EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE O.K.W. bulletins of the past weeks show a "Fortress Germany" stubbornly defended against a great arc of attack stretching from Kirkenes (evacuated on the 27th) through Memel, East Prussia, Hungary, Slovakia, Yugoslavia and Italy, round to the Vosges, the Moselle valley and Holland. The formulæ of this defence are now quite familiar: concentric attacks in the main frustrated, bitter fighting, enemy penetrations at great cost, &c. The western campaign, according to the Germans, last week took second place to the more intense fighting in Kurland and East Prussia: Goldap was stated to have been evacuated on the 23rd; the Russians penetrated into Ebenrode on the 26th and Schlossberg on the 27th. If there is a new feature in these communiqués it is the daily specification of German towns bombarded from the air; twenty cities have been thus named within one week. Such raids, admitted by Goebbels to be Germany's chief present anxiety, inflict much more than material damage. The Kreisleiter of Duisburg, in a statement recently reported, has revealed the strain now put on civic discipline. He asks the bombed-out to be patient until emergency accommodation can be found for them, he warns those as yet unaffected that they must make more room for the homeless and he warns every worker who fails to report for duty immediately that he will be treated as a Volksschädling. In the much smaller frontier town of Kleve a recent air raid apparently disorganised all official A.R.P. "Improvised" arrangements were excused on the ground that "many political leaders" had been killed and the population was reproved for having disregarded the Party's efforts to evacuate them eastwards. Such is the general impression of Allied air strength in Germany that, according to a Swedish report, a frequent topic of conversation is now the possibility of air-borne landings within the Reich.

The new Volkssturm has lost no time in assuming military importance if that may be judged by a place in the O.K.W. bulletins. It is said to have fought gallantly in East Prussia side by side with regular troops. But the enthusiasms of propaganda have already given way to colder reality. It has been announced this week that there will be no issue of uniforms or boots save to recruits who have been bombed out. Dittmar in his weekly talk was apparently concerned to provide doubters with some assurance of the military value of the new levies. Their creation signified "an unprecedented extension in depth of the battle zone" but he explained that by this he did not mean an increase in fully-armed forces, but "an increased degree of safety for the rear of the actual fighting front." The levies might achieve considerable defensive strength "but their chief value would be moral rather than material."

Mr. Churchill's statement on the Moscow visit has received fairly detailed comment. Apart from abuse, and the capital made out of the picture of the wandering minstrel, between whom "and the kings to whom he sang there was indeed a great gulf fixed in the Middle Ages," some comfort was derived from the cautious phraseology used to describe the military situation and from the lack of details as to what had really transpired in Moscow: "The House knows as little about the actual conversations as it knew before he spoke." German listeners were told not to be alarmed by the references to Allied unity and the destruction of Germany. This was nothing new and people need not hope for startling political developments: "Germany knows that at this stage the war will be and must be fought exclusively by military means."

The only utterance of political importance on the German side has come from Goebbels who, in another of his general reviews of the war, which was given considerable advance publicity, attempted a German balance sheet of happenings in the last three months. He argued that to fight for time, as Germany was now forced to do, was not hopeless resistance, but contained real hope of victory and suggested that the German leaders were not without a policy: "The nation is firmly determined to hold out in this struggle for its existence until its victorious end, and it is the duty of its leaders to show it the ways and means whereby this gallant endeavour may be brought to the speediest and most complete success." Denying that the self-confidence of the nation had been impaired, he praised the fine spirit both of fighting troops and air-raid victims, and assured his hearers that the September crisis was definitely over. He passed on an assurance of belief in victory given personally to him by Hitler and found in it more conviction than boastings in the enemy camp could provide. Hitler has this week given the same assurance in reply to a telegram from the new Hungarian Premier who had addressed him as "the first hero of the present tremendous military, ideological and workers' struggle." (See later under "Hungary.")

An examination of the fighting value of the German Air Force in October brings out the great efforts made by the Germans to develop their fighter force, which, despite all difficulties of training, reorganisation and fuel shortage, has increased in strength since August. The worst difficulties caused by the retreat through France, such as the lack of operational airfields, shelter cover, &c., within the Reich would seem to have been overcome. The supply of pilots is maintained by withdrawal from the now heavily reduced bomber force. Fuel difficulties have caused training in all branches to be cut to a minimum, but the efficiency of the German night-fighter force is stressed and experiments with jet-propelled aircraft are thought to be well advanced. It has long been evident that one task which the German Air Force is unable to perform is the provision of adequate cover for the fighting troops. What this means to the soldier is brought out by German Army Divisional Report on operations in Norway in July stating without qualification that "the enemy have complete mastery of the air. They bomb and strafe every movement, even single vehicles and individuals. They reconnoitre our front the whole time. Against all this the Luftwaffe is conspicuous by its total absence . . . . Our soldiers enter the battle in low spirits at the thought of the enemy's enormous material superiority. They are always asking: 'Where is the Luftwaffe?'"

Recent air attacks on the rail and water arteries of Western Germany have gravely prejudiced communication between the centres of heavy industry in the Ruhr from those in the rest of the Reich. Supply difficulties have reduced crude steel production in the Ruhr, and the bombing of Duisburg in early October has caused the actual destruction of one-third of all crude steel capacity in that district. Meanwhile, the Russian advance in east, south and north, in conjunction with Allied pressure on the neutral States, has deprived Germany of such important steel alloys as manganese, chrome, nickel and wolfram, which are bound to affect adversely German arms production. A shortage of weapons has been observed on both western and eastern fronts; this is, however, partly due to transport difficulties. It is also reported that 50 per cent. of the newly formed infantry units in East Prussia are equipped with weapons confiscated from Czech stores in 1939.

In connexion with the armament plants now being driven underground in Germany, it is announced that underground workers are to be given additional rations, approximating to those received by miners. Suggestions have been made that the number of such plants is now considerable, and that working conditions (involving lack of air and sunlight, damp and discomfort) are not conducive to increased effort.

Now that the Allies stand on German soil, the refusal of Germans to believe in the brutality of their enemies is giving concern to the Nazi authorities. The press frequently rebukes people for saying that the Americans are not to be feared. The arrest was recently reported of a woman who said that British officers billeted in her home during the Rhineland occupation behaved like gentlemen. "Rumours" of the good behaviour of Allied troops are denied, and one paper has actually spoken of them as the cause of widespread refusal to obey the evacuation order. It is now clear that large numbers of people have done this in German towns so far captured. Similar developments are reported from the eastern districts of the Reich. The good behaviour of Russian troops, said DNB on the 23rd October, was a trick to persuade Germans not to resist them. The Nazi answer is a flood of publicity, greatly swollen of late, regarding enemy severity and brutality. Details have been given of the confiscation of food stocks in Aachen, the refusal to import further supplies; courts which pass only death sentences; bad conditions in work camps; and the like. The destruction of Wallendorf, announced in the United States on the 17th September, was kept back for this spate of publicity, and first revealed to Germans on the 12th October. Happenings in the East Prussian village of Nemmersdorf have been similarly written up. The German press has also reported the courageous behaviour of patriots in the conquered districts, notably that Eisenhower has been unable to find Germans to act as heads of communes, that administrative officials have continued to perform their duties only if they could thereby assist their compatriots. A Communist has, for lack of better candidates, had to be installed as Mayor of Eupen. Allied sentries have mysteriously disappeared.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

During the past week the Red Army has cleared practically the whole of Ruthenia of the enemy and has reached the eastern borders of Slovakia. The chief towns and communication centres of Chust, Mukačevo, Užhorod and Čop have all been taken, and on the 27th October, the eve of Czechoslovak Independence Day, M. Nemec, the Czechoslovak Government Delegate for Liberated Territory, was able to send telegrams to President Beneš and Premier Srámek stating that he had entered Ruthenia and taken over the administration of the liberated areas.

By contrast, the German divisions in Slovakia have scored important successes against the resistance forces. The two main bastions of the patriots' defence area, Zvolen and Banská Bystrica, the centre and headquarters of the rising, were captured on the 26th and 27th October respectively, and the remaining troops and partisans can only hope to continue the struggle on a guerrilla basis in the hills. A telegram from the resistance headquarters to the Czechoslovak Government on the 27th October indicated the gravity of the situation: "The Slovak people and army fight enthusiastically for the Czechoslovak Republic despite absolute enemy superiority. They fight for every inch of liberated soil and pay a heavy toll. In the fierce iron encirclement, which becomes more and more gripping, the only encouragement in our physical and moral distress is the knowledge that you fight with us and that we are not alone." Subsequently it was announced that, in view of the nature of the fighting and to avoid giving information to the enemy, regular communiqués would no longer be issued.

Bratislava has naturally waxed jubilant over the capture of Banská Bystrica. President Tiso, his Premier and his Defence Minister sent grateful telegrams to Hitler, Ribbentrop and Himmler; flags were ordered to be flown in all towns and parishes of Slovakia; and the press and radio extracted the maximum of propaganda value from the success. The favourite lines of argument were that Beneš, under Russian orders, had once more brought calamity to Slovakia, and that, as in the case of Warsaw, the failure of the Red Army to bring promised relief to the rebels was merely additional proof of Bolshevik perfidy.

The event was hailed in similar fashion in the Protectorate. There, on the 29th October, Moravec broke an unwontedly long silence with a speech reviewing the achievements of the Krejčí Government during the past three years. It was the familiar story: they had buried the old antagonism between the Czechs and Germans; poverty and hunger were nowhere to be seen; Bohemia and Moravia were enjoying blessed tranquillity in a war-torn Europe; and, finally, the collapse of the Slovak rising meant that for a second time, and now finally, the idea of a Czechoslovak Republic had been buried.

POLAND.

There is as yet no news of any decision having been taken by the Polish Government on the problems raised in the Moscow conversations, which were discussed in Summary No. 264. M. Mikolajczyk has laid them before his Cabinet, the Polish National Council in London, and the official Underground movement in Poland.

On the 26th October he had a talk with Mr. Churchill, who gave the House of Commons an account of the Moscow discussions the same afternoon. In that speech Mr. Churchill said he hoped M. Mikolajczyk would "soon return to Moscow," and that "a good arrangement" would "be made which will enable him to form a Polish Government on Polish soil—a Government recognised by all the great Powers concerned." It was, he said, His Majesty's Government's aim that the Polish people should "find in Europe an abiding home and resting-place, which, though it may not entirely coincide or correspond with the pre-war frontier of Poland, will, nevertheless, be adequate for the needs of the Polish nation and not inferior in character and quality, taking the picture as a whole, to what they had previously possessed." Mr. Churchill hinted at the necessity for wasting no time in "indecision or in protracted negotiation," and observed that "if the Polish Government had taken the advice we tendered them at the beginning of this year, the additional complications produced by the formation of the Polish National Committee of Liberation at Lublin would not have arisen."

In the meantime, there is an absence of comment on these problems from Moscow, and broadcasts by the National Liberation Committee's station, except that the latter continues to abuse the reactionary émigré Polish Government in London (without naming M. Mikolajczyk) and urges the need for a definite and speedy solution. The Liberation Committee is proceeding more rapidly, according to a Moscow broadcast, with the allocation of land in liberated Poland to the peasants; and is appealing for aid, and especially for food, for the population. It claims that U.N.R.R.A. aid is being delayed owing to action by the Polish Government in London, but for this accusation there seems to be no justification. It is stated that oil is already being produced from the oil-wells in the liberated parts of Galicia west of the southern extension ("Line A") of the Curzon Line.

SOVIET UNION.

Red Army troops captured Kirkenes on the 25th October and have reached Neiden, 12 miles inside the Norwegian frontier. In face of bitter German resistance little progress has been made in East Prussia during the past week, and there has been no great change immediately to the south, except that Jablonna, on the Vistula 8 miles N.N.W. of the Warsaw suburb of Praga, was wrested from the Germans on the 28th October. On Czechoslovak territory Mukocevo was liberated on the 26th and Uzhorod on the 27th October, whilst in Yugoslavia to the north-west of Belgrade the towns of Novi Sad and Apatin on the left bank of the Danube were freed on the 27th and 28th respectively.

On the 24th October, at Tehran, M. Kavtaradze held a press conference in the Soviet Embassy (see below under "Middle East") at which he discussed the recent talks with the Persian Government on the subject of the Soviet demand for oil concessions, but the open attack which he there made on the Persian Prime Minister had had its forerunner in a leading article in the Moscow newspaper Trud on the 22nd of the month. This article quoted certain Persian papers to show that M. Saed's policy had led to internal disorders, especially in Kurdistan, and had been disastrous for Persia. Trud seems, too, to have gone so far as to make the entirely unwarranted statement that the Prime Minister's duplicity was also shown by the intensification of the subversive work of pro-Fascist elements in Persia and by open tolerance on the part of the Government of continued efforts of evilly-intentioned elements to disrupt communications, and thereby prevent the flow of Allied supplies destined for use in the struggle against Germany. The Soviet newspaper, after making the further charge that peaceful elements attempting to carry out the obligations imposed by the 1942 Treaty were being persecuted, asserted ominously that the future of Persia depended on close relations with the Soviet Union and on the faithful execution of the treaty.

On the 29th October Moscow Radio broadcast a Tass statement denying that the Soviet Union intended to participate in the international conference on civil aviation which opens on the 1st November in Chicago. The reason given was "the fact, which has become known in recent days, that Switizerland, Portugal and Spain, with which the Soviet Union does not maintain diplomatic relations and which have pursued for many years a pro-Fascist policy hostile towards the Soviet Union, have also been invited to the conference." In a recent correspondence in The War and the Working Class some contributors have urged that the time was ripe for strong Soviet steps to put an end to the anomaly of non-recognition of the U.S.S.R. by the three countries in question. It is thus possible that (among other reasons for its refusal to attend the conference) the Soviet Government hopes that the Western Allies will bring pressure to bear on these Powers to establish normal relations, and at the same time wishes to give notice that the U.S.S.R. will not tolerate them as members of the world security organisation, at any rate until relations have been established. This view is not contradicted by the fact that when the Soviet Government accepted an invitation to attend the conference on civil aviation, about a month ago, it knew what Powers were to be invited.

The signing of an armistice with Bulgaria (for the terms see under "Bulgaria") was discussed in a long article in Pravda of the 30th October, which was mainly recapitulatory, and embodied no points of special interest. It expressed in conclusion the gratification of the Soviet people that the Bulgarians had at last made an end of the criminal fratricidal policy, in relation to the other Slavs and in particular to their liberators the Russians, which had been pursued for the past thirty years by the pro-German rulers of Bulgaria.

On the 26th October the Information Bureau of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs stated that on the preceding day M. M. A. Kostylev, Soviet representative in Italy, had informed the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs of the decision of the Soviet Government to establish full diplomatic relations with Italy. The agrément of the Italian Government has been requested to the appointment of M. Kostylev as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the U.S.S.R. in Italy. (For the previous history of Soviet relations with Italy and the appointment of M. Kostylev, see Summaries Nos. 232–3 and 237.)

Estonia is the first of the Baltic Republics to appoint a Commissar of Foreign Affairs. It was reported from Tallinn on the 31st October that Hans Kruus had been chosen for the post. M. Kruus, a scientist and a deputy director of Tartu University, was Deputy Prime Minister in the Cabinet formed in Estonia in June 1940 after the conclusion of the Agreements between the Soviet Union and the Baltic States, but before the incorporation of the latter in the U.S.S.R. He held no post in the August Cabinet set up after the incorporation, but became rector of Tartu University, and was evacuated to Russia after the German invasion of Estonia.

Roumania has come in for criticism of her delay in fulfilling the armistice terms, parallel to that meted out a week earlier to Finland (see Summary No. 264 under "Finland"). A Tass message from Bucharest of the 25th October alleged that several Roumanian institutions and organisations were trying to sabotage the carrying out of the armistice terms in regard to the return of Soviet equipment, of which a great deal had been discovered by the control commission, in particular steam boilers, machine tools and no less than 3,000 tractors. Further, the Roumanian Government was charged with delay in putting into effect the promised purge of the administration. In the country at large, 500 members of the Iron Guard had been arrested, but a large number of them, including many leaders, were said to be still at liberty.

By a decision of the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. dated the 4th October this year, Colonel-General Golikov has been appointed Delegate of the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. for the repatriation of citizens of the U.S.S.R., who have been in captivity or forcibly driven away to Germany or German-occupied countries. Colonel-General Smorodinov and Lieutenant-General Golubev have been appointed Deputies and Major-General Dragun and Major-General Smirnov assistants of the Delegate for Repatriation. The Delegate for Repatriation is charged with directing the repatriation of citizens of the U.S.S.R. from Germany and from German-occupied countries as they are liberated by the Red Army and Allied troops, and with organising the sending home of liberated Soviet citizens.

SCANDINAVIA.

A recent enquiry by the Swedish Gallup Institute throws an interesting light on the present state of opinion in Sweden on the question of Scandinavian regionalism. Hitherto it has always appeared that Sweden was the protagonist among the Northern nations for the creation and maintenance of a Scandinavian bloc. If the Gallup figures can be trusted, however, Swedish opinion has undergone a great change in this respect as a result of the experience of the war. Of those questioned, no less than 43 per cent. expressed no view—which at least suggests a surprising lack of interest in the question, though it may be merely an instance of characteristic Swedish caution. Of the remainder, as large a figure as 27 per cent. favoured Swedish isolation, while the voters who supported some sort of bloc were remarkably uncertain as to which and how many of the neighbouring countries should be included. The largest extent of agreement was with regard to the inclusion of Norway. 14 per cent. of those approached were in favour of a wider association, including countries outside the northern group, among which England was an easy favourite. The explanation of this marked change of view is doubtless the fact that Swedish regionalism has always been associated with neutrality, and that the experience of the war has shown this to be unobtainable, except—so far—by Sweden in isolation. To some extent, therefore, the verdict may be regarded as a vote of confidence in Swedish foreign policy as pursued in the present war. A curious feature in the investigation is that Communists were mostly in favour of isolation, only a third of them favouring the inclusion of Russia in a combination.

The Swedish Government has granted to Finland a credit of 150 million kronor for reconstruction.

Opening a debate on foreign affairs in the Riksdag on the 30th October, the Prime Minister and M. Günther both reasserted the Government's intention of maintaining the policy of neutrality, though they expressed great indignation at the German treatment of Norway and Denmark, to which they seemed to attribute the restrictions which they had recently imposed on Swedish trade with Germany. The assurance was repeated that Sweden would not grant refuge to quislings or war criminals.

The Allied (Soviet) Control Commission is understood to have compiled a list of sixty-one Finns to be arrested and brought to trial for alleged war crimes and two generals have been already arrested, one of whom is Pajari, in spite of his conduct of the opening stages of hostilities against the Germans since the Armistice. The other is General Palojärvi, formerly Finnish Military Attaché in Stockholm. Colonel Paloheimo, who was Assistant Minister of Finance in the Finnish Government until its recent reconstruction, has also been arrested.

On the other hand, the relations between General Zhdanov and Marshal Mannerheim are reported to have been very cordial from the first, and the former is said to have accepted a plea for further delay in demobilisation of the Finnish forces in view of their employment in the expulsion of the Germans. An extension of two months has been conceded.

The capture of Kirkenes by the Soviet forces was celebrated on the 26th October by broadcasts to the Norwegian people from King Haakon and M. Nygaardsvold. The King mentioned the agreement for military co-operation concluded some time ago between the Norwegian Government and the Soviet Union, expressed his pleasure that Norwegian forces were to take part in the operations in Northern Norway, and appealed for the strongest possible support to be given by Norwegians to their Russian Allies, to whose friendship and sympathy for Norway he paid tribute. The Norwegian Prime Minister asserted that Hitler's troops were now in flight in North Norway, and urged that they must be killed, annihilated or taken prisoner, since every German soldier who escaped southwards would contribute to the prolongation of the war. This appeal was no doubt intended to have merely local application to the present theatre of war in Northern Norway, though there seems some risk that it may be given a wider interpretation by those activist elements which have been so long straining at the leash.

M. Trygve Lie, the Norwegian Foreign Minister, and M. Terje Wold, the Minister of Justice, arrived in Stockholm by air from England on the 28th October. It is officially stated that the visit was planned some time ago, and implied that its coincidence with the Russian advance into Norway is accidental, though this occurrence is admitted to add to the importance of the discussions impending.

The Germans are reported to have made comprehensive plans for the complete encirclement of the Oslo district, in the event of any disturbance in that quarter. Arrests made recently confirm the view that it is the German policy at present to secure an influential body of hostages against the contingency of national disorder or armed rising.

The same policy is being pursued in Denmark, where no less than 10,000 Danes are now estimated to be prisoners. It is widely reported that Professor Fog is dead (see last week's Summary) but another person arrested in the same raid and stated to have since died now seems to be alive, and it is believed that the Germans circulate rumours of the death of prominent persons arrested, with the object of encouraging unguarded discussion of their possible activities.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

In view of the possibility of almost irreparable damage being done to part of the Netherlands by the enemy through flooding and in other ways, the Dutch Government has announced that it reserves the right to demand the annexation of a portion of adjoining German territory, cleared of its inhabitants, in compensation.

In spite of a German propaganda campaign aimed at breaking their resolution, the great majority of the railway workers in enemy-occupied Holland remain on strike. In their resentment against them for hampering the military operations, the Germans have not merely disclaimed responsibility for Dutch food supplies, but have issued a decree prohibiting all forms of transport in the region of Amsterdam and The Hague, thus throwing the people of this densely populated area on to their immediately available resources. The food situation there must by now be extremely grave, since the principal stocks were only sufficient to last until the first or second week in November. Moreover, the shortage of fuel has been intensified through the cutting off of the Limburg coal supplies as a result of the Allied advance.

In Belgium the food situation continues to overshadow all other topics. On the 24th October the two Communist members of the Government handed the Prime Minister a letter addressed to him by the National Secretary of the Communist Party, in which the Government was reproached for the prevailing distress. M. Pierlot pointed out in reply that he could not permit any discussion in public between members of the Government, as this would be contrary to ministerial solidarity. In spite of the rumours which this incident not unnaturally provoked, no Cabinet crisis has developed.

Meanwhile, the Allied Supreme Command has appointed Major-General Erskine as Head of a Mission to the Belgian Government to give expert advice on the food situation. General Erskine gave a wireless address to the Belgian people on the 27th October in the course of which he announced that the military authorities had decided to give the Belgian people 200 tons of food a day during the twenty days following the 1st November—the supplies to include as much meat and fats as possible. He explained that this measure was not being taken because there was a shortage of food—in point of fact the food situation in Belgium is much less serious than in France or Holland—but to tide over the reorganisation of the system of distribution. The Belgian harvest has been satisfactory and there are sufficient stocks of essential foods in the country to carry it over at least until February.

The causes for the existing distress were explained in detail by the Prime Minister in a broadcast address on the 23rd October. Coal and transport, he said, were the major problems. Coal production per month had fallen from 2,200,000 tons to 625,000, which was a little over a quarter of the normal requirements. The chief reasons for this were shortage of labour and the lack of nourishing food for the workers who remained. Nevertheless, even 600,000 tons per month would be sufficient to allow a minimum of railway traffic and to provide enough gas and electric power for private dwelling houses and some vital industries. The bottleneck at the moment was the shortage of railway engines and trucks available for civilian traffic. To meet this, nearly all passenger trains had been cancelled except those transporting miners. Foodstuffs were being given absolute priority, coal and timber for pit props coming next. As regards water-ways, many were still unusable. Here the obstacle was not want of ships but the destruction of quays and loading apparatus. Under these circumstances, though there was sufficient food in the country, it would be unwise to release these stocks into a free market until they knew how long it would be before they would receive imported foodstuffs. This meant that controlled distribution, in the shape of rationing, repression of the black market and price control, must continue for the present. A certain number of growers and dealers in foodstuffs had failed in their duty and against them the penalties provided by the law would be strictly applied. The Minister of Justice had asked prosecutors to give priority to cases involving foodstuffs.

FRANCE.

The Provisional Government has now also been recognised by the Governments of China and Roumania as well as of several Latin American States (see "Latin America"). The recognition by the three Great Powers has elicited further comment, notably by General de Gaulle in a press conference on the 25th October (see below), and by the Prime Minister in his speech in the House of Commons on the 27th October. General de Gaulle said merely that the Government was naturally pleased that it was now to be called by its name. Mr. Churchill explained the reason for not granting recognition sooner. This, he said, was very simple. The British and United States Governments had a very special responsibility for making sure that the French Government, "emerging in part from their military action, would be acceptable to France as a whole and would not appear to be imposed from without." He had himself for some weeks been satisfied that the present Government commanded "the full assent of the vast majority of the French people," and that it was the only Government "which could possibly discharge the very heavy burdens which are being cast upon it." He had made it clear in his speech of the 2nd August (see Summary No. 253) that France could by no means be excluded from the discussions of the principal Allies dealing with the problems of the Rhine and of Germany. Recognition could therefore be regarded as "heralding a period in which she will resume her rightful and historic rôle upon the world's stage." The Prime Minister's statement was welcomed in a Paris broadcast as dispelling the cloud created by the verbal reservations in declarations of the 24th October by President Roosevelt and Mr. Stettinius which suggest that there were as yet no plans to bring France into discussions on post-war security. A statement by the diplomatic correspondent of the Agence Française de Presse, published by several papers on the 27th October, had, however, pointed out that "in the opinion of well-informed circles in Paris these reservations refer exclusively to the Council of Security, establishment of which was discussed at Dumbarton Oaks, but which cannot meet until the end of the war . . . . Even so, from the psychological point of view, the reservations made on the very day after the recognition of the Provisional Government disclose the continued existence of inhibitions which still remain to be overcome in the world before France is admitted to her proper place on a footing of equality." In Mr. Duff Cooper's opinion delay now in according to France the full benefits to which she considers she has a right is bound to cause resentment.

In his press conference of the 25th October General de Gaulle touched on many aspects of French affairs. He said that the French troops which entered Germany would undertake a military occupation of the territory they took from the enemy, but that there had so far been no talks with the Allies about the political conditions of such an occupation. He once again stressed France's desire to play a larger part in the war, but said that, if new French divisions were to be equipped, it would be necessary for the Allies to supply arms until France could herself resume manufacture. Since the battle of France the French had not received enough to equip "une grande unité." However, the magnitude of the tasks confronting the Allies in that battle to a certain extent explained why more arms had not been received. He pointed out that, although the F.F.I. were showing great courage in containing the 70,000 Germans on the Atlantic coast, they were ill-equipped and that other and more powerful forces would be needed to overcome German resistance. He also mentioned that the Government was recruiting an expeditionary force for Indo-China comprising colonial troops and volunteers. Referring to the idea of a bloc of Western European nations, he said that he did not think this would be necessary, but that the proximity of these States indicated the desirability of some co-ordination of their relations from the point of view of security. (For his references to the Levant, see under "Middle East.")

According to press reports, the Commission of twenty parliamentarians set up to select the 60 Deputies and Senators who are to sit in the Consultative Assembly has so far been able to find only fifty-five suitable candidates. Seventeen of the sixty seats were reserved for what is described as the 4th category, a group of Right-wing parties, but only twelve candidates have been deemed to have adequate Resistance records. It remains to be seen whether M. Jeanneney will arrange for the five vacant places to be filled before the Assembly meets on the 7th November.

On the 27th October the Council of Ministers adopted an ordinance establishing a Provisional Municipal Council of Paris and Departmental Assembly of the Seine to function until local elections next February. Although the twenty-eight members of the Paris Committee of Liberation, who have hitherto exercised the functions of both Assemblies, are to sit on both ex officio, M. Tollet, the president of the committee, has criticised the decision and asked why it should be necessary to replace something provisional by something also provisional.

On the 29th October the press published a communiqué of the Ministry of the Interior announcing the Government's decision to disarm independent groups, such as the Patriotic Militia, which were in some districts continuing to make requisitions and arrests in their self-imposed task of fighting the Fifth Column and the black market. The Government paid tribute to their services during the insurrectionary period, but declared that that period was now ended and that it was for the Government and its representatives alone to exercise administrative and police powers. All reports indicated that the action of independent armed groups was causing increasing anxiety and alarm among the rural population. Many of the members could make an effective contribution to defence by undergoing regular military training under a competent authority, and the arms in the possession of the groups would equip new units of an army which was in sore need of arms. This important decision of the Government was contested by the Conseil National de la Résistance (C.N.R.), which issued a statement of disapproval and sent a delegation to see General de Gaulle. The General is reported to have maintained the Government's position, emphasising the urgency of a solution both from the point of view of public order and of France's international position. At the same time he expressed the Government's desire for the co-operation of the C.N.R. According to the latest reports the C.N.R. has issued a further statement expressing its own wish to co-operate, its desire to be consulted beforehand in any questions affecting the Resistance movements, and its hope that "patriotic forces" can be given legal status.

According to a report emanating from the F.F.I. of the Dordogne, Admiral Platon, former Vichy Minister of Colonies, was arrested on the 21st July in the Gironde and executed on the 16th August. There are also unconfirmed reports of the execution in the Gironde of Darquier de Pellepoix, former Vichy Commissioner-General for Jewish Affairs. In Paris Stéphane Lauzanne, for more than forty years editor of the Matin, has been convicted of intelligence with the enemy and condemned to twenty years' solitary imprisonment and loss of all his possessions. Louis Renault, the president of the Renault company, who was arrested on the 23rd September, died in hospital on the 25th October, a few days before his trial was due to begin. The press reports that M. Pierre Lefaucheux has been appointed provisional administrator of the Renault Company pending the formation of a "Régie nationale." He will be assisted by a provisional consultative committee of workmen, clerical staff, foremen and engineers.

SWITZERLAND.

Swiss comment on the Russian refusal to attend the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago stresses the astonishment caused by this decision in British and United States circles. Government circles in Washington are quoted as regarding it as incomprehensible that Switzerland and Portugal should be put by the Russians on the same footing as Spain, and British circles at Montreal are quoted as declaring that the issuing of an invitation to neutral countries which did not recognise the U.S.S.R. de jure was only the ostensible reason for the Russian decision.

SPAIN.

During the past week the Spanish maquis has been a good deal more active in the columns of the London press than along the French frontier. As if the English Liberal sympathisers suddenly realised that by pitching it high they were only playing Franco's game, lively reports of successful raids into Spain were followed by denials that the Spanish guerrilleros had ever crossed the frontier at all. They then said that the Spanish guerrilleros having been withdrawn 12 miles from the frontier, all was peace and quiet along the Pyrenees, but that there was unrest in other parts of Spain. Truth is usually to be found hanging midway between the peaks of fantasy reared up by zealous partisans, and the story of the Spanish maquis is no exception. The Franco press naturally made capital out of a confused situation, and by exaggerating the menace and by taking elaborate and well-publicised defence measures, Franco did himself a good turn. But to attempt to deny the reality of the guerrilleros by transferring anti-Franco resistance far inland is to be equally inaccurate. As has been previously reported, the maquis have been making nuisance raids across the frontier (see Summary No. 263), and latest reports indicate that, though the general situation is quiet enough and there is no alarm in Madrid, bands of guerrilleros are still giving trouble to the Spanish authorities. For instance, in the Val d'Aran, where the town of Viella was at one time cut off (see Summary No. 263), the Spanish maquis still hold some 20 kiloms. of the road from there to the frontier. There are about 10,000 regular troops in the Val d'Aran, but they are curiously inactive and seem to be making no attempt to clear the country. The desire to avoid casualties in difficult country and possibly the fact that they are still wearing the summer uniforms in which they left North Africa would discourage exposure on the icy Pyrenean heights. There will be no enthusiasm for a prolonged stay in this area, and General Franco must be anxious to see order restored quickly. But he would not appreciate Dr. Negrin's offer, made to the French Delegation in London, to go down to the frontier himself pour ramener de l'ordre." The concentrations in the Val d'Aran have led to the denuding of the Eastern end of the frontier, and there seems to be some liveliness around Perpignan with promise of more to come. The guerrilleros in this part seem to be undisciplined and uncontrollable adventurers. Contrary to reports circulating in France and reproduced in some of the English press, the local Spanish population, though they may not be sympathetic to the Franco régime, have not yet given active assistance to the raiders. And the story that Gil Robles, the Catholic Monarchist leader, was backing the Unión Nacional, has drawn an indignant denial from that exile in Lisbon who does not at all appreciate his name being coupled with an organisation which is mainly Communist and not representative of even Spanish left wing opinion. The Unión Nacional is working away in France—the organisation inside Spain may be solid, but there is no evidence to show that it is—and if, as is not unlikely, there is before long a movement of Spanish refugees from all parts of the world to Paris, the situation on the Pyrenean frontier should be full of interest to the student of politics as well as to the student of war. In the meantime, General Franco is not proposing to send Señor Mateu as Ambassador to Paris until things are normal along the frontier; the present arrangement is that Señor Sangroniz will be sent from Algiers as Consul-General and Chargé d'Affaires. The latest unofficial reports from Paris show that the Spanish maquis have evacuated most of the Franco consulates which they had occupied a few weeks ago, and there are some signs of Franco-Spanish co-operation to check the activities of the guerrilleros. The French Government seem to be considering granting to Spanish refugees a status analogous to that enjoyed after the last war by holders of the League of Nations "Nansen" passports. This would be a first step to administrative control of these people; it is a necessary measure.

An interesting story from Tangier may be a sign of Spanish preparation for the change the de facto authorities know is inevitable. For some weeks past there have been rumours that the Spanish authorities were planning a plebiscite in the Tangier Zone. His Majesty's Acting Consul-General has now obtained possession of a list of fourteen leading Moslem dignitaries who have been obliged to sign a blank paper. It is not known to what they have involuntarily committed themselves. It may be a vote for Franco if the plebiscite should take place, or perhaps merely a petition asking for the continuance of the favour of Spanish overlordship. But this is just beating the wind; even if the Spaniards were to persuade every single Moor in Tangier to sign a blank paper, these worthless cheques on Allied goodwill would not be honoured on the day of reckoning.

Since this Summary was written the Spanish Radio Nacional has broadcast an announcement by General Moscardó, Captain-General of the Fourth Region, that the Val d'Aran had been cleared of "Red" troops. It is very likely that the guerrilleros have, in fact, withdrawn. It seems clear that they expected more active assistance from their compatriots than they received.

ITALY.

Despite the scientific and methodical damage carried out by the Germans in liberated Italy, particularly to hydro-electric power stations, Italy's main source of power, factories have resumed the production of various necessities, amongst which silk, textiles, cement, steel and fertilizers are mentioned. Paper plants in Rome and Tivoli are also manufacturing newsprint and others are about to start work. Although there is a dearth of raw materials, the Allies are doing all in their power to co-operate with the manufacturers, particularly by helping them to procure these necessary raw materials.

The situation in Sicily has been examined at a meeting of the Council of Ministers and it has been decided to set up a special council with a High Commissioner as president to report on local problems. This council will consist of twenty-four members drawn from political and economic organisations with local experts to assist them. A grant of 500 million lire has been approved for the economic reconstruction of Sicily and the Italian police force in the island is to be reorganised and purged of unsatisfactory elements.

Emilio Lusso, a former Deputy for Sardinia and himself a Sardinian, has just completed a tour of the island and has reported to Signor Bonomi on the conditions as he found them. According to the Corriere di Roma, he urged that powers should be granted to the High Commissioner for the island to work out a scheme of regional autonomy within the national framework.

Signor Bonomi, in an interview with a Reuter correspondent, re-emphasised the difficulties facing Italy this coming winter. If the Germans continue their destruction of all industrial installations and carry off all the produce of the farms, immediate and great help will be needed not only in food and medicine but in transport to distribute it. The housing problem was also very difficult, particularly for the farmers, who must live close to their land. Signor Bonomi went on to say that in Italy to-day it was a question of living, and to this end political parties must unite to improve the structure of the Government by strengthening its technical powers and that other great social and political problems must be postponed. In Signor Bonomi's opinion it would not yet be possible to constitute an assembly of former Deputies, and he apparently believed that for the time being committees of experts could be set up to help with the solution of the various problems. In view of the fact that Italy to-day had no electoral lists and no electoral system, all of which had been destroyed by fascism, Signor Bonomi was preparing a temporary electoral law for the compilation of the lists, and he hoped that in three or four months these lists would be ready. Only then would it be possible to proceed with the administrative elections, which would be the first electoral experiment of a democratic Italy. Signor Bonomi finished by speaking of the urgency of finding some outlet for Italy's growing population. In present circumstances it was, he said, more urgent than ever, but he was glad to say that he had found a profound understanding of this question amongst the representatives of Brazil, whose troops were now fighting in Italy.

In accordance with the policy announced by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister on the 27th September, direct relations between His Majesty's Government and the Italian Government have been resumed. As previously stated, Sir Noel Charles, the present High Commissioner, is to assume the rank of Ambassador. Count Carandini is to be the Italian representative in London. Count Carandini will have the personal rank of Ambassador but he will not have diplomatic status. A Liberal and a strong anti-Fascist from the beginning, Count Carandini fought in the last war and during neo-fascism he played an active part on the Italian Committee of Liberation as the Liberal representative. He is also deeply interested in farming and owned large dairy farms which formerly supplied Rome with a large proportion of its milk supply. The United States and the U.S.S.R. have announced the establishment of full diplomatic relations with Italy, notwithstanding the state of war. The other American Republics have followed the United States lead. The Italian Ambassador to Washington will be Count Sforza.

In Northern Italy the week's main event was the 22nd anniversary of the March on Rome on the 28th October, when the Republican Fascists made a big effort to reproduce some of the pomp and circumstance of former celebrations. Mussolini reviewed Legionaries and made a short speech; congratulatory telegrams—even more stilted than usual—were exchanged between Hitler and the Duce; and Party hierarchs, including Pavolini, Mezzasoma and Giorgio Pini, all made speeches. Mussolini also announced an amnesty for political offenders, remitting sentences up to three years' imprisonment, and a further amnesty for the military offence of evading the call-up for military service or compulsory labour—on condition that those concerned reported for service within eight days.

Celebrations took place, according to the Fascist radio, "in all towns and villages of Republican Italy," but the high light was put on Milan, the main town of the industrial north, where discontent and unrest owing to removal of machinery and workers to Germany have reached a high pitch, further aggravated by recent Allied raids. Mussolini visited the town during the day, and Pavolini, the Party Secretary, made a full-dress speech in which, after a glorification of Fascism, which he described as "a profounder and more vital reality than ever," he touched on some of the most outstanding causes of discontent. He assured his audience that "in the event of 'X'" (presumably meaning a forced evacuation towards the north) the Germans had no intention of destroying plant or factories. He also spoke of the danger of inflation, which would only be aggravated by a demand for higher wages. As to the true purport of the amnesty granted that day he was surprisingly outspoken, saying: "We Fascists have no particular love of amnesties. In fact, we have merely sanctioned—finally fixing a limit of eight days—that distinction between the wanderer who returns and takes his place at work again, and the infamous canaille of the bandits, to whom only bullets can speak."

Casualty figures for the Fascist Republican Army from January to August 1944 have recently been published in the Turin Gazzetta del Popolo. These are: killed—officers 122, n.c.o.'s 177, men 450; wounded—officers 59, n.c.o.'s 93, men 450; missing—officers 24, n.c.o.'s 55, men 379. While there is no check on the reliability of these figures, they go far to belie Republican Fascist propaganda, which in the past has tried to make the most of the alleged revivification of the Fascist Republican Army and of the part played by it side by side with the German forces.

THE VATICAN.

The European Division of the World Jewish Congress has asked the Pope to make a public appeal for the Jews now threatened in Hungary.

Months ago the Argentine Government wished to give food and medical supplies to the Vatican, and Franco offered to ship them. The scheme was held up for military reasons. Now that the war has moved far enough to the north, however, the Vatican is to receive the 4,000 tons of goods which they need for their works of charity.

War and the Working Class has called the Pope "Franco's godfather," a soubriquet which the Spanish wireless treats as a compliment. The Catholic Herald of the 27th October described the scene in these words: "Another anti-Pope outburst from Moscow this weak is linked this time with snarls at Franco," and goes on to attack "some 4,000 Spanish thugs, ex-Red civil war fighters who have sheltered in Southern France." The current number of the United States magazine Catholic World maintains a similar theme, more outspokenly. Its editorial opens thus: "The greatest potential menace to permanent peace is Soviet Russia. Fascism is not and never was as dangerous as communism." In contrast the Vatican Wireless in Spanish defined the Holy See's attitude in this war as impartial but not neutral or indifferent, unable to take sides, or to intervene, since intervention is unfruitful if whole peoples do not accept Catholic discipline, bound by the Lateran Treaty to wait until both sides appeal to it. The Pope defends the principle of justice gives warning of the presence of sin, but remains the Father of all.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

On the northern sector of the new front in Hungary, Soviet troops, advancing from the Upper Tisza, took successively Mukačevo, Užhorad and Čop, thus cutting off and remaining Hungarian and German forces in Ruthenia. By capturing Szatmár-Neméti they also cleared the enemy from the whole area east of the Trianon frontier with Roumania. Further south the fighting was stubborn. German communiqués claimed to have recaptured Nyiregyháza and to have encircled and destroyed Soviet formations which had advanced west of Szolnok. On the 30th October, however, the opening of a general offensive from the south-east was announced.

Budapest was raided heavily on the night of the 26th/27th October.

Szálasi and other members of his Government have exchanged telegrams of greeting with Hitler, Göring and Ribbentrop, promising them Hungary's loyal support to the last. Hitler in reply promised that "the German Reich would never leave Hungary in the lurch," and Ribbentrop promised her the most far-reaching support from himself and from the German Government.

The Lower House is to meet on the 2nd November. A series of sessions is to be held to decide, inter alia, the question of the Regency.

The Szálasi Government still seems uncertain as to the strength of its hold on the country, and the calling-up of several age groups in Budapest, including reserve officers up to their 48th year and men up to their 42nd, was cancelled and those already called up were actually sent back. Some curfew, &c., restrictions were, however, relaxed. Otherwise the Government has hardly passed the stage of announcing intentions, which include many measures of nationalisation. Only the Jews, male and female, have been mobilised to dig trenches, &c. There appear to have been many massacres and excesses, especially on the night of the 15th October; but the Government has agreed to allow Jews with protective passes to leave Hungary. Members of the German-speaking minority in Hungary are being evacuated to Germany as the front approaches their homes, mainly in Southern Hungary.

The bread ration has been reduced to 200 grammes per day.

Roumania.

During the week the political atmosphere has lightened. Nothing more has been heard of a transport strike, but in a manifesto accusing the Government of every sort of misconduct, a bid is made for Soviet support. Universul has been allowed to reappear, and there is at least a chance that a Government representative of all parties may be formed.

The press attachés at Helsingfors and Stockholm have been recalled in circumstances which suggest that the press department is to be subjected to a thorough overhaul.

The number of alleged war criminals under arrest increases. 1,356 Legionaries have been arrested in addition to 722 who are under accusation and are "now being purged in various prisons."

The Orthodox bishops of Transylvania have replied to a message from the Acting Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church. In this lengthy document, after recalling that the "Roumanian soldiers are fighting side by side with the brave soldiers of the U.S.S.R. to expel Germans and Hungarians from the ancient soil of Roumania," the authors give a sketch of the relations between the Churches of Russia and Transylvania in the past, and proceed to enlarge on the Hungarian atrocities committed after the Vienna Award. Like most propaganda it goes a little too far, and asserts that "young Roumanians were put into yoke to draw the plough."

The same mistake is made in another propaganda document. the articles on "Pathways of Victory" recently published in Pravda. The declared purpose of a good deal of this is to warn Soviet citizens whose duty takes them to Roumania not to be misled by the outward appearances of a colourful, joyous and carefree life, which is in reality far inferior to the solidity and worth of life in the Soviets. Some of the accounts of life in Roumania ring true, but the statement that a restaurant-keeper was "ashamed when he had to" serve Crimean wine will only provoke smiles from those who know that wine of all commodities is the one that Roumania has the least need to obtain from abroad, either by looting or in any other way.

Prospects of food shortage are debated but do not materialise. Meat, either fresh or tinned, can be obtained in Bucharest every day of the week except Wednesday. Visitors to Craiova and Brașov report that supplies there are plentiful. There is a shortage of wood for fuel, but oil stoves and fuel are to be had in place of wood.

Roumanian territory is now clear of the enemy, but just as in the war with Russia when the Dneister was reached, the Roumanian army proceeded to advance and occupy the country beyond it, so now the Roumanians continue to march into Hungary side by side with the Russians, no doubt justifying this by a convenient interpretation of one of the clauses of the Armistice agreement.

Yugoslavia.

With the partisan's occupation of Shabac all north-west Serbia appears to be cleared of the Germans. Kragujevac has been captured by Soviet and partisan forces; and the Germans are fighting hard to keep open their two lines of retreat by Kraljevo and by the Sandjak into Bosnia. The Red Army has occupied all Batchka, including Novi Sad; and the front is moving westwards across Srem, from which the numerous local Germans are migrating.

The partisans have occupied Split, Omish and the south Dalmatian coast almost to Kotor, except for the delta of the Neretva. In Bosnia they have taken Travnik, and are attacking Zenica and the Mostar–Sarajevo–Brod railway line. In Macedonia the Germans are being compressed between Bulgarian forces pushing forward from the east and partisans who have occupied Kichevo on the west.

Mr. Churchill made a short statement in the House of Commons on the 27th October on his discussions concerning Yugoslavia in Moscow. He said: "We are acting jointly, Russia and Britain, in our relations with both the Royal Yugoslav Government, headed by Dr. Shubashitch, and with Marshal Tito, and we have invited them to come together for the common cause, as they had already agreed to do at the conference which I held with them both at Naples . . . . We have invited them to come together and form a united Government for the purpose of carrying on the war, and, of course, until the country itself can pronounce . . ." Shubashitch and Tito, in fact, met on the 25th.

Greece.

Speaking in the House of Commons on the 27th October, Mr. Churchill said that Great Britain had now redeemed the pledge, made in 1941, that her forces would return to Greece. The lawful Greek Government was now sitting in Athens, and the Greek Brigade would soon return with honour to its native land. The much-needed supplies of food would soon be distributed in Greece, and His Majesty's Government would do its best to assist the Greek Government in stabilising Greek currency. His Majesty's Government did not wish to become an arbiter in Greek affairs; its wish and policy was that the Greek people should decide in perfect freedom upon the form of government under which they wished to live. Until such a decision was made, His Majesty's Government was, naturally, preserving its relations with the Greek Royal House and with the existing constitutional Government, and regarded them as the authority to whom it was bound by the alliance made at the time of the Italian attack on Greece.

After considerable difficulties, particularly in his negotiations with the Liberal Party, M. Papandreou has succeeded in reconstructing his Cabinet, though one or two seats still remain to be filled. All the Communist and EAM representatives who joined the Government in September have been included in the reconstructed Cabinet, and several Liberals have been brought in to replace those who resigned at the end of August, but, as the Cabinet is still not quite complete, it is too early to say definitely how the balance between the various parties will finally lie.

General Spiliotopoulos has been made Director of the Ministry of War, and Brigadier Katsotas, a former commander of the First Greek Brigade in the Middle East, succeeds him as Military Governor of Attica. A law has been passed whereby the Minister of War is authorised to call up soldiers and reservist officers of four classes (ages 26–29); ELAS is to be demobilised; another law provides for the trial and punishment of traitors by special courts.

Mr. Eden, Mr. Macmillan, Lord Moyne, and General Maitland Wilson arrived in Athens on the 27th October. The Allied authorities are doing their utmost to assist the Greek Government to deal with its financial and economic difficulties, and it is hoped that arrangements may be made to import from the Middle East a limited quantity of goods of small bulk and high local value, which the Greek Government will sell for purposes of revenue.

Albania.

After broadcasting an appeal for order, which proved to be its swan song, the puppet Government of Ibrahim Biçaku resigned on the 26th October, leaving it to such civilian officials and army units as exist to carry on the administration in the north where its writ still ran. The Regency Council was dissolved at the same time. The F.N.C. are already in control of three-quarters of the country, and are systematically taking over further territory as the Germans evacuate it. The evacuation in the north is perhaps proceeding more quickly than hitherto, but it is orderly. The F.N.C. have attacked Tirana repeatedly, penetrating more than once into the centre of the town, and the Germans there have begun to destroy their equipment and stores. A strong enemy column with tanks fought its way from Tirana to Elbasan along the road which the F.N.C. had closed. A thousand Balli Kombetar troops were cut off round Kavaje, 15 miles south of the capital. Damage done by the Germans to the oil wells at Kuçove before they evacuated the district on the 17th October may suspend working for a few weeks. The capture of Ohrid by Macedonian partisans will make escape difficult for further German troops from the south, who have been concentrated at Korça.

Bulgaria.

At the opening of the armistice discussions in Moscow the Bulgarian Foreign Minister, M. Stainov, based an appeal for just treatment of his country on the plea that the war declared by a previous Government against the Western Democracies offended the Bulgarian people's conscience and that they had shown this by the struggle of the partisans, the revolution of the 9th September, the present purge and the army's operations against the Germans. He professed a desire for close friendship with Bulgaria's neighbours, great respect for Great Britain and the United States, and profound love and gratitude for the liberator Power. In accepting the armistice M. Stainov declared that Bulgaria had already complied with much of it and that she hoped by co-operating increasingly with the United Nations to take her place among them even before peace was concluded. The armistice was duly signed on the 28th October by Marshal Tolbukhin for Russia and by Lieutenant-General Gammell for the Allied Supreme Command in the Mediterranean. Its terms are far from vindictive. Bulgaria undertakes to disarm German troops and intern German civilians; to make the Bulgarian forces available for service as required by the Soviet High Command, and to reduce them to a peace footing at the end of hostilities with Germany; to afford Russian and other Allied forces all facilities for movement; to release Allied prisoners and people interned on ideological grounds and to repeal discriminatory laws; to co operate in bringing war criminals to trial and to suppress Hitlerite and Fascist organisations; to submit publications, wireless and films to the censorship of the Soviet High Command; to surrender German war material and German and Bulgarian loot; to return ships and other property of the Allies; to make regular payments of Bulgarian currency and to supply goods and services, as required by the Soviet High Command; and to accept an Allied control commission which will be presided over by a Red Army officer until the end of hostilities with Germany and will supervise the execution of the armistice. The reparation to be made to the Allies including Greece and Yugoslavia is left for future determination. Other provisions affecting those two countries are that Bulgaria, while forbidden to employ her troops on the territory of any of the Allies without that Ally's leave, is bound to withdraw Bulgarian troops, authorities and civilians from the occupied territories, to repeal legislation connected with their annexation, and lastly to provide food at once for the Greeks and Yugoslavs who have suffered from Bulgarian aggression.

In the present Bulgarian situation the dominant feature is the indirect, rather than direct, influence of Russia. The press conforms to the Soviet style. Political commissars have been appointed in the army. Committees of the Fatherland Front have been set up in all localities and in all sections of the population. The Fatherland Front Militia in uniform recalls the N.K.V.D. in plain clothes. In industry increased hours and Stakhanovist activity are boosted and there is a drive for contributions for the front. Accommodation is rationed. Thanks to their greater energy, resourcefulness, ruthlessness and single-mindedness the Communists have got a disproportionately big influence in the Government, but for the present at any rate they seem bound to keep step with its other elements—the Tsveno, the Agrarians and the Social Democrats. Under the leadership of G. M. Dimitrov, who recently returned from exile, a single National Agrarian Union has been formed, and as the Agrarians represent the large peasant majority this is likely to counteract a swing to the extreme left. Meanwhile hotheads are restrained. The press tells Agrarians and Communists not to hinder the revolution by disagreeing among themselves. Yugov, the Communist Minister of the Interior, sternly rebukes members of the Militia for arbitrary arrests and confiscations.

A good deal of publicity was given to the hard fighting by which the Bulgarian army captured Stracin and other positions in its advance on Skoplje.

Turkey.

On the 29th October, the twenty-first anniversary of the foundation of the republic, the main theme at Angora was the peaceful development of the new Turkey both in the past and in the future. President Inönü said that the Republican régime had been a period of national prosperity and that its object for the future was to make Turkey a land of justice and equality and a useful member of the family of nations. They believed greater prosperity was in store and they would always be ready to share any burden necessary for the attainment of world security. The Prime Minister, M. Saraçoğlu compared the deficit, the empty barns and the insufficient coal of 1942 with an abundance which he announced, not only of corn and coal but also in the Treasury. He, too, predicted prosperity. The semi-official Ulus declared that there was no fundamental difference among Turks. Their purpose was to raise the country to the highest social level. After twenty-one years of peace their concern still was to reconstruct and rehabilitate, and this meant a long struggle. Consequently they hoped for a new world order where war would be banned.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The Egyptian Government has dismissed a few more officials. Like most of those removed when the Government first came into power, they had openly sided with the Wafd, and the dismissal of all such was probably inevitable. Some of the provincial governors have also been retired or absorbed into the Ministry of the Interior, most of their successors being senior men who had been got rid of in the early days of the late régime.

The provincial changes have doubtless been made with a view to assisting the Government in the forthcoming elections, which may be held in the near future. It is believed that the King insists on the distribution of parliamentary seats being on a coalition basis, and that Ahmad Maher has reluctantly agreed. The proposed distribution would give 55 seats each to the Saadists, Liberals and Makramites (followers of Makram Ebeid), 20 to the Watanists (Nationalists) and 14 to the Independents, while 65 seats would be freely contested. One unsatisfactory feature of this distribution is the excessive representation (20) allotted to the Watanists, who have never before had more than 4 or 5 Deputies in the Chamber. This party holds extremist views, and is known to be anti-treaty and anti-British.

During his recent visit to Cairo, Mr. Eden met the Egyptian Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, as well as Hassanein Pasha, First Chamberlain to the King. Both the Prime Minister and Hassanein assured the Secretary of State that the Egyptian Government intended to co-operate fully with Great Britain and to carry out during the war the part of a loyal ally. The Prime Minister further assured Mr. Eden that his Government was not dismissing officials because they were Wafdist, but because they had engaged in improper practices or were otherwise unfitted for their posts. He himself was resolutely opposed to victimisation for political reasons. As to the King, Hassanein told Mr. Eden that His Majesty was no more anti-British than he was himself, but that His Majesty had been led astray by bad advisers, notably Ali Maher, at the beginning of his reign. Hassanein was convinced that the King firmly believed that his country's future was bound up with that of Great Britain, and that His Majesty would do all in his power to co-operate with us. On the following day Mr. Eden was received by King Farouk, whom he thanked for the assurances His Majesty had recently given regarding Anglo-Egyptian relations. To this the King replied that he had no wish to embarrass his country's ally during the war.

It turns out that Abdul Rahman Azzam is not after all to go to the Levant States as Egyptian Minister. It is proposed now to put him at the head of a new Department for Arab Affairs. Azzam, who is himself of Arab stock and has long been interested in the affairs of the Arab world, is obviously cut out to take a leading part in connexion with Arab affairs under the present régime.

Certain members of the Syrian Government, including the Minister for Foreign Affairs, met General Beynet and Count Ostrorog last week, when discussions were held regarding the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales and the proposed treaty with the French. On the second day the meeting was attended also by the Lebanese Foreign Minister, much to the annoyance of the French. The French representatives took up the line that the question of the Troupes Spéciales must be discussed separately with each State, and that it was indissolubly linked with that of a treaty; while the Syrians said that the Troupes Spéciales were a matter of common interest to both States, and that they must be transferred at once as a preliminary to further negotiations. Though at one point the Syrians said that they would sign no engagement with any country during the war, later they asked the French what sort of treaty they had in view, to which the French replied that they wished for a "treaty of alliance" on the lines of those made by Great Britain with Egypt and Iraq.

Meanwhile, it is reported from Paris that General de Gaulle recently told a press conference that "the Syrians and Lebanese were independent, and independent from all sides." He went on to say that "it would be regrettable were France to learn one day that the difficulties she was experiencing elsewhere had been complicated by artificial difficulties provoked at Beirut or Damascus. If this proves to be the case it must cease."

The Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs, who recently returned to Bagdad from Syria, with the intention of sending an official communication to His Majesty's Ambassador and the American Minister about General Beynet's statement concerning Lebanese independence, has wisely changed his mind. Sir K. Cornwallis, upon whom the Minister called on his return, after reading the draft, advised against its despatch, and after some argument the Minister agreed. The latter emphasised in conversation that the Arab States as a whole were strongly opposed to any further treaties that gave a special position to any outside Power. He added that, should the situation in the Levant States deteriorate, they might appeal to the Arab Committee which had recently met at Alexandria, and which would doubtless be able to reassemble at short notice if necessary.

The conclusions reached by the committee at Alexandria were welcomed by the Palestinian Arabs, who especially applauded the clause dealing with Palestine. They were also gratified at the reception accorded to Musa Alami as their representative.

The Jews have been showing signs of nervousness about the future of Palestine, and the Jewish Agency has made a formal pronouncement rejecting partition and reaffirming as the Zionist objective a Jewish State embracing the whole of the country.

Intensive police measures against the Jewish terrorists continue, and several successful round-ups have been made. The population as a whole was impressed by the official communiqué on lawlessness, as well as by the deportation of the 251 persons who had been detained under the emergency regulations. The Hebrew press has sounded a more chastened note, and the basis of the communiqué is not seriously challenged. On the 26th October, sixteen days after the issue of the communiqué, the Vaad Leumi published a warning to the terrorists that unless their activities ceased the Jewish community would take action against them. At the same time they protested against the terms of the communiqué. It is not yet possible fully to estimate Jewish reactions to the deportations, but no doubt as much as possible will be made of what is claimed as "the right of every Jew to be in and remain in Palestine."

Almost the sole topic of interest in Persia during the week has been the decision by the Persian Government to postpone until after the war the granting of any oil concession, including, of course, that demanded by Russia. Those newspapers which are under Russian influence have attacked this decision violently, and have launched a campaign against the Prime Minister and the majority of the Majlis which agrees with him. On the other hand, some six or seven papers support the Persian Government. In one article the writer states that, when Persia was herself starving two years ago, she spared wheat and rice for Russia, then hard-pressed by Germany. He goes on to say that if, when she is fighting for freedom, Russia uses the mailed fist against Persia, surely this will wound Persia's feelings.

On the 24th October M. Kavtaradze held a press conference in the Soviet Embassy at Tehran, at which he stated, according to Tass, that the Persian Government had not put forward a single plausible explanation for its decision. He added that, while the friendship between his country and Persia could not be shaken, "the disloyal and unfriendly attitude taken by Premier Saed to the U.S.S.R. excluded the possibility of further collaboration with him."

In other ways the Soviet authorities have been continuing the war of nerves. On the 22nd October lorry-loads of armed Russian troops ranged past the Majlis, while Deputies were subjected to moral pressure on the issue. On the 27th October a demonstration, in favour of an oil concession to Russia, took place in Tehran, organised by the Tudeh Party and attended by Russian military police. The effect, however, both of M. Kavtaradze's statement to the press and of these anti-Government demonstrations has been to strengthen support for the Prime Minister both in the Majlis and among the public. General feeling is still opposed to the Russian demand (see also under "U.S.S.R.").

THE FAR EAST.

The principal Far Eastern event of last week was the naval battle, or rather group of battles, in waters adjacent to the Philippines following on the American landing on the island of Leyte. The Japanese Navy attempted a stroke with major forces before the Americans could use airfields on Leyte for land-based bombers, and while Leyte Gulf was still full of transports supplying the initial disembarkation. Several naval correspondents writing in the press have described the Japanese order of battle as strategically inept, because it involved the use of three widely separated forces, but there seems more reason to agree with the judgment of the Dutch Rear-Admiral Koenraad that it was "well-timed and ingenious, though risky." The plan apparently was for a squadron consisting partly of aircraft-carriers to divert the American Third Fleet by a move from Formosan waters, while two other squadrons without carriers, and relying on protection by shore-based aircraft, advanced through the enclosed seas of the central Philippines and fell upon the Seventh Fleet which was covering the landing on Leyte. The greatest capital ship strength was put into the middle squadron, which passed through the Sibuyan Sea and out by the San Bernardino Strait to the north of Samar; this comprised five battleships, including two of the heaviest class, while the other squadrons had two battleships each. The miscarriage of the plan was mainly due to the speed and violence with which Admiral Halsey's Third Fleet attacked the squadron from Formosa; he achieved a decisive victory over this with his carrier-borne aircraft and was then able to reinforce the Seventh Fleet before the Japanese middle squadron was able to achieve a decisive result; meanwhile the southern squadron had been defeated in a night action in the Surigao Strait to the south of Leyte and had failed to reach the American transports in the Leyte Gulf.

That the result of these engagements was an American victory is clear; what is not so clear is how much strength the Japanese Navy retains after the encounter. The estimation of enemy losses is a matter of great difficulty in a battle such as this in which most of the action consisted either of remote aircraft attacks, or of night fighting by surface ships, and a certain suspense of judgment is particularly necessary with regard to the night battle in the Surigao Strait because of the remarkable discrepancies in the reports of the original strength of the Japanese squadron engaged. In the communiqué issued by Admiral Nimitz on the 25th October the force sighted in the Sulu Sea was stated to have consisted of 2 battleships, 1 cruiser and 4 destroyers. A correspondent on Admiral Barbey's flagship after the battle said it had consisted of 2 battleships, 2 cruisers and 4 destroyers. Admiral Nimitz's communiqué of the 29th, however, put it at 2 battleships, 4 cruisers and 7 or 8 destroyers, while General MacArthur increased the figure to 2 battleships, 4 cruisers and 10 destroyers, all of which he claimed had been sunk.

The broadcast speech of Navy Secretary Forrestal on the 26th October showed a certain anxiety lest the tidal wave of victory publicity should cause the American public to think that the naval war in the Pacific was already "in the bag." He warned the public that Japan still had a fleet, and that damaged ships could be repaired, and added a reminder that "we too have lost ships and had others damaged." Rear-Admiral Koenraad, who formerly commanded the Dutch naval base at Soerabaya, also sounded a note of warning, calling attention to Japan's residue of battleship strength. The situation as regards capital ships appears to be that, having lost 3 old battleships, believed to be the Mutsu, Hiyei and Kirishima, Japan had before last week's battle 7 others of her old list, plus 2 of the 40,000-ton class recently put into commission. All of these took part in the Philippines battle; 2 of the old list, the Fuso and Yamashiro, are claimed to have been sunk, and all the rest to have sustained damage, but it cannot be assumed that any of the latter are out of action for long.

The Japanese have resolutely declined to admit that they were beaten in the Philippines battles, but their claims have been unusually modest and their admissions considerable. They have admitted 1 battleship (unnamed) sunk and another "substantially damaged," 1 aircraft-carrier and 2 cruisers sunk; they have not this time claimed the sinking of any American battleship, though they have been less modest with aircraft-carriers of which they have claimed 8 (3 being the correct figure). They have not been able to deny that the American fleet continues to sail the waters east of the Philippines, or that American fleet remain on Leyte, though they speak of them as being "marooned" there. The Philippines campaign is described as "only just beginning," and there is indeed no reason to expect it to be quickly finished, as the Japanese have nearly a quarter of a million men in the archipelago, which abounds in strong natural defensive positions.

President Osmena of the Philippine Commonwealth landed with General MacArthur on Leyte and has set up his Government on Philippine soil—a move which should have a considerable political effect on the Filipinos, especially in the Visayas, where Osmena was formerly more popular than his lately deceased predecessor, the Tagalog Quezo. The Americans appear to have received a warm welcome from the population in Leyte and to have been assisted by Filipino guerrillas secretly organised by American officers before the invasion. General MacArthur has also stated in a broadcast that all the islands are infested by anti-Japanese guerrillas, but he has not claimed any effective combat action by them so far outside Leyte; perhaps they are being held in leash until the Americans can give them full support. Among their exploits is declared to have been the capture of the secret papers of a Japanese Commander-in-Chief of the Combined Fleet, who was held prisoner before his death; this is interpreted as referring to either Admiral Yamamoto or Admiral Koga, both of whom were alleged by Tokyo to have perished in air accidents, and as meaning that he crashed somewhere in the Philippines and fell into the hands of a guerrilla band.

Outside the Philippines the most important political item of the week's news has been the recall of General Stilwell (see also under "United States"). He has been relieved of his three concurrent posts of Chief of Staff to Chiang Kai-shek as Commander-in-Chief of the "China theatre of operations," Deputy-Commander to Admiral Mountbatten in South-East Asia Command, and Commander of United States ground forces in China, Burma and India. His post under Chiang Kai-shek, as well as command of United States forces in China, will be taken over by Major-General Wedemeyer, now Deputy Chief of Staff to Admiral Mountbatten, while American troops in India and Burma will come under the command of Lieutenant-General Sultan.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The presidential election campaign has now entered its final week. Mr. Dewey continues his rôle as the efficient Prosecuting Attorney of the Administration, while President Roosevelt has made a whirlwind tour of the important but doubtful States. The "experts" believe that the President and Mr. Dewey are running "neck and neck," though the Fortune poll gives 53·5 per cent. of the poll to Mr. Roosevelt and 46·5 to Mr. Dewey. Dr. Gallup, who is a supporter of Mr. Dewey, maintains that straw ballots indicate that the President has an extremely small margin over Mr. Dewey and insists that the latter is still gaining ground. After Mr. Roosevelt's recent tour the Democrats, however, express themselves as considerably more confident than they were a month ago.

The outstanding development in the election campaign has been the emergence of foreign policy as the dominant issue in the election, despite earlier statements. Following Mr. Roosevelt's unequivocal statement on the American delegates' powers in the new World Security Council (see last week's Summary) which was fairly widely described as a courageous, authoritative and timely pronouncement for which the American public had been waiting, Mr. Dewey cancelled the Farm policy speech he had planned to make. At Minneapolis, the home of Senator Ball, he accused the President of "the most completely isolationist act ever taken by an American President in our 150 years of history," that of deliberately scuttling the London Economic Conference in 1933. He also attacked his signature of the Neutrality Act and his "repudiation" of the League of Nations. Referring to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, however, Mr. Dewey, following the President's lead, said that "we must make certain that our participation in this World Security Organisation is not subjected to reservations that would nullify the power of that organisation to maintain peace and halt future aggression. That means that it must not be subject to a reservation that would require our representative to return to Congress for authority every time he had to make a decision. Obviously, Congress, and only Congress, has the constitutional power to determine what quota of force it will make available and what discretion it will give our representative to use that force. I have not the slightest doubt," continued Governor Dewey, "that a Congress which is working in partnership with the President will achieve the result we all consider essential and grant adequate power for swift action to the American representative," and he accused the President of not being able to co-operate even with a Congress that was predominantly Democratic. Mr. Dewey also revealed that he had received telegrams from leading Republicans in Congress pledging their support for the World Security Organisation.

Mr. Walter Lippmann believes that after Governor Dewey's speech and the telegrams from the Republican Congressional leaders the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were established more firmly than ever as a bi-partisan commitment. Republican papers generally assert that there is no difference between Mr. Dewey's and Mr. Roosevelt's attitude towards international co-operation, but they believe that the United States is far more likely to achieve a sound foreign policy if Mr. Dewey is elected, since he will be able to co-operate with Congress. The "nationalists" (who are largely the old "isolationists") applaud Mr. Dewey's promise "to stay strictly within the Constitution," while the New Deal papers declare that the Republican candidate's statement concerning the powers of the United States delegate are dangerously ambiguous.

President Roosevelt, in a hard-hitting speech, spoke of the "ugly implication" which was first introduced by Mr. John Foster Dulles, Mr. Dewey's adviser on foreign affairs, that Republicans in Congress would co-operate with a President of their own party in establishing an organisation for world peace, but would not co-operate in the event of a Democratic victory. He charged Republicans with a deliberate and indefensible effort to place politics above patriotism. "I do not think the American people will take kindly to this policy of 'vote my way or I won't play,'" said the President at Philadelphia, and he referred to the achievement of his Administration in the preparation for, and conduct of, the war. To a mass meeting at Chicago the President referred to his message to Congress on the state of the union which he delivered last January and in which he outlined an economic Bill of Rights on which "a new basis of security and prosperity can be established for all, regardless of station, race or creed." He foresaw an extension of the United States peace-time productive capacity and called for a programme which would provide America with 60 million productive jobs. "America must remain," asserted the President, "the land of high wages and efficient production. During the war we have been compelled to limit wages and salary increases to prevent runaway inflation. After the war we shall, of course, remove the control of wages and leave their determination to free collective bargaining between trades unions and employers. We shall lift production and price-control as soon as they are no longer needed." Mr. Roosevelt asserted his belief in free enterprise, and added that "the future of the worker and farmer lies in the well-being of private enterprise and the future of private enterprise lies in the well-being of the worker and the farmer." He expressed his confidence that, with Congressional approval, the foreign trade of the United States could be trebled after the war, thus providing millions more jobs and laying the sound economic foundation for a lasting peace.

Mr. Roosevelt's mass meetings in Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, following on his tour of New York City, have done much to dispel what Mr. Marquis Childs has described "as the vilest whispering campaign" referring to the President's health. An amusing poll by the left-wing paper P.M. has disclosed that while the President did not "even have the sniffles" as a result of his tour in the rain in New York City, the majority of the reporters who covered the tour had developed colds, and that Mayor La Guardia had to retire to bed after completing half the trip. Nevertheless certain Republican papers reiterate that the choice of the electorate is not between Mr. Dewey and Mr. Roosevelt but between Mr. Dewey and Senator Truman, the Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency, the implication being that Mr. Roosevelt cannot last long. Senator Truman, in addition to association with the corrupt Pendagast machine, has now been accused of association with the Ku Klux Klan, which he indignantly repudiates.

Mr. Cordell Hull has issued a statement praising Mr. Roosevelt's handling of foreign affairs. "The President," he says, "is a statesman equipped by nature and experience as few statesmen have been in American history." He expressed confidence that history would record that the acts of the United States after the fall of France and before the United States entered into the war were indispensable "in staving off disaster to our nation and other free nations." Doubtless to help dispel rumours that the Administration was quarrelsome, Mr. Donald Nelson who, it is said, is about to leave on a new overseas mission for the President, has also issued a statement giving unqualified support to the President as the "man with the 'know-how' for the biggest job in the world."

There has been general rejoicing at the great American naval victory off the Philippines and Admiral King has remarked that this action has reduced the Japanese fleet "to not more than one-half of its maximum strength." This victory has naturally dominated the press and radio and has released a great deal of optimism which offsets to some extent the sober accounts of the extremely hard fighting in Europe. The British gains in Holland have incidentally been greatly praised. Mr. Drew Pearson even alleges that General Marshall went so far as to say that the European war might still be over before Christmas.

There was at first much speculation on the reasons for the recall of General Stilwell from China. Some asserted that it was due to disagreements with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, though other commentators mentioned disagreements with Lord Louis Mountbatten, General Chennault and Admiral Nimitz. In some quarters his recall was interpreted as a snub to the Generalissimo, and there were rumours that he was to be given command of an American army that might land on the shores of China. The President then confirmed that personal differences with the Generalissimo were the trouble. It was "just one of those things," he said, adding that General Stilwell would be given a new command of equal importance.

Mr. Churchill's speech on the outcome of his visit to Moscow has been received as "a characteristically well-rounded Churchillian war review," and has been quoted widely. It has been generally interpreted as proof of genuinely improved Anglo-Soviet relations, though there is despondency at the failure to reach a solution of the Soviet-Polish problem. The Agreements on the Bulgarian Armistice terms and on Yugoslavia, however, are quoted as evidence that the alleged Anglo-Russian differences on the spheres of influence in the Balkans have been amicably resolved, though several columnists maintain that Mr. Churchill did not break down Marshal Stalin's suspicions of the Allies, and that he failed to attain his desires in South-East Europe.

Admiral Land, the Chairman of the Maritime Commission and Administrator of the War Shipping Administration, has released a statement saying that "the President has requested the Maritime Commission to prepare a bold and daring plan for improving the American Merchant Marine and maintaining its future position." As a result of his Conference with the President, at which Mr. Henry Kaiser, the ship builder, was also present, it was agreed to begin a merchant shipbuilding programme as part of the reconversion programme, and take steps to produce new models as soon as shipyard space and man-power were available, so that, as Mr. Henry Kaiser said, "the United States would be able to compete in the world trade with 1950 rather than 1930 models." This programme will, of course, not interfere with the provision of vessels and materials now required for the war.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine Government has addressed a note to the other American Governments in which it declares that it considers necessary the calling of a meeting of Foreign Ministers, according to the procedure laid down by the Lima Conference of 1938, in order to discuss the problems of Argentina's relations with other American countries. The circular is accompanied by the text of a communication delivered to the Council of the Pan-American Union requesting that a meeting be convened as soon as possible. On the 28th October the State Department declared that it had not received this communication, but that if it did, the United States would exchange views with the Governments of the other American Republics before taking a decision.

The Argentine request is, of course, a very pretty nettle. Amidst a great display of injured innocence, the circular note demands that in no case shall the juridical or institutional aspect of the régime be a subject for discussion, since this would establish an undesirable precedent. In the first sentence (and, indeed, throughout) all blame is carefully diverted from Argentina's door; the note affects anxiety about "the situation that has arisen with certain American countries because of the attitude they have adopted towards the Argentine Republic," and shows no small self-satisfaction in extolling Argentina's willingness "to discuss with her peers a fundamental aspect of her international conduct," since she feels that "no stable and authentic order can exist in the American community based on the arbitrary expulsion of one of its members."

In making this bid for sympathy, the Argentine Government seems intent on drawing an early dividend on such démarches as the hint of the holding of elections, the recent undertaking to withdraw soldiers from civilian posts, and the professed suppression of pro-Axis propaganda. The Vice-President, meanwhile, it is suggested, is perhaps leaving the door open for elections by statements to the effect that it is not the parliamentary system, but simply the old politicians who are discredited. Nevertheless, some reorganisation of political parties must obviously be provided for if substance is to be given to the promise of elections. Colonel Perón's declaration about the return of soldiers to their proper sphere, referred to in last week's Summary, was a more definite undertaking: captains and those of lower rank are said to be already returning to the army in preparation for forthcoming manœuvres; majors and those above would return after the 30th November, and by the 1st January only about ten soldiers would remain in civilian posts. He himself, he said, proposed to give his main attention to army tasks in 1945. This talk is very fine but, even if it is quite sincere, the carrying out of the programme may to some extent be governed by the number of responsible civilians who are both capable of filling the vacancies and willing to work under the present clique.

Meanwhile, on the 26th October, Mr. Stettinius received the heads of Latin American missions in Washington at an informal meeting at which views were exchanged about the proposals made at Dumbarton Oaks and related American arrangements. At a press conference the following day, Mr. Stettinius said that these meetings would be continued.

The United States Embassy in London has again informed the Foreign Office of the importance attached to the non-conclusion of a meat contract with Argentina at this time.

The resignations are reported of General Mason, the Argentine Minister for Agriculture, and his Under-Secretary, Major Lorio; the Minister for Public Works, General Pistarini, has provisionally taken over the department of agriculture. General Rawson, formerly President of the Republic and Ambassador to Brazil, has been arrested.

The French Committee of Liberation has been recognised as the Provisional Government of France by Brazil, Peru, Colombia, Venezuela, Haiti, the Dominican Republic and Panama. Mexico, Chile, Peru, Cuba, Uruguay Colombia, Eucador and Venezuela have recognised, or have expressed their intention of recognising, the existing Italian Government. President Vargas has signed a decree suspending all restrictive measures against Italian residents in Brazil.

The new junta established in Guatemala has declared its intention of fulfilling all international obligations, and especially those connected with war effort. It has further dissolved the National Assembly and called elections for the 3rd–5th November. The new body now guarantees order, and claims that it has the support of the entire population. There were reported to have been a thousand casualties in the recent fighting. General Ubico and his wife have flown to the United States.

The new Salvadorean régime has been recognised by Spain, Honduras and Nicaragua, but declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of El Salvador. It claims to represent all parties except the followers of Sr. Romero, the left-wing candidate for the presidency, though its position would appear to be extremely precarious if it had not the solid support of the Army.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

Model's troops in Holland have now been forced back to the Maas, of which they still hold the right bank. The official German bulletins report "bitter fighting" at every stage, both on Walcheren and the mainland, and some success in counter-attacks delivered within Germany, south-east of Aachen. They claim also the prevention of an American break-through in the Vosges. The O.K.W. speaks of advance in Croatia, a fighting retreat in Hungary and effective counter-attacks in East Prussia and Kurland; Russian troops in Goldap were on the 5th reported to be completely cut off, the actual recapture of the place was announced on the 6th. Air raids on the Reich have received daily mention; the communiqué of the 3rd November gave a total of 52 British bombers lost over Düsseldorf on the preceding night. (The actual number lost was 19.)

Comment on the news has made grateful use of Allied admissions of German tenacity. Mr. Churchill was stated to have "solemnly buried" one of the greatest Allied hopes by affirming that a political revolt could not be expected in Germany. D.N.B. thought this remark the more significant because the 20th July had revealed "direct contacts particularly with Britain." Strength through Time is still the slogan for much war comment. A broadcast on the last day of October said that "every week gained by Germany retards the Allied plans by months." On the other hand, a full-scale general offensive by Eisenhower is prophesied for the very near future. Until this materialises, Germans are told to consider the focal point of the western fighting to be in the Vosges. Public comment is most gloomy, not in the much-tried west, but in the south of Germany. A Munich paper has attempted to draw a moral from German setbacks. It admits that "undeniable mistakes" in German policy have given the world a wrong idea of National Socialism. Germany's pre-war "display of daring initiative" was construed as arrogance, and for this Germany has paid dearly. Things could, according to this writer, hardly have come to a worse pass: "the threat of death hangs over us . . . . the pressure of war . . . . intolerable sacrifices, demands that sometimes make life seem no longer worth living, taking away as they do the last remnants of private peace, have beyond doubt on many a bleak day betrayed us into thinking that it must all end in defeat."

Goebbels has once again publicly attacked this war weariness. His answer to the question, what is the use of doing anything, is that this war will decide everything and that Germans have (if they wish to live) no choice but to become a nation of fanatics: "If to-day the entire nation were to work and fight as its best sons and daughters do at home and at the front, untiringly, like one possessed, faithful and strong-willed, then we should conclude this war victoriously, rapidly and decisively."

There is evidence that the Allied air offensive is being fought with typical German energy and resource. The railway system of Western Germany has been considerably adapted in order to escape air attack. Disorganisation in traffic grew to such proportions during September that marshalling yards west of the Rhine have been relieved of the greater part of their functions and trains in this area have now to be run only by night. The repercussions of this congestion and the effect of traffic restrictions are now felt in varying degrees throughout the Reich. A neutral traveller recently calculated that the journey from Berlin to Bâle now takes anything up to five days. In the case of oil installations, which now enjoy high reparation priority, the rate of repair during October was greater than the rate of destruction. The protection of the population, on the other hand, is proving less successful. Civil defence services are reported saturated and emergency arrangements chaotic, particularly in Duisburg, where many people could neither be fed nor housed without long delay.

A small but significant alteration has been recently announced in the German military penal code. Soldiers who have lost contact with their units and offices are now liable to punishment if they fail to report within one day instead of within three days as specified in the 1940 edition of the code. The change reflects not only what is now called the September crisis, referred to here last week, but the increasing severity of the High Command in dealing with desertion. A Swiss observer recently watched a troop train in a main German station; in the centre of the train two cattle trucks, heavily wired and guarded, were crammed with deserters, placarded as such and imploring food and drink.

It is interesting to find the expression "Free Corps," with its memories of the illicit Reichswehr detachments of the 'twenties, now recurring in Nazi propaganda. Some of the soldiers left in France have organised themselves, notably in Brittany, into a "Free Corps France," and, according to a recent broadcast to German forces have stocks of food and ammunition and even French recruits fighting with them. Information about Himmler's plans for an organised resistance movement within Germany continues to be received. Men chosen to lead local groups are reported to have been already provided with false papers and even sent to concentration camps. Such men swear eternal fidelity to the Führer and his teaching and accept, according to one report with alacrity, the prospect of an illegal and underground resistance to the enemy in all parts of the Reich. The actual organisation of this resistance seems to owe much to what might be expected to be its model, the partisan movements in Russia, Yugoslavia and France. The unit is a group of five men controlling a single district, such groups having no contact with each other but only with a superior officer. The quick passing of news to the centre is insisted upon as an essential of effective warfare. Both leaders and subordinates would appear to be most carefully chosen by the Security Service of the S.S.

The Volkssturm is meeting heavy weather both inside and outside Germany. Local papers reprove those who think it funny to talk of the new army of old men and cripples, armed with scythes or sticks and playing Red Indians. Field-Marshal Paulus, the senior German officer in Russian hands, has broadcast from the Moscow station "Free Germany" an indignant refutation of Himmler's recent attacks on his comrade, General von Seydlitz, denying that such a man as Himmler, who is "driving the German people to suicide with his Volkssturm," is a fit judge of the conduct of German officers.

Both the Nazi authorities and the population of Austria seem conscious of the fact that Vienna is the next stage on the Russian road from Budapest. Gauleiter Jury has told his people in Niederdonau that there will be no evacuation from the south-eastern frontier districts, and that "the inconveniences necessarily connected with fortification building" must be endured. Party officials would seem to have been recalled from digging in North Italy to superintend the same task at home. The confusion is increased by the influx of refugees, said to be Volksdeutsche from Serbia and Hungary, whom Austrians are asked to assist and comfort. It is reported that in Linz flats of air-raid evacuees have already been requisitioned for them. According to Gauleiter Hofer, the Volkssturm in Austria is to bear the traditional Tyrolese title of Standschützen and to have field-grey uniforms. A Stabsführer has already been appointed for Niederdonau, and leaders' courses have been started in Innsbruck.

The issue of a new list of broadcasting stations to which Germans may listen hardly justifies the assertion that they are not allowed to hear their own foreign broadcasts. The list is little more than half as long as that previously issued in 1943, because of the exclusion of stations now in Allied hands, but the only other changes are of minor importance, the omission of those in Norway and Holland, of Strasbourg and of two Reich stations transmitting for foreign countries. German internal censorship is neither more nor less strict than it has always been. The German Forces transmission, including the frank articles appearing in the military paper Front und Heimat, has always been forbidden to listeners within the Reich.

The speeches at the fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Warthegau appear to have been censored for transmission to the press. The German Home Service broadcast what purported to be a full account of the proceedings. Guderian specifically coupled together in his short speech the soldiers in his audience, including those who had fought in Warsaw, and the Volkssturm. To the latter he promised an Army issue of equipment and of weapons, which he assured them would be good ones. Himmler's own speech was much more vigorous and outspoken than the later D.N.B. account made out. Among notable excisions were, a reference to his "dear old friend" Daluege, the promise of such a resettlement of Germany's eastern provinces as would provide "a fully developed farm. . . . for every soldier of every unit of the Armed Forces," and the prophecy that "sooner or later we shall advance again beyond our frontiers." According to D.N.B. Himmler ended his speech with the more politic exhortation to stand firm until the enemies of Germany gradually realised that it would be tantamount to suicide for them to continue the assault against the Reich.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Reliable information as to the latest developments in Slovakia is now scanty. Bratislava continues to put out more or less credible reports on the situation in Central Slovakia, claiming that the only military operation at present in progress is the mopping up of the remnants of the resistance forces. On the 2nd November the German European Service in Slovak claimed that 12,000 prisoners had been taken and that captured booty included 284 guns of various calibres, 900 vehicles, 92 tanks, 65 aircraft and 28 field-kitchens. A later claim, on the 6th November, added to this tally 3,000 more prisoners, a further 18 guns, 5 tanks, 15 tons of explosives, a large food-store and 479 railway trucks of war material, including 72 loaded with ammunition, 10 with tanks, and 15 with field-kitchens. It is hard to accept these figures at their face value but there is, unfortunately, little cause to doubt the truth of a statement that General Viest, commander of the Czechoslovak forces in Slovakia, and General Golian, his deputy, have fallen into German hands. The latter had been the leader and military organiser of the revolt inside Slovakia, while General Viest, formerly Minister of State in the Czechoslovak Government in London, only arrived in Slovakia to take over his new duties in October. Unless the Slovak leaders are deterred by fears of ultimate retribution these two officers are likely to be executed, for Viest was sentenced to death in his absence some three years ago and Golian has already been indicted for treason for his part in the rising.

The Germans are evidently becoming increasingly concerned to maintain order in the Protectorate and especially in the province of Moravia which, as the Red Army presses westwards, takes on an added importance in the German rear. On the 1st November, what was described as a meeting of the Autonomous Protectorate Government was held at Vestín, about a dozen miles from the Slovak border. The Premier and the Minister of Agriculture were present and the former addressed a gathering of officials, workers, farmers and tradesmen. He covered the usual ground—the dangers of Bolshevism, the folly of hoping for British and American protection from the Red menace, the useless bloodshed that revolt against the Germans would entail—and promised a rude awakening to "those here in Bohemia and Moravia who are playing at setting up National Committees."

Der Neue Tag of the 20th October reported that Henlein had appointed Grupenführer Franz May as Gaustabsführer of the Volkssturm in the Sudetenland, and on the 2nd November D.N.B. announced that 90,000 Sudeten Volkssturm had taken part in the 1944 defence rallies which ended on the 31st October.

POLAND.

The Polish Government is still hesitating to make any public definition of its policy concerning the recent Moscow conversations. It is possible that such a decision may become easier to make as soon as the results of the American Presidential Election will have thrown light on the probable attitude of the United States in World Affairs. In the meantime any immediate acceptance, for instance, of the Curzon Line would necessarily seem in Polish eyes like surrender of a bird still partly in the hand; while the future expectation of compensation in the west and of Allied guarantees of Poland's integrity and independence must still seem like birds very much in the bush.

On the other hand, a pronouncement reported to have been made at the week-end by M. Strasburger, Polish Minister Resident in Cairo, in which he said that Vilna and Lwow were even dearer to Polish hearts than Warsaw, and that to give up the Galician oilfelds would risk the economic ruin of Poland, should not be taken as indications of the form which the decision of the Polish Government is likely to take.

In the meantime the Soviet administration and the Polish National Liberation Committee in Lublin continue to treat the Curzon Line and its southward extension in Eastern Galicia ("Line A") as a provisional boundary. Thus, since its liberation in the fourth week of October, Suwalki has been under the administration of the Lublin Committee. That Committee has on the other hand been advising the Poles at Lwow to withdraw to the west.

The National Liberation Committee in Lublin has published a decree dealing with speculation and war profiteering (25th October). Progress is reported in the dividing up of large estates, particularly in the province (voivodeship) of Rzeszow, i.e., the portion of the province of Lwow situated west of the southern extension of the Curzon Line. A beginning has been made at Lublin in the trial of two former collaborationists. Fifty other cases are shortly to be tried.

It was reported in a Tass message that Metropolitan Andrew Szeptycki, Archbishop of Lwow and primate of the Uniate Church in Eastern Galicia, had died in Lwow on the 1st November at the age of 79. He was described by Tass as head of the Greek Catholic (another name for Uniate) Church in the U.S.S.R., and it has announced that the administration of that Church had been taken over by Metropolitan Joseph Slepoy (Slipij), who, after being for many years director of the Uniate Seminary in Lwow, had recently been made Suffragan Bishop of Lwow.

SOVIET UNION.

In the far North no fighting has been reported in the Soviet communiqués since the 1st November, when an Order of the Day proclaimed the complete liberation of the Petsamo Region. In East Prussia only defensive fighting has been mentioned, in the area round Goldap, which the Germans claim to have recaptured. No progress has been reported in Poland, but in Hungary the left bank of the Tisza was cleared (2nd November), Szolnok captured (4th November) and a rapid advance between the Tisza and the Danube has brought the Red Army to the outskirts of Budapest.

In an Order of the Day issued on the 7th November Marshal Stalin announced that the Soviet State frontier had been restored along its whole length, which, if taken literally would mean, that the last remnants of German resistance in the Latvian S.S.R. have been overcome, although this was not specifically stated. This great achievement, announced on the anniversary of the October Revolution, was celebrated by twenty-four salvoes in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Minsk, Petrozavodsk, Tallinn, Riga, Vilna, Kishinev, Tiflis, Sevastopol and Lvov. In the same Order Marshal Stalin claimed that in the summer battle for Byelorussia 540,000 Germans had been killed or captured; in the Ukraine a further 250,000 officers and men had been accounted for.

On the 6th November, the 27th anniversary of the October Revolution, Marshal Stalin made his annual speech to the Moscow Soviet. In reviewing military developments his theme was "the astounding precision" with which the programme of common action drawn up at Tehran had been implemented. "Our Allies accomplished a mass landing operation on the coast of France that was unparalleled in history for scope and organisation," and this "second front in Europe" engaged up to 75 German divisions. Thanks to this help the Red Army, which a year ago was fighting virtually single-handed, had put out of action 120 German and satellite divisions (presumably in the whole course of the war). In 1943 the Red Army faced 257 enemy divisions, of which 207 were German: the figures were now 180 German and 24 Hungarian divisions. "It cannot be doubted," the Marshal added, that "Hungary will also be put out of action in the nearest future." Germany, isolated in Europe, now "finds herself on the brink of inevitable destruction." "To-day the Red Army has . . . . more tanks, guns and planes than the German Army": and they are superior in quality.

Turning to politics, the Marshal again took up the theme of Allied solidarity (apparently addressing his remarks not least to those members of the Bolshevik party who are not as convinced of the wisdom of a policy of collaboration with the Western Allies as he is). "There is talk of differences between the three Powers on certain security problems. Of course, there are differences, and they will arise on a number of other issues too. Differences of opinion occur even among people in the same party." What is surprising, the Marshal continued, is not the existence of disagreements, but the fact that "they are so few and that as a rule in practically every case they are resolved in a spirit of unity and co-ordination among the three Great Powers." Marshal Stalin referred particularly to the decisions of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference and to the "spirit of complete unanimity" which had prevailed during the recent visit of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden to Moscow. All the efforts of the Hitlerites to divide the United Nations had failed because "the alliance between the U.S.S.R., Great Britain and the United States is founded not on accidental transitory considerations but on vitally important and long-term interests."

Finally Marshal Stalin dealt with the treatment of Germany after defeat, and with "making impossible new aggression and new war, if not for ever, then at least for a long time to come. After her defeat Germany will, of course, be disarmed, in the economic and in the military-political sense." But that is not enough. "It is common knowledge," he declared, "that the German leaders are already preparing for a new war." History has shown the advantages which the aggressor enjoys. Marshal Stalin quoted the Pearl Harbour incident, the loss of the Philippines, Hong Kong and Singapore, to show that Japan, "as the aggressive nation, proved to be better prepared for war than Great Britain and the United States, which pursued a policy of peace." The U.S.S.R. had similarly lost the Ukraine, White Russia and the Baltic area because she was less prepared for war than Germany. So the problem is "to preclude fresh aggression on Germany's part and, if war should start, nevertheless, to stifle it at its very beginning and give it no opportunities to develop into a big war . . . . Apart from the complete disarmament of the aggressive nations, there is only one means to this end": to establish a security organisation representing the peace-loving nations, whose controlling body has at its disposal the minimum of armed force necessary to prevent aggression, and "to oblige this organisation to employ these armed forces without delay, if it becomes necessary, to avert or stop aggression and to punish those guilty of aggression." This must not be "a repetition of the sad memory of the League of Nations," which had neither the right nor the means to avert aggression. These steps will be effective if the Great Powers "continue to act in a spirit of unanimity and concord . . . . They will not be effective if this essential condition is violated."

Soviet territory, Marshal Stalin continued, has been cleared "now and for ever" of the Hitlerite filth. It now remains for the Red Army, jointly with its Allies, "to finish off the Fascist beast in its own lair, and to raise over Berlin the banner of victory. There is reason to expect that this task will be fulfilled by the Red Army in the near future."

Marshal Stalin's reference to Japan is new and encouraging. Not only did he describe her as an "aggressive nation," but by demanding "the complete disarmament of the aggressive nations" he included by implication that of Japan. His clarification of the Soviet Government's position with regard to Germany should finally silence whispers suggesting the possibility of any Soviet-German "deal."

The slogans put forward by the Central Committee of the Communist Party for the Anniversary of the Revolution are on traditional lines (see Summary

No. 213). There is, however, a new note of victorious confidence in all of them. Thus the first slogan, acclaiming the revolution, declares that it "created the mighty Soviet Power, the foundation of the freedom and independence of the peoples of the U.S.S.R., the bulwark of peace among peoples." In hailing the Red Army, it is emphasised that it "has driven out the German-Fascist invaders beyond the boundaries of our motherland, and is smashing them on German territory." References to the Allies are also warmer. The Anglo-Soviet-American alliance will ensure not only victory but also "a stable peace between the peoples of the whole world." Greetings are extended to "the brave British and American sailors" as well as to "the gallant troops of Great Britain and the United States, who are smashing the Hitlerite hordes in Western Europe." The Yugoslav, Polish, French and Czech peoples are also singled out for special mention. In the case of Poland, controversial issues are carefully avoided, the appeal being to "patriots of Poland" to assist their liberators—the Red Army and the Polish Army, with no mention of the P.C.N.L.

The Soviet campaign against those European Powers which have not recognised the Soviet Government (see last week's Summary) is developing briskly. On the 4th November, Moscow Radio broadcast in Russian a communiqué of the Information Bureau of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs on Soviet-Swiss relations. This communiqué revealed that on the 10th October, the Swiss Minister in London forwarded to the Soviet Government through its Ambassador in London a memorandum containing a proposal for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations. After summarising this memorandum the statement continues: "It is, however, a matter of general knowledge that during many years the Swiss Government, in violation of its old democratic traditions, has been pursuing a pro-Fascist policy hostile to the Soviet Union, which together with other democratic countries is consistently waging a struggle against Hitlerite Germany in the interests of peace-loving nations." The Soviet Government therefore "refused to accept the proposals of the Swiss Government . . . . since the Swiss Government has hitherto not disassociated itself in any form from its former policy of hostility to the Soviet Union." Switzerland has never recognised the Soviet Government, and the latter may well find irresistible the desire to inflict a public humiliation on so belated a penitent. Its attitude may, however, be part of the wider war of nerves which the Soviet Government is waging against some neutrals, and in particular against Spain. If relatively harmless Switzerland is handled so roughly, what will the Soviet attitude be towards Spain, whose Government is treated by Soviet propaganda as an Axis satellite, and some of whose generals are on the Soviet list of war criminals? Izvestiya's foreign observer returned to this familiar Soviet topic on the 3rd November, stating that "Fascist Spain is Hitler's last bulwark in Europe," and that "people naturally ask: 'Will the Madrid lackey outlive his European boss?' This question cannot be deemed irrelevant either for the cause of victory over Germany or for the future of European peace. That is why ripening events in Spain attract the close attention of public circles in all democratic countries." So once again Soviet interest in the future of Spain, and unqualified condemnation of the Franco régime, have been made clear to the world.

The Soviet press and radio campaign against the Persian Government (see Summary No. 265 under "Middle East") continues, reinforced this week by a long article on "Events in Persia," in Izvestiya of the 4th November, which accuses the Persian Government of violating its treaty and agreement obligations to the U.S.S.R. Izvestiya states that in contravention of clause 13 of the Soviet-Persian Treaty of 1921, the Persian Government, "willingly inviting concessionnaires from other countries, raised obstacles to the operations of the Soviet-Persian Khurian joint stock company." M. Saed's Government is once more charged with apathy in prosecuting Hitlerite agents, and the Prime Minister himself "with plain hypocrisy and double-dealing," whilst Izvestiya vigorously disputes the Persian allegation that the requests for oil concessions made by Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R. had been treated equitably. For the first time in this controversy the presence of American troops in Persia is questioned as being incompatible with "the sovereignty and independence of Persia, which has no treaty alliance with the United States (see also under "Middle East").

An article on the presidential elections in the United States which appeared in the official Izvestiya on the 5th November is remarkable mainly for its bold title: "President Roosevelt's election is guaranteed." The tone of the article is unqualifiedly pro-Roosevelt, and it even mentions "reports in Republican headquarters" that "a sham 'attempt' on Dewey" is being prepared, the responsibility for which would be laid on the American Communists. Even this, however, could not help Governor Dewey, but would merely expose him utterly "in the eyes of those who still harbour some illusions on his behalf."

On the 4th November the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet awarded the Order of Lenin to a number of Soviet diplomats, including M. Gousev, the Soviet Ambassador in London; M. Gromyko (Washington), M. Malik (Tokyo), and M. Panyushkin (Ambassador to China, who has been in Moscow for health reasons for the last six months). The Order was also awarded to three Deputy-Commissars for Foreign Affairs—M. Kavtaradze (who recently wielded the big stick in Persia—see Summary No. 265), M. Lozovsky and M. Dekanozov. The Order of the Red Banner of Labour was awarded (among others) to M. Orlov (Soviet political adviser on the Control Commission in Finland), General Maksimov and M. Kostylev (the recently appointed Ambassadors to Persia and Italy respectively), M. Solod (Soviet Minister to Syria and the Lebanon), M. Lavrentiev (recently appointed People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the R.S.F.S.R.), and M. Sobolev (Minister in London).

The end of the harvest this year was marked by several statements on the Soviet agricultural position. One broadcast talk recalled that on the eve of the war 250,000 collective farms replaced the former small-holdings of 25 million individual peasants. The technical advantages of this change-over from small-scale to large-scale mechanised farming were stressed, as well as the fact that in the pre-war period Soviet agriculture had 480,000 tractors and 154,000 combines (worked by 970,000 tractor-drivers and 255,000 combine-harvester operators). Agriculture was then 70 per cent. mechanised, and this resulted in important increases in agricultural yields. Furthermore, writing recently in Krasny Flot, the People's Deputy Commissar for Agriculture, M. Benediktov, declared that the total increase in the sown area this year in collective farms amounts to 12 million hectares, of which 9 million are under grain. He said that as a result of the increased sown area, accompanied by higher yields, the country will receive far more agricultural produce than during the preceding war-time years. He did not, however, add that there will be many more mouths to feed.

SCANDINAVIA.

The dissolution of the Civic Guard, or Skyddskår, in Finland, the decree for which passed its third reading in the Diet on the 3rd November, has caused great local depression, and is described in a Helsinki message to Svenska Dagbladet as "the hardest blow to Finland since the Armistice was signed." These regrets are not, however, shared in labour circles, which have always regarded the institution with suspicion as a reactionary body; in spite of the agreement between the Social Democrats and the Skyddskår during the "winter war," Arbetarbladet states that it knows of no instance where organised Swedo-Finnish workers have joined it. Originally, indeed, the Skyddskår was formed surreptitiously to counter the Bolshevik revolution, and formed the nucleus of the White Guards who suppressed communism in the stage of the war for independence which began early in 1918. The organisation was legally recognised as a part of the military forces of the republic in 1927, though at this stage the step was stubbornly resisted by the Social Democrats. Later, however, the organisation developed valuable social and educational features, which are remembered with wistful regret, and it was regarded as a cherished part of the national life. Considering its origin, however, and its pronouncedly bourgeois colour, it could hardly have been expected to meet with the approval of the Soviet Union.

The Germans and quislings are making intense propaganda of the evacuation of the civil population from Northern Norway, which they represent as a voluntary flight from the advancing Russians. On the other hand, Norwegian sources point out that Jonas Lie, who has been put in control of Troms and and Finnmark and armed with fresh powers in the Police Department by a decree signed by Quisling on the 2nd November, addressed the people of Kirkenes and Björnevatn immediately before the capture of this region by the Soviet forces, declaring that all houses would be destroyed by the Germans and the civil population compulsorily evacuated. Inhabitants of the Lyngenfjord–Skibotn area are also reported to have been compulsorily evacuated. A ship's steward who endeavoured to persuade an evacuation ship to make for a Soviet-controlled port has been condemned by a special court and subsequently shot.

The Norwegian Military Command broadcast from London on the 31st October a warning to the underground forces in Norway, pointing out that events in the North had not so far affected the previous instructions to the rest of the country to avoid open fighting. Such a warning may well have been felt desirable in view of M. Nygaardsvold's broadcast reported in last week's Summary. The Home Front leadership has also issued instructions, in anticipation of further intensive efforts by the Germans to break up the resistance movement, strongly emphasising the importance of increased security precautions.

It has now been announced in the Swedish Press and on the radio that the representatives of the Norwegian Government during their visit to Stockholm reached agreement with the Swedish authorities as to the use of the Norwegian police forces trained in Sweden. A number of them, it is said, will depart for North Norway as soon as possible. The total number of trainees is said to be some 11,000. M. Lie and M. Wold have now arrived in Moscow.

The Allied air attack on the Gestapo headquarters in Aarhus University on the 31st October seems to have been extremely successful. The majority of the Danes killed and injured are believed to have been in the German service and the latest estimates of German dead are over a hundred. D.P.T. (4th November) reports that among those killed must almost certainly be included the notorious Gestapo leader Schwitzgebel, who controlled the whole of Jutland. There is also stated to have been an extensive destruction of filed records, a circumstance which should be of great value to the Danish underground movement.

In spite of continued German raids and arrests in Copenhagen, sabotage in Denmark continues unchecked, especially on the Jutland railways, where explosions and dislocations are reported to be of nightly occurrence. A successful coup took place on the 6th November, when five Danish patriots captured the largest train ferryboat, normally plying across the Great Belt, and brought it successfully into the Swedish port of Helsingborg. A successful raid was made on the same day on the Public Registry at Aalborg, when card indexes containing particulars of 200,000 persons were removed.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The distribution of food in Belgium appears to be improving slightly. The supplies now (see last Summary) being furnished by the Allied military authorities are contributing to the improvement, but there is also reason to believe that the Belgian authorities are meeting with more success in their efforts to tackle the food problem. They continue, however, to be subjected to a stream of censure in the Belgian press, which never ceases taxing the Government with weakness. Criticism, though often captious, is sometimes pertinent. Lack of co-ordination between departments undoubtedly exists, and the fact that there are separate Ministries of Food and of Agriculture probably causes some inefficiency. It is also alleged that M. Pierlot lacks the strength to put an end to inter-departmental rivalries.

Meanwhile, however, the Communists have decided to continue to support the Government; that is to say, the Communist Ministers will not resign forthwith; but the Communist press will probably continue to run down the Government, as, indeed, will most other papers. It is a matter of some significance that M. Spaak, who proclaims himself a "militant Socialist," is advocating the formation of a Left-wing bloc which would include Socialists, Communists, Christian Democrats and Left-wing Liberals. This project is in the air and has aroused some discussion (see Summary No. 263) in many quarters.

The Belgian resistance organisations, especially the Independence Front, continue to be very discontented and to complain that the Government is not giving them due recognition. Many Belgians, on the other hand, are afraid that these bodies may constitute a serious threat to the rule of law. The political situation, therefore, is anything but stable.

In Luxemburg the Government seems to be grappling with the urgent problems of the moment in a workmanlike manner and to be enjoying wide popular support, though some of their measures have been criticised by the Communists.

In the Occupied Netherlands food grows scarcer and German repression becomes more brutal; the rounding-up and deportation of Dutchmen by the German police continues.

The inhabitants of Walcheren are in a sorry plight; large parts of the island are under water—at least at high tide; there is little food; and there may soon be a grave shortage of pure drinking water.

The free Dutch News Agency has published a statement by the Catholic Chaplain-General to the Dutch forces on conditions in other parts of the liberated Netherlands. He draws a vivid picture of the destruction done by the Germans before their retreat and states that rations are so low that those engaged on road repairs or in mining find it difficult to do their job properly. The Dutch, he added, do not complain much; they are grateful for their liberation, but they are "tired and sad" and puzzled by the fact that 10,000 German civilians, brought from the Aachen area to camps on Dutch soil, are being much better fed than they are. They think they should get the food that the Allies are giving the Germans and that the Germans should be put on short commons. Respect for the rules of international law, they argue, does not fill their empty stomachs.

FRANCE.

The announcement that the Prime Minister and Mr. Eden have accepted an invitation from General de Gaulle and M. Bidault to visit Paris in the near future as the guests of the Provisional Government has been warmly welcomed in Paris. The French communiqué which gave the news on the 3rd November expressed the pleasure which the French Government and people would have in seeing the visitors in the capital to the liberation of which the gallant British forces had so largely contributed. It described Mr. Churchill as "the famous British statesman who during this war has rendered and is still rendering such incompatible service to the entire free world" and Mr. Eden as "the great Foreign Minister whose far-sighted activity is one of the pivots of the great coalition." It added that the visit would give an opportunity for most useful talks between the two friendly Allied Governments. The prospect of such talks has given general satisfaction to the Paris papers, several of which have published leading articles paying warm tribute to Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden. The Communist Humanité, however, fears that the visit may lead to some exclusive Anglo-French arrangement, dictated by "les trusts" and leaving Russia out of account. The French home service of the 4th November broadcast a report of a talk about the Levant by the diplomatic correspondent of the Agence Française de Presse, in which he expressed the hope that Syria and the Lebanon would be frankly discussed while the British Ministers were in France.

The State Department announced on the 5th November that an invitation to visit Paris had also been addressed to President Roosevelt and Mr. Hull. The French note conveying this invitation described it as "an expression of the appreciation of the entire French nation for the outstanding contribution which the peoples and armies of the United States have made to the liberation of the capital of France and of the greater part of her territory." Acceptance of the invitation and the date of any visit will presumably depend largely upon the result of the Presidential election.

The vexed question of the Communist-inspired Patriotic Militia or Patriotic Guard (see last Summary) is still unsettled. On the 31st October the Council of Ministers showed that they stood firm by their decision to disarm all groups other than the army and the regular police when they unanimously approved a number of measures to implement that decision. A provision that all French men and women who wished to volunteer "for the defence of republican liberties" should give their names to the local town hall or police station appeared, however, to leave the door open for the transformation of the Patriotic Militia into a sort of unarmed Home Guard to protect republican order against internal dangers. Nevertheless, the Government's measures were violently opposed by the Communist Party, whose Political Bureau held a meeting on the 2nd November, at which, it is to be noted, both the Communist Ministers were present. The Bureau issued a lengthy statement (also said to have been unanimously approved) declaring that the President of the Government had once again taken it upon himself to treat the French Resistance movment as a negligible quantity, that the Government's decisions proceeded from " an unmistakable distrust of the people," and that the alleged need to collect all arms for the soldiers was a mere pretext, since the army needed heavy arms, not the light arms of the Patriotic Guard. " Conscious of the seriousness of the situation created by the Government's decisions," the Political Bureau appealed to " all patriots to be very much on their guard and to foil all provocative acts " which might be taken against them. It directed its representative on the C.N.R. to obtain the suspension of the Government's measures, invited the Communist members of the Departmental Committees of Liberation to stimulate the committees " to safeguard the rights of the Resistance movement " and instructed the Communist members of the Consultative Assembly to express " the misgivings of the people, who do not want to be delivered defenceless to the treacherous blows of the Fifth Column."

Fortunately the C.N.R. has proved more conciliatory. After a meeting on the 3rd November, it announced that it had unanimously decided to do away with the name " Patriotic Militia " and to apply instead to all groups under its supervision the designation of " Civic and Republican Guards." It had also approved a plan to give these Guards a legal status, and it published a communication which it had sent to the Government, expressing its desire to collaborate with it loyally and suggesting that its plan, which had been adopted unanimously, should form the basis for further discussions. The plan proposes that the Civic Guards, who are to exercise " patriotic vigilance throughout the country " should have depots of arms in places supervised by the municipalities and for which the local Committees of Liberation would be responsible. In the ordinary way these arms would be used only for specially defined purposes and only a few responsible officers of the Guards would carry arms regularly, but in certain cases of urgency the Guards might use their weapons first and account to the public authorities afterwards. It remains to be seen whether a compromise on these lines will be acceptable to the Government. In the meantime some attempts are being made to force its hand. Thus a mass meeting organised by the Paris Committee of Liberation to glorify the rôle of the Patriotic Militia was held in the Vélodrôme d'Hiver on the 4th November and among the speakers was the President of the C.N.R. himself, who said that the Militia had now reached the second stage in their career, the stage of " total integration in the defence of the Republic " under the name of Civic Republican Guards.

On the 31st October, the Council of Ministers approved an ordinance setting up a High Court of Justice to try members of the " so-called Government of Vichy." This Court will be composed of the five highest French magistrates, the President of the Cour de Cassation and the presidents of the different Chambers of that court. It will have 24 jurors chosen from a list of 100 names drawn up by the Provisional Consultative Assembly and comprising 33 Senators, 33 Deputies and 34 non-parliamentary members of the Assembly.

The appeal of Georges Suarez against the death sentence recently pronounced by the Paris Court of Justice has been rejected by the Cour de Cassation and he has made a final appeal to General de Gaulle. Recent sentences include that of penal servitude for life on General Pinsard, former Inspector-General of the Vichy Legion of French Volunteers, and recent arrests that of Sisley Huddleston who became a French citizen after the Armistice of 1940, and distinguished himself by the fervour of his Pétainist and anti-British sentiments.

The creation of factory committees, which was decided in principle by the Government on the 29th September, was the subject of a draft ordinance adopted by the Cabinet on the 31st October. This provides for the establishment of committees representing workers and management in all factories with over 100 employees. Their functions will be not only social but economic, since they must be kept informed of the financial and general situation of the factory, they must be shown all documents normally communicated to shareholders, and their reports must be laid before the general assembly of shareholders. They have the right to suggest means of increasing production in the factory.

The financial measures adopted by the Government on the 3rd November close a period of tension when many eyes were focussed on the Belgian financial experiment and the fear that similar measures might be applied in France was causing a flight from the currency and a run on notes of small denomination. Press comment on the Belgian measures has not been favourable, and they were violently attacked by the Communists for penalising the peasants. The French Government has instead decided to issue a 3 per cent. long-term loan at par, to be called the Liberation Loan, in order to mop up surplus currency. Upon the success of this loan will depend the decision whether further measures should be taken. Meanwhile, the severe measures directed against those who profited by the occupation (see Summary 261) form a complement to the new loan. The Treasury situation is satisfactory and the " rentes " are rising, while the comparatively low rate of interest offered on the new loan, the first ever to be issued at par, indicates the strong position of the Government at present.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Everything goes to show that the military phase of the activities of the Spanish maquis along the Pyrenees is definitely over. The clearing of the Val d'Aran by Spanish regular troops reported last week, and since confirmed, is probably the last operation of any consequence before winter prevents even guerrilla fighting in those high, windswept passes. The political phase, however, is by no means over; indeed, the Congress of the Unión Nacional in Toulouse, which ended on the 5th November, not only excited the delegates themselves, as was natural, but, thanks to Reuters and the B.B.C., attracted a world-wide publicity which neither its merits nor its significance deserved. But, even here the atmosphere was calmer: Radio Toulouse no longer incites the Spaniards to rebellion, and there are indications that counsels of prudence from General Miaja in Mexico, from Dr. Negrín, still in London, and not improbably from Moscow, too, have persuaded the Spanish men of the maquis that the moment has not yet come for Franco to be driven out. The immediate threat, never very grave, has receded, but the future situation will not be comfortable for the Falange régime. The probable infiltration of hostile men and propaganda into Barcelona, with its large, restless, industrial proletariat, may have serious results in undermining Franco's position during the winter months.

The Caudillo on his side has not been idle, and in order to get full publicity for an explanation of his political position—which was certainly overdue—he has given an interview to the B.U.P. correspondent in Madrid. The purpose of this unusual step was to stake a claim to be heard at the peace table. Undeterred by modesty or by apprehensions of misunderstanding, General Franco proceeded to justify his claim by painting a picture of Spanish policy since 1939 which the epoptic commentator can describe only as amazing in its impudence. By a play on words he claimed a voice in the peace settlement on the specious grounds that Spain had shown a desire for peace (as if that was a major virtue) by remaining at peace. He took credit for not having stabbed France in the back in 1940, an act forbidden by " our traditional chivalry." But the cream of his remarks is in his description of Spain as an " organic democracy." In the sense that anything organic is potentially putrescent, this is perhaps a defensible definition. When we remember that nowhere in the world is the gulf between words and their meaning deeper and wider than in Falange Spain, there is still room for astonishment at the Caudillo's Alice-in-Wonderland description of the Spanish State as based upon " the popular will and purest Christian tenets." The phrase " the popular will," which at first glance seems hardly applicable to Franco Spain, would doubtless be justified by its author in the recent syndical elections of which much has been made in the Spanish press. These elections to choose the delegates for the several corporations have been held with the sole idea of impressing foreign opinion that a free, popular election has taken place in Spain. In fact, the candidates for each corporation were limited to two or three, and were nominated by the Falange Syndicates themselves. Since it was important for propaganda that the greatest number of voters be brought to the polls, or at least be registered by their vote, certain devices were practised to this end. First, all blank papers counted as a vote for the first candidate on the list who was, of course, the Falange first choice. Secondly, employers were made responsible for their workers going to the polls and defaulters were to be heavily fined for their anti-democratic " attempt against the liberty of the vote." Thirdly, each voter received a paper which he had to have stamped at the pooling-booth and which he was told to keep, the implication being that he would be called upon to produce it next time he wanted a ration card or identity papers. So much for the expression of " popular will." As to " the purest Christian tenets," General Franco, of course, would have to exclude from their application the sanctity of human life and liberty, for there are still nearly 150,000 political prisoners awaiting trial or under preventive arrest, and it was admitted confidentially by the Director of Prisons that 70 political executions took place in September and that 1,137 persons were then lying under sentence of death.

These conditions are the direct responsibility of General Franco himself; he has his own ideas of the "purest Christian tenets," and is quite impervious to appeals for clemency. The latest move, taken on the advice of the Nuncio, is a petition for an amnesty signed by all the Spanish bishops, which will be presented to Franco by the Minister of Justice.

As to the future, the Caudillo made a glancing reference to the Monarchy. After saying that the question of the restoration was not an actual one, Franco affirmed that should the Monarchy be re-established after the war "it must constitute an eminently social reformist monarchy, very different from that which recently presided over our decadence." These are not words to encourage Don Juan in any lakeside dreams of a reconciliation with the self-opinionated and stubborn little Leader of the Falange Española y Tradicionalista.

There is no news of political interest from Lisbon, where negotiations for the new Supply-Purchase agreement are continuing between His Majesty's Government and the Portuguese Government.

ITALY.

Although there appears to be some division of opinion amongst the inhabitants of the Val d'Aosta as to the desirability of annexation to France, the Italian Minister at Berne has reported to his Government that a number of prominent persons in the valley have issued a declaration expressing their sincere loyalty to Italy and their hostility to annexation to France. At the same time, they insist that some autonomy as regards language and culture be granted to the valley.

The Committee of National Liberation of Piedmont is making representations to the Italian Government regarding its financial situation, suggesting that the Government should give secret guarantees to certain banks in the area which are apparently ready to advance funds to patriot forces in the Alpine valleys to the number of about 45,000. These same forces have also complained that the French do not seem to recognise their status since units which have been forced across the frontier were disarmed.

The Northern Italy Liberation Committee fear that a grave situation may arise when the Germans evacuate Venezia Giulia, in spite of the agreement already made between the Committee and Marshal Tito for the preservation of public order. A direct agreement between the Italian and Yugoslav Governments is advocated. The Allied plan is to keep Venezia Giulia under A.M.G. control until the peace conference, making use of all administration, whether Italian or Yugoslav, which is found to be functioning when the Allies arrive. But the ethnical distribution of the population will make the situation an extremely delicate one.

Owing to some employers not paying the wages increase ratified by the Council of Ministers on the 19th October, a half-an-hour sit-down strike was organised in Rome by the local workers' committees. This strike, however, was called off at a meeting between the secretaries of the Italian General Confederation of Labour and Signor Bonomi, at which the Ministers of Agriculture and Industry were also present. The Government announced that the employers had no justification for not paying the increased wages since this measure already had the Cabinet's approval. Besides the increase of wages, the workers had demanded supplementary rations and the creation of workers' canteens. According to a press report, at a further meeting under the presidency of Signor Bonomi, attended by three Allied representatives, it was decided to grant these demands, and that the Allies should supply macaroni and flour to these canteens beginning on the 6th November.

Reactions to Mr. Eden's visit to Rome were, on the whole, very favourable. The Italians in general see in Mr. Eden's visit a gesture of goodwill towards the present-day Italy which has rid itself of Fascism, so consistently opposed by the Secretary of State.

Signor Aldisio, the High Commissioner for Sicily, has received the Trapani Liberation Committee, and has assured them that reconstruction of the harbours of Trapani and Marsala will soon begin, and that the municipal and provincial administration would also soon be reconstituted with elements chosen from the Liberation Committees.

Citizenship of Rome has been conferred on President Roosevelt. The Mayor, Prince Doria-Pamphili, and the Council of the capital came to this decision in order to mark Italy's gratitude to the President for his firm friendship which has led him to discriminate between the Italian people and the Fascist régime.

There is little definite news to report from the North this week. According to Transocean, some partisans have given themselves up as a result of the amnesty decree announced on the 28th October; the amnesty expires on the 10th November. Fascist propaganda speaks of extensive "mopping-up operations" against partisans. Reliable information from Milan suggests that captured partisans are being treated with increasing cruelty by the Germans and neo-Fascists, and in many cases are summarily hanged.

According to Swiss reports, unrest in the main industrial centres of the North has reached such a pitch that the Fascists fear a repetition of the general strike of last March. Pavolini's speech, reported last week, which would seem to have been aimed directly at this situation, is said to have been inspired by Kesselring and the German military authorities, who, in view of their apparent intention to carry on the defence of Italy throughout the winter, have obviously everything to gain by averting disturbances in the big northern industrial centres.

The Italo-German Cultural Association held its 22nd annual meeting in Venice in the presence of many prominent Italian and German personalities, including Dr. Rudolf Rahn, the German Ambassador to the Italian Social Republic. Dr. Rahn made a speech in which, after the usual glorification of the ties between Italy and Germany, he spoke of the "terrible fate" of Finland, Roumania and Bulgaria, who had "handed themselves over to certain and systematic destruction," and also warned his Italian hearers against putting their faith in "miraculous weapons"—though ultimate victory was assured because "the moral crisis which has stricken down Europe like an epidemic has been surmounted."

THE VATICAN.

On the 30th and 31st October and the 2nd November the Vatican Wireless gave broadcasts in German which must have astounded many German listeners. The first praised a recent "social speech" of Archbishop Saliège of Toulouse at a "thanksgiving service in Toulouse Cathedral." The thanksgiving was obviously for the liberation of France from the Germans. The whole speech was a plea for the Catholic as opposed to the totalitarian conception of man. "The purpose of social life is not slavery but the free unfolding of the human personality." "The proletariat must go. All must have the right to a due amount of property. The worker does not want to be kept under the protection of fascism or the corporative system." Finally, "love and justice are the soul of France, who will never die." The speaker went on to recall similar pronouncements of the Swiss Episcopate in September last, of the English Bishops, and the pastoral letter of the German Bishops of March 1942, itself a reproduction of the German Bishops' memorandum on the "Dignity and Rights of Man" sent to the Reich Government in December 1941. All these episcopal utterances were then shown to be local manifestations of the social policy of the Popes, which Pius XII went out of his way to emphasise on the 1st September this year.

The second talk was a reflection on All Saints' Day, that it is not Cæsars, generals or demagogues who build empires, but Saints. "Ring out, bells, the peace of the ages, the peace of Eternity!"

The third talk, by Dr. Bruno Hiltenberg, took for a text the inscription over the German cemetery in Rome, "Teutones in Pace," and recalled that Germans in Rome find their last resting place in the shadow of St. Peter's, as they did centuries ago. It ends with the sad question: "Is there any one among us who has not lost a dear one in this war?"

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

In Hungary, a group of members of the Upper House willing to support the Szálasi régime, corresponding to the existing "National Association" of Deputies of the Lower House, was formed under the Archduke Joseph. On the 4th November both Houses passed legislation dealing with the situation created by Horthy's "resignation"; and thereafter Szálasi took an oath before the Holy Crown in the capacity (unknown to the Hungarian Constitution) of "Leader of the Nation," exercising the functions and enjoying the rights of the Hungarian Regent. The Regency is, however, not to be filled for the moment.

Meanwhile, the big Soviet advance which had begun on the 31st October made quick progress and by the 4th November Soviet forces had reached the outskirts of Pest. Hampered by weather, however, they did not enter the city and by the 6th November the Germans began to claim a "stabilisation" of the front in this sector. Further north, the Germans and Hungarians withdrew across the Tisza west of Nyiregyháza; but from this point northward the line showed little change.

Refugees are reported to be streaming westward from Budapest, but there are no signs that its defenders mean to abandon it until forced to do so, and no decision has apparently yet been taken on the compulsory evacuation of the civilian population. The attitude of the workers is still uncertain. A general mobilisation order for Budapest was issued and then cancelled, presumably out of fear of the reliability of the men called up, and there is a reliable report of one revolt, which was, however, started prematurely and soon repressed; the Moscow correspondent of The Times, on the 7th November, suggested that if the Soviet forces entered Budapest, they would have to control "an unreliable, reckless and probably hostile population." There are reports that Germany is moving material from Budapest war factories into the Reich.

Roumania.

The change of government in Roumania is at long last an accomplished fact. Two members of the former Government remain, the Prime Minister, Sanatescu, who combines with that office the portfolio of Minister of War, and Patrașcanu, the leader of the Communist party, who becomes Minister of Justice. Somewhat surprisingly neither Dinu Bratianu, Maniu, nor Petrescu, the leader of the Social Democrats, are included. There has been a "general post" of offices. Some are combined in new ways, and some entirely new ones appear, such as the Minister of Co-operation and the Ministry of Minorities. The Liberals have four portfolios, the National Peasants six, and the Communist groups between them, seven. The Communist strength in the Government is therefore out of all proportion to their strength in the country. Niculescu-Buzești's place as Foreign Minister is taken by Constantin Vișoianu. He will be remembered as having been associated with Barbu Stirbey in the earliest Armistice negotiations. The pro-Nazi element has entirely disappeared.

A certain amount of trouble has arisen over carrying out the terms of the armistice. The Soviet High Commission accuses the Roumanian Government of evading or disregarding a number of the provisions. In particular Roumania has neglected to make the payments agreed upon to enable the High Commission to function in the country, they have done little or nothing towards fulfilling the indemnity obligations, and have attempted to hold up any action by raising the question of the rate at which goods are to be valued, and they have done little in the way of restoring loot from Russia. There is no doubt about there being reasonable cause for complaint. Attempts have been made to conceal loot by repainting and removing marks of origin from machinery. And Roumania has installed a new tramway system at Constanta and a bus service at Craiova, the vehicles and machinery for which were looted wholesale from Odessa. The Roumanians, on the other hand, accuse the Soviet High Command of non-fulfilment of the Article which provides for the restoration of Roumanian civil administration. This complaint also is well founded; both Moldavia and Northern Transylvania are still being administered by the Soviet Military Command. The Russians have made a clever counter to this charge. When the order was made for the disarming of the political party guards, the Communist party evaded the order with the connivance of local Soviet officials. When the High Commission was requested to enforce its own order and disarm the Communist guards, the Commissioner replied that the High Commission could not interfere with Roumania's internal affairs! It is evident that according to the Soviet interpretation of the armistice terms, they provide for a great deal more interference with Roumanian affairs than the Roumanians expected. And neither side has shown any disposition to be accommodating.

The Soviet authorities have moved trains into the yards of the Româno-Americana, Astra and Steaua Româna Oil Companies, and have set prisoners-of-war to work loading material for removal to Russia. In reply to representations, the Soviet High Commissioner claimed that this material was German and was intended for use at Baku when the fields there had been occupied. He undertook to examine the matter and return anything which was found to have been improperly removed, but the loading continued, and after a further request that loading should cease pending enquiries, and the trains already despatched brought back, lighting was installed so that work could be carried on by night, and loading went on at an accelerated rate. Between 12,000 and 13,000 tons of material has been removed. A great deal of this appears to be drilling apparatus, which is invaluable for getting damaged wells into working order. The Soviet Government, to whom the matter has now been referred, admit that both the British and Americans should have been consulted, and profess that they have no desire to interfere with the activities of the Roumanian Oil Companies, by the removal of some "surplus" stocks.

Yugoslavia.

In eastern Yugoslavia, the Germans now hold in Macedonia only some areas in the centre and in the neighbourhood of Skoplje, in Serbia the route along the Ibar to Kraljevo and thence to Bosnia, in the Sandjak Sjenica and Novi Pazar, in Montenegro an area round Podgorica and Kotor. They are concentrating troops in Kosovo, Metohija and Montenegro, for an attempt at escape. Meanwhile partisan forces control all the ports of Dalmatia from Zara to the Gulf of Kotor. They have advanced inland towards Mostar and may prevent a German retreat through Hercegovina.

In the north, the Soviet and partisan westward advance has reached Sremska Mitrovica.

Tito appeared publicly in Belgrade to review partisan units on the 27th October. He was not accompanied by Dr. Shubashitch. He made a speech, thanking all who had helped in the expulsion of the enemy, declaring the partisans' readiness to accept the sincere collaboration of all, but warning any dissidents that the partisans would not forgo the fruits of victory. Nor, he said, would they be treated as pawns; for they had earned the right to be treated as equals by the Allies. Politika, the organ of Dr. Ribnikar, Vice-President of the National Liberation Committee, has re-appeared. In an article of the 29th October, it said that the new Yugoslavia had nothing in common with the old. All connexions with the past had been broken. The new Yugoslavia had been established by the decisions of A.V.N.O.J. (the partisan assembly) last year. Civil authority over Belgrade has been given to a committee, with Mihajlo Ratkovitch, a carpenter, as president.

Tito and Shubashitch had several meetings, in the presence of members of the N.L. Committee, and drew up, on the 1st November, a draft agreement for submission to the Yugoslav Government and to King Peter. This provides for three Regents, to act for the King in Yugoslavia, pending a decision on the form of the State. The Regents would appoint a Government of twenty-eight Ministers, consisting of all the members of the Shubashitch Government and all the members of the N.L. Committee with Tito as Prime Minister, Minister of Defence and Commander-in-Chief. The task of the United Government would be to conduct a plebiscite on the form of the State. Meanwhile A.V.N.O.J. would remain the legislative authority in Yugoslavia.

In answer to the Yugoslav Ambassador in London, who wrote that the Yugoslav population in the areas annexed by Italy in 1920 and 1924 (i.e., Venezia Giulia), would deeply resent being again, even if only temporarily, placed under Italian rule, His Majesty's Government have replied that it is the intention of the Supreme Allied Commander to place the areas indicated under Allied Military Government until their disposition has been determined by negotiation between the Governments concerned.

Greece.

Except for small individual groups, no German troops remain on the Greek mainland. British troops have landed in the Salonica area; the town of Salonica is being administered by E.L.A.S. (For the Bulgarian evacuation of Thrace, see under "Bulgaria.")

The outstanding problems in Greece remain the guerrilla situation and the currency question, and on their speedy solution depends the future not only of the Papandreou Government but of public order and security throughout Greece. Outside Athens E.L.A.S. behave as they please, and neither the E.A.M. Ministers nor General Saraphis have any control over them. M. Papandreou has taken various steps to ensure order; the E.A.M./E.L.A.S. National Militia will cease to exist at the end of November; till then it is placed under Government orders; the gendarmerie is to be purged and reorganised on a broader basis as a National Guard; volunteers who joined either the Middle East forces or the guerrillas are to be discharged; regular army officers will be absorbed into the National Army, while guerrilla officers will be offered facilities for special training; four classes are to be called up for the National Army in December; meantime, the Military Governor of Attica is placed under the orders of General Scobie.

Professor Svolos has announced that the Government has decided to issue a new drachma on or before the 11th November.

A special military tribunal is to try ten persons charged with high treason. These include General Tsolakoglou and John Rallis, the first and last puppet Premiers; General Bakos, Minister of Defence in the Tsolakoglou Government; Simonidis, Governor-General of Macedonia; Lambou, Chief of the Special Security Police; and Colonel Plitzanopoulos, head of the Security Battalions. General Pangalos is said to have been arrested. Six Ministers have been entrusted with the task of reporting how a purge of State officials may best be effected.

Albania.

On the 20th October Enver Hoxha, the F.N.Ç. leader, announced the formation of the first Albanian Democratic Government before a crowded and enthusiastic Assembly at Berat where the F.N.Ç. have set up their headquarters. There was fanatical excitement in the town, and Enver Hoxha will probably try to obtain Allied recognition for his Government in spite of the present confusion in Albania. Mr. Law repeated in the House of Commons on the 1st November the British Government's view that the Albanian people themselves must decide on the future government of the country.

The F.N.Ç. have been extending their control in the north, but the Germans still hold the chief places on the lines of communication there. There has been heavy fighting between the F.N.Ç. and the Germans 20 miles to the south and east of Scutari. In the south the F.N.Ç. have continued to harass the Germans at Elbasan, they have entered Korça and they are reported to have surrounded Struga in conjunction with Macedonian partisans.

Bulgaria.

The evacuation of Western Thrace by the Bulgarian civil and military authorities was completed on the 25th October, although General Beresov, the Soviet commander, proposes to continue using Bulgarian troops in Yugoslavia. While the general leniency of the armistice caused a measure of smug satisfaction, the evacuation of Western Thrace must have been a rude shock to Bulgarian territorial aspirations, and it was no doubt in order to sweeten the pill that the Government and press boosted the armistice, stressing their satisfaction with the moderate terms secured, their intention to see them faithfully carried out and the advantage of so doing. One paper also stated that during the armistice discussions the Bulgarian delegates found constant support in the Russian people, and the Sofia radio announced that the delegates who had stayed on in Moscow for trade discussions had received a promise from M. Mikoyan that he would see whether Bulgaria's needs could be met.

On the 26th October, Sofia radio broadcast a manifesto by the Macedonian National Assembly to Macedonians everywhere including Greece to close the ranks in order to establish a free Macedonia as an equal unit in a federal Yugoslavia and to destroy the present artificial frontiers.

Public interest is being worked up in the forthcoming trials by the People's Courts. Demands for condign justice arrive from local and other associations. Jewish victims of the Fascist régime are invited to depose, and it is ordered somewhat naïvely that public prosecutors must base their charges on adequate evidence and not rely, as under the former régime, on confessions. It is announced that Prince Kiril is one of a batch of two hundred persons to be tried. Princess Eudoxie, the sister of the late King, has also been arrested. Filov, Bozjhilov, Bagrianov, all members of their Cabinets, two bishops and a number of other clerics, two former Presidents of the Sobranje, and other public men and journalists are to be tried. In Sofia alone there are nearly seven hundred to be charged, and arrests continue.

Turkey.

In opening the Grand National Assembly on the 1st November President Inönü stated that the finances of the Republic were sound—a claim for which there seems to be considerable justification. He touched on the many branches of internal reconstruction with which the Government has managed to proceed in spite of the war, and with reference to agricultural improvement at any rate his optimism seems to be confirmed by the fact that a bumper harvest was obtained although a million men were under arms. With regard to foreign affairs he expressed the hope that Allied victory would bring justice and security for all nations, great and small—and here he betrayed a fear which constantly obsesses the Government. He repeated a statement he has made more than once, that Turkey would do her utmost to be a helpful member of the family of nations. In her relations with her great Soviet neighbour Turkey had carefully respected her treaty obligations and she hoped that these relations would develop in friendliness. She also hoped for closer relations with the United States. To the British alliance which had kept its vitality after the severest tests, Turkey would continue to attach the highest importance. Turkey rejoiced at the liberation of France and Greece and she would do everything she could to promote peace in the Balkans. She had no outstanding differences with anyone and no secret designs. She desired only to progress morally and materially in conditions of peace. Declaring that the Republic ensured equality, justice and freedom for all its citizens, that it was government by the people and that it would fight any tendency to imitate a foreign régime, President Inönü ended by affirming what in fact distinguishes the Turkish from most other authoritarian States, namely, that the Republic has acted for the benefit of the people.

The cordial telegram of good wishes sent by the Prime Minister, M. Saracoğlu, to the Greek Prime Minister on his Government's return to Athens left no doubt about the Turkish Government's desire to continue the friendliest relations with Greece.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Few details about the assassination of Lord Moyne in Cairo on the 6th November, beyond those reported in the press, have so far been received. The known facts are briefly that Lord Moyne was attacked and seriously wounded by two armed men dressed in European clothes outside his private residence at Zamalek, in Gezira, shortly after 1 p.m., and died of his wounds in hospital that night. Both the assailants were arrested. The police authorities are now satisfied that the men are Jews. King Farouk, members of the Egyptian Government and many other Egyptians have shown their deep concern and sympathy. The King went in person to the hospital to enquire after Lord Moyne's condition, and also gave a special award to an Egyptian policeman who had shown gallantry in arresting the assassins.

The Egyptian Government has announced its decision to appoint a commission to investigate the alleged irregularities of the late Cabinet. The commission is partisan in composition, the chairman being Makram Ebeid himself who, from the time of his famous "Black Book," has been the main accuser of Nahas, while the only other Minister appointed belongs to Makram's party. The fact that the other parties of the coalition are not represented has provoked a good deal of comment. It is believed that the Prime Minister is himself reluctant to take extreme measures against the Wafd, and that his party (the Saadists) have deliberately refrained from participating in the work of the Commission so as to leave the Makramites and the Palace, which is said to be behind the move, responsible for its proceedings.

It is reported that Hassanein Pasha has proposed a fresh distribution of seats for the forthcoming elections, differing from that mentioned in Summary No. 265. The suggestion that he made to the Prime Minister was to give 90 seats to the Saadists, 70 to the Liberals and Makramites respectively, 20 to the Watanists and 14 to the Independents. No free seats would be allowed. Ahmad Maher, who wants to have a number of free seats for his own party (as he hopes) to win, has not yet acquiesced in this proposal. The number allotted to the Watanists certainly seems excessive. It is in any case doubtful whether 20 Watanists of standing could be found, and if this number is accepted by the Prime Minister he may try to introduce some of his own representatives into that party, so as to use it in order to secure a majority against Makram Ebeid.

In a statement last week on Arab Union, the Egyptian Prime Minister said he believed in collaboration between Egypt and other Arab countries, and thought that Arab Union was the best means to this end. While, of course, giving no credit to Nahas for the success of the Alexandria Committee, he allowed that the decisions taken were of importance and interest to the present Egyptian Government. He added that a special section for Arab Affairs (to the head of which Abdul Rahman Azzam has since been appointed), was being established in the Egyptian Foreign Office, and that Egyptian representatives would shortly be appointed to Syria and Lebanon.

The Lebanese Prime Minister commented to the press last week on General de Gaulle's recent statement about the independence of Syria and Lebanon (see Summary No. 265. Although the official text had not, he said, been communicated to his Government, he noted with satisfaction that General de Gaulle had referred to "an independent Lebanon—independent from all sides." The President admitted, however, that he did not understand the latter part of General de Gaulle's statement. "It is impossible," he said, "that artificial difficulties should be created here. No one has the right to intervene in the exercise of sovereignty of this country, in its destinies and in its policy, which are now in the hands of the Lebanese, represented by their local and national authorities."

Discussions were resumed on the 30th October between General Beynet and the Syrian authorities, but progress, according to General Beynet, was about as much "as if they had been riding on a merry-go-round." The French continued to press for a treaty while the Syrians were adamant in their refusal to negotiate, and reiterated their demand for the Troupes Spéciales to be handed over immediately. At a meeting of the Syrian Parliament later in the day all the speakers supported the policy of the Government.

A deadlock has thus been reached in Franco-Syrian negotiations. Although little is known at present about the terms of the proposed treaty, that little is enough to make the Levant States believe that it would mean giving to France a privileged position which neither Syria nor Lebanon wishes to concede. They fear, indeed, that it might mean the re-establishment of the mandatory position—a prospect naturally abhorrent to them.

Mr. Churchill has replied to the letter from the Syrian President of the 19th September on the question of a treaty between Syria and France (see Summary No. 260). The Prime Minister states that His Majesty's Minister will explain the British point of view to the Syrian Government, and hopes that the President will consider it gravely and dispassionately. In response the President has told Sir E. Spears that, while greatly appreciating the spirit in which Mr. Churchill's message was sent, he wishes him to know that Syria cannot grant a privileged position to any other Power, and that the Troupes Spéciales must be handed over to Syria.

M. Solod, the newly-appointed Soviet Minister to Syria and the Lebanon, recently told the Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs that the Soviet Government, as M. Novikov had already pointed out, "wished to see the Levant States completely independent with no foreign Power occupying a privileged position."

The Persian Prime Minister has replied to the attack made upon him by M. Kavtaradze with regard to the Russian demand for an oil concession in Northern Persia. When first approached by M. Kavtaradze, said M. Saed, he felt sure that his Cabinet would not consent to the demand, but promised to discuss it with his colleagues. He did so on more than one occasion, and informed M. Kavtaradze of their negative reply. When M. Kavtaradze said that this amounted to a rejection of the Soviet request and would "strain relations," M. Saed suggested that if detailed proposals were made they would be considered by the Persian Government, although no final decision could be given until after the war. This offer was refused by M. Kavtaradze. The statement ended with four reasons for postponing the decision.

Up to the 2nd November the situation continued to be threatening. Demonstrations in favour of Russia occurred in Tabriz, and troubles were also reported in Resht and Isfahan. So great was the pressure exercised by the Soviet authorities that it looked at one time as if the Shah might have to sacrifice the Prime Minister, although it is doubtful whether his successor, whoever he might be, could adopt a different attitude. On the 31st October a broadcast from Moscow made a ferocious and baseless attack on M. Saed, accusing him and other "reactionaries" of wishing to make Persia "into a base for a line of attack on Russia." That part of the Persian press influenced by Russia also continued to attack the Prime Minister with unabated violence. On the other hand the number of papers supporting the Government's policy has increased, and Russian behaviour has been criticised as unwarranted interference.

His Majesty's Government regard the matter as sufficiently serious to warrant an approach on our part to the Soviet Government. After consultation, therefore, with the State Department, we are informing Moscow that we consider this to be a question which the Persian Government has the right to decide for itself, and that, in view of the Anglo-Soviet-Persian Treaty and the Tehran Declaration of 1943, the Persian Government cannot be forced against its will to yield to the Russian demand. Moreover, we have accepted without demur the Persian decision to make no further oil concessions until after the war. The United States Government is taking similar action.

By the 2nd November the horizon began to clear a little. There were indications that the Russians might after all drop their demand. One good sign was that the Soviet authorities promised to provide rail wagons in Northern Persia for grain which has been held up for lack of transport.

THE FAR EAST.

President Roosevelt, in his press conference statement of the 31st October, made it clear that General Stilwell had been recalled at the request of Chiang Kai-shek and that there had been no other reason for it than that, as the President put it, "sometimes you just can't help hating someone." The recall, he said, had nothing to do with politics or strategy or with the Chinese Communists, or with the question of supplies for China, nor had it any connexion with the simultaneously announced resignation of Mr. Gauss, the American Ambassador in Chungking. Dr. T. V. Soong, the Chinese Foreign Minister, has now confirmed President Roosevelt's account of the affair. In a statement broadcast on the 4th November, the Foreign Minister said that the Chinese Government had not intended to issue any explanation, because the recall was purely a military matter, but there had been many "unfounded speculations" about the reasons for it, particularly in the United States army. In fact, it had been entirely "a question of personality" and had had nothing to do with any difference of policy between China and the United States. When General Hurley and Mr. Nelson had come to confer with the Chinese Government as President Roosevelt's personal representatives, complete agreement had been reached as a result of the talks, and Dr. Soong believed that, far from any rift developing between China and the United States, the relations of the two countries would from now on become "more understanding, intimate and fruitful than ever before."

The "unfounded speculations" which provoked this statement by Dr. Soong referred no doubt in the first place to the article by Brooks Atkinson, the Chungking correspondent of the New York Times, published by that newspaper on the 31st October and widely reproduced in American evening papers of the same date. Atkinson flew home from China with Stilwell and thus eluded the censorship in Chungking, which cut another correspondent's report on the same subject from 388 words to 10. Atkinson seems to have dipped his pen in Stilwellian vinegar, and he attacked the Chungking Government in no uncertain terms. He described Stilwell's recall as "the triumph of a moribund, anti-democratic régime, which is more concerned with maintaining its political supremacy than in driving the Japanese out of China." According to his account (which was reported to have produced "something like consternation" in the United States), General Hurley, as President Roosevelt's special envoy, had been negotiating during September for Stilwell to be given full command over all Chinese armed forces. The Generalissimo at first appeared to agree, but afterwards his attitude stiffened, and at a meeting of the Central Executive Committee (presumably its Standing Committee) in October he declared that Stilwell must go, that control of Lease-Lend materials must be placed in his own hands, and that he would not be coerced into making an agreement with the Communists. If the United States would not modify its demands, China would renounce Lease-Lend and go back to fighting Japan alone, as before Pearl Harbour. President Roosevelt then, according to Atkinson, agreed to recall Stilwell.

Much the same version of the episode was given by the British United Press correspondent, Darrell Berrigan, who added, however, that a dispute about strategy had played a major part in precipitating the crisis, as Chiang Kai-shek alleged that Stilwell had disobeyed his orders in launching the campaign in Yunnan, and held him responsible for the reverses in Hunan and Kwangsi on the ground that he had failed to provide any supplies for the Chinese forces engaged on that front.

Whatever may be the truth with regard to the negotiations carried on in Chungking by General Hurley, the statement that Chiang Kai-shek threatened to continue China's war in isolation if the United States laid down unacceptable conditions for Lease-Lend assistance accords with the remarkable phrase in his "Double Tenth" broadcast (noted in Summary No. 263) that China would go on with the war against Japan "in co-operation with her Allies or alone." However extraordinary such an attitude may appear at first sight, it is less so if it is realised that the Chinese army, as distinct from the American air force in China, and excluding the campaign in western Yunnan, has received in 1944 no war material to speak of. Despite the important influence it has exercised in the strategic position in the Western Pacific as a whole, the activity of the American air force from Chinese bases has been by no means an unmixed blessing to China, for it has provoked the Japanese into major offensives without providing enough air power to stop these offensives. A large part of the supplies flown over the "Hump" has gone into building up a long-range bomber force for the strategic bombing of Japan, which may have an important long-term effect on the course of the war, but has done nothing to help Chinese troops in Hengyang or Kweilin. In some Chinese quarters it was urged at the outset that, after the need for fighter aircraft for the protection of key cities had been met, priority of air transport should be given to artillery and other supplies for the Chinese army before any attempt was made to build up a large bomber force. The Americans, on the other hand, seem to have relied on the Chinese army with its existing equipment to protect the airfields which were constructed, and no doubt certain highly-placed Chinese, if only for reasons of "face," encouraged them in this belief. Now that disaster has come in South China, and a number of important airfields have fallen one after another into the hands of the Japanese, mutual recriminations between Chinese and Americans have been more or less inevitable; the Americans point to incompetence, corruption and defeatism among Chinese generals as the causes of the collapse, while the Chinese say they could have done better if they had been given some guns.

The Yunnan campaign has been an additional complication, because virtually all American material not required for the American air force was diverted to the Chinese army on this front on General Stilwell's recommendation. The campaign has been not unsuccessful; Tengchung has been captured and contact made with South-East Asia Command forces in North Burma. But from a Chinese point of view Tengchung cannot weigh in the scales against Changsha and Hengyang; the link-up of the Ledo and Burma roads is being pushed forward as fast as conditions allow, but it must be some time yet before China obtains any relief by this route, and much trouble may be in store for her in the meantime.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

On Tuesday the United States elected a President, one-third of the Senate, a complete House of Representatives and a host of State officials, including thirty Governors. Not unnaturally the Presidential election overshadowed all others.

Mr. Roosevelt has won a resounding victory. The American people's verdict has been deliberate and complete. The result is a landslide and Mr. Roosevelt is the first President to serve not only for three but for four terms.

Before the results of the Presidential election were known the majority of "experts" generally conceded a slight advantage to Mr. Roosevelt, and although it was expected that he might win by a narrow margin they refused to commit themselves, despite the fact that the betting odds were roughly three to one on Mr. Roosevelt. Their forecasts were hedged with all sorts of conditions, and they took final refuge in the fact that the figures were liable to a margin of error of 3 per cent. either way. The Gallup poll gave Mr. Roosevelt 51·5 per cent. and Mr. Dewey 48·5 per cent. of the civilian popular vote, on the eve of the poll. The magazine Fortune, whose polls have been fairly accurate in the past, issued a final tabulation showing 53·6 per cent. for President Roosevelt and 46·4 per cent. for Governor Dewey. No sampling of the Soldiers' Vote was allowed.

