protest should be directed, not against that Government and those who assist it, but against those who oppose it and divide China. As for the specific Russian charges of American economic ambitions, it is made ludicrous by the contrast between the Russian practice of imposing monopoly control on the economies of other countries and the traditional American doctrine of the open door; . . . . It is not China but Russia that has sought and achieved monopoly privileges in Manchuria, the richest province of China."

A State Department spokesman, in reply to requests for comment on Madame Sun's statement, said, on the 23rd July, that there was no change in U.S. policy towards China from what it had been for a considerable time past, which was to aid in bringing about the unification of factions there. He added that General Marshall had been sent to China for that purpose. He also drew attention to a recent clear statement of U.S. policy by Mr. Dean Acheson, Under-Secretary of State, who had stressed that the United States is doing its utmost to prevent a civil war from spreading in China.

Although it is probable that more significance is attached to Madame Sun's statement outside than inside China, there is no doubt that her sudden emergence into the political arena at this particular moment came as a complete and not over-welcome surprise to the Kuomintang, whose press has been quick to justify America's policy of aid to the Central Government by declaring that the Communists "are being kept supplied with arms." This is the first time a Chinese Government organ has carried an article implying that the Communists are receiving Soviet assistance.

Following a number of unpublicised assassinations of members of the Democratic League at Sian, two prominent members of the League, Professors Li Kung-pu and Wan Li-tou, were murdered in the first half of July at Kunming. Both were graduates of American universities and were widely known in American academic circles linked with China. Eleven other Kunming professors, members of the same League and whose names were said to be "on the list," have received sanctuary at the United States Consulate in Kunming and the American Consul has since sought a guarantee for their safety from the Kunming Garrison Commander. President Chiang Kai-shek has publicly condemned these shootings, but, as they have occurred only a few weeks after an attack by a "mob" in Nanking on a self-styled peace delegation from Shanghai, which included a number of prominent members of the Democratic League, there is a strong impression that the Kuomintang's gestapo is at work. The "peace delegates" were set on and badly beaten at the Nanking railway station, while the police made little attempt to interfere.

Despite the hope entertained throughout the first half of July that General Marshall's efforts to end the civil war might terminate in agreement by negotiation, increasing bitterness and mutual distrust between the Central Government and Communists have resulted in a general spreading of intensified fighting. The areas chiefly affected are Hupeh, Honan, Shantung, Shensi, Kiangsu and Anhwei. The Communists in Hupeh and Kiangsu are reported to have a well-established supply line from Manchuria via Chefoo and Weihaiwei, which would indicate that the recent Government landings on the Changshan Islands, off the northern tip of the Shantung Promontory have not achieved their purpose of cutting this line (see this Summary No. 351 of the 17th July, 1946).

Soon after Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek withdrew from Nanking to his summer resort at Kuling in the latter half of July, General Marshall is reported to have flown to Nanking to discuss new peace proposals with Chou En-lai and then to have returned to Kuling with the Communist leader's reply; but neither party appears ever to have been really hopeful of a last moment compromise. Large scale hostilities followed almost immediately with a four-pronged Kuomintang offensive against the Communists in the Kiangsu-Anhwei border region. This operation was attended by considerable success. The Communist units, which recently were considered a threat to Nanking itself, were driven back to a point forty miles north of the capital; while the situation in north Kiangsu was claimed on the 22nd July, to be well in hand. Later news from Nanking announced an important victory for the Government forces in capturing Jukao, the right anchor of the fluid front in the north Kiangsu-Anhwei quadrangle about a hundred miles north-west of Shanghai, after some 20,000 Communists, defending the city, had retreated northwards towards Tung-hai. Other reports state that Government forces have cleared almost the entire 230 mile length of the Tsinan-Tsingtao Railway in Shantung. The troops taking part in this latter advance are reported to be the seventy-third and the fifty-fourth Government armies. Central Government troops are also engaging the Communist forces in the other affected areas and there is obviously a fixed plan to remove the Communist hold from the network of the north China railways and from economically important pockets. One of the objectives in north Kiangsu appears now to be Huaiyin; birthplace of the Communist leader, General Chou En-lai, and the Communist centre in the Kiangsu military district.

The Central News Agency has reported that the retreating Communist troops of General Li Hsien-nien, once almost trapped in the Hupeh pocket, had reached a town forty miles south of Shangnan in Shensi Province. This point is 350 miles from Hsuan Hua-tien, General Li's former headquarters.

Although it would appear that, sensible of the general superiority of the Government forces, the Communists themselves were anxious to avoid large-scale activities, at least for the present, Nanking has been careful to saddle them with responsibility for the drive they have been compelled to launch. At a press conference on the 31st July, Dr. Peng Hsueh-peh, Minister of Information, told correspondents that the Government has found it impossible to make any progress in the current peace talks "owing to the over-all Communist offensive."

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The end of the first week of the Paris Conference found opinion in the United States still for the most part unenthusiastic regarding the efforts that were being made by the Allied statesmen to reach a settlement with the minor Axis countries. Conservative internationalists like Mr. John Foster Dulles spoke of the Conference as little more than a first step in the peace-making, pointing out that the vital question of Germany would not be taken up until later, while liberals like Mr. Raymond Swing insisted that the present meeting was a mere travesty of a real peace conference and condemned it as "a second-class conference with considerably less than second-class authority, making recommendations on second-class treaties." Those who felt that, despite its many shortcomings, the long-awaited gathering of the Allied nations would at least provide a platform from which the conscience of the world could make itself heard were particularly gratified by Mr. Byrnes' proposal of the 30th July that all plenary sessions and all meetings of the commissions to study the treaties should be thrown open to the press—as well as by the unexpectedly prompt endorsement which this received from M. Molotov. Nevertheless their satisfaction was to a considerable degree offset by the general aversion to the five Peace Treaty drafts published the same evening. To all except the extreme Left-wing, the latter seemed to belie the repeated assurances of Mr. Byrnes and Senator Vandenberg that democracies would never compromise with principle for the sake of securing agreement from Moscow. The draft Treaty for Italy would, it was feared, leave the country dangerously exposed to Soviet political and economic pressure, while the draft Treaties for Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria would perpetuate Soviet domination over the Danube valley and most of the Balkans.

As a result of the interest aroused by the round-up of suspects in Tel Aviv and by the rejection by the Zionists of the proposals submitted by the Anglo-American Cabinet Committee in London, the problem of Palestine continued to deflect some of the limelight from the proceedings of the Allied delegates in Paris. The essential features of the Cabinet Committee's provincial autonomy plan for Palestine had already been made familiar by a number of press leakages, and the Zionists had already shown their firm intention of rejecting the plan root and branch, when Mr. Morrison and Lord Addison made their formal announcements at the opening of the debate in Parliament on the 31st July. The Zionists had also made it abundantly clear that they would wreak vengeance at the polls next November on any member of Congress who dared to identify himself with the plan. Consequently there was little surprise when the President issued his non-committal statement of the 31st, in which he merely announced that he had decided to summon Mr. H. Grady and the other American members of the Cabinet Committee back to Washington "to discuss the whole matter in detail." Nevertheless Mr. Truman was apparently much distressed at the attitude which he found himself forced to adopt. The original intention had been that, when His Majesty's Government issued their full statement on the Anglo-American Committee's proposals, he should make a shorter announcement indicating, inter alia, his belief that the plan which they embodied represented the best solution of the problem that could be expected. The text of this announcement had already been approved by Mr. Byrnes in Paris. On the morning of the 30th July, however, the President received a deputation of pro-Zionist members of Congress led by Representative Emanuel Celler of New York, and the same evening the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, informed His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington that Mr. Truman had reluctantly come to the conclusion that he was unable to give the plan the proposed endorsement. Meanwhile Senator Robert A. Taft, a prominent Republican member of the Upper House, had made the situation more difficult by announcing his opposition to any solution of the Palestine problem along the lines proposed by the Cabinet Committee. Whatever now emerges from the discussions which Mr. Truman is due to have with Mr. Grady and his colleagues on his return from Missouri on the 6th August, it seems clear that he will repudiate any settlement for Palestine, however equitable, which threatens to cost his party votes in the forthcoming Congressional elections. The press has, however, made no secret of the role which the Jewish vote has played in his political thinking on Palestine, and the effect which his surrender to the Zionist lobby will have on his prestige in the eyes of the Gentile electorate and of the rest of the world remains to be seen (see also under "Middle East").

The 79th Congress of the United States came to a formal close with the simultaneous adjournment of the Senate and the House of Representatives on the evening of the 2nd August. Unless the President finds it necessary to call the special session to deal with inflation as he threatened to do in his message of the 25th July, the Chambers on Capitol Hill will now remain unoccupied until the 80th Congress assembles next January. In the field of domestic politics the 79th Congress will probably be best known to history for its defiance of the White House on almost every major item of legislation presented during its second session—a defiance in some ways unparalleled since the bitter feuds between President Andrew Johnson and the 39th and 40th Congresses in the years that followed the Civil War. Of the forty-two important measures requested by President Truman, less than a third were approved in anything like the terms in which they were originally drafted. Eight, including the vital Office of Price Administration Extension and Selective Service Bills, were only passed with crippling amendments, and the rest, including the Emergency Powers Bill to deal with the strike situation, were either defeated outright or pigeon-holed indefinitely. In the international field, however, the late Congress had a far more glittering record. Apart from its recent acceptance of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement and of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Inter-National Court, it ratified the United Nations Charter with only two dissenting votes and endorsed the Bretton Woods proposals and the international monetary system which they made possible. It also acquiesced willingly when Senator Vandenberg proclaimed that American foreign policy would henceforth be bi-partisan—with the result that, whatever the outcome of the November elections, the present lead which the United States is taking in world affairs stands in no serious danger of being repudiated.

LATIN AMERICA.

Argentina.

In a conversation with the United States Ambassador, General Perón has confirmed his intention of putting the Chapultepec and San Francisco decisions before Congress for ratification (see Summary No. 351), adding that he hoped to hold a secret session in order to avoid any verbal unpleasantness. Mr. Messersmith pointed out that the delay in obtaining ratification was doing harm to Perón in the United States and that it might soon be said that Argentina had been admitted to the United Nations under false pretences. When Mr. Messersmith expressed the hope that the Anglo-Argentine negotiations would be successfully concluded, Perón replied that the questions of sterling balances and meat prices were very difficult, but that "they were going to find a solution."

Mr. Messersmith remarked afterwards that Perón was clearly concerned about the deterioration of the internal political situation, of which there has recently been further evidence. Dr. Bramuglia resigned from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in protest against the Senate's rejection of his diplomatic appointments, but has been persuaded by Perón to stay on for the time being. As an example of Perónist dissensions, a recent incident may be mentioned in Catamarca, where the Perónist provincial Senate demanded the removal of the no less Perónist Governor. The President sent an investigator whose report led to the Governor's place being taken over by the Vice-Governor. Crowds of workers then demonstrated in favour of the Governor, who accordingly resumed his duties without reference to Perón. According to broadcast reports, a bill has now been passed to authorise federal intervention in Catamarca.

Interference with political opponents still continues. Interventors remain in control of the Universities, and have now been appointed to the Benevolent Society and Engineering Centre. Meanwhile, presidential intervention in the activities of the ministers is conspicuous by its absence: the Minister of Industry and Commerce (Sr. Lagomarsino) and the director of the Central Bank (Sr. Miranda) are reported to be making money out of their official positions, and the fact that Mrs. Perón is deeply involved in these intrigues and scandals serves to make the President ridiculous and to emphasize that he is far from being the "strong man" he has been painted.

Brazil.

Dr. Vargas' reappearance on the political scene (see Summary No. 349) has led to lengthy negotiations between the President and the political parties. It will be recalled that when Dr. Vargas took his seat in the Constituent Assembly a motion was presented by the Opposition expressing approval of the army's action in forcing his resignation and that this motion, which was adopted by a couple of votes, revealed a split in the President's P.S.D. The fact that a considerable section of his party was primarily loyal to the ex-dictator suggested that General Dutra could only be able to hold the P.S.D. together by coming under Dr. Vargas' influence, and negotiations were accordingly begun for a coalition between the Dutra wing of the P.S.D. and the opposition U.D.N. The Minister for War, General Góes Monteiro, who played the leading part in bringing the Vargas régime to a close, was responsible for arranging a meeting between the President and the Opposition leader, Dr. Octávio Mangabeira.

The negotiations seem to have met with various difficulties. The immediate formation of a coalition would mean that the Constitution which is now to be debated would be approved by only a small majority: in order to prevent this, it seems probable that the P.S.D. and U.D.N. will agree on the final form of the Constitution, and thus assure it a large majority. Only after the passage of the Constitution would the coalition be formed and the cabinet be reorganised to admit representatives of the U.D.N. It is reported that they would receive the portfolios of Foreign Affairs, Labour and Finance, and might be offered the Vice-Presidency. Meanwhile, an attempt has been made to depict General Dutra as President of all Brazilians, presumably in order to conceal the fact that he is no longer the effective leader of a majority party.

UNITED NATIONS.

Atomic Energy Commission.

Committee No. 2 achieved some progress on the 31st July; Russia had said baldly that inspection would violate the principle of national sovereignty, and that no system of inspection could guarantee proper control. The Committee thereupon decided to ask the Scientific Committee whether control of atomic energy could be made effective, and, if so, how. The Secretariat has drawn up a comprehensive list of topics for the Legal Committee to consider, covering all the major points of difficulty in the relationship between the system of control recommended by Committee No. 2 and the United Nations. The Working Committee will be asked for instructions on the order in which these numerous topics are to be considered.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Plenary Sessions of the Peace Conference were adjourned on Saturday the 3rd August, after the South African representative, Major-General Theron had delivered the last of the formal speeches each leader of the twenty-one delegations was expected to make. During Tuesday's session, the 30th July, Mr. Byrnes repudiated U.S. isolationism and promised that the United States would do its best to secure the Big Four's acceptance of the recommendations made by a two-thirds majority of the Conference. Mr. Attlee pledged his support for the Foreign Ministers' various agreements. At the same time he said that the views of the 17 States must be given full consideration. He thought that the Conference's discussions would "most considerably assist the attainment of agreement on those parts of the Treaties not so far agreed," but pointed out that without agreement between the Big Four the chance of agreed texts was very small. Dr. Wang of China came out boldly for a just and lasting peace, rather than the compromises on which so much of the Foreign Ministers' work was based. He urged the allies to respect the principles they had proclaimed during the war, and in particular the Atlantic Charter as it applies to territorial questions. M. Molotov spoke on Wednesday. Two of his statements were significant. (1) The Foreign Ministers proceeded not by way of imposing upon some States the will of others, but by way of joint decisions and arrangements, an argument which was shortly to develop into the claim that any attempt to alter or amend the decisions by the Four was necessarily an attempt to destroy the unanimity of the Four. (2) The Soviet so values the good work done by the ex-satellites that it wishes them to pay the Allies compensation on only a limited scale. For the same reason it opposes all attempts at economic interference which would be incompatible with the sovereignty of these States. It was the argument M. Molotov used in the Council of Foreign Ministers to counter all proposals to secure the opening of the Danube to world trade on equal terms. Dr. Evatt, who followed, upheld the rights of the smaller nations, who fought the war, to join in making the peace. Like Dr. Wang, he urged that the principles of the Atlantic Charter be observed. Territorial questions, he considered, should be determined by an impartial examination of all the facts. Therefore all material considered by the Foreign Ministers should be available for the Peace Conference. He objected especially to Russia's privileged position in regard to Italian reparations, and to Trieste being placed under the Security Council, where the veto operated. Amongst speakers on Thursday, the 1st August, Baron Van Ousterhout most effectively supported the claims of the smaller nations. Mr. Mason of New Zealand said that exchanges of territory should not be carried out without consulting the people concerned. M. Kardelj of Yugoslavia and M. Lange of Norway also spoke. At Friday's Plenary Session M. Masaryk said that Czechoslovakia would have no more 1919–1938 Minority Treaties. Mr. Mackenzie King made the important suggestion that the Foreign Ministers should meet from time to time during the life of the Peace Conference. Thus the Treaties could be completed in such a way as to emphasise the joint responsibility of the 21 whilst still leaving the last word to the Four. The Ethiopian delegate, M. Ato Akilou, who followed M. Rzymowski of Poland, claimed both of Italy's East African colonies. M. Kisselev of Byelo-Russia spoke of the need for Four Power Unity, and said that public opinion could not endure the continued occupation of the Italian colonies by United Kingdom troops. On Saturday the 3rd August Sir S. Ranganadhan (India) recalled India's vast contribution to victory and described her peculiar interest in the Italian East African colonies, which, he said, should become independent as soon as possible.

Procedure.

The Commission on Organisation and Procedure was the essential part of the Conference. Set up to discuss the rules drawn up by the Big Four, it was deciding the very nature of the Peace Conference itself. Were the draft rules of procedure merely suggestions, as Mr. Byrnes had clearly stated, or did they bind not only the Big Four, as M. Molotov tried quite inaccurately to prove, but the Conference itself? Could agreed clauses in the draft treaties be altered by the Conference? Could the Twenty One even succeed in making any recommendation, seeing that under the two-thirds majority rule, 8 votes could prevent the passage of any recommendation? Was the usefulness of the Conference to consist in the publicity it brought to bear on the decisions of the Four, its direct contribution to the peace being limited to the problems which the Four had left unsolved? Finally, from the point of view of the smaller nations who took part in the common victory, was the Conference just a solemn mockery?

On Tuesday, Dr. Evatt proposed M. Spaak as Chairman. M. Molotov proposed M. Kardelj because Yugoslavia, he said, had played a larger part in the war than Belgium. A secret ballot gave M. Spaak 13 votes to M. Kardelj's 7. M. Kardelj was chosen vice-chairman by acclamation. It seems that Ethiopia voted for the Russian candidate, and that Norway abstained from voting. It was then decided that the Press should be admitted to all the Commissions. This proposal of Mr. Byrnes, supported by Dr. Evatt and M. Molotov, may have the effect of driving the more delicate negotiations away from the lime-light into the "corridors."

Wednesday was spent in discussing the Yugoslav motion that the draft rules be accepted. No decision was reached: but one argument used by the Russian area is likely to prove as helpful to its inventors and scarifying to potential opponents as was that cruder bogey, the so-called "Western Bloc." It started with M. Kardelj's statement that the aim of the Conference should be unanimity. A two-thirds was therefore more desirable that a simple majority; for as M. Molotov said, it gave a recommendation more authority. Further, it safeguarded the rights of minorities; since, as M. Molotov showed by quoting from the French Press, the Anglo-Saxon countries and their clients formed a bloc of 12 or 13 votes, and a simple majority would place the Soviet and its clients always in a minority. M. Kardelj extended the argument by claiming that in ethnic questions the States directly interested must agree to all decisions. Subsequently he advanced to the formal proposition that in all boundary questions the Ally concerned should have the right of veto. Another side of the argument was that nothing must be done to disturb the unanimity of the Four. Certainly each member of the Four will stand by the draft treaties on which they have jointly agreed; but M. Molotov did not succeed in persuading them to give similar support to the draft rules of procedure, because Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes had expressly reserved their right to vote for any amendment which harmonised better with the wishes of the Conference. The champions of the smaller Powers and of the Conference were Dr. Evatt and Baron Van Ousterhout, M. Spaak, Mr. Mason and M. Tsaldaris.

On Thursday the Greeks secured an amendment which authorises the Conference to discuss "any question connected with the peace treaties." Their aim is to be able to discuss Northern Epirus. A Netherlands motion that all the 21 nations should sit on each Commission was defeated; but it was agreed unanimously that any nation that wished to attend, could do so without the right to vote.

Friday and Saturday were taken up with the Council's claim to reserve the chairmanship of the Conference for the Big Five. Dr. Evatt considered this claim a dangerous precedent for future peace conferences, i.e., on the Pacific area. The Netherlands delegate proposed M. Bidault as permanent chairman and might have secured general agreement had not M. Molotov insisted on the Council's rule being upheld. M. Bidault at once refused to stand. The Dutch therefore proposed that the Conference elect its own chairman. M. Molotov then accused Mr. McNeil of going back on the Council's decision. Mr. Byrnes and he both exposed the fallacy of this contention; but they said that they would vote for the Council's decision on the logical ground that the Netherlands proposal seemed to command no more support than the Council's decision. The Netherlands proposal was defeated by 12 to 8, with one abstention.

Three sessions on Monday the 5th August and two on Tuesday, the latter of which ended at 2·35 on Wednesday morning, were devoted to the rule, which M. Molotov had induced his Foreign Minister colleagues to accept, that recommendations from the Conference need a two-thirds majority before the Council will consider them. This vast expenditure of time and heat was due to the determination of M. Molotov and his comrades that no other kinds of recommendation should reach the Council; and it is a reasonable deduction that he reckoned on no proposals of which they disapproved ever becoming recommendations under the two-thirds rule. Mr. Byrnes made this clearer still, when he recalled that, ever since Potsdam, Russia had voted to restrict the number and freedom of participants in the Conference, and that she had agreed without reservations on the 4th July to send out invitations to the Conference, and had then made her consent depend upon the Council drawing up rules of procedure for the Conference.

Four proposals were before the Conference : (1) by the Dutch, that all voting should be by simple majority : (2) the United Kingdom compromise that recommendations should be of two kinds, two-thirds majority and simple majority, and that the Council should consider each : (3) by the Russians, that the two-thirds rule should stand, but that a recommendation carried by a simple majority might be sent up, not by the Conference, but by the States in the majority. This proposal was not a compromise, since the Conference itself could still send only two-thirds majority recommendations, and in any case each belligerent ally already had the right to put its views before the Council : (4) the usual kind of French compromise, that in addition to the two-thirds rule, the Conference should be able to send up simple majority recommendations at the request of their supporters.

Early in the debates, Mr. Jordan showed the absurdity of the two-thirds rule by asking why 35 per cent. should be allowed to override the wishes of 65 per cent. Later, when it almost seemed that a vote would end the talk, M. Molotov suddenly revived the notorious argument used by M. Gromyko in the Security Council debate on Spain of the 26th June, and said that the voting issue was a matter not of procedure but of substance and therefore required a two-thirds majority, and this, in spite of the fact that the debate was in the Committee on Procedure. At once the Netherlands delegate asked M. Molotov if he would consent to his new proposal being voted on according to the two-thirds rule, assuring him of the opposition of at least 8 members. M. Molotov was silent. Once, the Yugoslav stated solemnly that his country would not accept proposals with which it disagreed, and more than once M. Molotov seemed to be claiming veto rights for Russia.

At last, the Netherlands motion, in favour of a simple majority, was put to the vote, and lost by 9–11. Finally, as midnight struck on Tuesday/Wednesday, the United Kingdom compromise was passed by 15 votes to 6, a margin of much promise for the future.

Twice in the course of these long proceedings, M. Molotov, always ready to accuse the U.K. and U.S.A. of inconsistency, himself went back on the Council's decisions : (1) he supported, albeit unsuccessfully, Poland's claim to join the Commission on Hungary : (2) he contradicted the draft rules by proposing a two-thirds majority in the Committee of Procedure. It appears that Mr. Byrnes has stated that he will do his best to secure acceptance by the Council of any recommendation which has gained a two-thirds majority in the Conference, even though the U.S. had voted with the minority. This promise appears to apply to recommendations on subjects agreed by the Council as well as on the 26 subjects on which the Council did not agree. It is unlikely, however, that any amendment of the agreed provisions can be carried by a ⅔ majority against the Big Four who have pledged themselves to support the agreed provisions at the Conference. Moreover, it must always be remembered that the Council's decisions have to be unanimous, and that it is bound to consider recommendations, not to accept them.

Wednesday the 7th August was a day of peace after storms and the rules of procedure were adopted unanimously in their amended form. The following proposals were approved : (1) from Yugoslavia, "should a proposal from an Allied State, neighbour of an ex-enemy State, receive no majority in its favour, then the Allied State should have the right to submit the case to the Council of Foreign Ministers" : (2) from the Big Five, that none of themselves should be chairman of a Commission, and that the "Commissions should each be able to invite any ex-enemy to express its views" : (3) that, in matters not covered by the rules, the Conference should be "guided by the principles of the rules of the General Assembly."

THE Anglo-American talks on bi-zonal arrangements in Germany (of which the agenda was outlined in Summary No. 367) opened in Washington on the 13th November. The major obstacle to agreement has been the question of sharing the financial burden between the two Governments and in this respect negotiations are taking place at a particularly inauspicious moment when, whatever the opinions of the United States Administration, it is bound by the determination of the new Republican Congress to achieve financial economies. In discussions on export-import plans for 1947–49 the British representatives urged unsuccessfully the advisability of a long-term reconstruction loan by the United States to Germany to make her solvent in three years. The American view appears to be that essential food and relief imports should be paid for on an equal financial basis, the American share being paid from appropriation, while additional imports of raw materials should, on the American side, be financed by short-term advances from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (see Summary No. 364). British representatives have made it clear that they cannot assume the burden of paying for 50 per cent. of such essential imports of food and other raw materials. Discussions continue with the possibility of a slightly larger contribution from the R.F.C. Agreement has, however, been reached on a number of other points. It is clearly understood that the foreign trade plans depend on an increase in industrial production beyond the limits agreed by the four powers and that since economic unity had not been achieved the two governments are free to take action. General Clay has stated that so far as the US zone was concerned he intended to retain just as much plant as was necessary to achieve a balance of payments as soon as possible, while the British representatives have asked for a joint announcement on policy. It has provisionally been decided to support, to the full extent that funds will permit, an eventual increase in the food ration to 1,800 calories, although the world food supply is unlikely to allow this before the summer of 1947 or possibly 1948. It is also agreed that existing trade barriers should be relaxed as soon as possible, that an exchange value for the mark should be established and an early financial reform carried out, while the exchange of "full technical and business communication" between Germany and other countries together with the restoration of normal business channels with potential buyers should be facilitated as soon as possible. A German bi-zonal trade agency will be the administrative agency for imports and exports. At a meeting of the bi-zonal economic committee in Frankfurt last week it was announced that a German foreign trade agency would begin work on the 1st December.

Coal exports from the British zone have been cut by a further 200,000 tons a month from December until March, thus reducing exports to 585,000 tons a month. When the first cut of 150,000 tons was announced in October it was pointed out (see Summary No. 360) that this was insufficient to restore German economy and it is extremely doubtful whether even the latest reduction will achieve the necessary effect (for French reactions see under "France"). Largely owing to increased miners' rations coal output in the Ruhr has risen from 180,000 tons a day in October to 195,000 tons on the 14th November. The long-term food situation in the British zone remains unchanged. Marshal of the Royal Air Force Sir Sholto Douglas has toured the Ruhr towns and Hamburg. On the 15th November he stated that he hoped to keep the ration up to 1,550 calories even if the bread ration had to be reduced. While senior Military Government officials have emphasised that the position remains critical Mr. Hynd has stated that this winter, though grim, would not be as bad as last winter. The U.S. zone has offered 50,000 tons of grain provided this can be repaid in reasonable time, but it has not yet been possible to give such a guarantee and negotiations are continuing. The first small shipments of grain from the Soviet zone are beginning to arrive. In the French zone Trade Unionists have also protested against the food situation. By contrast, in Berlin supplies are stated to be ensured for the winter, but the city is suffering from a critical power shortage.

It is reported that the Provisional Ordinance for decentralising administration in the British zone has been issued in Berlin (see Summary No. 366). Under this ordinance, subject to Control Council Laws, the Länder will have the power to legislate on any subjects which are not specifically reserved from their competence and will have executive authority over matters on which they legislate as well as being empowered to administer laws passed by the Centre, except in a few cases such as posts and railways. Subjects on which the Länder may not legislate include not only foreign affairs and defence but such matters as central banking, income tax, criminal and civil law, the direction of basic industries and distribution of materials in critically short supply. Military Government also exercises emergency powers over reparations, occupation costs, demilitarisation, displaced persons and refugees, wages and price control, labour control, social insurance, trades unions and timber felling. Subjects temporarily excluded from the Länder legislatures include land reform, insurance and the production and collection of food. On a fourth series of important topics, Military Government will lay down fundamental principles which must be followed, as, for example, on Church affairs, development of industry, housing, agriculture, press and meetings. This ordinance comes into effect on the 1st December and, as already announced by General Robertson, the Länder will assume authority by the 1st January, 1947. Thereby, as part of the planned transfer of control to the Germans, and in line with action taken last December by the Americans, British officials will cease to exercise executive functions at the lower levels of Government but will continue to supervise the Land Governments with the power to veto any law and will retain control at the higher levels.

On the 12th November the Control Council was informed that an ordinance had been issued setting up Land Lower Saxony which will include Schaumburg–Lippe. The Soviet member, again insisting that it had not been agreed to eliminate the State of Prussia, contended that such a major reorganisation should be made by quadripartite agreement. Land assemblies and cabinets in the British zone are now being re-formed in order to bring them into line with results in the district elections of the 13th October. The most important Cabinet is that of Rhineland–Westphalia, since its composition will affect the carrying out of socialisation of the Ruhr industries (to which the Christian Democrat leader, Adenauer, has already expressed opposition). The Christian Democrats have now stated that they are willing to enter the cabinet, although they refused to do so in August, and negotiations are being carried on between the non-party premier Amelunxen and party representatives. Amelunxen is likely to remain premier until the elections in March 1947. It now appears that Agart (SPD) head of the Central Economic Office of the British Zone has resigned this post and it is possible that he may become Minister of Economics in the Rhineland–Westphalian cabinet. The composition of Hamburg Senate was announced on the 15th November; the SPD has a clear majority over the Free Democrats and Communists, but unfortunately the CDU abstained from voting considering that the Senate should represent all parties.

In the Soviet zone the distribution of the 520 Diet seats has been completed and gives the Socialist Unity Party (with supporters like the Cultural League) an absolute majority in Thuringia, Mecklenburg and Saxony State, but not in Brandenburg and Saxony Province. Seats in the Berlin Magistrat have not been finally allocated. One result of the Social Democratic victory in Berlin has been to increase the party's campaign against the Berlin Branch of the Freie Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund, now under SED domination. Results of this campaign may be decisive in the Trade Union elections in February 1947 and would have important effects on the position of the SED, just as the Communist victory in the Trade Unions last February paved the way for "fusion." Abandoning the hope that the FDGB can be restored as a "non-political" organisation Dr. Suhr stated on the 5th November that the party was out to "conquer the FDGB" presumably to avoid the danger of being manœuvred into forming a rival trade union. The SPD has recently concentrated its attack on the FDGB's allegedly feeble attitude over the removal of workers to the USSR. In the British zone trade unions seem likely to retain their "non-political" character at least for some time. Communist penetration is not yet sufficient to force the issue although the party already has some strength in the mines (see last week's Summary).

The four-power committee controlling IG Farben confirmed on the 14th November a resolution that control officers in the four zones should appoint separate trustees for each unit until the legal future of these works is decided. This will be the first visible step towards breaking up the combine. In the US zone the Laender have already been asked to nominate German trustees for those units which are not being removed. The appointment of German nationals is in line with the step taken at the end of October in the British zone when Dinkelbach (formerly on the board of directors of Vereinigte Stahlwerke) was appointed head of the "trusteeship" section of the North German Iron and Steel Board.

In accordance with General Clay's reparations proposal (see last week's Summary) the Economic Directorate announced on the 12th November that it would allocate immediately between the Western Countries and Russia general purpose equipment from some war plants in the three Western Zones. The subsidiary British plan, referred to last week, was criticised by the Soviet representative as contrary to the Potsdam Agreement. The plan was also debated in the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency on the 14th November and opposition to the scheme may necessitate amendments. (See also under "France," "Low Countries" and "Poland".)

AUSTRIA

At the Allied Control Council meeting on the 15th November General Clark defended the Austrian Government's action in raising the food ration against Soviet and French criticism. He explained that U.N.R.R.A. had been able to buy additional food for Austria owing to the War Department's decision to reduce by 5 million dollars its bill to U.N.R.R.A. for supplies which the latter took over in Austria last April. Any additional supplies which U.N.R.R.A. might buy thus come from money put up by the United States Government (who have, however, made no condition that the supplies are to be used in their zone, or in the zones of the western occupying Powers, as seemed possible a few weeks ago). Indeed, General Clark went on to emphasize his anxiety that Austria should be treated as a unit. He wished to make plain that there was no restriction in the United States zone on the movement of indigenous resources to other zones, and he did not want a higher scale for the U.S. zone, provided that the uniform scale for all Austria was sufficient for a person to live on. But he naturally could not allow supplies to flow freely from the U.S. zone unless others did the same, and he referred to reports that potatoes coming into Vienna from the Soviet zone, for example, were only for consumption in the Soviet zone. General Clark did not believe that there would be sufficient indigenous supplies available to enable Austrians to have an adequate diet after U.N.R.R.A. supplies cease on the 1st January. In spite of all efforts to make all indigenous resources available, he was convinced that a deficit would remain which could only be made up by imports, and he had arranged during his visit to the United States to have some supplies in the pipe-line after the 1st January as his contribution.

General Zheltov said that the Soviet Union adhered to the principle of Austrian control of indigenous resources, but held that it did not apply to property taken under the terms of the Potsdam Agreement or held for military purposes. This view, of course, effectively nullifies the recent Allied Council resolution that the Austrians should control all indigenous resources (see Summary No. 366).

The French authorities in Austria have reacted strongly to recent statements by the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Schaerf, in which he criticised the control and use by all four Allies of Austrian resources, and alleged that the French were exporting meat from their zone, using butter, cheese and other produce to feed the occupying troops, and exporting cloth and timber. The statement issued on the 14th dealt in detail with Dr. Schaerf's allegations, and said that it must be emphasised that France had supplied Tyrol and Vorarlberg with much more than she had received.

The report of a Sub-Committee of the Select Committee of Estimates of the House of Commons, which visited Austria in September, has added its warning that Austria is approaching an extremely critical situation which must create grave anxiety, both to the Allied Commission and to the Austrian Government. The report stated that a major crisis will arise this winter unless a quick decision is reached on how to close the gap in supplies when U.N.R.R.A. ceases to function. It described the increase to 1,550 calories as "even slower starvation" than the slow starvation 1,200 calory food ration. The country's whole economy was supported by relief imports, of which 80 per cent. were food imports, which meant that they contributed nothing to make Austria self supporting. The Committee stressed the need for concentrating British policy on strengthening the Austrian administration as quickly as possible so that the occupying forces might be withdrawn. It recommended almost complete demilitarisation and reduction in numbers of the staff of the British element of the Allied Commission; release at an early date of as many as possible of the less dangerous Nazi internees; a speed-up of the entry into Britain of Austrians who wish to come here for permitted employment (although the types of workers who would be needed here are urgently needed for reconstruction in Austria, and any large-scale movement of such workers as agricultural and building workers would only add to Austria's economic difficulties); priority, where possible, for the return of Austrian prisoners-of-war in British hands; and finally that the problem of the permanent settlement of the displaced persons should be brought to the attention of the United Nations by the British Government with a view to finding out what countries are willing to receive them, and so that suitable arrangements might be made for their transference.

The question of displaced persons left in Austria at the end of the war, of whom there are still large numbers in the British zone, (see last week's Summary), is complicated by the influx of Jews from Eastern Europe into Germany and Austria which the Committee's report calls "almost a second Exodus." These people have been migrating from Eastern Europe into the American zones of Germany and Austria with the intention, in the majority of cases, of finally making their way to Palestine. It is clear that it is a highly organised movement with ample funds and great influence behind it, but the Sub-Committee were unable to obtain any evidence as to who are the real instigators. When the United States authorities asked the other zones in September (see Summaries Nos. 360 and 361) to receive some of the Jews for whom they could not find room, the other three Powers agreed that the best policy was to tighten control of the frontiers to stop any further influx, for they could not feed more people in their zones. The Russians, at least, took prompt action in stopping trainloads of Jews at the frontiers with Czechoslovakia and Hungary. There are now, however, two camps in Styria run by U.N.R.R.A., full of able-bodied, young Jewish men and women, with a large proportion of children, for whom the Americans could not find room.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Czechoslovak Parliamentary committees, which are representative of all parties, have in recent weeks provided considerable criticism of Government policy. That they should do so is particularly important where a National Front Government is working to an agreed programme of a revolutionary nature which is satisfactory, in its entirety, only to the Communists. Thus, for example, the Foreign Affairs Committee heard on the 31st October from the Peoples Party deputy, Dr. Chudoba, a searching criticism of foreign policy, in particular of the pro-Soviet behaviour of the delegation in Paris. This, he implied, had not served him well in their American relations, nor with regard to the Slovak-Hungarian dispute. On this last question Dr. Clementis had remarked that Czechoslovakia might be "compelled to effect a final solution herself"—might, in other words, resort to unilateral expulsion.

On the 12th November, a joint session of the Foreign Affairs, Resettlement and Socio-Politcal committees brought forth some strong criticism of the progress of repatriation of Czechs and Slovaks from abroad. These emigrants, descendants of peasant and industrial settlers, are being placed in the Border Regions in an attempt to offset the loss of Germans recently expelled. The committees were provided with a statistical survey of these movements. So far contingents of about 10,000 from France (mostly miners) Austria and Poland respectively, another 3,000 from Belgium, and the same number from Germany and from Yugoslavia, making a total of 40,000. Excluding Hungary, there are about 250,000 nationals still settled in other European countries; 140,000 in Yugoslavia, 50,000 in Roumania, and 35,000 in Volhynia (Soviet Ukraine). Repatriation agreements are in operation with the governments of the last two. The Volhynian Czechs, it was stated, are to be moved in 120 special trains before May 1947. It may be noted here that the Communist party has been more successful than its competitors in planting and organising supporters in the Border Regions, with the help, particularly, of the Ministry of the Interior.

The freedom of the press in Czechoslovakia depends in the same way upon the dogged resistance of the non-Communist parties and their fellow-journalists to the continuous efforts of the Minister of Information, M. Kopecký, to gain control. He is once again introducing a Press Bill, a revised version of one argued down last year. At present only the political parties and group interests (e.g. Youth, Legionaries) are allowed to have their own press—apart from purely scientific and artistic bodies. In his speech on the 13th November, M. Kopecký claimed that this arrangement had general support, and that there would be no return to the pre-war system whereby the wealthy Stříbrný Press was able to make treasonable attacks upon the State. His new Bill, however, would give the Minister greater powers in "curbing anti-government propaganda," and in assuming the duties of the provincial censorship offices, which exist unchanged under the pre-war law. The last proposal incensed the Slovak Democrats, who saw that it conflicted with the present powers of the Slovak Department of Information. This "press dictatorship," as the Slovak Democrat paper termed it, would be further entrenched by an increased use of such discriminatory practices as refusal to grant new licences and favouritism in paper allocations which have already caused so much irritation. Further, M. Kopecký proposed the publication of a "Government daily" in an evening edition; this would mean, in fact, a fourth Communist daily, (counting the Trade Unions and Youth papers as such) as opposed to the one-per-party scheme. This is a disquieting development, when it is realised that the aim is to recapture the record circulation of the only pre-war evening paper, which, ironically enough, was Stříbrný's Večerní České Slovo.

POLAND

At its session on the 12th November the Presidium of the National Council of the Homeland decreed that elections to the Legislative Chamber should be held on Sunday, the 19th January, 1947 (see Summaries 362 and 363). The electoral period was fixed to start on the 17th November, and separate dates were clearly specified for various electoral programmes. The results of the voting will be published on the 31st January by the General Electoral Commission.

The Warsaw Radio has announced that a solid electoral "bloc" would be formed by the Polish Socialist Party (P.P.S.), and Polish Workers' Party (P.P.R), the Peasant Party (S.L.), and the Democratic Party (S.D.). These four parties formed the original "Lublin" Committee under Russian protection. It was also reported that the Labour Party (S.P.), would join this bloc only in the regained territories, acting independently elsewhere, and that the "New Liberation" Peasant Party (P.S.L.–N.W.) had not yet reached a decision. This last party is a dissident group which has split off from the P.S.L. of M. Mikolajczyk, who is leading his own party under separate electoral lists. Being in opposition to the "Lublin" parties, he has met with their customary obloquy, including the accusation of collaborating with "Polish Hitlerite supporters" in the attempt to make Poland's future dependent on Germany's powerful friends.

According to British press reports, however, there are signs that the P.P.R.–P.P.S. unity is less solid than it appears.

The two parties are said to have failed to reach an agreement on the question of a joint list of candidates. The P.P.R. proposed that the P.P.S. and itself should each have 32 per cent. of the seats in the diet, 25 per cent. going to the S.L., and the rest to the smaller parties. The P.P.S. pointed out that this would give the P.P.R. a permanent majority of 57 per cent. (since the S.L. is known to favour complete collaboration with the P.P.R.). The P.P.S. counter-proposal was that 80 per cent. of the seats should be equally divided between the P.P.R. and itself, and the rest between the other parties.

The only point of agreement between both parties was said to have been the decision to allot M. Mikolajczyk 12 per cent. of the seats. They have not much time for reconciling the divergent opinions, since lists of candidates have to be announced by 10th December.

Poland's western frontier continues to be one of the most important questions of her foreign policy. According to press reports, the Polish Government is thinking of asking the Council of Foreign Ministers at New York for separate representation during the initial discussions on Germany.

This request is said to be actuated by a desire to obtain an adjustment of the frontier along the Oder estuary such as would give Poland the whole of the island of Uznam (Usedom). At a Warsaw Congress of three thousand Poles from the "regained territories," a resolution was passed that the island of Ruegen, if not given to Poland, should be placed under the protection of the United Nations. It appears doubtful whether this latter demand has the support of responsible Polish circles. Inside Poland itself a national levy is to be raised by the Government, in order to accelerate the economic rehabilitation of the Western territories. The Government has contrived to claim credit, even for a drastic step of this character, inasmuch as the gradation of the levy strictly according to financial means is being represented as an act of social justice, as well as an effective reply to critics of the Oder–Neisse line.

The first number of the weekly publication "Glos Anglii" ("The Voice of England") has not had a very favourable reception from official Polish critics. The paper's object is to present various aspects of British life, but the Socialist newspaper "Robotnik" complains that the "omission of the most topical British problems cannot be made good even by the finest articles on exhibitions, fashion, sport, or British education and literature."

The "Voice of England," according to Robotnik, should be "the voice of the new Britain of the Labour Party, and not of the old Conservative Britain."

SOVIET UNION

Reinforcing the attitude adopted by the Soviet delegates to the United Nations, the commentators in the press and on the radio have been at pains to calumniate British rule in the Sudan, South Africa's policy, and recent developments in colonial countries generally. "Egypt's claims to the Sudan are unanswerable," asserted Moscow radio in Persian and a Wafdist (Cairo) newspaper is quoted as saying that "Bevin wants to convert the Sudan into a British commercial concern . . . . so that he can get a grip on her throat." This was capped by the statement that the streets of Sudanese towns were "recently flooded with the blood of Sudanese demanding the realisation of the age-long aspirations of the Sudanese nation . . . ." General Smuts was reminded that his demands (with regard to South-West Africa) were typical of the imperialist trend in the post-war organisation of peoples in dependent or colonial countries.

"Such methods," said the speaker, "are resolutely rejected by those who look upon the U.N. as an instrument for the establishment of world democracy and the triumph of the great ideals which have inspired the peoples in their war against Fascism and aggression."

M. Vyshinsky's speech in the United Nations General Assembly on displaced persons has been made the occasion for renewed attacks in the Soviet press on the policy of the Western Allies in their zones in Germany and Austria. It was claimed that, whereas all allied prisoners-of-war and civilian deportees had been returned long ago from the Soviet zone, 1,200,000 remained in the western zones. An article in Krasnaya Zvezda asserted that these people were terrorised by the authorities and threatened with whipping and starvation if they expressed a wish to go back to the U.S.S.R. It was further alleged that when a group of Soviet citizens in one camp started issuing a wall newspaper "The Motherland Calls," the paper was torn down and the editor threatened by British officers with detention and whipping. The activities of the Ukrainian nationalists—only to be expected in view of the large number of deportees and refugees from Eastern Galicia—also came in for criticism together with those of citizens of the Baltic States and anti-Tito Yugoslavs. Krasnaya Zvezda conceded that among these persons there might be some genuine traitors to their Soviet motherland, but the majority were described as longing for repatriation and not knowing how to get away from the camps—a statement that might cause a wry smile to harassed British and American officials.

The first clear official confirmation of earlier evidence and rumours that Marshal Koniev had replaced Marshal Zhukov as deputy Minister of the Armed Forces and Commander-in-Chief of the Land Forces was given by Krasnaya Zvezda (the 17th November) in a short item on the Frunze Military Academy referring to Marshal Koniev as Commander-in-Chief of the Land Forces of the Armed Forces of the U.S.S.R. Though Zhukov is still believed to be in Odessa, his position remains obscure and the press has made no reference to him for months. On the other hand, Marshals Tolbukhin and Rokossovski, whom earlier rumours alleged to have fallen into disgrace, have both been referred to recently in the press in terms which suggest that they still hold their previous positions.

The first Soviet comments on "The British Labour Party Revolt" against the Government's foreign policy were more restrained than might have been expected, while strongly stressing "the people's support" of the amendment. It was pointed out (by Moscow radio in Italian) that "a rebellion" was an inadequate term to define an amendment backed by over 60 Labour M.P.s, which proved the development of opposition within the Party, "and a state of mind widespread among the Labour masses and all British workers—which contradicts the present trends of British diplomacy."

The recent Moscow criticism of the principles and the inadequacy of world food relief, mainly attacking the U.S.A. and Canada (see Summary No. 365), has now been reinforced by an unpleasant new line in regard to the U.K. food supplies and "hunger diplomacy." It is pointed out that "in its allocations for 1947, the World Food Council has allowed Poland, Yugoslavia, Greece, Czechoslovakia, the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Albania, China, Italy and Austria only one-fifth of the amount of fats that Britain alone is to receive. These ten countries together get 25 per cent. less fats than Belgium and the Netherlands."

Although no official announcement of it has yet appeared, the Soviet Government have recently made certain changes in the nomenclature of the Soviet armed forces and now wish the three services to be known respectively as "Soviet Army," "Soviet Navy," and "Soviet Air Force" and no longer as "Workers' and Peasants' Red Army," "Workers' and Peasants' Red Navy," etc. The merging of the People's Commissariats for Defence and the Navy into a new Ministry of the Armed Forces in March of this year had already led the Soviet newspapers to refer much more frequently to "the armed forces of the U.S.S.R." than to the Red Army and the Red Navy. But it was not until after the introduction of new "Internal Regulations for the Armed Forces" in August that they began to use the names "Soviet Army," "Soviet Navy" and "Soviet Air Force" with unmistakable unanimity and regularity. As a corollary, the press is also substituting "serving man," "soldier," and "sailor" for "Red Army man" and "Red Navy man." The change seems to be part of the same process of stressing the prestige and dignity of the Soviet State and its organs as recently led the Soviet Government to replace "People's Commissars" and "People's Commissariats" by "Ministers" and "Ministries."

denied by Tass as "a slander from beginning to end." As might be expected, Chinese official sources have maintained a discreet silence about this incident, though, according to the Peiping correspondent of the New York Times (the 14th November) "Chinese officials were taking a most serious view of it."

International Youth Day on the 10th November was duly celebrated in Moscow and two days later the Soviet anti-Fascist Youth Committee held its plenary sessions. The World Federation of Democratic Youth, founded a year ago on the pattern of the World Federation of Trade Unions, was said to have reached a membership of 45,000,000. Stress was laid in the speeches at Moscow on the links between the World Youth Federation and the International Union of Students; Soviet citizens, secretaries of the Komsomol Central Committee, are vice-chairmen of both bodies. The Soviet anti-Fascist Youth Committee has set up a special section for extending connections between Soviet students and the International Union of Students. A new monthly periodical "World Youth" has just started to appear in Moscow in Russian, English, French and Spanish. The first number contained an article on the terror to which Greek Youth was exposed with the help of British tanks and another urging the setting up of Committees in all countries for friendship with Spanish Youth and the severance throughout the world of relations with General Franco.

Although the World Youth Federation includes representatives of Socialist and even some Roman Catholic Youth organisations, Komsomolskaya Pravda, on the occasion of World Youth Day, launched out vigorously against the Socialist Youth International and "certain Church organisations encouraged by the Vatican" for knuckling under to Fascism. The article accused "reactionary elements among the occupying Powers" of fostering, and the Catholic Church of encouraging, undemocratic trends among the Youth of Germany and Austria.

The total enrolment of labour trainees in trade and factory schools this year is planned to rope in some 250,000 young persons; the second routine call-up for this purpose started on the 15th November. Some 147,450 youths aged 16–18 are to join factory schools and others aged 16–19 will be entering various branches of the metallurgical industry, according to the Deputy U.S.S.R. Minister for Labour Reserves, L. I. Pogrebnoy. An acute labour shortage is one of the many difficulties holding up the reconstruction programme in the Soviet Union and it might therefore have been expected at least that labour trainees would have been forthcoming according to schedule. But, according to official statements, this is far from being so, and grave shortcomings are admitted in the work of the Ministry of Labour Reserves who have failed to provide the requisite numbers of miners, metallurgists, railwaymen, builders, textile workers and "building materials" workers. Both the factory training and the living conditions, including accommodation and equipment for young workers, are also criticised as extremely unsatisfactory. It is therefore uncertain whether the Government's plan for recruiting labour from this source will be fulfilled this year.

By a decree of the R.S.F.S.R. Supreme Council, N. N. Mirotvortsev (R.S.F.S.R. Deputy People's Commissar of Light Industry) has been promoted to be R.S.F.S.R. Minister for Light Industries, in place of A. F. Shchegolev, who has been relieved of his post.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

In a conversation with Mr. Bevin recently on the possibility of Belgian territorial claims against Germany, M. Spaak said that the difficulty confronting him was that, in view of the claims made by the Netherlands, Luxembourg and France, his own people would expect him to make similar demands, and would cease to be satisfied with assurances of adequate compensation for Belgian sufferings during the war. He remarked that the scale of Netherlands claims—both territorial and economic, but particularly territorial—had been much reduced: in earlier discussions on the subject with Dutch Ministers he had urged moderation, and he thought it was possible that the reduction of at least their territorial claims owed something to his efforts. But, in his opinion, the economic claims were still disproportionate. M. Spaak then expressed his complete agreement with the long-term view of the German economic problem taken by H.M. Government, and the necessity of eventually integrating German industry into the economy of Europe. He also agreed with Mr. Bevin's wish to postpone examination of the territorial claims until such time as they could be taken together. He added that his own difficulties would be somewhat mitigated if he could be assured that the claims of other countries—whether territorial or economic (presumably in their present form)—would in all probability be rejected. To this Mr. Bevin replied that, if it was proposed to put forward Belgian economic claims on a scale similar to those of other countries, the greater would be the chances of rejection for all these claims, since the total would be still more disproportionate to the proposed future German economy.

The unstable Huysmans Cabinet has managed to survive its latest crisis (12th–15th November), for which the threatened resignation of the four Communist Ministers was ultimately responsible. The crisis arose out of the election of M. Marchand, sole representative of the Union Démocratique Belge in the Chamber, to the newly-created fifth Vice-Presidency of the Chamber, instead of M. Lahaut, President of the Communist Party, for whom the office had been earmarked. The totally unexpected return of M. Marchand was a nasty shock for the Communists; but his success was openly acclaimed by M. van Acker and his supporters. Furious, the Communists sent an ultimatum to M. Huysmans, demanding "total and immediate reparation for the outrage done to the Communist Party," on the ground that the attitude of certain members of the coalition tended to call in question the principle of Communist participation in the Government. The Communist Ministers then took the extreme step of sending a letter of resignation to M. Huysmans. The crisis was eventually resolved by one of the Socialist Vice-Presidents agreeing to surrender his post, and the Socialist parliamentary group to give unanimous support to M. Lahaut's candidature; whereupon the Communist Ministers withdrew their resignation.

The Netherlands

Dr. Ir. J. A. Ringers, non-party Minister of Public Works and Reconstruction, resigned on the 15th November. Recent reports suggested that Dr. Ringers had contemplated resignation on account of ill-health; but the real cause has since been stated by the ex-Minister himself. "At the time of the formation of the Beel Cabinet," said Dr. Ringers, "I declared myself prepared to accept the post temporarily, despite grave misgivings. The objections which I then raised were due to the former Cabinet's policy towards the N.E.I." Ir. Vos (Party of Labour), Minister of Transport, has temporarily replaced Dr. Ringers (16th November). (For the terms of the Draft Agreement with regard to the future of Indonesia, see under "Far East.")

FRANCE

The readiness of the Communist Party to assume the responsibilities of leadership of the Government and the conduct of the foreign relations of France, has been illustrated by an important pronouncement made by M. Maurice Thorez, General Secretary of the party. M. Thorez took the almost unprecedented step of giving an interview to Reuter's correspondent in Paris which was published in the continental edition of the Daily Mail on the 15th November. He said that "we would sign an alliance with Great Britain to-morrow if we could obtain a settlement of the German problem which satisfied our just desires." France was grateful towards all the Allies and would not choose between them; she considered agreement between them to be essential. However, she was critical of Anglo-Saxon policy towards Germany since this seemed to aim at the restoration of German domination in Europe. France needed security and reparations: the first must be assured by absolute control of the Ruhr, the prolonged occupation and effective disarmament of Germany, the liquidation of Fascism, and the economic union of France and the Saar. On the question of control of the Ruhr, some compromise agreement must be reached with the U.S.S.R. As for the disarmament of Germany, M. Thorez recognised that some of Germany's heavy industries must be developed, but insisted that they must remain under close control. France's second need, reparations, must be met in large part from the coal produced in the Ruhr; "we really cannot understand the British refusal to give us more Ruhr coal." M. Thorez then denied the suggestion that the Communist Ministers had held up the Anglo-French commercial negotiations and declared that the Communists had always favoured the development of mutually advantageous trade.

Two days lated M. Thorez gave an interview to the Paris correspondent of the Times. After repeating the substance of what he had said to Reuter's correspondent, he declared : " We want the ties of friendship and alliance between Great Britain and France to be drawn more tightly . . . I come from a province (Artois) into whose soil too much British blood has flowed for me to underestimate the worth of Franco-British friendship. Agreement must come of a mutual understanding of the interests of our two countries and of a just settlement of the German problem." Turning to Communist domestic policy M. Thorez said that the party had not asked for a mandate to carry out a strictly Communist programme, but one of national reconstruction, acceptable to all democrats. "The Communist Party, in its action as part of the Government and within the framework of the parliamentary system it has helped to re-establish, will hold strictly to the democratic programme which has won for it the confidence of the masses of the people." Russian Communism was not the only path to Socialism, and France, with her great traditions, would find her own way. The French Workers' Party, which they wished to create by the fusion of the Communist and Socialist Parties, would be a guide to the new democracy and would open its ranks also to Catholic workers. In conclusion M. Thorez said that the French Communists hoped that their aims would be understood in Great Britain.

M. Bidault will hand the resignation of his Government to the acting president of the National Assembly when it meets on the 28th November. It will then be open to the Assembly to ask M. Bidault to carry on until the election of the President of the Republic, in January, enables a proper Government to be formed, or to try to find at once the basis for a new Government whose leader would simply have to be confirmed by the President of the Republic. The second solution has in its favour the need for an authoritative Government to represent France at the current international discussions and to deal with the precarious financial situation. For the moment, however, the parties are waiting for the results of the elections to the Electoral College of the Council of the Republic, which will take place on the 24th November. The Communists have indeed laid claim to the Premiership and invited the Socialists to join them in forming a Government based on the "Republican majority" in the Assembly, but the Socialists have postponed their decision. Such a Government would need the support of the Radicals in order to have a majority in the Assembly, but the Radicals are at present showing great reluctance at the idea of any alliance with the Communists.

The press, thanks to judicious guidance from the Quai d'Orsay, was at pains to blanket the news that a further cut was being made in coal exports from the British Zone of Germany (see under "Germany")—it was relegated to the inside pages—and some understanding comment on the matter was published. Even L'Humanité, no doubt reflecting M. Thorez' new mot d'ordre, was less aggressive than usual.

SWITZERLAND

On the 11th November a Swiss Delegation, headed by a Professor Keller, visited London to discuss with the Treasury and the Bank of England the operation of the Anglo-Swiss Monetary Agreement of March 1946 and the probable trend of payments between Switzerland and the Sterling Area. All aspects of the financial situation were discussed. The Swiss were worried because the limit of £10 million which they had agreed to hold in the first year of the Agreement had been exceeded in the first eight months. The reasons for this are, in the first place, that, although the U.K. are supplying to Switzerland goods whose value is substantially in excess of the value of Swiss exports to the U.K., this advantage is offset by reason of the fact that the rest of the sterling area have an adverse balance on trade with Switzerland; and secondly that financial payments, the greatest factor in which is the tourist traffic, are running heavily in Switzerland's favour.

To adjust the balance of trade between Switzerland and the sterling area, it was suggested that the Swiss should endeavour to secure more goods from the sterling Dominions and India; the Swiss have already approached the Dominions representatives in London. As regards financial payments, the Swiss view that it is undesirable that the local tourist expenditure should assume unreasonable dimensions is shared in London; but it was pointed out that the question of the measures to be taken to achieve this end was primarily the concern of the Swiss. The Swiss Delegation returned to Berne on the 16th November to consult their Government on this point.

The Federal Council has decided to issue a new loan of 400 million francs, of which 298 million will be used for conversion purposes. 200 million are to be issued at 3 per cent. for twelve years, and 200 million at 3¼ per cent. for twenty years.

A communiqué issued to the press stresses the unfavourable treatment of Switzerland in the distribution of food. It says that the privileged treatment of that country has ceased to exist. The average ration is given as 2,550 calories, compared with United States 3,100, United Kingdom 2,800, France, Holland, Belgium and Norway 2,300 to 2,500, Italy, Greece, Yugoslavia and Austria 1,700 to 2,400, and Germany 1,600 to 1,800. The statement points out that a yearly quota of cereals is refused, oils and fats are less than 50 per cent. of the pre-war consumption, and sugar 55 per cent. The meat supply averaged 191,000 tons before the war; not more than 120,000 tons will be available in 1947.

According to a Swiss communiqué concerning the Swiss-Belgian trade agreement which was signed in Berne on the 26th September (see Summary No. 364), the Belgian import and export quotas laid down cover the period from the 16th September, 1946, to the 16th September, 1947. Belgium will deliver coal, iron and steel, metals, tissues and colonial timber. Payments will also liquidate outstanding accounts of the past two years in favour of Swiss creditors. Proceeds of the export surplus to Switzerland will be used for tourist traffic, insurance and transit expenses.

A Swiss delegation visited Berlin last month and made agreements with the British and American authorities for the resumption of trade between Switzerland and these respective occupation zones. Swiss deliveries will consist of foodstuffs and raw materials in compensation for German goods as and when they become available.

The Federal Council has recommended the merging of "Swissair" and "Alpar" into one Swiss National Air Line. For this purpose the Confederation, the Post Office and Federal Railways will participate in the increase of capital of "Swissair" from 1 to 20 million francs.

The budget of the Federal Railways for 1947 estimates revenue at a record figure of 543 million francs, which is 70 per cent. higher than in 1938.

A Swiss delegation has returned from Warsaw after preliminary discussions regarding the nationalisation of Swiss Firms in Poland.

SPAIN

The U.K. Delegation in New York has now worked out with like-minded delegations an agreed text for an Assembly Resolution about Franco Spain. It eschews all idea of intervention in Spanish domestic affairs, laying emphasis rather on the welcome which will be extended to the Spanish people in the United Nations conclave when the country has been rid of the Franco régime. The text also records in general terms the view that free and democratic elections in Spain would be "in the interest of Spain and world co-operation" and recommends the continued exclusion of Spain as she is from membership of any agency or organisation under the auspices of the United Nations. Logically, of course, the Russians should welcome such a punctilious care for the national sovereignty on which their whole attitude to the Organisation is predicated. But they will scarcely forgo the magnificent propaganda opportunity which the platform of the Assembly provides

Meanwhile, encouraged by optimistic messages from Spanish newspaper correspondents in New York—who take the line that, so long as the British and American delegates stand firm, any "action" by the Assembly will be a damp squib—General Franco has chosen the A.P. news agency as the vehicle for an expression of his views on Spain's international position. His statement is on the familiar pattern. All proposals for isolating Spain economically and politically, says the Caudillo, are just a plot hatched by Soviet Communism. Spain has not committed any breach of the peace, on the evidence of the Security Council itself, and to go against the plain meaning of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter would be to deprive members of the United Nations of all guarantees of security. Asked about the reports that his Government were contemplating a trade deal with the U.S.S.R. (emulating President Perón),

General Franco answered that, while the Soviet Union behaved as it did, there was no possibility of commercial relations. He pointed out incidentally that, except for the phase of "subservience" during the civil war, Spain had not in fact had normal diplomatic or commercial relations with Russia for thirty years. Finally, he gave once again the assurance that elections (municipal and provincial) and a referendum would be taking place in Spain one fine day but that it would be for him to choose the occasion. To-day, when the Spanish people were being incited to rebellion from abroad, and Spain was the object of villainous manœuvres in international assemblies, was certainly not the right moment.

H.M. Ambassador in Madrid confirms that the resumption of foreign pressure has duly had the effect of sharpening civil war animosities—and has temporarily spoiled the chances of success of the move towards a caretaker Government sponsored by the Alianza Democrática and their opponents in the Catholic and Monarchist camps (see Summary No. 366). On the 11th November Sir Victor Mallet had a warm half-hour of argument with the Spanish Foreign Minister when he went to see him inter alia to rub in the significance of the Resolution at the Trades Union Congress. Señor Artajo was in mettlesome mood following the result of the French elections. He had something to say about the more turbulent atmosphere, exemplified by recent bomb outrages and demonstrations on the occasion of the funeral of a Falangist victim, which was the result of renewed foreign pressure. He himself, he said, was having great difficulty in restraining right-wing Franco supporters. If the Byelo-Russian Resolution, demanding economic sanctions, were approved by the United Nations Assembly, the Spanish Government would resist to the last gasp "and if there was no petrol Spaniards would ride on mules!" Then, once again, he asked, somewhat plaintively, why the Spanish Government never got any credit for its resolute anti-Communism. H.M. Ambassador tried to make him understand that anti-Communism was no passport to the good graces of the Allies and that Franco's past damned him utterly in the eyes of all democratically-minded people. Civil war, certainly, had to be avoided at all costs, but still nothing had been done about the promised elections . . . . and the sands were running out.

Foreign opinion has naturally remained totally unimpressed by the "National Congress of Spanish Workers" which has been meeting in Madrid this month to the accompaniment of the usual national-syndicalist ballyhoo. Nor does it take kindly to the evidence, probably exaggerated, of renewed police activities. A recent drive against Communist underground forces is said to have resulted in numerous arrests, and three weeks ago the security police in Barcelona was reported to have rounded up more than fifty alleged leaders of the clandestine Republican Army formation (AFARE) and to have confiscated the complete set of archives and papers belonging to the organisation.

ITALY

On the 12th November Count Carandini delivered to the Foreign Ministers communications from the Italian Government on the subject of the possibility of direct negotiations between Italy and Yugoslavia. Signor Nenni wished it to be clearly understood that the Italian Government was ready to enter direct negotiations with Yugoslavia on the assumption that the agreement of the Big Four of the 3rd July, 1946, and the majority decision of the Paris Conference stood firm, and that if it proved impossible to reach direct agreement between the two countries, the above decision would in any case remain an accepted fact. The Italian Government was anxious to know if the Foreign Ministers concurred in these points.

On the 14th November H.M. Government informed Signor Nenni that although the Council of Foreign Ministers maintained their position as regards the decisions of the 3rd July, H.M. Government would be prepared to examine sympathetically any agreements reached by Italy and Yugoslavia, particularly if these agreements appeared likely to promote international peace. In view of the lack of detail so far received of Marshal Tito's offer, H.M. Government were not in a position to estimate the value of initiating direct negotiations. This was a matter for the Italian Government to decide, remembering that any agreement would be most carefully studied by the Council of Foreign Ministers in the light of decisions reached in Paris. As regards Signor Nenni's request that any agreement reached between the two countries be guaranteed by U.N.O., H.M. Government replied that in the circumstances no special guarantee could be given, but that in their view any such agreement approved by the Council of Foreign Ministers would have to be incorporated in the Peace Treaty.

On the 11th November the U.S. Government replied to Signor Nenni that they considered themselves bound by the decisions of the Council of Foreign Ministers. The continuance of direct negotiations was of course a matter for the Italian and Yugoslav Governments to decide. But the U.S. Government themselves would take no initiative in advocating a fresh solution. As regards a question of guarantee the U.S. Government expressed themselves in more or less the same sense as H.M. Government.

In the meantime Signor Togliatti has made a bitter attack on Signor De Gasperi's foreign policy, in particular on his attitude to the offer which he, Signor Togliatti, brought back from Marshal Tito. In his speech Signor Togliatti claimed that this was Italy's last chance of retaining Trieste. A large majority of the Italian people apparently believe this. It is further suggested that the Communist Party's success in the municipal elections is in great part due to this assertion of Signor Togliatti's.

Italians have not yet realized that political education in democratic government must begin with popular interest in control of local government, and that this is particularly true when there has been no political liberty for twenty years. In the municipal elections on Sunday, the 10th November, only 55 per cent. of the voters troubled to go to the poll.

The principal results of the elections in six large towns—Turin, Genoa, Florence, Rome, Naples and Palermo—were the defeat of the Christian Democrats in each town and the unexpected increase in the representation of the Uomo Qualunque party. In Turin, Genoa and Florence, the Communists won outright and Uomo Qualunque came low on the list; in Rome and Naples the People's bloc (Communists, Socialists, Party of Action and other left-wing parties) headed the list, but Uomo Qualunque came second; while in Palermo, Uomo Qualunque came first and the Monarchists second. The increase in the Uomo Qualunque's strength was most marked in Rome where the group polled 105,000 votes, and the increase was generally much more pronounced in the South than in the North. The position of the Christian Democrats, the centre party, has gradually been growing more and more difficult. As the party which won more seats than any other single party in the national elections, it holds 10 Ministries in the Government, and Signor De Gasperi, the leader of the Party, is the present Prime Minister. In these conditions Signor De Gasperi and his party are attacked as if they alone were the Government, and the fact that the Left—Communists, Socialists and Republicans—hold 11 Ministries between them is conveniently passed over. As regards Marshal Tito's offer, the Government has been attacked by both Right and Left; by the Right for even considering it, and by the Left for rejecting it. Signor Piccioni, Secretary of the Christian Democrat Party, attributed the party's failure in the municipal elections partly to the abstention of nearly 50 per cent. of the voters, partly to the formation of the left-wing bloc, and to attacks by the right-wing opposition and left-wing parties which formed part of the Government.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Magyar Nemzet reports that the Hungarian minority in Transylvania are expecting a substantial improvement in their economic situation as a result of General Susaikov's request to M. Groza to dissolve the Office for Abandoned Enemy Property. By the terms of the Commercial Agreement between the two countries, which is instanced as a further proof of good will, Hungary will deliver 1,000 wagon loads of maize and beans to Transylvania in exchange for timber, motor oil and raw material for her mines. Though it would be too much, states M. Gyönögyosi, the Foreign Minister, to expect a revision of the territorial decisions arrived at in Paris under the pressure of power politics, hope still remains that the Council of Foreign Ministers will allow Hungary and Roumania to settle the minority question by direct negotiation.

M. Molotov's announcement that the Soviet Union had restored to Hungary among other countries all the assets in the Soviet zone of Germany which could be identified as belonging to her raised a protest from Mr. Byrnes who maintained that the Russians had violated the agreement to await a general understanding for the return of property, M. Molotov replied that "no agreement should interfere with a just deed." The French Government have notified the Hungarian Government of their intention to give back all Hungarian property found in their zone. The first consignment consisting of motor vehicles, clothing, drugs and surgical instruments has already arrived.

M. Molotov did not prove receptive to Mr. Bevin's suggestion that with the withdrawal of the occupation forces from Italy and Bulgaria the time was approaching to consider whether the lines of communication across Hungary need be longer maintained. Great reductions have, however, been made during the last few months.

The slow progress made by the inter-party discussions is, according to Vilag, the newspaper of the bourgeois democrats, to be accounted for partly by the recent absence in London of M. Szakasits, the Social Democrat Deputy Premier, and partly by the desire of the left-wing bloc to postpone the Municipal Elections. M. Szakasits himself, when questioned on the reform of the Electoral Law, said that no important changes were likely. A few war criminals and Fascists might be excluded, but these form only an insignificant fraction of the Hungarian electorate. The Smallholders, too, seem to have successfully resisted the attempt to expel the so-called anti-democratic Deputies from the National Assembly. The Communist plan for a full-scale scheme of nationalizing the flour-mills has (see Summary No. 366) been modified as a result of influence exercised by the Social Democrats who thought the demand untimely. The Smallholders have agreed that the big mills should be nationalized and the small ones brought under borough control. M. Szakasits stated that barring the nationalization of electric energy no further alterations in this direction would at present be made.

Though subject to revision the B-listing (forcible retirement) of 1,700 Smallholder members of the Police Force, as against 500 left-wing or non-party members, may tend to give an exaggerated impression of its use as a political weapon, since many officials have been dismissed as survivors from the old régime rather than for their party affiliations. M. Bán, the Social Democrat Minister of Industry, declared that the chief aims of the B-List were to assure rational production and the success of stabilization. But that political discrimination has been employed is clear if we are to believe the evidence of Hirlap, the Smallholders' newspaper, which quotes the case of a police officer discharged from the Force for his refusal to leave the Smallholders' and join the Communist Party. Nor is this, says Hirlap, an isolated incident.

Roumania

By the time this Summary is published the Roumanian "election" will be over. In the opinion of a British official who has exceptional opportunities for observing the course of events and has many years experience of residence in Roumania the Communist majority is likely to be about 80 per cent. If the election were not rigged, the Communists might secure 1 per cent. of the votes.

The Government bloc have chosen the sun as their symbol. (The use of such symbols is necessary in Roumania in view of the widespread illiteracy of the people.) The whole of Bucharest is plastered with Government posters bearing the words "Votați Soarele" (Vote for the Sun!), the device is painted on hoardings and vacant spaces, and super-imposed on stamps and on the outside of matchboxes, and public conveyances have their headlights converted into suns by day and illuminated with electric bulbs at night. The police stop all motor cars and paint suns upon them. The election lists, completion of which is controlled by communist committees, are clearly a complete farce. It is estimated that in Ploiești and Câmpina as many as 50 per cent. of the voters have been struck off the lists. Any voter who is struck off has a right of appeal. But about 20 certificates are required for every appeal, and these are issued—or rather not issued—by the authorities. It was further announced in Ploiești on a certain day that lists of candidates must be deposited at the Tribunal, the list of Government candidates on one day and the list of all other candidates on the next day. The Government list was duly deposited, but the following day the workers in the oil refineries stopped work, and crowding into the offices of the tribunal prevented the lists from being deposited. The workers are not very brave, and as on other occasions were terrorised into obeying orders. Any attempt at opposition propaganda is met by violence, although the Government have repeatedly said that all electioneering facilities would be permitted to all parties. The opposition parties have decided rather against their better judgment to withdraw D-ni Romniceami and Hatzieganu from the Government.

An anonymous message has been received at the British Legation with a threat that the Legation will be blown up unless the British Government ceases its anti-Jewish policy. Appropriate security measures have been taken.

Yugoslavia

Croatia and Serbia elected their Constituent Assemblies on 10th November, the last of the republics to do so. These elections can be judged only by the proportion of the enfranchised who had the courage to abstain. At the polling booths there was rarely any alternative but to vote for the official candidate; occasionally there was a choice of two or more National Front candidates. According to Yugoslav custom the system adopted was one of dropping rubber balls into boxes, so that there was no question of spoiling ballot papers and there was no "Box without a list" as had been the case in the elections of November 1945. The Press published the results in percentages giving few of the actual figures. In Macedonia 94·56 per cent. of the electorate voted. In Bosnia 92·6, in Montenegro 95, in Slovenia 95·87, in Croatia 94, in Serbia 96·9. Some of the lowest percentages were recorded in N.E. Slovenia, in the district of Maribor (80–90 per cent.), where the election results in November 1945 had been the most unfavourable to the Government. At Cetinje, in Montenegro, every person on the voting lists used his or her vote.

The Yugoslav Press has questioned the "democratic character" of the Bulgarian draft constitution, according to which any frontier adjustments must be decided by the Grand National Assembly. This, the Yugoslavs declare, violates the principle of self-determination, for, if the people of Bulgarian Macedonia should wish to join Yugoslav Macedonia, their fate would be decided, not by themselves, as Macedonia, but by the Bulgarian majority in the Grand National Assembly.

The Serbian Patriarch Gavrile has returned to Yugoslavia, whence he was removed by the Germans in 1941.

Greece

Consternation was caused in Athens by the report that on 13th November a band some 700 strong had driven a company of Greek regulars out of the village of Skra, which lies west of the river Vardar and close to the Yugoslav frontier, and that the village had only been reoccupied by the Greek army after severe fighting and the arrival of reinforcements. Armed bands made further attacks on Greek army posts in the neighbourhood on 14th and 17th November. This series of raids on a twelve-mile front, only a short distance from the frontier was, according to Greek statements, conducted by forces of the Communist-run Slav-Macedonian Nationalist Liberation Front (S.N.O.F.), and many of them came from, and most escaped to, Yugoslav territory—sometimes under cover of fire from Yugoslav troops. There may be ground for the belief said to be held in the Greek army that the purpose of the attackers was to occupy an area reaching to points not more than twenty-five miles from Salonica. In other parts also of northern Greece the activity of armed bands has been alarming. In the Grevena district, for example, they are reported to have been in a position to summon able-bodied men to join them. The Greek Government claim to have proof that band activity is actively supported from beyond the Greek frontiers.

In these circumstances the general public is disillusioned with all politicians. By various commendable measures, known to have been taken on British advice, M. Tsaldaris has accumulated unpopularity. He has got rid of extreme Right Ministers; withdrawn excessive frontier claims; announced a limited amnesty; met the plea for high wages by a promise of commodities at low prices; and accepted a reasonable scheme for the trades unions. It is small wonder that he holds out to the public hopes of British and American financial and economic help, though symptomatic of the Greeks' present inclination to look to outside aid rather than exert the maximum effort of the nation to mobilise its resources. Opposition leaders like M. Venizelos and M. Sofianopoulos talk of a coalition, widened towards the Left, dealing with the Communist menace. But they seem to be more concerned with bringing M. Tsaldaris' Government down than with constructive policy, and it seems plain that no Government will deter the Communists from making trouble unless it be one dominated by the Communists themselves. Meanwhile Moscow broadcasts continue to denounce British military support to Greece and to demand fresh elections—the "freedom" of which, were the British forces withdrawn, would no doubt lead to the same domination by a ruthless minority, as in Bulgaria and elsewhere.

Albania

On the 9th November H.M. Government informed the Albanian Government through the British Ambassador at Belgrade that the Corfu Channel would be swept by minesweepers of the Royal Navy on the 12th and 13th, in accordance with the unanimous decision of the Central Mines Clearance Board on the 1st. The precise area to be swept was defined, and it was added that no ships would be stationed in Albanian waters: the operation would be carried out in the same way as were the sweepings performed by us in October 1944 and February 1945, to which the Albanian Government raised no objections. (See Summaries Nos. 366 and 367.)

On the 11th November another completely disingenuous reply was received. The Albanian Government said they felt obliged to protest against H.M.G's "unilateral decision"; they could not agree that a sovereign State should be faced in this way with a fait accompli. They proposed a joint commission to discuss the question of laying down a clearly defined "passage" to be swept. But "any sweeping undertaken without the consent of the Albanian Government outside the determined passage, i.e. inside Albanian territorial waters where foreign warships have no reason to sail, can only be considered as a deliberate violation of Albanian territory and sovereignty."

The operation was carried out as arranged, and on the 13th November the Admiralty announced: "Minesweepers of the Royal Navy operating in the Corfu Channel have to-day swept 22 moored mines, two of which have been recovered and are being examined. Other mines have been sunk by rifle fire, but some may drift ashore. A full report is awaited from the Commander-in-Chief, Mediterranean Fleet." An armed Albanian boat flying a white flag is reported to have watched on the second day, but she did not approach our ships.

The Albanian Government at once sent a protest to the Secretary-General of the United Nations against Great Britain's "dictatorial act," at the same time asking for the establishment of a commission to determine the extent of non-territorial waters in the Channel. There the matter rests for the moment.

The United States mission to Albania left the country on the 14th (see last week's Summary).

Bulgaria

The question of our relations with Bulgaria was raised in the House of Commons on the motion for the adjournment on the 12th November. Three of the members who took part in the debate—Mr. Mack (Lab.), Mr. Zilliacus (Lab.) and Mr. Mott-Radclyffe (Cons.)—had each spent a week or so recently in that country. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Mayhew, declared that the responsibility for the unsatisfactory state of affairs in Bulgaria was due to the low political standards, not of the people, but of the Government. We wished Bulgaria to remain on good terms with all her neighbours, including Soviet Russia. We wanted her to go ahead with constructive social reforms. But Socialism never had been and never would be established on terror and oppression. No genuine working-class movement needed those weapons to keep itself in power: only unrepresentative minorities needed them. Greece's claims on Bulgaria, he added, had been reduced and were now being considered by the Council of Foreign Ministers.

The Grand National (or Constituent) Assembly duly met for the first time on the 7th November and M. Vasil Kolarov was again elected Speaker. M. Trifon Kunev, the 70-year-old Agrarian author, was released on the 9th after awaiting trial for four months; but the charges against him and other Opposition deputies like MM. Lulchev and Asen Stamboliski have not been quashed. M. Pastuhov remains in prison and his election has been declared invalid. It is reported that arrests and beatings have continued since the elections. (See also under "Yugoslavia".)

Turkey

The devaluation of the Turkish lira last September, the first considerable measure taken by M. Recep Peker's Government, has produced a rise in prices which that Government has been powerless to stem. The consequent discontent was voiced by the Democratic Party in the Grand National Assembly on the 13th November. M. Peker there took the line that he would welcome a general debate on so important a matter. But in the privacy of meetings of the People's Party—which is in power—there were stormy scenes, the two Ministers most closely concerned threatened to resign, and in order to avert a crisis the President of the Republic had to intervene. He was no doubt right in insisting that the resignation of two Ministers only three months after M. Recep Peker had taken office, would damage the prestige of the Popular Party (of which President Inönü is himself the leader). As head of the State he was perhaps equally concerned to maintain a solid front against continued Russian pressure.

Two recent articles in the semi-official Ulus have dwelt on the value which Greece and Turkey derive from their mutual friendship in view of the Russian menace to both of them. M. Atay points out that Greece and Turkey are the only bulwarks between the Slav bloc on the one hand and the Mediterranean and Middle East on the other. If one succumbs, so inevitably will the other, and yet, he says, there are both Greeks and Turks who act against their country's interests.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

By Royal Decree published November 11th, King Farouk has accepted the resignations from the Cabinet of Lutfi el Sa'id, Saba Habashi and Abdel Galil Samra Pashas. Salib Sami Pasha (Independent) is appointed Minister of Commerce and Industry, and Ahmed Abdel Ghaffar Pasha (Constitutional Liberal) is appointed Minister of State. It was known that Abdel Galil Samra Pasha had wished to resign, and that Lutfi el Sa'id Pasha was uncompromising in his opposition to the present Treaty proposals. The party balance in the Cabinet is unchanged, and it is clear that Sidky Pasha has hopes, particularly by the inclusion of Abdel Ghaffar Pasha who is well known for his pro-British attitude, of increasing support within the Cabinet for the conclusion of the negotiations on the present basis.

The King appears to be exerting every effort to settle the Treaty question, and has unofficially expressed to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires his satisfaction at the latest proposals. The dissident bloc in the Egyptian delegation, however, either for reasons of personal hostility to Sidky Pasha, or for fear of compromising themselves with the Wafd, shew no sign of giving way. The latest indications are that Sidky Pasha may treat the delegation merely as an advisory body and take his authority to sign a treaty from the Council of Ministers and from the Chamber of Deputies.

Parliament was opened on the 14th November by King Farouk with the customary ceremony. In the Speech from the Throne reference was made to the Treaty negotiations, and the general principles underlying them were defined as being, on the Egyptian side, the realisation of national claims, respect for the principles of the United Nations Charter, and the safeguarding of Egypt's position as a member of the United Nations. The position of His Majesty's Government was described as being based on the desire for a Treaty of Alliance which should be not merely a matter of form, but a reality which could be depended upon when the test came. Understanding of these principles was complete, but the negotiations were protracted owing to divergencies on matters of detail. The difficulties, however, had been overcome during the week of discussions which Sidky Pasha had had with Mr. Bevin in London, and the matter was now before the delegation and would be presented to Parliament.

A meeting of the Egyptian delegation—the second since Sidky Pasha's return to Cairo—was held on the 16th November, but no decision was reached.

Demonstrations by students of Cairo University and el Azhar took place inside the university premises as a result of incitement by the Ikhwan el Muslimeen, the Wafd and the Makramites, who distributed pamphlets which are said to have urged "evacuation or revolution." According to the Arab News Agency a Students' National Front was formed with a charter defining their aims as the full independence of the Nile Valley with free, democratic rule—an aim which it is considered possible to attain by the dissolution of the present Parliament and its replacement by a genuine democratic Government which would refer Egypt's case to the United Nations. Adherents of the Sa'adist and National Liberal parties did not take part in these proceedings. The Government had taken all precautions against demonstrations outside the university precincts, and there were no disorders.

Palestine

Neither recent Zionist denunciations of terrorism nor the release of the detained Zionist leaders have produced any reduction in the number of terrorist incidents in Palestine. Barely a day has passed without some outrage being reported. During the week under review there were reports of six bomb or mine incidents, as a result of which two British and four Arab police officials were killed, and sixteen British police and military wounded. In recent weeks a large proportion of attacks has been directed at the railways. The Government of Palestine, in consequence, were compelled first to restrict the operation of the Palestine railways to hours of daylight, and then to decree total suspension of the services from the 19th November.

There are indications that the Jewish Agency and the Haganah are now becoming genuinely alarmed at the extent and indiscriminate nature of terrorist activity. The bomb outrage which occurred at the British Embassy at Rome, and for which the Irgun Zvai Leumi have claimed responsibility (see Summary No. 367, "Italy"), appears to have caused particular concern, since it is held to have interfered with Jewish Agency plans for assisting Jewish illegal immigrants. While, however, some attempt may be made to assert Agency discipline over the terrorist groups, there would seem still to be no question of the agency co-operating with the Palestine Government to suppress terrorism.

It appears that the question of Jewish Agency participation in the London Conference is to be referred for decision to the Zionist Congress which will assemble at Basle on the 9th December. The Congress is expected to continue until the 23rd December, and seems unlikely that the Jewish representatives will be ready to join the London Conference on the 16th, when it is due to resume. There is little to indicate which way the decision of the Basle Congress will go. Berl Locker, in London, has expressed the opinion that the Agency could attend the Conference on the basis of the formula, worked out during earlier conversations with His Majesty's Government, "to join in the discussions with His Majesty's Government and present their views as to the solution of the Palestine problem": but Jewish reports from Palestine suggest that the Zionist attitude there is not forthcoming, and that, without a concession on immigration, Agency agreement to attend will be withheld.

The possibility that the London Conference will fail to produce a satisfactory settlement is already leading to discussion of alternative approaches to a solution. On the 18th November the London Times, in a leading article, wrote: "One course would be to confer immediate independence on the Holy Land on the basis of the existing population: the other would be to transfer the Mandate to the United Nations. . . . This country, however, will not readily be forced by violent means to abandon a trust upon which so much idealism has been lavished; it could only be compelled to do so by a conviction that in the eyes of the world its retention of the Palestine Mandate is an obstacle to progress." While the second of these courses would meet Soviet objections that no trusteeship agreement has been submitted to the United Nations in respect of Palestine, it is doubtful whether it would be favourably received either by the Arabs, who demand only independence, or by the Jewish Agency, whose chairman, David Ben Gurion, recently voiced the opposition of the Zionist movement to a trusteeship "whether administered by Great Britain or any other Power."

In an attempt to check the constant stream of Jewish illegal immigrants through Europe into Palestine His Majesty's Government have sought to enlist the assistance of European Governments through whose territory this traffic tends principally to flow. It is therefore a cause for satisfaction that the French Government have decided to call a meeting in Paris to discuss Jewish illegal immigration through France. His Majesty's Government and the United States Government have been asked to send representatives, and the French have also suggested that representatives of the military authorities in the three Western Zones of Germany should be asked to attend. His Majesty's Government have accepted the invitation.