A few weeks ago Dr. Gallup also estimated that the poll would be less than 40 million, but on Tuesday, thanks largely to the efforts of the C.I.O.'s Political Action Committee in getting out the vote and to the last-minute appeals by both candidates, thanks also to generally favourable weather, the total vote was much larger than at first anticipated.

Lacking any definite lead by the experts beyond the statement that the race was "neck and neck" and a "photo-finish" was to be expected, 56 Washington political correspondents relied on their own judgment and forecast a handsome victory for President Roosevelt, giving him 332 electoral votes compared with 199 for Mr. Dewey. There is no doubt that the result will tend to discredit the public opinion surveys which, while claiming prescience have not risked prophecy, and whose careful scientific planning has been so wide of the mark.

During this final week the election campaign reached new heights of bitterness, venom and acrimony. Never before in his lifetime, said the President, had a campaign been filled "with such misrepresentation, distortion and falsehood. Never since 1928 have there been so many attempts to stimulate in America such racial or religious intolerance." Because of this Mr. Roosevelt admitted frankly that, although originally reluctant to run, he had become most anxious to win.

In his speech at Madison Square Garden Mr. Dewey continued to use the technique of the repetition of a few basic themes. He belaboured the "one-man rule," the "tired and quarrelsome Administration" which systematically "abused and insulted" the powers of Congress. He accused the President of prolonging the war in Europe through his "incompetence," and asked what had happened to General Eisenhower's forecast that Germany would be defeated in 1944. Mr. Morgenthau's alleged plan for the pastoralisation of Germany, for which he maintained Mr. Roosevelt was responsible, had stiffened, he declared, the will of the German people to resist and had caused the unnecessary loss of American lives.

Mr. Dewey also accused the Democratic party of selling out to the Communists, alleging that they, through Sydney Hillman of the C.I.O.'s Political Action Committee, were trying to secure control of the Federal Government. Once again he reminded his listeners that there were 10 million unemployed in 1940 and that "it took a war to get jobs." He reiterated his belief that now was the time for a change to a Republican administration in order to ensure full employment through lowered taxation, increased social security, freedom of private enterprise and the maintenance of high wages through collective bargaining. The President in turn ridiculed this charge at Boston by saying "this 'incompetent' Administration had developed a programme which was so good for the farmers and the business men and the workers of the nation that it is time for a change" according to the Republicans. "This 'chaotic' Administration has done such an amazing job for war production that it is time for a change." The Administration "had done such a fine job with the Good Neighbour policy and our plans for world peace that it is time for a change."

Despite the original design of the Republican party to concentrate on domestic issues and underline the weaknesses of the Administration on the home front, with foreign policy and the war securely tucked away on a non-partisan basis, events have made foreign policy the dominant issue. There is no doubt that the President correctly gauged the feeling of the public when he took the initiative and demanded that the American representative on the Council of the United Nations Organisation should be endorsed in advance by Congress with power to act, a demand which was later, and in a less forthright manner, made by Mr. Dewey. The record of the Republican party and the prominence in its ranks of unregenerate isolationists such as Senators Nye and Johnson considerably helped the President, and there was undoubtedly a feeling that Mr. Dewey, despite his protestations that he would be able to work with Congress better than President Roosevelt, would not be able to control the isolationists in his own party. Mr. Roosevelt has also probably been helped by the implication that the Republicans would not co-operate in building world peace in the event of a Democratic victory, thus building "a party spite-fence between (Americans) and the peace." Mr. Dewey suffered too by his failure to repudiate his isolationist backers. Compared with Mr. Willkie, the Governor failed to arouse enthusiasm and his speeches lacked warmth and popular appeal. His strategy in going back to 1933 in finding grounds on which to attack the President is also open to question, though it must be admitted that the progress of the war in Europe and the Pacific, despite China, all helped Mr. Roosevelt.

In his whirl-wind campaign, moreover, the President successfully refuted the charge that he is a decrepit old man incapable of assuming the burdens of another term of office. Mr. Dewey's charges that the President was at heart an isolationist and was responsible for the United States entering the war unprepared have been a boomerang.

The problems which the President will be called upon to face both at home and abroad are critical and it is therefore all the more encouraging that he has been given so decisive a mandate by the people of the United States. His authority will now everywhere be greater. The Democratic Party has gained ground at the expense of the Republicans both in the Senate, where they already had a majority, and particularly in the House of Representatives. At present there are 214 Democrats, 212 Republicans, 4 minor party members and five vacancies. In the new House the Democrats will now have a clear working majority, and the friction between the Executive and the Legislature is likely to be considerably eased. At the time this summary is written there are indications that in some States a Republican Governor will be succeeded by a Democrat. The defeat of isolationists, such as Senators Nye and Danahar, Representatives Hamilton Fish and Lyons, together with the vote of confidence by the people of the United States in Mr. Roosevelt's Administration to finish the war and win the peace, augurs well for the future, though Mr. Roosevelt will have to use to the full all his old skill to achieve his aims both in domestic and foreign affairs.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Governing Board of the Pan-American Union met on the 1st November (see Summary No. 265) and decided to transmit Argentina's request for a meeting of Foreign Ministers to the member Governments for study and recommendations. Mr. Stettinius, in his Press Conferences of the 1st and 2nd November, declared that the United States Government would not make any decision on the Argentine request until the other republics had considered it and there had been an exchange of views. He explained that when he had stated recently that the United States would do nothing to discourage a meeting of Foreign Ministers (a remark which seems to have caused a very favourable impression in Buenos Aires), he had in mind suggestions for a meeting to discuss post-war problems. On the latter subject a further meeting of Latin American diplomatic representatives in Washington would take place, as arranged, on the 9th November. The board of the Pan-American Union is next due to meet in December, though this date may be put forward when a majority of replies are received from the other Governments.

The Argentine Government did not consult its neighbours before launching its proposal, and the effect in Latin America has been one of surprise, tinged perhaps with a certain admiration for the boldness of the move. So far only Colombia, Venezuela and Ecuador have revealed their attitude. On the 31st October the Colombian Government announced that, after consulting with Venezuela and Ecuador, it favoured, in the interests of American unity, participation in the meeting proposed by Argentina. The Venezuelan Minister for Foreign Affairs, apparently finding discretion the better part of valour, later described this statement as premature. To judge by broadcast reports, each country tends to impute to its neighbours more tenderness for the Argentine proposal than it will itself admit to. The Chilean Minister for Foreign Affairs, however, has confessed his surprise, declaring that he finds it difficult to envisage a meeting merely to discuss the Argentine question, and the Uruguayan Under-Secretary has emphasised the need for extreme caution in his country, adding that its position is necessarily delicate and that his Government is undecided.

The Argentine move is, of course, a gamble and its results are not yet calculable. Of the various possibilities that present themselves, one is a conference without the presence of Argentina and another is one with the Argentine problem occupying an inconspicuous place in the agenda. Meanwhile, in Buenos Aires the general tendency is to regard this dangerous proposal as a "clever and probably sincere" move to ease the international position. Some Argentines, however, fear that a conference might settle their external problems without relieving them of their internal dictatorship, others feel that a rapprochement with the United Nations would be the source of internal improvement. The Government appears to be confident that if General Peluffo could meet his colleagues round a table he could convince them of the honesty of his intentions. Meanwhile, the Nationalists are busy convincing themselves of their own righteousness, and the Argentine wireless stations have broadcast rosy accounts of the reception given to their proposal in other countries. Colombia received a special bouquet as the first to welcome it, and General Farrell, speaking at Córdoba, said that Argentina "is beginning to be understood."

The Argentine police are reported to have made arrests in connexion with threatened strikes in Buenos Aires and La Plata; and broadcasts from Montevideo described disturbances in Buenos Aires on the 31st October. Some days before there were disorders at Salta when a judge ordered the arrest of the local police chief. According to the Federal Chief of Police, Colonel Velasco, new organisations of the Communist International have been discovered and suppressed. Dr. Waldorp, a distinguished doctor and a member of the German-Argentine Association, has been appointed interventor in the University of Buenos Aires. About forty professors appointed by the Nationalist Interventor in June have been dismissed.

A decree issued by the Argentine Government has contributed to abate the vexatious decree of the 3rd June, 1944, which ordered the railway companies to hand over their share in increased freights (granted in March 1942) for the purpose of raising wages. The Government has now accepted a reduced sum, for which it will allow compensation. No progress has been made towards solving the longer-term troubles of the railway companies.

The Salvadorean Government set up by Colonel Osmín Aguirre Salinas (see Summary No. 264) continues to survive. Spasmodic strikes took place last week, and Sr. Miguel Tomás Molina, the President of the Supreme Court (which declared Colonel Aguirre's Government unconstitutional), has proclaimed himself President. Sr. Romero, the Democratic Union's candidate for the presidency, is reported to be returning to his country from the United States.

The Chilean Government is reported to be considering the establishment of relations with the U.S.S.R. in the near future. The French Provisional Government has been recognised by Paraguay; relations with the Italian Government have been restored, or will shortly be restored, by Paraguay, Bolivia and Panamá.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

More than 50 States sent representatives to the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago which met on 1st November under the Chairmanship of Mr. Adolf Berle, the principal United States Delegate. Because of the world-wide interest in the subject the United States had extended its invitations to include neutrals with the unfortunate result that the U.S.S.R. had at the last moment refused to participate (see Summary No. 265, under "Soviet Union"). But the number of delegates and experts was so great that even the resources of the Stevens Hotel were taxed beyond capacity. It became clear also that the United States wished the Conference to go more into technical detail than had been contemplated by some other delegations, including the United Kingdom, and the Conference is likely to extend to three weeks.

The main issues of the Conference are, however, apparent, and much careful consideration and planning will be needed if a satisfactory result is obtained. It is universally agreed that it is too early to draw up a permanent convention on the subject. But it seems desirable that any interim arrangement should reflect the principles on which the permanent organisation will be based, since the future of civil aviation will be affected by what happens in the immediate post-war period. There is, of course, also general agreement that there must be a technical convention concerning such matters as safety, rules of the air, meteorological services, &c., with a suitable governing body to control these matters. But a large number of countries wish the international authority to exercise much more power than this. The New Zealand and Australian Governments have proposed that all international air services should be owned by an international transport authority. Other nations would not go as far, but there is a large body of support for the proposals of the United Kingdom first adumbrated in the White Paper, that the international authority should have power, in accordance with principles to be agreed on in a convention, to decide upon routes and the numbers and nationality of aircraft that should be used on them. Lord Swinton, the leader of the British Delegation, devoted his opening speech to the consideration of the general principles on which such proposals are based.

The United States Government, on the other hand, considers that the time has not yet arrived for so much international control. It wishes civil aviation to remain in competitive hands with as little interference as possible, and it claims that there are as yet no guiding principles on which universal agreement can be obtained. Its own preference is for numbers of planes to depend on the nationality of the passengers carried on the route. It would, however, leave the adjustment of traffic to negotiation between the competing companies in the same manner as shipping was dealt with before the war. In addition, in order that traffic may be begun as soon as possible, it wishes to conclude bilateral agreements at once with those States situated on the routes which the United States companies wish to operate, and it has indicated that, while, as the principal aircraft manufacturing State, it is ready to provide transport aircraft for other countries, its attitude on this question will depend in part on the readiness of other countries to provide facilities for landing grounds, &c., which United States aircraft can use.

The United Kingdom, on the other hand, has suggested that the frequencies on routes and the nationality of the aircraft allotted to each should be controlled by the principle of the origin of the traffic irrespective of the nationality of those travelling. Otherwise many countries might simply serve as the aerodromes of those which provided the bulk of the traffic. Canada has put forward suggestions in the form of a draft convention which goes a long way in the same direction as the United Kingdom, though it stresses the control of routes rather than of frequencies in the routes. More recently, however, Canada has suggested that the interim period should be free of all such restrictions. The Latin American States also have shown a disposition to refuse almost all international control, but it is not yet known how far this is merely a bargaining position to obtain a better position on the controlling body.

The Conference has set up four main technical Committees: a Convention Committee on the general principles of an international convention, a Technical Standards Committee, a Routes Committee (of which Mr. Berle is Chairman) and a Committee on the Interim Council.

The last Committee has an especially thorny task, for the United States proposals for its constitution which includes a permanent seat for Brazil, have met with very wide criticism, especially from the Latin American delegates. Canada's suggested controlling body is based on a principle similar to that on which the International Labour Organisation is based, while the United Kingdom has not yet put forward views on the subject.

It is clear that much discussion will be necessary to clarify these complicated points, to endeavour to come to an agreement on some of the basic principles, to decide how many must be settled at this time and to provide for the immediate future. But though there are obviously great divergencies of opinion, as was to be expected on a subject in which technical advances have been so great during the last decade, there is a very strong desire to draw up an international convention and to set up an international authority at the appropriate time. Obviously there will be need of compromise and the recognition of the points of view of both large and small countries if a considerable advance is to be made at this Conference.

GERMANY.

FOR the first time in twenty-one years Hitler has failed to make his November speech on the anniversary of the Munich Putsch. Last year, despite many rumours, intensified by the increasing rarity of his appearances, he did appear and gave a vigorous performance (cf. Summary No. 214). Since then, he has avoided the lime-light even more; it has been suggested that the conferring of a decoration on General Blaskovitz on the 28th October was announced on the 6th November in order to reassure an anxious public that he was still alive. Public attention has thus been focussed on the Munich ceremony, which was cancelled without explanation, save the rather lame excuse, in a message to the Far East, that the total war decrees had prohibited political meetings. (As a matter of fact Goebbels had exempted from restriction gatherings of political importance.) Four days later, on Sunday the 12th, a mass rally was held in Munich, in a place not indicated but, to judge from certain allusions in the Gauleiter's opening speech, probably the famous Bierhalle, at which Himmler read a long harangue from the Führer.

The fact that nothing happened on the 8th, when all Germany was waiting to hear if Hitler would speak or not, suggests that the Putsch anniversary was grafted on to a Volkssturm meeting; in order that a speech from Hitler might perhaps counter the unfavourable impression produced by his failure to give any sign of life on the 8th. The announcer, describing the scene on Sunday evening, emphasised that it was a triple celebration, in the first place commemorating the martyrs of 1923, secondly those of this and the last war, and finally as the occasion of the swearing-in of the Volkssturm. On the other hand, so long and detailed a speech could not have been prepared in a moment. Whether the Sunday meeting was an attempt to retrieve the mistake of Thursday's cancellation it is not possible at present to say; the background of these events is enveloped in mystery. Nothing reliable is known of Hitler's condition, not even whether he is certainly alive. If he is alive, he is plainly not in a condition to appear in public.. It may be that he is really ill, suffering from a cerebral complaint following on the events of July. More than one report has alleged this to be so. Yet since the 20th July he is known to have spoken and acted with sanity and even assurance. This fact suggests that the cause of his retirement may be temperamental, that there are times (as at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 21st July) when he can speak before a microphone, and that there are others when he is unable to deliver a speech. It may be no disease, but a loss of nerve (such as he fervently protested a year ago would never happen to him) which makes him afraid to appear in public. Such fear, whether of assassination or of a breakdown, may well have increased since his escape from death in July. But it was probably operative long before that. He missed a more important occasion than last Thursday when he failed to speak on the 30th January, 1943, the tenth anniversary of his accession to power.

At all events it can be assumed that at so critical a stage in the war as the present his advisers would have insisted on his appearance had that been humanly possible. The question arises as to how long the mystery of his retirement can be maintained. If he does not reappear soon it will be difficult to persuade his countrymen that he is still alive. Some phrases in the speech of last Sunday can, indeed, be read as skilful preparation by others, or as his personal foreboding of his disappearance from the public scene. He warned his people not to expect to see him. He considered his present task to be the direction of the war and not the making of speeches. He said that his own life was immaterial to the accomplishment of his task and that he would spare neither health nor life to fulfil his duties as "the first German.". He has said these things before, but their repetition can hardly compensate for the absence in Germany's bombed cities of a leader visibly radiating that unwavering resolution which, through another's mouth, he still claims to possess.

If the speech was put together by others than Hitler it was a clever pastiche. It was rambling in structure and occasionally vigorous in phrase. It had the familiar historical recapitulation, the parallels between the past and present tasks of National Socialism. It affirmed that the Leader was devoted body and soul to the single aim of strengthening Germany against Bolshevism, which is at least in accord with what is known of his convictions. The egocentric note of last year's speech was even more prominent, especially in the passages on Germany loyalty, National Socialist magnanimity, the necessity of hero-worship, and the treachery of the July criminals and of members of "old, ailing and morbid dynasties." References to the actual strategy of the war were absent. One of its few realistic references was to the heroic efforts of Japan, Germany's "greatest ally." The leaders in Italy, Hungary, Slovakia and Croatia, who had rallied the forces of resistance against national decay, all received honourable mention. Perhaps this was an attempt to make good the blunder of his statement on the 25th September that Germany had been deserted by all her European allies. Typical of Hitler's manner was also the description of the concentric Allied attacks of August and September as "bitter repercussions" of the 20th July. The Volkssturm, though a chief occasion of the meeting, was accorded only the briefest mention. Several types of traitor were threatened: anyone who should use dagger or bomb against Germany, members of former parties who believed that the time of their resurrection might have come, and, most cryptic category of all, those who now thought fit to involve other people in conflict with their conscience. Is this a warning to those who may be planning another 20th July and attempting to induce Army officers to break their oath of allegiance to their supreme commander?

The keynote of the Volkssturm meetings of Sunday last was, as a V.B. headline expressed it, "Volkssturm in the spirit of the Feldherrnhalle." The main speeches by Goebbels in Berlin and by Schepmann in Danzig, were undistinguished, and did little more than repeat points which have already become propaganda slogans. The former gave assurances about the modern organisation and armament of the levies: there would be no question of sending Berliners unarmed against the enemy. Schepmann stressed the responsibility of the S.A. for weapon training and admitted that some 4 million men were already enrolled. The most vigorous Nazi speech of Sunday, made neither in Germany nor in connexion with the Volkssturm, was by Terboven at a rally in Oslo, in which he used with some effect all the propaganda appeals of the moment to encourage belief in victory, which, thanks to the holding up of the enemy through precious weeks and months, would be accomplished by technical developments allowing German armament to abolish the material superiority of the Allies.

He contrived in the same speech to stress that as in 1923 the Nazis had surmounted a situation which ordinary politicians thought hopeless, so it would be again.

There are two interesting features in the propaganda concerning V2, the use of which was announced by the O.K.W. on the 8th November. It was calculated to attract some public attention in a week in which the only outstanding items were Roosevelt's victory and Hitler's failure to speak. In the second place it was announced with studied moderation, as a contributory irritant to the enemy and without any suggestion, in spite of its name, that it was retaliatory. It was stated to be "far more effective" than V1, and to travel faster than sound. But such comment as has been seen preferred to praise it as a marvel of construction and to deal with British censorship of news rather than to describe damage.

Official German reports of the fighting in the Scheldt estuary avoided actual mention of the Allied capture of Walcheren, but the O.K.W. bulletin of the 10th gave a summary of what German resistance there had achieved: "in weeks of gallant fighting" the German troops had blocked the Allied access to Antwerp and had gained time for measures depriving them of the use of the port. The same bulletin gave the information that the port area of Antwerp had for weeks past been under fire from V1 and V2. Second place in these bulletins has been taken by the advance of General Patton's army in Lorraine and by what the O.K.W. termed the American attempt "to eliminate the fortified town of Metz by strategic envelopment." Unofficial accounts of these engagements laid stress on the fact that Patton's offensive was the first stage in a more general and extensive attack. The position in Italy, in Hungary and in East Prussia was described as more or less unchanged; one communiqué said that after rainy weather in Hungary the Russian attacks had been resumed. There is no confirmation of a report that Kesselring has been killed.

The outstanding military event of the week, the sinking of the Tirpitz in Tromsö Fiord on the 12th, has so far elicited no German comment. This successful attack is the eighth attempt to sink by level bombing a capital ship which was regarded by the Germans as unsinkable. The destruction of the Tirpitz three and a half years after that of her sister ship Bismarck deprives the German navy of its last seaworthy battleship. The most powerful ships it has left are the pocket battleships Lutzow and Admiral Scheer, at present inactive in the Baltic.

An important indirect effect of air attacks on German population centres, which has so far not been noticed in this Summary, is the impediment to police control. The difficult task of controlling movements of population is seriously complicated by the destruction of records. This has happened in the town of Saarbrücken, whither General Paton's armies are now heading. The local newspaper announced at the end of October that "special circumstances" made it necessary to register the entire population of the Stadtkreis, presumably at the same time as the distribution of ration cards. The same paper admits the difficulty of locating workers by saying that "present conditions make things easier for shirkers"; there is in certain areas of the Reich now no means of compelling those who make no effort to do so to return to their work. Among the agenda of Gau propaganda leaders in Kurhessen is said to have been discussion of "the tremendously increased work of the Security Police and Security Service." There, as elsewhere, the police would seem to have been reduced by being drafted into the armed forces. According to a private report, the regular police in some districts have now all gone to the front, their place being taken by conscripted men of over 35. A report from East Prussia speaks of elderly members of the Volkssturm doing duty as police. The Essen papers recently made the unusual statement that the Gestapo was now being instructed to deal severely with rumour-mongers. So outspoken a reference suggests that the situation is getting out of hand in certain areas. So does a phrase in General Dittmar's last talk: he spoke of opposing "with maximum counter-efforts" all attempts to break the German home front.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

It is impossible to assess with any accuracy the strength and extent of the underground resistance organisation in the Protectorate but that the Germans expect a rising sooner or later is quite plain. Their policy to combat this danger lies in a combination of praise, warnings and practical measures. During the past few weeks every sort of propaganda has been used in the attempt to ensure order in the country and among the practical steps to destroy possible nuclei of opposition have been an increase in the number of executions and the transfer to Germany of more Czech police; the latter are being increasingly replaced by Gestapo and S.S. men.

In Slovakia the Bratislava Government has clearly lost all independent significance and is now no more than a German mouthpiece. The controlled press and radio are still zealously conducting an inquest on the revolt and accusations and denunciations are rife; a new demand is being made for a purge of those Czechs still living in Slovakia and there are signs that the rising has given a fresh fillip to the dissension between Catholics and Protestants; the one positive step taken in the mobilisation of all available labour for the building of fortifications in the Bratislava area. Meanwhile Karmasin continues to complain that the Government had not, in the past, sufficiently safeguarded the rights of the Volksdeutsche and to demand still greater self-administration for the German minority.

The Czechoslovak Brigade in the west is engaged in the siege of the Germans in Dunkirk. Two sharp actions have been reported and in each the Czechoslovaks inflicted casualties and took prisoners without serious cost to themselves. The major difficulty of this unit has been its lack of reserves and it is worth noting that these have recently been increased by the arrival of a number of Czech soldiers from the "Autonomous Protectorate Army" who had contrived to make their way to the Allies from Northern Italy where the Germans had been using them as lines of communication troops. Czechoslovaks in liberated France have also been instructed to report themselves to the Czechoslovak Embassy in Paris with a view to their enrolment for military service.

Moscow radio on the 13th November broadcast an article from War and the Working Class commenting acidly on an interview given by Jan Masaryk to the English magazine Illustrated, in which the Minister is reported to have spoken of Czechoslovakia as "a valuable link between the East and the West." The "link" idea is sarcastically ridiculed and the Minister labelled "incautious."

On the 7th November the citizens of Mukačevo and Užhorod in Ruthenia sent messages of congratulation to Marshal Stalin. It is noteworthy that neither message contained any reference to Czechoslovakia and the Užhorod greeting spoke of "our dream to live in a single harmonious family with the Ukrainian people."

SOVIET UNION.

During the past week there has been little change in the military situation. The Red Army has been held outside Budapest, and appears to be developing an outflanking movement to the north-east. On the 9th November the Soviet Information Bureau issued a communiqué on the fighting on the Second Ukrainian Front (Translyvania and Hungary) between the 6th October and the 6th November. In this it was claimed that over 100,000 German and Hungarian officers and men had been killed, and 42,160 captured.

Colonel-General Golikov, the recently appointed Representative of the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. for matters relating to repatriation (see Summary No. 265), made a statement to a Tass correspondent which was published in all the Soviet papers and broadcast on the 11th November. In this he announced that "tens of thousands" of Soviet citizens had already returned home from Finland, Roumania and Poland; "the first 10,000 have returned from Britain; extensive preparatory work for repatriation of Soviet citizens has been conducted in France, Belgium and Luxemburg." He complained that in some cases Soviet citizens in liberated territory were still treated as prisoners of war, and even held in the same camps as Germans, in unsatisfactory conditions. In a number of instances the authorities on the spot even put obstacles in the way of the speedy return of these persons to the U.S.S.R. "There are also quite a few instances when people hostile to the Soviet State try by deceit, provocation, &c., to poison the minds of our citizens and make them believe the monstrous lie that the Soviet motherland had forgotten them, renounced them, and no longer considered them her citizens." General Golikov declared that there would be no reprisals even on "those Soviet citizens who, submitting to German violence and terror, committed actions against the interests of the U.S.S.R. . . . . if upon their return to the motherland they honestly discharge their duty." This is the first occasion on which there has been a clear statement of the attitude of the Soviet authorities to those Soviet citizens who, under duress, have assisted the Germans. The decision to let bygones be bygones is a wise one. It should greatly facilitate an early return to normality in the U.S.S.R. after the end of the war, both by preventing political bitterness and by securing the early and willing repatriation of the millions of Soviet citizens scattered all over Europe, whose labour will be so essential to the work of reconstruction. At the same time notice is given to the Allies that the Soviet Government is impatient of delays in returning captured Soviet citizens, and is jealously observing the treatment which they receive. Two days earlier Moscow Radio had criticised the "shocking living conditions" in certain camps in France, notably in the Marseilles area, in which liberated Soviet citizens were confined together with German prisoners of war. Some of the former were even being recruited for the Foreign Legion, "under conditions of terror." The Soviet Ambassador in France was stated to have protested to the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

The Bulgarian armistice delegation which left Moscow on the 31st October brought home interesting impressions. The Minister for Foreign Affairs stated on his return that no one should imagine that communism was to be introduced into Bulgaria at the instigation of the Soviet Government, despite the impression which might have been conveyed by the eulogies of the U.S.S.R. and the October Revolution filling the Sofia press. On the contrary, all the Soviet Ministers whom the delegation had met at Moscow had insisted that on no account should Bulgaria become a Communist State, and had advised the maintenance of the Fatherland Front, "which truly represented the new democratic Bulgaria." M. Molotov even deprecated excessive witch-hunting for Fascist-minded officers, urging that good service at the front should be taken as the sole test. The delegates, in particular M. Tarpeshev, the Communist Minister without Portfolio, appear to have been genuinely chilled by their interview with the great Dimitrov. Refusing to speak anything but Russian on the ground that he was a Soviet citizen, Dimitrov sternly reminded his compatriots at an official meeting that the Agrarians and not the Communists were the majority in Bulgaria, and in private spoke even more severely than in public. The impression left by his words on the abashed delegates was increased by their astonishment at finding their revolutionary comrade living in a style never enjoyed even by King Boris. Evidently hints of the Soviet attitude had got round even before the return of the delegation, for a story recently current in Sofia had it that Stalin had threatened to have Tolbukhin's head if he allowed the Bulgarians to bolshevise the Red Army. Paradoxical as the line taken by the Soviet authorities may have appeared to the Bulgarian delegates, it is only a further illustration of the general Soviet attitude towards the new Governments now emerging in liberated Europe. The Communist Parties themselves in all European countries support "Governments of national unity" with mildly reformist programmes. It is interesting to note that even in Bulgaria, probably the country where the Communist Party is strongest, and during occupation by the Red Army, the Soviet authorities directly discourage the local Communists from abandoning this policy. The Tito–Subasić agreement, smiled on by Moscow and confusing to many of the faithful in Yugoslavia, is a further illustration of this general trend.

M. Molotov gave a luncheon on the 10th November in honour of the Norwegian Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Trygve Lie, and his mission. The Soviet guests included MM. Dekanozov and Maisky. In his speech M. Molotov urged the development of the existing friendly relations between the U.S.S.R. and Norway now that the two countries once more had a common frontier.

The resignation of the Saed Government occasioned a fresh outburst of vituperation in Pravda. The charges mainly followed the now familiar lines, but included a new and apparently unfounded allegation that Saed had "armed tribes and instigated them against the Central Government." It was also alleged that the Tehran radio had been "converted into an instrument for slanderous anti-Soviet propaganda," while attempts had been made to suppress Moscow Radio reports on the situation in Persia. In fact, the Soviet authorities have done everything possible to prevent the Persian case reaching the outside world. In reporting the release of the Trade Unionists arrested by the Persian military and police in Tehran in connexion with the proposed meeting in honour of the October Revolution anniversary, Moscow Radio quoted a Persian paper as demanding the prosecution of Saed for these arrests. (See also under "Middle East.")

The refusal of the Soviet Government to attend the World Aviation Conference has again been discussed, in an article in No. 21 of The War and the Working Class. This indignantly denied that there could be any other reason for the absence of the U.S.S.R. from this conference than that officially stated (see Summary No. 265). The writer declared that the Soviet authorities knew only on the 24th October that Spain, Portugal and Switzerland had been invited—countries which were on good terms with Germany and her satellites, but had not seen fit to establish normal relations with the U.S.S.R. The Soviet Government had known that some neutrals would be invited, but did not know that "these specific neutrals" would be included. "Of course there would be no objection to such neutrals as Sweden and Turkey." It was noted that the United States had not invited the Argentine, which "conducts a pro-Fascist policy and is hostile towards the United States."

On the 12th November it was announced that M. N. V. Gorelkin had been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the U.S.S.R. to Uruguay. M. Gorelkin was Ambassador to Italy before the latter declared war on the U.S.S.R. He was one of a number of Soviet diplomats who were recently awarded the Red Banner of Labour "for outstanding services to the Soviet State and for successful fulfilment of the Government's assignments." (See last week's Summary.)

It was announced on the 10th November that M. P. I. Valeskaln had been appointed People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Latvian S.S.R. The new Commissar, who although having a Latvian name is apparently not a Latvian citizen, succeeded M. Junius Latsis as Minister of Education in the Latvian S.S.R. in January 1941. (See also under "Czechoslovakia," "Hungary" and "Roumania.")

SCANDINAVIA.

The Swedish Government delivered on the 11th November a note of protest to the German Legation in Stockholm in reply to a German notification two days earlier that the Eastern Baltic and the Gulf of Bothnia were to be an operational area in which all ships would risk being mined or fired on without warning. The Swedish Government considers these measures injurious to legitimate Swedish interests, denies the right of German forces to make use of them, and holds the German Government entirely responsible for any consequences. The Swedish War Risk Insurance Board has simultaneously notified Swedish ships in the Gulf of Bothnia that they should confine themselves to Swedish territorial waters.

Protests have also been evoked by a number of recent violations of Swedish territory by German soldiers, who have looted hay belonging to Swedish peasants. Most of these incidents have taken place on the Finno-Swedish frontier, but an aggravated case occurred on the 4th November in North Värmland, when a German patrol pursued two Norwegian refugees for a distance of 4 kilom. beyond the Norwegian frontier, firing shots and ultimately compelling a Swedish forester to guide them back, pressing the muzzles of rifles into his back. General von Falkenhorst has apologised for this incident and undertaken to punish the offenders.

The allegations of protection afforded by Sweden to actively anti-Soviet refugees from Estonia and other Baltic regions have been further pursued by the Swedish Communist organ Ny Dag, and have, after some delay, evoked replies in other Swedish papers. In Morgon-tidningen especially, the defence has adopted a perhaps rather provocative form by alleging the commission of a large number of murders and acts of torture by the Russians during the occupation of Estonia in 1940–41. These charges are indignantly denied by Ny Dag, which demands evidence of the accusations. Dagens Nyheter, while describing Ny Dag's presentation of the case as "narrow and mischievous," admits the necessity of procuring a trustworthy report of the composition of the Baltic refugee groups. No doubt, says the paper, they are mostly good people, but there are also exceptions from the rule.

The split in the Finnish Social Democratic Party occasioned by the opposition to the dominant influence of Tanner has now led to important developments. On the 8th November it was announced that two Ministers from the dissident section of the Party, MM. Fagerholm and Vuori, had resigned from the Government. It was at once predicted that this move would bring about a more complete reconstruction of the Government unless the Social Democrats were prepared to elect two men to replace those who have resigned. After discussion in the party groups in the Diet, it was decided that a Government reconstruction was unavoidable. On the 10th November M. Castren's Government resigned, and Marshal Mannerheim is understood to have started to form a new one, the Prime Minister of which is expected to be M. Paasikivi.

A rather curious feature of the situation has been a violent attack upon M. Vuori by the Communist paper Vapaa Sana. Having regard to the fact that the new Government is expected to be politically further to the Left than the old, and to be purged of elements which favoured the continuance of hostilities with Russia, this attitude of the Communists is difficult to understand. The attack may have a personal basis: the political editor of the paper is said to be the daughter of Kuusinen. It may also be explained as an instance of the inveterate antagonism of Communists to orthodox trade union circles.

The discussions in Stockholm between the Swedish Government and the Norwegian Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Justice appear to have been highly satisfactory. Apart from the question of the employment of the Norwegian police forces trained in Sweden, the Norwegian Government has obtained a loan of 100 million kr. to cover expenditure in Sweden during the next six months. The question of Swedish contributions to Norwegian supplies has also been satisfactorily handled.

In spite of the attempts of German and quisling propaganda to represent the evacuation of the civil population from Northern Norway as voluntary and humanitarian (see last week's Summary), there is no longer any real concealment of the fact that it is both compulsory and cruel. German sources reported on 8th November that the evacuation of Hammerfest was being carried out as a German defence measure. Actually the evacuation of Norwegians throughout the northern part of the country is being carried out by methods of the most drastic compulsion, and persons attempting to evade it have been shot. Livestock and food-stuffs, together with farm buildings, are being systematically destroyed.

The quisling Minister for the Interior, Hagelin, has finally resigned, ostensibly on grounds of ill-health. The "rowing" propensities of the Quisling Party have now been regretfully admitted by the extreme party organ Germaneren, in an article which states that mistrust and dissension and an inclination to row for safety are noticeable everywhere, even in the least expected quarters. The fears of the traitors are no doubt intelligible, for, apart from post-war prospects, there have been several cases of liquidation recently, and on the 6th November an act of sabotage destroyed the War Academy in Oslo, which had been occupied as the Headquarters of the Hird staff. Other cases of sabotage have been reported.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 9th November the Prime Minister was asked in the House of Commons whether he proposed to make a statement concerning the loss sustained by the Netherlands through the flooding of large areas of valuable agricultural land, and whether, in view of the statement recently (see Summary No. 265) published by the Netherlands Government, a joint reply by the United Nations could be made without delay. Mr. Attlee, replying on behalf of the Prime Minister, stated that, "so far as His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are concerned, I can say that all just claims for territorial compensation at the expense of Germany which the Netherlands Government may eventually decide to put forward will be given energetic support."

The plight of the Dutch is arousing sympathy in Belgium; a relief committee has been set up under Government patronage, and the Prince Regent has sent a donation of 50,000 fr.

Meanwhile, the Dutch Government are making such preparations as they can to repair the damage done to their country by the Germans; large orders for pumping, and other, machinery are being placed in the United States.

In the course of a speech to the Belgian Chamber on the 7th M. Pierlot adverted to the cordial relations between Britain and Belgium and said that the visit of M. Spaak to London—where he had arrived on the 4th—was aimed at making closer the co-operation of the two countries in various spheres. Belgian opinion is, in general, eager for close co-operation between Belgium, the Netherlands, Britain and France for purposes of security. But the Communists, while arguing that Belgium should maintain friendly relations with all the United Nations, deprecate a specially close understanding with Britain on the ground that Belgium would thereby be brought under British hegemony.

Towards the close of his visit to London M. Spaak said in an interview: "I have noticed that there is much discussion in the press on the creation of a West European bloc. The word bloc, it seems to me, is ill-chosen, and may have wrong interpretations. The main thing is to ensure peace by collective security and a universal organisation. But the Great Powers at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference were of opinion that, as the executive agents of international security, regional organisations might be formed. In that spirit I think that an agreement among the Western Powers is not only possible but necessary." M. Spaak added that during his visit he had also discussed with the British Government the provision of food for the Belgian people and of arms and equipment for the Belgian Army.

It would appear that there are still some 49,000 men in the various Belgian resistance organisations. The Government hopes to absorb a large proportion of them into the army, the gendarmerie and the civil service and to find jobs in private employment for the rest.

Some 60,000 Belgians, suspected of collaboration with Germans, have already been taken into custody, but public opinion demands yet more arrests, though some Belgians fear that innocent, as well as guilty, persons have been apprehended and ask that greater care should be taken before arrests are made.

FRANCE.

Paris has given Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden a triumphal welcome and the Paris papers, which doubled their size on the 12th November, have paid glowing tributes to Great Britain and her Prime Minister. The success of the visit has also been emphasised by the remarkably warm tone of the official announcement issued in Paris on the 13th.

The visit was timed to coincide with the Armistice Day celebrations. On the morning of the 11th November, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, who had arrived by air the previous afternoon, accompanied by Sir Alexander Cadogan, Field-Marshal Sir Alan Brooke and General Sir Hastings Ismay, drove with General de Gaulle and M. Bidault up the Champs-Elysées to the Arc de Triomphe where the General and the Prime Minister laid wreaths on the tomb of the Unknown Soldier. A military review in which British and American detachments took part was followed by a visit to the statue of Clemenceau and to the tomb of Foch. Later, in a welcoming speech at the official lunch at the Ministry of War, General de Gaulle said that 1,000 years hence France would not have forgotten "what was accomplished in this war through the fighting, the labours and the sufferings of the noble people whom Mr. Churchill is carrying on with him to heights of the greatest glory." The presence of the visitors was a practical demonstration of an alliance which cruel vicissitudes had shown to be more than ever necessary. In the course of his reply Mr. Churchill declared that France and Britain had shared the glories of Western Europe for so many years that they had become indispensable to one another. "It is a fundamental principle of British policy that the alliance with France should be unshakable, constant and effective."

On the following day the visitors were welcomed at the Hôtel de Ville by the Prefect of Police, the Prefect of the Seine and the Paris Committee of Liberation who had already during the preceding week received Mr. Duff Cooper and Mr. Jefferson Caffery. A diploma of honorary citizen of the city of Paris was presented to Mr. Churchill. He made a moving speech in French, which included an appeal to the French people to rally round their "uncontested chief," General de Gaulle, and do their utmost "to have France united and indivisible."

The visit of the British Ministers also gave the opportunity for political discussions. These opened in auspicious circumstances, for on the morning of the 11th November the French Government had received invitations from the Governments of Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R. to appoint a full and permanent representative to the European Advisory Commission. This news was received with great satisfaction by the Paris press as marking France's return to the rank of a great European Power. According to the official announcement issued in Paris on the 13th November, the talks covered "all questions concerning the conduct of the war and the preparation of the peace." They "were devoted in particular to the immediate problems arising out of the necessity, now that France has been liberated, for as full participation by France as possible in the common struggle." Mr. Churchill's view was indicated in his speech at the Hôtel de Ville when he declared that "a strong French Army as soon as possible" corresponded to the sentiments of England and the policy of its Government and was "absolutely necessary for the establishment of the moral equilibrium of Europe and to provide Europe with one of its factors of stability and virility which the world so sorely needs." He warned his hearers, however, that, since he could not promise a long war, it might not be possible to get many modern divisions ready, but said he would do his best to see that French forces were engaged against the Germans in the months which remained. As proof of his interest Mr. Churchill travelled by car to the front on the 13th and visited troops of the First French Army on the snow-clad slopes of the Vosges.

The Government has suffered a severe loss by the death of the Minister of Finance, M. Lepercq, who was killed in a car accident on his way back from a visit to Lille. M. Lepercq had a remarkable Resistance record and commanded the Paris F.F.I. during the August rising.

The new Provisional Consultative Assembly met for the first time on the 7th November at the Luxembourg. The opening session was purely formal. On the 8th the Assembly proceeded to elect its officers and in the second ballot chose M. Félix Gouin, the Socialist deputy, who presided over the Assembly at Algiers, to be its president. On the 9th it held its first working session and heard a brief speech from General de Gaulle in which he appealed to it to help the Government to accomplish its onerous duties. The parliamentary representatives have decided to call themselves the Groupe de la Résistance Parlementaire. The five remaining members of the group have now been selected, thus bringing its numbers up to the allotted 60 (see Summary 265). M. Maurice Thorez, Secretary-General of the French Communist Party, will be able to return from Russia to take his seat, since a decree has been issued extending to him the benefit of an amnesty granted by an ordinance of the 29th October. This empowers the Government to pardon offences against military law committed before the 17th June, 1940, in cases where the persons concerned have subsequently taken an active part in the Resistance movement. M. Thorez was sentenced for anti-militarist activities in November 1939. The amnesty follows upon a long and vigorous campaign conducted by the Communist Party in favour of his return.

The Administration of the Bank of France, first reformed in 1936 by the Popular Front Government and changed again, though not fundamentally, by Vichy in 1940, has again been reformed. On the 7th November the Cabinet approved an ordinance modifying the method of appointment of the Council of the Bank and weighting it heavily on the official side. At the same time the Cabinet approved the transformation of the Ministry of National Economy into a body charged with directing the whole economic policy of the Government, preparing and supervising the execution of a plan of economic reconstruction, and co-ordinating the work of the Ministries of Production, Agriculture and Food, and of the Ministry of Reconstruction shortly to be set up. The Minister of National Economy is also to be responsible for international economic negotiations and will in this sphere be associated with the work of the Quai d'Orsay.

From the 23rd to the 25th October the Mouvement de Libération Nationale, perhaps the most important Resistance organisation, held a Congress in Paris and resolved to negotiate with the Front National and other movements for the constitution of a single Front de la Libération. It decided, however, to reject the Front National's proposals for an agreed list of candidates at the forthcoming local elections (see Summary No. 263); movements should put forward their own candidates at the first ballot but join forces at the second ballot. The Congress also authorised its bureau to continue negotiations with the Socialist Party for the establishment of a common doctrine leading to joint action, and adopted a programme which goes far towards Socialism.

The Socialist Party Congress, the first party congress to be held in France since the liberation, began on the 9th November in Paris. The British Labour Party sent a delegation headed by Mr. Harold Laski and the Socialist parties of other countries were also represented. The main event on the first day was a long speech by M. Daniel Mayer, Secretary-General of the Party, who reported on its clandestine activities of the last four years and on the drastic purge that had been carried out within the Party itself. This was "un congrès de rénovation et d'épuration" which must abjure the old internal struggles. It must elect a new directing committee and decide such questions as the relations of the Party with the Christian Democrats, with M. Paul-Boncour's group, with the Mouvement de Libération Nationale and with the Communist Party. M. Mayer renewed the offer, made to the Communists under the occupation, of a joint committee to prepare the way to working-class unity. He referred to the German question, stating that once the German people had been re-educated they must be given their place within the new League of Nations. The other speeches showed that the Party doctrine remains unchanged but that the question of the purge is a main preoccupation.

Georges Suarez was refused a reprieve and shot on the 9th November. Mgr. Dutoit, Bishop of Arras, has been placed in "administrative internment" by order of the Prefect of the Pas-de-Calais. He is charged with having published articles in the diocesan Semaine Religieuse derogatory to France's Allies, the French troops and Resistance organisations. This is the first instance of civil action against a prince of the Church for collaboration. Recent arrests include that of Jérome Carcopino, a former Vichy Minister of Public Instruction.

(For France's attitude to Civil Aviation, see "United Nations.")

SWITZERLAND.

Further comment on the Russian refusal to attend the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago indicates the trend of Swiss opinion to be that Russia is still unwilling to co-operate sincerely with other nations. This attitude is contrasted with the results claimed for the Moscow Conference.

The reason given by Russia for her rejection of the Swiss proposals for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries—namely, that the Swiss Government "has hitherto not dissociated itself in any form from its former policy of hostility to the Soviet Union"—was not considered by Switzerland to be justified by the true facts. Switzerland had a politically clear conscience and rejected the accusation brought against her. She would await events calmly, but she would in no circumstances allow herself to be intimidated by a gesture, the meaning of which was as yet unaffirmed. For this reason, the Federal Council would not deviate from the view which led to the negotiations, and which was in accordance with its genuine desire to maintain good and peaceful relations with all foreign States. It would take the view that the negotiations were merely interrupted.

The public reaction was one of deep resentment, not only at the disregard shown by a major Power for a small State, but also at the method chosen to administer the rebuff; for it was contrary to usage for one country to reply to another by a public broadcast on a delicate subject requiring a certain measure of discretion. Resentment was also expressed at the use of the word "Fascist" to describe Swiss sentiments, and it was recalled that for many years the German press has complained about Switzerland's failure to take part in the crusade against Moscow.

On the 10th November, the Federal Council accepted with regret the resignation of M. Pilet-Golaz, chief of the Political Department. It was stated that the Minister had already notified the National Council of his intention in a letter on the 7th, but that the decision had in fact been taken before that date. The President of the Confederation at a banquet held by the Radical Party on the 13th November stated that M. Pilet-Golaz's decision was entirely due to considerations of internal policy, and bore no relation to Switzerland's foreign policy, which would not be affected by the resignation. M. Pilet-Golaz had thought it his duty to sacrifice his high place for the maintenance of internal peace. The President then paid a high tribute to the retiring Minister's work.

SPAIN.

General Franco's statement to the United Press mentioned in last week's Summary has not been well received either by the Allies or by the enemy. We on our side cannot accept the sincerity of a man who in his claim to Spanish neutrality conveniently forgets the much longer period when Spain was non-belligerent, and the Germans, forgetting what they owe to Franco, object to his currying favour now with the victorious democracies. In Spain much has been made of the prominence given in the Allied press and wireless programmes to the Caudillo's pronouncement, but careful editing gives only a favourable picture, headlines such as "Franco speaks; the world listens" being quoted by Radio Nacional, which added that the B.B.C. news bulletins gave four minutes to Franco's statement, "which is longer than the B.B.C. generally devotes to declarations from English or foreign statesmen." Public satisfaction, however, masked official disappointment, and the Under-Secretary of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs has complained that the B.B.C. confined itself to giving hostile commentaries. The truth is that there were none others available, for even those papers which were General Franco's friends in the Civil War cannot now approve his oily conversion.

However, this interview does clarify the situation, especially as it has been followed by the Spanish Ambassador's request to the Permanent Under-Secretary of State to arrange an early interview at which he could make an important communication from General Franco to the Secretary of State. We now know what to expect. Spain takes her stand on her alleged neutrality in this war which is based on abstention from stabbing France in the back (such treachery seemingly being the only breach of neutrality Franco's mind could grasp). The claim is that she could not be either our ally or Germany's ally because "she could never ally herself ideologically with nations not guided by the principles of Catholicism" (an argument hardly applicable to Fascist Italy), but (since the Allies are winning the war) she is now to be considered a democracy of a rather special, Spanish kind, to be known as organic. The episode of the Blue Division is squared with "honourable and complete neutrality" because no hostility against Russia as a nation was involved; it was a crusade for the idea of anti-communism, which has wider implications than merely Soviet ones. And so, on its record, the Franco régime self-righteously claims to participate in any European settlement. That is the Franco line; it is not a very good one.

First, the claim to neutrality is patently absurd. It was not valid even in 1939, for the Germans received plenty of favours from Franco before the fall of France. And with the declaration of non-belligerency on the 12th June, 1940, Spain, during the Suñer period, showed herself in everything but open war to be an associate of the Axis Powers. And, although Count Jordana did make an effort to behave neutrally, the Spanish Government maintained non-belligerency until February 1944. As to the refusal to "ally herself ideologically with nations not guided by the principles of Catholicism," the Caudillo must have forgotten his words to von Stohrer, German Ambassador to Spain, in September 1940. Stohrer had talked of Spanish-German collaboration as creating "with the definite triumph of a strong and sound ideology," a new Europe. Franco replied that "Spain had contributed to the rule of this new order . . . . the strength of her faith in the triumph of our common ideals." He went on to describe the warmth of Spanish friendship for Germany "in the battle for the consolidation of this politico-social revolution for which we fought so hard which is now being waged on the seas and in the air of Europe." This commitment to precisely the ideological association which he is now repudiating will not be forgotten. Great Britain and the United States are not less likely to forget Franco's attacks on the "plutocratic democracies" (which are bad) and to accept him at his own valuation as head of an Organic Democracy (which is good) than M. Stalin is to accept the Spanish fairy tale of the Blue Division. In short, General Franco's attempt at self-rehabilitation may look good in the Spanish press, whose ambiguous columns are usually decorated with equivocations of this kind. But when it comes to dealing with the Allies, the little Caudillo will find that his legs are too short for the pier-head jump to "work a passage" which no one has yet offered him. His ambitions are, however, probably more modest. On the business principle that you never get more than 25 per cent. of what you ask for, he claims a seat at the peace table, and will be only too happy if we leave him with his seat in the Pardo—and, of course, his bunny rabbits.

Along the Pyrenees things seem quiet, but none of the punitive or restrictive measures taken by the Spanish authorities have yet been relaxed. In the Basque province of Guipúzcoa it is credibly reported that there have been over 2,000 arrests, mainly of Basque Nationalists, and at one moment the bull ring at San Sebastián was crowded with prisoners. At the end of October the alleged discovery of a plot by the Perpignan "Reds" (see Summary No. 265) led to a fresh wave of arrests in Barcelona too, where the Catalan Nationalists are being active in their propaganda. One agreeable piece of political publicity was the draping of the Catalan flag on the cables which join two large steel towers in the harbour. It took the Barcelona Fire Brigade three hours of dangerous acrobatics and a lot of courage to remove the horrid emblem. Another commemorative practice is to place wreaths on the empty places from which the Falange had removed statues of Catalan patriots. This sort of game is not likely to decrease in Barcelona during the winter.

ITALY.

An interview granted by the Lieutenant of the Realm to the correspondent of the New York Times seems to have created a minor storm amongst some of the parties forming the Italian Government. The Prince's remark that the "Institutional" question should be settled by a plebiscite and not by the Constituent Assembly appears to have been the main cause of the trouble. In the Prince's opinion, a plebiscite should settle the question of a Monarchy or a Republic, and the Constituent Assembly should subsequently decide what form the Monarchy or the Republic should take. In support of this argument the Prince quoted the principles of the Atlantic Charter, in which it says that all peoples have the right to choose the form of government under which they will live, and also emphasised the fact that the feeling of the people towards this question, as yet unknown, might differ from the already known feeling of the political parties. The Prince realised that one of the chief dangers to the Monarchy was a certain faction, which had been closely connected with Fascism and had now rallied to the Monarchy for reasons of safety, but, in the present circumstances, the Prince thought that there was more danger of a dictatorship under a Republic than there would be under the Monarchy.

A communiqué has been issued by the Italian Government on this interview which reaffirms that the political parties which form the present Government are the expression of the Italian people in their fight for liberty, and repeats their solemn pledge that the "Institutional" question will be decided by the Constituent Assembly in accordance with the Law of the State.

The executive of the Italian Communist Party, after having been in conference since the 8th November, has now published a statement of the Party's aims in relation to the international situation. The chief points of this statement are as follows:—

The Communist Party reaffirms its support of the Government but reserves its right to criticise the Government when circumstances demand it.

The Party considers Italy's participation in the war insufficient and demands the purification of all reactionary elements, especially in the Army, so that the latter may do more for the liberation of Italy and less for the interests of political parties.

The Party calls on the Government to take more active measures to improve the transport and food situation, and for this purpose demands that authority should be generally transferred from the Allied Commission to the Italian Government which, according to this statement, has not yet been done despite Allied declarations.

The Party also demands elections for local administration authorities in those districts where conditions are sufficiently settled to admit of them, and more recognition for the local Liberation Committees. The Party stated it had no objection in principle to the suggestion for a Consultative Assembly, but foresaw the danger that it might become the playground of reactionary forces.

The statement finishes with instructions to its local representatives to support the Government in conformation with the Party's policy, to uphold the Committees of Liberation and to learn to conduct themselves in a manner uniform with national and democratic unity. The Party noted the increasing agreement between the Communist and Christian Democrat Parties with satisfaction and, as regards the future, declared itself for Republican agrarian reforms and the intervention of the State in industrial and banking concerns.

Mr. Harold Macmillan, the British Resident Minister, Central Mediterranean, has been appointed Acting President of the Allied Commission, and Commodore Ellery Stone, U.S.N.R., has been promoted Chief Commissioner.

On the anniversary of the Italo-Austrian Armistice in 1918 Signor Bonomi, the President of the Council, broadcast a speech in which he said that the Italian people should make themselves two promises, firstly to destroy every vestige of fascism and secondly to oppose every manifestation of the nationalistic spirit which was responsible for their present deplorable state. Signor Bonomi also said that, although party politics are a guarantee of liberty, yet the politicians themselves must not put their own interests above those of the nation as a whole.

In North Italy the amnesty extended by Mussolini to partisans giving themselves up expired on the 10th November. According to the Fascist propagandists, numbers of partisans have reported to the authorities, and much capital has been made of their pitiable state, and of the alleged fact that, contrary to "the lying campaign of the enemy," they are under no compulsion to join the Republican Armed Forces or to work in labour camps, but are merely being sent home. However, as the Gazette de Lausanne points out, anyone who joined the maquis in order to elude the penalties of the law or in hopes of receiving foreign money will be excluded from the amnesty and liable to prosecution; so it would seem that here, too, the Fascists are playing their usual game of giving with one hand and taking away with the other. In the meantime, General Alexander has issued orders to partisans to conserve their energies during the winter months.

Though the fevered evacuation preparations of October seem to have died down to some extent, it would seem that these were very extensive and even included arrangements for the transfer to Germany of all Italians whose known Fascist or German sympathies would endanger them in the event of an Allied advance. Plans are also said to have been made for leaving an underground nucleus of Fascists behind should evacuation become necessary. Some sort of semi-official agreement seems to have been reached between the Milan industrialists and the local military authorities whereby the industrialists hope to save their factories from destruction on payment of a lump sum, should the Germans give the order to mine them. Two prominent Milan industrialists, Alberto and Piero Pirelli, are rumoured to have been deported to Germany.

Record wheat, rice and maize crops are reported, and large-scale transportation to Germany seems to be taking place.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

During this week bad weather hampered military operations in Hungary. The Soviet attack on Pest made no progress, and after much fluctuating fighting the Germans claimed to have established a defensive line outside the city. They also claimed to have contained and partially expelled Soviet troops which had landed on Csepel Island. The Red Army, however, began a drive northward cutting the Pest–Miskolcz railway at Mezokoved and taking Jászbereny, while in the south, Soviet and Yugoslav Partisan troops crossed the Danube east of Pécs. Partisan activity is reported from the Croat frontier.

Colonel-General J. Vörös, Chief of the Hungarian General Staff up to the 15th October, has broadcast from Moscow. He said that he himself had been arrested by the Gestapo but had escaped and crossed over to the Russian lines. All orders issued in the name of Horthy from the 16th October onward (this includes Horthy's abdication and his recantation of the order to the troops to cease fire) were counterfeit and illegal. Vörös called on the Hungarian troops to come over to the Russians and not to defend Budapest, and to the population to resist the Germans by all means. He ended: "Long live free, democratic Hungary under the leadership of Regent Horthy!" The Soviets claim further desertions by Hungarian officers and men; the remaining Hungarian troops are now under German supreme command, and interspersed among German formations so that movement is difficult for them, but their reliability, from the German point of view, must be regarded as very doubtful.

Men of military age have been evacuated from the eastern suburbs of Pest and much of the civilian population is fleeing from the city to west Hungary where much destitution and disorganisation now prevail. The Central Government has not yet moved, and has promised that Budapest will be held to the last. Meanwhile the Arrow Cross Party is strengthening its grip on the country. A regular network of confidence men in all offices is being established and more party men are being appointed to all key posts. Further arrests of supporters of the Horthy régime are reported.

The Government, which continues to appeal in particular to the workers, has announced its intention of establishing a new "Occupational Organisation of the Working Nation."

Roumania.

The last few days have been uneventful and have been given over to taking stock of the situation created by the change of Government. There is a general impression that events are moving towards a new crisis, as the reconstituted Government lacks the elements of stability.

The outstanding feature of the week's news is the arrival of M. Vyshinski at Bucharest to deal with the question of compliance with the terms of the armistice. He was received by the King at the Castle of Peles.

The new Minister of the Interior, Penescu, has announced that his department is drafting an administrative law for the holding of communal elections.

The project of communal elections was mentioned as a way out of the difficulties in which the late Government found itself in the middle of October. The Minister also states that Roumanian authority has been re-established in five or six of the judete of Transylvania. He lays stress on the rights of the Hungarian minority, but explains that, for reasons of State, Roumanian must be the official language of the whole country.

The Minister of Justice, Patrascanu (Communist), who is responsible for the " purge " of the civil service, has declared that this must extend to the highest ranks of the legal profession. Those who were responsible for Roumania's disaster will be mercilessly punished. The period for the restitution of property looted from Russia expires at midnight on the 14th November, and the transfer must be completed by that time.

Yugoslavia.

In the Kosovo region Bulgarian forces have had a considerable success and are reported to be advancing on Prishtina from the north. They have also captured Kumanovo, east of Skoplje. The Red Army is threatening Kraljevo. The Germans still hold their escape line through the Sandjak. In Macedonia the partisans have closed in behind the retreating Germans and have occupied Bitolj (Monastir) and Djevdjeli and Veles (on the main line from Salonica). Enemy sources reported a fortnight's heavy fighting north-east of Zagreb, where the partisans are said to control all the rural areas.

In Belgrade an assembly of about a thousand partisan delegates from Serbia, whose duty is to elect a National Liberation Council of Serbia, met on the 10th November. The New Yugoslav Telegraph Service described it as repudiating all idea of Serbian hegemony in Yugoslavia, as assuming legislative authority in Serbia, as electing an executive committee, and as setting up a War Crimes Commission. (A similar commission had been set up earlier at Nish.) An eye-witness's description of Belgrade says that the city is badly damaged by Allied and German bombing, that sanitary conditions are bad and epidemics are expected, that the attitude of the people is apathetic, and that the partisans are taking care not to provoke antagonism and are retaining technical officials of the Neditch régime.

The Macedonian partisan leaders are reported to have received an agreement in principle from the Bulgarian Fatherland Front that Bulgarian Macedonia shall be eventually included in the Macedonian Member-State of Yugoslavia. They are also said to be content to leave the question of Greek Macedonia for settlement by the United Nations. But, speaking in Belgrade on the 8th November, General Djilas, of the Central Communist Party and till recently on the partisan Mission to Moscow, attacked the Greek Government for " violently terrorising our Macedonians in Greece without any justifiable reasons," and said that this policy could " only lead to poisoning of relations between the new Yugoslavia and the Greeks."

The economic condition of Croatia south of the Kupa river is deplorable. It is reported that it would take three months to repair the railways and there is little rolling-stock. The roads could be quickly repaired were lorries made available. One aspect of Croat opinion is revealed by the appeal of Hrvatski Narod, of Zagreb, for courtesy towards Croat troops on leave; another by the judicial power of punishment accorded to the Croat Commissioner for Food Supply. The partisans are reported to be welcoming Croat officers and allowing them to retain their previous ranks.

Greece.

In order to balance its budget and stop inflation, the Greek Government has decided to take the following steps: to fix wages of State employees so that the average wage equals seven shillings a day; to sell certain imported supplies at a price lower than existing market prices but high enough to produce revenue needed by the exchequer; to raise indirect taxes and to put a purchase tax on luxuries; to put a heavy tax on war profits; to keep down to a minimum expenditure on the armed forces.

A stabilisation law has been passed fixing the exchange rate of the new drachma issued by the Bank of Greece at 600 to the pound. B.M.A. notes will circulate in Greece, alongside the notes of the Bank of Greece, at the above parity. The Bank of Greece will exchange its notes with B.M.A. notes for amounts of not less than 12,000 drachmæ, and will exchange B.M.A. notes for drachmæ without any limit. The law empowers the Bank of Greece, at a later, unspecified, date, to sell foreign exchange on London and other centres, provided the amount demanded be not less than 60,000 drachmae. The rate of exchange on New York will be fixed on the basis of its quotation on the international money market. The rate of the old drachma to the new drachma is fixed at 50,000,000,000 to one. Advances by the Bank of Greece to the State are limited to 2,000,000,000 drachmas. Legislation on exchange control remains in force in so far as it consists with the present law.

An agreement has been reached between the Greek Government and representatives of the British Treasury, whereby the Greek Government has agreed to call in, within a period of twelve months, or such other period as may be agreed between the two Governments, all B.M.A. notes circulating in Greece, and to replace them by drachma notes. His Majesty's Government has undertaken to make available to the Bank of Greece an agreed amount of B.M.A. notes, to be debited against the account of the Bank of Greece with the Bank of England; when the B.M.A. notes have been withdrawn and returned, their face value in sterling will be credited to the Bank of Greece.

Professor Svolos, the Greek Finance Minister, has stated that the Bank of Greece holds cover for the new currency to the amount of £43 million, the greater part of it in gold and the rest in foreign exchange.

According to a statement by General Scobie, supplies of all kinds are now being brought into Greece at the monthly rate of 130,000 tons.

Albania.

After attacking the German and quisling forces in Tirana intermittently for a month, the F.N.Ç. opened an assault on the 3rd November, and at the end of five days' hard fighting captured three-quarters of the capital. The 1,000 Germans who took up strong positions in the royal palace and in barracks in the remaining fourth of the town were effectively bombed by Balkan Air Force. The Germans have been using considerable forces to keep open the Resan–Ohrid–Struga way of escape to the north.

Bulgaria.

Coming, as they did, soon after the return from Moscow of the Bulgarian armistice delegation, the meetings, banquets and other celebrations organised in honour of the anniversary of the Russian revolution furnished the occasion for many demonstrations of devotion to Russia. The prestige of the Soviet Union stands remarkably high to-day and press, radio and public speeches were filled with praise of the Union's achievements and of the Red Army's prowess. But care was taken not to omit reference to the part played by Great Britain and the United States. At a dinner given by the Red Army the Archbishop of Sofia, Mgr. Stefan, went so far as to call on the Soviet Union to give practical proof of that love of freedom which Soviet speakers had extolled. The Foreign Minister, the first time he received the British political representative, was at pains to assure Mr. Houstoun-Boswall that the demonstrations of enthusiasm for Soviet Russia did not mean that there was any question of introducing Communism (see " Soviet Union "). M. Stainov said that, with passions inflamed, the Government had to go slow for the present, but he hoped that it would have established itself by the end of the year. He admitted that the People's Courts were a drastic measure, but he contended that the alternative would have been the execution of summary justice by self-appointed judges in every village. With regard to the reported trade negotiations in Moscow, M. Stainov explained to Mr. Houston-Boswall that the Soviet authorities had suggested expert conversations and that Bulgarian experts would accordingly be sent to Moscow. He hastened to add that this implied no preference for Soviet trade. In a press interview M. Stainov coupled with the need for discipline the need for hard work, and this shock-worker note has been struck by other authorities.

By capturing Strumica, Podujevo and Veles and at any rate co-operating in the capture of Kumanovo the Bulgarian army made a further substantial contribution to the expulsion of the Germans from Yugoslavia. Bulgaria broke off relations with Japan on the 6th November, but the Japanese Minister and his staff have not yet left the country.

Turkey.

The entry into Izmir harbour on the 7th November of a Cunarder, the first foreign merchantman to arrive since 1941, marked the reopening of the Ægean, and as guardian of the Straits Turkey has agreed to the passage of supplies to Russia. It is satisfactory that the new Turkish Ambassador in Moscow met with a friendly reception. The Turkish press on the occasion of the Soviet anniversary had nothing but compliments for Russia and approval for Marshal Stalin's speech.

The Turkish delegation to the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago expressed an admirable desire to co-operate with the other nations represented, and there now seems to be some chance that the Trukish Government really means to abandon its absurd policy of secretiveness and exclusion and to afford facilities for civil air routes across Turkey. The first need is a good civil airfield at Angora.

The Turkish Government recognised M. de St. Hardouin last month as representing the Provisional French Government at Angora. The Turkish Ambassador in Paris is to be M. Numan Menemencioğlu, the former Foreign Minister. A Turkish Ambassador is also being sent to Rome.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Expressions of regret and indignation at the murder of Lord Moyne have been received by His Majesty's Government not only from Egypt and the Sudan but from other Middle Eastern countries, including Syria, Lebanon and Iraq. Iraq has been deeply shocked at the news, which incidentally has affected the political outlook by causing attention once more to be focused on Palestine.

The two men arrested, whose names were first given as Cohen and Salzman, have since confessed to the crime. Both came recently to Cairo from Palestine, Cohen preceding Salzman by several weeks. They state that they are members of the Jewish underground organisation called in Hebrew the "Fighters for the Freedom of Israel," but more commonly known as the "Stern Gang." Both appear to have entered Egyptian territory in British military uniform. Under interrogation Salzman gave as the motive of assassination the "bad government" in Palestine, for which Lord Moyne was held responsible.

No agreement has as yet been reached on the distribution of seats in the new Egyptian Parliament, for which elections are to be held in due course. Meanwhile the Egyptian Government has passed a law abolishing exceptional promotions and increases of salary made by the late Government.

Hassanein Pasha, First Chamberlain to King Farouk, was taken seriously ill after attending Lord Moyne's funeral, and will be unable to undertake any duty for some time. It is unfortunate that this pro-British friend and counsellor of the King should disappear from the political arena at the present critical juncture, since it leaves the Palace door open to less beneficent influences. Meanwhile, Lord Killearn has returned to Cairo from South Africa, where he had been spending a short holiday.

Hassan Nashat Pasha, Egyptian Ambassador in London, having recently married an English wife, has to leave the diplomatic service under an Egyptian law which obliges members of that service to resign if they marry foreigners. He is shortly returning to Egypt, and pending the appointment of his successor, Abdul Fattah Amr Pasha, better known for his brilliance as a squash-racquets player than for his diplomatic qualifications, is to be Minister Plenipotentiary at the Egyptian Embassy.

Rumours are current in Bagdad that the Prime Minister, Hamdi Pachachi, may resign before long owing to continued ill-health. If he does, it may not be easy to find a suitable successor. The Regent does not seem to favour at present the return of Nuri Pasha, and according to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Arshad al Umari, His Royal Highness might select as Prime Minister either Arshad himself or Ibrahim Kemal. Arshad made a good name for himself during his tenure of office as Lord Mayor of Bagdad, and has been one of the most influential members of the present Cabinet. As for Kemal, he is an able man of strong views, but he finds it difficult to co-operate with others. In either case a good deal of manœuvring behind the scenes would be required before a stable Cabinet could emerge.

The Persian Prime Minister has submitted his resignation. The reason given by him for this step was that, in spite of the support he commanded in the Majlis, he thought his departure from office might help the Russians to resume relations with the Persian Government and to drop their demand for an oil concession. The Shah did not at first wish to accept the resignation, but finally agreed, fearing that otherwise extreme action might be taken by the Russians, M. Saed's successor has not yet been selected.

In conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador the Shah expressed pleasure at learning that, according to the leader on "Persian Oil" in The Times of the 3rd November, Russian propaganda was not being accepted in London at its face-value. He did not agree, however, with the suggestion in The Times article that there was not "any particular reason why negotiations should have to wait till the end of the war." As the Shah pointed out, it was the presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia that gave Russia an unfair advantage which she had not scrupled to take, and freedom to discuss the question of oil would come with the departure of foreign troops from Persian soil rather than with the end of the war.

Generally speaking, as reported in last week's Summary, the strain that arose in Persia over the Russian demand is now a little easier. It cannot, however, be assumed that the crisis is over. M. Kavtaradze is still in Tehran, where he is showing signs of renewed activity; and until we receive an official reply on the matter from the Soviet Government, their attitude to the problem remains in doubt.

The press campaign in Persia continues to be waged on both sides, and while public opinion is still opposed to the granting of a concession to Russia, it would welcome a solution of the problem enabling her to resume relations with the Persian Government. That Soviet influence is not without its effect on certain quarters in Persia is illustrated by the message addressed by the "Central Trade Union Council" to Marshal Stalin on the anniversary of the October revolution. "In the name of all peasants and workers of Persia," runs the message, "the Council send their ardent greetings and the sincere regards of the oppressed people of Persia for the gallant Red Army and heroic peoples of the U.S.S.R. who have saved the Persian nation from the claws of the blood-thirsty Fascist brigands. Long live the U.S.S.R.—the true stronghold of world democracy!" (See also under "Soviet Union.")

THE FAR EAST.

The speech made by Marshal Stalin on the 27th anniversary of the October Revolution, in which he referred to Japan as an aggressor nation (see last week's Summary under "Soviet Union"), was, according to a Tokyo broadcast, reproduced in full without comment in all Tokyo newspapers of the 9th November. The broadcast stated that "while no press reaction or official comments are available as yet, the considerable prominence which Stalin's speech shared with other war news in the morning papers is taken as indicative of the keen interest with which his speech was received here." On the following day Iguchi, the Board of Information spokesman, made a statement in which he said that "it is generally admitted by those well acquainted with the circumstances of the Japanese-American negotiations preceding the present war that Japan was not an aggressor." Despite the American press interpretation of the passage as "the Soviet response to the American demand for positive Soviet co-operation in the war against Japan," Iguchi saw no indication in the speech of any change in the policy of the Soviet Union towards Japan. "Keen rational observers," he said, "who can penetrate the fog of complicated international relations, will find out what the Soviet leader had in mind."

In rebuttal of the charge that Japan was an aggressor Iguchi triumphantly quoted Mr. Lyttelton's speech of the 20th June (see Summary No. 247), and maintained that the imposition of economic embargoes on Japan by Britain and the United States in 1941 had been "an act tantamount to war." He added that Japan had given sovereign independence to Burma and the Philippines, which had been under British and American rule respectively before the war, and that British and American forces were now invading these countries to take away the independence which they had acquired.

It is an interesting fact that the Japanese publicity authorities should have made no attempt to conceal Marshal Stalin's accusation from the Japanese public and that the only official reassurance on the subject has been a guarded hint of an ulterior motive in the speech. It is probable that the Japanese Government is, in fact, kept guessing as to Soviet intentions, and thinks it just as well to give publicity to Marshal Stalin's remarks, so as to prepare the public for any further hostile developments which may be impending. On the other hand, they are well aware that hard words break no bones, and are able to see what has been pointed out by several columnists in the American press, that Marshal Stalin's reference to Japan, featured on the morning of polling day, was not unhelpful to President Roosevelt's election candidature. The Japanese Government will, therefore, presumably, wait for some more concrete indications of Moscow policy before taking up any new attitude towards the Soviet Union.

In the Philippines the Japanese have succeeded, though at heavy cost in bombed convoys, in maintaining a battle-front on the island of Leyte, and American gains have so far been restricted to Leyte and Samar. It has now been announced that General Yamashita, who commanded the Japanese invasion army in Malaya in 1941–42, is now in command in the Philippines, and his name has been much used in Japanese propaganda as a guarantee of Japan's ability to repel General MacArthur's expedition. Although the claims made on behalf of the Navy in the recent sea-air battles in Philippine waters have been stoutly upheld, the surface fleet has been allowed to fade quietly out of the picture, and its place as a threat to American sea-power and communications has been taken by the much-publicised Kamikaze (" divine wind ") Corps of Navy airmen, so called after the famous typhoon which destroyed Kublai Khan's invasion fleet off Kyushu in 1281. Members of this corps are alleged to dedicate themselves to crash-diving bomb-laden aircraft into enemy ships on orders from their commander, and a number of sinkings by this method have been claimed. The Japanese radio proudly affirms that the crash-dive-bomber is superior to the Germans' V.1 and V.2 in that it is steered to its target by a human agent, and boast that it manifests the ascendency of the Japanese spirit over the greater material strength of Japan's adversaries. A rival Army air group, the Banda unit, has now been formed to compete with the Navy and has put out its initial claims of sinkings.

In China, Kweilin, the capital of Kwangsi, and Liuchow, one of the principal towns of that province, have now fallen to the Japanese, and a special message of commendation has been sent by the Emperor to Field-Marshal Hata, the Commander-in-Chief in China, declaring that the forces under him had destroyed a number of American air bases and " have given us much valuable help for further operations in the whole of China." Hata in a proclamation on the 11th November declared that Japan would continue operations in China until the last vestige of American military power there had been destroyed, but had no desire for " fratricidal strife " in East Asia and would carry out her promise to withdraw all troops from China on the cessation of hostilities. In a broadcast to China from Singapore a Domei commentator threatened a further advance " for the final reduction of Chungking itself," and urged the Chungking Government to come to terms with Nanking " before it is too late."

By a curious coincidence Wang Ching-wei died in a Japanese hospital on the 10th November, the day of the capture of Kweilin. He had been undergoing medical treatment in Japan since March. His death may have been a natural one, but it is from a Japanese point of view not disadvantageous. Having failed to win over any leading personnel from Chungking, as he was originally expected to do, he became something of a liability, because his personal rivalry with Chiang Kai-shek was a principal obstacle to any attempt at negotiation with the Chungking régime.

Wang Ching-wei has been succeeded in his various posts at Nanking by his henchman, Chen Kung-po, and already a new political line has appeared in Nanking propaganda, which has taken up a proposal made by a writer, Hu Lan-cheng, for a " People's Congress " formed of representatives of the Nanking, Chungking and Yenan Governments for " bringing about national unity and salvation." This gesture to the Communists is an innovation in Nanking tactics, which have hitherto concentrated on anti-communism, and probably reflects Nanking's knowledge of the reported linking of the Communists with certain malcontent generals both in North and South China in an anti-Chungking coalition. The puppets are no doubt trying to reinsure in every direction, and the Japanese may reckon that, if Chiang will not respond to their anti-Communist overtures, it is as well to show him that Nanking is not debarred by ideology from stirring the Yenan pot. The Nanking small fry, whose interest is in Shanghai and its hinterland rather than in high aims of unifying China, are, indeed, probably ready to concede more to the Communists in practice than Chungking would be; a general disintegration of China would suit them well enough. The opposition to the Chungking Government in Free China marches, of course, under the anti-Japanese banner—as did the Kwangsi rebels in 1936—but an anti-Japanism which wrecked what is left of centralised authority in China would not be of a kind to alarm either Tokyo or Nanking.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The elections have been more decisive than was generally expected, less because of the size of Mr. Roosevelt's majority in the Electoral College (which he himself, however, admitted was a surprise), than because of gains by the Democrats all along the line, particularly in the House of Representatives, and above all because of the defeat of a surprising number of well-established isolationists. Whatever the party affiliation, it is agreed that the result of the elections is a strong expression of popular opposition to isolationism, at least in its most aggravated form. This is surprisingly conceded even by such isolationist papers as the Patterson group. Despite the clamour of the " Chicago set," it seems apparent that the people of the United States have given a clear mandate to the President to make a determined effort to establish a system of world security in order to prevent further wars.

Although returns are not yet complete, the major results are not in doubt, and the latest figures show that of the popular vote (largely excluding the Soldier Vote, which will not be completely counted until the 7th December) Mr. Roosevelt received 24,312,810 and Mr. Dewey 21,222,287. Compared with 432 (36 States) electoral college votes gained by the President, Mr. Dewey received 99 votes (12 States, one more than Mr. Willkie). Mr. Roosevelt won Michigan, with its 19 votes, which in 1940 had supported Mr. Willkie. The States which voted for Governor Dewey were North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Kansas, Wisconsin, Iowa, Indiana, Vermont and Maine, Wyoming and Ohio. The last two, representing 3 and 26 electoral votes respectively, had in 1940 voted for Mr. Roosevelt. Ohio, of course, is the home State of Governor Bricker, the Republican vice-presidential candidate.

In the gubernatorial elections 17 Republicans and 14 Democrats have been elected with one State, Utah, still undecided. Ohio, Washington, Massachusetts and Missouri, which formerly had Republican governors, now have Democrats, while the Republicans have won Indiana and North Dakota.

The new Senate will consist of 56 Democrats and 37 Republicans and 1 (La Follette) Progressive. Pennsylvania and Missouri have yet to be decided. At least eight Senators who were strongly isolationist will not return. Senator Reynolds (Dem., North Carolina) did not stand for re-election. Four were defeated in the primaries and their successors are in the main more internationally minded. The four defeated Senators are Worth Clark (Rep., Idaho), Champ Clark (Dem., Missouri), Rufus Holman (Rep., Oregon) and " Cotton Ed " Smith (Dem., South Carolina). Three leading isolationists were also defeated in the elections, Senators Nye (Rep., North Dakota), Danaher (Rep., Connecticut) and Gillette (Dem., Iowa). On the positive side, the Senate is considerably strengthened by the presence of such progressives as Governor Saltonstall (Rep., Massachusetts) and Mr. Fulbright (Dem., Arkansas). For the first time since President Wilson, it is not now certain that the isolationists can muster the necessary one-third of the Senate in order to reject a treaty. 33 Senators are clearly men who favour international co-operation, 16 are Southern Democrats, who traditionally are inclined to vote with the Internationalists, 14 are somewhat uncertain and 25 are more or less isolationist. The sentiments of the United States people in favouring American participation in world affairs have been expressed with unassailable clarity, but even so the Administration will need to be vigilant, if its plans are not to be shipwrecked by the efforts of the eight arch-isolationists who still remain.

Before the results of the elections were known, there were some fears expressed, for instance, by the columnist, Mr. Arthur Krock, that, while President Roosevelt would be re-elected, he might have to work with a House of Representatives that was predominantly Republican. Returns to date show that the Democrats have a working majority of about 50. (The latest figures are Democrats 242, Republicans 187, undecided 4, minor parties 2.) As in the gubernatorial elections certain notorious isolationists were defeated, notably Representatives Hamilton Fish (Rep., New York), Calvin Johnson, Day and Busbey (all Rep., Illinois), as well as twenty others of the same general type. The House is still liable to control, however, on domestic issues by the " unholy alliance " of Republicans and Southern Democrats. On foreign affairs a combination of Democrats and internationalist Republicans will have the majority.

The recent campaign has seen one new development of the utmost significance—that is the emergence of the C.I.O.'s Political Action Committee as an effective vehicle for the entrance of American labour into national politics. At the Democratic Party Convention the P.A.C. fought for the retention of Mr. Henry Wallace as Vice-President. Although it met with a set-back and failed to attain its object, the P.A.C. was nevertheless sufficiently strong to frustrate the hopes of several other candidates for the vice-presidential nomination and accepted the nomination of Senator Truman as a compromise. At the beginning of the political campaign there was, it is generally agreed, a widespread atmosphere of apathy, and the P.A.C. set itself to cure this, first, by securing the registration, and, secondly, the actual balloting, for the President. Mr. Sydney Hillman (who, incidentally, is visiting this country shortly to head the C.I.O. delegation at the meeting next month to prepare the agenda for the World Labour Conference, which has been called by the T.U.C. early next year) was the driving force in the P.A.C. In the primary elections the Committee was credited with quite substantial victories. It was held to be largely responsible for the defeat of such people as Representative Starnes (Dem., Alabama), Costello (Dem., California) and Senators "Cotton Ed" Smith (Dem., South Carolina) and Caraway (Dem., Arkansas), for the refusal of Mr. Martin Dies, of the notorious committee which bears his name, and Senator Reynolds (Dem., North Carolina) to stand for re-election, and, in part at least, for the nomination of several outstanding Liberals.

Republicans and even Conservative Democrats are, however, said to be distinctly worried at the emergence of this new Labour organisation within the Democratic Party. Mr. Dewey and Mr. Bricker specially went out of their way to label Mr. Hillman and other supporters, as Communists, and to say that the P.A.C. was a Communist scheme to capture first the Democratic Party and later the Federal Government. These attacks, however, did not deter the P.A.C. and may well have been a boomerang. The P.A.C. is generally regarded as having been responsible for swinging Michigan over to Mr. Roosevelt and for helping to hold New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Its formal future will be decided at a Convention of the Congress of Industrial Organisations, which meets soon at Chicago. Whatever is decided, it is widely felt that the committee is likely to continue in being at least as a formidable pressure group. Some Conservative-Democrats are, it is said, wondering whether it may not prove to be the nucleus of a political Labour Party, or, if not that, at least responsible for splitting the Democratic Party by ousting the Southern Democrats and causing political realignments within the two-party system. The brilliant group of economists, writers, broadcasters and research workers, which Mr. Hillman gathered together and which are considered in some quarters to be far abler than either of the machines of the Republican or Democratic Parties, is likely to be kept in being and to be a considerable force, though it is also true that, at least under Mr. Roosevelt's leadership, the Democratic Party, which is an uneasy amalgam of conflicting groups, is not likely to split asunder. But Mr. Hillman has demonstrated that he is the new power in the Labour world and that Mr. John L. Lewis no longer counts, since once again he failed to "deliver" the miners' vote in Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Illinois.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina it appears to be generally believed that the conference of Foreign Ministers to discuss the present situation of the Republic vis-à-vis other American countries will in fact take place. Even Dr. Palacios, the exiled Socialist leader, has expressed approval of such a meeting, which suggests that the Opposition is not now prepared to join issue on the question of foreign policy. General Peluffo enjoys more respect among his countrymen than his predecessors in the Foreign Ministry, and his foreign policy at least recommends itself more widely than does the domestic conduct of his colleagues. It seems likely that the Government is once again negotiating for the support of the Radicals, whose collaboration would give the régime a civilian veneer that might prove extremely useful. Such a transition would seem the most practicable way of avoiding complete disorder, since no régime could now hope to survive unless it had at least a measure of army support.

Among further attempts to create favourable opinion may be counted a decree giving the Minister of Industry and Commerce control over certain foreign firms (this is stated to have led already to intervention in thirteen German firms), and the resignation of Sr. Di Stagni, the Nationalist director of income tax, who is said to have acted as adviser to German interests.

In other Latin American countries official quarters maintain a decent reserve. The Argentine wireless now claims that "it is known that seven countries, Colombia, Venezuela, Paraguay, Uruguay, Chile, Bolivia and Ecuador, are in favour of a conference. This is the substance of things hoped for rather than the evidence of things already seen. The Cuban Minister of the Interior is reported to have stated that Cuba is undecided. Brazil is clearly unwilling to take up a definite attitude until the views of all the other Governments are known, and no further pronouncements have been made other than those recorded in last week's Summary.

A further meeting in the series of discussions between Mr. Stettinius and heads of Latin American missions in Washington was held on the 9th November, and Mr. Stettinius reported that he was encouraged by the support that the American republics were showing for the basic ideas embodied in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. At his Press Conference, Mr. Stettinius distinguished this question from that of Argentina, though he would not necessarily say that his Government would not discuss the two matters at the same conference. He added that possibly within a week or ten days' the Government might have a clearer idea of how the Argentine question would be dealt with.

Rumours that the Uruguayan Government had proposed the dissolution of the Emergency Consultative Committee for Political Defence have been denied by the Uruguayan Foreign Ministry, and the place of Argentina, which withdrew in September (see Summary No. 258) has been taken by Peru.

The Guatemalan junta (see last week's Summary), now known as the Frente Popular Libertador, has been recognised by the United States, Spain and most of its neighbours. Persons in close contact with the régime kidnapped a former head of the secret police from the Peruvian Legation on the 6th November. The Government have professed their ignorance of the affair and undertaken to punish those responsible.

Bolivia and Ecuador are reported to be seeking the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. Nicaragua has recognised the French and Italian Governments.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

On technical questions the Conference has already made great progress. Numerous sub-committees have reviewed every aspect of this part of the work of the Conference and have already come to agreement on a large proportion of it. Thus it will be possible to incorporate in an international convention, if it is so desired, the experience which has been acquired through the great development of aviation during the war period.

On more fundamental questions no such agreement has yet been reached. On one problem, however, considerable progress has been made. Yielding to the protests of the Latin American States, the United States Delegation has withdrawn its plan for the constitution of the Aviation Council. The principle of sovereign equality to which appeal was made, it is now suggested, will be recognised by the creation of an Assembly in which all States are represented equally. But some smaller executive body will be necessary and this may be one of 15 or 16 States, partly elected by the Assembly and partly chosen by their importance in the field of aviation, including their domestic services and the facilities offered for international routes. Thus the functional principle advocated by the Canadian Delegation would be recognised, and it is also hoped by some countries that geographical representation will be taken into account in the decisions to be made.

On the primary question of international control over routes and frequencies but little progress was made in the formal committees. The New Zealand and Australian proposal for the international ownership and operation of international air services was rejected as premature by the first Committee, a result which was generally recognised as inevitable. The United States has not yet withdrawn from its position that complete freedom should be allowed to commercial air lines (subject, of course, to cabotage, which includes colonial territories) to operate as commercial considerations may dictate. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, and the other members of the Commonwealth, who met at Montreal, have remained convinced that some international control of routes and frequencies is necessary, and that any interim bilateral agreements should contain stipulations which reflect this basic principle. At a press conference Lord Swinton emphasised the security aspect of international control, pointing out the important part airborne troops had played in recent operations.

In order to find a way out of this situation private talks have been begun between Mr. Berle, Lord Swinton and Mr. Symington (Canada). It is probable that some little time must elapse before it can be ascertained whether the materials for some compromise exist. Any agreement for the interim period could, of course, take some less formal shape than a Convention, if it were so desired.

The French Delegation (which supported the New Zealand proposal mentioned above) has shown an even greater attachment to the principle of international control than the Delegations of the Commonwealth. The Netherlands Delegation, following the example of the United States, has listed the routes on which the Netherlands Government proposes to operate, 39 in all, covering a large proportion of the world's air routes. The Delegation of Eire has notified the Conference that it wishes to open an international air port. But, unless some agreement can be reached on the main question of international control, routes will depend upon separate agreements entirely dictated by national interests.

U.N.R.R.A.

An interesting development has taken place with regard to the provisional arrangement made at the meeting of the U.N.R.R.A. Council at Montreal, whereby the Health Section of U.N.R.R.A. should temporarily undertake the administration of the Sanitary Conventions (recently revised) which were formerly administered by the Office International d'Hygiène Publique in Paris. A communication has now been received from the Director of the Paris "Office" announcing that the "Office" is open again and ready to undertake the administration of the Conventions; and the French Government has protested against the arrangements made at Montreal in view of the legal rights of the Paris "Office." The Montreal arrangement was, of course, made before Paris was liberated and no reflection on the Paris "Office" was intended. It seems improbable, however, that conditions in France are such as will make it possible for the "Office" to function effectively for some time. American co-operation now being sought in an endeavour to persuade the French Government to accept the Montreal arrangements for the time being, support being promised for giving the Paris Office an appropriate place in the International Health Organisation which it is hoped will be set up under the Economic and Social Council of the proposed new United Nations Organisation.

It is suggested that the future International Health Organisation should take the form of an International Health Commission which would be responsible for promoting the collection and dissemination of technical information, for research work, and for arranging advisory services to Governments. It would also be responsible for determining the scope of a number of specialised health bureaux (of which the Paris "Office" would be one) and preventing overlapping or rivalry between them. It is suggested that the specialised bureaux might be located in different parts of the world, though they would be co-ordinated from a common centre. The work of the Health Organisation of the League of Nations would be taken over by the new International Health Organisation.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

A REMARKABLE passage in Hitler's proclamation of the 12th November concerned the effect of the July plot on the relations between the German army and the Nazi Party. Hitler made the defiant assertion (which was accorded applause) that the time had gone when people might compromise and make reservations and in illustration of this general proposition he cited three particular cases: the Reich war flag, symbolising the National Socialist revolutionary idea, had become the regimental flag of the German armed forces, the German salute had been introduced into the army, and the People's Grenadiers had been formed. The changes in the German Wehrmacht here referred to are probably more spectacular than fundamental. But they are symptomatic of the latest phase of the long struggle between Party and Wehrmacht, in the course of which the Nazi spirit has had to fight its way step by step to further recognition by the soldiers. Two of its recent victories are worthy of mention here as filling out the Führer's picture. Some time in September Hitler issued an order enlarging the powers of the National Socialist Guidance Officers lately appointed to the army. These men were now allowed to address their reports to the highest authority without informing their superior officers and "without regard to the normal channels of communication." This means that the Chief of the National Socialist Leadership Staff, as he is called, may receive reports withheld from the military superiors of the writers. Even more significant is a law dated the 1st October which amends the German Military Service Act of 1935. That Act laid down that Party membership (and subscriptions) should lapse for the period of military service. The creation of the Waffen S.S. as a fighting force was thus a violation of the principle, if not of the letter, of such an Act. The new law not only allows soldiers to be Party members but to hold office in the Party while they are in the forces. It requires that their superior officer consent to this in all cases where their military duties are not interfered with. The only indication of a bargain having been struck is that Party badges must not be worn on military service. The official doctrine now is that only true National Socialists can fight for Germany. General Weisenberger, for example, addressing officers in his military district is reported to have told them that every soldier is first and foremost a fanatical National Socialist and that the Wehrmacht is no more than a part of the National Socialist nation. Other statements in this address make it fairly clear that the most topical point at issue between Nazis and others in the forces is the obvious one of belief in a German victory. Pessimists, said the General, will be eliminated, for young men, and particularly officer cadets, must be trained in loyalty. Such evidence makes it clear that the Nazis are up against more than German military tradition; they fight, and fear, the soldier's knowledge of the real state of affairs.

At long last the Germans have decided to make political capital out of the renegade Russian soldiers of General Vlasov. The General, to whom a rather spasmodic publicity has been accorded in the past, has now emerged as the "Leader of the Freedom Movement of all the Russian Peoples," and as such was received by the German Foreign Minister on the 11th November. On the 18th the widest circulation was given to a broadcast account of a ceremony in Prague at which Vlasov read a manifesto addressed "to the peoples of Russia" and Frank welcomed representatives of several Russian races. On this occasion Vlasov received a congratulatory telegram from Himmler. (For the main points of the manifesto, see below, under "Soviet Union.") Asked in the Wilhelmstrasse whether all this meant a change in Germany's Eastern policy, von Stumm gave an evasive answer, to the effect that German policy, as everyone could see, adapted itself naturally to changing conditions.

Serious German support of Vlasov dates back to early 1943, when units of a Free Russian army were formed and allotted to garrison duties in the eastern occupied areas. Constant friction was reported between these units and Rosenberg's officials who were committed to a Germanising policy which made the Free Russians frequently side with the civil population against them. The limelight he now suddenly enjoys leaves little doubt that he has been given another chance and that the German authorities are using him to experiment with a counterpart of the Moscow "Free Germans," to counteract the impression that Germany it now almost bereft of allies in Europe and most of all to create by political concessions more fighting units. Vlasov's speech in Berlin on the 18th November was an attack on Stalin and a plea for co-ordinated blows against bolshevism, which omitted any mention of the Western Allies. A curious feature of this new political line is the rôle played by Himmler. Hitherto he is supposed to have scorned Vlasov. He used hard words about him in 1943, but had a long meeting with him late last September. It may be significant that to his telegram of the 14th no reply was announced, an omission accentuated by Vlasov's reply to Ribbentrop on the same day.

The account given in last week's Summary of the effect of Allied bombing on police control in Germany may now be filled in by recent press evidence of conditions in certain bombed cities. A central area in Dortmund is now sealed off "for reasons of health." An Essen paper recently urged its readers in Dortmund to be patient in waiting for water and electric light and revealed that evacuation from Duisburg is proceeding as fast as conditions will allow. It commented on the difficulties experienced by NSV workers in finding shelter for the bombed out; people in other places were said to show little understanding of what they had suffered. The rush to shelters is now so great that only women and children are admitted; men must remain outside. Everyone is said to realise that the present scale of attack makes even the most rudimentary supply system nearly impossible, and also that things are bound to get worse. Even now, says one report, the population can hardly keep alive. An article in a Cologne paper refers to the almost nightly spread of destruction over the city: "The enemy has deprived us of gas, water and communications. Bread has become increasingly scarce and a helping of soup is regarded as a gift from heaven."

The Allied offensive on the western front has been reported by the Germans with considerable caution and some comment has explicitly warned the public that it is likely to grow in intensity and to spread over a wide area. The O.K.W. stated on the 15th that the expected British attack had begun west of the Maas, and the succeeding bulletins have treated Thionville and Metz as the most important fighting areas. That of the 19th admitted Allied penetration "at some points in the Geilenkirchen area." The French thrust to Mulhouse and the Rhine was described by one reporter as of secondary importance. Decisive actions, he said, were only to be expected in Lorraine and near Aachen.

Geilenkirchen is a town of 20,000 people, and is the second German town of any size to come under Allied Military Government. The experience so far gained of conditions in the captured townships is hardly of a type to allow more than a conjecture of what German behaviour will be in the more industrialised centres of the Reich. But, as so far observed, the inhabitants seem to have behaved as one would expect. Many have been sullen, most have been indifferent, but obedient; few have welcomed the invader, but little active hostility has been met with. They are said to have behaved like people who had passed from one form of military discipline to another. Nazi evacuation orders were found to have been widely disregarded; white armbands and flags were everywhere in evidence. This behaviour is no doubt known to the Nazi authorities who are reported to have started rumours that Aachen was betrayed into Allied hands by "Catholics and weaklings" and to be considering drastic measures to prevent civilians awaiting the enemy's arrival. Germans have already been told that public buildings will not be spared, now that it is a question of fighting for "every square metre of German soil." The SS are said to have plans for gassing front-line populations who refuse to obey instructions and to have threatened to submit the quarters they inhabit to V.1 fire.

The experience of A.M.G. seems so far to have been that German youth has been less undisciplined and more easy to control than was expected. Recent evidence from within the Reich suggests that within the cadres of the Hitler Youth there is a good deal of discussion and that different views are expressed with surprising frankness. The Edelweiss groups apparently hold their meetings on H.J. premises and discuss reports of conditions in factories and in the army. These groups appear to differ widely in character from one region to another. Some have a doubtful reputation, others seem to maintain with great courage connexions with both workers and soldiers. The numbers involved may not be large, but the attitude shown is in some cases extremely clear and firm, such as may radiate a strong influence once the machinery of repression is removed.

More news is now available of conditions in the Channel Islands where, as reported in this Summary (No. 261) early in October, stocks of food were said to be insufficient to feed the civilian population. The Bailiff of Guernsey has recently got a message through to the Red Cross authorities that conditions on that island are very bad. Rations have been drastically cut, but bread is expected to last only to 15th December. Stocks of soap are completely, and those of clothing largely, exhausted. There are few vegetables and there is no coal. Conditions would seem to be little better in Jersey, where the Bailiff is said to be unpopular as a collaborator who has done well out of the occupation.

Preparations for the defence of Austria are in full swing. Himmler has visited Styria and discussed with the Reichsstatthalter special measures to be taken in that region. Ley has just concluded a ten days' inspection of Volkssturm units. Men are recruited for work on the South-East wall, even from important factories; trade and craft enterprises are being asked to supply workers in their place.

In his annual speech to the peasantry, Backe said that the reduction of nitrogen supplies to agriculture to 23 per cent. of the quantities available in the last year of peace was the chief problem. But the supply of nitrogen, though important, was not all-important. For years neither fertilisers, fuel nor manpower had been available in sufficient quantities. After painting a gloomy picture of the agricultural situation, Backe said that no situation was so difficult that it could not be mastered. The peasantry would have to work harder than before outside the harvest times.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

M. Némec, the Czechoslovak Government delegate for liberated territory, whose arrival in Ruthenia was reported in Summary No. 265, has started his duties at Chust. According to his first reports, the main problem facing the delegation is that of transport and communications. Roads, railways and bridges were destroyed by the retreating enemy and most of the railway rolling-stock was removed to Hungary. In consequence, the distribution of food and medical supplies presents considerable difficulty, and the present situation with regard to these essentials is described by the Minister as "catastrophic."

The delegation of three members of the Slovak National Council, who arrived in this country for discussions with President Beneš and his Government on the 13th October, left England for the Soviet Union, en route for their own country, on the 15th November. A useful exchange of views has taken place and the Slovak representatives have given their endorsement to the legal continuity of the Czechoslovak Republic and the foreign policy of the London Government. There is agreement, too, that the administration of the restored republic shall be much more decentralised than formerly, but apparently decisions as to the nature and extent of this decentralisation have been deferred until the people of Czechoslovakia can be properly consulted.

POLAND.

Nothing has transpired as yet as to reactions in Washington on the questions discussed in M. Mikolajczyk's conversations in Moscow last month. Meantime, the Polish forces in Holland and in Italy continue to receive honourable mention for the part played by them at Arnhem, on the Mark and on Walcheren, at Predappio and Marsignano, and round Forli. On the 11th November, celebrated as Poland's Independence Day, the Polish Chaplain-General in Italy issued a pastoral letter paying tribute to the defenders of Warsaw and praising Poland's fight for moral law and Christian civilisation.

In Lublin the same day was marked by an exchange of greetings between the National Liberation Committee and Marshal Stalin, and by speeches by leading members of the Committee. A delegation from Praga, the liberated suburb of Warsaw, which had arrived in Moscow for the twenty-seventh anniversary of the October Revolution, was received by Marshal Stalin and M. Molotov on the 15th November. The leader, Colonel Marian Spychalski, who was described in the report of the proceedings as Mayor of Warsaw, had been the representative of the National Council of the Homeland with the Polish Army in the U.S.S.R. The delegates presented a plaque bearing the crest of Poland to Marshal Stalin and another to the City of Moscow; the Marshal, in his speech of thanks, referred to the gift as "a mark of the fraternal feelings of the Polish people towards the peoples of the Soviet Union, as a symbol of the firm fighting alliance between Poland and the Soviet Union against the common enemy, Hitlerite Germany."

The National Liberation Committee has issued a decree militarising the national railways in liberated Poland for the duration of the war (the 4th November). It has established twenty-one radio relay centres, and issued many hundreds of loud-speakers. Rapid execution of the provisions for land distribution has continued. In Rzeszow Province, i.e., that of Lwow west of the Curzon Line, the process is reported to be complete to over 80 per cent., over 13,000 farmsteads having already received land there. Provincial Jewish committees have been established throughout liberated Poland and have elected a Central Committee, of which Dr. Sommerstein is chairman. The Lublin Catholic University reopened on the 12th November after a lapse of five years.

SOVIET UNION

The only military progress to report this week has been in the area east and north-east of Budapest, where the Red Army has continued to advance slowly, capturing the town and railway station of Györgyös on the 19th November. That day was celebrated in the U.S.S.R. as Artillery Day, in honour of the barrage of the 19th November, 1942, which initiated the Red Army's offensive at Stalingrad. In an Order of the Day Marshal Stalin recalled the triumphs of Soviet artillery outside Leningrad and Moscow, at Stalingrad, Voronezh, Kursk, Byelgorod, Kharkov, Kiev, Vitebsk, Bobruisk, Minsk, Jassy and Kishinev, and claimed that "everybody knows that Soviet artillery has achieved complete domination of the battlefield over enemy artillery." The occasion was greeted by 20 salvoes from guns in Moscow, in the other 15 capitals of Union Republics, and in Leningrad, Stalingrad, Sevastopol, Odessa, Khabarovsk, Novosibirsk, Sverdlovsk, Gorky, Molotov and Tula. (The list includes some of the main production centres of Soviet armaments as well as cities where fighting took place.) The Order of Suvorov (First class) has been awarded to Chief Marshal of Artillery Voronov, Marshals of Artillery Chistyakov and Yakovlev, Colonel-Generals Kazakov and Khlebnikov. The order of Suvorov (Second class) and Kutuzov were awarded to a large number of directors and designers of the munitions industry.

On the 17th November Moscow Radio broadcast a Government statement confirming that General de Gaulle had been invited to visit Moscow. The wording of the statement seemed intended to make it clear that the invitation had been issued only after General de Gaulle had suggested to M. Bogomolov, Soviet Ambassador in Paris, that such an invitation would be welcome. It is, perhaps, not a coincidence that the Soviet press and radio has recently shown anxiety about proposals for a West European bloc comprising Great Britain, France, Belgium and Holland. Izvestiya's review of international affairs on the 16th November, after welcoming the invitation to France to participate in the European Advisory Commission, went on to discuss suggestions for "a Western European military and economic bloc." "Some see in this project only a regional agreement within the framework of the international organisation of the United Nations; others see in it, frankly, a counter-balance to the Soviet Union, or one of the unsuccessful combinations of the pre-war style. It is natural that warning voices are heard in the press, reminding us that France must look not only west but east too, and that a close mutual understanding with Russia must be an axiom of French post-war policy." It is clear that the Soviet Government will not welcome any suggestion for a western bloc which is not closely integrated into a general security scheme (see also under "France").

The Soviet papers have given at some length Tass reports of the Belgian resistance movement's protests against the Government's decision to disarm it. On the 19th November Pravda's observer discussed the matter at some length in a spirit entirely favourable to the resistance movement. The news from Belgium was "strange," in that the Government "considers its most urgent task to be the disarming of the Belgian forces of resistance. . . . It is unlikely that the disarming of the most resolute enemies of Hitlerite Germany will help Belgium."

The Russian quisling, Lieutenant-General Vlasov, has been in eclipse since his activities were last recorded in the Summary (No. 207). On the 14th November he emerged from obscurity, and "in the presence of Russian, Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Tartar, Caucasian and Turkmen representatives" in Prague he announced the formation of a "committee for the liberation of the peoples of Russia," with a detailed programme. This included the overthrow of the Stalin régime; an honourable peace with Germany; an internal policy based on national self-determination; equal rights for women; consolidation of the family; abolition of forced labour and mass deportations; dissolution of collective farms; restoration of private property and free trade; institution of real freedom of conscience, assembly, press; release of political prisoners; "no retaliation against those who give up fighting at Stalin's side for bolshevism, whether they fought from conviction or because they were forced to."

The "Committee of Liberation," in whose name Vlasov claimed to be speaking, remains shrouded in mystery. German sources assert that it has a membership of seventy-five, including workers, peasants and intellectuals; the absence of "a great number" of these from Prague was explained by the fact that they were in the U.S.S.R. This committee will publish a newspaper, Volya Naroda, twice weekly under the editorship of Lieutenant-General G. Shilenkov. This paper will replace the Novoye Slovo, hitherto the Berlin organ of the Russian quislings.

Vlasov seems always to have wished to bring under his command all Soviet prisoners of war who were prepared to act against the Red Army, and to put forward a political platform for an "indivisible Russia." The obstacle hitherto seems to have been Rosenberg. Vlasov's reappearance is no doubt partly due to the fact that the Red Army has knocked the bottom out of Rosenberg's eastern policy. Vlasov has tried to exploit the expulsion of the German army from Soviet territory, and war-weariness in the U.S.S.R. He "guaranteed" that Germany had no designs on Russian territory and that she will respect the sovereignty of anti-Bolshevik Russia; and he appealed to Russian patriotism against "the international forces led by Stalin's clique, which thrives on world revolution." Against these he called for "unity of all anti-Bolshevik forces."

Hitherto Vlasov's "Russian Liberation Army" (composed of Russians only) has proved extremely unreliable in action against the Red Army (see Summaries Nos. 198 and 207), and has not been allowed automatic weapons or heavy artillery. Now it has been united with the possibly more reliable (from the German point of view) Cossack units, as well as with the "Ukrainian Army of Liberation" and Caucasian, Turkmen, Tartar and Byelorussian units; and it is claimed that it is being supplied with modern equipment, and will soon take over an important sector of the Eastern front. This is the main significance of the new move from the German point of view. The Slovak Radio stated that, " although no exact figures about the planned Vlasov Army are yet known, it may be taken as certain that it will exceed 1 million." If a force of anything like this fantastic figure can be got together, it may be assumed that the overwhelming majority of it will be unmoved by Vlasov's new programme; his prospective followers will almost certainly attach more importance to his promise that " the committee will make every effort to make easier your position here in a foreign country " than to his more ambitious flights of political theory. There has been no reference to the new " Committee of Liberation " or to Vlasov from the Soviet side; but the Soviet authorities were no doubt aware of what was being planned, and intended the recent promise of an amnesty to prisoners of war who had served the enemy (see last week's Summary) at least in part as a counter-measure. (See also under " Germany.")

Tass recorded on the 14th November the arrival at Murmansk of 10,000 Soviet prisoners of war and deported civilians who had been liberated by the western Allies. They were welcomed by representatives of the Delegate of the Council of People's Commissars for Repatriation (see last week's Summary), and are being sent in groups to their homes. Orphans are being accommodated in children's homes. A further 10,000 liberated Byelorussians, mostly women, children and old persons, are reported to have returned home from Poland.

It was reported by Moscow Radio that Dr. Subasić, the Yugoslav Prime Minister, had arrived in Moscow on the 19th November, and had a conversation with M. Molotov on the following day. He was accompanied by M. Kardelj, deputy Chairman of the National Committee of Liberation, by M. Simić, the Yugoslav Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., by General Velebit and by members of the Soviet military mission in Yugoslavia headed by Major-General Melnikov.

The Soviet press on the 16th November reported the appointment of M. A. G. Shchiborin as Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary in Egypt, to replace M. Nikolai Novikov (the first Soviet Minister to Egypt), who was recalled December 1943, made a considerable impression in Cairo by his knowledge to Moscow last August. The retiring Minister, who presented his credentials in of Moslem and Near Eastern affairs and of Arabic. M. Shchiborin was First Secretary at the Soviet Embassy to the Allied Governments in London from 1942 to the spring of this year, when he too was recalled to Moscow (see also under " Middle East ").

SCANDINAVIA.

The long-expected formation of a new Finnish Government was announced on the 17th November. As anticipated, it is under the premiership of M. Paasikivi and its composition seems highly appropriate to its task of consummating the peace settlement and promoting friendlier relations with the Soviet Union. Besides the Premier, with his unrivalled experience of Finno-Russian negotiation, the Government has at least two other members who can claim exceptional knowledge of Soviet mentality, the Foreign Minister, M. Enckell, who was born in St. Petersburg and speaks fluent Russian, and M. Svento, foreign editor of Suomi Sosialidemokraatti, who has recently been attached to the Finnish Foreign Office as a special expert on questions relating to the Soviet Union. The veteran General Walden, one of the few survivors of the Linkomies régime, thoroughly deserves his retention as Minister of Defence, in view of his record in peace negotiation, as a member of the delegation which concluded the Treaty of Dorpat in 1920 and of that which negotiated the settlement after the " winter war " of 1939–40.

Among other members whose inclusion is likely to be viewed with favour by the Soviet Government are the Communist Yrjö Leino and M. Johan Helo, whose advocacy of Russo-Finnish friendship earned him a long period of imprisonment and expulsion from the Social Democrat Party.

Politically, the new Government is representative of nearly all sections of opinion. The Social Democrats have six places in it, adroitly divided so as to give equal mathematical representation to their two factions, while retaining a heavy qualitative balance on the anti-Tanner side. The Tannerites all lack weight and influence, and it is probably significant that two of them, MM. Takki and Aura, are among the very few survivors from the Linkomies régime, which approved the Ryti–Ribbentrop Pact. Their retention is presumably justified by their known harmlessness and passivity. The anti-Tanner section can boast perhaps three of the most important members of the Government—M. Pokkala, a veteran politician with a large Finnish following, M. Vuori and M. Svento. For the rest, the Agrarian Party has four representatives, and the Swedish People's Party three, of whom the only important one is M. Enekell, while the Conservatives are represented by the Premier and General Walden, and the National Progress Party has a young and unknown supporter in the Deputy Finance Minister, M. Tuomioja. For present purposes the Administration seems promising, and the objection that it does not fully represent the present party distribution in the Diet is probably unimportant, since new elections are due to be held before long. The absence of M. Fagerholm seems to be a price paid in the course of the political bargaining necessitated by the reconstruction, which is said to have been difficult and has certainly taken an unexpectedly long time.

The Finnish Government has applied to Sweden for the return of three alleged war criminals, who include M. Ketilainen, formerly Governor in Eastern Karelia, and General Aurijuri, Commander of the Eighth Division in the Finnish Army. These men headed a list of Finnish war criminals in East Karelia published by the Extraordinary State Commission of the Soviet Union as long ago as August last.

Further instances have been reported of German violations of the Swedish frontier. On the 14th November it was announced that Germans had crossed the Kongemä river about 25 kilometres north-west of Karesuando, and had pulled down barns and stolen nearly 5,000 kilos. of hay. The attitude assumed by German Foreign Office spokesmen to the Swedish protests has been insolently non-conciliatory, in spite of General Falkenhorst's apology for the incident on the Swedo-Norwegian frontier (see last week's Summary). The press campaign in Sweden is described as astonishing, and it is urged that the exact course of the frontier in this region is difficult to determine. Actually, it is marked by the large river which was crossed by the depredators. It is also suggested that in this region " a Swedish hay-loft may have been mistaken for a Norwegian one " (the looting of which is presumably to be regarded as quite in order!) whereas in fact the Norwegian frontier at the point in question is separated from Finland by about 70 or 80 kilometres of intervening Swedish territory. The Wilhelmstrasse spokesman finally counter-attacked by alleging repeated violations of the Norwegian frontier by Swedish soldiers and making a further complaint with reference to the Norwegian police training camps in Sweden. Finally he asserted that Anglo-American bombers were using Sweden as an assembly area for terror raids on German towns. An equally provocative line has been taken in German press comment on the Swedish protest against the Baltic war zone. In this rather strained situation, the German Minister to Sweden, Herr Thomsen, has been recalled to report. He arrived in Berlin on the 16th November.

There has been a lively discussion in the Swedish press on the question of permitting the recruitment of Swedish volunteers for service in Norway, on analogy with the course pursued during the Finnish War of 1939–40. Such a course is viewed with favour by some influential papers, and the press seems to assume that the question was among those discussed between the Swedish Government and the visiting Norwegian Ministers. On the other hand, an article in the Yorkshire Post for the 15th November, which hints at the possibility of active Swedish intervention in the war, when Sweden " could carry a large, useful and chivalrous share of the sacrifices yet to be made," has been criticised by Dagens Nyheter as at all events premature.

M. Terje Wold, the Norwegian Minister of Justice, has now arrived in liberated Norwegian territory. A Norwegian mission is now attached to the Russian command on the Arctic front, under the leadership of Colonel Dahl, who commanded the Alta battalion in North Norway in 1940 and has an intimate acquaintance with the topography and local conditions. A force of about 250 Norwegian soldiers, sent from Great Britain, is also reported to have arrived in Kirkenes. The anxiety felt in Norwegian circles for the fate of the inhabitants of Finnmark, in view of the systematic campaign of destruction pursued by the Germans in North Norway, was voiced by Crown Price Olav in a speech delivered in London on the 20th November. The latest reports are distinctly disquieting. In response to a request from the Quisling Government for permission to evacuate by the " horse-shoe " route through Sweden from Narvik to Trondheim, the Swedish Government have expressed their willingness to welcome all Norwegian refugees arriving in Sweden, but have naturally refused to assist the Germans and quislings in their policy of forced evacuation by granting the use of Swedish territory for the purpose of transferring the population to Southern Norway.

In spite of the activities of the Gestapo, sabotage in Denmark, particularly directed against the Jutland railway system, has recently assumed very large proportions. On the 15th November it was reported by D.P.T. to have reached such a scale that it was no longer possible to report separate details. These achievements have led to a serious outbreak of reprisal murders and acts of counter-sabotage, attributed to the Schalburg Corps. In consequence of these outrages, on the 15th November the trade union leaders in Esbjerg called a 24-hour strike by way of protest. On the 16th the Germans imposed a curfew and cut off gas and other essential supplies. Throughout the following day flags were flown at half-mast, but after the release of the Mayor and other local leaders who had been arrested by the Germans, negotiations were resumed. On the same day, the 17th November, an exceptionally daring raid was made on an arms factory in Copenhagen, when not less than 1,200 sub-machine-guns are reported to have been carried off without any casualties being incurred.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 13th it was announced that all members of the Belgian resistance organisations were to hand over their arms to the gendarmerie on or before the 18th; all fit men, however, would be allowed to volunteer for the army. It was subsequently explained that all who had volunteered were to return to their homes until it had been decided whether or no they were to be called up, during which period they would be regarded as soldiers on leave and be paid as such. Volunteers who were called up would, if they wished, be put into platoons entirely composed of ex-members of the resistance organisations.

These provisions were far from satisfactory to the Communists and the resistance organisations in general. On the 16th the two Communist Ministers and M. Demany, who represented the Independence Front in the Cabinet, walked out of a Cabinet meeting and told journalists who were waiting for news that they had resigned. The Communist Ministers explained that in their view all volunteers should have been taken into the army at once; the Government, in their opinion, were hostile to the resistance organisations and to all that they stood for. Further, the Government had omitted to take any steps against certain categories of traitors, many of the little fish had been caught, but the big fish were being left unmolested; for instance, nothing had been done to those industrialists who had collaborated with Germany; lastly, although the Government's financial policy bore hardly on the small man, all requests for concessions in his favour had been rejected.

M. Demany also made a statement to the press in which, while expressing his appreciation of M. Pierlot's sympathetic attitude to the resistance organisations, he declared that the Ministry of Defence was hostile to them. He added that the Government was deplorably slack in dealing with traitors and hinted that a reactionary spirit was strong within it.

That same evening M. Pierlot affirmed in a vigorous broadcast that, while the Government appreciated the value of the services of the resistance organisations, they were determined to carry out their policy of disbanding them, a policy with which the Allied Supreme Command were in full agreement. Moreover, at the request of that command Brussels Radio broadcast a message from General Erskine, head of the Allied Military Mission in Belgium, to the effect that Allied forces would, if asked by the Government to do so, assist in the maintenance of order.

These statements had a calming effect. For, though a meeting of protest against the Government's measures was held in Brussels on the 16th, in spite of an official ban, and addressed by two of the ex-Ministers, all three of them met General Erskine on the 17th and agreed that they would do all they could to secure observance of the law and to prevent conflict between the resistance organisations and Allied forces. These organisations, on their part, agreed that all weapons in the possession of their members were to be handed over to Allied authorities, and on the 20th the methods by which this was to be done were settled; after the 25th no member of any resistance organisation was to carry arms unless he held a permit to do so from the Allied authorities.

Thus M. Pierlot appears to have weathered a dangerous storm; but other storms are probably to come. Though the disbanding of the resistance groups will probably be widely welcomed, for all the outcry that their members made, there is undoubtedly a good deal of feeling against the Government because they have not yet taken any steps against alleged industrialist collaborators. There is also some apprehension in left-wing circles that reactionary influences are strong. But the Socialists have decided that this is not the moment to withdraw support from the Government. Though M. Pierlot is not very popular, the prospect of succeeding him does not now allure any possible rivals. Yet, though he may be indispensable for the moment, his position is not strong.

FRANCE.

Mr. Eden's account of his visit to Paris with the Prime Minister, rendered to the House of Commons on the 14th November, was prominently reported in the Paris press and gave great satisfaction in France. No less satisfaction was caused by the announcement of the 17th November that General de Gaulle had accepted an invitation from the Government of the U.S.S.R. and would shortly visit Moscow accompanied by M. Bidault. This news was universally welcomed by the press as a further sign of the recognition of France as a Great Power and as evidence that the success of the Prime Minister's visit to Paris had not in any way affected the friendly relations between France and the U.S.S.R. Many papers echoed M. Bidault's belief, recorded in an interview published by the Sunday Times of the 12th November, that France could "play a valuable part in forming a bridge between East and West." Hopes were also expressed that an invitation to General de Gaulle would soon transform the meetings of "the big three" into meetings of "the big four."

Mr. Duff Cooper presented his credentials to General de Gaulle on the 18th November. The French and Canadian Governments have agreed to raise their Legations in Ottawa and Paris to the rank of Embassies.

On the 19th November General de Gaulle made a broadcast survey of France's progress towards military and economic recovery. He announced that the First French Army, supported exclusively by the French Air Force, had launched a successful offensive on a front of 100 kilometres between St. Dié and the Swiss frontier, captured Montbéliard, Héricourt and Delle, reached the outskirts of Belfort, entered Alsace and taken nearly 10,000 prisoners. Other French forces, comprising units of all arms, were attacking with the Americans in Lorraine, had taken Baccaret and were engaged at Metz. The detachments formed in the Empire were thus being amalgamated with units of the F.F.L. in the heat of battle, and in eight months' time the nation would have a large army in Europe, an army worthy of it. (Since the General's broadcast it has been reported that the French First Army has entered Belfort and reached the Rhine between Mulhouse and the Swiss frontier; also that organised resistance has ceased in Metz.)

Turning to the economic situation, General de Gaulle said that the efforts to restore economic power had been concentrated "on the three domains on which all the rest depends: electric current, transport and raw materials." Coal production had risen from 244,000 tons weekly in September to 422,000 tons in the past week, or about half the pre-war output. On the 21st August Paris had been supplied with 900,000 kilowatt hours of electric current. On the 18th November she had received 9 million kilowatt hours. In 1938 the average had been 11 million. 1,238 bridges had been rebuilt and on the 21st November the first train would cross the Loire, at Orléans. On the 18th the first barges from the north of France (they are reported by the press to have carried coal) had been unloaded in Paris. The Seine was now navigable from Le Havre to Montereau and the Canal du Midi from Sète to Bordeaux. While the condition of the ports still forbade the import of raw materials, plans were being drawn up which should enable imports to begin on a considerable and ever-increasing scale by the beginning of spring at latest. All this had had to be accomplished "by gradually remedying the inevitable confusion produced in the central and local administration by the long period of enemy oppression, the presence of Allied armies, the sudden liberation, the fall of the Vichy régime, the isolation of whole districts and sometimes by some impatient people who had more enthusiasm than experience." Finally, the General appealed to all "in the name of all and in the interests of all" to make the Liberation Loan a triumphant success. Economic recovery and real social reforms would not be possible if large accumulations of surplus money remained idle or threatened the price structure.

The death of M. Lepercq (see Summary No. 267), whose last act was to lower the minimum subscription to the Liberation Loan from 5,000 francs to 2,000, has caused a minor Cabinet reshuffle. His post as Minister of Finance has been taken by M. Pleven. M. Giaccobi, Minister of Food, has succeeded M. Pleven as Minister for the Colonies, and M. Paul Ramadier, a former Socialist Deputy and Under-Secretary for Public Works in various Governments between 1930 and 1940, enters the Government as Minister of Food. Another newcomer is M. Raoul Dautry, Minister for Armaments from September 1939 to June 1940, who has been appointed to the newly created Ministry of Reconstruction and Town Planning. In his new rôle as Minister of Finance, M. Pleven broadcast an address to the nation on the 16th November urging support of the Liberation Loan. He was followed on the 17th by the Minister of Agriculture, who made a special appeal to the peasants to subscribe.

The doubts voiced in some circles about the adequacy of the Government's financial measures reappeared in a statement by the Confédération Générale du Travail on the 14th November. This called for the stabilisation of prices; the suppression of the black market in gold; the taking of a census of all fortunes, with the aim of confiscating illegal profits; and the replacement of existing bank-notes by a new issue. It also renewed long-standing demands for the nationalisation of credit institutions and key industries.

An answer to these demands was provided by M. Mendès—France's programme of economic policy, unanimously approved by the Cabinet on the 17th November. This stated that the Government had decided on price stabilisation, on the gradual absorption of surplus purchasing-power through loans and taxation, and on a census of fortunes and illicit profits. A plan of industrial production would be drawn up and all local schemes brought within its scope. Plans for the nationalisation of a large sector of industry by orderly and legal means were already under way but needed detailed study. The ordinance on the creation of factory committees (see Summary No. 266) was of such importance that it would be submitted to the Consultative Assembly.

At the Cabinet meeting of the 15th November the Government decided on the confiscation of the Renault works. These had already been requisitioned (see Summary No. 261) and would have been automatically confiscated after the trial and expected condemnation of Louis Renault, had not his death in hospital made it necessary to issue a special ordinance.

M. Vincent Auriol has been elected President of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Consultative Assembly, and M. Charles Laurent, President of the Finance Commission. By 170 votes to 6 the Assembly has refuesd to accept the nomination of M. Poitou-Duplessy as one of the Parliamentary representatives. M. Poitou-Duplessy, who belongs to the Fédération républicaine, was one of those who voted full powers to Pétain in July 1940.

The Socialist Party Congress (see last Summary) ended on the 13th November. A provisional directing committee of twenty-five members was elected and charged with preparing a new constitution for the party to be presented to the next Congress early in 1945. Seventy-eight Deputies and three Senators were excluded from the party on the grounds of collaboration or lack of resistance. The Congress empowered the directing committee to continue conversations with the Mouvement de Libération Nationale and other groups. It welcomed the idea of collaboration with Christian Democrats, but reaffirmed the principle of secularism. It approved the presence of party representatives in the Government and voted a long resolution, in which it pledged its support to General de Gaulle for the implementation of the C.N.R. programme; demanded the nationalisation of key industries and the decentralisation of local administration; and called for a world federation of free nations, in which a new Germany, purged but not dismembered, should have her place.

According to the Agence Française de Presse, the Regional Commissioner has stated that in the Toulouse region 476 militiamen have been imprisoned and twenty-one shot; that 221 collaborationists and seventy-seven members of the Parti Populaire Français have been interned; and that, in addition, there are a number of people detained whose cases have not yet been investigated. At Annecy "irregulars," disguised as members of the F.F.I., have broken into the prison and removed and shot two of the prisoners—Colonel Lelong, who had already been condemned to death, and General Marion, who was awaiting trial. The victims were respectively police chief and prefect of Haute-Savoie under the Vichy régime. The Regional Commissioner for Lyons is taking drastic measures to prevent further outrages.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The discouragement given in this country and in the United States to General Franco's profession of democratic faith has induced the Spanish press to explain away some misunderstandings (as they say) caused by the Caudillo's interview with the U.P. correspondent. Arriba of the 17th November, for instance, points out that the peace conference will fall into two parts, the settlement of the war and the creation of peace. Neutrals will not participate in the first, but in the second, "the presence of nations who by remaining aloof from the conflict have shown a strong love of peace and civilisation is imperative." And Ya of the 18th November carried an article which said substantially the same thing. At the same time official propaganda reinforces this argument by taking up once again the glorious heritage of Hispanity. Eugenio Montez, one of the stock Falange hacks, makes a truly astonishing attempt in Arriba to show the United States that the aims of America and Franco Spain are identical. After recalling Franco's words that Spain is to-day part of America, the writer says cryptically that Spain's contribution to the history of the United States has left a longing for the homeland. "Our great friendship with the United States of America and Brazil is part of that family feeling, perhaps a political family feeling." After this piece of impudence comes a tribute—"The example of progress and activity the United States gives the world attracts us towards her, and makes us wish to collaborate in the future as in the past"; then comes the real claim: "To the sympathy inspired by history we add to-day analogous aims." If we did not know that every Spanish journalist is, in Bauldelaire's words, "un gazetier fumeux qui se croit un flambeau," we should surely be nauseated by the spectacle of a nation which claims above all the high quality of pride and yet can stoop to the humiliation of such mean bamboozlement.

However, not all Franco's supporters are prepared to truckle in this ignominious fashion; the Falange extremists, moved by the brother of pride, obstinacy, are indignantly protesting against Franco's betrayal of Falange transcendentalism, and a report from Barcelona suggests even that the very extreme extremists are thinking of forming a new party in opposition to the Caudillo. Visionary ecstasy is one of the outstanding characteristics of Spanish mystics.

Largely owing to the arrival of a regiment of Spahis, who have had a calmative effect upon the Spanish maquis, the situation along the Pyrenean frontier continues to improve. This pacific influence of African blackamoors upon Spaniards in French metropolitan territory is not to be taken, however, as an augury for future international peace, justice and liberty. French sources suggest that the Unión Nacional in Toulouse had already ceased to have any control over these guerrilleros, who conduct was becoming frankly disorderly, and further, that the Junta Suprema itself, obeying the normal rhythm of Spanish politics, was fast dissolving into a fissiparous free-for-all. Another sign of increasing French control is the dispatch into the Republic of Andorra of 100 French gendarmes. This unusual, though justified precaution was taken by General de Gaulle in his capacity as co-Prince of Andorra (the other titular head, who was informed of the step taken, is the Spanish Bishop of Seo de Urgel). France has never admitted the right of the Spanish Government to act for the Spanish tutelary co-Prince, and this action, taken before the winter snows make passage into Andorra from France impracticable, is clearly intended to safeguard the French interest by preventing any change in the traditional balance of power in the small Republic. The Spaniards, however, in order not to be left out of the picture, have provided the other co-Prince, the Bishop of Urgel, with 100 Spanish gendarmes also destined for Andorra. The French Government have taken exception to this action, and have made an official protest in Madrid. Their view is that the Bishop of Urgel has nothing to do with the maintenance of order, which is a purely French responsibility. This Spanish move, which follows closely upon the formal recognition of the French Provisional Government, seems to be intended as a hint to the French that, in spite of recent pronouncements made on French soil, the Franco régime is still very much alive and capable of kicking.

The alleged approach by Señor Miguel Maura, the Spanish Republican leader, to Señor Sangroniz, Spanish interim representative in Paris, which received publicity in the French and British newspapers, has caused some excitement in Madrid. Maura's proposal, which, he claimed, Señor Sangroniz promised to forward to his Government, was that General Franco should send representatives to discuss with Spanish political exiles a modification of the present régime. The Falange are enraged, and the Monarchists and Socialists are equally angry because they both consider Maura to be a traitor representing nobody; only the moderate Republicans are pleased, because they attach political importance to the inclusion of this piece of news in the B.B.C. Spanish programme on the 16th November. The Spanish press of the 17th published a scornful denial that any Spanish diplomatic representatives abroad could have held political conversations with expatriates. In the meantime, the Spanish Government have formally recognised the French Provisional Government.

The state of Portugal may be ultimately bettered by the operation of the scheme for the general reorganisation of industry (including a plan for electrification), which was approved by the National Assembly on the 23rd October (see Summaries Nos. 246 and 264). After the revolution in 1926 Dr. Salazar successfully solved by orthodox methods Portugal's financial problems, but he has been less fortunate in overcoming the obstacles, some natural, some human, in the way of economic productivity. His hopes of increased agricultural yields have not been realised, and he is now turning to industrial expansion in order to raise the low standard of living of a preponderantly agricultural population. Hitherto, lack of raw materials, small markets, shyness of investors and other factors have hindered industrialisation, but the new Government scheme shows Dr. Salazar's belief that only increased industrial production can make the country capable of supporting its rapidly increasing population. This subject will be treated in a later Summary.

ITALY.

The Soviet Labour Delegation has finished its visit to Italy and is now returning to Russia. A comprehensive tour, organised by the General Confederation of Italian Labour, was made of the greater part of liberated Italy, including Sicily and Sardinia, during which the delegates expressed their sympathy for the Italian working classes, and a hope that now the Fascist régime had come to an end, Russia and Italy could renew their former friendly associations. In Rome and the other principal towns the truce between the political parties was observed, as well as the agreement to preserve unity in the Trades Union movement, but in the south the opportunity to stage some propaganda was apparently too much for the local Communist parties.

On the 11th November the Christian Democratic Party published two resolutions, the first of which accused the press of certain parties represented in the Government of trying to undermine the authority of the Government. The resolution went on to say that, unless the use of violence and a disrespect of the law were not energetically suppressed, the coalition Government would fall and with it the principles of liberty and democracy. Signor Togliatti, in the Communist Party's paper, Unità, has now published a reply to the Christian Democrat's resolution, in which he says that this resolution should have been addressed to the Fascists and not to the anti-Fascist and progressive forces of the country. Signor Togliatti quotes the partisan resistance in the north as an example of the discipline of the country and says that there have been no serious disturbances except the Palermo riot, which, according to him, was provoked by the forces of the State. Signor Togliatti attributes any discontent felt by the people more to the delay in punishing former Fascists rather than to lack of food.

The Communist paper Unità, of the 16th November, also publishes an article by Di Vittorio, one of the three secretaries of the Confederation of Italian Labour, attacking the Labour Offices. The introduction and support of these offices is attributed to the desire to import the American system into Italian administration. Di Vittorio admits the usefulness of the offices in supplying labour for the armed forces particularly during the early days of liberation, but attributes their continued existence in areas where civil administration has taken over to the intrigues of Italian civilians. He considers them dangerous, because they threaten to perpetuate Fascist tendencies and to regiment the workers' organisations. He further claims that the Trade Unions, in conjunction with the local authorities, are capable of placing workers in employment and should refuse to comply with the demands of the Labour Offices.

Sardinia appears to be taking her cue from Sicily as regards her demands from the Italian Government. The Separatist Movement hardly exists in Sardinia compared with Sicily, but unless steps are taken to improve conditions unrest will undoubtedly grow. It is not clear in what way Sicily and Sardinia think that they would benefit from separation, but the desire for independence, particularly in the former island, was probably born from their feeling of having been both neglected and exploited in the past. The most obvious schemes for eventual economic amelioration—such as afforestation, drainage and the expansion of the fishing industry—seem to be long-term policies necessitating considerable capital and this is not likely to be available in either island at present or in the future.

Count Carandini has arrived in London to take up his duties as Italian representative.

Signor Quaroni has been appointed Italian Ambassador in Moscow. Signor Quaroni was formerly the Italian diplomatic representative in Kabul. Under Marshal Badoglio's Government he was sent from there to Moscow in the same capacity in April 1944.

General Roatta, the former Chief of the Italian General Staff, has been arrested in Rome and accused of contributing to the maintenance of Fascism in power before the war. General Roatta was removed from his post, at the request of the British Government, in November 1943.

In the North, though the amnesty to partisans ended on the 10th November, reports still come in daily as to the number of partisans who are said to have given themselves up in various regions. These numbers are in no case large, and seldom exceed three figures; the Fascists account for this by saying that full returns have not yet come in. In any case, it would seem that only a small proportion have reported out of the total number of partisans in North Italy—a total which Fascist Republican official estimates put at over 85,000. The fate of the partisans who give themselves up seems to be uncertain. Swiss sources have suggested that the amnesty move was merely a German-inspired manœuvre to gain more labour for Germany, but this theory would seem to be rendered questionable by the recent issue of a circular from the Italian Minister of the Interior, stating that there will be no further compulsory rounding-up of Italian workers for Germany. Reprisals appear to have been carried out in some cases: for example, thirty partisans of Rovigo are said to have been hanged on surrendering, in retaliation for the death of a German officer at partisan hands. Despite both amnesty and General Alexander's warning to partisans to lie low during the winter, reports of patriot sabotage and other activities continue to be numerous.

The Communist and Socialist Parties in the North have followed the example of the corresponding parties in the South and entered into an alliance for co-ordinated action.

Mussolini presided over a meeting of the Fascist Republican Cabinet on the 16th November and made a detailed report on the political and military situation, of which, however, no particulars are available. The financial situation was also discussed, and warnings were uttered both then and later as to the dangers of inflation.

Swiss papers report that Mussolini has been playing with the idea of founding a new Nationalist Party to replace Fascism. He is said recently to have interviewed a former follower of Croce's, Dr. Edmondo Cione, who lately wrote a series of articles against Croce in the Corrière della Sera, and whose theories may apparently be utilised for the basis of this new party. The party's motto would be "Via dall'Italia tutti stranieri, Tedeschi, Anglo-Americani, &c.," and it seems to be on Nationalist lines similar to those recently put forward by a new "Italian Federation of Students and Intellectuals" which has already been strongly denounced by Farinacci.

VATICAN.

The problem of the relations between Catholics and Communists has been raised by Mgr. Théas, Bishop of Montauban, an unwavering supporter of the French Resistance Movement. Temps Présent of the 10th November quoted a letter of his to the leader of the "Jeunesse communiste" of Tarn et Garonne, in which he restated the Church's social ideals much as the Pope did on the 1st September. The Bishop had heard that many young Communists repudiated the Marxist materialism of their elders and adhered to a spiritual doctrine, and he wished to discover whether Christians and Communists could collaborate in building the new world, or whether their views in 1944 were as incompatible as they were in 1937. He called the Proletariat a social sore, condemned capitalist enslavement of the workers as the Archbishop of Toulouse had done in October (see Summary No. 266, "Vatican"), maintained the workers' right to private property and the amenities of civilisation. He opposed any system that made of marriage or the family a purely human institution or handed to the community the parents' responsibility for their children's education. Finally, he said that the Church would not accept a social system based on atheism and materialism. Here, his words emphasised the papal pronouncements which condemn not Communism, but "atheistic Communism."

Six English broadcasts from the Vatican have been devoted to the Pope's address to Italian doctors on the 12th November. A doctor's first duty was to save life. From this it followed that he must not countenance mercy killings, nor the "satisfaction of a natural instinct while depriving it of its life-generating power." The Pope recognised the fact that in moral questions the laity would often more readily hear the advice of a doctor than of a theologian. Hence the need for doctors with a Christian outlook.

Vatican officials perform a supremely useful function when they visit and report on conditions in military and civilian prison camps. The September number of the Vatican paper Ecclesia contains a severe condemnation of conditions that obtained in French-controlled camps of Italians in Tunisia. On the other hand, the papal visitor goes out of his way to praise the Finns who more than fulfil the Geneva Convention in the treatment of their prisoners. This, says the report, is all the more praiseworthy because the Soviet Government does not feel bound by the Convention and Finns have no sure information of the fate of their own men imprisoned in the Soviet Union.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

During the week German reports persistently spoke of fierce fighting round Budapest, as well as on the southern crossings of the Danube. Soviet communiqués suggested that only containing attacks had gone on in these areas, while the main weight of the Soviet and Roumanian forces in Hungary—put by the Germans at 35 rifle and 7 motorised divisions—was thrown northward. In this direction important progress was made and the northern limit of the Great Plain reached at several points. Among the larger places captured were Gyöngyös and Diosgyör.

The Soviets report that the attitude of the population in the occupied areas has become more friendly, while their own authorities have given the strictest orders for good conduct. Altogether, Hungarian, moral and military, is clearly weakening. Officers and men are deserting in increasing numbers. Recent desertions include the Chief of Staff of the 7th Army Corps, one entire battalion under its commanding officer, and many smaller formations. The Minister of Defence has attempted to raise the morale of his troops by promising them better pay, larger dependants' allowances and speedier promotion; but it is symptomatic that the authorities still prefer to employ the population chiefly in the factories, or on digging fortifications, while for the fighting services they appeal chiefly to volunteers from among young and fanatical elements who are being thrown hurriedly into the field; volunteer Levente anti-tank units were in action three weeks after formation. Ministers and speakers on the wireless pour out denunciations of "poisoners of the nation" who create panic and internal unrest. Martial law has been extended to cover all offences calculated to undermine the national will to resist. The Commissioners of the operational zones have been given practically dictatorial powers. Meanwhile the supply situation continues to worsen. The number of refugees in west Hungary is estimated at "hundreds of thousands," and it is admitted that large reserves of foodstuffs have fallen into Soviet hands.

The National Socialists and the Union of East Fronters have dissolved themselves and entered the Arrow Cross Party. The Government has repeatedly announced that Budapest can and will be held; but it is privily preparing itself to retire, probably to Sopron. It is confirmed that large quantities of industrial and other equipment, including stocks of agricultural produce, are being evacuated to Germany.

The accusations now being launched against Horthy and his entourage include not only having let the Soviet advance across the Carpathians (an admission of the effectiveness, formerly denied, of his Order of the Day), but also having refused to march into Southern Transylvania at the time of the Roumanian volte-face "in order to get a good mark at the Peace Conference from the British and Americans."

Roumania.

The confiscation of enormous quantities of material from the oilfields has resulted in a great deal of unrest and disturbance amongst the workmen. At one refinery there has been a demonstration in favour of the former British staff. The companies have, for some time past, had lists ready of personnel whom they wish to send back and some of them are being assembled at convenient points so as to be ready to return to their former posts as soon as possible. Permission for their return has not yet been granted by the Soviet authorities, although it is now six weeks since it was asked for.

It is not only in the petroleum industry that the mistakes and misunderstandings which exist on both sides have had disastrous results. Roumanian politicians from the start have tried to be too clever for the Russians, and have not only played into the hands of the local Communists but have provided the Soviet authorities with an excuse for riding roughshod over them on the ground that the Roumanians have not attempted to carry out their obligations fairly and willingly. Requisitions of goods of all sorts have been fantastic and have been made regardless of the capacity of the country. Labour has been disorganised and in particular agricultural work has been paralysed. Instead of the 2½ million acres of cultivable land which is normally sown only 600,000 acres have been sown this autumn, and only about a fortnight of the sowing season remains.

The new Government has set up an inter-departmental commission to supervise the carrying out of the armistice terms. The chairman is Petre Grozea (Communist), the Vice-President of the Council, and there are two members from each political party. All members of Roumanian Governments which have been in office between 1940 and the 23rd August, 1944, have now been arrested, as well as 4,000 persons described as "Legionaries."

Some administrative trouble has occurred in Transylvania and Constantsa. Certain officials and staffs were sent to Transylvania without the previous consent of the Soviet High Commission, and when the order was given for their withdrawal, it seems to have been interpreted by the population as a general order for evacuation. A further order to the people to remain quiet and carry on as usual had to be issued to reassure them. At Constantsa a mayor and Deputies were elected whom the military authorities would not allow to assume office. The local population, at the instigation of the National Democratic Front, installed them by force.

Yugoslavia.

In the extreme north the Red Army has crossed the Danube near Apatin into Baranja. The only other change in the front has been in the south, where the Germans have retreated from Skoplje. Radio Free Yugoslavia claimed that the partisans had taken the city; Radio Sofia that Bulgarian troops had done so. The latter added that in Skoplje beside the flags of Bulgaria and Yugoslavia there now floated the red flag of the Macedonian partisans. Similarly, each of the two stations claimed the subsequent capture by its national forces of Kachanik and Gniljane, north of Skoplje.

Partisans have occupied Cetinje between the Germans retreating from Kotor and those retreating via Podgorica. A small British force is co-operating against the Germans on the coast road from Kotor. Further north the Germans are trying to retreat north from Uzhice and down the Drina to get into north Bosnia. Allied aircraft have been heavily attacking the enemy's lines of retreat.

The Serbian Assembly in Belgrade (see Summary No. 267, p. 14) confirmed all the work of the partisan committee in Serbia during the past three years; and appointed a tribunal. The Assembly's session was followed by that of the much more authoritative Serbian National Liberation Front, the partisan body, which was started in 1941 and claims to have superseded the former political parties.

In an interview Tito has emphasised the people's urgent need of food, fuel and other necessaries and the destruction of railways, bridges and vehicles. He said that the Russians were providing 50,000 tons of wheat, of which 17,000 tons had reached Belgrade, and hundreds of lorries. (Belgrade is now also being well supplied with food from the Banat.) Tito asked that the Western Allies should send supplies, vehicles and Yugoslav ships to Western Yugoslavia now that the Dalmatian ports were free, and added, "I am rather surprised we have not yet had any success with the Allies." On the other hand, the partisan representatives are still arguing with the Allied authorities over the method of distribution of Allied relief. Several Yugoslav claims have recently been put forward by the partisans. Generals "Tempo" and Vukmanovitch, addressing the Serbian Assembly, declared that the peoples of Bulgarian (see Summary No. 267, p. 14) and Greek Macedonia desired to be included in Yugoslav Macedonia. Vlahov, the Macedonian Vice-President of the Partisan National Executive Committee, is reported to have sent a letter to the Greek Prime Minister, saying that Macedonians nominally in Yugoslavia, Greece and Bulgaria will not allow anybody to menace their liberty, and protesting against an alleged persecution of Slavs in Greek Macedonia. Partisan propaganda maintains the demand for Trieste and has added a demand for Baja in Hungary.

The Royal Yugoslav Minister of War has issued an order that all members of the Yugoslav Armed Forces who do not signify their readiness to serve under Tito within three days of the promulgation of the order will be treated as deserters. This has caused great confusion.

There is no further news as yet about the formation of a united Yugoslav Government. Shubashitch arrived in Moscow, to consult the Soviet Government, on the 20th November (see "U.S.S.R.").

Greece.

It is reported from Athens that the new currency continues to command the confidence of the public and that prices are stable. Unfortunately, Government drawings continue to be out of all proportion to revenue from taxes and sales of supplies. A joint Greek–British Co-ordination Committee has been formed to discuss such matters as finance for industry and regulation of wages. Certain wage rates have already been fixed, and will apply over the entire country. Meantime a law has been passed imposing on a thousand of the wealthiest citizens of Greece an extraordinary tax of 1,500 gold pounds.

M. Papandreou is finding that it is no easy task to reorganise the Greek High Command; General Othonaios, the new Commander-in-Chief, has refused to work with General Ventiris, and a compromise has had to be arranged, as the latter's removal would have been inopportune at the moment, while the new National Guard is being organised. The Prime Minister has also had trouble with E.A.M. and Communist leaders, who have pressed for the disbandment of the Greek Brigade. Indeed, M. Siantos, addressing a Communist rally on the 20th November, implied that the Brigade would be disarmed simultaneously with the guerrillas. However, M. Papandreou has now reached an agreement with the Communist leaders by which there are to be no more demonstrations, no more illegal arrests, and no more arms are to be carried; all street painting is to be effaced, beginning with the red paint with which the Communists had defaced the British Embassy; the 10th December is fixed as the date for disbanding the guerrillas; the Greek Brigade will not be disbanded, but generous leave will be given. M. Papandreou has announced that General Scobie will be in charge of the disbandment of the guerrillas.

Hellas, which now has a correspondent in Athens, reports that Greek opinion in Macedonia and Thrace is dissatisfied with the Bulgarian armistice for the following reasons: Greece is not represented on the Allied Control Commission; Bulgaria's manufactures, cattle-breeding and shipping have been left intact; Italy had to accept in advance new political, economic and financial conditions, but no such clause was imposed on Bulgaria; no mention was made of Bulgarian disarmament, frontier rectification or of a Bulgarian indemnity for ruined Greece.

Albania.

Balkan Air Force attacked Tirana again on 15th November, and on the following day F.N.Ç. forces finally captured the capital. Allied aircraft also bombed northbound German transport at various points and had particular success near Elbasan. On 16th November it was reported that the last German column from the south had passed through Ohrid and that in the north the F.N.Ç. had cut the Prizren–Djacovica road. British special troops have co-operated with the F.N.Ç. in harassing the German withdrawal in the south.

Although the population was enthusiastic when the R.A.F. first brought supplies by air, Enver Hoxha, the F.N.Ç. leader, showed considerable disappointment with the quantity we were able to send by sea. His greatest need, however, is currency, for there is so little of it circulating in the area under F.N.Ç. control that there was not enough for men working on the Kuçove oil-field and on the reconstruction of Valona harbour.

Bulgaria.

The internal situation in Bulgaria is reported to be still unsettled. The Government has evidently not yet managed to suppress extremists. On the 15th November the Central Committee of the Fatherland Front broadcast a warning to provincial committees of the organisation not to seize goods or distribute them and not to commandeer railway trucks. Next day the Minister of Propaganda broadcast a statement deprecating attempts by "irresponsible elements" to usurp the functions of the Government. The fact seems to be that Yugov, the Communist Minister of the Interior, in spite of much oratory on behalf of discipline, has failed to impose it on the National Militia and Fatherland Front committees in the provinces. He is described as a "man of straw" who exercises very much less influence than the head of the militia and the secretary of the Central Committee of the Fatherland Front—a woman Communist. Municipal elections must await parliamentary elections, and in lieu of municipal councils the Government has been appointing its own nominees to serve on local Fatherland Front Committees. Many of these nominees are said to have indulged in private vendettas. Arrests continue, but excesses are reported to be increasing. Relations between the army and militia are strained. The authority of the Government suffers from the fact that most of the militia is exempt from service at the front while most of the army is in Yugoslavia. In these circumstances there are persistent rumours that the Communists mean to overthrow the Government and purge the army, but, on the other hand, Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, the leader of the left-wing Agrarians, is now reported to have such a backing that he could by himself precipitate a Government crisis.