Persia

Pre-election fervour (see Summary No. 367) has been somewhat diminished recently by the Prime Minister's postponement of the elections, which are now to be held between the 17th and 21st December. The principal event of the week in Tehran has been a twenty-four-hour strike, declared on the 12th November by the Tudeh Party as a protest against an attack alleged to have been made on the 10th November by members of the Democrat Party on Tudeh workers in the Tehran railway stores. Another reason for the strike was Tudeh objection to the appointment of a Democrat as head of the State railways. Although initially it involved all Tehran workers (including railwaymen), with the exception of those employed in bakeries and municipal services, the strike was not a success. It soon petered out when the Ministry of Labour sent police and military to arrest the ringleaders. The Governor of Tehran has taken drastic steps to prevent further serious demonstrations. On the 17th November he issued two proclamations, the first prohibiting all public political meetings or demonstrations and meetings of workmen in factories, the second forbidding the carrying of arms of any kind, except by members of the official forces. All arms held by private individuals are to be surrendered by the 26th November.

Zenjan has now been evacuated by the Azerbaijan Democrats (see Summary No. 366), and a Persian battalion is reported to have left Tehran on the 16th November to garrison the town. In spite of Pishavari's assurances to the contrary, it appears that financial and manpower problems are causing the Azerbaijan Government considerable embarrassment. On the 11th November a demand was circulated from Tabriz for 6,000 rials, and ten men with previous military experience from every village. These "back to the wall" measures may indicate either that the Azerbaijanis are determined to resist further encroachment by the Central Government, or they may be trying to frighten the Central Government into not taking a firm line with them.

Disunity and lawlessness are increasing among the Persian Kurds. Qazi Muhammed appears to have lost what influence he had outside Mahabad, and there now seems to be no cohesion among the tribal chiefs. The one idea which they hold in common is to maintain their tribal independence. Sardasht has once more become the centre of a Kurdish Democrat insurrection against the Central Government, while in Rezaieh the Kurds are extorting large subsidies from Tabriz as the price of peace.

From Kermanshah it is reported that, on instructions from the Prime Minister, General Saffair, Chief Prefect of Police, undertook a mission to the "Western Tribal Union" (see Summary No. 362) late in October. The demands of the tribal chiefs are reported (but not confirmed) to include the establishment of Provincial Councils, the improvement of local conditions, the election to the next Majlis of men from Kermanshah and not outsiders, an increase in the number of deputies from the province, the cessation of Tudeh activities and the selection by the tribes of their own representatives to control their affairs. These demands shew a remarkable similarity to those made by Nasir Khan Qashgai (see Summary No. 361), and were doubtless prompted by the success of the Fars rising. The Prime Minister has agreed to the tribes' demands in return for a pledge of loyalty to the Central Government.

During the last fortnight there has been a marked improvement in the attitude of the press towards His Majesty's Government. Even the Tudeh papers, such as Zafar and Rahbar, have lately almost ceased their anti-British propaganda. The Soviet Union received loud eulogies from the Tehran left newspapers and the Azerbaijan press on the anniversary of the October revolution. But these seeds apparently fell on stony ground, for, three days later, on the 12th November, a violent criticism of the Persian Democrat Party and the "reactionary elements" was broadcast from Moscow.

Afghanistan

During the last two months Government officials have been shewing great interest in political developments in India, particularly the formation of the Interim Government under Mr. Nehru. Although most civil servants have refrained from comment on Mr. Nehru's Government, some junior officials have expressed surprise that the new Government does not include representatives of the Muslim League.

THE FAR EAST

China

On the 15th November, at a ceremony in Nanking at which representatives of the various diplomatic missions were present, the National Assembly was formally opened by General Chiang Kai-shek. In a speech of some length General Chiang exhorted the delegates to proceed to the task of drawing up a democratic constitution on the lines agreed upon earlier in the year at the Political Consultative Conference in Chungking.

Reports describing the opening ceremony state that it was poorly attended and that, although the request for a three days' postponement—from the 12th to the 15th November—had been granted in order to allow the minority parties time to nominate their representatives, few among those present were not members of the Government Party. Two of the minority parties, but not the Democratic League, are reported to have sent in their lists of delegates, who are expected to take their seats in the Assembly within the next few days. It is now thought that the Democratic League and a number of non-partisans are likely to follow the Communist lead and boycott the Assembly.

Chou En-lai and most of the Communist delegates have returned to Yenan, and in Communist circles there is much talk of a final rupture between the two factions and of an expected full-scale attack on Yenan from four different directions by Kuomintang forces. On the other hand, Chou En-lai's assertion to the press that, although the Nanking Government have already recalled their military liaison officer at Yenan and negotiations have been terminated by the unilateral opening of the National Assembly, the Communist Party proposes to continue to maintain liaison offices at Nanking, Shanghai and Chungking, indicates that, even at this stage, the back door has been left ajar and the last word has still to be spoken.

Press reports state that Nanking military sources have confirmed the withdrawal of all Soviet forces from Dairen, and that the port is now in the hands of the Communists. Government forces have been on the outskirts of the town for some time, but it is not known whether the Generalissimo's general cease-fire order remains in force following the Communists' refusal to attend the National Assembly. For their part, the Communists have completely disregarded this olive branch, claiming that the cease-fire order is but a sham and that both in Manchuria and north China the Government are continuing to wage full-scale civil war.

Indonesia

After the plenary session on the 21st October there was rapid progress in the informal discussions between the Dutch Commissioners General and the Indonesian representatives on the major political problems concerning the future of Indonesia. One point of fundamental importance, however, proved a stumbling block. How was a link with the Dutch Crown—on which the Netherlands representatives insisted—to be compatible with an independent Republic of Indonesia? For a time this question created an impasse which, despite the strenuous endeavours of both parties, appeared impossible to overcome. The Commissioners-General were adamant that recognition of the Crown as the head of the projected Union, the supreme link between the United States of Indonesia and the Netherlands—constituted a sine qua non of any settlement, while on their side, the Indonesian Delegation insisted that acceptance of this condition would render their position untenable vis-à-vis the Indonesian people.

Failure to find a satisfactory solution rendered it necessary to postpone the plenary session that had been called for the 4th November. Finally Mr. Sjarir decided that he and the members of his delegation would have to return to Jogjakarta to discuss the whole matter in the Indonesian Cabinet. It was then arranged that the Commissioners General would go to Cheribon in time to resume informal discussions with the Indonesian Delegates on the 11th November—this course having the additional advantage of affording them an opportunity of contacting Dr. Soekarno and his "Vice-President" Hatta. It was also agreed that Lord Killearn would preside over the projected plenary session at Cheribon.

The two Delegations duly met at Cheribon and, after informal discussions which took place throughout the day and at which Dr. Soekarno was present, the following official communiqué was issued on the 13th November:—

> "The Commission General and the Indonesian Delegation have found a possible basis of agreement which on certain points, however, necessitates further discussion with the Netherlands Government."

The possible basis of agreement took shape in the form of a draft treaty which was initialled in Batavia two days later. The following is a brief summary of the provisions of the Agreement:—

Article I provides for recognition by the Netherlands Government of the Republic of Indonesia as the de facto authority over Java, Madura and Sumatra; and for immediate measures to be instituted for the gradual transfer of territories occupied by Allied or Dutch forces to Republican Administration;

Article II provides that the Netherlands Government and the Government of the Republic shall co-operate in the speedy establishment of a sovereign democratic State on a federal basis to be called the United States of Indonesia;

Article III provides that the United States of Indonesia shall consist of the whole territory of the Netherlands-Indies, provided that territories wishing to do so may contract out of the United States of Indonesia and set up their own administration as separate members of the Union (see Article VI);

Article IV provides (1) that the component States of the United States of Indonesia shall be the Republic, Borneo and the Greater East, and (2) that the United States of Indonesia may make special arrangements with regard to its capital;

Article V provides for the formation of a Constituent Assembly to determine the constitution of the United States of Indonesia;

Article VI provides for the co-operation of the Netherlands and the Republic of Indonesia in the formation of a Netherlands–Indonesian Union consisting, on the one hand, of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, including the Netherlands and the Netherlands West Indies, and, on the other hand, of the United States of Indonesia;

Article VII provides that the Netherlands–Indonesian Union shall possess its own organs and that co-operation in foreign affairs, defence and, so far as necessary, finance, economy and culture shall be considered as common interests;

Article VIII provides that at the head of the Netherlands–Indonesian Union stands the Kingdom of the Netherlands; and that decisions on matters of common interest shall be taken by organs of the Union in the name of the Kingdom;

Article IX provides for the exchange of High Commissioners by the respective Governments;

Article X provides assurances for the rights of both parties;

Article XI provides for a conference between representatives of the Kingdom of the Netherlands and of the future United States of Indonesia to draw up the Statute which shall come into force after ratification by the respective Parliaments;

Article XII provides that an endeavour be made to effect the establishment of the United States of Indonesia and of the Netherlands–Indonesian Union before 1st January, 1949;

Article XIII provides for the introduction by the Netherlands of the United States of Indonesia as a member of the United Nations Organisation;

Article XIV provides for the restoration of rights and properties to non-Indonesians to be undertaken by a mixed Commission;

Article XV provides that the Netherlands Government shall take the necessary legal measures to adjust the constitutional and international position of the Kingdom of the Netherlands to the new situation;

Article XVI provides for the reduction by both parties of their military forces;

Article XVII provides for the establishment of an organisation consisting of delegations to be appointed by the two contracting parties, with a Joint Secretariat. Disputes arising in connection with the agreement which cannot be solved by the two above-mentioned delegations shall be submitted to arbitration. In this case, a chairman of another nationality with a casting vote shall be appointed by agreement between the two delegations, or, if no agreement can be reached, by the chairman of the International Court of Justice.

The draft treaty will now presumably be submitted to the States General at The Hague, and the Commission General are returning to Holland in order to be in a position to inform the Netherlands Government on any points that may require clarification. It is understood that they propose to remain in Holland only so long as is absolutely necessary and then to return to Batavia for the formal signing of the treaty, if and when it is approved by the two Governments concerned. Dr. Soekarno has publicly endorsed the agreement in a statement in which he also referred to the many respects in which the Indonesians are in need of Dutch help.

Lord Killearn, who throughout the negotiations has helped both parties over stiles that at times appeared almost unnegotiable, has been warmly thanked and has been invited by both parties to preside at their next and final meeting. He was not present at the final stages of the informal discussions which led to the framing of the draft treaty.

While these political discussions were in progress the Joint Truce Commission were also making satisfactory strides in the implementation of the Truce conditions. On 4th November a cease-fire and stand-fast order was issued to all military commanders in those areas in which it had not already been brought into force, and on the following day a satisfactory agreement was reached concerning the position at Sourabaya, where a delicate situation had been created in connexion with the water supply.

The evacuation from Java and Sumatra of the British forces of occupation, which, it was decided some time ago, should be effected by 30th November, has already begun and is reported to be proceeding smoothly. At a farewell party given by Dr. van Mook to the British and Indian military forces in the Netherlands East Indies, the Lieutenant-Governor-General sent the following message: "You came to save and stayed to protect: Your departure coincides with the dawning of peace in this country, leaves us with feelings of gratitude and regret and with the memory of an arduous task well done."

It has been announced that the second conference of the peoples of the Great East, scheduled to follow the two Conferences at Malino and Pangkal Pinang (see Summaries Nos. 353 and 365), is to take place at Den Passar on the Island of Bali on 7th December. And it is expected that important decisions will be taken at this conference concerning the formation and conduct of the United States of Indonesia.

Siam

An agreement providing for the return to Cambodia and to Laos of territory ceded to Siam by the Japanese award of 9th May, 1941, was signed in Washington on 17th November, 1946, between delegates of the French and Siamese Governments. The text follows the French proposals given in Summary 365. On Siamese insistence the preamble contains the words "considérant les points de vue exprimés par les gouvernements Américain et Britannique." Siamese amour-propre is thus saved.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The political commentaries in the United States are still full of speculation on the possible consequences of the Republican victories of 5th November and on the prospects of President Truman and the new Congress being able to reach a modus vivendi when the latter assembles in January. Among conservatives there is rising optimism regarding the chances of avoiding a complete stalemate. The President, they suggest, has a "natural affinity" to the forces "to the right of centre" which triumphed in the elections, and his own innate conservatism may well cause "areas of agreement" to be found between him and the Republican leaders. The editorial columns of many Republican newspapers are therefore again full of expressions of goodwill towards the Chief Executive. In one of these newspapers a cartoonist good-naturedly depicts Mr. Truman as a small and anxious figure in a lions' den, facing two not altogether voracious beasts labelled "Republican Senate" and "Republican House," above which is written a hopeful caption to the effect that "history records that Daniel came out all right."

Exactly how far the President would have to move to the Right as the essential price of harmony, spokesmen in the conservative camp, like Mr. David Lawrence, are already making clear. Mr. Lawrence confidently predicts that Mr Truman "will get more out of Capitol Hill in the next two years than he did in his first two years" if he will only refrain from encouraging the leaders of organized labour "to extend their political control over the country," repudiate "the radicals of the Wallace-Pepper wing" of his own party and only sponsor legislation which would be acceptable in the House of Representatives to the Republican majority and to the 100 Southern Democrats alike. Yet the very thought of the President pursuing anything but the forward course of the New Deal years has already placed the liberal Democrats firmly on their guard. Consequently they have been the most outspoken critics of his statement of 11th November, in which he gave his considered views on the outcome of the elections and expressed his desire to co-operate with Congress "in every proper manner." The mood of the country generally, however, is strongly against permitting any jockeying for position in 1948 by the rival parties to leave the machinery of Government in a state of constant deadlock, and for this reason moderate organs of liberal opinion like the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the Philadelphia Record are willing to agree that a programme of administration leaning to the conservative side (such as Mr. Truman's statement might in some ways foreshadow) is better than no programme at all.

An early test of the ability of the President and Congress to work together for the public good may well be provided by the crisis which Mr. John L. Lewis has precipitated in the coal mining industry. The fact that Mr. Lewis is himself nominally a Republican will not deter the party leaders like Senator Taft from attempting retributive action—especially as a successful bid for higher wages from the miners will be followed automatically by similar demands from the other union leaders. Senator Taft is currently reported to be engaged in an attempt to keep more progressive colleagues like Senators Aiken and Morse from succeeding to the leadership of the Senate Committee on Education and Labour so that he himself can retain the initiative in framing future labour legislation. (Similar contests are apparently going on between rival wings of the Republican party over appointments to other Senate and House committee chairmanships.) What was described as "constructive but emphatically not punitive" labour legislation was also conspicuous on the preliminary programme for next session which the Republican Steering Committee of the House of Representatives issued at its first meeting after the elections on the 14th November. Other items on that programme called for a 20 per cent. reduction in the federal income tax, the elimination of all Governmental controls, the termination as rapidly as may be practicable of the Presidential war powers and the limitation of the tenure of office by any President to two successive terms.

Little has been said by the Republican policy-making bodies since the elections about American financial policy abroad, although one or two of the more internationally-minded Republican organs have been quick to warn the party leaders of the dangers inherent in cutting the Federal Budget at the expense of the foreign loan and defence programmes. In this connexion even a stalwart representative of the business interests like Barron's Weekly has declared itself strongly against any attempt to repeat the loan and import policy of the last two years of Mr. Hoover's Presidency, pointing out that "to so undermine the economies of our foreign friends would be to widen the sway of Communism." Nevertheless at the State Department there are already signs of a readiness to defer to Congress, such as have not often been noticeable since Mr. Hull was given his mandate to apply his own policy of reciprocal tariff adjustment in 1934. In the current negotiations on the future financing of the British and United States zones of Germany Mr. Clayton has been unwilling to offer this country anything more advantageous than a "fifty-fifty" division of the costs of the joint economic programme where these costs have to be met on the American side by direct appropriations from Congress. Both Mr. Clayton and Mr. George E. Allen, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are also opposed to the idea of the United States granting a long-term loan to assist with the rehabilitation of Germany on the grounds that recollections of American loan policy to Germany in the 1920s would make such an idea most unpalatable to Congress.

Notwithstanding the preoccupation of opinion with domestic politics, considerable interest continues to be shown in the proceedings of the United Nations Assembly and in the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers. The ingrained antipathy of most Americans towards anything that savours of "imperialism" has been well to the fore in comment on Field-Marsal Smuts' plan for the incorporation of South-West Africa into the Union of South Africa and on the ensuing discussions in the Trusteeship Committee. Nevertheless the inclination to denounce the plan as offering what one Boston newspaper terms "only an extension of the Jim Crowism prevailing in the Union" has obviously been tempered in some quarters by a guilty conscience regarding the degree of racial discrimination practised at home—as well as by considerable qualms regarding the policy of "just plain grab" which some internationalists believe to have motivated the American proposals for the future administration of the former Japanese mandates.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

Since rumours of the impending resignation of Mr. Braden as Assistant Secretary were denied at a press conference early in November, Mr. Byrnes has endorsed the present direction of American Republic affairs. Mr. Braden, he said, had the full confidence of himself and of President Truman. He added that Mr. Braden had no intention of resigning and that he would not ask for his resignation. The report of Mr. Byrnes' remarks recorded no answer to a question put to him regarding differences between Mr. Braden and Mr. Messersmith concerning U.S. policy in Argentina.

At a press conference on the 13th November, Mr. William Pawley, U.S. Ambassador to Brazil said that there had never been a greater desire than now among the nations of the western hemisphere for the fulfilment of their obligations under the Chapultepec Conference, but that "various factors" made it doubtful that the Rio Conference on a mutual hemisphere defence programme could be held this year. (See Summary No. 365.)

Argentine

In April of last year the Argentine Supreme Court declared the decrees issued by the Provisional Government to be unconstitutional. This marked the beginning of friction between the Supreme Court and General Perón, who feared that a similar declaration might be made which would lead to a general blocking of his social and labour legislation. Matters came to a head in August of this year when four members of the Supreme Court were indicted, and on the 19th September a motion impeaching them, together with the Attorney-General—on the grounds that they had recognized the revolutionary Governments of 1930 and 1943, had interfered in the affairs of the Government by declaring unconstitutional a number of laws necessary to the country's progress and, finally, had extended their jurisdiction in order to protect capitalist interests—was carried in the Chamber of Deputies by 104 votes to 47. The case has yet to be heard in the Senate, which is solidly Peronist, but it is a foregone conclusion that it will go against the Judges and bring about their resignation.

Much strong feeling has been aroused by this affair. The Government papers have spared no efforts to discredit the Judges as "ultra-reactionaries," while the opposition, independent, and provincial press have expressed deep concern at this avowed determination of the Government to "carry the revolution to the Judicature"; the man in the street, mainly occupied with his own affairs, has not been much roused by the press campaign.

Though the Supreme Court does not, perhaps, enjoy quite the same prestige as it did ten years ago, the dangers of tampering with appointments to it are obvious. From the point of view of foreign interests any step tending to minimize its independence and impartiality would be a serious disadvantage, as it has always been regarded in the last resort as a sure dispenser of impartial justice.

UNITED NATIONS

General Assembly

The Veto

A debate fundamental to the existence of the "United Nations" began in Committee 1 on the 14th November. It led to an informal meeting between the Five Permanent members of the Security Council on the 18th, and by that evening the delegates of some 40 countries had spoken. All, with two or three Slav exceptions, had explained how Russia was destroying confidence in the Security Council by her use of the veto. Rousseau showed how a democratic society could not hold together if it could not express itself in a general will. It could express no general will if its members did not possess what we call civic sense. The United Nations are in a similar situation. Unless all the members of the Security Council can be relied on to act in the interests of the Society of Nations, the Security Council can never be the world-wide guardian of the peace that it was intended to be, and without such a trusted guardian peace must once more become the care of each armed nation, and the new society must fall apart. Disarmament depends upon trust in the Security Council. Hence the significance of Mr. Bevin's remark in the informal meeting: "We want, not a new set of rules, but a code of conduct."

Such a code was outlined in a memorandum which grew out of discussions between the U.K. and Commonwealth and certain other delegations, and which Mr. Bevin sent to the Chinese, French, Russians and Americans. Among its suggestions were the following. The veto-carrying Powers might confer informally before an important vote. If the Five were not at one, the minority might remember that they acted on behalf of the United Nations not only on behalf of themselves. They should, therefore, use the veto only when they believed the welfare of the United Nations to be at stake, and they should explain the grounds of their belief. They might refrain from vetoing a proposal merely because it did not go far enough to satisfy them. The memorandum then turns to the problem of how to check the fatal tendency to use the Council for propaganda. Questions should be brought to the Council, it suggests, only after other ways to agreement had been tried. A public discussion and a vote should be indulged in only after a committee had made sure that all other methods had been exhausted. Finally, could not the word "dispute" be defined; and could not the right of veto be accompanied by the right of non-veto, i.e., could not the Permanent Members be absent or abstain from voting, without being held to have thereby imposed their veto?

These and similar points figured largely in the debate, and might almost be taken as a précis of what was recommended by the vast majority of the speakers. Australia's delegate moved, with great reason and moderation, that the Permanent Members should exercise their veto only under Chapter 7 of the Charter (Enforcement). Article 27, he recalled, had been accepted at San Francisco on condition that the veto would be used with moderation. He went over the various instances of Russian misuse of the veto, and especially the claim to use a veto in deciding when a particular vote was a matter of procedure or of substance. He reminded the delegates that the sponsoring Powers at San Francisco had justified the veto on the plea that the Great Powers should control "a chain of events which might lead to war," and asked if Russia's rejection of new members came under that head. Russia had even in the case of the Northern frontier of Greece, prevented the Council from finding out whether or no a particular complaint involved a threat to peace. Russia claimed that the veto was the guarantee of Great Power unity. According to the Australian delegate its too frequent use had made it a revelation of disunity. Cuba's delegate was less restrained. He spoke of the "odious privilege" of the veto, condemned Article 27 and had the courage to point out that even unanimous Great Powers have erred. For instance, the "unanimous" decision of Germany and Russia in 1939 partitioned Poland. In the United Nations the principle of the sovereign equality of all members required equality in voting rights, and he proposed that a conference be called in 1947 to amend the Charter. New Zealand and Belgium supported Australia; the Philippines delegate supported Cuba, whilst the Polish delegate concluded that it was doubtful whether, under present conditions, any system could be found better than the veto. Argentina wondered if the other Powers could exercise a kind of counter-veto by leaving the Organisation or at least refusing to elect the non-Permanent members of the Security Council.

On the 15th, Senator Connally said, most impressively, that the Great Powers must be unselfish. Talk of amending the Charter was premature, and he suggested practical ways of improvement, such as a list of matters procedural and matters substantial. No one, he thought, should be judge in his own case. The Bevin memorandum was implicit in his speech. Yugoslavia struck a discordant note and imputed reactionary motives. M. Vyshinsky recalled that the formula in article 27 (3) was a U.S. invention. His remark that the absence of a Permanent Member from a meeting of the Council had nothing to do with the veto question roused speculation, and on this point, later in the debate, the French delegate quoted M. Gromyko's statement, made on 29th April, that his abstention did not amount to a veto. M. Gromyko, however, had added that his action must not be taken as a precedent. The main line of M. Vyshinsky's argument was the usual one, that Russia was for the veto and Great Power unity against the underminers, open and secret.

On 16th November, Dr. Wellington Koo made practical suggestions, and M. Parodi (France) criticised article 27 and urged the Great Powers to seek agreement rather than publicity, and to acquire the right not to exercise the veto. Mr. Noel-Baker put his Government's case with clarity and force. He was open in his disapproval of Russia's misuse of the veto, but he favoured the British method of "customary" development of the Constitution rather than the method of formal amendment of the Charter. In an important speech, the Canadian delegate also opposed amendment, but called the present use of the veto "disunity writ large." States, he urged, which brought complaints, must tell the Council what steps they had taken towards conciliation. On the 18th, S. Africa linked the prospects of disarmament with the conduct of the Security Council, and the Committee approved, by 38–6, a French proposal to postpone for a few days further discussion of the subject.

A notable event during the past week was M. Molotov's request for an interview with Mr. Bevin, and his advice to Mr. Bevin not to pay too much attention to the way in which the veto had been used during the last year. Such situations were unlikely to recur, and, he added, the Organisation was still very young. He agreed with all Mr. Bevin said on the need to restore the Council's prestige, even when Mr. Bevin conjured up a vision of its becoming a great fount of justice to which all Nations would repair. On the other hand, M. Molotov wanted "no written decisions," and during the informal meeting of the Big Five he agreed only to the suggestions that the Five should confer informally before an important question was put to the vote. It was depressing, at the same meeting, to hear him repeat the ancient charge that the critics of the Russian use of the veto had been "put up to it" by those who wished to destroy the veto, and the United Nations itself. A phrase of Mr. Bevin's during the informal meeting summed up the general anxiety: "H.M.G. did not, at the moment, have sufficient confidence in the Security Council . . . ."

Membership

In face of widespread doubts about its constitutional soundness, which the U.K. delegation shared, Australia modified her motion on the admission of new members, leaving only a proposal to set up a joint Security Council and General Assembly Committee, whose duty would be to enquire into the rules of procedure for the admission of new members. The proposal was carried by 29, including U.K., to 9 (U.S., U.S.S.R. and Company, France and Norway). Six abstained. Meanwhile M. Gromkyo has approached both the U.K. and the Syrian representatives, with an offer to trade the admission of Transjordan against that of Albania. When the Saudi Arabians told the U.K. representative of M. Gromyko's approach to Syria, and asked for the U.K. reaction, they were told that H.M. Government refused to trade respectable Transjordan against disreputable Albania, and that H.M. Government had received the artless Russian offer in shocked silence.

Relief action after UNRRA

The Economic Committee of the General Assembly heard Mr. La Guardia's plan for international relief action in 1947 at its meeting on 11th November and again discussed the matter on 18th November.

Mr. La Guardia said that relief would be needed by Greece, Yugoslavia, Albania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Austria, Ukraine, White Russia, China and perhaps other countries. There should be no gap between the end of UNRRA and the start of any new agency to be appointed by the Assembly in accordance with the Geneva resolutions of last August. The food problem, at least, could not wait and positive international action should be taken to solve it before the Assembly broke up. Aid given on a simple inter-Government basis would be merely old-fashioned imperialism, making one country dependent on another; charity to selected recipients by a group of big nations would be old-time power politics; there remained the approach through an international agency of the United Nations, giving relief irrespective of politics or any other consideration except verified need. He was confident that Russia, the United Kingdom, and the United States (to whom he addressed a special appeal as holding the key to the problem) would favour the third approach. He suggested that the United Nations should establish an Emergency Food Fund, amounting in money or kind to some 400 or 500 million dollars, to be managed by an executive board of Governments, nominated by the Assembly. This plan called for no new bureaucracy and no field organisation; but it would meet the urgent part of the food problem till after the 1947 harvest. For relief needs other than food, other measures must be adopted, e.g., the International Bank.

This proposal made a considerable impression, especially on the delegations of the recipient countries. The delegates of Norway, Denmark, Greece and Czechoslovakia were in favour of it; Brazil and Argentina supported a variation of it involving a pool of contributions from all countries; the Netherlands and France wanted a compromise between it and the simpler scheme proposed by U.S.A.; Russia was prepared to examine it, although (like Yugoslavia, Poland, White Russia and Ukraine) preferring that U.N.R.R.A. should be continued.

The opposition developed from the United States, whose delegate insisted that international action to meet the residual need between the end of UNRRA and the harvest of 1947 should be simple and speedy. A new organisation would entail legislation by Congress and delays would be inevitable. His country had never used hunger or other human misery as a political weapon and would not do so now, nor would conditions be attached to the help they freely gave to meet essential food needs. Country-to-country assistance would be more rapid and efficient than the plan now proposed by Mr. La Guardia.

Mr. Noel-Baker, for the United Kingdom, supported this line of criticism. The fund plan could not be realised before the United States Congress had made appropriations for the new international agency. The essential problem was not, as had been suggested, a choice between national and international operation of relief, but a practical question of how needed goods could best and most quickly be got when and where they were wanted. Governments able and willing to help should consult directly. Member nations giving or needing help should use the United Nations secretariat as a coordinating body, and the International Emergency Food Committee should continue to be an instrument of allocation. He hoped that U.S.S.R. would be a contributor to the new relief effort, whatever form it took.

No decision has yet been taken.

Preparatory Committee of I.T.O.

The present session of the Preparatory Committee will close with two or three plenary sessions to approve the reports of the committees. These are all ready in final form except for the report of Committee II. This committee, which had the longest and most difficult agenda, will require until the 22nd or 23rd November to complete its report and the final plenaries will not now be held until the 25th and 26th.

The work of Committee II has been carried out by four sub-committees. The technical sub-committee dealt with subjects arising under Section A of Chapter IV of the U.S. draft charter (Articles 9–17). It has produced a draft statement listing the numerous reservations and differences of opinion revealed in its lengthy discussions. These are nearly all technical, but the sub-committee is having great difficulty in producing a report that will bring out the considerable measure of underlying agreement (which undoubtedly exists) and will consequently be of use to the Interim Drafting Committee.

The sub-committee on State trading has produced re-drafts of Articles 26 and 27 of the U.S. draft charter which improve them from our point of view without materially changing their intention. It has been decided to leave Article 28 as it stands for later consideration.

The sub-committee on quantitative restrictions, exchange control and subsidies will, it is hoped, shortly produce a report embodying agreement on all substantial points.

There remains the sub-committee on procedure. This deals with the procedure to be adopted in the tariff negotiations which will be held concurrently with the second session of the Preparatory Committee, to be held in Geneva in April 1947. This procedure cannot be governed by the provisions of the I.T.O. charter, as the charter will not by then be in force. It is therefore necessary for the present session of the Preparatory Committee to pass a resolution setting up its own rules of procedure in conformity with what appears to be the probable provisions of the charter when it is eventually approved. The work on this problem is progressing slowly.

The core of the work of Committee II is to be seen in Articles 8 and 18 of the U.S. draft charter which deal with general most-favoured-nation treatment, and with the reduction of tariffs and the elimination of preferences. It became apparent at a meeting of the Commonwealth delegations held on 9th November (see last week's Summary) that there was some doubt about the exact interpretation placed on these articles by the U.S.A. This has subsequently been discussed with the U.S.A., and, on the understanding that exceptions agreed in the course of discussion will be permissible, no Commonwealth delegation has insisted on the deletion of the word "automatically" in the wording of Article 18, 1 (b)— which reads: "All negotiated reductions in M.F.N. import tariffs shall operate automatically to reduce or eliminate margins of preference . . . ." There has been considerable hesitation on this matter, however, by the Commonwealth countries.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

The well-worn problem of the powers of the Governor of Trieste occupied the Foreign Ministers from Tuesday, the 14th November, until Monday, the 18th. On that day M. Molotov smiled, and some agreement was reached. The background of the problem does not vary. At the Peace Conference a French compromise text for the Trieste Statute was accepted by U.K. and U.S., and recommended by a two-thirds' majority in the Conference. The U.S. delegate had pledged his Government's support for all such "recommendations." Mr. Bevin had, so to speak, climbed down from the original U.K. conception of an efficient Governor's powers, first to the American and finally to the French level and he felt that there was a danger that M. Molotov might be dragging him down into the borderland of chaos. M. Molotov prided himself on not producing a new version of the Statute. Instead he said he would accept the French text as a basis, and merely suggest amendments. Throughout the past week, however, those amendments looked very much like a devious way back towards the original Russian position. He agreed that the Governor need not be a native of Trieste, and that he should be appointed by the Security Council; but no one can become Governor without securing among other things Russian approval. M. Molotov then agreed on Monday to Mr. Byrnes's proposal that the "responsibilities of the Governor should include ensuring that public order and security are maintained by the Government of the Free Territory in accordance with the Statute, the Constitution and the laws of the Free Territory," and he accepts the American gloss that "government" means not only the Council of Government, but all the organs of government, executive, legislative, judicial, central and local, even the Governor himself. M. Molotov showed a disturbing reluctance to allow that the Governor's responsibility must include the "human rights" of the inhabitants, or to grant him the control over the Police which the Western Ministers consider essential if he is to carry out his responsibilites to the Security Council; and he was for long unwilling to appreciate the argument, driven home by Mr. Bevin, and Mr. Byrnes, that the Police will not in practice obey a Governor who commands them only in an "emergency," if they are subject to dismissal by the Council of Government. Even when he came round to the view that the Director of Security should appoint and dismiss the Police, he tried hard to win acceptance for the formula that the Governor should appoint the Director "on the recommendation of the Council of Government." His anxiety that a date should be fixed for the departure of U.S. and British troops, and his offer that, if a date were fixed, he would agree to the governor's responsibility for "human rights" were also disturbing; since, once withdrawn, the troops could only be sent back by the Security Council where Russia can veto all action. The Western view was that the troops must remain during the first experimental and inflammable stage, especially, as Mr. Bevin pointed out, since "trouble might well arise from the border States."

Monday's agreements are held to be noteworthy and may be hailed as a victory by East or West. Though the actual advances from the Peace Conference recommendation have been Eastward, M. Molotov has performed the, for him, most difficult feat of moving towards the West. For example, the Council of Government is to nominate the candidates for the Directorship of Security, but the Governor's choice is not limited to the nominees. "The appointment of a Director chosen from among the candidates nominated, or from among other persons, shall be made by the Governor after consultation with the Council of Government. He may be dismissed by the Governor, also after consultation with the Council of Government." Again the Director is not to be "subordinate" to the Governor, as the French draft said, but "the Director shall normally be under the immediate authority of the Council of Government from which he will receive instructions on questions within his competence." On the other hand Mr. Molotov agreed to the Western views on appointment and dismissal of the Police, on the Governor's relations with the Director, who must report to him, consult with him, etc., and on the Council of Government's duty to inform the Governor of the instructions it gives to the Director. M. Molotov gave assent, conditional on agreement on other points, to Mr. Bevin's text which allows the Governor to suspend administrative measures under certain circumstances, and also to propose them. It seems likely that M. Molotov will carry his idea that the Governor shall concern himself only with major issues in foreign policy, leaving current foreign affairs to be dealt with by the Council of Government, treaties being signed jointly by Governor and Council of Government. Mr. Bevin has managed so far to avert a clause laying it down that some of the judiciary should eventually be elected. Mr. Byrnes had suggested that this practice, fatal in an area of racial and political rivalry, should start in five years' time.

GERMANY

THE Anglo-American talks on bi-zonal arrangements for Germany have continued both in Washington and in New York where Mr. Bevin has held direct discussions with Mr. Byrnes. It now appears certain that the United States will not agree to pay more than half the cost of the scheme. (See last week's Summary.) Mr. Byrnes has clearly stated that Congress would not countenance any greater contribution. If this offer is accepted by His Majesty's Government it would mean that each country would have to contribute about £125 million sterling in the course of the next three years; a burden which the British representatives have struggled hard to reduce. A more welcome move has been a statement by General Clay that if a settlement were reached for the effective fusion of the two zones he would be prepared to pool immediately available food supplies. United States authorities are seeking to remedy delays in transporting food but their efforts will now be greatly hampered by the coal strike. In the meantime the loan of 50,000 tons of grain from the US zone for the British zone has been accepted. The US zone is now fearful of being involved in the crisis and General McNarney the American Commander-in-Chief stated at his monthly press conference on the 21st November that it was difficult to say whether the present ration could be kept up throughout the winter—in October the zone received only half the food imports necessary for its maintenance.

Trade Union and party leaders in the British zone continue to drive home their criticism of economic conditions and there appears to be a widespread belief that the occupying power is seeking to stimulate output while removing the factories necessary for peaceful production. On the 19th November the Trade Union zonal Committee in a strongly worded protest demanded that all dismantling should cease until the conclusion of the Peace Treaty and said that workers were no longer prepared to take part in the destruction of the basis of their livelihood. It asked that a German panel should advise on questions of dismantling. When General Erskine spoke with Trade Union leaders in the Ruhr on the same day they insisted that their aim of democratic re-education and responsible co-operation in rebuilding German economy was greatly hampered by the economic situation. General Erskine on the 20th November warned the Rhineland-Westphalian Cabinet that even if the increased steel quota of 11,000,000 tons was accepted, steel works would still have to be closed. A Minister replied that the works now in production were not sufficient to produce this quota, but somewhat confused his argument by saying that they were producing at a loss because of shortage of manpower and war damage. General Erskine also dealt with the decision, welcomed by Germans, to discontinue for the time being the dismantling of a number of cement factories which can be used for peaceful purposes. Ruhr miners have voted against working a Sunday shift under present conditions, a decision which has not passed unnoticed in the Soviet zone where some miners have volunteered to do Sunday work.

The Russian technique of stalling on "awkward" topics was again neatly illustrated in four-power meetings particularly on the subject of the removal of workers to the U.S.S.R. After fruitless argument in the Co-ordinating Committee the matter came before the Control Council on the 20th November when representatives again failed to agree on a communiqué. Marshal Sokolovsky noisily contended that the British had no right to raise the matter, which was adequately covered by the Proclamation of September 1945. He went on to say that, as far as he was concerned he did not intend to transfer any more skilled workers to the U.S.S.R. except in a few individual cases. On the 18th November, however, it had been reported that deportations were continuing from the Soviet zone although not from Berlin. There is evidence that on the questions of deportation and dismantling there is considerable conflict between the Soviet Military Administration and the representatives of economic agencies in the Soviet Uinon who take their orders direct from Moscow. The former is known to be gravely disturbed by the possible effect of such steps on Soviet policy in Germany and General Sokolovsky's statement, while bearing out this view, may not necessarily be acted upon in the future. The matter is now suspended in the Control Council but each delegation has the right to make his own statement to the press. In the Co-ordinating Committee on the 22nd November the Russian representative flatly denied an undertaking given at the previous meeting on the 16th November that he would investigate an allegation by the Episcopal Conference at Fulda that the Soviet authorities had rearrested and deported repatriated prisoners of war (see also Summary No. 352). The question was then raised of the Russian failure to report on the destruction of damaged warships. Although these reports have been due at intervals since the 15th February 1946 no reply was forthcoming. This constitutes a serious breach of the Potsdam Agreement and evidence suggests that far from destroying the Gneisenau and the Graf Zeppelin the Russians are reconstructing them. Equally unsatisfactory were discussions in the Political Directorate on the vexed question of the Russian controlled Radio Berlin.

A Draft Constitution prepared by the Socialist Unity Party was published in a revised version on the 16th November (see Summaries Nos. 361, 367). Grotewohl has described it as being based on the Weimar Constitution but avoiding what the party considers to be Weimar's chief defects. Thus it is proposed that Germany should do away with the "disastrous principle of the division of powers." There would therefore be no Reich President, no Second Chamber, no Supreme Court, in fact no instrument of Sovereignty independent of Parliament. The Government would be fully responsible to Parliament. Parliament would be elected for three years; the franchise age would be lowered to 18; no independent candidates would be allowed. Germany is envisaged as a unitary state more highly centralized than under the Weimar republic. An article in the constitution of particular importance to the party provides that Reich law over-rides Laender law. Reich laws are administered by the Laender, Kreise and Gemeinden, but subject to Central control, while their legislative powers are greatly restricted, the Centre legislating on public finances at all levels and even on such matters as child welfare and school affairs, libraries, church associations, press and meetings, which under the provisions of the British zone ordinance are matters on which the centre only lays down fundamental principles. The Draft Constitution provides for the abolition of private monopolies and strict application of land reform. Women are given equality of status with men and equal pay for equal work—this principle is already being applied in some industries in the Soviet zone. The rights of the individual and freedom of speech are guaranteed. The dangers of the constitution are clearly revealed in the clauses on justice. The President and members of the highest court in the Republic are elected by Parliament. Lay judges as well as professional judges are to be included for courts of all levels. They will be nominated by the "democratic organisations" and elected by the appropriate Assemblies. Lay judges were introduced in the Soviet zone in February 1946. They were appointed mainly from the working class and given a very brief legal training, the overt purpose then being to supplement the number of judges and narrow the gulf between the judges and the people. They have an equal status with professional judges and some complaints have naturally been made of their inefficiency. Although the exact details are not yet clear the perpetuation of such a system would seem to indicate a desire for political control although the constitution declare that judges are "independent." In the Soviet zone lay judges sit alongside professional judges but never alone and in fact exercise largely the function of the English jury. Other parties have not yet criticised the constitution itself. An SED spokesman has declared that the proposals are made at the right psychological moment before the victorious powers draft the Peace Treaty. Generally, the draft constitution seems to express a moderation designed to impress the S.E.D.'s enemies. This may be no more than Communist tactics, and indeed the non-division of powers, if applied broadly enough could in certain circumstances leave the door open for under-cover penetration and control by a single power-group. The single-Chamber system also seems suitable only for systems with a far greater degree of political maturity than may be expected from Germany. Any S.E.D. effort to push "democracy" to such extremes as to destroy it would have a precedent in the Soviet attitude over the Trieste Statute.

The new government of Lower Saxony is to be headed by the Social Democrat Kopf, former premier of Hanover. The difficulty of forming a cabinet had been increased by the local pride of Brunswick and Oldenburg. Kubel (SPD), former premier of Brunswick, becomes Minister of Economics and Tantzen (FDP), former premier of Oldenburg, becomes deputy premier and Minister of Transport. The SPD have most seats but not a clear majority. The CDU were induced to enter the cabinet apparently only on conditions that the party held the key post of Minister of the Interior. The reason for the CDU's abstention from Hamburg Senate is now learnt to have been the rejection of its impossible demands, backed by large business interests, for all the best economic posts, coupled with the SPD's insistence that Senators should give up private business interests. The CDU has further demonstrated its aloofness towards Kaiser in Berlin by declaring that he had no authority to comment on behalf of the British zone CDU on Bevin's statement concerning British plans for nationalisation. Adenauer may well become even more recalcitrant in view of the strength of the strongly clerical Christian Democrats in the French zone. On the 17th November, in the election, by indirect voting, of Constituent Assemblies in the three French zone States (but not the Saar), the Christian democrats gained a clear majority over all other parties. The French zone is the only part of Germany where one party is, on paper, supreme in all States.

General Erskine stated on the 15th November that the British zone representatives of the new bi-zonal agencies would be the Ministers of the Laender for the subjects concerned. This meets the German demand for political control over the agencies. (See Summary No. 363.)