Great credit was taken for the capture of Skoplje on 14th November. The Bulgarian delegation which attended the reopening of the partisan assembly of Serbian delegates in Belgrade were reported by the press to have been warmly received and to have discussed the future of Macedonia in a federated Yugoslavia.

The Japanese Minister and his staff left for Istanbul on 15th November.

Turkey.

Although Turkey broke off diplomatic and economic relations with Germany last August, she has passed no trading-with-the-enemy legislation and made no attempt to check German financial activities. The businesses of repatriated Germans are conducted by their nominees, and German banks and insurance companies are still carrying on. With a view to the fulfilment of our promise to mitigate to the best of our ability the economic dislocation caused by the rupture with Germany, there have been constant discussions between British, United States and Turkish authorities. But the inflation of Turkish prices and the Turkish propensity for haggling have impeded agreement. The Turkish Government has, however, advanced a step by deciding to allow on exports to the United States the same premium of 40 per cent. as is already allowed on exports to the United Kingdom, recouping itself by the same premium of 40 per cent. on imports from the United States as it levies on imports from the United Kingdom. In effect this puts the dollar on the same footing as sterling for trade exchanges with Turkey.

An account is now available of the proceedings which began last September in a military court against the Pan-Turanian enthusiasts—mainly teachers and students—accused of promoting racialism and plotting to upset the Government. It is fairly clear that the Pan-Turanians' activities were fomented by Germany at the time of her attack on Russia. But the Turkish Government, though it can hardly have been ignorant of the matter, took no steps to suppress the Pan-Turanians till May 1944, which it perhaps considered a suitable moment for obtaining kudos in Moscow. Moscow showed no great appreciation, having no doubt noticed that the Turkish Government deferred action until the German campaign against Russia had definitely failed. Pan-Turanianism, it may be recalled, was denounced by Atatürk and, though it may have received a fillip when a German victory over Russia was expected, it is for most Turks no more than a vague dream. They would, however, be wise to remember that a Russia which has some 20 million inhabitants of Turanian stock might one day be in a position to apply Pan-Turanianism in reverse.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

On the 17th November the Prime Minister made a statement in the House of Commons about Palestine in connexion with the assassination of Lord Moyne, which he described as a shameful crime which had shocked the world and had affected none more strongly than those, like himself, who in the past had been consistent friends of the Jews and constant architects of their future. "If our dreams for Zionism are to end in the smoke of assassins' pistols," said Mr. Churchill, "and our labours for its future to produce only a new set of gangsters worthy of Nazi Germany, many like myself will have to reconsider the position we have maintained so consistently and so long in the past. If there is to be any hope of a peaceful and successful future for Zionism, these wicked activities must cease, and those responsible for them must be destroyed root and branch.''

Mr. Churchill quoted from a letter he had received from Dr. Weizmann (who recently arrived in Jerusalem) assuring him that Palestine Jewry would go to the utmost limit of its power to cut out this evil from its midst. Mr. Churchill went on to say that the executive of the Jewish Agency had called upon the Jewish community '' to cast out the members of this destructive band, deprive them of all refuge and shelter, to resist their threats, and to render all necessary assistance to the authorities in the prevention of terrorist acts, and in the eradication of the terrorist organisation.'' '' These are strong words,'' said the Prime Minister, '' but we must wait for these words to be translated into deeds. We must wait to see that not only the leaders, but every man, woman and child of the Jewish community, does his or her best to bring this terrorism to a speedy end.''

It was announced last week that one member had resigned and one had threatened to resign from the executive of the Jewish Agency. This is believed to be due to a decision by the executive to employ the Hagana—the largest and most important illegal Jewish force in Palestine—against the terrorist gangs, although it was not proposed that the Hagana should act in co-operation with the Palestine police.

Both men accused of Lord Moyne's assassination are to be tried before an Egyptian Military Court under the law of état de siège—a form of martial law adopted in Egypt and maintained in that country during the war. One of them, whose name, at first given as Cohen, is now known to be Hakim, is a deserter from the Palestine Regiment. This, however, affords no ground for holding that he is not subject to Egyptian criminal jurisdiction, and as it is desirable that both the accused should be tried in the same way and preferably by an Egyptian Court, we shall not raise the point. Fraser Bey, a British officer in the Egyptian police, will attend the trial and submit a daily record of the proceedings to His Majesty's Embassy.

Since his return to Cairo Lord Killearn has had satisfactory talks both with King Farouk and with the new Prime Minister. In his conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador the King showed a growing sense of his responsibilities, while the Prime Minister told Lord Killearn that he believed the King really wanted to play the game. Ahmad Maher Pasha also said that he did not propose to badger His Majesty over constitutional issues as Nahas had done, but would deal with matters as they arose, avoiding as far as possible contentious questions with the Palace.

The Egyptian Parliament was dissolved by royal decree on the 15th November, and the new Chamber will meet on the 18th January, 1945. The date of the election has not yet been announced, but as a rule this is some ten days prior to the meeting of the new Parliament. How far the election will be '' free '' remains to be seen. Discussions between the parties are still being held over the distribution of seats, on which no decision has yet been reached.

Questions relating to the Levant States were discussed by Mr. Eden with M. Bidault, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Provisional French Government, during the Foreign Secretary's visit to Paris with the Prime Minister. M. Bidault gave the fullest assurances that both he and his Government intended to carry out all the promises made regarding the independence of Syria and Lebanon; though he added that France would expect to retain a measure of influence there. As regards the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales and the issue of equipment to the local gendarmerie, M. Bidault promised to send a reply before long. On learning of M. Bidault's assurances, the Syrian President told Sir E. Spears that his Government was prepared to discuss in the friendliest spirit all outstanding questions with the French, but would still refuse to sign a treaty or accord them a pre-eminent position in Syria.

Information has now been received giving the views of Ibn Saud on the protocol issued by the Preparatory Committee on Arab Union. He believes that some of the resolutions adopted at Alexandria are not applicable to Saudi Arabia, the control of which is based on Sharia law. He also suspects the motives of some of those taking part. Nevertheless, certain parts of the protocol he considers to be in his own interests and in those of all concerned. But if relations of mutual assistance and goodwill are to be established between the Arab States, he thinks that those States should first make an alliance between themselves similar to that already made between Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the Yemen. If an act of aggression were committed against the Arabs by a foreign Power, they could then rely on each other and co-operate to meet it.

There is little further to report on the political situation in Iraq, but the Regent believes that the difficulties within the Cabinet are growing, and he doubts whether its members are likely to continue pulling together much longer. While content for the time being to hold a watching brief, he now thinks that, should the Cabinet fall, he may prefer, after all, to invite Nuri again to become Prime Minister, with Arshad al Umari, the present Minister for Foreign Affairs, as one of his chief supporters.

No successor to M. Saed, who recently resigned the Persian premiership owing to the imbroglio caused by the Russian demand for an oil concession, has yet been definitely appointed. Of the possible candidates, the most likely at present is Murteza Bayat—a nonentity, but believed to be honest—whom the Shah has invited to form a Ministry. Bayat is already talking of solving the Russian difficulty, possibly by giving Russia the '' first refusal '' of an oil concession in Northern Persia. Such a solution would be interpreted as a moral victory for Russia, and a justification in her eyes for the way in which she forced M. Saed to resign. However this may be, the indications last week were that the Soviet Government was preparing to renew its pressure on the Persian Government. On the 18th November Sir A. Cadogan saw the Counsellor of the Soviet Embassy (in the absence of the Soviet Ambassador) and, in explaining our anxiety at recent Russian action in Persia, suggested to him that as his Government was a co-signatory with us of the tripartite treaty, it might have informed us of its intentions before trying to force the issue. His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow is also taking up the matter direct with M. Molotov.

The question was referred to last week in America by Mr. Sumner Welles, the former Under-Secretary of State, in a broadcast speech. '' Russia's attitude is most important,'' said Mr. Welles, '' because it raises the vital question of the part the Soviet is going to play in the international organisation itself. . . . . The right of Russia to ask that neighbouring Governments be friendly and co-operative should not be construed to mean that they must acquiesce in every advantage which the Russians seek.''

THE FAR EAST.

Changes in the Chungking Government, long rumoured to be impending, have now taken place. The following new appointments have been made :—

(1) General Chen Cheng to be War Minister, replacing General Ho Ying-chin.
(2) Yu Hung-chun (O.K. Yui), previously Vice-Minister of Finance, to be Finance Minister, replacing H. H. Kung.
(3) Chu Chia-hua, previously President of the Academia Sinica, to be Education Minister, replacing Chen Li-fu.
(4) Wang Shih-chieh to be '' Minister '' of Information, replacing Liang Han-tsao.
(5) Liang Han-tsao to be Chairman of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Commission (in the Executive Yuan).
(6) Chang Li-sheng, previously Secretary-General of the Executive Yuan, to be Minister of the Interior.
(7) Chen Li-fu to be '' Minister '' of Organisation (of the Kuomintang), replacing his brother, Chen Kuo-fu.

Some confusion has been caused in the reporting of these changes in the English language by the use of the terms '' Cabinet '' and '' Minister,'' which do not really represent the Chinese institutions to which they are supposed to correspond. Thus British newspapers have given the news and comment on it under the heading of '' Chinese Cabinet Changes,'' and Reuter's Chungking Correspondent (who is a Chinese) has stated that Ho Ying-chin '' has been dropped from the Government.'' However, it is only in a very limited sense that the Executive Yuan can be regarded as the '' Cabinet '' or '' Government '' in China, and persons may hold the title of Minister (pu chang or '' Board President '') without belonging to the Executive Yuan at all. The Ministers of War, Finance, Education and the Interior are Ministers of the Executive Yuan, and in their case the term has its normal meaning, but the Ministers of Organisation and Information are merely officials of the Kuomintang party and do not, strictly speaking, hold a State office except in so far as the Chinese '' National Government '' is regarded as identical with that party. In practice the Kuomintang '' Board of Information '' has recently functioned as a Ministry of State, but the '' Board of Organisation '' is still purely a party concern.

This is believed to be due to a decision by the executive to employ the Hagana—the largest and most important illegal Jewish force in Palestine—against the terrorist gangs, although it was not proposed that the Hagana should act in co-operation with the Palestine police.

Both men accused of Lord Moyne's assassination are to be tried before an Egyptian Military Court under the law of état de siège—a form of martial law adopted in Egypt and maintained in that country during the war. One of them, whose name, at first given as Cohen, is now known to be Hakim, is a deserter from the Palestine Regiment. This, however, affords no ground for holding that he is not subject to Egyptian criminal jurisdiction, and as it is desirable that both the accused should be tried in the same way and preferably by an Egyptian Court, we shall not raise the point. Fraser Bey, a British officer in the Egyptian police, will attend the trial and submit a daily record of the proceedings to His Majesty's Embassy.

Since his return to Cairo Lord Killearn has had satisfactory talks both with King Farouk and with the new Prime Minister. In his conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador the King showed a growing sense of his responsibilities, while the Prime Minister told Lord Killearn that he believed the King really wanted to play the game. Ahmad Maher Pasha also said that he did not propose to badger His Majesty over constitutional issues as Nahas had done, but would deal with matters as they arose, avoiding as far as possible contentious questions with the Palace.

The Egyptian Parliament was dissolved by royal decree on the 15th November, and the new Chamber will meet on the 18th January, 1945. The date of the election has not yet been announced, but as a rule this is some ten days prior to the meeting of the new Parliament. How far the election will be '' free '' remains to be seen. Discussions between the parties are still being held over the distribution of seats, on which no decision has yet been reached.

Questions relating to the Levant States were discussed by Mr. Eden with M. Bidault, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Provisional French Government, during the Foreign Secretary's visit to Paris with the Prime Minister. M. Bidault gave the fullest assurances that both he and his Government intended to carry out all the promises made regarding the independence of Syria and Lebanon; though he added that France would expect to retain a measure of influence there. As regards the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales and the issue of equipment to the local gendarmerie, M. Bidault promised to send a reply before long. On learning of M. Bidault's assurances, the Syrian President told Sir E. Spears that his Government was prepared to discuss in the friendliest spirit all outstanding questions with the French, but would still refuse to sign a treaty or accord them a pre-eminent position in Syria.

Information has now been received giving the views of Ibn Saud on the protocol issued by the Preparatory Committee on Arab Union. He believes that some of the resolutions adopted at Alexandria are not applicable to Saudi Arabia, the control of which is based on Sharia law. He also suspects the motives of some of those taking part. Nevertheless, certain parts of the protocol he considers to be in his own interests and in those of all concerned. But if relations of mutual assistance and goodwill are to be established between the Arab States, he thinks that those States should first make an alliance between themselves similar to that already made between Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the Yemen. If an act of aggression were committed against the Arabs by a foreign Power, they could then rely on each other and co-operate to meet it.

There is little further to report on the political situation in Iraq, but the Regent believes that the difficulties within the Cabinet are growing, and he doubts whether its members are likely to continue pulling together much longer. While content for the time being to hold a watching brief, he now thinks that, should the Cabinet fall, he may prefer, after all, to invite Nuri again to become Prime Minister, with Arshad al Umari, the present Minister for Foreign Affairs, as one of his chief supporters.

No successor to M. Saed, who recently resigned the Persian premiership owing to the imbroglio caused by the Russian demand for an oil concession, has yet been definitely appointed. Of the possible candidates, the most likely at present is Murteza Bayat—a nonentity, but believed to be honest—whom the Shah has invited to form a Ministry. Bayat is already talking of solving the Russian difficulty, possibly by giving Russia the '' first refusal '' of an oil concession in Northern Persia. Such a solution would be interpreted as a moral victory for Russia, and a justification in her eyes for the way in which she forced M. Saed to resign. However this may be, the indications last week were that the Soviet Government was preparing to renew its pressure on the Persian Government. On the 18th November Sir A. Cadogan saw the Counsellor of the Soviet Embassy (in the absence of the Soviet Ambassador) and, in explaining our anxiety at recent Russian action in Persia, suggested to him that as his Government was a co-signatory with us of the tripartite treaty, it might have informed us of its intentions before trying to force the issue. His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow is also taking up the matter direct with M. Molotov.

The question was referred to last week in America by Mr. Sumner Welles, the former Under-Secretary of State, in a broadcast speech. '' Russia's attitude is most important,'' said Mr. Welles, '' because it raises the vital question of the part the Soviet is going to play in the international organisation itself. . . . . The right of Russia to ask that neighbouring Governments be friendly and co-operative should not be construed to mean that they must acquiesce in every advantage which the Russians seek.''

THE FAR EAST.

Changes in the Chungking Government, long rumoured to be impending, have now taken place. The following new appointments have been made :—

(1) General Chen Cheng to be War Minister, replacing General Ho Ying-chin.
(2) Yu Hung-chun (O.K. Yui), previously Vice-Minister of Finance, to be Finance Minister, replacing H. H. Kung.
(3) Chu Chia-hua, previously President of the Academia Sinica, to be Education Minister, replacing Chen Li-fu.
(4) Wang Shih-chieh to be '' Minister '' of Information, replacing Liang Han-tsao.
(5) Liang Han-tsao to be Chairman of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Commission (in the Executive Yuan).
(6) Chang Li-sheng, previously Secretary-General of the Executive Yuan, to be Minister of the Interior.
(7) Chen Li-fu to be '' Minister '' of Organisation (of the Kuomintang), replacing his brother, Chen Kuo-fu.

Some confusion has been caused in the reporting of these changes in the English language by the use of the terms '' Cabinet '' and '' Minister,'' which do not really represent the Chinese institutions to which they are supposed to correspond. Thus British newspapers have given the news and comment on it under the heading of '' Chinese Cabinet Changes,'' and Reuter's Chungking Correspondent (who is a Chinese) has stated that Ho Ying-chin '' has been dropped from the Government.'' However, it is only in a very limited sense that the Executive Yuan can be regarded as the '' Cabinet '' or '' Government '' in China, and persons may hold the title of Minister (pu chang or '' Board President '') without belonging to the Executive Yuan at all. The Ministers of War, Finance, Education and the Interior are Ministers of the Executive Yuan, and in their case the term has its normal meaning, but the Ministers of Organisation and Information are merely officials of the Kuomintang party and do not, strictly speaking, hold a State office except in so far as the Chinese '' National Government '' is regarded as identical with that party. In practice the Kuomintang '' Board of Information '' has recently functioned as a Ministry of State, but the '' Board of Organisation '' is still purely a party concern.

Further, the Chinese Ministry of War (Military Affairs) is not quite what it seems. While remaining nominally a department of the Executive Yuan, it is concurrently the "Board of Military Affairs" in the National Military Council, and as such it is only one of a number of boards and commissions forming the Council under the direction of its Chairman, who is Chiang Kai-shek, assisted by a Chief of Staff, who is Ho Ying-chin. The National Military Council is not subordinate to, but co-ordinate with, the Executive Yuan (whose President is Chiang Kai-shek), and its Chairman, Chiang Kai-shek, is empowered to exercise the military power of the National Government, whose President, the Head of the State, is also Chiang Kai-shek.

The new appointments in Chungking must be viewed in relation to this political system. The most striking change, and the one naturally receiving most notice in Britain and the United States, is the replacement of Ho Ying-chin by Chen Cheng as War Minister. But Chen's sphere is a more limited one than may appear at first sight, because Ho Ying-chin, as Chief of Staff to the Chairman of the National Military Council, is still Chen's superior, and ultimate control over the armed forces (in so far as they obey the Central Government) remains in the hands of Chiang Kai-shek himself. On the civilian side H. H. Kung, though losing the Finance Ministry, remains Vice-President of the Executive Yuan, while Chen Li-fu, though losing the Education Ministry, takes over from his brother the Kuomintang Organisation Board, so that this important position continues to be held by the so-called "C.C. clique."

Within these limitations it can be said that the sum of changes is distinctly for the better. Chen Cheng's appointment, in particular, should lead to an improvement on the purely military side of China's war effort. Aged 44, he has a high military reputation and has had experience of command in the field during the present war—which Ho has not, having been War Minister since 1930. Chen was born in Chekiang and educated at the Paoting and Whampoa military academies; he was Vice-Minister of War in 1936–38 and Director of the Political Training Department of the National Military Council in 1938–40; he has also been at different times Commander-in-chief of the Ninth and Sixth War Zones and Governor of Hupeh. Recently it was reported that he had been sent to the north-west to reorganise the Chinese defence there after the collapse in Honan in the summer of this year. One of Chiang Kai-shek's most trusted generals, Chen Cheng has often been spoken of as a possible successor to his position, and he may, indeed, be cast ultimately for this rôle; in the meantime, however, he has still less influence at the highest level than Ho Ying-chin, who is eleven years older and has had more political experience. Chiang values Ho above all for his personal loyalty, which has not failed through a series of political crises; Ho thus remains the trusted adviser, even though he gives up some of his administrative functions.

When he was Director of the Political Training Department of the National Military Council, Chen Cheng had the Communist leader Chou En-lai as his assistant, the "united front" being at that time still a reality. On account of this former personal connexion, his appointment as War Minister should facilitate a military modus vivendi between the Chungking Government and the Communists, Chou En-lai having now returned to Chungking in company with General Hurley, who has been on a visit to Yenan. The prospects of at least a temporary Kuomintang–Communist agreement now seem to be somewhat brighter than they were recently, but, even though Chen Cheng's appointment may help, it should be emphasised that the decision on policy rests with the Generalissimo himself, and the gap between the Government and Communist proposals for a settlement still remains very wide.

The new Finance Minister, O. K. Yui, is a Cantonese, who has held a series of posts in the Administration of Chinese Shanghai, finally becoming Mayor of Greater Shanghai in 1937. He has been Vice-Minister of Finance since 1941. He is fifteen years younger than Kung, whom he replaces, and seems not to have been involved in the odium which has fallen upon the latter both for the currency inflation, which he has failed to check, and for the notorious enrichment of his family.

Wang Shih-chieh is not a newcomer to the Board of Information, for he only left that office two years ago. He is well known in this country as a member of the Chinese Goodwill Mission which visited Britain in December 1943 and has been a conspicuous promoter of Sino-British friendship.

Chu Chia-hua, the new Minister of Education, is, from an Allied point of view, a somewhat less desirable appointment, though an improvement on his extreme Nationalist prédecessor. Holder of a doctorate of Berlin University, Chu Chia-hua was formerly prominent as leader of the pro-German group in the Kuomintang. In present circumstances this is not likely to have any significance as regards China's attitude to the war, but it may mean (if he continues to hold the post) that the door will be open to German technical instructors after the war. According to a report from a good source Chungking is looking forward to getting the services of a large number of German technicians after the war, as it is expected that they will be ready to accept posts at relatively low salaries, and it is considered an added advantage that they will not be nationals of a Great Power.

Mr. Nelson has now returned to Chungking with thirteen American economic experts. Just before his arrival it was announced that a Chinese War Production Board on the American model had been set up with Wong Wen-hao, the Economic Affairs Minister, as chairman.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

For some time it has been known that there have been lags in the production of certain critical items necessary for the conduct of the war, notably heavy bombers, heavy artillery and ammunition, tyres, and assault transport and cargo ships. Workers, under the impression that the war in Europe is almost ended, have left essential war jobs in comparatively large numbers, moving not into other war work (which is impossible without a permit) but into civilian industry. This is precisely the position which was predicted by Mr. McNutt of the War Man-power Commission and Mr. Byrnes of the War Mobilisation Office when they advocated many months ago some form of National Service legislation such as there is in this country. The proposal was then denounced as "industrial conscription," and the times are certainly not propitious for its introduction now. Nevertheless, Mr. Henry Kaiser, the shipbuilder, maintains that workers are leaving their jobs at such a pace that they threaten to halt the production of vital war equipment, and Mr. Krug, Chairman of the War Production Board, has also drawn attention to the deficiencies in certain war production programmes. Mr. Byrnes, who offered his resignation as Director of War Mobilisation, but was persuaded by the President to continue at least until after the collapse of Germany, has stated that he might have to take "more drastic action" to correct the conditions in the man-power situation. Unless the production of vital war equipment increases, Mr. Byrnes threatens to suspend the limited reconversion of civilian industry which has now begun. He reminded the procurement agencies that "much of the man-power trouble is due to the mistaken belief on the part of some people that the war is about over." In order to dispel this false optimism, Admiral King, the Commander-in-chief of the United States fleet, has broadcast an appeal to the effect that, unless production deficiencies are wiped out, the momentum of the advance in the Pacific cannot be maintained. General Eisenhower has also broadcast from the Western Front to the war workers in America, calling for increased production of war materials and pointing out that the capture of Aachen was delayed owing to the shortage of ammunition—"expenditures have raced ahead of our receipts from home." In order to help to break down one critical bottleneck 1,000 specialists have been released from the army to re-enter the munitions industry.

The Senate Sub-Committee on Cartels, of which Senator Kilgore (Dem., West Virginia) is chairman, has presented its report to the Senate Military Affairs Committee. The report declares that the Germans have already "begun to pursue a strategy which they found successful a quarter of a century ago. They are already deploying their economic reserves throughout the world in preparation for a third attempt at world domination." The United Nations, it urges, should not only encompass the military defeat of Germany, but also the defeat of her economic forces. "Immediately after military victory, an international authority should take over the economic controls formerly held by Nazi cartelists. Such an authority should destroy the cartel system in Germany and make it possible for private enterprise to function in a free and competitive manner." "A cartel system dominated by American or British interests would eventually produce the same undesirable results as are exploited by the Germans. It would jeopardise peace and soon bring us face to face with the possibility of a third even more destructive world war." The report also recommends the punishment of cartel leaders and the prevention of the revival of the cartel system by the establishment of an international economic council as was envisaged at Dumbarton Oaks.

There has been some criticism of this plan in the press, and it is generally interpreted as an endorsement of the Morgenthau proposals for the dismemberment of German industry. There are signs, also, that, despite the official attitude of the Administration, public opinion in the United States towards cartels is undergoing some modification. Mr. Milo Perkins, formerly the executive director of the Board of Economic Warfare and an advocate of free enterprise, has recently urged in Harpers' magazine that the Americans should reconsider their views on cartels and not operate "in the fairy land of our own oratory." Mr. Perkins's arguments were based on two premises: first, that the United States had not the power to break cartels and, secondly, that foreign Governments were supporting their industrialists in their cartel arrangements and that the United States would be compelled to follow suit. He advocated the establishment of a Board of International Trade (within the Department of State) to review the compulsory registration of cartels and international commodity agreements. "Where we cannot eliminate the cartels, we must gradually perfect new ways to make them into instruments which will serve the public interest."

At the international business conference at Rye, Sir Clive Baillieu, one of the British delegates, proposed that the word cartel should be dropped and some such phrase as "trade accord groups" substituted. He also advocated the establishment of international machinery for the continuous and public review of the operations of all such "accords." Later the conference adopted a resolution recommending the retention of cartels, emphasising, however, that, while the benefits of such agreements should be preserved, it was essential to avoid their use "in a manner contrary to the public interest of any nation."

Both the American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organisations are holding their conventions this week. Referring to the successes of the Political Action Committee of the C.I.O., Mr. Philip Murray, the president, declared: "We set the forces of reaction in the United States back on their heels." It is now known that Mr. Roosevelt, not counting the Soldier Vote, obtained over 6½ million votes in thirteen cities with a population of more than half a million against some 4¼ million for Mr. Dewey. The P.A.C. is generally thought to be largely responsible for this heavy poll in the industrial cities. Subject to ratification by the convention this week, which is regarded as fairly certain, the Executive Board of the C.I.O., meeting at Chicago, has unanimously recommended the continuance of the C.I.O. Political Action Committee (as was foreshadowed in last week's Summary) and the continuance of Mr. Sydney Hillman and other officers in their present positions.

One interesting reflection on the presidential election is the relative impotence shown by the American press in influencing public opinion. Roughly two-thirds of the press were opposed to the President (see Summary No. 260). This was also roughly true in the 1932, 1936 and 1940 elections. On the whole, radio commentators were more inclined to support the President than the press, and Mr. Harold Ickes has now attacked the press for its remoteness from trends of popular opinion.

At his press conference Mr. Roosevelt has indicated that he favours immediate legislation on the lines of the Wadsworth Bill to ensure post-war compulsory National Service. The President would not state whether he contemplated purely military service, though he recalled the tremendous advantage which was gained by youths who went through the C.C.C. (Civilian Conservation Corps) programme and pointed out the large percentage of young men who had been turned down for military service in this war owing to their poor physical condition. He would also not express an opinion whether compulsory service should extend to women, though he had earlier indicated his own preference that it should. It is possible, as some critics believe, that this proposal will meet with strong opposition, partly on the ground that there is little difference between compulsory National Service and the Hitler Youth Movement.

Senator Ellison D. ("Cotton Ed") Smith (Democrat, South Carolina), already defeated in the primaries, has now died at the age of 80. An irascible picturesque Roosevelt-hater and bitter opponent of the Administration, he was an advocate of extremism in inter-racial affairs and once said "there is no place in the Democratic Party for Negroes."

LATIN AMERICA.

The submission to the Latin American Governments of Argentina's request for a meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs has led to a proposal by the Mexican Government that such a meeting should be held for the purpose of considering post-war problems, and that this should be followed by a discussion of the Argentine case. In answering the Mexican communication, the United States has circulated a note which takes a stand similar to that adopted in its previous notes on the subject of Argentina. Possibly as a result of this reply, it has been reported by the Argentine Associated Press that the United States has rejected the Argentine request. The State Department has denied this, adding that consultations are still in progress and that no decision has yet been taken. Meanwhile the Panamanian Government has capped the Mexican proposal with a further proposal that a conference to discuss post-war problems should be held and that Argentina should be invited to attend provided the other American Governments can satisfy themselves that she is pursuing a policy in accordance with the obligations she undertook at Rio and other American Conferences. Consultations should take place among the American Foreign Ministers to decide whether Argentina is in fact pursuing such a policy. If the decision is adverse, discussion of the Argentine case should be limited to an expression of hope of reform and a statement of the measures necessary for Argentina to take to satisfy other American nations.

In Buenos Aires General Peluffo has categorically denied rumours of his impending resignation. Nevertheless, reports of coming changes in the Argentine Government have multiplied. The highest common factor of these frequently contradictory rumours is that more civilian Ministers will be introduced. Other evidences of factitious democracy have been provided. The Minister of Justice, for example, is to set up a commission to consider a charter for the political parties "in accordance with the Government's intention to bring the country back to constitutional normality; and the notorious Dr. Manuel Fresco has been included in a published list of persons guilty of accepting bribes under former régimes.

In violent contrast to these propitiatory (if inexpensive) gestures must be set a new law designed to modernise the system of compulsory military service in Argentina. In peacetime Argentines of both sexes over twelve years of age, and in wartime all inhabitants except exempted foreigners, must take part in national defence. Military service covers the ages of 12 ("preconscription") to 50. The Ministry of War has explained that "war is no longer a purely military affair," but involves the whole nation, so that the new arrangements are "perfectly in accordance with the historical moment." This is highly reminiscent of Colonel Perón's June lecture (see Summaries, Nos. 248 and 249); and the Colonel, ever zealous for the support of the workers as well as of the army, has now promised rural labourers that the projected Estatuto del Peón intended to relieve their lot shall be enforced, even if the Government is obliged to take control of all the estancias in the Republic.

On the 17th November Mr. Law declared in the House of Commons that the decreasing volume of Argentine remittances had caused His Majesty's Government no little anxiety, and that there was little excuse for this fall at a time when Argentina was one of the most prosperous countries in the world.

Also in reply to questions in the House on the 17th October Mr. Attlee stated that the only countries which could be represented as of right at a future peace conference were those which had taken part in the war as belligerents. The Chilean Ambassador has now enquired what meaning should be given to the term belligerents. He has been informed that Mr. Attlee's intention was to make it clear that, since the purpose of a peace conference was to make peace between States that had been at war, only such States were as of right entitled to share in such a conference. It was not intended to exclude the possible participation of other interested States.

President Ríos of Chile, who has now recovered from his operation, resumes his duties on the 27th November. He has recently remarked that his Government desires to establish diplomatic relations with all countries and especially with the United Nations, including the U.S.S.R., that Chile's feelings were known, and that it was necessary to see what those of Russia were (see Summaries Nos. 263 and 266).

Three revolutionary movements, all of military origin, have been reported elsewhere in Latin America. In Ecuador fighting took place on the 18th November in Quito and Guayaquil, but the rebels, "active and retired army officers," appear to have been subjugated. In Venezuela it has been officially announced that a revolutionary plot, hatched by a small group of officers and soldiers of the Caracas garrison, had been discovered and suppressed. In Bolivia a revolt began on the 19th November in Oruro and a state of siege was declared. The aim of the rising was to remove President Villarroel and his Government. It was apparently instigated by supporters of the former régime of General Panaranda, headed by General Candia, formerly Minister for War. The Government has announced the suppression of the movement and the execution of four of its leaders.

Broadcasts from Guatemala City announce the formation of a Salvadorean Government in exile in Guatemalan territory (see last week's Summary), under the Presidency of the ex-President of the Salvadorean Supreme Court, who, with his associate judges, was dismissed by the National Assembly for having declared the present Salvadorean Government of Colonel Aguirre unconstitutional. There is now great discontent in Salvador itself and a state of siege has been declared. UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

At the end of nine days' private discussion between United Kingdom, United States and Canadian delegates it was hoped that agreement had been reached on the basic principles of international control of civil aviation. An apparently successful attempt had been made to meet the United States desire to afford as much scope as possible to competition and to allow the traffic to be decided by the efficiency and attractiveness of the services offered. Thus, in addition to the "four freedoms" of innocent passage, technical landings, the right to convey passengers to and from the country of the operator to any other country, agreement was reached (subject to a differentiation in rates) on the "fifth freedom," the right of transporting passengers between two foreign countries. Provision was also made for a three- or four-year interval to elapse before routes and frequencies were fixed, in order that those countries which had been prevented by the war from developing civil aviation might have a fair chance to compete with others which had not been in such a position. But, after communication of these proposals had begun to be made to some of the other principal countries concerned, it was found that the United States Delegation interpreted some parts of the agreement in an entirely different manner to what had been anticipated by the British and Canadian Delegations.

Thus the document, which has been presented to the other delegations and been published, is less complete than had at one time been hoped. It lays down some valuable general principles concerning the international character of civil aviation and the renunciation of civil aviation as an instrument of national policy. It also establishes the right of each State to decide its own internal air services and to prescribe the routes which international services must follow inside its territory. Exclusive agreements are banned. A number of indisputable propositions concerning equality of opportunity for all countries, the necessity of the highest quality of service at the lowest cost, the avoidance of economic waste by unreasonable competition are also laid down, and will no doubt find general acceptance. On the technical side, also, a very large measure of agreement has been reached and the safety and convenience of all travellers will thereby be much increased. An agreement on these lines would be an important advance in the regularisation of the great international air service which we may expect to come into existence in the next few years.

The machinery of control is along the lines of that suggested by the Canadian Delegation (see Summary No. 267). There is to be an Assembly on which all countries will have an equal vote, but of the countries to be represented on the Board of Directors, of fifteen members, seven are to be chosen by their importance in civil aviation, according to an established formula, which will probably give more seats to the members of the British Commonwealth than the two suggested in the original United States plan. No doubt the U.S.S.R. will be added to this group if she decides to come into the system. The other eight members are to be elected for three-year terms. States not represented on the Board may take part in the discussions without voting rights when their interests are affected.

There would thus be no international control of routes and frequencies, which would be left to individual agreements between Governments, while rates would be decided by the companies operating on the routes, subject, of course, to Government control in the interests of the travelling public. But, as private discussions are still proceeding, it may be possible to obtain agreement on some form of international control on such matters, especially for the immediate post-war period. Meanwhile, a number of other European countries have followed the example of the United States and the Netherlands and filed proposals for post-war routes. Nine have announced their intention of flying passengers and cargo across the North Atlantic. It is clear that, without some form of international regulation, a very difficult situation may ensue, and it is this fact which makes it possible that further agreement may be reached while the members of the Conference are studying the proposals submitted to them.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE French thrust into Alsace has provoked admissions of surprise from German news agencies. The dramatic events at the southern end of the Western Front have indeed been a prominent feature of the week's war reports. It has been officially claimed that powerful counter-attacks cut off the French force attacking Mulhouse. The bulletins of the O.K.W. also reported attacks on an increasing scale in the Aachen area, a British attack on the Italian front, which with tremendous deployment of material was said to have failed to break the German line between Faenza and Forli, and hard fighting in Metz and the Belfort Gap. The points at which attack is most feared would seem to be at the northern end of both western and eastern fronts. The importance of the Allied advance to Cologne has been much stressed of late by the Germans, partly in order to minimise the effect of their hurried withdrawal from Alsace. The distance through Jülich and Düren to the Rhine is, as Dittmar this week commented, almost negligible for the type of transport of which the Americans have so much. But in that narrow strip of country they will come up against the toughest German resistance. Dittmar forecasts "a battle of attrition," such as in the last war wrought havoc to both sides. The fighting is already said to be "fiercer than Normandy." As to the Eastern front, German agencies announced a large-scale Russian attack as having started in the Kurland area on the 19th. There have been suggestions that such an attack might be a prelude to a general Russian offensive any time and that troops were still being assembled by the various Russian commanders.

The war situation continues to be presented more or less optimistically. Full use is made of the encouraging arguments that the Allies are losing heavily in the Western battle, that their reserves are not inexhaustible and that German reserves are increasing, so that the struggle becomes more equal month by month. Dittmar has apparently caused surprise by speaking of the present American offensive as the last that can be launched under the favourable conditions of the present "transition period." At times, however, a much more realistic note is heard, as this week in Halfeld's article in the Hamburger Fremdenblatt. He reverted to the apprehensions of the coming winter and grimly reminded his readers that the Germans had not only to win battles on east, west and south, but to carry on through months of hardship: "We must stick out the worst of all winters . . . . maintain a reserve of forces which will allow us to act independently in 1945, and force our enemies to revise their nihilistic plans."

The activities of the Wilhelmstrasse in the sphere of foreign policy are giving rise to awkward questions. Dr. Schmidt emphatically denied, at a press conference, that rumours of peace negotiations via the Vatican had any foundation. The recent visit of Weiszäcker to the Pope was one of ordinary routine on which he declared comment or explanation to be unnecessary. Questions on the point drew from Schmidt the statement that the only possible peace was one which would ensure both the existence of the German nation and the retention of the conquered territories. According to the Berlin correspondent of a Swedish paper this second condition does not correspond to the general opinion in Berlin, which holds that Hitler's European order is no longer practical politics. Dr. Schmidt reacted with a sharp denial to the publication of this in The Times as the German official view. Another Swedish observer notes as "most striking" a new and tolerant attitude to the nations of Europe, ascribing it to a victory of the views of Himmler over those of Ribbentrop. There is other recent evidence that the rather doctrinaire attitude of the German Foreign Minister is overruled by the realism of his colleagues, even in the sphere of foreign policy.

German expectations of a large-scale Soviet offensive in the east are reflected in conditions in the rump General Government. According to information from underground Polish and from Soviet sources, Governor-General Frank has decided to transfer his seat about 100 km. north-westward, to the town of Czestochowa, near the Upper Silesian border, and the requisitioning of the necessary accommodation there has begun. The construction of defence works is still in progress, and all German males (including Volksdeutsche and Deutschstämmige) between 16 and 60 years have been conscribed for police service in the Stadtwacht or Landwacht—the equivalent of service in the Volkssturm elsewhere—since mid-October; early in November Poles were "invited" to volunteer for auxiliary service in the German Armed Forces. Recent neutral visitors to Cracow have reported that the city is filled with soldiers, carrying their arms "at the ready." All German children, and German women not fully employed, have been evacuated to the Reich, Slovakia, or elsewhere; and the number of Reich German administrative officials still in the territory was recently officially stated to have fallen to a few thousand. On paper, the official attitude towards the native population is increasingly conciliatory. At the end of October Frank announced that Polish participation in the work of administration would be initiated at once on the Kreis level, with the creation of advisory committees, and would eventually be extended to the provincial and national levels; since then, the German authorities have begun negotiations with the Polish Central Welfare Committee and with other Polish representatives. Polish sources also affirm that the Gestapo is discussing with Frank the possibility of a change of attitude towards the Polish Home Army, with a view to enlisting its support against the Russians.

Evidence of German attempts to exploit Baltic anti-Russian sentiment is furnished by the Swedish press, which has recently reported the formation in Berlin of a new "Committee for the Baltic Peoples," in which former local Quislings have been put aside, in favour of "new men who enjoy the confidence of the Baltic peoples." Further, in their retreat from western Latvia, the Germans are reported to have left behind battalions comprised of youths from all the Baltic territories as well as some German Balts, with instructions to wage underground resistance against the Russians.

As further evidence of dislocation in the German transport system should be noted an announcement, supported by a leading article in the Berlin press, to the effect that the railways burdened with military traffic cannot convey food supplies over long distances, and that areas will thus have to rely to an increasing degree on local stocks. This seems to foreshadow a food shortage (the possibilities of substitution of food-stuffs being limited) and it is significant that food grain and vegetables were specially mentioned in the announcement. In densely populated regions like the Ruhr which are far from self-supporting, outside supplies will depend on water transport, which has itself recently been impaired by aerial attack.

Two or three articles have recently been noticed in the German press praising the energy and personal initiative of Speer, particularly in cases where war industry (as is now admitted to the German public) has been damaged by bombing. A recent article in the Hamburger Fremdenblatt, on the other hand, seemed concerned to defend Speer and others against the charge that the efficiency of German economy had suffered from being controlled by men who were not experts, but "political personalities of unshakable energy." The degree to which Nazi leaders of the type of Himmler, Goebbels, Speer and Sauckel can maintain a unified central control of administration no doubt varies in different spheres. A highly placed observer in Switzerland recently doubted whether a central Government in the true sense still existed in Germany. This is probably a misconception. The evidence suggests that the control of vital war measures has been concentrated in the hands of a relatively small group of men working in close collaboration with one another, but this may mean that it is increasingly difficult to get decisions on matters of less urgency.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The Czechoslovak Minister of Reconstruction has recently disclosed some of his Government's plans for the transition period from war to peace conditions. The extent to which U.N.R.R.A. aid will be required and the transport problems involved are under discussion; a planning centre is being created with the purpose of rebuilding the economic life of the country as a whole; Czchoslovak specialists are studying the latest technical and scientific developments in the free world and plans are being made for the training of technicians and workers in Czechoslovakia to meet the inevitable lack of qualified people which will prevail in the immediate post-war period; of the specific legal measures already taken the most important is a decree which annuls all transfers of property concluded after the 28th September, 1938, and freezes the entire property of enemy persons and persons of unreliable State allegiance; this decree further provides that a temporary control may be set up to administer any enterprises where this is desirable to ensure the smooth functioning of economic life. The Czechoslovak Government emphasises that all these measures are of a short-term character so as not to prejudice the wishes of the people in the homeland.

The areas of Ruthenia handed over to the Czechoslovak delegate by the Soviet authorities comprise the political districts of Rachovo, Tačevo, Chust, Volové and Sevljus, 13 villages in the district of Iršava, 2 in Berehovo and 2 in Svaljava, i.e., roughly the eastern half of the province. East of the line of demarcation Czechoslovak laws are now valid; local national committees have been set up, anti-State organisations are being dissolved and their property confiscated; a rationing system is being introduced and frontier protection organised. M. Nemec has again stressed to his Government the great need for technicians and machinery to restore communications and for food, clothing and footwear; he points out that, although the local harvest in general is quite good and the number of cattle has not decreased catastrophically, there is a danger of famine in some districts in the near future.

Despite various reports indicating the continued existence of resistance in Slovakia the most reliable evidence suggests that, apart from the Czechoslovak airborne brigade, which is believed to be still operating in the region of Banská Štiavnice, south of Banská Bystrica, morale among the Slovaks is low and many are returning from the mountains to their homes. The Germans claim that the prisoners taken during the past fortnight included William Pauliny, a financial expert and member of the Slovak National Council, and a group of seventeen Americans. In the east, the Russians have made a notable advance into Slovakia and have occupied the towns of Humenné and Michalovce.

POLAND.

M. Mikolajczyk's resignation on the 24th November followed a discussion by the Polish Cabinet on the previous day of the Note brought by Mr. Harriman from President Roosevelt. American policy, as outlined partly in this Note and partly in Mr. Stettinius' statement of the 25th November, has always excluded the guaranteeing of specific frontiers in Europe. It is unequivocally in favour of a strong, free, and independent Poland. If frontiers were agreed between the two parties, with Great Britain's assent, no objection would be offered to this taking place at the present stage, or to such transfers of minorities as might be involved. It was hoped to give material assistance in Poland's post-war economic reconstruction. Mr. Harriman, however, accompanied this note with an oral message for the President offering to press Marshal Stalin to concede Lwow and the oilfields to Poland, if M. Mikolajczyk would wish this effort to be made. When, after receiving this notfication, M. Mikolajczyk sought for his Cabinet's support in continuing negotiations with the U.S.S.R., he found a majority of his Cabinet definitely against him, and resigned.

M. Kwapinski, whom the President then called on to form a Cabinet, is a veteran Socialist leader who has been mayor of Lodz and, since 1942, Minister of Commerce in the Polish London Government. He was imprisoned in Russia both under the Tsarist régime and in 1939–41; and is perhaps more radically opposed to the proposed agreement with the U.S.S.R. than any other member of the Cabinet. His efforts have met with no encouragement from the Peasant Party, which includes M. Mikolajczyk, and is supported by M. Romer. M. Kwapinski having failed in his task, a new Government has now been formed, headed by the Deputy-President M. Arciszewski, another Socialist. This Government is based upon the Socialist and National Democratic parties and includes no peasants. Its personnel is not impressive, and it is by no means excluded that the President may yet have to fall back again on M. Mikolajczyk. In this event M. Mikolajczyk may well insist on being allowed to carry out his known desire for reaching a settlement with the U.S.S.R. which would allow of a unified Government in liberated Poland, including at least some members of the London Government; and would make possible the co-ordination of all Poland's war effort, and the avoidance of civil war. It is known that he came back from the recent Moscow conversations hoping to win over his Cabinet to this policy; and it may be regarded as certain that if he is again asked to become Prime Minister, he will insist on being allowed by the President to pursue it.

The report given by Colonel Spychalski and his fellow delegates from Warsaw (Praga) of Marshal Stalin's informal conversation lasting 2½ hours with them after the official proceedings (see Summary No. 268) throws further light on Soviet policy towards the All-Slav movement in general and Poland in particular. It appears that Marshal Stalin was exceptionally cordial, even jovial, and that the delegates were genuinely warmed by their reception. The Marshal urged the necessity for a closer friendship and alliance between all the Slav peoples, but was at pains to emphasise that this was not Great Power Pan-Slavism, but an alliance of Slav States based on full equality. Such an alliance would be the best guarantee of future peace, and would prevent the Germans from ever again daring to attack another nation. Towards Poland Marshal Stalin expressed himself in most friendly terms, repeating the assurance that he wished to see Poland a strong and independent democratic State, and that nobody in the U.S.S.R. had any thought of "grabbing" her. He promised Soviet aid in the reconstruction of Warsaw, and in arming an army of any size that Poland could produce, adding significantly "what the Soviet Union promises, it always fulfils." He further proposed a joint Russian–Polish occupation of Berlin. While stressing the necessity for a firm Polish–Soviet alliance Stalin added the somewhat unexpected corollary that Poland must look for Allies not only in the East, but in the West; and must thus seek a lasting alliance with Britain, France and the United States.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 23rd November an Order of the Day announced that the Red Army, supported by ships of the Baltic Fleet, had cleared the island of Saare Ma (Osel) of German troops. Saare Ma controls the approach to the Gulf of Riga, and its recovery will greatly facilitate the operations of the Baltic Fleet. During the operation four torpedo boats, three patrol ships and one transport were claimed as sunk, with one heavy cruiser and two patrol ships damaged. This victory was saluted by twenty salvoes from 224 guns in Moscow. No progress has been reported from East Prussia or Poland, but in Czechoslovakia the Red Army had advanced from the east and south-east into Slovakia, capturing the towns of Mikhaljovce and Humanne on the 26th November. In Hungary the Soviet advance continues slowly east of Budapest, and the Red Army is closing in on Miskolc.

On the 20th November Army General Bulganin (promoted to that rank on the preceding day) was appointed one of the Deputy People's Commissars for Defence, of whom there are nearly twenty in all. Two days later it was announced in Moscow that Marshal Voroshilov had been relieved of his duties as a member of the State Committee of Defence, and that General Bulganin had been appointed a member of that body, which roughly corresponds to the War Cabinet in this country. General Bulganin is a figure of some prominence in the Communist Party, and a member of its Central Committee. He is a Deputy Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R., Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Soviet of Nationalities, and in 1940 was appointed President of the Economic Council of Metallurgy and Chemistry attached to the Council of People's Commissars. In August of this year he was appointed representative of the Soviet Government to the Polish Committee of National Liberation, and awarded the Order of Kutuzov, 1st class (see Summary No. 253, under "Poland").

Too much significance should not be attached to the fact that Marshal Voroshilov has been relieved of his duties as a member of the State Committee of Defence. There is no evidence that he has lost the favour of Marshal Stalin, which he has enjoyed since their close co-operation during the civil war. This favour brought him to high office, and kept him there even after his military failures during the Finnish war and in 1941. Marshal Voroshilov is still a member of the Politburo, the real centre of power in the U.S.S.R. He is now nearly 64 years of age, and his political influence has declined rapidly during the last five years: so that there would be nothing surprising if he were honourably retired. One press correspondent in Moscow, however, got the Soviet censor to pass a statement that "Voroshilov is presumed to be taking over new and important duties," and a German Foreign Office spokesman has already suggested that these duties are connected with a reorganisation of the Far Eastern Army. If such a task is being undertaken, there is, indeed, no one to whom Marshal Stalin would be more likely to entrust its supervision than Marshal Voroshilov.

On the 23rd November M. Kuznetsov, Chairman of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, reported to a meeting of leading Moscow trade unionists on the recent visit to Britain of a Soviet Trade Union delegation, of which M. Kuznetsov was head (see Summary No. 261). Loud applause greeted his statement that agreement had been reached on the necessity for severe treatment of war criminals. M. Kuznetsov announced that it had been decided to exchange delegations between individual trade unions in the two countries: "in the first instance trade unions of the coal, metallurgical, textile, building and transport industries will send delegations." He added that the postponed world Trade Union Conference (see Summary No. 261) would take place in February 1945, and a preparatory committee (comprising British, Soviet and United States trade unionists) would set to work in London on the 4th December. A resolution was passed uriging that from this conference there should be erected, "on a broad democratic basis, a fighting organ of the world trade-union movement capable of waging unrelenting struggle against fascism and its accomplices, and of fusing the ranks of the working class of the democratic countries for the successful solution of the tasks connected with its vitally important interests." An article in the current number of The War and the Working Class defined Soviet wishes rather more precisely: "It is now a question of creating an amalgamation of trade unions, which will include Soviet and United States unions and will really become world-wide; and it is perfectly obvious that this amalgamation will differ radically both in name and essence from the Amsterdam International," which, the article hinted, had been markedly influenced by German trade unionists. This world trade union organisation must "assure to organised labour the place it deserves in the coming solution of fundamental problems of post-war organisation in the interests of democratic, progressive development." It should have views on such problems as defence of the interests and rights of the masses of working people; working conditions and standards of living; help for victims of the war and ex-Servicemen; combating unemployment; the length of the working day, wages, prices; the continuance of controls in the post-war period; health protection, social insurance, education, housing, &c.

An exhibition of photographs illustrating the war effort of British youth has been opened in Moscow. At the opening ceremony, which was attended by many prominent Soviet personalities, a speech was delivered in Russian by Mr. Balfour, the British Minister. The exhibition is being visited by school children and groups from youth organisations; it will later go on tour. It was made the occasion for an article on Anglo-Soviet relations in Komsomolskaya

Pravda (the text of which is not yet available) which the Moscow correspondent of The Times described as far surpassing in warmth of feeling and understanding of the British war effort anything published in the Soviet press since the beginning of the war.

No details are yet available of the conversations between the Soviet leaders and the Yugoslav Prime Minister, M. Shubashitch, who left Moscow on the 24th November. The official Tass communiqué, put out on the following day, merely stated in general terms that the principal Yugoslav problems had been discussed with due regard to the position of Yugoslavia among the United Nations. During the discussions the necessity was noted of the formation of a united Yugoslav Government on the basis of the agreements recently concluded between Marshal Tito and Dr. Shubashitch. The Soviet Government, the communiqué continued, welcomed the efforts of the two leaders "to unite all truly democratic forces" in their country, and regarded "the creation of a democratic and federated Yugoslavia as a positive and constructive factor in the achievement of victory and the organisation of peace in Europe."

Following several war-time visits to Moscow on the part of the Prime Minister of Outer Mongolia (the last in January of this year—see Summary No. 225), Tass reports the arrival of a Mongolian trade delegation on the 24th November, headed by the Vice-Premier Madzhig. It is just a year since the last Mongolian trade mission visited Moscow. The delegation was met at the railway station by a group of high-ranking Soviet officials connected with the Commissariats for Foreign Trade and Foreign Affairs, including the Deputy People's Commissar for Foreign Trade, M. Yuly M. Kaganovich. No information has yet been officially released regarding the objects of this visit, but in view of Outer Mongolia's large surplus of livestock and agricultural raw materials, such as wool, ways and means of increasing these exports to the Soviet Union are probably under discussion, or even a Soviet-Mongolian trade treaty, which apparently does not yet formally exist.

The Extraordinary State Commission for investigating atrocities has issued a new report, dealing this time with crimes committed in Estonia. The report describes the persecution of Estonians, the prohibition of their language, the systematic destruction of cultural monuments, universities and schools, and the spoliation of industry and agriculture. Over 50,000 men, women and children are stated to have been killed in various concentration camps. The Hitlerite Government and the German High Command are cited as responsible for these crimes, and amongst those personally responsible Field-Marshals von Leeb and von Küchler are named, together with Colonel-Generals von Model and Lindemann, Generalkommissar Obergruppenführer Karl Lietzmann, Standartenführer Prince von Hohenlohe, head of the German Security Police, and many others. In commenting on this report Pravda drew the possibly slightly optimistic conclusion that "the bestial policy of the Germans caused the Estonian working people and Estonian intellectuals to think with particular tenderness and love of that period when Estonia, in the family of Soviet peoples, had freedom and the opportunity of developing its national culture and economy.

On the 22nd November the Order of Lenin was awarded to two prominent Communists of foreign origin, now presumably Soviet citizens—MM. Kuusinen and Varga. M. Kuusinen, who was a member of the Central Executive Committee of the Comintern from 1928 until its dissolution in 1943, is chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Karelo-Finnish S.S.R., and a deputy chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. M. Varga, whose decoration was awarded "for many years of fruitful work in the sphere of economic studies and successful scientific and publicist work," is a Hungarian Communist who has resided in the U.S.S.R. for many years. He is editor of the journal World Economy and World Politics, and contributed an important article on reparations to The War and the Working Class in October 1943 (see Summary No. 205).

SCANDINAVIA.

A terrible picture of the sufferings and prospects of the civilian population of the counties of Finnmark and Troms in Northern Norway has been provided by a distinguished refugee, with exceptional official experience of the region affected, who has recently escaped to Sweden and has since visited England. His report, as published in Svenska Dagbladet for the 22nd November, brings out not only the ruthless compulsion employed by the Germans in the evacuation, but the inadequacy of the means provided for effecting it. Ships and other means of transport have been requisitioned for military purposes, and the Norwegians, while their homes have been burnt and their cattle destroyed, and persons attempting to evade the order have in numerous instances been shot, are reduced to walking or the use of small rowing-boats for their movement southward, in arctic winter conditions. Apart from a fraction of the population in the neighbourhood of Kirkenes, who succeeded in hiding in mine galleries and thus joining the Russians, and some fugitives wandering in the mountains in horrible conditions, the whole of Finnmark is stated to be blasted and depopulated. In Hammerfest, out of 400 to 500 houses only 3, requisitioned by the S.S. and Gestapo, are left standing. In Vardö, an old woman of 92 was left the sole resident in the town, apart from one other person who succeeded in escaping from the compulsory evacuation. Meantime the roads are blocked by the retreat of the German forces, which is behind its time-table, and the sufferings of the Norwegian population are cynically disregarded. The report states in conclusion that, in default of speedy help, the civilian population is faced with certain death. Another report, based on a letter from Tromsö, adds a final touch of cynicism. "Everything," it says, "is being filmed and described as Norwegians fleeing from bolshevism."

In these circumstances, the Swedes seem to be doing their best to provide alleviation. It is stated in the press that supplies of food, clothing, &c., are being placed in depots along the Swedo-Norwegian frontier, which is being patrolled with a continuous air reconnaissance. The Swedish Government is also understood to have applied to Berlin for safe conduct for Swedish Red Cross ships to convey evacuees from the ports of North Norway to Narvik and thence by rail into Sweden.

The German paper circulated in Norway, Deutsche Zeitung in Norwegen, is quoted as reporting that it is intended to abandon 20 per cent. of Norway, and to make Trondheim the centre of the southward evacuation.

A Moscow broadcast in Norwegian, sent out on the 20th November, appears to interpret the appeal made by Prime Minister Nygaardsvold to Northern Norway as being of general application to the whole country. Reminding the audience of the importance attached by M. Nygaardsvold to the destruction or capture of the soldiers retreating southwards (see Summary No. 265), the broadcast asks for the paralysation of the German railway system and the sinking or firing of German ships throughout the whole of Norway, together with the sabotaging of transport vehicles. Blows, it concludes, are to be struck at the German transport system everywhere in Norway. So far there are no indications that these drastic instructions are being followed, nor does this appear to have been the intention contemplated in M. Nygaardvold's appeal. A German announcement, however, alleges some recent acts of sabotage on the railways in the neighbourhood of Oslo and Lillestrom—some 10 or 12 miles north-east of the capital, and the destruction of the Fram Fire Insurance building in Oslo on the 23rd November is also attributed to saboteurs.

Events in North Norway have aroused great indignation in Sweden, which has been aggravated by the misrepresentations of the quisling press on the subject of Sweden's refusal to open the "horse-shoe" route for the transit of evacuees from Northern to Southern Norway. The offer to receive refugees from Norway is deliberately ignored. Stronger action against Germany is being demanded of the Swedish Government in certain quarters. On the 23rd November, a Social Democrat member of the Riksdag, Frederik Ström, speaking at Göteborg, demanded that diplomatic relations with Germany should be broken off. The new paper Expressen, the 24th November, appears to favour this course, pointing out that the alternative of permitting the preparation of a volunteer force for service in Norway would take too long to relieve the existing situation. But Sweden, says this paper, cannot without loss of self-respect be an idle spectator of the tragedy of North Norway, she must speak her mind unmistakably and act accordingly.

On the 24th November, the Swedish passenger ship Hansa was sunk by a mine or torpedo between the island of Gothland and Sweden, with the loss of 93 lives, including that of the Deputy Chief or Staff, Colonel Lindquist. The spot where the incident occurred was outside the area in the Baltic recently proclaimed an operational zone by Germany. A convoy system has since been started on this route.

In an interview published on the 20th November by the Finnish paper, Arbetarbladet, M. Fagerholm attributes his exclusion from the Government to the intervention of M. Tanner, and the latter, while complaining that the version given in the interview is inaccurate, admits that he complained of a lack of balance in the Social Democrat views originally represented on the Government, and pointed out that M. Fagerholm had long ceased to represent majority opinion in that party.

In Denmark a reinforcement of nearly 4,000 German military police arrived in Copenhagen on the 18th November. This was interpreted as a prelude to intensified raids and the latest information seems to justify this apprehension. Sabotage, however, has so far continued unchecked, especially on the Jutland railways, and five more informers are reported to have been liquidated during the weekend the 18th/20th November.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

It was announced on the 25th November that the Dutch Premier, accompanied by the Ministers of War, Justice, the Interior, and Finance, had arrived in the liberated Netherlands for a visit; Professor Gerbrandy was to return soon to London, to report to the Queen, but the other four Ministers were to remain longer, in order to ascertain local conditions and to take certain necessary decisions. On the 26th Professor Gerbrandy broadcast to his countrymen to assure them that the Government was aware of, and sympathised with, their sufferings; he reminded them, however, that, during the operational phase of liberation, the highest authority rested with the Allied Command, which, for instance, was responsible for food supplies; that Command was doing all it could to help the Dutch. Professor Gerbrandy added that he had noted the gratitude of the people in the Southern Netherlands to their English liberators; a friendship had been established between the Dutch and the British people that would be of the greatest importance in the future.

In the opinion of Dutch engineers it will be possible to drain the flooded portions of the island of Walcheren within a year after the requisite plant has been obtained. But it will be some years before the reclaimed land is again fit for cultivation.

The shortage of food in the liberated Netherlands is acute. On the 21st there was a demonstration in Eindhoven by a number of the hungry inhabitants, who wish to draw the attention of the authorities to their plight, though they admitted that priority must be given to the import of military supplies. They were told that every effort was being made to help them. In the occupied Netherlands, too, food is very scarce, and is becoming scarcer. The Germans, moreover, continue to round up Dutchmen and send them to Germany or put them to forced labour in their own country.

Though there is at present a good deal more food in Belgium than in the Netherlands, much alarm is felt about the future. M. Pierlot has expressed himself very strongly in an interview with a correspondent of the Sunday Times. "If," he said, "with the harbours which will soon be operating on a larger scale our imports do not increase, the food situation will become so disastrous that no Government . . . . will be able to survive." He added that though "the reception of British soldiers in this country has been hearty and sincere . . . . if the food situation does not improve the people's attitude might easily change." It may be added that there is a shortage of jobs as well as a shortage of food. The Minister of Labour recently stated in the Chamber that there were 400,000 unemployed, but hoped that, with the aid of the Allied authorities, work would soon be found for them.

Such conditions are obviously not conducive to public tranquillity, and may well be partly responsible for the anti-Government demonstrations which have occurred, ostensibly because of the disarming of the Resistance organisations (see last Summary). On the 25th such a demonstration, organised by the Independence Front, occurred in Brussels and was attended by much disorder. The mob, according to a statement broadcast by the Premier on the 26th, attempted to break into the zone surounding the Ministries to which access was forbidden; some of the demonstrators threw grenades and fired small arms, and the Gendarmerie were compelled to use their weapons to disperse the rioters; 45 persons were injured.

This incident appears to have confirmed the resolve of the Socialist and Liberal parties to support the Government—at least for the time being. The support of the Catholics was already assured. Trouble, however, continues, and widespread strikes in Brussels and its environs broke out on the 28th.

FRANCE.

The liberation of Lorraine is nearing completion and that of Alsace is under way. The American Seventh Army has pushed on beyond Metz and a force including General Leclerc's French armoured division has thrust through the Saverne gap to Strasbourg. Further south the French First Army is advancing from Mulhouse and threatening the retreat of the German troops from the Vosges. General Eisenhower has expressed his pleasure at the success of French arms.

The French authorities had already taken various measures for the administration of the three eastern departments which the Germans treated as annexed territories. An ordinance of the 15th September provides for the restoration of the laws of the Republic which were in force on the 16th June, 1940. A Regional Commissioner, M. Charles Blondel, has been appointed for the Alsatian departments of Bas-Rhin and Haut-Rhin, and special powers have been conferred upon him and upon M. Rebourset, the Prefect of the Moselle, with whom he is to consult. Among their duties is that of preparing and laying before the Government measures which will bring legislation in the three departments into line with that ruling in the rest of France. This and the ordinance of the 23rd October abolishing the Direction Générale des Services d'Alsace et Lorraine, set up in 1925, suggest that while the Government is by no means blind to the special problems which must arise in departments subjected for four years to a ruthless policy of Germanisation, it is anxious to avoid giving Alsace and Lorraine a special status. The services of the Direction Générale have all been transferred to the Ministry of the Interior except those for education and social insurance, which have gone to the Ministry of National Education and the Ministry of Labour. Food supplies are being hurried to the population of the newly-liberated areas and lorries hitherto used for the victualling of Paris are being diverted for the purpose. The Government has undertaken to exchange German currency acquired since 1940 at the rate of 15 francs to the mark, and further imports of such currency have been forbidden.

On the 21st and 22nd November the Consultative Assembly held a debate on foreign affairs. Mr. Duff Cooper reports that the speeches were on a higher level than that usual at Algiers and that they showed a remarkable agreement on the main lines of French foreign policy. Most striking was the almost unanimous rejection of the idea of a western bloc and the emphasis on the need for close friendship with the U.S.S.R., coupled with good relations with Great Britain and the United States of America. M. Bidault's first speech in the Assembly was disappointing because he was ill and spoke very briefly, but it is noteworthwy that in a subsequent message to the Populaire he referred to his forthcoming visit to Moscow as a journey from which the Government expected results "of essential importance for France, for Europe and for the world." The main Government spokesman was General de Gaulle, who in a short and vigorous speech restated France's claim to a full share in all decisions concerning Germany, said that if Italy would formally renounce all claims against France friendly relations could be renewed, and reasserted France's intention to take her full part in the Far Eastern War and the reconquest of Indo-China. In an article in the Aube of the 25th November, Captain Maurice Schumann, former porte-parole of Fighting France and now a Resistance member of the Assembly, pointed out that the unanimity shown in the debate was broken only on one essential question: whereas, M. Wilzer, deputy for the Moselle, had declared for the annexation of Saar and Rhineland territories with either the assimilation or the transplantation of their population, M. Daniel Mayer, Secretary-General of the Socialist Party, had drawn attention to the danger of any dismemberment of Germany or annexation of specifically German territory. Captain Schumann then proceeded to an interesting interpretation of the references to Germany in General de Gaulle's own speech. From this, he said, it was clear that the Government would not annex peoples against their will. The fate of the German people would finally depend "de ce qu'ils révéleront d'eux-mêmes." But as none could foresee the effects of the dissolution of the Corpus Germanicum the hypothesis of annexation should not be ruled out. Moreover, nothing was more revealing than the fact that the General had referred to the German "peoples" and the "German State or States." This meant that for the Government the unified Bismarckian Germany was incompatible with French security. Finally, the Government would insist on a military and economic watch on the Rhine; in other words the basins of the Saar and the Ruhr must be put at the disposal "of the party of freedom, of which France was the vanguard."

French demands on Germany were also dealt with in an interview given to Reuter's correspondent on the 21st November by M. Mayer, the Minister of Transport. He said that they would include the return of all French ships and railway material in German hands; compensation in kind for French losses in transport material; and, eventually, deliveries to France of new in exchange for worn-out material.

M. Massigli has been appointed French representative on the European Advisory Commission.

The Government has adopted measures put forward by M. Parodi, the Minister of Labour, in order to provide for the 600,000 unemployed in France, of whom 300,000 are in the Paris region, and to secure labour for the urgent repair of communications and clearing of bombed areas. Workers unemployed as a result of the war will continue to be paid 75 per cent. of their wages in accordance with the law of the 22nd May, 1944, and to receive social insurance benefits, but their labour will be used by the Government where it is required. As far as possible the staff of individual factories will be kept together and employers will be informed of the work given to their employees, so that factories will be able to reclaim their workers directly they are able to reopen.

M. Ramadier, the new Minister of Food, made a statement to the Consultative Assembly on the 23rd November. He said that, apart from the transport situation, the fall in agricultural production compared with 1939 was the main reason for the present difficulties and that supplies of bread, meat and wine would remain short until next autumn. The fat ration would be increased when imports from the empire could be obtained; potatoes were fortunately plentiful. The problem of collecting produce from the peasants was difficult, but it might be possible, by reducing the number of middle-men, to raise prices for the peasants without raising them for the consumers. M. Ramadier explained the difficulties of replacing the personnel of the Vichy agricultural organisation, but was attacked by the Communists for slowness in purging his administration.

Albert Favre, a former Under-Secretary of State, has been condemned to hard labour for life for "intelligence avec l'ennemi." Recent arrests include those of several directors of Air-France, among them General Pujo and M. Edgar-Bonnet, who is also a director of the Suez Canal Company and as such was expected shortly in England for conversations with the British directors. They are accused of treason for having delivered material to the Lufthansa and sent Air-France personnel to Germany with the approval of the Government of Vichy. The metropolitan services of the Air-France Company have been requisitioned as from the 15th November.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

General Franco's political evolution proceeds. On the 21st November the Spanish Ambassador handed to the Secretary of State a copy of a personal letter from the Caudillo expressing his desire for a clarification of Anglo-Spanish relations, and instructing the Duke of Alba to transmit to the Prime Minister his sentiments on the subject. This document, perhaps the most important pronouncement on Spanish policy since the war began, will be analysed in next week's Summary. The Spanish text shows that General Franco's sentiments are most friendly, and that he is sincerely anxious for an improvement in the atmosphere so that Spain and Great Britain may enjoy mutual confidence and esteem. Franco's Spanish is even more "transcendental" than Hitler's German. He has brought to a high degree the art of accumulating woolly ambiguities in sentences starved of full stops, but where semi-colons abound in 16th century profusion, and which bristle equivocally with hypothetical imperfect subjunctives. If "le style c'est l'homme," then General Franco is indeed a tortuous and smoky character. To render this Falangist farrago into even non-basic English is a teasing task for any translator. The first reaction of an English reader is that this is an impudent document and the product of a mind remote from European realities.

The two draft decrees for the reorganisation of Portuguese industry, which were approved by the National Assembly on the 28th October—and to which reference was made in last week's Summary—cover a lot of ground. Portugal's economy is fundamentally an agricultural one of a very primitive kind; the problem facing any Government, therefore, is how to support, in unfavourable natural conditions and against the handicap of material inefficiency, a population which has increased by 50 per cent. in the last forty years and is still expanding. Efforts at increased agricultural yields having largely failed since Dr. Salazar began to direct the national economy, the new State is now looking to industrial development to solve the problem.

The basis of the new scheme is the necessity to reduce imports, and thereby to abolish the unfavourable balance of trade from which Portugal suffered in the decade preceding the outbreak of war. This has led to a grouping of industry which depends almost entirely on self-sufficiency. Existing industries are divided into groups according to the degree of their organisation and their ability to satisfy the needs of the home market. In Group I there are only five industries whose concentration is considered satisfactory. In Group II there are eleven industries which, though dispersed, are almost capable of satisfying the country's needs. Group III consists of twenty-five industries which are insufficiently developed to prevent large imports of the articles they manufacture. Group IV lists those new industries, basic or subsidiary, which are now to be established. If Portugal were to be made self-sufficing in the industries in Groups III and IV, it is hoped that imports could be reduced by 25 per cent. It is estimated that the first stage in the general plan—the nationalisation of Group III and the establishment of Group IV industries—will last eight years. The programme presupposes the necessary supply of electric power, which is covered by the second Bill.

This grandiose scheme is a natural development, and has doubtless been accelerated by the effects of our blockade. It certainly reflects Dr. Salazar's determination never again to be dependent upon the caprices of belligerents or to be squeezed by a political fist even though it be covered by the glove of commerce. We cannot tell to what extent the plan will succeed in freeing Portugal from dependence on foreign countries; we do not know, for instance, how far these measures of protection will fit into the economic organisation of the post-war world. Financially the prospects are not unfavourable. Great profits have been made since 1939 from the export of sardines, cork, tin and wolfram, the last especially having been a war-time windfall both for private individuals and the national exchequer. There is ample capital in private hands (provided it can be coaxed out of them), which could be used for launching new enterprises, and the Government hold large foreign balances, particularly in sterling, available for capital expenditure on equipment. But the spirit which has led, with one or two exceptions, to the general inefficiency of Portuguese industry to-day still flourishes, if such a word can be used of an animus of inertia. And the execution of the plan will certainly lead to increased governmental interference, already considerable, in industrial enterprises. Administrative incompetence will thus probably delay the accomplishment of the scheme in the eight years laid down. But, given internal stability, some progress should be made towards solving the Portuguese problem. And there should be, for British manufactures, a valuable, if temporary market for such capital goods as this country may be able to export in the years following the end of the war.

ITALY.

Signor Bonomi has had no easy task in trying to get the six parties which form his Government to pull together. Ever since April, when Signor Bonomi formed his first Government, these six parties have been more or less at loggerheads despite their promises to put aside their political differences, particularly as regards the "Institutional question," and lately Signor Bonomi has been pressed to give the Left a stronger representation in the Government. On the 22nd November the Communist leaders called on Signor Bonomi and asked for the resignation of Count Casati (Liberal), the Minister of War, and of Marchese

Visconti Venosta (Independent), Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. They also demanded greater energy in the conduct of the purge especially as regards the Army, and for the delay as regards the Army Count Casati is personally blamed. In this respect there has been a report that the arrest of Marshal Badoglio had been ordered, although this is denied by Signor Scoccimaro, Count Sforza's Communist Deputy for the Purge. Signor Bonomi informed the Communist leaders that he could not agree to the resignation of either Count Casati or of Marchese Visconti Venosta. Marchese Visconti Venosta, however, sent in his resignation on the same day giving as his reason that a new phase had been reached in Italian foreign policy and that there should now be a separate Minister who could be personally responsible towards the Cabinet for his policy. This refers to the fact that Signor Bonomi is nominally Foreign Minister but Marchese Visconti Venosta has been in charge of the Ministry. It is understood, however, that the real reason for Marchese Venosta's resignation was the interference of other Ministers—particularly of Count Sforza, who, ever since he landed in Italy, has coveted the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It may be remembered that Count Sforza occupied this post in 1921 for about nine months in Signor Nitti's Liberal Government. On the 25th November Signor Togliatti addressed a letter to Signor Bonomi in which he demanded that Count Sforza should become the Foreign Minister, Signor Tarchiani of the Action Party Minister of War, and Signor Nenni, leader of the Socialist Party, Minister of the Interior, the latter post being under Signor Bonomi. It would therefore appear that Count Sforza, nominally an Independent, although in reality up to now of the Action Party, has thrown in his lot with the Communists, who may well make use of him for a short time as the Action Party has only a small following. Signor Togliatti's final demand was that the present crisis should be submitted to the various committees of National Liberation, of which Count Sforza has lately been elected president, a totally unconstitutional procedure to which Signor Bonomi could naturally not agree. The crisis has therefore developed into a struggle for power between the extremists, with whom Count Sforza is siding, and the moderates. The extremists are trying to gain the most important Ministries, while Signor Bonomi is trying to include a more steadying influence in the Cabinet such as Signor Orlando.

As neither side would give way on any point Signor Bonomi, on the 26th November, handed the Cabinet's resignation to the Lieutenant of the Realm, who, after consulting with Signor Orlando, Signor della Toretta and the six party leaders as well as the leaders of the parties not represented in the Government, hoped to persuade the parties to continue working under Signor Bonomi and Count Sforza to take up the post of Ambassador in Washington. Up to date there does not appear to be any signs of the extremists giving way in their insistence to occupy the key positions in the Cabinet, nor of Signor Bonomi's reconsidering his decision that Signor Scoccimaro, the Deputy Commissioner for the Purge, must resign as in Signor Bonomi's opinion the purge is being used for political purposes rather than for the eradication of Fascism.

The fact that His Majesty's Government made it known that the choice of Count Sforza as Foreign Minister would not be viewed with favour is taken up by Signor Nenni in Avanti as undue interference in Italian internal affairs. Risorgimento Liberale, however, explains that His Majesty's Government had not so much imposed a veto as made a recommendation with a view to maintaining friendly relations between the two Governments. A misunderstanding had arisen in connexion with an assurance given by Count Sforza at the time of his return to Italy and this misunderstanding would have been accentuated if Count Sforza had become Minister for Foreign Affairs. Count Sforza had indeed promised to assist Badoglio in his struggle against the German invaders but the situation which he found on arrival in Italy was not that which he had been led to expect. There is truth in this explanation, at least as regards the British interpretation of Count Sforza's promise. An ambitious man, whose career has been ruined by Fascism, Count Sforza would appear to be trying to make up for lost time in his endeavour to gain power, by sacrificing all principles and ideals.

Whether Signor Bonomi will be able to form a Government from the six original parties or by the inclusion of one or two of the others would seem to depend on whether the extremists think the time is ripe for a show-down or whether they will wait for a more propitious moment. But it must be remembered that Signor Bonomi is himself 70 years old and has no really strong backing to help him through this crisis, but if he feels he has the solid support of the Allies in Rome, and His Majesty's Government have assured him personally of their support, it should make a big difference and may see him through the present trouble.

THE VATICAN

On the 15th November the Pope addressed the Polish Colony in Rome. After paying his tribute to Warsaw, he showed his faith in a happier future. "The whole of mankind, the true prosperity of nations and the durability of peace have as their foundation justice and respect for rights, especially the rights of those who are weaker. When the world becomes itself again it will have to recognise Poland's share in its deliverance." He spoke also of what the Polish cities of Lublin and Lwów had owed to Blessed Stanislas Kostka, the patron Clement X gave Poland in 1674.

The papal conception of the post-war world is reflected in the recent pronouncement of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of the United States on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Peace, it maintains, must carry out the Atlantic Charter in full. Prostrate nations must be helped, or they will become centres of unrest. National sovereignty must be respected, because it is a right which comes from the judicial personality of a nation; but it is limited both by the duties it owes to the international community, and "by the innate rights of men and families within the nation." The American bishops agree with the growing insistence of Catholic social thought that a nation is made up of individuals with their innate rights, each a member of one or more societies or associations which enjoy the rights of judicial personality. In a striking passage they condemn non-intervention.

"The ideology of a nation in its internal life is a concern of the international community. To reject this principle is to maintain that the violation of the innate rights of men in a country by its own Government has no relation to world peace . . . . a nation which refuses to its own people the full enjoyment of innate human rights cannot be relied on to co-operate in the international community for the maintenance of peace." According to them, there must be no isolation from the international institution. Every nation must belong, and none must be judge in its own cause. The pronouncement has been interpreted in some United States quarters as an attack on Russian foreign policy.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The beginning of the week saw minor fighting on the left flank of the Soviet line, which soon developed into a sensational Soviet advance. The bridgehead was greatly enlarged and first Mohacs was captured and then the important city of Pécs. Further up the Danube, Soviet forces landed on Csepel island where, a German commentator suggested, they "intend to make use of the Communist elements in the eastern suburbs of Pest." Here there has been heavy fighting but the main Soviet advance was northward. Tokaj, Hatvan and Miskolcz were all captured, as well as ground north of the 1938 frontier with Czechoslovakia. In Miskolcz, which is a large industrial centre, German reports again referred to Communist formations co-operating with the Soviets.

There is still little first-hand news of conditions behind the Soviet line. While the German and Hungarian press published large quantities of atrocity stories, correspondents' messages from Moscow emphasise that the Soviet troops have received strictest orders to preserve discipline, and maintain that the reception accorded to them by the population has been not unfriendly. The Times Moscow correspondent telegraphed on the 27th November that the Russians were respecting the local authorities of the Horthy régime and dropping leaflets reminding the Hungarians that Horthy had delegated full authority to his Chief of Staff (Vörös), who was now collaborating with the Red Army. "It was significant that the Red Army's mission in Hungary was a liberating one." According to other Soviet reports, the "Organising Committees" set up in occupied areas are drawn chiefly from the Smallholders, Social Democrats and Communists.

On the Hungarian side of the line, the National Guard inaugurated by Lakatos has been replaced by a new formation, the Armed National Service, the functions of which appear to be those of a Party guard. There have been further callings-up for the army, this time on a considerable scale. According to a German report, Cardinal Serédi has ordered Catholic teachers to take the oath of allegiance to Szálasi. This has not yet been confirmed from Hungarian sources; but the Papal Nuncio has attended official functions. Some more Government offices have been evacuated from Budapest, but the Government itself has not left, and the Germans have again declared their intention of holding the city to the last. There have again been many references—sometimes made to refute rumours of German looting—to large stocks and supplies falling into Soviet hands.

Roumania.

M. Vyshinsky who has been visiting Bucharest in connexion with the delay in carrying out the terms of the Armistice, has held detailed discussions with the British members of the Allied Commission. The meetings have been held in an atmosphere of great cordiality. It cannot be said that the points on which the British Section of the Commission wished to arrive at an understanding, have yet been satisfactorily settled. With regard to the removal of material from the Petroleum Companies' stores, M. Vyshinsky repeated the arguments about the goods being legitimate booty since they were German property, which had previously been used by both General Vinogradov and M. Molotov, and then said that it might be possible for the shipments to be stopped. As to the unrest and growing difficulties in the refineries and elsewhere owing to the presence of the N.K.V.D. M. Vyshinsky contended that this was a matter for the Roumanian Government, and that nobody was interfering with them. When asked why permission had not been given for the return of the oil experts, M. Vyshinsky said he would refer the matter to Moscow.

The Soviet Government has demanded that accommodation be found for three more divisions, one to be stationed in the Ploiești district, one in the country to the west of Bucharest, and one at Petroșani, Deva and Arad. These districts include the chief industries and the Soviet action has given rise to the fear that a complete military occupation is in contemplation.

What in the absence of an explanation is a totally unaccountable step for the authorities to take, is an order by the Bucharest police that taverns must close at 6 p.m., bodega bars at 8 p.m. and restaurants at 9 p.m. In Bucharest the restaurants do not begin business until about 9 o'clock. In 1940 as a war-time measure they were ordered to close at 2 a.m., and that was considered a very severe privation. It is quite certain that no Roumanian authority made such an order as this of its own free will.

Yugoslavia.

All Macedonia has now been cleared of the enemy. Further north the Bulgarians took Prishtina, and, together with partisan units, later took Vochitrn and Mitrovica. Meanwhile Albanian partisans occupied Prizren and Petch. The whole Kosovo–Metohija area seems to be cleared.

The Germans were driven back on Kotor, which the partisans occupied. The German force in southern Montenegro is now surrounded and trying to force its way out via Nikshitch. The German lines of retreat through Kraljevo and the Sandjak are still open.

Allied aircraft increased their deliveries of equipment to the partisans and heavily bombed enemy concentrations and communications.

The Serbian gathering of delegates from partisan committees (see Summary No. 267, p. 14) elected a Council for Serbia and a Presidium (standing committee). This Presidium has defined the formation and activities of the local partisan committees as "the basic organs of popular authority." The Belgrade press urges these committees to exercise their authority and show initiative. The Presidium has also appointed twelve commissars for departments of government in Serbia, and a legislative committee. Thus Serbia has been brought into line with the partisan organisation set up in other regions of Yugoslavia.

Tito's provisional Yugoslav Government has proclaimed an amnesty to all who were or are in Mihailovitch's or the Croat or Slovene Domobranstvo (quisling) forces, if they report for service to the partisan military or civil authorities by the 15th January next. The amnesty does not apply to those who remain in those forces after the publication of the amnesty (apparently 21st November) or are guilty of murder, robbery, &c. The provisional Government has also ordered the confiscation of all property of the German State and its citizens, and of persons of German nationality (presumably the local German minority), except those who have fought in the partisan forces. The property of persons absent or forcibly abducted by the enemy is sequestrated pending a decision upon it.

The Communist newspaper Borba has attacked the Governments of France, Greece and Belgium for now seeking to disarm their "resistance" movements. About the Allied troops in Dalmatia the new Yugoslav Telegraph Service emphasised that the partisan military authorities had permitted a very small force of British artillery to co-operate with their troops. No other request for permission for an Allied landing had been made.

In Belgrade and Split the bourgeois class is reported to be recovering confidence.

The Greek Communist Party is reported to have let it be known privately in Moscow that, if Bulgaria were willing to cede her bit of Macedonia to the proposed autonomous Yugoslav Macedonia, they saw no reason why the districts of Florina and Kastoria, in Greece, should not be similarly ceded; but that the Serres, Drama and Kavalla areas should remain in Greece.

Shubashitch has left Moscow (see "Soviet Union").

Greece.

The task of the Greek Government in maintaining stabilisation and restarting commerce and industry has been made more difficult by the fact that it has at the same time been necessary to create the administrative machinery to deal with these problems. The Government hopes shortly to establish a reasonable scale of wages and prices and is preparing plans to finance industries which produce goods for sale to the public. The recent budget, however, contains no credits for rehabilitation, and, with very little revenue coming in, the Government has been reluctant to provide the British military authorities with drachmæ to pay for road and relief works. The Government has, however, agreed to give financial assistance to industries whose products will be used to provide shelter for the homeless during the winter.

M. Papandreou, who has been having frequent conferences with M. Siantos and the Communist Ministers, has shown signs of yielding to pressure from these quarters; General Ventiris, the Chief of Staff (see last week's Summary), has been removed from his post, and M. Lambrianidis, Under-Secretary for War and member of M. Papandreou's party, has been superseded by General Sariyiannis, an appointment that will please none but the Extreme Left; M. Lambrianidis remains in the Cabinet as Minister without portfolio. The more moderate elements in the Government are apprehensive, and at one point both Liberals and Populists contemplated resigning; however, they have now agreed to remain in the Government until a legally armed force has been established in Greece. Meantime, the Liberal paper Dimokratia has sharply attacked M. Papandreou and has accused the British of making a tragic mistake in thinking that the Greek Communists were carrying on a struggle for national liberation rather than for political domination. The British, says Dimokratia, should have been more practical in their dealings with E.L.A.S.; they should have landed in the Peloponnese as soon as the Germans left. Why did they allow power to be handed over to the Communists? Without British support M. Papandreou and his Communist Ministers would fall; Great Britain should cease to intervene in their favour.

Albania.

Having to withdraw from Tirana in some haste the Germans left the chief installations there intact. Some three hundred Germans escaped to the north, but 1,200 are estimated to have been killed or captured and a battle group of Germans which advanced from Elbasan to the relief of Tirana was virtually annihilated by the R.A.F. and F.N.Ç. Both Elbasan and Durazzo have now been captured from the Germans. Small forces of quisling Albanians have been holding out at Tetovo and Gostivar, on the Yugoslav side of the frontier, but the main feature of the situation has been the attacks to which Allied bombers have subjected the German units by day and by night as they retreat slowly northwards.

Midhat Frasheri, the head of Balli Kombetar, has arrived in southern Italy with some thirty other fugitives who belonged to that now disbanded organisation or to the following of Abas Kupi.

Bulgaria.

The Government has made a change in the command of the militia, whose high-handed proceedings have, as reported last week, been partly responsible for the critical internal situation in Bulgaria. The Government evidently hopes that the new head of the militia, a Lieutenant-Colonel Dintzov, who is a lawyer and a Communist, will handle the situation with more tact than his predecessor. Meanwhile Fatherland Front delegates from the provinces have been conferring with their colleagues in Sofia on economic affairs and the conference has decided that private ownership shall be preserved and economic co-operation encouraged subject to a large measure of control by the people. In increasing the allowances of soldiers' dependants the Government, it may be noted, has introduced the principle of basing the increase not on the soldier's pay but on the number of his dependants. Similarly the allowances paid to the dependants of officers and men killed in action are to be equal, regardless of rank.

The Foreign Minister told the British political representative on the 21st November that the Government was determined that the Crown should be treated with proper respect so long as Bulgaria remained a kingdom. The Queen Mother was living with the infant King and the small princess at the palace at Vranya. Prince Kiril had been sent to Moscow for examination and Princess Eudoxie, the late King's sister, was kept more or less isolated near Sofia. Among people lately arrested are the president and council of the national bank who are apparently held largely responsible for the pro-German policy which is stated to have led to a Bulgarian loss of 42 milliard levas.

An article in the press claims the Bulgarian victories in Yugoslavia have only been possible thanks to the assistant commanders—i.e., political officers—whom the Government appointed to effect the "ideological rearmament" of the army and make it fight against, and not for, the Germans. A Government broadcast declared that the army's victories had already improved Bulgaria's international status, but it called on army and people for still greater efforts since Bulgaria's place among the peace-loving nations was now being determined.

The Premier, M. Kimon Gheorghiev, in an interview on the 20th November, again emphasised his determination to co-operate with the Balkan peoples and in particular with Yugoslavia. Similarly a recent article on Macedonia by the Agrarian leader, Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, condemns chauvinism and repeats the demand that by agreement between Yugoslavia, Greece and Bulgaria Macedonia should become a member of a federal Yugoslavia. The Bulgarian Government, so the Foreign Minister told the British political representative, is withdrawing its troops from Yugoslav Macedonia in deference to Marshal Tito and intends henceforth to have no more to do with Bulgarians in Macedonia than the French Government has with Frenchmen in Canada.

Turkey.

In pursuance of our policy of supporting Turkish economy we have, in agreement with the United States, started on a programme of buying Turkish commodities, although we cannot embark upon large-scale purchasing until Turkey gives us some satisfaction regarding the present inflation of Turkish prices and the modification of our existing financial arrangements with her. On the 21st November a party of Turkish business men left Angora to negotiate in the United States for industrial plant.

£T.500,000 has been collected in Turkey for Greek relief and the Turkish Government proposes to complete this gesture of goodwill by sending a Turkish ship to the Piræus with foodstuffs. At the same time a deputation of Greeks has arrived in Turkey from Kalymnos in the Dodecanese where the remaining German forces are unable to provide for the civil population.

Although it would be in the Allied interest that Turkey should do as the United States, U.S.S.R. and many other countries have done, Turkey has refrained from recognising Syria and Lebanon. Her reluctance seems to be partly due to a claim to certain properties in Syria.

Turkey has constantly shown an intense anxiety lest we should let the Soviet Government have things all its own way in the Balkans and lest Turkey herself should be unable to play her part in a sphere which she regards as vital. She seems to have picked up heart from the Moscow Conference, on which Turkish press comment was uniformly favourable, and from subsequent developments in the Balkans in which the semi-official Ulus sees a promise of a return to order.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The assassination of Lord Moyne is still widely discussed in Egypt, where it has caused considerable anti-Zionist feeling. But there is as yet no more news about the official enquiry that is being conducted in Cairo. Investigations are proceeding, and important information on certain points is awaited from Palestine. Another crime occurred on the 20th November, when two British soldiers, while walking in Maadi, not far from Cairo, were fired at from a motor car by a person or persons unknown. One of the soldiers has since died. If, as seems possible, the car was stolen just before the attack, the methods adopted are similar to those followed in previous cases by the Stern Gang. But there is as yet nothing to prove that the assailants in this instance were Jews.

On the 20th November King Farouk attended a swimming competition, organised by the Minister of Education, and was photographed with the Egyptian Prime Minister on his left side, and on his right Nabil Abbas Halim and Mohammed Taher Pasha. It will be remembered that these two worthies, both of whom are related to the Royal family, were interned in July 1942 by the Wafd Government for their pro-German activities, and were only released by the present Government on condition that they lived in retirement and abstained from any publicity. Abdul Fattah Amr Pasha, who is now attached to the Palace, saw the King, at Lord Killearn's suggestion, and pointed out to His Majesty the undesirability of persons with such a bad record appearing in public in the Royal presence. The King agreed that neither of them should again be invited to gatherings of this kind. His Majesty added that Ali Maher, the Prime Minister's troublesome brother, to whose activities Amr Pasha also drew the King's attention, was in future to be confined to his country estate.

Although the general election in Egypt is due to be held within six weeks or so, the question of allocating the number of seats between the various parties has not yet been settled. Meanwhile the Government has somewhat relaxed the censorship by allowing Wafdist representatives to reply to charges made against them in the press. The reason for this may be that the Prime Minister, who seems inclined to resent Makram's efforts to play a dominant rôle in the Cabinet, regards with equanimity any refutation of Makram, who is chiefly responsible for the charges against the Wafd.

A violently-worded column about Ethiopia by Drew Pearson, a widely-read American writer, has appeared in the Washington Post. Drew Pearson declares that Haile Selassie is most anxious to see the British leave Ethiopia, as they had "agreed to do" two, and later three, years after the re-conquest of his country. He goes on to say that the British now propose to grab various Ethiopian territories, and that the Emperor had in consequence appealed to the State Department. He adds that the Emperor's efforts to communicate personally with him (Pearson) were foiled either by the British or by the United States censorship. His Majesty's Government are informing the press here that they have no knowledge of any such appeal; and that, so far from occupying Ethiopia, we have withdrawn from the country except from certain areas where we have remained in virtue of an agreement with Haile Selassie.

Mr. Churchill's statement in the House of Commons about Palestine (see Summary No. 268) has naturally received a good deal of attention in the Jewish Palestine press. Haaretz commented as follows: "Churchill's words were bitter and harsh. We are aware that he spoke not only as head of the Government, but also as a friend of Zionism, who remained loyal to it during the difficult testing period before the war, and did not abate his loyalty after assuming office. That is why his words are so pungent. The entire future of Zionism has been placed in jeopardy. Not only Britain, but all sections of the Zionist movement wait on our reply." Davar wrote: "Mr. Churchill's statement shows conclusively the gravity of the lurking danger to our undertaking and hope from the vile deeds of terrorists. . . . . It is our bounden duty to mobilise all powers and influence in our midst to prevent these individual outcasts from distorting our character and endangering our effort."

Mr. Shertok, head of the political department of the Jewish Agency, at a meeting in Haifa on the 18th November, called to speed up recruitment for the Jewish Brigade, appealed to all Jews in Palestine to use every means to stamp out terrorism and to give full assistance to the authorities; while Dr. Weizmann has also warned the Jews that, if acts of terrorism continued in Palestine, their effects on the future of the country would be disastrous. The Stern Gang, for their part, have publicly admitted, in proclamations distributed in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, their responsibility for the murder of Lord Moyne. (For American reactions to Lord Moyne's murder see under "United States of America.")

The Iraqi Government has now agreed to the appointment of a Russian Minister in Bagdad. The Minister nominated by the Soviet Government is said to be M. Grigory Titovich Zaitsev, who has recently been employed in the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs in Moscow.

M. Bayat, who, as reported in last week's Summary, was invited by the Shah to form a Ministry in succession to M. Saed, has now presented his Cabinet. It contains no personages of note, some indeed being as insignificant as M. Bayat himself. The weakness of the new Cabinet vis-à-vis Russia lies in the fact that it contains two Ministers who served under M. Saed; of whom, however, one, Mohammed Sururi, has had strong support in the Majlis, while the other, Khalil Fahimi, took no part in the recent crisis owing to absence on duty in Kurdistan. On the whole the Cabinet may be described as a collection of "decent" men—for Persia—who are not likely to go back on M. Saed's policy on oil concessions. It is, however, possible that, should Soviet pressure increase, the Government may resign rather than give a firm refusal to Russia.

The new Prime Minister has himself informed Sir R. Bullard that there will be no change in policy on the oil question, since that policy represents the views of the Majlis and of the general public. According to M. Ala, the Minister at Court, M. Bayat told the Soviet Counsellor that he would certainly give the same reply as his predecessor to the Russian demand. Public opinion in Persia remains firm, and the Tudeh party appear to have been entirely discredited by the pro-Russian attitude they have adopted. Meanwhile, the Soviet press campaign against Persia, based on quotations from the pro-Soviet Persian press, continues to be waged as it has for some weeks past; while a German broadcast in Persian has welcomed the new Persian Government as including "men whose integrity is beyond reproach," which made it unlikely that it would "let itself become a tool in the hands of foreigners."

The Persian Ambassador in London, who was in Tehran when the Russian demand was first made and was a spectator of some of the incidents that occurred there, saw Mr. Eden at the Foreign Office on the 23rd November, when the Foreign Secretary informed him of our surprise at Russian action in Persia, and of our representations to the Soviet Government on the matter. M. Taqizadeh expressed great relief at hearing of the action we had taken, and said that he would like to inform his Government that we were watching the situation closely. But though reassured by Mr. Eden's words, the Ambassador did not conceal his anxiety about the future, or his dislike of the way that Russia had behaved over the oil question.

THE FAR EAST.

Two raids by American "super-fortresses" have been carried out against Tokyo from a base in Saipan during the last week. According to the Japanese report about seventy took part in the first raid, and five were brought down; the American communiqué did not give the number sent out, but stated that two had failed to return. Brigadier-General Hansell, the Base Commander in Saipan, said that the attack had not come up to expectations so far as results were concerned, but on the whole it was profitable; too much must not be expected too soon of the big bombers. General Arnold, Commander of the 20th Air Force, was more optimistic; he said that the attack had "rocked the heart of Japan," that Tokyo's war industries had been "badly hurt," and that the "battle for Japan" had been joined.

It was also announced by the 20th Air Force that instructions had been given to bomber crews to avoid damaging the Imperial Palace, shrines or temples. This appears to indicate a decision of policy in high quarters on the question, long debated in the United States, as to what attitude should be adopted towards the Japanese Imperial dynasty. A section of opinion has urged that the Emperor should be held personally responsible for Japanese policy and atrocities and should be bracketed with Hitler as an arch-enemy, and that everything possible should be done to destroy the prestige of the monarchy and its religious cult in Japan. This school of thought has been supported from China by Sun Fo, who has contributed more than one article to the American press demanding the abolition of the Japanese monarchy—though the Chinese Government has otherwise been quite non-committal on this subject. Mr. Grew, however, the former American Ambassador to Japan, has made public, since the war began, his opinion that the monarchy might be made a factor for peace in post-war Japan, and since he has been at the head of the Far Eastern Office of the State Department his view has apparently prevailed.

With the approach of the air war to the homeland it has been possible to observe for some time an increasing concern in Japan for self-justification as regards the origins of the Pacific struggle. This propaganda campaign has now been carried a step further by a speech delivered by Kurusu, the Special Envoy to the United States in the autumn of 1941, on the 26th November, the anniversary of the delivery of the final American note to the Japanese representatives. The Japanese now call this note an ultimatum and affect to regard its date as the real beginning of the Pacific war. Kurusu alleged in his speech that Cordell Hull was anxious for a settlement, but complained to him of "the interference of a certain group which made it impossible to proceed with the negotiations as he desired." Kurusu also charged the Roosevelt Administration with repeatedly postponing the promised court-martial on the Pearl Harbour Commanders in an effort to prevent disclosures of the truth with regard to the origin of the war.

Along with this war-guilt apologetic Japanese propaganda is still trying to intensify its appeal to the sentiment for independence in Asiatic territories dependent on Britain or the United States. There is nothing further to be done in this respect for the Philippines or Burma, but a new gesture is to be made to India by the opening of formal diplomatic relations with Subhas Bose's "Provisional Government." Since the failure of the "Indo-Japanese" invasion of Manipur not much has been heard of the "march to Delhi," but Bose and his Japanese sponsors have been able to derive a certain satisfaction from the continuation of the political deadlock within India, and the purpose of the opening of diplomatic relations is probably, by giving Bose all the trappings of a fully sovereign régime, to emphasise further India's lack at present of such a status.

In China the Japanese forces (now under the supreme command of General Okamura, Field-Marshal Hata having been recalled to be Inspector-General of Military Training in Japan) have now reached the border of Kweichow and threaten an advance to Kweiyang, which would sever the only good road linking Chungking with Kunming. It is reported that General Ho Ying-chin, who has been relieved of his post of War Minister, but remains Chief of Staff, National Military Council (see last week's Summary), is to be given direct command of Chinese forces covering the approaches to Chungking. General Pai Chung-hsi, the Deputy Chief of Staff and Kwangsi military leader, who was recently sent to Kweilin to supervise Li Chai-sum and Chang Fa-kuei in the defence of that place, is now reported to have shared in their disaster and to be a fugitive in the mountains of western Kwangsi. There is no reason to suppose that the Generalissimo will have shed tears over the misfortunes of any of these generals; for himself the military situation is not catastrophic as long as the Japanese can be kept out of the Szechwan plain, which is his own "Fortress of China."

Tokyo radio has represented last week's changes in the Chungking Government as "a gesture to curry favour with the United States, clearly indicating that Chungking has lost most of her sovereignty." Chiang Kai-shek, said the Domei commentator, was dependent on American help in his "blind resistance" against Japan, and therefore had to submit to American demands; if Chiang did not abandon his anti-Japanese policy, he would have to make a second and third reconstruction of his Government, when Washington required him to admit the Communists to a share in political power. On the same day, indeed, the Communists in a broadcast from Yenan made it clear that they regarded the changes as quite inadequate; there had merely been a reshuffle of posts among members of the Kuomintang ruling clique, whereas the Communist Party demanded a coalition Government and the elimination of "all anti-democratic, defeatist and Fascist elements."

General Hurley has now been appointed American Ambassador to China in place of Mr. Gauss, who has resigned. Mr. Nelson is still in Chungking advising on the organisation of the new Chinese War Production Board, but will soon be returning to the United States. General Wedemeyer has announced at a Press conference that the Generalissimo has accepted his advice on dispositions of Chinese troops to meet the Japanese offensive. In general, there seems to have been a relaxation of tension since the recall of General Stilwell. There is still, however, a certain strain in Sino-American relations consequent on the Press outbursts which followed Stilwell's recall. The anti-Chungking blast even assumed an official character when Brooks Atkinson's violent New York Times' article was formally communicated to the Ceylon Daily News by the Office of War Information. But the Sinophiles have risen in defence of China in answer to the charges made against her, and the periodical China at War, which the Chinese News Service publishes in the United States, has been able to state Chungking's case entirely with articles and letters written by Americans. The most vocal Sinophile champion is the ex-missionary Congressman Judd of Minnesota, who, in a letter to the Union for Democratic Action dated the 20th July, denounced the "nation-wide, systematic, organised and co-ordinated propaganda campaign" against Chungking and hinted at ulterior motives for it. Judd claimed that China could not be blamed for failure to hold democratic elections in the middle of a war when even Britain, with her long parliamentary tradition, did not do so; as to the Chungking censorship, he alleged it to be no worse than that applied in the United States to news of race riots. On the Communist question he drew precedent from American history; Abraham Lincoln, he argued, had been able to co-operate with Jefferson Davis as long as he was simply a party leader, but could not do so when the latter headed a rebellion with a separate Government, army, currency and flag.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Ever since the election there have been rumours of impending changes in the Cabinet, and a week or two ago the President sarcastically thanked the press for "settling at least five posts." Speculation chiefly centred round the alleged impending resignation of Mr. Cordell Hull who has long been suffering from ill health. Various names were suggested as his possible successor, notably Mr. Byrnes, Mr. Stimson, Ambassador Winant, Mr. Stettinius, Ambassador Harriman and Mr. Grew. Speculation came to an end with the announcement by the President that Mr. Cordell Hull, who is 73, had, on the advice of his doctors, resigned from the post of Secretary of State and that his resignation had been accepted with "deep regret." His Deputy, Mr. Edward Stettinius, who is 44, has been appointed to succeed him. The President has been at great pains to point out, however, that Mr. Cordell Hull, who occupies a unique position in the esteem of his fellow-countrymen, will still continue to advise him in the field of foreign affairs. "I shall continue to pray," the President wrote to Mr. Hull, describing him as the "Father of the United Nations," "that you may preside over its first session. That is nothing to do with whether you are Secretary of State or not at the time but should go to you as the one person in all the world who has done the most to make this great plan for peace an effective fact." Mr. Hull, for his part, has spoken of the "supreme tragedy" to him personally that he finds himself unable to continue making his "full contribution to such great international undertakings as the creation of a post-war peace organisation." Lord Halifax, in expressing his own great regret at Mr. Cordell Hull's resignation, has fittingly paid tribute to Mr. Hull's "character, integrity and grasp of great issues."

Mr. Stettinius, who took part in the Dumbarton Oaks conversations, gave up his post as Lease-Lend Administrator to replace Mr. Sumner Welles as Under-Secretary of State in December 1943. His book, giving an account of the operations of Lease-Lend, has done much to clarify to his fellow-countrymen the issues involved, and he is well known and liked in this country.

It is also generally rumoured that the resignation can shortly be expected of Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labour, who, it is to be recalled, was violently attacked by Mr. Dewey in his campaign speeches. Miss Perkins is one of the original members of Mr. Roosevelt's Administration, though her position as Secretary of Labour has grown more difficult by the creation of numerous agencies dealing with various aspects of labour. Other rumours of change are concerned with the names of Mr. Hannegan, the head of the Democratic party machine, who is mentioned as the possible new Postmaster-General; and Mr. Henry Wallace who, it is rumoured, would like to become Secretary of Commerce. Mr. James Fly of the F.C.C. (Federal Communications Commission), a veteran of innumerable Washington battles, has resigned and been succeeded by Mr. Paul Porter, who was responsible for the Democratic Party's publicity. Mr. Donald Nelson, who is now in China, has been appointed personal economic representative of the President and a member of the Cabinet. This appointment was referred to by the President's critics as another instance of his "propensity to boost his official misfits." Mr. Leo T. Crowley, the Foreign Economic Administrator also asked, on the 17th November, to be relieved of his duties as Administrator. The President has replied that while he appreciated Mr. Crowley's desire to return to private industry, he could not accept his resignation. "You are doing a fine job," he wrote, "and I want you to remain at least until the elimination of Germany from the war"; to which course Mr. Crowley has now agreed.

The British White Paper on Mutual Aid and President Roosevelt's report to Congress on Lend-Lease issued at more or less the same time have created widespread interest in the United States, and the realisation of the full extent of Britain's aid to the United States has occasioned great surprise, not to say pleasure. In his report the President emphasised that in the past year reverse Lend-Lease had almost trebled the previous year's, and had been particularly heavy during preparations for the invasion of Europe. "In these six months United States forces in the British Isles received the equivalent of almost 3,851,000 ships tons of supplies from the United Kingdom, exclusive of construction materials and gasoline, compared with 2,950,000 tons in the preceding eighteen months. One-third of all the supplies and equipment currently required by United States troops in the British Isles had been provided under reverse Lend-Lease. It would have required a thousand ships to send across the Atlantic what we have received for our men from the United Kingdom," and the President pointed out that Americans had been able to use these thousand ships for carrying supplies and equipment that had to come from the United States. He gave as his opinion that the invasion of France would have had to be delayed many months without this help. Mr. Roosevelt also paid generous tribute to the supplies which had been made by other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. He took the occasion, however, to point out that, while the United States had benefited enormously from reverse Lend-Lease, they had benefited far more "and in a far larger sense, from the total fighting effort of our Allies. . . . . Neither the monetary totals of the Lend-Lease aid we supplied nor the totals of the reverse Lend-Lease aid we received are measures of the aid we have given or received in this war. That can be measured only in terms of the total contributions toward winning victory of each of the United Nations," and, he added, "there are no statistical or monetary measurements for the value of courage, skill and sacrifice in the face of death and destruction wrought by our common enemies." Finally, the President give it as his view that by this common pooling final victory had been brought many months closer than would otherwise have been possible. "Lend-Lease and reverse Lend-Lease are a system of combined war supply. They should end with the war. But the United Nations partnership must go on and must grow stronger. For the tasks of building a workable peace that will endure, we shall need all the strength that a permanent and stronger United Nations can provide in winning security from aggression, and in building economic foundations for a more prosperous world."

The President's reference to the death and destruction that had been faced by Britain led to many tributes in the press to Britain's ability to aid her Allies so much in view of the enormous hardships that she had borne at home. Several writers pointed out that, Britain's population being one-third of the United States, her per capita contribution was most impressive, and it was further noted that Britain had allowed the United States time to mobilise, a boon which could never be assessed. P.M. declared that Mr. Roosevelt had virtually eliminated the possibility of a dollar-for-dollar settlement from the Lend-Lease accounts, and also foresaw a United States lending programme to the United Nations in the immediate post-war period in order to enable them to purchase American products. The loan of a large sum to Great Britain was discussed, though several papers, such as the Journal of Commerce, welcomed the President's assurance that Lend-Lease would not be the instrument after the war.

The assassination of Lord Moyne, while it has been prominently reported in despatches, has received little newspaper comment, probably due to the fact that this event was overshadowed by the election news, but partly, no doubt, owing to a reluctance to discuss so delicate a subject. Even such pro-Zionist papers as the New York Post have condemned and deplored this atrocity. It is generally agreed that the murder constitutes "a serious blow to Zionism." One or two papers, however, while condemning the murder, have condemned also the British White Paper policy in Palestine, and the Junion Hadassah Convention, while denouncing the assassination, maintains that the British Colonial Office is partly to blame. The convention adopted a resolution praising President Roosevelt for his efforts towards establishing Palestine as the Jewish Commonwealth. Mr. Sol Bloom has said that the hearing of the Compton-White pro-Zionist Resolution in the House of Representatives has for the moment been shelved.

The press has shown great interest in the forthcoming talks between Mr. Churchill, Marshal Stalin and President Roosevelt. Earlier comment assumed that the meeting was likely to occur before the end of the year; it is now generally agreed that it is unlikely to take place before the end of January. The President, on Monday, increased the speculation on when the meeting was likely to take place by saying that he might go away on a vacation and that he might go to "almost any point" and that his plans were in a state of flux, adding without amplification that he might surprise everyone.

Among the first to join issue with the Political Action Committee of the C.I.O. was Representative Martin Dies, and his committee, who declared early in the year that he would be investigating the activities of this newly-formed committee. The investigations were still continuing at the time of the Presidential election though Mr. Dies had already announced his decision not to seek re-election, while two members of his committee, Representative Joe Starnes (Democrat) and Representative J. F. Costello (Democrat), had met with defeat in the Alabama and California primaries, largely, it is said, owing to the activities of the P.A.C. In the November election another member, Representative Busbey (Rep., Illinois), was also defeated. The committee for investigating un-American activities has met with growing criticism since its inception in 1938 (see Summary No. 160), though the vote to cover its expenditure has been passed each year with large majorities. Unless fresh funds are voted the committee will expire with the present Congress, and in view of its diminished prestige it is possible that it will not be set up again when the new Congress convenes, at least in its present form. The committee has maintained a fine reactionary fervour and has sought to prove that all its enemies are Communists. It is of interest that the American Legion Convention at Chicago in September passed a Resolution demanding a campaign against "subversive activities" and there was a call for the continuance of the Dies Committee, while the New York Journal American has maintained that a movement is under way to make the Dies Committee permanent. The Chicago Sun, however, has prophesied the demise of the Dies Committee with pleasure. According to Time, House leaders of both parties are now agreed that the committee should not be revived when its lease of life expires on the 3rd January, 1945.

LATIN AMERICA.

Since the events recorded in last week's Summary there has been less public discussion of Argentine's proposal for a meeting of American Foreign Ministers, though Uruguay is reported to have proposed that the American Foreign Ministers should discuss the Argentine case before holding a general assembly to deal with post-war problems. On the 24th November, Mr. Stettinius declared that it was not yet possible to define the attitude of the United States Government, since consultation was still in progress. He added that he had every reason to believe that all the Governments concerned would be able to state their position before the next meeting of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union on the 6th December, that the principle of free democratic discussion had been observed, and that the United States' part in this discussion had been thoroughly in accord with that principle. He declined to say whether any of the Latin American republics had proposed a place of meeting.

Meanwhile, in its actions and explanations, the Argentine régime remains as changeable as the chameleon. Apparently in an endeavour to counteract the bad impression caused by the recent army law (see Summary No. 268), the War Ministry has explained that almost half of a recent age-group called up were rejected as physically unfit. At the same time, according to an official circular of the 17th November, the Government has resolved to put into effect the highly nationalistic pensions decree of the 13th June, by which a number of British subjects are adversely affected.

In Bolivia the Minister of Defence has announced that the revolutionary movement referred to last week was crushed on the 21st November. The National Convention has, however, authorised the continuation of the state of siege. A number of executions have taken place and members of the former Peñaranda régime have been arrested.

The Chilean Government has issued an official statement on the alleged violation of Chilean territory after the revolt. This declares that a Bolivian colonel and three armed men entered the Chilean village of Caquena on the 21st November and arrested three Bolivians, while "in the course of events"

Colonel Meliton Brito (the leader of the revolt) was killed. A formal protest had been made in La Paz. Colonel Quiroga, another leader of the revolt, was found in Chilean territory. According to Bolivian sources, Meliton Brito committed suicide "while trying to avoid arrest by reaching the Chilean frontier"; but the Government subsequently delivered a note apologising for the incident and offering to return those kidnapped. President Ríos has stated that he considers the matter closed. Two Argentine journalists were arrested at the start of the revolt, and subsequently released.

The Salvadorean "Government in exile" in Guatemala has taken over the Salvadorean Legation there, and Sr. Molina has announced that it will be raised to the rank of embassy. The Guatemalan Government have not recognised Sr. Molina's Government, though they have done nothing to stand in its way. It seems certain that troops have been sent to the frontier of the two countries, which has been closed by the Salvadorean Government of Colonel Aguirre. Peru has now recognised the Guatemalan Government.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

No agreement had been reached at the time of writing on the disputed questions still under debate at the Conference which has extended over a far longer period of time than had been expected. In accordance with the wish of the United Kingdom Delegation, discussions have taken place in Committee, mainly in a joint meeting of the principal sub-committees, since it was felt that the private talks had perhaps given the impression that the interests of other States had not been sufficiently considered. In these discussions there has been a very general acceptance of the main outline of the proposals. The numbers of the Board of Directors have, however, been increased from 16 to 21, a victory of the smaller States over the votes of the United Kingdom, United States and the Dominions. The International Air Organisation (now so called instead of "Authority") is to be an advisory body to Governments and not clothed with those powers of decision which the United Kingdom Delegation had suggested. This is, of course, a concession to the point of view of the United States, and it makes agreement on the basic principles of the economic section of the Convention all the more necessary.

The United States have not only pressed the "Fifth Freedom," the right to carry passengers from one foreign country to another along the international routes (see Summary No. 268), but insisted that this traffic shall be counted in assessing the right of any country to increase its frequencies along the routes. It is possible that many advantages would accrue to the United Kingdom from such a clause, but, as Lord Swinton pointed out in a press interview, it would probably injure very severely the more limited air services of smaller countries with their immediate neighbours, particularly the European countries, since many Latin American ones are already included in the United States routes. Moreover, Lord Swinton has felt it necessary to protect the interests of those countries whose air development has been crippled by the war, by again insisting on a preliminary period of three years after the close of the war with Germany for European countries, and three years after the close of the war with Japan for Pacific countries, during which such countries shall be entitled to claim their full quotas.

Both the United States and United Kingdom delegations have tabled their proposals concerning the Five Freedoms and the frequencies, and laid them before the sub-committee. The Canadian delegation have made a proposal concerning the Fifth Freedom, which is described as a compromise between the points of view of the United Kingdom and the United States. It remains to be seen whether an agreement on all these questions can be attained.

Failure to obtain such agreement would still leave intact the technical side of the Convention which is an immense advance and will be especially important for those countries which desire to establish long-distance international air routes. Even so, it must be recognised that there is a political and strategic side to the problem, and that such great issues cannot be settled merely on commercial lines. It remains to be seen how far the United States will take this point into account in accommodating her "flying start" to the needs of the rest of the world.

In Bolivia the Minister of Defence has announced that the revolutionary movement referred to last week was crushed on the 21st November. The National Convention has, however, authorised the continuation of the state of siege. A number of executions have taken place and members of the former Peñaranda régime have been arrested.

The Chilean Government has issued an official statement on the alleged violation of Chilean territory after the revolt. This declares that a Bolivian colonel and three armed men entered the Chilean village of Caquena on the 21st November and arrested three Bolivians, while "in the course of events"

Colonel Meliton Brito (the leader of the revolt) was killed. A formal protest had been made in La Paz. Colonel Quiroga, another leader of the revolt, was found in Chilean territory. According to Bolivian sources, Meliton Brito committed suicide "while trying to avoid arrest by reaching the Chilean frontier"; but the Government subsequently delivered a note apologising for the incident and offering to return those kidnapped. President Ríos has stated that he considers the matter closed. Two Argentine journalists were arrested at the start of the revolt, and subsequently released.

The Salvadorean "Government in exile" in Guatemala has taken over the Salvadorean Legation there, and Sr. Molina has announced that it will be raised to the rank of embassy. The Guatemalan Government have not recognised Sr. Molina's Government, though they have done nothing to stand in its way. It seems certain that troops have been sent to the frontier of the two countries, which has been closed by the Salvadorean Government of Colonel Aguirre. Peru has now recognised the Guatemalan Government.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

No agreement had been reached at the time of writing on the disputed questions still under debate at the Conference which has extended over a far longer period of time than had been expected. In accordance with the wish of the United Kingdom Delegation, discussions have taken place in Committee, mainly in a joint meeting of the principal sub-committees, since it was felt that the private talks had perhaps given the impression that the interests of other States had not been sufficiently considered. In these discussions there has been a very general acceptance of the main outline of the proposals. The numbers of the Board of Directors have, however, been increased from 16 to 21, a victory of the smaller States over the votes of the United Kingdom, United States and the Dominions. The International Air Organisation (now so called instead of "Authority") is to be an advisory body to Governments and not clothed with those powers of decision which the United Kingdom Delegation had suggested. This is, of course, a concession to the point of view of the United States, and it makes agreement on the basic principles of the economic section of the Convention all the more necessary.

The United States have not only pressed the "Fifth Freedom," the right to carry passengers from one foreign country to another along the international routes (see Summary No. 268), but insisted that this traffic shall be counted in assessing the right of any country to increase its frequencies along the routes. It is possible that many advantages would accrue to the United Kingdom from such a clause, but, as Lord Swinton pointed out in a press interview, it would probably injure very severely the more limited air services of smaller countries with their immediate neighbours, particularly the European countries, since many Latin American ones are already included in the United States routes. Moreover, Lord Swinton has felt it necessary to protect the interests of those countries whose air development has been crippled by the war, by again insisting on a preliminary period of three years after the close of the war with Germany for European countries, and three years after the close of the war with Japan for Pacific countries, during which such countries shall be entitled to claim their full quotas.

Both the United States and United Kingdom delegations have tabled their proposals concerning the Five Freedoms and the frequencies, and laid them before the sub-committee. The Canadian delegation have made a proposal concerning the Fifth Freedom, which is described as a compromise between the points of view of the United Kingdom and the United States. It remains to be seen whether an agreement on all these questions can be attained.

Failure to obtain such agreement would still leave intact the technical side of the Convention which is an immense advance and will be especially important for those countries which desire to establish long-distance international air routes. Even so, it must be recognised that there is a political and strategic side to the problem, and that such great issues cannot be settled merely on commercial lines. It remains to be seen how far the United States will take this point into account in accommodating her "flying start" to the needs of the rest of the world.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

SERIOUS administrative problems have been both caused and intensified by the unprecedented series of raids on the cities of the Rhine–Ruhr area. This area has now become strategically the most important part of the Reich. Not only is it directly in the path of an Allied advance, but its contribution to Germany's fighting power on three fronts is hardly more important than the morale and capacity of its people. Signs of a crisis in administration and of a dangerous decline in morale in this area now therefore possess increased political importance.

It is clear in the first place that German propaganda has had to lift its ban on news of conditions in the western cities. Official assurances that emergency measures will be adequate to the emergency have also recently been dropped. A broadcast on the Home Service of the 26th November described "the gruesome reality of a front town", and said that recent raids eclipsed in horror "vast earthquakes, national catastrophes and the battles of the first World War." Conditions of life in a town which had experienced nearly 2,000 alerts, in which people had to keep families in huts and shelters, those in the former case visiting shelters often more than once every day, were front-line conditions, and as such could only be understood by "the fighters of Monte Cassino and Avranches." Failure to appreciate this was said to explain the friction and misunderstanding encountered by evacuees.

More explicit evidence has been forthcoming in a series of articles published by the National Zeitung, the central office of which is in Essen, although many Ruhr towns have their separate edition of the paper. This has now openly complained that Reich authorities are not doing enough for West Germany. More workers from other districts must be made available to restore public services. Foreign workers have been sent, but these are, in most cases, not skilled workers. "Reich help has, unfortunately, not yet become effective"— such a sentence strikes a new note in the German press. The same paper states in another issue that "life in the ruined Rhine and Ruhr towns is becoming increasingly difficult . . . things which are a matter of course elsewhere become a problem here: water, electricity, gas, food, communications." Conditions are expected to get worse, so much so that compensation for being bombed out will soon, according to the National Zeitung, be no longer possible.

Among specific complaints made in such articles is first of all the lack of unified control. Craters, for example, have been filled in only to be reopened for work on cables and pipes. The transport situation would seem to be desperate. On the 23rd November the paper devoted a leading article to this, asserting that Essen had long ago asked for vehicles from other parts of the Reich, and indicating some exasperation not only with neglect of its request but with the quality of goods delivered: "Past experience induces us to exhort the authorities . . . . not to send just any old rubbish. If the front were supplied with inferior material this would be considered as sabotage."

Apart from the organisation of municipal services the most intractable problems are connected with the safety of the population. Re-housing is held up (still on the evidence of the National Zeitung) by lack of materials, which causes workers to "sit about idly on the sites." The shelter situation is causing increased discontent. Shelters are inadequate and discipline is difficult to enforce: "every attack increases the demand for security in the shelters." The present habit of giving space and seating to women and children while men stay outside is, says the local paper, no longer defensible. The solution recommended is more evacuation and in this matter the Gauleiter of Essen, on the 18th November, took the step of ordering old people, invalids and mothers with children to leave the city. (According to a recent report precisely the opposite evacuation policy is pursued in localities near the present front line: women and children stay, able-bodied men are sent eastwards.) It would perhaps be going too far to call this the first case of compulsory large-scale evacuation on account of air-raids: in previous cases people have been asked and advised to leave. But from a Gauleiter the difference between a request and an order cannot be very great. Press comment on the decision suggests that there are still about 400,000 people in the city, which had a pre-war population of 670,000. Even so, it is doubtful whether transport facilities will allow the order to be carried out. So far even the bombed-out have not been able to leave without long delay. A woman with young children who requested to be sent away was told that she could not be considered as long as she had a roof over her head. A major difficulty would seem to be the provision of an adequate reception area. The paper demands more billets in country districts and suggests that the problem needs stricter handling on a Reich basis. "The Reich population must move closer together so that the lives of their Volksgenossen from the front towns can be protected. If elsewhere standards are applied which are only half as severe as those long since applied in our bombed towns, results will be obtained." The suggestion is made that experienced billeting officers from the Ruhr towns should be sent with full powers to the reception areas.

It is this same Ruhr area which is stressed by German news agencies as the main objective of the Allied armies. The public are urged to believe that the Allied penetration through Alsace is of less consequence than the fighting east of Aachen. The double threat to the Eastern front is also reported to have become easier during the past week. The O.K.W. bulletin of the 30th November spoke of the "second defensive battle" of Kurland as successfully concluded. That of the previous day had reviewed the result of six weeks' fighting in central Hungary with figures of the considerable Russian losses. Agency comment has suggested, however, that more and bigger attacks are likely in the Hungarian theatre. Leaving out the bombing of Western Germany such comment can still present a fairly bright general picture of the war. Germans are told that they will have to accept local losses on all fronts but that no far-reaching military catastrophe need be feared. Indeed, the worst is over. "Germany has overcome her Dunkirk crisis." American material is being used up at an alarming rate—907 aircraft was the official figure of November losses—while German production is rising and a more equal contest is therefore in prospect for 1945. As Semmler told home listeners on the 26th November, "if the Anglo-Americans fail to achieve a decisive victory now with their maximum concentration of men and material, how do they think to defeat us in a few months' time when our own armament potential will have considerably increased and the present proportion of strength will have changed?" Even Dittmar, on the 28th November, despite an ominous reference to the Allies probing for "a second Avranches," emphasised the value of a new supply of reserves now available. German distresses, too, form only one side of the picture; the other, diligently described by Goebbels, is that of war-weary and disunited nations who cannot wish to go on fighting Germany for ever. Canada was described on the 30th November as "on the brink of anarchy."

Recent trade telegrams throw some light on the difficulty of doing business in Germany. Stuttgart is not now in use as an airport. Goods from Hamburg are despatched abroad most directly through Berlin. Basle acts as clearing centre for goods in transit to Spain. Many German orders appear to be held up because of materials blocked in transit through Hungary.

In industry there is growing dislocation owing to the increasing difficulties of transport, of which there is much general evidence, and to the weakening of administrative control, due in part to the disruption of transport and communications. It is reported that skilled workers are being called up for the armed forces, regardless of the effects on production. The claims of the Volkssturm also conflict seriously with those of essential work, and it has been laid down as a general principle that war essential work takes precedence over Volkssturm training. The fight against absenteeism continues. A worker guilty of absenteeism can now be deprived of the supplementary rations due to him. In the mining industry, however, the monthly average of absenteeism is stated to have been reduced by more than 50 per cent. as compared with the previous year.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The restoration of order in that part of Ruthenia administered by the Czechoslovak Government Delegate continues to progress reasonably well in face of the manifest difficulties. M. Nemec reports that three industrial plants are in working order, that the harvest is assured, the state of the forests is not as bad as had at first been supposed, the postal service has been restored and men are being mobilised for military service and labour. The medical situation has not proved serious; a medical mission, comprising doctors, nurses and equipment, which is due to leave London for Ruthenia shortly, will help to meet the existing staff deficiencies. Transport remains the chief stumbling-block.

Dr. Ripka's condemnation of Wenzel Jaksch's "Democratic Sudeten Committee" on the 31st August (see Summary No. 258) was followed on the 9th November by an even more strongly worded denunciation of Jaksch in the Czechoslovak State Council by Dr. Slávík, the Minister of the Interior. It is clear that in view of the uncompromising attitude of the Czechoslovak Government Jaksch's political position is now very weak and many of his supporters among the Czechoslovak Germans abroad are wavering and falling away. Dr. Lustig-Prean, the Christian Socialist leader, now in South America and a co-signatory of the Democratic Sudeten Committee's statement of policy in August (see Summary No. 258), has now revoked his signature from that document and is seeking to collaborate with Dr. Beneš.

On the 21st November the French and Czechoslovak Governments concluded an agreement on the repatriation of French and Czechoslovak citizens. Each Government undertakes to facilitate the return to their own countries of displaced nationals of the other country who hold the necessary repatriation visa, to accept such persons on its territory with a view to their repatriation and to permit the establishment on its territory of a National Mission of the other Government which will be given facilities to visit camps, &c., in order to investigate the identity of persons to be repatriated and to issue visas and documents.

POLAND.

President Raczkiewicz, receiving the new Polish Cabinet on the 29th November, expressed his regret at the absence of any members of the Peasant Party. General Sikorski's principle that the basis for a Government in temporary exile should be the widest coalition of movements in Poland must, he declared, be his own aim and that of the new Government. M. Arciszewski, the new Premier, stated in reply that his Government would base itself on the understanding reached between the parties in the Home Country in August 1943, and on the Declaration of the Council of National Unity in Warsaw of March 1944. Its foreign policy would follow that of General Sikorski. It would aim at a lasting understanding with the U.S.S.R. in accordance with the principles of international life fixed in the Atlantic Charter. His Cabinet would work unremittingly on the expansion of the Polish armed forces. Its immediate legislative proposals would concern the electoral laws, agrarian reform and a planned economy in industry and agriculture. The first task of the Parliament to be elected in Poland would be to frame a new Constitution.

The new Prime Minister, by appointing only "acting" Ministers of Labour, Finance, Education, and Defence, has left open the door to the Peasant Party to enter his Government. There hardly seems any great prospect of such a development; the more so as the members of the other three parties who have been working with M. Mikolajczyk are conspicuously absent from the new Government, except only his persistent opponent, M. Kwapinski, and the "acting" Minister of War. The strong points in the new Cabinet are the Premier and M. Berezowski, both until recently leading members of the resistance movement in Poland.

In Lublin the reaction to the crisis has been to speak of the London émigré Government as being "in process of disintegration" and the Arciszewski Cabinet as "reactionary and Fascist." A claim that the National Liberation Committee should now become a Provisional Government has been voiced by the Trade Union Council of Lublin Province and by a popular gathering in Praga, the liberated portion of Warsaw. Resolutions are stated to have been passed to this effect at "numerous meetings of the working people of Lublin"; and the Lublin Socialist Party is said to support this demand.

The comments of Pravda and Izvestia on the crisis make it clear that, by rejecting the policy agreed upon during the Moscow talks, the London Poles have in Russian eyes lost all claim to be treated as a serious factor in the dealings of the Soviet Government with the Lublin Committee. Pravda (28th November) pointed out that there was nothing surprising in M. Mikolajczyk's failure as he had been trying to reconcile the irreconcilable, and "bridge the gap between arrant reaction and democracy." It suggests, however, that there might still be a place in Poland for him personally and his supporters by appealing to "all genuine Polish patriots" to give "honest service to the Polish people, with the Committee of National Liberation at its head." A few days later Pravda criticised the new Polish Cabinet in detail, quoting extensive extracts from the British and American press which showed that it met with disapproval also from the Anglo-Saxon Powers. The formation of the Arciszewski Government, according to Pravda, exposed fully "the whole dirty game of the Polish reactionary émigrés" and made it absolutely clear that "the Polish reactionary clique in London has decided to go over to the offensive and completely and entirely disrupt the policy which Mikolajczyk had tried to carry out." Izvestia, commenting on similar lines, maintained that the question of who led the Polish émigrés was a matter of complete indifference to the Polish nation. Meanwhile, Moscow radio (30th November) has given prominence to the reports from Lublin that a mass movement was on foot for reorganising the Polish Committee of National Liberation into a "provisional Government of democratic Poland."

On the 27th November the trial began in Lublin, before a special Polish court, of six Germans accused of participating in the murders and tortures perpetrated in the concentration camp at Maidanek (see Summary No 259). More than 1,500 persons attended the trial, and according to one report a crowd of 5,000 infuriated people tried to lynch the prisoners on their way to the court. The defending counsel raised the question of the competence of the court, on the ground that the accused were prisoners of war and should be tried by a military court. The Polish prosecutor retorted that the prisoners were "executioners in military uniform called upon to destroy the civilian population," and not soldiers in the sense of the prisoners of war convention. The court decided that it was competent to try the case. The witnesses for the prosecution included twelve survivors from the camps. After the most appalling atrocities had been revealed—one of the defendants was charged with having murdered more than 2,000 internees—five of the accused were sentenced to death by hanging, the sixth having committed suicide during the trial. The sentence has already been carried out in public.

SOVIET UNION.

The Red Army has made great progress in Czechoslovakia and Hungary during the past week, and the guns of Moscow have saluted Soviet victories no less than five times. In Slovakia there has been a steady advance westwards, including the capture of Trebisov on the 30th November. Across the border in Hungary, the town of Eger was captured by Marshal Malinovsky on the same day, followed by Sátoralja Ujhely and the important industrial centre and railway junction of Miskolc on the 3rd December. Further south it was announced on the 29th November that Marshal Tolbukhin, supported by the Danube Naval Flotilla, which has sailed up from the Black Sea, had crossed the Danube on a 90-mile front and had taken Pécs and Mohács. This important success was consolidated during the week and the breach extended northwards and westwards by the capture of Szekszárd, Dombovár, Kaposvár and Paks on the 2nd December. On the 5th December the Red Army reached Lake Balaton. Thus Budapest has been outflanked and the Soviet left flank secured: and a threat towards Vienna may be impending. "It is pretty clear to anyone with half an eye," a radio commentator declared on the 2nd December, "that Hungary will not be in the war much longer." In Yugoslavia Soviet and partisan forces occupied Kraljevo on the western Morava on the 30th November, whilst north-west of Belgrade Mitrovica was captured on the 4th December and Ilok on the 5th December.

There has been a good deal of comment on the western Allies recently, mainly friendly. An article in Krasnaya Zvyezda, broadcast in Russian on the 28th November, gave a very favourable account of the activities of the Allied air forces against Germany, a subject which does not normally receive much publicity in the U.S.S.R. Figures were given of the number of aircraft engaged, and the total tonnage dropped, together with details of new types of aircraft and bombs. Credit was given both for air collaboration with land forces and for the undermining of German war industry by bombing; and the whole was described as "a valuable contribution towards the common task of the United Nations—the defeat of Hitlerite Germany." A Moscow broadcaster in English on the first anniversary of the Tehran agreement referred to it as "Germany's diplomatic Stalingrad." He quoted Marshal Stalin's dictum that the anti-German coalition was based on "vitally important and lasting interests," and concluded: "It is just this common factor of fundamental interests that makes the successful solution of all differences possible, and which determines the common line in decisive questions relating to the organisation of victory over the common enemy."

On the 30th November, in passing through Stalingrad, General de Gaulle presented a memorial plaque to the city on behalf of the people of France. In a speech made on that occasion he said: "Stalingrad is not only a symbol of victory. It is a splendid lesson of what the Allies can do united together against detested Germany." Two days later General de Gaulle and M. Bidault arrived in Moscow, where their special train was met at the station by M. Molotov. General de Gaulle was received by Marshal Stalin for a two-hours' talk on the day of his arrival, and on the 3rd December Marshal Stalin gave a lunch to General de Gaulle and M. Bidault, at which M. Molotov, M. Mikoyan, M. Litvinov, M. Bogomolov (Soviet Ambassador to France) and other high Soviet personalities were present. On the evening of the same day General de Gaulle and M. Molotov attended a ballet at the Bolshoy Theatre, where they were greeted with prolonged applause.

Just before General de Gaulle's arrival in Moscow, on the 27th November, two officers of the Fighting French "Normandie" Squadron were awarded the highest Soviet decoration, the title Hero of the Soviet Union, accompanied by the Order of Lenin and the Gold Star Medal. Ehrenburg, commenting on this in Krasnaya Zvyezda, recalled that the "Normandie" unit, including the two officers now decorated, came to the assistance of the Red Army before Stalingrad, "while abroad they were guessing how many more weeks we should hold out." On the 26th November a Fighting French spokesman, in the course of a broadcast in French in the Soviet European Service, declared that: "It is the Rhine which must again constitute—not for five or fifteen years, but for ever—the solid barrier behind which the western European peoples will at last breathe freely." That goes a good deal further than Soviet commentators have ever done, and of course in no way commits the Soviet authorities.

Comment in the Soviet press on the crisis in Belgium has continued along the lines indicated in last week's Summary. Thus Hofman, in a review of international affairs broadcast on the 28th November, declared that "the situation which has developed in Belgium shows that certain reactionary circles in that country are trying to ignore the lawful demands of the Belgian patriots with regard to rendering harmless the fifth column. Such attempts disrupt national unity and impede the process of Belgium's rebirth." An article in Pravda of the 30th November entitled "What is happening in Belgium and Holland," stated that in Belgium "the leading posts in the Government are still held by men who were members of the Cabinet before the war and whose policy of appeasement of Germany called forth trenchant public criticism.'' The article concluded: "It is very doubtful whether reprisals against members of the anti-Hitlerite movement will enhance the prestige of either the Belgian or the Netherlands Governments. Still more doubtful is it whether such a policy will serve to further the struggle against Hitler Germany.'' Recent events connected with the Cabinet crises in Greece and Italy have been reported fully in the Soviet press, so far without comment, although The War and the Working Class has criticised the inadequacy of Allied relief measures in liberated Italy; the unfavourable exchange rate, and the alleged failure to combat the black market and to expose and punish Fascists.

Danish affairs have not been given any prominence in the Soviet press since M. Dössing took up his post as representative of Fighting Denmark in Moscow last July. This silence has now been broken by an article in The War and the Working Class of the 15th November, criticising, though with some reserve, the Danish Council in London, and contrasting it unfavourably with the Council of Freedom working inside Denmark. The writer, however, seems to be curiously misinformed both as to the composition of the London Council and its policy. He believes it to include the septuagenarian ex-Foreign Minister, M. Peter Munch, who may have been confused with a prominent supporter of the resistance movement with a similar name, though the latter is not resident in England and consequently not a member of the Council. This and similar misconceptions form the basis of a charge of "marked bias in its conception.'' The article allows that the Council is defending in its own way the interests of Denmark, but accuses it of not having sufficiently disavowed "those bankrupt cliques which led Denmark into the disastrous paths of a pro-Hitler policy," and treats it as little more than a link between two irreconcilable camps. The inclusion of the leader of the Council, M. Christmas Möller, in such an indictment is a fantastic misrepresentation of his policy, but it is fair to add that some of the charges are put in a hypothetical form and that the author of the article admits some lack of definite information. The article ends on a note of interrogation rather than denunciation, suggesting that the way still lies open for the London body to adopt a "progressive policy" of "peace, freedom and democracy" as advocated by the Freedom Council in Denmark. Shortly after the appearance of this article, Tass reported the recent arrival in the U.S.S.R. of the well-known Danish Communist and author, Martin Andersen Nexö, who was given a cordial reception in Leningrad by the Union of Writers, and announced his intention of making a tour of liberated Soviet territories to collect material for future books.

There are indications that the Soviet Government is endeavouring to direct the attention of the public to the Soviet stake on the Pacific seaboard. A 700-page novel on "Port Arthur," by A. Stepanov, extolling the patriotism of the Russian defenders of the "greatest Russian fortress on the Pacific" appeared a couple of months ago. The November issue of the magazine Smena printed a long and laudatory account of Admiral Nevelsky's operations establishing Russia's right to Sakhalin and Manchurian territory from the Amur to the borders of Korea. A recently issued Moscow postage stamp commemorates Sergei Lazo, a Bessarabian revolutionary active in Siberia in 1918–20, who was captured by the Japanese, tortured and boiled alive. Lazo has not hitherto figured prominently in Soviet annals, apart from the fact that his name was given years ago to the former village of Muraviev-Amursky, but he is associated with the bitterest memories of Japanese intervention in the Soviet Far East after the last war.

The Soviet press has briefly announced the arrival at Kobe of 2,000 tons of parcels for American prisoners of war. These parcels had been despatched from a Soviet port in accordance with a Soviet-Japanese agreement.

The latest number of The War and the Working Class contains a very strong indictment of the Chungking Government for its dictatorial policy, neglectful conduct of the war and mismanagement of internal economy. Referring to the recent reshuffle of the Chinese Cabinet, the review admitted that some of the most discredited reactionaries had been removed, but added that others working for capitulation to Japan have been appointed. The strong American dissatisfaction with the strategy of Chungking was mentioned. China was also the subject of a special article on much the same lines in Izvestiya of the 2nd December. It was stated that as long as the Kuomintang persists in its anti-democratic policy, the Communist Party and the guerrilla forces remain the only reliable guarantee against fascism in China.

A Tass message from Helsinki of the 2nd December reported that applications had been received from 60,783 Ingermanlanders who had been evacuated to Finland between March 1943 and June 1944, to return to the Soviet Union. According to Finnish sources, a total of 62,000 had entered Finland during that period. The Tass report stated that there had been 116,000 of these Ingermanlanders in the Leningrad region in 1926, and laid stress on their "painful feelings on being forcibly deported by Finnish and German troops.'' It was also asserted that Ingermanlanders who expressed a desire to return to the U.S.S.R. had been dismissed from their jobs and driven from their homes by the Finnish authorities.

The Præsidium of the Supreme Council of the U.S.S.R. has released M. I. K. Sedin from the important post of People's Commissar for the Oil Industry of the U.S.S.R. and appointed M. N. K. Baibakov, the first Deputy Vice-Commissar, as Commissar. The new Commissar, a young man of 33, was born in Baku and has been active in the oilfields of the Soviet Union since he started as an engineer in the Azerbaidjan oil industry. After a successful career in Azerbaidjan he was sent to develop the newly discovered deposits of the "Second Baku" in the Volga region. Subsequently he was appointed head of all the Soviet Eastern oil trusts and became Deputy People's Commissar in 1939. This successful oil expert was twice awarded the Order of Lenin and received the "Defence of the Caucasus" Medal for his work in connexion with the evacuation and restoration of the North Caucasian oil industry during the war.

The Moldavian Republic, which has not come into the limelight since its liberation, has now appointed M. Rud as its Commissar of Foreign Affairs, as announced by Tass on the 4th December. Nothing is known of the new Commissar except that he is presumably the same as the C. A. Rud who was elected a member of the Council of Nationalities for Moldavia in January 1941, and was appointed deputy chairman of the Moldavian Council of People's Commissars in February of that year.

SCANDINAVIA.

On the 30th November Crown Prince Olav broadcast from London a message to the Norwegian home forces. After referring to the tragic situation in the North, he issued instructions to men capable of bearing arms, telling them to evade the evacuation orders of the enemy, and to hide when forcible removal was imminent. They were to endeavour to protect buildings from destruction, extinguish fires, and in particular protect harbours and power stations. In the absence of other legal authorities they should maintain order, having chosen a leader and collected in suitable localities. Enemy patrols remaining behind to carry out destruction were to be attacked, but the moment had not yet arrived for large-scale military action. At the right moment orders would be issued from England to definite detachments to break internal lines of communication in order to drive the enemy to sea, where they would be dealt with by Allied naval and air forces. The warning against premature rising was repeated and emphasised.

A further report on the situation in Northern Norway has now been issued by the Minister of Justice, M. Terje Wold, who has returned from his visit to that country. According to this account, the Norwegian authorities now have contact with the whole Varanger peninsula, and the peninsula of Nordkyn as far as Kjöllefjord on its western coast. Of the inhabitants of Eastern Finnmark, estimated at about 23,000, between 18,000 and 21,000 have succeeded in evading the evacuation. Local authorities have begun to operate in the liberated region. On the other hand, the German destruction is described as "catastrophic," and all dwellings in East Finnmark have been more or less destroyed. The same fate has been meted out to lighthouses and beacons, and all means of transport have been either removed or destroyed, while the telephone and telegraph services have been completely cut off. There is much diphtheria, and grave danger of epidemics. M. Wold emphasises the baselessness of the German excuse for the policy adopted, pointing out that the Russian armed forces do not need houses. He speaks highly of the consideration shown by the Soviet troops to the Norwegian population.

On the 29th November, the Swedish Premier and Foreign Minister announced in the Riksdag the rejection by Germany of the Swedish offers of relief for Northern Norway, on the ground that the evacuation had already been practically completed to the south of Narvik. This statement is in violent conflict with other reports received, which allege that the vast majoriy of the evacuees, some 70,000, were, at the time in question, still either crowded in Narvik or to the north of it.

Public opinion in Sweden, as voiced in the Press, is becoming increasingly aroused by the Norwegian situation, and action ranging from diplomatic pressure to the despatch of military aid is being advocated. A typical article which appeared recently in Morgon-Tidningen, after complaining of the fact that the frontier between Sweden and Norway should be under the control of Berlin, concludes with the following passage: "If the executioners of the Norwegian people will not allow our expeditions to pass, but open fire on us, then we are not to shoot back; no, we must submit to neutrality. Or shall we not?"

The feeling against Germany has been further exacerbated by the evidence of survivors from the sinking of the Hansa (see Summary No. 269), which appears clearly to establish that a submarine, rather than a mine, was responsible for the disaster. A searchlight of the kind used by U-boats was trained on the Hansa immediately before the explosion.

Following the loss of the Hansa, escorts have now been arranged for steamers running to Sweden from the Danish island of Bornholm.

Danish saboteurs have recently devoted their attention to German transport ships designed to remove troops from Norway to Denmark. In one day eight ships were sunk or damaged in Copenhagen harbour. Sabotage in general continues, together with the usual reprisals, which have included the murder of a popular clergyman, Pastor Johannensen, on the 24th November. It is reported that Pastor Sandbech, whose life was believed to be in danger after his arrest by the Gestapo, escaped on the occasion of the air raid on Aarhus and has arrived in Sweden. The journalist Peter Gudme, described as one of the best known Danish patriots, is said to have taken his own life after arrest by the Gestapo on the 28th November.

In consequence of protests, 200 of the Danish police deported to Buchenwald in Germany are now to be returned to Denmark. (For Russian press criticism of Danish Council in London, see under "Soviet Union.")

At a meeting of the new Finnish-Russian Society in a suburb of Helsinki on the 29th November, a resolution was passed demanding the trial as war criminals of MM. Ryti, Tanner and Kivimäki.

On the 28th November the reconstruction of the Finnish Social Democratic Committee was announced. M. Tanner had stated at the Party Congress that he no longer wished to be Chairman or even a member, and the chairmanship has now been conferred on M. Hiltunen. The anti-Tanner opposition, however, is now more weakly represented than before, retaining only three seats as against six held by M. Tanner's supporters. The three Opposition members are MM. Vuori, Pekkala and Fagerholm.

M. Walden, the veteran Defence Minister of Finland, is reported to have had a stroke on the 28th November.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The situation in Belgium is definitely quieter for the moment. Most of the workers who went on strike as a protest against the Government's firm attitude towards the resistance organisations (see last Summary) have returned to work. The strikers were condemned by the leaders of both the Socialist and the Catholic trade unions. The Socialist Party has been greatly annoyed by the conduct of the Communists and is ready to support the Government, provided it introduces certain reforms. The great majority of Belgians, too, whatever their political views, are glad that M. Pierlot has not yielded to threats, but has been firm in carrying out his policy of disbanding the resistance groups; that policy, indeed, is accepted by several of those groups: the principal opposition has come from the Independent Front, which is largely under Communist control.

The Chamber undoubtedly reflected the feeling of the country when, on the 28th November, it voted for the grant of wide extraordinary powers to the Government by 116 to 12, with six abstentions. This, however, does not necessarily mean that the Government is safe for any considerable period. Unemployment and shortage of food remain causes of discontent. Opinion has yet to be convinced that those industrialists who are widely believed to have collaborated with the Germans will be duly punished. The Walloons think they are inadequately represented in the Government. M. Gutt's coming proposals for a tax on war profits will probably be distasteful to right-wing opinion and may not be sufficiently far-reaching to please left-wing opinion. It would not, therefore, be in any way surprising if fresh crises were to occur.

Meanwhile it is satisfactory to note that 25,900 members of the resistance organisations have volunteered for service in the Army. Most of these will be sent to Britain to complete their training. (See also under "France.")

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle and M. Bidault have arrived in Moscow accompanied among others by General Juin, the Chief of Staff for National Defence, M. Dejean, the newly-appointed Political Director of the Quai d'Orsay and M. Palewski. On the way the General was received in Tunis by the Bey, in Cairo by King Farouk and in Teheran by the Shah. The Paris press continues to extol Franco-Russian friendship, and to give prominence to a visit from which it expects great results. (For the General's reception in Russia and Russian press comment see under "Soviet Union.")

Allied troops continue to make headway in Alsace and Lorraine. The German bridgehead east of Strasbourg has been smashed, but the city is being shelled from the German side of the Rhine. Persistent sniping in Strasbourg caused General Leclere to give a rash warning that for every French soldier killed five German hostages would be shot. S.H.A.E.F., however, issued a declaration that the Allied Expeditionary Force was operating in conformity with the article of the Geneva Convention that forbids reprisals against prisoners of war, and a subsequent Sixth Army Group statement that General Leclerc and his men had left Strasbourg on further operations appeared to indicate that his proclamation was automatically cancelled since he had ceased to be in command in the city. Meanwhile a Foreign Office spokesman in the Wilhelmstrasse declared that the German Consulate in Geneva had been instructed to hand to the International Red Cross Committee a note denouncing the trials of "French adherents of Franco-German understanding" and the "persecution" of inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine by the French authorities and stating that they considered the Reich Government would be compelled to take "suitable measures" against the very large number of "Gaullists" in Germany. M. Pleven, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, is reported by the Paris wireless to have informed the Consultative Assembly on the 5th December that he had no official knowledge of this note, but that the Government remained unshakably resolved to mete out justice to French traitors.

Neroni and Boero, who were recently convicted by the Paris Court of Justice of complicity in the assassination of M. Mandel, were shot on the 28th November. Angéli, the former Regional Prefect of Lyons, has been condemned to death and reports of sentences of death passed on militiamen, informers and others still come daily from the provinces. Nevertheless, criticism of the slowness of the purge continue and have been voiced not only in the press and at public meetings but also in the Consultative Assembly, where the Commission for Justice has urged that "épuration" should be swift and vigorous. These criticisms have received fresh impetus from two explosions in the south of France in which several members of the F.F.I. have been killed. The Ministers of Justice and Public Health themselves went to investigate the circumstances on the spot. The more serious of the two incidents was the explosion at the Château de Timone near Pertuis in Vaucluse, as a result of which the local Liberation Committee arrested thirty-seven suspected members of the "Fifth Column" who were promptly condemned to death by an ad hoc tribunal. Fortunately the Regional Commissioner's representative was able to intervene and M. de Menthon has since stated that there have been no summary executions. Although the Communists have attributed the incidents to the "Fifth Column," others, like the Director of the Sûreté Nationale, have inclined to the view that they were part of a Communist manœuvre to force the Government to retract its decision to disarm the Civic Guard (see Summary No. 266). In a statement to the press on the 1st December, after his return to Paris, M. de Menthon said that he was inclined to think that the explosion was due to foul play, but it is clear that no proof has yet been obtained. M. de Menthon added that in order to speed up trials four additional Courts of Justice have been set up in the Marseilles region. Another measure to accelerate procedure has been the grant of authority to the Criminal Sections of Regional Courts of Appeal to hear appeals en cassation against the verdicts of Regional Courts of Justice. Hitherto all such appeals have had to be referred to the Cour de Cassation in Paris.

On the 29th November the Consultative Assembly concluded its debate on food (see last Summary) and voted a resolution demanding the liquidation of all Vichy organisations, the reorganisation of transport, a national plan for collecting food-stuffs, and the raising of agricultural prices.

On the 30th the Assembly began consideration of the supplementary budget estimates, amounting to 11 milliards, and voted those of the Ministries of the Interior, Information, Foreign Affairs, Health, Navy, Air, Merchant Navy, and Reconstruction and Town Planning. The debate on the Ministry of Information estimates was particularly lively as it followed on M. Teitgen's announcement that newsprint quotas, already small, would have to be cut by 25 per cent., and on the resulting protest from the National Federation of the Press. Speakers refused to believe that the comparatively small amount of coal needed to maintain newsprint production could not be transported, and urged that a uniform reduction of 25 per cent. would unduly penalise those papers which were most in demand. The measure has now been postponed till the 9th December pending a joint enquiry by the Federation of the Press and the Minister of Production.

The coal-mines of the Nord and Pas-de-Calais, the most important coal-fields in France, which were requisitioned at the end of September (see Summary No. 261) are now to be nationalised. On the 28th November the Government decided to create a State-controlled body, the "Houillères Nationales du Nord et Pas-de-Calais" with a director and assistant directors appointed by the Government, and a consultative committee composed of 8 representatives of the employees, 5 of the consuming industries, 9 of the State, and 2 of the former owners. The Treasury is to provide the working capital, but the undertaking will have the form of a commercial enterprise and its expenditure will not require prior Government authorisation. The methods of distributing profits between the State, the employees and welfare organisations, and of compensating the former owners will be decided later. Interest charges will provisionally continue to be paid. The press expects that the other coal-fields in France will also be nationalised.

The press reports that during their recent visit to Paris the Belgian Foreign Minister and Minister of Finance arranged for the loan to Belgium of a certain quantity of French wheat and for the exchange of Belgian coke against French iron-ore.

The Four-Party Advisory (Anglo-American-French-S.H.A.E.F. Mission) Committee in Paris has agreed to the French programme of civilian imports available for shipment by the end of June 1945, and S.H.A.E.F. have certified that it is within the anticipated capacity of French ports, and inland transport should be sufficient to handle the total tonnage involved. M. Monnet, whose task is to obtain the shipping for these supplies, gave an interview to the press on the 2nd December in which he referred to an import programme of 3½ million tons (excluding coal and oil) agreed on with the Allies, which would be met mainly from the French Empire, and which he hoped would be fulfilled before the autumn of 1945. The present lack of raw materials greatly adds to the difficulties of the French Government, and the Minister of National Economy has expressed the hope that when they again become available costs of production will fall, thus justifying the Government's present refusal to increase industrial prices, and that low-cost programmes of standardised consumer goods can be established.

M. Maurice Thorez (see Summary No. 267), who has been in Moscow since the dissolution of the Comintern, arrived in Paris from Moscow on the 27th November and spoke at a monster meeting in the Vélodrôme d'Hiver on the 30th. He urged support for the army, the need for speedy economic revival, for the intensification of the purge, and for the unity of all parties and resistance groups, but added nothing to these familiar themes.

SWITZERLAND.

The question of Russo-Swiss relations has continued to feature largely in the editorial columns of the Swiss press. While discussion, to a large extent, is based on party politics, the general attitude remains the same as before. Comment on Pravda's article dealing with Swiss deliveries of war materials to Germany has emphasised that this trade has resulted from Switzerland's isolation and her urgent need of indispensable war materials, that it has taken place with the full knowledge of the Western Allies, and that Russia itself made extensive deliveries of war materials to Germany before the outbreak of the Russo-German war. It is vehemently denied that this traffic prejudices Switzerland's neutrality, and some commentators are asking what lies behind Moscow's persistent attacks against Switzerland.

The discussions arising out of the resignation of M. Pilet-Golaz have also tended more and more to follow the lines of party political controversy. The Socialists have passed a series of resolutions condemning the foreign policy of the retiring Foreign Minister, frequently including other members of the Federal Council in the criticism. They insist that the new Foreign Minister should not be a "discredited or compromised" member of the existing Federal Council.

Socialist resolutions and demonstrations, together with the pronouncements from the Right and Centre Parties, are generally considered, however, to be partly manœuvres for position, and the opinion is widely held that a compromise will be reached which will prevent any serious political land-slide. As the successor to M. Pilet-Golaz can be chosen only by Parliament, which does not meet until the second week in December, there is still time for successful confidential party bargaining.

SPAIN.

General Franco's letter to the Duke of Alba on Anglo-Spanish relations to which reference was made last week is a document of importance. It represents the most serious attempt yet made by the Franco Government to achieve friendship with Great Britain, and its purpose is to save the Falange régime from the collapse which the Allied victory will inevitably entail. The Ambassador was instructed to transmit "faithfully and with the utmost frankness" the Caudillo's ideas on Anglo-Spanish relations to "our good friend, the British Prime Minister." And Franco's ideas, though expressed most diffusedly and in a rather bruised syntax, are simple enough.

The Prime Minister's speech of 24th May and "that other gesture of his youth when, with such generosity of spirit, he served under the Spanish flag," are for General Franco a guarantee that the anxieties created in his mind by the European crisis will be sympathetically shared in London. With lofty comprehension, the Caudillo appreciates the differences of outlook between Great Britain, enslaved by the prejudices of war, and Spain, neutrally free from belligerent passions, but now feels that the identity of interests of the two countries is assuming a more definite shape. For the great danger to Europe is Bolshevism, and the ascendancy of Russia makes understanding among the peoples of Western Europe a vital necessity. Italy and France, both suffering internal disintegration, will be incapable for many years of building anything stable upon the foundations of defeat. And with Germany destroyed, Russian power consolidated in Europe and Asia, and the United States dominant in the Atlantic and the Pacific as the mightiest nation in the world, where is England to look for support save towards Spain?

The deduction, says Franco, is clear; Britain and Spain must be friends, and the greater the destruction of Germany, the closer must that friendship be. Having established the need for this happy partnership in a world of misery and ruin, Franco gives a frank review of present relations. He has no illusions about them, for in spite of Mr. Churchill's "generous sentiments" and the goodwill (sic) of the Spanish Government, there has been no dissipation of the atmosphere of hostility in Great Britain. He complains that the British press, including "governmental organs" (he means the Times!), and the B.B.C., have not ceased attacking in rude and peevish tones Spain, the régime, "and even her Leader." He naturally attaches greater importance to this attitude when it is discernible in official representations, and when it is justified in terms of what he calls "ideological differences." Here he points the lesson with a gentle reproach that the British, who are used to getting on with all sorts of people, really have no right to turn up their noses at the Falange ideologues. A monumental platitude, worthy to be quoted, then serves as a warning: "Great Britain should not forget that the relations of the present time are an immediate consequence of those of the past, and that such relations as we may now maintain are bound to have a considerable influence on those of the future."

Next comes the instruction to his Ambassador to tell us bluntly that the Spaniards know all about the nefarious activities of our Secret Service and Propaganda Agents; even the most confidential stratagems and manœuvres have been disjointed, with the aid of Providence, by the three most vital sections of Spanish national life, the Army, the Police and the Falange "with its three million active members." These machinations are really the cause of any passing discontent which may be observed among the Spanish people; "there has been no petty intrigue nor minor disorder brought to light which has not. . . . been traced back to British agents." But, with true Spanish chivalry (the other notable example was the refusal to stab France in the back in 1940), and in order to avoid embarrassing the employers of these omniscient, omnipresent but not omnipotent agents, the Spanish Government have avoided giving publicity to their frightful misdeeds. Looking to the future, however, and generously ready to forgive and forget the past, Franco insists that, the balance of strategic power having quite changed, ancient prejudices must be thrown overboard. Spain could not, of course, "act against her convictions and take advantage of other nations' misfortunes, thus failing in the principles of honour and chivalry that have prevailed throughout her history, giving it the stamp of nobility—principles summed up in the Spanish saying 'Nobleza obliga' "—but, naturally, as regards Great Britain, "it would be only fitting that we should strive to establish closer relations for common action in the future." Spain is a friend worth having, and "history shows that it is not so difficult to win Spain's friendship and her heart"; but there must be no more jealousy, and no trace of that "old spirit of domination" which would arouse suspicion of the increasing greatness of the friend and partner" (i.e. of Spain). And, finally, if Great Britain were to pay any heed to those "bad Spaniards outside Spain who think they could effect a rapprochement by giving Britain a better deal," any such hypothetical change of régime would serve the interests of Russia alone.

The document reads like the eager, incoherent rambling of a semi-educated demagogue whose mind cannot control even the clichés which are its only currency, and it is not surprising that the Spanish Embassy in their translation should have fallen back on a gallant paraphrase. Although the move for closer relations comes from Spain, there is little outward sign of any change in the very great complacency of its author. Franco may know that without our help his chances of survival are small, but he still values himself very highly. It is an impudent message, but no impudence was intended. The physical and mental isolation of her statesmen has been one certain cause of failure in Spain's history since 1900; this Spanish statesman is no less blinkered than the others,

> ". . . . from the cheerful ways of men
> Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
> Presented with a universal blank
> Of Nature's works, to him expunged and rased,
> And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out."

ITALY.

The Government crisis continues, mainly owing to the Communist and Socialist parties refusing to join the Government unless their terms are accepted. Signor Bonomi, on the other hand, did not see his way to cede to the Communist-Socialist demands for Count Sforza as Foreign Secretary and Signors Tarchiani and Nenni as Ministers of War and the Interior. It seemed possible that some sort of a compromise as regards the above might have been reached but the demand that the "Committees of National Liberation" should be the arbiters of this political crisis could not be accepted by Signor Bonomi. Although Signor Bonomi himself does not seem to be quite clear as to what is meant by this demand, he apparently translates this proposal as an attempt to hand over some of the powers of Government to the committees, a step Signor Bonomi considers to be quite unconstitutional. There is still hope that the six original parties will make another effort to forget their political differences and combine to form a Government, but if the Communists and the Socialists remain obdurate, Signor Bonomi may have to try to form a Government without them. Although a Government formed of the remaining parties may not have a very long life, the success or otherwise of this solution would appear to depend a good deal on the attitude of the Christian Democrat party. This large party, whose leader is Signor de Gasperi, a Minister without Portfolio, has not, as yet, really made its policy clear. The fact is that it has a right and left wing but which is predominant is as yet unknown, and this may hinder Signor de Gasperi from throwing in his lot with Signor Bonomi. The last development is that all the parties, with the exception of the Socialists, seem to be willing to co-operate under Signor Bonomi but Signor Nenni refuses to accept any compromise. The chief bone of contention seems to be the position of the Committees of National Liberation in relation to the Government. Signor Bonomi, in his reply to the Communist and Socialist letter on this point, said that he interpreted their proposal as a desire that the Committees of National Liberation should have constitutional powers and also as a setting aside of Signor Bonomi's mandate from the Lieutenant of the Realm and he asked for further clarification.

This crisis has come about through the Left-wing feeling that they are entitled to stronger representation in the Government but whether there is any underlying reason why matters should have come to a head at this particular moment cannot yet be determined. A fear that the Right-wing's pro-Monarchy policy may have been gaining too much ground in a quiet way or that the Communists in the North were not as strong as had been previously thought may possibly have had something to do with it. But until it is known what the Communist-Socialist proposal regarding the "Committees of National Liberation" really means, it is difficult to guess. Signor Togliatti has apparently given way on this point but Signor Nenni has refused to compromise.

The Foreign Secretary's statement in the House of Commons regarding His Majesty's Government's attitude towards Count Sforza and towards Italy's position vis-à-vis the Allied Nations seems to have had, in general, a very salutary effect. Naturally some of the reaction is unfavourable but the more sensible shades of opinion have realised that Italy needed some sort of a lesson to bring her back to realities and have accepted Mr. Eden's statement as such. The State Department has publicly dissociated itself from what it regards as British intervention in Italian politics and many publicists in the United States have expressed themselves critically.

Mr. Alexander Kirk, the American representative on the Advisory Council, has been nominated Ambassador in Rome by President Roosevelt.

In the North, the Commission for the revision of officers' cadres in the Fascist Republican army, which was set up last August, has issued a report envisaging drastic reductions, though not, as was erroneously stated in some quarters, a total disbandment of the army. Personnel in the officer and n.c.o. categories is to be reduced by some 50 per cent.; a rigorous selection is to take place, some officers being dismissed outright and others placed on the reserve. Recruitment of officers is henceforth to be voluntary. The main reason given for these changes is that when the Fascist Republican army was set up in the autumn of 1943 many undesirable elements were included who were lacking in either technical skill or "political reliability towards fascism." The Fascist Under-Secretary for War has stated that after the "purge" the Fascist army will consist of four infantry divisions and two A.A. defence divisions, as well as 10,000 auxiliary troops fighting beside the Germans.

Both Pettinato, in the Stampa, and Farinacci, in the Regime Fascista have seized the opportunity to criticise the army, Pettinato blaming the lack of co-ordination and central authority, while Farinacci speaks of the apathy of the higher Fascist authorities with regard to the army, many units of which he describes as "entirely spineless" and lacking in discipline. This article of Farinacci's gives evidence of the continued breach between himself and the Fascist Republican leaders. Another malcontent is Renato Ricci, recently dismissed from the command of the Republican National Guard; and a third is Piero Parini, who resigned from the office of Head of Milan Province in August, and has lately written an article in the Stampa condemning the single party system.

Republican Fascist propaganda has seized with glee on the Cabinet dissensions in Liberated Italy, and likens the atmosphere in the South to that of 1919, which fascism "purified." A propos of the British intervention, the Fascist radio says it is now obvious that "Italy has become a British colony."

THE VATICAN.

When the Jews of Hungary were threatened with deportation and maltreatment, the European Division of the World Jewish Congress requested the Pope to make a public appeal, and asked Mr. Myron Taylor for his support. The Pope's reaction is an admirable example of the practical wisdom of the Vatican diplomacy and of delicate irony. He considered that a public appeal would not stop the Germans and might even make the position of the Jews worse. Besides, if he agreed to appeal for the Jews, he would have to agree to speak publicly on the Russian treatment of the Polish and Baltic peoples. Under these circumstances neither Sir D'Arcy Osborne nor Mr. Myron Taylor were inclined to press for a public appeal. Meanwhile the Pope continues to do what he can through diplomatic channels

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

As described elsewhere, the Soviet forces made further progress during the week in north-eastern Hungary, while in the south-west a spectacular advance took them up to Lake Balaton, threatening Budapest from the rear. Meanwhile refugees poured westward from Budapest and, although the fortifications of the city were hurriedly extended, the Government has already begun to evacuate the city and is said to have completed preparations for destroying installations, &c., when total military evacuation becomes necessary.

Most of the Hungarian army and population has obviously lost the will to resist. A special Field Security Police has been formed. Nevertheless, reports of desertions and sabotage increase. It seems likely that, when the time comes, the Germans will cut their losses as regards the majority of the population, but will try to salvage, with stores and machinery, such man-power as they may think reliable. Already a campaign has opened for recruitment in Hungarian S.S. Divisions, paid at the German rates. These are probably meant to serve as a Hungarian Legion after Hungary has been evacuated.

The leaders of the Hungarian National Socialist Party hase officially joined the Arrow Cross.

Roumania.

It is evident that Roumania's chances of internal peace and good order depend in a great measure upon the King, in whose opinion the best solution for the moment is a non-political Government which could hold office until it became possible to establish a party Government representative of the people. He has been considering with General Radescu, the Chief of the Staff, the composition of a new Council of Ministers. General Sanatescu's Government has resigned and General Radescu has been appointed Prime Minister. The former Ministers hold office until the details of the new Government are settled. The King is fully alive to the risk of the step he has taken, and to the possibility of Russian intervention in some form or other.

The matter of the removal of oilfield equipment without notice has now developed into a full-dress controversy between the British and Soviet authorities on the claim that the material removed was German property. The argument turns on the interpretation of certain clauses of the Armistice Agreement. The present position is that the stuff has been taken, and the decision of His Majesty's Government as to further steps to be taken is awaited. In reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 1st December, Mr. Eden stated that a claim is being made on the Soviet Government in respect of British property which has been confiscated.

The two Roumanian liners which were in Turkish hands and which have been taken over by the Soviet Government as part of the reparations payments are to begin a regular service between Odessa and Constanta this month. The request of the British authorities that one of these ships should be placed at the disposal of the British for the conveyance of troops, has been refused by the Soviet Government on the ground that their own need of transport will not permit of this.

The Ministry of Education has ordered that maps which show Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina as part of Roumania are to be suppressed, and until the issue of new school text books, passages in existing books which "contradict the Armistice clauses" are to be expunged. Russian language courses are to be arranged in elementary and secondary schools.

The Soviet authorities have refused permission for the regular R.A.F. service between Bucarest, Sofia and Athens, unless a separate permission for each flight is obtained through the M.A.F. and Moscow. The bi-weekly service has been at a standstill.

In an interview with one of the Communist groups, General Vinogradov appealed to the "workers" to liquidate factory officials whom they knew to be in sympathy with the Nazis.

Yugoslavia.

The Red Army has occupied Baranja (west of the Danube) and pushed on north and west.

In central Serbia Kraljevo has been taken. Further south the Bulgarians with partisan assistance have taken Rashka and Novi Pazar. The Germans are evidently retreating hurriedly and have only the inferior routes to Bosnia via Sjenica and Ivanjica available. On the former route they are being attacked by partisans on the Lim; near the latter partisans claim to have encircled the German garrison at Chachak.

The encircled German force in southern Montenegro is now reported to be trying to retreat northwards through the Sandjak.

Unity is being vigorously imposed in Serbia. Addressing the Yugoslav Council of National Liberation (AVNOJ) Tito alluded to political opponents, saying, "We must conquer all those who do not want the kind of Yugoslavia for which hundreds of thousands of the best sons of our land laid down their lives." And Borba, the Communist paper, writes "The Communists are the most competent to transfer their experience and . . . . spirit to the masses of the nation . . . . so that perfect unity between front and hinterland will be achieved." Among over 100 persons described as traitors and collaborationists who were recently court-martialled and executed in Belgrade were Veselinovitch and Djordjevitch, two of Neditch's Ministers, and M. and Dj. Jankovitch, former Ministers. On the other hand, about 2,000 chetniks are said to have been released under the amnesty.

The Banat is reported to have large stores of cereals, after an excellent harvest, and pigs and cattle in normal pre-war quantity. The area is being kept under partisan-military administration, and the inhabitants have been told to work regardless of hours and wages. The German minority, of both sexes, is being conscribed for forced labour. In the Banat and Bachka, where there was little fighting, the railways have suffered little; unlike Srem where the lines are much damaged. The great difficulty is the destruction of nearly all the bridges over the big rivers.

Partisan propaganda continues to ventilate the Yugoslav demand for Trieste and Istria.

Greece.

It was officially announced on the 26th November that discussions about the demobilisation of the guerrilla organisations between Generals Scobie, Zervas, and Saraphis had been begun in a very cordial spirit; at the same time there was said to be great eagerness to enlist in the new National Guard. On the 28th messages came in from Sparta, Corinth, Pyrgos, and Kalamata, saying that the call-up of the 1936 class had been completely successful in those districts; the news from Salonica was less reassuring. M. Papandreou had hoped on that day to obtain the signatures of the whole Cabinet to the demobilisation decree, a document which contained several concessions to the extreme Left and which had in fact been to a large extent drafted by the E.A.M. Ministers. According to this draft decree, E.L.A.S. and E.D.E.S. were to be disbanded on the 10th December, while military formations in the Middle East would be demobilised before returning; until the National Army was organised the Mountain Brigade and the Sacred Battalion would remain intact, while at the same time there would be formed one brigade of E.L.A.S. and a proportionate unit of E.D.E.S.; all those demobilised must hand over their arms; the Government alone had the right to raise an army; the gendarmerie would hand over its arms to the new National Guard, the E.L.A.S. National Guard would be demobilised, handing over to the new National Guard (1936 class) in some districts on the 1st, in some on the 17th, December. At the last minute the E.A.M. and Communist Ministers demanded further changes, notably that the Mountain Brigade and the Sacred Battalion be demobilised; they also wished to omit the clause by which all those who were demobilised had to hand over their arms. Meantime, recruitment for the new National Guard continued, and by the 1st December there were 10,000 of them under arms; the E.L.A.S. National Guard, however, refused to lay down their arms. With the approval of M. Papandreou, General Scobie issued a vigorous statement to the Greek people, pointing out that British troops had come to Greece for three reasons: to help to drive out the invader, to bring relief, and to help to restore the prosperity of the country; this third task depended on the restoration of public confidence and the establishment of the Government's authority throughout Greece. He stood firm behind the present constitutional Government, until the Greek State could be established with a legally armed force behind it, and until free elections could be held; until that time, he would help Greece to protect her present frontiers. Next day a statement was issued from 10, Downing Street, that General Scobie's message was issued with the knowledge and entire approval of His Majesty's Government. Meantime the Communist and E.A.M. Ministers had resigned from the Government.

On the 3rd December the Communists called a general strike in Athens and the Piræus. A mass demonstration, organised by E.A.M., which the Government had banned, ordering the city police to stop it by force if necessary, began to converge on Constitution Square. Firing occurred, and the following casualties are reported: police, one killed, three wounded; demonstrators, eleven killed, fifty-nine wounded. It has not yet been possible to fix the responsibility for this extremely unfortunate incident; reports differ as to who fired first; an enquiry has been opened by the Ministry of the Interior. It would appear that some, at least, of the crowd were armed with grenades, and it may be noted that the police have since liberation been subjected to constant provocation by the Communists. Most of the reports appearing in the British press do not give full weight to these factors and cannot, therefore, be taken at their face value.

The latest reports from Athens state that E.L.A.S. troops, well equipped with arms, are infiltrating the northern suburbs of Athens; a party of 800 entering the Athens–Piræus area have been disarmed by British troops. General Scobie has ordered all E.L.A.S. troops and police to leave the Athens–Piræus area by midnight on the 6th.

Albania.

After the capture of Tirana the F.N.C. reinforced their formations in Northern Albania, and on the 29th November they captured Scutari. Two German divisions have thus been completely isolated in Northern Albania and Southern Montenegro.

Bulgaria.

In spite of the uneasy internal situation in Bulgaria there is, and has been, no evidence that the Russian authorities have used their position to further the cause of communism. On the contrary, the indications are that they have cold-shouldered Bulgarian Left extremists, considering no doubt that Russian interest lies in maintaining the Fatherland Front Government in power so that it may continue to throw the military and other resources of Bulgaria into the fight against Germany. The Bulgarian Second Army is withdrawing from Macedonia now that area has been freed, but other Bulgarian troops are co-operating further north with those of Marshal Tito and entered Novi Pazar on the 30th November. From Government broadcasts, however, it would seem that the population are by no means entirely convinced of the need for going on fighting the Germans further to the north-west. These broadcasts condemned pacifist talk of demobilisation as virtually disarming Bulgaria at the very moment when she was regaining her international position. They warned the public that more sacrifices were necessary. They pointed out that there could be no return home before victory and no freedom short of marching to Berlin.

The Government has been taking steps to renew relations with various countries. Professor Mihalchev, who holds the chair of philosophy at Sofia University and was once Minister at Prague and later at Moscow, has been sent to be Bulgarian political representative in Russia. M. Peter Todorov, a veteran member of the Zveno group, a close friend of the Prime Minister and of Colonel Damian Velchev, and an old advocate of some sort of federation with Yugoslavia, has been made political representative with Marshal Tito. A new Minister has been appointed to Berne, and the Government hopes to establish relations with Italy.

Turkey.

The Turkish authorities seem to be finding their preoccupations somewhat diminished. In the first place, the Bulgarian armistice, when originally announced, had caused them anything but unmitigated satisfaction—for Turkish policy to-day turns upon Bulgaria as much as last century it turned on the Straits. But they have now realised that at the end of hostilities Great Britain and the United States will participate on an equal footing with Russia in the control of Bulgaria. Secondly, the Turkish authorities have at last felt able to discount the Reich so completely that last month they called off the Istanbul black-out, although the state of emergency which has existed throughout the war in that area has been prolonged for another six months. Thirdly, the economic situation seems to be getting easier for, as might be expected now that we are no longer competing in the market with the Germans, a fall in the prices of food and even clothing has been reported from Izmir.

The Turkish Government has now invited the Syrian and Lebanese Foreign Ministers to visit Angora for discussions leading to Turkish recognition of Syria and Lebanon.

Turkish newspapers were impressed by the British war effort as disclosed by the White Paper, and they paid warm tributes to Mr. Churchill on the occasion of his birthday. About the disturbances in Greece the Turkish press not unnaturally evinced a good deal of concern.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The four-day holiday ("Id al Adha"), held last week in all Moslem countries to celebrate the successful conclusion of the pilgrimage, withdrew Egyptian attention from almost everything else of interest. Even the political scene took second place, though, as is usual at feast-times, complaints were heard about the high cost of living, doubtless encouraged on this occasion by those interested in the forthcoming electoral campaign.

The Wafd has announced its decision to boycott the elections: this means of course that Ahmad Maher's coalition Government will have an overwhelming majority in the new Parliament. But it is probable that it would have won a victory in any case. More than a month ago reports from the provinces indicated general gratification at the dismissal of Nahas, even in those districts where a Wafdist majority might have been anticipated. This was no doubt due to the well-founded belief that the Wafd Government had become very corrupt, even by Egyptian standards, and had shown itself incapable of dealing with the acute problem of supplies.

What Ahmad Maher wants, however, is an absolute majority for his own Saadist Party. Whether he will succeed in this object appears open to doubt. The number of seats to be allocated to each party has been more or less settled. Fifty-five seats are allotted to the Saadists, Liberals and Makramites respectively; while the Watanists, who have been given 14, threaten to withdraw their support from the coalition unless they get 20. Fourteen seats are left to Independent candidates, while 65 are to be freely contested.

There is little further to report on the Lord Moyne case. The two Jews accused of the murder are to be tried by an Egyptian military court under the penal code, adopted when martial law was proclaimed in Egypt early in the war, which prescribes death as the punishment for a crime of this nature. As the military court is not a court-martial, the death penalty if imposed would be by hanging. Al Amin Abdallah, the Egyptian constable responsible for the apprehension of the culprits, has been awarded the British Empire Medal by The King in recognition of his courage and determination; while, as a token of their appreciation of the help rendered by the Egyptian police, His Majesty's Government are considering the offer of a substantial donation to the Egyptian Police benevolent fund.

Since the day of the crime, the murder of Lord Moyne and the consequences that may arise from it have absorbed public opinion in Palestine. Reactions naturally differ in the two communities. The Arabs for their part do not conceal their satisfaction at the blow to Zionism that, in their opinion, this latest and most flagrant example of Jewish terrorism is likely to cause; though they are also genuinely concerned at the reliance on force to gain political ends revealed of late by Jewish methods. Some surprise at the delay in taking strong counter-measures by His Majesty's Government has been caused among the Arab community, who do not fail to remember the prompt reprisals that were taken against them when Mr. Andrews was murdered by Arabs at Nazareth in 1937.

Jewish opinion, on the other hand, though at last aroused against terrorism, still tends to dwell upon the possibly disastrous consequences to Zionism rather than upon the duty of the community to stamp out the evil. It is true that since the murder of Lord Moyne there has been no cause to complain of the overt attitude of the Jewish Agency and the Vaad Leumi; but neither body has as yet shown any real proof either of the will or of the ability to regain control.

The future of Palestine is, of course, still keenly discussed by both sides, the Jews clamouring for a Jewish State, and the Arabs insisting on the full implementation of the MacDonald White Paper. No further outrages occurred in Palestine during the month of November, but a number of arrests of suspected persons has been made by the Government. The public and shameless acknowledgment by the Stern gang of its responsibility for the murder of Lord Moyne, "the arch-enemy of Jewish aspirations," is an index of the fanatical spirit that pervades the leaders of that body. (For Resolution on Palestine in the House of Representatives, see under "United States.")

The news of Sir E. Spears's recall from his post as His Majesty's Minister to the Levant States has, according to reliable reports, been unfavourably received by the Lebanese authorities, who regard this move, as do other prominent members of the local community, as due to French pressure.

The second session of the Iraqi Parliament, prorogued in June last, was opened by the Regent on the 2nd December. In his speech from the throne, in which the alliance with Great Britain was given prominence, the Regent welcomed in particular the Alexandria "protocol," the opening of diplomatic relations with Russia, and the recognition by so many countries of the Levant States' independence. Only in one short but pithy sentence did His Royal Highness refer to Palestine: "our Government has given and will give to Palestine special attention proportionate to the just rights of her Arab inhabitants." In domestic affairs, the usual promises were made of reform and development in every department of Government, including education, agriculture, medicine, aviation, &c.

The oil question is still to the fore in Persia. On the 2nd December a Bill was rushed through the Majlis providing that, under heavy penalties, no negotiations or agreement with a foreign Government or company concerning oil are to be undertaken by any Prime Minister or other member of the Persian Government. The Prime Minister and Cabinet may, however, discuss the sale of oil and the manner in which the Government should exploit its oil deposits, provided the Majlis is informed of all such conversations. This was followed on the 4th December by a vote of confidence in the Prime Minister with 72 votes in favour and only 9 against. Meanwhile, the Soviet authorities are continuing to exercise pressure in various ways, as, for instance, by ejecting persons whom they regard as hostile from the Russian occupied zone, by the tranfer of Russian funds from the Persia State Bank to the Imperial Bank of Persia, and by a demand for the suppression of five Persian newspapers that have opposed the oil concession.

Mr. Harriman, the United States Ambassador to Russia, stopped at Tehran last week on his way back to Moscow, and saw the Shah, whom he found firm but anxious. He told His Majesty that his Government had informed the Soviet Government of American concern and sympathy over the oil problem. Mr. Harriman added, however, that, in the American and presumably in the British view also, the question was one to be decided between Persia and Russia.

On the 28th November a marble plaque to commemorate the Tehran Conference was unveiled at the Soviet Embassy. The inscription on the plaque recalls the holding of the conference between the leaders of the three Great Powers, and ends with the words: "The conference adopted a declaration about joint operations in the war against Germany, and about post-war co-operation of the Three Powers, and also a declaration about Persia." The reference to the "declaration about Persia" was received by the Persians present at the ceremony with pleasure, not unmixed with scepticism. It was significant that the only member of the Persian Cabinet not invited to the ceremony was Sururi; while Fahimi could not, in any case, attend, owing to absence in Kurdistan. Both these Ministers, it will be remembered, were members of Saed's Cabinet.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 4th December it was announced that Dr. T. V. Soong had been appointed Acting-President of the Executive Yuan so that Chiang Kai-shek could devote himself entirely to the military direction of the war. On the previous day it had been announced that he had been appointed Acting Vice-President in place of Dr. H. H. Kung, who had resigned.

These changes in the Chungking Government have followed within a fortnight after those which were recorded in this Summary, No. 268. At that time Soong's only promotion was to be made a State Councillor—a position carrying no real power, though having some prestige value. Since then the Japanese advance towards Kweiyang has continued and numbers of refugees have reached Chungking spreading alarm and confusion; the Government has been seriously weakened by its inability to stop the run of military reverses and the power of the former ruling clique within the Kuomintang has been undermined. The changes made last month appeared to indicate an intention to keep ultimate power still in the same hands, though bringing some new men into the Executive Yuan Ministries; the appointment of Soong to the Yuan Presidency, however, signifies a real shift of political authority. His elevation will be generally welcomed in Britain and the United States, as Soong has a high reputation both for political judgment and for financial capacity, and there is some ground for hoping that he may be successful both in bringing about a larger measure of political unity in China and in imposing some limit on the rake's progress of Chinese monetary inflation. On the other hand, it would be unwise to expect too much of a man called to power in such an extremely difficult situation as that which now confronts China or to ignore the factors adverse to Soong. The high regard in which he is held by foreigners is in part due to the thoroughness of his "westernisation," but the very qualities which make him so well fitted for the task of administrative and fiscal reform tend to make him unpopular with politicians whose ways of thought and practice remain essentially Chinese. Moreover, as a civilian in a country where civil control over military forces is so far from being established, he cannot count on direct armed support and for this will be dependent either on Chiang Kai-shek or on the backing of some other leading general. It remains to be seen whether Chiang (who remains Head of the State and Chairman of the Supreme Defence Council and National Military Council) can now work in harness with Soong to the extent required for an effective war effort.

One result of Soong's accession to his new office is expected to be a working agreement of some kind with the Communists. It is reported that a provisional agreement has already been reached with the Chungking Government by Chou En-lai and now awaits endorsement by the Communist Party leadership in Yenan. Soong's presence at the head of the Executive Yuan should make it easier to reach a modus vivendi; he has been less antagonistic towards the Communists than Chiang himself, and it has even been rumoured—though without substantial evidence—that he has been canvassing their support for his own leadership in Chungking against his political rivals. In the present military situation it is hardly possible for the Kuomintang to refuse to relax the blockade in Shensi or to reject proposals for military co-operation against the Japanese. It should be remembered, however, that an agreement for temporary co-ordination of military action, even if covered by phrases about the Communist armies being under the authority of the National Military Council, would not solve the fundamental political problem afforded by the existence of separate Communist armed forces and civil administrative organs; an alliance between two States is not the same thing as unity within one State, and as long as Chinese Communists claims are pitched at their present level, a Chungking–Yenan "United Front" must in practice resemble the former rather than the latter.

In the background of the Kuomintang-Communist conflict there is the problem of China's relations with the U.S.S.R. Before General Wu Chung-hsun, the new Governor of Sinkiang, left Chungking to take up his post he declared that one of his chief tasks would be to try to promote friendly relations with the Soviet Union, but the Soviet press and radio made no mention of this statement. The Governor is now facing a serious situation in the province. The Kazakh tribesmen have risen in revolt in areas of Western Dzungaria close to the Soviet frontier, and a force of well-armed "White" Russians has attacked and partly captured from the Chinese garrison the important town of Ining (Kulja) in the Ili valley. These Russians belong to the community of Russian exiles who congregated in Sinkiang after the Russian civil wars of 1918–20; many of them served the Sinkiang Government as mercenary soldiers, and in 1933–34 they took a leading part in supporting Sheng Shih-tsai against the Tungan-Turki rebellion, combining for this purpose with Red Army units sent across the frontier from Soviet territory. Under Sheng's rule, Russians black-listed by his Soviet advisers found it expedient to leave Sinkiang; the rest came more and more under Soviet influence, though they were formally declared to be Chinese citizens. To-day it is no longer possible to trace a line between "White" and "Red" Russians in this area, and Chinese citizenship is apparently regarded as no bar to Russian patriotism, as the Orthodox Patriarch in Moscow recently sent a message to the emigrant Russians of Sinkiang calling on them to support Russia's "Great Patriotic War" and making no mention of China. The Special Delegate of the Foreign Affairs Ministry in Urumchi has informed His Majesty's Consul that the Russian rebels in Sinkiang had been supplied with arms from across the frontier, though he admitted he had not been able to obtain actual proof of this. No public statement on the matter has so far been made in Chungking. At a time when the Japanese are marching up the road from Liuchow to Kweiyang, Chinese in the capital are unlikely to worry much about what is happening in Kulja, but the disorder in this remote region of Central Asia may, unless quickly checked, give rise to serious complications affecting the post-war relations of the Powers in the Far East.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

President Roosevelt has announced further important changes in the senior positions in the State Department. Mr. Joseph C. Grew, who was the United States Ambassador to Tokyo at the time of Pearl Harbour, has been appointed the Under-Secretary of State. Three Assistant Secretaries have resigned, Mr. G. Howland Shaw, Mr. Breckenridge Long and Mr. Adolf Berle, who is at present head of the American delegation to the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago. Of the Assistant Secretaries appointed by Mr. Cordell Hull only one remains, Mr. Dean Acheson, who remains at his post in charge of international conferences and of relations with Congress. The new Assistant Secretaries are Mr. Will Clayton, now Administrator of Surplus War Property, who will be in charge of economic affairs, Mr. Archibald MacLeish, now Librarian of Congress, who will take charge of cultural relations and information, and Mr. Nelson A. Rockefeller, at present Co-ordinator of Inter-American Affairs, who will continue to deal with Latin America. Mr. Berle has stated that the President has already offered him another important post, but has not disclosed its nature, and the President has announced that he would shortly nominate Mr. Norman Armour, formerly Ambassador to Argentina, to another important diplomatic post abroad. The President also announced that other appointments to strengthen the State Department would be made in the near future. It is possible that this will concern two Additional Assistant Secretaries of State.

For some time reports have been current that the Anglo-American Oil Agreement would be revised before it was submitted to Congress, and Senator Connally, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a Democrat from Texas, the chief oil-producing State, has now predicted that the agreement will never be ratified. In his view it is " unfair to the American oil industry and is not necessary for the general welfare." He has also stated that he had opposed ratification ever since it was first submitted to his committee. When the agreement was announced in August, it was welcomed by Mr. Hull as an example of the type of arrangement through which international economic collaboration might be assured, and it was widely regarded as a prototype for other commodity agreements (see Summaries Nos. 254 and 256). But it has been strongly opposed by the " independent " oil producers, who have little interest in foreign oil development. The basis of this opposition is evidently a fear that the agreement will lead to Federal regulation of the domestic petroleum industry, of which it has long been apprehensive, and this fear appears to have been strengthened by the decision to submit the agreement to Congress in the form of a treaty. It is argued that ratification as a treaty might bind the United States to any interpretation that the International Oil Commission might put upon the broadly-worded provisions in the agreement. It had been hoped that a compromise satisfactory to the industry might be reached if the advisory nature of the proposed Commission could be made absolutely clear and if domestic oil policies could be specifically excluded from the agreement.

In an amended form the House of Representatives' Foreign Affairs Committee has now approved the Wright–Compton Resolution on Palestine. The Resolution urges that " the United States uses its good offices to the end that the doors of Palestine should be opened for free entry of Jews into that country and that there shall be full opportunity for colonisation so that Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic commonwealth." " I shall make every effort," said Mr. Sol Bloom, the chairman, " to see that the Bill is passed on the floor of the House during (this) session," though he pointed out that the Resolution might die in the Rules Committee unless it secured high priority to enable it to be considered before Congress adjourned on the 10th December (see last week's Summary). In the Senate Foreign Regulations Committee consideration of the analogous Resolution moved by Senators Wagner and Taft was postponed until the next meeting of the committee on the 6th December. Both these Resolutions are further evidence of the well organised Zionist pressure-groups in Washington, which a week or two ago also persuaded the A.F. of L. (American Federation of Labour) and the C.I.O. (Congress of Industrial Organisations) to pass similar pro-Zionist Resolutions.

The Annual Convention of the A.F. of L. which concluded its proceedings at New Orleans this week reaffirmed Labour's no-strike pledge " to show the world how we stand." One of the most interesting events of the Convention was an invitation by Mr. William Green, who was re-elected president for the twenty-first consecutive year, to Mr. John L. Lewis and the United Mineworkers to rejoin the A.R. of L. Mr. Green said he was willing " to resign as president, if necessary," if this would forward Labour's interests.

A statement on the second phase of Lend-Lease to the United Kingdom was issued by Mr. Crowley, the administrator of the F.E.A., Mr. Morgenthau, the the Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Stettinius, the Acting Secretary of State. Since its inception, the statement pointed out, Lend-lease aid had been made available to the United Kingdom, solely as a contribution towards winning the war, and this combined supplies arrangement would continue until the unconditional surrender of both Japan and Germany. " Lend-Lease articles have from the beginning not been available for re-export commercially. That policy will be continued without change." It was not anticipated that the British need for Lend-Lease assistance following the defeat of Germany would be much more than half of that during 1944, and to some degree Lend-Lease aid to the United Kingdom would be reduced even before the defeat of Germany. " It is now expected that some raw and semi-fabric materials, such as iron and steel, will no longer be provided by the United States under Lend-Lease." After the defeat of Germany there would be no impediment, the statement continued, to the United Kingdom's exporting articles, which were no longer supplied under Lend-Lease and which had been obtained either from United Kingdom production or purchased for cash from the United States. " It is likely, however, that both the United Kingdom and the United States will be able to reconvert part of their resources on an equitable basis to meet essential civilian needs in the period between the defeat of Germany and the defeat of Japan," and some improvement in the conditions of life in England could therefore be expected. Since Lend-Lease and reverse Lend-Lease were concerned purely with war supplies they did not affect the problem of post-war foreign trade.

Testifying before a Sub-Committee on Foreign Trade and Shipping of the House Special Committee on Post-war Economic Policy and Planning, Mr. Dean Acheson, Assistant Secretary of the Department of State, urged the removal of the ban imposed by the Johnson Act on private loans to foreign Governments in default to the United States Government. Mr. Acheson revealed that the United States Government had before it requests for loans from several foreign Governments and he believed that the Export-Import Bank would be a most useful instrument to promote international trade and to counteract economic dislocations arising from the war. He announced that the United States shortly proposed to seek an understanding with leading trading nations in order to effect substantial reductions of all kinds of barriers to trade, such as the elimination of discriminatory treatment, the elimination of quotas, embargoes and prohibitions against exports and imports, reduction of import tariffs and the creation of an international trade organisation to study international trade problems and to recommend practical solutions.

The serious shortage of certain critical items of war production has led to the postponement of the plans for the reconversion of industry for civilian purposes. Authorisations which were granted to 126 cities to begin such schemes have been suspended for 90 days owing to the acute labour shortage. Further stress on the seriousness of the situation was given by General Somervell who commands the United States Army Service Forces. General Somervell appealed both to management and labour to recapture the sense of urgency and not to become over-engrossed in post-war planning. " The plain truth is," said the General, " that our requirements are becoming larger as more and more troops have become engaged, and the actual expenditures of these troops have been greater than was anticipated. The rest of the answer lies in the drift away from the production of essential industries of thousands of men and women." The President has appealed to everyone in a war job to stick to it, and it is understood that Mr. Krug, the chairman of the War Production Board, is considering the possibility of advocating bonuses to war workers who remain in their posts and who do not leave to seek permanent civilian employment.

An indication of the opposition which is likely to greet attempts to introduce some form of post-war military conscription in the United States can be seen from the resolution of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America that consideration of such legislation should be deferred until after the war. LATIN AMERICA.

The proposed meeting of American Foreign Ministers to consider the case of Argentina still remains in abeyance, and though the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union meets this week, it is possible that it will not have sufficient information at its disposal to take this proposal a stage further.

In reply to an enquiry addressed to His Majesty's Government by the United States Embassy in London on the limitation of Argentine exports and imports, His Majesty's Government have explained in a note of the 1st December that, while they entirely appreciate the importance attached to an early solution of the problems presented by the present Argentine régime, and are at all times anxious to assist the United States Government to the full extent of their powers and situation, their capacity to help in economic ways is nevertheless limited by severely practical considerations.

In Argentina itself broadcasting-stations have apparently been permitted to report that the Anglo-Argentine negotiations for the renewal of the meat contract are "still in a state of deadlock." A new civilian Minister of Agriculture has been appointed, Dr. Ricardo Riguera: and apparently to give support to Colonel Perón, who is said to have had difficulties with local military leaders, the whole Argentine Cabinet has been engaged in military junketings at the aviation school in Córdoba.

The incident between Bolivia and Chile (see Summary No. 268) has now blown over, the Chileans accepting the fiction that Colonel Meliton Brito (said to have been killed on Chilean soil) committed suicide, and the Bolivians returning prisoners captured in Chile. The situation in Bolivia is reported to be calm. But a brother of Dr. Carlos Salinas (who was Foreign Minister in General Peñaranda's Government and is reported to be among those Bolivians recently executed) has, from the security of Chile, described the present state of affairs as a reign of terror.

In Chile a statement of the National Executive Committee of the Radical Party criticising President Ríos appears to presage a definite break between the President and his party, and therefore a split in the party itself.

The Guatemalan Government, having hitherto supported the claims of Dr. Arévalo, a former Opposition leader till recently living in exile, as candidate for the presidency, now appears to be reconsidering its views. In a recent decree it has declared that the fundamental principles of the revolution were the abolition of presidential re-election (recognising the right of rebellion in cases of infringements), the replacement of presidential designates by a Vice-President, the reorganisation of the army "purging it of politicians and protecting it from them" and obligatory suffrage for all literate citizens. It announced that the present junta would remain in office until the 15th March, and that a new Constitution would be prepared by the 5th March.

The Salvadorean Government of Colonel Aguirre has taken over the property of all members of the exile Government of Sr. Molina set up in Guatemala. The Guatemalan radio has stated that Sr. Molina's Government "should be considered as the legitimate Government by all freedom-loving Central Americans." Other reports predict a meeting of the various exiled candidates for the Presidency of El Salvador. A shooting affray which occurred in the streets of San Salvador on the 30th November suggests that further trouble lies ahead.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

In spite of the efforts of the Canadian Delegation to find a formula, which both the United Kingdom and United States Delegations could accept, and of exhortations by Mayor La Guardia and others, it has been found impossible to come to complete agreement on the matters under discussion at Chicago. As the Conference proceeded it became clear that there was a fundamental difference between the present point of view of the United States and that of the members of the British Commonwealth and some other countries. In presenting its plan for regulation by an International Air Authority the United Kingdom had in mind the successful working of the Civil Aeronautics Act (1938) of the United States. It had there been found that, in order to avoid excessive competition, some regulation of routes and frequencies were necessary, and the result had been much to the advantage of the travelling public. It was considered that if such regulation was necessary in the domestic field over an area as large as the United States, it would be still more indispensable in the interests of the public in all countries now that world-wide aviation was under consideration. But the United States Delegation, after making some attempt to find a formula that would meet its own views, abandoned the idea of international regulation of routes and frequencies. It considered that these would be best determined by the ordinary method of commercial competition which would thus supply the travelling public with the services it desired according to the law of supply and demand.

There was thus no possibility of compromise. The United Kingdom Delegation, indeed, came to recognise in the course of the discussions that it was difficult, if not impossible, to draw up regulations which applied equally well to the whole world. The small Latin American States, for example, were in a very different position to the highly industrialised European States. It suggested, therefore, that only the general principles should be laid down in the Convention and that it should be left to the International Authority to apply them to suit the needs of each area. The United States, however, could not accept this suggestion and it gradually began to insist on the disadvantages of all regulation except that purely technical.

The final stages, therefore, necessarily revolved mainly about the grant of the five freedoms. Without the first four of these there can be no international flying at all. But the granting of these freedoms is for some States the only bargaining weapon which they possess if the international aviation authority has no power to regulate routes in the interests of all States. There has consequently been a good deal of discussion as to the place where the grant of these freedoms should be made. It was at one time suggested that they should be placed in the main Convention to which States which wished to retain control over them would have had to make reservation. At the time of writing, however, it seems that the grant of the freedoms will be reserved to separate Conventions.

It would thus seem likely that there will come into existence an international organisation for technical matters, a comprehensive convention regulating these, and other agreements concerning the freedoms. Full details of these last have not yet been received.

The rest of the complicated process of establishing international air routes and services must in such circumstances be made by bilateral or multilateral agreements which may involve many countries. That, for example, issued during the Conference between the United States and Spain envisages air lines which necessitate the consent of France. The immediate negotiation of such agreements is obviously very difficult for countries that have for over four years been deprived by the war of all possibility of developing their own civil aviation. The new organisation will at any rate provide a centre where these problems can be discussed and it may be hoped that in the course of time some general principles of regulation will be found that are acceptable to all parties.

GERMANY.

FOR some weeks now the subject of Hitler's death (cf. Summary No. 267) has been denied all publicity in Germany. Ley on the 18th November ridiculed extravagant rumours. No spokesman was appointed to deny that the Führer was ill. He would appear now to have recovered. He received last week several diplomats and with Szalasi of Hungary he is reported to have given close consideration to "all questions concerning political, military and economic collaboration between Germany and the Hungarian nation"—no small programme for a sick man. He has decorated a U-boat commander and congratulated a Field-Marshal. Goebbels' deputy Naumann stated on the 4th December, the date of the political talks, that Hitler was in excellent health and was acting "with the utmost optimism and energy."

It is not far-fetched to assume that the talks on Hungary—and in particular Szalasi's visit, which was not announced in the first accounts of Hitler's activities on the 4th—were prompted and informed by the now almost circular threat to Budapest. Although German propaganda has minimised the threat to the city and claimed (on the 9th) that the latest Russian attack has been "completely transformed within the past 24 hours by our counter-attacks," it has said enough to indicate considerable concern. The O.K.W.'s bulletin of Friday last (8th) reported "fighting of great ferocity along the whole Hungarian battle front," and made it clear that Russian forces were now both to the north and to the south of the city. An agency message on the following day said that Budapest had been isolated and must be considered as "a strongly fortified bridgehead." A decision in this area, said the message, could be expected soon, and to counteract the effect of such news, much space was given to the "slowing down" of the western Allied offensive against the Reich.

In the official communiqué concerning the diplomatic talks with the Hungarians no indication of German policy is allowed to emerge. One may assume, in view of the impending fall of Budapest, that "political collaboration" at the moment is very much subordinate to military and economic. The Germans are chiefly concerned with the problem of defending Austria, since the Russians are already on the edge of the plain which extends to Vienna. The loss of the largest railway centre in South Eastern Europe will mean increased difficulties of supply and transport, and judging from Hungarian reports, Hitler has done his best to ensure the despatch to Germany of everything in the way of stocks, plant and workers that can be got out of Hungary in time (see further under "Hungary").

Ribbentrop's spokesman in the Wilhelmstrasse has had a good time this week in dealing with Allied policy. Neither he nor writers in the press found much difficulty in showing that de Gaulle's visit to Moscow fitted in to the German doctrine of the war, as did the British quarrel with Sforza and the outbreak of civil war in Greece. Such things were bound to happen, and to increase, said German comment. All such events, wrote Halfeld, "confirm the old German argument that the German armed forces stand as the guardians of peace and order between a Communist revolution and the continuity of European civilisation." Mr. Churchill's statement, said Dr. Schmidt in the course of a long comment, showed that the British Government had no single policy for Europe but was reduced to dealing with each country as if it were in a vacuum.

Meanwhile Goebbels has been concerned with the more difficult task of propaganda to discontented sections of his own people. His broadcast on the 8th had to admit that the enemy now raids the Reich from the air as and when he likes. All he could say on this point was that Germany's leaders were "working with fanatical zeal" to increase the enemy scale of losses. But he had stern words for the restive elements in the west, of whose complaints an account was given in last week's Summary. He insisted that the war must be waged as a whole, even though that seemed to ask too much of the homeless. Yet even they could hardly say that they had nothing more to lose. They had themselves; they had a national community which both stood by them now and guaranteed the rebuilding of their cities after the war, and finally they had the inestimable freedom of the Fatherland.

A very different note was sounded this week by the chiefs of the German Ministry of Transport, speaking on the occasion of Railwaymen's Day (7th December). Dorpmüller, in a broadcast, pictured the daily destruction of traffic arteries and "vital installations." Ganzenmüller, at the actual ceremony, after praising the achievement of organisation which had allowed German forces to retreat in good order and with negligible losses in rolling stock, attempted a defence of improvisation which, together with repair, was now the chief preoccupation of German transport. Improvisation did not mean inefficiency, but the discovery of ways and means of travel in spite of the dangers which threatened every journey. Those who travelled without urgent cause were told that they were saboteurs as much as any who lived comfortably at the community's expense. Speer, who followed Ganzenmüller, was more resolute than Goebbels had been regarding the German reply to attack from the air. Final victory, he said, depended on an increased war effort at home and this in its turn on relative immunity from direct attack. In order to secure this immunity, "we must and will sweep the German skies clear again." Speer further impressed upon the railwaymen that in their hands lay one prerequisite of German victory. This may correspond to a real anxiety on the part of the Nazi leaders that the strain of daily bombing is too great for the German railwayman. He is, according to a report so far unconfirmed, becoming restive and reluctant to work. There are as yet no signs, though there seems to be considerable fear, of a strike on the railways.

The most recent evidence of the German transport crisis comes from the now immediately threatened area of Austria. Delays in passenger traffic are said to be so great that many trains have for this reason to be taken off altogether. The express from Vienna to Budapest takes over twenty hours to do the journey. A troop train recently stood for days on end in Vienna until an engine could be found. Men returning from leave to Italy were delayed a week for lack of carriages.

From West Germany there is evidence that the risks to which transport of all kinds is now exposed are a factor in discouraging evacuation. A press article deplores the shocking rumours which spread in Oberhausen concerning the fate of an evacuation train not heard of for many days. Similar reluctance to leave home is reported from the Saar, where the Gauleiter of Westmark has recently ordered a preliminary "thinning out of the population" in order to ease military operations. "Women not at work, children and old people" must depart when ordered to do so by the local Party leaders. Working women with children stay unless they can be replaced at work. Men in the Volkssturm (i.e., between 16 and 60) must stay and are not allowed even to escort their families. Still further south, in Baden, people have been warned to expect similar measures and to resist all inducements to panic. In Austria, Blaschke has had to deny rumours of a quarrel between himself and Schirach as to whether Vienna should be declared an open city.

Now that the first phase of publicity regarding the Volkssturm is over, certain features of organisation are becoming clearer. The awkward question of exemptions has naturally not been given much publicity. An announcement in early November suggested that not only were members of defence and security forces exempt (Army, police, O.T., S.D., &c.) but also an unspecified category of those who could present at enrolment centres a red "postponement" card. As this is at the disposal of the Party offices, it may be that certain Party officials are exempt from training. There is some evidence too of a struggle regarding members of Party formations. It was at first announced that such people would not form separate units within the Volkssturm, but a recent order by a Leipzig Kreisleiter states that Party formations will be incorporated intact. It is further reported that both Himmler and Bormann have issued training manuals dealing with questions of leadership. The Völkischer Beobachter recently revealed that such questions are provoking "candid discussions," and warned the public that the leader principle is not invalidated by the shortage of leaders and the resulting "conflict between theory and practice." The article suggests that leaders have aroused criticism by their corruption as well as by their inefficiency.

A Women's Auxiliary Corps has this week been formed in Germany, launched by a broadcast from the Reich Women's Leader on the 9th December. Frau Scholtz Klink called upon German women "for military help to the nation." The new idea, as she explained it, was not "to create female soldiers indistinguishable from men" but to concentrate within a single corps all existing women's organisations serving the armed forces. There was no question, said a later statement, of sending women to the front. The aim was to release more men for front line service. A large-scale recruiting campaign was promised, to be carried out by Party authorities. The Corps itself is to be regarded as part of the Armed Forces, to be staffed and led by women, and to be placed under the supreme administrative control of Goebbels, Bormann and Keitel.

Reports from Reich territory recently occupied by the Allies indicate that the German authorities are evacuating the populations of the towns from which they must retreat. Forward areas east of Aachen and north of Metz have been discovered to be uninhabited. The Germans would seem reluctant to leave numbers of their own people as they did at Aachen. Whether in fact they can prevent this will only become clear when they again evacuate a town of some size. Such a policy implies a drastic reversal of the military tradition (which they have so far observed throughout the war) of keeping civilians off transport routes. In Mulhouse the local banks were found with records intact and personnel present. The offices and securities and personnel of the Reichsbank had, however, been systematically withdrawn, entailing a total of unrealised claims (by other banks against the Reichsbank) estimated as high as ten million marks. German propaganda has now started to give publicity to the punishment of German collaborators. A forces broadcast of the 8th reported that a label attached to the corpse of an Aachen merchant warned all traitors to mark his fate.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The Russian advance in north-west Hungary has taken them to within 30 miles of Zvolen and less than 100 miles from Bratislava; in eastern Slovakia the Red Army is within striking distance of Košice; and in the interior of the country resistance continues. In these circumstances a conference of Hlinka Guard Commanders was held at Bratislava on the 7th and 8th December, at which the President, the Premier, the Minister of Defence and the German Commander in Slovakia were present. No details have been released beyond the statement that reports on the situation in the various parts of the country were heard and directives issued which would "completely clear Slovakia of the armed saboteur bands." Tiso made a speech on the usual lines pledging the Slovaks to remain loyal to Germany, and other speakers expressed their confidence in ultimate victory.

In London the Czechoslovak Government is drawing lessons from the experiences of other liberated countries. On the 7th December Dr. Ripka broadcast an appeal to his countrymen for a firm national front for the tasks after liberation, repeating the pledge that "all who have been given the honour of keeping the flag of the Republic flying in the free Allied world abroad will regard our mission and our work as having ended the moment President Beneš . . . . shall appoint a new Government on the liberated territory of the Republic." On the previous day M. V. Nosek, a Communist Vice-President of the State Council, had equally emphatically indicated that the administration of Czechoslovakia in the transition period would rest with the people at home. After surveying the preparatory decrees passed or planned by the present Government, he added that "the laws proclaimed on the liberated territory of Slovakia by the Slovak National Council also represent a valuable contribution to our preparatory legislation." The State Council, he said, would be dissolved the moment a Government was set up in Czechoslovakia, so that no member of that Council would return as such, but as an ordinary citizen of the Czechoslovak Republic. Speaking of the difficulties of reconstituting the apparatus of public administration, M. Nosek declared that it was "absolutely certain" that "in Ruthenia the officials will be Ruthenians, in Slovakia they will be Slovaks and in the Czech lands Czechs. All three peoples will share in the central administration of the Republic."

A group of twenty-four Czechoslovak technicians is now in Tehran ready to go to Ruthenia to assist in the repair of communications there.

POLAND.

The Polish Prime Minister, M. Arciszewski, broadcast an address to Poland on the 7th December, in which he repeated much of his statement of the 29th November, referred to in the last Summary. He affirmed not only that the basis of his Government was the agreement of "the four parties," but that even the Peasant Party "supported" it. It is true that the underground government representatives in German-occupied Poland include a member representative of the Peasant Party, but there has been little time for the new London Polish Cabinet to get in touch with its Homeland, and both the Peasant Party in London and other members of the late Government continue to hope for a return to power of a government in London that would support M. Mikolajczyk's policy of striving for agreement with the U.S.S.R. and for political unity in Poland. Meantime the strength of the Nationalist Party in the Arciszewski Cabinet has been increased by the addition of two under-secretaries belonging to the party's right wing, and by the support of "Polonia," a large Polish society of Nationalist sympathies in the United States.

In the Polish liberated provinces the agitation for recognition of the Lublin Liberation Committee as a Provisional Government continues to grow, and to find echo in the press and over the radio in Moscow. A full-dress reception has been given by the Moscow City authorities to a delegation of Polish Intellectuals from Lublin. Land distribution has made rapid progress; it is said to be "nearly complete" in Bialystok province, and "quite complete" in that of Rzeszow (i.e., Lwow west of the Curzon Line). In the latter case it is stated that 254 estates, comprising 125,000 acres in all, have been parcelled out. Support will thus, presumably, be won for the Committee among the beneficiaries, who seem to be in the main existing smallholders and landless peasants. M. Jedrychowski, acting representative of the Committee in Moscow, took a recent opportunity to make a statement welcoming the Franco-Soviet Treaty and to draw a parallel between the French and Polish Liberation Committees, as also between the French General Assembly and the National Homeland Council in Lublin.

It is reported that the Liberation Committee is already arranging for transfer of Poles from Nowogrodek province and Grodno to places west of the Curzon Line; and that 644 Ukrainians from places west of that line have already arrived in Odessa.

SOVIET UNION.

Despite bad weather and heavy mud, the Red Army's advance in Hungary has continued. On the 9th December an Order of the Day announced that Marshal Malinovsky had broken through to a depth of 40 miles on an 80-mile front north of Budapest. Balassa Gyarmat, Nógrád and Vác were captured, the Danube being reached at the latter town. The same Order of the Day announced that Marshal Malinovsky's troops had crossed the Danube south of Budapest and joined up with Marshal Tolbukhin's troops near Lake Velenczei, south-west of Budapest. On the 10th December Soviet troops took Ipolyság and were reported 6 miles north of Budapest. The fall of the city appears imminent. Marshal Tolbukhin has now cleared the area between Lake Balaton and the Danube, and is advancing up the Drava. Barcs was captured on the 7th December. On the latter date it was announced that the southern end of Lake Balaton was completely cleared of the enemy. In Yugoslavia the Red Army and the partisans continued to advance between the Danube and the Save; Sid was captured on the 6th December.

In view of the approach of the Red Army to the Austrian frontier, it is perhaps worth recording that The War and the Working Class has stated its opinion that "there is no demand for the Habsburgs in Europe." "Plans of Otto and his 'court' do not conform to the decisions of the Moscow Conference for the restoration of an independent, democratic Austria."

On the 10th December Tass issued a Soviet-French communiqué on the sojourn in Moscow of General de Gaulle and M. Bidault. It declared that their conversations with Marshal Stalin and M. Molotov "dealt with a set of problems relative to the continuation of the war and the organisation of peace, and especially to the German problem. These conversations revealed the existence of a broad concord of views between the two Governments, as well as the most sincere basis for close collaboration. The two Governments again confirmed their decision to conduct hostilities until complete victory over Germany, and their will to take jointly all appropriate measures to safeguard Europe against fresh aggression. In the spirit of these decisions . . . . the two Governments have signed a treaty of alliance and mutual assistance," the text of which has not yet been published.

The previous day Marshal Stalin gave a dinner at the Kremlin in honour of General de Gaulle and M. Bidault, and on the 10th December General de Gaulle presented high French decorations to Marshal of Aviation Falaleyev and other Red Army officers. On the 10th December General de Gaulle and M. Bidault left Moscow. In a commentary on international affairs broadcast on the 5th December M. Yermashev took credit for the fact that "it was on the initiative of the Soviet Union that France was invited to participate as an equal member in the work of the European Advisory Commission." (See also under "France.")

In response to a query from a correspondent, The War and the Working Class has endeavoured to explain why the American Federation of Labour has refused to take part in the International Trade Union Conference (see Summary No. 261). The writer asserted that the A. F. of L. "does not seek friendly collaboration with the Congress of Industrial Organisation or the establishment of unity in the American trade union movement," and went on argue that the A. F. of L.'s support of the "virtually non-existent Amsterdam International reflects a striving towards a split rather than unity" in the international trade union movement. A desire for unity, on the other hand, was growing among the American workers. The A. F. of L.'s argument that the Soviet trade unions were not free and were more interested in political and economic problems than in trade union matters was dismissed as "nothing but an excuse." The writer concluded: "The unwillingness of the A. F. of L. leadership to co-operate with other trade union organisations, not only the Soviet, in the solution of vital problems relating to the life struggle of the working class, this manifestation of trade union isolationism should be regarded as an indication of great stagnation and profound reaction."

It was reported on the 5th December in the Swedish press that the Swedish Government had agreed to allow representatives of the Soviet Legation in Stockholm, accompanied by an official of the Swedish Foreign Office, to visit Baltic refugee camps in Sweden. The refugees, who are all regarded by the Russians as Soviet citizens since the incorporation of the Baltic States in 1940, were to be informed that they could return home without any risk of punishment. Some of them are stated (by Swedish sources) already to have expressed a wish to return to the U.S.S.R. The number of Baltic refugees in Sweden, apart from Estonian Swedes, is put by the paper at 24,000, the great majority being Estonians.

It was announced on the 11th December that diplomatic relations had been established between the U.S.S.R. and Chile, at a meeting between the Ambassadors of the two countries in Washington. There have been no diplomatic relations between the U.S.S.R. and Chile since 1917.

On the 7th December it was announced that M. N. M. Lifanov had been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the U.S.S.R. to Australia, in succession to M. Vlasov, who was recalled to Moscow in August. M. Lifanov is a Far Eastern expert, having been head of a Soviet trade delegation in China from 1931 to 1934 and head of the First Far Eastern Department of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs since 1938.

For Marshal Stalin's insistence to M. Shubashitch that Yugoslavia must on no account try revolutionary experiments or ape the Soviet régime, but must have free elections, see under Yugoslavia. This line of Soviet policy tallies exactly with the damping down of the Bulgarian Communists by Dimitrov on the occasion of the recent visit of the Bulgarian delegation to Moscow (see Summary No. 262).

With the appointment of M. P. I. Rotomskis as People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Lithuanian S.S.R., the list of Foreign Commissars of the Union Republics is now complete. Nothing further is at present known of M. Rotomskis, who was not a member of the 1940 Lithuanian Soviet Administration.

The three years' struggle for the defence of Soviet northern lines of communication has been commemorated by the institution of a medal "For the Defence of the Soviet Arctic." The event was marked by several press articles, including one by Admiral Golovko, the Commander of the Northern Fleet. Tribute was paid to the bravery and success of the Soviet fleet in opposing German plans for the blockade of the port of Murmansk and for the capture of a long stretch of the Soviet Arctic regional. Impressive figures were cited in regard to the work of the Northern Fleet in destroying German submarines and other craft, thus enabling the convoys to reach port. The only reference made to the British and Allied convoys was indirect and meagre.

The Moscow Soviet has adopted a project for the construction of a pipeline from Saratov to Moscow which will supply the city with natural gas. Its construction is to be completed, under the auspices of the State Committee for Defence, by December 1945. It is estimated that the project will increase Moscow's gas supply five-fold. Despite the heavy capital expenditure, it is claimed that "the gas brought to Moscow over 800 kilometres will be twice as cheap as Moscow coal, one and a half times as cheap as oil and more than twice as cheap as timber fuel." The pipeline will cross 90 rivers, five lakes, thirteen roads and thirteen railways.

(See also under "Middle East.")

SCANDINAVIA

On the 6th December, Independence Day was celebrated in Finland under poingnantly ironical conditions. The occasion was marked by a broadcast from the new Premier, M. Paasikivi, in which he wisely made no attempt to minimise the gloomy prospects of the situation. He laid great stress on the necessity for friendly relations with the Soviet Union, which he said were "a prerequisite for a free and independent Finland." He also emphasised the close cultural and economic ties existing between Finland and the Scandinavian countries, especially Sweden, going so far as to say that the Finnish constitution and outlook were a heritage from the close connection with Sweden which had lasted for over 700 years. He held out hopes that economic conditions, which at first would be extremely hard, would begin to improve from 1947, though economic freedom would only be reached with the payment of the last instalment of reparations in 1950.

Addressing a Press Conference at the Ministry of Information on the 8th December, M. Terje Wold, the Norwegian Minister of Justice, gave his impressions of his recent visit to Northern Norway in terms which he has since substantially repeated in a letter to The Times (12th December). He was clearly even more perturbed by the possibilities inherent in further German withdrawals, accompanied by systematic devastation, than by what had already occurred in Finmark, though he drew a harrowing picture of the situation there. He said that the one question everywhere asked was—"Can anything be done to stop this?" and indicated his personal view that the only effective remedy would be to cut off the German troops from the sea. He developed this point further in reply to questions, and though disclaiming military qualifications, expressed the fervent hope, which he attributed to every Norwegian, that the successful prosecution of the war would not exclude the rescue of Norway from the total destruction facing her, if the Germans conducted their evacuation according to plan.

M. Wold's remarks, interpreted as an appeal for naval and military operations, have been extensively discussed in the Swedish press which, however, mostly points out that they can hardly be expected to alter the strategic plans of the Allies. On the other hand, Aftonbladet asks what may be the psychological effect on the future if the British and Americans withhold assistance while the Russians are courting popularity.

A Home Front instruction under about twenty heads, said to have been issued locally on the 4th December, was broadcast to the Norwegian people from London on Sunday, the 10th December. It does not, however, add substantially to directives previously issued, but is presumably intended to keep them in mind by means of a fresh formulation.

A prominent enemy of Norwegian patriots, Police Inspector Reidar Vogt, was shot on the 6th December in Oslo, with a machine gun officially stated to have been of British manufacture. A similar liquidation was reported on the 8th December, the victim being Police Commissioner Wickström of Stavanger.

Some significant figures are now available to show the diminution of Swedish trade with Germany during the present year. This trade is to cease altogether from the beginning of 1945, but has already dropped to a very large extent. The 1944 figure for exports of ball-bearings to Germany is barely one-sixth of that for the previous year, though the grave deficiency thus incurred by the Reich seems to have stimulated considerable ingenuity in circumventing the embargo by smuggling and indirect purchase. The shortage has been increased by a useful piece of sabotage in Norway which destroyed the store of the Swedish company, S.K.F., in Oslo. Shipments of Swedish iron to the enemy in October this year amounted to less than one-tenth of the corresponding figure for 1943, and the export to Germany of this commodity for the first ten months of 1944 was reduced to about a half of that for the same period in the previous year.

As a sequel to the proceedings instituted by the Swedish paper Dagsposten against the Commander-in-Chief, General Jung, in respect of his allegation that it had received foreign financial support, it is now announced that a prosecution is to be started against the responsible managers of this paper, which is charged, on the basis of secret police investigations, with receiving German support from 1941 and, in particular, 3,000 Reichsmarks monthly during the past six months. Large anonymous gifts of a highly suspicious character are also alleged in a communiqué on the subject broadcast on the 7th December.

LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 4th the Dutch Prime Minister talked to a press conference at Eindhoven. The present Government, he said, would resign as soon as the Netherlands were entirely free. He was inclined to think that the Queen would not entrust the formation of the new Cabinet to a member of the present Government. After the liberation, too, a new Parliament would be chosen "by means which are not yet decided." That Parliament would remain in being until an election could be held. The resistance movement must have a say in its formation. The Prime Minister added that the whole spirit of the Dutch had changed and that he was not sure that the old parties would revive.

On the 4th M. Spaak made a long speech on foreign policy to the Belgian Chamber. Belgium would continue to fight by the side of her Allies until Japan, as well as Germany had been defeated. She was aware of the debt she owed to the United States, and could not disinterest herself from the war in the Pacific. M. Spaak then alluded to the economic agreements between Belgium and the Netherlands and declared himself in favour of new links—political, economic and military—between the two countries. But friendship with the Netherlands alone would not give Belgium unity and prosperity. A strong France was indispensable for the welfare of the world, and specially of Western Europe. Close co-operation between the Low Countries and France was highly desirable. Belgium, however, would never forget what she owed to Britain; friendship with Britain was an essential and constant element of her foreign policy.

M. Spaak then paid a tribute to the Red Army and affirmed that a close accord between the great Allies was necessary for the maintenance of a desirable peace. Belgium hoped the terms imposed on Germany would be hard. He was not in favour of the artificial dismemberment of Germany, but if Germany should disintegrate and Western Germany should become separated from the other parts, then Belgium would have to modify her foreign policy and assert her rights.

Finally, M. Spaak explained that he envisaged the future international organisation as a three-storied edifice. The top story was collective security; the second, a European alliance, and the first, regional agreements. The function of a regional group would be to act as a local organ for carrying out a policy of collective security.

Certain changes have been made in the Belgian Cabinet in consequence of the resignation of three Ministers on the 16th November (see Summary No. 268). M. van Acker, the Socialist Minister of Labour, has also taken over the Ministry of Health, vacated by the resignation of the Communist Dr. M. Marteaux; M. Kronacker, a Liberal Senator, has become Minister without Portfolio; the latter appointment, however, is said to be due to M. Kronacker's special qualifications, and not to his political affiliations; his main duty will be to co-ordinate negotiations regarding imports and shipping space; in fact, he will spend most of his time in Britain or in the United States, where he will virtually act as Minister of Supplies.

FRANCE.

The announcement of the signature of a Franco-Soviet pact has caused lively satisfaction in France. In a motion expressing its pleasure at this return to the traditional policy of friendship with Russia, the Conseil National de la Résistance also hoped that analogous treaties might be signed with "the other Allies." According to the Figaro of the 9th December the French Government and French opinion expected any agreements reached in Moscow to give France substantial guarantees as to her eastern frontier; the French programme was thought to include the exploitation of the Saar by way of compensation for destruction on French soil, the neutralisation of the Ruhr and the creation of a Rheno-Westphalian State.

General de Gaulle's absence in Moscow has made people realise the extent to which all decisions on domestic and foreign policy ultimately rest with him. The importance of strong leadership in France has, moreover, been emphasised by the disturbances in other countries. These have in general caused both surprise and regret in the French press together with self-congratulation on France's more fortunate lot. It is widely recognised that General de Gaulle's disappearance from the scene would spell political chaos.

"In order to remove any possibility of ambiguity," a communiqué in the press of the 5th December explained that General Leclerc's threat to shoot civilian hostages (see last Summary) referred to "the tens of thousands of German civilians, officials, farmers, members of the Nazi party and 'cultural' elements" who were still in Alsace, and who had been sent there since 1940 to nazify the country and to replace genuine Alsatians who had been deported.

In his statement about the German menace of reprisals for executions in France of collaborators mentioned in the last Summary, M. Pleven declared that the Government would continue as hitherto rigorously to apply the rules of international law to German prisoners of war and civilians interned in France. He also said that its unshakable resolve to see that justice was done to French collaborators of course applied to General Dentz who had been mentioned by name in the German note. An inspired comment by the Agence Française de Presse, published on the 5th December, said that the German note was regarded by authoritative quarters as a piece of gross impudence and that if the German threat were carried out the French Government would reply appropriately.

In the course of the debate on the budget of the Ministry of Justice in the Consultative Assembly on the 5th December, several speakers expressed the wish that épuration should be more speedy and efficient. In his reply M. de Menthon mentioned that 210 magistrates had been suspended, three-quarters of them presidents of provincial courts, and that the number of indictments in the Paris region had risen from 8 to 4,250 between the 3rd September and the 4th December. The Assembly, however, was not satisfied with the Minister's explanations and marked its displeasure by a token reduction of 100 francs in the credits voted for his Ministry. Figures of sentences in the Lyons region since the 19th August were given by Radio Lyons on the 8th December: they included 101 sentences of death and 16 of imprisonment or hard labour, 38 administrative internments, 30 house internments and 17 sentences of exile from France. The condemnation to death of Angeli (see last Summary) evoked some comment in the press, including a protest from M. d'Ormesson in the Figaro of the 7th December. He declared that such a harsh sentence was quite unjust since there was no evidence that Angeli had committed any treasonable act. The President of the Court had conducted the trial irreproachably, but the jury had committed a grave error in wishing "frapper symboliquement une fonction" by an excessively rigorous sentence. It has since been announced that the sentence has been quashed by the Lyons Court of Appeal on account of errors in procedure. All but two of the twelve members of the French Gestapo, known as "the gang of the Rue Lauriston," who have been on trial before the Paris Court of Justice, have been condemned to death.

Continuing its discussion of the supplementary budget estimates, the Consultative Assembly had a debate on agriculture on the 7th December. The Minister, M. Tanguy-Prigent, stated that 40,000 agricultural holdings had been ruined owing to the war and 100,000 hectares mined. As a preliminary measure loans were being made at a low rate of interest to those farmers who had suffered. While the Government could not envisage raising retail prices and the reduction of wholesale margins was difficult, it intended to help certain producers by means of subsidies. In an earlier speech at Limoges M. Tanguy-Prigent had warned the peasants that the old customs-barriers could not be retained and that they must therefore modernise and cheapen production. The peasants have also been urged in a broadcast appeal by M. Mendès-France, to deliver the full quotas of produce fixed for them at the controlled prices and through the regular channels. He warned them that selling on the black market would result in a fall in the valuo of the currency and hamper their future purchases of tools and equipment.

The Minister of Transport, M. Mayer, reported to the Cabinet on the 5th December that an agreement had been reached with the Allied authorities about the use of the French Mediterranean ports; this would allow the French considerable dock space for the unloading of colonial produce. Negotiations were also going on in Washington for the hire of a number of Liberty ships.

The most recent political Congress to be held in Paris has been that of the Mouvement Républicain Populaire (M.R.P.), the Resistance Movement which was founded by the Catholic Left and is now apparently to replace the old Parti Démocrate Populaire and the Jeune République party. It is represented in the Government by Mm. Bidault, de Menthon and Teitgen. The Congress, which took place on the 25th and 26th November, resolved to form a "revolutionary" political party which should unite "all those who wish for the fruitful reconciliation of the tradition of the Rights of Man with Christian thought." It declared its readiness to co-operate with other parties for the establishment of an economic and social democracy, and the Press has been full of discussions of a possible alliance between the Socialists and the Catholic Left. This Congress was followed on the 3rd and 4th December by that of the Confédération des Travailleurs Chrétiens (C.F.T.C.) which is closely linked with the M.R.P.; it resolved to continue its friendly co-operation with the far larger Confédération Générale du Travail but to preserve its separate existence.

The Socialist suggestion of a joint Committee to discuss eventual fusion (see Summary No. 267) was accepted by the Communists, and after negotiation a permanent Comité d'Entente has been set up to which each party has appointed ten leading representatives.

SPAIN.

Lord Templewood returned to Madrid last week for a farewell visit. He saw General Franco to take formal leave on the 12th December, and is now back in London. It has just been announced that the United States Ambassador, Dr. Carlton Hayes, has also resigned, and is to be replaced by Mr. Norman Armour, the former United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires. In an interview on the 4th December His Majesty's Ambassador once more detailed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs the grounds for British dissatisfaction with the Spanish Government's behaviour, with special reference to the continued toleration of German agents. One nefarious practice of theirs mentioned by the Ambassador, which the Government has failed effectively to check, is the circulation of counterfeit British bank-notes. Señor Lequerica remained undisturbed by this tale of grievances, presumably in the mistaken conviction that, after the recent U.P. interview (see Summary No. 268), American sympathy for the Franco régime can be counted upon, and because, he claimed, Mr. Churchill had, in his speech last May, given the Government a clean bill of health. He was left in no doubt that this was a flagrant misinterpretation of the Prime Minister's attitude; Mr. Churchill himself, incidentally, in the Commons' Debate of the 8th December on the Greek situation, seized an opportunity of denying that he had spoken "praising words" about Franco. His Majesty's Ambassador concluded with a warning that the Falangist dictatorship, for very good reasons, was anathema outside Spain and had left the country in a position of dangerous isolation.

Pertinent evidence of the régime's black record, and British opinion of it, was forthcoming in a recent leader-page article of The Times (2nd December). This sober indictment is reported to have made a great impression on Spanish public opinion—which clings to the idea that The Times is a Governmental organ. (Not a word of the article, of course, was published in the Spanish press. But the B.B.C.'s Spanish Service had broadcast it in extenso, and His Majesty's Embassy had taken steps for a limited circulation of the text among friendly Spaniards.) Together with a series of articles by Mr. Vernon Bartlett after a visit to Spain, it establishes clearly that the principal (and indeed a very effective) reason for the survival of the Franco-Falangist régime is the nation-wide fear of another civil war. Señor Madariaga, too, has come out with an Open Letter to the General, which has been published in the Spectator—and is also no doubt circulating in Spanish America. It effectively demolishes every claim to the goodwill of the Democracies made by General Franco in his U.P. interview, points out that all the vital forces in Spain are opposed to the régime, and adjures him to perform now the patriotic act of taking himself off before the present phase of Spanish history ends in a catastrophic crash. Now, though so well-known outside Spain, Señor Madariaga is a prophet without honour in his own country. But, at any rate, this sally from an essentially middle-of-the-road Spaniard should dispel any illusions that Franco can turn away wrath by dressing up the Falange wolf as a sheep.

It will, of course, require more than reiterated statements about Franco's unpopularity at home and abroad to shake the almost mystical self-confidence of the Peer Gynt of El Pardo. And, certainly, Paris rumours of General Franco stepping down and making way for Señor Maura and a Government of reconciliation need not be taken seriously. "Don Miguel" is a sympathetic figure who has powerful friends among the Spanish bourgeoisie, and also commands esteem among the "Reds" for his unwavering loyalty to the Republic; he might, at a later date, fulfil a useful rôle in bridging the chasm between the malcontents inside Spain and the émigrés. But the Falange, and their Caudillo, have still plenty of fight in them. What does bear watching now is the behaviour of Franco's henchmen and, particularly, the Army leaders, whose attitude will be the decisive factor. His Majesty's Military Attaché was somewhat surprised when recently the Chief of Staff of the Army, General Garcia Valiño, asked specially for an interview with him, and after hearing of the intense dislike felt abroad for Franco and the Falange, intimated that the generals felt much the same way and would see to their removal from power in the near future. Now, one swallow does not make a summer, and Spanish generals are, we know, volatile as mercury. But the importance of this approach lies in the personality and position of General Valiño, an ambitious man who has hitherto been convinced of a German victory and has had no truck with other would-be contumacious generals.

The effect of the recent Allied successes on the Falange leaders has been two-fold, as it was in the panic days after the fall of Mussolini. Some are bound hell for leather for the Allied camp and seem to care little whether the Leader and the Party's principles go by the board in the scamper. The unconditional Party members, on the other hand, have restarted, especially in the provinces, their swashbuckling and terrorist activities, publishing the most militant leaflets designed to scare their opponents of all shades of opinion.

His Majesty's Ambassador confirms the reports of a marked increase in the number of political executions—and the Spanish "Gestapo" elements in the Ministry of War, still under German influence, have recently made a large number of arrests, most of the victims being Republicans and not Communists.

ITALY.

After a fortnight spent in conferences and the interchange of letters in an attempt to reconcile the six parties, Signor Bonomi has at last succeeded in forming a Government of four of the original six parties, namely the Communists, Christian Democrats, Labour Democrats and the Liberals. The Socialist and Action parties refused to compromise on the question of whether the Government should secure its mandate from the Lieutenant of the Realm or from the Committee of National Liberation. Signor Nenni, the leader of the Socialist Party, although he had as a member of the Committee of National Liberation made the same promise as the Cabinet to accept the constitutional prerogatives of the Lieutenant of the Realm until the "Institutional question" could be settled by a Constituent Assembly, insisted that Signor Bonomi should have handed his resignation to the Committee of National Liberation and not to the Lieutenant of the Realm. Further, Signor Nenni wished the solution of the Government crisis to be left to the Committees of National Liberation, to which Signor Bonomi could not agree, but as the implications of this step were not clear, Signor Bonomi asked for clarification. Whether Signor Bonomi has received any clarification of what was intended by this demand is not known, but it might be construed as an attempt to form an armed force capable of helping whichever party it favoured to seize power.

The present Government, which has formally acknowledged all the undertakings to the United Nations entered into by its predecessors, is made up as follows:—

President of the Council and Minister of the Interior: Signor Bonomi (Independent).
Vice-Presidents of the Council: Togliatti (Communist); Rodinò (Christian Democrat).
Minister without Portfolio: Brosio (Liberal).
Foreign Affairs: De Gasperi (Christian Democrat).
Justice: Tupini (Christian Democrat).
Education: Arangio-Ruiz (Liberal).
Finance: Pesenti (Communist).
Treasury: Soleri (Liberal).
Public Works: Ruini (Labour Democrat).
Industry, Commerce and Labour: Gronchi (Christian Democrat).
Agriculture: Gullo (Communist).
Posts and Telegraphs: Cevelotto (Labour Democrat).
Railways: Cerabona (Labour Democrat).
Aviation: Scialoja (Labour Democrat).
Navy: De Courten (Independent).
War: Casati (Liberal).
Occupied Italy: Scoccimaro (Communist).

The last is a new Ministry formed to help with economic and patriot problems in the North. There is also the possibility of another new Ministry being formed to help repatriates.

As can be seen from the above, all the Ministers, with the exception of Signors Brosio and Cevelotto, who are newcomers, have held office either under Signor Bonomi or under Marshal Badoglio.

Signor Brosio is believed to have succeeded Count Carandini as leader of the Liberal Party, while Signor Cevelotto is the Secretary-General of the Labour Democrat Party.

The idea of making two Vice-Presidents of the Council is a new departure, but has been done to satisfy the Left with a more prominent position in the Government. The appointment of Signor Togliatti as one of the Vice-Presidents is, however, balanced by the appointment of Signor Rodinò, a Christian Democrat and a man of some political experience.

What effect Signor Nenni's refusal to co-operate will have on the Communist-Socialist alliance remains to be seen. There has been a suggestion that Signor Nenni would be better occupied as editor of Avanti, and that another party leader should be chosen. Signor Togliatti probably has no wish to see the end of this alliance because although the actual strengths of the two parties in the North is not accurately known, there is probably not a great deal of difference so that a split at the moment might be disastrous. Signor Togliatti may, however, wish for a more amenable Socialist leader in order to achieve more practical co-operation. Meantime Signor Nenni is attending the Labour Party Conference which is being held in London this week.

The Prime Minister made His Majesty's Government's position clear as regards Count Sforza's nomination as Foreign Minister. Mr. Churchill said there had never been any question of a veto. If the Italian Government wished to appoint Count Sforza they were at liberty to do so, but the appointment of a man with a record of intrigues against both Marshal Badoglio's and Signor Bonomi's Governments, despite his explicit promises to the contrary, would make close co-operation between the Allies and the Italian Government extremely difficult. Count Sforza is not in Signor Bonomi's present Government, and he has also resigned the office of High Commissioner of the Purge.

Count Sforza has now issued a not very convincing denial of any intrigue against Marshal Badoglio. He appears to wish to blame Marshal Badoglio for not carrying out his promises to concentrate on the liberation of Italy and the casting-out of Fascism, but does not explain why, if these were his complaints, he did not make them public at the time.

The Government crisis in the South has provided the North with some useful propaganda material, and comparisons have been drawn between the disagreements of the South and the Republic of the North which "even in a state of so-called tyranny manages to exist with sufficient order." Farinacci has seized the opportunity to point the moral against Pettinato's and Parini's recent articles attacking the single-party system; while Ezio Mario Gray, in the Gazzetta del Popolo, writes of the "bankrupt balance-sheet of British foreign policy." Another article in the same paper deals with the two "nerve-centres of disagreement between the Anglo-Americans and the Soviets"—Greece and Poland.

The Committee of National Liberation in the North has issued an order of the day deprecating the dissensions in the Italian Government and expressing the view that only a Government formed by a nominee of the Central Committee of National Liberation could have valid authority.

Food, fuel and transport difficulties in the Milan district appear to be acute. Many trains have been cancelled on the lines radiating from Milan, and two new Italian army divisions recruited from German camps are said to be arriving in Italy only with the greatest difficulty, according to a Swiss report, owing to serious road and rail interruptions on the Brenner route.

News of partisan sabotage activities continues to appear, and though stern mopping-up operations are said to be going on in the Cuneo and Como districts, the partisans seem to be checking the Germans and Fascists in the Val Tellina and clearing the Val Malenco of Republicans. The Fascists have incorporated the "defaulters, rebels and bandits" who reported as a result of the amnesty in an auxiliary battalion which is to be used as a Civil Defence force.

There have been several changes among the local Podestà. The new nominees, in accordance with the Duce's recent policy, are drawn largely from the workers' organisations.

THE VATICAN.

Since France was freed, the conduct of the French Hierarchy under Vichy and the Germans has been widely criticised. With notable exceptions it has been considered weak and acquiescent, and in some cases unpatriotic. French Catholics have regretfully contrasted the supineness of their own Bishops with the courage of the German Bishops in face of Hitler. Demands have been heard that the Pope should make a purge. There is ample precedent for the Pope transferring Bishops whom political changes have made politically unwanted; but the initiative should come from the Government, and the latest Vatican information suggests that in this matter the Pope will not take the first step. Rumours of impending papal action increased after the 6th November when the French Cardinal Tisserant—the only non-Italian Cardinal in the Curia—reached Paris.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Soviet advances reported elsewhere have three parts encircled Budapest and have made the city's remaining communications with the west precarious, as well as endangering its water supply. On the 11th December the Hungarian General commanding the area advised the civilian population, in their own interests, to leave.

Most of the Ministries have already gone; they appear to be scattered throughout western Hungary. Actually, although the Germans have been prophesying that the situation would change with the arrival from the Balkans of the much-heralded Weichs Army, a meeting which took place on the 4th December between Hitler and Szálasi, Kemény and Beregffy apparently decided on the complete evacuation of Hungary. On their return, the Hungarian ministers announced that Germany was going to take in "temporarily" the Hungarian army, with its appurtenances, the war industries, and the workers in them, together with the families of the soldiers and workers transferred. The transfer is, apparently, to be compulsory for all elements which Germany could use either as cannon-fodder or as slaves: these are men of military age, who are to form the army of the future, and more of whom have been called up, or invited to volunteer, skilled workers and all members of the Arrow Cross and the German minority; and, of course, the existing army, fighting as it retreats. A new Hungarian army is to be trained and equipped in Germany (this process has already begun) in special formations which are, according to plan, eventually to be led back to the Carpathians in a victorious counter-offensive. All available stocks and supplies, both industrial and agricultural, are being evacuated; Beregffy stated that most of the industry had already gone.

It is difficult to say how far these orders are being obeyed or, indeed, how far any attempt is being made to apply them to unreliable elements or to useless mouths. Probably these are being deliberately left behind, although it is reported that some Jewish workers are to make the move when Eastern Hungary was evacuated, only the armed forces, police, national guard and some civil servants were ordered to leave. Priests were ordered to stay. The rest of the population seems to have been allowed its choice. There are reports of a mass flight of bourgeoisie and Right Radicals, but among the workers, probably many will evade the order and in the army itself desertion is now widespread; both desertion to the Soviets and simple disappearance.

Meanwhile the Szálasi Government is exacting the oath of allegiance from all civil servants, including teachers (Cardinal Serédi's instruction to Catholic school-teachers to comply is now confirmed) and army officers. From the latter he is said to be encountering opposition, towards which, however, he and the Germans are proceeding ruthlessly.

A military court has passed sentences on a number of high officers for having participated, during October and November, in an anti-Nyilás and pro-Allied "liberation movement." Three officers have already been executed. The leaders of the movement were two well-known Smallholder Deputies, E. Bacjcy-Zsilinsky and Z. Toldy. The latter has escaped, but the former is under arrest, and Parliament has been "asked" to suspend his immunity in order that he may be brought before the court. The court also passed sentence of death in absentia on the Hungarian diplomats abroad (comprising practically the entire corps still serving at the time) who refused obedience to Szálasi.

A German-Hungarian court of summary jurisdiction has been set up in Budapest to deal with sabotage, incitement, contact with the enemy, &c.

Roumania.

The political situation in Roumania is a little puzzling to observers at a distance, but those on the spot appear to regard the position as satisfactory and hopeful. The change of Government is much more a change of direction than of personnel. The former Premier, General Sanatescu changes places with the Chief of the Army Staff, General Radescu, who becomes Prime Minister. The Minister of the Interior, Dl. Pennescu, who has been vigorously attacked from some quarters for his slackness in carrying out the "purge" of the pro-Nazi elements, is left out, and his place is taken by the new Premier, who combines the Ministry of the Interior with the premiership. The rest of the Council of Ministers remains unchanged. The King has contrived to call the bluff of the Communists. His Majesty and General Radescu had all ready a council composed of "technicians," and was prepared to set up this form of Government if the Communists refused to co-operate with General Radescu.

M. Vyshinsky has returned to Moscow after a very cordial send-off. He expressed approval of the new Government. Hopes were held out—it is impossible to say more at the moment—that outstanding questions between the British, American and Soviet sections of the Control Commission would be satisfactorily settled.

Roumanian citizenship has been restored to Dr. Tilea, formerly Roumanian Minister to St. James', and to members of his staff. They were deprived of citizenship in 1940 when they decided not to return to Roumania when the Roumanian Legation in London was closed. Their property, which had been confiscated, has also been restored.

Yugoslavia.

North of the Save the partisans, with Russian support, have advanced into Slavonia. A German force retreating from Zvornik, on the Drina, broke through northwards to Bijeljina in Bosnia, but another was repulsed from Tuzla. Further south the two German forces on their lines of escape from the Ibar valley are now respectively west of Chachak and around Sjenica in the Sandjak. The latter force detached troops to assist the escape of the group encircled in Montenegro, and fierce fighting is reported around Bijelopolje.

In western Yugoslavia the partisans have captured Knin and thus appear now to control the whole of Dalmatia. In Slovenia they have succeeded in keeping the main railway line Ljubljana–Zidani Most (Steinbruck) unusable.

A statement by the partisan officer in charge of river shipping gives a melancholy picture. Of 1,819 craft operating before the war, 1,292 were removed by the enemy. Allied and enemy mines in the rivers made navigation difficult. And for the salvage of sunk craft only one small crane was available.

The economic condition of most of Croatia, with the complete break-down of transport and the flight of much of the population, appears to be much more serious than that of most of Serbia. That Pavelitch has himself assumed command of the Croat armed forces can hardly encourage his supporters.

A new scheme of taxation, to be administered with the assistance of the local partisan committees, has been announced at Belgrade.

Dr. Shubashitch arrived back in Belgrade on the 4th December and was in London on the 9th. In Belgrade he professed himself encouraged by his visit to Moscow. Marshal Stalin, he said, there emphasised the need of true democracy in Yugoslavia and deprecated Communist experiments; he also said that the partisans ought to hold " proper elections " instead of elections by acclamation as hitherto and ought not to " cook up congresses " as they had done.

The shipment of Allied relief to western Yugoslavia is still held up by the unwillingness of the partisan authorities to accept the principles of impartiality in its distribution and of the presence of Allied observers.

Greece.

Speaking on the Amendment to the Address on the 8th December, Mr. Churchill pointed out that M. Papandreou had gathered into his Government no less than six E.A.M. representatives. M. Papandreou himself was a man of the Left, a democrat and a Socialist; he had trusted his E.A.M. Ministers, but meantime E.L.A.S., many of whom had devoted far more time to attacking Zervas' guerrillas than to fighting the Germans, were planning to descend on Athens and seize power by armed force; a number of Germans who had been left behind were fighting in their ranks. Faced with this prospect, the Greek Government, including the E.A.M. Ministers, had tried to arrange for general disarmament, to be followed by the creation of a National Army. Meantime, British experts were toiling to save the drachma and British ships were landing stores at the Piræus. The British had entered Greece with American and Russian consent, and at the invitation of a Government in which all parties were represented. His Majesty's Government had felt obliged to do what it could to help Greece, rather than abandon Athens to anarchy and misery. Democracy could not stand upon a violent seizure of power by unrepresentative men. When E.L.A.S. began to move on Athens, he had directed General Scobie to use whatever force was necessary to drive them out. He had also urged His Majesty's Ambassador to do his utmost to prevail upon M. Papandreou to remain in power. He would persist in his policy of clearing the rebels out of Athens.

Speaking on the same occasion, Mr. Eden said that the Greek people must be enabled to express its will through the ballot box, not the bomb. The present Greek Government was not a Right-wing Government; its members were Republicans. The differences that had arisen were not a quarrel between Royalists and Republicans. When he, Mr. Eden, was in Athens, leading members of the Communist party had assured him that they approved the Greek Government's policy. The E.A.M. Ministers themselves had drawn up the demobilisation decree, which provided that, in addition to the Greek regular troops, one brigade of E.L.A.S. and a smaller number of E.D.E.S. were to remain under arms; at the last moment they had demanded the demobilisation of the regular troops. The Greek guerrilla leaders had agreed to serve under General Scobie, and E.L.A.S.'s action was a breach of this agreement. His Majesty's Ambassador had striven most loyally and truly to carry out his instructions.

E.A.M./E.L.A.S. are in complete control throughout Thrace and Macedonia, and have carried out large-scale arrests in Salonica, where a general strike continued until noon on Saturday. In Salonica E.L.A.S. have not initiated any hostilities against the British. In Athens the situation has deteriorated during the last week. The general strike continues, and unloading at the Piræus has stopped; food can be distributed only with considerable difficulty and danger. There has been constant shooting and sniping by E.L.A.S. in the Athens–Piræus area, and British troops have been attacked. They are gradually clearing E.L.A.S. out of the centre of Athens, but many of the rebels are in civilian clothes and can easily infiltrate again into cleared areas; regular Greek units are clearing the eastern suburbs. Meantime, further guerrilla forces are reported to be arriving outside Athens. Reinforcements are being sent to General Scobie; Field-Marshal Alexander and Mr. Macmillan arrived in Athens on Monday. On that day M. Porphyrogenis, the former Minister of Labour, was at his own request received by General Scobie; he stated that he represented the E.A.M. Committee, who were directing E.L.A.S. General Scobie made it clear to him that E.L.A.S. must obey his orders, as troops placed under his command by the Caserta agreement; these orders had been, and still were, that E.L.A.S. must evacuate Attica. All E.L.A.S. supporters in Athens and the Piræus must hand over their arms; the number of these supporters was known and, unless the surrender of arms was on a satisfactory scale, it would be considered that the condition had not been fulfilled. As soon as these requirements had been fulfilled, General Scobie would inform Field-Marshal Alexander, who would initiate the necessary steps to put an end to the present turmoil in Greece and restore to all Greeks their democratic liberties; the first step to this must be the disbandment of all private armies.

Albania.

Albania having been cleared of the Germans, the Government set up by Enver Hoxha—who is now styled Colonel-General—has been turning to the tasks of internal consolidation and reconstruction. At a congress held at Berat in October the partisans had decided on a democratic programme recognising freedom of all kinds, the equality of all, including women, private ownership, universal suffrage and the secret ballot. Besides these admirable principles the programme proposed to combat illiteracy and ill-health, to stamp out Fascism and to maintain close relations with the big Allies. Accordingly Enver Hoxha's Government has proclaimed an amnesty for the Balli Kombetar, the Legality Party, and other collaborationists. While denouncing King Zog in unambiguous terms, the Government declares the Communist Party to be a guarantee of true democracy. Moreover, with the evident purpose of consolidating its position the Government is creating a National Liberation Front with local committees throughout the country and convoked a women's congress at Berat and a teachers' congress at Korça.

Bulgaria.

On the 1st December the Government published a decree to the effect that officers, n.c.o.s and men charged with the less serious collaborationist crimes might go to the front and, according to their performance there, might make amends. This produced a violent Communist protest, which alleged that the decree had been issued without the concurrence of the Communist Ministers or—as if this were a condition of validity—of the Central Committee of the Fatherland Front. The decree, it was asserted, enabled the guilty to escape the jurisdiction of the People's Courts and would hinder the elimination from the army of the Fascist element which remained in it. The Communist paper denounced any tendency to deviate from the strict principles of the Fatherland Front, and it hinted that the Agrarians and the Zveno party—the other two main components of the Front—thought the purge had gone far enough and were trying to set opinion against the Communists. On the 6th December the Government announced that it had cancelled the offending decree, so that the incident might be considered closed and all malicious rumours stopped. Next day a mass meeting staged at Sofia by the Fatherland Front expressed satisfaction at the withdrawal of the decree, insisted on the need for continuing the army purge and for keeping up unity within the Front and chaired Colonel Damian Velchev, the Zveno Minister of War. The Agrarians, however, on the strength of a lame excuse, abstained from attending the meeting. The incident thus reveals considerable disunity in the Fatherland Front Government. Moreover in the country at large, now that the first enthusiasm caused by the Red Army's arrival has passed, the excesses of the Communist extremists and the reign of terror they have maintained in many places have alienated moderate public opinion. From this revulsion of feeling advantage must accrue to the Agrarians, who are reported to be rapidly reorganising their party under their returned leader, Dr. G. M. Dimitrov. Nevertheless, in spite of internal unrest the hold of the Red army on the country remains unquestioned. Bulgarian divisions are sent off reluctantly to fight against Germany and Russian divisions arrive in the country. The Soviet High Command has declared Bulgaria a military area and, while it intervenes little in the administration except for example in such matters as censorship, its will is law for the Bulgarian Government.

Turkey.

The concern shown by the Turkish press and wireless about the situation in Greece was an indication of the value which Turkey attaches to her alliance with that country and of her fear lest the triumph of Left extremists should lead to Russian predominance there. The occurrence of civil war was deeply deplored and sincere hopes were expressed that it would not last long. Due allowance was made for German machinations and it was recognised that while the big Allies refrained from interfering in the régimes of other countries, Great Britain was bound to suppress extremists whose activities could only spell disaster.

Press and radio referred sympathetically to General de Gaulle's visit to Moscow and the resultant Franco-Soviet treaty. The Turks doubtless feel that the more Russia re-enters the comity of nations, the less likely she is to threaten Turkey.

The Turkish authorities are reported to have at last ordered German banks, insurance companies and trading firms to close down.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The names of the Government candidates who are to stand in the forthcoming Egyptian elections have now been announced. Public interest is naturally enough centred on these elections, for which all parties of the coalition are busily preparing. As indicated in last week's Summary, the Saadists, under the Prime Minister's leadership, intend, if possible, to get an absolute majority over all other parties. They want, in fact, to be in a position to stand up not only to the other sections of the coalition but also to the Palace, which is afraid that the Saadists may try to take a leaf out of the Wafdist book and create another parliamentary dictatorship. The Prime Minister has already sent instructions to the provincial governors, enjoining them to see that elections are freely held, and he has also issued a statement to the press expressing the Government's determination on this point. No great importance, however, need be attached to such assurances in Egypt, where freely conducted elections have seldom, if ever, taken place.

Another shooting incident occurred near Cairo on the 8th December, when a junior British army officer was mortally wounded at Maadi, close to the place where two British soldiers were attacked, one of them fatally, on the 20th November. There are indications that Mr. Shone, His Majesty's Minister at Cairo until a week or two ago, when he was appointed to succeed Sir E. Spears at Beirut, might also have been assassinated on the night following the murder of Lord Moyne had it not been for certain fortuitous circumstances. Persistent rumours of the intention by Jewish terrorists to kill Mr. Shone had been current in Cairo for some time, and it is even alleged that the two Jews charged with the murder of Lord Moyne stated that they had come to Egypt with the main purpose of murdering Mr. Shone first and Lord Moyne later. His Majesty's Government have given a donation of £500 to the Egyptian Police Benevolent Fund as a token of their appreciation of the help rendered by the Cairo police in the Lord Moyne case.

Nuri Pasha has now returned to Egypt, where it is said he will be joined shortly by other representatives from neighbouring Arab countries, for the purpose of discussing the formation of an Arab League. The two problems of Palestine and Syria may also have a high place on the agenda, having regard to the rumours about partition of the one and to the departure of Sir E. Spears from the other. Before leaving Bagdad, Nuri, who recently returned from a visit to Amman, told Sir K. Cornwallis of the despondency caused in Palestine and Transjordan by the rumours of partition as a solution to the Palestine problem. Nuri affirmed that partition would not solve the problem, and that if it were introduced the Arab countries had decided completely to boycott the proposed Jewish State. He and the Arab leaders were well aware that their relations with His Majesty's Government might be adversely affected by such a policy of boycott, but they were nevertheless determined to carry it out if the decision to partition Palestine were put into effect.

Ibn Saud too is showing renewed anxiety over Palestine. He has asked for the views of His Majesty's Government regarding the future of that country, and from his communication it would appear that, unless he receives assurances satisfactory to the Arab cause, he may no longer be able to continue advocating patience without losing face in the Moslem world. (For Zionist policy in America see under "United States.")

The Syrian Government has selected Dr. Najib Armanazi as its Minister in London, and has asked for our agrément to his appointment. Dr. Armanazi, who was appointed Secretary-General to the President of the Syrian Republic in 1943, is a brother-in-law of Jamil Mardam, the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The first anniversary of the Declaration on Persia issued by the Three Great Powers on the 1st December, 1943, at the end of the Tehran Conference, has been made something of an occasion by the Persian Government. M. Bayat, the Prime Minister, gave a large party on the 1st December, when he referred in cordial terms to the Tehran Conference, and laid special stress on Persian independence and the respect shown by the Allies for Persia's status and interests. One satisfactory change in the Cabinet was made last week by the transfer of Nasrullah Intizam from the Ministry of Communications to that of Foreign Affairs.

The oil question still occupies pride of place in Persia. What policy the Russians intend to adopt on the matter is not yet clear, but, according to the new Persian Foreign Minister, the Soviet Ambassador and M. Kavtaradze called on M. Bayat on the 7th December, when M. Maximov stated that the Soviet Government was not satisfied with the relations now existing between the two countries, and that the situation had been made more difficult by the passing of the Oil Concession Bill (see Summary No. 270). M. Kavtaradze left Tehran for Moscow on the 9th December, and we may know more of his Government's intentions when he has had time to report to M. Molotov the negative result of his prolonged discussions with the Persian authorities. One thing alone seems to be certain; he is not going back to Russia, as he had doubtless hoped he would, with the oil concession in his pocket.

Some idea of Russian-inspired policy in Persia may possibly be gathered from a broadsheet recently published in Tehran by the Tudeh party. This document quotes a manifesto of a meeting held at Tabriz on the 1st December, and (wrongly) alleged to have been attended by 50,000 people, who demanded inter alia the creation of provincial councils, the trial of the late Prime Minister, the formation of a coalition Government, social reforms and the maintenance of good relations with the U.S.S.R. The manifesto further declared that the people of Azerbaijan would shortly take steps to give effect to it. While the numbers stated to have been present at the meeting are greatly exaggerated, it is probable that the Tudeh party seriously intends to set up provincial councils in Azerbaijan.

Some twenty-eight Persian newspapers have formed an "Independence Front," their alleged object being to preserve the independence and integrity of Persia, to defend Persian rights and laws, to oppose dictatorships and to see that Persia is represented at the "Peace Conference."

It now looks as though Dr. Millspaugh is not likely to remain much longer in Persia. There has long been considerable opposition to him in the Majlis and in the press, and the Prime Minister proposes that Dr. Millspaugh should go on leave and not return. M. Bayat nevertheless wishes to retain the rest of the American Mission.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese Prime Minister, General Koiso, broadcast to the nation on the third anniversary of Japan's declaration of war against Britain and the United States. He enumerated Japan's achievements in the three years of war: "the Filipinos and the Burmese," he declared, "have been liberated from the arbitrary rule of the Americans and the British respectively; the independence of the East Indies is imminent; all traces of Anglo-American rule in China have disappeared; Siam has been reborn as an Oriental State;; and a new moral order is thus assuming increasingly concrete shape in our living-space." He claimed that the Americans had begun to make "indiscriminate bombing attacks" on the Japanese homeland as the only way to bring about a speedy decision of the war; he stressed the decisive importance of the fighting in the Philippines and urged the Japanese people to be more energetic than ever in war production. He paid a tribute to the resistance of Germany in the European theatre of war.

Tokyo is now being subjected to repeated raids by American bombers from the Marianas. With the start of serious air fighting over Japan the question of Japanese treatment of Allied airmen who land and are captured on Japanese soil has again come to the fore. In response to enquiries on the subject addressed to Tokyo through the Swiss Legation by the British and American Governments, the Information Board spokesman, Iguchi, declared at a press conference on the 6th December that the Japanese Government would hold responsible under the stipulations of international law those enemy airmen clearly found to have deliberately broken the established practices of warfare. Two days later, in reply to comments by the Washington and Delhi radios describing this statement as an "official Japanese threat," Iguchi declared that the enemy should make a "deeper study of international law." It seems likely that the formula is intended to provide for cases of killing of airmen by the army or by civilians with army collusion, which the Japanese Government may not be able to prevent even if it wished to do so. The decisive factor in the situation is the Japanese army's attitude towards surrender by its own members—an attitude which renders it indifferent to the prospect of reprisals, as Japanese prisoners in Allied hands are in any case disgraced and disowned.

An interesting editorial on the resignation of M. Mikolajczyk as Polish Prime Minister appeared in the Nippon Times, the recognised mouthpiece of the Japanese Foreign Office, on the 3rd December. The writer declared that the Polish Government had now been abandoned by both Britain and the United States; by the former in order to clear the way for a division of Europe into British and Soviet spheres of influence, and by the latter because she was determined to appease the Soviet Union in every way in order to gain Soviet co-operation in the war against Japan. The Polish Government was the "orphan of Europe" and, having been abandoned by the Anglo-Saxon Powers, would soon be "crushed to death" by the Soviet-supported Lublin régime. The significance of this comment lies not so much in its application to Poland, whose fate is of little interest to Japan, as in its potential relevance to the case of China, for, if the United States is supposed to be buying a Soviet alliance against Japan at the expense of Poland, she can be represented as equally ready to do so at the expense of China. It is likely that a propaganda campaign on these lines is being prepared for the time when, and if, the Soviet Union makes a move hostile to Japan. At present there is nothing definite to exploit, and the Japanese are still inclined to walk warily and refrain from publicly attributing to the Soviet Union any aggressive designs in the Far East, but, pending further developments, their political warfare can work on the theme that Britain and the United States are always ready to sacrifice the interests of their weaker allies in order to gain the favour and support of the Soviet Union. The effects, if any, of such propaganda, may not be confined to China, for there are signs of a growing rift between Sinophiles and Russophiles in the United States, the former tending to become more and more identified with opposition to the Roosevelt Administration. Henry Luce, who continues to take a keen interest in the land of his birth, is said to be planning a vigorous campaign in his various magazines against suggestions that the Soviet Union should after the war be allowed to acquire a privileged position in Manchuria.

The Japanese forces which invaded Kwangsi from Hunan have now joined hands with units which crossed the frontier north-eastward from French Indo-China and Japan's overland corridor to South-East Asia has thus been completed, though there cannot be any through railway communication by this route in the immediate future. On the Kweichow front a Japanese vanguard, after penetrating rapidly to within 70 miles of Kweiyang, has been withdrawn to the Kwangsi border. It is at present uncertain how much significance should be attributed to this withdrawal, or whether the Japanese have any serious intention of pushing on to Kweiyang after their recent extensive conquests. Any attempt to overrun Kweichow must encounter great difficulties of terrain, and the advantage should be greatly on the side of the defence if the Chinese are at all resolute in resistance. The Japanese may, however, take the view that the capture of Kweiyang would be worth a great effort, as it would largely cancel the gain to China from the prospective clearing of the western end of the Burma Road.

The success in Kweichow has for the moment steadied morale in Chungking, which was being undermined by the influx of refugees from the south. On the 7th December General Wedemeyer gave an assurance at a press conference that the United States would never abandon China, and declared he was confident that the Japanese could be driven back if there were determined unity of purpose throughout China, and solidarity between the Chinese people and army. According to an agency report Chiang Kai-shek has now agreed in principle to participation by the Communists in the Government, but it remains to be seen how far he is prepared to go in concessions which he can no longer make from strength but only from weakness. His political position now depends mainly on the course of military events; further disasters would reduce his prestige still further, but, if he can tide over the present crisis, he may be able to restore his power by sharing in Allied victory later on.

China has conferred upon President Vargas of Brazil the decoration of the Special Grand Cordon of Propitious Clouds.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

There has this week been a flood of criticism of His Majesty's Government for their alleged reactionary intervention in European affairs. The flood was let loose by Mr. Stettinius's statement about Count Sforza, in which he declared that the position of the United States Government "has always been that the composition of the Italian Government is purely an Italian affair except in the case of appointments where important military factors are concerned." Since Italy was an area of combined responsibility, he added that the United States Government had reaffirmed to both the British and Italian Governments that they expected the Italians to work out their problems of government along democratic lines without interference from the outside. "This policy would apply to an even more pronounced degree in regard to the Governments of the United Nations in their liberated territories." (There was considerable speculation on whether this last sentence referred to Allied policy in Belgium and Greece or whether it referred to Russia's handling of the Polish situation.)

Count Sforza, who has long resided in the United States, enjoys an exaggerated prestige in America as a symbol of Italian democracy and as a consistent anti-Fascist. The alleged British "veto" on his appointment was held to be due to his opposition to the House of Savoy. Newspapers and radio commentators alike accused Great Britain of trying to impose a reactionary pattern on Europe, and the brusque tone of Mr. Stettinius's statement was widely interpreted in the press and on the radio as a snub to Great Britain and as a reaffirmation of the libertarian position of United States. One or two papers, however, such as the New York Times, criticised both the matter and the manner of the Secretary of State's remarks. And although the statement obviously struck a responsive chord in the American heart, Mr. Stettinius himself had probably no sooner issued it than he regretted his impulse. He seemed at any rate to be sincerely conscience-stricken when taxed by a member of the embassy with having only made matters worse by drawing attention to differences between American and British policy. Moreover, the statement was in contrast with the way in which we had tried to support United States policy even when they had acted unilaterally, as in Sweden and Argentina; and furthermore, we pointed out, we had not placed a veto on Count Sforza but had, quite properly, expressed our disapproval of him. On the following day Mr. Stettinius went a little way towards improving the situation by expressing agreement with the Prime Minister's remark about Greece, that "whether the Greek people form themselves into a monarchy or a republic is for their decision; whether they form a Government of the Right or Left is for their decision; these are entirely matters for them."

Organs of Conservative and middle-of-the-road opinion tended, at the outset, to support British action in Greece more than they had done over the Sforza issue, but they trailed off into less favourable comment later. The Left-wing papers and the majority of the radio commentators have criticised British action in Greece without reserve, and the press in general have represented this as being the sharpest divergence to date on British and American policies. Raymond Gram Swing observed that "British prestige is at its lowest ebb." Lord Halifax later saw Mr. Stettinius and told the press that the British and United States Governments were "far from misunderstanding," though he admitted that there might have been a lack of consultation on both sides.

Some uneasiness has been expressed that the policy advocated by Mr. Stettinius would result in enhancing Russian influence in Europe at Britain's expense, and the anti-Russian Hearst group in particular actually supported British policy on the ground that the Allies were not fighting "to provide a way for the extension of the Communist world idea." There was also some tendency in Conservative circles to take the view that, since the United States were apparently not prepared to assume military responsibility in places such as Greece, they are scarcely in a position to indulge in too much abuse of us. The Denver Post went so far as to maintain that Mr. Stettinius's "policy paradoxically is isolationist." Other commentators demanded further clarification of the State Department's "hands-off" policy, and asked whether Germany and Japan, after unconditional surrender, would also be told to form their own Governments "without American interference." But whether strongly critical or not, there has been a general demand that the rift between Great Britain and the United States clearly demonstrates the need for an early meeting between Mr. Churchill, President Roosevelt and Marshal Stalin, so that the Allies can arrive at a common political policy as they have successfully done in the military field.

After hearing the views of Mr. Stettinius, the Acting Secretary of State, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has decided by 12 votes to 8 to comply with the request of the State Department to defer action on the resolution advocating unlimited Jewish immigration into Palestine until the next Congress assembles, "in view of the present delicate international situation."

The President has now nominated two additional Assistant Secretaries of State to the State Department. These are Mr. James C. Dunn, at present chief of the European Affairs Commission in the State Department, and Brigadier-General Julius C. Holmes, chief adviser on civil affairs to General Eisenhower. After a prolonged debate in the Senate, the nominations of Mr. Grew as Under-Secretary of State and of the three other Assistant Secretaries (Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Clayton and Mr. MacLeish) were sent back to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (on the motion of Senator O'Mahoney (Democrat, Wyoming) for further consideration). There is a certain feeling against Mr. Rockefeller, who is the son of one of the richest men in the United States, and to Mr. MacLeish, who is a poet; but it is the nomination of Mr. Clayton that has excited the most opposition, particularly on the part of the farm bloc. In the eyes of the Liberal press also, Mr. Clayton, one of the most powerful cotton brokers in the world, is suspected of representing reactionary big business. A number of Senators also are anxious to know more about his views on foreign trade and particularly on cartels, and Left-wing papers, such as P.M. and the New Republic, have consistently attacked Mr. Grew's "appeasement-minded" attitude towards Japan and Mr. Clayton's "big business" handling of the disposal of surplus property. They fear that the reorganisation planned by Mr. Stettinius will push the State Department over to the Right.

On balance, however, the changes in the State Department have been welcomed as indicating "real organisation." Senator Albert Chandler (Democrat, Kentucky), while expressing no objection to Mr. Grew, has declared that he wishes to learn more about the other nominations. "We ought to know," he declared, "where they stood on the war in Spain, their attitude towards Vichy, what they think about problems in India, and whether they think the Atlantic Charter is dead." In some quarters the action of the Senate is interpreted as an attempt to express its dissatisfaction at the part which Mr. Hopkins is alleged to have played in the selection of Mr. Stettinius and other members of the State Department. The public hearings began on the 12th December, but it is not anticipated that eventual Senate ratification will be withheld. (See also last week's Summary.)

Mr. Kent Cooper, the executive Director of the Associated Press, addressing the annual meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers, has pronounced in favour of "a free exchange of news throughout the world," adding that "such communication systems as there are between some countries have invoked either censorship or such heavy charges as to stifle news exchange efforts by agencies of the press"; and there is evidence that the newspaper lobby is conducting a vigorous campaign to secure the adoption of an official United States policy for the abolition of censorship, for the freedom of the press and for uniform cable rates. The Board of Directors of the American Society of Newspaper Editors has passed a resolution urging that all Governments should declare the right of people everywhere to hear news free from censorship restrictions. The Board is also reported to have appointed three members "to visit various world capitals to confer with appropriate governmental bodies, press associations, newspaper and radio executives." On the 18th November Mr. Paul Miller, Chief of the Washington Bureau of the Associated Press, announced that he was authorised by Mr. Stettinius to say that the United States Government would undertake explanatory talks with other Governments to try to secure an International agreement on world freedom of news exchange. It is understood that Mr. John Knight, the Chairman of the Association of Newspaper Editors and Publishers, will shortly visit Europe to investigate the international situation. (See also under "Latin America," "Soviet Union" and "United Nations.")

LATIN AMERICA.

The Governing Board of the Pan-American Union met on the 6th December under its new Chairman, Mr. Stettinius. Discussion of the Argentine question was, however, deferred, since insufficient replies had been received from member Governments, though a resolution was carried in favour of a special meeting of the Governing Board if a sufficient number of replies should have been received before the next regular meeting, on the 3rd January. A resolution was also moved in favour of a special conference of five or six Latin American countries to consider means of facilitating a solution of the Argentine problem before a meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs should take place.

On the 11th the Colombian press published an unofficial text of a reply of the Colombian Government apparently in response to Mexican soundings about Argentina's request. Two points were made: first, that Argentina had an undeniable right to be heard and to explain her attitude at a meeting of the American countries, and second, that the American countries had no right to prescribe the form of Government of any one of them, and in consequence no right to require Argentina to abandon her present system as a condition for being heard at such a meeting. The Argentine Government, whose hopes have been somewhat dashed of late, appears to have been encouraged by the action of the Pan-American Union on the 6th December, and it has taken fresh steps which may be interpreted as preparing the ground for a conference. These include the appointment of a committee of three distinguished judges to formulate regulations governing the conduct of political parties as a preliminary to the holding of elections; the reappearance of the democratic Argentina Libre, which has been suppressed since June 1943 (both these steps were taken on the 9th December); and the closure for a week of the pro-Axis Cabildo as a result of an article attacking intervention in Axis firms.

Further outbreaks of violence occurred in San Salvador on the 8th December, when several persons were killed. In the course of the affrays, armed police broke into the French Legation, and this incident, despite the fact that the Salvadorean régime has offered compensation, has caused some concern among members of the Diplomatic Corps who are giving shelter to numerous political refugees. Martial law has been proclaimed. In Honduras the atmosphere is equally overcharged: the attempted invasion by exiles who had gathered in Salvadorean territory failed (see Summary No. 264), and the Honduran Government is reported to have persuaded the Salvadoreans to take the remaining exiles into custody. Nevertheless, the tide which has already swept away General Ubico, formerly the doyen and model of the Central American dictators, has induced a state of alarm in the breasts of those still surviving. It is even reported that the Presidents of Honduras and Nicaragua and the Provisional President of El Salvador propose to establish a Tripartite Republic, with one of them as President of the whole and the others remaining as Governors of their respective countries. One purpose of this association, it is suggested, might be to proceed against Costa Rica and Guatemala! Territorial ambitions may well be entertained by the dictators, but it is difficult to see any of them acknowledging either of the others as Tripartite President and himself accepting an inferior position.

The Chilean Government has announced that an agreement has been reached for the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. (see Summary No. 268). In Peru a number of resignations have taken place as a prelude to the elections next year: they include those of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs, War and Public Works, and of General Ureta, Inspector-General of the Army, and of ex-President Marshal Benavides, till now Ambassador to Argentina. Most or all of these entertain presidential ambitions.

The Office of the Co-ordinator for Inter-American Affairs has announced the expenditure of 10 million dollars on the provision of educational facilities in Latin America. Present agreements cover Peru, Bolivia, Haiti, and the five Central American Republics; partial agreements have been signed with Brazil, Chile and the Dominican Republic; and agreements are being negotiated with Ecuador and Paraguay.

UNITED NATIONS.

Civil Aviation Conference.

The Conference held its final meeting on the 8th December after a session of 37 days, much longer than had been anticipated. The prolongation of the labours of the Delegates due to the difficulty of coming to full agreement on international control was reported in last week's Summary. But it resulted in documents of great value which have laid the basis for further advance when war is over.

There were five main documents. A Final Act embodied twelve resolutions of a rather mixed character which include the acceptance of a number of technical points and the reference of unsettled business to the Interim Council. All the participating States signed this Final Act, which is no more than a compendium of resolutions previously agreed. Provision has been made for rules as to pilotless aircraft, the most recent development in international aviation. There are also a Permanent Convention, superseding those of Paris (1919) and Havana (1928), and an interim agreement dealing in comprehensive fashion with the technical side of aviation and setting up an interim council. The first will need ratification by the signatory States and, since 26 are necessary, it is not likely to come into force for at least two years. The latter, which 26 signatories bring into force, will determine flying in the immediate future, so that the technical advances of recent years can be immediately brought into operation, while the interim council will provide a centre of discussion, and if the parties so agree, of decision. Its seat will be in Canada and at its last meeting the seat of the Permanent Organisation will be determined.

The other agreements concern the Five Freedoms, the first granting the first two, the second all five. These freedoms, of course, apply only to civil aircraft. The latter will probably be signed now by few States outside the western hemisphere, but the former is expected to be practically universal, though some States wish to reserve their assent until they see exactly what their position is. Thus, though the United Kingdom itself accepted the two freedoms, it was necessary to make a reservation as regards Newfoundland, whose Government had not yet convinced itself that immediate acceptance was in the interests of its ward.

The elections to the interim council threw an interesting light on the difficulty of producing a satisfactory Council by vote. A trial vote was so unsatisfactory that the elections were divided into three categories elected one after the other, (1) operators, 8 seats (one reserved for the U.S.S.R.); (2) States providing facilities, 5 seats; (3) States elected to give geographical representation, 8 seats. Both Mr. Berle and Lord Swinton exhorted the Conference to vote in an objective manner. The result was, however, in class 1, United States, United Kingdom, Netherlands, France, Brazil, Mexico and Belgium; in class 2, Canada, Cuba, Norway, Iraq and Peru; in class 3, China, Australia, Egypt, Czechoslovakia, Turkey, Chile, El Salvador and Colombia. There were thus many anomalies such as the preference of Mexico over Canada as an operator, while the Latin American States had one-third of the total of seats against six European seats and Asia was obviously inadequately represented. Some mitigation of the result was obtained by the action of Norway which offered to resign its seat in favour of India, thus moving Cuba to make the sacrifice in its place. The result is to make Latin American representation equal to that of Europe, while India receives her just recognition.

In the concluding speeches both Mr. Berle and Lord Swinton emphasised the immense importance of the agreements already concluded. "Chicago," said Lord Swinton, "is the first chapter in a new work of co-operation." Public opinion has tended to lay emphasis on what was not done rather than on substantial progress already made. But, though much remains to be done, the Conference has not only made important technical advances, set up an interim council and secured the practically world-wide acceptance of the two freedoms, but also by discussing with great frankness the issues of international control prepared the way for more comprehensive agreements in the future. It must be regarded as a good omen that the Conference has not been a place for the negotiation of special bilateral agreements between States, which will now have at least a body of principles to consult before such are made. The points of view of the different States on these matters were fully disclosed to the Conference and, though with some difficulty since the medium of communication was at times rather opaque, to the world public. The Civil Aviation Conference may rightly be said to have cleared the air.

GERMANY.

GERMAN propaganda has gratefully accepted what it calls the "entire trainload of ammunition" presented to it by the House of Commons debate on Poland. Several broadcasts of the 16th took points from Mr. Churchill's speech, which has been discussed in a tentative rather than an exultant manner. In view of the German insistence on "Strength through Fear," remarkably little use was made of specific points, such as the fate of East Prussia and Silesia and the transfer of population. No more important personality than Fritzsche was put up to speak on the subject. Schmidt was absent from the Wilhelmstrasse, and no use (for Germans in the Reich) was made of the British desire for an early three-Power conference. The Political Survey claimed that the frequency of Churchill's speeches was in itself a sign of weakness: "While Hitler worries our enemies by his silence, Churchill has the same effect by his continual speech-making." His last speech showed how absurd it had been for Britain to go to war for Poland; as the Manchester Guardian had observed, it disclosed a crisis, not of Poland only but of the United Nations. Fritzsche's commentary, delivered later on the 16th, was on the same lines, rubbing in what it called the British illusion of being able to dictate a policy to Europe. At the Press Conference of the German Foreign Office, von Stumm observed that Churchill had addressed his words "less to M.P.s and the Poles than to Britain's Soviet ally." He insisted on the close connexion between Churchill's last two speeches: "London has now sacrificed Poland—in order to retain Greece." The substance of this comment was reproduced for foreign information in a special statement, which drew from the speech five conclusions: that Britain was no longer interested in Poland, that a new meeting of the Big Three was unlikely, that the United States differed from Britain on the Polish issue, that the Atlantic Charter had been finally abandoned and that any compromise between Churchill's Britain and the German people was out of the question. A later statement (also for foreign listeners) was the only one of the day which sought to emphasise Mr. Churchill's attitude to Germany. His "plans for German dismemberment" would be taught in every German school, carried by every German soldier in his knapsack and posted in every factory. "A Churchill peace in Europe would mean that all European frontiers would be charged with high explosives."

The counter-attack launched by Rundstedt on the 16th was first announced by the O.K.W. on the 18th, and since then has been prominently featured in German war reports. It is very doubtful whether, in an order of the day of the 15th, Rundstedt did, as reported, call on his troops for a last effort. He assured them that their great hour had struck, that strong forces were attacking the Allied armies, that everything was at stake, and called on them "to achieve the utmost" for Fatherland and Führer. A Forces broadcast told the same troops on the 18th that they must not expect rapid and easy advance to Paris, and that their attack had been planned to the last detail by Hitler himself.

The information given here (cf. Summary No. 267) regarding the German police can now be supplemented. A D.N.B. announcement of the 15th December reveals that in future police pay will be on the same scale as that of the Armed Forces. The reasons given for this rise are that police units now operate increasingly with units of the Armed Forces, including the Waffen SS, and that in the South and East (i.e., probably in occupied territories) administrative offices of Army and Police are now united, and that the pay system will be simplified. It is not yet clear how far Himmler, who is Chief both of the Police and of the Reserve Army, aims at the creation of a unified fighting force for home purposes.

There has been since July last a striking increase in press reports of attacks on policemen. Since cases reported can be assumed to be less numerous than the actual incidents the appearance of fifteen such reports in five months is worth remark. A confidential source, more precise on this point, circulated that six policemen were shot in Berlin in one week of November. Considerable rewards were offered. The Berlin press early in October reported the case of a Russian who on the 15th August had shot two Waffen SS men on police duty outside the Oranienburg Station in Berlin; on the 20th October it announced that the criminal had been caught and executed. A likely motive of attacks on policemen is to obtain possession of firearms, and attempts have been made in western Germany to induce civilians to surrender to the authorities any arms in their possession. In Baden and Bavaria these were requisitioned for the Volkssturm. In Lorraine it was stated that unlicensed possession of firearms would be punished by death. On the other hand it is clear that people are trying to obtain, or to keep, firearms. Army pistols are said to have been "systematically" stolen in Erfurt. Pistols are purchased from soldiers on the black market.

The difficulties of German industry under frequent air attack are illustrated by a report that an engineering works in Düsseldorf has started to transfer workshops and mechanics to a site only 15 miles away. Such short-range evacuation means that the workers affected need not leave their homes, but also that both workers and plant remain within a vulnerable area.

In some Berlin factories trouble is said to have occurred from workers complaining that their rations are inadequate for the long hours which they have to work. Reports from German areas now under A.M.G. state that food rationing under the Nazis has on the whole been efficient, the official ration having been in most cases met. Black market activities, though not so prominent as in France or Belgium, are said to have been considerable and sustained chiefly by smuggling across the Dutch and Belgian border.

A new call-up of medical personnel for the Armed Forces is said to have further restricted the number of doctors available to the civil population. An assessment of the position in September last gave one doctor for every 5,000 to 7,000 persons, and of these doctors some spent much time visiting military hospitals. Such a situation may prove serious in view of the fact that in so many towns living conditions are bad, vitality low and the worst of the winter still to come. A recent meeting of the Dortmund City Council listened to a report from the health officer the published version of which stated that the danger of epidemics should not be underrated in view of the conglomeration of so many people in unfavourable circumstances. The number of cases of diphtheria and scarlet fever has increased, the spread of disease having been probably favoured by the crowds in A.R.P. shelters. Cases of spotted typhus were said to have spread from eastern workers to Germans.

Traffic dislocation and movements of population have combined to cause confusion to the German postal system. The press frequently claims that letters do not arrive because they are inadequately addressed; envelopes which do not bear the correct postal numbers of the district cannot, it is said, be dealt with by an overworked or temporary staff. A western newspaper in November reported, as not an isolated case, that of a letter sent from less than 50 kilom. away. "We could have walked the distance several times during the time it took to reach us." There was in September evidence of increased use of private messengers. Business firms in the Ruhr speak of the inconvenience of having only three deliveries per week. The Reich Minister of Posts has complained that many unimportant letters are sent by registered mail, thus causing the Post Office much unnecessary work.

Captured letters from Germany show some increase of apathy and listlessness, but still contain examples of "firm" morale and confidence in victory. Many such letters now bear the stamp of the Gestapo and not of the military censor. A woman factory worker writes of her joy at hearing of V 2 and of her disappointment that in spite of its use the war seems to have gone on just the same. "In moments of doubt," writes a Leipzig correspondent to a friend in the Forces, "take up Mein Kampf and think what the Führer gave us in 1933." Many write with horror of conditions in raided cities, of Bochum as a dead city, of the hungry people in flooded Cologne and of the endless troubles of those who try to travel. A soldier in Strasbourg writes that all the infantry think the war will be finished by Christmas. Another soldier suggests that Christmas festivities might well be scrapped altogether since Joseph and Mary have been called up, the Christ-child evacuated from German hearts and the manger, hay and animals (except the ass) requisitioned.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The Red Army has continued to advance westwards along the Slovak-Hungarian frontier during the past week and as the threat to Slovakia increases conditions in that country clearly grow more chaotic. The propaganda from Bratislava seeks to explain away the disorganisation of administration, transport and communications, which it admits to exist and concentrates on the terrors of bolshevism more frenziedly than ever. The evidence indicates that these efforts are bearing little fruit. In the Protectorate, too, the Russian advance is having an effect. Executions of Czech resisters have increased in number and Czech farm-workers of the 1921–22 age-groups are being called up for ten weeks of labour service digging trenches near the Protectorate.

Two members of the Czechoslovak Government Delegation in Ruthenia, Dr. Drtina and M. Uhlír, recently returned to England to report on conditions there to President Beneš and his Government. The Delegate himself, M. Nemec, arrived in Moscow last week.

On the 7th December a delegation of Orthodox Clergy from Mukačevo in Ruthenia, headed by the Bishop of the Mukačevo–Prešov diocese, arrived in Moscow to request the support of the Russian Synod in their application to the Synod of the Serbian Orthodox Church for the transfer of the Mukačevo Orthodox diocese to the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate. (See also under "Soviet Union.") Mukačevo does not come within the area of Ruthenia handed over by the Soviet authorities to the administration of the Czechoslovak Delegate.

During M. Masaryk's illness Dr. Ripka is, as usual, deputising for him as Minister for Foreign Affairs. M. Masaryk's duties as Minister of Defence have been temporarily taken over by Dr. Slávík, the Minister of the Interior.

POLAND.

The Polish Prime Minister, M. Arciszewski, made a formal statement of his Government's policy to the Polish National Council in London on the 13th December, which he based on four points: (a) Its authority was derived, he said, from the Polish President, M. Raczkiewicz; (b) it considered the voice of the home country as decisive on all important matters of State; (c) the armed forces under its command were continuing to grow; and (d) it enjoyed the support of American Poles, particularly in matters of relief.

Mr. Churchill's speech on Poland in the Debate on the 15th December produced an immediate reaction in the great majority of the press and radio comments of the United States. This comment, written from the standpoint of those who themselves are committed to no guarantee or alliance with Poland, is sharply critical. The proposed readjustment of Poland's boundaries is represented as evidence of the abandonment of the Atlantic Charter, of the revival of power politics and the apportionment of Europe into spheres of influence. Several papers referred to the "inconsistency" of Mr. Churchill's stand, contrasting his support of the "legitimate" Government of Greece with his supposed disavowal of the "legitimate" Government of Poland, an interpretation which is quite unjustified by the text of the Prime Minister's speech. Mr. Churchill's appeal for an early meeting of the Big Three is regarded as further evidence of an apparent lack of understanding between the major Allies. There is, however, a mounting support for his plea that, despite differences, nothing must impair their basic unity. "It is painful to have differences of opinion and policy between Britain and the United States," declared the Chicago Daily News. "A serious division now over the treatment of liberated territory would be a catastrophe endangering not only the war effort but the future peace. The most obvious move is a meeting of the three leaders and an immediate show of unity."

In contrast to this spate of unofficial disapproval Mr. Stettinius on the 19th December issued a public statement of United States policy which is a watered-down version of President Roosevelt's letter to M. Mikolajczyk in November (see Summary No. 269).

According to an interview given to the Sunday Times of the 17th December M. Arciszewski's comment on the debate was that "the favourable statements made by Mr. Churchill and other members . . . ." "do not seem to justify the amputation of the eastern part of Poland." His Government was, he said, preparing new proposals for submission to the Soviet and other Allied Governments "after they have been approved by the Underground State in Poland itself."

In the meantime, although it seems that communication has been properly re-established with the Underground movement in Poland, it is reported that its leaders attach the greatest importance to the formation of a Polish Government in London which would include M. Mikolajczyk and his Party.

SOVIET UNION.

As for the previous five weeks, there has been no change on the Soviet-German front in East Prussia and Poland. In Slovakia, Sáhy, just over the border from Hungary, was captured on the 15th December, followed by Kamenec on the 18th December. In Hungary, after the rapid advances of the preceding fortnight, the pace has slowed down. The principal gains have been north of Miskolc, where the Red Army is pushing along the three railway lines leading into Slovakia. Szendro was taken on the 15th December, Putnok on the 17th December, Göncz on the 18th December. The ring is slowly tightening around Budapest, Gödöllö being captured on the 12th December. In Yugoslavia no change has been reported.

The text of the Franco-Soviet treaty was made public in Moscow on the 17th December (for an analysis of its terms see under "France"). The provisions of the treaty are very similar to those of the Anglo-Soviet treaty of alliance of the 26th May, 1942, and the Czech-Soviet treaty of the 12th December, 1943 (see Summary Nos. 141 and 219). The main differences between the new treaty and the Anglo-Soviet treaty are that there is no reference to the Atlantic Charter in the preamble; the resolve of the contracting parties to work together to create a peace and security organisation comes in the preamble and not as an article of the treaty, since this work has in fact begun at Dumbarton Oaks; nor do the contracting parties pledge themselves to "act in accordance with the two principles of not seeking territorial aggrandisement for themselves and of non-interference in the internal affairs of other States," no doubt in order to leave France free to annex German territory should she wish to do so.

Comments on the treaty in Pravda and Izvestiya has for the most part been highly platitudinous. Izvestiya emphasised the importance of uniting "the two largest States of the European continent" if German imperialism was to be resisted. Pravda gave a brief historical survey in which it was argued that "the Soviet-French treaty of mutual assistance concluded in 1935 could have been an active weapon against German aggression if it had not been cancelled by the notorious Munich policy directed against the Soviet Union, a policy which proved fatal in its ruinous consequences for Europe, and first and foremost for France. Franco-Soviet collaboration was cut short as a result of the arbitrary actions of the traitors to the French people, the traitors who stood for collaboration with Hitlerite Germany." The present treaty was described, obviously enough, as "a document of great military and political significance," signifying "a new and important stage in the development of Soviet-French relations." M. Bogomolov, Soviet Ambassador in Paris, has announced that the Normandie Squadron in the U.S.S.R. will be expanded and that French airmen will be able to train in Soviet air schools.

Notwithstanding the friendly atmosphere which prevailed during General de Gaulle's visit, the Soviet press has been as swift as ever in reacting to any criticism of the Soviet war effort, even from France. On the 14th December Izvestiya and Krasnaya Zvyezda printed an article attacking Colonel Chassin, Director of the Military Department of the French Ministry of Information, for a review of the situation on the Eastern Front, in which he was reported as saying that in October there were 127 German and Hungarian divisions there, that the number was increased to 135 in November, and that by the 1st December there were 132 divisions on the Soviet-German front. The correct figures, the article stated, "which have been ascertained by the army reconnaissance service," were 204 German and Hungarian divisions on the Eastern front in October, 212 in November and 220 (including 200 German divisions) on the 1st December. Thus during October and November, allowing for 16 divisions put out of action, the number has increased by 32 divisions transferred "from other theatres of war, including Italy." "The question arises," the article concluded, "did Colonel Chassin fall a victim of his own ignorance and lack of information, or did he try to mislead public opinion deliberately?"

Little publicity has been given in the Soviet press to the doings of the National Committee of "Free Germany" since the adherence of Field-Marshal von Paulus (see Summary No. 255 under "Germany"). On the 8th December, however, all the Moscow newspapers published the biggest scoop which has yet been obtained from German prisoners in the U.S.S.R. This was an appeal to the German people and army, signed by von Paulus and no less than fifty generals—well over half the number of German generals captured by the Red Army. The appeal, which was restrained and dignified in tone, was alleged to be made on behalf of "many hundreds of thousands of officers." Its theme was: "There is no longer any hope for a change in the situation. No single Power in the world will negotiate with Hitler." Having thus proclaimed the indivisibility of the Allies, the appeal went on to assess coolly the consequences of surrender; "True, our Fatherland will be occupied by enemy troops, but an end will be put to the senseless sacrifices on the fronts and in the Fatherland, while the homes and enterprises which have so far escaped destruction will be preserved. True, the victors will demand punishment for all iniquities caused to their peoples, but only those will face the court who are guilty of crimes against the laws of culture and humanity. Certainly our future will not be easy, we shall work, we shall restore; but the road of progress will again open before us." The military situation was as hopeless as in 1918, when Hindenburg and Ludendorff demanded the discontinuation of the war. The German army and people must take the same action now "before the joint offensive of the united forces of the enemy destroys the German army and whatever has still remained in our Fatherland." This is a much more sober and realistic estimate of Germany's prospects than the "Free Germany" Committee has hitherto been in the habit of making.

Finland has come once more into the foreground in the Soviet press during the past week. Pravda (14th December) carried a long article discussing the recent Congress of the Finnish Social Democratic Party, strongly critical of the Party in general and Tanner in particular. Tanner, according to Pravda, had suffered no change of heart since the armistice, and acted at the Congress as "an undisguised mouthpiece of all chauvinist and Fascist circles in Finland." His demand for "a strong Government" was not, however, echoed by the masses of the Finnish people. Though the Administration remained "cluttered with agents of Hitlerism," the people were now demanding democratisation of the régime and prosecution of those responsible for the war and war crimes. Although the results of the Congress, where the Tanner point of view was mainly reflected, would suggest that the Finnish Social Democrat movement was incapable of developing politically, Pravda concluded that the ultimate stage in the Party's development had not necessarily been reached. The majority of the Party leadership could not indefinitely support Tanner, for if so the workers would finally turn their backs on them and on the Party. The Social Democratic workers were beginning to recognise that " a solid State is not a police State, but a democracy, and that the independence of the Finnish people is menaced not by friends but by enemies of co-operation and good neighbourly relations between the Finnish and Soviet peoples."

A cordial note was struck by General Zhdanov in his speech at a reception given by the Finland Soviet Union Society on the 11th December. He noted that there had developed in Finland since the Armistice " a truly historic process of consolidation of progressive and democratic forces in connexion with the task of establishing friendly and cordial relations with the Soviet Union," and among these forces the Society occupied an important place. He concluded on the note that the U.S.S.R. followed the work of the Society " with profound sympathy and attention, being convinced that the ideas of friendship of a free, independent and democratic Finland with the Soviet Union meet the vital interests of the Finnish people."

All the Soviet papers reported with approval on the 18th December that Finland had fulfilled within the time assigned Article 4 of the armistice, concerning the reduction of the Army to a peace-time footing. Three days later it was announced that the mixed Soviet-Finnish Frontier Commission in the Porkkala Udd area had finished its work, and that the Soviet delegation had left for Moscow.

For M. Vyshinsky's admonition to the Roumanian Communist leaders, given on the eve of his departure for Moscow, that they should " behave themselves," as he did not wish to hear any complaints of their behaviour, see under " Roumania." This attitude of damping down the ardour of local Communists is exactly parallel to that adopted by the Soviet authorities in dealing with Yugoslavia and Bulgaria (see last week's Summary).

The authorities of the Moscow Patriarchate, who have recently been showing considerable interest in the Orthodox Churches abroad, particularly in Bulgaria and Roumania, gave a cordial reception on the 7th December to a delegation of clergy of the Mukačevo–Prešov Orthodox diocese in Ruthenia. The delegates were applying for the transfer of their diocese from the jurisdiction of the Serbian Patriarchate to that of Moscow, and their petition received favourable consideration from the Acting Patriarch, Metropolitan Alexei, who promised to intervene with the Holy Synod of the Serbian Orthodox Church. Before their departure for Kiev, the delegates were received by M. Karpov, Chairman of the Council for Ecclesiastical Affairs in the Russian Orthodox Church (see also under " Czecholovakia ").