AUSTRIA

There was a serious development in the Austrian food situation when it became known on the 19th November that the Soviet authorities had refused to allow milk, fats and grain to leave the Soviet Zone and were blocking the passage of potatoes and sugar to other zones. The Austrian Cabinet met at once in a session which continued all day, and the Austrian Government obtained an undertaking from the Soviet authorities that some milk from the Soviet Zone would be sent to Vienna, and that five wagons of sugar destined for Styria would be allowed to proceed. Vienna and the British Zone were particularly hard-hit by this sudden ban. On the 22nd November it was reported that bread would run out in the British Zone in twenty-four hours, owing to the hold-up of 3,000 tons of bread-grains from Lower Austria, and efforts were being made to borrow flour from U.S. army stocks. The Landeshauptmann of Styria said that if supplies were not found he believed serious unrest might ensue. On the 22nd the Chancellor said that negotiations with the Russians had "taken a turn for the better," and the question of milk and sugar supplies had been satisfactorily settled, and it was hoped that potatoes and grain supplies would also be settled soon. It is not yet clear, however, whether supplies will arrive in time, and the incident shows clearly how narrow the margin is from disaster.

There are several possible motives for the Soviet action. Firstly, the Russians in Austria undoubtedly fear that the recent increase in rations, involving as it does the more rapid consumption of indigenous resources, will result in the exhaustion of the indigenous stocks in the Soviet Zone. The Russian representative on the Economic Directorate said on the 22nd that the disastrous harvest in Russia made it unlikely that his Government would be able to provide assistance for Austria in the shape of food, and enquired whether assistance, if any should be provided by the British and United States Governments, could be made available to the Soviet as well as to the other Zones. The second motive, therefore, is the Russian suspicion of possible action by the Western Allies when UNRRA aid ends in December, suspicion which has gradually been mounting and has been increased by the American attitude in recent months, promising help only to those Zones which will "play." It is strange, however, that the Soviet ban follows a turn to a much more favourable policy by the United States towards the Soviet authorities in Austria, demonstrated by General Clark's statement at the last Allied Council Meeting (see last week's Summary) that the United States element was prepared to pool supplies and wished to see Austria treated as a whole. The British and U.S. members of the Economic Directorate reassured the Soviet member that it was their hope and intention that all supplies obtained should be evenly distributed. According to the Austrian Chancellor the Russians had hoped that the ration would be kept low in order that consequent industrial unrest might bring down the present Government. Industrial unrest was becoming serious before the ration was raised.

While the Austrian Chancellor has confirmed that relations between the People's Party and the Socialists are good and improving daily—and this was borne out by speakers at a Socialist Party conference just concluded—the Communists have launched a determined campaign against the Government. Communist shop stewards in Vienna heard the Communist leader Koplenig demand new elections in Austria on behalf of his party. "The militant masses" of the Austrian workers were ready to oust the reactionary elements of the Government, he said. This is the first demand for new elections since the present Government were elected last November.

Koplenig attacked the attitude of the Government towards the recent events at the University of Vienna. For some weeks before the student elections the Communist press had been conducting a campaign against alleged Nazi elements in the University who were taking a prominent part in election meetings. On the 20th November, polling day, a procession of workers from factories, significantly, in the Soviet Zone of Vienna demonstrated outside the University against the "continuance of Nazi influence in schools and universities." Riots between demonstrators, students and police developed, and a number of students were injured. The Communist "Free Austrian Youth" were prominent, and members forced their way into the University building and hoisted a red flag. The whole affair seems to have been inspired and arranged by the Communists, with the possible backing of the Russians. It is significant that no incidents are reported from any other University in Austria, although Graz University came under strong criticism earlier in the year for the slow progress of denazification there and the large numbers of foreigners who were students. The Communists have attacked at a vulnerable spot. The Universities in Austria had predominantly Pan-German tendencies under the Empire and after 1918, and this, coupled with the serious unemployment in the learned professions when the Empire was broken up, made them favourable breeding-grounds for anti-Semitism and Nazi doctrines. Political dissension and riots had a disastrous effect on university life before the Anschluss, but Vienna was always less amenable to Nazi propaganda than Innsbruck and Graz. The University population has greatly increased since the war—at Graz, for instance, it was over 5,000 in July (compared with 2,563 in 1937), of whom about a quarter are foreign students, including Reichsdeutsche, Yugoslavs and Poles. There are, therefore, grounds for suspicion that many unsuitable people are using the Universities, either as a means of avoiding compulsory work in reconstruction or as a cloak for subversive activities: and the growth of a new body of discontented professional people who can find no work is a danger which must be watched intently. The Austrian Government have made good progress in denazifying the Universities and schools, however, to the extent that there is a serious shortage of teachers, and the University authorities have made efforts to weed out the more unsuitable elements among the students. The Austrian Government have taken the Vienna incidents seriously, recognising the threat to their position, and have emphasised their desire to make the check on students and teachers as strict as possible. The results of the elections in the whole of Austria (they were able to proceed later in Vienna), were a decided victory for the People's Party. The right-wing "Union of Austrian University Members" gained 75·3 per cent. of the total votes in a poll of 80 per cent. of the electors; the Socialists 21·7 per cent; and the Communists 3 per cent. This result will not have helped to make the Soviet attitude more favourable. At the Executive Committee meeting on the 22nd the Soviet member proposed that the Vienna University and Colleges should be closed until denazified by the Allied Commission, and that members and applicants for membership of the Nazi Party, ex-officers of the German Army, and displaced persons should never be admitted as teachers or students. It is to be feared that this will provide M. Molotov with fresh ammunition for refusing to discuss a Peace Treaty with Austria in the Council of Foreign Ministers.

POLAND

The Polish Provisional Government has recently received notes from H.M. Government and the United States Government, concerning the Polish elections to be held on the 19th January.

The British Note, recalling the assurances given by the Polish Government at Yalta and Potsdam that elections would be free and unfettered, points out that Great Britain cannot regard the assurances as having been fulfilled, unless all democratic parties in Poland have equal facilities to conduct a campaign freely and without intimidation, and unless all parties are represented on the electoral commissions at all levels. The two notes were presented immediately before the lists of the chairmen for the electoral divisions were due to be published. There are to be fifty-two chairmen for as many divisions, and on them depends the selection of some 7,000 chairmen of the local polling committees, who wield great authority during elections. M. Mikolajczyk's PSL is therefore said to be anxious as to how many, if any, of its representatives will be appointed.

The British Note's insistence on freedom for all democratic parties receives fresh significance from the arrest of M. Bartoszewski, the legal correspondent of M. Mikolajczyk's newspaper Gazeta Ludowa. The occasion for the arrest was a report made by M. Bartoszewski of a recent much-publicised murder trial. The murdered man had been a member of the PSL, and the Government prosecutor alleged that he had been killed for desiring closer collaboration with the Government bloc. It was implied that M. Mikolajczyk connived at the murder, if he did not actually desire it. Together with M. Mierzwa and M. Augustynski, M. Bartoszewski is the fifth prominent PSL official recently arrested (see Summaries Nos. 363 and 365).

In the House of Commons on the 18th November, Mr. Mayhew, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, [replying orally,] said that the Polish Government had not invited an official mission of British or other foreign nationals to observe the Polish elections, and it was not proposed to suggest such a mission. In [a written] answer to the question whether it was intended soon to ask for a meeting of representatives of Britain, America and Russia, to consider the proper enforcement of the agreement for free elections in Poland, Mr. Mayhew stated that he was not persuaded that a special meeting would serve any useful purpose.

Inside Poland itself, the "New Liberation" Peasant Party (PSL N–W) has finally decided to follow the example of the Labour Party (SP) and to join the government electoral bloc only in the regained territories (see Summary No. 369).

The relations between the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish State were the subject of a long interview, in the form of questions and answers, between President Bierut and Ksawery Pruszynski, the well-known Polish publicist, on the 20th November. The President said that the Polish state was sincere in its endeavours to reach agreement with the Church. The Polish progressive movement, like many others in Europe, had evolved in such a way as to render possible collaboration with any religious body. The new social reforms in Poland had not been aimed against the Church. Its lands and agricultural property had not been touched, as in other states. In the regained territories, new premises had been found for church orders, and funds made available for rebuilding devastated Church property. Church schools and universities had not been closed down. All this had happened in a country of which the government was not recognised by the Vatican. Whether this state of affairs would be extended or curtailed depended on the attitude of the clergy; on whether they would accept the conditions existing in Poland, to which they owed all what they had received. There were two particular difficulties. First, the Vatican, which had always been very cautious in its protests against Germany's oppression of Poland, was now defending Germany. This could only cause bitterness among Poles. Second, some Polish clergy were inclined to misuse their pulpits for purposes of political propaganda. The Church authorities should stop that. The President ended by calling upon the Church to rebuild the moral health of the country, to restore family life which was the foundation of Poland's social structure, and to care for the education of Polish youth. In such tasks, Church and State could meet. A somewhat unfortunate accompaniment to this interview was the sentence of death passed by a Warsaw Military Court on Father Jarkiewicz, on the ground that he had belonged to a terrorist group, which was responsible for the deaths of three members of the PPR (Communist Party). The priest was said to have passed the death sentences on them.

SOVIET UNION

The Soviet disarmament proposals to the United Nations are being loudly played up at home and abroad and contrasted with the British Conscription Bill to prove the peaceful intentions of the Kremlin. "The die-hard incendiaries of a new war" were alleged to be backing the Bill; this propaganda line was stiffened by a deft manipulation of quotations from the recent debate in the House of Commons on the organisation of the Ministry of Defence and the prolongation of Conscription.

Bolshevik (No. 19) for October has an eighteen-page article on "The History of the British Empire," which is couched in more damning terms than earlier articles on the same subject and impregnated with orthodox Marxist views on the Empire. The general tone of the introductory analysis of the Empire is given by the statement that piracy, the slave trade and the war lie at the root of English colonial history. The "fortunate" dominions which enjoy "freedom as the English bourgeoisie is said to understand it," contains only 30 millions of the Empire's total population of 450 millions, according to Bolshevik. This first section of the article is rounded off by the statement that the epic of the building of the British Empire is one of the most extensive and tragic in history. The second part of the article criticises the colonial policy of the British Government in recent years and echoes the view that there is nothing to distinguish the colonial policy of the Labour Government from that of the Conservatives. By no stretch of the imagination can the system which prevails in the British Empire be described as anything but "a system of economic exploitation and political reaction in which there is not even a shadow of freedom and democracy," concludes Bolshevik. In view of this Soviet pronunciamento in the leading Party journal, the obduracy of the Soviet delegates to the United Nations in regard to British proposals for trusteeship is not surprising.

Pravda's New York correspondent has expressed doubt of the theory that the wounding of the Ukrainian U.N.O. delegate Stadnik was in the ordinary routine of gangsterdom and has hinted that the attack was political. Stadnik had been in the U.S.A. since March as Ukrainian delegate to the U.N.R.R.A. General Council session and had spoken frequently at mass meetings of Ukrainians of American origin. The matter has been taken up even more strongly by M. Manuilsky who, in a letter to Mr. Byrnes, insisted that the attack was an attempt prepared in advance on the life of the two delegates and complained that the criminals had not been brought to justice.

In harmony with Indian sympathy and support for the Soviet Union at the United Nations Assembly a very cordial message was broadcast from New York by Pundit Vijaya Lakshmi to the U.S.S.R. last week. "The U.S.S.R. is our neighbour," he said, "and neighbours must understand and appreciate each other. With that end in view the National Government of India wishes to make contact with the Soviet Union by establishing diplomatic, cultural and scientific relations between the two countries."

The situation of northern Greece is being described in Soviet propaganda as a spontaneous uprising of the population in self-defence against the policy of terror and persecution of democratic forces adopted by the Government. The reactionary leaders in Greece were provoking a civil war in reliance on foreign bayonets. The reports that the partisan units were receiving help from Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Albania were said to be nothing but provocative rumours put out by the Greek Government in order to get the support of the British troops.

The most important item in Soviet publicity on the Middle East last week was a typically suspicious Krasnaya Zvezda article dealing with the United States "dollar and base policy in the countries of the Arabian peninsula." It was alleged that America was interested in exploiting both the oil and the gold mines of Saudi Arabia, up to 1,000 million dollars capital for the purpose having been poured into the country, and in strengthening its strategic hold of the Middle East by the construction of aerodromes, air lines, and pipe lines, &c., in Turkey, the Lebanon and other Arab countries. It was further noted with concern that a treaty had just been concluded between the Yemen and the U.S.A.

There was more Soviet criticism of American food policy last week when the Americans were reminded that they were consuming an average of 15 per cent. more food than before the war, and that with a very little self sacrifice they could ease the acute need of the peoples of Europe and Africa. In a very garbled version of American policy, America was wrongly alleged to be opposed to coordination of food exports owing to her "famine strategy" and the desire to exercise economic and political pressure on the importing countries.

A Norwegian trade delegation headed by the Minister of Supplies and Reconstruction, arrived in Moscow on the 18th November. Representatives of Norwegian industry arrived with the delegation, which was met at the airport by Stepanov, the U.S.S.R. Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade, and other Soviet officials. Following the recent trade agreements with Sweden, Denmark, Finland, and Iceland, it was to be anticipated that discussions on trade would eventually take place between the Soviet Union and Norway, though in pre-war days Soviet-Norwegian trade was a negligible factor in the foreign trade of either country. (See also under Scandinavia.)

The Ukrainian Academy of Sciences has just elected A. V. Palladin as President in succession to Academician Bogomolets. The new President is a leading scientist in the Department of Geo-Chemistry and has been decorated with the Orders of Lenin, of the Red Banner of Labour and of the Red Star.

The latest Soviet institution to be attacked in the present clean-up under the auspices of Kultura i Zhizn is the Soviet home and foreign news service, Tass. The unsatisfactory nature of the Tass agency service was listed among the causes of the general inadequacies of regional newspapers, which were severely criticised at the same time; in particular, these papers were attacked for failing to expound ideological questions in their columns or to exercise due influence on the life of local collective farms, and were said to be "filled at random with empty material."

SCANDINAVIA

Sweden

An agreement for a Stockholm–Moscow civil airline, carrying passengers, freight and mail, has been signed between the Governments of the U.S.S.R. and Sweden. Swedish planes will fly between Stockholm and Malmi, the airfield belonging to Helsinki in Finland, and Russian aircraft will ply between Moscow and the Finnish airfield. Thus the Swedes have succeeded in obtaining full reciprocity from the Russians in that neither party to the agreement will fly over the territory of the other. Although the Finnish Government has in fact no control over Malmi airfield, permission had to be obtained for aircraft to fly over Finnish territory en route to Moscow and Stockholm, and this permission was obtained by the Russian Government from the Soviet High Command. It appears that the British element on the Allied Control Commission was not consulted in the matter and the Vice-Chairman of the Commission, in a conversation with our representative in Finland, adopted the attitude that the Commission was merely functioning as an organ of the Soviet High Command and that he himself was a subordinate who was not in a position to discuss its decisions. His Majesty's Government have in consequence requested their representative at Helsinki to have the British element on the Allied Control Commission at once lodge a strong protest with the Vice-Chairman of that body. At the same time it has been suggested that the Vice-Chairman should be informed that His Majesty's Government proposed to ask the Finnish Government for permission to replace their existing courier service by a commercial service now that the ban on foreign flying over Finland had been lifted in favour not only of Russia but also of neutral Sweden. At the moment all other foreign Powers including Allied Powers, wishing to send aircraft to Finland must give necessary notice to, and obtain permission from, the Allied Control Commission through their Legations.

It is now learned that Swedish food rationing will have to be continued, as the hopes of a record harvest have not been fulfilled owing to damage by rain during the harvesting season.

Denmark

The Danish Foreign Minister and the Premier have once against spoken on the South Schleswig question. M. Rasmussen spoke at great length but without adding anything to his original arguments, while M. Kristensen, in a speech at Sonderborg, repeated his well-known extremist views, but prefaced his remarks by emphasizing that he spoke not as Premier but as an ordinary Member of Parliament. The speech has, however, stirred political circles and it does not seem impossible that a vote of confidence may be demanded by M. Kristensen's opponents.

The Danish press appears concerned about the continued occupation of Greenland by the United States, and Prof. Mogens Fog, the Communist deputy and member of the Danish Resistance Movement, has recently asked the Government whether it was intended to denounce the Dano-American agreement on Greenland entered into by M. Kauffman during the war, as Denmark could hardly be regarded as independent as long as the United States retained bases in her northern colony. M. Rasmussen is said to have promised to take up this question during his visit to the United States.

The latest news from the Faeroe Islands shows that the moderate "Home Rule" Party (Selfstyre) have received two seats out of the six gained by the Social Democrat-Selfstyre alliance at the election, leaving four held by Social Democrats. (See this Summary No. 368.)

Finland

A Finnish trade delegation led by Ministers Svento and Takki left for Moscow on the 10th of November. The Finns, according to a statement, are hoping to conclude an agreement for the exchange of goods during the year ending on the 31st December, 1947. The value of the proposed exchange is estimated at 60 million dollars, i.e., 30 million dollars each way, and if concluded will constitute the most valuable compensation agreement so far reached between the two countries. The principal deliveries to be made by the Soviet Union will consist of grain in exchange for prefabricated houses, but the negotiations will no doubt also include a variety of other commodities. It may for instance be mentioned that Finland is anxious to obtain 2,000 tons of refined machine oil as well as other lubricants, and though prices for oil in the Soviet Union are higher than the current prices in the United States, the Finns, through lack of dollars or convertible foreign exchange, may be forced to obtain these requirements from Russia.

Norway

On the 19th of November a Norwegian delegation, headed by the Minister of Supply, M. Torp, arrived in Moscow. M. Torp stated that he and his party were in the Soviet Union for the purpose of stimulating trade between Russia and Norway. Though all commercial intercourse had been interrupted by the war the friendship which the two countries had for each other remained unimpaired, and the Norwegian people were deeply grateful to the Red Army for the part which it played in the liberation of the Finnmark. (See under "Soviet Union.")

FRANCE

No official figures of the complete party representation within the new National Assembly have yet been issued. Reliable sources within the Ministry of the Interior, however, give the following results for 617 out of the 619 seats (Oceania only voted on the 24th November and the Cochin-Chinese election is postponed indefinitely): Communists, 183; Socialists, 101; M.R.P., 162; Rassemblement des Gauches, 63; Gaullist Union, 18; P.R.L. and other Right-wing groups, 67; Algerian moderates, 7; Algerian nationalists, 5; Madagascar nationalists, 3; other colonial deputies, 8.

The elections of over 85,000 delegates, out of 400,000 candidates, to compose the electoral college which will, on the 8th December, elect the Council of the Republic, took place on the 24th November and provided a remarkable illustration of the political consciousness of the French people. Over 72 per cent. of the electorate voted, partly, no doubt, as a result of the exhortations of the M.R.P. and the Right-Wing who feared that a high proportion of abstentions would favour the more highly disciplined Communists. In fact, the Communists do not seem to have improved on their gains at the last election, but the M.R.P. has considerably strengthened its position and is only just behind the Communists. Any exact analysis of the results of last Sunday's election is impossible owing to the complexity of the political alliances formed for the purposes of the election. It seems likely, however, that the second chamber, when elected, will present a balance of forces differing little from that in the legislative Assembly.

The Communist Party is continuing its campaign for leadership of the new Government, and M. Thorez gave yet another interview, this time to an American news agency, in which he repeated the points previously made by him (see last week's Summary). The Communists are making the most of the Socialist refusal to join with them unconditionally to form a governmental coalition. The M.R.P. has declared that it will not enter a Government which is led by a Communist Prime Minister.

Meanwhile, France will not be able as yet to send an authoritative representative to the Foreign Ministers' discussions. M. Bidault is quite unable to leave France for the time being, and M. Couve de Murville, who at present replaces him on the Council of Foreign Ministers, is not authorised to take part in discussions of substance on the German question. He has been instructed therefore to press for the postponement of the important debates on Germany by the Foreign Ministers until the second half of January.

In domestic affairs the first task of the new Government will be to deal with the financial situation. M. Robert Schuman, Minister of Finance, told a correspondent of the New York Times that the budget deficit for 1946 would amount to 120 milliard francs, while that for 1947 would be 155 milliards if drastic steps were not taken quickly. He admitted that there was a danger of inflation, since part of the deficit had to be met by advances from the Bank of France. He urged that the Assembly should vote the budget before the Council of the Republic met on the 24th December.

The increased consumption of electricity, which is 37 per cent. higher than this time last year, together with the low level of water in the reservoirs of the hydro-electric power stations and the shortage of coal for generating thermal power, has necessitated severe restrictions on consumption. In Paris factories are only allowed to use power four days a week, while domestic consumers are cut off for two days a week from 7-30 in the morning to 7-30 in the evening, with a break of three-quarters of an hour at lunchtime. Efforts are being made to fit a 40-hour working week into the framework of these restrictions and to allow fulll supplies to public services and other priority consumers.

The Indo-Chinese territory occupied by Siam in 1941 has at last been restored to France. (See Summaries Nos. 365 and 367 under "Far East"). M. Henri Bonnet, French Ambassador in Washington, declared that the French were acting on behalf of the governments of Cambodia and Laos. The active assistance of the native rulers of these protectorates has, indeed, been of considerable value to the French in their present task of laying the foundations of the Union Française, and particularly in their covert competition with Viet Nam for the favours of Cochinchina, where reports of the "first diplomatic activities of the Indo-Chinese Federation" were undoubtedly calculated to impress. The French have, moreover, now exchanged letters with the Siamese regarding possible Siamese diplomatic representation at Battambang. They profess to fear nothing from the investigations of the Commission of Conciliation which is to examine the whole question of the frontier. Of Siamese willingness or authority to control "spontaneous manifestations" rumoured to be in preparation for the take-over period they are more sceptical, but they trust to the detailed protocol of evacuation and a wise choice of military executives. M. Jean Daridan took up his appointment as Chargé d'Affaires at Bangkok two days after the signing of the agreement.

ITALY

In accordance with instructions received from Signor Nenni, Signor Quaroni, a member of the Italian Delegation in New York, called on M. Simič, the Yugoslav Foreign Minister, on the afternoon of the 20th November. Signor Quaroni informed M. Simič of the Constituent Assembly's decision to establish direct contact with the Yugoslavs over the question of Venezia Giulia and asked for details of Marshal Tito's recent offer. After expressing surprise that Signor Quaroni was not already au fait, M. Simič explained that under the terms of this offer, Trieste was to receive an autonomous régime under Italian sovereignty and that its boundary and the boundary between Italy and Yugoslavia were to be in accordance with the Yugoslav proposals to the Council of Foreign Ministers in New York, which would leave both Gorizia and Monfalcone in Yugoslavia. Signor Quaroni replied that, since Signor Nenni's instructions had been that the French Line was the only possible starting point for negotiations, this proposal offered, in his personal opinion, no basis for discussion. M. Simič then said that the Italian Government was mistaken if it thought that the French Line was an accepted fact since it would never be agreed to by the Yugoslav Government. He went on to enquire what territory the Italian Government would be ready to cede, both on the Italo-Yugoslav frontier and on that of Trieste and Yugoslavia, to retain Italian sovereignty of Trieste. Signor Quaroni replied that this question went beyond his instructions and there the matter rests. Signor Quaroni, however, is of the opinion that the Yugoslavs have no idea of starting serious negotiations.

Trouble within the coalition Government is again coming to a head, owing to the growing rift between the Christian Democrats and the Communists. While the Socialists and the Christian Democrats are doing their best to solve the difficulties with which the nation is faced, the Communists are making use of them for future election purposes. Signor Togliatti continues to attack Signor De Gasperi on every occasion and would seem to desire to provoke a Governmental crisis. On 21st November in the Council of Ministers, Signor De Gasperi challenged Signor Togliatti's assertion that he had made no serious effort to secure the repatriation of Italian prisoners in Yugoslavia and demanded a vote of confidence. Signor Nenni proposed a resolution which recognised that Signor De Gasperi had done everything possible to this end and this was unanimously approved. Although this was a success for Signor De Gasperi, the Christian Democrats will have to evolve a stronger policy if the party is to retain the confidence of its supporters.

Shortly after assuming office the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs informed H.M. Government of his desire for commercial treaty with the United Kingdom. H.M. Government explained the difficulties in the way of anything in the nature of a formal bilateral treaty but expressed their readiness to welcome a small Italian delegation of commercial experts to discuss possible ways and means of increasing commercial exchanges between the two countries. The Italian Government have accepted this offer. It is hoped that talks will begin on December 9th.

Further results in the Municipal elections show that the People's bloc have won 1,045 seats and 70 communes; 141 seats and 3 communes have been won by the Socialists, 152 seats and 7 communes by the Communists, each Party acting independently; 741 seats and 15 communes by the Christian Democrats and 109 seats and 4 communes by the Uomo Qualunque.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The statement of Mr. Morgan Phillips, the Secretary-General of the British Labour Party, that his visit to Hungary should be interpreted as signifying his Party's appreciation of the achievements of Hungarian democracy has been received with great satisfaction by the Social Democrats whose guest he was. By implication it is considered a setback to those adherents of the old régime who had hoped to make political capital out of the differences between the Great Powers.

Since MM. Bárányos, Eröss and Bognár are all members of the Smallholders' Party their appointment to the Ministries of Agriculture, Supply and Information respectively does not affect the status quo so far as the proportional distribution of Portfolios is concerned. The technical qualifications of

M. Bárányos, in particular, are generally admitted throughout Hungary, where his ability is respected independently of Party considerations. M. Keresztúry, the National Peasant Party Minister of Education, is to remain in office, as it was found impossible to reach agreement on the subject of his successor.

Arrangements are being made to allow M. Nyárady to visit London and Washington in order to discuss the restitution of Hungarian property from the U.K. and U.S.A. zones in Austria and Germany. In this connection the question of admitting a Mission into the U.K. zones is under examination.

The Representatives of the United Kingdom and of the United States on the Allied Control Commission in Budapest are protesting against General Sviridov's demand for the cessation of U.S. wireless bulletins on the pretext that these are libellous to the Soviet Union. The restrictions imposed by the Armistice Terms on Hungarian publications, it is pointed out, in no sense apply to any of the Powers represented on the Control Commission itself.

M. Gyöngyösi, the Foreign Minister, has stated that the deportations to Bohemia for labour service of Hungarians living in Southern Slovakia have been carried through with the utmost brutality, those who resisted being beaten and handcuffed. 250 had, however, managed to escape to their own country by boat, although several of the refugees are reported killed. Dr. Winkler, the Czechoslovak Government Representative on the Mixed Commission, has said that the deportations are simply a matter of recruiting agricultural labour for the Czech lands, and that as such no investigation is necessary.

In Transylvania 29 Deputies from the Hungarian Popular Party have been elected.

Rumania

The estimate given in last week's Summary of a Government majority of 80% has proved to be correct, but a little under the mark. The actual majority is just about 84%. Of the 348 members of the Government bloc, 70 are professed Communists, although this profession amounts to very little. There is not much to add to what has already been said on the subject. The principal malpractices which have gone to secure the majority have been summarised by the British authorities under six heads: (a) withholding of electoral identity cards from opposition voters; (b) forcible interference with opposition representatives on polling supervisory committees; (c) arrest of a number of opposition candidates on election day; (d) plural voting by Government supporters; (e) actual inclusion in the count of ballot papers already printed to show a Government vote; (f) general intimidation of parties and electorate in certain sectors, both before and during polling day. It is difficult to believe in corruption on such a scale even in a country like Rumania where corruption has been reduced to a fine art. A shrewd suggestion which comes from a Rumanian resident in England is that the Rumanian people, recognising the hard facts of the situation have thrown themselves heart and soul into this stupendous fraud in the belief that it is common knowledge that such a result could never have been obtained if the voters had been free agents, and so they have chosen this way of demonstrating to the world that they were acting under compulsion from without.

It is early days to speak of what the immediate results may be. The new Parliament is to meet on the 1st December, and the questions which arise are concerned with the attitude which may be taken up by the British and American authorities, and not least by the King himself. This much is certain: that the slightest inclination of a desire to be accommodating will be interpreted by the Groza Government as a justification of their wholesale breaking of promises. This is clearly shown by the exchange of notes which took place just before the election. The practical problem before Britain and America is what pressure, direct or indirect, can be brought to bear, and indeed, if any pressure at all shall be used. The decision will have an important bearing on the problem which has to be faced by the King, and upon the future of the country and the dynasty.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Government rose energetically to the Greek Government's charges that the insurgents in Northern Greece were receiving help and encouragement from Yugoslavia. The Greek Minister in Belgrade was informed that Yugoslav frontier posts in Southern Macedonia were being reinforced to prevent Greek bands seeking refuge across the frontier. He was handed two notes of protest against violations of the Yugoslav frontier by Greek aircraft, on the 20th, 21st and 22nd November. Some plans were said to have penetrated to a depth of five kilometres and one was reported to have opened fire on a Yugoslav military post. The first note concluded with the warning "that the Yugoslav Government will take all necessary steps to prevent the crossing of our territory by foreign aircraft, and any act of aggression whatsoever." The second note complained that some planes had not left Yugoslav territory until the A.A. defences had gone into action.

H.M. Ambassador in Belgrade questioned the Assistant Minister for Foreign Affairs on the subject of these Yugoslav reinforcements. He commented, too, on the secrecy with which events in Southern Macedonia were shrouded and referred to the occasion when the British Commercial Secretary had been turned away from Ohrid recently without any explanation. General Velebit assured Mr. Peake that the Yugoslav Government had no sinister intentions towards Greece.

The press and wireless, of course, have gone very vigorously into action, using their stock arguments about the Greek people fighting for their freedom and independence, about the Greek Government being kept in power by British bayonets in order to further British imperialist designs in the Mediterranean, and so on. The Greek accusations against Yugoslavia were described as "criminal attempts to destroy peace and security in the Balkans." Borba, 24th November, wondered whether the situation was not sufficiently serious for Yugoslavia to consider a rupture of diplomatic relations with Greece.

The Greek business has effaced most other subjects from the news. There was a sudden burst of indignation, however, over an anonymous pamphlet setting out Austrian claims to part of Lower Styria within Yugoslavia, which was described as being distributed among Austrian official circles. This may herald a revival of the Yugoslav demand for Carinthia.

The failure of the British and American authorities to trace Ante Pavelić, the head of the puppet "Independent State of Croatia," who is said to be hiding in Italy or Austria, has long been a sore point with the Yugoslav Government. It cannot understand that, under present conditions, it is impossible for the authorities to keep an eye on every individual displaced person, or to guard all the camps. Although the former Yugoslav Military Mission and the Yugoslav War Crimes Mission in Austria, in spite of special facilities, have been equally unsuccessful, the Yugoslavs periodically accuse His Majesty's Government and the U.S. Government of knowing the whereabouts of the wanted man, and of deliberately withholding him. A recent article in a Swiss paper will do nothing to dispel their suspicions. It contains an account of an interview of its correspondent with Pavelić in Graz, at which two American officers were said to be present.

The Serbian Constituent Assembly has elected its Presidium. The Prime Minister of Serbia, M. Blagoje Nešković, went through the formality of resigning and of accepting the invitation to form a new Government—the mixture as before. A similar procedure has been followed in Slovenia.

In a news item on the development of plastic surgery in Yugoslavia, Tanjug paid an unaccustomed tribute to the work of the British team of plastic surgeons, which has spent a year in Yugoslavia under the auspices of UNRRA.

Greece

On the 19th November the Greek Government published a list of thirty-three frontier incidents of which nineteen are alleged to have taken place between the 9th September and 14th November on the Yugoslav border, ten on the Albanian and four on the Bulgarian. In several cases Albanian or Yugoslav patrols are stated to have been involved and in other Yugoslav frontier posts are said to have helped the bands with fire or directions. These allegations seem to be true. In any case there is now no doubt that armed bands frequently come from, and escape to, neighbouring countries. (See under Yugoslavia.)

Although there are recent reports of serious incidents in the Peloponnese in which bandits coming down from the mountains near Sparta and elsewhere have overwhelmed the gendarmerie, it may be said that the authorities are able to cope with the situation south of a rough line from Yannina to Volo. Though hampered by the nature of the country and by bad communications, the Greek authorities would still manage eventually to re-establish order north of that line, were the Communist bands not trained and armed in Yugoslavia and able to retire across the frontier and to return replenished from bases on foreign soil. These bands consist of Greek autonomists or ex-ELAS men who have been worked on to believe that their oppressed countrymen will welcome them and, with their help, join a Balkan federation. Thus the penetration of armed bands down the mountain ridges leading from Yugoslavia and Albania puts Western Macedonia very largely under bandit control and keeps Salonica in a perpetual state of anxiety.

On the 19th November there was a storm in the Chamber when M. Kanellopoulos, fresh from a tour in Northern Greece, asserted that the Government no longer had control of the country north of Mt. Olympus. M. Tsaldaris angrily replied that some of the Opposition were acting against the national interest by making such statements. Two Leftist papers have been suspended, it is reported, for printing a statement purporting to come from "G.H.Q. Republican Army of Northern Greece," and a bill has been introduced to enable the authorities to keep such tendentious matter out of the press. The Government deny that the rebels have succeeded in creating any considerable "free" area near Grevena or elsewhere but, all the same, land communications between Athens and Salonica are practically cut.

The Communist leaders in Athens who seem to have little or no control over the armed bands in the north, will no doubt continue to stir up popular grievances, and there will be economic strikes, but the Greek masses have no desire to rise against the allegedly "reactionary monarcho-fascist" Government. Indeed the rebellion has already done something to strengthen M. Tsaldaris' shaky position in the Chamber and led to a second strike of civil servants being called off. Nevertheless, even the moderate leaders continue to squabble among themselves—to the joy of the Communists. The extreme Right have become restive under M. Tsaldaris' measures of appeasement such as the amnesty which became law on the 20th November, and the Opposition will not join in a coalition Government unless they are first assured that the economic and financial help which M. Tsaldaris hopes to get from the United States and Britain will be forthcoming.

Albania

As the Admiralty briefly announced on the 21st November, it has been established that the 22 mines swept by British minesweepers in the North Corfu Channel on the 13th were of German manufacture. Nothing beyond this has been made public at present, but it is understood that the technical evidence available makes it virtually certain that the minefield was laid within the past two months either by Albania herself or by some Power (perhaps Yugoslavia) acting as her agent. As The Times naval correspondent has pointed out, an expert has no difficulty, from inspection of a recovered mine, in recognising within fairly narrow limits how long has elapsed since it was first put under water. If the obvious inference is confirmed, an intolerable state of affairs is revealed. International law, codified by the Hague Conventions of 1907 and universally accepted since, obliges even a belligerent in time of war to notify the world when he makes any sea area dangerous by laying mines. When there are no hostilities in progress there can be no possible justification for any Power clandestinely placing mines off its coasts, whether in its own territorial waters or not.

Bulgaria

On the 21st November—3½ weeks after the elections—M. Kimon Georgiev's Cabinet resigned, Georgi Dimitrov having decided to form a more predominantly Communist administration with himself at the head. On the 23rd the new Cabinet was completed as follows:—

Prime Minister: Georgi Dimitrov (Communist).
Vice-Premier and Foreign Affairs: Kimon Georgiev (Zveno).
Vice-Premiers without Portfolio:—
Alexander Obbov (Govt. Agrarian).
Traicho Kostov (Communist).
Georgi Popov (Govt. Social Democrat).
Interior: Anton Yugov (Communist).
Education: Dr. Mincho Neichev (Communist).
Finance: Prof. Ivan Stefanov (Communist).
Justice: Radi Naidenov (Govt. Agrarian).
War: Maj.-Gen. Georgi Damianov (Communist).
Trade and Supply: Yordan Bozhilov (Communist).
Agriculture and State Domains: Georgi Traikov (Govt. Agrarian).
Public Works, Roads and Construction: Georgi Dragnev (Govt. Agrarian).

on the 20th, 21st and 22nd November. Some plans were said to have penetrated to a depth of five kilometres and one was reported to have opened fire on a Yugoslav military post. The first note concluded with the warning "that the Yugoslav Government will take all necessary steps to prevent the crossing of our territory by foreign aircraft, and any act of aggression whatsoever." The second note complained that some planes had not left Yugoslav territory until the A.A. defences had gone into action.

H.M. Ambassador in Belgrade questioned the Assistant Minister for Foreign Affairs on the subject of these Yugoslav reinforcements. He commented, too, on the secrecy with which events in Southern Macedonia were shrouded and referred to the occasion when the British Commercial Secretary had been turned away from Ohrid recently without any explanation. General Velebit assured Mr. Peake that the Yugoslav Government had no sinister intentions towards Greece.

The press and wireless, of course, have gone very vigorously into action, using their stock arguments about the Greek people fighting for their freedom and independence, about the Greek Government being kept in power by British bayonets in order to further British imperialist designs in the Mediterranean, and so on. The Greek accusations against Yugoslavia were described as "criminal attempts to destroy peace and security in the Balkans." Borba, 24th November, wondered whether the situation was not sufficiently serious for Yugoslavia to consider a rupture of diplomatic relations with Greece.

The Greek business has effaced most other subjects from the news. There was a sudden burst of indignation, however, over an anonymous pamphlet setting out Austrian claims to part of Lower Styria within Yugoslavia, which was described as being distributed among Austrian official circles. This may herald a revival of the Yugoslav demand for Carinthia.

The failure of the British and American authorities to trace Ante Pavelić, the head of the puppet "Independent State of Croatia," who is said to be hiding in Italy or Austria, has long been a sore point with the Yugoslav Government. It cannot understand that, under present conditions, it is impossible for the authorities to keep an eye on every individual displaced person, or to guard all the camps. Although the former Yugoslav Military Mission and the Yugoslav War Crimes Mission in Austria, in spite of special facilities, have been equally unsuccessful, the Yugoslavs periodically accuse His Majesty's Government and the U.S. Government of knowing the whereabouts of the wanted man, and of deliberately withholding him. A recent article in a Swiss paper will do nothing to dispel their suspicions. It contains an account of an interview of its correspondent with Pavelić in Graz, at which two American officers were said to be present.

The Serbian Constituent Assembly has elected its Presidium. The Prime Minister of Serbia, M. Blagoje Nešković, went through the formality of resigning and of accepting the invitation to form a new Government—the mixture as before. A similar procedure has been followed in Slovenia.

In a news item on the development of plastic surgery in Yugoslavia, Tanjug paid an unaccustomed tribute to the work of the British team of plastic surgeons, which has spent a year in Yugoslavia under the auspices of UNRRA.

Greece

On the 19th November the Greek Government published a list of thirty-three frontier incidents of which nineteen are alleged to have taken place between the 9th September and 14th November on the Yugoslav border, ten on the Albanian and four on the Bulgarian. In several cases Albanian or Yugoslav patrols are stated to have been involved and in other Yugoslav frontier posts are said to have helped the bands with fire or directions. These allegations seem to be true. In any case there is now no doubt that armed bands frequently come from, and escape to, neighbouring countries. (See under Yugoslavia.)

Although there are recent reports of serious incidents in the Peloponnese in which bandits coming down from the mountains near Sparta and elsewhere have overwhelmed the gendarmerie, it may be said that the authorities are able to cope with the situation south of a rough line from Yannina to Volo. Though hampered by the nature of the country and by bad communications, the Greek authorities would still manage eventually to re-establish order north of that line, were the Communist bands not trained and armed in Yugoslavia and able to retire across the frontier and to return replenished from bases on foreign soil. These bands consist of Greek autonomists or ex-ELAS men who have been worked on to believe that their oppressed countrymen will welcome them and, with their help, join a Balkan federation. Thus the penetration of armed bands down the mountain ridges leading from Yugoslavia and Albania puts Western Macedonia very largely under bandit control and keeps Salonica in a perpetual state of anxiety.

On the 19th November there was a storm in the Chamber when M. Kanellopoulos, fresh from a tour in Northern Greece, asserted that the Government no longer had control of the country north of Mt. Olympus. M. Tsaldaris angrily replied that some of the Opposition were acting against the national interest by making such statements. Two Leftist papers have been suspended, it is reported, for printing a statement purporting to come from "G.H.Q. Republican Army of Northern Greece," and a bill has been introduced to enable the authorities to keep such tendentious matter out of the press. The Government deny that the rebels have succeeded in creating any considerable "free" area near Grevena or elsewhere but, all the same, land communications between Athens and Salonica are practically cut.

The Communist leaders in Athens who seem to have little or no control over the armed bands in the north, will no doubt continue to stir up popular grievances, and there will be economic strikes, but the Greek masses have no desire to rise against the allegedly "reactionary monarcho-fascist" Government. Indeed the rebellion has already done something to strengthen M. Tsaldaris' shaky position in the Chamber and led to a second strike of civil servants being called off. Nevertheless, even the moderate leaders continue to squabble among themselves—to the joy of the Communists. The extreme Right have become restive under M. Tsaldaris' measures of appeasement such as the amnesty which became law on the 20th November, and the Opposition will not join in a coalition Government unless they are first assured that the economic and financial help which M. Tsaldaris hopes to get from the United States and Britain will be forthcoming.

Albania

As the Admiralty briefly announced on the 21st November, it has been established that the 22 mines swept by British minesweepers in the North Corfu Channel on the 13th were of German manufacture. Nothing beyond this has been made public at present, but it is understood that the technical evidence available makes it virtually certain that the minefield was laid within the past two months either by Albania herself or by some Power (perhaps Yugoslavia) acting as her agent. As The Times naval correspondent has pointed out, an expert has no difficulty, from inspection of a recovered mine, in recognising within fairly narrow limits how long has elapsed since it was first put under water. If the obvious inference is confirmed, an intolerable state of affairs is revealed. International law, codified by the Hague Conventions of 1907 and universally accepted since, obliges even a belligerent in time of war to notify the world when he makes any sea area dangerous by laying mines. When there are no hostilities in progress there can be no possible justification for any Power clandestinely placing mines off its coasts, whether in its own territorial waters or not.

Railways, Posts and Telegraphs: Stefan Tonchev (Govt. Agrarian).
Health: Dr. Ratcho Angelov (Communist).
Social Policy: Zdravko Mitovski (Govt. Social Democrat).
Information and Arts: Dimo Kazasov (nominally Independent).
Electrification, Waters and Natural Wealth: Manuel Sakelarov (Communist).
Industry: Hristo Lilkov (Zveno).
President of the Supreme Economic Council: Dobri Terpeshev (Communist).