It was announced in Moscow on the 16th December that the Soviet Government had accepted Nicaragua's proposal for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between that country and the U.S.S.R. Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiaries will be exchanged. On the same day Senor Quintanilla, Mexican Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., presented credentials accrediting him, in addition, as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Costa Rica.

The Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic celebrated its 20th anniversary on the 10th December. The occasion was suitably honoured by messages from high party and government organs of the U.S.S.R. and the R.S.F.S.R. These messages stressed principally the cultural and economic advances made in the republic during the twenty years of Soviet power. The new oil, chemical, sulphur, food, textile and silk industries were mentioned in these messages and in a broadcast talk by M. Berdiev, Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Turkmen S.S.R. M. Berdiev stated that whereas in 1925 72 per cent. of the Republic's total production consisted of agricultural produce, now 76 per cent. of the production is industrial: this notwithstanding the fact that in the interim agricultural production has doubled. M. Berdiev and twenty-four others were awarded the Order of Lenin, and nearly 400 other persons were decorated. A delegation from the Horosan (Persia) branch of the Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R. attended the jubilee session of the Supreme Soviet of the Turkmen S.S.R., and was subsequently received by M. Aliev, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the republic (see also under " Middle East ").

The elections to the Supreme Soviet have again been postponed, this time until December 1945 (for the last postponement see Summary No. 220).

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

Political conditions in Belgium continue to be tranquil. Improvements in the supply and distribution of food have doubtless contributed to this, but, unless fairly substantial quantities of food can be imported in the near future, conditions will again deteriorate. Owing to an acute shortage of newsprint the main Brussels papers will now be published only three times weekly; a few weeks ago they were already compelled to appear four times a week instead of daily. As a result reports of Parliamentary debates have been drastically cut and the nation has hardly been able to form a proper estimate of the conduct of its representatives at this critical time. Meanwhile, the Right-wing Catholic press is already denouncing M. Gutt's coming Bill for a tax on war profits and M. van Acker's coming Social Security Bill. Such polemics will irritate the Socialists and may even imperil the survival of the coalition Government.

General Koenig has visited Brussels and has been received by the Prince Regent.

There is now more food in the liberated Netherlands. The Dutch News Agency announces that, while during November rations fell to an average of less than 900 calories daily per person, it was found possible to raise them to 1,600 for December. It is also hoped that the level for January will be 1,800 calories, or even 2,000, with extra rations for heavy workers and children. In the middle of December a consignment of food and medicines arrived from Switzerland as a gift from a Swiss relief committee.

Efforts are also being made to send food to the Occupied Netherlands; as a result of a request by the Dutch Government a Swedish ship laden with supplies is ready to sail to a Dutch port as soon as the necessary safe-conducts can be obtained from the belligerents. Meanwhile, the position in such towns as Amsterdam and Rotterdam is grim indeed.

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle and his party returned to Paris by air on the 16th December. On the following morning the General presided over a meeting of the Council of Ministers at which he and M. Bidault gave a detailed report of their negotiations in Moscow. It is understood that, apart from the Franco-Soviet pact, Germany, Poland and collective security were the main subjects discussed with the Soviet leaders.

The text of the Franco-Soviet pact was published later in the day. The treaty is modelled on the Anglo-Soviet pact (for points of difference and other comment see under " Soviet Union ") and contains eight articles. The preamble explains the resolve of the two Powers to pursue the war against Germany to the end, their conviction that, once victory has been achieved, the re-establishment of peace and its maintenance for a lasting future requires close collaboration between them and with all the United Nations, and their determination to co-operate with a view to creating an international system of security. In the first two articles the two Governments agree to assist one another in the war against Germany and not to undertake separate negotiations with Germany or to conclude an armistice or peace with any German authority except by mutual consent. In the third, they undertake to adopt by common agreement after the war " all measures necessary to eliminate any new threat on the part of Germany and to oppose every initiative liable to render possible a new attempt to aggression on her part." Article 4 states that, should one of the high contracting parties become involved in hostilities with Germany either in consequence of an aggression committed by Germany or through the application of Article 3, the other will immediately give it all the support and assistance in its power. By the fifth article the two Governments undertake not to conclude any alliance or join any coalition directed against one of them and by the sixth they agree to give one another all possible economic assistance after the war. Article 7 states that the Treaty in no way affects commitments previously entered into towards third parties by virtue of published treaties and Article 8 declares that it will come into force immediately on exchange of the instruments of ratification and last for twenty years; it also makes provision for prolongation. The pact has been hailed in France as a realistic document effectively designed to procure for both Powers the greatest possible security against a revival of the German menace.

General de Lattre de Tassigny, commander of the French First Army, has been put in charge of the operations in the Alsace sector south of Strasbourg and now has with him an American division as well as a division under General Leclerc. His troops have had to meet severe German counter-attacks south and west of Colmar. Further north General Patch's men have advanced after stiff fighting and liberated Hagenau and Lauterbourg.

The first Assembly of the Departmental Committees of Liberation (C.D.L.) met in Paris at the Hôtel de Ville on the 15th and 16th December under the chairmanship of M. Saillant, President of the C.N.R. A large majority approved motions calling for a rapid purge among the chief collaborators, confiscation of the property of the trusts, nationalisation of key industries, commercial treaties between France and the three other Great Powers, and a new press freed both from private influence and State tutelage. Although many speakers urged the postponement of the local elections, the restriction of the General Councils to an administrative rôle, and the maintenance of the political responsibilities of the C.D.L. as advisory committees to the prefects, together with a statutory extension of their powers, at least until the minimum programme of the Resistance had been achieved and a new constitution adopted, a motion was finally approved favouring the holding of provisional local elections pending the return of prisoners and deportees. The Assembly also unanimously approved an address to General de Gaulle expressing entire confidence in him for the conduct of the war and "the reconstruction of a just and free France," and great satisfaction at the signing of the Franco-Soviet Treaty as "an affirmation of our returning power and as a precious guarantee of security."

The first congress of French peasants since the liberation was held in Paris on the 14th, 15th and 16th December and marked the first step in the creation of a new Confederation of Agriculture to replace the Vichy Peasant Corporation dissolved two months ago. The Minister, M. Tanguy-Prigent, himself a farmer, had already set up a provisional National Committee for Agriculture and committees in each department representing all trends of opinion; while representatives of the main pre-war peasants' organisations had met in Paris and established a National Commission for Peasant Unity. At the Congress, which was attended by delegates from 82 departmental committees, this Commission decided to form itself into a temporary bureau of the future General Confederation of Agriculture and to organise a Congress of Peasant Unity to be held next February. The paper Libération Paysanne, which appeared clandestinely under the occupation as Résistance Paysanne, is to be the organ of the movement.

After a two-day debate the Consultative Assembly approved the Government's scheme for setting up factory committees in industry (see Summary No. 266), but recommended that the committees should be made compulsory in all undertakings of 50 or more employees (the limit proposed by the Government was 100) and that their powers should be extended. The Assembly also approved the procedure already agreed between the C.G.T. and the C.F.T.C. (Catholic trade unions) for electing workers' representatives to the committees. M. Parodi promised to consider the Assembly's proposed amendments.

The Assembly then debated the transport situation and the Minister, M. Mayer, made an effective speech describing the difficulties involved. While the position on the railways was improving, largely through the repair of locomotives, the road transport situation was still very serious. The Assembly voted a resolution acknowledging the results already achieved, but asking that a census of all road vehicles should be taken and that Allied help should be secured, particularly in allowing empty vehicles to travel loaded and in allocating shipping to restore communications between France and her Empire.

The ordinance nationalising the coal-mines of the Nord and Pas-de-Calais (see Summary No. 270) has now been published. The preamble states that only the Government can carry through the technical reorganisation and create the psychological conditions necessary for maximum production. It claims that a new system of operational ownership and management has been adopted to allow flexibility and initiative. The Miners' Federation has, however, declared its dissatisfaction with the ordinance and demands the nationalisation of all the French coal-mines without compensation for "the owners who betrayed their country," and their management by tripartite committees representing the miners, the State and the consumers.

Paul Chack, the writer of sea stories who became a contributor to Aujourd'hui and president of the Anti-Bolshevik Action Committee, has been sentenced to death by the Paris Court of Justice. Recent arrests include those of Raymond Patenôtre, former Minister of National Economy in the Daladier Government of April 1938, Pierre Gentin, Minister of Commerce in the same Government, Clamamus, former Senator of the Seine, and Lucien Rottée, former Directeur des Renseignements Généraux at the Prefecture of Police.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Assembly met on the 14th December to elect the Federal President and Vice-President for 1945, and at the same time to choose a new Federal Councillor to replace M. Pilet-Golaz, head of the Political Department, who resigned last month. Federal Councillor Eduard von Steiger, head of the Department of Justice and Police, was elected President of the Confederation for 1945, and Federal Councillor Karl Kobelt, head of the Military Department, Vice-President. Herr von Steiger, who is a member of the Farmers' Party, is a lawyer in Berne, and has held important municipal and cantonal posts. Dr. Kobelt (St. Gallen) is a member of the Radical Democratic Party.

The main nominees for the vacant seat on the Federal Council were Dr. Petitpierre (nominated by the Radical Democrats, Catholic Conservatives and Farmers' Party); M. Perret (Social Democrats); Dr. Vodoz (Liberal Democrats); and Professor Rappard (Independent Party). Dr. Petitpierre was elected in the first ballot. Of the 227 valid votes, Dr. Petitpierre received 122; M. Perret, 67; M. Vodoz, 26; and Professor Rappard, 9. Dr. Petitpierre, who represents Neuchâtel in the Council of States, is an authority on International Law.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

After four and a half years as His Majesty's Ambassador in Madrid, Lord Templewood has resigned his post. The Secretary of State, in acceding with regret to Lord Templewood's request to be relieved of his charge, has expressed his appreciation of the manner in which he discharged his difficult and important task in Spain. In his farewell interview with General Franco, though unable to prejudge the Prime Minister's answer to the Caudillo's letter, the Ambassador did attempt to dispel the many misconceptions under which Franco is labouring. In this he was helped by the Prime Minister's reference to Spain in his speech in the House of Commons on the 8th December, when he described the statement that he had praised Franco in his earlier speech of the 24th May as a "gross misrepresentation." Lord Templewood told Franco bluntly that the Anglo-Soviet alliance was one of the foundations of British foreign policy, and that it was futile to imagine that we should take part in any anti-Russian bloc. He also said that Franco was making a very big mistake in assuming that France was no longer a factor in European politics; she was, in fact, destined to play a very important part. As to Anglo-Spanish relations, which certainly were not all that could be desired, the trouble lay entirely with Spanish Fascism, which was continually impeding our conduct of the war and preventing Spain from being neutral. Franco's reply to this plain truth was the inevitable claim, upon which more than one newspaper campaign has been windily waged, that Falangism had nothing to do with either Nazism or Fascism. To this very shop-soiled distinction Lord Templewood's answer was that, if Falangism adopted Fascist methods, it was not surprising that the British public should regard Spain as a Fascist stronghold and a potential centre for Nazi intrigue. The Ambassador then attacked General Franco on the Military Courts and the repressive measures generally adopted by the Government, particularly the number of political executions carried out in recent months. It was clear from Franco's reply that executions had indeed increased (which we know already: see Summary No. 266), but he told Lord Templewood that he was about to launch a series of reforms, e.g., institution of a Cortes elected on a regional basis, greater freedom of local government, projects of social security, &c. This is, presumably, the shaping of Franco's "organic democracy." The recent syndical elections show how much life there is in it (see Summary No. 266).

It cannot be claimed that this interview succeeded in shaking Franco out of his happy and serene complacency. He remained quite unruffled, and showed no resentment even at Lord Templewood's most pungent criticisms. He gave no signs of being worried about the future, and seemed wholly convinced that the Falange régime is in the van of human progress and quite the best that Spain has ever had. Any suggestions that he is not Heaven's chosen instrument for the redemption of his country he regards as either malicious blasphemy or, more tolerantly, sheer ignorance. At the moment, being kindly disposed towards His Majesty's Government, he is inclined to rate British doubts of his sanctity in the second category. As an earnest of his new-born feelings, so eloquently described in the U.P. interview and in the letter to the Duke of Alba, he had removed from his desk the photographs of Hitler and Mussolini; from their place radiated the benign dignity of the Pope (proof of his "purest Christian tenets") and of General Carmona (the Iberian bloc). And just to show that, in spite of four years' strained relations, there was no ill-will, Franco pressed upon Lord Templewood the Grand Cross of the Order of Isabel the Catholic, the highest order now given in Spain. He had the grace to take the Ambassador's refusal in good part.

Mr. Norman Armour, formerly United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires, has been appointed to succeed Dr. Carlton Hayes in Madrid. Mr. Armour, unlike Dr. Hayes, is an Episcopalian, not a Catholic. He was born in England of American parents, and married Princess Myra Koudacheff. Mr. Armour is considered in the United States to be one of the outstanding American representatives.

In Lisbon, Dr. Salazar seems pained by the sharpness of the British reaction to General Franco's belated recognition of the way of the war. He has told Sir R. Campbell of his anxiety lest our expressed disapproval of the Falangist régime should stir up again the troubled waters in Spain just as they had been showing signs of settling. He deplores what he calls the short-sightedness of British public opinion in repelling the gesture, admittedly injudicious, of a country whose interests must be considered, and whose collaboration in the rebuilding of Europe must be accepted. This attitude is quite in character, for Dr. Salazar is in chronic fear of social convulsion beyond the frontier. He considers Spain to be a potential outpost of Communism, and he is very sensitive about the stability of his partner in the Iberian bloc. It may be, too, that his own hopes of playing a part in the post-war settlement have received a few chill splashes from the cold douche thrown over the Caudillo's pretensions. Dr. Salazar has always nourished with lofty idealism the theory that those countries whose vision and logic have not been disturbed by the passions of war are particularly fitted for the delicate task of ensuring peace and justice after the war. Which is just what General Franco thinks—with a good deal less justification.

ITALY.

The Italian Cabinet has taken the oath in accordance with the formula settled upon for the last Cabinet, that is, to exercise their functions in the Supreme interests of the State and not to prejudice in any way the Institutional question until a Constituent Assembly can be convocated. On this occasion each Minister took the oath separately instead of in a body as was done on the last occasion. The President of the Council, Signor Bonomi, alone took the oath directly to the Lieutenant of the Realm.

Signor Togliatti, the Communist leader, seems to have felt that he owed some explanation to his followers for his last-minute volte-face in joining the Government. In an article in Unità Signor Togliatti explains at some length that the working of the Communist-Socialist alliance did not function as well as it might have done during the Government crisis, with the result that the Left had not gained the position it should have. Signor Bonomi's invitation to the three main parties to guide the Government's policy is given by Signor Togliatti as his reason for joining the Government. These parties are, of course, the Communist, Socialist and Christian Democrat, but Signor Togliatti admits that the Communists and the Socialists have not been able to achieve political agreement with the Christian Democrats. The Communist party leader finishes by emphasising his party's increased responsibility in that it will now have to represent the Socialists and Actionists, a statement which may or may not console the Socialist leader, Signor Nenni.

There has been some trouble at Catania in Sicily in which one person was killed and two or three injured. The cause of this riot is said to have been the calling-up of the 1921–22 classes for military service, but it was more probably due to undesirable characters who are always ready to seize on any chance to make trouble wherever they can. Sicily is a land of intrigue, and at this unsettled time with so much unrest it is a fertile field for any faction with an axe to grind.

The trial of the two Generals, Del Tetto and Pentimalli, is taking place in Rome; they are accused of not taking adquate measures to defend Naples against the Germans. General Arisio, the superior officer of the accused and a witness for the prosecution, took the occasion to charge Fascism with the unpreparedness of the Italian Army when Italy declared war on Great Britain and France. The moral and material poverty of the Italian Army was due, said the General, to the Fascist hierarchy's continual interference, with the result that the military had lost all sense of initiative and responsibility.

Several well-known Italian exiles have been repatriated from Switzerland and were received by Signor Bonomi on arrival in Rome. They include the Liberal economist Professor Luigi Einaudi, Count Stefano Jacini, a prominent Christian Democrat, and Luigi Gasparotto, a Minister of the pre-Fascist period.

In the North, Mussolini made a big speech in the Teatro Lirico in Milan on the 16th December. The speech, which was also broadcast, was announced over the Fascist-controlled radio on the previous day, and every effort was made to revive the atmosphere of the "historic occasions" of the past. The early part of the speech dealt with the "betrayal" of last year and contained a violent indictment of the House of Savoy and Marshal Badoglio. The later "treacheries" of Roumania, Bulgaria and Finland were, however, stigmatised as "even more dastardly," and "in comparison, the Italian people betrayed on a smaller scale." Mussolini then went on to emphasise the military and economic contribution of the Italian Social Republic to the Axis cause. Soldiers and workers collaborating with the Reich numbered 786,000 at the end of September, according to German estimates. Tracing the growth of the Republican Fascist Party, he repudiated any attempts to stress the Republican aspect and to eliminate the word "Fascism"—"it would have been a mistake and cowardice to lower our flag." The social programme of Republican Fascism as laid down in the Verona Manifesto of the 15th November, 1943, was a logical continuation of Fascism's original programme, and on the social and economic side this programme had been carried out to the full. Some points of the Verona Manifesto, however, had not yet been put into effect, notably the demand for a Constituent Assembly. This postulate, Mussolini explicitly stated, would be carried out "only when the war is over," as it had been deemed "superfluous to summon a Constituent Assembly while the territory of the Republic could not be considered fixed in view of the development of military operations." It has also been found impossible to fulfil the Manifesto's promise that no citizen would be detained for more than seven days without an order of the judiciary; the reason for this was to be found in "the multiplicity of police agencies, ours and allied" and in the need to take reprisals against outlaws. In this connexion Mussolini made some attempt to answer criticisms of the illegal and brutal methods adopted towards partisans: "Certain episodes," he said, "have encouraged anti-Fascism to indulge in its usual generalisations. I must declare most explicitly that these events displease me very much, even if they are only episodes. The State cannot adopt methods which degrade it."

Another point of criticism which Mussolini took up was that made recently in articles by Parini and Pettinato attacking the single-party, and thus by implication the Fascist, system. A Party membership-card was no longer a prerequisite for any position in the State, and therefore "any discussion of the problem of the multiplicity of parties seems altogether untimely." There were many republics of the totalitarian type, for example, the present Turkish Republic. Mussolini then went on to stress the benefits conferred on the workers by the socialisation programme of the Fascist Republic.

The latter part of the speech dealt with the progress of the war since September 1943, and contained some optimistic references to Germany's secret weapons, coupled with the usual sarcastic comments on dissensions between the Allies and the threat of bolshevism. Mussolini ended by a fervent appeal to Italians to "defend the Po Valley tooth and nail . . . . while waiting for the whole of Italy to be Republican." The Italians south of the Apennines had suffered bitter delusion and degradation and "millions of Italians contrast yesterday with to-day." There were already signs of revival, and "it is you, dear comrade of Milan, who must and will give the men, the arms, the will and the signal for revival."

signs of being worried about the future, and seemed wholly convinced that the Falange régime is in the van of human progress and quite the best that Spain has ever had. Any suggestions that he is not Heaven's chosen instrument for the redemption of his country he regards as either malicious blasphemy or, more tolerantly, sheer ignorance. At the moment, being kindly disposed towards His Majesty's Government, he is inclined to rate British doubts of his sanctity in the second category. As an earnest of his new-born feelings, so eloquently described in the U.P. interview and in the letter to the Duke of Alba, he had removed from his desk the photographs of Hitler and Mussolini; from their place radiated the benign dignity of the Pope (proof of his "purest Christian tenets") and of General Carmona (the Iberian bloc). And just to show that, in spite of four years' strained relations, there was no ill-will, Franco pressed upon Lord Templewood the Grand Cross of the Order of Isabel the Catholic, the highest order now given in Spain. He had the grace to take the Ambassador's refusal in good part.

Mr. Norman Armour, formerly United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires, has been appointed to succeed Dr. Carlton Hayes in Madrid. Mr. Armour, unlike Dr. Hayes, is an Episcopalian, not a Catholic. He was born in England of American parents, and married Princess Myra Koudacheff. Mr. Armour is considered in the United States to be one of the outstanding American representatives.

In Lisbon, Dr. Salazar seems pained by the sharpness of the British reaction to General Franco's belated recognition of the way of the war. He has told Sir R. Campbell of his anxiety lest our expressed disapproval of the Falangist régime should stir up again the troubled waters in Spain just as they had been showing signs of settling. He deplores what he calls the short-sightedness of British public opinion in repelling the gesture, admittedly injudicious, of a country whose interests must be considered, and whose collaboration in the rebuilding of Europe must be accepted. This attitude is quite in character, for Dr. Salazar is in chronic fear of social convulsion beyond the frontier. He considers Spain to be a potential outpost of Communism, and he is very sensitive about the stability of his partner in the Iberian bloc. It may be, too, that his own hopes of playing a part in the post-war settlement have received a few chill splashes from the cold douche thrown over the Caudillo's pretensions. Dr. Salazar has always nourished with lofty idealism the theory that those countries whose vision and logic have not been disturbed by the passions of war are particularly fitted for the delicate task of ensuring peace and justice after the war. Which is just what General Franco thinks—with a good deal less justification.

ITALY.

The Italian Cabinet has taken the oath in accordance with the formula settled upon for the last Cabinet, that is, to exercise their functions in the Supreme interests of the State and not to prejudice in any way the Institutional question until a Constituent Assembly can be convocated. On this occasion each Minister took the oath separately instead of in a body as was done on the last occasion. The President of the Council, Signor Bonomi, alone took the oath directly to the Lieutenant of the Realm.

Signor Togliatti, the Communist leader, seems to have felt that he owed some explanation to his followers for his last-minute volte-face in joining the Government. In an article in Unità Signor Togliatti explains at some length that the working of the Communist-Socialist alliance did not function as well as it might have done during the Government crisis, with the result that the Left had not gained the position it should have. The official broadcast comment described the tremendous enthusiasm with which this speech, "to be known in the history of Italy as the Speech to the Milanese," was greeted. A Fascist rally also took place "spontaneously" at Turin to express enthusiasm after the speech. Later in the day Mussolini toured Milan, which he had not visited since the events of September 1943, and, after inspecting a workers' canteen, addressed a huge crowd in the Piazza San Sepolcro, the original home of Fascism.

This Milan visit and speech were undoubtedly timed to rally the faint-hearted forces of Fascism at a time when, with the imminent capture of Faenza and the approach to Bologna, the threat to the Po Valley draws steadily nearer. It may also be seen in relation to the present German all-out effort on the Western Front. Milan was probably chosen, not only as the main town of Republican Italy, with an enormous industrial population, but also as a town which is suffering both bombardment and great privations of all kinds during the present winter, and which is known to be a centre of seething discontent and disaffection.

It must be admitted that in this speech Mussolini has staged yet another of his come-backs. The speech shows the old sureness of touch, the old trick of carrying the war into the enemy's camp by an apparently frank admission of some criticisms and an apparently honest answer thereto. And in his later speech in the Piazza San Sepolcro the familiar voice of the demagogue was heard again saying, "Comrades, now I feel myself in direct touch with you, I speak to you while we can see into each other's eyes and feel our hearts beat together, fired by the same enthusiasm—profound love for our Italy."

THE VATICAN.

Cardinal Tisserant, a convinced de Gaullist, was sent to France to report to the Pope on the condition of the Church now and during the Occupation. He travelled widely and spoke to people in all walks of life. He concluded that the Church had not pursued a consistent policy in France, and that the higher clergy tended to be out of touch with the people. This was due partly, perhaps, to lack of direction from Rome, partly to weakness in the French Cardinalate, and the retiring habits of the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris. He thought that nothing would be gained by changing the membership of the Hierarchy. It would be better to put new life into present members.

Two events followed close on Cardinal Tisserant's visit. On the 9th December the Vatican recognised the Provisional Government, and on the 14th December Brazzaville wireless gave out that Mgr. Roncalli had been appointed Papal Nuncio to France, in place of Mgr. Valerio Valeri. In 1929 Mgr. Valeri was Apostolic Delegate for Egypt, Palestine, Cyprus and Transjordania, and His Majesty's Minister to the Holy See reported that he spoke English well and had always shown a friendly disposition to British institutions. He became Nuncio to France on the 3rd June, 1936. After the liberation the citizens of Vichy made him an honorary citizen of their town; but the French Government declines to accept diplomats who have been accredited to the Pétain régime. Mgr. Roncalli has been Apostolic Delegate in Turkey and Greece since 1934—a position which comes under the jurisdiction of the Congregation of the Eastern Church, whose Head is Cardinal Tisserant.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

In Hungary, the Soviets have made some gains in the north-east, towards Košice, and in the north-west, on the river Ipel. In the south and in front of Budapest the front remained practically stationary, although the capital is now under shell-fire.

Although more promises have been made to make of Budapest a "second Stalingrad" the evacuation of industrial plant, raw materials and agricultural produce is going on apace, as is the recruiting of young and fanatical volunteers for training in Germany. But in spite of frenzied efforts to pep up morale by means of atrocity stories, the population generally is reported sullen and apathetic, and "only waiting for the Russians to take over." There have been more cases of desertion, especially among the infantry; some of sabotage of communications, and some indications of a more definite resistance movement among pro-Horthy elements.

Parliament met in Sopron and passed the annual Budget and Appropriation Bill without debate. The city was afterwards bombed. There are reports that Jewish labour formations are being moved to Germany. Hungarian official sources have stated that if any Jews go out of Hungary, they will do so only as part of the general evacuation and will remain under the supervision of the Hungarian authorities.

Roumania.

Reading between the lines of German comment on the new Government, it can be inferred that Vyshinsky's visit to Roumania has done good, and that the country may be entering on a period of comparative calm and be able to make some progress. Vyshinsky appears to have realised that the local Communists, with their mania—which it must be admitted is shared by other parties—for organising street demonstrations, have been responsible for a good deal of disorder, and he has instructed them to conduct themselves in such a way as not to provoke trouble.

The new Prime Minister, Radescu, has addressed a meeting of press representatives and has broadcast to the public. The tone and content of these utterances is excellent. In particular, he has declared that neither he nor his colleagues desire anything for themselves. If this is true, it strikes a new note in Roumanian politics, and promises well for the future.

The air service between Athens, Sofia and Bucarest has been resumed.

Yugoslavia.

North of the Save there has been little change. The Germans' retreat from the Balkans continues. They have evacuated all Serbia except a small area near Zvornik on the Drina, and the partisans have entered Pozhega, Uzhice and Ljubovija. The German group in Montenegro is slowly fighting its way northwards and may succeed in joining the Germans in the Sandjak, who are now west of Sjenica. In Bosnia the Germans are moving steadily towards Brod on the Save.

The new President of the Belgrade City Council is Dr. S. Stankovitch, who is also President of the Presidium of the Serbian legislature. So the carpenter Ratkovitch (see Summary No. 266, 8th November, p. 15) has quickly returned to obscurity. In the city the food situation is better than it has been for the past three and a half years. Coal production in east Serbia is said to be nearly up to the pre-war level and there is plenty of wood in the villages, but there is no means of transport. Much denunciation of each other by Serbians has led to many arrests. The commercial and official classes tend to watch events with reserve or passive hostility. Amongst the arrested is Irinej Chiritch, the Orthodox Bishop of Novi Sad, who was given a seat in the Hungarian Upper House.

The partisan press has refrained from editorial comment on British policy in Greece. But a leading article in Borba, the Communist paper, denounced Papandreou and his supporters as a minority seeking to dominate the Greek people and to press imperialist claims on the territories of Greece's neighbours. British policy in Greece, the non-recognition of the partisan National Committee as the Government of Yugoslavia, and the difficulties over relief (see Summary No. 271, p. 14) combine to arouse partisan antipathy to Great Britain.

Partisan leaders have been putting out numerous territorial claims. In London General Velebit, according to The Times, claimed all Venezia Giulia east of the Isonzo, and the district of Klagenfurt in Austria. The official news agency, Tanyug, gave prominence to suggestions of claims on the Roumanian Banat and on Baja in Hungary. General Nadj has spoken of claims on Hungarian Baranja. At the recent Youth Congress the chairman, in his closing speech, exhorted Yugoslav Youth to "fight for its brothers in Bulgaria and Greece."

A brigade of Macedonians from Greece has been formed at Bitolj. Its purpose is not yet clear. But the report of the general mobilisation of men under 30 in Macedonia is disquieting.

Greece.

Reports from Athens indicate that it is fairly generally believed there that the only hope of any political solution lies in the appointment as Regent of Archbishop Damaskinos, the Archbishop of Athens. The Archbishop is a figure greatly esteemed by all Greeks for the courageous part he played during the occupation; he was active in organising relief, and on several occasions protested strongly to the German authorities over the shooting of hostages. As head of the Church of Greece he set a high standard of conduct which was imitated by most of his clergy, who showed great courage in resisting and obstructing the Germans. His record should make him acceptable even to the extreme Left. M. Papandreou approves of the proposal to appoint the Archbishop as Regent, but it appears that his Cabinet is not unanimous on the point. The main objection, however, appears to come from the King of the Hellenes, who presumably feels that the appointment of a Regent would weaken his own position; he is, however, prepared to agree to the appointment of the Archbishop as Prime Minister, a post which the latter has no wish to fill, as he desires to remain outside ordinary politics. The question has been under discussion for more than a week, and the need for a decision is urgent.

General Plastiras arrived in Athens on the 13th December, and at once offered to place himself at the disposal of the State in any capacity; he has not yet received any official appointment, but it is known that M. Papandreou recently had it in mind to use him as Commander-in-Chief of the new National Army. A recent (unconfirmed) report from Athens suggests that there may be a danger of both Communists and Royalists attempting to exploit for their own ends General Plastiras' reputation for absolute integrity.

Meantime, fighting in Athens continues. E.L.A.S. delivered their reply to General Scobie's demands (see last week's Summary) on the 16th; they agreed temporarily to withdraw from the Athens–Piræus area, but stipulated, inter alia, that the Greek regular forces must also withdraw, and that British troops must cease to intervene in the internal affairs of Greece. In reply General Scobie pointed out that no mention had been made of E.L.A.S. troops handing in their arms, a condition on which he must insist. British troops, he added, had scrupulously adhered to the Caserta Agreement; at the same time he published the full text of the agreement. A further reply is expected from E.L.A.S. Professor Svolos is known to have urged M. Zevgos to persuade E.L.A.S. to accept General Scobie's terms. It is, indeed, reported that some of the more moderate elements in E.A.M. have broken away; these include the Union of Popular Democracy (E.L.D.), with which M. Tsirimokos is associated.

There has as yet been no fighting in Salonica, and a big E.A.M. demonstration on the 17th took place without either disturbances or enthusiasm.

Albania.

A certain amount of co-operation has been evident between Enver Hoxha's organisation and E.L.A.S. On the one hand, E.L.A.S. handed over to the Albanian partisans Koço Kotta, who was King Zog's Prime Minister in 1938. On the other hand, the Albanian partisans are reported to have allowed E.L.A.S. troops to cross Albanian territory on their way from Florina to attack E.D.E.S. troops, and two E.A.M. officers are said to have reached Tirana.

Bulgaria.

It is no doubt with the purpose of fostering a public desire for vengeance that details have constantly been published about the preparation of the case against those responsible for leading the country into war on Germany's side and about the constitution of the People's Court for trying them. The opening trial has now been fixed for the 20th December, and one of the presidents has stated that the Court will act quickly, not a single guilty person escaping punishment nor a single innocent one being convicted. The indictment states that King Boris and Professor Filov, his Prime Minister, decided early in January 1941 to let the Germans through Bulgaria and to join the Tripartite Pact, and that this decision was formally adopted by the Cabinet on the 28th January, 1941, and by the Sobranje on the 2nd February. The Opposition was suppressed. The press was controlled. The people were deceived. Thousands were interned. Resistance groups were formed and partisans were slaughtered. For all these crimes responsibility is laid on the ex-Regents, Professor Filov, General Mihov and Prince Kiril, on the two Filov Cabinets and on the succeeding Cabinets of MM. Bozhilov and Bagrianov, and even on that of M. Muraviev, which is charged with failing to take effective steps to throw off the German yoke in the six days of its existence before the Red Army's arrival. Members of the Sobranje who supported collaboration are also accused.

On the 13th December General Damian Velchev, the Minister of War, issued another order of the day praising the achievements of the army against the Germans in Yugoslavia and insisting on the need for continuing the fight. The truth is that Bulgarian troops have been reluctant to go to the front and the Government has only sent them in deference to strong Russian insistence. Mutinous incidents which have occurred have been partly due to bitter feeling between the army and militia. The militia are exempt from service at the front. There is therefore a lot of riff-raff among them. But they are under the Minister of the Interior—a Communist—and are virtually S.S. troops of the Communist Party and in the absence of the army units at the front exercise almost sole internal control. A recent curfew order, for example, was issued by the director of the militia. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the Government is reported to have doubled the pay of army units serving outside Bulgaria.

Turkey.

The economic situation is—temporarily at any rate—far from satisfactory, and M. Saraçoğlu, the Prime Minister, made a rather gloomy reference to it when opening the annual "Buy Turkish" week at Angora. He claimed that gold stocks were ample but he admitted that the note circulation had quadrupled during the war. Revenue was falling and since Turkey broke with Germany foreign trade had stagnated. The United States and United Kingdom were now the only markets where Turkey could sell or buy, and the Government was doing its utmost to cultivate them. If British and American promises—to support Turkish economy as far as possible—were fully carried out the situation would soon improve, but in any case Turkish foreign policy would continue to be based on the Anglo-Turkish alliance.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

In Egypt, the Government's election campaign was opened on the 14th December with a speech by the Prime Minister. After calling upon the electors to go to the polls in order to "prove their love for the constitutional and democratic régime proper to a civilised nation," and referring to the collaboration of the coalition parties, which had made "heavy sacrifices" in the interests of the fatherland, Dr. Ahmed Maher expressed regret that the Wafd had decided not to enter the contest. Evidently they realised that the Government intended the elections to be conducted "with full freedom and justice," and were afraid to reveal the measure of the popular disfavour into which they had fallen. The administrative authorities had been instructed not to interfere in the campaign, except for the prevention of demonstrations.

Behind the scenes the Government's position was less impressive. Despite the agreement on the numerical allocation of seats, the organisation of the elections continued to raise issues on which the party leaders were sharply divided. Makram Ebeid Pasha is understood to have threatened to resign, taking with him two of his colleagues in the Cabinet, and to have been dissuaded by means of concessions to his point of view. It is also reported that a small number of workers, demonstrating in front of the Abdin Palace, threatened a general strike if Makram were allowed to resign, and that his alleged influence among the workers played a part in the Prime Minister's decision to compromise with him. The four leaders have now issued a statement in which they severally disown any of their followers who stand in constituencies earmarked for one of the other parties. Nevertheless classes are said to have taken place in some constituencies between groups of Saadists and of Makram's supporters.

Some surprise has been caused by the candidature of Ali al-Birair, who, as a Sudanese resident in Egypt, is not eligible under the provisions of the Egyptian Electoral Law. Dr. Ahmed Maher's attention has been drawn to this anomaly.

Two of the sub-committees established by the Preparatory Committee for the General Arab Conference—those dealing with cultural matters and with propaganda—are reported to have met in Cairo on the 13th December. An Arab Feminist Congress assembled there on the previous day, under the Presidency of Madame Sharawi. Ali Maher Pasha attended a reception for the delegates, but the proceedings are said to have taken an unexpectedly pro-British turn owing to the influence of the Syrian and Lebanese delegations.

Sir Edward Spears left Beirut on his way to London on the 15th December. He is succeeded by Mr. Terrence Shone. Despite the official statement that "the return of Sir Edward Spears to this country does not indicate any change in British policy, and is solely due to his desire to resume his duties in Parliament," and despite other assurances in the same sense, Syrian and Lebanese leaders apparently regard his departure as further evidence for their belief that the policy of His Majesty's Government is undergoing modification.

The second postponement of action on the pro-Zionist resolution in the United States Congress (see last week's Summary, under "United States") has naturally caused disappointment in the Palestinian Jewish community. Their newspapers connect the intervention of the State Department against the passage of the resolution with the outrages recently committed by Jewish terrorists. The Palestine Post consoles its readers with the reflection that "the President hardly needed the support of the Congress resolution for giving effect to the policy to which he stands committed by a series of statements, the most specific being the one he made shortly before his re-election."

At a meeting held in Jerusalem to celebrate Dr. Weizmann's 70th birthday, Mr. Shertok is reported to have said: "Every sign of enmity towards England is . . . . deadly poison and should be considered as national treason . . . . England remains the main centre of decision, and there we shall have to wage the struggle for a Jewish State in the whole of Palestine . . . . The day of decision is not yet known. But when it comes it will not bring an immediate final solution. It will make renewed efforts necessary. We have not brought forward the slogan of a Jewish State in order to annul gradual development and construction. We shall be judged not by words but by deeds, and these are: numbers and area."

The Persian Government are anxiously awaiting some definite indication of the attitude which the Soviet Government will now adopt on the oil question. The Ministry for Foreign Affairs failed to draw M. Kavtaradze into a further discussion of the problem before he left for Moscow. But an account has appeared, in the Persian paper published by the Soviet Embassy, of some remarks which he made to a group of Persian Deputies. The passing of the oil concessions Bill, he is reported to have said, was the outcome of pressure exercised by such enemies of Persian-Soviet friendship as the late Prime Minister and Sayyid Zia. He added that it was inconsistent with the existence of foreign concessions in Persia. The Soviet Government were confident that the Majlis would correct its mistake. The concession for which he had asked did not resemble a capitalist concession: it would help to develop the Persian economy and to prevent unemployment, and when the concession expired its equipment would become Persian property. M. Kavtaradze concluded by saying that he was returning to Moscow because the difficulties of his mission had been aggravated by recent developments, particularly by the activity of certain Deputies who had created an atmosphere of hostility to the U.S.S.R.

According to the Persian Prime Minister, M. Maximov has told him that the Soviet Government expect the oil concessions Bill to be amended; as an alternative the ambassador suggested that the Shah might refuse to ratify it. He also observed that the Persian Government could not itself exploit the oil for lack of capital, to which M. Bayat retorted that they had built the railway with their own money. At the same time he reminded the ambassador that the Bill passed by the Majlis did not forbid the Persian Government to discuss the sale of oil to a foreign Power. (In this connexion, it is to be noted that the terms of the Bill also do not preclude the formation of a company nominally Persian but operating under effective Russian control.)

Meanwhile the dispute between the Tudeh Party's organs and other newspapers continues unabated. Both sides are drawing morals from events in Greece—the one portraying the E.A.M. as a small minority incited from abroad and trying to seize power, while the other draws parallels between the behaviour of reactionary imperialists in Greece and that of M. Said, Sayyid Zia and their "masters" in Persia. It seems important, if the Persian Government wish to postpone a resumption of oil negotiations until after the withdrawal of foreign troops, that they should meanwhile draw the sting of the internal opposition by carrying out measures of social reform.

THE FAR EAST.

The Allied landing on Mindoro on the 15th December opened a new phase in the Battle of the Philippines, bringing the Allied offensive through the inner waters of the archipelago to the shores of the South China Sea. A Tokyo broadcast for Europe just before the landing declared that "signs of a great new development in the military situation in the Philippines have now become apparent after a month's stalemate on the Leyte front"; a new enemy task force had passed through the Mindanao Strait into the Sulu Sea, and, while the objective of this operation still remained to be seen, it was evident the enemy were trying to extend the front further to the west.

After the landing on Mindoro had been officially admitted, Japanese publicity strove to minimise its significance by representing it as an attempt at diversion following on the "failure" to subdue Leyte. In support of this, great stress was laid on the alleged recapture of two airfields on Leyte and it was claimed that the Americans would find it difficult to maintain reinforcements and supplies for their expedition to Mindoro while the Japanese still held bases in the eastern Philippines. There was no disposition to represent the struggle in the Philippines as of anything less than crucial importance for Japan. "The Battle of the Philippines," declared the Asahi, quoted by Tokyo radio, "has entered a decisive stage and holds the key to the entire war in the Pacific. Now is the time when we must rise as one man to exert our utmost effort to produce supplies and ammunition and rush them to our forces in time for this grave battle."

The announcement of the creation of a British Pacific Fleet was held by Japanese publicity to be a confirmation of Japanese claims to have inflicted enormous losses on the United States Navy in recent actions off Formosa and the Philippines. The United States Navy, it was alleged, had previously considered itself able to carry on the sea war in the Pacific without British aid, but heavy losses had compelled Washington to ask for it. A D.N.B. report from Tokyo quoted Japanese naval circles as saying that the principal object of the formation of the British Pacific Fleet was to protect British interests in that ocean against American encroachment and to secure for Britain a favourable position at the post-war conference table when territorial aspirations in East Asia would one day be settled—a notion which seems already to diverge considerably from Japan's official hopes of expelling both British and Americans completely from the whole region.

Partly as a consolation for depressing news from the oceanic fronts and partly also perhaps as a propaganda reinsurance against the eventuality of defeat in the Philippines, great prominence has been given in Japan to the link-up of Japanese forces on the "overland corridor" to Indo-China via Kwangsi. Apart from the line of communication from Manchuria and North China via Hankow, it was claimed that Shanghai could be linked with the corridor by the railway through Kinhwa and Nanchang, the total distance between Shanghai and Singapore by this route being 5,500 kilom.; 840 kilom. of railway remains to be completed, but this would take less than a year. Regarded as a line of communication to Singapore this route can hardly be a substitute for naval command of the South China Sea, as its long stretches on the coasts of Annam and Lower Siam would be extremely vulnerable to interception by hostile sea-power; as far as Hanoi, however, it is a good inland route for moving troops to Indo-China and one of the main consequences of the Japanese link-up in South China may be an increasingly tight hold by the Japanese Army on the French territory. With the elimination of the Vichy régime in France the French administration and armed forces in Indo-China are left without the cloak of Pétainist legality to cover their submission to Japan; on the other hand, any defiance of Japan before Allied forces were ready to give effective support could only lead to disaster. Admiral Decoux is thus in a situation of great embarrassment and danger. The Japanese attitude has been made quite clear in recent Tokyo broadcasts: Indo-China is "sovereign" and "an integral part of East Asia," quite separate from France, which has become a "parasite" of the Anglo-Americans, "hoping to steal from Asia whatever spoils there would be forthcoming from the Pacific war." After the precedents of Darlan, Badoglio, King Michael and Horthy, it is unlikely that the Japanese have any confidence in the "loyalty" of Decoux, and it may be assumed that they have a plan for taking over control in Indo-China as and when a military emergency develops.

Mystery still surrounds the Japanese withdrawal from Kweichow, which does not seem to have been imposed by Chinese arms. It is possible that the Japanese outran their supplies or lacked clothing suitable for campaigning in winter in the Kweichow highlands. But there have also been rumours of collusion, and some colour is lent to this version by a report that the removal of the threat to the capital has made the Kuomintang less inclined than a fortnight ago for a compromise with the Communists. The Mainichi of the 13th December asserted that the recent changes in the Chungking Government had been due to American pressure and that this pressure would increase with every military setback Chungking suffered—from which it might be argued that the way to reduce American influence in Chungking was to spare Chungking military setbacks beyond those absolutely necessary for Japanese strategy in the larger war. Japanese political warfare now appears to be concentrated on China more than ever before. Japanese diplomatic representatives in various parts of China have been recalled to Tokyo for a special conference, while Wang Ching-wei's successor, Chen Kung-po, has been received on a visit there with every formality, being entertained by General Koiso at a banquet on the 16th of this month.

On the 14th December Chiang Kai-shek gave an interview to the News Chronicle Special Correspondent, Stuart Gelder—the first interview he has granted a foreign journalist for two years. In answering a series of questions put by Gelder he declared that the Government was seeking a solution of the Communist problem with the greatest patience; the Kuomintang, he claimed, had never prevented non-members from participating in the National Government, and in fact welcomed co-operation from other parties. As to Japan, he said that she must be thoroughly disarmed, but that Japanese domestic problems would be better left to the Japanese people to solve for themselves. Finally he declared that "what China expects most just now from her Allies is better understanding, more sympathy and closer co-operation."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

This week there is a mounting wave of serious anti-British feeling in the press and radio of the United States. According to the columnist, Samuel Grafton, the United States "are being flooded with anti-British pronouncements, manifestos, declarations and cartoons. Some are put out by the Liberals, who object to British policy in Italy and Greece, but some of it comes from the publicists, who have always been anti-British, and from isolationists, who see an opportunity to get in their own particular anti-British blows. . . . . There seems to be a torrent of comment unfavourable to Britain." All sorts of charges, some quite absurd and trivial, are being concocted. They vary from accusing Great Britain of responsibility for the cigarette shortage in the United States (because of Lend-Lease supplies) to sabotaging the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago by placing national above world interests. On the one hand, Mr. Myron Taylor is reported to be opposed to the "British idea" that Italy as a beaten foe must pay, and, on the other, U.N.R.R.A. in Greece is reported to have declared that they cannot fulfil their tasks through being "unavoidably associated with an organisation of force and discrimination."

But the focus of this criticism is the alleged reactionary and nationalistic policy of this country towards Europe. In Italy, indeed, the joint statement recognising the Bonomi Government is said to have ended the rift which began over a minor divergence which was exaggerated into a major issue by the State Department's press release (see last week's Summary). But criticism of our policy in Greece continues on familiar lines. The situation lends itself to demagogic appeals, and it is disturbing to observe that so much of the criticism of British policy in Greece, despite clear statements by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, is based on false assumptions, unfounded suspicions and unsupported prejudices.

As to Poland, the Prime Minister's speech did nothing to remove the anti-British sentiment. It met, indeed, with general disapproval, more gloomy than indignant. There is now evidence of a genuine perturbation about post-war settlements in general. It is even said that Mr. Churchill's treatment of Poland "has driven another nail into the coffin of Dumbarton Oaks." [For a detailed account of American reception of the Prime Minister's speech, see under "Poland."]

The one point on which American reaction has not been hostile is the demand for an early meeting among the Three Big Powers. Before this meeting takes place, however, Congress and the press are alike insistent that American policy must be clarified and that a clear statement should be issued by the President and the State Department. Mr. Stettinius's statement concerning United States policy with regard to Poland was only couched in very general terms. There is evidence, however, that the Senate is demanding a more clear-cut statement from the President. As Senator Vandenberg (Republican, Michigan) declared, "only the President can give us, the world at large and Poland the reassurances which now seem to be called for." He asked if it was not time for the President to state what is the foreign policy of the United States. Several speakers, such as Senator Pepper (Democrat, Florida), supported this demand.

All this, of course, plays into the hands of the ex-isolationists in the United States, who are once more beginning to raise their voices, and it is disturbing indeed that it should still be so easy to whip up the traditional anti-British prejudices and suspicions, though, despite the violence of the criticism, it is by no means certain that it will last or leave any deep mark.

The Franco-Soviet Pact has been widely interpreted as further evidence of the resurgence of France as a Great Power and General de Gaulle's prestige is considerably enhanced. But, in view of the general misgivings about European policies, much uneasiness is expressed lest this pact should portend the revival of balance of power politics, and in certain quarters it is criticised as inconsistent with the proposals at Dumbarton Oaks. Some radio commentators, however, have pointed out that the pact destroys any chance of an exclusive western bloc designed to offset increasing Soviet power in Eastern Europe.

Mr. R. K. Law, Minister of State, has arrived in Washington and has been received by Mr. Stettinius. Mr. Law is discussing with the United States authorities supply questions which are now arising in liberated territories in North-West Europe and the Mediterranean, and he is also discussing similar questions in relation to Italy.

In reply to a question regarding freedom of news, at his recent press conference Mr. Stettinius stated that "the whole question of freedom of information is now under study in the Department of State. I shall support any practical measure to give international recognition to the principles of freedom of news." He earnestly hoped that it would be possible to have this subject brought up at the United Nations Conference when it meets (see last week's Summary).

Mr. Leon Henderson, the former head of the Office of Price Administration, has arrived in England "to make a survey of the economic problems involved in the future control of Germany, and especially that part relating to Germany's power to make war in the future."

The Treasury Department have refused the request made by Finland through the Swedish Embassy to use part of her frozen funds in the United States to pay her war debt instalment. It is said that use of the money for this purpose would establish the United States as a preferred creditor of Finland.

LATIN AMERICA.

Central America continues to indulge in its own particular war of nerves and the tense situation now turns upon events in El Salvador. On the 12th December a number of opponents of the de facto Government of Colonel Aguirre seized several towns in the north-west of El Salvador, and fighting broke out with Colonel Aguirre's forces. Colonel Aguirre's Government protested to the Guatemalan Government on the grounds that the revolutionaries had made use of Guatemalan territory. Guatemalans, however, repudiated the protest in strong terms, apparently maintaining that the revolutionaries left Guatemala some time ago and began their rising in El Salvador. Meanwhile, the Guatemalan press accuses the Honduran air force of helping the Aguirre régime in El Salvado, and the Guatemalan air force is reported to be patrolling the frontier. The Salvadorean police, after their raid on the French legation (see last week's Summary), have now violated the Peruvian, and removed a number of political refugees. The right of asylum has admittedly been abused; but the Salvadorean Government's method of remedying this abuse is unlikely to prove good evidence in favour of its recognition, even if it should survive.

The commission set up by the Argentine Government to draft an Organic Statute for the political parties (see Summary No. 268) has announced its resolve to uphold democracy and complete freedom of suffrage and political self-determination.

It is announced that the new Chilean mission in Moscow and the new Russian mission in Santiago (see last week's Summary) are to have the status of embassies.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

FIRST place in all war reports has naturally been given this week to the German counter-offensive in the west. The O.K.W. announced on the 22nd the fall of St. Vith, and heavy fighting around Stavelot. Strong Allied relieving attacks in Central Luxemburg were mentioned on the 24th. The bulletin issued on Christmas Day mentioned a concentric German attack on American forces in the area of Bastogne. Much has been made of the point that Rundstedt has forced the Allied Command to relax pressure at other places on the Western Front. The German attack has acted, said the agency message, like a magnet in attracting American strategic reserves. It had compelled the withdrawal of strong formations from previous points of attack, in particular from the Aachen area and the Saar. The German recapture of Dillingen was instanced as a result of this process. The public were told that the time was not yet ripe for a detailed account of operations, and were encouraged to think of the German offensive as proof of strategic superiority, as a surprise blow by which the German Command had definitely "seized the initiative." They were told that "the German Army in the east is also quite capable of producing surprises," and that "the occasional evacuation of a few localities" in Hungary had no decisive influence on the situation. The Transocean agency, for foreign consumption, was somewhat more explicit. It gave the total of American prisoners taken as 25,000. It quoted a military spokesman as holding the view that the set objectives of the western attack had been everywhere reached and in some cases surpassed. One report included mention of heavy Allied air attacks, but all comment was confined to generalities. Fritzsche, on the Home Service of the 22nd, struck the note of relief tempered with cautious optimism. He described military success as due to months of patient preparation and endurance. "The German people has not given in and to-day it reaps the harvest of its tenacity." Some later messages suggest a change of policy after the first successes; they treat the attack as a full-scale winter offensive; all mention of limited objectives has been dropped. Reports now talk of "a German victory" and "a turning point in the war."

Christmas week has brought to the German people a double dose of encouragement from Goebbels. On the 22nd he refurbished his well-worn theme of Britain fighting a war that only her allies can win. Everyone in Britain, he said, must now be aware of the present "alarming tendency in the political development of the war," apparent in British inability to prevent "the foreign legions of Bolshevism" from spreading over Europe as and when Stalin should direct. In a broadcast on Christmas Eve, the Minister painted the other side of the picture, the heroic sufferings and achievements of the Germans. He spoke to the "great German community of the lonely," emphasising that language could not express the surge of feeling felt by all Germans, especially by those away from home, on reaching a sixth war Christmas. He congratulated the nation on displaying "a degree of moral resistance" which deserved nothing but admiration. He had words for the bereaved, the homeless and a special final reference to the Führer, who, he said, was, "as always, full of the greatest intellectual and spiritual vitality," and, indeed, had never been so occupied with plans and ideas for the future.

Although Hitler's health has recently improved it is still not clear how much he actually can and does accomplish in the direction of affairs of State. A Basle paper recently quoted "well-informed sources" for a highly-coloured account of his being surrounded by a staff of architects, and occupying himself with horoscopes and giant models of rebuilt cities. For the rest he is said to live in a completely unreal world, full of the illusions cleverly chosen for him by an inner circle of advisers, who withhold all bad news and present him with no uncensored papers. Whatever be his state, it is clear that Goebbels and Himmler are still determined to keep up his prestige, if only as a curtain behind which they may plan the conduct of operations.

Master of the German internal situation, Himmler appears to be now manœuvring for control of foreign policy. He is said to have reached an understanding with the leading German generals, to have come round to their view that negotiation is more possible with the Western Powers than with Russia, and to have ensured that Guderian and Rundstedt should not be interfered with in their conduct of strictly military operations. He is said also to believe that his chief bargaining weapon is Hitler himself, whom he would give up in order to secure a reasonable compromise, but whom he now keeps as a potent but mythical figure in the background. Opposition to such plans is said to come from the German Foreign Office, who hold that there is no likelihood of any of the Allies negotiating at all with Himmler. Himmler's answer to this is reported to be a plan to replace Ribbentrop by someone, such as Neubacher or Seyss Inquart, more amenable to his plans. There are persistent reports that Weiszäcker recently put tentative proposals to the Pope, presumably acting on Ribbentrop's orders. The coincidence of political unrest in Europe and the German western offensive may well induce Himmler either to press such proposals or to embark on a different line of approach to the Allies. But no evidence of such a change in German foreign policy is as yet visible.

Following the terrorism reported in this Summary (No. 271) the Kölnische Zeitung is said to have contained reports of death sentences passed by a German "Fehme" court on four burgomasters in the Aachen district for collaboration with the Allies. A copy of the paper has not yet been received, but this D.N.B. on the 20th confirmed, and gave wide publicity to these first signs of the treatment which was practised by secret courts and the Freikorps in Germany after the last war and which is being systematically prepared by Himmler's underground organisation.

Since the Channel Islands were last mentioned in this Summary (cf. No. 268), further information has been received from both Guernsey and Jersey as to the shortage of essential supplies on the islands. In the course of a detailed memorandum submitted to the Command of the Occupying Forces in Jersey on the 31st August, the Bailiff asserted that stocks of the most essential foods would be exhausted by mid-November, that the lack of soap and anæsthetics was considered to be specially alarming and that "unless fuel and medical supplies can be obtained soon this island faces conditions involving the most serious consequences." This memorandum, which on the face of it would seem to show commendable energy, has been criticised by an organisation called "the Jersey Democratic Movement" as a belated attempt to whitewash a bad official record and to impress the public of Jersey. A similar account was given in answer to a question at the States meeting in Guernsey on the 1st November. No ration of grain, soap or meat had been possible since August. The stock of clothing was almost exhausted. The standard bread ration was 4½ lb. per week. The fuel position was reported to be even more serious than that of medical supplies. No news is yet to hand of the arrival of the ship-load of supplies despatched to the Islands.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

This year, as usual, the Slovak leaders all issued Christmas messages to their countrymen, but on this occasion they had nothing cheerful to say. The keynote in every case was one of anxious foreboding. President Tiso, after a gloomy reference to the death and destruction being wrought to "apocalyptic Bolshevism unleashed by capitalists," went on to compare the present Christmas with the first Christmas, when people did not realise, in the misery which beset them, that the Messiah was standing at their doors; even now, he insisted, it was possible, granted faith and hope, "to trust that we shall see the recognition of our right and victory." The other speeches and articles provided the same compound of solidly based apprehension and vague hopefulness. Gaspar's message contained the frank admission that "the Slovaks are divided into two camps: the camp of life and that of decay"; while the newspaper Napred spoke of "the sword of Damocles hanging over Bratislava and all Slovakia."

In the Protectorate President Hácha spoke to the Czechs on Christmas Eve. Once more he praised his listeners for their common sense and appealed for continued patience, tolerance, discipline and order.

Mr. L. A. Steinhardt has been nominated as the new United States Ambassador to the Czechoslovak Government. Mr. Steinhardt has previously served in Sweden, Peru, Moscow and Angora. A Czechoslovak Consulate was opened at Marseilles on the 11th December to look after the interests of the estimated 7,000 Czechoslovak subjects in Southern France.

POLAND.

The French Foreign Minister, in his statement on the 21st December, said that in negotiating the new Franco-Soviet Treaty the French delegates had raised no objection to the Soviet plan for handing over Pomerania and Silesia to Poland (see under "France"). The French delegates also agreed, while in Moscow, to an exchange of delegates with the Lublin Committee; the French delegate, M. Fouchet, has been serving in the Embassy in Moscow, while the Lublin delegate, M. Jedrychowski, has represented the Committee in Moscow and acted as propaganda chief.

The Polish Peasant Party in London, whose head is M. Mikolajczyk, has begun the issue of a weekly paper, Jutro Polski, in the first issue of which the attitude of the party is defined in sharp opposition to M. Arciszewski's Cabinet, which is described suggestively as "Nationalist-Socialist," and as being unrepresentative. A statement is attributed to M. Mikolajczyk to the effect that he would not join any new Government unless President Raczkiewicz resigned.

It has been foreshadowed that the Lublin Committee, which is holding a meeting on the 31st December, may use the occasion to declare itself as Polish Provisional Government of Poland, with M. Bierut as President and M. Osobka-Morawski as Premier. Further messages of support for this project are reported as coming from Poles in South Africa, the United States, Palestine, London and Mexico; and notably from France, where an appreciable proportion of the Polish workers have been working with Left-wing resistance organisations during the German occupation.

It has been announced that General Berling, who has been in Command of the Polish Army fighting with the Red Army in Poland, has been replaced by General Korczyc, hitherto Chief of Staff to the Polish Commander-in-Chief at Lublin, General Rola-Zymierski. General Korczyc, who comes of a Polish landowning family, has served for a long time with the Soviet forces.

SOVIET UNION

Again no change has been reported from the Soviet side on the Soviet-German front north of Czechoslovakia. On both sides of the Slovak-Hungarian border between Levice (captured 24th December) and Košice there has been a steady advance and consolidation. The most striking advance, however, took place south-west of Budapest, where a break-through by troops of the Third Ukrainian front led to the complete encirclement of Budapest. In this advance Székesfehérvár was taken on 24th December and Esztergom on the Danube on the 26th December. On the same date several of the western suburbs of Budapest fell to the Red Army. (For political developments in Hungary see under "South-Eastern Europe.")

A British all-party parliamentary delegation of ten members (two from the House of Lords and eight from the House of Commons) is to visit the Soviet Union early in the New Year. Meanwhile the Soviet press has been following the German offensive in the west, but comment has on the whole been optimistic: emphasis has been laid on the local surprise attained by the Germans, and—with heavy sarcasm—on the "propaganda offensive" for German home consumption which has accompanied military operations. Pravda of the 24th December expressed regret that "at a time when the Germans are invading Belgium, the fighters of the resistance movement are actually forbidden to participate in the defence of the country," and asked: "Does not this mean that in Belgium there are still people who fear the anti-fascist activities of the resistance forces more than a repetition of German occupation?"

A Soviet trade union delegation has departed for France, at the invitation of the French General Confederation of Labour. The head of the delegation is M. Soloviev, secretary of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, and its object is described as being "to establish personal contact with the French trade union movement and to discuss the possibilities of establishing friendly relations and organisational links between the trade unions of France and the U.S.S.R." Meanwhile the Franco-Soviet Treaty (see last week's Summary) was ratified by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet on the 25th December.

On two previous occasions recently articles of great interest have appeared from the pen of M. N. Malinin—one on war aims (see Summary No. 199) and one on the organisation of international security (see Summary No. 252). Now the same author has flown another kite in the shape of an article contributed to The War and The Working Class on regional organisation under the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. M. Malinin observes that the League of Nations spent more time over the Chaco war than over the threat from Hitler. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals try to remedy this by providing for regional agencies: but these proposals still remain vague. In particular it is important that there should not be too great a divorce between the regional agencies and the central security organisation, since this might lower the prestige of the latter and encourage major divergencies of principles and policy in different regions. Regional blocs, implying hostility to other blocs, must be avoided. But present-day needs demand "zones of security," since the security of one country can be threatened from the territory of weak neighbours. "Could anyone object," M. Malinin asks, "if England should find it necessary to make a special agreement with Belgium and Holland so as to make it impossible for these territories to be used as a springboard for attack on Britain? Equally, nobody would object if the Soviet Union, with the same purpose, wished to establish particularly friendly relations with its nearest neighbours." Such agreements benefit small Powers even more than great. But two conditions are essential: there should be no infringement of the sovereignty of the States concerned, and the borders of the "security zones" should be defined only by agreement between the leading Powers of the continent concerned. M. Malinin tentatively suggests dividing the general assembly of the world security organisation into four sections, dealing respectively with Europe, America, Asia and the Pacific, and Africa. States with interests in more than one continent would participate in the work of all the sections concerned. This article was written "as a basis for discussion," and it will be interesting to see if further comment is forthcoming.

Another article in The War and the Working Class has stated the Soviet case against Persia. The writer alleges (incorrectly) that American and Anglo-Dutch concessions in Persia include parts of the Russian concession voluntarily relinquished by the Soviet Government in 1921 on condition that the Persian Government should not transfer that concession to third States or individuals of other States. These concessions, therefore, represent a violation of the 1921 agreement and of "the minimum guarantees for the security of the Soviet southern border." Further, the article accuses the Persian Government of discriminating against the U.S.S.R. in favour of British and American oil companies, and declares that negotiations for new concessions were initiated by the Royal-Dutch Shell and the Standard Oil and Sinclair companies, with diplomatic backing, a year ago, without the Soviet Government ever having been consulted by its Allies. The article asserts that the objection to granting a concession to the U.S.S.R. was based solely on political prejudice, and instanced the bill recently introduced in the Majlis to prevent negotiations for further concessions as yet another act of discrimination, since it would leave the present concession-holders, among whom the Soviet Union does not figure, in a position of effective monopoly.

The Extraordinary State Commission for the investigation of German war crimes has produced a report on atrocities committed in the Lithuanian S.S.R. The details are sickeningly familiar, including the massacre of 165,000 Soviet prisoners of war and 300,000 civilians, and a systematic attempt to eradicate Lithuanian culture. Those named as responsible include Reichskommissar Zohse, Deputy Reichskommissars Esse, Mattissen and Freundt, Generalkommissar of Lithuania von Renteln, and 110 other officials, army and S.S. officers.

It was announced in Moscow on the 21st December that M. Lazar Kaganovich had been released from the post of Peoples' Commissar for Railways of the U.S.S.R. and appointed a Deputy Chairman of the Council of Peoples' Commissars. He has been succeeded by Lieut.-General I. V. Kovalev, who was previously Deputy Peoples' Commissar for State Control of Railway Transport and before that Deputy Peoples' Commissar of Transport and Communications. When M. Kaganovich was last relieved of this Peoples' Commissariat (which he has held with brief intermissions since 1935) in April 1942 it was to undertake an important job in reorganising transport in the Caucasus. His present assignment is unknown, but it is most unlikely that the man mainly responsible for the brilliant functioning of Soviet transport during the war will be left for long without important work.

For the signature of the Finnish-Soviet Indemnity Agreement see under "Scandinavia."

SCANDINAVIA.

The carrying out of the Finnish Armistice terms seems to be proceeding on the whole satisfactorily. A report has been received from General Valve, the new Minister of Defence, that demobilisation had been completed by the 5th December, and the army reduced to its peace-time level. On the 8th December the Soviet-Finnish Commission dealing with the territory handed over at Porkkala Udd was stated to have concluded its work. The question of reparation, which for some time caused difficulty, owing to the Russian insistence on valuing Finnish deliveries at 1938 prices instead of at those now prevailing, which are twice as high, was settled on the 17th December by the signature of an agreement which embodies a concession of an additional 15 per cent. for ships and machinery and 10 per cent. for consumption goods. A favourable impression has been produced by the release of two prominent Finns charged with war crimes—Generals Pajari and Palojärvi. The Swedish paper Göteborgs Posten (21st December) maintains that no one could have complained if these persons had been punished, since both had been responsible for the shooting of prisoners of war. Finnish public opinion is, however, depressed by its own estimate of the post-war prospects of national independence, and mild treatment at the present juncture has not disposed of gloomy forebodings as to the ultimate fate of the country.

There have been further violations of the Swedish frontier by the German forces in Finland; in an incident of this kind on the 14th December a trespassing German soldier was shot after an ineffective warning. Arrests were reported on the 18th December of persons said to be involved in an extensive smuggling of ball-bearings from Karlskrona and other ports; according to Aftonbladet, which alleges that one of the gangs concerned made a profit of over 40,000 kronor on a single transaction, further developments are expected which may make this case the biggest of its kind since the outbreak of war.

Permission accorded to a Russian delegation to visit the Baltic refugee camps in Sweden has been criticised in the Swedish press, on the ground that it implies a premature and servile recognition of Soviet sovereignty in the Baltic States.

A Swedish Norwegian volunteer union was formed in Stockholm on the 12th December, as a preliminary step towards the recruitment of a force which, it was admitted, could not be enrolled without Government sanction. The step is approved by Dagens Nyheter, on the ground that preparations must be made in time, if such assistance is to be effective when required.

In a broadcast to the people of Norway on the 26th December M. Nygaardsvold, the Norwegian Premier, stated that the Germans must be punished for the calculated crime which they had committed in the devastation of northern Norway. He dealt with the steps being taken to provide relief in the liberated area, and associated himself with the disappointment expressed at the absence of an Allied attack from the west directed to cut off the German line of retreat. He disclaimed knowledge of the plans of the responsible Allied authorities, but said that his Government had impressed upon them as strongly as possible the humanitarian and military advantages which they considered such an operation would secure, and expressed sympathy with the impatience felt in Norway at the delay in liberation. With regard to post-war plans, M. Nygaardsvold repeated and defined his earlier pledge to tender the resignation of the Government, saying that this would be done at the first Cabinet meeting in Oslo Palace after the liberation of the country was completed. He also touched on the difference of opinion existing as to whether the present Storting should be convened again, and tended to minimise the objections raised to such a course. A final decision, however, he urged, should wait until after the return of the Government to Norway and after conference with the representatives of the Home Front.

There have been no new developments in Denmark, where sabotage, liquidation of informers and the counter-measures of "schalburgtage" and "clearing murders" continue as usual.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The German offensive has given the Belgians a sharp reminder that the war is not yet over. Public opinion has swung round to the view that Party differences are as nothing compared to the importance of displaying national unity in the face of danger. Papers of all political shades have been in emphatic agreement on this point. It was in such a spirit that M. Pierlot broadcast on the 23rd. Proclaiming his robust confidence that the desperate adventure undertaken by the enemy would be his downfall, he declared "to-day all Belgians are in the service of the nation," and directed that all orders given by the Allied military authorities were to be obeyed both by civil servants and by ordinary members of the public.

On the 24th General Erskine also broadcast a message of hope and exhortation. He praised the spirit of the Belgian working men and stated that "Belgium is destined to play an increasingly important part on the battlefield, in the factory, in the mines, in the workshops, in the docks, on the railways and canals." It was no use pretending that life was easy for the Belgians, but they had a great opportunity to serve their country and the common Allied cause and he was confident that they would do their duty and that conditions in Belgium would gradually improve.

The policy of disarming members of the Belgian resistance organisations is being continued and reminders that all arms must be handed in have been published. On the 18th M. Demany, who until recently represented the Independence Front in the Cabinet, offered to reconstitute the armed formations of that body and to place them at the disposal of General Erskine, but his offer was politely refused.

M. Gutt has now published his proposals for a tax on war profits. Briefly, they are that all capital increases since the 9th May, 1940, with certain exceptions, be absorbed by taxation. So drastic a plan will certainly be disliked by those affected, but there seems to be little doubt that it will be popular with the masses and the present emergency may moderate the opposition of the wealthy, who may well shrink from jeopardising the life of the Government.

FRANCE.

The Franco-Soviet pact was discussed by the Consultative Assembly on the 21st December. The debate, which was given an excellent press by the Paris papers, was opened by M. Bidault, who was in better form than when he spoke on the 21st November, but still did not give the impression of being likely to become a forceful Parliamentary figure. After describing the purpose of the pact, M. Bidault emphasised that there could be no question of an alliance or bloc with which Great Britain and the U.S.A. were not associated. The Government had just set up a committee under the chairmanship of M. Paul-Boncour to examine the Dumbarton Oaks Agreement with special reference to the manner in which France, Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R. could combine to ensure true peace and security. This should answer the criticisms of a section of the American press. Turning to the German question, M. Bidault confirmed that France did not wish the Reich to retain control of the Rhineland and Rheno-Westphalian basin. The forces of the free countries, those of France above all, should mount guard on the Rhine and the factories of the Rhine and Ruhr should work first to repair the damage caused by the Prussian war machine and then for the well-being of the world. M. Bidault also said that the Government had agreed to the Soviet Government's proposals for the cession to Poland of East Prussia, Pomerania and the Silesian industrial basin. France held dear her traditional friendship for Poland and deplored the failure of the Polish Government in London to reach agreement with the Soviet Government, and that of the Lublin Committee to agree with the Polish Government in London. Conditions clearly did not yet allow the Polish nation to express its wishes and the French Government would therefore continue to recognise the present Polish Government. In an interview with a representative of Carrefour he said, however, that the solution of questions concerning liberated French prisoners might necessitate contacts with the Lublin Committee. It is understood that unofficial representatives have in fact now been exchanged.

The debate was wound up by General de Gaulle in a brief but forceful speech. His statement that France could not conceive either of victory or of an organisation of security "without an effective alliance with London" met with tremendous applause. It was no less obvious, he said, that "specific links" were necessary "with those continental States which have been, are, and may again become the chosen victims of German ambition, such as Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Holland and Luxemburg" .... The common ordeal must not come to an end without the establishment of a general system of co-operation and security at least from the strategic and economic points of view and such a system would obviously have to include the United States of America, without whose aid victory and lasting peace would alike be impossible. France would contribute to it to the full extent of her capabilities. In conclusion General de Gaulle reminded the Assembly of the present German offensive. The war was not yet won and it seemed that "the same conjunction of circumstances which is gradually convincing everybody that world affairs cannot be settled without France shows at the same time that the victory on which such settlement depends cannot be achieved without us." In this field, too, France accepted full responsibility.

The Assembly adopted with acclamation a resolution congratulating the Government on the conclusion of the Franco-Soviet pact and expressing the hope that it would be followed by a series of similar agreements confirming the close solidarity of France with the other United Nations. The pact was ratified by the Council of Ministers on the following day. It is noteworthy that the German offensive in the west and the Consultative Assembly's debate have given the Paris press fresh cause to demand arms for the French forces and a further mobilisation of French resources in the war effort.

In a broadcast on the 22nd December M. Pleven announced that the results so far received showed that the Liberation Loan (see Summary No. 266) had raised more than 155 milliard francs. He claimed that this was a success achieved in very difficult conditions. At the same time the procedure for tracing and confiscating illicit profits had been quickened and more than 6,000 corporate bodies had been arraigned before Committees of Confiscation since the 15th November. As a further part of its financial programme the Government intended to take a census of all holdings abroad and to mobilise them.

The Resistance group known as Ceux de la Résistance has held a congress in Paris and passed a resolution in favour of the creation of Commissions d'entente paritaire with the object of co-ordinating and unifying all French Resistance movements as soon as possible. Another motion forbade all members of the executive committees of the movement to apply the directives of any political party within the movement or to allow their action to be influenced by party ideology. A Congress has also been held by the Radical Socialist party. Thirty Deputies and Senators were expelled from the Party and the assembly passed a vote of confidence in General de Gaulle.

Georges Albertini, who was Marcel Déat's directeur de cabinet at the time of the Liberation of France, has been condemned to five years' hard labour by the Paris Court of Justice. Roger Bertrand, also a former directeur de cabinet to Déat, has been arrested at Agen and Angelo Chiappe, former Vichy Prefect of the Gard and brother of the former Prefect of Police, has been sentenced to death at Nîmes. (See also under "Poland" and "Soviet Union.")

SPAIN.

Lord Templewood's speech in the debate in the House of Lords on the 19th December was given prominence in the Madrid press, which gave, from the Spanish point of view, a fair summary of it. Those parts of the speech dealing with Spain were of course glossed over, with the remark that Lord Templewood gave "excessive importance to supposed foreign influence during the first years of the war, and to details of police methods." In complete consistence with this attitude, the passages on the liberties of speech and the press were omitted; moreover, Lord Samuel's speech was not mentioned at all, while Lord Cranborne had the unusual honour of being specially censored by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs itself. It is interesting to note in a new-proclaimed "organic" democracy this tenderness for the susceptibility of the Spanish conscience, which must be protected against the vicious temptations of free thought, free speech and free writing. But Franco has always been a conscientious father to his flock.

Christmas is a time of peace and goodwill, and is not usually, even in Spain, the occasion for political conspiracy and upstirring. But it looks as if the Spanish authorities were nervous lest there should be trouble this year, for the series of preventive arrests which have been carried out during the last few weeks culminated on the night of the 22nd December, when about 300 Republican and Monarchist sympathisers, mostly of the professional classes, were taken into custody. Dr. Marañón, a leading Republican physician and one of the few opponents of the régime previously allowed to return, was visited by the police at 2 a.m.—socially the equivalent of 10.30 p.m. in England—but refused to leave his house. The Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior were at a dance at the Pardo given in honour of Franco's daughter, and apparently knew nothing about most of the arrests. On their return, trying to repair what they seem to have recognised as a blunder, they gave instructions for Dr. Marañón not to be molested any further, and since then most of the people arrested have been released. Dr. Marañón is the father-in-law of the British Press Attaché.

There has been, too, a certain amount of unrest throughout the country which has provoked a number of minor disturbances in different places. For the moment, the effect of these incidents is not likely to do more than strengthen the belief of the middle and conservative classes, who are living quite comfortably, that Franco, with all his faults, still stands as a bulwark against anarchy. What the masses think is not so well indicated, but it is to be noted that not all the persons responsible for these little commotions are terrorists. Although the Spanish people have a high capacity for endurance—they need to have—there is a limit to the practice of the most austere philosophy, and there is no question but that the ordinary, poor, working people, who have looked up and have not been fed, have had enough of the Falange. And, with encouragement, they would give vent to their repressed feelings with some violence. But only given sufficient encouragement to break the grip of the Gestapo-trained Falange police.

In Tangier, Señor Tomás Súñer, after acting as Delegate of the Spanish High Commission in Morocco during General Uriarte's absence on leave, has left the Zone. General Uriarte, who was Military Governor and who was believed not to be returning (see Summary No. 263), has in fact gone back to resume charge of his regiment, but it appears that the Spanish Government have evaded the issue of reappointing a Military Governor. Their intention seems to be to continue to identify the "Delegación" with the Spanish Consulate-General, which still exists in its own right by virtue of its status under the International Régime. The present policy of associating the office of Delegate with the Consulate-General may well be calculated to appease those foreign Powers who dislike dealing with a "Delegación" which has no legal status, and perhaps, optimistically, to accustom the Tangerine public to normal dealings with an eventual Spanish Administration.

ITALY.

The Italian Council of Ministers has decided to set up a Consultative Assembly to advise the Government on technical and political problems. The Assembly, it is stated, will act as liaison between the executive and the people. The decision has been favourably commented on in the press, but Italia Libera (Action Party) voices the opinion that the Assembly should not be limited to a series of technical and scientific advisory commissions, but should assume the wider responsibilities which the Committee of National Liberation wishes to be entrusted to such an Assembly.

Count Sforza has addressed a letter to Signor Bonomi declining the post of Italian representative in Washington lest, he states, his arrival there might give rise to fresh dissensions. He declares that he still stands for a fruitful understanding between Italy and the two Great English-speaking democracies. Signor Bonomi, it is understood, is now endeavouring to find a successor to Count Sforza, and has in view one or two candidates for the post.

L'Italia Nuova (Democrat) of the 16th December reports an interview with Signor Scoccimarro, the new Communist Minister for Occupied Territories, in which he gives his views as to the activities which should be embraced by the new ministry. Although Signor Scoccimarro complained in Unità of the 17th December that he had not been accurately reported, and that the field of the new ministry's activities must be settled by the Government, it is not unlikely that the scheme outlined in the interview bears some resemblance to the wide powers which Signor Scoccimarro would like to wield. According to the interview as published in L'Italia Nuova, the Ministry will be divided into Political, Economic, Military and International Political Departments which, among other functions, will interest themselves in underground political activities in the north, make plans to control those industries whose owners have collaborated with the enemy, care for and compensate those who have suffered for political reasons at the hands of the enemy, and help to regulate relations with neighbouring countries when problems arise out of the actions of partisan groups. It is clear that such far-reaching powers if entrusted to an ardent Communist of Signor Scoccimarro's brand might easily be given a political twist to facilitate a favourable reception to the Communist Party on the liberation of the north.

On the 22nd December Generals Pentimalli and Del Tetto were both sentenced by the High Court of Justice to twenty years' imprisonment for abandoning their command in Naples. They were found not guilty of treachery or of collaborating with the enemy.

There is little news from the Italian Social Republic this week. Mussolini stayed on for four days in Milan after delivering his speech of the 16th December (see last week's Summary). During this time he toured the city and reviewed troops. He was greeted everywhere with tremendous enthusiasm, according to Fascist-controlled reports, which included an eye-witness account broadcast by John Amery. Swiss papers, however, say that the visit was preceded by 7,000 preventive arrests, and account for Milan's apparently enthusiastic welcome by the fact that the city and its surroundings contain at least 40,000 refugees from liberated Italy, including the most fanatical Fascists who fled thither from Rome and the south. According to these neutral reports, the real people of Milan took no interest in the spectacle. Indeed, a general apathy and misery would seem to have descended on the city. Enthusiasm for the war has waned in the face of disappointment at the slow Allied advance, and living conditions grow daily worse. Ration cards are practically worthless, whereas anything can be obtained at fantastic prices on the black market.

The Turin Stampa, whose editor, Pettinato, has recently published articles critical of the single-party system, made Mussolini's speech and his defence of the Fascist régime the occasion for some further observations on the value of free criticism within the State. Popolo di Alessandria has even gone so far as to propose a monarchist party centring round the Aosta branch of the House of Savoy.

Marshal Graziani, who accompanied Mussolini to Milan, has broadcast a Christmas message to Italian and German troops urging them to fight on side by side.

THE VATICAN.

Vatican wireless in Spanish of the 12th December carried the address of the Bishop Gonzalas of Colombia on the Feast of Our Lady of Guadeloupe. He sang the praises of Spain and Spanish-America "united in race and Catholic tradition" and of Spain itself, "as Franco revived it, the application of whose laws is based on purely Christian principles, whose civilisation, based on the Rock of the Catholic Church, is founded on work, the family, respect for old age, on science and art, and which even includes the convicts in the prisons." (See Summary No. 266, "Spain," for the unconscious irony of the last remark.) The broadcast reflects the negative or red bogey influences in the Vatican outlook, which are, however, fast yielding to the new importance given to social problems and the rights of man. The more positive outlook was seen in the Pope's address of the 15th December when he received in audience members of the Military Affairs Committee of the United States House of Representatives. The questions legislators will have to decide "reach down to the roots of human society, to the inviolability of the human person, to those individually god-given rights which are antecedent to the State and which no State dare infringe without jeopardising its own existence" . . . . "The war will end, but the peace that men will clutch at will crumble in their hands unless God has first place in the Councils of the Nations."

The Pope will sing the Christmas Midnight Mass in St. Peter's, instead of in his private chapel where he sang it the last two years before the Allies freed Rome.

The Argentine gave a considerable tonnage of supplies to the Vatican for its relief work. At present Vatican supplies come from Allied sources, and the greater part is devoted to relief. It was agreed recently that the Argentine goods should be allowed to enter the Vatican. One problem, however, still remained to be settled. Should the tonnage of Argentine supplies be deducted from the deliveries the Allies had promised. In that case the Argentine would be relieving the Allies of a burden, and the Vatican of some financial liability since the Vatican will pay for its supplies, without in any way adding to the Vatican's capacity to give relief: or should the Argentine gift be used merely to enable the Pope to relieve more persons?

Following the papal appeal on the subject of the numerous hospitals at Imola, the Allied Command has now agreed to take precautions to ensure, as far as possible, that these buildings and their inmates be preserved from harm. The Vatican has communicated to both belligerents the terms of the appeal made by the Bishop of Verona in which he asks that the city of Verona may be spared from becoming a battlefield.

In a long broadcast on Christmas Eve the Pope discussed democracy and the problems of an effective peace.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

During the early part of the week the Soviet forces made small advances on their right flank, following these up by a swift movement on the left. Székesfehérvár was taken on the 24th December, Esztergom on the 26th December. Budapest was now completely encircled and fighting was reported in its suburbs, several of which were captured. Its surrender seems imminent. There was a further hurried last-minute evacuation of Government offices, &c., and of stocks, from Budapest. Among the persons ordered to leave were all officers—active, reserve, retired, &c.—and their families. Many civilians have fled also, but most of the population, especially the workers, have remained, even resisting appeals to go. It is confirmed that large numbers of Jews—according to some accounts, 40,000—have been marched to Germany, to the accompaniment of brutal treatment, and there set to work digging fortifications. The remainder are being collected in a central ghetto.

Meanwhile, under Soviet auspices, a Provisional National Assembly has been constituted in Debrecen and a provisional Government formed. The latter is composed of officers who went over to the U.S.S.R. after Admiral Horthy's proclamation of the 14th October; these include the Premier, Colonel-General Miklós and the Minister of Defence (Colonel-General Vörös), independent personalities (including some members of the Armistice delegation from Moscow, among whom is Count Géza Teleki, son of the late Paul Teleki, as Minister of Education) and representatives of the small-holders, National Peasants', Social Democrat and Communist Parties. After its composition, the Premier read out a declaration, which in its terms embodied, amongst other things, acceptance of the preliminary armistice conditions previously presented to the Hungarian Armistice delegation in Moscow. While referring to Admiral Horthy as Head of the State, he emphasised the democratic character of the new Government, which would break completely with Germany, ask for a definite armistice with the Allies, work for the closest friendship with all democratic countries, the United States, Great Britain and above all the U.S.S.R., and join with the U.S.S.R. in completing the liberation of the country by mobilising all forces against the Germans and their quislings. Democratic rights and institutions were guaranteed and reforms, including land reform, promised. Private property and initiative would be respected. Discriminatory legislation, including anti-Jewish laws, was abolished. The Arrow Cross and kindred organisations were disbanded. Hungary would compensate the U.S.S.R. and her neighbours for material damage caused by the war. A special appeal was issued to all officers and soldiers still on the German side of the line to join in the struggle for liberation.

The new Foreign Minister has announced that "we are breaking with Germany immediately and shall, if possible, engage in the war on the side of the Soviet Union and the Allies."

Roumania.

The threat of the Soviet authorities to remove to Russia the Astra-Româna plant for the production of 100-octane benzine is occupying the attention of the British authorities in London, Bucarest and Moscow. A respite of four days before the dismantling of the plant begins has been obtained. The plant is claimed by the Soviet as war booty, and the British authorities contend that it is the property of the Astra Company. It has been pointed out that, if left where it is, the production of 100-octane spirit can begin within three months, while if taken to Russia it will be over a year before it can be got going. The widening of the railway track for its removal (which seems to be undertaken by the Russians quite lightheartedly) will also interfere with other transport and put a severe strain on labour. At the moment of writing the matter is still under discussion, but the dismantling of the plant had been begun before the expiration of the four days of grace.

Permission has been obtained for the entry into Roumania of a British specialist to treat Russian soldiers with penicillin. In reply to a reminder that the return of forty petroleum experts had been promised by Christmas, it was pointed out that the Russian Christmas falls thirteen days later than the Roumanian.

An attempt—fortunately unsuccessful—on the life of the Vice-Premier, Dl Petre Grozea, has been made at the Athene Palas Hotel. It is stated that the assailants were "two landowners." The description is intriguing. A considerable majority of Roumanian peasants are "landowners," so it by no means follows that the would-be assassins were representatives of the capitalist class who desired to rid themselves of a Communist Minister.

Yugoslavia.

There has been little change in the military situation. The Partisans have entered Zvornik. Thus Serbia appears completely evacuated by the Germans, who are fighting their way northwards down the Drina and the Bosna. Their extreme rearguard in central Montenegro is slowly struggling to effect contact with the German force still in the western Sandjak. In western Bosnia the Partisans have pushed forward, occupied Srb, at the head of the Una valley, and were reported to be fighting in Banjaluka.

The Partisans are rapidly constructing a single-party régime. Tito is said to desire the widest possible basis of support and therefore to retain the services of as many technical and administrative officials as possible. Past records, short of activity against the Partisans, are covered by the amnesty. But there must be no opposition to the new régime. Thus the newspapers all speak with the same voice. And a decree of the National Liberation Committee, of the 19th December, requires judges and civil servants to take an oath to respect the law, the interests of the people and the achievements of the National Liberation struggle. Zechevitch, the Orthodox priest who is Commissar for the Interior, was reported in the press as saying: "There are no politics outside the Unified National Liberation Front." And Neshkovitch, the Secretary of the Front in Serbia, as saying: "The National Liberation Front is not an instrument of State or of authority, but an all-national political organisation of national liberation."

Presumably, thanks to the energetic intervention of Tito there have lately been no manifestations of a Partisan intention to intervene in Greek Macedonia. To the same source appear attributable the much-improved British relations with the Partisans in Dalmatia and Montenegro.

The terms on which Tito will accept the agreement with the Allied military authorities on the supply of relief have now been received and it appears probable that a formal agreement will soon be concluded. Meanwhile, in anticipation of the actual agreement, 500 tons of food and medical equipment are reported to have been sent to Dalmatia on the 18th December.

The consideration of the latest Tito–Shubashitch agreement on the formation of a United Yugoslav Government proceeds in London.

Greece.

E.L.A.S.'s reply to General Scobie (see last Summary) did not reach the British authorities until the night of the 22nd, and it was decided to consult Field-Marshal Alexander, who was due to reach Athens on the 24th, before replying to this communication. Briefly, E.L.A.S. made the following points: The Caserta Agreement did not justify the "blood-stained intervention" of the British; the Greek people was master in its own country and must have a free and independent Government, which would deal with collaborators, organise a regular National Army, and guide the country to free elections; the Mountain Brigade and any other Greek Units from the Middle East must be withdrawn to the Cyclades and the gendarmerie must be disarmed, disbanded and purged;

the disarmament and imprisonment of former members of the Security Battalions must be further verified; on general agreement being reached, E.L.A.S. would withdraw from Athens and Piræus and would accept disarmament "simultaneously with that of the supporters of the opposite Party"; surrender of arms could be made only to "a Greek Government of mutual confidence."

Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden arrived in Athens on Christmas Day, and, after consultations with Field-Marshal Alexander, Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Leeper, they informed M. Papandreou that they proposed to convene a conference, as far as possible representative of Greek political opinion, under the presidency of Archbishop Damaskinos (for whom see last Summary). The Central Committee of E.L.A.S. were invited to send three or four delegates, whose safe-conduct was guaranteed; this invitation was accepted. The Conference opened in the late afternoon of the 26th; those who attended were: British representatives—Mr. Churchill, Mr. Eden, Mr. Macmillan, Mr. Leeper, Field-Marshal Alexander, General Scobie; Greek political leaders—MM. Papandreou, Sophoulis, Kaphandaris, Maximos, Dragoumis, and General Plastiras; E.L.A.S. Central Committee—M. Siantos, Secretary-General of the Communist Party; M. Partsalidis, Secretary-General of E.A.M.; and General Mandakas, none of whom had held office under M. Papandreou; there were also present as observers the United States Ambassador, the French Minister, and the Soviet military representative. After a speech of welcome by the Archbishop and speeches by Mr. Churchill, Field-Marshal Alexander, and M. Papandreou, the British representatives withdrew, leaving the Greeks to continue the discussions. Before the British withdrew, M. Partsalidis expressed his surprise at the absence of representatives of those political parties of which E.A.M. was composed, whereupon Mr. Eden explained that the Conference could invite anyone it liked to attend. The Conference is proceeding.

Albania.

Albanian partisans—who now call themselves the National Liberation Army of Albania—have been continuing the fight in Yugoslav territory alongside the Yugoslav partisans. The Tirana radio broadcast a message received from Marshal Tito on Albanian Independence Day congratulating the Albanians on their heroic fight for freedom and assuring them that the union of the Albanian and Yugoslav forces to-day was a symbol of future brotherhood between two free nations.

The "Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation," as Enver Hoxha's provisional Government now styles itself, has decided to set up a special court in every prefecture to try war criminals, and it is now explained that the amnesty does not cover the organisers of Balli Kombetar, the Legality Party, the Fascist Militia, the Skanderbeg S.S. Division or the gendarmerie.

The provisional Government is finding the economic problem difficult. It has banned exports, it is requisitioning professional services for reconstruction and supplies for the forces, it denounces black marketeers, and proposes to take industrial and business concerns under control.

Bulgaria.

Although the Bulgarian Government professes to have given orders to prevent Bulgarians from taking part in the Greek conflict, there are indications of Bulgarian reinforcements and supplies finding their way to E.A.M.

Two divisions of the People's Court duly opened proceedings in Sofia on the 20th December. In each division the bench consists of four professional judges and five "People's judges," the latter of whom, like the officers of the court, have all suffered from the previous régime directly or through their relatives. The Prime Minister, M. Gheorghiev, recently described the purpose of the People's Court as being to impose a sentence which firstly would punish those guilty of plunging the country into the war against the people's will, and secondly would prevent such a recurrence. But the spirit in which the trial has been approached may be gauged from passages in a manifesto broadcast before the trial by the local Fatherland Front committee: "The people demand death for the traitors and murderers. . . . . Citizens! En masse to the trial! . . . . Support the People's Court in Order to finish the purge once and for all!" Recent history having shown that political opponents who are merely imprisoned have an inconvenient way of reappearing in power, it seems as if the Government would take the chance of making a fairly clean sweep of those in its hands. The trial is expected to last two or three weeks.

Turkey.

The Turks make no secret of their desire to see an end put to disorder in Greece. Their concern is understandable enough, for were the extreme Left to triumph in Greece the Turks would have no further use for the Greek alliance which is one of the pillars of their foreign policy.

With regard to the German offensive in the west the Turkish press in general assumes that it is a desperate venture undertaken by the army rather than by Hitler or the Party in the hope of obtaining tolerable peace terms from the Allies. The general view is that the offensive can only prolong the war but not enable the Germans to avoid ultimate defeat.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

A new temporary Agreement between the United Kingdom and Ethiopia, superseding the Agreement and Military Convention of January 1942, was signed in Addis Ababa on the 19th December. Lord De La Warr and other members of the British delegation left Ethiopia on the following day, after a stay of nearly three months.

By this Agreement, that part of the "reserved areas" which lies on the north-western side of the Jibuti–Addis Ababa railway is returned to Ethiopian administration. The remainder of the previous "reserved areas," together with the Ogaden territory as defined in the Military Convention of 1942, are to remain under British military administration for the duration of the present Agreement, without prejudice to the Emperor's sovereignty over them. His Majesty's Government agree to relinquish the control and management of the section of the Jibuti–Addis Ababa railway lying in Ethiopian territory "within three months of receiving from the Imperial Ethiopian Government a formal assurance that satisfactory arrangements have been made for its continued efficient operation." The Ethiopian Government, for their part, agree that priority shall be given to any traffic for which it is requested either by M.E.S.C. or by the British military authorities, and they undertake that their arrangements for the operation and management of the line will not be such as to prejudice the rights of the Franco-Ethiopian Railway Company.

His Majesty's Government have relinquished the right to diplomatic precedence accorded to them by the Agreement of 1942, and the Emperor is also released from the obligation of consulting them before appointing foreign advisers of other than British nationality. The British Military Mission will remain in the country, with its expenses borne by His Majesty's Government, unless either of the High Contracting Parties, after consultation between them, desires its withdrawal. There is also provision for reciprocal civil aviation facilities, and for the operation of regular services to, in and over Ethiopia by one or more British air transport organisations. Freedom of navigation is safeguarded for the Air Forces of the Allies as well as for British military aircraft.

The Agreement entered into force on its signature, and is to remain in force until it is replaced by a Treaty, with the proviso that either party may give three months' notice to terminate it at any time after the 19th December, 1946.

A British offer to include in the Agreement provision for further financial assistance to Ethiopia was rejected. The proposal was for a development fund, to be administered by an Anglo-Ethiopian board, and to be supplied by His Majesty's Government with £500,000 every half-year during the currency of the Agreement, up to a maximum of six contributions. The Ethiopian negotiators would not agree to the element of foreign control involved in this proposal, which, however, was left open to their acceptance until the signature of the Agreement. They have been informed that His Majesty's Government will be ready to consider sympathetically any future representations on this subject, though we are no longer bound by the terms of the rejected offer.

It is hoped that this Agreement will regulate Anglo-Ethiopian relations to the satisfaction of both signatories until a more permanent and general settlement in the Horn of Africa can be considered.

The agrément of His Majesty's Government has been granted for the appointment of Dr. Armanazi as Syrian Minister in London. A Times editorial of the 12th December, on British policy towards the Levant States, has provoked the Damascus paper al-Kifah into sharp rejoinder. The writer declares somewhat obscurely that the terms used by The Times are those which it used after the last war on the subject of the "Sykes–Picot agreement," which was the cause of all Syria's subsequent miseries. The Syrians refused to have their future made a subject of secret bargaining.

The demonstrations which broke out in Cairo on the 23rd December involved some 15,000 students and showed a more bitter feeling against Great Britain than has been observed for many years. The demonstrations centred on the question of the Sudan and seem to have been organised by the Wafd. The students tore down pro-British posters in shops and pictures of Mr. Churchill but were finally dispersed without serious conflict. The Prime Minister himself went to the University and told the students that he had King Farouk's orders to suppress all forms of disorder and that it was not for them to settle the question of the candidature for Parliament of the Sudanese, Ali al Birair (see last Summary.)

THE FAR EAST.

Japanese publicity has shown great satisfaction at the news of the German counter-offensive on the Western front. "The new German thrusts," declared the Domei political correspondent on the 22nd December, "have wrecked Eisenhower's winter offensive schedule .... The entire Japanese nation is stimulated by the German counter-offensive and follows it closely. They are happy that their confidence in the Germans has not been in vain."

In the Japanese Cabinet Shigeru Yoshida has now replaced Ginjiro Fujiwara as Munitions Minister, and at the same time Admiral Seizo Kobayashi has been added to the Cabinet as Minister without Portfolio. Fujiwara, according to the Nippon Times, had "carried out his heavy task well," but had been relieved of his post on account of advanced age—he is 75—and ill health. Yoshida, who succeeds him, is 59; he has had a career in the civil service and has been a Cabinet Secretary and Welfare Minister. The Nippon Times asserts that the organisation of war production requires the "scientific handling of labour" and that Yoshida is specially competent for this task. The appointment of Admiral Kobayashi, on the other hand, is of political rather than administrative significance. After being for several years Governor-General of Formosa he was appointed President of the Yokusan Seijikai in place of General Abe, when the latter was sent to take over Koiso's post as Governor-General of Korea. The Seijikai was organised by Tojo in 1942 to act as an élite of the earlier Taisei Yokusankai, organised by Konoye in 1940, which had proved too complex and unwieldy to be of much use to the Government politically; in particular, the task of harnessing the politicians of the "defunct" parliamentary parties was felt to need a smaller and more compact body than the older organisation provided. The Taisei Yokusankai, however, was not abolished on the creation of the Seijikai; it has remained as an auxiliary of the State bureaucracy in supervising and co-ordinating all sorts of "national service" associations. Under Tojo it seems to have retained a formal supremacy over the Seijikai, for its head—at first General Ando and later Fumio Goto—was taken into the Cabinet as a Minister without Portfolio, whereas the head of the Seijikai was not. Now the positions have been reversed, and this appears to indicate an increase in the importance of the Seijikai relative to the parent organisation.

On the 22nd December Domei triumphantly announced that Japan had found in pine roots "a new source for unlimited supplies of excellent high-octane aviation petrol" and that a national campaign for collection of pine roots had been instituted. Whatever the practical possibilities of this particular ersatz device, it is significant that Japan should be thus talking about self-sufficiency in aviation petrol at a time when the Netherlands East Indies oilfields are already being subjected to bombardment from the air, the tanker fleet is seriously depleted and the American advance in the Philippines threatens a complete severance of the sea lanes to Sumatra and Borneo. The Japanese are being gradually introduced to the idea that they may be deprived (but without fatal results) of all the more bulky products of the South Seas supposed to have been secured to them by their conquests, just as they have for some time been taught not to expect any considerable addition to Japan's food supply from the rice surpluses of Indo-China, Siam and Burma. On the other hand, it is not admitted that the cutting of communications with the homeland means the end of Japanese power in the areas which have been, or may be, cut off; on the contrary, Japanese propaganda now devotes considerable attention to the capacity of the local and regional garrisons for carrying on by themselves. The garrison of Truk was recently described as dividing its time between strenuous military training and the cultivation of the allotments by which it supported itself, and a university professor is said to have been giving expert advice to an isolated garrison "near Australia" on the raising of food plants. There is a substantial basis of fact for this propaganda; although in some places Japanese units have been worn down by hunger, bodies of troops remain, subsisting somehow, not only in the Carolines but also in New Guinea, the Bismarcks and the Solomons, and the mopping-up of such troops, based on inland mountain and jungle strongholds, is a matter of great difficulty. Similar intractable pockets of resistance may be expected in parts of the Philippines, the Netherlands East Indies and South-East Asia until Japan's final collapse, and even then some of the ex-conquerors may continue as local bandits. The tentacles of this octopus may be severed from the body, but they show a remarkable power of independent wriggling.

Japanese propaganda to China has naturally made the most of the disclosure that the Atlantic Charter never existed as a formally signed document. A broadcast in English for China declared that "this so-called Charter was never meant to be implemented either in Europe or Asia, but the exposure of it by one of its own authors would not have come so early if the Soviet Union were not already treating it as a ridiculous scrap of paper"; the same broadcast quoted Senator Wheeler as having said in the Senate debate on the new American State Department appointments that the United States could not prevent Russia from taking Finland, Poland, the Dardanelles or "a large bit of China."

Marshal Stalin's speech of the 6th November in which he classified Japan as an aggressor nation was not reported in the Chungking Press except by the Communist organ, the Hsin Hwa Jih Pao, and by the Ta Kung Pao, which complained that he had mentioned only Japan's aggressions against Britain and the United States and had said nothing of her invasions of China. On the 15th November the Tass correspondent, who had never before asked a question at a Chungking Government press conference, caused a sensation by enquiring why it was that the speech had not been published by any other newspaper. Dr. K. C. Wu, the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, could only produce the somewhat lame explanation that the translation into Chinese had probably been too late for printing. In comment on the speech, he said that in branding Japan as an aggressor Marshal Stalin had expressed the sentiment of all the United Nations, and that he (Dr. Wu) fully agreed with the statements issued from Washington and London that the speech would result in closer co-operation with Russia in winning the war in the Far East and in establishing a durable peace. Dr. Wu rather pointedly avoided expression of any hope that the Soviet Union would participate in the Far Eastern war, and it is indeed notorious that the prospect of such participation is not regarded with enthusiasm in Chungking official circles.

General Wu Chung-hsin, the new Governor of Sinkiang, has now been at his post in Tihwa since early in October, and Liu Tse-yung, who has recently been serving in the Chinese Embassy in Moscow, has been sent there as Special Delegate for Foreign Affairs in place of Chaucer Wu, whose tenure of that difficult office has not been a happy one. The province remains in a disturbed condition, with raids by Kazakh and Kirghiz tribesmen from both the tribal areas of the province itself and from Soviet territory, but so far no determined attempt to overthrow the existing régime appears to have been made. There is no further news of the situation in Kulja.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The 78th Congress ended on the 19th December. One of the last acts of the Senate was to ratify the nomination of the new Under-Secretary (Mr. Joseph Grew) and the five Assistant Secretaries of the State Department. Mr. Roosevelt is reported to have summoned the four Democratic Senators of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to have insisted that they should break the deadlock over the acceptance of his nominees, and to have stated that if they persisted in their filibustering tactics he would present the same names to the new Senate when it met in January. The battle over the confirmation of the appointments is seen by many well-informed commentators as symptomatic of the Senate's uneasiness and dissatisfaction over the present course of America's foreign policy and as evidence of its determination to assert its prerogative in this field (see Summaries Nos. 270 and 271).

Consternation over the turn of events in Europe has been heightened by Mr. Roosevelt's revelation that the Atlantic Charter was not a formally signed document. The President has remarked, however, that "the objectives of the Atlantic Charter were as valid to-day as when they were announced in 1941," and has compared them with the Ten Commandments and with Wilson's Fourteen Points, pointing out that, although all the objectives might not be achieved, they were worth striving after.

The wave of criticism against the alleged power politics of Russia and Britain still continues, and Senator Ball (Republican, Minnesota), a pronounced internationalist who supported Mr. Roosevelt because of his dissatisfaction with Mr. Dewey's stand in foreign affairs, joined the isolationist Senator Wheeler (Democrat, Montana) in expressing his fear that if this trend continued in Europe the Senate might reject the Dumbarton Oaks plan for the organisation of peace.

Several editorial writers have pointed out that Germany is "fighting for time" in the hopes that a deterioration in Allied unity will lead to a negotiated peace, and while there is no dilution of certainty in ultimate victory there is to-day no easy confidence in its early consummation. The German counter-offensive in the West, which took the American people completely by surprise, is regarded with extreme concern. Indeed, American opinion, always tending to be mercurial, was plunged into the deepest gloom by an operation everywhere regarded as calamitous. The reverse to American arms was a shock almost as great as Pearl Harbour and a set-back thought to be as serious as Bataan. It is now asked why was Allied intelligence caught unawares, and in general it is believed that the German advance may upset General Eisenhower's plans for an all-out offensive and may win for the Germans a breathing-spell over the winter. Complacency on the home front has received a nasty jolt and talk of reconversion is no longer the order of the day. The need for increased production is generally recognised. This was underlined by Mr. J. A. Krug (the Chairman of the War Production Board), who stated that the German spearhead would inevitably destroy large quantities of Allied supplies, and expressed the view that it might be necessary entirely to re-equip the American First Army.

The publication of statistics showing the increased expenditure on civilian goods and services in conjunction with the military developments on the Western Front has also increased the feeling of disquiet. It is felt that this may have contributed to the shortage in certain spheres of war production which in turn have to some extent been responsible for the present military position.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina the doldrums continue, with slight breezes now from the right, now from the left. The resignation of General Sanguinetti, Interventor of the Province of Buenos Aires, together with some forty other officers who have been occupying civilian posts there, is presented as part of the programme for returning soldiers to the army, and is welcome. But the suppressed Deutsche La Plata Zeitung has reappeared as Die Zeitung—without its Gothic type—and Cabildo has recovered from its temporary suppression (see last week's Summary), and is now twice its former size and price. A recent attempt to seize a military aircraft for the purpose of scattering anti-Government leaflets over the capital ended in several arrests of "Communists." It has been denied that the imprisonment of ex-Senator Santamarina had anything to do with this, though the Chief of Police declares him guilty of "offences of an ideological nature" of which "irrefutable proof can be produced." A sidelight is thrown on the position of the Government by two recent strikes (at the Y.P.F. distillery at La Plata and an air base in Paraná), which, though they were declared illegal and military action was threatened, only ended when the demands made were granted: these included the release of a dozen workers arrested on political charges. Disillusionment with the ambitions of Colonel Perón would appear to be increasing among Argentines, and Dr. Palacios, speaking in Montevideo, has declared that "if we allow this (dictatorship) to continue we are not worthy of being Argentines," and he has urged his compatriots to reconquer their liberty by "organising ourselves secretly and all becoming soldiers."

In Central America, the Guatemalan election resulted in the overwhelming victory of Dr. Juan José Arévalo, the Liberal candidate, over Dr. Adrián Recinos. the former minister in Washington. Dr. Arévalo, who had lived abroad for some time before the recent revolution, will take office for four years from the 15th March. The situation in El Salvador is still obscure, but reported incursions or insurrections are by supporters of Dr. Molina or Dr. Romero, appear to have been suppressed. Reports that the Molina régime has been recognised by Guatemala and Costa Rica appear to be premature.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE slowing-up of the German western offensive has produced increasing reticence in official reports and caution in comment. Since the 23rd December the O.K.W. has rarely referred to a definite German advance. The troops which were then said to be in strong pursuit of "dislodged American formations" were on the 28th reported as "making slow headway against tough enemy opposition." The growth of Allied resistance has been the main feature of German reports of the battle over the turn of the year. The German advance, said the O.K.W. bulletin on the 28th, had led to a head-on battle "on the largest scale" against forces withdrawn from other sectors. The bulletin of the 31st said that such strong forces had been brought up by both sides that "about half the divisions in the western theatre of war" were now involved. Strong Allied counter-attacks were reported at Rochefort and Bastogne, but news of the capture of the latter place was withheld from the German public.

So was the critical nature of the situation at the most threatened point of the German eastern front. Fierce attacks on Budapest from three quarters were admitted by the O.K.W. on the 28th, but it claimed on the 31st that the Russians were still held on the outskirts of the city. As if to compensate for this paucity of information, the official bulletins contained several items of an encouraging nature, such as the intervention of the Luftwaffe in the west, the long-range fire directed at Liége and Antwerp, a German advance in the Saar and northern Alsace, an unsuccessful Allied coastal landing in Italy, the new "Storm Vikings" or midget submarines which had attacked Allied shipping in the Scheldt.

A home broadcast on the 27th declared that the German western offensive was the most discussed topic of the Christmas season and that it had "steeled the confidence of the nation." Sertorius wrote on the same date for Transocean that Eisenhower had not yet been able to regain the initiative, but comment for home consumption has been meagre. Dittmar has not broadcast for a fortnight.

An article by him in a soldiers' paper concentrated almost entirely on the encouraging effect of such an offensive on morale; the "moral repercussions of this evident defeat on our western enemies" could hardly be rated too highly. The blow had been launched, most successfully, at a moment when "crisis spread its gloomy shadow over us."

The end of the year has occasioned a remarkable chorus of messages from the German leaders to their people. They show something approaching surprise that the German nation has withstood the strains of 1944 and some of them do not hide the fact that even harder trials, "the most tempestuous storms of this war," lie ahead. In the forefront of Göring's New Year message was pride that 1944 should have seen the armies of the Reich not only beat off all attacks made upon it but themselves take the offensive. He used Allied "liberation" as a spur to nerve Germans to greater sacrifice: "Never has the general confusion in Europe been greater than to-day." Herbert Backe said that German resistance depended on "the utmost effort of the rural population"; only by the greatest economy could Germany's food requirements be met. Hierl, Dönitz and Ley extolled the leadership of Hitler; Speer and Himmler hardly mentioned his name. Rundstedt encouraged soldiers in the west without specially referring to the German offensive. Guderian saw "through the flickering flame of the battles" the beacon of victory.

On New Year's Eve the Germans heard a lengthy discourse on the "German miracle" by Goebbels and a half-hour speech from Hitler himself. Goebbels argued that the war could not be understood from the standpoint of the average man: it was fluid in every respect and its historic meaning would only later emerge. The more fortunate for Germans was it therefore that in Hitler Germany had found a leader surpassing in stature any other figure of the war, a man worthy of his time and destined to conquer. Goebbels combated the ideas that the war was as good as decided already and that a negotiated peace was possible. "War is only decided in the last round." It was vain, he said, to hope for Germans to give up fighting unless they had secured victory.

For once perhaps the Führer has not disappointed the hopes of his followers. He gave them a speech which not only came as a surprise (he has not spoken since 21st July and never before during this war at the New Year) but, although it contained little rational ground for hope, was sufficiently firm in tone and vigorous in argument to inspire those who ask nothing better than to follow any lead he will give. Hitler began by explaining his silence as due to the overriding demands of the direction of the war and to "the events of the 20th July." If, he said in a later passage, he now spoke less frequently, that was neither because he did not wish to, nor because he could not, but because his whole time was given to mobilising the nation, and to improving the weapons and quality of its fighting troops. He claimed for his own work and devotion "some share of the credit in turning the tide of fate."

The first third of the speech consisted of an attack in the old manner, on Allied propaganda and plans to enslave Germany. This showed the Allies to be ignorant of the fact that the last 300 years of German history were no true picture of the character of the German people, which was destined to be an increasingly decisive factor in European history. He wished in reply to let the world know that "this State and its leaders are unshakable in their will and unwavering in their fanatical determination to fight this war to a successful conclusion," which might, he said, come before 1946. The leaders shared the fate of the people and would never capitulate "on account of suffering and sorrow." They not only highly appreciated the effort of every dutiful German, and promised him that service of the State would not be forgotten, but were determined to annihilate everyone who became "a tool of foreigners." He knew how his people were suffering; no leader in the world knew his people better than Hitler knew the people and homes of Germany. He assured them that the National Socialist State would in a few years rebuild all that to-day lay in ruins. He admitted that "many unforgettable documents of art and culture," and many sacrificed lives, could not be replaced. Yet such a struggle for national existence gave to him, more than to any other German, the strength to carry on undismayed. Not only had his appeal for national mobilisation been more than met but the foreign workers in Germany were coming to appreciate the value of the social community around them. As leader of Germany's fate he thanked men, women and children for what they had achieved and exhorted them to have faith in their leader and "fight to the end with extreme fanaticism." The speech closed with the customary thanks to the Almighty and the promise to Him that Greater Germany would do its duty until victory.

In his Order of the Day to the armed forces Hitler made some additional points. To give the whole of Eastern Germany to Poland, as Mr. Churchill wished to do, was to give it in effect to Russia. Although German fronts had been shortened, Hitler protested that he had made no step backwards without offering resistance to the last. His attack on Allied policy was even sharper than in the speech: "where the Allies come, order collapses and chaos ensues. Democracy is incapable of solving even the smallest problems on the Continent." He finally assured his soldiers that 1945 would witness "a turn of fortune of historic import."

More interesting than the actual New Year messages were certain assessments of the situation broadcast on the 30th December. Scharping described the past year as one of great crises which "touched rock bottom on the 20th July." Fritzsche admitted that burdens and sacrifices were engraved on the hearts of the people as "the characteristic feature" of the year. A broadcast to troops in Italy reminded them that "in the sixth year of war there is hardly anything to be bought other than the absolute necessities of life," and that the nation was invincible as long as it remained united. Seyss Inquart told German-speaking listeners in Holland that all opponents would ultimately be worn down by German resistance and "constantly renewed German miracles." Most interesting of all was Dr. Schmidt who described the great change in the European political situation during the past six months. British policy had met with nothing but failure in every quarter. The present conflict between East and West was seen to be really a struggle between Russia and Germany. Schmidt ruled out the possibility of a negotiated peace, since the Allies were at least united in their determination to destroy Germany. But "Germany is sure of herself; she will fight in 1945, and in 1946 and 1947; and never will she surrender." The common purpose inspiring the Allies would not enable them "to fight to the last."

Evidence as to the condition and temper of the people to whom the New Year appeals have been addressed is fragmentary and difficult to control, but certain points emerge with some frequency. It is clear that many Germans are too tired to respond to demands for yet greater endurance. "We cannot," says the writer of a letter, "remain perpetually an anvil." In districts of the Reich where raids are heavy and living conditions worse than elsewhere, the constant presence of death seems to rule out both hatred and hope. To some, death seems preferable to such a burdensome life; the terror at home could only be exchanged for slavery at the hands of the Allies. The coming of the Russians would seem to be greatly feared, yet many people see little difference between National Socialism and Communism. Protests, like that of Göring in his message quoted above, that Germany was not responsible for the war, would appear to find fairly general acceptance. A business man of some standing recently admitted that he knew of no Germans who regarded Germany or Hitler as guilty of starting the war, although a few people would admit that Germany was possibly somewhat more to blame than the other nations. Some say, on the other hand, that Hitler is at least responsible for losing the war, but such people are thought not to be very numerous, the majority having ceased to regard Hitler as the effective controller of the nation. Very many people seem to fear and to detest Himmler. This feeling is intensified by the terror, the more impressive for being silent. Men say that no organised resistance is possible as long as individuals or groups are liable to disappear from any factory or office, with no questions asked or explanations given.

These would seem to be the chief elements of the mood of the German people as it faces the prospect of 1945, fear of its leaders; almost indistinguishable in many cases from fear of the enemy, fatigue, scepticism, yet a certain receptivity to main themes of propaganda; inability to discern an alternative to the unrelieved succession of defeats, burdens and privations. Recent assessments by qualified judges agree that the proportion of people with a policy or with definite views is very small, either for or against the régime. The mood of the majority would seem to be compounded of a desire to end the war at all costs, and a sense of complete impotence to bring it to any end. On the most favourable interpretation this has been described as "disciplined apathy."

Recent reports from Austria say that factory machinery is being dismantled at Graz and Government offices moved away. Many administrative offices are said to have been transferred to the Sudetenland. Reich Germans are apparently trickling back to Germany while German settlers from Hungary are still pouring into Niederdonau and Styria.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The latest progress of the Red Army in Slovakia has taken them to within 2 miles of the junction of Lučenec (on the way to Zvolen) and, in the west, across the territory between the Ipel and the Hron, so that the Russian troops now stand on the edge of the great fertile plain stretching to Bratislava 75 miles away.

President Beneš's Christmas broadcast to the Czechoslovak people was a warning to his countrymen not to be misled by German propaganda and especially by its exploitation of recent events in newly liberated countries; in restored Czechoslovakia there would be great changes—a new Constitution, a decentralised administration, a national front Government making possible the participation of all political representatives from Left to Right, a radical solution of the German problem, a new approach to economic and social problems "with regard to our relations both with the East and with the West"—and this would inevitably cause discussions and disagreements; but "if we all act in a truly democratic manner and if we, those at home and abroad, struggle together for freedom and the new State, against nazism and for democracy, and stand honourably and loyally by one another, then there cannot arise any serious conflicts, any civil disorders, nor even any street fighting."

A speech by Moravec broadcast from Prague on the 30th December, which was largely a reply to Dr. Beneš, followed rather markedly those lines against which the latter had warned the Czechs. The Western democracies had been forced to capitulate to Moscow and Beneš found himself forced to play Stalin's game; Czechoslovakia would be sovietised (there would even be a Moravian Soviet Republic) and the Czechs, under a "dictatorship of the proletariat," would be at the mercy of the Bolsheviks.

In a New Year message broadcast from London on the 31st December, M. Jan Masaryk affirmed with particular emphasis that Czechoslovakia's foreign policy in 1945 would be based on her friendship with the Soviet Union. Everything that followed from that basis would be carried out to the letter, without hesitation and without compromise, and Czechoslovakia's relations with her neighbours would be determined from the standpoint of the Czechoslovak-Soviet Treaty. "We want a democratic and strong Poland but only a Poland which will collaborate with the Soviet Union, we want a decent and democratic Hungary which will let us live in peace and, again, only a Hungary which will collaborate with the Soviet Union."

POLAND.

The National Homeland Council of (liberated) Poland celebrated the first anniversary of its formation by meeting in Lublin on the 31st December and passing a law providing for the setting up of a Provisional Government in place of the National Liberation Committee. Immediately afterwards the Council proceeded, in accordance with this "law," to declare M. Bierut to be Provisional President of Poland. M. Bierut, having then nominated M. Osobka-Morawski as Prime Minister, M. Morawski submitted a list of 17 members for the Provisional Government, which was also approved. The new Government consists, at least in name, of 5 Socialists, 5 Peasant Party members, 5 members of the (Communist) Workers' Party, two Democrats, and one non-party member. Eight members are former members of the National Liberation Committee, who retain their former departments. M. Morawski also retains the department of Foreign Relations. General Rola-Zymierski keeps that of National Defence, in addition to his post of Commander-in-Chief. The Prime Minister, being a Socialist, has two Deputies, namely M. Gomolka (Communist) and M. Janusz (Peasant Party).

The proclamation of the Provisional Government was received with acclamation at the Municipal Theatre at Lublin, where, it is reported, 1,500 Peasant Party delegates from liberated Poland were assembled for a party meeting. The session of the National Council itself was attended by the Soviet delegate and by M. Fouchet, French "Delegate in Lublin"; as well as by seven British, American and French press correspondents. The ceremonies ended in a salute of 124 guns, a firework display, and a night on which the curfew was temporarily suspended. The occasion was also marked by a review of the Liberation Committee's achievements, which were said to include the completion of agrarian reform in all the liberated areas. A parade of the Second Polish Army, newly formed in liberated Poland, was also held.

In one sense the change is one of form rather than substance. The Provisional Government has taken over from the Liberation Committee State machinery for an area containing a population of about 8 million, with its central and local government organs, schools, posts, railways, industries and finances; together with responsibility for reconstruction and for foreign policy; and with an army which, if less experienced and in some ways less well equipped than the Polish forces in the west and in Italy, is probably more numerous, and is definitely Polish in all but a few of the higher posts. All this was already in existence. What is new is the sentiment which the change appears to have produced in the people present, namely, that here at last, after five years, was something that, whatever its faults, could be called a Polish Government on Polish soil.

The London Polish Government has denounced the change as an "attempt against the sovereign rights of the Polish nation." The United States Government, through Mr. Stettinius, has followed the lead given by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons on the 15th December, by declaring that it will continue to recognise the Arciszewski Government.

SOVIET UNION.

Again there has been no report from the Soviet side on fighting north of Czechoslovakia, and further south there has been no change of great note. The Red army continues to advance slowly northwards from Hungary into Slovakia, whilst around Budapest extremely bitter fighting has continued. On the 27th December the Soviet communiqué announced that "our troops have split the encircled enemy grouping the two parts, one of which has been driven into the hilly and wooded area in the Danube bend north of Budapest, while the other has been tightly gripped in a vice in the city." Meanwhile the Red army is also pushing westwards from Budapest.

One commentator has observed that "encircled Budapest is symbolical in miniature of the position of all Germany and the European territory still under her control," whilst Izvestiya's International Observer, à propos of German operations in the west, declared that "even if the Hitlerite command wanted to, it would be unable to transfer reserves to the western theatre."

On the 30th December the Soviet Information Bureau issued a communiqué on the shooting of Soviet negotiators, covered by the white flag, by the Germans in the Budapest area. According to this communiqué, "throughout the night of the 28th–29th December and the morning of the 29th December powerful Soviet transmitters in the forward lines of the front incessantly broadcast to the enemy command and troops encircled in the Budapest area an announcement of the forthcoming despatch of Soviet negotiators to present an ultimatum, as well as of the time and route to be taken by the negotiators in their ride to the positions of the German troops. Red army troops along the route of the negotiators' ride completely ceased fire." Nevertheless, the Soviet officer despatched on the 29th December from the left bank of the Danube in a car flying the white flag was fired on and killed; the officer despatched from the right bank was taken to the German headquarters, where the German command refused to accept the ultimatum or to enter into any negotiations. On his return journey the Germans opened fire on him and he was killed by a shot in the back, his interpreter only just escaping. The ultimatum, signed by Marshals Tolbukhin and Malinovsky, after pointing out the hopeless position of the encircled troops, offered, "in order to avoid unnecessary bloodshed and to preserve from ruin Budapest, its historic riches, cultural and artistic monuments and the population," generous terms. These included a promise that any Hungarians who surrendered should be allowed to disperse to their houses after registration and interrogation: Germans surrendering would be allowed to choose after the war whether they would be repatriated to Germany or any other country.

Soviet press comment has greeted the formation of the new provisional Government in Hungary with approval, and has quoted many messages welcoming it from Hungarians outside Hungary. (For the arrival in Moscow of an armistice delegation from the provisional Governments see also under "South-Eastern Europe.")

It was reported by Tass on the 28th December that the Soviet Government, with the consent of the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, had acceded to the request of the Bulgarian Government to hand over persons detained by the Soviet Command, who were the chief culprits in involving Bulgaria in the war against the United Nations. The persons handed over, besides the three Regents, included most of the ex-Ministers, among them the former Prime Ministers Bozhilov and Muraviev. Izvestiya, discussing the Sofia trials of the war criminals, praised Bulgaria for setting an example to other countries in that she was the first to bring to the dock not only Hitler's secondary agents and accomplices, but the chief culprits. Bulgaria alone appeared so far to understand the necessity of the detention and sentencing of war criminals, not only as condign punishment for the calamities they had brought on their country, but also to forestall the recurrence of a pro-Fascist and pro-German régime. Pravda (31st December) also issued a warning that fascism had been scotched and not killed, pointing out that the poison left behind in the minds of different groups of people in countries which had been directly or indirectly included in the Hitlerite New Order implied a real risk that a Fascist régime might return. "The moral and political destruction of fascism is a more difficult task than the expulsion of the Germans from a country."

(For a Tass report concerning the fulfilment of the Roumanian Armistice Agreement see under "Roumania.")

The arrival in Moscow of a Uniate delegation from Lvov, and its reception by Polyanski, chairman of the Council for Matters connected with Religious Denominations (other than the Orthodox Church), was announced in Izvestiya of the 30th December. This is the first mention from the Soviet side of the Uniate Church since the announcement of the appointment of Metropolitan Slipij as its administrator on the death of Metropolitan Szeptycki (see Summary No. 266 under "Poland").

The opening of relations between the U.S.S.R. and the Vatican would, however, appear to be no nearer, judging by Izvestiya's comment on the Pope's Christmas message. The Pope's failure to include in his lengthy address any word about the "villainous crimes of the Hitlerite bandits," or to discuss Mussolini and his Fascist band, could not be put down to forgetfulness, but was an indication of his "definite policy and definite sympathies." The Pope's declaration that in a State governed by the will of the masses liberty becomes a tyranny showed how far removed are his conceptions from the horrors and sufferings of the peoples who have passed through Hitlerite slavery. His statement, according to Izvestiya, was "an obvious violation of the basic and vital interests of the people and of true democracy." (See also under "Vatican.")

Yet another communiqué from the Extraordinary State Commission on German atrocities was published on the 23rd December, this time on crimes committed in the Lvov region. The communiqué declared that in concentration camps in this region the Germans massacred nearly 700,000 Soviet citizens of all ages and both sexes, as well as subjects of France, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Poland, Holland, Great Britain and the United States, who had been transported to Lvov from concentration camps in Germany, and a number of Italian officers. Among those who gave evidence before the commission were several Frenchmen, formerly German prisoners of war. The Hitlerite Government, and especially Himmler, were denounced as responsible for these crimes, together with Dr. Frank, head of the General Govérnment, and 116 others. Himmler is reported to have visited the camps on several occasions and "personally instructed the executioners." He could no doubt have been held responsible for almost any of the countless atrocities already reported by the Extraordinary Commission, so that (in addition to his personal interest in these camps) it is just possible that some particular significance attaches to the singling out of Himmler now that he has assumed effective control in Germany. It seems a little superfluous, but the Kremlin may even have thought it desirable to put him publicly beyond the pale as a person with whom there can be no negotiation.

His Majesty The King has conferred an honorary C.B.E. upon M. V. N. Pavlov, interpreter in the Soviet People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs, in recognition of his valuable assistance to the British delegation at the Tehran Conference and other meetings with Marshal Stalin and M. Molotov.

SCANDINAVIA.

The date for holding the elections for the Finnish Diet has now been fixed. They will take place on the 17th and 18th March. Owing to the time which has elapsed since the last elections, held in July 1939, it is estimated that about a quarter of the electorate will be voting for the first time. This in itself makes any forecast difficult, but the position is rendered still more uncertain by the split in the Social Democratic Party and the recent formation of a number of new political groups, which express the intention of courting the electorate independently. Of these the most important appears to be the "Democratic Front," the formation of which was announced on the 29th December, ostensibly to rally all sections of opinion which disapproved of the policy pursued during the war. The Social Democrat Party Committee has issued a declaration repudiating these new formations, and stating that persons joining them will forfeit ther membership of the party. Another uncertain factor is introduced by the resurrection of the Communist Party, after 15 years of complete legal suppression. It will certainly be resuming its constitutional existence under specially favourable circumstances. In these conditions, the forthcoming elections should be of quite unprecedented interest and importance.

The Swedish pro-German paper, Dagsposten, has expressed great indignation concerning the formation of the Norwegian Volunteer Association referred to in last week's Summary, declaring it to be a violation of Swedish law, and the paper appears to have extracted from the Minister of Justice an admission that the matter must be investigated. On the general question of enlisting Swedish volunteers for service in Norway, a recent Gallup Poll has recorded on the whole an adverse opinion. Forty-five per cent. of the votes were opposed to the idea, 29 per cent. neutral, and only 26 per cent. favourable. The prevalent opinion seems to have been that Sweden would best help Norway by keeping altogether clear of the war.

Some Norwegian refugees in Sweden have founded an organisation called the Association of Norwegian Patriots, which has been accused of being to some extent under Communist influence and of showing tendencies hostile to the present Norwegian Government. A Tass message from Stockholm published in the Russian Pravda for the 30th December describes the composition of the Association as Left Wing, and asserts that it has sent a message to the Government in London demanding more active participation in the War and the "establishment of democracy in Norway," which would seem to imply an endorsement of the imputation of reactionary tendencies recently made against the Government and the recognised home-front leadership by the Communist leader Furubotn, as well as of the activist line advocated by the Communists. The organisers, however, have repudiated these suggestions in a statement issued on the 31st December, which asserts that all parties are represented, and denies opposition to the Nygaardsvold Government.

M. Jens Bull, the Norwegian Minister in Stockholm, whose tenure of the post has been by no means generally popular, is now being succeeded by the former Minister in Reykjavik, M. Esmarch. M. Bull's departure was at first attributed to illness, but it is now announced that he is going to Rome.

The command of the German forces in Norway appears to have been definitely taken over by General Rendulic from General Falkenhorst. The army headquarters are being transferred from Oslo to Lillehammer, partly for reasons of security, though no doubt the central position of Lillehammer, with good communications with Tröndelag and Western Norway, has also played a part in the decision.

The Germans in Denmark made a conciliatory gesture at Christmas by the release of 175 political prisoners. Christmas Eve is reported to have passed off quietly, but on the following day a Dane was shot in Copenhagen by a German sentry, and others were fired upon. Boxing Day saw the elimination of a member of the Schalburg corps, and almost simultaneously the usual "clearing murder" was perpetrated by one of his colleagues. A Copenhagen factory was blown up by saboteurs on the 28th December.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

A correspondent of the London Vrij Nederland in the liberated Netherlands has written an interesting account of the problems that arose immediately after the liberation. He candidly admits that mistakes were made and that a number of arbitrary acts were performed by members of the resistance organisations, some of whom, indeed, only joined such organisations after liberation; he notes that a man is not necessarily fit for a public post because he has been good at sabotage. But he points out that mistakes were inevitable in the circumstances; prompt action involved a risk of error, but it was better than doing nothing. As time passed, moreover, conditions had improved and experience had been acquired by the Dutch authorities which would be invaluable when the rest of the Netherlands were freed. Then, the difficulties would be even greater, for, whereas in the now liberated Netherlands a steadying influence had been exerted by the Catholic Church, to which the great majority belonged, in the rest of the Netherlands the majority were either Protestants or agnostics. The writer, however, had faith in the sense and courage of his fellow-countrymen and believed that the Dutch Government was aware of the difficulties that lay ahead.

The overrunning of part of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg and of Belgium by the Germans has been attended by numerous atrocities. Prince John of Luxemburg said in an interview "isolated villages in the Ardennes . . . . were taken entirely by surprise. In many cases evacuation was impossible, and I have heard of places where the invader has carried off to Germany all the men between 15 and 70 still fit for forced labour. Ruin and distress in the northern part of the country are indescribable. Nothing can be more horrible than reoccupation by an enemy who thinks only of wreaking vengeance." The Germans, indeed, are making no attempt to conceal their cruelty; rather do they seek to publicise it, in order to spread terror. A German-controlled "Belgian Freedom" radio station is striving to make Belgians leave their homes and flee from the supposedly advancing Wehrmacht by broadcasting atrocity stories. For instance, listeners were told that in a village on the Rochefort–Marche road all the inhabitants had been ordered into the square by S.S. troops and shot forthwith.

The Belgian and Luxemburg Governments have maintained a firm attitude in the face of the German threats. The Luxemburg Government remained in the Grand Duchy; the Belgian Government ordered all officials to remain at their posts. The Belgian Minister of Defence announced in a broadcast that some of the units raised since liberation were now at the front and appealed for large numbers of volunteers, whom it was now at last possible to equip and train. In Luxemburg a decree introducing conscription had been promulgated on the eve of the German offensive and had met with the hearty approval of the inhabitants, who were eager that their country should play its part in the defeat of Germany.

The new Belgian social security law came into force on the 1st January. The Right-wing Catholics do not much like it, but it was certainly demanded by the great majority.

Broadcasting to the Belgian people on the 1st January the French Ambassador in Brussels spoke of the "close solidarity in ideas, aspirations and destiny" between France and Belgium, and went on to say that "on General de Gaulle's return from Moscow, our Foreign Minister broached the problem of the Rhineland and Westphalia in our Consultative Assembly. France and Belgium, like the Netherlands are interested in this problem both from a military and an economic point of view, which calls for a still closer co-operation between us within the framework of our unshakable alliance with Britain. It is not a case of counting one's chicken's before they are hatched if we now advocate a readjustment of our respective economic systems, with a view to bringing them into line with the requirements we shall have to meet after the settlement of the problem of the Rhineland."

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle broadcast to the nation on the 31st December. After reviewing the position of France at the end of 1944 he referred to the decision to mobilise the 1943 class at the end of January 1945. This mobilisation was, he said, naturally being co-ordinated with the supply of arms and equipment by French factories and by the Allies. He was happy to announce that the Allies had promised enough to equip "a large number of new units within a satisfactory period of time." Victory would find France in the first rank, arms in hand. It would also find her free and he confirmed M. Tixier's statement to the Consultative Assembly (see below), saying that "unless the circumstances of war prevented them," municipal and departmental elections would be held in the spring. They would, of course, be provisional, holding good "until the return of the absent." Turning to the economic situation, he expressed a guarded optimism. 1945 should bring slow but steady progress. "We may hope that next spring our harbours will welcome an appreciable number of ships which are no longer laden exclusively with troops, arms, ammunition and military rations. To-day we must make do with what we have and bravely endure all hardships and shortages." The speech ended with a fresh appeal for unity and with words of remembrance to all those fighting for France and her allies and to those in the hands of the enemy.

The economic situation referred to by the General is in fact causing the French authorities great anxiety. The Director-General of Economic Affairs at the Quai d'Orsay, M. Alphand, has spoken of the grave situation developing through lack of supplies of imported food-stuffs, raw materials and coal, and through the gradual deterioration of the inland transport position. He told a British representative that General de Gaulle and M. Bidault considered that this was the most urgent problem now confronting the Government, and that the early restoration of a reasonable level of rations and the resumption of a minimum of industrial production in France were of vital military importance to the Allies. Mr. Duff Cooper agrees that the lack of raw materials and consequent increase in unemployment at a time when food and heating are seriously deficient are bound to cause discontent and render the Government's task more difficult. M. Alphand, however, spoke with great appreciation of British assistance given during M. Monnet's recent visit to London, and the Ministry of National Economy announced on the 28th December that France is to receive from Britain before the end of June 300,000 tons of wool, cotton, non-ferrous metals, sulphur and food and that the first ships are already being loaded. This is part of the French civilian import programme (see Summary No. 270) for which M. Monnet has been negotiating. The press has announced that the ports of Dieppe and Boulogne have now been handed over in working order to the French by the British Navy, and that the Mediterranean port of Sète has been cleared of mines.

The decision to mobilise the 1943 class referred to in General de Gaulle's speech (see above) responds to a widespread demand for a larger army and a greater war effort. This was voiced in the Consultative Assembly as well as in the Paris press, and inspired partly by the desire to see France's enhanced status among the nations backed by a corresponding force, partly by the wish to put a speedy end to German resistance on the Atlantic coast and partly by the German offensive in the Ardennes. On the 20th December the Assembly's Commission for National Defence held a meeting and demanded the mobilisation of several classes of young men, a vigorous purge of cadres and an intensification of the war effort, and on the 26th December the Assembly itself debated national defence in secret session, only its final resolution being made public. This again asked for the mobilisation and military training of the youth of the country so as to enable all Frenchmen to take part in the war. It also demanded "total unification" of the Army and the establishment of a unified Command. It has since been announced that the Government has allotted 43 milliard francs for national defence in the provisional budget for the first quarter of 1945, and 58 milliards for civil expenditure.

On the 27th and 28th December the Consultative Assembly proceeded to a debate on general home policy, which more than one Paris paper criticised as too discursive. The debate was opened by the Minister of the Interior, who touched on many aspects of internal affairs. He claimed that the purge in his own administration had been rapid and vigorous. Five thousand police had been promptly dismissed, arrested or suspended. Thirty-two thousand people were still interned, 5,000 of whom had not yet been examined, and it would not be possible during the war wholly to dispense with administrative internment. Several thousand Fifth Columnists had been arrested each month. He reaffirmed the Government's intention to hold local elections, but said that it had not yet been decided whether the departments should vote one after the other or whether they should wait until the end of April, when they should all have been able to complete their preparations. He also said that the Departmental Committees of Liberation would be maintained in being and that a new ordinance would redefine their powers in such a way as to avoid conflict between them and the Conseils Généraux, whose rôle was essentially administrative.

The chief feature of the debate was an unexpected attack by M. Noguères, Socialist Deputy for the Pyrénées-Orientales, who accused M. Jeanneney of having acquiesced in the muzzling of the opponents of the grant of full powers to Pétain in the National Assembly on the 10th July, 1940, and said that it was scandalous that he should now be in the Government. M. Noguères' onslaught provoked a sharp reply from General de Gaulle, who said that opinions might differ about the drama of 1940, but that now only one thing counted: deeds and the service of the country. There was no one present who had not served the country and the republic.

At the conclusion of the debate, the last of the session, the Assembly voted a comprehensive resolution which, among other things, expressed the hope that the Government would continue to collaborate with the Resistance organisations, that it would effect a real monetary and fiscal reform, that it would see the need to evict "les grandes féodalités économiques et financières" from a dominant position in the national economy, and that it would proceed to socialise the principal means of production, sources of power, mineral deposits, insurance companies and, first and foremost, the big banks.

The new French Ambassador in Washington, M. Henri Bonnet, presented his letters of credence on the 1st January and signed the United Nations Declaration on behalf of France. In a message, read by Mr. Stettinius, President Roosevelt expressed his "profound gratification" at France's adherence and his admiration for her unconquerable spirit. She was now "a strong ally once more in the first rank of the free and peace-loving nations of the world."

Henri Béraud, the notoriously anti-British contributor to Gringoire, has been sentenced to death by the Paris Court of Justice. Other recent condemnations include those at Paris of Lucien Combelle, director of the weekly Révolution Nationale, and at Poitiers of General Vergnaux, director of the munitions factory of Châtellerault. Both were sentenced to fifteen years' hard labour.

SPAIN.

It is not an Iberian custom to eat at the Christmas season richly spiced fruit puddings, after having first made careful search for those touching tokens of hypothetical happiness so dear to the pragmatic English heart. The Spaniards pledge the future in a different way, when, on New Year's Eve, they come together in the open spaces of their villages and towns, and, holding in their hands bunches of Almería grapes, each containing exactly twelve, wait for the clocks to strike. As the midnight chimes ring out, the crowd, with a sense of urgency, begins to eat the fruit, stroke by stroke, grape by grape, for luck will hold only so long as you keep pace with the clock. There must have been, among the governors of Spain to-day, more than one who, risking both decorum and digestion, hastened to synchronise the twelfth stroke with the last grape in the knowledge that, if the past five years have been critical for Spain, the year of 1945 will be full of hazard for her present rulers. General Franco and the Falange régime have done very well out of the war. They were able to avoid the danger of being drawn into the conflict, and they had begun to accumulate credit with the Allies—for which the Caudillo owes more to the late Minister for Foreign Affairs, Count Jordana, than he has ever acknowledged. Then they allowed the wilful irresponsibility so typical of Spanish leaders to imperil what could have been a fairly smooth passage through genuine neutrality and a modified régime to post-war prosperity in an Allied-controlled Europe. Too often, during the last two years, have the Spanish Government yielded to German pressure, hedged with the Allies and generally allowed backsliding to mar the course of their foreign policy. And pretentious claims made recently for an important part in the peace won by others have only irritated the United Nations in whose hands lies the future of the Falange régime.

But if Franco, in seeming blindness, considers that the vaguest lip-service to the Allied cause will guarantee him a passage home, some of the Falange hierarchs are far from sharing his complacency. That they have done very well for themselves is shown by the Spanish budget for 1944, which gives an interesting indication of the financial position occupied by the Falange. The Party Vote, including the Militia, amounts to 181 million pesetas as against 1,972 million for the Army, 341 million for the Navy, 432 million for the Air Force, 502 million for Education and 113 million for National Health. This is perhaps not excessive, but the Treasury Vote is only a small part of the Falange income, the most important part of which is the quota of 2 per cent. deducted from all salaries in Spain. It is impossible to estimate the total amount of this source of income, but a reliable estimate gives a figure of about 900 million for the Province of Madrid alone. Even allowing for the work done by the "Auxilio Social," which is paid for out of Party funds, it is clear that the amount allotted to the Falange by the Spanish State is out of all proportion to that granted for public services. Over and above the Treasury Vote and this 2 per cent. quota, there are two other, less official sources, (a) the premium often paid to the Syndicates by traders anxious to obtain import licences and (b) the difference between the cost price paid by the syndicates and the price they charge the traders. 100 per cent. is not an unusual margin in this operation, which is a source of much satisfaction to the Party chiefs.

In matters of finance Franco is an honest man; he has nothing to fear but political destruction, and that, as has been said often before, is not one of his bogies. The Party notables, who interpret the national interest less conservatively, have much more reason to be sensitive to any factors which might affect the stability of the régime and their enjoyment of power. That is why some of them are showing much greater nervousness about Allied opinion than their Leader, who, in his incorruptibility, fears no man.

ITALY.

Relative calm seems, for the moment, to reign in Italian political circles, but how long it will last is another matter. Whether Signor Nenni, the leader of the Socialist Party, can be more obstructive within or without the Government remains to be seen, but the Communist-Socialist Alliance appears to be getting into a rather involved situation. When the present four-party Government was formed Signor Togliatti, the Communist Party leader, stated that his Party would now have the added responsibility of representing their friends, the Socialist Party, in the Government, but Signor Nenni is hardly likely to agree to this for long. In the Socialist paper Avanti Signor Nenni speaks of the Communist Party as being the opposition within the Government whilst the Socialist Party is to represent the opposition without. But up-to-date the Socialist Party policy has been more extreme and revolutionary than the Communist so it seems more likely that the real opposition will come from the Socialist Party outside the Government and will be directed as much at the Communist Party as at the other three parties forming the Government. Signor Nenni may, however, come to the conclusion that he can be more effective inside the Government than outside and such a decision may be hastened by the Socialist Party itself which does not always seem to be in complete agreement with Signor Nenni's extremist views. But if the Socialist leader elects to stay outside the Government and the Party agrees, the Communist-Socialist Alliance looks as if it might be strained to the utmost. In any case Signor Bonomi seems likely to have the same trouble as formerly in trying to get his team to pull together. In a broadcast on the 17th December Signor Bonomi again reminded the Italian people that winning the war was the most important fact and the nation should direct its entire effort to that end. In a tribute to the Partisans in Occupied Italy Signor Bonomi spoke of the powers which had been granted to the Committee of National Liberation in Northern Italy in carrying on the struggle against the Nazis and the Fascists and mentioned the new Department which had been formed to deal with all problems arising from the situation in the North. Signor Bonomi finished by saying that nearly 200,000 Italians were about to finish their military training and that the division, which the Romans had lately seen parading through the streets of the city, would soon take its place beside the Allies, at the battlefront.

News from the north has been particularly scanty over the Christmas period. The Committee of National Liberation in North Italy has issued a statement reaffirming its own unity for the war effort, noting the declarations of Socialist and Action Party representatives on the Northern C.N.L., in which they affirm their solidarity with the Italian Government's actions towards prosecuting the war and welcoming the creation of a Ministry for Occupied Italy.

Rumours of Farinacci's death persist. Swiss reports suggest that he has been assassinated by the clandestine Patriotic Action Group, or, alternatively, that he was killed by an Italian S.S. squad acting under Mussolini's orders. There has been no official confirmation of Farinacci's death, the only reference to the rumours being a brief comment on the Fascist-controlled radio, which ridicules the whole matter as an Allied invention. No Farinacci editorials, however, have appeared in the Regime Fascista for some days.

Ezio Maria Gray has published a long article in the Gazzetta del Popolo eulogising the spirit of Bologna in the front line. The town would seem to be virtually cut off from communication with places further north, but, according to Gray, who bases his information on some recently obtained copies of the Bologna paper, the Resto del Carlino, life goes on there much as usual and, " as regards the food supply, it makes one want to go and live in Bologna."

Mussolini has sent a New Year message to Italians in Germany urging them to work loyally with the Germans during the coming year.

THE VATICAN.

The Pope made three points in his yearly address to the Cardinals. Firstly he noted the fever for reform which has seized mankind, and wondered whether it would give the world civil war after world war. Secondly he showed how the Church embraced all her children—" all those who have erred from the path of righteousness." Thirdly he upheld the Church's duty to proclaim truth, and expose error, especially the misuse of words " Freedom, Independence, Democracy." These three points formed the basis of his notable Xmas Eve broadcast to the world. " The war had awakened the peoples and made them critical of their Governments, and convinced them that if they had not lacked all possibility of criticism and amendment, the world would not have been dragged into war." To avoid future wars the people must have effective guarantees. Is it strange that a democratic tendency dominates the peoples? After basing democracy on the rights and dignity of men, he said that it could exist in monarchies and well as in republics—a passage designed to cover British democracy. He then distinguished between a people, in the democratic sense, and a mass, " which is inert in itself and can only be moved from outside," and which, " is the mortal enemy of true democracy and its ideals of liberty and equality." True democracy rejects State absolutism.

The New World Order must include all peoples. Its authorities must be supreme, but " all member States must retain an equal right to their own sovereignty. Only thus can a spirit of free democracy pervade the evil ground of foreign relations." No injustice must be done to victor, vanquished or neutral, and vanquished must have the promise of ultimate association. Finally, the " Church's mission is to announce to the world, which is looking for more perfect forms of democracy, the highest and most needed message, the dignity of men called to be sons of God."

The message is regarded as a warning against pseudo-democracy. Pravda attacks it for not condemning " Hitlerite Bandits," and for belittling the will of the people (see under " Soviet Union "); but the Pope does not condemn by name: if he did, he could not stop short at Hitlerite Bandits. (The Papal position was explained in Summary No. 270, under " Vatican.") The Papal distinction between People and Mass was missed by Pravda. The broadcast is the most notable pronouncement the Pope has so far made on Catholic Democracy and the Rights of Man, and illustrates a growing Catholic tendency to look beyond Governments to the people, " to man as such, who, far from being a passive element in social life, is and must remain its subject, its foundation and its end. . . ." " Of no form of government which secures the well-being of its citizens will the Church disapprove."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Provisional Hungarian Government in Debrecen has declared war on Germany, and has promised to begin hostilities as soon as resources are mobilised. The Allies are being formally requested for an armistice, and a delegation headed by General Voros in Moscow to receive terms. The National Assembly has claimed to be, at present, the exclusive repository of the nation's sovereignty, which is exercised through the officers of the Assembly. The question of its relationship to Admiral Horthy, now detained in Germany, seems to be left in suspense.

The composition and programme of the Government are warmly praised by the Soviet Press. Elsewhere, the reception has been generally favourable. Practically all Hungarian organisations abroad, whatever their political colour, have welcomed it and have promised to co-operate with or to serve it; most Hungarian Legations have recognised its authority.

The full composition of the Government is as follows: Premier, General B. Miklós (recently General Officer Commanding Hungarian First Army, went over to Soviets after the 15th October); Foreign Affairs, J. Gyöngyössy (Left-wing publicist, Smallholders' Party); Interior, F. Erdei (Left-wing Sociologist, champion of agricultural labouring class); Defence, General J. Vörös (Horthy's Chief of Staff, went over to Soviets after the 15th October); Finance, Dr. I. Vásáry (administrative and financial expert, seven years Mayor of Debrecen, prominent Calvinist, Smallholders' Party; Education, Professor Count G. Teleki (Member of Hungarian Armistice delegation to Moscow, son of late Premier who committed suicide in April 1941 when Germany and Hungary invaded Yugoslavia); Industry, F. Takács (bourgeois industrialist); A. Valentini, Justice (lawyer, prominent Social Democrat); Supply, General G. Faragó (headed armistice delegation to Moscow); Social Welfare, E. Molnár (Left-wing Sociologist, Social Democrat); Agriculture, I. Nagy (locksmith, Communist); Trade and Communications, J. Gábor (workman, Communist).

The Germans and Hungarians have launched a counter-attack against the advanced Soviet positions near Komarom. Round Budapest the ring has been tightened. Many suburbs are now in Soviet hands, the penetration having been, apparently, most rapid in the outskirts of Buda; the latest reports, however, speak of fighting in the very heart of Pest. The Germans and such Hungarian allies as they possess are resisting desperately, house by house. Some Hungarians are reported to be fighting on the Soviet side. The destruction in the city appears to be on a very large scale.

On the 30th December the Soviet wireless announced that Marshals Tolbukhin and Malinovsky had addressed to the Commanders of the German and Hungarian troops in Budapest (naming four German divisions and one artillery brigade, and four Hungarian divisions and three auxiliary regiments) a demand to surrender under honourable conditions in order to avoid further bloodshed and destruction. The lives and security of those surrendering were guaranteed; Germans might return to Germany after the war and Hungarians return to their homes after registration and interrogation. The Soviet wireless stated that the two envoys bearing the ultimatum were shot, one on his way into Pest, the other during his return, the German Command having refused to accept the ultimatum or to conduct negotiations of any kind. The Soviet statement ended by saying that the entire responsibility for civilian casualties and for the destruction of Budapest would fall on the Hitlerites. The Germans issued a denial of the shooting three days later. Meanwhile, the carnage continued. The population of Budapest, swollen by the influx of refugees to a number stated, perhaps with some exaggeration, to amount to 2 million persons, was reported to be reduced to starvation rations and deprived of essential services, including its water supply.

Roumania.

The Roumanian Prime Minister, General Radescu, besides impressing favourably those who come in contact with him, is making progress in his efforts to satisfy the Soviet demands for a more wholehearted compliance with the Armistice terms. While some enemy nationals are still unaccounted for, 10,000 Germans and Hungarians have been interned. Out of 55,000 Soviet citizens deported, 36,000 have been repatriated. A large amount of industrial equipment has been returned and over 2,300 head of livestock. 386,000 tons of petroleum products have been shipped to Russia. At the same time the Soviet authorities are dissatisfied at the slowness of the " purge " or " war criminals." No satisfactory definition of this term has been arrived at. It appears to be applied to any defeated enemy. The censorship of the press, periodicals and theatre and radio performances set up by Article 16 of the Armistice is strictly enforced. Eighty-six provincial papers and publications have been suspended. This, combined with the censorship of school books and maps, indicates a new technique designed to prove that certain historical events did not actually take place. Requisitioning proceeds on a scale which suggests either that the Roumanians are being forced to non-compliance with the demands made, or that the Soviet are seeking an excuse for commandeering the whole of certain supplies. A requisition of medical supplies is quite fantastic. It includes 1,300,000 pairs of forceps of different kinds, 3 million needles for syringes, 53,000 pairs of dental forceps, 50 tons of lysol, 50 tons of lanoline, 5 tons of quinine, and 100,000 tubes of penicillin, of which commodity Roumania possesses none at all. And these are only a few of the 103 items in the list!

Nothing has been heard of Mareşal Antonescu for more than three months when he was removed from custody in Roumania and taken to Russia. It was announced that he was to be tried by an Allied Court. On the 29th December an attack was made upon him in the Soviet European broadcast service in the course of a talk on "Who are the Antonescus?" Amongst his "scandalous deeds" are specified wholesale corruption at home and transfer of currency to banks abroad. Whatever may be said of Mihai Antonescu, conduct of this kind is entirely foreign to all that is known of the Maresal. "Our correspondent" claims to have visited his former homes and described the "palatial character" of his surroundings. In point of fact the Maresal's house in Bucarest is quite a modest establishment, and the villa at Predeal is a comfortable, moderate-sized place such as would be owned by any well-to-do professional man. This bolt from the blue inevitably suggests a question as to what may be the object of it at this juncture.

Yugoslavia.

Heavy fighting has continued in east Slavonia, where Bulgarian troops have been brought up. The Germans continue to retreat down the Bosna and from the Drina across north Bosnia. Their force in Montenegro has joined up with the Germans in the Sandjak, but has been severely punished by Allied aircraft. East of Slovenia the Germans seem now to control only the coast of Croatia, the communication lines north from Mostar, Banjaluka, Bihatch and Fiume, and their main east-west line along the Save.

Macedonian Slav Partisans appear to be in control on both sides of parts of the Greco-Yugoslav frontier. The Macedonian Partisan Assembly (Asnom) began its second session at Skoplje on the 28th December, in the presence of Kardelj, Tito's chief political assistant.

An editorial article in the Belgrade Politika has broken silence on the Greek crisis. It considered that British intervention was ill-advised, since, if successful, it would give the management of the elections to the Papandreou Government, and would alienate the sympathies of the Greek people from Great Britain.

In Serbia the Partisans have conscribed all able-bodied men and many women. The population is thus brought under control and the conscripts are subjected to the full force of the Partisan propaganda. Some of the recruits, after three or four weeks' training, are sent to the Slavonian front where the Partisans are fighting pitched battles for the first time and casualties are heavy.

Serbia is afflicted with grave monetary difficulties. Eight different currencies are circulating. Owing to lack of transport prices vary enormously in different localities. On the black market dinars are 8,000 to the pound, 2,000 to the dollar. The official rate in Belgrade has been fixed at 800 to the pound and 200 to the dollar. The Partisan administration speak hopefully of obtaining foreign exchange, through remittances from Yugoslavs in America. Meanwhile, there is virtually no backing for the vast amount of paper money in circulation, commercial and financial activities are at a standstill, and the problem of paying State employees without causing inflation is acute.

Greece

Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden left Athens on the 28th December. On the 27th Mr. Churchill had made a statement to press correspondents saying that, the British had entered Greece by agreement with Mr. Roosevelt and Marshal Stalin and at the invitation of an all-party Greek Government. There would have been a massacre in Athens had British troops not intervened. The British sought nothing from Greece except her friendship. They had contracted grave responsibilities, and were absolutely determined to clear Athens and its environs; he hoped some sensible settlement would be reached, but, if there was no agreement, the guns would go on firing. If it proved impossible to obtain a satisfactory democratic foundation, it might become necessary to create some sort of temporary international trust.

The Conference convened by Mr. Churchill on the 26th met again on the 27th. In addition to the original Greek political representatives, the second meeting was attended also by MM. Canellopoulos, Peter Rallis, Stephanopoulos, Mylonas, Sophianopoulos, Gonatas, Alexandris, Theotokis and Tsaldaris; E.L.A.S. had not increased the number of its representatives, nor were there present any representatives of the parties, other than the Communist Party, which constitute E.A.M. According to Athens wireless, the E.L.A.S. delegates announced that they would disarm only if parties of the Left were given 40 to 50 per cent. of the seats in the Cabinet, including the Ministries of the Interior and of Justice and the Under-Secretaryships for War and Foreign Affairs; if the Mountain Brigade, the Sacred Battalion, and the National Guard were disbanded; if a plebiscite on the King's return were held early in February and elections for a Constituent Assembly took place in April. General Plastiras refused to accept these terms, as did the representatives of the Populist Party, who left the Conference. The Archbishop thereupon adjourned the proceedings sine die; he subsequently reported to Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden that the "overwhelming desire" of those present had been that a Regency be established immediately, and the British Ministers undertook to advise the King of the Hellenes to accept this course. On the 30th a Royal Declaration was issued, addressed to the Archbishop, which stated that the King, being resolved not to return to Greece unless summoned by a free and fair expression of the national will, appointed the Archbishop as Regent. The Archbishop was sworn in on the 31st, and on that day the Papandreou Government resigned. The Regent immediately held consultations with leading politicians; it is understood that he will offer the Premiership to General Plastiras.

Meantime, the Central Committee of E.A.M., in spite of the terms their representatives had put forward at the Conference, sent a memorandum to Mr. Churchill, in which they asserted that they had accepted "the basic points" of General Scobie's terms. Acknowledging this communication, General Scobie said the Central Committee had never made it clear that his terms had been accepted, and asked that a plenipotentiary be sent to his headquarters to confirm it. In consequence, a delegation, headed by M. Zevgos, came to confer with General Scobie, but it has been officially announced that no agreement was reached.

In fact, the E.A.M. delegates brought no confirmation of acceptance of General Scobie's conditions, and the object of their visit appears to have been to persuade him to undertake commitments regarding the future of the Greek Armed Forces before the new Greek Government had been formed.

Albania.

The general attitude of the Albanian partisans towards the Greek and Yugoslav partisans has always been one of co-operation, and recent reports from Athens indicated a considerable infiltration of Albanian partisans into Greece. However, on the 24th December Radio Tirana denied categorically that any Albanian partisans had joined E.L.A.S. or that any Albanian partisan units had entered Greece. While continuing to fight alongside the Yugoslav partisans in Montenegro, the Albanian partisan forces are trying to mop up such armed opposition as they find in their own country. How general the acceptance of Enver Hoxha's Provisional Government is remains to be seen. Although a youth congress at Tirana is reported to have adopted communism, the average Albanian, having only the vaguest ideas on the subject, probably wants, above all, to be left in peace to repair the ruin which war has brought on him.

Bulgaria.

The Soviet Government has returned to Bulgaria for trial those whom it considered the chief war criminals and had removed to Moscow, viz., the ex-Regents (of whom Filov was wrongly reported in Summary No. 258 to have escaped from Bulgaria), Bozhilov, Muraviev, four other ex-Ministers and Generals Lukash and Hadzhi-Petkov. Proceedings have gone on in the two divisions of the People's Court sitting at Sofia. Half a dozen of King Boris's confidants have been heard, and radio and press comment has not failed to point out that the monarchy had surrounded itself with men so decadent that their only defence to-day was to shift responsibility onto the King. Former Cabinet Ministers and Deputies mostly pleaded either that they were kept in ignorance of the Government decisions to join the Tripartite Pact, to allow German forces into the country and to declare war on Great Britain and the United States, or else—what seems nearer the truth—that any opposition on their part would have been futile.

The partisans and Militia are now reported to be fully armed. Ordinary police functions are entrusted to the Militia. It is the Militia, for example, which authorises public meetings, which grants Bulgarians permits to leave or re-enter the country, which—under the Soviet High Command—exercises the censorship and which claimed to have proof that the recent firing of a petrol tank at Ruschuk was Fascist sabotage. According to broadcast announcements the Militia discovered at Ruschuk a military organisation promoted by Fascist industrialists to fight the Fatherland Front. This revelation has been used as an incentive for the public to extirpate Fascism which is alleged to be again raising its head. The Prime Minister, M. Gheorghiev, himself claimed that there was no question of a serious Fascist threat, and it is no doubt true that the Fatherland Front—so long as it sticks together—has little to fear. But the Communists must be aware that their terrorism has made them unpopular and they seem to be bent on getting power into their own hands before the Agrarians, their more moderate partners in the Fatherland Front, capture popular support. Through the Communist Minister of the Interior the Communists already control the Militia and the secret police, and as a result there have been arrests of Agrarians all over the country on one excuse or another. The Communists appear now to be aiming at the control of the Ministry of War and the army. Two Russian-trained Generals have been made Chief of Staff and Adjutant-General, and a partisan Colonel has become Director of Military Intelligence. But whatever signs there may be of a crack in the Fatherland Front, the Soviet High Command's control over the Government and the country is complete, so much so that one of the causes of an economic crisis which is brewing is that Soviet war requirements are exhausting the resources of the country.

Turkey.

The information which emerged during the trials of war criminals at Sofia that the Filov Government asked Berlin for Turkish Thrace up to the Enos–Midia line was probably already known to Angora. It has been treated with commendable silence by Turkish commentators—except M. Yalçin, who insists that Turkey can have no faith in Bulgaria—and a Turkish Minister is being sent to Sofia.

The Turkish press continues to support British policy in Greece wholeheartedly. Reviewing the past year in the semi-official Ulus M. Atay made the absurd claim that Turkey's break with Germany led to Germany's withdrawal from the Balkans, but he repeated the promise that, having no territorial ambitions, Turkey would continue to co-operate with the Allies. As regards the home situation, he said, Turkey was at ease. The cost of living had gone down and there was enough food and clothing. M. Atay ended with the assertion that confidence in the Prime Minister, M. Saracoğlu, was greater than ever. It is probably true that the Government's position has become firmer, for, while many people are tired of the Popular Party, no one has yet emerged able and willing to lead a genuine opposition, and the malcontents seem perforce to have resigned themselves to a continuance of M. Saracoğlu's administration.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The Egyptian Prime Minister has expressed to His Majesty's Ambassador his regret for the anti-British demonstrations that took place at the university on the 23rd December. Ahmad Maher Pasha explained that only irresponsible youths had taken part, and that they had not realised the gravity of their action. The Prime Minister also made a statement to the press, in which he said that he had gone unattended to the university, and had told the students that the incitement leading to the troubles, in which they had taken part, had been based on false reports, spread by paid and lying agents. He urged them not to listen in future to such would-be deceivers, and gave them a special message from King Farouk himself asking that calm should be preserved.

The Prime Minister's visit to the university seems to have had the desired effect. Except for minor unrest on the 25th December, which was promptly suppressed, the situation in Cairo has since been quiet, and the few other disturbances that took place in Alexandria and elsewhere were effectively dealt with by the Egyptian authorities. The main source of the demonstrations, which, according to the Prime Minister, were factitiously worked up by the Wafd, was popular sympathy with Ali Bereir, the Sudanese candidate for the Egyptian parliamentary elections. Fortunately Bereir was prevailed upon by the Prime Minister to withdraw his candidature, and on the 26th December he issued a statement to the press, explaining that his withdrawal was due to "high national and political considerations." Nevertheless, Bereir affirmed his "adherence to Egyptian unity of the Nile Valley, which cannot be broken, since every Sudanese has the same rights and obligations as every Egyptian." The elections are due to take place on the 8th January, and the new Parliament will meet on the 14th January.

The trial of the two Jews accused of the murder of Lord Moyne has been arranged to begin in Cairo on the 10th January. They are to be defended by Tawfiq Doss Pasha, an Egyptian Senator and well-known advocate, and another Egyptian lawyer, assisted by a British-Jewish lawyer practising in Egypt.

Mr. Shone, until recently Minister at His Majesty's Embassy at Cairo, took up his duties as His Majesty's Minister to the Levant States on the 22nd December. In their instructions to him His Majesty's Government have emphasised once more that our policy in the Levant States, while supporting the States' independence, aims at a final settlement of all questions still outstanding between them and the French by an agreement, or series of agreements, to be negotiated between them. It is, of course, realised that the fulfilment of this object will require time and patience. Since Mr. Shone's arrival he has gained the impression that the opposition to a treaty with France is even stronger than he had reason to suppose. Despite the announcement that the change of British Minister implies no change in the policy of His Majesty's Government, the feeling prevails locally that we intend to put pressure on the Levant States, and that sooner or later we shall acquiesce in the French having a privileged position in those States that is incompatible with their complete independence.

In fact, however, while it is true that we admitted in 1941 "that France should have the dominant privileged position in Syria over any other European Power," this does not mean that we favour a state of affairs in which the French would have predominance over the Syrians and Lebanese themselves. The French authorities may, of course, tend to interpret our undertakings in a sense more favourable to themselves. They certainly have in mind the Anglo-Iraqi and Anglo-Egyptian Treaties, but it looks as if they would now find much difficulty in achieving any agreement so favourable to France as those treaties have been to Great Britain.

When some weeks ago we learned that the French intended to send a cruiser to Beirut, it was feared that such a visit at this time might be provocative of trouble in the Lebanon, and we asked the French to postpone it. They, however, decided to proceed with the project, and the cruiser Emile Bertin duly arrived at Beirut just before Christmas. Though the arrival of the cruiser was accompanied by the despatch to Damascus of 20 French tanks, coupled with a stiff note to the Syrian Government protesting against the attitude of the press, the visit passed off without any untoward incident.

Ibn Saud is paying a visit to Mecca, where he arrived on the 28th December. On the 30th December he was to receive Abdul Rahman Azzam, the Egyptian Amir al Hajj, and head of the newly-created Department of Arab Affairs in the Egyptian Foreign Office.

The Persian Prime Minister is preparing a bill to provide for the formation of a Persian company to exploit the oil deposits in the north. Meanwhile the situation in northern Persia remains uneasy. Persian citizens to whom the Russians object are still being deported; there has been a clash at Shahi, in Mazanderan, between workers and gendarmerie, in which Russian troops are said to have intervened; and leaders of the "Workers' Union" have complained, at a demonstration in Tabriz, of the indifference of the central Government to the affairs of Azerbaijan.

Seyyid Zia has recaptured the limelight with an article in Raad-i-Imruz, repudiating the accusation that he is anti-Soviet, but making a spirited counter-attack on M. Kavtaradze. The decision of the Majlis had been made necessary by the threats and other mistakes of the Soviet representative; he (Seyyid Zia) had wished the oil concessions bill to apply only so long as foreign troops remained on Persian soil, and it would certainly not be amended during that period, or while the fate of Cabinets depended, not on the Majlis and the Shah, but on foreign Embassies and synthetic demonstrations. The Government should threaten to move the capital from Tehran if relations with foreign Powers were not clarified in the near future.

THE FAR EAST.

With the American forces astride the central Philippines and threatening Manila, Japanese publicity continues to express confidence in the outcome of the struggle for the archipelago. On the 29th December the Government spokesman, Iguchi, told foreign journalists that, although the Americans had penetrated the "inner circle" of Japanese defence, "they will soon find that they have entered a large trap prepared by us." On the other hand, the possibility that the Americans may reduce Japanese resistance in the Philippines and make a landing on the coast of China is apparently no longer regarded as remote, for Singapore radio broadcasting to China has been at pains to tell the Chinese that, even if the Americans do invade China, they will only meet with disaster, because "Japan's best men are in China."

If the Americans were to capture Manila while Formosa still remained in the hands of the Japanese, they would not yet be in a position to threaten the China coast north of Amoy, but with naval command of the South China Sea, they could launch attacks against either French Indo-China, the island of Hainan or the Hong Kong–Canton area. Overland contact between the Japanese forces in Indo-China and the main Manchuria–China area of Japanese continental occupation has been achieved by the recent campaign in Kwangsi, and Canton is also in communication with the army in Kwangsi via the West River, but a section of the Hankow–Canton railway in northern Kwangtung is still held by Free China troops under Yu Han-mou, preventing direct support for the Canton and Hong Kong garrisons from the Yangtse valley. A Japanese offensive to clear this last main obstacle seems to be the logical conclusion to recent Japanese strategy in China. If it were successful, it would have a political, as well as a military, importance, for it would break up the remaining military power of the old Kwangtung–Kwangsi provincial combination, which in spite of its own internal dissensions has long been a factor limiting the authority of the Central Government. As a matter of long-term political calculation, the weakening of the semi-independent power of such military-political leaders as Li Chai-sum, Chang Fa-kwei and Yu Han-mou will be greatly to the advantage of the Chungking Government (if it can itself survive intact), for, whereas Allied arms can be expected in time to reverse the Japanese conquests in the two Kwang provinces, it will be difficult for the provincial leaders to restore their shattered military and administrative power as it was before.

The Chungking Government itself will escape this kind of disintegration as long as the Japanese do not invade Szechwan. At present there is no immediate prospect of this; there are no signs of a fresh advance into Kweichow and the front in north-west Kwangsi has lapsed into inactivity. With the recession of the threat from the south spirits have risen again in Chungking, and Chiang Kai-shek has issued a New Year message to the nation in which he not only reaffirms emphatically his confidence in victory over Japan, making the most of the Chinese successes in Yunnan and Burma as evidence of what Chinese troops can do if "given proper equipment and co-operation," but also launches a political counter-offensive against the Communists by proposing to summon a People's Congress for adopting a Constitution "as soon as the military situation has become stabilised."

As far as is known, the negotiations between the Chungking Government and the Communists which have been going on for several months have now definitely broken down. Chiang Kai-shek has rejected the Communist terms for a settlement, objecting particularly to Yenan's sweeping demands for autonomy of Communist administration in areas outside the so-called "Border Region." Even more fundamental has been the divergence of views with regard to the formation of a coalition Government at the centre. On this subject the Communist leader, Mao Tse-tung, told the correspondent of the New York Times at Yenan in October that the Communists were unwillingly to join such a Government merely by invitation, because this would be "too much like attending a political banquet." What they wanted was to participate in the selection of the Government "on a democratic basis," and for this purpose they demanded the summoning of "an emergency convention composed of delegates from all political parties, people's associations, cultural organisations, universities and other representative bodies in China." This convention would consist of "from 40 to 100 delegates"; its first business would be to "abolish all existing laws and ordinances that infringe on civil rights," and then it should elect a Government "capable of carrying out the new principles." After the war this Government would be charged with the responsibility of convoking a People's Congress to adopt a Constitution.

The aim of such a proposal was clearly to make the coalition Government responsible not to the Head of the State or the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee (which would mean that the Communist Ministers could at any time be pushed out, leaving the Kuomintang with the legal executive power), but to a body which, consisting mainly of delegates from "people's associations," "cultural organisations" and what not, might be expected to be refractory to Kuomintang control. Such a body, however, would not necessarily be "democratic"; whether it could be rightly so called would depend on the extent of membership of the electing bodies and the manner in which their representatives were chosen. Moreover, this electorate has had hitherto no legal existence, and as there is no general principle by which it could be formed, it would have to be created by an agreement between the Kuomintang and the Communists, who would have jointly to decide what organisations were to send delegates, what voting power should be allotted to them, and how their representatives should be elected. But, as goodwill between the Kuomingtang and the Communists is the one thing lacking at the start, a scheme which depends on their agreement on so complex an issue can hardly hold out the prospect of a solution of the conflict between the two armed factions.

Nevertheless, any such proposals are embarrassing to the Kuomintang, which has recently been made to feel acutely aware of its lack of democratic legitimacy. It is not merely that its present régime is that of a one-party State (which would not make China unique among the United Nations), but it has not so far supported itself by even the formality of popular elections. In these circumstances Chiang Kai-shek's response to domestic and foreign criticism of his rule as undemocratic and to the Communist proposals for an "emergency convention" has been to announce the convening of the postponed People's Congress at an earlier date than he had previously promised. The People's Congress was to have been held in November, 1937, and "elections" for it were going on during 1936–37, but it was postponed owing to the outbreak of the war with Japan. It was again scheduled to assemble in Chungking in November 1940, but was again postponed on the ground that it was impossible under war-time conditions for some of the delegates to reach the capital. Recently the Generalissimo promised that it would be convened within a year after the end of the war. The new announcement certainly advances the date, but is still somewhat indefinite. What the Generalissimo said, as reported by Chungking radio in English, was: "We must prepare for the convening of a People's Congress this year to promulgate a Constitution. . . . . I do not feel the necessity to wait until the end of the war to call a People's Congress. I am ready to propose at once to the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang that, as soon as the military situation has become stabilised enough for us to launch counter-offensives with greater assurance of victory, we should convene a People's Congress and adopt a Constitution which would enable the Kuomintang to transfer the power of government to the people." Since this announcement was made, however, Dr. T. F. Tsiang, Counsellor to the Executive Yuan, has stated that it does not give a guarantee that the Congress will be convened this year.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The 79th Congress convened on Wednesday, the 3rd January, with fateful problems before it. They include the question of universal military training; the broadening of the social security programme; wage stabilisation, price controls and revision of the tax structure; the reconversion of industry to civilian needs to secure full employment after the war; the strengthening of the labour laws, particularly those dealing with the War Labour Board, and, above all, the groundwork to establish an international security organisation to ensure "lasting peace." The President will deliver his traditional message on "the state of the Union" on Saturday, the 6th January, and, according to press reports, either then or in his inaugural address on the 28th January, will deal with Anglo-American relations. It is expected also that he will deal not only with international political relations, which have obviously deteriorated, but also with international economic relations, since the rest of the world is waiting to know the policy which is likely to be pursued by the world's leading creditor nation.

Without any doubt 1944 closed upon what, if American public opinion were taken as a guide, had all the appearance of being the lowest point in Allied unity since the war began, and with a painful resurgence of Anglophobia and, to a slightly lesser extent, of Russophobia in the United States. Perturbation about European political affairs is, no doubt, genuine, but there is also a general, if temporary, feeling of cynical disenchantment, and a quite deplorable tendency to attribute to this country the lowest motives. Both Britain and Russia are regarded as pursuing "power politics" (itself an emotional phrase), and the mood in the United States is now one of baffled disillusionment and pessimism rather than of anger. All this, though serious, should not be taken too tragically. An article in the Economist, describing American complaints of Britain as "intolerable" and calling upon the Prime Minister to stop "appeasing" the United States, has been widely quoted and commented on, and Mr. Elmer Davis, Director of the Office of War Information, has appealed to the American people not to inflame differences among the Allies. They could not, he maintained, reasonably expect all the principles of the Atlantic Charter to be put into force at once or even at the end of the war.

Criticism of the Allies, however, shows a tendency to give way to a demand for a clear-cut statement of American foreign policy itself. Mr. Walter Lippmann, for example, has asserted that American foreign policy has been "based on a radically false conception of war diplomacy." Up to date, says Mr. Lippmann, the United States have taken the position that the settlement of all political problems should wait until after the war, when the international security organisation may be established. But this position, he argues, is neither possible nor desirable. "All great strategical decisions of war are political as well as military." The United States must cease to evade "the practical issue" and must recognise the error of "the policy of postponement"; otherwise it will be unable to assume "leadership." In Congress, on the radio and in the press there is some echo of these views, or at least a demand for a clarification of America's position.

Meanwhile, Mr. Churchill's high courage in visiting Athens has again captured the American imagination. Even the Scripps Howard Press, which has condemned British policy in liberated territories, expressed the view that "Mr. Churchill has again turned weakness into strength and once more proved himself a remarkable statesman." There is no enthusiasm for United States intervention in Greek affairs if Mr. Churchill's mission fails; on all sides, however, hope is expressed that the establishment of a Regency may lead to an early solution of the Greek problems.

As noted in these Summaries, during the last two or three weeks, the old isolationists have again raised their heads and voices with warning cries against European entanglements. Senator Wheeler (Democrat, Montana, and an arch-isolationist) has now taken a surprising step by tabling a resolution advocating a far greater degree of American participation in current European problems and calling for the "immediate creation of a United Nations political council to provide for the democratic settlement, in harmony with the principles of the Atlantic Charter, of territorial questions that have arisen in Europe, and that may arise elsewhere." This has been greeted in some quarters as a gratifying indication of a real change of heart, or at least as a realisation by Senator Wheeler that isolationist opinions are a political handicap. Others, looking back over the past twenty-five years, perceive rather the opening move in a new isolationist policy, argue that Senator Wheeler is convinced, for instance, that the attitude of Russia towards the Polish settlement makes the immediate acceptance of such proposals impossible, and foresee that the Senator may ingeniously attempt to justify a policy of isolationism by the argument that the major Allies have failed to live up to the terms of the Atlantic Charter.

Meanwhile, the news from the Western Front has been received with cautious optimism, though, as noted in last week's Summary, the German offensive has had a most sobering effect on the home front and there is a general recognition of the need for increased output in certain critical items of war production and for further restrictions in civilian consumption. There has been no grumbling, for example, over the ban on horse-racing, increased rationing, or the imposition of sanctions against employers who violate the War Man-Power Commission's regulations. In this connexion, by order of President Roosevelt, the War Department has for the second time seized ten stores and the factories of Montgomery, Ward and Co. (one of the largest department and mail order firms) for refusal to accept the directives of the National War Labour Board issued last spring, requiring it to impose the "closed shop" principle and to deduct trade union dues from wages. Mr. Sewell Avery, the chairman of the company, is a bitter opponent of the New Deal, and the action of the Administration was no doubt hastened by reports that a strike in Montgomery Ward's in Detroit was likely to spread to other workers in war production factories in this important area. In his order the President stated that "strikes" in war time cannot be condoned, whether by workers against their employers or strikes by employers against their Government. All our energies are engrossed in fighting a war on military battle fronts. We have none to spare for war on industrial battle fronts."

(For details of previous clashes between the Administration and Montgomery Ward's, see Summaries Nos. 239 and 241. See also under "Latin America" and "France.")

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 27th December a report appeared in the United States Press that the Mexican Government would call a conference of American Ministers for Foreign Affairs to deal with post-war problems: no representative of Argentina would, apparently, be present, though the Argentine case might be raised at the conference. On the next day the Mexican Foreign Minister denied the accuracy of this statement and expressed his surprise that it should have been made. Nothing, he said, had so far occurred beyond an exchange of views between those Latin American States which were members of the United Nations to discover whether a conference to study post-war problems would be feasible at present. If agreement were reached on the place and agenda of such a conference, it would be called, and Mexico City would be available as its seat. According to Sr. Padilla, the question of inviting Argentina would depend on the unanimous vote of all interested American States. The conference would in any case be an extraordinary one and outside the series of which the Rio de Janeiro Conference was the third.

The Uruguayan Minister for Foreign Affairs has stated that Uruguay would attend such a conference, and mentioned that no other Governments had favoured the suggestion of Uruguay and Colombia for a preliminary informal meeting. He himself thought that a conference would do little good. Even if Argentina participated, it was unlikely that a real decision on the Argentine question would be reached, and any attempt to coerce Argentina or to treat her discourteously would be most undesirable.

The full effect of this in Argentina is difficult to gauge. It may well be interpreted as proof that the State Department will accept nothing less than the overthrow of the present régime, and General Peluffo's position will obviously be weakened as the result of the collapse of his original plan for a full Pan-American Conference. The question is now whether the international situation will play into the hands of the Nationalists, or whether the writing on the wall is plain for all to read. Colonel Perón, it is interesting to note, has lectured a group of Chilean journalists on the democratic nature of the Argentine Government. He took credit for the fact that there were not more than a thousand political prisoners in Argentina—even these, he added, were being gradually released. As for rearmament, he favoured disarmament, but he could not accept it when at the frontiers "each Argentine soldier was faced by five soldiers on the other side" (apparently a further instance of the Colonel's celebrated tact). He could not give a definite date for elections because it would take at least six months to prepare electoral lists. Asked whether he himself would run for the presidency, Colonel Perón professed to leave this matter entirely to destiny. No man, he added, could escape his destiny.

The Brazilian police have arrested about a dozen prominent civilian opponents of the régime, including Dr. Medeiros Netto, president of the Federal Senate until the dissolution of Congress in 1937. About 100 other persons have also been arrested for making "Communist," left-wing, and pro-Russian speeches. These arrests appear to have been of an admonitory nature. President Vargas's reception on a recent visit to São Paulo was markedly cool. But there are no clear signs of union among the left-wing opposition, and the military opponents of Dr. Vargas are generally thought to be unwilling to move while the war lasts. Without them, little or nothing can be accomplished.

Central America remains in a state of tension. The report that the surviving dictators (of Honduras, Nicaragua and El Salvador) have been planning to form a Tripartite Republic (see Summary No. 271) has now been amplified: representatives of the three countries are said to have met in Buenos Aires six months ago to discuss the matter, and the Guatemalan Foreign Minister has stated that this report has been verified and that the three dictator-presidents met at Amapala about Christmas. This is as it may be. What is certain is that there is now trepidation in Guatemala about the repercussions of the unsuccessful revolt in El Salvador (see Summary No. 273), the opponents of the Aguirre régime having received more help than was discreet from the Guatemalan junta. Sr. Toriello, a member of this, has departed for Washington, apparently to ask for arms in case of an attack from El Salvador.

On the 29th December the President of Panamá issued a decree suspending constitutional government, and convoking a national convention for the 15th June. This measure, which provoked an immediate storm, was due to the action of ten members of the National Assembly who had issued a manifesto that they would call for the election of Vice-Presidents, contrary to the understanding that there should be no pressure for a change of President until the end of the present term. The press has been gagged, and Opposition members of the National Assembly have taken refuge in the canal zone. No violence appears to have occurred, but the situation is confused, and the President, subject to pressure from all sides, is in a state of great indecision. It remains to be seen whether that arch-intriguer Arnulfo Arias is implicated in this state of affairs.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE German communiqués and war reports in the first week of the New Year have been concerned to show that Germany has not lost the initiative, in spite of evidence that she has been forced on to the defensive in the Ardennes sector. On the 5th January, a Front report said that "although the fighting during the last few days has changed from its originally offensive character to a stage of grim defensive fighting against the bulk of the Anglo-United States divisions assembled in the west, this fighting is fundamentally different from the defensive fighting of the last few months. Then we fought to prevent the enemy advancing further on German soil. To-day the fighting aims at repelling manœuvres to eliminate the acute danger represented to the enemy by the German offensive." The severity of the fighting is stressed, with emphasis on the heavy American losses. On the 7th January the Ardennes battle was described as "the most terrible battle of attrition of the war." Houffalize was mentioned on the 2nd and 4th January as the centre of Allied attempts to "break through." On the 2nd January the news from the western front was dominated by descriptions of a "surprise attack" by the Luftwaffe on Allied airfields in Belgium and Holland. The O.K.W. claimed heavy Allied losses. On the 3rd, Krull asserted that "the absolute air supremacy which was regarded by the enemy as their greatest trump card will be challenged if surprises of this kind are repeated."

First references to the German offensive in the south gave the impression that there were only local attacks in weakened sectors. On the 5th January the O.K.W. indicated that it was a bigger matter by saying, "the front between Sarreguemines and the Rhine is on the move." On the 6th the O.K.W. referred to the surprise thrust of German forces north of Strasbourg, and this crossing of the Rhine was said by a D.N.B. commentator to be "as much of a surprise to the Anglo-United States strategists as the beginning of the winter battle on the 16th December.'' On the 7th January the O.K.W. opened with the claim that '' during the last few days our troops have established a bridgehead across the Meuse at Wanssum in East Holland.

The O.K.W. has dealt only briefly with the fighting in and around Budapest. On the 6th January it announceed that the Budapest garrison continued to hold out, and front reports spoke of street fighting. For publication abroad, Schmidt called the fighting '' the fiercest and most costly since Stalingrad.'' German efforts to relieve Budapest were first mentioned on the 8th. Krull said that the gallant resistance of the garrison was tying down Russian forces and '' thus creating the basis for a turn in the situation.'' The recapture of Esztergom was announced by the O.K.W. on the 8th.

General Dittmar returned to the microphone on the second day of the New Year in order to present a profit and loss account of the military events of 1944. He was frank about critical times and situations on both the eastern and the western fronts, and in the forefront of his survey referred to the '' ever more ruthless '' air attacks on the Reich. After dealing with the collapse of the central eastern front in July he said that it would be regarded as a masterpiece of German generalship that this gap, seemingly beyond repair, was gradually closed. He insisted that only at the last moment had Germany decided on radical measures of concentration and the mobilisation of the entire resources of the nation, and suggested that such measures should have been enforced much earlier. He attributed the internal crisis of the 20th July to the impression caused by the military threat on east and west. On the credit side he used Italy, claiming that it had been '' a bright spot '' of German strategy throughout the year, although he adopted Mr. Churchill's phrase about the '' soft underbelly '' in order to say how much German stiffening the southern front had required. Among other welcome events of the year had been the emergence of a new European consciousness, presumably in Vlasov's forces), the defence of Warsaw under the very eyes of the Russians on the opposite bank of the Vistula, and the consolidation of the main fronts, which had in the west led to an actual German offensive.

Himmler, the most energetic of Germany's present masters, does not court publicity, and it is instructive to follow his activity in the sphere of appointments. Leading positions in the Reserve Army, for example, were filled late in 1944 by men taken from high posts in the Waffen S.S. Early in November General Osterkamp, since 1940 head of the Administration Office in the High Command of the Army, was decorated, retired (to be subsequently appointed to command Wehrkreis XII) and succeeded by August Frank, promoted two days later to the rank of S.S. General. Similarly, Hans Jüttner, chief of the Central Appointments Office of the S.S., was made chief of the Army General Division and permanent representative of the Reich Leader S.S. as Commander of the Reserve Army. The tendency in such appointments is fairly clear, which is more than can be said of recent changes in administrative posts. The most important of these is possibly the removal of Hans von Helms from charge of a Department in the Ministry of the Interior to be acting Landeshauptmann of Westphalia. In normal times this latter would not be thought an important post, since the Landeshauptmann, being in charge of provincial self-administration, is under the supervision of the Oberpräsident, who is the Gauleiter of Northern Westphalia. In the adjacent province of Hanover the Gauleiter, incapacitated by a car accident, has appointed as Oberpräsident in his place, not his deputy, Bredow, but a younger man, Binding, hitherto Regierungspräsident of Hildesheim.

Propaganda regarding the Volkssturm continues to run well ahead of the known facts. It is reported that in central Germany west of Berlin the numbers of volunteers have been exceedingly small and that some conscripted men have not received any drill. The Deputy Gauleiter of Vienna recently described the formation of the Volkssturm as the final stage in the National-Socialist revolution, whereby the people had become sovereign. Rightly regarded, the Volkssturm was the Führer's greatest political creation; it proved his confidence in every citizen. Evidence of the lack of such confidence has increased of late, particularly as regards the careful selection of officers according to their political reliability. A recent directive, emanating from Hitler's Headquarters, reveals that men with actual military experience can only be considered for appointment as battalion commanders if they have already proved themselves good Party members. The same point emerges from a verbose press agency account of the 28th December, 1944, which endeavours to explain that mere military ability does not make a good Volkssturm leader: the first prerequisite is loyalty to the Führer. A man '' may have been a good superior officer in the army and yet in the Volkssturm be best suited for a place in the ranks.''

Germany is exporting to Sweden textiles which are badly needed by both the soldiers and the civilians of the Reich, whose needs cannot be met by her own industries, some of which are crippled by bombardment. Nothing is done for civilians, but they are asked, as every year, to contribute clothing for the army. Last week's appeal for garments '' of every description '' was more urgent and circumstantial than usual. It was signed by Bormann, Funk, Goebbels and Himmler, and pointed out that military demands were heavily increased by those of the People's Grenadiers and the Volkssturm. The tone recalled that of the appeals for winter clothing to be sent to the eastern front in 1941 and 1942. It did not disguise the fact that in this sphere, as in so much else, the front depends on the efforts of those at home.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Despite the increased German pressure on the south bank of the Danube, which has forced the Red Army to yield up Esztergom, the Russians have continued to press forward to the west on the Slovak side of the river. Having crossed the Hron they have advanced some 15 miles towards Komárno and the River Nitra, which represents the last natural obstacle before Bratislava, now about 65 miles distant.

The chief event of the past week in Slovakia was a visit to Bratislava by General Dittmar, who delivered an address there on the 4th January. The Premier and other members of the Slovak Government were present as well as the leaders of the German Ethnic Group. The speech was typical of current German propaganda, its themes being Germany's marvellous recovery from the set-backs of 1944, the fissures appearing in the Allied coalition, the chaos in the liberated countries and the indications of Allied war weariness.

Czechoslovak official circles in London have made no comment on the action of the Lublin Committee in declaring itself the Provisional Government of Poland. The current issue of the Communist weekly, Nové Československo, however, contains an editorial article acclaiming the step and calling for Czechoslovak recognition of the Lublin Provisional Government.

POLAND.

The proclamation of the '' Provisional Government '' in Lublin, reported in the last Summary, was quickly followed by a request from its President for recognition by the U.S.S.R. This recognition was given on the 5th January, and ambassadors were exchanged; M. Victor Lebedev, formerly Soviet envoy to the Allied Governments in London, being appointed to Lublin, while the Lublin envoy in Moscow is M. Zygmunt Modzelewski (see also under '' Soviet Union ''). The Polish Government in London has issued a statement in which it is urged that '' Soviet recognition is a direct violation of the fundamental rights of the Polish nation.'' In Washington a spokesman of the State Department said that his Government had nothing to add to Mr. Stettinius' new year statement reported in the last Summary.

The Polish Peasant Party in London (M. Mikolajczyk's party) has stated that '' if the Allied Governments were to recognise the Lublin administration, they would thereby make themselves accomplices in an attempt to impose a Communist Government in Poland as a preliminary to the complete absorption of Poland by the Soviet Union.''

The National Homeland Council's meeting in Lublin last week, at which the change of title was proclaimed, is reported to have been attended by 105 members, including a number from German-occupied Poland and one Pole from East Prussia. M. Morawski made a long speech in the Council, outlining, among other things, plans for taking over the rest of Poland when liberated; for settling Poles from outside Poland there; for land reform, social reform and training of teachers; for rebuilding industry; for extending the use of tractors with the help of peasants' co-operatives; and for enlarging the army. General Zymierski also spoke at length on the Polish army in Poland and the need for completely reversing the foreign policy of the late Colonel Beck. The army, he said, now contained 10 infantry divisions, an armoured corps, two armoured brigades, an air force, 12 independent divisions and brigades of artillery, one cavalry brigade, engineers' and sappers' brigades, and a medical corps. It now had 30,000 officers and 15,000 cadets undergoing instruction. He was confident, he added, "that those who covered Polish arms with glory in the battles of Italy, France and Holland will, by breaking with their reactionary command, contribute through their struggle to the attaining of a free and democratic Poland." This phase is characterised by the Polish Government in London as a direct incitement to mutiny.

The attitude in Lublin towards M. Mikolajczyk has hardened. M. Morawski has said of him that although he has not joined M. Arciszewski's Government he has not declared himself against M. Arciszewski, nor broken off relations with the "Polish reactionaries" in London. "By this attitude he has condemned himself to isolation from the masses of the Polish people." "In such circumstances," M. Bierut observed on the 1st January, "I assess negatively any chances of agreement." M. Mikolajczyk's name is even reported to have been included in a list of London Polish leaders in favour of whose exclusion from Poland the "Peasant Party Congress" in Lublin passed a resolution last week.

Comment in the Soviet press has been copious on the transformation of the Polish Committee of National Liberation into the "Provisional Government of Poland," and its subsequent recognition by the U.S.S.R. Izvestia hailed the change as "the most important event in all Poland's history," and all papers claimed that it had been achieved on the unanimous demand of the population of the whole of liberated Poland. Both Izvestia and Pravda were unsparing in their castigation of the Polish Government in exile, which by "its anti-national anti-democratic policy had brought about its own utter isolation from the Polish people." Its "criminal political intrigues" aimed at undermining the unity of the anti-Hitler coalition, at destroying "the tender roots of the democratic sovereignty of Poland," had, however, been brought to nought; and even circles still openly sympathising with the Polish reactionaries had now to admit that "the emigré cabinet was only hanging by a thread."

The decision to recognise the Lublin Committee's new status, taken by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. on the 5th January, was treated by Pravda as a natural and logical consequence of the Soviet policy of maintaining and consolidating friendly relations with democratic Poland. The War and the Working Class maintained that the "Provisional Government" would soon "take its merited place among the Allied Governments and be accorded recognition by them." Mihailov, in a broadcast from Moscow, claimed that the new democratic Poland had become an important factor in European politics, and treated the case of Poland as only "one of many instances of the establishment and organisation of the democratic forces of the European peoples which were making themselves more and more actively felt."

On the 8th January a statement was put out by the secretary of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. M. Gorkin, decrying rumours circulating in the foreign press that M. Bierut, President of the Polish National Council of the Homeland, had been arrested under the Pilsudski régime and exchanged for a certain Pole in custody in the U.S.S.R. by agreement between the Governments of the U.S.S.R. and of Poland. The issue of such a statement from the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet is highly unusual.

ERRATUM.

In Summary No. 274, under "Poland" line 10, the number of members of the Workers' Party was wrongly given as 5, instead of 4.

SOVIET UNION.

The main interest of the fighting on the Soviet-German front this week has centred round the battle for Budapest. Inside the city the Red army is slowly but methodically advancing block by block, against stubborn resistance. To the north-west a German counter-attack south of the Danube has met with some success, and on the 7th January the Soviet communiqué announced the abandonment of Esztergom. No further withdrawal has been announced, however, and on the other side of the Danube the Red army has crossed the Hron and advanced more than half the distance between that river and Komarno. The continuance of this push suggests that the Soviet High Command is confident of its ability to hold the German thrust in the opposite direction on the southern bank of the Danube.

M. Zaslavsky has reviewed Sir Edward Grigg's book "British Foreign Policy" at length in Bolshevik. The review is favourable, and Sir Edward Grigg's chapters on the British Government's European policy between the two wars are described as the writing of a realist with a clear understanding of his country's vital interests. M. Zaslavsky quotes with approval the author's rejection of a western bloc as a repetition of the errors which gave rise to the second world war. M. Zaslavsky's main criticism, in line with current Soviet utterances, is that Sir Edward Grigg underestimates the tenacity of Fascist ideas and crypto-Fascist organisations, and that more determined action will be needed to lay the foundations of peace than the author envisages.

The full text is now available of the article on the plans of the Habsburgs in Europe noted in Summary No. 271. In connexion with alleged Papal support for the schemes of Otto and his uncle, Prince Rupert of Bavaria, for setting up a new Catholic State in Central Europe, The War and the Working Class repeated the note of hostility to the Vatican sounded last week in Izvestiya (see Summary No. 274). Basing itself on foreign press reports that both Prince Rupert and his nephew were to be received at the Vatican, the article claimed that they had found in the Pope "a producer who would stage their monarchical farce as if it were a solemn mystery." Pravda, in its international review of the 8th January, also returned to the charge, maintaining that the Pope was attempting to prevent Hitler's accomplices from having to answer for their crimes. The fact that certain American newspapers had taken up the Pope's theme of a "just peace" which, according to him, implied no distinction between victor and vanquished, showed that his Christmas message had been directly used by those to whom it was addressed, i.e., by pro-Fascist elements attempting to cover up with the authority of the Church the wicked deeds of the Hitlerites. Such elements, according to Pravda, were hoping at least to save Hitler's legacy if they could not save Hitler himself.

For the Soviet decision on the 5th January to recognise the Provisional National Government of the Polish Republic, see under "Poland." M. Victor Lebedev, appointed as Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. to Poland, is a man of 44; he was Counsellor at the Soviet Legation in Belgrade in 1940–41, and in 1943 was made Ambassador to the Allied Governments in London. For the appointment of General Catroux as French Ambassador in Moscow, see under "France."

It was reported on the 4th January that M. Molotov had received M. Janos Gyöngyösi, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Provisional National Government of Hungary.

The recent celebration in Tashkent of the 20th anniversary of the Uzbek S.S.R. was marked by the attendance of a delegation of 11 Persians (accompanied by the Soviet Consul-General in Meshed, M. Abramov) representing the Persian Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R. The Persian guests are reported as paying tribute to the progress made by Uzbekistan under the "constant solicitude of Marshal Stalin." They were received by the President of the Moslem Ecclesiastical Board of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, Ishan Babakhan Abdumadjidkhanov, who talked to them about Moslem affairs in Central Asia and the part played by Soviet Moslems in the war against Hitlerite Germany. The delegation was entertained to dinner by the new Uzbek Commissar for Foreign Affairs, M. Aliev. Some weeks ago a Persian delegation attended the celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Turkmen S.S.R. (see Summary No. 272). These visits are no doubt not unconnected with the Soviet-Persian oil conflict and the Soviet effort to play the Moslem card in this affair. (See also under "Middle East.")

Following a very belated announcement by Tass of the departure of a group of Soviet Moslem pilgrims for Mecca (which they had not visited since 1926), the Mufti of Russia, Abdur Rahman Zainullah Raisuli, made a public statement recalling the hardships imposed on Moslems in the Tsarist Empire, and their progress under the Soviet régime, concluding with a vivid picture of Moslem sufferings during the war with Germany.

SCANDINAVIA.

In spite of the correct behaviour of the Soviet authorities in Finland, widespread fears are reported to exist in that country that its independence is ultimately threatened. But while the new situation undoubtedly affords encouragement for the growth of domestic Communism—hitherto suppressed, but probably always possessing considerable latent strength—there seems no reason to suppose that fears of absorption have any serious foundation. The analogy of the Baltic States is fallacious, since the occupation of these small countries had an obvious strategic motive which in Finland is adequately satisfied by the terms at present imposed, while the economic incentive presented by the Baltic ports hardly applies to Finland.

There are, however, signs that events in other countries liberated from German occupation or hoping shortly to be so, and the expectation—well-founded or not—of Soviet support, have encouraged Scandinavian Communists to adopt a more intransigent attitude vis-à-vis the more moderate elements in the local resistance movements. Norwegian and Danish Communists have commented on the Greek situation in extremely tendentious terms: the secret broadcasting station, "Norges Frihet," which is obviously under Communist control, speaks of fights "between the Greek Quislings and reactionary forces, on the one hand, supported most energetically by the British troops, and the Greek army of liberation on the other." An even more violent expression of Communist opinion was voiced in a recent issue of the Danish-language paper Kurer, published in this country as the organ of the Danish Seamen's Union. This paper went so far as to suggest a refusal by Danish seamen to carry supplies to Greece. The opposition to the post-war plans of the Norwegian Government, of which the formation of the Union of Norwegian Patriots referred to in last week's Summary appears to be a symptom, is probably a further instance of growing Communist assertiveness and ambition, and the same characteristics are becoming noticeable in the relations between the Communist elements of the Danish Freedom Council and the more moderate side of the resistance movement represented by former members of the Rigsdag. Attempts are, however, continuously being made to reconcile these opposing forces.

These internal conflicts, however, have in no way interfered with the useful work being performed by the resistance movements. In Denmark, an outstanding success was achieved on the 2nd January, when a band of about eighty saboteurs, armed with a 20-mm. automatic gun, stormed and wrecked the Torotor factory in Copenhagen, which was said to be used for the manufacture of essential parts of the steering mechanism for German V2 rockets. A successful raid was also made recently on the Horsens prison, from which fifteen political prisoners were liberated, including the captain who was responsible for the escape of M. Christmas Möller from Denmark. In Norway, too, the destruction by fire, following an explosion, of the headquarters of the Borgervakt in Oslo, towards the end of the year, has obviously contributed to minimising the response to summonses to attend for service in this organisation; those who have complied are now estimated to be no more than 1 per cent. of those called up. The police are also reported to have refused in a great many cases to seek out and arrest the recalcitrants.

A recent Gallup Poll in Sweden on the question which two events in 1944 had created the strongest impression appears to throw an unfavourable light either on the intelligence of average public opinion or on the trustworthiness of this form of enquiry. By far the highest proportion of votes—49 per cent.—went to the sinking of the Hansa, the invasion of France being a bad second with 36 per cent., while the surrender of Paris and the crossing of the German frontier each achieved no more than 1 per cent. The murder of the Danish poet Kaj Munk attracted 23 per cent. of the votes, while the attempt on the life of Hitler only received 11 per cent. The distress in North Norway achieved 12 per cent. and the Russo-Finnish armistice 10 per cent. Interest in bomb incidents diminished, perhaps naturally, with distance from the centre; Russian bombs on Stockholm attracted 6 per cent., but on Haparanda only 2 per cent., while the latter figure tied with that occasioned by the flying-bomb attacks on England.

LOW COUNTRIES.

A long speech by Seyss-Inquart was broadcast to the Dutch on the 7th. The Reich Commissar explained at length that the Germans had done all they could to make the Occupation as little of a burden as possible to the Dutch. Until September they had seen to it that the rations were adequate. But afterwards things had deteriorated and now the situation in the Netherlands was characterised "by hunger, cold and misery." Transport difficulties were, of course, largely responsible for the shortage of food and coal. The railway strike, however, was not causing the German authorities any anxiety, though it was injuring the Dutch. Seyss-Inquart was at pains to state that none of the strikers had been persecuted, and to add that the strikers had been dismissed, and would obtain work again only to the extent which the Occupation authorities decided; certainly, those who had been in responsible positions would not be reinstated; they would be called to account, but there was no hurry about that. On the other hand, the Reich Commissar showed more anxiety in his references to the "standstill of inland shipping"; if the Dutch were to receive supplies of food and coal a tonnage of 100–150,000 would be required; in point of fact, a far greater tonnage was available. The German authorities had declared that ships so employed and furnished with proper certificates would not be requisitioned. When, therefore, a Dutchman saw a ship hidden in a small side-canal he should ask himself whether that craft and its skipper were not partly responsible for the shortages. If the Dutch would co-operate, the Germans would ensure the distributions of food and coal. If, indeed, the latter were not made available, the pumping stations would cease to work for lack of power and large parts of the country, including Rotterdam, would be flooded.

Certain other points in Seyss-Inquart's speech also deserve mention. He admitted that quantities of industrial equipment were being exported to the Reich and that Dutchmen aged 17–40 were being called up for labour, many of them for labour in the Reich; the call-up had unhappily been attended by painful circumstances, very distressing to the "sentimental" Germans. But Germany must do all she could to strengthen herself in a total war, and conditions for persons called up would have been much better had they been willing to do what they were told. Finally the Reich Commissar alluded to the Dutch resistance organisations in terms which showed that he regarded them as dangerous and declared that all who joined them placed themselves outside the laws of war.

If Seyss-Inquart's speech be considered as a whole, it is a fair inference that the Dutch are causing the Germans a lot of trouble. His references to inland water transport are particularly illuminating, while his nonchalant treatment of the railway strike looks very much like bluff.

M. R. Motz, President of the Belgian Liberal Party, has written an article in the Brussels Soir on the food shortage in his country. He says that while Belgium must make the best use of such resources as she possessed at home, she is in great need of imports from the Congo, particularly of vegetable oils. The Congo had made a great contribution to the Allied war effort and it would be a measure of pure justice to make available a part of Belgium's merchant navy for the importation of food from the Congo to Belgium. At the present moment the hearts of the Belgians were full of affection for the British. It would be a thousand pities if that affection were to be diminished by the belief—albeit false—that Belgium was not being fairly treated.

The Belgian Minister of Supply (see Summary No. 271) subsequently stated that during his recent visit to London he had obtained promises that some sardines and oil for margarine would forthwith be sent to Belgium from Britain and that during the present month shipping would be made available for the transport of food from the Congo and from the United States.

FRANCE.

A communiqué published in the French press of the 6th January stated that General de Gaulle conferred with Mr. Churchill and General Eisenhower at Allied Headquarters on the 3rd and that at the end of the Conference the General had a talk with the Prime Minister.

President Roosevelt's cordial references to France in his Message to Congress have given great satisfaction, not least his statement that "we are now about to equip large new French forces with the most modern weapons for combat duty." It and the conference just mentioned have been interpreted by the Paris correspondent of The Times as pointing to the recognition of a larger French share in the direction of Allied military operations, which are now, as the result of the German thrusts, taking place to a wider extent than expected upon French soil.

The French desire for a strong army has become all the stronger since the launching of the new German offensive in Alsace which has led to the Allied evacuation of Wissembourg and to a German crossing of the Rhine a few miles North of Strasbourg. The French home service radio of the 8th January admitted a "momentary panic"—transformed by German propaganda into a mass evacuation—but asserted that the people had been reassured by the promise from the United States General commanding the sector that "Strasbourg and Alsace will be defended."

In an interview with a representative of Résistance, M. Diethelm, Minister for War, said that if the war lasted a few months longer France would by the end of it have an army of more than 650,000 men. The post-war army of the future would, however, have to be very different from the old one; it would be a limited army of specialists, technicians and tacticians, always ready to strike hard and promptly at any time and place, should the defence of the Empire and of international conventions demand it. At the same time, however, training centres should be set up where the entire class mobilised could during a short period of military service receive "the fundamental military and patriotic training indispensable to all citizens of a great nation." In a later statement M. Diethelm gave details about the new call-up recently announced by General de Gaulle (see last Summary). The mobilisation of the 1943 class would proceed regionally and in groups according to the accommodation and equipment available. The 1944 class would be called up in the same way, at the end of March, and the 1945 class would follow at the end of April as soon as barrack-space, clothing and equipment allowed.

General de Larminat, Commander-in-Chief of the French Forces in the West, has told a correspondent of the Aube that traffic in almost all the Atlantic ports save Brest and Bayonne is entirely paralysed. For the moment the situation on the front had been stabilised and his duty was to see that the German garrisons continued to be surrounded. In spite of being ill-clad and ill-shod, his men showed a remarkable spirit.

Following upon the last debate of the Consultative Assembly, the Minister of Finance has obtained approval for a draft ordinance on fiscal charges. Though the measures proposed involve the raising of the level at which income tax becomes payable from 10,000 fr. to 20,000 fr., revenue from this tax is not expected to decrease in view of the general rise of wages. There is also to be an increase in the amounts of the taxes which local authorities can impose, in particular the entertainment tax. On the 3rd January the Council of Ministers further approved a 40 per cent. rise in passenger railway fares and a 70 per cent. increase in freight charges; an ordinance reducing the number of judges in courts of first instance from three to one—a measure intended to speed up the course of justice; and an ordinance restoring and extending the principle of free secondary education, which had been reversed by Vichy.

The Council of Ministers on the 30th December approved an ordinance announcing important reforms covering salaries and pensions in the civil service to take effect as from the 1st February. To overcome anomalies and meet hardships caused by the present rise in the cost of living, all posts have been classified in one or other of 62 new categories, each of which will carry a minimum salary representing an increase above the present rates. The new basic salaries will range from 36,000 fr. per annum to 450,000 fr. in the highest grade (e.g., President of the Court of Appeal). Family allowances are to be increased and a new system of compulsory savings will be introduced for all officials drawing more than 100,000 fr. per annum.

It was officially announced in the French press of the 31st December that General Catroux, Minister Delegate for North Africa, had been appointed French Ambassador in Moscow. His post in North Africa will not necessarily be filled, as questions concerning that area can be handled with less confusion by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and of the Interior.

By a Government decision Oradour-sur-Glane, near Limoges, the scene of the German mass-outrage of the 10th June last (see Summaries Nos. 249–251) is to be kept uninhabited and unchanged as a memorial to the victims. A new village will be built near.

On the 5th January the press announced the arrest in Paris of MM. Lemaigre-Dubreuil and Rigaud (see Summary No. 245). The death sentence on Henri Béraud (see last Summary) was the subject of an article of protest in the Figaro by M. Mauriac, who said there had been no evidence that he had been a collaborator and that bad causes should not be provided with martyrs. Béraud's appeal has since been rejected. Paul Chack (see Summary No. 272) was executed on the 9th January (see also under "Italy" and "Middle East").

SWITZERLAND.

As is customary, the Federal Council, at is first meeting in the New Year on the 4th January, allocated its members to the various Departments. The Political Department which deals with foreign affairs, was assigned to Dr. Petitpierre, of Neuchâtel: he thus takes the place of M. Pilet-Golaz who resigned from the Federal Council in November. It is understood that

M. Pilet-Golaz's departure is not primarily due to the failure of his negotiations with the U.S.S.R. but to his feeling that the new situation which Switzerland will have to face in liberated Europe needs to be handled by someone who does not suffer under the disability of having been in relations with the Governments of Hitler, Mussolini and Pétain. Though, as stated in Summary No. 272, Dr. Petitpierre was nominated for the Federal Council by the Radical Democrats, the Catholic Conservatives and the Farmers' Party, he is considered to be more acceptable to the Social Democrats than his predecessor, and his appointment is therefore likely to improve the relations between the Social Democrats and the bourgeois parties. Dr. Petitpierre is 45 years of age and has been Professor of Private International Law at the University of Neuchâtel since 1939.

Prognostications in the United States press of an intensification of Allied pressure against Swiss-German trade relations led, on the 5th January, to a statement by M. Hotz, Director of the Commerce Division of the Federal Department of Public Economy. As regards the export of Swiss products to Germany, M. Hotz said these had been reduced to the "strict minimum" needed to secure from Germany materials vital to Switzerland, cut off as she was from the sea. As regards transit traffic, Switzerland had loyally observed her international engagements and had at no time during the war permitted the through transport of war materials. The Swiss people were unanimous in feeling that there was no need for pressure to be put upon them and they would not give in to it.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Some publicity has been given to the refusal to Dr. Negrín, the former Republican Prime Minister of Spain, of facilities for broadcasting from London last week to a Spanish democratic meeting organised in New York by the American periodical the Nation. The Foreign Office informed Dr. Negrín that he could send his message by telegram to the meeting, which he did. The decision was made for two reasons. First, the radio telephone service (by which the broadcast would be made) is available only for Government or Government-sponsored calls, press calls, or approved broadcast messages: it is heavily burdened, and its use is very strictly controlled. To grant Dr. Negrín the use of it for political purposes would certainly bring legitimate complaints from others who have been refused permission in the past. Secondly, Dr. Negrín was allowed to come to Great Britain as a refugee on the understanding that he would not indulge in any political activities. Since a London weekly has stated that Dr. Negrín's stay in England was not conditional, it may be said that on the 22nd November, 1939, Señor Azcárate, ex-Republican Spanish Ambassador in London, who had enquired whether a visa could be granted to enable him to come to England from France, was informed that a visa for three weeks would be granted provided he gave an undertaking that Dr. Negrín would not indulge in any political activity. As Dr. Negrín's sponsor, Señor Azcárate accepted that condition in a letter dated the 24th November, 1939. Dr. Negrín did not avail himself of the visa until the fall of France, when his departure had become a matter of personal urgency. He arrived in this country, in fact, as a political refugee, and was bound by the conditions on which the visa was granted to him.

When the Portuguese Cabinet was remodelled last September, the change was summarised in the words "all Dr. Salazar seems to have done is to fit a set of new tyres: the engine remains the same." (See Summary No. 258). Since then the new men have shown themselves as firm in their Nationalist faith as their predecessors, and quite as subservient to Dr. Salazar in spirit and action. It may be said, however, that the Ministers have displayed an intense preoccupation with the problems of economic and social reform and an ostensibly strong desire to combat the abuses that flourish so abundantly in the Portuguese Corporative State. Acting upon the principles of discipline and intregity, they have bestirred themselves to travel the country, investigating the conduct of their various administrations, agriculture, public works, education, police and public health. The press are giving full support to the commendable activities of these brave new brooms, and abuses are incessantly ventilated and reforms demanded in the columns of the newspapers. The effect of such publicity is healthy, and many a shady local official has been temporarily shaken back into the straight path of duty.

But whether the efforts being made by the Government and the press will achieve solid results in the field of social reform is questionable. This is a country where imaginative idealists, "putting the will for the deed and aiming at ends without employing means,'' create with facile fervour a dream-world far more attractive than any Portuguese reality. And when they come to give their paper paradise a material existence, there is a sorry gap between project and performance; for like all romantics they inevitably lose the battle between the inner world of freedom and the outer world of necessity. Hence the gorgeous bathrooms of the wolfram racketeers, which contain every refinement save water, the factories in which the workmen's model dormitories are unlocked only for the passing admiration of visitors, and the schools, alongside which it would be only just an exaggeration to say that Mr. Will Hay's establishment would seem a model of studious efficiency. And it would be an error to conclude that the Portuguese are distressed by this façade. They are not. Like all Latins, they love a façade; ostentation plays a very important part in their lives. This pleasure in outward show, coupled with the conditions of Biblical simplicity—and squalor—which obtain all over the country make progress in our sense of the word impossible of achievement by one Government, or indeed by one generation. All that can be said now is that the Portuguese Government are aware of the radical demands for social improvement which are being advocated in the world at large, and that they are showing the best intentions to put their promises into practice.

There are reports that the reorganisation of the Cabinet in September is to be carried a stage further, and it is suggested that Dr. Salazar is anxious to form a strong Government capable of withstanding the shock of the Allied victory, which, according to his way of thinking, will bring with it an increased danger of communism in Europe. The two changes now rumoured to be in preparation affect the Ministries for Foreign Affairs, Education and Colonies. Dr. Teotonio Pereira, Ambassador to Spain, will be given the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, and Dr. Caeiro da Mata will leave the Ministry of Education to succeed him in Madrid. And Dr. Marcelo Caetano, it is stated, who is much occupied by his duties as head of the "Mocidade," the Youth Movement, has asked to be relieved of the Ministry of Colonies. If this story is true, Dr. Caiero da Mata will be disappointed, for he looked on the Ministry of Education as merely a stepping-stone to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. But Dr. Pereira would probably be a better choice, and it may be that Dr. Salazar wants to remove him from Spain, where he has done very well, as being too markedly a Salazar man who had better disappear now, rather than await the possible disappearance of the Franco régime. As to the Colonies, it is believed that Dr. Salazar wishes to regard that Ministry less as a political office than a permanent home for a competent Minister of State.

ITALY.

During a recent press conference in Rome the head of the Government Press Office made some references to Franco-Italian diplomatic relations. He expressed a wish that normal diplomatic relations between his country and France should be resumed as soon as possible since they were bound by so many ties of affection and traditions, and hoped that the negotiations which were now in progress would soon be successfully concluded. There were, according to the head of the press, "no obstacles arising from territorial claims." Reminding his listeners that Italy had already repudiated all territorial claims made under the Fascist régime, he finished by saying that the status of Italians in Tunisia was the only remaining question to be settled.

This, however, seems to be wishful thinking as the Agence Française de la Presse has since published in the press a statement, based on official information, on this subject. This statement says that it is premature to speak of negotiations proceeding favourably when only preliminary contacts have as yet been made, and goes on to say that it is a mistake to speak of the status of Italians in Tunisia as a subject for discussion since the Conventions of 1896 governing the status of Italians in Tunisia have lapsed as a result of Italy's declaration of war on France in June 1940." This state of affairs was formally recognised by an Ordinance of the Provisional Government of France in June 1944. Further, as regards territorial questions there has never been any question of these being raised during discussions dealing with the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

Le Monde also publishes an article to the effect that although France is as desirous as the Italian Cabinet to resume cordial relations it would be a mistake to hurry negotiations as the French public opinion needs some preparation, because France has not yet forgotten Italy's declaration of war.

The purge of Fascist elements in the Italian army, particularly in the higher ranks, has been urged by the Left on more than one occasion. During the recent Government crisis one of the Communist-Socialist demands was the resignation of Count Casati, the Minister for War. Since then, General Armando Azzi and Emilia Lussu (Action Party) have both expressed their desire in the press for the democratisation of the army. General Azzi's article caused a minor sensation as he was a regular serving soldier and military commander of Lazio. The General demanded that the "Royal" army should be re-named the "National" army, that the Piave hymn should take the place of the royal anthem, that the oath of allegiance should be modified, and, finally, that relations between officers and men should be reorganised on a more democratic basis. The Italian Government took disciplinary action in the General's case which Signor Togliatti, the Communist Party leader, as a member of the Government, approved. Signor Nenni, the Socialist leader, however, in his paper Avanti strongly supported the General and condemned the Government's action although Signor Togliatti had approved it. Emilio Lussu, in an article in Italia Libera (Action Party) advocated the sweeping away of the generals who, he said, were "bound heart and soul to the Supreme Commanders of the Fascist war." Lussu, however, expressed mild approval of Count Casati as Minister of War.

It is not yet quite clear whether the purging of the Fascist element in the army is the real reason for these demands or whether a fear that the pro-monarchist feeling in the army, as fostered by Marshal Badoglio as a balance to Fascist influence during Mussolini's régime, is still strong. Marshal Badoglio may be by now more or less out of the picture but his successor or successors may be considered to be imbued with the same pro-monarchist spirit.

There has been a report in the Press that the King of Italy is seriously ill and that the Crown Prince has gone to his father's bedside.

In an address in Rome Signor Soleri, Minister of the Treasury, pointed out that the Fascist régime had bequeathed to the new Italian Government an enormous budgetary deficit. (This confirms the suspicion of the grave budgetary difficulties of the Fascist Government, which had, however, always been concealed by the omission to publish the relevant figures.) Italy, Signor Soleri stated, has now a huge note circulation unbacked by any gold or foreign currencies. According to the Minister, the Italian people "are resigned to the devaluation of their currency now being effected, but wish to see it stabilised on a basis on which reconstruction can begin."

In the North, Mussolini spent New Year's Day inspecting the soldiers of the Tenth M.A.S. Flotilla and Militiamen of the G.N.R. Press and radio commemorated the twentieth anniversary of Mussolini's speech of the 3rd January, 1925, against his Aventinist opponents, which has always been observed as one of the great days in the Fascist calendar. This year press comment drew comparisons between the opposition encountered by Fascism in 1925 and the present situation: "To-day, as then, Mussolini is alive and present, and his enemies will not prevail."

A Milanese who was in Milan at the time of Mussolini's visit in December and who has recently arrived in Switzerland, has told a Swiss paper that Mussolini seemed to be well and in good fighting fettle when in Milan. This informant spoke of a deterioration in Milanese morale and a revival of anti-Allied feeling during the last three months, owing to such varying factors as disappointment at the slowness of the Allied advance, successful Fascist and German propaganda, air-raids, food shortage and winter privations. To balance this report, however, Swiss sources tell of recent riots among the workers in Milan, resulting in the arrest by the Germans of 10,000 Italians, who are to be deported to Germany. Scoccimarro, the Minister for Occupied Italy in the Bonomi Government, has also recently stated that open and general anti-Nazi demonstrations took place among Italians workers in the north early in December.

A Decree of the 25th December abolishes the Fascist Confederations of Industrialists, Farmers, Traders and Credit Insurance Firms. Their functions will be taken over by a single Confederation of Labour, Technicians and the Arts (known as C.O.L.T.A.) and by national, provincial and communal syndicates. This measure is greeted by the Fascist press as a first step towards the practical implementation of the socialisation policy outlined in the Verona Manifesto.

THE VATICAN.

In his New Year Speech to the Papal Guards, the Pope emphasised the non-exclusiveness of the Catholic Church, a point which he brought out in his Christmas Eve Message (see Summary No. 274, "Vatican") and for which Pravda attacked him. He said of the many visitors the war brought him from both sides: "So long as they might approach us we graciously received the sons

Emilio Lussu, in an article in Italia Libera (Action Party) advocated the sweeping away of the generals who, he said, were "bound heart and soul to the Supreme Commanders of the Fascist war." Lussu, however, expressed mild approval of Count Casati as Minister of War.

It is not yet quite clear whether the purging of the Fascist element in the army is the real reason for these demands or whether a fear that the pro-monarchist feeling in the army, as fostered by Marshal Badoglio as a balance to Fascist influence during Mussolini's régime, is still strong. Marshal Badoglio may be by now more or less out of the picture but his successor or successors may be considered to be imbued with the same pro-monarchist spirit.

There has been a report in the Press that the King of Italy is seriously ill and that the Crown Prince has gone to his father's bedside.

In an address in Rome Signor Soleri, Minister of the Treasury, pointed out that the Fascist régime had bequeathed to the new Italian Government an enormous budgetary deficit. (This confirms the suspicion of the grave budgetary difficulties of the Fascist Government, which had, however, always been concealed by the omission to publish the relevant figures.) Italy, Signor Soleri stated, has now a huge note circulation unbacked by any gold or foreign currencies. According to the Minister, the Italian people "are resigned to the devaluation of their currency now being effected, but wish to see it stabilised on a basis on which reconstruction can begin."

In the North, Mussolini spent New Year's Day inspecting the soldiers of the Tenth M.A.S. Flotilla and Militiamen of the G.N.R. Press and radio commemorated the twentieth anniversary of Mussolini's speech of the 3rd January, 1925, against his Aventinist opponents, which has always been observed as one of the great days in the Fascist calendar. This year press comment drew comparisons between the opposition encountered by Fascism in 1925 and the present situation: "To-day, as then, Mussolini is alive and present, and his enemies will not prevail."

A Milanese who was in Milan at the time of Mussolini's visit in December and who has recently arrived in Switzerland, has told a Swiss paper that Mussolini seemed to be well and in good fighting fettle when in Milan. This informant spoke of a deterioration in Milanese morale and a revival of anti-Allied feeling during the last three months, owing to such varying factors as disappointment at the slowness of the Allied advance, successful Fascist and German propaganda, air-raids, food shortage and winter privations. To balance this report, however, Swiss sources tell of recent riots among the workers in Milan, resulting in the arrest by the Germans of 10,000 Italians, who are to be deported to Germany. Scoccimarro, the Minister for Occupied Italy in the Bonomi Government, has also recently stated that open and general anti-Nazi demonstrations took place among Italians workers in the north early in December.

A Decree of the 25th December abolishes the Fascist Confederations of Industrialists, Farmers, Traders and Credit Insurance Firms. Their functions will be taken over by a single Confederation of Labour, Technicians and the Arts (known as C.O.L.T.A.) and by national, provincial and communal syndicates. This measure is greeted by the Fascist press as a first step towards the practical implementation of the socialisation policy outlined in the Verona Manifesto.

THE VATICAN.

In his New Year Speech to the Papal Guards, the Pope emphasised the non-exclusiveness of the Catholic Church, a point which he brought out in his Christmas Eve Message (see Summary No. 274, "Vatican") and for which Pravda attacked him. He said of the many visitors the war brought him from both sides: "So long as they might approach us we graciously received the sons of that nation, among whom we lived many years '' (i.e., Germany, where he spent fifteen years). '' Then came to us from every continent the sons of the other side. We receive them conscious that the Catholic Church embraces all nations and that the Vicar of Christ belongs to all.''

The Pope's Christmas Eve Message was the basis of an article on International Affairs in the Dutch Catholic paper Eindhovensch Dagblad, of the 28th December, where it was argued that, since the New League of Nations must have a spiritual foundation, the Pope must be a member of it, and that other Christian Churches must be represented too. It mentioned by name the '' Œcumenic Movement.'' The Message provoked no reaction in Germany; but the German Ambassador to the Holy See expressed his shocked surprise at its attitude to the Peace Settlement. The shock probably came from the Pope's assumption '' that peoples to whose Governments, or perhaps even partially to themselves, the responsibility for the war is attributed, should have for a time to undergo the rigours of security measures.'' (See Summary No. 273, under '' Germany,'' for von Weizsaecker's recent activities at the Vatican.)

Vatican Wireless on the 2nd January condemned the Italian Christian Left Party, the Sinistra Christiana, pointing out that it was the former Communist Catholic Party, and that, despite its name, its principles and tendencies did not agree with the teaching of the Church.

Any hopes of granting a regular monthly quota of entry and exit permits for visitors to the Vatican have been dashed by the greatly increased activity of the Enemy Intelligence Service.

SOUTH-EAST EUROPE.

Hungary.

A curious military situation has developed in Hungary, as while the Soviets have advanced further north of the Danube, the German counter-offensive south of that river met with some initial success. Esztergom was recaptured, and heavy fighting went on west and south of that city, reaching a point only some 15 miles from Buda. Meanwhile, in the capital, Soviet and Roumanian troops have made considerable further progress, in hard fighting, towards the heart of the city, the greater part of which they now hold.

The armistice delegation sent by the Debrecen Government is still awaiting in Moscow. In Liberated Hungary, the administration is being restored and reorganised.

Roumania.

General Radescu has broadcast to the Foreign press an appeal to the Allies and the Soviet Government in particular for understanding and assistance in carrying out the obligations imposed by the Armistice, and especially asking that compliance with the terms will not be made impossible by depriving Roumania of the means of production. In a statement to the Roumanian press the Prime Minister's argument is stated with somewhat greater emphasis, but this statement has not been allowed to become public. As a result of strong representations by His Majesty's Government, the Soviet Government have instructed their authorities in Roumania that the removal of oilfield equipment is to cease, and the Astra Ruat plant is to remain and to be put into operation in Roumania. The Soviet Government have not accepted our contention that the material concerned is not legitimate war booty a view which was strongly upheld in an article in the New York Times on the 28th December, and further reply is being sent to them on this and other aspects of the problem.

In Moldavia as a result of Communist activity combined with the fact that the province has been cut off from communication with the central authority, there has been some disorder and setting up of unauthorised local administrations in an irregular fashion. The trouble is now at an end, and the officials nominated by a special mission which had been sent to Moldavia had been confirmed in their appointments.

The question of shortage of railway transport is being dealt with by a commission in Moscow headed by the Minister of Communications.

The Soviet Government has decided to deport to Russia a large proportion of the Germanic population of Roumania to provide labour during the continuance of the war. Men between the ages of 16 and 40, and women between 18 and 35 are involved. Children are not to accompany them, and only nursing mothers are exempt. They are to be well treated and allowed to write letters home!

By way of keeping up the '' musical comedy '' character of Roumania of which so much is heard, 107 members of the former Iron Guard who had been imprisoned have been allowed forty-eight hours' Christmas leave!

Yugoslavia.

Wintry conditions have rendered operations difficult. There has been no change in Slavonia. The Germans have continued their retreat in the Sandjak and Bosnia, and are making efforts to eliminate the Partisans from a defensive zone in Slovenia.

The Macedonian Partisan Assembly (A.S.N.O.M.) sat on the 28th–30th December. Representatives of the Bulgarian Government and Fatherland Front and of Bulgarian Macedonia spoke. Kardelj, Tito's political expert, exhorted his hearers, having achieved military victory, to win political success as well. With thinly-veiled reference to Greece, he said that '' solemn undertakings not to interfere in the internal affairs '' of small countries were being '' treated as scraps of paper.'' He made no reference to territorial claims on behalf of Macedonia outside the frontiers of Yugoslavia. The Assembly elected to its Presidium, unanimously by acclamation, the candidates proposed by Vlahov, President of the Macedonian Liberation Front.

Mosha Pijade, a Vice-President of the Partisans' Supreme Council, published an article dwelling with satisfaction on the beneficent spread of the Pax Sovietica to the States of South-Eastern Europe. Another article claims the whole of Venezia Giulia, including Trieste and, for the first time, the plain west of the Isonzo, for Yugoslavia. Claims are also being made to the coal-producing area of Pécs in Hungary.

An official committee has been set up to reorganise the Yugoslav Trade Union movement, which is evidently to be a State-run organisation.

The Presidium of the Liberation Front of Serbia has issued a declaration on the Front's political basis. Its ten points are concerned with general mobilisation of all in the service of the State and include '' that the young shall be educated in the spirit of unity . . . . regardless of political convictions,'' '' that all groups and parties constituting the Front shall work in mutual agreement,'' and '' that the decisions of the Presidium of the Front are binding for all members of the Front.''

The arrival of a ship with 500 tons of food and medical stores at Split has greatly improved relations with the Partisans there. Their arrangements for distribution are reported to be good.

Radio Zagreb asserts that the Catholic Archbishop of Belgrade has been condemned by a tribunal in the Banat and executed.

Greece.

On the 3rd January General Plastiras took the oath as Prime Minister and Minister of War, Marine and Mercantile Marine. Among other new Ministers who took the oath were M. Sophianopoulos (Foreign Affairs and, temporarily, Press), an important figure in Greek politics, who was one of the delegates to the Lebanon Conference; in 1932 he founded his own Agrarian Party, with Socialist tendencies; he has, on several occasions, visited Soviet Russia, and is believed to be anxious to improve relations between Greece and the U.S.S.R.; M. Pericles Rallis (Interior), a Populist Deputy of strong Left-wing tendencies; M. George Sideris (Finance, Supply, and Labour), a former Minister of the Interior under Venizelos, who, though a leading member of the Liberal Party, has entered the Government without any party ties. The new Government definitely inclined to the Left, though the Communist Party is not, and is unlikely to be, represented, nor, at present, are there any representatives of the more moderate parties which helped to constitute E.A.M. It has, in fact, been confirmed that there is a definite split in the National Liberation Front; in Salonica the Socialist Party and the Union of Popular Democrats have announced that they are in '' full and complete disagreement '' with E.A.M. over the resignation of the E.A.M. Ministers and their subsequent anti-British policy. In Athens, E.L.D. has severed its connexion with E.A.M., though M. Tsirimokos has thrown in his lot with E.L.A.S. Professor Svolos is known to have disapproved of the revolt, though he had not sufficient courage to come out with a public statement to that effect, when asked to do so by General Plastiras. It is also reliably reported that there is a split among the Communist leaders, Siantos, Ioannidis, and Partsalidis wanting to fight to a finish, Zevgos, Porphyrogenis and Mandakas counselling moderation.

The new Premier has defined the aims of his Government as the imposition of law and order, the return of the public services to duty, the punishment of those who genuinely committed crimes during the occupation, and the swift satisfaction of urgent needs such as housing and relief. In a message to the Greek people (4th January) he said that the personality of the Regent and the guaranteed Left and democratic composition of the new Government should be enough to allay hesitation and suspicion. He therefore begged " those who had been misled " to trust him and lay down their arms forthwith. On the same day M. Sophianopoulos made a statement to the press on the same lines, adding that Greece ought to appear united in the ranks of the Allies, not only to preserve her integrity, but to obtain satisfaction for her national claims.

By the 5th January the Athens–Piræus area was reported to have been cleared of E.L.A.S., and on the 8th Cairo Wireless stated that British forces had now advanced 40 kilom. from Athens. There has as yet been no truce. On the 6th January, with the approval of the Regent and the Premier, General Scobie issued a statement recalling the terms he had previously laid down for a truce and pointing out that recent events had made these terms no longer applicable. Despite repeated requests by himself and the International Red Cross, E.L.A.S. had refused permission for prison camps to be visited; they had also taken a large number of civilians as hostages. It would be intolerable if a truce did not cover this situation. He was therefore withdrawing his original conditions, though he was always prepared to meet E.L.A.S. leaders to discuss new terms.

Albania.

The political and military system which Enver Hoxha is setting up in Albania corresponds even in small details with that of Marshal Tito. The high praise bestowed on it by Belgrade commentators indeed suggests that public opinion is being prepared for a closer connexion between Albania and Yugoslavia. At the same time the Albanian provisional Government's newspaper, in an article denouncing the Zogist Legality Party for selling the country to the Fascists, declares that such days cannot recur, because Albania has a great alliance with Yugoslavia and Greece, who fought for the same ideas as herself.

Bulgaria.

The People's Court at Sofia has continued to hear the charges against former Cabinet Ministers and Deputies. Against Bagrianov, who was Prime Minister for three months until a few days before the arrival of the Red Army, the gravamen of the indictment was that he had promised to recall Bulgarian troops from Yugoslavia, to grant an amnesty, to admit Soviet Consuls and to purge the army and police, but that he had failed to carry out these promises. His defence was that he had to proceed cautiously. The proceedings were simple and orderly. He was allowed to put his case at length with all the arts of an advocate. The court was overflowing but there were no demonstrations.

The meeting of A.S.N.O.M., the Macedonian partisan assembly, at Skoplje on the 28th December, called forth more manifestations of Bulgarian goodwill towards Yugoslavia and a new-born Macedonia. In a broadcast on that day Kazasov, the Tsvenist Minister of Propaganda, warmly welcomed the new State and hailed Marshal Tito's Yugoslavia and the ideal of a Balkan federation. Terpeshev, a Communist Minister without portfolio, attended the proceedings and a member of the central Fatherland Front Committee who was also there reported on his return that the dream had become a fact : Macedonia was free and had her own Government, Assembly, language and character. This is all in accord with the policy constantly declared by M. Gheorghiev's Government. Moreover, it may be suspected that while that Government has made a show of denouncing Bulgarian expansionism it would in fact support any scheme for extending Macedonia at the expense of Greece.

The need for unity in the Fatherland Front is insisted on with such emphasis by George Dimitrov in his New Year message from Moscow and on the other hand by an Agrarian paper as to corroborate reports of disunity. The Communists are said to be packing the Fatherland Front Committees throughout the country with a view to turning them into Soviets. While the Tsveno party and the Social Democrats sit on the fence the Agrarians are stated to oppose this Communist activity. The Agrarian leader G. M. Dimitrov addressed 50,000 people at Plovdiv on the 24th December in spite of the militia's attempt to prevent the meeting, and further Agrarian meetings are expected.

Turkey.

At the end of last month the British and United States Governments asked the Turkish Government to sever relations with Japan. On the 3rd January the National Assembly approved the proposal of the Foreign Minister, M. Hasan Saka, to break off relations as from midnight on the 6th January. M. Saka informed the Assembly that in the opinion of the British and American Governments the step would deprive the Japanese of a vantage ground from which to observe Allied war activities and would thus help to shorten the war, and he himself expressed the view that it would confer a substantial advantage on the Allies. He added, as his predecessor did last August on the occasion of the rupture with Germany, that it would depend on the other party whether the rupture were followed by a state of war. Turco-Japanese relations are of the slightest, but if Japanese diplomats and other Japanese subjects are sent home Japanese opportunities for gathering information and making mischief in this area will be considerably less.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The general election in Egypt was held on the 8th January. According to The Times it was evident by the end of the day that no result would be reached in several constituencies in Cairo and Alexandria. A successful candidate in an Egyptian election requires a clear majority over the combined poll of his opponents, and as many constituencies have a large number of candidates, voters will probably have to ballot again next Sunday in a straight contest between the two leading candidates.

Nashaat Pasha, the late Ambassador in London, has not yet been received by King Farouk. It is said that His Majesty refuses to see Nashaat owing to the latter's alleged disparagement of the King. Nashaat himself, however, told Lord Killearn that the real reason was the King's displeasure at his recent marriage to an English lady.

During the month of December the lull in Arab political activities in Palestine remained unbroken. The various Arab parties have not yet evolved a common programme, nor have they succeeded in producing a unified leadership. Musa Alami, who seems to enjoy the confidence of all parties as an explorer, albeit in a non-commital way, of the avenues leading to Arab unity, has held discussions with the Amir Abdullah, General Nuri Pasha and other Arab leaders. His talks have covered various matters connected with the Arab cause, including the possible establishment of centres for Arab propaganda in the United Kingdom and the United States of America. Musa Alami has also visited Egypt, where this subject may figure prominently in the further discussions that are to be held in Cairo on Arab unity.

Jewish politics in Palestine have recently been dominated by the presence in that country of Dr. Weizmann. At a joint session of the Jewish Elected Assembly and the Inner Zionist Council on the 5th December in the presence of Dr. Weizmann, resolutions were passed reaffirming two important Zionist objectives. These were the control of immigration by the Jewish Agency, and the creation of a Jewish State in unpartitioned Palestine. Special emphasis was laid on the rejection of partition, and increased support was shown for the extremist " Biltmore " programme. Recruitment for the Jewish Brigade is making some progress, but so far with results rather disappointing to the Jewish Agency. Apart from continuing their leaflet campaign, the terrorists have abstained from further action. The police have arrested more terrorists, and have seized a printing-press belonging to the party, in addition to a considerable amount of explosives. More suspects have been removed to Eritrea where there are now 265 in detention.

Mr. Shone's early impression, reported in last week's Summary, that the feeling in the Levant States is as strongly opposed as ever to a treaty with France, was confirmed in a recent conversation he had in Damascus with the Syrian President and Minister for Foreign Affairs. The President stated with the utmost vigour that his Government would refuse to consider the negotiation of any treaty or agreement that gave to the French a predominant position, adding that this decision had the unanimous support not only of the Chamber, but of the whole country. The Syrians wished, in fact, to come to the final peace settlement if possible unfettered by any international obligations, although prepared, if necessary, to sign equal treaties with all the Great Powers.

The Syrian President also complained of the long delay in the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales from French to Syrian control, and said that this question could not remain unsettled much longer since the position of his Government was being adversely affected by the delay. The President made it quite clear that what his Government feared was that, if the Troupes Spéciales remained in French hands, they might be used later on as a means of coercion; and rather than this should happen he would prefer to see them disbanded altogether. The French no doubt are purposely keeping back the Troupes Spéciales as a bargaining-counter with which to get the hoped-for treaty with the Levant States. But this is likely to be of little avail, at any rate so far as concerns Syria, which in its present mood would almost certainly refuse any solution of the Troupes Spéciales question in exchange for a treaty with France.

The Lebanese Government resigned on the 7th January for internal reasons. Abdul Hamid Kerami, a wealthy Moslem of Tripoli, has been asked to form a new Cabinet.

Ibn Saud came from Mecca to Jedda on the 1st January and received the members of the diplomatic corps. On the following day he gave Mr. Jordan an account of his talks with Abdul Rahman Azzam, head of the Egyptian Department of Arab Affairs, with whom he had discussed at Mecca the setting up of Arab propaganda offices in London and Washington. Ibn Saud, while supporting the project, urged that the officials for these centres should be most carefully chosen and without undue haste. He suggested in the meantime the despatch of a special envoy from each Arab State to London and Washington, bearing two letters, one to His Majesty the King and President Roosevelt respectively from the Head of the State, and another from each Arab Prime Minister to his opposite number in the United Kingdom and the United States of America, setting forth the Arab point of view on the Palestine question.

As a further result of his talks with Azzam, Ibn Saud has now decided to sign, with certain reservations, the protocol drawn up by the Alexandria Committee.

According to the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs a conversation recently took place in Tehran between himself, the Persian Prime Minister, M. Ahi, who is returning to Moscow as Persian Ambassador, and the Soviet Ambassador to Persia. The talk centred on the oil problem, which the Persians present said they intended to solve by forming a Persian oil company for exploration. If they could not find Persian experts for the purpose they would try in the first instance to recruit "neutrals": failing this, they might apply to the U.S.S.R. for Russian experts, and also for machinery and equipment on credit. If such material must be paid for, the Persian Government would naturally expect to buy in the best markets. M. Maximov said he would report the conversation to his Government. Although under the new oil concessions law this discussion ought to have been reported to the Majlis, the Persian Prime Minister has so far kept silent on the matter, realising no doubt that debate would only lead to controversy and wreck any chance of an agreement.

The oil question also forms the subject of a recent note to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from the Soviet Ambassador in London. M. Gusev, after explaining the object of M. Kavtaradze's mission to Persia, criticises M. Saed for his "disloyal" and "hostile" attitude to the Soviet Government, and for his refusal to accept an offer so advantageous to Persia. M. Gusev goes on to comment on the "unfavourable" attitude taken up by His Majesty's Government in the matter, and states that his Government cannot agree with the British argument that the granting of an oil concession can affect the sovereignty of Persia, or that the question should be deferred until after the war.

According to the local press of the 4th January the Persian Prime Minister has notified provincial governors of certain reforms that he intends to introduce regarding such matters as the position of workers, public health, free compulsory education, agriculture and industry, improvements in the Ministries and Government Departments, and revision of the law governing provincial and local councils. It is doubtful, however, whether most of these reforms will actually be carried out in the near future.

THE FAR EAST.

The storm-centre of war in the Philippines has now moved from Leyte and Mindoro to the main island of Luzon, and the Americans, apparently enjoying complete command of the sea even to the west of the archipelago, have made a landing on the shore of the Lingayen Gulf to the north of Manila. The invasion of Luzon is the largest expeditionary enterprise yet undertaken by the Americans in the Pacific, and differs in character both from the landings on relatively small islands such as Saipan, Peleliu and even Leyte, and from campaigns against large "wilderness" islands, such as New Guinea and New Britain, where the fight is only for possession of a few coastal bases. Luzon is an island so large as to be similar to a continental territory, a great part of it is thickly populated, and it contains a substantial Japanese army which should be able to fight major battles without dependence on reinforcement by sea convoys. The battle for Manila will presumably be now for some time the centre of the Pacific war picture, and its outcome may be expected to have profound moral and political effects in all parts of the Far East.

To the north of Luzon Japan has intensified preparations for meeting an invasion of Formosa. General Rikichi Ando, commanding the Japanese army in Formosa, has been appointed concurrently Governor-General of the island, thus combining supreme military and civil authority. The Governor-General whom he has replaced was Admiral Kiyoshi Hasegawa, who now goes to the Supreme War Council in Tokyo.

Attempts have recently been made to obtain for Japan a wider basis of support in both Korea and Formosa by gestures of political concession. When the former Overseas Affairs Ministry (which dealt with territories under Japanese sovereignty outside Japan Proper) was abolished at the same time as the new Greater East Asia Ministry was created, Korea and Formosa were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Home Affairs Ministry, their administration being thus assimilated to that of the homeland, and a new emphasis was put on the common citizenship of Koreans and Formosans with Japanese as subjects of the Emperor. Since General Koiso took office a special Korea–Formosa Greater Political Privileges Investigation Committee has been set up, and Koiso (who was Governor-General of Korea before becoming Prime Minister) presided at its first meeting on the 31st December. He said it was Japan's basic policy to "remove barriers" between Korea, Formosa and Japan Proper, so that they would "be made one with the parent country and become true subjects of the Empire." Koiso claimed that, "particularly since the beginning of the China affair," they had become "conscious and proud" of being Japanese subjects. Conscription had already in 1944 been introduced in Korea and would be applied in Formosa in 1945. Volunteers from both countries had already distinguished themselves in battle. Korea and Formosa constituted "an important part of the fighting strength of the Empire," and they should know that they would be treated equally with the people of Japan Proper in the future; for this reason the new Committee had been set up.

Teruo Hachiya, former Japanese Minister to Bulgaria, has been appointed Minister to the "Free India" Provisional Government of Subhas Bose. This formal diplomatic representation is clearly designed to bolster up Bose's "Government" at a time when the Allied advance into Burma is putting the much-advertised "March to Delhi" very much into reverse. Not much has been heard in Japanese publicity about Bose and his followers since the failure of the "Indo-Japanese" drive into Manipur, but in the last week or so there has been a revival of notice of his activities—chiefly collecting money from Indian residents in Japanese-occupied territory, for which purpose he has been touring Malaya and Sumatra. It remains to be seen whether he will return to Burma, which is becoming somewhat insecure as a place of residence. Ba Maw has apparently returned there after visits to Tokyo and Bangkok, but he could hardly avoid doing so, whereas for Bose, whose régime has started as a "Government-in-Exile," one site is as good as another as long as it is out of reach of the Allies.

The Japanese in Burma are still making an effort to prevent a junction between the Chinese army advancing down the Burma Road from Yunnan and the North Burma forces which have captured Bhamo. Brigadier-General Cross, Assistant Chief of Staff to the United States Forces in China, declared at a press conference in Chungking on the 6th January that the Ledo–Burma Road would be in operation in about thirty to thirty-five days after the Japanese had been driven south of Wanting and Namkhan. After the Burma Road had been reopened, it would be placed under military control until the military situation in China had greatly improved. The road's first task would be to bring in to China the much-needed military supplies which were accumulating in India and were too heavy to be transported by air; afterwards other management could be considered. Asked whether the military control would be American, Chinese or mixed, Cross said that the American and Chinese authorities were in consultation on the matter. It is clear that the Americans are determined to prevent any repetition of the Burma Road scandals of 1939–41, when not only was the traffic subject to wholesale extortion and robbery but civilian goods—mainly luxuries—were frequently given priority over military supplies through corruption of officials and drivers.

The extent to which the Americans succeed in obtaining real executive authority for transport control on the Burma Road will provide something of a test case for American-Chinese military co-operation on Chinese soil. Against

The battle for Manila will presumably be now for some time the centre of the Pacific war picture, and its outcome may be expected to have profound moral and political effects in all parts of the Far East.

To the north of Luzon Japan has intensified preparations for meeting an invasion of Formosa. General Rikichi Ando, commanding the Japanese army in Formosa, has been appointed concurrently Governor-General of the island, thus combining supreme military and civil authority. The Governor-General whom he has replaced was Admiral Kiyoshi Hasegawa, who now goes to the Supreme War Council in Tokyo.

Attempts have recently been made to obtain for Japan a wider basis of support in both Korea and Formosa by gestures of political concession. When the former Overseas Affairs Ministry (which dealt with territories under Japanese sovereignty outside Japan Proper) was abolished at the same time as the new Greater East Asia Ministry was created, Korea and Formosa were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Home Affairs Ministry, their administration being thus assimilated to that of the homeland, and a new emphasis was put on the common citizenship of Koreans and Formosans with Japanese as subjects of the Emperor. Since General Koiso took office a special Korea–Formosa Greater Political Privileges Investigation Committee has been set up, and Koiso (who was Governor-General of Korea before becoming Prime Minister) presided at its first meeting on the 31st December. He said it was Japan's basic policy to "remove barriers" between Korea, Formosa and Japan Proper, so that they would "be made one with the parent country and become true subjects of the Empire." Koiso claimed that, "particularly since the beginning of the China affair," they had become "conscious and proud" of being Japanese subjects. Conscription had already in 1944 been introduced in Korea and would be applied in Formosa in 1945. Volunteers from both countries had already distinguished themselves in battle. Korea and Formosa constituted "an important part of the fighting strength of the Empire," and they should know that they would be treated equally with the people of Japan Proper in the future; for this reason the new Committee had been set up.

Teruo Hachiya, former Japanese Minister to Bulgaria, has been appointed Minister to the "Free India" Provisional Government of Subhas Bose. This formal diplomatic representation is clearly designed to bolster up Bose's "Government" at a time when the Allied advance into Burma is putting the much-advertised "March to Delhi" very much into reverse. Not much has been heard in Japanese publicity about Bose and his followers since the failure of the "Indo-Japanese" drive into Manipur, but in the last week or so there has been a revival of notice of his activities—chiefly collecting money from Indian residents in Japanese-occupied territory, for which purpose he has been touring Malaya and Sumatra. It remains to be seen whether he will return to Burma, which is becoming somewhat insecure as a place of residence. Ba Maw has apparently returned there after visits to Tokyo and Bangkok, but he could hardly avoid doing so, whereas for Bose, whose régime has started as a "Government-in-Exile," one site is as good as another as long as it is out of reach of the Allies.

The Japanese in Burma are still making an effort to prevent a junction between the Chinese army advancing down the Burma Road from Yunnan and the North Burma forces which have captured Bhamo. Brigadier-General Cross, Assistant Chief of Staff to the United States Forces in China, declared at a press conference in Chungking on the 6th January that the Ledo–Burma Road would be in operation in about thirty to thirty-five days after the Japanese had been driven south of Wanting and Namkhan. After the Burma Road had been reopened, it would be placed under military control until the military situation in China had greatly improved. The road's first task would be to bring in to China the much-needed military supplies which were accumulating in India and were too heavy to be transported by air; afterwards other management could be considered. Asked whether the military control would be American, Chinese or mixed, Cross said that the American and Chinese authorities were in consultation on the matter. It is clear that the Americans are determined to prevent any repetition of the Burma Road scandals of 1939–41, when not only was the traffic subject to wholesale extortion and robbery but civilian goods—mainly luxuries—were frequently given priority over military supplies through corruption of officials and drivers.

The extent to which the Americans succeed in obtaining real executive authority for transport control on the Burma Road will provide something of a test case for American-Chinese military co-operation on Chinese soil. Against any proposals the Americans may make will be ranged, not only vested interests, which would be disturbed by honest and efficient management, but also the strong nationalist sentiment which resents any form of foreign control as savouring of the " unequal treaties " and " semi-colonial status."

In general, there are signs that Chiang Kai-shek, with his new War Minister, General Chen Cheng, is really trying to carry out reforms in Chinese military organisation and supply, and that relations with the local American authorities have greatly improved since the recall of General Stilwell. Major-General McClure, General Wedemeyer's Chief of Staff, in an interview on the 21st December, described General Chen Cheng as " a very fine military man who lets no grass grow under his feet," and said he was doing much to get food to the troops at the front. The successes of the Chinese army in Burma, said McClure, had been largely due to their having enough to eat. American officers training Chinese troops have, indeed, given first priority to feeding them adequately; the effects of malnutrition may be judged from the fact, as reported by the Red Cross in China, that of a contingent of recruits raised in Hunan and marched to Yunnan, 62 per cent. died on the way. The newly created Ministry of Conscription under General Lu Chung-lin has been in operation since the 16th November and has been endeavouring to improve the lot of the recruit. Among practices which by a special decree are to be in future visited with punishment are " unauthorised killing," " plundering and killing a sick recruit or burying him alive," and " burial without a coffin in case of the death of a recruit or exposing his corpse in the open." The Generalissimo recently set an example of discipline by paying a surprise visit to a barracks and executing on the spot two officers responsible for ill-treatment of recruits.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Congress convened on the 3rd January, and, while the Senate immediately adjourned until the following Saturday, the House of Representatives elected Mr. Sam Rayburn (Democrat, Texas) as Speaker for a third term. In accepting re-election Mr. Rayburn made an earnest and urgent plea for unity during the war and for American participation in a peace backed by force. America, he said, must join with other democracies in a peace-loving world, to " use all the force necessary to bring about an ordered world." Mr. Merrow (Republican, New Hampshire) introduced a joint resolution calling for the amendment of the United States Constitution to provide for the ratification of treaties by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress, instead of, as at present, by a two-thirds majority of the Senate only. The chances that this far-reaching change will be agreed by the Senate have hitherto been considered and still are very slight; though eminent constitutional scholars, such as Professor Corwin, have lately been urgent in their arguments for it.

Later in the day the House somewhat disillusioned the school which believed that the recent elections had changed its temper by voting, by 207 to 186, to place the so-called Dies Committee to investigate un-American activities on a permanent basis—making it, in fact, the only permanent body in Congress with a continuing power of subpœna. Once again the vote was the result of an " unholy alliance " between Republicans and Southern Democrats. The Liberals naturally interpreted it as a " victory for reaction," and even moderate Conservatives declared that the committee's functions were now adequately covered by existing Government agencies. Anti-Administration papers, however, asserted that the vote " sounded an encouraging note of independence," and it was reported in the New York World Telegram that Wall Street welcomed the revival of the committee as evidence of the South's opposition to the New Deal, and as giving the President an opportunity to check " the Reds " who supported him. It is significant that among the powerful elements opposed to the abolition of the committee was the American Federation of Labour, which professes to believe that its rival organisation, the Congress of Industrial Organisations, is dominated by Communists (see Summary No. 269).

The President's Message, sent to Congress on the 10th, was, as he had promised, exceptionally long. Although the report was on " the state of the Union," nearly a half of it was devoted to foreign affairs. On the whole it has met with general approval from both Parties, and has been variously described as prudent, statesmanlike, realistic, courageous and, according to the New York Times, " grim." The President paid generous tributes to this country and the U.S.S.R., and expressed complete confidence in General Eisenhower and the other Allied commanders, and his review of the war was considered " so comprehensive as to be suggestive of reports which Churchill gives to Parliament."

C265801

Calling for Allied unity at this critical phase of the fighting, Mr. Roosevelt issued the wholesome warning that " the nearer we have come to vanquishing our enemies the more we inevitably become conscious of the differences among the victors. We must not let those differences divide us or blind us to our more important common and continuing interest in winning the war and building the peace." The Atlantic Charter, he described as " a statement of principles which do not provide rules of easy application to each and everyone of this war-torn world's tangled situations "; but the principles were principles which the United States would do its best to support. " We have not shrunk for our military responsibilities; we cannot shrink from our political responsibilities." The President admitted concern over the situation, for example, in Greece and Poland, though he appeared to support British policy in Greece by observing that " until conditions permit the genuine expression of the people's will, we and our Allies have the duty to use our influences to the end that no temporary or provisional authorities in the liberated countries shall block the eventual exercise of the people's right to choose their own Government." Finally, he gave the pledge that the United States would co-operate with the other United Nations " not for war alone but for the victory for which it is being fought. We must never forget the lesson we have learned—that we have friends who will work with us in peace as in war." " Perfectionism," he remarked, is as great a menace as " imperialism " or " isolationism." Indeed perfectionism, which assumes " a monopoly of wisdom and virtue," may prove, as it did after the last war, the most effective path to isolationism.

Mr. Roosevelt, it must be admitted, left the position of the United States vague and undefined in several particulars. He did not, for example, indicate the precise form of American collaboration with other Powers, though the speech was helpful in emphasising that the problems of adjustment in liberated areas must not be permitted to delay the establishment of permanent machinery for the maintenance of peace. " Most important of all, 1945 can and must see the substantial beginning of the organisation of world peace." This part of the Message should pave the way for and make agreements between the Allies easier, and it is notable that the President's views on American foreign policy have evoked great satisfaction and have been generally interpreted to mean that the United States is definitely committed not only to winning the war but to securing and maintaining the subsequent peace—a prospect which has been styled " a most drastic change in what used to be called the American way of life."

In terms of domestic policy also the Message was of particular interest, and one proposal has already evoked a good deal of opposition. Although Mr. Roosevelt's assessment of the war prospects was soberly optimistic, he stated quite frankly that there had been a considerable falling off in American war production because of a lack of adequate controls over labour and plant, such as exists in this country. He therefore renewed his plea, made a year ago, for a National Service Act, a request supported by the Army and Navy Departments. As a first step he proposed the immediate acceptance of Mr. Byrnes's recent recommendations that those rejected for the armed forces on medical grounds should be made to work in vital war industries or be conscripted for lighter forms of military work. There is general support for this measure. The passage of a National Service Act, however, is regarded as highly doubtful. Even the proposed conscription of 20,000 Army and Navy nurses is not a certainty. " American Labour is still reluctant to approve or support the national service legislation which provides for compulsion," said Mr. William Green, the President of the American Federation of Labour; " we doubt the need for such legislation." It is understood that this is also the view of the rival Congress of Industrial Organisations, and also of many employers, including the Chamber of Commerce, and it is regarded as extremely unlikely that legislation for universal conscription will be enacted unless there is a " drastic change for the worse on the war fronts." Even more unpopular was the demand for universal military training after the war—which the President said he would deal with in a later special Message to Congress and despite the support of the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, on this issue there will be powerful opposition by religious and educational groups.

On trade and industry the President remarked: " We support the greatest possible freedom of trade and commerce," adding, " We Americans have a house clearing of our own to do in this regard." He reiterated also his desire to see an expanding domestic market, together with a large increase in American exports. But his comments on economic isolationism and the need for " a house clearing " may be taken to indicate an appreciation of the need for increased imports as well as increased exports. Finally, the President's remarks on the relationship of Government to private enterprise, on schemes for social insurance, housing, health and education, which he hinted at, and on the development of America's natural resources and his reference to the Tennessee Valley Authority, all of which together would help to secure "full employment," will doubtless be much discussed and debated during the coming weeks.

Recently the wisdom of the "unconditional surrender" formula has once more been queried. The reference to this in the President's Message was interpreted by certain writers as signifying that it referred to the enemies' armies only, and Senator Wheeler, who now argues that from what has happened in Poland it is clearly too late to implement the Atlantic Charter, has denounced unconditional surrender, maintaining that this has played into Hitler's hands, and proved "brutal and costly" to the Allies. Mr. Stettinius soundly repudiated this suggestion as "profoundly regrettable," pointing out that Senator Wheeler's attack will be understood in Germany and Japan as meaning that if those countries can resist long enough and kill enough American soldiers, the will of the American people to achieve a complete victory will be broken and a negotiated peace can be secured.

It is gratifying to note that there is increasing evidence of alarm in the United States at the deterioration of Allied unity in press and radio criticism, and while misunderstanding and misinterpretation of our policy continues, there is increasing expression of a desire to re-establish the broken harmony. Articles in the British press attacking the United States attitude to Britain, particularly that in the Economist, continue to be widely reproduced and commented on. Both the President and Mr. Stettinius were asked their views, but both refused to be drawn by somewhat provocative questions.

LATIN AMERICA.

When asked at a Press conference whether there was any truth in the rumour that the Argentine Government proposed to hold elections shortly (see Summaries Nos. 268, 271 and 274), General Farrell evaded the issue. How, he enquired, could the Government hold elections when they did not yet know who could or could not vote, when there was still no charter for the political parties, and the polling lists were still to be prepared. He declared that the Government would not ally itself with any political party, and denied rumours that a new Minister of the Interior was to be appointed: hitherto, he said, his Cabinet had always agreed, "and we shall do so even more in the future." The appointment of Dr. Bramuglia, a follower of Colonel Perón, as Interventor of Buenos Aires Province will undoubtedly be of assistance to that gentleman should elections ever be held. Dr. Bramuglia's appointment brings the number of civilian Provincial interventors up to nine, out of a total of fourteen. It cannot, however, be said that these civilians are necessarily preferable to their military colleagues.

The Uruguayan Ministry of the Interior has announced the discovery of a Nazi spy-ring and a number of arrests. It denies that there have been attempts against public order.

The Mexican Senate has unanimously decided to empower the President to send regular units of the Mexican armed forces abroad during the war. Should the President avail himself of this authorisation, a token contingent of the Mexican air force would seem to be the most likely branch of the armed forces to see foreign service.

In Bolivia Sr. Paz Estenssoro, the leader of the MNR and a prime mover in the revolution in December 1943, is reported to have been appointed Minister of Finance. Comment on this appointment is unnecessary.

The Panamanian crisis continues. The old Cabinet resigned to give the President a free hand, and a new Cabinet has been coolly received. The President has stated privately that he has no intention of surrendering to pressure engineered by Dr. Harmodio Arias (an ex-President and brother to Dr. Arnulfo Arias: see last week's Summary). Eighteen opposition members of the Assembly met secretly on the 2nd January and went through the motions of opening a new session: in order to make a quorum they were constrained to accept four supporters of Arnulfo Arias.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

FOR the first ten days of the year German reports on the fighting in the West continued to combine admissions that German troops were now fighting a defensive battle in the Ardennes with assertions that the High Command retained the initiative which they had regained on the 16th December. The O.K.W. of the 10th January spoke of another attempted American breakthrough in the direction of Houffalize, and said that the Ardennes fighting had involved both sides in considerable losses. On the same day, D.N.B. issued a summary of British and American losses from the 16th December to the 5th January, giving the figures as 90,000 killed and wounded and 25,000 prisoners. On the 11th, the communiqué announced the German withdrawal across the Ourthe, "the better to buttress the deep flanks of our salient in the Ardennes" and on the 13th, the repulse of an attack north-east of Laroche; on the following day Malmédy and Houffalize, as well as Bastogne, were mentioned. Military commentators insisted that the defensive fighting between the Meuse and the Moselle had created the right conditions for the successful attacks between the Saar and the Upper Rhine, and, by attracting reserves of men and material, had robbed the Allies of their freedom of action.

Although some advances continue to be claimed in Alsace-Lorraine—the O.K.W. on the 10th announced that German troops had "torn open" the Maginot Line south-east of Wissembourg—home propaganda is cautious and does not raise expectations with regard to Strasbourg or other important gains. On the 13th January, Hallensleben said on the D.N.B. European service that, although the Ardennes battle was still the focal point, the German Command was now concentrating its efforts "almost exclusively" on this southern sector of the front. A D.N.B. broadcast on the 14th reported a D.A.Z. article, which said that the German offensive in the West bore only a local character, and that none in Germany had attached far-reaching strategic expectations to it. It was probable that the High Command from the beginning had only limited objectives "not dissimilar from those actually achieved." With the news of the new Russian offensive, the German propagandists have found yet another argument to prove that the western offensive was a success. It prevented the enemy from achieving the "desired simultaneous onslaught" from the main fronts. A survey on the Home Service on the 14th said that the battle in the East was part of the enemy's carefully thought out general onslaught against Germany. Stalin had intended to hurl his massed armies against a Germany whose left flank was "seriously threatened, if not already torn open." But the serious danger to the west front had been removed by the German offensive, and the enemy in the West could not regain his freedom of action; still less could he think of launching an offensive thrust against Germany within measurable time.

The news of the Russian offensive was not given to the German public until the 13th January, when the O.K.W. announced the attack south of Warsaw, saying that the "long-expected Bolshevik winter offensive on the Vistula has begun." A D.N.B. survey said that the new battle heralded hard fighting which would extend to "other sectors of the Eastern front which had hitherto been quiet." On the 14th, the O.K.W. said that "the enemy has launched his expected large-scale attack on East Prussia." It is repeatedly emphasised by all commentators that the High Command has long expected these attacks, and is prepared for them, although no attempt is made to minimise the seriousness of the situation to the home public. One reporter said that "the Soviets do not aim merely at territorial gains. They seek a decision." A later account said that the biggest battle of the war had begun. A Transocean spokesman said that the Eastern Front had again become "Front No. 1," and that the new offensive aimed at "bringing about a collapse of the German Eastern front along its entire length."

The German troops facing the Russian onslaught in East Prussia are said to have been purged of all officers who might favour a compromise peace between Germany and Russia. The German Command appears to have used its breathing-space to the full, in strengthening fortifications and the striking power of the military units posted in East Prussia. Military morale is reported to be good on that front; it is said that anti-Russian propaganda is both intense and effective, and that the training of Russian partisans is being actively pursued.

The intense air activity over Germany on the 14th January, in the course of which 235 German aircraft were shot down, was prominently featured by the O.K.W. which reported "a number of fierce battles over the Western Front" in which 23 Allied planes were shot down, and over Germany 64 aircraft including 46 four-engined bombers accounted for by "air defences." No actual mention was made of German losses or even of large-scale intervention by the Luftwaffe. (The official Allied statement of planes lost on the 14th was 20 bombers and 33 fighters.)

To the ever-increasing problem of evacuation from large centres of industry, the invasion of the Reich has added that of emptying localities threatened by the enemy. The first of these problems would now seem to be exceeding the capacity of German administration. The situation is that people demand to leave or are ordered to leave but cannot, because trains are infrequent or over-crowded and reception areas refuse any further influx. The National-Zeitung of Essen, already cited in this Summary for its outspoken comment, stated in November that only State action of a radical kind could get over the difficulties of transport and accommodation. The Deputy Gauleiter of Essen on the 18th November ordered the entire evacuation of all inhabitants not engaged on essential work. This was said to be (cf. Summary No. 270) the first case of compulsory large-scale evacuation and it is now clear that Schlessmann's order remained pretty much a dead letter and that there are still nearly half a million people in the city. A report in early December admitted that no definite dates could yet be fixed for evacuation because billeting facilities had not yet been found. On the last day of the year it was announced that Schlessmann had repeated his order, coupling with it an appeal to working mothers to send their children away to camps in charge of N.S.V. workers.

The second problem, that of evecuating areas threatened by the enemy's advance, has so far reached only modest dimensions, since no heavily populated areas have been overrun. The Nazis, after urging the people to resist to the last, would seem to have tried, in small localities, to evacuate the entire population, and in other cases to take the men and leave the women and children—almost the opposite procedure to that followed in the bombed towns. Small townships have been found empty. In Eschweiler, the Allied troops found only 300 people, most of them aged or sick, out of the normal population of 33,000. The case of Aachen is instructive. Before the capture of the city, policemen and firemen were removed by S.S. troopers to Wuppertal. The law courts were without legal officials. Of the 163,000 inhabitants, under 2,000 were still in the city. A few thousand more had taken refuge in the neighbourhood. The eviction is reported in certain cases to have been in some cases severe, and even ruthless. Ration cards were withdrawn, farmers' produce burnt; a letter from Alsace described how over 7,000 inhabitants were thrown out on to the street by armed S.A. men, and were allowed only half an hour to prepare for departure.

It is interesting that one small but influential body of men have decided to disregard evacuation orders—the Catholic bishops of Western Germany. The usual Fulda conference was not held in August 1944, but the bishops of Western Germany met at Honnef and agreed to await the arrival of the Allies with such of their people as remained in their dioceses. In conformity with this decision the Bishop of Aachen returned to the city from his country house early in September.

The reports of fighting on the East and West fronts are accompanied by increasingly prominent and violent atrocity stories of the treatment of civilians and prisoners by the Russians and Americans. Much has been made of a conviction in Monschau, whereby a boy of 16 was found guilty, after a two-day trial by an Allied military court of giving information to the enemy, and sentenced to death. According to D.N.B., he has "refused to serve the enemy." It called the trial a judicial farce, the sentence an atrocity and a crime against the most elementary principles of international law. The cases selected for publicity within Germany seem to be picked with some care. A broadcast reported that of a 15-year-old boy who was given six months' imprisonment for disregarding the curfew, but nothing was said of the former German policeman found destroying records, who was given ten years.

The clothing collection referred to in last week's Summary differs in character from those of previous years, when it was still possible to assert that there were reserves of unused or unnecessary clothing. Now, when for eighteen months almost no clothing has been released to civilians other than those who have lost all their clothes in air raids, it is clear that the number of civilians who still have clothes with which they can dispense must be very small, even when it is admitted that the majority of gifts will represent a "sacrifice." The primary objects of the appeal are therefore to mobilise uniforms no longer worn, and civilian clothes no longer worn by those in uniform. The High Command has ruled that members of the Armed Forces who provide their own uniforms are to surrender whatever they possess in the way of uniforms and equipment above the stated maximum outfit. The uniforms and equipment of dead soldiers should be put at the disposal of the fighting front in as complete a condition as possible. All soldiers on active service have been asked to give to the "People's Sacrifice" the uniforms they are keeping at home and not using. One announcement says that the right to wear the uniform of the new Armed Forces may be granted for the duration of the war to men who have been honourably discharged from the Services, but, "in effect, the 'People's Sacrifice' permits only those persons to wear uniform who have to do so in the direct execution of their duties." The Head of the Reich Chancellery, Dr. Lammers, has notified all Reich authorities that all uniforms which belong to officials and are not absolutely needed for service must be contributed to the "People's Sacrifice" Collection. Those who must wear uniforms may keep at the most two complete outfits.

Propaganda compares the "People's Sacrifice" with 1813, and says that its historical significance transcends its material importance. The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung says that the clothing collection will result in a further proletarianisation, or breakdown of social classes, in Germany. From the nature of the appeal, it would seem that it will result in a large restriction in the wearing of uniforms. Heck, who is in charge of the appeal, has organised other clothing collections. The imposition of the death sentence for stealing clothes which have been collected is not new.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The two main developments in the military sphere on Czechoslovak territory have been the Red Army's capture of Lučenec and progress beyond towards Zvolen and the big stride forward on the north bank of the Danube, which has taken the Russians to the River Nitra and the outskirts of Komárno. The reaction in Bratislava, now only 40 miles from the fighting, reveals the feverish anxiety of the Slovak Government. The Hlinka Guard, Hlinka Youth and the Slovak Labour Service have been incorporated in the armed forces; a Youth Congress was held on the 14th January and addressed by several leading members of the Government in an attempt to rally the young people of the country to serious efforts in its defence; and the press and radio have striven their utmost to improve public morale. There is no indication that these efforts have met with any success, and they are chiefly significant for their admissions that defeatism is rife, that Allied propaganda has been successful in many cases and that the compulsory trench-digging is being evaded on a considerable scale.

In the Protectorate the Volkssturm was ostentatiously sworn in on the 7th January. In Prague the ceremony was held in the Old Town Square, beflagged for the occasion, and Henlein took the salute at a march-past.

A broadcast in Ukrainian on the Kiev wave-length on the 10th January referred to a Congress of People's Committees of the Sub-Carpathian Ukraine which, according to this statement, had "promulgated a manifesto on the reunion of the Sub-Carpathian Ukraine with the Soviet Ukraine." The enthusiastically pro-Russian sentiments of the liberated Ruthenians have been commented on before in this Summary, and the fact that General Petrov's army in Ruthenia is composed of Ukrainian troops will have strengthened these feelings. The facts of the Kiev announcement are, therefore, perfectly credible. Enemy propaganda has exploited the broadcast as an indication of a Soviet intention to annex Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia, but it is not yet possible to draw any firm conclusions on this aspect of the matter. In any case, the broadcast places Dr. Beneš and his Government in an embarrassing position, strengthens the opponents of his pro-Soviet policy and provides useful grist to the enemy propaganda mill.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 13th January an Order of the Day addressed to Marshal Koniev announced that the Soviet winter offensive in Poland had been launched from the bridgehead west of the Vistula south of the confluence of the San. "Despite unfavourable weather conditions, precluding active air support," the troops of the First Ukrainian Front broke through on a 25-mile front, widened in two days' fighting to 40 miles and extended to a depth of 25 miles. During the next two days the advance continued, and an Order of the Day on the 15th January announced the capture of Kielce. The front had by this date been broadened to 50 miles, and in the south Red Army troops were already within 30 miles of Cracow. There has as yet been no Soviet confirmation of German reports that simultaneous attacks were made in East Prussia and the Warsaw area, but a further advance has been made from the south into Slovakia; the fall of Lućenec was announced on the 14th January. German resistance still continues in Budapest, but the German relieving force has been held on the southern bank of the Danube, and the Red Army has advanced to within 2 miles of Komarno on the northern bank.

The Soviet press and wireless has recently devoted much attention to analysing the causes of Soviet military success; in this connexion the creative strength of the Soviet State and the fundamental superiority of the Soviet economic system have been the subject of much self-congratulation. Speaking during the Red Army hour of the Soviet Home Service, Lieut.-Colonel Gotovsky said that it was not the alleged superiority in raw materials and population that had ensured the war-time survival of the Soviet State, but the Soviet system which "ensures the highest pace in production and technical progress." The advantages of socialist industrialisation and collectivisation of agriculture were contrasted with the defects of private ownership, resulting in competition, monopolies and anarchy in production. The enormous progress made by Soviet munition plants during this war were contrasted (with many relevant details of production) with the totally inadequate output of the Tsarist munitions industry.

The British parliamentary delegation referred to in Summary No. 273 has now arrived in Moscow. The delegation, which will stay in the U.S.S.R. for three weeks, is led by Colonel Walter Elliot, and includes Brigadier Lord Lovat, Lord Faringdon, Colonel Charles Ponsonby, Major R. E. Manningham-Buller, Mr. John Parker, Mr. T. Fraser, Mr. Wilfrid Roberts, Mr. P. W. Jewson and Commander King-Hall.

On the 12th January Pravda published an article on developments in Hungary. The popular character of the new provisional Government was said to have been demonstrated by the active participation of the population in the elections, by the numerous messages received from Hungarian democratic organisations in Great Britain and the United States, and by the adherence of "the majority of the diplomatic representatives of Hungary abroad." The generosity of the Soviet Union had afforded the Hungarian people "the possibility of rapidly restoring and reviving their State organisation, their political and economic independence," thus proving once again that "the aim of Soviet policy is to defeat and eradicate fascism and give freedom to the peoples." But Hungary, as "Hitler's most obstinate satellite," must bear material responsibility for damage resulting from her participation in the war against the U.S.S.R., must return loot and "liberate the forcibly taken territories of Czechoslovakia and Rumania." The provisional Government must completely eliminate fascism inside the country, and "Hungary will win a place for herself among the freedom-loving nations in proportion to the share she will now contribute to the military efforts of the United Nations."

The Soviet press has continued to refrain from comment on affairs in Greece, but an article in The War and the Working Class returned to a familiar theme in a review of the United Nations' tasks in 1945. It observed inter alia that "the crises or political difficulties which arose in some of the liberated European countries towards the end of 1944 show that the peoples who went through the nightmare of German occupation cannot reconcile themselves to the return of former régimes, and leaders who, during Europe's period of stern trial, showed their bankruptcy . . . . Only a Government supported by the people and formed on a wide democratic basis can guarantee peace and order."

The attacks on the Vatican noted in the last two summaries have continued during the past week. The attempt of the Catholic Times to answer Pravda's former "critical appraisal" of the Pope's Christmas message (see Summary No. 275) aroused considerable sarcasm in the latter journal. "True democracy, as understood by the Catholic Times, is manifested in reconciliation with fascism." That paper remembered that it served the Vatican, but forgot that it was published in the Motherland of Dickens, where humour was appreciated. There were also further general accusations that Fascists were sheltering under the wing of the Vatican, La Libre Belgique being particularly criticised for defending the Belgian Rexists. Izvestiya (the 11th January) revived the old charge that the Vatican was supporting émigré Poles in their attack on the U.S.S.R. On the other hand, Tass (the 14th January) gave prominence to quotations from the New York Times concerning the "meticulously correct" behaviour of the Lublin Government towards the Catholic Church.

Articles by British and United States Trade Union leaders published in the December issue of The War and the Working Class are criticised in the current number of this journal by the Chairman of the Central Committee of the Munitions Workers' Union, M. E. Vazhenin, for lack of precision and firmness in regard to international trade union unity. In his view, the tasks of the future trade union organisation should include the mobilisation of the working class for the continuation of the war against Germany and the establishment of a genuine security organisation for the maintenance of a lasting peace. The Amsterdam International is arraigned for its weakness and "complete non-resistance to Fascism." As a counter-policy for the defence of the economic interests of the working class, a single centre is advocated to solve working class problems of international co-operation. This article is typical of the present strong Soviet drive to associate the trade unions of liberated Europe and international security measures, and of the increasing space given in the Soviet press to trade union activities throughout the world.

The first metal works in Northern Kazakhstan, long noted for its rich reserves of copper, coal and non-ferrous metals, began to operate near Karaganda on the eve of the new year. It lays the foundations of the development of Kazakh iron ore deposits (hitherto of little importance) and is scheduled to produce 30,000 tons of steel annually.

SCANDINAVIA.

An unusual amount of publicity has been given by the controlled press and broadcasting service in Norway to an address delivered on the 10th January by Rodstad, the Tröndelag county leader. The speech has been reported in extenso both by radio and press. Its object seems to have been to convey the impression that the home front had been completely disorganised by the arrest of certain persons in Trondheim and the vicinity, whom Rogstad represented as the core of the organisation. These persons he endeavoured to discredit as being an unrepresentative combination of reactionary and Communist elements. The general tone of the speech was exceedingly truculent and threatening. The most probable explanation of the publicity given to this address is a desire to counter the increasing prestige acquired by the real home front leadership by recent activities under its auspices.

Apart from successes previously reported, achieved by carefully organised sabotage and the elimination and intimidation of traitors and informers, great disruption has recently been brought about in the German land communications by the action of Norwegian parachutists flown from England, with the valuable co-operation of local home-front workers. Apart from an incident on the 13th January, when about 180 German soldiers lost their lives when a train fell over a bridge which had been blown up, the effect of these activities has been to drive the German forces to make increasing use of their vulnerable sea routes, which have recently been repeatedly and successfully attacked by Allied naval and air forces; in particular, an outstanding success was achieved on the 12th January in the destruction of an enemy convoy off Egersund. In the evening of the following day another convoy was attacked by Allied aircraft in the neighbourhood of the Swedish coast at the northern entrance to the Kattegat.

An admission in the N.S. paper, Finnmarks Folkeblad, which is now being issued as the organ of the evacuees from northern Norway, has finally disposed of the German and Quisling contention that the evacuation was of a voluntary character. The evacuees, says this paper, arrived as guests sent by the authorities against their will and fail to understand the necessity for the steps taken.

The recently-established "Association of Norwegian Patriots" (see Summary No. 274) has been publicly repudiated by representatives of Norwegian Trade Unionism and by leaders of the former Central Board of the Norwegian Labour Party at present resident in Sweden. The new organisation is said to threaten the unbroken unity which should prevail until victory is won.

The speech from the throne at the opening of the Swedish Riksdag on the 11th January was cautiously phrased and discouraged exaggerated hopes of a speedy end to the war. Sympathy with Denmark and Norway, "awaiting the hour of liberation under increasing trials," was however openly expressed, and an assurance was given that Sweden would do all in her power to help her sister nations. A hint was given that the strictest economy in the use of imported goods was necessary, in view of the progressive decline of trade with the continent, which must be expected to continue. On the other hand, the speech made the encouraging assumption that it would be possible greatly to reduce defence expenditure during the coming year.

The Swedish Government has made a protest against an announcement made through the German legation that the blockade zone in the Skagerrák had been extended eastward from the 12th January. The effect of this step is said to be to encroach on the area hitherto left free for fishing and navigation, by about 10 nautical miles.

Loud explosions recently heard in southern Sweden have been attributed to V-bombs, and, though official opinion at first favoured the view that they had occurred out at sea, recent reports seem to suggest that Sweden is once more being made the corpus vile for German experiments with this type of weapon. The Stockholm correspondents of British papers state categorically that three flying bombs of a new type fell near Karlskrona on the 13th January, and that they are officially described by Swedish military authorities as "radio-steered projectiles which can be made to change course." Though their final appearance was from the north, it is said to have been established that they started, like previous unwelcome visitors of the kind, from the island of Bornholm.

It was announced in Washington on the 12th January that Mr. Maxwell Hamilton had been appointed U.S.A. representative in Finland. He is to have the personal rank of Minister, though the step is stated not to amount to a formal resumption of diplomatic relations.

On the 13th January, the Soviet radio announced negotiations between Finland and the Soviet Union with a view to the supply of 30,000 tons of grain, 1,000 tons of sugar and other foodstuffs by the latter, in exchange for nickel, cobalt, copper and pyrites and assistance in the repair of Russian naval vessels in Finnish dockyards.

With a view to the forthcoming elections, the anti-Tannerite opposition in the Finnish Social Democratic party are advocating co-operation with the "Six Man Group" and the Communists. Divergence of views on this question seems likely to increase the schism in the ranks of the party.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Belgians have been told that only six per cent. of the coal mined in their country is directly used by the Allied armies, although Belgian heavy industry is largely devoted to the manufacture of war material. Further, there is no net export of coal, for supplies sent to Dutch territory in the vicinity of the Scheldt are counter-balanced by imports from the Netherlands to the Liége area. Thus the German propaganda, that Belgians are being kept short of coal for the benefit of the Allies, has been refuted. Coal, however, remains scarce for the house-holder and efforts to increase output are to be made. It has been announced that men are to be called up for work in the mines.

M. Gutt's proposals for a tax on war-profits (see Summary No. 273) were certain to meet with strong opposition in the Chamber. Both the right-wing Catholics and the Liberals have declared their intention to fight the Bill, which will be supported by the Socialists and the Christian Democrats. On the present showing, therefore, it looks as if the Bill would be thrown out, which would entail a crisis. But a compromise may well be found.

The German offensive caused a number of Belgians to leave their homes—possibly stimulated to do so by German propaganda (see Summary No. 274). Appeals for funds to assist them have been made and should meet with a good response. The Government, which has already been criticised for the inadequacy of its measures to help the bombed-out, will also be blamed if it does not adequately supplement the efforts of private charity to help the refugees.

It is to be noted that the German-controlled "Belgian Freedom" Radio appeals continually to the Belgians to demand peace in accordance with the alleged wishes of King Leopold, and also urges them to seize food from the Allied forces. There is, however, no reason to believe that this propaganda has had much effect.

The inhabitants of the Occupied Netherlands have been repeatedly and strongly exhorted by Radio Orange to evade by all possible methods the German call-up of Dutch labour (see last Summary). Unfortunately, however, the call-up has met with some success. It is reported that some men in the big towns have registered for work in Germany, influenced by hunger and despair; in the small towns and villages, on the other hand, where food is perhaps more easy to get, the proportion of volunteers has been much lower. It should also be remembered that numbers of Dutchmen have been forcibly deported.

A Dutch journalist in the liberated Netherlands reports that, while his compatriots are continuing to endure cold and hunger with patience, some irritation has been caused by the British soldiers, who keep on wasting good food; for instance, bread-crusts. The Dutch not unnaturally think that the transport employed in conveying this wasted food could have been used to bring them food which they would certainly not throw away.

The Netherlands have signed the "Five Freedoms of the Air" Convention with a reservation as to the fifth freedom; the text of this reservation, however, has not been published.

FRANCE.

Though German proximity to Strasbourg remains threatening the improvement in the general situation on the Western Front is reflected in French wireless reports of the greater confidence and the feeling of relief among the people. The Provisional Government none the less issued on the 11th an important official declaration solemnly reminding the German authorities that the "measures of de facto annexation taken some time ago in Alsace and Lorraine by the unilateral action of the Reich have no validity in the eyes of France." French citizens in the area occupied by German troops as a result of recent operations should be treated in conformity with the Hague Convention. Anyone guilty of acts of violence against inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine on the pretence that they had failed in their duty as German subjects would be liable to the penalties by which war criminals are punished.

Following on the recent conference between Mr. Churchill, General de Gaulle and General Eisenhower, the French press is now giving prominence to the claim of General de Gaulle to join the "Big Three" at their next meeting. M. Wladimir d'Ormesson in the Figaro of the 9th January made the most complete and cogent statement of the French claim. This was officially presented in a memorandum handed to the British, United States and Russian Ambassadors on the 15th January, which points out that military operations are in progress on French territory and that France is herself taking part in them to the greatest extent permitted by her resources. The prospect of her ever-increasing participation in the common war-effort will require the revision of the programme of manufacture, supply and transport. But France cannot be bound by decisions taken in her absence. The French Government consider they should be represented at conferences concerned with the general conduct of the war and with the future peace for both of which France has a share of responsibility.

The seriousness of the economic situation was reflected in the communiqué issued after the meeting of the Council of Ministers on the 12th January. Semi-official accounts stated that the transport position had been much worsened by the severe cold spell. Only 259,000 tons of coal are at present transported weekly, of which 241,000 are needed for the essential requirements of railways, gas works, hospitals, schools and bakeries. This leaves only 18,000 tons for armament industries and other factories of the highest priority, which is wholly inadequate. Hence the Government had decided on a large-scale reduction in the passenger train service and in newsprint supply.

The newsprint cut caused an indignant outburst from the whole press—Right and Left. The Paris Press Syndicate described it as a disastrous solution which could have been avoided had the supply of paper to the press not remained in the wrong hands. Leading articles denounced the Government for having allowed the appearance of a mass of unnecessary and worthless periodicals. An Advisory Press Commission at the Ministry of Information, to advise on the quantities of newsprint to be allotted and other matters, was set up by a decree reported on the 13th January. But criticism remained severe. The restrictions, by which newspapers will be reduced to half their usual size, will eschew advertising matter and concentrate on important news, and will cost 1 fr. 50 like the provincial papers, were due to come into force on the 14th January.

René Claude, the son of Georges Claude, the collaborating scientist, has been arrested on the basis of evidence found among German archives at Nancy. The appeal against sentence of death of Angelo Chiappe, former Vichy Prefect of the Guard, has been rejected. The appeal of Henri Béraud (see last two Summaries) was also rejected by the "Chambre des mises en accusation" acting as a Court of Appeal in Paris; and Jean Luchaire, speaking from the German-controlled "French Government" station, declared triumphantly: "Alive Béraud in no way served our policy or shared our ideas, but, murdered, he will be one of our best and most redoubtable levers." The news, however, that sentence had been commuted to penal servitude for life was subsequently announced, and the reprieve was only attacked by the Populaire and Humanité.

M. de Menthon, evidently replying to criticism of the slowness of the purge, which had included the demand for his own removal from office, in the course of an interview given to the Aube said that the Government must choose a middle way between appeasement and ruthlessness. There was no such thing as "revolutionary" or "traditional" justice—only justice pure and simple, which was incompatible with summary executions of people, even when they had been sentenced to death. Of Pétain's trial he said that it was for the High Court of Justice to decide whether he would be tried in his absence or whether Vichy Ministers would be tried first.

In reply to a Berlin wireless report that five Gaullists had been sentenced to death as a reprisal for the execution of collaborators in France, French official quarters told the press on the 14th January that there would be no official reaction to this threat. The recent French Government declaration was recalled that threats by the Wilhelmstrasse would not prevent French justice taking its course. The sentencing of hostages was an international crime.

The French Provisional Government has intimated to His Majesty's Government and the United States Government that it cannot determine its attitude towards the new Italian Cabinet until certain questions which exclusively concern France and Italy have been satisfactorily settled. This was subsequently made clear in the inspired comment on the meeting of Ministers of the 12th January, which also examined Franco-Italian relations. Normal diplomatic relations could not be resumed until the Italian Government formally recognised that Italy's declaration of war in 1940 had invalidated the Franco-Italian agreements of 1893 which gave a privileged status to Italian subjects in Tunisia. The Diplomatic Correspondent of the Monde commented that if this was recognised, nothing would prevent the resumption of relations with Italy and the examination of less important questions, as for example, the adjustment of the borderline.

SWITZERLAND.

M. Walter Stucki has been appointed head of the foreign section of the Political Department—a position roughly corresponding to that of our Permanent Under-Secretary of State, his predecessor becoming Minister at Athens. M. Stucki, who represented Switzerland with much distinction as an economic expert at Geneva and elsewhere in the 'thirties, had latterly been Swiss Minister at Vichy. His appointment is evidently destined to strengthen the hands of his more inexperienced chief, M. Petitpierre. The press calls on him to show initiative and courage in bringing Switzerland's strength into active play for the reconstruction of Europe and so extricating Switzerland from the dangerously isolated position in which she now finds herself.

Swiss opinion had, in fact, been a good deal perturbed by the reports in the United States press mentioned last week and, in the circumstances, general relief was occasioned by the mild tone of Mr. Stettinius's reference to the subject at his press conference, when he merely said that economic relations with Switzerland were under consideration. It was recognised, however, that the negotiations thus envisaged would be far from easy. What has particularly preoccupied the Swiss has been whether, in return for concessions to Allied pressure as regards their trade with Germany, with the resulting effects on employment, they could count on the opening up of trade relations with the West and the procuring of the 300,000 tons of Swiss goods held up in Spain and Portugal. Happily the ban on transit through France has at last been relaxed, and traffic with Marseilles and the Spanish frontier started on a moderate scale during the week, the transport being provided by the Swiss.

SPAIN.

On the 16th January the Secretary of State handed to the Spanish Ambassador the Prime Minister's reply to the letter from General Franco which was analysed in Summary No. 270 (the 6th December, 1944). It will be remembered that the Caudillo's letter was an invitation to a closer understanding between Great Britain and Spain. In the Europe of the future, he argued, Anglo-Spanish friendship will be necessary if the advance of Bolshevism is to be stemmed; but the obstacles which now exist must be frankly faced. (Since he alleged that they lay entirely on the British side, in the form of secret service agents, sabotters and a hostile B.B.C. and press, he himself had no difficulty at all in facing them frankly.) In spite of these barriers, Spain was ready to forget the past and to create a friendship which the post-war strategic situation would make imperative. Franco, like Barkis, was willin'.

The reply, sent by the Prime Minister in the name of the War Cabinet, will not encourage General Franco to go on dreaming dreams, for it is a rather stinging document. If words can disturb his beatific self-satisfaction, Mr. Churchill's sentences should certainly do so. The desire for close and cordial relations between the British and Spanish peoples is reciprocated, but the first point emphasised is a refutation that such difficulties as now exist are due to the attitude and activities of His Majesty's Government and the British people. An absolute denial is made of the assertion regarding the activities of British agents in Spain; and Mr. Churchill continues: "I can only suppose that your Government has been misled by the allegations of those persons whose obvious interest lies in disturbing relations between the British and Spanish peoples." The letter then sets out "in complete frankness the serious difficulties which, in our view, still hamper the satisfactory development of relations between our two countries."

First, a reminder of Spanish policy during the war. Without forgetting that Spain did not oppose us at the critical periods of the war, namely, at the time of the collapse of France in 1940 and at the moment of the Allied landings in North Africa in 1942, the Prime Minister recalls the period of open non-belligerency. He cannot forget that throughout the war German influence in Spain has constantly been permitted to embarrass our war effort, and that a Spanish division was actually sent to give assistance to our German enemies against our ally, Russia. Among the many unneutral activities of which His Majesty's Government have had to complain the letter specifies two: the arbitrary suppression in 1940 of the International régime in Tangier, in violation of treaties to which Spain was a party, and the series of speeches in which General Franco disparaged this country and others among the United Nations, and spoke of their defeat as being desirable and inevitable.

Now that the war is drawing to a close and plans are being made for the future of Europe and the world, the letter continues, His Majesty's Government cannot overlook either the past actions of the Spanish Government or the consistently hostile attitude of the Falange, the official State Party, which has maintained an intimate relationship with the Nazi Party Dictatorship in Germany and with the Italian Fascists. Mr. Churchill reminds General Franco that he publicly took note, on the 24th May last, of the favourable changes in Spanish policy which began during the tenure of office of the late General Jordana Minister for Foreign Affairs, September 1942–August 1944), but those changes he declares, have not yet been sufficient to remove all the barriers between our two countries. And so long as those barriers prevent the development of really close relations of friendship and co-operation which is the desire of His Majesty's Government, "there can be no question of His Majesty's Government supporting Spanish claims to participate in the eventual peace settlement. Nor does it seem to me likely," the letter goes on, "that an invitation would be forthcoming for the admission of Spain to the future world organisation." It may perhaps be pointed out that, following Franco's rash pretensions in his interview with the U.P. correspondent (see Summary No. 266), the Spanish press attempted to gloss over the claim to representation at the Peace Conference by saying that the Caudillo had been misunderstood; all he had in mind was participation in the future world organisation, not a place at the peace table.

The references to Russia in General Franco's letter are dealt with categorically. In forthright language the Prime Minister removes any possible Spanish misconception that His Majesty's Government would be prepared to consider "any grouping of Powers in Western Europe or elsewhere on a basis of hostility towards, or the alleged necessity of defence against, our Russian Allies." He tells General Franco that, "the policy of His Majesty's Government remains firmly based upon the Anglo-Soviet Treaty of 1942, and that they regard the continuance of Anglo-Russian collaboration within the framework of the future world organisation as essential, not only to their own interests, but also to the future peace and prosperity of Europe as a whole." The letter ends with the reminder that such plain speaking was invited by General Franco's own desire for a clarification of Anglo-Spanish relations. "It is my conviction," Mr. Churchill adds more encouragingly, "that relations of friendship and co-operation between our two countries are desirable, and that they can only be developed and maintained within the framework of the principles which I have set out for your Excellency's consideration."

This reply may seem to close the door rather brusquely in the face of a country whose misdeeds we do not forget, but whose goodwill is, after all, not entirely without value for us as the leaders of European civilisation. But it is far from being a "noble negative"; it is not a refusal to Spain, it is rather a most opportune reminder to General Franco that the "noble positive" from him, the Head of the Falangist State, is not yet positive enough.

The Prime Minister has sent a copy of this correspondence to Marshal Stalin as well as to the United States Government.

ERRATUM.

Last week's Summary, page 6, end of second paragraph for "straight" read "strait."

ITALY.

The decision of the International Federation of Trade Unions not to admit ex-enemy countries to their conference in London next month will be very depressing news for the Italian General Confederation of Labour.

Efforts to reorganise Trade Unions began, more or less, as soon as the Allied Nations landed in Italy and, though there have been some ups and downs, as might be expected after twenty years' repression, the Trade Union Movement has been gradually reorganised and the British Trade Union has, practically unanimously, been chosen as the model. With this object in view a General Labour Congress is to be held in Naples towards the end of the month in the hopes of being able to broaden the basis of the Italian Confederation of Labour. But, in addition to this, the intention is to change the present system, in which the delegates are simply party representatives chosen by their leaders, into a non-party movement with the delegates freely elected by the rank and file.

It is, therefore, more than ever unfortunate that the International Federation of Trade Unions has deemed it necessary to take this step. A plea might possibly be made that Italy, as a co-belligerent, no longer comes into the category of ex-enemy countries, particularly in view of the ever-increasing responsibility that is likely to be granted to the Italian Government in the conduct of their affairs.

Pietro Nenni, the Socialist leader, made a speech at the Teatro Brancaccio on the 1st January to a large gathering of the Socialist Party. Signor Nenni made no particularly new point but, except from his own paper Avanti, he seems to have had from the press more criticism than support. Even Italia Libera, the Action Party paper, criticised the Communist-Socialist alliance and found Signor Nenni's explanations of the Socialist Party's policy unsatisfactory. Risorgimento Liberale (Liberal Party) was naturally much more critical. This paper asks how Signor Nenni explains his Party's absence from the Italian Cabinet when he had told his audience that Italy must redeem herself in the eyes of the world by the most complete co-operation in the United Nations' war effort. As regards the acceptance by the Committee of National Liberation in the north of the powers delegated to it by Signor Bonomi, Risorgimento Liberale suggests that Signor Nenni would do well to take a lesson from his Socialist brothers in the north.

With reference to Franco-Italian relations (see Summary No. 275), the statement published in the press by the Agence Française de la Presse to the effect that the status of Italians in Tunis was not a subject for discussion seems to be confirmed, since following a meeting of the Council of Ministers on the 12th January inspired comment subsequently stated that normal diplomatic relations could not be resumed until the Italian Government recognised that the 1893 agreements confirming the privileged status of Italians in Tunisia had lapsed following Italy's declaration of war on France.