This means that the Communists, besides having a total of ten out of twenty members in the new Government, have gained three important Ministries, namely Education (formerly Radical), War (formerly Zveno) and Trade (formerly Govt. Social Democrat). The Government Agrarians retain the four Ministries they already held, plus a vice-Premiership without portfolio. The Zveno representation has been reduced from four to two; the Government Social Democrats are to have two Ministers but only one Ministry; the only Radical goes out, and among others dropped are Georgi Kulishev (Zveno), who was Foreign Minister in the last administration, and Dimiter Neikov (Govt. Social Democrat), who was Minister of Trade in the last two. The ruthless Dr. Mincho Neichev, feared and hated as Minister of Justice in the last Cabinet but one, significantly reappears as Minister of Education. Six others—Naidenov, Damianov, Bozhilov, Traikov, Mitovski and Sakelarov—are newcomers. Altogether, it ought to prove a pliant team. M. Georgiev, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, may be depended upon to toe the line to Dimitrov's satisfaction (and can always be replaced). General Damianov is a capable military organiser trained in Russia.

Concurrently with these ministerial changes, the Governorship of the National Bank has changed hands: M. Stanko Cholakov, a member of the Zveno party (who was Finance Minister until last March), has resigned, and his Communist understudy, M. Tsonchev, has taken his place.

It was announced in London on the 22nd November that the King had approved the appointment of Mr. W. E. Houstoun-Boswall, British Political Representative in Bulgaria since 1944, to be H.M. Minister to the Lebanese Republic. Tribute was paid to Mr. Houstoun-Boswall's work during two strenuous years by Mr. Mayhew, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the House of Commons on the 12th.

The Foreign Affairs debate in the House aroused immense interest in the Bulgarian press, the idea of a "Labour M.P.s' revolt" appealing strongly to Fatherland Front supporters, and there were sensational headlines for three or four days. The Soviet press has been quoted prominently as saying that the rebels represent the true feelings of the English people, and great publicity has been given to a statement of Dimitrov's applauding Mr. Mack and Mr. Zilliacus and attacking Mr. Mott-Radclyffe's reference to "40,000 political prisoners in Bulgaria." In so far as he defended Bulgaria's interests against Greece, Mr. Zilliacus came in for praise from Government and Opposition press alike.

About three weeks ago the representative whom the Opposition had been allowed to have on the "Central Committee for the public observation of the elections"—a highly respected lawyer called M. Bronzov, who was Mayor of Sofia last year—rather courageously sent in a minority report on the way the elections were held, in which he drew attention to a number of irregularities and made specific allegations of electoral fraud. So far, no action has been taken by the authorities to investigate these charges. Even the majority report admitted that "irregularities and incidents occurred at some places in the country," but it went on to argue that "being of a limited number they were not calculated materially to influence the result of the elections." The Zveno party executive issued a statement openly criticising the Communists' electioneering methods and placing their dissatisfaction on record; but here again the Communists have taken no notice. The Trojan Horse policy has been only too successfully carried out.

The U.S.S.R. have opened a new Consulate at Plovdiv.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

While little progress appears to have been made towards reaching an agreement upon the Treaty proposals now before the Egyptian delegation—partly, no doubt, owing to the illness of Sidky Pasha—no efforts are being spared by the Opposition parties to intensify the campaign against them, and their activities have received no little impetus from their belief that Sidky Pasha intends to push ahead with Parliamentary backing, regardless of the delegation's eventual decision. The Chamber of Deputies have had an animated debate on an interpellation, submitted by the Sa'adist Vice President, and suspected to have been instigated by the Cabinet, regarding the progress of the negotiations. Makram Ebeid Pasha and other members upheld the authority of the delegation to reject or approve the Treaty terms in the first place. The discussion was eventually closed by the President, who declared that the results of the London talks would be deposited at the Bureau of the Chamber, and that discussions would be resumed on the 26th November. A secret session was held on that day. Makram Pasha headed the Opposition members who walked out early in the proceedings as a protest because the session was in camera. A detailed account of the London conversations was given by Sidky Pasha and Ibrahim Abdul Hadi, the Foreign Minister. A vote of confidence in the Government was obtained, and authorisation was given to the Government to continue negotiations for the realisation of the nation's aims, and to submit the results to Parliament.

King Farouk issued a decree on the 26th November dissolving the Treaty delegation, a step which the attitude of the majority of its members had rendered almost inevitable. In view of the influence exerted upon the students and the mass of the population of the larger towns by the Opposition parties (particularly the Wafd and the Ikhwan el Muslimin) a critical situation may result from this step.

In an interview published by the Musawwar in its issue of last week, Sidky Pasha argued that, by the terms of the Sudan protocol, agreed in London, the unity of the Sudan with Egypt under the one crown was ensured, and that it was within this framework that the Sudanese would be prepared for "self-government," an expression by which the Governments of Egypt and Great Britain understand internal autonomy, and not complete political independence. Any other view, said Sidky Pasha, could be the result of ignorance or bad intention only. The Sudan could not separate from Egypt, except with Egypt's consent. Challenged by His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires on this unwarranted interpretation, Sidky Pasha claimed that he was only trying to calm public excitement. In what is described as a "considered reply" to a request by The Times correspondent for information on the state of the Treaty negotiations, which was published in London on the 23rd November, Sidky Pasha refers to the heavy responsibility which will fall on Egypt "to help the Sudan to realise its ambitions and to achieve its own destiny under the ægis of the King of Egypt." In the same statement he dismisses the importance of the opposition with an optimism which seems to ignore inconvenient facts. An "all party" committee to oppose the Treaty is said to have been formed, and there is believed to be a distinct chance that, although the Treaty terms may be accepted by the Chamber of Deputies, they will be rejected by the Senate.

Demonstrations by Cairo students took place on the 23rd, 24th, 25th and 26th November, and clashes with the police and the military resulted in casualties on both sides. Fire-arms and hand-grenades were used by the students. The Opposition press alleges an excessive use of force against the demonstrators. In Alexandria students went on strike on the 23rd November, but dispersed quietly. A more serious outbreak, with casualties amongst the police, took place on the 26th November.

Syria

The picture of conditions in Syria presented in Summary No. 362 was based upon information which concentrated upon the points of actual and potential unrest, and thus gave insufficient credit to the Syrian Government for the maintenance of security in the country as a whole at a standard much higher than had been expected. In fact, apart from minor incidents, the security of the country has been maintained unimpaired since the events of May and June, 1945, and the Government's authority has been established in one area of potential disaffection, the Alawite territory. At the same time the political stability of the country may be disturbed during the coming months if, as is possible, some members of the Government resign in order to give their full time to preparing for the elections. The return to Syria of Jamil Mardam Bey, who has just relinquished his post as Syrian Minister in Cairo, may also complicate the political situation.

Saudi Arabia

King Ibn Saud has replied to Mr. Truman's letter of the 25th October expressing his recognition of Mr. Truman's benevolent zeal on behalf of Jewish displaced persons, but drawing his attention to the inconsistency with the humane and democratic principles which are the basis of life in the United States of America, of forcing a people to accept the entry of aliens who will become a majority and drive them from their own country.

Iraq

The hope that a Cabinet to carry out the elections might be formed by the Amir Zaid has not been fulfilled, and on the 21st November came the somewhat unexpected announcement that Nuri Said had formed a Cabinet. The members and their Ministries are as follows:—

Prime Minister and Minister of Interior: Nuri as Said.
Finance: Salih Jabr.
Foreign Affairs: Fadhil al Jamali.
Economics: Baba Ali.
Justice: Omar Nadhmi.
Communications: Ali Mumtaz.
Defence: Shakir al Wadi.
Education: Sadiq al Bassam.
Supplies: Muhammed Hadid.
Social Affairs: Jamil Abdul Wahab.

Only Jamali and Baba Ali retain their posts. Yusuf Ghanima, the Christian Minister of Finance, makes way for Salih Jabr, who is generally regarded as the most capable of the younger men and destined to be the first Shia Prime Minister. Muhammed Hadid is a member of the left-wing National Democratic party, and is 'Iraq's first left-wing Cabinet Minister.

A Royal irada has been issued announcing the dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies and the holding of elections in order to provide the nation with a Parliament capable of dealing with the problems of peace.

Arab League

The meeting of the Council, which opened on the 30th October, was adjourned until the 18th November, and two communiqués have been issued. In one the Arab States are called upon to recognise the independence of Indonesia; in the second, issued on the 24th November, the receipt of messages from political organisations in North Africa is announced, and a decision is recorded expressing sympathy towards the peoples of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Tripolitania, and promising support for their right to freedom and independence.

Palestine

In the three weeks between the Inner Zionist Council's statement denouncing terrorism (see Summary No. 367) and the 19th November, British casualties in Palestine had reached the figure of 17 killed and 52 injured. In addition there were 6 Palestinian casualties, 5 fatal. There was no abatement in the attacks during the week under review. Casualties to British personnel were 6 killed and 10 wounded. Two incidents during this period merit special mention. On the 20th November a bomb was placed in the premises of the Jerusalem Income Tax Offices. Although the police exploded the bomb by gunfire 12 persons were injured, one of whom, a Jewish temporary policeman, died subsequently. The Income Tax Offices suffered serious damage. On the 17th November a police vehicle was blown up by a mine on the road between Sarona and Tel Aviv. Three British police constables and one R.A.F. sergeant were killed, and two British policemen and two aircraftmen injured. The vehicle itself was gutted.

The second of these incidents had repercussions. After a police check had been introduced at the scene of the incident complaints were received that some ten vehicles had suffered damage (mainly of a minor character, although two had bullet-holes in them), while four civilian suspects who had been arrested complained of assault by the police and military. On the following day 15 policemen entered cafés in Tel Aviv where they are reported to have done considerable damage. 32 cases of assault were reported, and 5 persons were detained in hospital, though none of the injuries was serious. A number of cars was also reported to have been stolen.

The High Commissioner, in considering various measures intended to improve the political atmosphere in Palestine, has had constantly to bear in mind the effect that concessions to Jewish opinion might have on the morale of the police and military forces in Palestine. The incident described above is an indication of the effect which the continued tension caused by the acts of the terrorists is having.

In addition to the acts of terrorism aimed primarily at the British administration in Palestine, a Jewish civilian was shot and seriously injured in Tel Aviv by two Jewish youths. The motive behind this crime appears to have been political.

Between the 19th and 21st November all services were cancelled on the Palestine Railways in consequence of unrest caused among the railway staff by terrorist activities. A restricted service was reintroduced on the 22nd November.

There are further signs that the Jewish Agency will attempt to suppress terrorism. Recent casualties to Jews appear to have spurred them to consider more drastic measures than have been adopted hitherto, although they are apprehensive of a schism of the Yishuv, or of defections from the Hagana to the terrorists. The Jewish press certainly seems to suggest a hardening of the official Zionist attitude towards the terrorists.

As it appears that the United Nations Assembly will continue in session after the 16th December, the date arranged for the resumption of the Palestine Conference, the Arab Governments are being requested by their representatives at New York to propose a postponement of the Conference. His Majesty's Government will raise no objection to this proposal should it be advanced. A postponement would, in any event, have the merit of allowing the Zionist Congress, should it decide in favour of Jewish participation, time to arrange its delegation (see Summary No. 369).

Meanwhile the question of Palestine is being brought to the attention of the United Nations. At a Committee which is discussing the future constitution of the International Refugee Organisation the Egyptian delegate proposed an amendment for inclusion in the preamble, to the effect that the essential task of the International Refugee Organisation was repatriation, and that resettlement would only be contemplated as a last resort. Both this and a second Egyptian amendment providing that the resettlement of refugees could in no case be imposed on a sovereign State or run counter to the freely expressed wishes of the indigenous populations of trust- or non-self-governing regions or territories, were defeated.

Not all Jews are with Ben Gurion in rejecting a United Nations trusteeship for Palestine (see Summary No. 369). The Jewish Telegraphic Agency claims that the Uruguayan Foreign Minister has promised the Uruguayan "Pro-Palestine Committee" to bring Palestine under United Nations trusteeship, and to press for unlimited immigration. In Palestine itself Hashomer Hatzair, the extreme left-wing party which advocates a bi-national State, proposes that during the transition period a trusteeship, with the U.S.S.R. as one of the trustees, should be established. On the other hand, a resolution submitted to the Board of Deputies of British Jews advocating a United Nations trusteeship was withdrawn after the President, Professor Brodetsky, had pertinently drawn attention to the disadvantages of having the matter placed before the United Nations, where there were six Arab States, and where the attitude of the Eastern European countries was unknown.

Persia

The Prime Minister returned to Tehran from Gilan on the 19th November. In an interview with His Majesty's Ambassador the next day he appeared optimistic about the election prospects, and expressed the view that the Tudeh were unlikely to secure any seats in Gilan, Mazanderan or Khorassan. In regard to Azerbaijan, he has now decided to send armed detachments of gendarmerie and, if necessary, of the regular army to all constituencies without exception to ensure that order is maintained and that the elections are free from all improper interference. In addition, the Ministry of the Interior is to send special officials to all constituencies to supervise the proper conduct of the elections, and to take immediate action to prevent any attempt at obstructing the smooth working of the electoral machinery. Circular directives on these lines, which also contained instructions for the proper and speedy conduct of the elections in accordance with the Electoral Law of 1911, were sent to all Governors-General and Governors on the 21st November.

The Prime Minister hopes by these measures to assert his authority over the Azerbaijanis and thus overcome the opposition to the holding of the elections, which is based on the abnormality of conditions in this province (see Summary No. 367). If they deny the Central Government's right to send in forces, refuse to admit them or deny them freedom of action, they would then be defying the Government's authority. If it could be shewn that such defiance was prompted by the Soviet, the Prime Minister has stated that he may make an appeal to the United Nations.

Further information has now been received about the occupation of Zenjan (see last week's Summary). According to the Prime Minister, the Azerbaijanis undertook six months ago completely to withdraw their armed forces from Zenjan and the Khamseh district, but subsequently made every sort of excuse for not honouring their pledge. Eventually, the Azerbaijan delegation to Tehran (see Summary No. 367) agreed to evacuate Zenjan on the 14th November. Carefully-chosen gendarmerie officers were accordingly sent there on that date to take over, but they found that the town had not been evacuated. Four days later one of their number was shot at, and others grossly insulted and arrested by Azerbaijani "Fidais." In view of these facts, a column of regular army troops was ordered to move to Zenjan, where it arrived on the 23rd November. Martial law was then declared, and the town appears to have been occupied without further incident.

The Kurdish rebels at Sardasht (see last week's Summary) have not caused any more trouble during the past week. A report has, however, reached the British Military Attaché that on the 5th November the Kurds succeeded in capturing the heights surrounding the town, but were expelled by a successful counter-attack on the following day. According to the Chief of the Persian General Staff, the Russians have recently supplied the Kurds with arms and uniforms.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The promulgation of the Constitution brings to the foreground the question of the future of the Yoshida Government since the new constitution requires that the Premier and a majority of the Cabinet shall be members of the Diet. According to a Japanese radio broadcast of the 11th October the present intention of the Government is to hold a general election either immediately after the constitution comes into effect (3rd May, 1947) or after the regular Diet session in the spring. The Social-Democratic and the Communist Parties are, however, demanding the immediate resignation of the Government. The two parties are at one in laying the blame for growing inflation at the door of the Government, though the Communist Party as might be expected, adds the charge that the Government is pro-capitalist and anti-labour. Both parties are in line with the Japanese Federation of Labour Unions and the Congress of Industrial Organisations which attack the Government on the score of its recent treatment of strikes.

The Government has run into difficulty in its attempt to check by compulsory mediation the spread of labour disputes. The Labour Relations Readjustment Act provides for such mediation but when the Central Labour Commission recommended that the average wage of electrical workers be raised from 1,200 yen to 2,150 yen per month, the Government took alarm and refused to accept the award. It now proposes to establish a Wage Examination Board whose task would be to "devise a general basis for wages" (presumably in relationship to the cost of living).

The teachers are also striking, through the All Japan Teachers' Union. It is generally agreed in Japan that teachers are badly underpaid and there is much sympathy for their claims, but unfortunately the issue has been obscured by the use of tactics that have a strong Communist appearance—the flaunting of red flags in mass public demonstrations and demands relating to cash payments and income tax exemptions that could only be met by an alteration of the laws.

The drift toward strikes for political ends and the outbreak of "wildcat" or irresponsible local strikes have induced the Headquarters of the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers to counsel moderation. No new directive has been issued but pamphlets on collective bargaining procedure and on union contracts with employers, as practised in the United States, have been distributed and leaders have been advised to avoid political strikes, "wild changes," abuse and violent picketing.

Over this scene of labour unrest hovers the spectre of inflation. The old currency was called in and new notes issued during February and March and on the 26th March the note issue was 18,000 million yen. By mid-November it had reached 70,000 million. The Finance Minister, who is a staunch believer in reflation, maintains that "there will be nothing to fear, if production picks up." Lack of consumer goods appears to be the main cause, and the consequent black market the subsidiary cause, of the rise in prices. While production has grown, the rate of progress shows signs of slowing down. Thus of 500,000 bales of American cotton received it is reported that only 180,000 bales have been processed. Shortage of materials for the reconstruction of mills and difficulties in recruiting labour are said to be the main obstacles.

The urgent need of industrial recovery lends point to S.C.A.P's. desire to see the problem of reparations settled without further delay (see Summary 367 under Soviet Union).

If the Yoshida Government can weather the stormy seas it is now encountering, the proposal to postpone the general election until the first half of 1947 would seem the more logical, for the delay would give time for the local elections now due to take place and for the settlement of the vexed question of the "purge." In October, the Soviet member of the Allied Council requested an assurance that the local elections would be cleansed of defects that had characterised the last general election. The Chairman took exception to the tone of his remarks but colour has been lent to the justice of the charge by orders issued by the Government for a drastic purge and disqualification of all local officials, politicians and business leaders who were associated with wartime ultra-patriotic organisations. According to the Tokyo Broadcast a Government official hinted broadly that the initiative came from S.C.A.P. A number of local officials have "saved face" by resigning and concern is caused by the consequent slowing-down of administration. In turn the position of may Diet members is rendered insecure by the removal of persons who were instrumental in their election. The two conservative parties—the Progressives and the Liberals—which are the main support of the Yoshida Government are understood to be more seriously affected than the Socialist Party.

The next regular session of the Diet is due to convene on the 27th December but an extraordinary session was opened on the 25th November.

Korea

According to Moscow Radio of the 15th November elections to People's Committees of Northern Korea were carried out amidst scenes of the greatest enthusiasm. Of an electorate of approximately four and a half million 99·6% voted! Over 97% voted for candidates of the United National Democratic Front in elections to the Provincial People's Committees, 95·4% for Town Committees and 96·9% for District Committees. Comment is unnecessary. The following day "Pravda" published a long article on the subject of Korea. The administration of Northern Korea was praised to the skies—1,000,000 hectares of land had been confiscated and handed over to the peasants, industry, transport, postal communications and banks had been handed over to the People's Committees, an eight-hour day and social insurance had been introduced and women had been given equal rights. Equal space in the article was given to abuse of the American administration of Southern Korea: the Joint Commission had broken down because the U.S. delegates wished to alter the terms of the Moscow agreement; the aim of the administration was to destroy democratic organisations; premises were raided; progressive periodicals were closed down; leaders were arrested and strikers shot.

So long as the Soviet line is to pillory all non-Communists as reactionary and to distort measures taken for the maintenance of law and order, prospects of an amicable settlement, if the Joint Commission is re-opened, are remote. At the same time it must be admitted that the great majority of the people in Southern Korea have no understanding of the rights and wrongs of the case and look back with feelings akin to regret to the time when they were subject to an iron discipline and at all events "knew where they were."

According to the press, General Hodge, Commander of the U.S. Forces of Occupation in South Korea, announced on the 8th November that the Soviet Commander had written expressing Russian willingness to resume talks on the unification of Korea. The Russians appear to have modified their views for they are now stated to recognise the right of Koreans to freedom of expression in presenting their views. General Christiakov's letter, however, "did not completely resolve the differences between the two delegations on the matter of consulting democratic parties and organisations."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The decision of the 400,000 soft coal miners to cease work on the 21st November has plunged the United States into another industrial crisis, the end of which it is impossible to foresee. The stakes on both sides are enormous in what promises to be the biggest contest of the post-war period between the United States Government and a labour union, although at the moment the issue is still enmeshed in a tangle of legal niceties which it may take the courts some time to unravel.

Technically, the miners are not on strike. Their leader, the unpredictable Mr. John L. Lewis, has merely declared the contract which they concluded with the Government last May no longer valid, it being a tradition among the miners that they do not continue working when they have no contract. By such quibbling Mr. Lewis and his underlings hope to secure themselves immunity from the operation of the Smith–Connally Act, which makes it illegal to strike in industries directly controlled by the United States Government—as the soft coal mines have been since Mr. Lewis precipitated his last crisis in May.

The Government is apparently determined to force a "showdown" with Mr. Lewis. On the 18th November the Department of Justice secured a temporary injunction restraining the United Mine Workers and their officials from terminating their contract. This Mr. Lewis is held to have ignored, with the result that he now faces prosecution for contempt of court. The reply of Mr. Lewis and his attorneys is to challenge the legality of the injunction which, they contend, is a violation of the Norris–La Guardia Act of 1932. Mr. Lewis has been an old hand at fighting federal injunctions, from the coal strike of 1919 onwards, and there are also others, outside his immediate entourage, who feel that the Administration has seized upon an ill-chosen weapon for its first counter-blow against him. The injunction is for many only too reminiscent of the dark ages of American trade unionism of fifty years ago, when those in authority had recourse to this much-discredited instrument to smother the industrial unrest which followed the great Homestead and Pullman strikes. It is therefore not surprising that Mr. Green, the President of the A.F. of L., has protested and that the Congress of Industrial Organisations, which does not see eye-to-eye with Mr. Lewis on many issues, has been quick, at its annual convention which opened at Atlantic City on the 18th November, to adopt a resolution against what it calls "any attempt to impose economic slavery through vicious anti-labour injunctions." Yet the leaders of the C.I.O. have themselves been placed in something of a dilemma by Mr. Lewis. On the one hand they are uneasy lest his claims and methods intensify the clamour for repressive labour legislation. On the other, being in a constant struggle to strengthen their position relatively to the rival American Federation of Labour and being about to embark upon their own major wage fight for 1947 (for which the Atlantic City convention is serving as a council of war), they would begin to lose membership if they failed to win concessions comparable to any secured by Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Truman is stated by members of the party which accompanied him on his recent trip to Florida to be determined not to "knuckle down" again to Mr. Lewis. He must realise, however, that both he and his Republican opponents in the new Congress are likely to be put to their supreme test by the present crisis. Almost the entire conservative and middle-of-the-road press is crying out for executive and legislative action against the "appalling power and irresponsibility" of the miners' leader, and the remedies proposed vary all the way from the demand of Mr. David Lawrence and the New York Herald-Tribune that the Administration seize the union funds and forbid strike benefits to the miners to longer term suggestions for amending the basic National Labour Relations Act of 1935 to give the employers more extensive rights in bargaining collectively.

Those who look to the 80th Congress to produce a permanent solution of the problem are already watching with keen and sympathetic interest the plans which are being formulated by Senator Joseph H. Ball of Minnesota, a prominent member of the Republican sub-committee assigned to study labour legislation. Quite apart from the coal crisis, Senator Ball had intimated his intention of introducing a bill to outlaw the "closed shop." Since the "walk-out" of the miners on the 21st November he has been urging the Republican leaders and Mr. Truman to get together in drawing up an agreed labour programme that can be presented to Congress when it meets in January.

The immediate consequences of the stoppage of work by the miners—which has occurred at a time when stocks of fuel are low and when domestic demands are rising to the seasonal peak—have been the imposition of a drastic reduction in the railway services, the re-institution of the wartime "dim-out" in the urban areas of 21 States and the curtailment of production in industries where supplies of coal are dwindling. Fears are being expressed regarding the effect of the order to "freeze" all soft coal stocks on the American export programme, and Mr. Acheson admitted at his press conference on the 19th November that this effect might be "serious." There is little evidence, however, that the public as a whole realises the catastrophic effect that a prolonged strike would have on countries abroad.

Apart from the possible reverberations of the coal crisis, commentators have found reason to be troubled by the international picture this week. In the field of Anglo-American relations the amendment on foreign policy tabled by the Labour "rebels" in the House of Commons has been the cause of much concern, although the general reaction has served once more to demonstrate the store which most people in the United States set by Anglo-American understanding. The inveterate Anglophobes have been only too ready to discern in the "revolt" evidence that the "Red tide" is now lapping at the doors of Whitehall, and the Patterson press has taken the opportunity to insist that the only "sane" policy for the United States is to remain "heavily and efficiently armed—atom bombs and all"—on the theory that "when you don't know who your friends and enemies are the wisest thing you can do is to keep your powder dry and have plenty of powder on hand." The Left has likewise seized upon the large number of Labour abstentions in the division of the 18th November to question once again the wisdom of the United States pursuing a policy of which a major premise is the close and continued co-operation of this country. Some writers, like Mr. Alexander Uhl of P.M. suggest that "now the tide of easy acquiescence in Tory politics has turned we can expect, not only the growth of protest among the Labourites, but also a modification in British policy." Elsewhere, however, the tendency has been to dismiss the "British Henry Wallaces" as the product of what the New York Herald-Tribune refers to as the "stresses in the Utopia" of the British Socialist experiment.

As regards the meetings of the United Nations Assembly and the Council of Foreign Ministers—which continue to hold attention despite the distractions of home affairs—M. Molotov's plea for disarmament and the show which the Soviets have made of "recoiling from their former expansionism, at least in key areas like Western Europe" were believed by more optimistic observers like the brothers Joseph and Stewart Alsop to offer hope that some form of compromise may yet be arrived at between the conflicting viewpoints of East and West. They were, however, writing before the Soviet Foreign Minister's classic demonstration of intransigeance over the veto, and even then they were careful to add that such hope was only reasonable "provided Senator Taft's tax and budget do not cause us to toss away at the crucial moment all such instruments of effective foreign policy as a strong national defence."

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

According to information just received, the establishment of diplomatic relations between Argentina and Russia gave rise to a lengthy interpellation of the Foreign Minister in the Chamber of Deputies, when Sr. Pastor, asked the following questions: (a) had the Government taken into consideration that Argentine dignity had been injured by the Russian authorities and that this had led to rupture of relations with the Russian Government (i.e., after the October Revolution)?, (b) from whom came the initiative to renew relations?

(c) had the Government considered whether these relations should be of a conditional character? and (d) how far-reaching would be the consequences of resuming relations?

The Foreign Minister had little difficulty in disposing of (a). A certain Naveillan, who was Armenian by birth, Chilean by naturalisation and had served in the French army, but had never even set foot in Argentina, was at the time in charge both of the Argentine and Roumanian Legations and was arrested by the Russians for hiding arms in the latter Legation. With regard to (b), the Minister said that the initiative came from the Russians, via the Soviet Ambassador in Montevideo, who made approaches with reference to the sending of a commercial mission. The re-establishment of diplomatic relations was accomplished "in the only dignified way" by a simultaneous announcement from both Governments.

While stating that the Argentine Government had no business to take into consideration the internal affairs of the foreign countries with whom it maintained relations, the Minister affirmed that it would not tolerate the interference of any foreign country in Argentine internal politics.

The recent press report of Mr. Messersmith's alleged "off-the-record" statement to the American Legion, that war between the United States and Russia was inevitable, has been given considerable prominence in the Argentine papers. La Hora, the Communist organ, has been almost hysterical in its denunciation of the American Ambassador, whose recall has been insistently demanded by the Communist "Daily Worker," of New York.

Bolivia

Delay in holding general elections in Bolivia (see Summary No. 367), is attributed to the vitiation of the electoral lists by the previous régime. Only about 150,000 people—say 5 per cent. of the population—were on the old lists, and it is estimated that the number of people qualified to vote in the new elections will be about double that number. For a few months past the Provisional Government have been urging people to take steps to have their names inscribed in the new lists, but the response to the Government's appeal was at first most unsatisfactory, as only about 25,000 persons took the trouble to register. With a view to remedying this regrettable indifference the Government accordingly issued a decree to the effect that (a) no citizen may be a public functionary unless he is inscribed in the Civic Registers, and (b) from the day following the closure of the Civic Registers, no citizen will be able to undertake any administrative, judicial or banking business except on production of his electoral card.

With the departure of the last of the prominent refugees (including Dr. Paz Estenssoro, Lt.-Col. Calero and Sr. Monroy Block, who left the Paraguayan Embassy for the Argentine on the 27th October), the problem of political refugees has ceased to worry the Diplomatic Body and the Government. (See Summary No. 367.)

Brazil

According to a broadcast report, a draft Bill, obviously aimed at the Communists, with perhaps one eye on the Integralists, has been sent by President Dutra to Congress. The Bill provides for the retirement of all officers and sergeants of the armed forces, military police and fire brigades of the Federal district, who are members of "political parties of organisations which are contrary to the democratic régime." In a message accompanying the draft, the President said that Ministers, members of Congress and of the Armed Forces had urged upon him the necessity of authorising the retirement from active service of those whose political allegiance was in conflict with their duty. The main purpose of the armed forces was to defend the nation and to guarantee law and order. Political parties holding non-democratic principles had shown by word and deed that their plan of action included the denial of the concept of a motherland as understood by Brazilians, the weakening and final elimination of the constituted powers, disregard for law, and the replacement of it by another contrary to national principles.

Mexico

The Minister of Education, Sr. Torres Bodet, has given partial results of the Government's campaign against illiteracy which was begun two years ago. The original plan, that every literate person should teach an illiterate, seems to have resolved itself into the organisation of collective centres where most of the teaching is given free by professional teachers. According to the census of 1940, Mexico had 7,161,000 illiterates between the ages of 6 and 40. Of these about 1¼ millions were Indians, falling outside the scope of the present scheme, leaving rather less than 6 million Spanish-speaking illiterates. Altogether just over 700,000 of these had now passed the examination, and as many more were still under instruction.

Peru

Seventeen months have now elapsed since the election of President Bustamente, and that of the Apristas as the strongest party in Peru. As a result of irregularities in those elections, three Senators and 15 Deputies were unseated; and one Senator died after election. Polling for these vacancies took place on the last day of June and resulted in the election of two Apristas to the Senate and eleven Apristas, 3 Independents and one Communist to the Chamber of Deputies. Dr. Luis Flores, the Peruvian Fascist leader, was returned to the Senate as a result of a Socialist-Aprista split vote. Since these elections the National Democratic Front has 37 seats in the Senate (including 20 Apristas) to twelve oppositionists, with eighty-nine (including 66 Apristas) to 64 in the Chamber of Deputies. Aprismo is therefore more strongly represented than it was a year ago, though it is still not in a position to take power alone, and has merely decided to hold three ministries, instead of standing out of the cabinet.

The results of the democratic victory are difficult to estimate. It is not unnatural that after generations of exploitation and want the workers have come to regard the right to strike as the panacea for all their troubles. The Apristas have usually encouraged the wave of strikes and the industrialists have so far been able to stand the resulting increase in costs. Since last August, however, the Apristas have modified their policy of giving all strikes full support, though this is in part due to the instigation of strikes by the Peruvian Communists. While the Apristas (and certainly Sr. Haya de la Torre) maintain their opposition to the Communists, their main political preoccupation is with their adversaries to the right, who have been able to resist a number of measures supported by APRA in Congress. The principal scheme of Sr. Haya de la Torre for the development of Peru is the setting up of a National Economic Council. While a bill for the creation of this Council is before Congress, President Bustamente is known to be reluctant to embark on large scale schemes whose financing may present serious problems.

UNITED NATIONS

Refugees and Displaced Persons

The Third Committee of the Assembly finished its general discussion of the draft I.R.O. charter on the 9th November and went on, in subsequent meetings to a consideration of the numerous proposed amendments. The general discussion was marked by a vigorous attack by the Russian and other Slav delegates on the leading principles of the I.R.O. and on the alleged shortcomings of the British and Americans in the conduct of displaced persons' camps. The reply to this onslaught was brisk and the sense of the meeting was strongly against the Slav thesis, though evidence is not wanting that Mr. Vyshinsky, at any rate, made a considerable impression on many delegates.

Following the general debate, some 65 amendments to the draft constitution came up for discussion, one by one. A few of these deal with financial matters, and will be referred to Committee V. Of the remainder, forty come from the Slav delegations. This comprehensive group covers all the points that have been raised so often before by the Russians and their supporters and have been so often voted down. They provide for the changes that would be necessary in the draft constitution to ensure that (a) various groups of displaced persons, especially political dissidents, are excluded from international aid;

(b) all reference to the Assembly Resolution of 12th February, which admits individual freedom of choice whether to be repatriated or not, is carefully deleted;
(c) the task of I.R.O. is confined to repatriation and is explicitly agreed not to include resettlement outside the country of origin;
(d) the I.R.O. will operate for one year only and, even so, will be virtually under the control of the countries of origin;

(e) the funds, assets, and archives of the Inter-governmental Committee on Refugees shall pass to the I.R.O. to be used within the limits indicated above, and the I.G.C. shall be liquidated.

In addition, the Russians have once more put forward the demand, rejected on so many previous occasions, that an itinerant commission, on which "countries of origin" should be strongly represented, should visit displaced persons' camps whenever situated and that nominal rolls of all displaced persons should be furnished to their countries of origin.

These moves, which have been made at this late stage in defiance of an almost complete understanding reached in September between British, American and Russian representatives as to the amendments to be put forward, seem to represent a final attempt on the part of the Slav group to wreck the I.R.O. or, if that cannot be done, to reduce it to a nullity.

After prolonged discussion on several days, all the Slav amendments have been rejected. In one or two instances, concessions have been made; but the general result is once more to affirm the opposite point of view, safeguarding the interests of genuine political dissidents, and prescribing resettlement as a definite task of the I.R.O. The suggestion that a provision should be included in the constitution of the I.R.O. liquidating the I.G.C., a completely independent organisation, and taking over its assets (no reference being made to its liabilities) has been ruled ultra vires.

The voting has in some instances been close and this might be taken to indicate that more delegations were coming to favour the Slav thesis; but, as a confidential statement from one of them explains, it may well arise from reluctance to offend the Russians who hold as hostages many allied nationals forcibly enlisted by the Germans during the war and employed by them on the Eastern front, where they were captured. On this account, abstention from voting is often considered the better part.

The chief British amendment aims at permitting the I.R.O. to contract out the care and maintenance of displaced persons to the control authorities in the allied Zones of Occupation and requiring the I.R.O. to make definite agreements with such authorities before starting its work in their respective Zones. American support had been hoped for the former of these provisions, which, as proposed, is permissive merely and not mandatory, but, especially since the elections, this has been difficult to obtain. The matter has not yet come to the vote and the result is by no means certain.

Among the cross-currents influencing the debates (and the votes) appears to be an underlying fear on the part of the Egyptian and other Arab delegations that the I.R.O. may be utilised to further excessive Jewish immigration to Palestine. This has been a disturbing, but not yet a fatal, influence.

The discussions are not yet completed; and the final form of the recommendation which the Committee makes to the Assembly remains to be seen.

General Assembly

Allied Troops and Disarmament

Russia had tried and failed to persuade the Security Council to take up what she alleged was the threat to peace caused by the presence of Allied troops in the territories of Member States. On that occasion she had asked for a return of all such troops, the position of any bases, aerodromes, &c., justifying her proposal under articles 34 and 35 of the Charter which cover "threats to peace." On the 20th November, in the Political and Security Committee, M. Molotov moved a resolution that the "General Assembly should recommend the Security Council to take a decision that States, members of the United Nations, should submit the following information to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council within one month: (1) at what points in the territory of members of U.N. or other States, with the exception of former enemy territories, and in what number, are armed forces of other members of the U.N.; (2) at what points in former enemy States and in what number are armed forces of the Allied Powers and of other members of the United Nations; (3) at what points in the above-mentioned territories are air and naval bases, and what is the size of their garrisons belonging to the armed forces of other States Members of the United Nations." This information, he now said, was wanted under article 43 of the Charter, and he added that without it the Military Staffs Committee would not be able to approach problems of disarmament. Russia's notorious blocking of the Military Staffs Committee gives a rather bogus look to the second argument. The first has more substance; but even then, Article 43 deals only with the numbers and location of the forces and facilities which members shall agree with the Security Council to put at its disposal, when it asks, "in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security." M. Molotov was asking the Security Council to ask! Both Sir Alexander Cadogan and Mr. Bevin asked M. Molotov what he really hoped to achieve by this motion. In the course of the debate, which was still continuing on the 26th, M. Molotov and the Yugoslav delegate made it quite clear that Russia hoped to secure the withdrawal of "Anglo-American" forces from Persia, Greece, Iceland and China, and that Russia had dropped nothing of her charge that those forces were a threat to peace. It was ironical that Senator Connally and Mr. Bevin should each have had to point out to M. Molotov that his concentration upon "armed forces" was out of date: the former reminded him that the United States desired aggression "neither by arms nor by ideology," and the latter reminded him that "the tactic of nerve wars on smaller nations, which was going on to-day, was as bad as actual war."

On Thursday the 21st Mr. Bevin made a speech compounded of just the right proportions of idealism and commonsense. Hitler, he said, had had no troops abroad, and yet he had threatened the world. It was futile to count the few troops abroad and leave uncounted the main forces at home. The Russian motion was too narrow, and, as it stood, he rejected it; he proposed, however, that it should be taken as part of the whole question of disarmament. If that were done, he would welcome it, as "giving the Security Council and the Military Staffs Committee the greatest task that any body of people ever had—to build a structure of disarmament that will enable Governments to decide whether it is of such a character that they can to a large extent surrender their sovereignty to the United Nations." There is idealism in these words; but there is also a warning, such as occurred in the veto debate and is being forced from the lips of responsible Western Statesmen, that loyalty to the "United Nations" is not mere loyalty to any particular organisation or means; but loyalty to the goal of peaceful co-operation to which the best means must be found. On Friday M. Molotov called Mr. Bevin's attempt to combine the request for information with disarmament delaying tactics, and rejected it. Mrs. Pandit (India) supported Russia.

When the debate was resumed on Monday the 25th, the U.K. delegation had modified its approach to the subject, abandoning its previous insistence on disarmament and information combined in favour of a motion which (1) linked the request for information with disarmament in the preamble, (2) extended the enquiry to cover Home forces, (3) required the information to be furnished by the 1st January, (4) required the information to be "immediately subjected to an effective United Nations system of verification on the spot by a Committee to be established by the Security Council before that date." Verification thus becomes central to the British position; for, as Mr. Noel Baker pointed out in his learned and forceful speech, unless facts can be verified they give no confidence, and without confidence facts are useless. Another important feature of the U.K. motion is its approach not to the Security Council, where Mr. Noel Baker artlessly said, the U.K. has a veto, but to the Assembly, whose recommendation would commit all the members. M. Molotov's motion referred matters to the Security Council. Senator Connally, who followed, praised Mr. Noel Baker warmly for his speech, supported the proposed scope of his enquiry, but did not include verification in his own motion. The Assembly must address its recommendation direct to the members. To address them to the Council would, he said, be derogatory to the Assembly's rights, and would waste time—one more indication of the position to which Russia's use of the veto was fast reducing the Security Council.

On Tuesday the 26th M. Molotov countered the U.K. resolution by agreeing to the demand for information on Home Forces provided that it goes with information on armaments (atomic, jet-propelled, etc.), and that it is submitted only when the Security Council starts to examine the proposals for general disarmament. His delegation would give its views on verification at the same time. Senator Connally called this dilly-dallying, supported the U.K. position but wished verification left out. Mr. Noel Baker agreed with M. Molotov that a list of troops without a list of armaments was of very small use. All the same to know the number of Home Forces would be a certain guide to the Military Staff Committee, whereas the numbers of troops stationed abroad would tell them nothing. He would not give armament figures until he felt sure that international security was not a sham, and he knew that M. Molotov was no more ready to make premature disclosures than he.

Indians in S. Africa

At a joint meeting of the Political and Legal Committee on the 21st November, Mrs. Pandit moved that the General Assembly should ask the S. African Government to bring its legislation governing Asiatics into harmony with the standards set by the Charter, and to report what steps it had taken at the next session of the Assembly. She argued that the matter was not domestic, since the S. African Acts of 1943 and 1946, by discriminating against Indians and segregating them, broke agreements made between S. Africa and India, violated fundamental principles of the Charter concerning human rights, and impaired relations between two members of the United Nations. She admitted that the Indians in question were citizens of S. Africa; but she claimed that an Indian Government had been responsible for sending their forebears to S. Africa under certain conditions, and therefore had a moral and political obligation to their descendants. Field Marshal Smuts replied that the question was domestic and therefore beyond the scope of the United Nations. If it were not so treated, the United Nations would have to examine all S. African legislation and administrative acts, and if that were the accepted procedure no Government would be safe and States would find their position inside the United Nations quite intolerable. He moved that the International Court of Justice be asked to decide the legal issue, whether the Indian complaint came within article 2 para. 7 of the Charter (domestic jurisdiction) or not. Ukraine, Byelo-Russia and Yugoslavia supported Mrs. Pandit, and China inclined the same way.

The Committees met again on Monday the 25th. Judge Chagla (India) argued that the Assembly and not the International Court should interpret the Charter; besides, the complaint involved a violation of the principle of the Charter and was therefore political rather than legal. Mr. St. Laurent (Canada) supported reference to the Court. Article 2 para. 7 must not, he said, be so interpreted as to invalidate article 1 which enjoined respect for human rights. He therefore agreed with the U.K. that the United Nations must decide what are human rights as soon as possible. Meanwhile, article 2 para. 7 must be interpreted. A legal, as distinct from a political decision would add much needed importance to the "Court aspect" of the United Nations. The Polish delegate, while recognising the claims of "domestic jurisdiction" thought that treaty obligations had been disregarded.

The Attorney-General, Sir Hartley Shawcross, had a difficult task. His Government, he said, would have preferred the two members to settle the dispute out of court, and now that one had brought it before the United Nations, they would have preferred not to speak at all. Nevertheless his argument had something of Solomon about it. Let India agree to the Court's jurisdiction. If her case were well founded, reference to the Court would in the end best serve the interests of the Indian people since a judicial solution was always more acceptable to a nation against whom it was given than a political solution. The case could not be examined objectively by a mass meeting of 108 delegates, unless it were artificially simplified. Since action must be within the Charter, it was necessary to decide whether the matter was excluded by article 2 para. 7, or if it were not, whether it involved the denial of some fundamental human rights which U.N. were bound to respect. The Indian complaint was that the "fundamental right of every individual to own and purchase property wherever he likes" had been infringed; but these fundamental human rights were not observed by all members of the United Nations; nor were "fundamental rights" yet defined. His conclusion was that the Court should decide the relevance of article 2 para. 7 to the present case, and that the United Nations should quickly enable the Human Rights Commission to draft an International Bill of Rights.