In the North, the Fascist Republican Government has begun the year by taking strong measures with regard to the control of food supplies and in defence of the lira. A Decree of the 29th December, which came into force on the 8th January, ordered the requisitioning of all wholesale food concerns, which are henceforth to be under the control of a special Commissioner in each Province. Furthermore, all restaurants are to be converted into war canteens where meals will be served only at fixed low prices. These drastic measures are said to be aimed at putting an end to black market dealings and speculation, but a more cogent reason is probably to be found in difficulties of transport and distribution.

Another decree, allegedly aiming at the reduction of spending-power and the defence of the lira, orders the "temporary" cessation of the war bonus granted last September to industrial workers. The bonus of 10 lire a day which was then granted to industrial workers with no family responsibilities is to be discontinued for the present, while the bonus of 25 lire a day for heads of families is to be reduced to 20 lire. The withdrawal of these benefits, which were loudly proclaimed only four months ago as an example of Fascism's social policy, can only result in greater hardship among the workers, who may thus be compelled to accede to pressure to volunteer for work in Germany.

The trial of seven Generals who held important Commands at the time of the Armistice took place early in January. These Generals, whose trial had been pending for some months, were accused of abandoning their Command or failing to prevent disbandment of their troops. Generals Caracciolo and Robotti were sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. Generals Garibaldi and Vecchiarelli to 10 years' imprisonment, while of the remaining three Generals two were acquitted and the case against the third was dismissed.

THE VATICAN.

The Vatican's English transmission of the 8th January gave the gist of a joint pastoral letter issued by the Sicilian Bishops, who advocate what the speaker called "a notable programme of social reconstruction." They demanded a restoration of the old trade guilds in modern form, agricultural co-operatives, more small holdings and rural banks to finance all these things. Workers, too, must share in the profits of industry. These reforms require "highly efficient modern rural schools. Instead, classical and professional schools are multiplied, destined too often to take the country pupils off the land, and make them misfits for life." The whole pastoral reflects the Pope's recent insistence on the dependence of full personality on the right to property, and his determination to make the continuance of a proletariat impossible.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Hungarian delegation in Moscow is still awaiting presentation of the Armistice terms. Little news has come in of the activities of the Debrecen Government; but it is stated that the administration and other services are to be thoroughly purged of German and Nazi elements.

The entire battle-front in Hungary has been practically stationary during the week; but inside Pest the attackers have made some progress in bitter fighting. Among the important centres captured are the Eastern and Western Railway Stations.

Roumania.

As noted in last week's Summary, the Soviet Government intend to deport for forced labour in coal mines in Russia a large number of Roumanians of Teutonic descent. The first drafts have already left. The number at present affected is 35,750, the final figure may be 100,000 or even more. Nursing mothers with children under one year old are exempted, and so also are priests and nuns, whom in the first instance it was proposed to include.

General Vinogradov asserts that the people involved have consistently helped the Germans against the Allies, and that they are purely German in mental outlook. They are to be well treated and their eventual fate is to be decided at the Peace Conference.

We have informed the Soviet Government and the Soviet authorities in Bucharest that as we had not been informed before this decision was taken we shall be obliged, if questioned, to make it clear that action was taken without our being consulted. The United States Government have taken similar action in Bucharest, and have reminded General Vinogradov that there is nothing in the terms of the Armistice to justify the removal of these Volksdeutsche to the U.S.S.R.

There is a tendency for prices of foodstuffs to rise in Bucharest, but there still appear to be ample supplies for those who can afford to buy. The Prime Minister has spoken of the painful spectacle of a small minority indulging in riotous living, when people in general are struggling for life. This is one more good mark for General Radescu. It is this same "small minority" who not only in respect of luxury spending, but in everything else as well, are reckoned by foreigners to be "Roumania." The Prime Minister promises that night clubs will be closed and balls, except those held for charity, prohibited. In the meantime meals in restaurants are to be limited to two courses and dessert. This may not amount to very much. All meals in Bucharest restaurants are à la carte, and three courses is the usual-sized meal. Nothing is said about the size of the courses!

Yugoslavia.

The only considerable military development seems to be that the Germans in their retreat down the Lim are now north of Prijepolje. The hard-pressed Slovene Partisans have met with opposition in their effort forcibly to mobilise recruits. They have, however, been reinforced by the "Garibaldi" (Communist)

Division of Italian Partisans, about 1,200 strong, who have crossed the Isonzo and joined them.

The Belgrade press has given great prominence to the formation of provisional Governments in Albania and Hungary and at Lublin. On the 7th January Borba (Communist) devoted a leading article to abuse of the Polish Government and the Polish troops fighting with the Western Allies. There was no hint of any differences in Allied opinion over Poland; except that the writer expressed the conviction that the Lublin Government "will now be recognised by the rest of the democratic States—France, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and others." Next day Borba enthusiastically supported the Albanian Liberation Committee's demand for recognition from the Allies. Radio Belgrade has become increasingly critical of the use of British force in Greece. On the 12th Borba printed an article from the Laiki Phoni, of Salonika, which exalted the struggle of E.L.A.S. "against Fascism" and spoke of General Scobie as the representative of Conservative circles assisting national traitors.

King Peter has taken a step which has given a check to the discussions on the formation of a united Yugoslav Government. On the 11th January, on his own responsibility, he issued to the press a statement of his views on the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement for a Yugoslav Government. While approving the basic principle of the agreement, that the freely expressed will of the peoples of Yugoslavia should decide the future constitution of the country, and while accepting the principle of the formation of a Regency Council, he stated his objections to two features of the agreement, namely, the proposed method of appointing the Regency Council and the attribution of unrestricted legislative power to the Partisans' Council (A.V.N.O.J.) during the period until the Constituent Assembly has enacted the new constitution. He added that the second feature suggested the transfer of power in Yugoslavia to a single political group, and declared that only an all-party Government could satisfactorily deal with the situation. It remains to be seen if the King's two points can be met with the agreement of all parties concerned.

The Belgrade press of the 13th treated the King's statement as a matter of indifference and incapable of affecting the establishment of the new régime in Yugoslavia. Organised demonstrations in the streets shouted anti-royal slogans. On the other hand, it is reported that for the first time some slight interest is being shown by the public in the King. Most of the Partisans and of their opponents, being unfamiliar with the machinery of democratic government, have inferred from the publication of King Peter's statement in London that it was made at the instance of the British Government. This has even led them to speculate on the possibility of British intervention in Yugoslavia.

Greece.

On the 10th January it was officially announced from General Scobie's Headquarters that emissaries from E.A.M. Central Committee had arrived bearing a document which authorised MM. Zevgos and Partsalidis and Majors Makridis and Athinellis to negotiate for a truce, either all together or two of them together. General Scobie had received the emissaries and had ascertained that they had come, not to put forward any proposition, but to receive his terms for a truce and to accept them if they saw fit.

Discussions continued throughout the 10th and 11th January, and it was announced on the night of the 11th that a truce between General Scobie's forces and the Central Committee of E.L.A.S. had been signed by General Scobie and the four E.L.A.S. delegates; at the request of the latter, who needed time to issue the necessary orders, hostilities would cease at one o'clock on the morning of the 15th January. Briefly, the main terms of the truce were as follows:—

By the 18th January E.L.A.S. forces east and south of the general line of the road Itea–Amphissa–Lamia–Domokos–Pharsala, and thence east to the coast north of Volos, must retire, and remain, west and north of this line; by the 17th January E.L.A.S. forces must evacuate Salonica and an agreed area round it; by the 19th January E.L.A.S. forces must evacuate the northern Peloponnese, withdrawing south of the general line Pyrgos to Argos; by the 24th January E.L.A.S. forces must withdraw from Zante, Eubœa, Kithera, the Cyclades, and the Sporades; all service personnel of whatever nationality, including Greek police and gendarmerie, must be returned. This provision included all Greek personnel bearing arms, but not civilians detained by the E.A.M. civil police. An equal number of E.L.A.S. prisoners would be released by the British. All British civilians captured must be returned.

It is to be noted that by the terms of the truce Greek civilian hostages are left in the hands of E.L.A.S.; on this point the E.A.M. delegates absolutely refused to yield, being evidently determined to hold these unfortunate persons as security against possible future proscriptions. The Regent has expressed himself as "profoundly shocked" at E.L.A.S.'s refusal to release innocent men and women; at the same time he stated that, if E.L.A.S. Central Committee felt they could assist in the re-establishment of law and order, he would readily facilitate a meeting between them and representatives of the Greek Government. General Plastiras issued a brief statement saying that the truce did not prejudice the attitude of the Greek Government, which would not deviate from its intention of establishing the rule of law throughout the country. On the same day a statement issued from 10 Downing Street endorsed the terms of the truce on behalf of His Majesty's Government, described the taking of hostages as a barbarous custom condemned by international law, and pointed out that no truce could endure or ripen into peace unless or until the hostages had been released. The Greek Government expressed profound relief at the publication of the British statement, and General Plastiras again affirmed that no penalties would be enforced except by courts of law against individuals who were found to have committed acts contrary to the rules of war or to the ordinary criminal code.

Albania.

It may or may not be true that Albanian partisans joined E.L.A.S. or supplied E.L.A.S. with ammunition, but there is little doubt that three delegates of the Albanian partisans attended E.A.M./E.L.A.S. discussions at Salonica.

A broadcast of the 5th January supported the appeal of Enver Hoxha's Government for Allied recognition, by claiming among other things that the Albanians had been the first people to fight Fascism, that they were now fighting the Germans in Montenegro and that the provisional Government had established order all over Albania. Whatever the extent of its authority, the provisional Government certainly inclines to drastic measures, which indicate a new atmosphere infused with the spirit of Moscow. An Italian and an Albanian representing a firm of contractors were executed for concealing road-mending material. Profiteering is loudly denounced and the people are invited to bring evidence to the special court which is to try war criminals. It is evident that the court will be used as a convenient instrument for eliminating political opponents.

Bulgaria.

Continuing its proceedings the People's Court heard the ex-Regents, three former Premiers and other ex-Ministers and Deputies. The most sensational development was Prince Kiril's suggestion that King Boris had died of an overdose of oxygen when the Germans flew him home after his meeting with Hitler. Published comment on the trial emphasised the Prince's German descent, described him as a spendthrift and swindler and observed that for the first time since the French revolution the people had the chance of judging a dynasty which had oppressed them and led them into disaster. What the Fatherland Front—and no doubt Moscow—hold against the Muraviev Government is not only that by its procrastination in the early days of last September it enabled the German forces to get away, but also that consisting of Leftists, as it did, it played the ex-Regents' game of splitting the Left. On the former point Nikola Mushanov, an important figure in the Muraviev Cabinet, stated that the Government deferred its declaration of war against Germany in order to allow time for Bulgarian troops to withdraw from Yugoslavia.

If it is true that the Communists have lost ground since September, that may explain evident signs of unrest among the component parties of the Fatherland Front. On the 24th December Terpeshev, the partisan leader and Communist Minister without Portfolio, who now figures as a lieutenant-general, admitted in a speech that there was hostility in the Front to the Communists. Since then emphasis has been laid on the unanimity alleged to prevail and also on the need for continuing the purge of the Administration and of the parties composing the Fatherland Front. The Premier, M. Gheorghiev, sent a New Year's message to Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, the Agrarian leader, mentioning that he relied on Agrarian support. The Fatherland Front itself issued a statement stressing its unity, deprecating dissension and advocating a further purge. A Tsveno paper declared that all signs of such a thing as a rift had gone. Both a Social Democrat and a Communist paper demanded a purge for the consolidation of the Front.

Lastly, the secretary of the Agrarian Union made a point of asserting that complete unanimity prevailed within the Front.

Although there have been reports of armed Bulgarians and Bulgarian arms and ammunition entering Greece, the E.L.A.S. delegates who went to Sofia in an effort to obtain reparation supplies are reported to have met with a refusal. However, Bulgarian delegates appear to have attended an E.A.M./E.L.A.S. conference at Salonica.

A Bulgarian trade delegation has been sent to Moscow to negotiate for cotton, wool, leather, rubber, iron and other urgently needed raw materials. It may be hoped that Bulgaria will first be compelled to make at least a start with reparation deliveries to Greece and Yugoslavia.

Turkey.

The announcement that there is to be a third issue of bonds to cover military expenditure suggests that the decline in revenue recently mentioned by the Prime Minister has been such as seriously to upset the budget adopted last summer. The economic situation would be much eased if the 750,000 men now under arms were gradually to be demobilised, but a Bill which has recently passed its first reading in the National Assembly gives the Cabinet absolute power to prolong the period of service. Although there has been relief at the improvement in the Greek situation, that in Bulgaria is regarded with disquiet, and no change for the better is noticeable in Turco-Soviet relations. The Turkish Government is therefore unlikely to indulge in substantial demobilisation.

On the 8th January the Minister of Public Works opened a new road which leads from Iskenderon (Alexandretta) via Mersin and over the Taurus to Ulukişla on the Anatolian plateau. On the following day, in the presence of the British Ambassador, he opened a new jetty at Iskenderon. Both these important works have been constructed with British financial and technical help.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The trial of the two Jews, Hakim and Ben Suri, charged with the murder of Lord Moyne, opened in Cairo on the 10th January, and except for Friday the 12th has continued daily since then. The proceedings in court have been dignified and impartial. One remarkable feature was the reading out by the Procureur-Général of a telegram sent to the Egyptian Minister of Justice by an American-Jewish organisation in New York demanding a fair trial; and the President of the Court took the opportunity of stating that the judges would act according to the law and their consciences, and that the accused were assured of a fair trial. Hakim pleaded guilty to killing Lord Moyne with premeditation, participating in the killing of Corporal Fuller, the British driver, and being in illegal possession of firearms; while Ben Suri pleaded guilty to killing Fuller, participating in the killing of Lord Moyne with premeditation, and being in illegal possession of firearms and explosives.

Ben Suri, in his statement, said that he had not intended to shoot Fuller, his instructions being to kill only Lord Moyne. He stated that all Palestinians were fighting for independence, and that Great Britain was a foreign Government trying to impose its rule and withhold freedom from them. Hakim, who spoke more briefly, confined himself to the motive of the crime, asserting that the Government of Palestine had committed crimes of violence before they themselves had done so, and that it was not possible for them to bring to justice persons like Lord Moyne. Both the accused refused to state from whom they had received their instructions.

After the Procureur-Général had addressed the Court for the prosecution, saying that the accused had shown no pity and deserved none, one of the advocates for the defence spoke on behalf of Hakim who, he said, was under 18 at the time of the murder and was therefore deserving of clemency. Tawfik Doss Pasha, who later continued the defence, urged that this was a political crime, due to Jewish disappointment at the present position of Jews in Palestine. He ended with a quotation from the Quran and an appeal for mercy. The trial continues, but is expected to end shortly.

The final results of the Egyptian general election show that the Saadists, the party of the Prime Minister, have gained 125 seats; while the Liberals obtain 74, Makramites 29, Independents 29, and Nationalists 7. Thus the Saadists have 125 members as against 139 of all other parties. Ahmad Maher has since re-formed his Cabinet, but only a few minor changes have been made.

East, retaining it only over those commodities which are in exceptionally short supply or which, being bulky, require an exceptional quantity of shipping. Otherwise the local Governments resume full responsibility for the regulation of their import trade. Their freedom of action is still limited, however, by the general shortage of shipping and, for members of the sterling area, by the relative scarcity of non-sterling currencies. It is the latter problem which forms the subject of the Anglo-Egyptian arrangements contained in an exchange of letters (3rd and 6th January) between the Egyptian Ministry of Finance and the British Embassy, published last week in a White Paper (Cmd. 6582). By these arrangements His Majesty's Government undertake to provide Egypt in 1945 with a substantial amount of non-sterling currency (the "target" figure is £10 million), while the Egyptian Government for their part have agreed to strengthen their import and foreign exchange controls. It is pointed out that, since no payments for wheat and fertilizers are included in the target figure, there is a potential additional burden, which may amount to as much as £5 million, on the sterling area foreign exchange pool.

Large-scale but peaceful demonstrations by students took place in Damascus on the 2nd January on the question of the Syrian National Army. The Prime Minister told the demonstrators of the long negotiations between the Syrian Government and the French over the Troupes Spéciales, and of how the French had changed their minds about transferring these troops. He added that the Allies could not supply arms for a new Syrian army, as none were available beyond those for the use of the gendarmerie.

We have again pressed the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to send a reply about the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales and the supply of cars and automatic weapons to the gendarmerie, on both of which matters Mr. Eden spoke to M. Bidault personally during his visit to Paris in November last. In a recent conversation with Mr. Duff-Cooper on the matter, M. Bidault was not encouraging. When told that an unfavourable impression was being created by the lack of any reply on his part to the various communications we had sent, he said that he regretted the delay, but that no reply was better than one which might be totally unsatisfactory. Nor did he agree that the situation in the Levant was becoming more serious.

The Regent of Iraq is hoping to visit the United States at the end of March or in early April. He expects to be in America for about a month, after which he would like to pay another visit to this country, travelling incognito. The proposed formation of Arab propaganda offices in London and Washington (see last week's Summary) has been officially approved by the Iraqi Government, which has allocated £30,000 for 1945 towards the expenses of their establishment. In announcing this recently in Parliament the Iraqi Prime Minister stated that the main object in view was propaganda on behalf of Arab Palestine.

On the 8th January the Persian Majlis passed a law repealing the special powers granted to Dr. Millspaugh in economic affairs and placing on the Persian Government the responsibility for dealing with departments and institutions which had been under Dr. Millspaugh's charge, either by their abolition or by their transfer to another Minister, or by making them into independent administrations. The Government may also retain, amend or cancel any of Dr. Millspaugh's economic regulations.

A story has been current for some weeks that the Soviet Government intended to appoint a Minister of State in Tehran corresponding more or less to the British Minister of State in Cairo. There seems, however, to be no basis for the rumour.

THE FAR EAST.

Radio broadcasts from Tokyo indicate that the Koiso Government is facing a crisis and may even cease to exist before the Japanese Diet reconvenes on the 21st January. Although Domei reports for foreign consumption affect confidence that the outcome of the Luzon battle will be a crushing defeat for the American invaders, this optimistic view is evidently not shared by inner political and military circles in Tokyo. The Japanese are under no illusions as to the disastrous consequences to the Japanese "co-prosperity sphere" and ultimately to Japan itself which the complete American conquest of the Philippines would entail. The American capture of Saipan brought about the downfall of the Tojo Cabinet; it is unlikely that Koiso could survive the fall of Manila.

In addition to the loss of prestige which it has suffered through the Japanese defeats in the Philippines and in Burma, the Koiso Cabinet has also been under fire for its shortcomings in home administration. These criticisms have particularly centred around the poor quality of munitions production, inadequate measures for dealing with damage caused by air raids, and insufficient co-operation between officials and people. Domei, on the 12th January, announced that a new five-point programme, drawn up by the Planning Board had been approved by the Cabinet. The programme provided for the strengthening of anti-air raid defences; a drastic intensification of munitions production; a thorough campaign to increase food production; an expansion of the National Labour Service; and the conversion of all available materials to war purposes. There is nothing novel in this programme; what is significant is the light which it throws upon existing troubles on the Japanese home front.

On the 14th January Japanese Imperial Headquarters announced that some sixty American aircraft had raided Nagoya and surrounding areas and that bombs had been dropped in the grounds of the Grand Shrine of Toyouke;. two ritual purification halls and five halls for sacred music and dancing had been demolished. The communiqué added that the results of the interception of enemy aircraft were being ascertained. A later report claimed nine American aircraft destroyed and many others damaged. The Shrine of Toyouke is the Geku or Outer Shrine of Ise, the Shinto holy of holies, and the fact that enemy aircraft could not be prevented from bombing it is a tremendous blow to the Government's prestige and provides a splendid opportunity for anyone who may wish to bring about its downfall.

This chance has evidently not been missed. Opposition to the Koiso Government appears to have centred in the Seijikai, headed by Admiral Kobayashi, the recently-appointed Minister without Portfolio (see this Summary No. 273). The Seijikai is largely composed of members of the Diet, some of them old Parliamentarians, others of a more militarist and extremist character, who were elected for the first time in 1942. Tokyo reports indicate that these "younger members" of the Diet are taking an active part in demanding a drastic political renovation—which might imply measures somewhat corresponding in character to those taken in Germany since last July. The Seijikai, which was organised as a link between the Government and various "national service" associations, appears to have developed into a formidable critic of the Government itself and might take on a totalitarian aspect under the ægis of "patriots" of the Hashimoto stamp.

A member of the Japanese Military Press Corps in the Philippines quoted General Yamashita, the Japanese Commander-in-Chief, as saying that "the loss of an island or two in the Philippines does not matter. We shall allow the enemy to advance and then annihilate tens of thousands of them at one stroke." Other Japanese reports elaborate this theme of a planned retreat into the interior of Luzon in order to deal a destructive counter-blow. The Domei commentator in Singapore (12th January) intimated that the Japanese would pursue a similar strategy in Burma; he said that their troops had fallen back on previously prepared positions in Central Burma and that the Japanese commanders had concentrated the maximum force on a battlefield chosen by themselves. After surveying the general military situation in the Pacific, he ended with the comment that there existed in the East vast imponderable forces—the anti-British masses of India and the anti-foreign masses of China in particular—which would eventually guarantee a decisive Japanese victory.

On the 11th January, Tokyo announced the appointment of Suemitsu Kadowaki and of Shoji Ogata as Counsellors to the Japanese Embassy in Moscow. Kadowaki had previously been Chief of the East Asiatic Department and then Chief of the Political Department of the Tokyo Foreign Office. Ogata had been Consul in Petropavlovsk in 1935 and was regarded as particularly well-informed on Japanese-Soviet relations. The appointments were considered to be a significant strengthening of Japanese representation in Moscow. A Japanese Singapore broadcast (13th January) alleged that the principal aim of Anglo-American intrigue in Moscow was to inveigle Stalin into war against Japan. It pointed out that the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact of April, 1941, was operative for five years, that either contracting party had to give notice of its desire to terminate the Pact one year before its expiration, and, if neither side took such action, the Pact remained in force for a further five years. Stalin would therefore be compelled to show his hand in respect of the Pacific War before April, 1945. This would be one of the most important subjects of discussion at the forthcoming conference of the "Big Three," but Stalin's Western Allies had no adequate compensation to offer him to offset the disadvantages of incurring war with Japan. The German political survey in N.P.D. (10th January) referred to Stalin's denunciation of Japan as an aggressor nation and to articles in Pravda and in The War and the Working Class which depicted Japan's position and prospects in sombre hues. But nevertheless, the German commentator considered that neither Japan nor the Soviet Union had either the inclination or the strength to start a new war. For both Powers the most favourable moment for declaring war against each other passed several years ago. The one fact which emerges from these Axis speculations upon Soviet intentions is that no help will be forthcoming from Tokyo to relieve the hard-pressed German armies on the Russian front.

On the 9th January the Chungking Radio reported that the Standing Committee of the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee had decided to convene the sixth Party Congress on the 5th May. The National Party Congress is supposed to meet every two years, although in fact it has not done so; previous Congresses were held in 1924, 1926, 1929, 1931 and 1935. There was also an Extraordinary Party Congress at Hankow in 1938. When in session the Congress is the supreme Kuomintang organ and it elects the members of the Central Executive and Central Supervisory Committees of the Party. The forthcoming Kuomintang National Congress will have among its tasks that of formulating the arrangements for the People's Congress which the Generalissimo recently announced would be convened before the end of the war (see this Summary No. 274). Meanwhile the negotiations between the Kuomintang and the Communist Parties, which had previously ended in deadlock, are reported to have been renewed and the chances of some kind of a settlement being reached are thought by observers to be rather brighter than before.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In his Budget Message to the new Congress on the 9th January, President Roosevelt sounded the same note heard in the "State of the Union" Message three days earlier (see Summary No. 275). "We have learned," he asserted, "that, just as the United States cannot afford to be isolationist in its political philosophy, neither can it stand the malignant effects of economic isolationism." He went on to outline "a concrete programme for international monetary and financial co-operation at an early date." The President's practical proposals were threefold: first, he urged Congress to accept and implement the Bretton Woods agreement of last July, proposing an International Monetary Fund and an International Bank for Reconstruction. Secondly, he recommended "the early expansion" of the Export–Import Bank's lending powers. Thirdly, he urged the repeal of the Johnson Act, which since 1934 has prohibited loans to countries, including Great Britain, which are in default on loans arising out of the First World War.

These suggestions were, as he explained, designed to eliminate "the evils that stem from unstable and destructive exchange practices," while meeting "the need for international investment which is becoming acute." Whereas the Export–Import Bank, a Government institution founded in 1934, provides credits for the purchase of American goods abroad, the International Bank would enable the United States to finance the movement of goods from any country to any other country. The anxiety of the Administration to help reconstruction everywhere is clear. A novel emphasis on the connexion between domestic prosperity and world stability also appeared in the Message. "Other countries are anxiously awaiting the development of our policy and will be more willing to make international commitments if they are assured of high post-war employment in the United States. They are fully aware that international co-operation cannot succeed unless the United States is prosperous."

The day after the Budget Message, the President was obliged to expose something of a setback to his foreign economic policy. He requested the Senate to return for further consideration the Anglo-American Oil Agreement of the 8th August, 1944, which has since been languishing in the Senate files. This step came as no surprise. It was clear that the agreement stood little chance of ratification in its present shape, particularly as it was strongly opposed by Senator Connally (Democrat, Texas), the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and on most matters, except oil, a valuable supporter of the Administration's policy. Outside Congress the Petroleum Industry War Council had also suggested drastic amendments. Fears that the Senate might be by-passed if a revised oil pact were concluded in the form of an executive agreement were expressed by the Wall Street Journal and the New York Herald-Tribune; while the New York Times (the 12th January) took it for granted that "the revised draft will be prepared in consultation with the petroleum interests and also with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. This is altogether the proper course to take."

A much more promising omen, on the 10th January, was the somewhat unexpected appearance of Senator Vandenberg as the champion of an uncompromising foreign alliance. The Republican Senator from Michigan has travelled a long way from the isolationism of pre-Pearl Harbour days. He was responsible for the Mackinac Resolution inserted in his party's platform last summer and his new proposals did not differ fundamentally from the views he expressed during the Dumbarton Oaks debates. Yet, presented in concrete form, they were sufficiently arresting.

Opening the debate on foreign policy on Wednesday, before an attentive Senate and a deeply-interested gallery, Senator Vandenberg called for the immediate negotiation of a "hard and fast" treaty between the major Powers to keep Germany and Japan permanently demilitarised. "We need not await the determination of our other post-war relationships," he said. "This problem, this menace, stands apart by itself." The Senator went on to explain that he would favour the immediate formation of a United Nations security organisation such as was contemplated in the Dumbarton Oaks plan, but made a significant reservation: provided it specifically authorised the ultimate review of protested injustices in the eventual peace terms. Such a reservation would "at least partially nullify the argument that we are asked to put a blank cheque warrant behind the future status quo which is unknown to us, and which we might be unwilling to defend." Even with this qualification his proposal seems to mark a considerable advance on his position last summer.

Senator Connally, whose opinions were taken to reflect those of the White House, which he had visited the previous day, suggested that it might be better if there were not "too much discussion of these matters" before the coming "Big Three" conference. But Senator Austin, another influential member of the Foreign Relations Committee, strongly supported the proposal and was followed by several other Senators, Republicans and Democrats as well. In the end Senator Connally was constrained to promise an examination of the proposed alliance.

In conversation Senator Vandenberg has insisted that he is prepared for an unconditional treaty not dependent on the good behaviour of the other parties, that he is confident of obtaining two-thirds of the Senate to support it; and that his proposal is not incompatible with the Dumbarton Oaks Plan. Like Senator Connally, Administration spokesmen may well have feared lest such a limited alliance might salve too many consciences at too little cost and make a larger international organisation more difficult to get through the Senate later on. Senator Vandenberg, however, not only seems to hold the balance in the Foreign Relations Committee but in the Senate itself. The Committee is now more strongly internationalist than hitherto. Of the five new members, though Senator Wiley (Republican, Wisconsin) is a pronounced Isolationist and Styles Bridges (Republican, New Hampshire) a nationalist, Senators Hill (Democrat, Alabama), Hatch (Democrat, New Mexico) and Lucas (Democrat, Illinois) are all out-and-out internationalists. There are now 14 unswerving supporters of the Administration on the Committee, and, of the 9 Republican members, Senator Austin is also internationally-minded, while Senators White and Bridges have comparatively good voting records. Only Senators Johnson, Capper, La Follette and Shipstead are diehard Isolationists.

Senator Vandenberg's speech stole the thunder of several other Senators who had their own panaceas to offer the Administration. His colleague from Michigan, Senator Ferguson, wants a reiteration of the Atlantic Charter and a United Nations Council to administer liberated countries. Senators Ball and Hatch despair of getting a further resolution on the lines of their famous B.H. formula accepted before the forthcoming meeting. Senator Connally himself, who has been inclined, perhaps on behalf of the Administration, to soft-pedal discussion of foreign policy at this moment, has put forward outside Congress a plan for the immediate formation of a provisional council of the United Nations with a purely advisory function.

The Senate debate continued after the week-end with rather more acrimony, thanks to Senator Wheeler, who has returned to his wonted isolation. During the week-end the press of the Union was warm in praise of Senator Vandenberg's initiative, especially as coming from an erstwhile Isolationist. Liberal papers sounded a warning that such an alliance must not become a substitute for a broader treaty. Republican organs hailed the speech as "a beacon in the midst of Allied bickerings." Criticism of British and Russian "power politics" was still very vocal, but the cautionary words of the President about "perfectionism" and the Economist's expressed distaste for "noble negatives" were echoed in a number of places. A significant article in The Nation (13th January) by Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, censured American Liberal and Progressive opinion for its too great awareness of the sins of others. The fact is, he wrote, that America's threat to international accord is more subtle than the policies of Britain and the Soviet. "Our power is primarily economic rather than political, and economic power is always less obvious."

Mr. Walter Lippmann has continued to write in a conciliatory strain. He hails the Vandenberg proposal with enthusiasm, believing that it is "not only consistent with the letter and spirit of the Dumbarton Oaks Plan, but that it is indispensable to the success of the plan." The important proviso for review noted above, is, however, nowhere mentioned in the article. In his first trans-atlantic broadcast on the B.B.C. Home Service (Sunday, 14th January) Mr. Joseph C. Harsch of the Christian Science Monitor once again expressed American idealism and optimism with his concluding remarks: "You can call Senator Vandenberg an astute politician who senses the swing of public opinion, or a statesman. But is doesn't matter very much which you call him, for the result is the same. Mr. Roosevelt now proceeds to the next meeting with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Stalin more nearly the leader of the nation on peace measures than he ever was before and very much more so than Woodrow Wilson was in 1918." (See also under "Latin America.")

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 8th January the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union decided that, since the "United and Associated American States" had agreed to hold a meeting to discuss present and post-war problems of an emergency character, it would be preferable that no action should at present be taken about the Argentine proposal for a meeting of Foreign Ministers: an opportunity would, however, be afforded for the representatives of the American Republics to give joint consideration to the Argentine request. Invitations were issued two days later. The Conference will presumably take place in Mexico City in the middle of February; the unrecognised Governments of Argentina and El Salvador have not been invited.

The Conference is to discuss measures relative to the common war-effort; the problems of post-war co-operation, including the Dumbarton Oaks proposals; and measures of economic co-operation; finally the question of Argentina will come up. On the 8th January the Colombian Government issued a statement to the effect that in future Pan-American conferences should meet at fixed dates, that the Union of American Republics should have the power to impose political and judicial sanctions, and that a means should be found for withholding recognition from Governments not deserving it without infringing the principle of non-intervention in internal affairs.

The reaction of the Argentine Government has been to instruct their representative on the Governing Board to inform the chairman of the Union that, "so long as Argentine rights remain unrecognised and consultative procedure is vitiated, which in the opinion of this Government is the implication of the resolution of the 8th January," the Argentine Republic had decided to abstain from participating in the meetings of the Union. This action, which, in the circumstances, can hardly be called immoderate, suggests that the Government have no wish to increase the existing tension. It seems, in effect, to be a compromise between those who wished to withdraw from the Union altogether, and those who wanted to take the even less energetic line of a simple protest against Argentina's being deprived of the benefits of a consultative meeting.

The Argentine Cabinet, despite General Farrell's anodyne affirmations (see last week's Summary), has again been violently divided. Colonel Perón's manœuvres to build up his own future (especially the appointment of his henchman, Dr. Bramuglia (see last week's Summary)) have been an obvious source of friction, and General Peluffo, who is believed to have issued an ultimatum demanding that Colonel Perón's "personal rule" should be checked and a return made to civilian government, announced his resignation on the 15th January. Major Embrioni, the Director-General in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, has also resigned. The Government is accordingly much weakened.

Meanwhile, Government measures have been more conciliatory than otherwise. The Pensions Decree (see Summary No. 269) has been suspended; three more German construction firms have been subjected to Government management; and the new Interventor of Córdoba has upheld the freedom of worship guaranteed by the Constitution in cancelling a police prohibition on Salvation Army meetings. On the debit side, Argentina Libre, which emerged from silence on the 7th December, has again been closed by the police.

In Brazil there is evidence that President Vargas has at last become convinced of the necessity for elections. The chief reason which would support such a conviction is the desire to ensure for Brazil the favour of the United Nations in the post-war world. Brazil's desire, indeed, to play a prominent part in post-war world organisation is obvious; and the feeling is growing that an essential preliminary is either a house-cleaning or some appearance of house-cleaning—para inglês ver. This welcome change of outlook (if it is a change) seems to be at least partly due to a modification in the views of General Dutra, the Minister for War, who has just returned from a doubtless instructive trip to the battle-front in Italy. The general's conversion leaves the Minister of Justice and the President's brother Benjamin as the leaders of the reactionary clique. The general apparently now favours a return to the 1934 Constitution with a Senate and Chamber directly elected by the people, rather than the frankly corporative and totalitarian Constitution of 1937. It is also possible that by these means the President would appease the Liberal opposition at home, though the "Liberals" are reported to be confident that a free press would expose enough scandals to bring down the existing order.

Mr. Adolf Berle has been nominated United States Ambassador to Brazil.

In Panamá the position of President Ricardo Adolfo de la Guardia appears to be firmer. He is bidding for popular support by raising salaries and offering Panamanian nationality to the descendants of West Indian families, debarred by the reactionary legislation of 1941. Criticism of him is now restricted to his allegedly unconstitutional position (he took over the remainder of the term when Arnulfo Arias was overthrown) and to the value to be attached to his promise of free elections for a National Convention in May.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE third week of January 1945 has been a black week for German arms. The loss of Warsaw, Lodz, Cracow and Tilsit—four important military outposts in no more than four days—has given the German people a shock, the extent of which cannot yet indeed be measured, but of which the gravity of propaganda statements is a clear indication. The shock does not seem to have been altogether unexpected. On the 13th, Nazi publicists were already explaining that "deep wedges here and there" would not be decisive "so long as our defensive front maintains a coherent, if elastic, system." On the second day of the Russian offensive D.N.B. stated that the German forces were fighting "partly in prepared positions and partly in free movement." The public were assured that counter-measures had been taken, in the shape of "complete defensive positions, staggered in depth," extending "far to the rear." Thereafter, each day's output of propaganda has emphasised, rather than disguised, the critical nature of the battles fought on Germany's eastern frontier. On the 16th, a D.N.B. broadcast for the German press said that "German strategy has never intended to force prestige successes by rigidly defending sectors of ground which are difficult to hold," a preparation for admissions of further Soviet penetrations which have followed rapidly. On the same day, the Gauleiter of Upper Silesia, Bracht, broadcast an appeal to an Army Group in the East, in which he recognised the threat to Upper Silesia. "You must now hold out and contest every inch of ground," he said. "Behind you stand German men and women. . . . . If you do not hold out, we cannot resist."

On the 17th, for the first time since D-Day, the O.K.W. gave to the Eastern front first place in its communiqué. On the following day it announced briefly the evacuation of Warsaw. In the evening, the home public heard that "the foremost waves of the battle have reached the frontier area of the Reich." A war reporter painted a vivid picture of reserves being hurriedly rushed up to the front: "emergency units, police troops, the brave men of the Upper Silesian Volkssturm, the Stadtwacht, the Landwacht, and the regiments manning the positions in these areas."

On the 19th, the official communiqué announced that the garrison of Budapest had withdrawn to the west bank of the Danube. Maegerlein, in the Home Service, depicted the German people as "bringing forth their maps and school atlases to seek out with grave anxiety the towns to which Soviet tank spearheads have rapidly advanced in the last few days"—an anxiety which is not surprising in view of the mention of such names as Cracow, Lodz, Kutno and Gumbinnen. But, said Maegerlein, these were only advanced tank spearheads, and the main Russian forces were further to the East. Details of the desperate measures of German commanders in the field were issued for the Press. Only rarely was the arrival of reserves awaited. Every available man was being armed and thrown into the fight. As in the West, the enemy would find that the nearer he approached to the German frontier, the more fanatical would be the German resistance. Another broadcast for the German Press was slightly more optimistic, and spoke of the first indications that the Eastern front was beginning to regain its strength. The enemy was meeting the defensive line "quickly built before the Upper Silesian frontier."

On the 20th the O.K.W. announced the fall of Cracow and Lodz. Volkssturm battalions were helping to block the way of Soviet spearheads into Upper Silesia. The names of Gilgenburg, Neidenburg and Insterburg appeared in the communiqué. Fritzsche admitted that although indications of new defence lines had appeared sooner than they had during the fighting in the East and West last summer, the present breakthrough was taking place much nearer to "the very centre of our living space." For the European Press, Hallensleben spoke of the attempts of German battle groups left behind in the Vistula bend to delay the main Soviet forces, and of the movements of "those German armies which have been by-passed by the Soviet attacking wedges," and said that they were reaching "rallying zones west of their starting area," and would soon influence the battle considerably. The O.K.W. also spoke of the German troops in the "depth of the battlefield," as being everywhere engaged in heavy fighting with the enemy infantry which was following up.

Street fighting in Gumbinnen and Tilsit was reported in the communiqué of the 21st. Other comment spoke of a slowing down of the Red army's thrusts, "on the whole," and was vaguely hopeful of German counter-measures to come. In a talk to German forces in the Netherlands, a Political Guidance Officer said that "space is no longer an ally of Germany." The battle in the East "must be brought to a finish where we stand." A D.N.B. editorial of the 22nd is much more gloomy: "If the decision were to run against us, not only the life of the individual but the existence of the German nation would be ended."

The fighting in the West was overshadowed by the attention paid to the Eastern Front. On the 15th January Sündermann said to foreign journalists, however, that the Soviet winter offensive was only possible because the Western Front was pinning down part of the German forces. The more usual view was expressed by Kriegk on the 16th, when he said that the German offensive in the West had "more or less given the cover for our back that we need in our present effort to ward off the new Soviet mass assault with the entire fighting strength of our Eastern divisions." On the 21st, a D.N.B. broadcast said that although it was not comparable with the great battles in the East, the fighting in the West was no less important, because the Allies were endeavouring to regain the initiative.

The measures taken by the Reich civil authorities to meet the crisis seem to be in the nature of desperate remedies, applied perforce, and with little regard to national morale. Express train services have been cut throughout the Reich, with the exception of services between East Prussia and Pomerania. Railway traffic into the Reich, said Königsberg radio, will continue as usual. Consumers' fuel supplies have been cut—coal and coke by 30 per cent., as compared with 1941–42, gas entirely where it is not the only means of cooking, electric fires are forbidden. Private letters, except for local delivery, must be replaced by post-cards. Yet the Nazis urge their people to keep calm. Hitler is reported to be in direct command of the threatened front. Desperate resistance is said to be in store for the enemy at every stage. Poznan, said State Secretary Naumann, will prove a hard nut for the enemy to crack, but its defenders were not likely to witness final victory.

With the Russian occupation of the towns of Kielce and Radom (the 15th and 16th January), of Warsaw and Czestochowa (the 17th) and, finally, of Cracow on the 19th, the General Government has ceased to exist. The political importance of Cracow (which in 1943 had a population of 3½ million, of whom 25,000 were Germans) had diminished since November, when the seat of Governor-General Frank's Administration was moved to Czestochowa (see Summary No. 269). Its military value, on the other hand, was emphasised by a Wilhelmstrasse military spokesman as recently as the 18th January, when he described it as "the corner-stone of our prepared position in the south," and outlined "the contours of a provisional German rallying position near the frontier of the Government General . . . . roughly marked by the towns of Cracow, Czestochowa, Lodz and Ciechanow." (Ciechanow had already fallen on the 17th January, and Lodz was to follow suit on the 19th.)

Further signs that Himmler is consolidating his authority at points of danger may be added to those given in a recent issue of this Summary (No. 275). The Infantry General, Glaise-Horstenau, recently commanding German forces in Croatia, has been replaced as "Plenipotentiary" by S.S.-Obergruppenführer Pruetzmann. The General Inspector for Prisoners of War, Infantry General Röttig, has been replaced by S.S.-Obergruppenführer Berger, who late in 1944 was commanding German troops in Slovakia and has been concerned with the protection of rail traffic. An order quoted in a West German paper of mid-December reveals that the Wehrmacht Commander in Saarbrücken is the Police President of the town, and thus not even a member of the Waffen-S.S. A prisoner's statement of about the same date was to the effect that German forces in the Upper Rhine region were under S.S. command. The Volkssturm formations fighting in Upper Silesia are reported to be commanded by S.S.-General Jeckeln, formerly Police Leader of the Ostland.

In view of articles in the German press complaining of the ruthlessness and indiscriminate nature of Allied bombing of German population centres, a passage in a captured circular issued by the Director of the Party Chancellery in June 1944 is worth quotation. Discussing the issue of emergency rations Bormann writes that "heavy daylight attacks are frequently directed against centres of industry, in particular armament factories, and residential areas do not suffer any great damage from these." Another order issued by Bormann (in November last) states that the "transport crisis" caused by Allied air attack on traffic lines "may develop into a threat to the basis of our existence, similar to the threat once created by our U-boat war for the English people and the leaders of its war effort."

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The rapid success of the new Russian offensive has had important effects in Czechoslovakia. The drive beyond Cracow left the Germans in eastern Slovakia in an uncomfortable salient and General Petrov's forces in Slovakia made a swift advance and occupied, not without stiff fighting, the three important towns of Košice, Prešov and Bardejov. Czechoslovak troops, who entered Slovakia from the north, are participating in the clearing of Slovak territory and further progress has been made to the west of Prešov.

The Bratislava Government continues its endeavours to arrest the march of events by exhortation to the Slovaks and denunciation of the Allies. Full value is still being extracted from the Soviet Union's alleged designs on Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia and the consequent inglorious collapse of President Beneš's ambitions.

On the 18th January there was a shuffle of functions in the autonomous Government of the Protectorate, Dr. Krejčí relinquishing the Premiership in favour of Bienert. Each retains his former post, Bienert as Minister of the Interior and Krejčí as Minister of Justice. Krejčí also becomes Deputy Premier. The reason given for the change is Krejčí's desire to devote himself more fully to his task as Minister of Justice. The move does not seem to be particularly significant, neither of the Ministers concerned having been regarded in the past as an out-and-out quisling. Both, on this occasion, made the customary profession of loyalty to Germany. The date was the third anniversary of the Government, and K. H. Frank summoned all its members to his presence to thank them for their past efforts and stress their future responsibilities.

The liberation of Košice, a sizeable town with a population of over 70,000, brings to the forefront the question of the establishment of the Czechoslovak Government on its own soil. Košice is the first town to be freed where a Government might reasonably be expected to function; Dr. Beneš is fully alive to the dangers that would be entailed if liberated Slovakia were to be administered for any length of time by a Slovak National Council remote from and only tenuously linked with a central Government in London; it is known, too, that the Soviet Government is anxious that the Czechoslovak Government should be transferred to Slovakia as soon as possible. On the other hand, such a move would necessitate the reconstruction of the Government to include members of the home front without any possibility of including representatives from Bohemia-Moravia; communications with the rest of the world would be unsatisfactory; and the mere transportation of the Government with all its appurtenances to a temporary seat at Košice presents considerable difficulty. Despite the objections mentioned, it is probable that Dr. Beneš will decide on the move in the fairly near future.

POLAND.

The very rapid advance of the Red army has already freed the whole of the "General Government," half the Incorporated Territory, and some further areas in Silesia and East Prussia whose indigenous population is of Polish origin. In Kielce, Radom and Warsaw the Lublin Committee's administration has already established itself. In the first two of these cities and Lodz there was virtually no interruption of economic life. In Warsaw the retiring Germans had time to blow up such buildings in the central areas as they had not previously destroyed; but the Mayor appointed by Lublin, who had already been functioning in the eastern suburb of Praga, promptly began to organise the enrolment of an army of workers for clearing and for beginning reconstruction. A pontoon bridge already crosses the Vistula. The troops who relieved the city were selected from General Zymierski's Polish army, now said to be 300,000 strong. Crowds came in from outlying districts to welcome them. A meeting followed at which Messrs. Bierut and Morawski expressed the gratitude of the people for the capital's deliverance by the Red army and the Polish army fighting beside it. It was the Polish army, said Morawski, that actually captured Warsaw, when it was already surrounded by the Red army. At the same time the National Homeland Council addressed a manifesto to the liberated territories of Poland claiming that the Polish army will soon recover the "age-old Polish territories taken by the Germans"; that the Lublin Committee has re-established a Polish Government in Poland, and that the inhabitants of the newly liberated provinces should rally round it and support its local organs in the work of political, economic and educational reconstruction.

On the 23rd January the Polish Ambassador in London presented a memorandum on Polish-Soviet problems, in anticipation of the forthcoming meeting between the Great Allied Powers. On the 19th January M. Arciszewski, in a broadcast to Poland, had declared that if the principle of Polish independence were established, every Polish-Soviet problem could easily be solved. "We hold out a hand to Russia," he said, "and we do not believe that it will be rejected."

It is reported that arrangements have now been made by U.N.R.R.A. for the transport of relief supplies for Poland via Black Sea ports.

The liberation of Warsaw has been hailed with great enthusiasm in the Soviet press, which regards it as strengthening the friendship between the Soviet and Polish peoples. "Nobody will ever succeed in tearing asunder the fraternal ties which have been welded in these days by the blood which the Russian and Polish peoples have bled in common."

Marshal Stalin, replying to a message of gratitude from the officials of the Lublin Committee expressed his conviction that the continued efforts of the Red Army and the United Polish Army would bring about "the early and complete liberation of the fraternal Polish people from the yoke of the German-Fascist invaders" and concluded: "Long live a free and independent Poland."

Attacks in Moscow against the Polish Government in London have if anything increased—Professor Yerusalimsky in a commentary broadcast from Moscow on the 18th January asserted that the Germans had hoped to create "a sort of political bastion" in Poland with the aid of the émigré clique of Rackiewicz, Arciszewski and Kwapinski. They hoped that the agents of this clique in the "Home Army" operating in close collaboration with the Gestapo would be able to cause confusion and even civil war in the country. These calculations were, however, unfounded, as the Polish people had "rallied with unexampled enthusiasm round its provisional Government."

On the 19th January Pravda answered Mr. Eden's expressions of regret that Soviet War News should have stigmatised the Polish Government in London as Hitler's lackeys. Pravda replied by repeating the charge that that Government had been stabbing in the back the Soviet troops heroically fighting for Poland's liberation; and alleged that its agents had actually been killing Soviet officers and Red Army men. On the 20th January Izvestia published a letter to its editor from a group of Deputies to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. attacking Commander Bower's speech of the 10th January on Poland.

In answer to Commander Bower's charges concerning the Soviet attitude during the Warsaw rising, the letter reaffirmed the Soviet thesis that Moscow radio had never urged the Warsaw population to rise and that the rising had taken place without the knowledge of the Red army or its Command. Bower was castigated for his concern for Polish independence when he himself was "an ardent champion of the preservation of fetters for the people of India." His "insulting abuse of the Soviet and Polish peoples" would have sounded natural coming from "the lips of a German-fascist politician, our enemy," but was strange from the representative of the "British people which is friendly to us." "One should not wonder that there are such shady characters as Bower and the like among Conservatives; one should only wonder at the fact that gentlemen Parliamentarians tolerate the speeches of these dishonest characters" without giving them any rebuff.

The letter also attacked Captain Graham for his December speech asserting that the U.S.S.R. must not treat the Poles as if they were an insignificant Asiatic tribe such as the Uzbeks or Tadjiks, making once again the ready point about the Captain's own attitude to the Indians and the well-known facts of the Soviet treatment of their own Asiatic races.

Lord Alfred Douglas's "death-bed testament" begging Mr. Churchill not to surrender Poland to "bloodthirsty apes" also did not escape the attention of the Supreme Soviet Deputies. They admitted that the babblings of one old dotard or one British M.P. who had gone wild were not really significant, but what was surprising in their view was the fact that their fellow-parliamentarians did not realise how these outbreaks reflected on "the prestige and honour of that high institution."

The group of Academicians signing the letter included members of the Uzbek and Tadjik Academies of Sciences.

The recent visits of British, French and American correspondents to Lublin have thrown some more light on conditions in liberated Poland. It appears from their accounts that the Lublin Committee have gained support, notably by the distributon of land, by the lowering of prices, and above all by the presence, impressive equipment, and numerical strength of the Polish army under General Zymierski. The Lublin Administration is recognised as needing both a wider political basis, and a larger number of experienced officials. In moderate political circles it appears that there is a strong desire for the appointment of British and American observers; while among the peasants there is still a wish that M. Mikolajczyk should return to lead the Peasant Party, for which no adequate leadership had yet arisen in the three liberated provinces.

SOVIET UNION.

The Red army's offensive now extends from East Prussia to the Carpathians, and has continued unabated throughout the week. Between the 16th and the 22nd January the guns of Moscow thundered no less than twenty-three times in honour of Soviet victories. General Cherniakhovsky, commanding the Third Byelorussian Front, has broken into East Prussia from the north and east, capturing Tilsit on the 20th January and Insterburg on the 21st January. Königsberg is now directly threatened from the east and, less immediately, also from the south. Here troops of the Second Byelorussian Front, under Marshal Rokossovsky, after breaking through north-west of Warsaw, have swung northwards on to German territory, capturing Tannenberg (21st January), Deutsche Eylau and Allenstein (22nd January). The advance on East Prussia from south and east is similar in conception to the campaign of 1914 which led up to the disastrous Russian defeat at Tannenberg: but the issue is likely to be different this time, thanks mainly to the much more efficient Russian supply system and greater co-ordination by the Supreme Command. Marshal Zhukov, commanding the First Byelorussian Front, liberated Warsaw on the 17th January, Lodz on the 19th January, and on the 22nd January was reported within 30 miles of Poznan; over 150 miles west of Warsaw. Marshal Koniev, commanding the First Ukrainian Front, captured Czestochowa on the 17th January, Cracow two days later, and has entered Reich territory: Kreuzburg was occupied on the 21st January. Further south General Petrov, commanding the Fourth Ukrainian Front, took Novy Sacz on the 20th January and advanced westwards in Slovakia to take Presov and Kosice on the same day. In the region south and south-west of Cracow the Soviet advance has been slowest, and it is clear that the Germans are fighting desperately to retain control of the industrial areas of Polish and German Silesia. This may give the Russians an opportunity to burst through along the route which leads via Poznan to Frankfurt and Berlin. The battle for Budapest continues, little progress being reported in the Soviet communiqués. A German claim to have recaptured Székesfehérvár on the 22nd January has not been confirmed from the Soviet side, but a heavy German commitment here might be positively welcome to the Red army command.

The British Parliamentary delegation now visiting the U.S.S.R. (see last week's Summary) attended a reception given in their honour in Moscow by the Chairman of the Soviet of the Union, M. Andreyev, and the Chairman of the Soviet of Nationalities, M. Shvernik, at which many Deputies of both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. were present, as well as important officials from the Commissariats of Foreign Affairs, Defence and the Navy, and the heads of the Allied diplomatic and military missions in Moscow. The members of the delegation were also entertained to lunch by the same bodies and on this occasion, in addition to members of both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet, MM. Molotov, Mikoyan, Vyshinsky and Maisky were present. The Soviet Home Service broadcast an interview given to the press by members of the delegation after their first sight-seeing expeditions in Moscow, which included visits to the Kremlin, the Moscow State University and the Lenin Library. All the comments quoted were most appreciative and Commander Stephen King-Hall remarked that "British public opinion is ten years behind the time in its ideas of the U.S.S.R."

The visit of the Soviet Trade Union delegation to France appears to be passing off in an atmosphere of great cordiality. The delegates, who arrived in Paris towards the end of December, under the leadership of M. Soloviev, secretary of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, were given a big reception at the French Ministry of Labour at which several Cabinet Ministers were present, including the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and also M. Thorez, secretary of the Communist Party of France. General de Gaulle himself received the delegates on the eve of their departure from France on the 19th January. In the course of a tour of the provinces lasting from the 8th to the 15th January, the delegates, dividing into two parties, visited Bordeaux, Toulouse, Lille, Marseilles and Lyons. In the numerous speeches great confidence was expressed in the Franco-Soviet Treaty and in the future relations between the working classes of France and the U.S.S.R., and M. Soloviev anticipated the establishment of closer ties between the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions and the Confédération Générale du Travail. In the furtherance of this aim a delegation of French Trade Unionists headed by Benoit Frachon, secretary of the C.G.T., was sent to Moscow, arriving there on the 16th January. On the following morning it was announced that a Franco-Soviet Trade Union Committee had been formed on the initiative, according to Moscow radio, of the C.G.T. Kuznetsov, Chairman of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, was to be leader of the Soviet delegation to the new Committee. The French delegates in Moscow were given a big reception on the 20th January by M. Molotov. It has not yet been stated whether they will visit other centres in the U.S.S.R.

Tass issued on the 16th January a denial of the Associated Press report that the Soviet Union at the request of France had asked that General de Gaulle might be invited to take part in the forthcoming meeting of Marshal Stalin, President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill. The report had further stated that, in return for this invitation, General de Gaulle had agreed at the Moscow Conference to support the Soviet Union's view-point on territorial problems in Eastern Europe, while the U.S.S.R. in its turn agreed to support France's claim to the Rhineland. Tass asserted that the whole report in no way corresponded to the facts.

A summing up of Finland's execution of the Armistice Agreement over a period of four months was published by Tass on the 18th and 21st January in a form parallel to the report on Roumania's fulfilment of her similar obligations put out a month earlier (see Summary No. 274 under "Roumania"). It was stated that Finland had satisfactorily fulfilled her undertakings under article 4 of the Agreement by placing her armed forces on a peace footing within the prescribed period, and also under article 5 by breaking off relations with Hungary, Croatia and Slovakia. Article 8 concerning the lease of Porkala Udd was also working smoothly, and the repatriation of Soviet citizens from Finland under article 10 was nearing completion; 56,033 Soviet citizens had been registered, and by the 14th January 55,725 had returned to the U.S.S.R. Under article 11 concerning reparations forty-four ships and 1,266 truck-loads of goods, mainly timber and by-products and copper wire, had been despatched by Finland. Thirty-four war criminals had been arrested under article 13. The return of looted Soviet property (article 14) was going on satisfactorily, 3,175 truck-loads of looted goods having been returned by the 8th January. The release of persons imprisoned because of their activities in favour of the United Nations (article 20), hampered by the former Minister of Justice, von Born, had been carried through by his successor, 2,338 persons having been released by the 10th January.

Criticism was directed to the failure of Finland to intern all German and Hungarian nationals in accordance with article 2. Under article 7, concerning the handing over of the Finnish Merchant Navy to the Allies, the Finnish authorities were not blamed, but Sweden came in for severe rebuke for allowing Finnish ships to escape control and detaining them in Swedish ports as Swedish property. The Swedish authorities, according to Tass, had found no reason for detaining these ships when they were carrying German freight for Hitler. Thus "the Swedish hypocrites who proclaim everywhere their friendship for the Finns are rendering them a false service." (For Swedish denials of these allegations see under Scandinavia.)

The main count in the indictment was Finland's failure to disband pro-Hitlerite organisations of Fascist type (article 21), in particular the organisation "Brotherhood in Arms," stigmatised by Tass as definitely Fascist (for an account of this association see under Scandinavia). Members of an organisation of German citizens known as "The German Colony," which was stated to have dissolved itself to escape detection, were still at large. As in the case of Roumania Tass launched accusations that members of these Fascist societies were actually occupying leading positions in the Government. "There are many indications that the reactionary forces of Finland are making efforts to support, in one form or another, the activities of Fascist elements in the country, and thus to hamper Finland's conscientious execution of the Armistice Agreement."

The conclusion of an Agreement between the Governments of the Soviet Union and Roumania on deliveries of goods by the latter country to indemnify the U.S.S.R. for war damage in accordance with article 11 of the Armistice was signed in Bucharest on the 16th January. The Agreement provided that the 300 million dollars of reparations to be paid over six years should be subdivided as follows: oil products 150 million dollars, grain, cattle and timber 54 million, sea and river ships and machinery and railway equipment 96 million. The value was to be fixed at 1938 world prices in dollars with 15 per cent. increase for machinery, railway equipment and ships and 10 per cent. for all other goods. The new Agreement is parallel to that concluded with Finland on the 20th December, with the exception that the Roumanian Agreement contains no provision that the deliveries should be made in equal amounts annually.

In the report of Roumanian progress in fulfilling the armistice conditions issued by Tass on the 29th December the Roumanian Government was accused in particular of failing to carry out article 8 concerning the disposal of the property of German or Hungarian nationals. On the 18th January Tass reported that German materials left on Roumanian territory were now being properly transferred, 42 barges, a considerable quantity of military supplies and 1,000 tons of grain and provisions having been handed over to the Allied Control Commission. The same report gave further details of progress under the other heads of the armistice, giving figures greatly increased since the December summing up for oil deliveries and for the quantities of Soviet property returned.

No comment from Pravda or Izvestiya has so far been available on the Yugoslav Government crisis, but Krasnaya Zvyezda of the 17th January described King Peter's communiqué of the 11th January, criticising two points in the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement, as the work of the "black reaction." The article linked the activities of the "Fascists in Yugoslavia" with those of other countries, concerning which the Bagrianov trial in Sofia had made interesting revelations. The reactions of the Yugoslav people, however, showed that King Peter was building on sand; they were determined to defend the new democratic forms of government now being created.

For the terms of the armistice with Hungary see under "Hungary."

The twenty-first anniversary of Lenin's death was celebrated by a memorial meeting in the big hall of the Kremlin, attended by Marshal Stalin, high-ranking officials of the Communist Party, of the Supreme Soviet, and many representative Government officials. The main feature was a long speech by M. Alexandrov, Chief of the Propaganda Department of the Communist Party, emphasising the superiority of the Soviet multi-national State and collective farm system as founded by Lenin, developed by Stalin and proven by its victory over fascism. According to M. Alexandrov, the Communist Party now contains 5,700,000 members.

are fighting desperately to retain control of the industrial areas of Polish and German Silesia. This may give the Russians an opportunity to burst through along the route which leads via Poznan to Frankfurt and Berlin. The battle for Budapest continues, little progress being reported in the Soviet communiqués. A German claim to have recaptured Székesfehérvár on the 22nd January has not been confirmed from the Soviet side, but a heavy German commitment here might be positively welcome to the Red army command .

The British Parliamentary delegation now visiting the U.S.S.R. (see last week's Summary) attended a reception given in their honour in Moscow by the Chairman of the Soviet of the Union, M. Andreyev, and the Chairman of the Soviet of Nationalities, M. Shvernik, at which many Deputies of both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. were present, as well as important officials from the Commissariats of Foreign Affairs, Defence and the Navy, and the heads of the Allied diplomatic and military missions in Moscow. The members of the delegation were also entertained to lunch by the same bodies and on this occasion, in addition to members of both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet, MM. Molotov, Mikoyan, Vyshinsky and Maisky were present. The Soviet Home Service broadcast an interview given to the press by members of the delegation after their first sight-seeing expeditions in Moscow, which included visits to the Kremlin, the Moscow State University and the Lenin Library. All the comments quoted were most appreciative and Commander Stephen King-Hall remarked that "British public opinion is ten years behind the time in its ideas of the U.S.S.R."

The visit of the Soviet Trade Union delegation to France appears to be passing off in an atmosphere of great cordiality. The delegates, who arrived in Paris towards the end of December, under the leadership of M. Soloviev, secretary of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, were given a big reception at the French Ministry of Labour at which several Cabinet Ministers were present, including the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and also M. Thorez, secretary of the Communist Party of France. General de Gaulle himself received the delegates on the eve of their departure from France on the 19th January. In the course of a tour of the provinces lasting from the 8th to the 15th January, the delegates, dividing into two parties, visited Bordeaux, Toulouse, Lille, Marseilles and Lyons. In the numerous speeches great confidence was expressed in the Franco-Soviet Treaty and in the future relations between the working classes of France and the U.S.S.R., and M. Soloviev anticipated the establishment of closer ties between the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions and the Confédération Générale du Travail. In the furtherance of this aim a delegation of French Trade Unionists headed by Benoit Frachon, secretary of the C.G.T., was sent to Moscow, arriving there on the 16th January. On the following morning it was announced that a Franco-Soviet Trade Union Committee had been formed on the initiative, according to Moscow radio, of the C.G.T. Kuznetsov, Chairman of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, was to be leader of the Soviet delegation to the new Committee. The French delegates in Moscow were given a big reception on the 20th January by M. Molotov. It has not yet been stated whether they will visit other centres in the U.S.S.R.

Tass issued on the 16th January a denial of the Associated Press report that the Soviet Union at the request of France had asked that General de Gaulle might be invited to take part in the forthcoming meeting of Marshal Stalin, President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill. The report had further stated that, in return for this invitation, General de Gaulle had agreed at the Moscow Conference to support the Soviet Union's view-point on territorial problems in Eastern Europe, while the U.S.S.R. in its turn agreed to support France's claim to the Rhineland. Tass asserted that the whole report in no way corresponded to the facts.

A summing up of Finland's execution of the Armistice Agreement over a period of four months was published by Tass on the 18th and 21st January in a form parallel to the report on Roumania's fulfilment of her similar obligations put out a month earlier (see Summary No. 274 under "Roumania"). It was stated that Finland had satisfactorily fulfilled her undertakings under article 4 of the Agreement by placing her armed forces on a peace footing within the prescribed period, and also under article 5 by breaking off relations with Hungary, Croatia and Slovakia. Article 8 concerning the lease of Porkala Udd was also working smoothly, and the repatriation of Soviet citizens from Finland under article 10 was nearing completion; 56,033 Soviet citizens had been registered, and by the 14th January 55,725 had returned to the U.S.S.R. Under article 11 concerning reparations forty-four ships and 1,266 truck-loads of goods, mainly timber and by-products and copper wire, had been despatched by Finland. Thirty-four war criminals had been arrested under article 13. The return of looted Soviet property (article 14) was going on satisfactorily, 3,175 truck-loads of looted goods having been returned by the 8th January. The release of persons imprisoned because of their activities in favour of the United Nations (article 20), hampered by the former Minister of Justice, von Born, had been carried through by his successor, 2,338 persons having been released by the 10th January.

Criticism was directed to the failure of Finland to intern all German and Hungarian nationals in accordance with article 2. Under article 7, concerning the handing over of the Finnish Merchant Navy to the Allies, the Finnish authorities were not blamed, but Sweden came in for severe rebuke for allowing Finnish ships to escape control and detaining them in Swedish ports as Swedish property. The Swedish authorities, according to Tass, had found no reason for detaining these ships when they were carrying German freight for Hitler. Thus "the Swedish hypocrites who proclaim everywhere their friendship for the Finns are rendering them a false service." (For Swedish denials of these allegations see under Scandinavia.)

The main count in the indictment was Finland's failure to disband pro-Hitlerite organisations of Fascist type (article 21), in particular the organisation "Brotherhood in Arms," stigmatised by Tass as definitely Fascist (for an account of this association see under Scandinavia). Members of an organisation of German citizens known as "The German Colony," which was stated to have dissolved itself to escape detection, were still at large. As in the case of Roumania Tass launched accusations that members of these Fascist societies were actually occupying leading positions in the Government. "There are many indications that the reactionary forces of Finland are making efforts to support, in one form or another, the activities of Fascist elements in the country, and thus to hamper Finland's conscientious execution of the Armistice Agreement."

The conclusion of an Agreement between the Governments of the Soviet Union and Roumania on deliveries of goods by the latter country to indemnify the U.S.S.R. for war damage in accordance with article 11 of the Armistice was signed in Bucharest on the 16th January. The Agreement provided that the 300 million dollars of reparations to be paid over six years should be subdivided as follows: oil products 150 million dollars, grain, cattle and timber 54 million, sea and river ships and machinery and railway equipment 96 million. The value was to be fixed at 1938 world prices in dollars with 15 per cent. increase for machinery, railway equipment and ships and 10 per cent. for all other goods. The new Agreement is parallel to that concluded with Finland on the 20th December, with the exception that the Roumanian Agreement contains no provision that the deliveries should be made in equal amounts annually.

In the report of Roumanian progress in fulfilling the armistice conditions issued by Tass on the 29th December the Roumanian Government was accused in particular of failing to carry out article 8 concerning the disposal of the property of German or Hungarian nationals. On the 18th January Tass reported that German materials left on Roumanian territory were now being properly transferred, 42 barges, a considerable quantity of military supplies and 1,000 tons of grain and provisions having been handed over to the Allied Control Commission. The same report gave further details of progress under the other heads of the armistice, giving figures greatly increased since the December summing up for oil deliveries and for the quantities of Soviet property returned.

No comment from Pravda or Izvestiya has so far been available on the Yugoslav Government crisis, but Krasnaya Zvyezda of the 17th January described King Peter's communiqué of the 11th January, criticising two points in the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement, as the work of the "black reaction." The article linked the activities of the "Fascists in Yugoslavia" with those of other countries, concerning which the Bagrianov trial in Sofia had made interesting revelations. The reactions of the Yugoslav people, however, showed that King Peter was building on sand; they were determined to defend the new democratic forms of government now being created.

For the terms of the armistice with Hungary see under "Hungary."

SCANDINAVIA.

On the 14th January a meeting of the Finnish-Soviet Society (S.N.S.) passed a resolution in which it contended that the execution of the Armistice terms still left much to be desired. In particular, it demanded the immediate dissolution of the Association of Brothers in Arms, which it accused of political activities prejudicial to good relations with the Soviet Union. This Association is, in theory at any rate, a sort of Finnish counterpart to the British Legion, under the honorary Presidency of Marshal Mannerheim, and is mainly concerned in charitable work. It is said to have distributed no less than 165 million Fm. for the relief of war victims. It differs from the suppressed Skyddskår, in favour of which somewhat similar pleas of beneficial social activities were urged, in being organised on purely civilian lines. It is of course possible that, as an association drawn from army circles, it has predominantly anti-Russian sympathies. It has, however, been defended against the present charge even by the Labour and Social Democrat papers Arbetarbladet and Suomen Sosialidemokraatti, who contend that the organisation, which has done good work in its proper field, should not be condemned unheard and that its peremptory dissolution would create a bad impression. The admission is made, however, by these organs, that some of the leading members did on an earlier occasion try to use the Association for political ends, such as impeding the peace effort. The correspondent of the Swedish paper Aftonbladet reported on the 17th January that the authorities had in fact carried out an investigation, but had found nothing to justify the charge preferred by S.N.S. On the same day, the organisation itself issued a defence, in which it claimed that it was an association of democratic citizens, with equal rights irrespective of military rank or social standing, and with the purely charitable object of assisting war victims. It was not possible for it to work for political aims, since its membership, including the governing body, was drawn from all parties and both language groups. The demand for its dissolution is stated by Aftonbladet's correspondent to have aroused widespread resentment, and is attributed exclusively to the Communists and the Six-Man group. At least two local branches of the S.N.S. have protested against the resolution of the central body, asserting that it did not conform to the society's programme or further good relations between Finland and Russia. (For Soviet allegations of defective fulfilment of armistice terms, in which the Brothers in Arms are summarily described as a "Fascist organisation," see under Soviet Union.) The Russian accusation against Sweden, of holding Finnish merchant ships in Swedish ports and declaring them Swedish property, was categorically denied on the 20th January by the Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

On the 18th January it was announced that the Finnish Government had dissolved a further ninety associations under the terms of the Armistice. The dismissal of Vakio, the managing director of the Finnish broadcasting system, is also attributed to political reasons.

The Tannerite majority in the Social Democrat group have, in view of the forthcoming elections, issued an appeal in which the Opposition is strongly criticised for incessant attempts to cause disunity.

The alleged violation of Swedish territory by German V-bombs (see last week's Summary) has been prominently discussed in the Swedish press, and Aftonbladet states that the existence of the experimental station on Bornholm is established, together with the abuse of Swedish territory, and that diplomatic representations will probably be made when sufficient evidence is accumulated. Dagens Nyheter issued a warning against the publication of information as to places where these bombs have been observed, which it states to be precisely what the Germans desire.

Norwegian forces in east Finnmark are now reported to have advanced as far as the southern extremity of the Porsanger Fjord, where they have come in contact with enemy detachments. An area of 21,500 square kilom. in Finnmark has thus been liberated, including the important Banak airfield at the head of the Porsanger Fjord.

Organised sabotage in Norway continues to achieve considerable successes, to which is now attributed the sinking of the German transport Donau and the damaging of another in Oslo Fjord on the 16th January. The Germans in Oslo are now said to be suffering from extreme nervousness, which makes them unduly ready to fire on anyone passing in the streets after dark. This practice has recently led to a number of casualties among completely innocent persons. It is calculated, however, to render illicit communications more difficult, and these difficulties have been increased by systematic and repeated raids by the German military police.

Besides the now normal routine of sabotage and elimination of informers in Denmark, a more original, if less violent, coup was reported on the 19th January, when the Siemens factory was entered by armed men, who demanded and removed all plans and working instructions.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Belgian Government is preparing legislation concerning the press. The law of libel in Belgium is much weaker than in Britain, and the Drapeau Rouge has recently provoked much indignation by a scurrilous attack on the Minister of Justice. But apprehension that a general censorship might be introduced has provoked widespread alarm; such a censorship is, indeed, forbidden by the Belgian Constitution, and the Belgians are very attached to the freedom of the press. M. de Visscher, however, a Minister without Portfolio, endeavoured to reassure his compatriots by declaring in an interview that there was no intention of introducing a censorship and M. de Schrijver, the Deputy Prime Minister, was quoted by Brussels Radio as having made a statement to the same effect. But it should be noted that he drew attention to the fact that the Government have power to ban or suspend papers in wartime.

M. de Vleeschauwer, the Belgian Colonial Minister, has made a statement on the Congo since May 1940 to a joint meeting of the Colonial Committees of the Senate and Chamber. In the course of this he informed the meeting that Mr. Churchill had given him the most formal assurances as to the safeguarding of the Congo in a conversation that took place in July 1940. A written assurance that it would do its utmost to protect Belgium and her African possessions had subsequently been given by the British Government. M. de Vleeschauwer added that there was now talk in some circles of certain forms of internationalisation of Colonies. The only proposal, however, that seemed to be practicable was one for the establishment of regional consultative commissions. Belgium was in favour of this form of international collaboration.

A correspondent of the London Vrij Nederland reports that the people of the liberated Netherlands want food for their minds almost as much as food for their bodies. There is a passionate desire for information about trends of thought and conditions in the Allied countries, and English books and papers would be devoured if only they were available.

FRANCE.

"Countless homes have no fires at all. In every workshop, office, or shop, people have to work without heating. Hospitals, schools and children's nurseries receive but scanty allowances of fuel. Food rations leave no margin and setbacks and delays are at times experienced in their distribution. There is barely enough milk for babies and the sick. Gas and electricity are sparingly distributed. Further, many of our industries are not yet able to work or are working only partially. Although our agriculture enjoys relatively better conditions, it does not possess the machinery which would enable it to develop as it might. Our devastated towns and villages are clearing away their ruins, but they lack all that is needed to begin reconstruction." Such was the cheerless picture of conditions in France drawn by General de Gaulle in a broadcast on the 17th January. Further details were given in a speech by M. Lacoste broadcast on the 16th.

These two speeches were clearly designed to repair the damage done by the failure of the Government, and in particular of the Ministry of Information with its large regional organisation, to give the public an adequate explanation of the reasons which have made the material conditions of life in liberated France at least as difficult if not more difficult than they were under the German occupation. This failure and the failure to prepare the country for the sudden imposition of new and severe restrictions on heating, lighting, travel and the size of newsprint (see last Summary), led to an outburst of angry criticism in the press. The Administration was accused of incapacity, and one evening paper, Libres, published by the National Movement of Prisoners of War and Deportees, made the first direct attack on General de Gaulle which has appeared since the Liberation: "Our house is in the hands of tinkers. Their master should know that it is time to stick his nose, his big nose, into internal problems. France must be put on solid foundations. Hitherto de Gaulle has only occupied himself with the roof which was in holes and let the rain in. He has tackled what was most urgent. Now for the rest."

In their speeches General de Gaulle and M. Lacoste explained the difficulties which had made impossible an adequate provision of power, raw materials and transport. General de Gaulle defended the administrative services, which he claimed were, in spite of the bitter trials to which they had been subjected for years, now on the whole equal to their task and serving the State with ardour and discipline. Both pointed out that war, victory and the future greatness of France inevitably demanded more sacrifice and suffering. In General de Gaulle's words "Victory, power, renovation cost dear in hardships, labour and sacrifices . . . . But they are what we want and they are our reward." The General's speech was on the whole well received by the press and nearly all comment emphasised that the French nation was prepared to accept any sacrifices which it understood to be necessary. Several papers, however, repeated that the Government might have avoided the worst difficulties, and the unofficial Radical-Socialist Aurore made the acid comment that the General's reference to the fact that France was now paying for "many years of mistakes, weaknesses and bad methods" smacked too much of the language so often used by Vichy.

One of the most interesting references in General de Gaulle's speech was to the raw materials import plan for France, the execution of which, he said, had been delayed by "certain over-optimistic ideas about Germany's power of resistance, the pressing necessity of supplies for the battles of Western Europe, Russia and the Far East and the consequent crushing demands upon shipping." He was, however, happy to announce that the negotiations in Washington for the pursuance of the plan had just been concluded. Statements concerning these negotiations, which have been conducted for the French by M. Jean Monnet, were, in fact, made by the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom on the 16th and 17th January respectively. These said that the French import programme for the first six months of 1945 had been endorsed for planning purposes and that steps would be taken to make supplies available for shipment. Moreover, in spite of the difficult shipping situation, it had been possible to allocate an additional number of ships for French civilian use for the first three months of the year, and it was hoped that further ships would be available after March. As far as possible, French ships would be used to carry French supplies.

After a lengthy meeting on the 16th January the Council of Ministers approved three ordinances submitted by M. Pleven. The first imposes very severe penalties on all holders of assets abroad who fail to declare their assets by the 1st March. The second obliges Frenchmen in France to declare their holdings of gold and foreign bonds, and the third compels foreigners to disclose their assets in France, thus tightening the hold of exchange control over foreign accounts. In a broadcast speech on the 20th January M. Pleven also referred to a second series of measures adopted by the Government which provide for the conversion at par and at the rate of 3 per cent. three Government loans (Rentes Françaises), two of 4 per cent. and one of 4½ per cent. Special terms will, however, enable people who owned bonds on the 1st September, 1939, and whose income is below a certain level to continue to receive the present rate of interest so long as they retain the bonds. M. Pleven warned his hearers against the illusion that a devastated France, which still had gold reserves, could solve her financial problems by a surgical operation, "painful when it is applied but thereafter followed by the disappearance of the black market, the fall of prices and bright sky." Moreover, the most radical financial measures would yield no result if there were no improvement in stocks, communications and production.

M. Pleven's allusion to a "surgical operation" was no doubt a hit at M. Mendès-France who is reported by The Times to consider that French financial policy is "drifting along conventional lines towards the spiral of inflation, open or hidden (in the form of an increasing black market") and himself to favour a deflationist policy with the maintenance of stringent price, wages and profits controls and the introduction of measures such as those adopted in Belgium. It is believed that M. Mendès-France would also like to include the Ministry of Finance among the Ministries whose activities he co-ordinates as Minister of National Economy. Differences between the two Ministers are said to have been brought to a head by the decision to convert the rentes and M. Mendès-France is understood to have offered to resign but to have been dissuaded by General de Gaulle, who is endeavouring to effect a compromise. Meanwhile the Finance Commission of the Consultative Assembly has made a number of cuts in the 1945 estimates of the Ministry of National Economy.

In a broadcast on the 21st January M. Parodi, the Minister of Labour, announced that the Government would shortly introduce an Essential Works Order applicable to all men between 18 and 40.

Robert Brasillach, erstwhile disciple of Maurras and former editor of Je suis partout, has been sentenced to death and Guy Zuccarelli, editor of Les Nouveaux Temps, to ten years' penal servitude. Charles Spinasse, former Minister in the Blum Cabinets of 1936 and 1938, is reported to have been arrested.

(See also under "Soviet Union" and "Middle East".)

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

One more little difference of opinion between the British and United States Governments and the Spanish Government has now been satisfactorily settled by the release on the 14th January, after a "mock" arbitration, of the Italian warships which took refuge at Port Mahon and Pollensa, in the Balearic Islands, in September 1943 (see Summaries Nos. 206 and 229).

Rumours of discontent in the Portuguese army which have been flowing round Lisbon recently have hardened into something which has the appearance of a genuine crisis. There is nothing new in stories of dissatisfied officers wishing for a change of régime (one outstanding grievance is the low rates of pay), but this time the reports seem to be much more circumstantial. It appears that a group led by General Tamagnini Barbosa, known as a critic of Dr. Salazar, have been working on General Carmona to convince him that there is an overwhelming desire on the part of the army to modify Dr. Salazar's administration. The movement seems also to have a political, as distinct from a purely military, character, and to be inspired by the wish to forestall a Communist upheaval. The President, however loyal to the army which is devoted to him, is most unlikely to dismiss Dr. Salazar, upon whom the ultimate resolution of the crisis depends. The Doctor has repaired to his country home to commune with his conscience, as is his habit when there are important political decisions to be made. At the moment it is impossible to predict what will emerge from his retreat; all that one can report is that the crisis is more serious than earlier rumours indicated.

Macao, the Portuguese peninsular colony at the mouth of the Canton River, has been out of the news since August 1943, when a British river steamer, which had taken refuge there after the fall of Hong Kong, 40 miles away, was forcibly seized by Japanese troops in plain clothes (see Summary No. 204). In the meantime, life has run as normal a course as possible when account is taken of the fact that the population has been doubled by the influx of refugees from China, and that the colony, being dominated by Japanese-controlled territory, is largely dependent upon Japanese sources for its food supply. The austerities of war, too, may have slightly curtailed the pleasures of opium, fan-tan and greyhound racing, which, together with incense sticks and insecticides, are Macao's chief contributions to civilisation. Last week, however, an official announcement in Lisbon stated that on the 18th January aircraft, not fully identified, had on two occasions bombed and machine-gunned the naval aviation hangar, the telegraph station, the barracks, the power station and the oil deposits, causing a small number of casualties. The Portuguese, having lost Timor and with only a precarious hold on Macao, are extremely sensitive about the integrity of their Far Eastern possessions, and there was much natural indignation in Lisbon. On the 20th January, however, the press published a note stating that the nationality of the aircraft had been established as American, and that the United States Government had expressed their profound regret for the incident and had ordered their authorities to carry out a full investigation. This frank admission should go far to assuage the hurt to Portuguese susceptibilities.

ITALY.

The Italian press has concentrated on a single sentence without reference to the context in Mr. Churchill's speech on the 18th January, in which, as it alleges, the Prime Minister said that Great Britain had no need of Italy and which it interprets as an intention purposely to humiliate Italy. Italy, however, seems to be suffering, as is perhaps natural in the circumstances, from an inferiority complex which makes her alternate between exaggerated self-importance and unnecessary self-depreciation, although the latter frame of mind is generally short-lived. Perhaps after twenty years of Fascist dictatorship and regimentation it is too early yet to expect Italy to find her feet and build a foundation from which to make a new start.

"Italy not needed by Great Britain" is the head-line adopted by several newspapers in Rome, followed, however, by little comment, except, as might be expected, from Signor Nenni in his paper Avanti. The Socialist leader, although he is said to have been greatly impressed, during his recent visit to London, by the self-imposed discipline of the British public, is as irresponsible as ever and says that, if Italy is driven to despair, revolution or a return to Fascism may be expected. The new Italian democracy will, however, according to Signor Nenni, go its own way with or without England.

Signor Alberto Tarchiani has been appointed Italian Ambassador in Washington, and this appointment has been agreed to by the Government of the United States. Signor Tarchiani, who is 60 years old, belongs to the Action Party and was Minister of Public Works in Marshal Badoglio's last Government. He was exiled from Italy during the Fascist régime and directed anti-Fascist work in France. When France fell Signor Tarchiani went to the United States and was secretary of the Mazzini Society in New York. He is a friend of Count Sforza, with whom he worked in America, and was said to have been chosen by Count Sforza to go with him to Washington as counsellor when Count Sforza was offered that appointment.

In the North, the campaign for the defence of the lira and against the black market continues. Two further decrees governing food distribution have been issued, providing for the setting up of a Commission for the requisitioning of agricultural products in every commune, and entrusting food distribution to workers' consumer-goods co-operatives. Extensive and drastic financial decrees have also been issued, which are aimed at a further reduction of spending-power and an increased acquisition of capital for the State over a long period. These measures include a revision of landed property assessments in view of the greatly increased value of land; a wartime excess profits tax on agricultural income and leases; the compulsory payment in cash, rather than by the surrender of bonds as hitherto, of the special tax on real property introduced in 1936; and a 20 per cent. reduction in the salaries of transferred Government personnel.

The food shortage in the North appears to be very serious, and strikes have recently taken place in Milan, Turin, Genoa and Venice, which Swiss sources attribute to dissatisfaction with food and heating conditions rather than to political motives. Attacks on Fascist and German soldiers have also been reported from Milan. The authorities have taken stern repressive measures; 27 people have been tried by the Special Tribunal, and 12 of them have been sentenced to death; also the curfew hour has been put forward, and all public services and places of entertainment are to close down earlier. Swiss reports state that the Fascist authorities have handed over to the Germans the control of traffic in Milan.

The Fascist Minister for Popular Culture, Mezzasoma, has stated that since the summer of 1944 the partisan movement has been decreased by three-quarters, according to his estimates. This he attributes to the success of German and Italian counter-measures, the cessation of Anglo-American aid, disunity among the partisans themselves, the failure of the Allies to advance rapidly northwards, and the hard winter. Still further pressure has recently been put on partisans to recant by cancelling the pensions and military decorations of anyone who is associated with a partisan band. The Fascists clearly wish to give the impression that the partisan threat has been effectively dealt with. It is, of course, probably true that many partisans have "gone underground" during the hard winter; but frequent reports of sabotage continue to come in from many districts.

THE VATICAN.

On Sunday, the 14th January, the Pope granted his usual New Year's audience to the Bishops and Nobility of Rome. Speaking of the "necessary rebuilding of the material, intellectual, moral, social and international order of the world," he again stressed a conception of progress dear to Jacques Maritain: "There can be no simple return to the past. History moves ever forward towards progress or an illusion of progress." He left the clear impression that he condemned all attempts to tie the Church to Governments or Parties as binding her spiritual freedom with secular chains. "A Christian's function in politics is to keep his gaze fixed on the unchangeable principles of human action and apply these unfailing norms to the circumstances of the hour"—advice in which spiritual and worldly wisdom coincide.

The Pope received General Anders, Commander-in-chief of the Polish Forces in Italy, on the 18th January. The general presented a silver shield on behalf of the Polish Forces. The inscription concluded with these words: "in homage to the Defender of Justice, Pope Pius XII." The interview, and the space the Vatican newspaper and wireless devoted to it are significant.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Fighting in Hungary, although overshadowed by the operations in Poland, has continued bitter. The Soviet forces have now acquired the whole of Pest, but the Germans are holding out in the hills of Buda, and have met with some success further west. They have retaken Székesfehéavár, and reached the Danube east of that city. Further north, the Germans have advanced east of Komárom, but the Soviets have taken Košice (Kassa).

On the 20th January the Hungarian armistice was signed in Moscow by the delegates of the Provisional Government. In its general structure the document follows the model of previous armistices, especially the Bulgarian. Like Bulgaria, Hungary undertakes to withdraw within her 1937 frontiers, and while the Roumanian armistice contained a reference indicating the possibility that the final Roumano-Hungarian frontier would not be so favourable to Roumania as that of Trianon, no corresponding reference appeared in the Hungarian document, which contained a statement that both the Vienna Awards were null and void; and Hungary has to repeal all measures annexing or incorporating territory not only from Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, but also from Roumania. Reparation clauses, however, do not apply to Roumania. The amount fixed for Hungarian reparations is practically the same as that for Roumania (and Finland); the military contribution, rather smaller.

The following is a summary of the terms:—

1.—(a) Hungary has withdrawn from the war against the United Nations, including Czechoslovakia, and has declared war on Germany. (b) She will disarm and hand over German armed forces in her territory and intern other German nationals (unless of Jewish origin). (c) She will participate in the war against Germany with forces to be specified, amounting to not less than eight infantry divisions, with corps troops. (d) On conclusion of hostilities with Germany her armed forces will be demobilised and put on a peace footing.

2. Hungary has agreed to evacuate within the frontiers of the 31st December, 1937, all troops and officials from occupied Czechoslovak, Yugoslav and Roumanian territory and to repeal all legislative and administrative provisions relating to the annexation or incorporation of such territory.

3. Hungary allows the Allied forces freedom of movement across her territory, and place at their disposal military, air and river installations, barracks, &c., with the necessary personnel.

4. She will release Allied prisoners of war and internees and supply them with food, &c., and with means of repatriation.

5. She will release all persons detained on account of their sympathies with or activities in favour of the United Nations, or for racial or religious reasons, and will repeal all discriminatory legislation and disabilities arising therefrom.

6. She will return to the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and the other United Nations all State property removed to Hungary during the war from their territory.

7–8. She will hand over as booty all German war material in Hungary, and not permit, without authorisation, the export or expropriation of property belonging to Germany or her nationals, or to persons resident in German or German-occupied territories.

9–10. She hands over, for use during the war, all vessels belonging or having belonged to the United Nations. Hungarian merchant vessels are subject to operational control by the Allied (Soviet) High Command.

11. Hungary agrees to make payments and provide commodities, facilities and services required for the Allied (Soviet) High Command, and for the Allied Control Commission set up as described below: further, to assure in case of need the use and regulations of the work of industry, transport, &c., as instructed by the High Command or Commission.

complex which makes her alternate between exaggerated self-importance and unnecessary self-depreciation, although the latter frame of mind is generally short-lived. Perhaps after twenty years of Fascist dictatorship and regimentation it is too early yet to expect Italy to find her feet and build a foundation from which to make a new start.

"Italy not needed by Great Britain" is the head-line adopted by several newspapers in Rome, followed, however, by little comment, except, as might be expected, from Signor Nenni in his paper Avanti. The Socialist leader, although he is said to have been greatly impressed, during his recent visit to London, by the self-imposed discipline of the British public, is as irresponsible as ever and says that, if Italy is driven to despair, revolution or a return to Fascism may be expected. The new Italian democracy will, however, according to Signor Nenni, go its own way with or without England.

Signor Alberto Tarchiani has been appointed Italian Ambassador in Washington, and this appointment has been agreed to by the Government of the United States. Signor Tarchiani, who is 60 years old, belongs to the Action Party and was Minister of Public Works in Marshal Badoglio's last Government. He was exiled from Italy during the Fascist régime and directed anti-Fascist work in France. When France fell Signor Tarchiani went to the United States and was secretary of the Mazzini Society in New York. He is a friend of Count Sforza, with whom he worked in America, and was said to have been chosen by Count Sforza to go with him to Washington as counsellor when Count Sforza was offered that appointment.

In the North, the campaign for the defence of the lira and against the black market continues. Two further decrees governing food distribution have been issued, providing for the setting up of a Commission for the requisitioning of agricultural products in every commune, and entrusting food distribution to workers' consumer-goods co-operatives. Extensive and drastic financial decrees have also been issued, which are aimed at a further reduction of spending-power and an increased acquisition of capital for the State over a long period. These measures include a revision of landed property assessments in view of the greatly increased value of land; a wartime excess profits tax on agricultural income and leases; the compulsory payment in cash, rather than by the surrender of bonds as hitherto, of the special tax on real property introduced in 1936; and a 20 per cent. reduction in the salaries of transferred Government personnel.

The food shortage in the North appears to be very serious, and strikes have recently taken place in Milan, Turin, Genoa and Venice, which Swiss sources attribute to dissatisfaction with food and heating conditions rather than to political motives. Attacks on Fascist and German soldiers have also been reported from Milan. The authorities have taken stern repressive measures; 27 people have been tried by the Special Tribunal, and 12 of them have been sentenced to death; also the curfew hour has been put forward, and all public services and places of entertainment are to close down earlier. Swiss reports state that the Fascist authorities have handed over to the Germans the control of traffic in Milan.

The Fascist Minister for Popular Culture, Mezzasoma, has stated that since the summer of 1944 the partisan movement has been decreased by three-quarters, according to his estimates. This he attributes to the success of German and Italian counter-measures, the cessation of Anglo-American aid, disunity among the partisans themselves, the failure of the Allies to advance rapidly northwards, and the hard winter. Still further pressure has recently been put on partisans to recant by cancelling the pensions and military decorations of anyone who is associated with a partisan band. The Fascists clearly wish to give the impression that the partisan threat has been effectively dealt with. It is, of course, probably true that many partisans have "gone underground" during the hard winter; but frequent reports of sabotage continue to come in from many districts.

THE VATICAN.

On Sunday, the 14th January, the Pope granted his usual New Year's audience to the Bishops and Nobility of Rome. Speaking of the "necessary rebuilding of the material, intellectual, moral, social and international order of the world," he again stressed a conception of progress dear to Jacques Maritain: "There can be no simple return to the past. History moves ever forward towards progress or an illusion of progress." He left the clear impression that he condemned all attempts to tie the Church to Governments or Parties as binding her spiritual freedom with secular chains. "A Christian's function in politics is to keep his gaze fixed on the unchangeable principles of human action and apply these unfailing norms to the circumstances of the hour"—advice in which spiritual and worldly wisdom coincide.

The Pope received General Anders, Commander-in-chief of the Polish Forces in Italy, on the 18th January. The general presented a silver shield on behalf of the Polish Forces. The inscription concluded with these words: "in homage to the Defender of Justice, Pope Pius XII." The interview, and the space the Vatican newspaper and wireless devoted to it are significant.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Fighting in Hungary, although overshadowed by the operations in Poland, has continued bitter. The Soviet forces have now acquired the whole of Pest, but the Germans are holding out in the hills of Buda, and have met with some success further west. They have retaken Székesfehéavár, and reached the Danube east of that city. Further north, the Germans have advanced east of Komárom, but the Soviets have taken Košice (Kassa).

On the 20th January the Hungarian armistice was signed in Moscow by the delegates of the Provisional Government. In its general structure the document follows the model of previous armistices, especially the Bulgarian. Like Bulgaria, Hungary undertakes to withdraw within her 1937 frontiers, and while the Roumanian armistice contained a reference indicating the possibility that the final Roumano-Hungarian frontier would not be so favourable to Roumania as that of Trianon, no corresponding reference appeared in the Hungarian document, which contained a statement that both the Vienna Awards were null and void; and Hungary has to repeal all measures annexing or incorporating territory not only from Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, but also from Roumania. Reparation clauses, however, do not apply to Roumania. The amount fixed for Hungarian reparations is practically the same as that for Roumania (and Finland); the military contribution, rather smaller.

The following is a summary of the terms:—

1.—(a) Hungary has withdrawn from the war against the United Nations, including Czechoslovakia, and has declared war on Germany. (b) She will disarm and hand over German armed forces in her territory and intern other German nationals (unless of Jewish origin). (c) She will participate in the war against Germany with forces to be specified, amounting to not less than eight infantry divisions, with corps troops. (d) On conclusion of hostilities with Germany her armed forces will be demobilised and put on a peace footing.

2. Hungary has agreed to evacuate within the frontiers of the 31st December, 1937, all troops and officials from occupied Czechoslovak, Yugoslav and Roumanian territory and to repeal all legislative and administrative provisions relating to the annexation or incorporation of such territory.

3. Hungary allows the Allied forces freedom of movement across her territory, and place at their disposal military, air and river installations, barracks, &c., with the necessary personnel.

4. She will release Allied prisoners of war and internees and supply them with food, &c., and with means of repatriation.

5. She will release all persons detained on account of their sympathies with or activities in favour of the United Nations, or for racial or religious reasons, and will repeal all discriminatory legislation and disabilities arising therefrom.

6. She will return to the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and the other United Nations all State property removed to Hungary during the war from their territory.

7–8. She will hand over as booty all German war material in Hungary, and not permit, without authorisation, the export or expropriation of property belonging to Germany or her nationals, or to persons resident in German or German-occupied territories.

9–10. She hands over, for use during the war, all vessels belonging or having belonged to the United Nations. Hungarian merchant vessels are subject to operational control by the Allied (Soviet) High Command.

11. Hungary agrees to make payments and provide commodities, facilities and services required for the Allied (Soviet) High Command, and for the Allied Control Commission set up as described below: further, to assure in case of need the use and regulations of the work of industry, transport, &c., as instructed by the High Command or Commission.

12. Reparations for the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia are fixed at 300 million American dollars, payable in commodities over six years (two parts to U.S.S.R., one part to Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia). Compensation to other United Nations to be fixed later. Deliveries are calculated at 1938 prices with an increase of 15 per cent. for manufactured goods and 10 per cent. for other goods. The dollar is calculated at 35 to 1 oz. gold.

13. All legal rights and interests of the United Nations and their nationals to be restored.

14. Hungary will co-operate in the apprehension, trial and surrender of persons accused of war crimes.

15. All pro-Hitler or Fascist political, military, paramilitary or other organisations to be dissolved.

16. Press, literature, films, the post and wireless to come under Allied control.

17. Hungarian civilian administration to be restored throughout Hungary up to a line 50–100 Km. behind the front; Hungarian authorities will co-operate with the Allied (Soviet) High Command or Control Commission in securing the execution of the armistice terms.

19. "The Vienna Arbitration Award of the 2nd November, 1938 and that of the 30th August, 1940, are hereby declared null and void."

Article 18 provides for the establishment in Hungary, for the whole period of the armistice, of an Allied Control Commission, the statutes of which have also been signed. The Commission, which has its seat in Budapest, is composed of a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, a political adviser, two assistants to the Chairman, and a Chief of Staff, a staff, and the following divisions: political, administration, military, air force, river fleet, economics. The Chairman is the representative of the Soviet armed forces. Representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States are included in the Commission. Representatives of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia are accredited to it and have access to all questions concerning their respective countries. During the first period, i.e., to the conclusion of hostilities with Germany, the Chairman and Vice-Chairman calls meetings and informs the British and American representatives of policy directives before issuing them, taking note of any observations. The British and American representatives have the right to receive information, to put forward proposals, to travel, to communicate with their own countries and, through the Chairman or Vice-Chairman, with the Hungarian Government. They determine the size and composition of their own delegations.

It is expected that this careful preliminary definition of the rights and status of the representatives, other than Soviet, on the Commission, will obviate the difficulties which have arisen in connexion with the Commissions in Roumania and Bulgaria.

Roumania.

Some sort of agreement has been arrived at on the subject of leaving Roumania with sufficient facilities for transport to enable the country to carry on. As far as maritime and river transport is concerned the British authorities consider the arrangement satisfactory. Roumania keeps the passenger ship "Transylvania" which possesses a value in the eyes of Roumanians far beyond her actual value. She also keeps one cargo vessel, two tugs and a dredger, and a floating dock, on condition that she constructs two docks for Russia during the next three years. The railway transport arrangement made by Dl Gheorghiu-Dej is hailed with enthusiasm by the Roumanian Radio, as proof of Moscow's understanding and generosity. The actual concessions are a trifle vague, and the language in which they are announced is true to type. It remains to be seen what they amount to.

The Sofia wireless announces a bright idea of Dl Patrašcanu for a discussion meeting of 120 delegates nominated by the three chief parties and professional bodies to propose and discuss, in the absence of a parliament, the Government's draft Bills.

Negotiations with Great Britain and America on the subject of the deportations of the Saxon population continue. In the meantime 12,000 have already left for Russia.

Yugoslavia.

The Germans have now successfully evacuated the Sandjak. They are reported to have not more than 45,000 men south of a line Sarajevo–Vishegrad. In east Slavonia their troops covering the retreat have advanced slightly. In Slovenia they have dispersed the Partisans north of the Save and are strengthening their hold on the country east of the main railway-line to Trieste, while apparently ignoring the Partisans to the west.

After nearly four months of fruitless negotiation at Bari over the supply of relief by the Allied military authorities, General Hughes and Sadler went to Belgrade on the 18th January. They saw Tito next day and an agreement was promptly signed. It provides for the delivery of goods to Yugoslav authorities at Yugoslav ports. The distribution of the relief will be carried out by Yugoslav authorities (the one point emphasised by the New Yugoslav Telegraph Service on the 21st), "without regard to religion, race or political affiliations." To afford expert advice Allied technical officials will observe the process of distribution. Their number will, at first, not exceed 300 in all, officers and other ranks, together with U.N.R.R.A. officials and personnel. The number may be increased by agreement. The concurrence of the then Royal Yugoslav Government was signified by Dr. Vukosavljevitch, a Partisan member of that Government. A second shipment of relief goods, of 1,000 tons, is to be sent as soon as possible.

The demonstrations against the King ceased in Belgrade on the 15th January as suddenly as they began. The identical characters of the speches reported from demonstrations in other towns indicate that the agitation has been centrally directed.

There has been evidence that the Partisans have had difficulty in building up their propaganda organisation in Serbian towns remote from Belgrade. Borba (Communist) has lately protested at the continuance of some "pro-Fascists" in provincial public life and criticised the failure of a Nish newspaper to grasp the party line. Prominent Partisans have gone on tour. When communications are improved, the enforcement of adherence to the party line will doubtless be facilitated.

For the deportation of Volksdeutsch from the Banat to Russia, see under "U.S.S.R."

The efforts of Dr. Shubashitch and his colleagues of the Royal Yugoslav Government to induce King Peter to withdraw his objections to the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement (see Summary No. 276, p. 13) had failed, when Mr. Churchill spoke in the House of Commons on the 18th. The Prime Minister stated that the only principle supported by His Majesty's Government concerning the political settlement of liberated countries was the establishment of authority in accordance with the results of free elections with secrecy of the ballot and no intimidation. Great Britain had no special interest in Yugoslavia. But the escape of King Peter and his Government to England in 1941 imposed upon this country a certain duty towards the Government and peoples across the Adriatic, which could be discharged by the holding of a plebiscite. With the advance of the Soviet forces across Yugoslavia, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden had reached an understanding with Marshal Stalin at Moscow by which their two countries would pursue a joint policy in regard to Yugoslavia. Discussions by telegram were constantly taking place, and President Roosevelt was being kept informed. The British and Soviet Governments believed the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement (the first draft of which was agreed on the 16th June, 1944) the best that could be made for the immediate future of Yugoslavia, since they preserved the form of the Monarchy and provided for a free plebiscite. King Peter had stated objections to the Agreement. But a decision was required within a few days. If the consent of King Peter could not be obtained, it would be necessary to go ahead, his assent being presumed.

The Prime Minister's speech delighted Tito and his colleagues, removing their doubts about British policy. They assumed that they could now disregard King Peter, but were prepared to continue dealing with Shubashitch.

On the 22nd the Chancery of the Royal Court issued a statement on behalf of King Peter. This declared that he would approve any arrangement which ensured the free expression of the popular will on Yugoslavia's future government. As he had received no suggestions from Tito, he had proposed to Shubashitch and to Tito, on the 15th, that the royal powers should be transferred to a Cabinet with Tito as Prime Minister, provided that this Cabinet were appointed in a constitutional way. [King Peter appears to base his action on Article 116 of the Constitution, which gives the King discretionary powers, in great emergencies, subject to subsequent review of his acts by Parliament; and on Article 40, which states that, in the absence of the King abroad, his functions are to be discharged by the Cabinet. The clause concerning the appointment of the Cabinet would give the King a say in the composition of that body and enable him to demand that it should not be virtually exclusively composed of Partisans, but should include representatives of all considerable political forces.] Tito replied that he wished to deal with the King only through the Royal Government. To meet that situation the King had requested the resignation of Shubashitch, who no longer had the King's confidence, and had told him that his Cabinet was dismissed.

Thus the settlement of the provisional Yugoslav régime had again been delayed.

Greece.

Speaking in the House of Commons on the 18th January, Mr. Churchill defended the policy of His Majesty's Government in Greece, saying that there was no case in his experience where a British Government had been so maligned and its motives so traduced in its own country by important organs of the press or among its own people. He himself had never been connected with any large enterprise of policy about which he was more sure in mind and conscience of the rectitude of the Government's motives, of the clarity of its principles, and of the vigour, precision, and success of its action, than what it had done in Greece. He had, he admitted, underrated E.L.A.S. as a fighting force. For several days at the beginning of December there was a struggle to prevent a hideous massacre in the centre of Athens. After the establishment of the Regency, neither he nor the Foreign Secretary had sought to interfere in the choice of a Premier nor in the character of the new Greek Government; General Plastiras had, in fact, formed a Left-wing Government. Britain wanted nothing from Greece but her friendship, but this she must earn and deserve; she could not immediately disentangle herself from the affairs of Greece. E.L.A.S.'s hostages must be released, and the truth about E.L.A.S.'s atrocities must come out. The Greek Government had agreed to the principle of "no proscriptions," that meant that no one would be punished unless he were found guilty by a properly constituted court of conduct contrary to the rules of war or to the criminal code. But this promise was dependent upon the treatment and delivery of hostages. The name and the honour of Britain were deeply engaged in this matter.

On the 19th January Mr. Eden said that His Majesty's Government had never been opposed to E.A.M. becoming the Government of Greece, but E.A.M. had tried to seize power by force, instead of using the medium of the ballot-box. In the course of the recent fighting all the elements except the hard Communist core had flaked away from E.A.M.; the Socialists, the Agrarians, the Popular Democrats, had all announced their decisions to break away. There was no question of hostages being held either by the Greek Government or by the British, and he demanded, in the name of all parties and all Members of the House, that E.A.M. should release its hostages forthwith. General Plastiras had confirmed to His Majesty's Ambassador that it was the policy of his Government to take action only against persons guilty of crimes against the penal code or the rules of war. General Plastiras was the man who, after the collapse of Greece in 1922, had pulled the country together, arranged for a general election, and then retired. Why should Great Britain wish to deny freedom in Greece? Wherever British authority carried, the decision would be by ballot-box.

It was announced on the 20th January by the International Red Cross Delegation in Greece that the Central Committee of E.A.M./E.L.A.S. had on the 14th January instructed their civil police to release immediately all civilians arrested since the 3rd December, except those who were formerly in the Averof prison and those accused, on definite evidence, of criminal acts.

MM. Sophianopoulos, Pericles Rallis, and Macropoulos have been chosen to represent the Greek Government at a conference with representatives of E.A.M./E.L.A.S. on the 25th January.

Albania.

The economic situation is bad owing to the ravages of war and, in particular, to the shortage of wheat. According to one report, 3,000 civil servants had, at the end of the year, had no pay for three months and many were selling their clothes to live. Enver Hoxha, nevertheless, is inclined to refuse Allied offers of relief unless he himself can manage the distribution of the supplies provided. His provisional Government is full of schemes for economic reconstruction and has already announced the abolition of the agricultural tithe. It has also reconstituted the National Bank and declared war on profiteers. Traders must register, stocks must be reported, and hard work is stated to be the great solvent of economic problems. Conscription is adumbrated and the people are told that now they are in power the law, though it is at last for their benefit and not for the privileged, will be enforced. The special court for war crimes has begun its proceedings by releasing a number of arrested persons, but it is declared that the guilty will be punished and reactionaries crushed.

A French mission consisting of a major and a lieutenant arrived in Tirana on the 8th January and made a short stay.

Bulgaria.

The climax in the trial of war criminals was reached on the 13th January with the examination of Filov who was Prime Minister from 1940 to 1942 and later a Regent, of Bozhilov who was his Minister of Finance and later Prime Minister, of Gabrovski, who as Filov's Minister of the Interior, was notorious for ruthless repression, and of other ex-Ministers. Filov was received in court with curses and showed up feebly. With regard to signing the Tripartite Pact he pleaded not guilty on the ground that his aim was to avoid German occupation and he took the general line that he did the best he could for Bulgaria. Gabrovski made a more determined stand but confessed to responsibility for the law for the defence of the nation and to having handed over 7,000 Jews from Greek territory for compulsory labour. Among a lot of evidence that was then given for the prosecution there was some in favour of the foreign policy advocated by Burov and N. Moshanov who were Ministers without Portfolio in Muraviev's six-day Government preceding the Russians' arrival. A former police spy is reported to have given evidence that two American bomber pilots were murdered, that the Soviet Consulate at Varna was searched on Gabrovski's orders, that Greenewich, an employee of the British Legation, was kidnapped and handed over to the Gestapo and that the bombs which exploded at the Pera Palace Hotel at Istanbul were put among the luggage of the British Minister and his staff when they left Sofia. The proceedings have been punctuated by cries inside and outside the court of "Death to the murderers!" and will, it is stated, end on the 30th January with heavy but just sentences.

General Popović, the head of a Yugoslav Military Mission which recently arrived in Sofia, disclaims any political rôle, though he seems bent on getting what supplies he can out of Bulgaria. Marshal Tito's attitude to Bulgaria is that her entry into a Yugoslav Federation is a possibility which could only be realised when good relations had lasted long enough to enable the Serbs to get over the enmity Bulgaria has showed them in three wars. The present Bulgarian authorities on their part are busy trying to ingratiate themselves with the Yugoslavs. Bulgarian-Yugoslav friendship is constantly proclaimed a main principle of the new Bulgarian policy. In a spate of pro-Yugoslav propaganda Marshal Tito has been eulogised and cogent appeals have been made for the destitute fellow-Slavs of Yugoslavia, for Yugoslav children—of whom some hundreds have now been received in Bulgaria—and for Yugoslav Jews. In these, as in all their other activities the Bulgarian authorities must be assumed to have at least the tacit consent of the Soviet Government which through the Allied Commission exercises complete control over the country.

Monsignor Stefan, the Archbishop of Sofia, has been elected Exarch of the Bulgarian Church. Though more of a politician and a man of the world than a divine, he is something of a reformer and his anti-German sentiments have never been in much doubt.

Turkey.

In the expectation that the Straits will shortly be open once more to navigation the Turkish press, while pointing out that their closure had been due to Axis occupation of the Ægean and not to any Turkish action, expressed its gratification that this waterway should render service to Russia and her Allies by shortening their supply route. All facilities were promised and the economic benefit of a reappearanc of Allied and other foreign shipping, when the port of Istanbul has been stagnant for four years, is no doubt awaited with genuine satisfaction.

The Turkish press has allowed itself occasional bitter complaint that the British and American Governments have not acted up to their promise to support Turkish economy. Blame should fall rather on the Turks' own propensity for haggling. However, we have now agreed with them to buy raisins and nuts at prices below those they exacted when the Germans were still in the market, but higher than the general market rate. It is hoped that other support purchases may follow.

Preliminary negotiations have been going on with a view to the establishment of formal relations with the Governments of Syria and Lebanon. These two States are anxious for recognition by Turkey but they fear that Turkish insistence on most-favoured-nation treatment in respect of rights and privileges given to other Powers means not only that Turkey, as herself formerly bound by capitulations, now wants the same right of access to the Mixed Courts as is enjoyed by Western Powers, but also that she may claim the American privilege of opening schools—e.g., in north Syria. Secondly, the Syrian and Lebanese Governments are afraid that the Turks will try to inveigle them into recognising the 1939 agreement by which Turkey extorted the Hatay district of Iskenderon or Alexandretta) from France. This question Syria and Lebanon want to leave for discussion in the future when they believe they would at any rate have the support of the Soviet Government.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The trial of the two Palestinian Jews charged with the murder of Lord Moyne ended on the 18th January, when the President of the Court announced that the record of the proceedings would be referred to the Mufti of Cairo (which is equivalent to a death sentence), and on the 22nd January the court condemned both the accused to death. The sentence must be confirmed by the Egyptian Prime Minister in his capacity of Military Governor. Considerable sympathy in the public mind was created for the accused by the defending barristers, who not only emphasised the youth of the prisoners, but also affirmed that they had acted from patriotic motives, their sense of right and wrong having been perverted by the results of Jewish persecution. Their advocates also urged that, though they might be guilty of a "political" crime, they had committed it not as Zionists, but as Palestinians driven to desperate measures by the treatment which Jews and Arabs alike had received from British officials, and especially the police, serving in the Palestine Government.

As pointed out in last week's Summary, the recent general election in Egypt gave the Saadist party 125 members in the new Chamber as against 139 of all other parties. Though the Government is nominally a coalition, the Prime Minister's party (Saadists) wanted to have a clear majority over all others combined. Outwardly, it has failed in this object, but if, as is believed, some of the twenty-nine Independents will vote with the Saadists, the latter may just get a bare majority. In spite of so much talk about a "free" election, there seems to be little doubt that the Government did interfere to some extent, and that as one result of this intervention Makram Ebeid Pasha did not secure the full number of seats allotted to his party. The Government also seems to have used its influence against the candidates put forward by such parties as the "Moslem Brethren" and "Young Egypt," and also against those Independents who professed Socialist or Communist views. In the new Cabinet formed by Ahmad Maher Pasha his party have increased their number of Ministers from four to six, while the other parties have retained their numerical representation as originally arranged.

The new Parliament was opened by King Farouk on the 18th January, when the Speech from the Throne was read by the Prime Minister. The Speech vehemently criticised the actions of the late Government, referred to Egyptian interest in the Sudan and lauded the assistance that Egypt had rendered to the Allies which, it was contended, gave Egypt a claim to a hearing when peace was declared.

Interest in Arab unity has been revived in Egypt by the presence of Nuri Pasha and the Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs; and by the return of Abdul Rahman Azzam, head of the Egyptian Department of Arab Affairs, from Saudi Arabia, where he discussed Arab affairs with Ibn Saud. The "cultural sub-committee" set up by the Preparatory Committee at Alexandria has already met in Cairo, and was attended by representatives from Egypt, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Transjordan. It is believed that the various Arab countries interested will shortly send delegates to Cairo to discuss and formulate the council of the proposed Arab League.

Franco-Syrian relations do not seem to be improving. Ibn Saud recently received a communication from Fuad Hamza, his Minister at Angora, summarising a conversation Fuad had held with General Beynet, the French Délégué-Général in the Levant States. According to Fuad Hamza, General Beynet told him that the administration of both the local Governments was too corrupt to entitle either country to independence, and that, as long as those Governments remained in power, it was impossible for the French to reach an agreement with them. As for the Troupes Spéciales, the General could not agree to hand them over, since their transfer, he said, would only mean their use by the Syrian Government to expel the French from Syria. Nevertheless, if the Syrians insisted upon war, France was ready to fight.

The contents of this message have since been discussed by Mr. Shone with General Beynet, who said that his remarks had been grossly distorted by Fuad Hamza, and that some of what Fuad had reported was "pure romance." The General, however, admitted that the relations between the French and the two local Governments, especially that of Syria, were far from good, although he did not consider the situation in either State serious. General Beynet also told Mr. Shone that he was anxious to send back to France many of the French officials still serving in the Levant States, retaining only a few picked men who had not the old mentality. Mr. Shone was favourably impressed by the sincerity with which General Beynet gave his views. His anxiety to get rid of a number of French officials was particularly welcome, and if put into effect would no doubt ease the situation.

On the 13th January Jamil Mardam, the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs and Defence, made a speech in the Chamber, in which he emphasised that the Troupes Spéciales must be handed over to the Syrian Government, and that his Government would not conclude a treaty with France. This speech from one who has been regarded as the most moderate of the Nationalist leaders has caused some excitement. It may have been connected with the possibility of Jamil Mardam's succeeding the present Syrian Prime Minister, and therefore wishing to stress nationalist policy in Parliament. It is known, however, that Jamil has sent two notes to the French, one pressing them to transfer the Troupes Spéciales immediately, the other asking them to make French representation in Syria purely diplomatic. (For Turco-Syrian relations see under "Turkey.")

Meanwhile, Ibn Saud has sent a letter to the Syrian President, Shukri Quwatli, who is known to be greatly influenced by what Ibn Saud says, telling him that he should follow the advice given him by His Majesty's Government to conclude a treaty with France. Ibn Saud argues that Iraq and Egypt have progressed markedly since making their treaties with Great Britain and that although such agreements may not at first bring everything that is desired of them, they do help to define independence and to open the door for friendship. Ibn Saud therefore urges the President to be more accommodating in his attitude to the French, and ends by stating that he considers his "interference" in this matter necessary, partly to ensure the independence of Syria and Lebanon, and partly to avert the danger of disturbance in those countries It will be interesting to see what Shukri's reaction to this wise advice will be.

Ibn Saud has arranged to meet the King of Egypt on the 24th January at a small creek on the Red Sea some 20 miles north of Yenbo. King Farouk, who himself proposed the visit, is expected to travel there in his yacht. The visit may not last more than a few days, but may be important. Not only is this the first occasion on which the two Kings have met, but if Ibn Saud gives Farouk the sound advice he has given to others, and if the young King is wise enough to listen to his mentor, the effects on Egyptian policy, and indeed on that of the Arab world generally, may well be beneficial.

During a recent visit to Bagdad Lord Gort, the High Commissioner for Palestine, had the opportunity of meeting the Regent of Iraq and other leading personalities. In conversation with Lord Gort, the Iraqi Prime Minister gave his views on the Palestine question. Hamdi Pachachi thought that it was not now possible to establish in that country either an Arab or a Jewish State. He expressed markedly grave anxiety about the strength and "limitless" ambition of Zionism. He was strongly opposed to partition, since the Jews would never be content with a restricted area, but would eventually try to conquer not only Arab Palestine but also the Levant States and Iraq. He feared that a Jewish army equipped with modern weapons would soon overcome the Arabs, who could not depend, as the Jews could, upon the advantages of wealth and science.

Hamdi Pachachi thought that the only solution was for Great Britain to continue to govern Palestine for the next twenty-five or thirty years. If His Majesty's Government would agree to this and would also prohibit further Jewish immigration, he for his part would advocate for an equal period a treaty of alliance between the Arab States and Great Britain. He concluded by saying that a wave of feeling in favour of Great Britain now permeated all Arab countries, and that, as these countries desired to strengthen their ties of friendship with Britain, he hoped that no decision regarding Palestine would be taken which might upset their present good relations.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese Diet reconvened on the 21st January when leading members of the Government gave a review of the military, political and domestic situation. The Premier, General Koiso, declared that Japan was faced with the gravest situation since the outbreak of the Pacific War and that her fate hung in the balance, although at the same time he asserted that her strategic position for the defence of East Asia was exceedingly firm. He stigmatised the bombing of the shrines at Ise (see this Summary, No. 276) as an outrage which had aroused the profound indignation of the people and strengthened their fighting spirit.

Most of Koiso's speech was devoted to promises of more effective measures to co-ordinate central and local organs of administration so as to secure the more effective execution of the Cabinet's war programme and to bring the local military and civilian authorities into closer contact and harmony. That such reforms are needed is shown by some sharp criticisms in the Japanese press: Thus the Tokyo Shimbun (the 6th January) complained that it took an excessively long time for the Cabinet to put its plans into effect, while the Mainichi (the 8th January) asserted that hardly any plan could be put through, but ended in "wishful figures without practical effect."

Koiso promised more effective anti-aircraft protection for factories as well as a more comprehensive programme for the dispersal of industry and for the evacuation of civilians from large cities. This would include the provision of underground facilities for munitions industries. It was intended to increase the production of steel, light metals and liquid fuel both in Japan and upon the Asiatic mainland. The Government would carry out the complete conversion of labour and materials to war production, and would endeavour to increase food supplies. Koiso paid a tribute to Japanese merchant seamen and promised improvements in their treatment; at the same time he declared that there would be further developments in land transport in Japan and Korea so as to ease the burden on the mercantile marine.

Domei (20 Jan.) said that, as from the 25th January, officers and assistant officers in the merchant marine would be given the status of senior and junior Government officials for the duration of the war, and that their pay would be increased. This presumably means that captains will be equivalent to senior Government officials—the precise grade was not specified—and first, second and third mates will have correspondingly lesser official grading. Domei also said that officers of the merchant marine, under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Transport, would be treated as naval or military officers when on duty aboard Army or Navy vessels. There has evidently been a good deal of discontent in the Japanese merchant navy about inequalities of status and remuneration, which the seamen probably resent the more because neither Army nor Navy could prevent heavy losses of merchant ships and crews, particularly among those on transport service to the battle-fronts in the Pacific. Japanese merchant seamen, with their opportunities of visiting foreign countries, are probably less easily moulded by official propaganda than are their shore-going compatriots; they are also more advanced in labour organisation. A breakdown in morale on their part would obviously be a very serious matter for Japan, particularly as such disaffection might come to affect the Navy itself, now smarting under defeat and—except for the much-advertised kamikaze units—from Army aspersions about its inactivity. Undue significance should not be placed upon this matter, but constant Japanese broadcasts about the solidarity and dauntless spirit of the people as a whole suggest the lady who protested too much. Revolutions are apt to begin among seamen suffering from a sense of injustice or conscious that they, through no fault of their own, can no longer meet the enemy on equal terms.

It remains to be seen whether the Koiso Government's belated zeal for reform will prolong its tenure of office. E. A. Sommer, Transocean correspondent in Tokyo, reported (18th January) that at a special meeting of the Seijikai it had been decided to abolish both that body and the larger Taisei Yokusankai and to form a new association. He added that, in this new body, the Comrades' League—formerly known as the Japan Youth Corps (Dai Nippon Seinendan) and presided over by General Tatekawa—would play a leading part. The moving spirit in the Comrades' League is the sinister Colonel Hashimoto, of "Panay" fame. When Tatekawa resigned, Koiso himself took over the chairmanship of the Comrades' League, probably in order to checkmate Hashimoto, but encountered "great resistance." Transocean further reported (21st January) that the disbandment of the Taisei Yokusankai had been announced in Tokyo that day and that a new coalition party would be formed "to provide a true link between the Government and the Throne." The disbandment does not appear to have been carried out at once as a DNB message from Tokyo of the 22nd January said that the Yokusankai had met that day to discuss Koiso's statement in the Diet that the Association would occupy a controlling and official position in the new mobilisation measures for war industry. Presumably Koiso's statement refers to the reconstituted body, in which most of the members of the Yokusankai are likely to be included, but with the Hashimoto faction wielding increased influence.

Koiso's address to the Diet was followed by a speech from Shigemitsu, the Foreign Minister. Much of what he said consisted of a disguised overture to Chungking. He declared that "the war in East Asia started with the Chinese problem and will end there, for there can only be peace in East Asia when China takes her rightful place," and he alleged that Japan was fighting to secure Chinese independence in contrast to the imperialistic policies of Great Britain and the United States. Shigemitsu also declared that Japan's relations with the Soviet Union were governed by the Neutrality Pact, which, he said, provided the framework for close diplomatic contact between the two countries in respect of world politics. He claimed that progress had been made in "various questions at present under discussion" and he instanced the Fishery and Sakhalin Concessions Agreements of March 1944. He praised Germany's "struggle against seemingly insuperable difficulties" and declared that Japan's close ties with her would remain until final victory. Shigemitsu apparently still hopes to keep the U.S.S.R. neutral and to come to terms with Chungking; in answer to questions in the Diet he said that Japan would spare no efforts to realise general peace in China.

The Japanese have not so far resumed their main offensive in south-western China; they have, however, made a local drive which has resulted in the capture of Waichow and the expulsion of Chungking troops from the Bias Bay region, near Hong-Kong. The Japanese themselves say that this move is intended to frustrate any attempted American landing in this area. Chungking reports say that the Japanese are making defence preparations along other parts of the Chinese cost, notably in Chekiang and around Shanghai.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

At the very simple and dignified inaugural ceremony for his fourth term, President Roosevelt, in the shortest address ever delivered on such an occasion, issued a warning that the United States and the Allies were passing through a period of "supreme test," a test of courage, resolve, wisdom and of essential democracy. "In the days and years to come," said the President, "we shall work for a just and durable peace, as to-day we work and fight for total victory in war." "We can and we will achieve such a peace." There would no doubt be mistakes, and imperfections, but "we have learned, that we cannot live alone, at peace; that our own well-being is dependent upon the well-being of other nations far away . . . . We have learned the simple truth that 'the only way to have a friend, is to be one.' We gain no lasting peace," he continued, with an obvious reference to the mutual recrimination of the past few weeks, "if we approach it with suspicion and mistrust and with fear."

Earlier in the week the President described as a "strikingly successful example of United Nations collaboration" the work of the Combined Production and Resources Board, the Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Food Board. "We hear a good bit," began the statement which the President read at his press conference, "about differences between the United States and Britain, but perhaps we hear less of how really effectively they are working together in winning the war, and also in meeting the economic problems of the areas they liberate." He revealed that he had agreed with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Mackenzie King on the maintenance of the Boards until the end of the war with Japan, and in answer to a question from a correspondent, he stated that the experience gained by the Boards would be valuable for any work that might have to be done by the United Nations after the war, though he did not commit himself any further.

At the close of his statement Mr. Roosevelt singled out for special praise the work of Mr. William L. Batt, the United States representative on the Combined Raw Materials Board, and vice-chairman of the War Production Board, who himself stated three months or so ago that, " it would be tragic if the accumulated experience of the Combined Boards in the field of international economic co-operation were to be lost."

Speaking in Cincinatti last week, Mr. Batt predicted the possibility of a head-on clash between British and American opinion after the war and appealed for a better understanding of the problems facing the two countries. He urged Americans if they want " the help of Britain in building a better world, (to) take energetic steps towards helping Britain regain economic health." The prospects of the British textile industry he described as " grim " and of the coal industry as " stark " and he urged Americans " to direct their energies towards helping Britain " for reasons of enlightened self-interest even though Britain might have to resort to cartels, State trading and other methods unpopular in the United States, in order to regain her lost markets. " If you agree with my general thesis that the world needs a healthy Britain, then you will want to do whatever you can to help her whenever you can."

Preparations for the meeting (" across the seas," according to Senator Conally) of Mr. Churchill, Marshal Stalin and Mr. Roosevelt are going ahead. Mr. Stettinius has revealed that he will accompany the President on his forthcoming trip, in addition to attending the meeting of American Foreign Ministers which will be held at Mexico City in mid-February. While emphasising that the conference was a meeting of the Chiefs of States, Mr. Stettinius expressed the view that after the first meeting there might be parallel meetings of the Foreign Secretaries, as had been suggested by Mr. Eden, though he did not reveal whether Mr. Molotov would also accompany Marshal Stalin.

Mr. Churchill's speech last week in the House of Commons has, as usual, been applauded in the United States as, in the words of one radio commentator, " climatic, comprehensive and comprehending." Several papers regard the speech as " one of the greatest that the most famous British orator now living has ever made," and the " reassuring overtures " of British intentions towards liberated countries has done much to decrease criticism of British foreign policy, and has succeeded in clearing the air of a good deal of Anglo-American misunderstanding, though Left-wing papers such as P.M., still continue to criticise the statements on Greece. Press and radio alike, however, express particular gratification at Mr. Churchill's magnificent tribute to the American fighting forces, " one of the most noble tributes paid by the leader of one Ally to the troops of another." The New York Herald-Tribune has remarked that the world needs more of this kind of specific utterance, and contrasts it with the " vagueness " of statements issued on United States foreign policy; while the New York Times declares that " the war aims of the United Nations have never been stated more clearly than they were in Mr. Churchill's adoption of Lincoln's phrase."

Questioned about what Mr. Henry Wallace would do when he was succeeded as Vice-President by Senator Truman, Mr. Roosevelt jocularly replied that he did not think he would starve, adding that that was a real tip. All speculation is now at an end with the announcement that Mr. Jesse Jones has resigned, at the request of the President, his post as Secretary of Commerce, and as Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiary agencies, in favour of the retiring Vice-President. The publication of correspondence which has passed between Mr. Jesse Jones and the President reveals that Mr. Jones, in a bitter letter, has refused the President's offer of a diplomatic post abroad and strongly disagrees that Mr. Wallace " could do the greatest amount of good in the Department of Commerce." " For you to turn over all these responsibilities to a man inexperienced in business and finance will be hard, I believe, for the business and financial world to understand. The New York Times, as well as one or two other papers, expressed the view that, following Mr. Cordell Hull's resignation, Mr. Roosevelt has now lost the only other member of his Cabinet who had the full confidence of Congress, and there are reports that there will be strong opposition in the Senate when the President submits his nomination for its consideration, though in the end it will probably be confirmed. Mr. Wallace's appointment, at his own suggestion and " as a party reward," must be particularly galling to Mr. Jones in view of the enmity and strife that already exists between them (see Summary No. 198). Mr. Jones is popular with Big Business, the Republicans and Conservative Democrats, while Mr. Wallace is an ardent New Dealer, who is strongly supported by Left-wing opinion and in particular by the Congress of Industrial Organisations. In order to quell the rising opposition and allay the suspicions of the business community, Mr. Wallace has issued a statement to the effect that " opportunity for free enterprise must be expanded " but the Administration " must accept the duty of seeing that all men are in health and have jobs." And the " common man need not tolerate less prosperity in peace than in war."

LATIN AMERICA.

The resignation of General Peluffo as Foreign Minister reported in last week's Summary, caused something of a sensation in Argentina, even though Argentine ministers are now accustomed to be here to-day and gone to-morrow. The fact that it was announced as the result of the General's disagreement with recent trends in internal policy has been turned to account by the Press Secretariat of the Argentine Government, which has depicted the late Minister for Foreign Affairs as the leader of an ultra-Nationalist group intent on foiling Colonel Perón's policy of replacing military officers by civilians, and on preventing the holding of elections : a Buenos Aires broadcasting station has even declared that " this may change the opinion of those nations who do not want Argentina present at the meeting of Foreign Ministers."

Whatever the truth of this interpretation (and it is of interest that the Nationalist Press has praised the fallen General Peluffo), it clearly shows that the victorious Colonel Perón again desires to pose as the champion of democracy : his friends are reported to be comparing his elimination of General Peluffo with that of Argentina's leading totalitarian, General Perlinger, in July. In addition, the ultra-Nationalist Interventor of Corrientes, Dr. David Uriburu, has conveniently been dismissed, as well as two other Nationalist officers from the President's entourage. The Nationalist newspaper Cabildo did not appear on the 18th January, and this was reported to be due to the Government's refusal of newsprint. The Socialist Vanguardia has reappeared and clamours for the removal of the state of siege. The extreme Nationalist Alianza (suppressed when Argentina broke with the Axis) has also re-emerged.

The Ministry for Foreign Affairs is temporarily in the hands of Dr. César Ameghino, the Minister of Finance. There is a rumour that Dr. Podestá Costa, the Argentine representative at the Inter-American Juridical Committee, a prominently right-wing and " neutral " senator, may be offered the Ministry. A retired Colonel, Sr. Amaro Avalos, has been appointed Minister of Agriculture.

The Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs has told His Majesty's Ambassador that elections will be held early in May for the Presidency, Senate, and Chamber of Deputies. It remains uncertain whether States will vote for Governors, and Municipalities for Prefects. There is to be no return to the 1934 Consitution, but a decree to amend the 1937 Constitution in a liberal sense is expected to appear shortly. There will be only two candidates for the Presidency. The Constitution of 1937 provides for one candidate nominated by the President, and one chosen by an Electoral College, appointed on corporative lines. Should the President not nominate a candidate, the College's choice is automatically appointed. As to the forthcoming elections, Dr. Leão Veloso has remarked that " it is not impossible that the present President may offer himself as a candidate." It also appears likely that the present President, for want of any organised opposition group, may appoint his opponent. There should thus be the least possible doubt about the result of the contest.

A practical example of this system has just been given by El Salvador, where General Salvador Castañeda has become President by means of an election, his term being due to commence in March. All his rivals had retired from the field on the grounds of obvious military interference in the polls, and General Castañeda was thus returned by an overwhelming " majority."

The Guatemalan Government have broken off relations with the Spanish Government.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

NOW in its third week, the Russian offensive has achieved the capture of Memel, the encirclement of East Prussia, an advance to the Oder, an invasion of Pomerania and the capture of several industrial centres of Upper Silesia. No German counter-attack of any magnitude has developed. "The war bulletins of the last few days have filled many German hearts with the deepest anxiety," said Fritzsche on the 27th. Hardly less ominous have been the descriptions and warnings broadcast by the German wireless about the difficulties of the retreating armies, the hurried evacuation of civilians from the eastern districts, and the bitter weather in which all these movements have had to take place. With the Russian armies, as the D.A.Z. reminded its readers, "only a few hundred kilometres from the capital," it is hardly surprising that the people have been warned not to expect the traditional celebrations of Hitler's accession to power on the 30th January, 1933.

On the 24th January the O.K.W. announced that the Russians had reached the Oder, on the 25th that Oppeln had fallen and Elbing was threatened, on the 26th that Russian forces were on two sides of Poznan and attempting a break-through towards Königsberg and on the 27th "several major penetrations in the Upper Silesian industrial area." The fighting seems to have been fiercest in East Prussia, the Russian penetration greatest in the central sector, the extremity of Zhukov's advance beyond Posen is due east of Berlin. This means that the Germans have already been driven in places beyond the line where some months ago, according to a private report of an interview given by Guderian, they hoped to hold the Russians, that is a line running from Graz, through Bratislava and Cracow to Posen and Danzig.

German propaganda has endeavoured to explain to its public why this victorious Russian advance has not yet been opposed by any serious counter-attack. Dittmar, speaking on the 23rd after an absence of three weeks, used some alarming phrases. He said that the Germans "must avoid precipitate action, in order to render our counter-blows as effective as possible." He urged that the relative slowness of military developments on the German side should be rated as a "positive factor . . . . however much this may test the patience and confidence of the German people." But such encouragement as he could offer was itself far from positive. He spoke neither of reserves nor of a new line of resistance and left the impression that further considerable losses of Reich territory must be expected: before the front could be restored there would be many a moment of "painful impatience, when the names of German towns, representing to us a multitude of personal relations and human bonds, will be mentioned as contested or lost."

Statements of this kind can have done little to alleviate depression at the thought that two eastern provinces are almost as good as lost to the Reich. The historic importance of East Prussia, the propaganda regarding its defence and the formation of the Volkssturm, which was first set up there, will make its loss appear at least as significant as that of the intrinsically more valuable Silesian centres of war industry. Certain German spokesmen have made some efforts to bring the hard facts home gently. Dittmar spoke of East Prussia as "an advanced bastion . . . . threatened with severance from the rest of the Reich." Another commentator compared it to a huge camp within which women and children have taken refuge while soldiers and the Volkssturm defended them "with unimaginable ferocity." Glodschey, on the 27th, admitted that the province was now cut off from all land communication with Germany, and hinted that it might be temporarily lost.

Forster, as Gauleiter of Danzig and East Prussia, broadcast an appeal to all men capable of bearing arms to report for service at once. Supply columns and rearward services were urged to comb out every man who could possibly be spared for the front. Soldiers of all services who have lost contact with their units have been told by wireless to report to specified centres. Stragglers have been rounded up in Königsberg and formed into emergency units. These and similar reports suggest a confusion behind the front lines which recalls that of the German western armies last September.

As to the evacuation of civilians from threatened areas, the evidence again suggests haste and confusion. Schwarz van Berk, broadcasting on the 24th, referred to the stream of trains depositing East Prussian refugees in Berlin. Roads leading out of the province were so crowded that the Gauleiter ordered "trekking columns" to leave them, and asked Party and police officials to see that this was done. The Gauleiter of Upper Silesia said on the 24th that the evacuation of women and children from Breslau would soon be complete, but admitted that waves of refugees from the Wartheland and eastern districts had been crowding the city. A wireless estimate of the number who by the 25th had left, in bitter weather by rail and road, was roughly 300,000, that is nearly half the peace-time population of the city. The newspaper Front und Heimat assured its military readers that this evacuation could not be compared with that of the French in 1940. The evacuation of Vienna, which is stated to have been pursued since the 2nd January, apparently included foreign workers (thought to be a potential Fifth Column) as well as women, children and invalids.

Newspaper articles in the last weeks of 1944 gave some publicity to the difficulties which make up the problem of evacuation now intensified by the Russian advance. No less intractable than those of enforcing departure and of providing transport are the difficulties of reception. Areas to which evacuees are sent now appear to be saturated. Articles suggest that it is impossible to go on sending homeless people to places where householders either refuse them admittance—people who did this were sent to work in a bombed area of the Rhineland—or cannot accommodate more, or cannot remain on good terms with those to whom they do give shelter. A Munich paper wrote in December that differences between householders and lodgers were so frequent that the best solution for bombed people was Ley's "emergency house." The quarrels had got beyond the hope of being merely a private matter; the Reich Housing Commissioner both could, and must, intervene. In Gelsenkirchen, the Deputy Gauleiter of Essen suggested in December that since people could not be moved beyond the limits of the Gau, the population of its eastern districts must make room somehow for more evacuees. The demand for space in Baden is now such that a Landrat has forbidden premises to be "used for the accommodation of furniture and household goods." This means that those air raid victims who have managed to store their effects will have them moved elsewhere. A report from Vienna stresses the fact that householders are entitled to refuse compliance to registration officials who have not established their identity.

A brief announcement from Berlin, on the evening of the 28th, stated that Quisling had been received by Hitler. The official communiqué was, as is usually the case with such political talks, laconic, and followed the well-known line that the conversations at Hitler's Headquarters had been frank and cordial and that complete agreement had been reached regarding all questions affecting both Norway and Germany. Hitler's determination to give Norway complete independence after Germany had won the war was reaffirmed. The names of those present suggest that the meeting was concerned with important issues of present policy. Quisling was accompanied by two colleagues. The German Reich Kommissar of Norway, Terboven, was there, as were Ribbentrop, Lammers and Bormann. It has for some time been rumoured in Norway that political changes would be announced on the 1st February, the anniversary of Quisling's appointment, but what these are is far from clear. The Germans were recently reported to have eleven divisions established in Norway. They now need not merely every soldier, but every policeman and worker they can get. Terboven himself was reported to be moving out of the Reichkommissariat building in Oslo. The German military commander in Norway, General Rendulic, is said to have been transferred to the eastern front. It is possible that the Nazis, now faced with the necessity of withdrawing forces from Norway, are covering such a withdrawal with promises for the future and an increase in Quisling's present powers. Whether Quisling and his compatriots will be given a much larger measure of control will probably depend on German estimates as to the likelihood of Allied attack on the Norwegian ports. (See further under "Scandinavia.")

If Hitler's short speech broadcast at 10·15 p.m. on the 30th January should prove to be his last, he will at least have been consistent to the end. It was full of the old Hitler—dogmatic, ruthless, fanatically inhuman—and in places attained something of his early vigour. The themes also were well-worn—Russian aggression, British impotence (illustrated by the telling simile of the sheep and the tiger), National Socialism as Germany's only adequate defence, insistence on his own divine mission. He dealt sharply with those opponents of the Nazis who think that an undefended Germany would never have fallen prey to "this Jewish international world conspiracy." He warned foreign statesmen "once and for all that any attempt to make an impression on Nazi Germany by using phrases of the kind used by Wilson presumes a simplicity of mind unknown in modern Germany." He proclaimed the 30th January, 1933, as the date marking the spiritual rebirth of the German nation, which had been thus enabled to resist a European disease so severe that even the man who survived it could only do so "by exertions which would weaken him in an extreme degree." Since the Almighty had created the German people, defence of their existence was defence of his work. His own life was ruled by his duty to his people, from which he could only be absolved by Him who had called him to it, and who on the 20th July last had confirmed his mission. He demanded sacrifice to the last ounce of strength from every German, healthy and sick, worker and peasant, woman and girl. He threatened "ignominious death" to those who stabbed Germany in the back, and he appealed "with particular confidence" to German youth. His final word expressed his conviction that the present calamity would be mastered by a victorious Europe under German leadership.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The troops of General Petrov and Marshal Malinovsky have made more steady progress during the past week towards clearing the Germans from Slovakia. Pushing north-west from Miskolcz the latter was able, on the 24th January to report the capture of Rožnava and Jelšava, whilst by the 28th January Petrov's Army, which includes the Czechoslovak corps under General Svoboda, had advanced westwards through difficult country along the line of the Košice–Bohumin railway to capture Poprad, over 2,000 feet up at the approaches to the High Tatra. Czechoslovak broadcasts from Moscow are urging the Slovaks not to permit themselves to be evacuated and to do everything possible to prevent the destruction of property, communications and installations by the retreating Germans.

In the Protectorate Frank has been making preparations during January to meet the grave situation that has arisen as a result of the Russian offensive. With a view to more rigid control of war production, Bertsch, the one German Minister in the Protectorate Government, has been appointed chairman of the Armaments Committee for Bohemia–Moravia; rail-travel and the consumption of electricity and gas have been drastically curtailed; a still stricter frontier supervision has been introduced; and executions for anti-German activities have increased in number.

More light has now been thrown on certain points in Soviet–Czechoslovak relations. As regards the future of Ruthenia (see Summary No. 276), the position is that officially the Soviet Government still stands by the Treaty of December 1943 and the subsequent agreement concerning the administration of liberated territories signed in May 1944, and maintains the view that the Czechoslovak Government should administer under the armistice all the pre-Munich territories of the Czechoslovak Republic. At the same time, both Governments take account of the strong Ukrainian nationalism displayed by the Sub-Carpathian Ruthenians since their liberation, and the Czechoslovaks are probably reconciled to ceding Ruthenia at the Peace Conference—or even earlier, possibly, if the Russians should bring strong pressure to bear. In another respect—the question of Czechoslovak recognition of the Lublin Provisional Government—Moscow has already exerted strong pressure on the Czechoslovak Government, and the latter, though with some reluctance, is likely to fall in with the Russians' wishes and decide to recognise Lublin during the present week.

POLAND.

The Soviet Armies have now driven the Germans from nearly all Silesia, Upper and Lower, east of the Oder, and from nearly all of East Prussia south of the latitude of Königsberg. In Lublin-controlled Poland there is a note of jubilation. "We are returning to Silesia," said Lublin Radio, thinking perhaps of the old castle of the Polish Piast dynasty which still stands at Oppeln, the capital until last week of the German "Greater Upper Silesia." The "League of Western Poles" is organising a register of all Poles from the incorporated provinces and of others who wish to be given land in the areas that may be acquired.

The Lublin Administration is largely concerning itself with reconstruction and relief. It has voted an initial credit of £5 million for the restoration of Warsaw, where it has been estimated the Germans did damage to the value of £42 million. It is suggested that this should be a claim on German reparations, and that 150,000 German workers should be employed on reconstruction. As to relief, some grain is being sent in as a present from the neighbouring Soviet Republics (see below under "Soviet Union"). It is also announced that American Red Cross supplies, chiefly medical, will shortly arrive. Both reconstruction and relief are said to have been among the questions discussed by MM. Bierut and Morawski on their recent visit to Moscow.

M. Arciszewski's memorandum on the political situation, reported in the last Summary, has been the subject of attacks by Lublin and of criticism in M. Mikolajczyk's paper Jutro Polski. Lublin Radio says it is an insult to the Polish nation to suggest "that power in Poland should be taken away from the Poles and handed over to an Inter-Allied Commission." M. Mikolajczyk has made the counter-suggestion that both the London and the Lublin Administrations should be replaced by a new Government mainly formed from men who have remained in Poland; that the controversy as between the 1935 and 1921 Constitutions should be disregarded, since neither can in practice now be applied; and that the President's place should be taken by a "Presidential Council." Meantime the Lublin Administration has extended its control to Cracow, where provisional Provincial and Municipal Councils have now been set up.

The German war currency, known as the Cracow zlotys, was withdrawn from circulation early this month, and is being replaced by a Polish zloty. Holders of the Cracow zlotys obtain the new exchange only up to a limited amount, the rest being credited to them with a prospect of full payment if reparations are received from Germany to cover the whole issue.

The Rector of the reopened Catholic University of Lublin, and at present administrator of the Lublin diocese, has made a statement of the damage suffered by the Catholic Church in Poland under German domination. Enomous losses, he says, were suffered, and a great number of priests were murdered, including 67 in his own diocese, and 80 per cent. of those in the dioceses of Chelmno and Gniezno–Pozan. In the provinces now liberated the Church has, he says, received its freedom, Catholic schools have been opened, and the entire clergy "while remaining loyal to the Government, maintains a non-political attitude, carrying out the duties imposed on it by the Canon Law and the Concordat concluded with the Holy See."

SOVIET UNION.

The Red Army's advance has continued on all fronts, celebrated this week by twenty-one Orders of the Day from Marshal Stalin. Memel fell on the 28th January and the expulsion of the Germans from Lithuania is thus completed. In East Prussia General Cherniakhovsky was reported within 2 miles of Königsberg on the 29th January, whilst to the west Marshal Rokossovsky broke through to the Baltic at Tolkemit on the 26th January, thus cutting off the remnant of East Prussia which the Germans still hold. South of Bydgoszcz (captured on the 23rd January) a great Russian sweep forward has left isolated islands of resistance in Torun and Poznan; the first seizure of Pomeranian territory was announced on the 29th January. Further south again the Red Army's front in Silesia now extends for 140 miles, and Breslau is threatened. Hindenburg fell on the 26th January, Beuthen on the 28th January and Katowice (in Poland) on the same day. The Dabrowa mining region has thus been cleared. In Slovakia a steady advance has continued, culminating in the capture of Poprad on the 28th January.

A special communiqué issued by the Soviet Information Bureau on the 26th January stated that in the fighting on German, Polish and Czechoslovak territory between the 12th and 24th January the enemy lost more than 295,000 killed and 86,330 prisoners.

The British parliamentary delegation last week visited Leningrad and were received by M. Popkov, the Chairman of the Municipal Soviet. On their return to Moscow they enjoyed a personal conference with Marshal Stalin lasting over an hour, in the course of which they were able to question the Marshal on various subjects of interest to them. M. Maisky acted as interpreter during this visit and M. Molotov was also in attendance.

One of the more noticeable results of the Anglo-Soviet alliance in the propaganda field was that India ceased to be represented as a victim of British imperialism by the Soviet press and wireless. The mid-January number of The War and the Working Class, however, contains a long article on India's political, economic and cultural backwardness for which His Majesty's Government is held responsible. Culturally, modern India is stated to have achieved less than countries like Norway with one-hundredth of her population. The writer of this article, A. Diakov, who in the pre-war years specialised in Indian affairs in the Soviet press, alleges that "all impartial observers rightly regard the extreme political backwardness of a country which remains in the position of a British colony up to the middle of the twentieth century as the fundamental cause of the strikingly tardy economic and cultural development of the Indian people." Diakov's analysis of the various Indian political parties is no more flattering than his picture of British rule. Gandhi is accused of believing in "such unreal doctrines as civil disobedience" and of being opposed to "industrialisation, without which no country can be free to-day, and to the war of freedom-loving nations against aggression"; the Mahasabha and the Moslem League are criticised for their reactionary religious differences and the Princes as a "bulwark of political backwardness." India was also mentioned, it may be recalled, in Izvestiya's attack on Commander Bower (see last week's Summary under "Poland"). The revival of this subject is probably inspired by irritation on the Soviet side with the current criticism of Soviet foreign policy in Great Britain.