The United States delegate also supported a reference to the Court, his most weighty argument being that such a reference would be an appeal to the rule of law, and he urged the Indian delegates to agree. The French delegate praised his own country's lack of racial discrimination and put forward a vague resolution in favour of action by the Assembly. Finally Mr. Heaton Nicholls (S. Africa) gave a detailed account of the exact position of Indians in Natal, which he contrasted with what he described as the "false" picture given by the Indian delegation.

On the 26th, the Turkish and the Netherlands delegates advised reference to the Court, while the Mexican, Philippine and Haitian declared that human rights were involved and the Assembly must act. Mrs. Pandit (India) remarked in the course of her speech that fortunately for the world the British Empire was in process of liquidation, and that if S. Africa belonged to anyone, it belonged to the "barbaric indigenous population" from whom the Whites had seized it. An interesting intervention came from the representative of the new member, Sweden. He sympathised with the Indian complaint against racial discrimination, but, since politics must influence legal decisions as little as possible, his delegation would propose a resolution referring the problem of the scope of article 2, para. 7, to the International Court. M. Gromyko decided that the question was political. Since the Court was empowered to deal only with legal matters, the Assembly should recommend measures for a peaceful solution under articles 10 and 14 of the Charter.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

The discussions on Trieste meandered with soul-destroying slowness through Wednesday and Thursday and Friday. Some six major problems were still unsolved: (1) the extent of the Governor's emergency powers: (2) the seat of authority in the provisional régime, was it to be, as U.K. and U.S. desired, in the Governor, or as Russia proposed, in a kind of council whose actions were subject to the Governor's veto as in the Permanent Statute: (3) the date at which Allied troops should leave, e.g., a definite date, as M. Molotov wished, or when circumstances dictated as the others contended (Mr. Byrnes became as definite as to suggest 45 days after the Governor declared his own forces capable of keeping order): (4) Elections, should they be 4 months after the treaty came into force, or, as the others maintained, as soon as practicable: (5) non-discrimination in transit facilities to and from the Free Port, and, linked with this the Russian demand for a customs union and railway convention with Yugoslavia: (6) the Free Port Instrument or Constitution.

On Saturday the 23rd November the Deputies were supposed to draw up texts of articles agreed already; but M. Gousev boggled at everything and progress was nil. M. Gousev's work that morning seems to have brought matters to a head. At the informal meeting of the Foreign Ministers, Mr. Byrnes made it clear that his country was no longer interested in a Four Power agreement, and that his country had wasted time enough. M. Molotov was impressed. It was agreed to set up again the Trieste Commission to draft the actual Statute and Free Port Instrument on the basis of the texts already accepted; but the vital result of Mr. Byrnes's attitude on Saturday was that M. Molotov went to talk things over with Mr. Byrnes on Monday. In this dramatic interview, described by Mr. Byrnes to Mr. Bevin, M. Molotov was told exactly what the U.S. thought of Russian behaviour: Russia had shown unexampled contempt for her Allies: she had disregarded every important recommendation her Allies had made at the Peace Conference. Let M. Molotov say whether or no he wanted a settlement. If not, the world would not end; America would simply make a series of bilateral treaties. M. Molotov appeared moved, and followed a method almost habitual with him: he borrowed his opponent's argument. Russia, he said, was under great pressure from Yugoslavia. She must do something for her Ally. Would not Mr. Byrnes help her in this, and their problems could be solved. The two statesmen then got down to business.

M. Molotov gave the clear impression that he wanted a settlement. He would like Gorizia, which means undoing the French line: more reparations for Yugoslavia than for Greece, and here Mr. Byrnes has probably given him fatal encouragement: Mr. Byrnes's formula that the troops shall leave in 90 days, unless the Governor decided otherwise, and finally, not more than 50 per cent. compensation for losses to British property (previously he had said 25 per cent.: the U.K. claims 75 per cent., with the approval of a simple majority of the Peace Conference).

When the Foreign Ministers met on that crucial Monday, they agreed to the U.S. version of Article 16 bis, and to the first 9 paragraphs of the French Resolution, which are to be taken as the principles on which the Statute of the Free Territory of Trieste is based. This last was a substantial achievement. No progress was made on the qualifications necessary for a Trieste citizen, and the Commission was told to discuss the question of free transit facilities with the Czechoslovaks, Italians and Yugoslavs.

It is worth noting that Mr. Byrnes informed M. Molotov that he had treated British interests in the rest of the treaty almost with contempt.

Mr. Byrnes has discovered a way to move M. Molotov. He can break the spell exercised by the pursuit of Four Power Agreements by the threat of bilateral treaties. It remains to be seen how far Mr. Byrnes has carried his firmness, and what M. Molotov will gain in return for a treaty.

AN agreement providing for full economic integration of the British and United States zones of Germany was signed in New York on the 2nd December and will come into effect on the 1st January, 1947. It is represented as the first step towards economic unification of Germany, and in announcing the arrangement both Governments expressed the hope that the plan will lead to discussions with the other occupying Powers for the extension of this or similar schemes. It is based on plans to achieve a self-sustaining economy in Germany by the end of 1949. The United Kingdom enters the scheme as an equal partner with the United States and will bear half the cost. As stated last week, this will entail expenditure by Britain of £125 million over the next three years; it should be emphasised that this is not in addition to an expenditure of £80 million a year for those years, as at present. Imports, however, would come mainly from the dollar area while this area would only take a small proportion of the exports. It would be impossible for Britain to make her contribution wholly in dollars ($500 million) as this represents over one-seventh of the American loan to Britain. At first His Majesty's Government authorised acceptance of the scheme only on condition that Britain did not pay more than $300 million in dollars, but the United States was unable to accept this proposal. The Americans are, however, fully aware of the difficulties arising from the dollar shortage and expressed willingness to take account of these difficulties. In particular the Agreement states that sources of supply "shall be selected to the fullest extent practicable so as to minimise the drain on the dollar resources of the United Kingdom." Proceeds from exports will be used to pay as far as possible for imports, and in any case money expended on imports must be repaid by the Germans in goods and services as soon as is consistent with the rebuilding of a healthy non-aggressive

Germany. H.M. Government also accepted the plan on the condition, now embodied in the Agreement, that food (as well as other resources) both indigenous and imported must be pooled to produce a common standard of living. It is understood that there would be no question of repaying in kind the wheat recently loaned to the British zone, although H.M. Government assumes financial liability in this respect as part of a general agreement whereby stocks on hand financed by the respective Governments will be taken into account when estimating the costs of approved imports on an equal basis after the 31st December. Any rations for displaced persons in excess of those given to Germans would not, however, come under the new scheme. Much of the work of determining import needs and securing supplies will fall on a Joint Export-Import Agency of the two Governments, which in due course will transfer as much of its responsibility as is practicable to a German agency. Other points in the Agreement, which is subject to yearly review, were outlined in Summary No. 369. A subsidiary unpublished memorandum deals largely with payment for coal exports (see under "Austria"). The Agreement as finally signed shows substantial concessions on the part of H.M. Government, but the United States Government have also advanced from their original unwillingness to share even half of the cost in view of the smaller population of their zone. Discussions were, however, prolonged, and at one point in reply to a suggestion by Mr. Bevin that if the cost were too heavy H.M. Government might have to withdraw from the British zone, Mr. Byrnes offered to exchange zones and declared he felt that with American industrial organisation and the potentialities of the British zone they would make it a success in a very short time. On this basis they would meet 60 per cent. or even 65 per cent. of the costs. The idea of the acceptance of this startling and momentous offer was, naturally, never entertained as a political possibility by H.M. Government.

Press reports over the last three weeks have spoken of a Russian proposal to General Clay for raising the level of industrial production. This is a repetition of the offer made to General Clay in August, details of which were discussed in Summary No. 356. The matter was not carried any further on either side at the time and, as regards the United Kingdom, acceptance of this reparation proposal would still entail a fundamental change from present policy. According to "The New York Times" of the 22nd November informal discussions on the matter have taken place recently between Marshal Sokolovsky and General Clay, but the latter stated that he had no authority to negotiate. The advantages of the offer for Russian publicity purposes are illustrated by Soviet zone propaganda. Leipzig radio, fastening on the "New York Times" report, affirms that the offer was made on the 5th November and loudly attacks Washington and London for their failure to jump at the plan, "particularly in view of the disastrous situation of industry in the Western zones," the claim is made also, quite illogically, that the United States is committed to the Morgenthau plan.

Dr. Schumacher, accompanied by Franz Neumann, Viktor Agartz, Wilhelm Knothe and Fritz Heine, is visiting London at the invitation of the British Labour Party. This is the first political visit to Britain by a German leader since the occupation. A Social Democrat leader from the French zone was forbidden to come, a French Foreign Office spokesman declaring that France considered the SPD the most nationalistic of the German parties—this is the first time the French have thus publicly committed themselves in this respect. (See also under "France.") The Soviet zone press has also seized on the event as additional proof that the SPD is a British "Fifth Column" in Germany. Dr. Schumacher in a number of talks, of interest as prepared for British consumption, has paid an unusual tribute to British sacrifices in food and money for Germany and has claimed that this must be emphasised, because there were rising nationalistic elements in Germany which were trying to cast a fog in front of the people's eyes. He commented strongly on the failure to carry out declared British policy in the British zone and said that anarchy in Germany was increased by the multiplicity of official administrative organisations each going its own way. He has again asked that the dismantling of peaceful industry should cease. In his absence the Zonal Advisory Council on the 1st December passed a resolution calling for immediate measures to improve economy. Welcome to the Germans will be an announcement of the 29th November that no more steel works will be closed down this year and that it is unlikely that any will be closed in 1947. The official position of Dr. Agartz (see Summary No. 369) has now been clarified. He announced on the 23rd November that the Central Office for Economic Affairs, of which he is head, will close at the end of the year when the Bi-Zonal Economic Committee takes over. Dr. Agartz considers this Committee unsuitable for its tasks and has refused to join either the Committee or its advisory branch the Economic Administrative Committee.

In Wuerttemberg-Baden where a referendum on the Draft Constitution and Diet elections were held on the 24th November, the Constitution was passed with 86% of valid votes in favour, but over 20% of the votes cast were invalid. It is felt that this is because the public lacked interest and instruction in the issues of the referendum, since Communist disapproval of the Constitution could not have accounted for more than 10% of the votes. In the Diet elections the only change from those in June was that the Christian Democrats lost two seats to the Demokratische Volkspartei, an active branch of the German Liberal Democrats. The Constitution has provoked considerable discussion, with the CDU usually in opposition, and as finally passed represents substantial changes from the Draft (see Summaries Nos. 348 and 349), the most marked being the absence of a Second Chamber and a State President. There are to be common "Christian schools," but religious instruction for the different denominations will be separate. The Bavarian and Hesse referendums which took place on the 1st December will be discussed next week. Left-wing resentment has been aroused in Hesse by a pastoral letter from the Roman Catholic Bishops of Mainz, Fulda and Limburg strongly criticising the Constitution. This is the more surprising as, although it bears traces of the Socialist majority in this State, the final text was agreed mainly because of an alliance between the SPD and CDU. In Bavaria the elections are of particular interest as the leader of the CSU (the majority party), Josef Mueller, is facing public charges of a Nazi past although he was twice arrested by the Nazis. Mueller represents the left wing in the party and has been foremost in cooperating with the SPD. In some ways he even stands to the left of the SPD leader Hoegner, since he opposes the plan for the appointment of a State President, supported by Hoegner, both because of his federalist tendencies and his personal ambition. Hoegner appears to be strongly opposed by the younger members of his party in his unwillingness to go into opposition if the CSU win the election, on the ground that "opposition" under Military Government is totally unreal. A more moderate view is taken by von Knoeringen, a rising member of the party, who was in England during the war.

United States Press Correspondents have been refused admission to the Soviet zone until January, on the somewhat unconvincing grounds that travel would be dangerous, with all transport at present being overloaded as a result of troop demobilisation. Rail traffic has recently increased sharply, to the surprise of German officials, and this would seem to indicate some form of troop movement—although it is not known in what direction. It is a possible indication of Russian disquiet under present conditions. German criticism of Soviet reparation policies is mounting. The Vice-President of Thuringia recently told members of the Socialist Unity Party that the present reparation policy in Thuringia would soon lead to the complete bankruptcy of the State. Russian realisation that criticism is sharper than they expected and will seriously embarrass their policy is reflected in the, admittedly small, concession to the Zeiss works at Jena which will apparently be allowed to retain about 1/10th of their equipment. Russian popularity is not increased by the over-zealous action of subordinate German officials. There is now evidence that much of the persecution of CDU and LDP candidates and voters in parts of the Soviet zone in September, which included the closing of shops in some villages and the dismissal of minor employees, was due to the independent action of such subordinate authorities. In some cases at least this was not approved or instigated by higher German authorities, who recognised the wider political implication of such measures. Leo Skrzypynski, who was reported in Summary No. 366 to have tendered his resignation from the Central Administration of Industry because he disagreed with the general trend of Russian economic policy, has recently broadcast from the Soviet zone, but it is still doubtful whether he will retain his post.

A major scandal has been caused in the French zone and angrily commented on from all parts of Germany by the acquittal by a German Court of Tillessen, who, in 1921, murdered Matthias Erzberger, head of the German Armistice delegation of 1918. He was acquitted on the ground that Hitler's amnesty in 1933 for those who helped the régime to power has not been specifically repealed by the Control Council. The German judge has now been dismissed and a re-trial ordered, but the possibility of such a verdict is a grave illustration of the consistently unsatisfactory attitude towards denazification in the French zone.

AUSTRIA

The food question dominated the Allied Council meeting on the 29th November, although it was only discussed informally. It had been apparent at the Executive Committee meeting on the 25th November that the Soviet authorities were not likely to allow indigenous supplies to leave their zone, where there is enough food to last until the next harvest, until they received some assurance about how the apparent deficit on food supplies for the whole of Austria would be met next year. At the Council meeting, General Clark proposed that an Advisory Board of representatives of each of the occupying Powers, UNRRA, and the Austrian Government should be created immediately, to be responsible for preparing food plans, ensuring that proper utilisation of indigenous food, and recommending ration changes to the Allied Council; and that all indigenous food or food imported by UNRRA or any of the occupying Powers should be pooled and made available for the whole of Austria. General Clark said that he was willing to let all indigenous food in the U.S. zone move freely and to pool U.S. imports. The Russian representative was clearly doubtful as to where the necessary imports to maintain the increased ration would come from, and General Clark repeated that they would come from a credit supplied by the U.S.A. He said that he had asked the U.S. Government to ship sufficient food to feed the U.S. zone and sector of Vienna, and also a 450 calorie reserve for his zone, but he denied that he meant to use this to raise the ration to 2,000 calories in his zone. The British representative proposed that, instead of a Food Board, the Economic Directorate, in conjunction with UNRRA and the Austrian Government, should review the monthly food plans and ensure that all indigenous and imported food supplies should be pooled and distributed throughout Austria, and that no one zone should be better fed than any other. After acrimonious exchanges between the U.S. and Soviet members, in which the Soviet member accused General Clark of withholding cattle needed to supply the Soviet zone with meat and fats, the discussion took a turn for the better, and General Zheltov seemed ready to agree to a suggestion by General Clark that if the Russians were supplied with the necessary meat and fats they would let supplies move freely from their zone. A settlement seems possible in the near future.

The Allied Council are to consider the long-awaited report on the Austrian Denazification Law on the 13th December.

The detailed provisions of the Anglo-U.S. agreement on the economic union of the British and American zones of Germany (see under "Germany"), include some which concern the settlement of accounts for coal and electric power between Germany and Austria, and trade between the two countries. Payment which the Government of the United Kingdom may receive for coal exported from the British zone of Germany to Austria before the 1st April, 1946, is to be assigned to the Joint Export-Import Agency. Coal imported into Austria from the British zone of Germany for use by the occupying forces will be paid for by the occupying Powers, while coal imported for civilian consumption from May, 1945, until December, 1946, is to be regarded as a charge on the Austrian Government. The proceeds of electric power exported from Austria to Germany during this period will be used to pay for coal imports, and the remaining coal debt will be collected "as and when Austria is capable of discharging it over the calendar years of 1947, 1948 and 1949." This agreement, however, cannot take into account the electric power exported from the French zone of Austria as long as France does not enter into the agreement.

Trade and commerce between the British and U.S. zones and Austria will be a responsibility of the Joint Export-Import Agency in Germany, which will negotiate with appropriate agencies in Austria. The Agency will not, however, undertake "indirect financial assistance to the Austrian economy at the expense of the German economy."

Dr. Norbert Bischoff, the Austrian Political Representative in Paris, has been chosen to succeed Herr Waldbrunner, the former Political Representative in Moscow. Herr Waldbrunner, a Socialist engineer, resigned because he encountered difficulty in his dealings with the Russians, and in particular failed to speed up the repatriation of Austrian prisoners from Russia. Dr. Bischoff is a career diplomat who has spent many years in France.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The recent exchange of views with Washington on outstanding economic problems is a more hopeful portent of Czechoslovakia's relations with the United States. The State Department announced on 20th November that Czechoslovakia had agreed to compensate American owners of nationalised property, and would give general support to the trade rules contained in the I.T.O. charter. Mr. Acheson conceded that the Czechoslovak Government, in their efforts to reconstruct internal economy, must retain their system of export and import licensing; Czechoslovakia, on its side, has now given assurances that these controls will be administered "without discrimination as among foreign sources of supply" as soon as it has sufficient free foreign currency.

It is probable, though by no means certain, that the United States Government may remove its ban on the grant of the Export-Import Bank credit, to which the Czechoslovak Minister of Finance referred in his budget speech on the 22nd November. Meanwhile, Czechoslovakia has been seeking foreign loans elsewhere, and it is reported that there are offers from Argentina, Brazil and other Latin American States. Negotiations with Argentina for a credit of 75 to 100 million pesos are apparently well advanced, and the Škoda works of Plzeň is said to have competed successfully for the contract to build a large alcohol factory in Buenos Aires. On the other hand, South Africa has refused a credit of £1 million, and Switzerland, although Czechoslovakia's biggest trader, is hesitating in granting a request for help.

Relations with the United States have been further eased by the long-awaited release of the Czechoslovak shipping which had been impounded on the upper Danube by the American authorities. In another field the recent American tour of Dr. Lettrich (a Democrat), President of the Slovak National Council, may have done something to modify the anti-Beneš separatist attitude of the American Slovaks, even though his references to an opposition party in Czechoslovakia caused some annoyance at home.

The favourable trade balance indicated by the September figures illustrates the vigour with which the export drive is being pursued. In the last quarter the Ministry of Foreign Trade has signed or renewed agreements with Sweden (one of the chief sources of iron ore and ball bearings), the Netherlands, Brazil, Yugoslavia and Switzerland—the last, however, with reservations about compensation for nationalised Swiss property. Czechoslovakia, too, was, incidentally, the only one of the so-called "Iron Curtain" countries to accept the American invitation to the Preparatory Conference on International Trade held in London last month. Czechoslovak economic policy is, of course, guided by the fact that the Soviet Union can only partly satisfy her needs in raw materials, and does not, as a matter of policy, absorb her light luxury products. The pre-war export of light products is threatened with future competition from Germany. Czechoslovakia intends to replace Germany to some extent, as a centre for heavy industry, and the change-over envisaged will lead to an increasing demand for machinery from the West.

On the 22nd November, the National Assembly heard a three-hour speech (on the 1947 budget proposals) from Dr. Dolanský, the Finance Minister. The budget shows a deficit of 28 milliard crowns, an increase of 2 milliard on 1946. Public taxes, the largest single item of revenue, had however yielded 14 per cent. more than estimated. Credit accounts, frozen as part of the initial plan to stabilize the currency, may be partially freed in the spring. Dr. Dolanský opened his speech with a survey of this year's national economy. Agricultural production was satisfactory, with noticeable improvements over last year in the production of cereals, potatoes, and sugar beet; oil-bearing products had increased fourfold, but fats, at 40 per cent. of the pre-war level, were still inadequate, although meat had reached two-thirds the pre-war figure. Industrial production was now up to three-quarters of the pre-war output, the greatest increase being in black coal, 50 per cent. more than last year.

(See also under "Hungary.")

POLAND

By an agreement concluded on the 28th November between the Communist and Socialist Parties, the representation of the latter party in the administrative, diplomatic and industrial affairs of the country has been made more nearly equal to that of the Communists. Symbolic of the new arrangements are the appointments of M. Cyrankiewicz, the Socialist Party's secretary-general, to a Ministry without portfolio, and that of the Socialist Professor Leszczycki to be the second Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs (the first Vice-Minister being the Communist M. Modzelewski). The first appointment brings the number of Socialist members of the Cabinet to six, the same as that of the Communists.

The diplomatic service is to offer more openings for Socialists, and there will be a number of higher managerial posts for them in nationalized industry, where the Communists have had a majority of the key positions. It is rumoured that a further important appointment may be that of a Socialist as Vice-Minister of Security. This Ministry, controlling the secret police, has always been the special preserve of the Communists and one of the departments most under Russian influence. The agreement also binds the parties to conduct the fight "against all reaction" and "against the Polish Peasant Party, which has become the legal outgrowth of the reactionary underground." The parties are also reported to have agreed to provide joint educational courses for the youth of the two groups, and to see that Socialist and Communist youth movements make similar pacts and arrangements.

The first clause of the general agreement explains that "unity of action and cooperation among the whole working class" are necessary for certain national aims, such as the "securing of the independence of reborn Poland and the integrity of her frontiers." Subsequent clauses prescribe the means whereby such aims are to be achieved.

On the question of elections, the four parties of the governmental bloc have issued a joint declaration to the effect that they all desire justice and security for the world, as well as the rapid reconstruction and revival of Poland in every possible sphere, with frontiers on the Oder and Western Neisse. M. Mikolajczyk and his party are accused of obstructing such aims, and of giving shelter to forest gangs. This accusation has an ominous accompaniment in a statement by Glos Ludu, the Communist paper, that the P.S.L. was "breaking up," and that throughout the country its ranks were "melting away."

The recent visit of Dr. Schumacher, the German Social-Democrat leader, to Britain has received bitter comment, especially since Schumacher is well known for his desire to change Poland's western frontier. Official Polish circles have always complained that Germans of similar views are, allegedly, being afforded encouragement in the British zone of Germany. The pithiest comment on Schumacher's present visit comes from the Socialist paper Robotnik: "The Germans can only find a response from those who did not themselves experience the doubtful pleasure of acquaintance with the culture of the German Herrenvolk."

SOVIET UNION

The brunt of the Soviet assault was borne this week not by the Americans but by the British. Thus, according to Soviet commentators, the U.K. Delegation were the principal obstructionists in the Political Committee of the United Nations Assembly; British interference in Greece was the root of all trouble in the Balkans; the British were deceitfully trying to maintain their position in Egypt and keep the Sudan from Egypt; the British were intriguing in Persia, maintaining a "Black Reichwehr" in Germany and bullying the Albanians, etc. Such a reactionary foreign policy, it was asserted, could not fail to arouse widespread disquiet in Britain where a "wave of anti-Bevinism" was reported. On the other hand, criticism of America was mostly concerned with internal affairs although the possible establishment of United States bases in Canada was mentioned. An exceptionally long article by the well-known Soviet economist Varga emphasised the abnormality of the present American boom and forecast a violent slump by 1948. The danger of opposing the principle of unanimity in the United Nations was again emphasised and all proposals for changing the voting procedure in the Security Council were described as flank attacks on this vital principle. In reports from foreign countries the results of the Roumanian elections took pride of place. The defeat of the "reactionary parties and their foreign masters" by "true democracy" was hailed with delight.

Tass reported on the 26th November that 2,160 former Russian emigrés had left Marseilles for the U.S.S.R. under the repatriation scheme inaugurated last June. The contingent was said to have included many people of Ukrainian and Byelorussian nationality from east of the Curzon line; the first batch of repatriates which left France in the early Autumn had consisted exclusively of these. Tass made a great point of the presence of members of the intelligentsia among the repatriates, mentioning by name Professors Shorin and Zuskerstein and the author Roshchin who do not, in fact, appear to be particularly distinguished members of emigré circles. French sources estimate the number of Russians in France at the time of the liberation at about 60,000 as against 65,000 in 1939. This number did not include those Russians who had taken out French nationality papers who numbered about 17,000 by 1935.

Attacks on Ukrainian "bourgeois nationalism" as exemplified in the works of Ukrainian historians have been carried on continuously since the summer. A recent broadcast in Ukrainian from Kiev has accused the school of Professor Hrushevsky in particular of claiming all the cultural achievements of the Kiev state for the Ukrainian nation; according to the Soviet version in the hey-day of Kievan culture, the eastern Slavs had not yet separated into three parts and the culture of Kiev was thus the common parent of all Russian culture. Further, Hrushevsky was accused of ignoring the class struggle in the Ukraine and the necessary friendship between the Ukrainian and Russian peoples. These continued assaults on the historical front fit in with other evidence that the situation in the Ukraine is far from happy. Ukrainians are being reminded, on the other hand, of their good fortune in being for the first time, under one flag; the Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty which realised "the ardent desire of the Transcarpathian Ukrainians to unite with the Soviet Ukraine" being the last link in the chain. This Treaty is being cited as a practical embodiment of the principles of international co-operation laid down in the United Nations charter. It stood, the radio commentator said, as an indictment of the policy of those powers which, while insisting on the equality of large and small nations, were, in fact riding roughshod over the interests of the latter.

Pravda, returning to the charge against the administration of the British zone in Germany, has described special German military units formed by the British, said to be known by the local population as the Black Reichwehr and allegedly commanded by officers of Hitler's army; a letter purporting to emanate from a sergeant-major serving in one of these formations was quoted for the assertion that the units were intended to be used as punitive formations against the German people. These forces were to do duty as imitation Gestapo agents, and no member of a unit would so much as dare to hint that he was an anti-Fascist.

A delegation from the 700,000-strong Amalgamated Engineering Union of Great Britain, consisting of 12 members, is at present in the U.S.S.R. at the invitation of the Soviet trade unions. On arrival in Moscow the president of the A.E.U. and head of the British Delegation, Mr. Jack Tanner, broadcast a message of goodwill to the metal workers of the Soviet Union in which he stressed the "feelings of solidarity which exist between the metal workers of Great Britain and those of the Soviet Union." Mr. Tanner extended an invitation to Soviet trades unions to send a delegation of engineering workers to England next spring. The Delegation, after a few days in Moscow, started on a tour of the Donbas region.

Mongolian papers have published a denial issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Mongolian People's Republic of the report broadcast a few days ago by the Seoul radio of a concentration of Mongolian forces on the Chinese-Mongolian border. This report is declared to be a complete invention.

Possibly as a result of President Roxas' protest against the Soviet campaign of misrepresentation, Moscow has latterly been silent about the Philippines. In general, there has also been a marked falling off in news from the Far East, although a series of short features on China kept up public interest in Chinese press criticism of the National Assembly and United States penetration of Chinese markets.

The Soviet press reports that the Soviet-Afghan Agreement of the 13th June was ratified by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet on the 28th November. (See also under "Middle East.")

SCANDINAVIA

Sweden

The Head of the Swedish Defence Staff was authorised to publish a communiqué on the 5th November on the "Stella Polaris" case (see Summary No. 368). According to this statement the Finnish High Command asked the Swedish military authorities in the summer of 1944 for permission to transfer to Sweden certain wireless equipment and personnel in the event of a military occupation of Finland. This request was granted—with the proviso that the establishment of a Finnish intelligence unit in Sweden could not be permitted and that personnel would be liable to internment if still in military service. Shortly before the Finnish armistice notice was given that the Finnish Government would like to carry out the arrangement and in due course the Finns arrived, as expected, with their equipment at Härnösand and Gävle. They arrived in larger numbers than was anticipated and included women and children; all were treated as ordinary refugees, as none of them were in uniform. Many of them have since returned to Finland. The equipment was sold by the Finnish to the Swedish State and payment made to a properly accredited Finnish authority, and any equipment not so sold was returned to Finland. Certain archives which arrived at the same time were not taken over by the Swedish authorities but deposited, by an authorised Finnish representative, with private individuals. No further official statement on the subject is now expected.

The Swedes, it is reported, have taken exception to the conduct of M. Leino in making a statement on this matter in the Finnish Diet without giving them due notice of his intention, and the Swedish Minister in Helsinki has lodged an official complaint.

With regard to the archives, a representative of H.M. Embassy was told in private conversation with a Member of the Swedish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, that a hint had been dropped to the "private individuals," whose names he mentioned, to burn the archives, as it would be difficult for the Swedish Government to refuse an official Finnish request for their return to Finland, should such request ever be made at the instigation of the Finnish State Police, a high proportion of which are known to be Communists.

Meanwhile the Swedish authorities fondly hope that their part in the "Stella Polaris" affair will now be allowed to be forgotten!

Denmark

M. Christmas Moeller, the Danish Foreign Minister in the Coalition Government formed after Denmark's liberation, made a rather strong speech at a Students' Association on the 23rd November. It will be remembered that in the early days of the occupation he was one of the worst thorns in the side of the German authorities, because he persisted in touring the country after his forcible retirement from office, constantly urging his countrymen to resist the Germans to the uttermost. It appears that now once again he feels that the time has come to rouse his countrymen. His speech mainly criticised their present self-complacency and refusal to face world events in a more broadminded and generous spirit. Thus he pointed out that it was "not becoming for Danes to discuss whether or not a division should be despatched to Germany. Denmark lost 3,000 young men in the war, Britain 300,000." As his only son was one of those 3,000, this clarion call to a change of heart comes from the right man. He also criticised the present Danish inclination to blame a few individuals for Denmark's submission to Germany in April 1940. It would be wrong if the people did not recognise that the majority supported this action at the time. He also expressed himself as dissatisfied with the discrimination shown in the sentences imposed on various political offenders, mentioning in this connexion the case of Count Schimmelmann, a well-known collaborator, who had escaped with a very light sentence. On the other hand, he gave it as his opinion, that M. Scavenius was one of those who was wrongly blamed, as he merely carried out the wishes of the majority, having been three times asked to become Prime Minister in 1940. Another subject of his criticism was the discrimination shown in respect of Danish-minded men who spied for Great Britain in South Schleswig as against German-minded citizens in Denmark who helped the Germans. As regards the South Schleswig question itself, it seems that M. Christmas Moeller has slightly modified his views, bringing them more into line with those of his party, as he stated on this occasion that the frontier was firm "in the way that North Schleswig had come to Denmark." Danes naturally based themselves on the right of self-determination and would support a removal of the frontier in due course, should a change of mentality take place south of the Skjelback.

Immediate official measures have been announced dealing with a possible coal shortage due to the United States decision, reported in the Danish press, to suspend shipments of coal to Europe. There will be drastic cuts in civilian consumption of gas and electricity and in the passenger traffic on the railways. At the same time attempts are being made to increase supplies of coal and coke from Poland and of fuel oil from Great Britain.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

Opposition to the Netherlands-Indonesian draft agreement appears to be increasing as its full significance is beginning to be realised. Since the sensational revelation that two opponents of the agreement, General Kruls, the Dutch C.-in-C., and Admiral Helfrich, had discussed it with Queen Wilhelmina (25th November), two other persons of eminence, Generals Reynders and Winkelman (both former Cs.-in-C.), have stated their disapproval. Politically, most of the opposition comes from the Right, and represents a formidable body of opinion; but, as the independent Labour paper, Het Parool, points out, "the Government's policy is not to be judged by Kruls and Helfrich, but by the States-General." In fairness, however, to the General and the Admiral, it must be admitted that their expressions of disapproval were tempered by a "wait-and-see" attitude. Be that as it may, their comments have resulted in official action being taken to keep the armed forces out of the controversy: Lieutenant-Commander Schagen van Leeuwen, Minister of Marine, has already issued an order prohibiting press interviews by naval officers unless sanction has previously been obtained, in order to avoid "giving offence in these disturbed times of unusual political troubles" (28th November). Among individual political parties committed to rejection of the agreement is the Party of Freedom; and posters in its name, urging opposition to ratification, have appeared in various parts of the country. Several other groups have sent telegrams and petitions to the Government; while in the larger towns, meetings of support or opposition are being held. Thus, the controversy over the agreement now wears the appearance of something hardly more edifying than an election campaign. A more dignified protest to the Government comes from the professors in the Faculty of Law in Utrecht University, for whom the draft agreement is "an open violation of the Constitution." They reject, on legal grounds, the plea of an "emergency," and emphasize the "vital necessity" of a "legally-correct starting-point." Approval by the States-General, say the professors, would be "inadmissible in law." "The doubtful advantage of a so-called elastic solution, with the resulting necessity of making light of our constitutional institutions, should not be chosen in preference to a way which may be longer and more difficult, but which offers the best guarantee for a solid constitutional basis of new political relations. Such a basis is an essential condition for any policy." A copy of this declaration has also been sent to the Chairman of each Chamber.

The three Commissioners-General (Professor Schermerhorn, M. van Poll and M. de Boer) began their discussions with the Cabinet on the 28th November. Another session was held on the 30th. So far no statement has been issued.

Belgium

The municipal elections—the first since 1938—were held on Sunday, the 24th November. The electors voted pretty much as they did at the General Election in February, substantial gains being once more registered by the Christian Social Party and the Communists, and losses by the Liberals. The Christian Social Party has again emerged as the largest individual party: it now holds 156 of the 406 seats on the combined councils of Brussels and Greater Brussels—a net gain of 30 seats; while at Antwerp (of which the Prime Minister is Burgomaster), it narrowly missed control of the City Council with 21 seats to the three Government parties' 22. M. Huysmans' own comment on the results was that they had "satisfied everybody." The Socialist Party had gained both votes and seats at Antwerp; the Christian Social Party had "inherited the votes which had hitherto gone to parties now non-existent"—an oblique reference to the quisling Rex and V.N.V. parties. The "tidal wave" (anticipated by the Christian Social Party) had not occurred.

Following the debate in the Senate on the Civilian War Damage estimates, the Government sustained another defeat (28th November). The voting was a tie—82 to 82; but this is technically regarded as amounting to a defeat. The tie resulted from the absence (through illness) of two members from the Government benches, and again emphasizes the extreme precariousness of the Government's Senate majority of one. M. Buisseret, Minister of the Interior, told the Senate that the "accidental" absence of these two members ought not to be interpreted as "lack of confidence" in the Government. The session was then adjourned for an hour so that M. Huysmans (who was not present) could be consulted. When the session was resumed, M. Huysmans declared that,

" following precedent," the Government would not resign, but would again submit the War Damage estimates. M. Struye (Christian Social Party) then challenged M. Huysmans' decision as being unconstitutional and said his party would leave in a body if it were not reversed. M. Huysmans remained obdurate, whereupon the Christian Social Party left the chamber, which was shortly afterwards " counted out," there being less than the quorum of Senators present.

A new political party—the "Freedom Party"—has been formed by M. Loumaye, a Liberal ex-Senator. A meeting is to be held in Brussels on the 15th December, when an executive will be appointed and statutes and a programme drawn up.

FRANCE

The interpretation of the elections held on the 24th November for the delegates who are to choose the representatives of metropolitan France in the Council of the Republic (see last week's Summary) has occasioned much controversy. The Ministry of the Interior, after issuing one set of inaccurate statistics, has declared the following results, for France and Algeria, to be correct: Communists, 24,688; Socialists, 14,393; Rassemblement des Gauches, 10,252; M.R.P., 24,755; Gaullist Union, 1,157; Right-Wing 9,643; miscellaneous and independents, 233. Thus the M.R.P. takes first place; however, the Communists still claim that they in fact obtained the highest number of delegates. One point of interest is the fact that local lists of independents had little success.

The National Assembly met on the 28th November with the veteran Communist, M. Cachin, as president, to receive the resignation of M. Bidault's Government. M. Bidault emphasised in his letter to the president the need for the rapid constitution of a strong Government to deal with the financial situation. (The situation in Indo-China (see under " Far East ") has now been added to the immediate preoccupations of the administration.) M. Vincent Auriol was re-elected President of the Assembly on the 3rd December, securing 284 votes against M. Cachin's 170 and M. Varenne's 98. The election of the new Premier was due to take place on the 4th December, the only candidate so far put forward being M. Thorez. The M.R.P. favour the re-election of the present Government, or one with a similar structure, until the election of the President of the Republic —who, they still hope, will be General de Gaulle. The Socialists have now met the Communists to discuss a possible programme of Government, and a section of the Radicals are believed to favour the idea of a new Popular Front.

The visit to London of the German Social Democrat Leader, Dr. Schumacher, is causing considerable anxiety to the French, and the Quai d'Orsay refused to permit Social Democrat representatives from the French Zone to join Dr. Schumacher. Comment in most of the press has been reserved, but Dr. Schumacher's reception here was reported with some bitterness by L'Aube, organ of the M.R.P., while L'Humanité referred to him as " the champion of German nationalism " and connected the visit with plans for a Western bloc. (See also under " Germany.")

The so-called Monnet Plan was published after it had been presented on the 28th November to the Planning Council, which includes all the Ministers concerned and a dozen other nominated members and is presided over by the Prime Minister. It has been drawn up by the secretariat of M. Jean Monnet, who was appointed General Commissioner for Planning by a decree of the 3rd January, 1946, and given full powers. It is more in the nature of a description of " target " than a plan in the socialist sense. It envisages the modernisation and re-equipment of industry and agriculture, including necessary reconstruction and covers the years 1947–50. It has the general approval of the Confédération Générale du Travail and of the Confédération Générale de l'Agriculture, and representatives of many different activities and many political opinions have worked together upon it in industrial working parties and other specalised committees. There is thus a surprising consensus of opinion in favour of it, though some experts are doubtful whether the ambitious programme which it puts forward can in fact be carried out. No doubts have yet been voiced publicly as to the desirability of some of the specific recommendations—such as the big increase in steel output.

The plan provides for an increase in coal production from 50 million tons in 1946 to 65 million in 1950; an increase in electricity production from 23 to 37 milliard kilowatt hours; an increase in steel production from 4 to 11 million tons, and in cement from 3 to 13·5 million tons. Planned increases in productive efficiency for 1950 as compared with 1938 are: 13 per cent. in mining, 20 per cent. in textiles, 30 per cent. in construction materials, 40 per cent. in building and public works, 46 per cent. in iron and steel, 57 per cent. in motor vehicles, 27 per cent. in agriculture. To carry out this programme nearly a million extra workers will be needed by the end of 1947, of which many must come from abroad, and a working week of 48 hours must be accepted. Total investment of 2,250 milliard francs will be needed, of which 460 milliard must be spent in 1947. M. Monnet, in introducing his plan, said that only by means of such a programme could France fit herself to export in a competitive market so as to be able to pay for necessary imports when her foreign credits were exhausted. He also pointed out that a big assumption had been made, the assumption that prices would remain stable. The success of the plan depended on the maintenance of financial stability, the balancing of the ordinary Budget and the encouragement of savings.

SWITZERLAND

In Berne, on the 24th November, M. Kobelt, President of the Swiss Confederation, made an important statement to members of the Swiss radical-democratic party regarding the state of Federal finances and national defence. He pointed out that, according to the Federal Constitution, the first task of the Confederation was to maintain the country's independence. Foreign countries would not respect Switzerland's policy of neutrality unless they believed in her determination to defend the country. Therefore an army capable of putting up a resistance was indispensable. The President declared that an economy in military expenses was necessary, but that there were limits which could not be passed without endangering the national defence. He added finally that, during the March session, the Federal Council intends to inform both Parliament and the public about the aims of the projected military reforms.

The Financial Delegation of the legislative Council has sent its report to the Financial Commissions of the National Council and the Council of States concerning the fiscal year from the 1st October, 1945, to the 30th September, 1946. This report estimates the national income at approximately 12 milliard francs, and the debt at 8½ milliard francs, with a further increase expected in the latter during the next few years. Economy is necessary to re-establish the balance of finances. The revision of military organisation should make a considerable reduction in expenditure for national defence, but further cuts will have to be made in other fields as well, especially as regards subsidies. Fresh sources of income will also have to be found. An increase in certain postal charges is expected to yield several million francs, but it will not be possible to avoid the introduction of a general tax on beverages. With regard to the revaluation of the Swiss franc the report says that it would be a mistake to combat the present-day excessive economic activity by an adjustment of currency.

The first Swiss-Bulgarian trade talks since the war, which took place in Sofia, have resulted in an agreement being reached on a list of goods to be exchanged between the two countries. Switzerland is to export, among other things, machinery, medical supplies, chemical products and electrical instruments in exchange for about thirty different goods from Bulgaria including tobacco, hides, minerals and tomato pulp. The Swiss delegation was led by Max Troendle. There has been favourable comment on the negotiations by the press of both countries concerned. The problems of payment and transport have still to be discussed.

On the 12th November the Federal Council agreed to the nomination of M. Egidio Reale as Italian Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Switzerland.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

During the past week the Hungarian Press and Radio have been largely concerned with the forcible deportation of Hungarians in Southern Slovakia for labour service in the Czech Lands. On the 27th November M. Gyöngyösi sent a fresh Note to the Czechoslovak Government protesting against the eviction of Hungarians and announcing that the Hungarian Government would withdraw permission for the repatriation of Slovaks from Hungary as from the 29th November. The Note points out that the Hungarian Government had made numerous concessions which went beyond the scope of the Repatriation Agreement. Thus, in order to assist Czechoslovakia in overcoming her manpower shortage they had consented to the return of certain volunteers before the principles governing the repatriation procedure were settled. They had expected that in return Czechoslovakia would adhere strictly to her obligations under the Agreement. Instead she had replied by removing Hungarian families from their homes. Negotiations between the two countries for the implementation of the Agreement must be conducted in a calm atmosphere, and this is conditional upon Czechoslovakia's observation of its terms. The confiscation of Hungarian property would have to cease, payment of social relief should be made to dismissed employees, and immediate instructions issued to the Slovak authorities not to avail themselves of the Compulsory Labour Service Decree for the deportation of Hungarian families.

According to the Communist newspaper, Szabad Nép, discrimination is shown against Hungarians with a "leftist" tradition, nearly all the Communists, for instance, having been removed from Muzsla, while notorious Fascists were untouched. It is not clear why the political views of their victims should affect the behaviour of the Slovak authorities who seem generally determined to exploit Hungarian labour for as long as possible as well as to demagyarize the frontier districts before the question of returning them to Hungary comes up for discussion. In addition, Hungarians report the existence of a religious persecution in Slovakia directed against the Protestant Church, the Constitution of which has been suspended, its gatherings prohibited, and several of its clergy and employees imprisoned for attending Bible circles, usually without a hearing. There are further allegations of cruelty which Czechoslovak sources, in their turn, deny, saying that there has been no breaking up of families, that compulsion is applied only where the voluntary principle fails, that false propaganda is used to persuade Hungarians that they are being deported to Siberia, and that, though a refugee was killed while attempting to cross the Danube, the bullet which hit him came from one of the Hungarian frontier guards who had started an unprovoked attack on the Czechoslovak guards to prevent them from interfering with the Hungarians' flight.

The Freedom Party (see Summary No. 366) led by M. Sulyok, held its inaugural meeting on the 24th November. M. Sulyok read the Parliamentary speech for which he was expelled from the Smallholders' Party early in the year. Yugoslav circles have attacked his statement that Hungary could not have been forced into the war on Hitler's side unless she had lost certain territories. The Western Powers had given Hungary no help at the Peace Conference, M. Sulyok asserted, and Soviet Russia, whose faults in foreign policy must be admitted, though not criticized, had backed the Czechoslovak demand for the exchange of populations. He stressed the importance of Soviet Russia's friendship and referred to the economic assistance which she had given Hungary. Turning to domestic affairs he spoke strongly against the way in which the Smallholders had allowed 80 to 90 per cent. of the power to go to the extreme Left, although a majority vote had established them as the leading party. He reproached the Communists and Social Democrats for abusing democracy by extending their rule over the nation, which did not agree with them. The Freedom Party stood for democracy and social justice based on Christian principles as well as for the equality of all Hungarians regardless of race or religion. M. Sulyok denied that the nationalization of the big industries would benefit the people. On the contrary, it was the political leaders who would be enriched.

By contrast Budapest Radio's Russian language Service emphasized the satisfactory results which some 600 nationalized enterprises had already achieved, singling out the increased production of the coal mines for particular commendation. While it is true that the output has been rising steadily and is reported to have reached the daily rate of 2,726 wagon loads by the end of October, the situation nevertheless remains serious. Current deliveries have had to be reduced to allow stocks to accumulate, and though it is hoped that supplies for essential industries will be maintained, the outlook for domestic consumers is unpromising.

The Supreme Economic Council, of which M. Bárányos is to remain a member, has decided to lower the prices of a series of industrial commodities by 5 to 25 per cent., instead of by a general 25 per cent. drop, as the left-wing bloc originally proposed. (See Summary No. 366.) In spite of the fact that, except in the case of yarn, no official price increase has taken place since the 1st August, prices have soared recently without any justification, for neither raw material nor production costs have increased. It was a part of the initial stabilization policy to fix industrial, as opposed to agricultural, prices at a high level, both to ensure that the towns should be able to pay in terms of manufactured goods for the food sent them from the country, and also to create an atmosphere of confidence by a gradual reduction later on.

A Presidential clemency decision has commuted the death sentence passed on István Antal, former Minister of Justice and Propaganda, to one of life imprisonment. Although M. Antal was the right-hand man of General Gömbös, and as such a leading spirit in the process of Hungary's nazification, the fact that he was deported by the followers of the Arrow Cross Premier, Szálasi, no doubt weighed heavily in his favour.

Roumania

The King has opened the new Parliament in person. Neither the British nor American Representatives were present. (A short reference in The Times, based upon the Associated Press report, was perhaps somewhat misleading. "No British or United States military or political representatives were present to-day to hear King Michael announce . . . . that Roumania desired better relations with Britain and the United States." There is a suggestion here that desire for better relations with Britain formed one of the main points of the King's speech, and almost a suggestion that our representatives were guilty of a discourtesy in not being present to hear it. The fact is that the reference to Britain and America was only by the way.) After affirming that one of Roumania's main preoccupations would be the maintenance of perfect friendship and close collaboration with the Soviet Union, the King went on to say, "Our Government will aim at developing political, economic and cultural relations with Great Britain, the United States, France and other peace-loving countries." The speech then continued to lay stress on the ties of friendship with the Russian-controlled countries in Eastern Europe.

Both the British and Americans have expressed dissatisfaction at the manner in which the elections were conducted, but it is clear that there is no intention of withdrawing recognition of the Roumanian Government, or to refuse to conclude a treaty of peace.

The British Representative in Bucarest is quite clear that two courses were open to the King. He could force the issue now, in which case he would very likely have lost his throne and possibly his life, or he could play for time, in which case he would in all probability lose his throne eventually. If he had taken the former course, he would at least have gone with the good will and affection of his people. By taking the latter course, he runs the risk not only of forfeiting the throne but the good will of his people as well. Had he been assured of anything more than moral support from Great Britain and America, he might have been ready to choose the former alternative, but the Allied Governments were not prepared to advise him, since they were not in a position to give anything more substantial.

A detail which does not appear to have received any attention is the question how the King could communicate with his people. The radio and press would be closed to him. The dropping of leaflets was an expedient adopted in some cases during the war, but in Roumania this would be ineffective as so many of the people cannot read. A message from the King could only be passed on by word of mouth, and any attempt to spread it in this fashion from village to village would easily be detected and stopped with serious consequences to those who were attempting to carry it out. The Russian and Roumanian authorities could circulate any version they chose of what had taken place. This is a type of difficulty existing in Balkan countries which people in this country find hard to appreciate.

There are a number of newcomers in the Government as it has been announced. The two Opposition Ministers who were brought in last January to broaden the Government, are not included in the new list nor, so far, does Professor Constantinescu-Iasi, who recently visited London, appear. Dl Gheorghiu-Dej, formerly Minister of Communications, becomes Minister of National Economy, and one woman is included, D-na Florica Bagdazar, as Minister of Health. Dl Emil Bodnaraş is Under-Secretary of the Premier's Office, and it is noted that this office is to have extended authority. Dl Bodnaraş is a genuine Communist, and is the real ruler of Roumania under the Soviet. D-na Anna Pauker, who has been elected to the new Parliament, is the link between Bodnaraş and Moscow.

Scattered about Roumania are a number of resistance groups, with a membership varying from a few hundreds to one well-armed and well-organised body of about 15,000. This group which calls itself the "Voice of Blood" is composed of deserters from the army when the army was fighting against the Germans after August 1944. They objected to fighting on the side of the Russians, but profess not to be pro-German. The group is by way of being an opposite number of the Tudor Vladimărescu Division, except that they have not sold themselves to a foreign Power.

The proposed Payments' Agreement between Roumania and this country continues for the time being in abeyance.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav authorities are normally very reticent about their internal security services. When General Aleksandar Ranković took over the Ministry of the Interior in March 1946 he made one of the few public references to the work of O.Z.N.A. (now U.D.B.). Recently he described a new Bill concerning the People's Militia (the uniformed police), which is shortly to be discussed by the National Assembly. This Bill, in fact, only confirms the arrangements which were made during the reorganisation of the Ministry of the Interior in the Spring. The Militia, which grew up during the Partisan war, is organised on military lines, and armed. While for the auxiliary Militia civilians are liable for conscription locally and on a temporary basis, recruitment for the Militia proper is through special training schools, and the qualifications are youth, good health and an "unimpeachable moral character." The Militia includes not only traffic police and the fire service but an important branch, the Industrial Militia, formed for the "better protection" of all major industrial and public utility enterprises (which are now all State controlled). This body is responsible to the General Militia, but it is maintained at the expense of the individual enterprises which it is designed to protect. Small wonder that the Yugoslav Trade Unions are able to boast that strikes are unknown! A similar force existed in Croatia under Pavelić. Another Bill provides the outline of a system of Military Public Prosecutors, with functions identical with those of their civilian counterpart, but responsible only to the Commander-in-Chief (Marshal Tito).

Marshal Tito has signed an order for the demobilisation of those of the 1923 class who joined the National Liberation Forces in the latter half of 1944, and of all who joined previously.

Archbishop Stepinac has been moved from the prison ward of the Zagreb hospital, where he has been under treatment, to a religious house in the country. The Government, it appears, would be greatly relieved if his resignation or transfer from the See of Zagreb could be effected. This would provide an excuse for his release and expulsion from the country. Dr. Rittig, the Incumbent of St. Mark's, Zagreb, and a figurehead in the Government, is known to have an eye on the job of successor to Mgr. Stepinac; such an arrangement would suit the Yugoslav Government—but not the Vatican.

The first anniversary of the declaration of the Republic was celebrated on the 29th November with much blowing of the Yugoslav trumpet. Borba had hardly enough words to describe what Yugoslavia had done by her own efforts. On the same day Marshal Tito and the Soviet Ambassador attended the opening of the bridge over the Danube at Pančevo which has been rebuilt under Russian supervision, with Russian contributions of labour and material, and has been named "The Red Army Bridge."

The repatriation of 1,000 Italian prisoners-of-war has been announced.

Greece

The state of affairs in northern Greece may fairly be described as civil war, and, although it has yet to be confirmed, the Greek belief that there is a considerable concentration of Yugoslav troops on the frontier does nothing to relieve tension. Greece protested strongly in Belgrade against the Yugoslav assertion that Greek aircraft had crossed the frontier. But more important was the appeal addressed by the Greek Government to the United Nations Assembly. This appeal gave as instances of Yugoslav intervention in Greek affairs: the activities of the Slav-Macedonian Nationalist Liberation Front (S.N.O.F.) based at Skoplje; the guerilla training at Voulkes camp in Voivodina of 2,500 or 3,000 Greeks and 3,500 "Ægean Macedonians," and the attachment of men of former Macedonian battalions of Slav-speaking Greeks to regular Yugoslav units. The Greek Government claim to have much evidence that the rebels receive substantial help from Albania, Bulgaria and particularly Yugoslavia (a) by the organisation of bands in these countries; (b) by the protection given by the forces of these countries to bands and individuals crossing the frontier in either direction; (c) by the reception and relief of Greek criminals and anarchists and their encouragement in revolutionary activity in Greece. There is in fact little doubt that these Greek allegations are true.

Meantime the rebels made attacks even nearer to Salonica and perpetrated sporadic outrages both north and south of the Gulf of Corinth. Their brutal murders not only of gendarmes but also of unoffending men, women and children caused an outcry, and there was further talk of a coalition. A Government so broadened would include the parties of MM. Venizelos, Papandreou and Kanellopoulos. But when M. Tsaldaris made an offer to M. Sophoulis to take four Liberals into the Government, the Liberal leader refused it. What M. Sophoulis wants is to be Prime Minister, and what the Opposition as a whole want is to down M. Tsaldaris. The urgent need of the whole nation for a strong Government seems to be a secondary consideration for the politicians. But if under M. Tsaldaris' leadership the Populist Party were to crumble into dissident groups, effective parliamentary government would become impossible and there would be a danger of dictatorship.

On the 1st December it was reported that M. Tsaldaris had left Athens by air for New York, where he would head the Greek delegates to the United Nations and present the Greek case to the Security Council.

Albania

It will be recalled that during last June and July thirty-seven anti-Communist Albanians were tried at Tirana on a charge of having attempted to overthrow Enver Hoxha's régime with the alleged (and entirely imaginary) assistance of "armed intervention from abroad." It will also be remembered how in the course of that trial various quite unfounded allegations were made regarding certain officers attached to the British Military Mission (which had been withdrawn from Albania some three months earlier)—the Court clearly trying to give the impression that the defendants were working against the régime under orders from London (see Summary No. 348).

Now during November, directly following on the withdrawal of the United States political mission, a similar trial has been staged. This time a group of twenty engineers who were engaged on draining some marshes near the coast were accused of having received money and assistance from a named member of the U.S. mission in return for their delaying and sabotaging the work, and thus helping to hold up the economic re-establishment of Albania. Two UNRRA employees were also said to be implicated. According to the Albanian telegraph service (10th November), one of the accused, when asked in court to justify his behaviour, said that he and his friends in the dock expected that there would before long be an Anglo-American landing on the coast of Albania, and they wanted to secure good jobs through having helped the invaders. This fantastic story must evidently be supposed by the Albanian authorities to impress the more gullible of their people, for it was the principal theme last June as well. In the end five of the accused engineers were sentenced to death, two to life imprisonment and three others to terms of imprisonment with hard labour.

Both the Tirana wireless and the Government-controlled press persist in denying that Great Britain had the International Mine Clearance Board's authority to sweep the Northern Corfu Channel on the 12th and 13th November. In all their references to this country and to the U.S.A. their tone grows more and more offensive. The Tsaldaris Government is abused as a matter of course every day.

Bulgaria

A perusal of the full draft text of Bulgaria's new republican constitution, which the Grand National Assembly has been engaged in discussing, suggests that it has been carefully planned so as to allow for Bulgaria to fit easily into a Greater South Slav Federation as soon as the moment seems ripe. If one makes due allowance for the fact that Yugoslavia herself is a federation already, the similarity between her Constitution and the new Bulgarian one is noticeable enough to suggest their both having been worked out by the same Department in Moscow with this end in view. Not only are the various functions of the Presidency, the Assembly, etc., very much alike, but there is a marked resemblance in the economic and social clauses too. While, under Article 8, "private property and private initiative are recognised and protected by the State . . . . and the inheritance of private property is regulated by the law," the same article goes on to lay down that "no-one may use the right to hold private property to the detriment of the national community. . . . All private monopolistic organizations such as cartels, trusts, etc., are banned"; but "private property can only be confiscated in the public interest and with appropriate indemnity." Article 9 says that "private land belongs to those who cultivate it," and that "the law may determine the maximum of land that can be privately held." In the light of recent events and of present conditions it would be wise to regard much of the document as a mere propaganda manifesto. Lip-service is paid to such admirable principles as universal suffrage and secret balloting (Art. 2), the independence of the judiciary (Art. 53) and the inviolability of the home (Art. 72). The National Assembly is given very extensive powers (Art. 16), most decisions being taken by a simple majority vote, with the possibility of a national referendum in the background. Deputies may be unseated (Articles 4 and 17). Military service is to be compulsory for every citizen (Art. 77). This clause need not necessarily conflict with Article 9 of the draft Peace Treaty, which is designed to limit the strength of Bulgaria's armed forces to 66,000 men at any one time.

A bald announcement was made on the 26th November that the Sofia Provincial Court had stopped the case against Kosta Lulchev, leader of the Opposition Social Democrats, but that the 22 others cited with him will be tried on the 20th December. (See Summary No. 367.)

For some little time there has been reason to think that a fair number of Greek Communists who have slipped over into Bulgaria have been receiving military training at two or three centres there under Russian supervision. The Hristo Botev Officers' Academy at Sofia is one of the places which had been mentioned in this connexion. The latest reports suggest that the training is being speeded up and intensified. It must, however, be added that in a speech which he made to the Grand National Assembly on the 28th November, Dimitrov categorically denied that any "armed groups" had "passed into Greek territory from Bulgaria."

Turkey

In the speech with which, as already mentioned, he opened the Grand National Assembly on the 1st November, President Inönü expressed gratification that in spite of political inexperience and in spite of considerable party feeling Turkey had in the present year successfully held three free elections—general, municipal and vilayet. Although he may have been a little premature in describing this as the attainment of the last stage of democracy, it does represent a big advance on the road marked out by Atatürk. The creation of an Opposition, however, is not the final goal. It is no doubt the desire of the Turkish leaders that one day in the future the new Democratic Party—which is separated from the People's (Government) Party by no serious questions of principle—shall assume power, and that the country shall be endowed with a genuine two-party system. The present position of President Inönü and other leaders is therefore ambiguous. As patriots they welcome the development of the Democratic Party. As members of the People's Party they are bound to decry the Democratic Party. In any case they want to train the electorate, totally unused to constitutional procedure as it is, to keep controversy within legitimate bounds, and to develop between the parties a spirit of toleration and fair play. In the speech mentioned above President Inönü deprecated such a degree of animosity as might weaken the country. On a previous occasion, although he is leader of the People's Party, he assured certain members of the Democratic Party of his desire for the development of their Party, which, he said, had been started by friends of his, and for toleration to develop between them and the People's Party. No doubt, when the moment comes that it loses popular favour, the People's Party will be extremely reluctant to surrender the power which it has enjoyed ever since its foundation by Atatürk, but on the 17th November it took a further step towards making a fair field for its opponents, inasmuch as it decided that the People's House (Halkevi) should be open to all citizens irrespective of Party, provided it was not used for "political" purposes. If carried out, this will represent a big concession by the People's Party. For the People's Party possesses one of these institutes in every town and village of importance, and has used them not only to westernise the people but also to establish the Party's grip over the country. The People's Houses have therefore hitherto been a great political asset to the People's Party.

The publication on the 13th November of the official despatch by Field-Marshal Lord (Sir Maitland) Wilson on operations in the Middle East in 1943 prompted two leading Turkish editors to answer his references to Turkey's reluctance to take an active part. They repeated the familiar argument that the military material we supplied was not sufficient, and they implied that Turkey would have sacrificed herself to the Germans in vain—which justifies Lord

Wilson's main conclusion that she was deterred by doubt of our ability to save her from at least the initial stages of a German attack. A fresh argument, which was no doubt suggested to the two apologists by more recent events, was that intervention in Bulgaria or even the grant of bases to Britain would have involved Turkey with the Soviet Union.

The fighting in northern Greece has attracted a good deal of attention. The newspapers in general express sympathy with Greece and regard the episode as a trial of strength between the Slav bloc and the Western Powers.

The brief visits of United States warships to Izmir (Smyrna) and Marmaris between the 24th and the 29th November were welcomed as yet another sign of growing American friendship.

The Secretary-General of the Foreign Ministry left Angora on the 28th November to convey congratulations to King Abdullah on the independence of Transjordan, and on his way back he will discuss current affairs with the Lebanese Government. This indicates a continued desire to cultivate the Arab countries and will no doubt draw acid comment from Moscow.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Sidky Pasha now feels that the signature of the Treaty has become most urgent, since any further delay will be exploited by the Opposition. Unfortunately his own pronouncement about the independence of the Sudan (see last week's Summary) cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged, and Mr. Bevin is insisting on an exchange of letters which will make clear that both Governments agree that the Sudanese will remain free to choose their future status after a period during which they would be prepared for self-government. This, Sidky Pasha protests, it is impossible for him to do. The fact that this difficulty is of his own creation has been clearly put to him by His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires.

At a meeting of the Wafd Parliamentary Group under the presidency of Nahas Pasha on the 28th November, the Wafd policy of opposition to the Sidky–Bevin proposals was approved, and it was decided to address a telegram of protest to the United Nations and the Security Council against the measures being taken by Great Britain "to force the people to accept the proposals of which the effect is to retain her military forces in the country, and to accept a treaty of alliance with her under pressure of those forces." Protests were also registered against the "policy of steel and fire" being applied to the country by Sidky Pasha's Cabinet, and against the action being taken to suppress demonstrations of students and others. The line which the Wafd itself intended to follow is indicated in resolutions calling for a general strike and "accepting invitations" to visit the provinces. The first of these visits was to have been to Tanta on the 8th December; the Cabinet banned it on the ground that it was part of a plan to provoke insurrection at a time when members of Parliament should be free to study the country's future in a calm atmosphere.

Arab League

On the 28th November the League Council adopted a resolution drawing attention to the danger to the Arabs of Jewish immigration into Palestine, and charging the Secretariat-General to address a protest to His Majesty's Government in view of their negligence in this matter. The continuance of immigration is regarded as contrary to the "promise made by His Majesty's Government in 1939" (the White Paper which was rejected by both Arabs and Jews), and all immigrants are regarded as "illegal."

The Cairo press of the 29th November published a statement issued in the name of the Arab League Council on the subject of the Greater Syria project, which had been discussed at a special meeting. The statement contains the assurance that each of the States represented on the Arab League Council remains faithful to the League Covenant, and will not dispute the independence or sovereignty of a State Member of the Arab League, or attack the existing governmental régime.

Palestine

The representative of the Jewish Community Council of Jerusalem made the arrival of yet another ship carrying illegal immigrants—the s.s. Lochita, also known as Knesseth Israel—the occasion for challenging the legality of the Palestine Government's action in deporting illegal immigrants. Application for a writ of habeas corpus was made on behalf of 1,941 of the Lochita's passengers. On the original petition the court declared an order nisi, and the illegal immigrants were held on board ship in Palestinian waters until the case was heard on the 28th November. Judgment was given on the following day. The Chief Justice found that no illegality had been committed by the Palestine Government, and the application for the writ of habeas corpus was discharged.

The Court's decision relieves the Palestine Government of what might have been a new and serious embarrassment. At the same time disappointment at a result which destroys the hopes that had been raised of successfully challenging the action of the Government has caused a renewal of terrorism in Palestine, and it is feared that a serious setback may ensue to the progress made by the Palestine Government and Jewish leaders in fostering anti-terrorist trends during the days immediately preceding the trial. The position was aggravated by riotous behaviour of the would-be immigrants on board the Lochita and the counter-measures necessarily taken to restore order. Owing to the congestion and the insanitary conditions in the ship it was decided to transfer the passengers to three British ships in Haifa harbour. On British troops boarding the Lochita, missiles were thrown, troops were severely manhandled and some thrown overboard. Only after the use of tear-smoke and fire-hoses was order restored. About thirty soldiers were injured, while two Jews were killed and two injured as a result of firing which took place during the riot. The ships sailed later for Cyprus.

In an official communiqué issued on the 29th November the Palestine authorities express regret at the necessity once again to deport illegal immigrants to Cyprus, but point out the disastrous effect upon attempts by the Government and responsible Jewish leaders to bring about better conditions and establish an understanding in Palestine of encouraging and assisting these people to attempt to enter the country in disregard of repeated warnings that they will not be allowed to land. The comment of the Jewish Agency is that the immigrants are not illegal, but "come as of right under the Mandate."

Only one incident had been reported during the week under review until the 30th November, when a Jerusalem police billet was attacked by Jews estimated at possibly a hundred strong. The attack lasted half-an-hour. It is not clear whether this outbreak was inspired by the Lochita incident and the High Court's decision. Meanwhile, the cessation of attacks on the railways may be explained by an announcement put out by the Irgun Zvai Leumi and the Stern Gang that, during the next eight to ten weeks, while the citrus crop is being marketed, they will defer further operations. It should be added, however, that this lull in terrorist activity may be connected with a rumoured ultimatum from the Jewish Agency to the Irgun Zvai Leumi and the Stern Gang to discontinue their activities for two months while negotiations are proceeding.

In the hope of allaying the increased tension expected to result from the Lochita decision, the High Commissioner has hastened a measure which he had previously been contemplating. He has announced that he has agreed to allow the immediate transfer of 750 Cyprus immigrants to a camp controlled by the Jewish Agency, and to use the Government accommodation so freed for a further 1,000 immigrants from Cyprus, who will be brought to Palestine as soon as possible. These immigrants will then be held until they can be accepted against Palestine monthly immigration quotas.

With Jamal al Husaini, leader of the Palestine Arab Party, in Cairo attending the Arab League Conference, there has been no notable development in Palestine on the Arab side. It is perhaps worth recording that the Arab League has issued another protest about Jewish immigration into Palestine, urging that all such immigrants should be returned to their countries of origin. (See also "Arab League".)

The Metropolitan of Leningrad is at present paying a visit to Palestine. The ostensible reason is "to visit Eastern Orthodox Patriarchates."

Persia

Throughout the past week the situation in Zenjan has been anything but peaceful. The Azerbaijan Democrats are accusing the Central Government troops of gross barbarities towards the inhabitants. On the other hand, according to the Tehran press of the 26th November, soon after the arrival of Government troops on the 23rd November, several Zenjanis assaulted a number of persons who had collaborated with the Azerbaijan Democrats, looted their homes and killed a leading Mullah. There is no doubt that economic conditions in Zenjan were anything but satisfactory prior to the arrival of the Government forces, and the desperate plight of the population, owing to the poverty of the Azerbaijan administration (see Summary No. 369), may have stimulated feelings of revulsion against Pishavari's Government. The Chief of the General Staff has issued an open invitation to all newspapers to send representatives to report upon the situation in the Zenjan area, and has promised them all the requisite facilities.

A serious development in the Azerbaijan situation occurred on the 28th November, when the Soviet Ambassador delivered a message to the Prime Minister to the effect that if Persian armed forces entered Azerbaijan there would be "disturbances" in that province and on the Soviet frontier and it would therefore be better if troops were not sent. Nevertheless, he still intends to send a limited force into Azerbaijan to ensure the orderliness of the elections, in accordance with his proclamation of the 21st October (see last week's Summary). If this force encounters resistance and an armed clash ensues, Qawam proposes to send in a larger body of troops to re-assert the Government's authority.

Following this meeting with the Soviet Ambassador, Qawam telegraphed to the Governor-General of Azerbaijan that he had received reports that the Azerbaijanis were preparing defensive positions close to the provincial frontier of Azerbaijan, and urged him to ensure that no opposition were offered to the entry of Government forces, which would be sent there merely to safeguard the security of the elections. Dr. Javid, replying in the name of the Provincial Security Council, stated that the despatch of armed forces to Azerbaijan was unconstitutional and a breach of the agreement with the Persian Government. On the 1st December the Central Government sent a telegram rebutting these contentions and denying the right of the Provincial Council to express an opinion in such a matter. The telegram ended with a warning that, if resistance were offered to the Government troops, the consequences would be very serious.

The main body of the Persian Government troops is in Zenjan and, on the 28th November, they were holding a line from Zenjan, through Tikab (or Takan Tappeh) forty-five miles east of Saqqiz and Saqqiz to Sardasht. Partisans of the Zulfiqari and Shahsavan tribes are supporting the Government, but so far no troops have crossed the provincial boundary of Azerbaijan.

Concentrations of Azerbaijan Democrats, reinforced with Kurdish sympathisers from the Mahabad district, incuding Mulla Mustafa of Barzan, are reported north of Sardasht and Saqqiz. The main body of the Azerbaijan Democrat forces appears to be centred on Mianeh, midway between Zenjan and Tabriz. Their morale is reliably reported to be bad. They feel that, unless Russian help arrives, their leaders will desert them at the first small defeat inflicted by the Government troops. His Majesty's Consul-General at Tabriz considers that Government forces would receive a hearty welcome in Tabriz, and that, if the Persian Democrat Party were to open branches in Azerbaijan, there would be a rush to join.

This attitude is probably due in part to the Azerbaijanis' uncertainty of Russian assistance. So far there has been no indication that Soviet aid is forthcoming, in spite of the Soviet Ambassador's warning. The opinion in Tabriz is that the Russians are anxious to avoid drawing the international spotlight once more on Azerbaijan. In view of this, and of the bad administration and poor morale of the Azerbaijan Democrats, the situation may not be quite as serious as it looks on the surface. However, minor clashes are inevitable—skirmishing by Shahsevan partisans is already reported from Herau (70 miles due north of Zenjan)—and it is impossible at present to forecast the eventual outcome.

THE FAR EAST

French Indo-China

Hopes that the modus vivendi would pave the way to a peaceful settlement of the outstanding differences between France and Viet Nam have been shattered by a series of unfortunate incidents indicating that the previous appearance of tranquillity in French Indo-China was deceptive. Briefly, the President of the Provisional Government of Cochin-China has committed suicide and there has been a serious clash between French and Viet Nam forces at Haiphong and Langson in Tonking.

The problem facing France in Indo-China resembles that being tackled by the Netherlands in Indonesia. Corresponding to the Indonesian Republic, which has now successfully staked its claim to Sumatra, Banka and Billiton in addition to Java and Madura, and cherishes the ambition of leading the whole of Indonesia, is the Annamite Viet Nam Republic, which France has recognized as the de facto government of Tonking and Annam but which claims the right also to incorporate Cochin-China and whose extremists are inclined to intermeddle also in the affairs of Cambodia and Laos. The two main points at issue between the French and the Viet Minh are (1) the latter's claim to Cochin-China and (2) a definition of the future status of Viet Nam. As regards the second problem, spokesmen of the VN Republic have indicated its willingness to enter both the proposed new Indo-Chinese Federation and the French Union on an equal footing with France, whereas the latter wishes Viet Nam to be an integral part of each organization and further desires to retain the controlling voice in external trade and relations.

As regards Cochin-China France agreed to submit the question to a plebiscite but immediately spoilt the effect of this compromise by the establishment on the 1st June of a Provisional Government on a bureaucratic pattern under Dr. Thinh as President, thereby wrecking any hopes of a successful outcome of the Fontainebleau Conference. Subsequently, apart from sporadic disturbances, Cochin-China remained outwardly quiescent, but Dr. Thinh's suicide on the 9th November has roused doubts of the success of the French experiment. A writer in Le Monde of the 17th November admits that the Government was an artificial piece of machinery and did not really represent the Cochin-Chinese people who regarded Dr. Thinh as the protector of French interests and consequently viewed his government with apathy, not to say hostility. Dr. Thinh evidently found the task of steering a middle course between the claims of conservative French elements and the radical demands of the Cochin-Chinese beyond his powers and he took his life after becoming the target of attack in the Council of Ministers.

The writer in Le Monde points the moral that the French authorities should take the incident as a warning; however much the Cochin-Chinese may wish to govern themselves, they are not likely to give their confidence to an administration which they do not consider truly representative of their interests, any more freely than they would to an Annamite administration. It is pertinent to add that, although Cochin-China has been a separate entity, as a French Colony, since 1862, over 80 per cent. of the population are Annamites, who cannot fail to be swayed by the nationalist movement in the neighbouring Annamite States of Annam and Tonking, now united under Viet Nam. From Saigon it is reported that Dr. Le Van Hoach, who has been elected President by the Council, has approached Viet Minh elements for their support.

Operation of the modus vivendi has not begun auspiciously. Already on the 31st October the High Commissioner had found it necessary to state officially that it was not to be interpreted as altering the status of Cochin-China nor did it mean its incorporation in Viet Nam. It had been known that the latter maintained a shadow military and administrative organisation in Cochin-China. This now showed signs of open activity, and on the 9th November the High Commissioner protested to the Viet Nam Government against its continued existence. But in the atmosphere of mutual distrust and suspicion that has now succeeded to the outward cordiality that marked the return of the Viet Nam delegation it is scarcely likely that the Viet Minh Party will cease to work, whether openly or in secret, to win over the Cochin-Chinese to the Viet Nam Republic.

If the French quarrelled with the Annamite interpretation of the modus vivendi in Cochin-China, the Viet Nam Government considered that they had equal cause for dissatisfaction with the construction put upon it by the French authorities who have re-opened a Customs Office at Haiphong (since the establishment of the Government no Customs dues have been levied though the Viet Namese have enforced "squeeze" on goods in transit.) The V.N. Government protested to the High Commisisoner against this action and also against French control of the trade of the port and the collection of dues from French citizens. Before, however, the matter could be settled by negotiation, local resentment resulted on the 20th November in serious fighting between French and Viet Nam forces. A temporary truce broke down and a pitched battle ensued in the town and airfield. Viet Nam shore batteries also opened fire on the cruiser "Suffren." French troops have now regained control of the town and airfield. According to the press, the French Commander at Haiphong has informed the V.N. Minister of Defence that for the maintenance of peace and security it is essential that French troops should have control of the area and has rejected the suggestion of a mixed commission to discuss the question.

Hostilities also broke out near Langson, a main road-junction 180 kilometres north-east of Hanoi, where French troops were engaged in exhuming the bodies of French and Annamite soldiers who had been butchered by the Japanese and buried in mass-graves. The operations occupying several days and involving wide search of the neighbourhood, the Viet Nam forces suspected, or professed to suspect, that the French action was a cloak for a military reconnaissance and opened fire. French re-inforcements were then sent and eventually re-occupied Langson.

For these incidents each side blames the other. In the circumstances the joint military mission that was to draw up a truce agreement in furtherance of the modus vivendi has made no progress. Feeling is said to be running high. If the Viet Nam Government thought that the modus vivendi was the half-way house towards complete autonomy, they have been rudely awakened. They feel that the French have stolen a march on them by the promptitude with which they have adopted measures which the Annamites had imagined were to be decided by joint commissions. Just as the re-opening of the Customs appears to them to be an attempt to secure economic control, so military action at Langson suggests a strategic move, for this important town is the gateway into the Chinese Province of Kwangsi.

An agreement between France and China of the 28th February 1946 provided that negotiations should take place between the two parties for the purchase by the Chinese Government of the Chinese section of the Yunnan or Kunming–Haiphong railway and the creation of a free zone in the port of Haiphong. France's subsequent recognition of Viet Nam is, therefore, to some extent limited by this commitment. Paris Radio of the 16th November reported that negotiations were shortly to take place. It has long been an ambition of the French that the northern port, Haiphong, should rival Hongkong in the trade of China and the southern port, Saigon, should rank with Singapore and Batavia in the entrepôt trade of the "South Seas." Their own action in monopolizing the trade by means of a tariff barrier effectively prevented the realisation of this ambition, but the importance of these two ports is sufficient explanation of the French desire to retain control there.

Since the withdrawal of Chinese troops from the northern half of Indo-China relations between the two countries have been friendly. On the celebration of the Double Tenth at the Chinese Consulate General at Saigon the High Commissioner broke with precedent by attending in person.

Admiral d'Argenlieu arrived in France on the 17th November to confer with the French Government. According to Press reports the Inter-Ministerial Committee for Indo-China confirmed the firm policy associated with his name.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The crisis in the coal industry and the legal battle between Mr. John L. Lewis and the Administration have continued to furnish the all-absorbing topic of interest in the United States this week. The limelight which Mr. Lewis himself has enjoyed has alternated between his appearances in court to answer the charge of contempt for disobeying the injunction against cancelling the miners' contract and his negotiations with the coal-owners to reach a settlement privately. On the other side, there has been a tendency for commentators to share the apparent hope of the prosecution that the court proceedings may yet convince the miners that their contract is still valid and that, in the words of one newspaper, they "will realize with bitterness that the bargain they made last May was, as Mr. Lewis said at the time, a good one." On the 3rd December Mr. Lewis was found guilty of contempt of court. In announcing the verdict Judge Alan Goldsborough took what he admitted to be the "somewhat unusual" step of asking counsel on both sides to submit recommendations for an appropriate sentence.

Public opinion has been firmly behind the prosecution in what is widely regarded as the supreme test of authority between the United States Government and a "dictatorial" and "irresponsible" trade union leader, although the fear that the rights of labour generally may be prejudiced if he loses is causing both the A.F. of L. and the rival C.I.O. to support Mr. Lewis. The customary popular sympathy for the miners is almost entirely absent. Even the liberal-left-wing

New Republic has carried an article admitting that the miners are no longer the down-trodden element in American economic life which they were in the past and that "their current wages, after seven strikes capitalizing on the nation's necessity since Pearl Harbour, have placed them among the highest paid of industrial workers." At the same time it is pointed out that, whatever the outcome of these and further court proceedings, Mr. Lewis must inevitably lose the coming battle in Congress. The main lines of Republican strategy for that battle are already partly drawn, and the drive for some form of amendment to the National Labour Relations Act of 1935—which consolidated and extended gains accruing from many years of labour agitation—has been carried a step forward with a statement by Senator Taft on the eve of his departure for South America. The provisions of the 1935 Act, Senator Taft insisted, would definitely have to be changed to increase labour's responsibility and, beyond that, the Republicans in the new Congress would use every means in their power to curb strikes. Among the Democrats also the Conservative and anti-labour forces have been mobilizing. About seventy Southern Democratic members of the new House of Representatives are said to be pressing for the election of Representative Eugene Cox of Georgia, a keen supporter of the restrictive Case Bill of last session, as their minority leader. They would thereby prevent the post from going to Representative John W. McCormack of Massachusetts, the former majority leader, who has a liberal voting record.

Prominence continues to be given to the deleterious effects which the stoppage of work by the miners is having upon the American economy as a whole, and reports of drastic cuts in the output of other industries—as, for instance, in the case of Carnegie Illinois Steel of Pittsburgh, where production is already reduced to 35 per cent. of capacity—have been consistently treated as front-page news. There is also anxiety regarding the extent to which the coal shortage is likely, in the words of the New York Herald-Tribune, to "add to the diplomatic difficulties of nations which are endeavouring to adjust Europe's shattered political structure to the Continent's still crippled economy." That the State Department has been troubled by the possible repercussions of the actions of Mr. Lewis on its conduct of foreign relations has been patent in the desire of Mr. Byrnes to conclude the agreement for the fusion of the British and American zones of Germany before the coal crisis precipitates political difficulties at home and before the situation begins to deteriorate still further.

It is too early as yet to gauge the reactions of the American press and public to the agreement on Germany, which was signed in New York on the 2nd December (see under "Germany"). There has been little speculation on the nature and outcome of the talks while they have been proceeding, although there has been a growing desire to see the Western Powers produce a settlement for Germany with or without the consent of the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, some concern has been shown regarding the way in which American administrative policy and practices in Germany and Austria have during the past few days been indirectly responsible for what is described as "the first serious post-election threat to the nation's bi-partisan foreign policy." On the 27th November the four Republican members of the Senate War Investigating Committee accused the Administration of "seeking to conceal something wrong" in the American zones of Germany and Austria and of "playing politics" after the six Democratic members of the Committee had voted along party lines to prevent the Committee from inquiring into the methods of occupation employed in those two countries. The same four Republican Senators have taken the initiative in permitting the press to publish the contents of a report to the Committee, suggesting that American money is being used to organize a large influx of Eastern European Jews into the American zone of Germany, which the Democratic members of the Committee insisted on keeping secret.

The publication of the information contained in this report, which indicates that as many as 150,000 Jews have been brought into the American zone in the past eight months for the possible purpose of building up pressure for a Jewish State in Palestine, may well serve as a valuable corrective to the Zionist agitation in the United States. In the past two weeks the Zionists have been taking advantage of the presence of Mr. Bevin in New York to urge him to issue a statement suggesting that His Majesty's Government might consider the possibility of partition in Palestine. Mr. Byrnes has also disclosed the significant fact that Senator Taft, the chairman of the Senate Republican Steering Committee, is now interesting himself in Palestine and that he has approached Mr. Byrnes to find out the possible intentions of His Majesty's Government with regard to that country.

In contrast to the attention given to domestic problems the volume of comment on international affairs in general has declined appreciably this week. The unexpected readiness to compromise which M. Molotov manifested over Trieste in the Council of Foreign Ministers on the 26th November and over the principle of international control and inspection of armaments in the Political and Security Committee of the United Nations General Assembly two days later has come as an agreeable surprise and brought hope of further understanding to all except the sceptics who feel that concessions from the Soviets are invariably a question of reculer pour mieux sauter. One or two commentators are even ready to believe that the Soviet Foreign Minister's acceptance of the principle of inspection has narrowed the gulf between the American and Russian viewpoints on the paramount issue of atomic control.

LATIN AMERICA

Brazil

Among the provisions in the New Constitution (see Summary 369) directly affecting labour interests there is an interesting innovation in the form of compulsory and direct profit-sharing in industry. Though embodied in the Constitution, this would apparently require special legislation to be put into effect. A similar measure foreshadowed in a "Social Charter" which an employers' association tried to establish in São Paulo in 1945 came to nothing, owing, it was reported, to the workers' distrust of the employers' intentions. Assistance for the unemployed is also envisaged in the Constitution. No scheme of unemployment insurance exists in Brazil, nor, according to general report, does it seem likely that there will be one for the present. There is a general shortage of labour, and no indication exists that the problem of surplus labour can arise in Brazil for some time to come.

The position of Trade Unions is left much as before. The free right of association is provided for, but it is subject to regulation by law and there is, therefore, no obligation on the Ministry of Labour to make any change in the existing machinery of control over the unions of employees.

The new Constitution radically alters the framework for the administration of the Labour Courts, hitherto administered by the Ministry of Labour, but in future to be a branch of the normal judicial system of the country. In Brazil the legal profession plays a dominating part in the Labour Courts. The Chairman is always a lawyer, and the assessor takes a much less active part in the proceedings than his opposite number in Britain. The Labour laws in Brazil are so complicated that no employer or employee has much chance of winning a case unless he is represented by a lawyer, usually a specialist in social legislation, one or two of these gentry being permanently employed by large companies and unions.

Although some critics welcome the change because the administrative control will no longer be in the hands of the Ministry of Labour Officials, it is generally feared that the new system will make for rigidity and throw an increasing degree of responsibility on the regional tribunals, whose capacity for handling large-scale industrial disputes is subject to criticism. Disputes regarding labour accidents are to be dealt with by the civil courts.

In short, with the exceptions of the modified structure of the Labour Courts, and the new doctrine, as yet no more than a doctrine, of the workers' share in profits, the new Constitution leaves the Vargas Labour organisation and legislation essentially unchanged. Principles are so worded that the executive authorities are under no obligation to relax either the control of trade unions or the prohibition of strikes.

Just before the day on which the establishment of the Republic is commemorated (15th November), General Canrobert Pereira da Costa, the new Minister of War, issued an order of the day to the Armed Forces, drawing attention to the dangers of Communism. The evil effects of demonstrations by extremists was reason enough, the General said, for the Army not to look on passively at the spreading of the new wave of foreign and strange ideologies, which, imported by aliens, were mainly intended to mislead the Brazilian people. The Army must courageously oppose the expansion of all alien and imperialist doctrines, if Brazil, as a nation, did not wish to fall before them. The Minister recalled the Communist revolt of eleven years ago, the "bloodiest that had ever been seen in Brazil" and finished by referring to Russia as "an imperialist nation bent upon world conquest, aiming to destroy our nationality, because we are a free people and freedom conflicts with Russian ideas."

Such statements, coming from a senior Cabinet Minister, suggest that the Government may be still considering some definite action against the Brazilian Communist Party. After General Canrobert's order, a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro stated that alongside the official commemoration on the 27th November of the victims of the Communist rising in 1935, the Brazilian Communist Party proposed to celebrate the date as one of National Liberation—though they had postponed the accompanying demonstrations till the 6–9th December. The Minister of Justice, holding that this would constitute "provocation and premeditated crime," is reported to have instructed Governors and Interventors to stop Communist "provocation," offering them all necessary resources for the purpose.

Dominican Republic

The Dominican Minister for Foreign Affairs has delivered to His Majesty's Minister and the United States Ambassador copies of a report from a Dominican agent in Cuba, giving details of an alleged plot to attack the Dominican Republic, apparently by land, sea and air from Cuba. The Minister emphasised the Communist nature of the conspiracy, and hinted that the recent Communist activities in the Dominican Republic (see Summary No. 368) might have led to disaffection in the army. Nevertheless, if President Trujillo is looking for an excuse to curb the "democratic" movement, the discovery of the "Communist conspiracy" seems to be admirably suited to his convenience.

Uruguay

The Uruguayan Presidental elections took place on the 24th November. Voting is reported to have been orderly. While final figures will probably not be available for some days, partial results give the Batllistas (Colorados) a moderate lead over the Herreristas. The Batllista candidate for the Presidency is Sr. Tomás Berreta, formerly Minister for Public Works in President Amézaga's Government. A plebiscite on Constitutional reform which was held simultaneously with the presidential elections shows a majority in Montevideo in favour of government by National Council in place of the Presidency (see Summaries Nos 345 and 357). It is not yet clear, however, whether the majority is sufficient to ensure this reform: in any case Sr. Berreta is the Batllista candidate to preside over the nine members of a National Council.

UNITED NATIONS

General Assembly

Allied Troops and Disarmament

Soviet resolutions seem to enjoy an after-life which dialectical materialism denies to men. M. Molotov's resolution on Allied forces stationed in the territory of members of the United Nations was killed by neglect in the Security Council. It revived as a demand for information about such forces, in the present Assembly. It was swallowed up by a U.K. resolution on the 28th November, after a vain attempt to find salvation in an Egyptian resolution; and now lives again as part of M. Molotov's resolution on disarmament; for the attempt to secure the withdrawal of Allied forces from Greece and China has been followed by an attempt to eliminate the atom bomb and at the same time uncover its secrets in the process of control.

Apart from its provision for "verification," which U.S. opposition defeated, the U.K. resolution on forces in foreign countries (see last week's Summary) was carried paragraph by paragraph on the 27th, when the Committee debated for seven hours without respite. M. Molotov wished members to disclose the armaments as well as the man-power of their Home Forces. All agreed with him that man without a weapon was of little warlike value; but M. Molotov had not originally asked about the armaments of forces stationed abroad, and a majority were not convinced of his sincerity in asking for the armaments of Home Forces. The U.K. resolution was passed, as amended, on Thursday, by 34 votes to 7 (the Slavs and Indians). Afghanistan, France, Sweden and Turkey abstained. Russia opposed this version of her own resolution on the grounds that it confused the issue with disarmament problems, and did not include an enquiry into armaments. The Egyptian resolution was a surprise to the U.K.

delegation. It contained a statement that no country had the right to keep troops on the territory of another, and a demand that such unchartered troops should be withdrawn "without delay." M. Manuilsky tried hard to take a vote on the resolution before the U.K. resolution came up; but he was circumvented, and finally U.K. intervention led to the withdrawal of the Egyptian resolution.

Having disposed of the question of Allied forces, the Committee began a discussion on disarmament. Four resolutions came before the Committee, Russian, Australian, Canadian and American. As Sir Hartley Shawcross said more than once, all had the same purpose, i.e., disarmament; but they differed sharply over the means. The Soviet proposal puts in the forefront the banning of the manufacture and use of atomic energy for warlike purposes. It places the control of disarmament under the Security Council: "there shall be established within the framework of the Security Council . . . . special organs . . . ." (a) "a Commission for the control of the execution of the decision regarding the reduction of armaments, (b) a Commission for the control of the execution of the decision regarding the prohibition of the use of atomic energy for military purposes." Control thus comes within the veto area, and as the U.K. and other delegates pointed out, offered no security. The Canadian resolution, on the other hand, as well as the slightly less comprehensive Australian draft, seeks to overcome the difficulty by setting up, by international treaty, a control Commission not subject to the veto. Its other points of difference are, (1) it urges, as a first step, that the Security Council conclude agreements with members under Article 43 of the Charter (forces at disposal of Security Council), (2) it seeks to eliminate "all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction," as well as atomic weapons, (3) it urges the Atomic Energy Commission to finish quickly the task set it by the Assembly on the 24th January, 1946, a task which includes a plan of international control. The Soviet resolution, on the other hand, as M. Parodi made clear, endangers the free action of the Atomic Energy Commission. Finally in the Canadian resolution (paragraph 5) the General Assembly recommends the Security Council, with the help of the Military Staff Committee, to submit plans to members for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments as is provided under Article 26 of the Charter—"to the end that an International Treaty or Convention on disarmament may be concluded as soon as possible."

A series of questions which Sir Hartley Shawcross put to the Russian delegate brought out the differences of principle between the two points of view. Russia at present sees security in the veto. The U.K. and those who think along similar lines, see no security with the veto in charge of a security system. The position is roughly as follows. Any disarmament scheme must be approved by the Security Council. Here the veto operates. Any treaty or agreement to put "control" etc. outside the scope of the veto, must be approved by the Security Council, in which the veto operates. If it is approved by the Security Council, well and good. If it is rejected, the conclusion may well be that the Charter does not provide the members of the United Nations with security, and that security must be sought elsewhere.

The Veto

The Five Permanent members met again on the 23rd November (see last week's Summary) when M. Molotov put forward a draft resolution rejecting attempts either to alter the Charter or to "adopt further rules regarding the application of the unanimity rule laid down in Article 27 of the Charter." He entirely ignored the almost unanimous criticism of his country's use of the veto, and argued that the Security Council should never vote when Russia's interests were at stake, lest it fail to give due consideration to those interests, and he cited the Persian dispute as an example of how the Council should not act. This line of argument leads, of course, to the conclusion that each great Power has the right to pursue its own interests, and count all the time on the other Powers observing, or being "vetoed" into observing, a strict doctrine of non-intervention.

M. Molotov's draft had a bad reception. Mr. Byrnes said that Russia had used the veto in a manner never contemplated at San Francisco, and that the Five Powers should now agree to restrict its use to "enforcement measures." Mr. Bevin said that he had suggested the meeting of the Five in order that Governments might be enabled to tell their peoples to have faith in the Security Council. M. Molotov's draft gave no grounds for that faith. M. Parodi even dared to say that the draft "only poisoned the atmosphere." The problem now reverts to the Committee of the Assembly.

The debate on the Australian and Cuban resolutions was resumed on Sunday the 1st December in the Political Committee. It was a session of hard words and soft. Sir Hartley Shawcross praised Mr. Bevin's "code of conduct" for users of the veto, and declared that his Government would observe it. M. Vyshinsky called one point "platitudinous," another "question-begging" and ignored the rest. He made his usual assault upon Australia; but something, perhaps the U.K. and U.S. pious resolve not to criticise past uses of the veto, softened him, and eventually he saw points of agreement between the Australian and Russian resolutions. Finally, he agreed to a Danish motion to set up a sub-Committee whose task should be to reconcile the various resolutions under discussion. Few could disagree with the Russian resolution . . . all States must seek to strengthen the United Nations and "improve the work of its bodies." Nations, large and small, must work together for peace. They must "avoid excessive regimentation and formalism," and follow the "lofty principles of the Charter." Finally "The General Assembly expresses its confidence that in the future the Security Council will duly take into account the experience of its work during the preceding period with a view to the adoption of agreed decisions."

On the 2nd December, Senator Connally spoke strongly in favour of the freedom of the Atomic Energy Commission, which the Russian resolution seemed to restrict. Its report must form the basis of the Security Council's plans for control. The U.S. Government, he continued, wanted a control authority untrammelled by the veto, free to go where it liked. Unfortunately the wording of the U.S. resolution is too vague to be helpful.

South-West Africa

South Africa's proposal to incorporate what was once German South-West Africa in the Union was turned down by a sub-Committee of the Trusteeship Committee. The manner of so doing was so gentle that Field Marshal Smuts himself accepted the joint U.S.-Danish resolution in which it was conveyed, remarking only that, despite the principles of self-determination, he must now tell the inhabitants that the United Nations would not respect their wishes. The grounds of the rejection were "insufficient data"; but South Africa was praised for bringing the matter to the United Nations, and for its promise, if its request were rejected, "to administer the territory as heretofore in the spirit of the principles laid down in the mandate." A Russian motion cast doubts on the referendum conducted in South-West Africa and told the South African Government to submit a Trusteeship Agreement. A joint Cuban-Indian motion demanded Trusteeship. Both were defeated, the Russian securing only Polish support.

Indians in South Africa

The joint Political and Legal Committees ended their consideration of the problem with a political decision. On the 30th November the chairman, M. Manuilsky, with great skill and lack of scruple, steered the Committees into voting first for the Mexican-French resolution. When this was adopted by 24 votes to 19, with 6 abstainers and 5 absentees (it was Saturday afternoon), he ruled all further voting unnecessary. Thus, the question on which the debate was turning, the relevance of Article 27 (limits of domestic jurisdiction) to the Indian complaint, was shelved, and a matter of vital concern to all member States is withheld from the International Court of Justice. Instead, the Committees have given the Assembly a resolution which condemns by implication, postulates without proof and invites a prolongation of dispute. According to the Resolution, "the treatment of Indians in the Union should conform with the international obligations under the agreements concluded between the two Governments and the relevant provisions of the Charter." At the next Assembly the two Governments are to report progress. No authority has decided whether the Cape Town Agreement is an "international obligation." There is to be no investigation on the spot. Truly did the Belgian representative exclaim on Wednesday the 27th, "I am frightened at the way in which certain delegates made up their minds before hearing either Indian or South African statements." Such an attitude brings United Nations' "justice" into contempt. Norway's representative raised a matter of principle when he said that the Assembly ought to refer a question to the International Court whenever a member involved so wished, and, above all, when the Assembly itself was, as it were, a party. In the course of the discussions, an increasing number of representatives came, helped perhaps by the immoderate speech of the Indians, to realise that the Union had a case, and to plead for an agreement between the two members. Had the chairman been impartial, it is likely that the joint U.K.-U.S.-Swedish resolution to refer the legal question to the International Court would have been carried. The matter now goes to the Assembly.

International Trade Organisation

The final plenary session of the Preparatory Committee was held in London on the 26th November, when the reports of the Committees were approved. While it should be emphasized that these discussions were on an expert level, and the resulting recommendations are not binding on Governments—the Soviet Government incidently being unrepresented—the fact remains that a substantial advance towards the main objectives of the I.T.O. conception can be recorded: the area of agreement proved to be more extensive than had been anticipated. The conclusions of the Conference are being set forth in a separate F.O. print and will not therefore be summarized here: it should perhaps be noted that the maintenance of full employment was recognised as an international and not merely a national interest and it was suggested that the Economic and Social Council should sponsor discussion and, if necessary, action by Governments to achieve this.

The Preparatory Committee is to meet again at Geneva next April. In the meantime, its findings, and also those on cognate subjects reached by the Food and Agriculture Organisation, will be the subject of close study and their value assessed in relation to economic developments.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

Some progress was made over the Italian Treaty up to Saturday the 30th November. It was agreed that, on entry into force of the Treaty, the troops stationed in the Free Territory should be 5,000 each from U.K., U.S., and Yugoslavia. This would mean a reduction of some 3,000 in Yugoslav troops. These troops shall remain at the disposal of the Governor for 90 days after he assumes office. They then cease to be at his disposal and will be withdrawn in 45 days, unless the Governor tells the Security Council that he needs them. In that case they leave 45 days after he reports to the Security Council that he can maintain order without them. Agreement was also reached on texts covering the appointment of the Governor and elections to the Constituent Assembly. The question of the powers of the Governor during the provisional régime was not settled. M. Molotov wished the principal executive authority to reside in the provisional council. Mr. Byrnes wobbled, M. Couve de Murville suggested various compromises and Mr. Bevin stuck to the U.K. view that the only practical course was to give responsibility to the Governor. He protested against the way in which the U.K. proposals were continually being put aside. On Friday Mr. Bevin fought what was long a lone battle in defence of the Paris recommendations on Reparations for Greece and Yugoslavia. At the end Mr. Byrnes rejoined him; but the matter was not settled. He stood out, with French support for another Paris recommendation on compensation, i.e., 75 per cent., while M. Molotov was back at 25 per cent. and Mr. Byrnes coming up from 25 per cent. to 50 per cent. On Saturday agreement was reached over the method of settling economic disputes arising out of the treaties, and M. Molotov ceased to object to clauses binding Bulgarians and Hungarians to give reasonable rates to railway traffic passing through their lands. A French proposal to safeguard the bondholders of the Danube–Sava–Adriatic Railway was adopted.

Agreement on Danube problems was brought much nearer by two Russian proposals or declarations, the wording of which will in each case need careful scrutiny. One lays down conditions for calling a "conference for the preparation of a convention regarding the Régime of navigation on the Danube." The other seeks to define "freedom of Navigation."

ACTING swiftly on the warning given to the Council of Foreign Ministers (see Summary, 18th December) but not made public, the French Government announced on the 19th December that they had taken steps to impose control over the Northern and Eastern borders of the Saar and to institute strict limitations on the passage of persons and goods. M. Couve de Murville later informed the British Embassy in Paris that cordons of officials were being posted along the border between the Saar and the rest of Germany in order to ensure that increased supplies of food destined for the Saar miners should not find their way into other parts of the zone. He gave an assurance that the cordon had no other purpose and was in no sense a customs barrier. M. Couve de Murville fully recognised that measures destined to cut off the Saar from the rest of Germany must await the decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers. To the German public, however, the new ordinance—and the sight of the signboards "Douanes Françaises" along the border—immediately conveys the idea of a customs barrier. The measure is generally interpreted as a first and permanent step towards economic union with France designed to forestall Allied objections by a fait accompli. Whatever French intentions it seemed to the public as if the method of introducing these measures had not accorded with four-Power procedure, and the affair has created a most unfortunate impression in the rest of Germany—although not, be it noted, among the inhabitants of the Saar. All German political parties, with the exception of the Liberal Democrats, who believe the measure to be a temporary one, have already recorded their protests. The Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom had previously announced their support to French claims on the Saar, but they have not yet approved the French extension of the area, which took place last July. Presumably this additional area is included in the new customs region. When

M. Couve de Murville made his statement in the Council on the 9th December the Ministers present neither approved nor objected to French schemes, although Mr. Bevin intimated that he would seek further information from the French Government. Pravda of the 29th December in condemning the action as unilateral, is therefore technically correct in affirming that no " discussion " of the matter took place. General Clay has also made a vigorous protest which has apparently surprised the French in its complaint that the American authorities were given no official warning. General Clay's dressing-down for the French was no doubt seasoned by a dispute which took place in the Co-ordinating Committee on the 19th December. On that occasion, General Noiret admitted in reply to General Clay's queries that part of the Robert Bosch rubber plant had been transferred from South Wuerttemberg to the Saar. The French representative protested that a Zone Commander might move plants within his own Zone. General Clay retorted that a French official had recently stated that the Saar was a separate administrative unit and could not be considered part of the French zone. The French member could only offer to " investigate."

The rest of the meeting on the 19th December secured agreement on several points, including the introduction of a gift parcel service and approval of the general plan for the report to the Council of Foreign Ministers. Discussions on reciprocal deliveries of reparations and on the navigation of German ships to foreign ports had to be postponed, but the only real Soviet objections were in their refusal to penalise the use by Germans of British and American canteen vouchers, which they consider should not have been issued without four-Power agreement. The subsequent meeting of the Committee on the 21st December was hampered by the patent irritability of the Chairman, General Clay. By contrast the Russians, although they raised every kind of tiresome point in discussing preparations for the Control Council report, climbed down twice in the face of United States and United Kingdom willingness to jettison the whole report if necessary. The Russians have evidently been instructed to avoid a break down, particularly over the report, out of which they clearly intend to erect a monument to their own achievements. A hint of a possible further change in Russian tactics was given in a broadcast from Leipzig Radio which complained of the delay in the arrival in the East of newspapers from the Western zones and Western sectors of Berlin and remarked that " Although they did not excel in truthful reporting, it was desirable to read as many papers as possible." Hitherto Russian efforts to keep information from the Eastern zones has prevented any four-Power agreement for the exchange of newspapers. The transfer from pre-censorship to post-censorship in the Soviet zone has not, however, made much change in the " middle-class " papers; editors are afraid to write anything which might meet with disapproval and are forbidden to use freely the Western press agencies.

The dispute over control of Berlin Government has been reopened in an acute form. The principles at stake were brought into the open when the Americans asserted, in opposition to the Russians, that Delius (LDP)—whose position was discussed in Summary No. 373—should hold office unless or until removed by the Kommandatura. Five hours of discusion failed to produce agreement. The Russian view is felt to be reasonable, but they also maintained that all decisions of the assembly and council would require Allied approval before they took effect. The Local Government Committee has now agreed that day-by-day decisions should not be hopelessly hampered in this way and that only laws and ordinances should be subject to prior approval. The Russian Commander may well repudiate the agreement. Further argument is anticipated too, over the appointment and dismissal of " senior civil servants."

Tortuous negotiations in Bavarian political circles have at length produced a successor to Josef Mueller (now facing a purge court) as Christian Socialist premier. After both Dr. Pfeiffer and Dr. Hundhammer had been tipped for the post, the party found as the new minister a dark horse, Dr. Hans Ehard, formerly States Councillor in the Ministry of Justice. Dr. Hoegner (SPD) has kept to his decision to bring his party into a coalition, although refusing to do so under Pfeiffer, and has even secured for his party the portfolios of Interior, Economics and Justice. Most startling is the elevation of the notorious Dr. Loritz of the Economic Reconstruction party to be Minister for Special Tasks in charge of denazification. He has already promised a lively campaign against the " big Nazis." The U.S. zone has not a monopoly of surprising appointments. Strong Communist disapproval has been voiced at the latest appointment in the British Zone where Dr. Gereke (CDU), Minister of the Interior in Lower Saxony is well known to the German public as a former German Nationalist member who held a post in Schleicher's Cabinet.

A remarkably frank criticism of British policy was given by Premier Steltzer (CDU) of Schleswig-Holstein in a full page interview to Die Zeit on the 5th December. Coming from a leader hitherto regarded as among the more moderate German speakers and having an active anti-Nazi record, his accusations are likely to carry all the more weight with a population only too ready to exploit Allied ineptitude and to suggest to the British that the Germans might be forced to look Eastwards. Steltzer recorded the disillusionment of the Germans because they had not benefited from the renowned " common sense " of British Colonial Policy. Two grave mistakes, he alleged, had been to expect a German " Werewolf " movement and to believe that German officials were totally incapable of carrying out their own administration. Even individually capable British officers were unable to take decisions on the spot. He specified a series of examples of British inefficiency in dealing with the food situation and rejecting German advice. He eliminated the last shreds of German gratitude by claiming, wrongfully, that the £80,000,000 contributed annually by the British taxpayer did not take into account the proceeds of German exports. And he also accused the Allies of placing German foreign assets to reparation accounts which he claimed was in contravention of international law as long as German needs had not been fulfilled. Steltzer made an interesting statement on the Eastern Frontier which he later, to Polish indignation, repeated in Hamburg—namely, that if the Eastern Provinces were not returned, a peace treaty with Germany would not be possible for no German statesman would agree to sign away his country's land. Finally, dispelling claims by French witnesses that the Christian Democrats admit German guilt, Steltzer denied that the guilt of the leaders was shared by the German people and used the familiar but none the less dangerous argument that National Socialism had been encouraged by the rest of the world, particularly through Chamberlain and the Anglo-German Naval Agreement of 1935.

A considerable concession is to be made to meet the claims of the South Schleswig Association that it should enjoy the rights of a political party. In the Landtag elections next March, which are to be conducted by the Germans, it has been arranged that a special clause shall be inserted in the Schleswig-Holstein electoral law. This provides that for these elections (and by implication for no other purpose) the Association may share the privileges of political parties —for example may not only sponsor candidates for individual seats, but also may back them as a group for the reserve list used in this modified system of proportional representation.

AUSTRIA

Austria celebrated the first anniversary of the constitution of the Second Austrian Republic on the 20th December, when the President, Dr. Renner, the Chancellor, and leading members of the Government spoke hopefully of a " truly free Austria " after the conclusion of a treaty in the New Year. The State Department announcement on the 21st December that General Mark Clark had been appointed the United States Deputy in the discussions on the Austrian Treaty in London has been warmly welcomed by the Austrians, who regard General Clark as a good friend.

The economic situation remains grave. On the 18th December a Vienna Councillor said that the city would be faced with famine in a few weeks if home and imported supplies were not improved. The closing down of industries to save electricity, which was to have been from the 22nd December to the 2nd January, had to be advanced to the 19th December, with a correspondingly greater loss in output for the home and export markets. It was announced in the House of Commons on the 18th December that the British Government are to make an immediate and substantial contribution to the economic recovery of Austria in the form of grants and credit up to £10,000,000. This assistance is to be used only for the purchase of supplies essential to recovery. The Minister of State said in his announcement that the decision was in conformity with the resolution adopted on the 11th December by the General Assembly of the United Nations on relief needs in the post-UNRRA period, and His Majesty's Government were confident that the other occupying Powers would make contributions proportionate to their resources, and that further help would be given in cash or kind by other countries in a position to asist. If these expectations were fulfilled, it should be possible for Austria both to acquire the necessities of life throughout 1947 and to set her feet on the road to economic recovery, thus limiting the need for further emergency assistance thereafter. A condition of the British aid is that the principle of economic unity is maintained by all the other occupying Powers, so that the Austrian Government can dispose freely of its resources and imports for the benefit of the Austrian population as a whole.

The quadripartite councils continue to be satisfactory, and the improved spirit of co-operation appeared again at the Allied Council meeting on the 23rd December, presided over by General Kourasov. This was General Kourasov's first appearance for several weeks, and his prolonged absence from Vienna had given rise to rumours that he would not return. Agreement was reached on several minor questions. The Soviet member asked that the Allied Council should demand the minutes of the secret session of the Austrian Parliament held on the 30th October at which questions concerning the occupation Powers were debated, but discussion on this matter was inconclusive.

Rumours that almost all French and Soviet troops in Austria were to be withdrawn soon are almost certainly wishful thinking on the part of the Austrians, but their persistence and the circumstantial nature of the reports indicate the keen desire of the Austrians for this withdrawal.

Reports that the Yugoslav Government are to put forward their claims to Carinthian territory during the Treaty discussions have caused widespread concern, and Herr Piesch, the Provincial Governor of Carinthia, defended his Government's policy towards the Slovene population on the 20th December. The Yugoslavs are maintaining a propaganda offensive against Austria, attacking the alleged activities of Nazis and reactionaries.

The Austrian Chancellor, accompanied by the Vice-Chancellor, the Foreign Minister, and the Minister for the Protection of Property and Economic Planning, presented modified Austrian proposals for the bilateral settlement of the German assets question to the Soviet authorities on the 19th December (see Summary No. 373). The American and French authorities have favoured this step, which had been precipitated by the insistence of Parliament and the Russians for a settlement, but which appears unwise in view of the forthcoming Treaty discussions at which a quadripartite decision on this vexed question might be possible. The Austrians have modified their original proposals, and have informed the Russians that they have until the 1st February to accept or refuse them. If no agreement is reached by that date the Austrian Government will recover their freedom of action and refer the question to the Allied Council or to the Deputies in London. The Austrians now offer to buy back all properties, including Zisterdorf, within a period of weeks, for Austrian schillings. An express reservation is made exempting United Nations property from transfer to the Soviet Union.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The main characteristic of the Christmas Eve message to the country by President Beneš was its admonitory tone. In striking a high moral note, he was following the tradition of his great predecessor, T. G. Masaryk, who always sought to employ his prestige in the service of infusing worthy principles into public life. Dr. Beneš pointed to three specific evils which at the moment beset Czechoslovakia—and, it may be added, other countries in Europe. First, he deplored the appearance in the ranks of all political parties of numbers of opportunists singularly lacking in public spirit, a phenomenon that may be partly attributed to the doubtful recruits gathered from other discredited affiliations. Secondly, he expressed concern at the demoralisation of youth—its indolence, moral laxity and irresponsibility. While this may sound a rash generalization, it is probably true to say of Czechoslovak youth that it is now more than normally out of phase with the seriousness and purposefulness of its elders. The contrast has been greatly increased by the different war experience of the two age-groups, the one cut off from the outside world and carrying on an individual revolt against an inimical authority, the other—notably the exiled Ministers—submerging self in a vast international effort at co-operation.

The Czechoslovak educational authorities themselves appear to be alive to the implications of the President's words. Within the limits of currency and other shortages, and Communist suspicion, the authorities have encouraged student visits abroad and received foreign guests in return—as for example the December visit of the Headmaster of Charterhouse. Another interesting experiment is the Czech school set up, with the help of the British Council, at Bishop's Stortford by the Social Democrat Workers' Academy of Prague. The Sokol movement—particularly valuable at the moment as a vehicle for whole family, not merely youth, training—still flourishes, and preparations are on foot for a big Slet in 1948. This physical culture organisation has resisted the Communist attempts to engulf it, and will, it is hoped, withstand attempts at infiltration.

President Beneš touched on a more difficult matter in referring to the poor showing which Czechoslovak youngsters had made in response to the labour conscription regulations imposing part-time work in the fields, mines and factories. Not schooled in compliance to public necessity—for labour shortage is one of Czechoslovakia's overriding difficulties—youth, particularly the students, apparently feels this a heavy burden in addition to the rather exacting and somewhat academic requirements of the educational system.

The third fault, increase in alcoholism, may right itself more easily. It is attributable as in other European lands to the same complex causes, and to the fact that Czechoslovakia possesses an abundance of the raw materials of alcohol, sugar, potatoes, barley, hops and fruits and a shortage of other consumers' goods.

In the matter of labour conscription, the action of the Government in transferring Magyars from southern Slovakia to the depopulated industries of Bohemia, raises a number of issues. The Government can argue that they cannot afford—while still unable to reach agreement with Hungary on the transfer problem—to waste their badly needed reserves of labour, and that all citizens of the state are liable for such labour service. Hungarian criticism is thus being described as an unwarrantable intrusion in internal affairs, and Cardinal Mindszenthy has, on these grounds, been refused a visa to discuss the subject in Prague. On the Hungarian side, at least among the Social Democrats, there has been an attempt to tone down the wildness of accusations against Czechoslovak "brutality," and the contacts now established between Dr. Beneš and Count Karolyi are a hopeful augury of some working arrangement.

The labour force, already receiving Bulgarian recruits, may soon be further augmented by Roumanian and Italian workers, as a result of present negotiations.

POLAND

His Majesty's Government's Note of the 22nd November concerning the forthcoming elections in Poland (see Summary No. 370) was recently answered by a sharply phrased Note from the Polish Government. The British Note was based on the complaint that the Polish Government was not fulfilling the obligations which it accepted under the Yalta and Potsdam agreements. The Polish Note is a "tu quoque" accusation that these agreements are also being violated by H.M. Government. The tenor of its seven-point indictment is that H.M. Government, in pursuance of a policy of favouring the former Polish Government in London and conniving at its alleged attempts to foment a third world war, are indulging in a whole series of actions prejudicial to the interests of the re-born Polish state. Such actions include delaying the repatriation of Poles who choose to return to Poland, retention of Polish gold and of Polish ships allotted to the Royal Navy during the war, and the unilateral concellation of the agreement whereby fixed quotas of Germans expelled from Poland were to be admitted into the British zone of Germany.

On the question of the actual elections, the contention of the Polish Government is that, although the Yalta and Potsdam agreements contained the obligation to hold free and unfettered elections, they did not prescribe any particular method of fulfilling it. The British Note stated that the manner in which the elections were held would necessarily affect the views of His Majesty's Government formed as a result of them. To this the Polish Note took particular exception, on the ground that it was a reflection on their sovereignty.

Inside Poland, the population is showing a marked apathy concerning the elections, the general opinion being that the way in which a vote is cast will have no influence on the final outcome. Considerable unrest is reported from certain country districts, especially south-east of Warsaw. The activities of the forest bands have increased, particularly since the moment when the Government decided to send special groups of the Polish Army throughout the land to carry out the task of election propaganda. These groups attempt to incite the people against M. Mikolajczyk's P.S.L., in the hope that the latter will be provoked to actions justifying reprisals. The Polish press admits the seriousness of the terrorists' campaign, and calls for vigorous action against it.

That the recent mission to Washington of the Polish Minister of Industry, Hilary Minc, achieved a certain success is shown by the lengthy text of a State Department press release. Agreement was said to have been reached on the procedure of the payment of compensation to United States owners of enterprises taken over under the Polish Industries' Nationalization Act of the 3rd January, 1946. Payment is generally to be made in dollars, and facilities are to be granted to the American Embassy in Warsaw to lodge protests on behalf of the owners. The agreement covers property situated in former German territory both inside and outside the area allotted to Polish administration by the Potsdam Declaration of August 1945. Any differences are to be decided either by the two Governments in a spirit of mutual understanding, or by an umpire designated by them, or, in the last resort, by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Simultaneously with the agreement, the Secretary of the Treasury informed the Polish Minister of Finance that Polish assets in the United States would be released from the 7th January, 1947, as well as the gold and the accounts of the Bank of Poland at present in the United States.

SOVIET UNION

The general tone of Soviet comment on the international situation at the turn of the year has been one of sober satisfaction, though no attempt has been made to gloss over the profound divergences of view still remaining between the U.S.S.R. and the so-called Anglo-American bloc. The results achieved by the United Nations Assembly were held to have proved the possibility of international co-operation and to have justified the existence of the organisation. "The year now ending has shown how necessary, how vitally necessary, is an international organisation such as the United Nations." All credit for the positive results achieved was, of course, attributed to the Soviet delegation, while the blame was laid chiefly on Great Britain for what was said to be the main disappointment—namely the failure to reach agreement over the issue of troops in foreign territories.

Although there do seem to be some signs of improved feelings in the general Moscow atmosphere, anti-British and anti-American propaganda has not been allowed to die down. Pravda indeed displayed goodwill by hastening to make handsome amends for the offensive article on British convoys by Captain Andreev in Krasny Flot (see Summary No. 373). Pravda paid full tribute to the gallant work done by the convoys, which was "universally known" and trounced Captain Andreev roundly for his ill-conceived article which had drawn misleading inferences from the record of one operation. Regret was expressed at the capital which had been made out of the article by the London press two months after its publication; the hue and cry, it was argued, was quite out of proportion to the importance of the episode.

Mr. Bevin's broadcast declaration on Sunday, the 22nd December, was summed up very fairly without comment by Tass in two-thirds of a column. Much publicity was given to the revolt of a section of the Labour Party on the question of foreign policy, with special reference to the second of Mr. A. J. P. Taylor's series of broadcast talks in the Third Programme opposing too close an association with the United States. The most uncharitable of the remarks on Great Britain during recent weeks were put out by Krasnaya Zvezda in an article on the colonies which claimed that the British concern for the welfare of colonial peoples was due mainly to the desire to mobilise the natives in a possible future war.

The impending visit of Field Marshal Montgomery has been announced by Tass; no comment was made from Moscow, but the Roumanian radio welcomed it as an indication of the "continued consolidation of Anglo-Soviet relations."

The Anglo-Egyptian negotiations have come under fire; it was alleged that the British had consistently broken their promises to evacuate the country, and the Egyptian delegate to U.N.O. was criticised for having withdrawn his recent motion under British pressure. The Egyptian Minister in Moscow has apparently been behaving in a curious fashion, setting himself up against his own Government and telling his Soviet guest at a large party that the U.S.S.R. had much to learn from Egypt; this has not endeared him to the Soviet authorities who, while ready to use him for propaganda purposes, regard him with anything but respect.

French affairs have again come into the foreground; after some delay the Viet Nam situation has been discussed by Izvestiya, which blamed "certain French circles which were not interested in a peaceful solution of the Indo-Chinese problem," of attempting to wreck the work of the Fontainebleau Conference. However, M. Blum's speech was treated as evidence of the Government's good intentions. The French action in the Saar was condemned by Pravda as an unilateral act, in a sharp and critical tone in striking contrast to the friendly treatment of France in recent months. It seems that the Soviet Government do not trouble to conciliate French public opinion where their major interests in Germany are concerned, or where they discern a threat to the fulfilment of the Potsdam Agreement.

The activities of the Russian Orthodox Church in the Middle East are continuing and will be intensified in the New Year, when Pariarch Alexei is expected to visit various countries in the area. In the meantime the aged but still active Metropolitan Grigorii of Leningrad has been on a tour of Palestine and Egypt. In Jerusalem he stated that his visit had no political object and that he was not going to deal with the vexed question of Russian Church property. He made the interesting promise that Russian pilgrims would again be visiting the Holy Land in the spring. Archimandrite Anthony, head of the local opposition faction of the Russian Church in exile, owing allegiance to the Synod of Metropolitan Anastasy, took measures against the Metropolitan, which included stationing Roumanian nuns armed with staves round the Aim Karim convent to prevent his entry. Metropolitan Grigorii had some contact with the Orthodox in Beirut, but apparently took little interest in the question of the Arabophone Orthodox of Palestine which constantly agitates the Jerusalem Patriarchate. Towards the Greeks his attitude was perfectly correct. In Egypt Metropolitan Gregorii paid a visit to the Coptic Patriarch, whom he is said to have invited to Moscow to discuss the question of the Coptic Churches joining in a union of Orthodox Churches under the auspices of the Russian Church. This curious statement seems somewhat doubtful as the Copts are technically heretics, and the Russian Church has hitherto been ecclesiastically most correct.

The Moscow Patriarchate has won a great and presumably unexpected success in the U.S.A. At the 7th general Sobor of the Russian Orthodox Church of America a resolution was adopted acknowledging the spiritual authority of Patriarch Alexei of Moscow and breaking with the Karlovtsy Synod. The only proviso made was that the American diocese should retain its autonomy, including the right of appointing its own bishops, and that Metropolitan Theophilus, the present head, should retain his position. The resolution was adopted by 187 votes to 61, a majority that is surprising in view of the vigorous opposition of many of the Bishops and clergy to Moscow. The minority could apparently hardly contain themselves when they heard the result, and forgot their episcopal dignity. The Exarch of the Moscow Patriarch, Metropolitan Benjamin, cordially welcomed the decision and anticipated that Moscow would confirm Metropolitan Theophilus in his post, in spite of his past anti-Soviet record.

M. Gromyko, permanent Soviet delegate to the Security Council and former Ambassador in the U.S.A., has been appointed one of the five deputy Foreign Ministers of the U.S.S.R., presumably filling the vacancy left by the appointment of M. Lozovsky last July as head of the Soviet Information Bureau. The Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Georgian S.S.R., M. Bakradze, has resigned on the ground of ill-health. His place has been given to M. Shkubianishvili. Several awards of the Order of Lenin have been made recently; Marshal Rokossovsky received the order on his fiftieth birthday and Shostakovich and Tikhonov have also been given the decoration. The awards to the two last-named are of interest seeing that the recipients had both been severely criticised in the recent ideological campaign. Pudovkin's film on Admiral Nakhimov, which was condemned last autumn by the Party authorities, is now, in a slightly revised form, being given an enthusiastic reception.

New Times is in future to appear weekly instead of fortnightly.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

The authorities of all four Zones in Germany have now agreed to receive those refugees at present in Denmark who were formerly resident in each of the Zones (also see Summary No. 367 under "Germany"). This will mean about 12,000 for the British, 1,500 for the American, 500 for the French and about 15,000 for the Russian Zone. In addition the French and American authorities have undertaken to bring their total up to 12,000 each. In view of M. Stalin's original offer to receive into the Russian Zone half of these refugees, provided the remainder were taken over by the other three Zones (see Summary No. 349), the Danish Minister in Moscow, M. Doessing, has, on instructions from Copenhagen, approached the Soviet authorities and asked them to receive a number equivalent to the total to be taken into the three other Zones, namely 36,000. His Majesty's Minister in Moscow is taking a similar step and is at the same time expressing the hope that appropriate instructions can be sent to Berlin so that this essentially quadripartite problem may be discussed between the authorities responsible for the four Zones. According to M. Doessing, M. Dekanozov, with whom he discussed the matter, while obviously aware of M. Stalin's offer, stressed the practical difficulties arising out of the fact that the Soviets have meanwhile accepted into their Zone a large number of Germans from Poland and Czechoslovakia.

The presence of these German refugees in Denmark has been a long-standing Danish grievance, born, it must be admitted, with commendable patience, although they have made their presence an excuse for delaying the sending of a Danish military contingent to Germany. Allied occupation forces in Germany were, of course, well aware of this state of affairs and only too anxious to relieve the Danes of their burden, but the practical difficulties in the way were very substantial; one of the most serious being the fact that the majority of the refugees hailed from the Russian Zone, and the Russian offer mentioned above was never officially confirmed, nor steps taken to put it into practice. It was, therefore, hardly necessary for Mr. Fiorello H. La Guardia to address a somewhat officious message on the subject to the Allied Control Commission "for their thoughtful consideration," as it may only strengthen any sense of grievance the Danes may have without giving any constructive help. Moreover, it seems a little absurd to single out Hitler's "model protectorate" for a eulogy of its "heroic effort at recovery and rehabilitation." Denmark suffered less destruction than any other country, and the Danes have had little chance of proving their heroism.

The majority of the Danish press are still in a very belligerent mood when the subject of Anglo/Danish trade negotiations is discussed, and British demands are described as entirely unreasonable. A discussion which took place at the annual meeting of the "Twelve Men Association," the union of larger agriculturists, sheds some light on this aspect of the situation. The Chairman of the Association, M. R. Fabricius, said that it had been proved time and again that Great Britain agreed to Danish demands if she became aware that she could not press down the prices of the goods in question, and that, therefore, the Danes "should pull themselves together and state that unless the British agreed to their terms they would obtain nothing but that part of the production which could be disposed nowhere else." Another speaker, M. Flemming Juncker, was slightly more conciliatory. The two countries were really too poor to trade with one another. This was regrettable, but it would be still more so if they fell out about it. The British could easily pay higher prices for the small quantity of Danish goods which meant little compared with their total imports, but they feared the consequences with the Dominions. Great Britain had more "currency humps" than Denmark, and she had economic obligations which far exceeded anything the Danes could imagine.

In view of the unyielding public attitude in Denmark towards the Anglo/Danish trade question, an article in Information, the organ of the Resistance Movement, strikes a refreshing note which, oddly enough, seems to echo M. Christmas Moeller's clarion call for a change of heart (see Summary No. 371). The paper blames the Danish people for still taking as the starting-point for their reactions the comparison with the "normal pre-war standard of living" and regarding restrictions of this standard as an injustice forced upon them by malicious foreign Powers. "The war was also our war and we must pay our share of the cost" . . . . "the Danish people have not been able to realise fully that after six years of war, the world is far far poorer and that the distribution of poverty cannot be avoided."

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

Questions raised by members on the Government statement on the Cheribond Draft Agreement [see Summary No. 373, 18th December] during the debate in the Second Chamber brought forth a lengthy reply from M. Jonkman, Minister of Overseas Territories (19th December). On the one hand, said the Minister, the Government were being urged to "speed up matters," and on the other to "give the replies in writing." The Government, however, had taken a via media—speed without precipitancy. M. Jonkman agreed that the Government had failed to keep the public adequately informed, but that had been "unavoidable." In any case he thought that additional information "would not have prevented the sharp controversies." He wanted to convince his opponents, he went on, that it was "best" to vote for the Agreement. The Government, which called itself progressive, looked to the future, and anyone who did that showed himself to be a supporter of the Agreement. A "big sacrifice" had been made in order to achieve "something worth while." Above all, the Agreement was a "political concord," whose provisions were so few that there was "room for a round-table conference." Turning to the question of the "binding minutes," M. Jonkman said that there had been discussions between the two parties (at which the British representative was not present), when agreement had been reached as to what had to be done in the future. Minutes had been taken of these agreements; but the Minister thought that the Chamber would not press for their publication, because to do so would be harmful. To those who felt uneasy about constitutional issues, M. Jonkman would say that, while the written Constitution was "rightly being upheld" in the debate, circumstances had arisen which could "never have been foreseen." What, he asked, was the Agreement's aim? "Freedom for the N.E.I. in a greater unity with the Netherlands." A quadripartite State would be called upon to implement demands which had yet to be formulated. The Indonesians would be the framers of the Constitution of the United States of Indonesia; but "one task" had been set aside in this connexion for the Netherlands to perform. M. Jonkman ended his speech with criticism of the Anti-Revolutionary member, M. Schouten (a prominent opponent of the Agreement), whom he accused of wanting to return to the "old power under certain new conditions"; adding that the time for M. Schouten's ideas was before the Japanese capitulation—"not now." The Chamber then rose. During the resumption in the evening, Professor Romme, leader of the Catholic People's Party, supported by several prominent members of the Government parties (his own and the Party of Labour), the Right (Anti-Revolutionary, Christian Historical Union and State Reformed Party) and the Freedom Party (a Centre party), tabled a motion urging the safeguarding of "the victims of circumstance in Indonesia and of the internees." A second motion by Professor Romme endorsed the Government's policy. Both were carried—the first by 84 votes to 10, the second by 67 to 30. It was then M. Schouten's turn. Having once again expressed his disapproval of the Government's policy, he proceeded to table a motion inviting the Government to "convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the Realm." In addition to his own party (Anti-Revolutionary), he was supported by the two other Right parties and the Freedom Party. His motion was, however, defeated by 65 votes to 29. There was one (Catholic) abstention.

In a statement to the Curaçao States-General on the 23rd December, Dr. Kasteel, the Governor, said that M. Jonkman was preparing certain constitutional amendments which would enable Curaçao to elect a responsible Government. A Dutch Parliamentary Commission (whose terms of reference are presumably similar to those of the van Poll Parliamentary Commission to the N.E.I.) is shortly to leave for the West Indies. The names of the Commissioners (announced on the 19th) are as follows: Second Chamber—Dr. Bierema (Freedom Party), M. Meijerink (Anti-Revolutionary), Professor Logemann (Party of Labour) and M. Wagenaar (Communist); First Chamber—Mr. Kropman (Catholic People's Party) and Professor de Zwaan (Christian Historical Union).

Belgium

An unofficial strike of 13,000 stevedores at Antwerp, which began on the 16th December, and which—but for emergency measures—at one time bid fair to paralyse the port, shews no sign of ending. The situation has been further aggravated by a strike of tug-boat workers, who ceased work the same day. The two are apparently unconnected, though their objects are similar—namely, wage increases (in the case of the stevedores, a 10 per cent. increase), which in the opinion of M. Troclet, Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, would have "an adverse influence on prices." Broadcasting on the 18th an appeal to the stevedores to return to work, M. Troclet explained that the strike was due to measures that came into force on the 1st October to combat abuses by the dockers of the Minimum Living Allowance Regulations (proposed by the Joint Harbour