The establishment of the League of European Freedom under the auspices of the Duchess of Atholl evoked a particularly virulent outburst against "that indefatigable old dame" by David Zaslavsky in Pravda. India was also dragged into this polemic and the interest of the Duchesss of Atholl and her supporters in the future status of the Baltic and other small peoples of Europe arraigned as "anti-Soviet in bias."

Pravda's international observer (29th January) produced some caustic comments on the Yugoslav Government crisis. "What political crisis can exist in Yugoslavia now that the Shubashitch Government has concluded the Agreement with Marshal Tito on the basic issues of home policy?" The only crisis was "a personal crisis of King Peter" who came out without any ground against the Agreement. The King's failure to withstand the influence of reactionary groups was, however, a menace only to himself; whatever attitude he took could not seriously affect the situation in Yugoslavia.

M. Modzelewski presented his credentials as Ambassador of the "Provisional Government of Poland" to M. Kalinin on the 26th January, M. Lebedev, the Soviet Ambassador in Lublin, being received the same day by M. Osubka-Morawski. Meanwhile, cordial messages and gifts in kind are being sent to Warsaw by the Ukrainian, Byelorussian and Lithuanian Republics, the Ukrainian message particularly stressing the unity of Poles and Ukrainians in their common Slavdom. The Ukrainian Republic sent 15,000 tons of grain besides smaller quantities of sunflower seed, sugar and dried fruits, the Byelorussian 10,000 tons of grain, and the Lithuanian 5,000 tons.

Seyyid Zia and his supporters are a subject this week of a vituperative article in Pravda. They are said to have "fought against the Soviet military authorities, engaged in terrorist activities against Soviet supply lines and spread anti-Soviet lies and accusations." The rest of the article is in much the same vein of highly-coloured biographical and historical misrepresentation of Seyyid Zia's part in Soviet-Iranian relations since 1921. It concludes: "the sooner Seyyid Zia removes his accursed and filthy carcass from Iran the better." (See also under "Middle East.")

The General Council (Sobor) to be held in Moscow on the 31st January to elect a Patriarch of Moscow and all the Russias is to be a big occasion, and distinguished representatives of the Orthodox Churches outside the U.S.S.R. have already arrived to attend. It would presumably have been difficult for the Œcumenical Patriarch of Constantinople to accept the invitation of the Russian Holy Synod to attend the Council in person, but his Exarch in Western Europe, Metropolitan Germanos of Thyateira has gone to Moscow as his representative. The Patriarch of Jerusalem was apparently unable to travel owing to illness, but he also has sent a delegate in the person of Archbishop Athonoges of Sebaste. The Patriarch Alexander III of Antioch was apparently one of the first to accept the invitation, though even he experienced some hesitations, his bishops urging him not to show too great a subservience to the Russian Patriarchate. The Soviet Minister in the Lebanon, M. Solod, seems to have exercised persuasive powers to some effect, and the Patriarch may have agreed the more readily as he is known to have hopes of asking Marshal Stalin to intervene with General de Gaulle to restore the Orthodox Church to its old position in the Levant. The Patriarch reached Moscow on the 27th January accompanied by two of his bishops. The Patriarch of Alexandria, Christopher II, had more difficulty in making his decision, the Greek Chargé d'Affaires in Cairo doing his best to dissuade him. The scale was tipped in favour of Moscow, however, when he learnt of his brother of Antioch's decision to make the journey. He consulted the British authorities, stating that he had the approval of the Archbishop of York, but he apparently did not approach the Egyptian Government.

Originally the Russian bishops only decided to invite representatives of the four ancient Patriarchates and the Catholicos of Georgia to their Council, but other churches were later included. Tass (29th January) reported that a large delegation from the Serbian Patriarchate had arrived in Moscow, led by Metropolitan Josip of Skoplje, the Acting Patriarch, Patriarch Gavrilo being still presumably in German hands. The Bulgarian Church, regarded as schismatic by all the Orthodox world excepting the Moscow Patriarchate, was not invited, largely, it is thought, because the Patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria had made its exclusion a condition of their acceptance. It is surprising, however, that there has so far been no mention of delegations from the Roumanian Patriarchate, or from the Church of Greece. The Coptic Patriarch had been trying to get an invitation through the Soviet Legation in Cairo, but his exclusion would be automatic, as all the Orthodox including the Russians regard the Copts as heretical as well as schismatic.

It is worth noting that these delegations have only been welcomed by church dignitaries on their arrival in Moscow, no representatives of the Soviet Government having been present at the station or airport.

The liberation of Memel (Klapeda) was hailed by M. Paletskis, chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Lithuanian S.S.R., on behalf of his Republic. Memel, torn away from Lithuania by Germany in 1939 "with the direct connivance of Smetona's Fascist Government," had been restored to the Lithuanian people for ever. Only under the Soviet banner, M. Paletskis said, could they achieve their age-old dream of freedom and national independence.

By the death of M. Konstantin Umansky as the result of a plane crash in Mexico, the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs has lost one of its most astute and successful diplomats, and a member of its Collegium. M. Umansky, who was born in 1902 in Nikolayev, joined the Communist Party as a youth of 17. He had had a varied experience as a Tass representative in Vienna, Rome and Paris before being transferred to the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs in 1931. Appointed Counsellor to the Soviet Embassy in Washington in 1936, he was subsequently promoted to be Ambassador in Washington, a post he relinquished in 1941. He was appointed Soviet Ambassador to Mexico (following a period of home service) in 1943. Last year he was awarded the Order of the Red Banner of Labour for outstanding services to the Soviet State. He was regarded on all sides as the key man in Soviet diplomatic relations with the Latin-American continent. At the time of his death he was on his way to Costa Rica to present his credentials as Soviet Minister Plenipotentiary to that country.

SCANDINAVIA.

The visit of Quisling to Hitler at the latter's headquarters has given rise to a flood of rumour and speculation, the truth of which cannot be verified until after this Summary has been written. The official communiqué, issued on the 28th January, is not informative: "Complete agreement on all questions" is a well-worn cliché which seldom has any striking resemblance to the truth. The promise of Norwegian independence is seriously qualified by the proviso "after the victorious conclusion of the European struggle," which, if a German victory is meant, would appear to be synonymous with the Greek calends. The meeting appears, however, to have been regarded as of considerable importance; besides the Führer, prominent Germans present included Ribbentrop, Bormann and Lammers, while Quisling also brought auxiliaries for the discussion.

The expectation expressed in current rumour is that the 1st February—the customary date for Quisling to receive a ration of crumbs from his master's table—will see the theoretical independence of the Norwegian puppet Government sufficiently conceded to enable Quisling to declare the conclusion of peace with Germany, or even of an alliance with her: to give this independence a more convincing appearance it is thought possible that the Reichskommissar may be withdrawn. Such developments may well give rise to an internal crisis which will further test the staunchness of the home front. Fri Fagbevegelse, the organ of the clandestine press most closely reflecting the official view of the Nygaardsvold Government, has published an article stressing the effectiveness of a general strike and the necessity of making preparations to use this weapon, and significant support has been given to this pronouncement by the Norwegian Broadcasting Service from London.

The fanatical extremists of the Quisling Party seem prepared to go even further than peace and alliance with Germany, and to be disposed to organise—on paper at any rate—that active defence of Northern Norway which the Germans have failed to attempt. On this subject, the clandestine but apparently genuine N.S. publication Norsk Hird has indulged in a violent tirade against the treachery of the German "liberators" in evacuating Finnmark without a blow, and against the quisling leaders for their subservient acquiescence in this policy. A struggle for Finnmark, says this paper, would have been a brilliant opportunity for arousing the nation in the struggle with Bolshevism. That this bellicose view has some support in N.S. circles is confirmed by a report from S.N.P. on the 21st January to the effect that fanatical quislings are considering the organisation of a partisan movement against the liberated portion of North Norway, suicidal as this policy may appear. It remains to be seen whether February will throw further light upon these rumours, alarums and excursions.

It was reported on the 27th January that General Rendulic, who recently succeeded Falkenhorst in the command of German forces in Norway, has been transferred to the Eastern Front, and he is said to have been replaced by General Böhmer, who is believed to have special knowledge of Norwegian conditions.

In Finland, the fate of the much-discussed Brothers-in-Arms Association (see last week's Summary) was decided on the 25th January when the Government announced its dissolution. The latest information appears to justify the charges of political activity brought against the organisation, which seems to have included an undue proportion of Nazi-minded individuals among its prominent officials. There would appear, however, to be some doubt whether the step taken may not involve a danger of converting the Association into an underground conspiracy with purely political objects, since the charitable and non-party side of its activities will necessarily disappear. The decision of the Government was probably, however, rendered nearly inevitable by the strong views expressed by M. Orlov, the political adviser of the Soviet Control Commission. The Finnish Press seems mostly to regard it as a sacrifice laid on the altar of Finno-Russian understanding.

The main interest in Finland continues to centre round the forthcoming elections and the regrouping of political forces in preparation for them. The split in the Social Democrat Party has probably been widened by a controversy as to whether the party should form a bloc with the new Democratic League, on which issue the League insisted on the elimination of the names of Tanner, Hakkila, and Salovaara from the list of candidates. On the 25th January the Social Democrat Party board rejected these conditions, stating that the selection of party candidates was an internal matter with which the League had no right to interfere, and going far to imply that it regarded the League as a stalking horse for Communism. On the other hand, the Social Democrat Opposition announced on the 26th that it had entered into a coalition with the League. The Opposition is, however, reported to be further split by this decision, which has only secured the assent of some of its members. In default of such a coalition it is felt, however, that radical Social Democrats will desert to the Communist fold and the party will be left exclusively Tannerite.

The preliminary elections of party candidates by the Social Democrats took place on the 21st January, and the first results announced seem to show that Tanner still retains his ascendancy, especially in the capital and larger towns. In Helsinki Tanner himself headed the list, and his supporters for the most part secured more votes than members of the Opposition.

Though the Russians are still behaving with restraint and correctness, they have made it clear that they are not indifferent to the course of the elections. M. Orlov, indeed, has made the significant remark that the results in March would be regarded as the main test of the good faith of the Finns.

In the evening of the 22nd January a bomb was thrown at His Majesty's Legation in Stockholm, though without doing serious damage. The act appears to have been committed by an irresponsible individual, and was obviously unrepresentative of any important shade of public opinion.

On the 21st January a German patrol boat intercepted a Danish steamer in Swedish territorial waters outside Hälsingborg. Though a protest was expected, and many organs of the Swedish press expressed serious indignation, Hälsingborgs Posten quotes military circles as being of opinion that the German vessel was within its rights.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The text has now been published of a letter sent to Seyss-Inquart by a number of doctors in the Occupied Netherlands on the 6th January. This letter paints a terrible picture. "The distress of the Dutch population in the most densely populated districts grows day by day. The rations issued to adults in these districts have a food value of 600–800 calories a day. This is less than half the amount which an adult requires to keep alive while resting, and less than a third of what he needs when working." The letter goes on to condemn the barbarity that attends the deportation of Dutch workers to Germany, of which it gives several details, and concludes with the statement that, if the Germans persist in their cruelty to the Dutch, they will forfeit all claim to the respect of mankind.

Since the letter was written conditions have, if anything, deteriorated. Influenced by the hope of getting more food a few of the railwaymen who have been on strike since the middle of September recently returned to work. A broadcast on Radio Orange reminded the Dutch that the continuance of the strike was imperative and pointed out that the strike was not responsible for the famine—a point which had also been made by the doctors' letter. The Dutch Government, said Radio Orange, ordered the strike to go on and gave warning that trains would be attacked by the air forces of the Allies.

Mr. J. A. W. Burger, the Dutch Minister of the Interior, has resigned. For the time being, Mr. H. van Boeyen, Minister of General Affairs, will also act as Minister of the Interior. Mr. Burger is a young Socialist who escaped from the Netherlands in the spring of 1943; in August of that year he became Minister without Portfolio, and, in June 1944, as the result of a Cabinet reshuffle (see Summary No. 244), he succeeded Mr. van Boeyen as Minister of the Interior. Mr. Berger's resignation was occasioned by a broadcast delivered in the Liberated Netherlands on the 14th January, in which he had discussed the punishment of collaborators. Mr. Burger had indicated that he was not in favour of proceeding against well-meaning persons merely because their attitude to the enemy had not always been correct and they had fallen into errors of which they had afterwards repented. According to Radio Orange this broadcast had been delivered without the knowledge of the Dutch Prime Minister, who had held that it was incompatible with the policy laid down by the Government and calculated to undermine the resistance of the Dutch in the Occupied Netherlands. Mr. Burger, however, had held that his broadcast contained nothing that was incompatible with the Government's policy, but had felt impelled to tender his resignation because relations between himself and Dr. Gerbrandy were no longer those of complete mutual confidence.

The coal shortage in Belgium is becoming increasingly serious. Strikes have caused output to fall, and a lack of pit-props may cause it to fall yet further. The freezing of waterways, too, has made transport more difficult. In consequence many households are without coal, and Brussels has no electricity by day and no gas at all. Naturally there is a widespread tendency to blame the Government, and, while it is true that nothing could have prevented coal from being fairly scarce, the Government has undeniably shown a regrettable lack of vigour and has failed to take adequate measures against the black market in coal. The Communists are seeking to make capital out of the general discontent, and they may succeed in creating serious trouble.

What makes things worse is that supplies of newsprint are exhausted. If the papers have to cease publication, Belgians will be able to satisfy their appetite for news from two sources alone, the radio and rumour. It is not at all certain that the radio would be able to counteract the effect of false and mischievous rumours, which would certainly spread over the country in next to no time.

FRANCE.

In a press conference on the 25th January, General de Gaulle referred to most of the outstanding foreign issues with which his Government is faced. Replying to questions on the conference of the Great Powers, he said curtly that he had heard there was to be such a conference, but France had not been invited.

Perhaps the most interesting of his declarations was that "French forces must be installed on the Rhine from the Swiss frontier to the mouth of the river. Experience had shown that unless she held that line, France was foredoomed to invasion. Not only her own security but that of Western Europe was at stake."

The Government had not so far received any request to begin negotiations for an Anglo-French pact, but it was to be expected that the two countries would sooner or later define the terms of their alliance, though the absence of a written pact had not prevented their waging war together for the past five years. The Franco-Soviet pact would not constitute a model for other pacts: for pacts were alliances and could not be concluded in the same terms with every State. France hoped, however, to conclude agreements with her neighbours, especially Belgium. All such agreements would be marked by the desire to oppose German aggression, which characterised the Franco-Soviet pact.

On relations with Italy, General de Gaulle repeated points previously made (see Summary No. 276 under "France" and "Italy"). It was to be hoped that the Government of Signor Bonomi, for whom France had a high esteem, would recognise that the Franco-Italian Conventions in respect of Tunisia no longer exist. He added that Italy's present war effort, whatever the courage shown, could in no circumstances compare with the war effort of France. The commercial negotiations in progress with Spain would, it was hoped, enable France to increase that war effort. As regards Tangier, the French Government considered that its status—which was also of concern to other Powers—was not yet settled; it had constantly protested against the modifications introduced by Spain. Asked whether the French Government intended to recognise the Lublin Committee as the Provisional Government of Poland, he replied that France would wait until Poland herself could express an opinion. At present that was not possible. Referring to present discussions regarding the future of the Pacific, he stated that in the event of another war with Japan, the same French Pacific bases as were now being used by the Allies would again be put at their disposal.

General de Gaulle also touched on the position in the Levant—a subject recently raised by reports of General Spears's speech at the Royal Empire Society criticising French policy. Serious and distressing difficulties had been created for France in Syria and the Lebanon. "France (so he was reported by the Aube as saying), who was the first to recognise their independence, wishes to preserve her traditional pre-eminent position there. Agreement with the Governments of Damascus and Beirut would long ago have been complete but for outside interference ("des interférences extérieures") between us and them, which complicates the situation and compromises our relations with a great State" (sc. Great Britain) (see also under "Middle East").

The tone of the conference was ungracious; but this may have been due as much to the bitter cold, which has set all tempers on edge, as to pique at the failure to invite the French to the forthcoming conference of the Great Powers—a subject which has been causing disappointment and depression in Paris newspaper comment. Publicity has since been given to the visit to Paris of Mr. Harry Hopkins, who was reported to have talked with General de Gaulle and M. Bidault.

General de Gaulle's reference to France's neighbours was no doubt not unconnected with the presence in Paris of the Luxembourg Minister for Foreign Affairs and with the forthcoming visits of the Norwegian and Belgian Foreign Ministers. It is expected that a Franco-Belgian commercial agreement will be signed, and a special committee or committees may be set up to study various aspects of Franco-Belgian trade and customs relations. There would also be an exchange of views regarding the future treatment of Germany and zones of occupation, though it is recognised that no decisions could be taken without the agreement of Great Britain, the United States and the U.S.S.R. The general scope and importance of M. Spaak's forthcoming visit was indicated in a Belgian News Agency report of the 26th January.

M. Thorez, Secretary-General of the French Communist Party, made an important speech at the inaugural session of the party's central committee on the 21st January—a speech which has since been given considerable prominence on the French wireless. While he made the highly controversial statement that the new army must be the army of the masses, since the idea of the professional army of technicians had been discredited, he was conciliatory to ex-Vichy military elements "who now sought only to redeem themselves and do their whole duty to France and the Republic." As for the purge, it was for the Government alone to act. Again, the Milices Patriotiques had a raison d'être before and during the insurrection against the Hitlerites and Vichy; but public security should now be safeguarded by the regular police, and the Gardes Civiques and all irregular armed groups should no longer be kept in being.

It is suggested that M. Thorez, was perhaps the more inclined to accept the dissolution of the Milices Patriotiques since the order to hand in their arms has remained largely a dead letter. But the whole tone of the speech was conciliatory. The Communists, he maintained, had no revolutionary intentions. The word "revolution" had been discredited by Hitler and the Vichy "National Revolution." The Communist Party was the nucleus round which all men of good will should rally for the reconstruction of France. "Le parti de la main tendue (i.e., the hand offered to the Catholics at the time of the Popular Front), qui est aussi le parti de la laïcité, n'admet aucune exclusion à l'égard d'aucun bon Français." Possibly under instructions from elsewhere, the Communist Party would seem to have realised the extent of the popular reaction against disorder and demagogy and wishes to present itself as the Party of order and unity: "un parti de gouvernement."

The long-announced trial of Charles Maurras, the Royalist leader and director of the Action Française, who was charged with treason, finally opened in Lyons on the 24th January. On the 27th he was found guilty, but attenuating circumstances were admitted and he was sentenced to solitary confinement for life. Maurice Pujo, his lieutenant, was condemned to five years' imprisonment and a fine of 20,000 fr. Both were sentenced to "national degradation." According to the Lyons wireless of the 30th January, Maurras will not appeal. On the 29th January the Paris Court of Justice condemned Henri Clerc, ex-Deputy for Annecy, to penal servitude for life. Under Vichy he directed news reels at a yearly salary of 360,000 fr., and is reported to have sent a film, the "Prisoners of Dieppe," to Hitler.

It was announced on the French wireless on the 29th January that M. Jacques Maritain, the distinguished French philosopher and leading "Left-wing" Catholic, has been appointed Ambassador to the Vatican.

PORTUGAL.

Last week looked like being a black one for Dr. Salazar, who, according to most reliable reports, was facing the gravest political crisis of his long period of office. There was certainly dissatisfaction in the Army, the support of which is essential to any régime, and a group of officers had certainly approached President Carmona, who, it is believed, took their complaints against Dr. Salazar sufficiently seriously to investigate whether the "Military Committee of National Liberation" was indeed supported by the whole Army. Dr. Salazar, meanwhile, had retired to the country for a few days, and no one knew whether he would emerge from his retreat as victor or vanquished. At the moment, it does not appear that Dr. Salazar has suffered defeat, for when Sir R. Campbell spent an agreeable three hours in his company on the 26th January he seemed to have hardly a care in the world beyond the present worries of the scarcity of coal and of shipping. The fear of Russian influence in Europe is so constant a part of Dr. Salazar's thought that it acts more as a continuous ground-bass to passing anxieties than as an ordinary come-day go-day worry. It is not yet definitely known if the crisis is settled, but it looks as though the Doctor has found a solution, whether by promising an all-round increase of pay to the dissatisfied Army or by some other means. It is known that President Carmona is most reluctant to attempt any drastic measure against Dr. Salazar. If the Army have indeed been persuaded to accept the continuance of the régime, it will be one more example of Dr. Salazar's uncanny skill in handling his people; it demonstrates, too, his immense prestige, which seems in itself to hamstring his enemies. But, even though the skies may have cleared again, there are more storms to be faced. The pay of the Army may be raised as a palliative to the distress among the families of the lower ranks, but the gremios, the employers' guilds, will continue their corrupt manipulation of Portuguese industry and commerce. And, though, given the difficulty of achieving anything solid in Portugal, there are many successes, the mismanagement of the gremios is one of the outstanding political failures of Dr. Salazar's régime. A failure which may be accepted cynically or resignedly in easy days arouses wrath under the press of hard times. Economic distress and anger at corruption in government are political tinder which the spark of an Allied victory may well touch off. Dr. Salazar knows this very well: so do his enemies. But they believe that his departure before the end of the war in Europe would avert trouble in Portugal; he thinks that no one but he possesses the combination of wisdom and firmness necessary to guide the country in the difficult days which lie ahead.

ITALY.

The British official explanation of the passage in Mr. Churchill's speech on the 18th January, which, robbed of its context (as reported in last week's Summary), caused some depression in Italy, has now produced a corresponding rise of spirits. The statement, which was issued from 10 Downing Street, gives the whole context, from which the Italian Press misquoted one sentence. To correct the impression thus given, the statement explains that this passage was in answer to a suggestion, widely publicised, that Great Britain was indulging in "power politics," particularly in the Mediterranean. The statement goes on to say that the reference to Italy in the speech did not imply that Mr. Churchill's message to the Italian people on his departure last August was superseded, or that Italy should not eventually take her proper place amongst the other European nations. Most of the Press has accepted this explanation with satisfaction, but Voce Repubblicana (Republican) is still apparently rather sceptical, and suggests that if Great Britain is to play the leading part in the Mediterranean, she will necessarily need the support of the two Mediterranean nations, Spain and Italy. Il Popolo (Christian Democrat), commenting on the Foreign Minister Signor de Gasperi's expression of satisfaction at this explanation, points out, however, that this is the second time in the last few months that more or less official agencies have transmitted inaccurate texts resulting in inaccurate comment.

It appears from press reports that a certain gangster nicknamed "Il Gobbo" (the Hunchback) was recently shot in front of the offices of a political organisation known as the "Unione Proletaria." It is variously alleged that, despite its name, the "Unione Proletaria" has Right-wing backing, is in the pay of Army generals, since it is said to make use of Army transport, or is a Fascist organisation in disguise. The Hunchback is reported to have been on his way to murder the Secretary-General of the "Unione Proletaria," a firebrand named Salvarezza, when he himself was shot by Carabinieri who afterwards raided the "Unione Proletaria's" office. A quantity of arms is said to have been found but Salvarezza himself had escaped, which, according to the Socialist paper Avanti, had been connived at. Other papers say that Salvarezza was connected with the gang which murdered Matteotti, but that he and the "Unione Proletaria" are run by some party or shade of political opinion seems probable. It is not known what connection, if any, there is between the foregoing press reports and a report from Sir N. Charles to the effect that the Carabinieri have raided the headquarters of the Communist Party and discovered a large quantity of arms of various sorts. It seems quite possible, however, that in the present disturbed state of Italy some of the more violent elements may wish to resort to direct action to achieve their political ends and copy the methods of the gangsters whom their countrymen made famous, some years ago in Chicago.

The Italian General Confederation of Labour have just published the first issue of their Trades Union paper called Il Lavoro, which, according to the editorial signed by Grandi, Di Vittorio and Lizzadri, is to be the paper of all Italian workers, manual and intellectual, from the cities and from the country.

In the North, the Italian Social Republic continues its attempts to show signs of life and deal with the acute food and labour situation by the characteristic Fascist method of issuing decrees and reorganising Ministries. A Ministry of Labour has now been set up, with its seat in Milan, and with Giuseppe Spinelli, the Syndicalist who was appointed Podestà of Milan last September, as Minister. The Labour Ministry is to take the place of the National Commissionership of Labour, and will carry out not only the functions of that organisation, but also those of the National Commissionership of Prices, as well as the social insurance and syndical functions of the Ministry of Corporative Economy. The latter Ministry is now to be known as the Ministry for Industrial Production, and is to deal with the services of industry, mines and metallurgy, of trade, private insurance, and industrial consumer goods. The Ministry of Agriculture and Forests is to take the title of Ministry for Agricultural Production; its functions so far seem to be little changed. An article in the Repubblica Fascista has attempted to explain this ministerial reorganisation, but fails to give any convincing reason beyond the fact that there had been considerable overlapping between the Commissionership of Labour and the Ministry of Corporative Economy. The idea behind the creation of the new Ministry of Labour is said to be "the necessity to unify, to simplify, and to recognise the dignity of labour," and the measure is represented as a part of the general policy of allowing the workers to play an increasingly important part both in industrial life and in the life of the Social Republic.

The Fascists have announced that during the last six months considerable progress has been made in the socialisation of industrial concerns. Would-be impressive figures are given, and among the concerns mentioned are some of the biggest Milan firms such as Alfa-Romeo.

THE VATICAN.

On the 25th January the Vatican wireless in German gave the Pope's speech to the Sodality of Our Lady. Members from some thirty nations were present. The speech contained these startling words: "If I may refer to my personal memories of Munich, what a wealth of truly Christian family life was produced by the Sodality of St. Michael, then flourishing in the Bavarian capital!" This condemnation of the Nazi behaviour to the Catholic Church in Germany, implicit in the use of the past tense, was made manifest by the Vatican in its next day's German broadcast. After quoting the Pope's words, the speaker recalled how St. Michael's Sodality had long been guided by Fr. Rupert Mayer, S.J. On the 5th June, 1937, he had been imprisoned for refusing to recognise a State ban on his preaching in certain churches. A month later Cardinal Faulhaber delivered his famous sermon of protest in St. Michael's Church, describing the arrest as "marking the start of a new phase of the Kulturkampf for the destruction of the Catholic Church." Vatican wireless went on to say that it now had no news of the Sodality nor of other Catholic activities in Germany: "Nor had it seen the pastorals of the German bishops for eighteen months," adding "we cannot give news from second- or third-hand sources." It should be noted that pastorals were issued in Lent 1944, which were analysed in Summary No. 237 under "Germany." It is astonishing to hear that the German censor could prevent their entry into the Vatican. Fr. Mayer was called the Catholic Niemoeller, and Cardinal Faulhaber's name is a household word in Germany, so that the Pope and the Vatican wireless would be appealing to a wide and receptive public, and proclaiming themselves once more upholders of the rights of societies and individuals against the totalitarian State. They would also be encouraging all who should hold similar views in Germany. As Sir D'Arcy Osborne said of the Pope's Christmas Eve message: "We cannot but welcome His Holiness's presence on the democratic band-wagon."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The German attempts to relieve Buda seem to have spent their strength, and the latest reports showed the Red Army on the offensive again west of the capital, while further gains have been made in Buda itself. Besides Roumanian, Bulgarian troops are now helping the Red Army, while some Slovaks are assisting the Germans and Szálasi Hungarians.

The Soviets report a beginning of restoration of civilian life in Pest, and throughout liberated Hungary, a development of activity among "democratic organisations."

The Social Democrat and Communist Parties have concluded an agreement and established a joint consultative committee.

President Roosevelt has appointed Mr. H. F. A. Schoenfeld, formerly United States Minister in Finland, to be United States representative in Hungary (in addition to and separate from the Control Commission) with personal rank of Minister.

Roumania.

Dl Gheorghiu-Dej, the Minister of Transport, on his recent return from Moscow, was accompanied by Dna Anna Pauker, a leader of the extreme Left-wing Communists. Her arrival has been the signal for a new outbreak of Communist activity. At a meeting of the party she made a statement, with what backing of authority is not known, to the effect that, if a Communist Government were formed, and if, incidentally, Maniu and his supporters were relegated to a position of complete powerlessness and obscurity, the Soviet Government would be prepared to hand over to Roumania the whole of the administration of Transylvania, would return all Roumanian prisoners of war, and would grant to Roumania co-belligerent status. One condition of this being that there should be no interference on the part of the Roumanian Government with existing Roumanian economy, and no nationalisation of industry or banking. It is not uncommon for inducements of an extravagant type to be held out by aspiring politicians—it was an expedient successfully used by the Iron Guard in its earlier days—and Roumanians are extraordinarily credulous in such matters. On the matter being put to General Vinogradov by the responsible Minister, the replies were vague, and the most that could be got from the General was that the question should be referred to Moscow. If recent experience is anything to go by, this means that the Soviet Government has no intention of making the suggested concessions. Dna Pauker's activity, combined with the fact that Dl Patrașcanu tried to dissuade her from causing dissension in the Government at the present time, rather suggests that General Radescu's Government is in a strong position and that things are going reasonably well.

The deportation of workers of German origin from Roumania continues to occupy the attention both of Great Britain and the United States. 57,000 have already been assembled, of whom 26,700 have already gone. The remainder are expected to leave by the 1st February. To put it mildly the conditions of travel appear to leave a good deal to be desired, but this may be due to mismanagement and callousness on the part of minor officials in charge of the business. Since these people are required to work, it is in the Soviet authorities' own interest to deposit them at the scene of their labours in a reasonably fit condition.

A trade agreement with Bulgaria was concluded on the 9th January. Roumania will export goods, mainly petroleum products to the value of 300 million lei, against the import of an assortment of goods from Bulgaria, including skins, silkworm eggs, various seeds, tobacco and non-ferrous metals. The rate of exchange is 1 leva = 1,817 lei.

The Roumanian Home Service Radio announces that in deference to the concern which it has occasioned, the order banishing religious teaching in certain classes of schools has been rescinded.

Yugoslavia.

There has been no military development, except that from the Bosna valley the Germans have struck to the west and captured Travnik.

At Zagreb in February bread cards will only be available for officials. Radio Zagreb said: "it will be left to the people to provide their own bread."

The Partisans intend to remove the German Minority from the Banat, and are deporting all such Germans between the ages of 16 and 60 to forced labour in the U.S.S.R. They have also removed the Magyar villagers of Churug, in Batchka, not because of their nationality, but on the charge that they took part in the reprisals on the Serbs of the district of Zhabalj in January 1942.

The first session of the Yugoslav Trade Union Congress took place on the 23rd January. The normal purposes of such unions were emphasised, and also the need to subordinate them to the war effort, and the inclusion of agricultural labourers and poor peasants was demanded. A speaker from the Bor mines, which were French-owned before the war, said: "The Bor mines are ours and should be the property of the Yugoslav people."

The relations of the authorities of the Serb Orthodox Church with the Partisans are reported to be cool. The Metropolitan recently blessed the Royal Family by name and omitted the traditional mention of the Army, which appears in the liturgy with the adjective "Christ-loving." The Partisans say that at present they are unable to pay the clergy; and, if the Church continues its "neutrality," Tito's patience may be exhausted.

The attitude of the Partisan leaders in Macedonia is one of temporary disinterestedness in Greek affairs, but of determination to acquire Greek Macedonia for the Yugoslav Federation by peaceful means. Courts for the trial of collaborationists have been operating in Macedonia. These sit in camera, without jury or appeal or legal assistance for the accused.

A ship with 1,000 tons of relief stores left Italy for Split on the 23rd. A similar shipment will follow shortly.

Discussions took place between King Peter and Shubashitch, whose resignation the King had demanded, in order to find a formula which preserved the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement intact. On the 28th January Tito, addressing a meeting in Belgrade, denounced the King for attempting to create confusion in Yugoslavia and described the recent anti-royal demonstrations a "a trial plebiscite." He said that in his view the Agreement would be put into effect at once or not at all; and added: "That is my message to them in London." On the 29th an official statement in London explained that Shubashitch had handed to the King the resignation of his Cabinet, and that the King had re-appointed Shubashitch and his colleagues (except that General Ristitch, who was unwell, would be replaced); that it would be the duty of the new Government to carry out the Agreement, while "endeavouring to take account of the observations contained in the communiqué issued by the King on the 11th January" (see Summary No. 276, p. 13) and his other suggestions; and that the King had agreed to transfer his powers to a Regency Council, to be chosen by himself and appointed by royal decree (i.e., with the counter-signature of a Minister).

There appears now to be no obstacle to the fulfilment of the Agreement. Shubashitch and his colleagues are expected to leave for Belgrade shortly, to take their places in a Government with Tito and his colleagues.

Greece.

The conference which it was hoped would take place on the 25th January between representatives of the Greek Government and of E.L.A.S. had to be postponed owing to a misunderstanding. On the 22nd a delegation claiming to represent E.A.M. presented itself at Livadia; it consisted of MM. Partsalidis and Porphyrogenis (Communists), Tsirimokos (E.L.D.), Gavrielidis (A.K.E.), and Georgalas (E.P.O.N.). The delegates were accompanied by thirteen experts. The Regent's invitation had been sent, not to E.A.M., which is, in fact, disintegrating, but to E.L.A.S. Central Committee, a purely Communist body, and he had invited them to send only three delegates; the delegation which arrived at Livadia had set off before the Regent's message had been received. Both M. Sophianopoulos and the Regent, in conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador, expressed the view that the only conference likely to produce results was one with the three Communist leaders. The Regent, therefore, sent a further message asking E.L.A.S. to send as delegates three responsible leading members of the Communist Party, accompanied by one non-voting military expert. This message was apparently crossed by a message from E.L.A.S. Central Committee stating that the delegates mentioned above, with the addition of Professor Svolos, now in Athens, were the most representative and the best fitted to take part in negotiations with the Government. At the same time the Regent received a message from the delegation at Livadia, pointing out that they held full authority from the Central Committee of E.A.M. to sign an agreement; they could not, however, take upon themselves to change the number and composition of the delegates. To this the Regent replied that he must insist that the E.L.A.S. delegation consist of three—no more—responsible Communist leaders. E.A.M. Central Committee replied indignantly that it was unreasonable that the Communist Party alone, and not E.A.M. as a whole, should be represented. In a further message the Regent explained that it was a matter of common knowledge that the principal and decisive voice on the questions to be discussed belonged to the Communist Party; he asked that the delegation include MM. Siantos and Partsalidis, and fixed the meeting for the 1st February. It now remains to be seen whether M. Siantos and his colleagues are prepared to take the responsibility of letting the conference break down on the question of the size and composition of the E.L.A.S. delegation.

Meantime, in some districts, E.L.A.S. appear to be releasing hostages in a haphazard manner, leaving them to straggle home as best they may. In Salonica, however, the situation remains extremely unsatisfactory. As no hostages had been returned there by the 24th, a representative of the International Red Cross set out for Verria to see General Bakirdzis, who, though apparently willing to be co-operative himself, was having difficulties with the Communists. His statements on this occasion were inconsistent and evasive. No hostages, he said, had been removed from the Salonica area during the evacuation; all persons arrested for political reasons had been released. Immediately afterwards he said that orders had been given for all such persons to be released. On the 26th, in a communication to a British divisional commander, General Bakirdzis repeated his statement that no hostages were taken from Salonica and added that all persons under preventive arrest had been released before the evacuation.

A Trade Union delegation, headed by Sir Walter Citrine, arrived in Athens on the 22nd, and was received by the Regent on the 23rd. The delegates also visited General Plastiras and members of his Government, listened to the views of five hundred British troops who took part in the recent fighting, and made contact with officials of the General Confederation of Greek Labour; they also met E.A.M. labour leaders at Livadia and brought four of them back to Athens for discussions with the Greek Government and the Athenian Trade Unionists.

Albania

The provisional Government has appointed a special court to try war criminals, which means in practice all who collaborated with the Axis, all who opposed the partisans, and in particular all who used violent methods against the partisans and against their sympathisers. Propaganda is accordingly being directed against former Cabinet Ministers, Balli Kombetar and the Legality Party, as being reactionaries, quislings and traitors who must be severely punished.

Elections have been held in southern Albania to the local councils which the provisional Government has been using for administrative purposes. The freedom of these elections, which is stressed with some boasting, may be judged by the broadcast announcement that collaborationists must not be allowed to vote.

Marshal Tito's attitude to Albania, it appears, is not to exclude the possibility of Albania entering a federal union with Yugoslavia some time in the future. He has a military mission in Tirana. The Albanian and Yugoslav flags are reported to fly side by side at Prizren, Priština, Peć and Djacovica. In Albania the wireless constantly insists on the closeness of Albanian relations with Marshal Tito and on the need for the two countries to go on working together, and it quoted with evident satisfaction an article in a Yugoslav Communist paper praising Albanian co-operation and admitting that the majority of the population in the districts of Prizren and Peć is Albanian.

Bulgaria.

In an extremely menacing speech, the Public Prosecutor reviewed his indictment and pinned the ultimate responsibility for the fatal pro-German policy on the late King Boris. "The time has come," he said, "to bring his spirit before the People's Court, to stigmatise him as the murderer of the Bulgarian people and to deny him the title of King." He demanded the death penalty for the three ex-Regents, for all the members of Filov's two Cabinets (1940–42) and of the Bozhilov Cabinet (1943). A third division of the People's Court has been opened at Sofia to deal with the doctors, priests, journalists and others who went at the Germans' invitation to see evidence of alleged Soviet atrocities at Katyn and Vinnitsa. In the provinces People's Courts have been opened at Varna, at Plovdiv, to try sixty officers and men of a division which was sent against the partisans, and at Botevgrad, where fifty people are accused of murdering partisans and burning down their houses.

A much-advertised meeting of the Agrarian Union at Pleven was attended by 100,000 people. Four Cabinet Ministers belonging to the Agrarian Party spoke, as did Terpeshev, the rhetorical Communist Minister. All emphasised the harmony alleged to prevail between Agrarians and Communists and the need for these two components of the Fatherland Front to stand shoulder to shoulder and resist all attempts to split them. Terpeshev, after commending Nikola Petkov, one of the Agrarian Ministers who has succeeded Dr. G. M. Dimitrov as secretary-general of the Agrarian Party, went so far as to say that that Party had emerged stronger from its recent crisis. This was a scarcely veiled expression of Communist displeasure with Dr. Dimitrov, and it is likely enough that when Dr. Dimitrov resigned he had decided that it would be good tactics to go to earth.

The Communists, whose organisation and activity largely compensate for their lack of numbers, are making a bold bid to eclipse their only serious rivals, the Agrarians. Another move in the Communists' game was to start their own co-operative. The Agricultural Bank, which controls all co-operatives and had itself evidently come under Communist influence, then ordered the new Communist co-operative to be merged with Napred, the Socialist co-operative which has a twenty-five years' reputation for sound management and moderate politics and has been in close relations with the British and Swedish co-operative movements. The Communists will now presumably try to undermine the Socialist Party by obtaining control of the joint Socialist–Communist co-operative, and then perhaps tackle Tsveno, the other small Party in the Government coalition. That they have made no attempt to take over the Agrarian co-operative, which with the Socialist co-operative formed the core of the co-operative movement, suggests that the Communists do not at present want to have an open break with the Agrarians.

Turkey.

Owing to the practical difficulties entailed by their despatch home, some eight hundred official and unofficial Germans—many of whom have no desire to return to the Reich—are still in Turkey, though interned. The Japanese Ambassador and his staff of some fifty people have been interned in the Japanese Embassies at Angora and Istanbul as the Turkish authorities have been unable yet to obtain Soviet visas for them to return to Japan via Russia.

A Turkish ship left Istanbul on the 28th January for Piræus with food and clothing given by the Red Crescent. The Turkish Ambassador and Greeks who had found refuge in Turkey returned at the same time. The Turkish Government has agreed that the Ægean islands may be supplied from British dumps in Turkey and that Turkish caiques may be used for the purpose.

Turkey proposes to send trade delegations to negotiate a compensation agreement with Switzerland and to obtain delivery of goods bought but stuck in Bulgaria. A Roumanian delegation is being received at Angora.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The news of the death sentence pronounced on the two murderers of Lord Moyne has been calmly received in Egypt, where the general public regard it as a just penalty. It now only remains for the sentence to be confirmed by the Egyptian Prime Minister, and there seems little doubt that he will confirm it, in spite of his being urged to exercise clemency by a number of Jewish organisations in different parts of the world. If the sentence is confirmed, the men will probably be hanged in a few weeks' time.

In the King's Speech read by the Prime Minister at the opening of the new Egyptian Parliament reference was made to a proposed court of enquiry relating to the misdeeds of the late Government, and there have been other indications that the present Government intends to prosecute Nahas Pasha and his Ministers at an early date. Makram Ebeid actually told a party of journalists on the 21st January that prosecution would be undertaken in accordance with certain articles of the Egyptian Constitution. The Prime Minister himself is probably against the prosecution; on the other hand, Makram is undoubtedly pressing for it, while King Farouk's hostile attitude to Nahas is well known. We ourselves would deplore the victimisation of any members of the late Government.

King Farouk's visit to the Hejaz began on the 24th January, when the royal yacht anchored at Yenbo and he was welcomed by Ibn Saud. According to The Times, which accorded the event the distinction of a leading article in its issue of the 30th January, King Farouk and his suite spent the 25th January in the royal camp, where they wore Arab dress when attending the dinner given in their honour by Ibn Saud. Relations between the Arab States were no doubt the main topic of conversation between the two monarchs, but details have not yet been officially received. King Farouk later left for Medina accompanied by several of Ibn Saud's sons and Shaikh Yusuf Yassin.

(For the visit of the Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria to Russia see under "Soviet Union.")

The situation in Syria seems to be deteriorating. Further demonstrations by students took place in Damascus on the 23rd and 24th January. They were conducted in an orderly manner and no untoward incidents took place. But more serious demonstrations have since occurred elsewhere, all of them connected with the demand for a national army. On the 24th a debate was held in the Syrian Chamber on the estimates for such a force, when many Deputies spoke in support of the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales or of the creation of a national army without further delay. A resolution was unanimously passed calling on the Government to take over "the Syrian troops under French command," at the earliest opportunity. General Beynet nevertheless refuses to regard the situation as serious, though in a recent conversation with a British representative he spoke in much the same strain as in his reported talk with Fuad Hamza (see Summary No. 277). If the Syrians chose to throw down the challenge, the French would take it up, and he could "sweep away everything in two hours." All he wanted was for the people of Syria and the Lebanon to keep quiet for six months; French and British aims were identical, and it was intolerable that the two Allies should have their attention distracted from the important issues of the war by troubles in the Levant.

Our policy will still be to try to convince the Syrian Government that negotiation on a friendly basis is the first step towards an understanding, and that, unless the Syrians prove less intransigent than heretofore, it will be difficult for us to help them. On the other hand, we cannot allow the French to follow a policy in the Levant States that is different from ours. We are pledged to the independence of the States, and if we failed to keep the French up to their promises, our whole position in the Middle East might well be endangered. Mr. Eden recently told the French Ambassador in London of the strength of Syrian opposition to the conclusion of a treaty with France, and expressed the hope that the French Government would not underestimate the seriousness of the situation or the need for appointing a first-class man, possessed of sympathy and tact, to deal with it.

But our efforts to influence both sides are not likely to be helped by the statement attributed to General de Gaulle at a recent press conference. He laid emphasis on the maintenance by France of her pre-eminent position in the Levant States, and referred to "outside interference," but for which agreement would long ago have been reached between France and the Levant States. Nor will General de Gaulle's statement about France's pre-eminent position be likely to convince the Syrian Government of the advantage of further discussions with the French. The Syrians have said repeatedly that they will not give to France any pre-eminence in their country, and their determined attitude on this point has been well illustrated by the communication recently sent to Ibn Saud by the Syrian President. Ibn Saud had advised Shukri Quwatli to negotiate a treaty with France (see Summary No. 277), but Shukri has replied quite definitely that Syria could neither conclude a treaty with that country nor accord her a privileged position. This is all the more remarkable when it is remembered what influence Ibn Saud is generally able to exercise on Shukri. (See also under "France.")

The earlier demonstrations that took place in Syria were duly reported to the Iraqi Government by their Minister in Damascus, and on receipt of the news the Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs told His Majesty's Ambassador that, although his Government had no wish to interfere in the internal affairs of the Levant States, he was afraid that, should there be a clash with the French, it would be difficult for them to avoid intervention. Sir K. Cornwallis in reply told him that we were fully alive to the difficulties of the situation, and that we were doing everything we could to ease matters. The question of the supply of arms by the Iraqi Government to the Syrian gendarmerie has again cropped up, and we are informing the Iraqi authorities that we could not agree to their assisting the Levant States in this way at present.

The Persian Ambassador called on Sir A. Cadogan at the Foreign Office on the 16th January in order to discuss the present position in Persia. M. Taqizadeh said that Russian pressure in northern Persia was steadily increasing. The Soviet authorities refused to allow Persian armed forces to enter the region where they were in control, and the Russians could terrorise the population into making such manifestations as they themselves desired. They were also pressing for the repeal of the recent oil concession law, to which, of course, the Persian Government could not agree. His Excellency added that he could not understand the motive behind Soviet action, which he felt was not really the need for oil. He had recently read an article in War and the Working-Class, in which it was said that Russia herself did not need the oil, but wished to deny it to the Americans and British. Finally, the Ambassador asked whether His Majesty's Government would be prepared at the forthcoming meeting to put the Persian case, and endeavour to secure that Soviet policy should conform to the tripartite treaty and to the Tehran Declaration of 1943. To this Sir A. Cadogan replied that, if and when a meeting took place, he expected that we should be disposed to raise the question.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 24th January Chou En-lai went by aeroplane from Yenan to Chungking to resume the Communist-Kuomintang negotiations. He was met at the airfield by General Hurley, the American Ambassador. Coinciding with the return of Chou En-lai to Chungking, Mr. Grew, the American Assistant Secretary of State, said that the United States was ready to use "its friendly good offices when requested by the Chinese" to bring about agreement between the Chinese Communists and the Chinese Government.

Before he left for Chungking Chou En-lai gave an interview to the correspondent of Yenan Radio. He said that in November 1944 he had gone to Chungking with instructions to raise the question of a coalition Government but that this was rejected and he returned without result (see this Summary No. 274). Chou declared that the Communists considered that the establishment of a "democratic coalition" was the only way to overcome the existing crisis, and that other perfunctory measures, no matter in what form, would certainly not help the country. He declared that "what the people of the entire nation expect from the National Government is the immediate abolition of one-party dictatorship; establishment of a democratic coalition Government and a unified High Command; the recognition of the legal status of all anti-Japanese partisans and groups and of popularly-elected Governments in all liberated areas; the abolition of all secret police activities; the repeal of all laws in restraint of popular freedom; the release of political prisoners; and the withdrawal of the troops surrounding the Shensi–Kansu–Ninghsia Border region and attacking the Eighth Route and New Fourth Armies."

This shows that the Communists have abated none of their demands and are in a confident and uncompromising mood. They evidently believe that, with the support of dissident elements within the Kuomintang, they can bring about the downfall of the Kuomintang dictatorship. With Communists and Left-wing supporters in key positions in the Government and the higher Army directorate, with Tai Li and his secret police gone, and with complete freedom for the Communists to organise and proselytise in all parts of China, Chiang and the Kuomintang would be virtually helpless. For the Generalissimo to accept such terms would mean the end of all that he has stood for and fought for since his rise to power. So far from doing this, he is reported now to be utilising the drive to secure student volunteers for the Army as a means of forming a special élite corps under his personal command. The Chungyang Jih Pao (25th January) said that this force would be given careful political training so as to provide the troops with a thorough insight into politics and ethics and an accurate understanding of Chinese history and geography. The Communists have been quick to perceive the danger to themselves of such a force; Yenan Radio (23rd January) alleged that people in Chungking described the Volunteer Youth as S.S. troopers and said that they were not true students, but ruffians and secret police sent into the schools by the Kuomintang.

It is possible that the Communists may overplay their hand and, through being too arrogant and uncompromising, may forfeit some of the sympathy and support which they at present enjoy. So far as the Americans are concerned, there are some signs that the tide of anti-Kuomintang feeling is on the ebb. On the 16th January Mr. Mansfield, a Democratic Representative from Montana, told the House of Representatives of his experiences and discussions in China while on a special mission there for President Roosevelt during November and December 1944. Mansfield saw the Generalissimo on the 11th December and had a frank talk with him about the Communist question. Chiang complained that the Americans expected Chungking to make all the concessions, and asked why they did not induce Yenan to make some as well. Mansfield's comment was that this sounded like a good suggestion. Mansfield made it clear to the House of Representatives that Chiang had offered the Communists recognition as a legal party, equipment of their armies on a basis of equality and participation in the Government, and that the Communists had rejected these terms because they feared that their share in the Government would be very limited and that their armies would be wiped out. Mansfield gave a very fair account of the military, political and economic shortcomings of the Chungking Government, and showed how some at least of these were unavoidable in a country which is only in process of achieving national unity and an effective governmental administration. He gave Chiang full credit for what he had achieved, and concluded that the Generalissimo was the one man who could keep China united; no other had either the prestige or the ability, and he should therefore be given every possible support by the United States. Reports such as this may serve to arouse sympathy for Chiang, who for his part has made a graceful gesture to the United States in naming the new India–China road the "Stilwell Road."

In a swift drive southwards from Hunan and northwards from the Canton area, the Japanese have wrested from the Chinese the last part of the Canton-Hankow Railway. Domei (the 29th January) said that the Japanese forces in Kwangtung on the 24th January occupied Shaokwan, the headquarters of General Yu Han-mou, Commander-in-Chief of the Seventh War Zone, and continued their advance to link up with their army coming down the railway from Hunan. The two forces made contact on the 27th January. The Japanese allege that Generals Yu Han-mou and Hsueh Yueh had been given strict instructions by the Generalissimo to defend the southern section of the Canton–Hankow railway, but that their forces, which the Japanese say comprised sixteen divisions, crumbled away. From the speed with which the Japanese accomplished their objective it is evident that they could have encountered little resistance.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Despite the President's recent admonition that Government officials should refrain from prophesying when the war is likely to end, and despite reiterated warnings against over-optimism, the progress of the war in Europe and the Far East has again precipitated the danger of another wave of over-optimism in the United States, which is likely to frustrate the President's attempt to secure the passage of a National Service Act, similar to the one in this country.

But international affairs this week, both military and political, have taken second place to the domestic conflict over the appointment of the Secretary of Commerce. By 14 votes (8 Republican and 6 Democrat) to 5 (all Democrat) the Senate Commerce Committee has rejected the nomination of Mr. Henry Wallace and at the same time has approved a Bill introduced by Senator George (Democrat, Georgia, and Chairman of the Senate Post-War Economic and Planning Committee) to transfer the Federal lending agencies from the control of the Department of Commerce. The battle in the newspapers and on the radio continues with unabated fury and there is little change in the opinion as set forth in last week's Summary. Apart from the handful of papers which support New Deal policies, the press is overwhelmingly opposed to Mr. Wallace's nomination and gives little publicity to his evidence before the Senate Committee. The issue is not merely a personal one between Mr. Jones and Mr. Wallace, though their old enmity gives it dramatic intensity. Mr. Jones is regarded as a champion of the Right, a believer in the minimum of State control and the maximum freedom for business. Mr. Wallace, on whom the hopes of the Progressives are centred, believes in the increasing co-operation of the State and private industry in order to ensure, as he himself stated, sixty million jobs for Americans at home and the adoption by the United States of an expansionist policy in international trade. Mr. Wallace is supported by Liberals and Labour, and particularly by the Political Action Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organisations, which sees in him a Presidential candidate for 1948. But it is this very support which has to a large extent awakened the antagonism of the Southern Democrats who fear the political force which organised Labour has already demonstrated itself to be during the late elections; and the combination of Republicans and conservative Southern Democrats may lead the Senate to refuse to confirm Mr. Wallace's nomination, or at least to deprive the Commerce Department of the Federal loan agencies in order "to avoid the most disastrous possibilities of ultimate confirmation."

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the other Government lending agencies, have lending authorisations to the extent of some £12,000 million, of which the bulk is at present tied up in war production plants, loans to industry, and stocks of raw materials. Mr. Jones contends that Mr. Wallace is incapable of administering these vast loans and disagrees with his "untried ideas and idealistic schemes." Mr. Wallace, on the other hand, maintains that the Government's investment resources should be made to work in co-operation with private enterprise to ensure full employment at home by helping small businesses and by financing large public works projects. He maintains that Mr. Jones sides with the large money interests against the interests of "the common man."

There are those among American commentators who believe that Mr. Roosevelt did not intend to further the nomination of Mr. Wallace and that, as at the Chicago Convention, the late Vice-President is in fact being thrown to the wolves. The move, they maintain, was a token move, intended to placate the C.I.O. In support of this contention they draw attention to the President's original letter to Mr. Jesse Jones in which he declared that Mr. Wallace asked specifically for the Commerce Department and that the major reason for nominating him was as a reward for his incessant and loyal support during the November elections; and they compare this "unblushing" political reward with the President's earlier plan in 1937 to pack the Supreme Court. In some quarters Mr. Jones's dismissal is also interpreted as a rebuke for his opposition to the Administration's policies and particularly for the part he is alleged to have played behind the scenes in fomenting the revolt of the Democrats in his native State of Texas.

Whatever the ultimate outcome of this complicated situation (and Mr. Roosevelt is reported to have issued a statement that America needs Mr. Wallace and that he himself counts on "his aid, his wisdom and courage"), there is no doubt that the underlying economic question is of immense importance not only to America but to the whole world, since it involves the question of the true function of government in a democratic State. And on this also turns the question whether after the war the United States can find work for her vastly increased production facilities and ensure full employment for her people, without running the risks of exporting unemployment overseas and thus precipitating another world economic collapse such as occurred in 1929. The Conservatives believe unfettered private enterprise is fully able to tackle this problem, while Mr. Wallace and his supporters favour a strong Central Government which will co-operate through its financial resources and by the exercise of controls, with private enterprise, to ensure full employment policies internally, and liberal trade policies externally. Whether the United States will reverse the apparent trend to the Right and favour the readoption of New Deal theories, with their acceptance of Federal responsibility for social conditions, remains to be seen.

The President has also suffered a further rebuff this week, which again emphasises the difficult situation created through the divorce of the Executive from the Legislative. The Federal Court in Chicago has ruled that the President's seizure of the Montgomery Ward mail order business is illegal. Upholding the company's contention that it is not a "war producing plant," the Court held that the President had rights only to seize plants equipped to produce articles necessary or useful in conducting the war. The court also noted that the War Labour Board's directives were "only advisory" and it expressed the view that if disputants were unwilling to obey, then "Congress alone is the only branch of the Government which can compel them to do so." It is expected that the Administration will appeal to the Supreme Court against this decision. Meanwhile the Army will continue to run Montgomery Ward's properties. One common factor in both the disputes is that both decisions are also blows at the Congress of Industrial Organisations. This is the organisation principally supporting Mr. Wallace and it is also the union organisation with which Montgomery Ward's have been in dispute for over two years. Mr. William Davis, of the War Labour Board, maintains that if the decision of the Federal Court is not reversed then "the whole plan of peaceful settlements of wartime labour disputes will collapse."

The Committee to investigate un-American activities, which hitherto has been popularly known as the Dies Committee, and which has now been placed on a permanent footing, is to be presided over by Representative Hart (Democrat, New Jersey), who belongs to the Hague political machine. Despite therefore the inclusion of the reactionary Representative Rankin (Democrat, Mississippi), so long as the Hague machine co-operates with the Congress of Industrial Organisations as it did during the November elections the Committee would appear to be unlikely to encourage anti-labour investigations as did its predecessor (see Summary No. 275).

LATIN AMERICA.

The majority of the American countries have now accepted the invitation of the Mexican Government to the meeting of Foreign Ministers which is to be held at Mexico City on the 21st February, but most of them have veiled their views in a discreet silence. Colombia (see Summary No. 271) and Venezuela are notable exceptions, and the Venezuelan Foreign Minister, at a press conference on the 19th January, emphasised the importance which his Government attached to Pan-American unity, deplored the fact that Argentina and (possibly) El Salvador would be absent from the coming conference, and declared that Venezuela would openly work for the return of Argentina to the fold by any means consistent with the needs of security and self-preservation recognised by the continent. The future world-security organisation, he believed, should take a federative form "in which America might become a coherent factor."

The (apparently unauthorised) action of the Peruvian Ambassador in Washington in proposing the motion of the Governing Body of the Pan-American Union, that the Union should abstain from discussing the Argentine problem, has aroused much criticism in Lima, where it is pointed out that Peru has few friends in South America and could not afford to antagonise Argentina. All references to Sr. Beltrán's motion were at first expunged from the local press by the censor, but the Government has been obliged by the intensity of criticism to issue a communiqué pretending that Sr. Beltrán did no more than represent the opinions of all his colleagues.

In Buenos Aires, the Argentine Government has published a decree (signed by all its members on the 15th January) which establishes severe penalties for crimes against the State. The first two articles are concerned with the repression of crimes against the internal and external security of the State: the third is designed to "assure the supplies that might be needed by the armed forces": the fourth and fifth are concerned with measures against acts which hinder production, such as strikes and sabotage: and the sixth covers crimes "such as the spreading of false and tendentious news, the dissemination of doctrines that advocate the use of force to suppress or change the basic principles of Government and membership or direction of associations with such aims." This decree was described as placing Argentina on the same footing as the majority of countries. The measures against strikes are of interest in view of the embarrassments these have caused to the Argentine Government (see Summary No. 273). It is also to be noted that the Confederation of Latin American Workers recently called for a general strike throughout Latin America on the 25th January as a demonstration of sympathy with Argentine workers. Colonel Perón has now congratulated himself and the Argentine workers that all that happened in Argentina (so he alleges) was a partial strike in one cold-storage plant. In Brazil the Minister of Labour (one of the strongest opponents of the proposed elections) (see last week's Summary) dropped ominous hints of the possibility of disturbances. But none have been reported.

Rail communications between Guatemala and El Salvador are suspended; and there are reports that Salvadorean troops are marching on to the Guatemalan frontier and that they may receive support from Honduras.

The Soviet Ambassador to Mexico and Mrs. Umanski have been killed in an aeroplane accident.

GERMANY.

ALTHOUGH the Russians have not been able to cross the stretch of the Oder lying due east of Berlin, the Germans are showing themselves very conscious of the threat to their capital. The daily bulletins of the German High Command have, during the past week, given an impression of an increasing weight of strength opposed to the Russian attack and have avoided direct admission of serious loss. They describe the desperate resistance of German garrisons behind the Russian lines in Elbing, Poznan, Schneidemühl and Torun; the numerous harassing attacks by Luftwaffe formations have been stressed. The bulletin of the 1st February mentioned a Russian advance "as far as the Oder north-west of Küstrin." That of the 4th announced the loss of Torun by saying that the garrison had fought its way back to the German lines in accordance with orders. Counter-attacks have been mentioned in these bulletins, but only as of local importance. Dittmar, speaking on the 30th, said nothing of any significant German counter-stroke. A broadcast on the European service on the 1st February presumed that the majority of German reserves would be kept back until a group was assembled "capable of genuine tactical measures." In general, the Germans have claimed no more than a "consolidation" of their front, for which they seemed inclined to thank the thaw ("worth a whole army," as a D.N.B. comment put it), and Marshal Zhukov's caution in strengthening his flanks before advancing further in the centre. A European summary on the 2nd February said that the first phase was nearly over, but that viewed as a whole the battle would not reach its climax until the "German central reserves" had been thrown into it. So far, according to a political review on the German Home Service of the same day, German counter-measures had only had considerable effect at the bases of the long Russian wedge directed at Berlin. At its tip things were still "at the improvisation stage." The broadcast suggested, however, that this was proving costly in German lives: soldiers of the Wehrmacht and the Volkssturm were "daily furnishing fresh proof of their readiness for action and their fanatical determination." Thus had the people's war, in the sense used by Clausewitz, become a reality.

Berlin is pictured in such broadcasts as "ready for battle." Barricades were going up; more Volkssturm units being formed; tanks, armoured columns, trains of troops were moving east in great abundance. Crack units were awaiting the enemy outside the city. The daylight raid of the 3rd February was reported by the O.K.W. as "a United States terror raid" in which "damage was done to dwelling houses and cultural buildings, mainly in the centre, and the civilian population had losses." Recent accounts of life in Berlin suggest that for some weeks now energetic measures have been taken to prepare the city for siege. Battalions of Volkssturm have been despatched eastwards. In forming such battalions care has been taken to segregate politically unreliable men and to put them under strict S.S. control. Government buildings have been mined, preparations have been made for further evacuation of important offices. It has also been reported that some Berlin "flak" defences have been moved nearer the battle line.

German propaganda has striven to divert public attention from any feeling that the "fortress Europe" of two years ago has shrunk to "fortress Berlin." It has gratefully taken up Hitler's rejection of a "Wilsonian" declaration by the Allies, and warned the public against any united statement by the Big Three. Hitler's speech of the 30th, summarised in last week's Summary, was remarkable for the absence of any statement of the German political line of the moment. Hitler spoke neither of dividing nor wearing down the Allies. Goebbels, as if to repair the omission, in his broadcast of the 28th January, drew a picture, at once alarming and encouraging, of what would happen "if the German divisions in the east suddenly ceased to exist," thus allowing "the 200 Soviet assault divisions" to confront "the 80 Anglo-American divisions." He prophesied that in such a case America would withdraw from Europe and Britain would prefer to appease rather than to resist Bolshevism. A recently-captured document, dating from the end of last year, affords interesting evidence that his weekly articles have not always been very popular with the German Security authorities. Their observers find Goebbels too educated and too subtle for the average man. In an out-spoken report they make damaging criticisms of German propaganda at a critical stage in the war. The news is dull and cheerless. Hitler's voice is not heard. No leader takes his place as national spokesman. Criticism of propaganda is thought so prevalent within the Reich as to suggest a danger more likely even than revolt, a general disbelief in National Socialism itself. One German commander has striven to deal with criticism among troops in a somewhat novel manner. Field-Marshal Model, as a German military newspaper reported last week, is in the habit of carrying leaflets in his pocket for distribution to troops with whom he seeks an exchange of views. The latest of these explains that German troops in the east are facing a dramatic repetition of what the Army in the west experienced last autumn, and asserts that, just as the Allied plan to end the war in 1944 was smashed by "the boldness of the German command and the gallantry of the German soldier," so a like outcome may be expected in the east.

Hardly secondary to the military gains of the Red Army is the effect of their advance on the machinery of the German war effort. The province of Upper Silesia which was created in 1939 by fusing the mining and industrial centres of Poland and Czechoslovakia with those of German Upper Silesia, has over 4 million inhabitants and produces (with the addition of Mährisch-Ostrau) about 110 million tons of hard coal annually, representing half of the Reich's current output. In mid-1944 the Gau contributed about 10 per cent. to the German-controlled steel production of 36 million tons. Since then the current German steel production has fallen to about 16 million tons, making the share of Upper Silesia about 23 per cent. Roughly 2 million tons of the Reich's steel production depended on supplies of coke and coking coal from Upper Silesia.

It is impossible to assess fully the loss of other basic materials derived from the areas now overrun by the Russians. These areas contributed 50 per cent. of Germany's zinc, 25 per cent. of her lead, 20 per cent. of her rubber (buna), 10 per cent. of her sulphuric acid, 10 to 15 per cent. of her shell propellant supplies and they included (in April, 1944) about 10 per cent. of the German-controlled mineral oil refinery and synthetic oil capacities. Equally serious will be the loss of finishing capacity, used to manufacture parts for tanks, aeroplanes, U-boats, in particular radio valves, forgings, crankshafts, heavy plate and armour plate.

In addition the Germans will be deprived of manufacturing plant which produced one quarter of the Reich's output of railway wagons. The German railways which relied to 50 per cent. of their fuel consumption on Upper Silesian supplies will have to be fed from the Ruhr at the price of longer hauls and a loss in efficiency. Administrative plans for the distribution of allotted supply quotas will have to be completely revised. The repercussions (direct and indirect) of the eastern losses thus far exceed in magnitude anything the Germans have had to cope with since the war began. The loss of supplies must lead to the closing of much industrial plant in the Reich, and consequently, instead of the shortage of labour which has been a feature of German economy over the last two years, workers of high priority will be unemployed. At a moment of national emergency such men may well be mobilised to strengthen the German fighting forces.

The three Gaus of East Prussia, Warthegau and Danzig West-Prussia supplied to the Reich about 1·15 million tons of bread grain, sufficient to feed about 8 million people. To this must be added delivery surpluses of potatoes, fodder grain, meat and fat products. Although a considerable amount of these surpluses may have been sent into the Reich, the cuts in rations announced on the 2nd February suggest a lack of total supplies, and not only a lack of supplies at the right places. The Reich Minister of Food has decreed that the food ration cards for the 72nd and 73rd ration period are to cover nine weeks instead of eight, i.e., until the 8th April. As the losses of sugar imposed by the war are particularly high, no sugar will be issued during the 74th period. Consumers must, therefore, make their next two months' rations last nine weeks instead of eight, and their next sugar rations last thirteen weeks instead of eight. From the beginning of the 72nd rationing period, the potato ration of 3 kilog. per head per week has been reduced to 2·5 kilog., and in future the storage of eating potatoes will not be allowed.

The cuts are said to be temporary and it is implied that further reductions are to be expected. It is explained that the lost Gaus have an agricultural surplus, which will no longer be available, and that the hundreds of thousands of evacuees, who previously produced food not only for themselves but also for others, have now become consumers for whom food must be found. Stocks of food in the abandoned territories have also been lost. At the same time military movements and evacuation have placed a burden on the transport system which has created great difficulties for the supply of food.

A survey of shop stewards, or factory-wardens (Betriebsobmänner), in factories, undertaken by the German Labour Front (D.A.F.) early in 1944 disclosed some remarkable figures. In Baden, for instance, only 117,000 out of a total of 221,000 were shown as Party members. It appears that managers have in the past got rid of ultra-Nazi shop stewards by having them reclassified for military service. It was hoped to improve matters by replacing stewards who were not Party members and by getting shop stewards exempted from military service as key technical personnel.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

As a result of his progress in Upper Silesia, Marshal Koniev is now in a position to strike, if he chooses, through the Moravian Gate into Czechoslovakia, with the twin possible objectives of attacking the war industry of the Bohemian lands and linking up with Malinovsky's army on the north bank of the Danube for an eventual drive on Vienna. This situation, according to neutral sources, has produced a tense atmosphere in the Protectorate where the Czechs are eagerly awaiting an opportunity to strike a blow towards their liberation and the German population is openly apprehensive. In these circumstances, writes Aftontidningen, "a small spark could cause a violent explosion."

On the 19th January, at a private meeting which he called in London, M. Rudolf Bechyne, Deputy Premier of the pre-Munich Czechoslovak Government, delivered a violent attack on the Government of Dr. Beneš and M. Šrámek which, he asserted, had "neither programme nor authority," and called for its replacement by "resolute, decent and competent men." During the past week, Bratislava propaganda, more desperate than ever for material, has devoted much energy to the exploitation of the "evidence of disruption" among the London Czechoslovaks thus dropped into its lap.

As was foreshadowed in last week's Summary, the Czechoslovak Government at its meeting on the 30th January, unanimously decided to give recognition to the Lublin "Provisional Government" of Poland. The Polish Government in London has reacted to this announcement by breaking off relations with the Czechoslovak Government (see also under "Poland").

POLAND.

Following the recognition of the Lublin Administration by the Czechoslovak Government last week, and the mutual appointment of envoys, the Polish Government in London has broken off relations with the Czechoslovak Government in a communiqué which added that the Polish Government had "long recognised that the Czechoslovak Government in London is not independent in its decisions" so that the recognition "did not come as a surprise to the Polish Government."

The Lublin Administration moved to Warsaw on the 1st February, those of its branches for which no accommodation is available in Praga and other suburbs being housed temporarily in the vicinity of either Warsaw or Lodz. Other administrative developments recently reported from Poland have been the reinstatement of the pre-war magistrates at Lodz, and the restoration of pre-war Polish labour legislation. Rapid progress is reported in the taking over by the Administration of factories found intact or slightly damaged in the newly liberated provinces, including Upper Silesian mines, foundries, &c.; and of agricultural industries pending the latter's transfer to peasants' mutual assistance associations. M. Bierut has said that his Administration will take over German Silesia and Southern East Prussia as soon as the military situation permits.

The Lublin (now Warsaw) Administration has conferred the Order Virtuti Militari on Marshals Zhukov, Rokossovsky and Koniev in gratitude for the liberation of Poland by their armies; special mention being made of the freeing of Lodz, Cracow and Upper Silesia with comparatively little damage. In Cracow a Te Deum was sung in the cathedral by order of Archbishop Sapieha.

Professor Grabski, who was president of the Polish National Council in London until M. Mikolajczyk's resignation, and went with him on his two visits to Moscow last year, has perhaps as much right as anyone to be considered one of Poland's elder statesmen. He was, incidentally, right-hand man to M. Dabski in the Polish delegation which negotiated the Treaty of Riga in 1920–21. He has just issued a pamphlet with the title of "Nil Desperandum," in which he welcomes his country's projected return to the old Polish lands in the west and north, which Bohemia and the Teutonic Knights seized at the time of Poland's weakness in the 14th century. The Polish Kings then compensated for these losses by joining to Poland Lithuanian, White Russian and Ukrainian lands in the East. This worked well enough while Russia was weak, but not when Russia again became strong. Professor Grabski therefore suggests that Poland should become a national State, incorporating all the Polish people, but leaving out the Slav and other minorities in the East. The enmity created by Germany is now so deep, he says, that no appeasement could lessen it. The need for Poland to rely on Russian help exists in any case; and for Poland he holds that it means an alliance in which Poland will be second in size among Slavonic peoples; and, with Czechoslovakia, will represent the western group of those peoples.

SOVIET UNION.

The Red Army's advance has proceeded more slowly this week, presumably owing to the thaw, but has continued to make significant progress. In East Prussia the ring round Königsberg was tightened by the capture of Heilsberg and Friedland on the 31st January, and of Landsberg and Bartenstein on the 4th February. Further south Torun, which had been by-passed when the Red Army swept into Pomerania a week earlier, fell on the 1st February. Marshal Zhukov's troops have meanwhile entered Brandenburg and reached the Oder east of Frankfurt. The Red Army has now crossed the German frontier on a front of 350 miles. The advance in the Carpathians has continued slowly, and Zakopane (in Poland) was taken on the 30th January. Fighting is still going on in Budapest. The Soviet communiqué of the 3rd February by implication admitted the truth of earlier German claims to have broken through to the Danube east of Székesfehérvár by claiming the recapture of places between that town and the Danube.

Metropolitan Alexei of Leningrad, locum tenens of the Patriarchal Throne, was elected Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia at the General Council (Sobor) of the Russian Church held at the Church of the Resurrection in Sokolniki near Moscow from the 31st January to the 2nd February. The new Patriarch, who is 67, is a Muscovite and took a law degree before being ordained and taking monastic vows in 1902. After being in charge of various ecclesiastical seminaries, Alexei received his first episcopal appointment in 1913, being made Bishop of Tikhvin, and later of Yamburg. In 1926 he was given the dignity of Archbishop as Administrator of the Novgorod diocese, and in 1933 he became Metropolitan of Leningrad. In the present war he has not been as prominent in public work as Metropolitan Nikolai Krutitsky, who was originally expected to succeed Patriarch Sergei, but he remained in Leningrad throughout the siege doing relief work, and was awarded the medal for the defence of Leningrad. The Sobor convened for the election was described as being composed of a bishop, a priest and a layman from each of the forty-four dioceses now existing in the U.S.S.R., though the figures of 41 archbishops and 126 representatives of the clergy and laity given as the total attendance does not tally with this. The canonical principle of the participation of the laity in a Russian patriarchal election, which had not been observed in the election of Patriarch Sergei in 1943, was thus secured, though the lay element had not the same strength as in the Sobor of 1917, when it was equal numerically to the clerical. There is no evidence as to how the delegates to the present Sobor were chosen. A departure was made from traditional procedure in that Patriarch Alexei was elected by open vote "conducted by means of interrogation of the episcopal Members of the Council." Since 1634 Russian patriarchs had been elected by a preliminary secret ballot of the Sobor, one name being chosen by lot from among the first three candidates on the list, and this practice was continued in the election of Patriarch Tikhon in 1917.

Much time was devoted at the Sobor to hearing accounts of the patriotic activities of the Church in war-time; Metropolitan Nikolai reporting that a total of over 20 million roubles had been contributed by believers to the Defence Fund. The Sobor unanimously adopted the Government's statute for the administration of the Russian Orthodox Church, and sent an address to the Government of the U.S.S.R., which was represented at the proceedings by M. Karpov, chairman of the Council for Orthodox Church Affairs.

The visiting delegates from Orthodox Churches abroad took no part in the election, apart from Metropolitan Benjamin, head of the section of the Russian Orthodox in North America, which acknowledges the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate. It is interesting to note that Metropolitan Theophilus, head of the main body of the Russian Church in the United States, which has hitherto maintained an attitude of extreme reserve towards the revival of the Moscow Patriarchate, should apparently have sent a delegation of three to attend the election, though they were not mentioned in the accounts of the proceedings. Apart from the other delegations mentioned in last week's Summary, one came after all from the Roumanian Patriarchate, headed not by the Patriarch himself but by Metropolitan Josef of Arges. The Church of Greece presumably regarded itself as represented by Metropolitan Germanos of Thyateira.

At the close of the meetings, the Sobor sent out an appeal to Christians of the whole world calling for renewed efforts to secure complete and final victory and the rooting out of the "very memory of the man-hating teaching of fascism": "if after the termination of the war fascism were again to start disseminating its terrible teaching to poison the rising generations with its venom, all the immeasurable sacrifices born in the name of victory would have been in vain." The appeal closed on a note of warning against heeding the voices of those who, "having the hardihood to consider themselves Christians," were calling, in the name of forgiveness, for pardon for the Fascist "infanticides and traitors." Such people were no less blameworthy than the Fascists themselves, since they had "joined in the sins of others." Christians throughout the world should struggle with all their force against "such monstrous distortions of the Saviour's divine doctrine." In conclusion, the Sobor sent its blessing to the working people of the whole world.

Attacks on the Vatican have been resumed during the past week, mostly in the form of reports from the United States. Tass (2nd February) quoted articles from the American magazine Protestant and the New York Post accusing the Pope of Fascist tendencies, and a day later gave an account of a declaration submitted to President Roosevelt by 1,600 American non-Catholic clergy. The signatories of this declaration were said to deprecate any deal with the Vatican, "which would be treason to the cause in which we fight." According to these clergy, whereas the Vatican had refrained from intervening in politics since 1870, it had started to take an active part in them again since 1929, and in the present conflict the Pope had come out on the side of the enemies of democracy. Izvestiya (2nd February), in an article roundly condemning the slowness of the purge of Fascists in Italy, also returned to the charge, "the higher the rank of a traitor, the more defenders he has, especially at the Vatican."

In contrast to the criticisms of Italy, Bulgaria has been lauded in the Soviet press for its swiftness in dealing out justice to traitors. "The significance of this first trial of international criminals in the present war far transcends the boundaries of Bulgaria."

Considerable prominence has been given by the Soviet press and wireless to the investigation of the accident which caused the death of the Soviet Ambassador Umansky and to the suggestion that the numbers of Falangists and other Fascist agents in Mexico may have been connected with it. El Popolar, organ of the Mexican Workers' Confederation, was quoted as saying that "an investigation should lead to drastic reprisals against the anti-Soviet provocations of the pro-Fascist press." The new Mexican ambassador to the U.S.S.R., M. Bassols, presented his credentials to the Kremlin on the 1st February.

M. Zaslavsky, who spent some time in this country before the war as a student, seems now cast for the rôle of press champion of Soviet interests vis-à-vis Great Britain. Following hard on his recent attack on the Duchess of Atholl comes his article in this week's Pravda lashing at The Economist. Both articles are in much the same vein of high indignation. The Economist leader of the 6th January, "Deadlock in Europe," in the light of later Soviet victories in Eastern Europe, provides the first target for M. Zaslavsky's ire and is indicated as "a classic example of blindness." But it is more especially the political theses underlying The Economist's "Armchair strategy" and its objection to handing over East Prussia to Poland which are attacked. Though described as an example of "alarming levity," the article in the issue of the 20th January on "The Russian Zone," with its allegations regarding conditions in Soviet-occupied Europe, apparently offended even more deeply than The Economist's first leader. M. Zaslavsky ineffectually attempts to rebut The Economist's contrast between the unanimity on Soviet foreign policy found in the Supreme Soviet and the searching analysis to which Government policy is subjected both in the House of Commons and Congress. Incidentally, in this polemic he makes one of the few direct references to the recent Greek political crisis found in the Soviet press: "What connexion is there with Greece, where there is an attempt to disarm those partisans who conducted a heroic struggle against the German invaders?"

SCANDINAVIA.

After the high expectations of sensational developments aroused by Quisling's visit to Hitler, the short and simple ceremony in Oslo on the 1st February came as a decided anti-climax. All that happened was the transference of the Storting building from the Reichskommissariat to the representatives of Nasjonal Samling. Neither Terboven nor Quisling was present; the necessary speeches were made by Dr. Koch and Vasbotten, quisling Minister of the Interior. The latter had a difficult task in reconciling his thanks for the restoration of a Norwegian building to Norwegian hands with a eulogy of the blessings of German occupation. There is a peculiar irony in the transfer of a building dedicated to the practice of free democratic discussion to the party which repudiates such methods of government, a party moreover which never secured a single seat in the building by the vote of the Norwegian people. What use Quisling will make of it remains to be seen. As a climax of bad stage management, someone threw an ineffective bomb at the back of the building after the ceremony had ended and the actors dispersed.

Great play is being made by German propaganda in Norway about the alleged discovery of a report of negotiations between the Norwegian Government and the Allies on the subject of post-liberation supplies. The inadequacy of the supplies contemplated is being strongly emphasised in the controlled press.

In an address to Norwegians in London on the 31st January, which was subsequently broadcast to Norway, M. Nygaardsvold disclosed the fact that a document proposing a particular treatment of post-war questions had been circulated with fourteen forged signatures, including those of five members of the Government. Actually, the Government did not consider it its business to adopt an attitude towards plans for the future economic and political life of Norway: it had not associated itself with any of the programmes for the future which had been devised by those who had been considering its problems. What we hoped for after liberation was a strong Norwegian front, in which elements of the Home Front and of the front abroad would be combined without mutual jealousy. He considered that no one but an ignoramus or a supporter of dictatorship could regard the suppression of party differences in a liberated Norway as a blessing, but the present Government, though originating with a particular party, had been, since April 1940, a coalition in which all parties were represented. The speech may be regarded as an answer to rumours to the effect that the present Government, in spite of its declarations, intends to entrench itself in office in the immediate post-liberation stage.

Considerable public interest, both in the Riksdag and the press, has been recently aroused in Sweden by the trial, on charges of espionage mainly directed against refugees, of the former head of the German-controlled Skandinaviska Telegram Bureau, Lönnegren, and an official of the Aliens' Commission named Paulsson. The former was arrested on the 23rd December, the latter on the 4th January. The case was made the basis of severe criticism of M. Möller, the Minister for Social Affairs, for employing on the Aliens' Commission a man with Paulsson's known pro-Nazi bias, though knowledge of this was repudiated by M. Möller. As a result of the agitation, a committee to investigate the scandal has been set up by the Government under the chairmanship of M. Sandler, Prime Minister in 1925–26 and Minister for Foreign Affairs from 1932–39. The trial continues.

Further attacks on Swedish vessels by unidentified foreign torpedo craft have led to an extension of the escort system. An attack of this kind directed against the Swedish minesweeper Landsort, on the 21st January, between Öland and the Stockholm Archipelago was met by the release of depth charges.

On the 31st January M. Paasikivi, the Finnish Premier, in reply to a question in the Diet, cited the opinion of Dr. Ståhlberg, the distinguished jurist who was President of Finland from 1919–25, to the effect that the declaration or prosecution of war could not be regarded as war guilt. M. Paasikivi felt, however, that, in order to promote relations of confidence between Finland and the Soviet Union, politicians who had influenced the policy which had led Finland to her present plight ought to retire from active politics. Following this statement of opinion, eleven persons are said to have been asked to refrain from candidature in the forthcoming election—the four Social Democrats—Tanner, Hakkila, Salovaara and Aaltonen, four Agrarians, and three from the Coalition Party—Linkomies, Horelli and Lehtonen. These candidatures have accordingly been withdrawn, though Tanner has protested that he considers the procedure undemocratic.

In a communiqué issued on the 31st January the Danish Freedom Council announced that the fight against Germany had been intensified since the new year, with the object of hampering all military movements in Denmark and of impeding German armament production. The facts appear to substantiate this claim. The Gestapo, however, made widespread raids and arrests in many parts of the country towards the close of January.

The Germans have also made extensive confiscations of the limited coal supplies of Denmark, and the fuel situation is regarded as grave. It is also extremely serious in Norway, where it is reported that Oslo has only sufficient stocks for February, and it is expected that traffic on the railways will shortly be curtailed by the cessation of all passenger trains. On the Bergen railway these have already been discontinued.

M. Christmas Möller has now arrived in Sweden from England. In a press interview shortly after his arrival he stated that Denmark was now recognised as a State fighting on the Allied side and would consider it an honour if the victorious Powers desired her presence at the Peace Conference.

It was reported on the 4th February that General von Hanneken had been replaced in the command of the German forces in Denmark by General Lindemann, who is considered to have distinguished himself on the Eastern front in 1943. The change is regarded as the substitution of a soldier with higher active service qualifications, and as such may indicate an expectation that Denmark will become a theatre of operations.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The resignation of M. Burger (see last Summary) has caused some of the papers in the liberated Netherlands to demand that a Catholic be appointed to succeed him as Minister of the Interior. Since the present Dutch Cabinet contains no Catholic members and the great majority of the inhabitants of the liberated Netherlands are Catholics, this demand is very natural. It may be added that before the war the Catholic Party was the strongest Party in the Netherlands and was usually represented in the Government, which, owing to the multiplicity of Parties, was always a coalition.

The Province of West Flanders has decided to adopt the Province of Luxemburg, which suffered severely during the recent German offensive. Supplies of food and clothing are being collected for the relief of the victims. This generosity of a Flemish towards a Walloon Province should do much to counteract the efforts of certain ill-inspired Walloon papers, which are doing their utmost to stir up bad feeling between Flemings and Walloons.

On the 1st February a deputation of the Belgian Socialist Party waited on M. Pierlot and informed him that they desired a debate on a vote of confidence at an early date. M. Pierlot consented to the holding a debate, but desired that it be postponed; he also refused to accede to a request that he remodel his Cabinet. The executive of the Socialist Party then met and passed a resolution calling upon the five Socialist Ministers to resign. M. Pierlot, however, was able to persuade his Socialist colleagues to remain in office until after the debate, which, it was agreed, should be held on the 6th. M. Pierlot's line was that it would be constitutionally improper for the Cabinet to resign until the Chamber had voted.

Press comment on the crisis seemed to show that the continuance of the Government was neither expected nor desired. Though it is noteworthy that the Socialist Peuple went out of its way to pay a tribute to M. Pierlot's candour and public spirit, while advocating the formation of a left-wing coalition to succeed the present Ministry. The formation of a Cabinet of experts was advocated by a right-wing Catholic paper.

It is fortunate that sufficient supplies of newsprint have now been made available to enable the papers to continue to keep the public informed of what is going on for the time being. As was said in the last Summary, the disappearance of the press would be a most untoward event.

A broadcast by Major-General Erskine on the 4th reminded the Belgians of certain stern realities. Life has hard and would remain so; strikes only made matters worse. While most Belgians were behaving well a few had shown a lack of confidence and determination. "I speak particularly of those who spread false rumours. I do not doubt that such rumours are started by our enemies, but it is unfortunate that these enemy agents should find anybody to believe such stories and to repeat them. For instance, it is apparently common gossip that Belgian coal is being exported to Britain. This is a complete lie." General Erskine also told his hearers that he had represented, and would represent, Belgium's needs to General Eisenhower, but that there were many urgent calls upon the resources of the Supreme Commander and that his decisions must be accepted loyally.

FRANCE.

The French First Army has occupied Colmar and is pressing the enemy hard in what remains of the so-called Colmar pocket. North of Strasbourg the Germans have abandoned their bridgehead near Gambsheim.

Although the Paris press has expressed disappointment that General de Gaulle has not been invited to join in the discussions of the "Big Three" it has taken his absence more calmly than might have been expected. The General himself, in a broadcast on the 5th February, said that although many people considered it "rather strange that in the present phase of the struggle the heads of the three other big Powers should without French participation attempt to fix the means by which the war will be ended and the conditions of the settlement which will emerge from it," there was no need for alarm. As he had already stated, France would not be bound by anything which she had not fully discussed and approved on equal terms with others. The permanent presence of French forces all along the Rhine, the separation of the Ruhr basin and of the territories on the left bank of the river from the future German State or States, and the independence of the Polish, Czechoslovak, Austrian and Balkan peoples were essential so far as France was concerned. France knew she could not ensure the peace of Europe single handed. For this reason she had made an alliance with Russia, and for the same reason she wished to make an alliance with England "as soon as she will consent to what is vital with regard to Germany and as soon as we have eliminated certain vestiges of an outdated rivalry in this or that part of the world."

This allusion to outdated rivalry refers, of course, in particular to Syria and the Lebanon, where there is increasing tension between the French and the local Government. On the 1st February, acting on Mr. Eden's instructions, Mr. Duff Cooper called M. Bidault's attention to the seriousness of the position and expressed His Majesty's Government's concern at the lack of progress towards a settlement of the vexed problem of the Troupes Spéciales and other outstanding questions. In reply M. Bidault regretted that Anglo-French conversations, even if they had been confined to the Levant, had not begun immediately after the visit of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden to Paris in November. He assured Mr. Duff Cooper that no provocation would be given by the French in the Levant States and that the strictest orders would be sent to avoid it. If, however, the inhabitants attacked French property or nationals, force would have to be used to resist them. His Government could not think of handing over any part of the Troupes Spéciales immediately as a gesture, since any show of weakness in the face of threats was a mistake. The Lebanese Government had recently issued a decree declaring that any Lebanese citizen serving a foreign Power who refused at the Government's behest to give up his post within a prescribed time-limit would lose his nationality. This, M. Bidault said, the French regarded as a direct incitement to the men of the Troupes Spéciales to revolt.

The situation in Syria and the Lebanon was discussed at the Council of Ministers on the following day. A subsequent semi-official statement said that General de Gaulle in a recent press conference (see last Summary) had already referred to the difficulties encountered by France, "who alone was responsible for the maintenance of order" in Syria and the Lebanon. It was extremely probable that, had the French remained "en tête à tête" with the Governments of Beirut and Damascus, there would have been no trouble. Nevertheless, France was, as M. Bidault had repeated, absolutely determined to preserve her pre-eminent position in those two countries and to maintain order there while retaining control of the military force which she kept for the purpose. The instructions given by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to General Beynet were unequivocal. (For the reactions to this statement in Syria and the Lebanon and for other developments, see under "Middle East.")

The three political congresses which met in Paris at the end of January—that of the Central Committee of the Communist Party (the 21st–24th January) (see last week's Summary) and the National Congresses of the Mouvement de Libération Nationale (M.L.N.) (the 23rd–30th January) and of the Front National (F.N.) (the 30th January–2nd February)—discussed the same political and economic subjects and reached similar general conclusions on most points. The Communist Party and the Front National, in which the Communists are the dominating force, strongly urged the concentration of all the national energies on the war to crush Fascism and on the establishment of a large French Army. Both also pressed for the confiscation and nationalisation of the property of "the Trusts" and, rejecting any "monetary manipulation" of the Belgian type, advocated financial rehabilitation by the development of production. The M.L.N. Congress, which was noticeably more critical of the Government than the Communists, called not for State control of industry but for the accession of workers to a share in the control of big enterprises, and insisted on compensation for small investors. All three meetings wanted substantial help for agriculture and the extension of the co-operative system for buying and selling, the Communists and the F.N. specifically denouncing the Comités d'organisation. Whereas the Communists and the F.N. unanimously accepted the principle of State secular education and the withdrawal of the grant to religious schools, the M.L.N. was divided on this issue. The F.N. reiterated its intention to present "listes communes" at the forthcoming local elections. It also declared that all local Liberation Committees must relinquish their administrative powers to the prefects and mayors.

One of the main issues at the M.L.N. Congress was the question of possible fusion with the Front National (see Summary No. 267). After a lively debate the meeting rejected by 250 votes to 119 a motion advocating a Resistance federation at all levels which would lead both to fusion and to the formation of a single united French labour movement. It adopted the more cautious policy of co-operation on a national level for specific aims. The F.N. regretted this rejection of its appeal for fusion but still hoped for eventual federation.

On the 24th January the press announced a Government decision that the purge in the Central Government offices must be completed by the 15th February and in the provinces by the 15th March. Furthermore all cases, except those before the High Court, in which the prosecution asked for a death sentence, must be terminated by the 1st May. Inspired press comment has pointed out that this decision is intended to accelerate and not to suppress judicial proceedings and that it will not prevent fresh cases from being brought to court. The decision will certainly be welcomed by a large body of opinion and no doubt reflects General de Gaulle's wish to keep the purge within bounds and to have done with it quickly. It is known that the burden of deciding on appeals for mercy has weighed heavily upon him and that he examines each case of a death sentence with scrupulous care. The imposition of a time-limit has, however, been criticised by several Résistance papers, which argue that in fact under the present system of judicial procedure it will mean that many collaborators will go free. In the words of the Franc-Tireur the cease fire should be sounded when the battle is over and not when it has only just begun.

In an address delivered to the Foreign Policy Association at Philadelphia on the 2nd February Mr. Grew reviewed the problem of supplies to France and mentioned that tweny-six ships were now scheduled to sail for France with "civilian cargo" during the first quarter of this year (see Summaries Nos. 270 and 274).

SWITZERLAND.

Economic negotiations will begin very shortly in Berne between the Swiss Government on the one hand and special delegates from Great Britain and the United States on the other. The British delegation will be headed by Mr. Dingle Foot, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Ministry of Economic Warfare, and that of the United States by Mr. Lauchlin Currie, acting as the special envoy of President Roosevelt. The delegates will spend a few days in Paris on the way to Berne to discuss with the French authorities the question of transit of Swiss imports across French territory. Swiss opinion, which appears to have been much impressed by President Roosevelt's nomination of Mr. Currie, warmly welcomes the negotiations.

Meanwhile Swiss-German negotiations are continuing in Berne and the Swiss-German clearing agreement, which had already been extended from the 15th to the 31st January has been further extended to the 15th February. The chief Swiss interest in these negotiations is coal supplies from Germany. Stocks of coal in Switzerland have fallen very low. Permits are now required for the purchase of coal of all kinds within the country and rationing is foreshadowed.

Swiss citizens in Germany have been officially advised not to leave their places of residence. The legation at Berlin and all the Swiss consular representatives are remaining at their posts and the staff at Breslau has been strengthened so as to enable Swiss citizens and their interests in that area to be better looked after.

M. Xavier de Gaulle, brother of General de Gaulle, has been appointed French Consul-General at Geneva.

M. Petitpierre entered on his duties as Head of the Political Department (i.e., Foreign Minister) on the 1st February.

In view of the strained relations between Switzerland and the U.S.S.R., the outcome of the Big Three Conference is being awaited with intense interest.

SPAIN.

Oblivion is a state oft desired by man, and moralists have not ceased exclaiming at the ease with which, in most adverse circumstances, he has succeeded in achieving that Lethal consummation. For some time past the Spanish Government have been providing an engaging example of this phenomenon, and their attempts to convince the world that Spain has never been anything but strictly neutral in this war, that her adherence to the Anti-Comintern Pact in no way implied hostility towards Russia, and that the Falange is an autochthonous institution owing nothing to other doctrines—all these antics have been amply displayed before the readers of this Summary. By this time it might have been thought that the question should have been decided; either the world believed the Spaniards, or it did not. In any case, further protestation was inappropriate.

But what has happened is that the world does not believe the Spaniards, and the Spaniards still keep on trying to persuade the world.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs, discussing with Mr. Bowker, His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, the recent correspondence between General Franco and the Prime Minister, made it tolerably evident that no rebuff from London was going to prevent the Spaniards from continuing to make friendly gestures towards His Majesty's Government. Señor Lequerica confirmed suspicions that Franco's letter was entirely his own idea; he had drafted it without consulting the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who had been obliged to listen to it read to him by its author over the telephone. The Minister clearly felt that the remarks on Russia were clumsy, but discreetly defended his master by rather unkindly explaining that he had "spoken as a soldier." The Generalissimo's words, though "noble," he said, were hardly appropriate; certain things might be thought, but should not be given utterance. In reality, there were no obstacles on the Spanish side to the establishment of normal relations with Russia; the Spanish Government were merely concerned with preventing interference in Spanish internal affairs. Turning to Tangier, Señor Lequerica saw no problem there to disturb Anglo-Spanish relations. The Spanish Government were not going to be intransigent, and the Minister was quite confident that His Majesty's Government had no intention of humiliating Spain—a significant expectation. Señor Lequerica, forgetting that the Spanish State and the Falange Party are officially one, assured Mr. Bowker that the Falange had no influence whatever on Spain's foreign policy; Franco was absolutely free to follow any policy he chose, and the one he had chosen was that of close friendship with Great Britain and of identification with Great Britain's interests in Europe. Moreover, Franco believed that Mr. Churchill's reply opened the door for friendly discussions. A man who believes that will believe anything.

This odd conversation should be compared with an interview given by Señor Lequerica on the 22nd January to a correspondent of the Associated Press, which interview was a pendant to that of General Franco in November with the United Press. (See Summary No. 266.) The Minister made a conciliatory reference to the News Chronicle articles by Mr. Vernon Bartlett (see Summary No. 271), refrained from saying anything favourable about the Falange, and made a friendly gesture towards Mexico. (There have been many rumours recently—from Spanish sources only—about the resumption of Hispano–Mexican relations.) But the most interesting part of this interview was the Minister's attempt at explaining away the Spanish adherence to the Anti-Comintern Pact, which Spain signed on the 27th March, 1939. After describing the pact as only a "coincidence of judgment" between various countries on the Communist danger, Señor Lequerica explained that in Spain it was a "defensive reaction." "When, however, the first agreements were reached between Russia and Germany over the occupation of Poland, the pact lost its efficacy," and the Government "in order to avoid any misinterpretations" had decided "to abandon its international contacts in this connexion, and to limit itself to internal action . . . ." To affirm now that the Anti-Comintern Pact lost its efficacy in 1939 is a worthy example of the Spanish desire to bury the past under a mass of face-saving phrases. But it is a little late in the day. To the rest of us it is asking a lot to suggest that we forget that on the 25th November, 1941, Spain signed a protocol to this pact prolonging it for five years, and that from July 1941 till April 1944 the Blue Division were at least nominally fighting against our Russian allies. It all goes to show the set of Spanish policy. At the same time, however, that the Minister for Foreign Affairs was speaking mellifluous words to Mr. Bowker, Radio Valladolid, the Falange station, was intensifying the pro-German tone of its programmes.

Señor Mateu, the new Ambassador to the Provisional French Government, has arrived in Paris. Before leaving Barcelona he told Mr. Farquar that he hoped that His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris would be informed that he had always been on the side of the Allies, and that he was not an extreme Falangist. The ambition of the Spanish Government is manifest: forgetting the past, they seek "to be nameless in (un)worthy deeds." But oblivion is not thus to be hired.

ITALY.

The Italian Government has made an appeal to the Allies to reduce the financial burden imposed under the Armistice terms. Unless some relief is granted the economic stability of the country will be in danger and, to prevent this, the Government asks that, as a first measure of relief, dollar or sterling credit be established for all the occupation lire issued by the Allies. The occupation lire issued up to date are reported to total 50,000 million. Mr. Harry Hopkins, who lately visited Rome, is reported to have told American correspondents, who alone were granted an interview, that he was not at all happy regarding the situation as between the Allies and the Italian Government and people, and that a talk with Signor De Gasperi, the Foreign Minister, had rather increased his concern. Mr. Hopkins went on to say that public opinion in the United States felt that it was wrong that countries should be liberated and then left to suffer from hunger, cold and destitution, but that the difficulty had been to provide shipping space for the necessary supplies. Mr. Hopkins was of the opinion that the Military authorities had begun to realise that civilian supplies for liberated countries were a necessity, and he felt that American Civil authorities should insist that a proportion of the available tonnage should be set aside for this purpose. Referring to Mr. Roosevelt's declaration that Italians should have a minimum bread ration of 300 grammes, Mr. Hopkins said that American propaganda had done a deal of harm by promising what it had been unable to supply. Mr. Hopkins also told the American correspondents that the people of the United States were beginning to understand that it was not enough to liberate countries unless, at the same time, help was given to settle their political problems, and that it was contrary to American interests that any form of totalitarian government should be initiated or should endure in liberated countries. The Italian-American Labour Council, which is said to represent 300,000 members of the American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organisations, has also urged a revision of the Allies' policy in Italy, and a resolution to this effect and that the principles of the Atlantic Charter be applied to Italy has been presented to Mr. Dunn, the Assistant Secretary of State charged with, inter alia, the supervision of European affairs. According to the press Mr. Dunn, while expressing sympathy with the resolution, explained to Mr. Antonini, the President of the Council, that the delay in sending relief to Italy was due to the military needing all available shipping.

The first free conference for 22 years of the C.G.I.L.—the Italian General Confederation of Labour—came to a close on the 1st February. The Conference opened on the 28th January at Naples and approved an extensive programme of Social Legislation and, for the first time in the history of Italian Labour, elected a woman, Signora Maddalena Secco, to the Central Committee. The main points of the social reform programme presented by the Socialist Oreste Lizzadri and approved by a majority vote were :—

1. Acknowledgment that the employee has a prior claim over the employer to consideration by the State.
2. Assurance of employment and a guarantee of a minimum wage.
3. Old age pensions.
4. Regulations for the employment of women and children on the basis that equal work means equal pay.
5. Professional training of youth to be organised.
6. Adequate Insurance legislation to be established.

The Roman press seems now more inclined to believe that the Unione Proletaria (see last week's Summary) is or was a Fascist organisation in disguise. The Socialist paper Avanti, having already said that Salvarezza's escape was connived at, presumably by the Carabinieri, makes another attempt to implicate them with the Unione Proletaria. According to Avanti Signor Bonomi, during the Government crisis of November last, wished to arrange a meeting between some of the party leaders and some Ministers and chose as the meeting place the Piazza Navona. When, however, Signor Bonomi was informed by the Carabinieri that "someone" had threatened trouble, the meeting place was hurriedly changed. This "someone," says Avanti, was Salvarezza, and as he accompanied his threat with the sinister hint that "Il Gobbo," since deceased, was the man who carried out his orders, nobody apparently thought it worth while arguing about. Avanti now asks why Signor Bonomi yielded to this threat and did not order the arrest of Salvarezza and his minion. Unfortunately the article does not explain why Salvarezza took exception to the Piazza Navona as a meeting place, nor is it quite clear why "Il Gobbo" was shot "on his way" to murder Salvarezza or for what reason the hunchback wished to destroy such a lucrative source of employment.

In the north, Mussolini, speaking to Turin Blackshirts, has stressed the socialisation policy of the Italian Social Republic and congratulated Turin workers on their "growing interest in socialisation." Whatever this may amount to, it would appear from reports recently arriving from Switzerland that the January strikes among industrial workers were on an even larger scale in Turin than in Milan. Some accounts even put the number of strikers at 75 per cent. of all the Turin workers.

There has been a fresh crop of rumours to the effect that the Germans are contemplating the evacuation of North Italy, and that the Fascist Republican Government is preparing to transfer its headquarters to a place near the Swiss frontier. The latter suggestion has been indignantly repudiated by the Fascist-controlled radio. Marshal Graziani is reported to have told Fascist Army officers that he was resolved to fight on even should the Germans withdraw, and intended to organise a "Volkssturm" on the German pattern in Italy.

A Swiss paper has published two decrees issued by the C.N.L. for North Italy ordering all "soldiers of the so-called Republican Army," functionaries, State officials, and ordinary citizens to put into practice a general disregard for all orders emanating from the Germans or the Fascists. Among other methods of sabotage, people are asked to refuse to collect or pay taxes. Individual and collective account will be taken, it is stated, of the results of the boycott campaign, and "every culpable failure to act will be severely punished by disciplinary action and public stigma."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The German forces in Hungary are said to have been reinforced, and fluctuating fighting, described by both sides as heavy, has gone on in the Székesfehérvár region, with the Russians gaining some ground. In Buda, the defenders are apparently now reduced to the Castle hill, with a few streets round it.

It is reported that in Pest hardly any houses are completely destroyed although very many have been damaged. Some life is returning to the city. Food supplies are arriving and some papers, including the Social Democrat daily, Népszava, are appearing.

The Debrecen Government has appealed for volunteers for the new Hungarian army now being formed. The Government has decided that not only no National Socialist, but no leading member of the old "Government Party" (M.E.P.) may hold public office. Commissions for an administrative purge have been set up. "People's Tribunals" are also to be established in every town and county to judge all war criminals and all persons guilty of acting against the people. The members of the tribunal are to be elected by the local organisations of the political parties represented in the National Independence Front. The tribunals will have the right to inflict any punishment, from fines and confiscation to internment, imprisonment and death. A Council of Reprieve consisting of the Chairman of the National Assembly or his Deputy, the Minister of Justice or his Deputy, and representatives of the Political Commission of the National Assembly will have the right to grant reprieves in the case of death-sentences only. Preparations for the projected land reform are also being pushed on.

The Szálasi "Government" has begun to organise a new voluntary "Armed National Service." This service, which is for Party members, will be, in almost all respects, on an equal footing with the army. Parallel with this, there is a fresh drive for recruits for the new Hungarian army being trained in Germany. Presumably in connexion with these measures, the Minister for Total Mobilisation has ordered a man-power census to be taken. The extraordinary powers of the Government have been prolonged until the 31st December, 1945. Parliament is considering a Bill for dissolving marriages between Jews and non-Jews.

Roumania.

Two special courts have been set up and public prosecutors appointed for the trial of those who are designated as war criminals and responsible for the country's disaster. Proceedings are to start early next week. The personnel of these courts has the appearance of being somewhat less professional than is usual. Some of the special prosecutors are solicitors, but such descriptions as "worker," "employé," "school-teacher," and "engineer" also occur.

Permission has at last been given for the return to Roumania of a party of forty petroleum experts, who were to have arrived by Christmas.

The delegation from the Roumanian Patriarchate of the Orthodox Church to Moscow for the enthronement of the new Patriarch of Moscow, is headed by His Holiness Iosif Gafton Sinaitul, Bishop of Arges. (See "Soviet Union" Summary.)

The pay of the Roumanian army has been increased by 1½ farthings a day!

Yugoslavia.

No considerable military development seems to have occurred.

The Presidium of Avnoj (the Partisans' legislature) has annulled all laws, decrees, regulations, &c., introduced during the German occupation, and also all those which were in force before the German invasion in so far as they are incompatible with "the achievements of the national liberation struggle." Similarly, all appointments and promotions at Belgrade University, made since the 6th April, 1941, have been annulled. A tightening of controls is indicated by an article in Borba, by the head of the Military Propaganda Department, emphasising the need of political education amongst recruits, and by another protesting against the publication of economic information, much of which should be a State secret even in peace time. On the other hand, from Croatia, where the Partisan organisation operates under greater difficulties, it is reported as possibly true that in some cases the National Liberation Front's nominees have been defeated by locally chosen candidates in elections for town and village committees. Reuters' correspondent has returned to Belgrade and it is hoped that other British and American newspaper correspondents will follow shortly.

Public expression of Macedonian aspirations for the annexation of Greek and Bulgarian Macedonia is officially repressed. Moreover Yugoslav Macedonia appears to be largely sealed up. The frontier with Greece between Bitolj and Florina is closed; as is the internal boundary between Serbia and Macedonia. In a recent speech in Belgrade, General "Tempo" spoke of the difficulties of restraining the demand for an enlarged and also independent Macedonia, but implied that the union of Greek and Bulgarian with Yugoslav Macedonia was a legitimate aspiration.

Shubashitch has been fulfilling his undertaking to "endeavour to take account" of King Peter's observations of the 11th January (see Summary No. 278, p. 14) by transmitting to Tito the names suggested by the King for the Regency Council and enquiring whether Tito would agree to the inclusion of one or two other non-Partisans in the unified Government. Mr. Grew, Acting Secretary of State, on the 2nd February declared that the United States Government desired a prompt and amicable settlement on the lines or the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement, on the understanding that after the liberation of all Yugoslavia free elections would be held "if the proposed United Government of Yugoslavia can be so organised as to be representative of the Yugoslav people."

Greece.

On the 30th January E.L.A.S. Central Committee notified the Regent that its delegates to the Conference would be MM. Siantos, Partsalidis and Tsirimokos, and these three, accompanied by General Saraphis and two other military advisers, arrived in Athens on the 1st February. M. Sophianopoulos felt very strongly that it was ill-advised to accept Tsirimokos as a delegate, since by doing so the Government would tacitly acknowledge the existence of E.A.M.; however, after the Regent had had a talk with M. Tsirimokos, who seemed anxious to be helpful and even offered to resign from the delegation, it was finally agreed to accept him as a delegate, and the Conference opened late on Friday night. The basis of the discussions was a programme put forward by the Government, of which the main points were: (1) a National Army would be formed on the basis of regular recruitment of age-groups; officers would be selected by a technical military committee; (2) the gendarmerie and police must remain in being until they could be reorganised; meantime, there would be a purge among officers and men; (3) trials of collaborationists would be expedited; (4) the free expression of political opinion would be safeguarded; (5) martial law would be repealed as soon as agreement had been secured, and all the fundamental rights guaranteed to the citizen under the Constitution before the Metaxas régime would be secured; there would be free elections for Trade Union officials; (6) the Government would hold a free plebiscite and free elections, at which it would welcome Allied observers; (7) as an act of grace, the act of taking up arms against the Government would not in itself be regarded as indictable. At the same time it was pointed out that all hostages in the hands of E.L.A.S. must be released and that any persons held on charges of collaboration or of any other crime must be handed over to the State; all irregular forces must be disbanded and must hand in their arms.

The Conference opened in a conciliatory atmosphere; next day M. Siantos, replying to the Government's proposals, welcomed most of the suggestions put forward. He accepted the need for general disarmament. He insisted, however, that the Communists must be represented in the Government and maintained that, on the question of an amnesty, it would be impossible for the Government authorities to distinguish between political and criminal offences. On this last point he went so far as to say that, if a general amnesty could not be granted, the Conference might as well break up. In fact, a very reasonable amnesty decree, drafted by M. Pericles Rallis, was put forward, but M. Siantos turned it down. The Conference adjourned on Saturday night, and on Sunday the Government delegates sent to the E.L.A.S. delegates a communication pointing out that a general amnesty could only result in "ferocious and unprecedented crimes remaining unpunished." The Government considered the E.L.A.S. attitude absolutely inadmissible.

To this the E.L.A.S. delegates replied on Monday that, since the Government persisted in its views, they felt that to insist on their own standpoint could only plunge Greece into disaster. They would therefore consent to the question of prosecutions being settled on the principles laid down by the Government.

In view of the above message the Conference has been resumed.

Albania.

Enver Hoxha, who is extremely anxious to obtain Allied recognition of his provisional Government, had the discourtesy to refuse Field-Marshal Alexander's offer to send a military mission to him on the withdrawal of the British military liaison officers and pending recognition. Moreover, in spite of the urgent need for medical and other supplies and of the dissatisfaction of some of his colleagues, Enver Hoxha has still not agreed to the Allies controlling the distribution of the relief which they offer.

Public interest in the forthcoming trial of war criminals is stimulated by the official wireless and newspaper. All who opposed the F.N.Ç., it is urged, must be sentenced to death, and violent indictments have been made against Balli Kombetar, Abas Kupi and his Legality Party, Mustafa Kruja and other leaders who opposed, or at least failed to join, the F.N.Ç. But in the field the F.N.Ç. do not appear to be having things all their own way, for in an engagement with Nationalist forces north of Scutari about the 18th January they are reported to have suffered 300 casualties and to have lost a number of prisoners.

Bulgaria.

On the 1st February the People's Court at Sofia sentenced Prince Kiril and General Mihov (ex-Regents), Professor Filov (ex-Premier and ex-Regent), Bozhilov and Bagrianov (ex-Premiers), Gabrovski, D. Shishmanov, Draganov, seventeen other ex-Ministers and eight of King Boris's confidants to death; four ex-Ministers and two of the ex-King's confidants to hard labour for life or for various terms. Muraviev, who headed the last Cabinet before the revolution of September last, was, with his colleagues, treated slightly more leniently. He and Dimov, his Minister of the Interior, were sentenced to hard labour for life; Mushanov, Ghichev and Burov to hard labour for a year; and Pavlov, Ghirghinov, Popov and Daskalov to a year's imprisonment, which was remitted conditionally. Of the accused Deputies 117 were sentenced: 67 (including Tsankov who now leads the puppet Bulgarian Government in Germany) were condemned to death, 23 to hard labour for life and the rest to hard labour for lesser terms. Most sentences included confiscation of property and loss of civil rights. The death sentences were executed the same night.

In private conversation the Foreign Minister admitted that the sentences erred on the side of severity. They were not, he said, the result of external pressure, but some of the professional judges had had difficulty in preventing their non-professional colleagues—not a few of whom were the direct or indirect victims of Government repression—from being carried away by their own emotions and the rhetoric of the Public Prosecutor. Some sentences had even been more than the latter had asked for.

In the published reports there has been no suggestion that any of the accused was convicted under any specific article of any law. The general indictment was under two heads: firstly, the pro-German policy, and, secondly, the repression of the people. Evidence of anti-Soviet propensities in the first connexion and of cruelty in the second was considered particularly damning. There is no indication of Soviet intervention, but the all-powerful position of the Red Army in Bulgaria could hardly fail to exert an influence even if the whole staging of the trial had not conduced to a merciless verdict. Outside the law courts at the time of the final session the streets were packed tight with an orderly crowd consisting of the usual public, soldiers, of whom some attended by order as part of their political re-education, and processions with placards and slogans. Loud speakers announced the sentences and the crowd applauded at intervals. A broadcast account of the proceedings concluded with the observation: "We must kill in order that the future may be safe." Thus, while there is doubtless truth in the Public Prosecutor's allegation that the repression practised by the Filov, Bozhilov and Bagrianov Governments meant 3,200 death sentences, 2,400 life sentences, 18,900 sentences altogether and numerous acts of unspeakable cruelty, the verdict of the People's Court seems to have been given not only for the sake of punishment and vengeance but also to clear the ground of all possible adversaries of the Fatherland Front. Bozhilov may have mitigated but little the pro-German policy of his predecessor Filov, but the charge that the Bagrianov Cabinet, which showed the first signs of changing the national policy, tried to double-cross the Allies and that the vacillation of the Muraviev Cabinet, which was further to the Left, meant the loss of ten Bulgarian divisions and a continuation of the police terror, does not seem fully to explain the crushing sentences imposed on members of two Governments which tended, however irresolutely, to break with Germany.

Turkey.

One nightmare which haunts the Turkish mind is that Persia in the east and the Balkans in the west may one day pass under Communist control and that Turkey will thus find herself surrounded on three sides by Russia or Russian satellites. It is comprehensible, therefore, that there were signs of great satisfaction in Turkey over the improvement in the Greek situation. But, with regard to the blood-bath in Sofia, though the Turkish press was deliberately restrained, opinion was shocked.

In the economic sphere the Turks have been showing signs of activity. They are reported to have sold large quantities of tobacco to the United States. A Turkish mission in this country has ordered £T.100 million worth of railway equipment. A Turkish air expert has made a contract with a British firm for starting an aero-engine factory in Turkey. A group of Turkish bankers are looking round here, on their way back from a visit to the United States, with an eye to buying industrial equipment. Lastly, a mission under M. Cevat Açikalin,, the Secretary-General of the Turkish Foreign Ministry, is expected to come here soon to bring the Anglo-Turkish Financial Agreement of 1939 into line with later developments.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The Egyptian Prime Minister has not yet decided whether or not to proceed with the proposal to prosecute Nahas Pasha and the members of the late Government on the grounds of their alleged corruption. He is still engaged in examining the evidence prepared by the committee of enquiry, and until he has completed his scrutiny he will defer his decision. Even if, as is probable, the Prime Minister is personally opposed to it, there is no doubt that the King, who cordially dislikes Nahas, would be glad to see the prosecution go forward; and although relations between the Palace and Makram may be less close than they were, the Palace is no doubt willing enough to make use of Makram's support in furthering the project.

King Farouk was given an enthusiastic reception in Cairo on his return from the Hejaz on the 31st January. Egyptian press comment, like the messages of courtesy exchanged between the King and Ibn Saud, emphasises that the visit has strengthened the relations between Egypt and Saudi Arabia, and facilitated negotiations for union among the Arab States. This is borne out officially by the announcement made by the Egyptian Government, immediately after the return of the King, that all the Arab countries concerned had been invited to send delegates to Cairo in the near future to continue their discussions on Arab unity.

A report of the visit has now been received from the Hejaz, giving Ibn Saud's account of the meeting. He was favourably struck by King Farouk, whom he considered intelligent, though impulsive and impressionable as was natural at his age, and who would, he thought, develop with proper handling into a wise ruler.

Ibn Saud states that he impressed upon his royal visitor the great importance of maintaining the British connexion, and recommended his adopting the formula (which Ibn Saud himself has so frequently given us as his own) of "putting his trust first in God, and then in His Majesty's Government." He also advised him not to place too much reliance on his Ministers, who, he said, often put their own interests before those of their country, but to rely more upon himself as Ibn Saud had done, and like him, to maintain close and friendly relations with the British.

Among other matters discussed was that of Syria. It will be recalled that Shukri Quwatli recently informed Ibn Saud that he was unable to follow Ibn Saud's advice to negotiate a treaty with the French. Ibn Saud has now decided to write a second time to the Syrian President, telling him once more that the only safe road to follow is that recommended by His Majesty's Government. At the meeting, Ibn Saud urged King Farouk to adopt the same line with Shukri as he himself had done, and advise the Syrian President to come to terms with the French. On the whole, there seems to be no doubt that the visit was highly successful, and may prove to be of real importance in the future. If King Farouk follows the advice of one whose position and prestige in the Arab world are so widely regarded, and whose faith in us, even in the darkest days, has never failed, Anglo-Egyptian relations, and indeed Anglo-Arab relations generally, may benefit greatly.

Satisfactory as the meeting appears to have been, it is hardly surprising to learn that the Amir Abdullah has been greatly disturbed by it. Indeed, so upset was Amir that he urged his nephew, the Regent of Iraq, to pay him a visit at Amman as soon as possible, and His Royal Highness was expected to leave Bagdad for Transjordan on the 4th February, accompanied by Nuri Pasha. What the Amir and the Regent can do about it remains to be seen, but it does not look as though they could do very much.

The deadlock with the French in the Levant States over the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales still awaits solution. Further demonstrations of students took place in Damascus on the 30th January, and when the Syrian President, who personally intervened, told them to return to school, he received the reply that they would continue to strike until Syria was given its national army. Though the students soon after dispersed, further demonstrations with anti-French slogans occurred on the 4th February not only in Damascus but also in Homs and Hama. There has also been serious tension in Jebel Druze, where the French are nervous for their safety.

Everything is being done by His Majesty's representatives in Damascus and in Paris to bring the two parties together. But the situation is not rendered easier by statements, official or semi-official, reported from Paris and quickly circulated in Syria and the Lebanon. Last week reference was made to General de Gaulle's statement at a press conference. On the 2nd February M. Bidault, the French Foreign Minister, said much the same thing. France was "solely responsible for the maintenance of order" in the Levant States, and would defend her prerogatives there. She had at her disposal a military force for that purpose. Instructions to that effect, he added, had been given to General Beynet with the approval of the French Cabinet.

It was consequently in a rather heated atmosphere that His Majesty's Minister met the Syrian President and Minister for Foreign Affairs in Damascus on the 3rd February. The Syrian representatives were greatly upset at this latest news from Paris. Nevertheless, after a long discussion they said that they were prepared to ask the French to state exactly what they wanted. They were ready indeed to open discussions with the French, but insisted upon two things: the immediate transfer of the Troupes Spéciales, and the refusal to grant to France any predominant position.

The Lebanese Government is evidently no less determined to assert its independence. It is reported that an official proclamation was recently issued stating that any Lebanese in the service of a foreign Power, who refused to resign when ordered to do so by the Lebanese Government, should be deprived of his nationality. Further, the Lebanese Chamber passed a resolution on the 3rd February asking the Government to transfer the Troupes Spéciales to Lebanese control, thus following the example of the Syrian Chamber, recorded last week. Lastly, the Lebanese Minister in London, speaking on behalf of both Governments in the Levant, stated on the 5th February that neither Syria nor Lebanon could accept the French demand for a predominant position there. He went on to say that before concluding any treaty they were bound, by the terms of the Alexandria Protocal, to consult with the other Arab States and obtain their consent. They could not therefore commit themselves to any treaty which might act as a barrier to collaboration with those States.

Meanwhile, there has been talk, both in Damascus and in Beirut, of the Levant Governments being willing to negotiate an identical agreement with Great Britain, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and France. The Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs believes that this may constitute the best way out of the deadlock. The Syrian President seems also to be taken with the idea, and has asked the American Minister to obtain for him a draft outline of a similar treaty which might serve as a model. (See also under "France.")

THE FAR EAST.

Although the fall of Manila to General MacArthur's forces is a shock to the Japanese public, it was not altogether unexpected. On the 30th January Domei quoted an Asahi correspondent in Luzon as saying that Japanese resistance in the mountain area around Lingayen was preventing an American advance and that the Americans might make a surprise landing in the Manila area. In general, Japanese propaganda about the Luzon fighting has followed the now rather hackneyed lines of enlarging on American losses in men and material; on the length of their sea communications; and on General Yamashita's preparations to strike a heavy counter-blow when he judges the time to be ripe. Domei (1st February) struck a more sombre note in saying that for the first time since the outbreak of war in East Asia a real land battle was being fought between the Japanese and American forces; that the Japanese troops in Luzon would not capitulate in face of the enemy superiority in numbers but would either return victorious or would follow their ancestors and brothers who had preceded them in the struggle for the freedom and future of Japan (i.e., they would all perish). Mainichi (5th February) declared that Manila was of no strategic importance.

That the Japanese Government is resigned to the loss of the Philippines may be deduced from the amount of propaganda now being devoted to the theme that after all the decisive theatre of war is not the Philippines but China. The Domei radio at Singapore (27th January) asserted that it was everywhere admitted that the Greater East Asia War would be decided on the Chinese continent and that the battles raging in Burma and the Philippines had a vital bearing on the final decisive encounters which would have to be fought out in China. Owing to the strategic situation of China in relation to Japan itself and to Japan's vast arsenal in "Manchukuo," Japan could assemble arms for the final clash which would be vastly superior to those of her enemies. If necessary, the North China–"Manchukuo"–Korea bloc alone could supply the Japanese armies for years. Thus, even were the Shanghai–Yokohama sea route to be threatened, the Japanese armies could derive the sinews of war from the Asiatic Continent itself.

On the 1st February General Wedemeyer told correspondents in Chungking that the Japanese would not be disappointed in their expectation of Allied landings on the China coast. The Japanese are boasting that their recent operations in Kwangtung, Hunan and southern Kiangsi (see this Summary Nos. 277 and 278) have placed their forces in a strong position to meet such Allied landings. They claimed (31st January) that their capture of Waichow had scattered a group of Allied agents sent to make coastal surveys and to gather information. The Japanese have captured Suichuan, a city in south-western Kiangsi, and Namyung in northern Kwangtung, and they claimed (4th February) that they were nearing the city of Kanchow, in Kiangsi. General Wedemeyer, on the 1st February, warned correspondents that a number of American air bases east of the Canton–Hankow Railway might soon fall into Japanese hands. Domei (3rd February) said that these bases were at Suichuan, Kanchow, Sincheng and Kian, with "mobile bases" at Namyung and at Kienow, in Fukien. The Americans had already destroyed the bases at Sincheng and Kienow, those at Suichuan and Namyung had remained in action during the middle of January, but all were now captured or neutralised. The Japanese claimed to have captured 115 air bases in central and southern China in their operations during the past year and said that these could now be used by the Japanese Air Force in the event of an American landing on the south China coast.

The Koiso Government has been busy in measures designed to increase war production. Transocean (5th February) reported from Tokyo that the steps taken included closer co-operation between the military and the civil authorities; the employment even of armament workers on military tasks of national defence (which presumably means Home Guard and A.R.P. duties); the placing of young armament workers under the direct command of the military authorities; the reduction of lectures in secondary schools and universities to 12 per cent. of the former total; and the complete diversion to war purposes of all research in physics and chemistry. According to Domei the construction of underground aircraft factories has been started, while Volunteer Service Corps are being organised to speed up production in the factories.

In order to co-ordinate civil and military administrative measures in Japan there has been a reorganisation of regional Army commands and also of the civil administrative districts, composed of groups of prefectures (see this Summary No. 256). On the 24th January an Army ordinance established the Tohoku and Tokai districts in addition to the existing Central, Northern, Eastern and Western Army districts. This step was followed by a Home Office decree on the 31st January which abolished the Hokuroku regional administrative district and transferred its prefectures to other districts; thus making eight, instead of nine, regional districts. The Hokuroku comprises the western coastal prefectures of Ishikawa, Toyama, and Fukui. The effect of the two ordinances is to equate the Army regional zones with the prefectural groupings; the chairmen of the regional councils are to have additional powers; thus in the event of an interruption in communication with the capital, the Army zone commander and the civilian regional chairman could collaborate to take all necessary measures.

Japanese comment on the war in Europe betrays a nervousness lest the Russian victories bring about the collapse or capitulation of Germany. The Japanese press and radio have not concealed their hope that the Russians will be held on the Oder and eventually pushed back by a German counter-attack. Domei (3rd February) asserted that this would happen and also that General Eisenhower would not for some time be in a position to attack on a major scale on the Western front. Thus Germany would gain the time she needed and Allied attempts to drive a wedge between the German people and their Government would also be unsuccessful. What is worrying the Japanese was made plain by the Asahi (5th February), which said "there can be no doubt that Japan, as well as the Anglo-Americans, is wondering what attitude Russia intends to take in the war against Japan. The war against Germany has entered a decisive phase. Just as in the war against Germany, there must be a decision in the war against Japan. To-day, therefore, we must pay special attention to this point."

It was reported from Canton that Yasumitsu Fukui, the Japanese Consul at Macao, and Yasuteru Asahina, a member of his staff, had been shot at and wounded by terrorists, who were alleged to have been sent by enemy order to cause friction between Japan and Portugal. Fukui, the Japanese Consul, died of his wounds the next day (Domei, 3rd, 4th February).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Comment on the good news from all fronts has been closely linked in the United States to the "Big Three" parley, the announcement of which was expected at any moment. The striking military and diplomatic successes of the U.S.S.R. were seen to strengthen Stalin's hand at the conference table, and apprehension was expressed in some quarters that, failing agreement on her terms, Russia was in a strong position to act alone. "Perhaps," observed Time, "Stalin thought that if he waited while his armies drove on, all Europe, including Germany, might eventually drop into his lap, because there was nowhere else for it to drop." Heinz Eulau in the New Republic contrasted Russia's moves with Britain's, and concluded that "Russia will probably become the most powerful State in the world." The moral generally drawn was that "on reciprocal trust of Russia, prosperity and peace are likely to depend." Columnists, such as Marquis Childs, were, however, more impressed by the "integrated and unmistakable" character of British policy, and all commentators joined in urging the Administration to take a strong line at the Conference. The economic strength of the United States was emphasised as America's trump-card, though opinions differed on how it should be played. They ranged from the habitual idealism of the Christian Science Monitor to the frank nationalism of the New York Daily News, which called on the President to use his bargaining position "to get flat legal title to plenty of bases in the Atlantic and Pacific" and "to keep his hands off European boundaries."

The New York Herald-Tribune was more representative in considering that "the irreducible minimum on which agreement must be reached is the problem of dealing with a defeated Germany." With this was closely linked the question of trying war criminals. The War Department announced on the 31st January the creation of a war-crimes section of the Judge-Advocate General's Department to gather evidence against Germans and Japanese accused of crimes against American citizens. This was thought by some observers to indicate that the United States is preparing to act alone in this matter if international action fails. Allegations by Mr. Herbert Pell that he had been ousted from his position as chief United States delegate to the War Crimes Commission because of the Government's disagreement with his forthright views, led to pertinacious questioning of Mr. Grew, Acting Secretary of State, at press conferences on the 29th January and again on the 1st February. In a broadcast Mr. Pell had revealed that he favoured the prosecution of Germans for ill-treatment of other Germans, particularly Jews, inside Germany itself, and that he was for "hanging the whole Gestapo," however many of them there turned out to be. On the 1st February Mr. Grew issued a statement citing the Moscow declaration on the treatment of war criminals and subsequent pronouncements of President Roosevelt. He told reporters that proposals prepared to implement the objectives announced by the President "provide for the punishment of German leaders and their associates for their responsibility for the whole broad criminal enterprise devised and executed with ruthless disregard of the very foundations of law and morality, including offences wherever committed, against the rules of war and against minority elements, Jewish and other groups, and individuals." The phrase, "wherever committed" was inserted at the request of the journalists, after Mr. Grew had consulted his legal advisers, and in this form the statement was commended by the press as "so far, so good." Mr. Law's similar statement for the British Government on the 31st January was also welcomed in the United States, though it was generally felt that "a fuller statement on this subject, supported by all the United Nations, would still be helpful."

Because of the lack of precise information about the agenda of the "Big Three Conference," most newspaper comment was inconclusive, if bulky. Ernest K. Lindley, who is usually supposed to know the mind of the Administration, anticipated that President Roosevelt would be prepared for far-reaching commitments and would press his own views about the organisation of peace. A statement to the press in Rome, given by Mr. Harry Hopkins on his way to the conference, lent support to this idea that a "tough" line would be taken, while an article he contributed to the current number of the American Magazine was taken to represent the Administration's views in its desire for compulsory military service after the war in order that the United States might take part in a prolonged occupation of Germany and Japan.

Since the speech of Senator Vandenberg, offering Republican support for an alliance to keep Germany and Japan permanently demilitarised (see Summary No. 276), there have been many other indications of the will to reach an agreed foreign policy. A poll conducted during the week by the New York Times showed fifty Senators unreservedly in favour of the Vandenberg project, thirteen in favour provided the President thought it desirable, five in favour provided it did not conflict with plans for world organisation. Four more Senators made serious reservations, but only nine replied with an unqualified negative and several of these were probably Administration supporters. With the fourteen Senators who made no reply at all, this gives considerably more than two-thirds of the Senate as favourable to an international commitment of the most entangling type. It is significant that largely as a result of his lead in foreign affairs Senator Vandenberg's stock with the Republican Party has risen very high, and his name is being mentioned as a possible candidate for the Presidency in 1948.

The letter of the sixteen freshman Senators on the 24th January endorsing the President's foreign policy has been followed by a similar letter from fifty-seven new Democratic Representatives on the 1st February, promising "to co-operate to the fullest" in seeking an enduring peace for the world. Newly-elected Republican Representatives were also reported as drafting a similar pledge. Meanwhile the State Department's drive to educate the American public in the meaning of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals has been intensified. By means of the radio, cinema, press articles and pamphlets, travelling lecturers and hundreds of local organisations the message is being carried into every home. Before he left the United States, Mr. Stettinius had himself given a number of talks on the subject, appeared in a film and contributed to the February number of the Readers' Digest, a persuasive article. He was due to deliver a series of broadcasts later in the month.

A reluctance to embarrass the Administration at this critical juncture was perhaps the reason for postponing the controversy over the Secretaryship of Commerce (see Summary No. 278). On the 1st February, after averting immediate consideration of the nomination of Mr. Wallace by a vote of 43 to 41, Senator Barkley, the Democratic leader, persuaded the Senate by a voice vote to postpone further discussion until the 1st March. At the same time the George Bill, providing for the withdrawal of the Federal Loan Agencies from the Commerce Department, was passed by 74 to 12 and sent to the House of Representatives, where its speedy passage was confidently expected, especially as the President had signified that he would approve the Bill, if passed. It remained to be seen whether Mr. Wallace would withdraw his name, with the Secretaryship's powers so drastically curtailed.

Another Congressional measure concerning the war effort, the May Bill, misleadingly nicknamed the "Work or Fight" Bill, passed the House of Representatives by 246 to 165 on the same day and is now before the Senate Military Affairs Committee. Though a national service Bill, it does not go nearly as far as the Administration desires, but if passed in its present form is expected to direct or keep men of military age, at present deferred for one reason or another, in definite war work. The War Department's statement on casualties up to the 31st December, 1944, as totalling 737,342, and its further revelation, on the 2nd February, that men previously assigned to non-combatant duties abroad are being converted to infantry at the rate of 10,000 a month, have shown the need for a greater intake into the armed forces as well as war industries. This the May Bill does something to remedy.

Meanwhile, the news that Manila had been captured on the 4th February aroused immense enthusiasm throughout the United States, and there are now fears that over-optimism about the war in the Far East will cause some slackening of the war effort, as the successes in Europe did last summer.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina the Commission appointed to draft a Statute for the political parties is reported to have resumed work, and all Argentines were "reminded" (apparently on the 31st January) that their suggestions for reform must be sent to the Commission by the 31st January.

The Mexican-American Commission for Economic Co-operation has delivered to the Presidents of the United States and of Mexico a report on its activities since its formation in September 1943. The recommendation that the Commission be discontinued has been accepted by both Governments, and President Avila Camacho has expressed to President Roosevelt his gratification at its work and his hopes of future United States-Mexican co-operation on other lines. In his reply Mr. Roosevelt pointed out that, despite the demands for American industry for war material, it had been possible in 1943 to supply Mexico with more products than ever before, and that in 1944 American supplies exceeded world supplies to Mexico in any previous year.

The Mexican Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., Sr. Narciso Bassols, has presented his credentials to M. Kalinin. The new Soviet Minister, M. Nikolai Borisovich Gorelkin, has arrived in Uruguay.

In Brazil it is reported that a new electoral code will be published shortly; it will apparently be based on identity cards instead of on the old register. The Brazilian wireless hints that "the old political factions" may perhaps reorganise, possibly in the form of a National Party or as organised parties.

Disillusionment has been the most striking feature of Ecuadorean politics since Dr. Velasco Ibarra assumed the presidency in May 1944. The almost Messianic fervour with which he was hailed is now practically spent, and it is perhaps remarkable that he should have kept his heterogeneous Cabinet together for so long. A reshuffle was announced on the 31st January.

UNITED NATIONS.

International Labour Organisation.

The 94th Session of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organisation was held in London between the 25th and 31st January. It was preceded by meetings of two Committees set up in pursuance of resolutions adopted at the International Labour Conference at Philadelphia, May 1944, dealing with "Constitutional Questions" and "Employment" respectively. The main interest of the Conference centred round the Report of the Committee on Constitutional Questions. A discussion of the first part of this report dealing with the relations between the I.L.O. and the proposed new United Nations Organisation, led to the unanimous adoption of a resolution welcoming the progress made at Dumbarton Oaks and affirming the desire of the I.L.O. for association with the proposed new Organisation "on terms which will permit the I.L.O. with its tripartite character, to make its best contribution to the .... organisation of international machinery for the better ordering of a peaceful and prosperous world, while retaining for the I.L.O. the authority essential for the discharge of its responsibilities under its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia." Attention was also drawn to certain general considerations which should be borne in mind by the Negotiating Committee of the Governing Body, set up at Philadelphia to discuss the relationship of the I.L.O. to the new Organisation with representatives of the latter. Emphasis was laid on the tripartite character of the I.L.O.; on the importance of submitting "constitutional decisions" of the Organisation direct to Governments without their previous submission to any other authority; and on the desirability of maintaining the status of the I.L.O. in the hierarchy of international organisations. The view generally expressed by members of the Workers' and Employers' Groups during the meetings was that the I.L.O. should be as closely linked with the new Organisation as it has been with the League, but that it should not be "subordinated" to the proposed Economic and Social Council. Most members of the Workers' and Employers' Groups were also of the opinion (strongly expressed by the Acting Director) that the I.L.O. should be directly represented at the proposed United Nations Conference.

The second part of the Report of the Constitutional Questions Committee resulted in a lively and interesting discussion of the effectiveness of I.L.O. procedure, during the course of which Sir John Forbes-Watson (leader of the Employers' Group made some effective criticisms of the practical operation of the I.L.O. Conventions. The Czechoslovak workers' delegate argued in favour of an increase in the representation of "Workers" in the I.L.O.; and there was some consideration of the special problem of the ratification of I.L.O. Conventions by federal States.

Probably the most important decisions of the Governing Body related to the establishment of international committees for particular industries. A list of seven major industries for which international committees (with appropriate secretariats) should be appointed was agreed; and it was decided, after considerable discussion, that these committees should be tripartite (Government, Worker, Employer) not, as in the case of the Joint Maritime Commission, bipartite (Worker, Employer—with a neutral Chairman). There can be no doubt that the establishment of these Committees is likely to be the most important development of the work of the I.L.O. since it was itself established at the end of the last war.

The problematical return of the Soviet Union to the I.L.O. was again the subject of a considerable speculation; but, beyond making it plain that the door was wide open, it was not suggested that any further action should be taken for the time being to induce the Russians to return to the fold. A formal application from the Italian Government for the re-admission of Italy to membership was placed on the agenda of the next meeting of the Governing Body (to be held at Quebec, probably in June, with a view to the preparation of a report to the next ordinary session of the Conference (to be held, if possible, in France during the autumn). Meanwhile, it was decided to appoint an I.L.O. representative in Rome as soon as possible "to facilitate the supply of information to the Italian Government and to Italian organisations of employers and workers."

GERMANY.

THE importance of holding the line of the Oder—"the river of German destiny in the East," as Dittmar called it—has dominated German comment on the situation during the past week. On the 6th, Kriegk said that, first of all, Germany must "hold back bolshevism on the Oder" and then stop the expected new attacks of the Anglo-United States divisions in the West. Maegerlein told his listeners on the same day that the opposing forces on the Oder in the Silesian area were, "on the whole, of equal strength," and on the 8th the home public were again assured that the Germans had "a very strong concentration of military power on the Oder line" and that while some Russian bridge-heads had been slightly extended, others had been eliminated. According to the High Command these bridge-heads were being hotly contested and their extension prevented. The overall picture presented by the communiqués was one of fierce defensive fighting, with occasional limited counter-thrusts by the German forces. The O.K.W. admitted on the 9th, however, that the fighting had extended close to the outskirts of Liegnitz. On the 10th it said that the Russians had gained ground to the west in the "Breslau–Liegnitz–Glogau area." Ley wrote in the Angriff, in a very confident tone, of his visit to the Oder front. "It is a great miracle," he said, "that for the most part the enemy has been held at the Oder. Even if the enemy is successful at one or other bridge-head in front of Neisse or Liegnitz, it does not alter the fact that he has been held." On the following day, however, the communiqué announced the fall of Liegnitz. The German public still await the expected counter-blow. Krull said on the 10th that "the mystery about the manner, place and extent of the expected German initiative remains impenetrable." There are warnings of fresh attacks to come, in both East and West.

German reports of the Allied offensive on the western front tend to belittle the progress so far made, while comment for Europe forecasts much bigger things to come very soon. On the 10th the O.K.W. said that the "twenty-one days' battle for the bridge-head in Upper Alsace" had been concluded and the German forces withdrawn to the east bank of the Rhine.

Dittmar gave his listeners a gloomy picture of the situation. Quoting Frederick the Great, he compared Germany to a tight-rope walker, for whom the slightest slip means "a deadly fall." He rather obviously did his best to toe the Party line. Admitting the terrible sufferings of the people, he said this was no worse than the fate which would overtake Germany should she lay down arms unconditionally. Even if the struggle were hopeless, he said, it would be better to go on resisting. Unconditional surrender was a demand for suicide. He specifically defended Germany's leaders against charges that they were prolonging the war—"the war is not prolonged by those people who call for resistance to the utmost but by those who think that the peace of the graveyard reigning over Germany is the peace they want." His main assurance was the somewhat negative one that the High Command had not let itself be "stampeded" into "operations for propping up resistance," which would have meant a danger of frittering away its resources.

Having said so much to order, Dittmar proceeded to make some startling statements regarding dislocation in the East. He told his listeners that fighting in one's own country had certain definite disadvantages, and that "real or even only apparent failure of administrative machinery" had an influence on the troops. He went on to say that, "moved by pity for their compatriots fleeing from their hearths and homes," these troops would frequently direct their sympathy to the wrong quarters. It is possible that something serious lies behind such veiled references. One recent report speaks of evacuees travelling in cattle-trucks while S.S. officials travelled in comfort. The resentment of the evacuees was so great that a riot began, in which troops took the part of the evacuees. Incidents such as these may well have occurred on other occasions and would substantiate Dittmar's general phrases.

Goebbels, in his weekly article, was very realistic. The Soviet winter offensive, he said, had radically changed the military situation in the East. He obviously wished to show that the leaders are aware of the feeling that further resistance is senseless, but nevertheless the fight must go on because there is no alternative. He assured his readers that "the flood from the steppes will be stemmed, and that at a time when the danger is at its greatest and is visible to everyone. Until then we must keep a cool head." This article, like many others of the week, seemed to have been written with an eye to developments of the meeting of Allied leaders. The contents of the statement issued at the close of the meeting are analysed below. (See under "United Nations.")

The behaviour of Nazis in posts of special responsibility is of unusual interest at the present moment. It is already clear that Himmler has made public examples of some high officials. On the 28th January the Forces service announced the public execution of the Deputy Mayor of Breslau, Spielhagen, as "a coward devoid of honour," and two days later the news was given to the home public with the explanation that he had "intended to leave Breslau and seek a new post elsewhere." He was executed by order of the Gauleiter, Hanke. On the 6th February the German people heard that Himmler himself had handed over several officials to be court-martialled, who had "proved themselves unworthy in these days of trial." Von Salisch, former S.S. Standartenführer and head of the Bromberg police, was reduced to the ranks and shot for "cowardice and neglect of duty." Kühn, former Regierungspräsident, and Ernst, the former Mayor of Bromberg, were degraded and sent to a penal battalion. Bormann took similar action in the case of Rampf, the Bromberg Kreisleiter. On the 9th it was announced that Floeter, Mayor of Königsberg (a small town just east of the Oder), and a holder of the Party Badge of Honour, had been sentenced by court-martial and hanged for leaving his town without an evacuation order. The authorities show concern, by their prompt and ruthless action and by the frequent allusions to the subject in talks and articles, as to the possible effects of such desertions by officials on the civilian population, and, more important, on the troops defending the front-line towns. Hahn, in his Das Reich article of the 4th February, said: "Admittedly a person who should have been the last to leave might here and there have been the very first to seek safety in flight." On the 7th February Saal found it necessary to deny suggestions in a broadcast, said to be from a "United States radio station in Europe," that Goebbels or any of the Party leaders were leaving Berlin. "None of the German leaders think of leaving Berlin, least of all Goebbels, who did not conquer Berlin only to abandon her in her hour of danger and hardest test." While the faithless are punished, the loyal servant is rewarded with greater responsibility, as police changes in Hamburg, Lübeck and Magdeburg bear witness. The most important of these is perhaps the return of S.S. General Schrœder to the post of Police President of Lübeck after three years as S.S. chief in Latvia.

Himmler continues to extend his power, both military and civil, in the East. According to one report he received full powers on the Eastern front from Hitler on the 21st January. The first indication of this quickly appeared in a Front und Heimat article broadcast on the 23rd, which said: "The Führer has sent his best army commanders, and men of iron determination such as the Reichsführer—S.S. Heinrich Himmler, to the focal points of the battle. They have been given complete power and will make radical decisions and guarantee the command." It was not clear, possibly not intended to be clear, from this reference, whether Himmler was acting as policeman or as soldier. A few days later he was reported to have visited the front. But it has now been revealed that he has assumed actual military command. No official announcement was made, but Schwarz van Berk, on the 8th, in the course of a review of the situation in the East, casually mentioned "instances which occurred in the sector of the Army group under the command of Reichsführer S.S. Heinrich Himmler." This sector is presumably the Centre, since Marienwerder and Torun are mentioned as being within it. That one who is not a soldier should now command a group of German armies must be striking and not altogether encouraging news to the discerning public. It will almost certainly strengthen the popular impression that Himmler now controls Germany's destiny, both military and civil. Herbert Hahn, writing in Das Reich on the 4th February, stated that the total evacuation of a district, which has hitherto been ordered by the Führer only, may now be carried out in the East by Himmler's order. A "delegate of the Reichsführer S.S." has been appointed for Pomerania and entrusted with "the utilisation of the entire strength of rear areas." Whether this means that Himmler exercises within each Gau powers other than those he already enjoys as head of the Home Army and the Volkssturm is not as yet clear.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Under the direction of State Secretary K. H. Frank, German defence measures in the Protectorate, and especially in North-East Moravia, which is now immediately threatened by Koniev's army, are being pushed forward energetically. The protection of the railways has been still further strengthened; the number of Germans in the Protectorate war industries has been increased; major formations of German troops, according to one source, are being concentrated in Central Moravia; and the call-up of Czechs for fortifications work has been intensified; 4,000 Czechs were reported to be already employed on defence work on the Austrian border and a new call-up has yielded a further 65,000, of whom over 50,000 are to be employed immediately, probably in the neighbourhood of Moravská Ostrava, while the rest will be kept as a reserve.

Similar, though much more ragged and ineffectual, preparations are being made in Slovakia, where the activities of partisans and the "indifference" of the population are openly admitted. Volkssturm units from Vienna have been brought to Bratislava and unwilling Volksdeutsche from the eastern regions have been evacuated. Meanwhile Slovak Government spokesmen continue to deliver pathetic speeches of defiance and diatribes of hate against the Czechs and the Bolsheviks.

The Czechoslovak Government delegate for liberated territory has now moved from Ruthenia to Košice. Local National committees are being elected in all the liberated Slovak communities, including Košice and Prešov, and according to Czechoslovak reports good progress is being made with repair work, enrolment into General Svoboda's Army Corps, the restoration of public services and the weeding out of collaborators. In London the Czechoslovak Government has summoned a ministerial committee to meet this week to deal with "questions connected with the transfer to the homeland of the State machinery abroad."

The Czechoslovak and Netherlands Governments have concluded an agreement by which each undertakes to facilitate the repatriation of displaced nationals of the other country who may find themselves on its territory. The Czechoslovak Government signed a similar agreement with the French Provisional Government in November 1944 (see Summary No. 270).

POLAND.

The official statement issued on the 12th February, at the conclusion of the Crimea Conference, recorded that agreement had been reached "on the conditions in which a new Polish Provisional Government may be formed in such a manner as to command recognition by the three major Powers." The Provisional Government at present functioning in Poland should be "reorganised on a broader democratic basis, with the inclusion of democratic leaders from Poland itself and from Poles abroad"; and a Commission composed of M. Molotov, Mr. Harriman and Sir Archibald Clark Kerr was authorised to consult with these several elements, in the first instance in Moscow, to that end. The new Government thus formed should be called "the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity," and should be pledged to the holding of free elections as soon as possible, on the basis of universal suffrage and the secret ballot, all democratic and anti-Nazi parties having the right to take part and to put forward candidates.

With the Provisional Government formed on those lines the Governments of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States would establish diplomatic relations, and would exchange Ambassadors "by whose reports the respective Governments would be kept informed about the situation in Poland." The three Heads of Governments considered, it was further stated, "that the eastern frontier of Poland should follow the Curzon Line, with digressions from it in some regions of five to eight kilometres in favour of Poland." They recognised that Poland must receive substantial accessions of territory in the north and west; and they felt that the opinion of the new Provisional Government of National Unity should be sought in due course on the extent of these accessions, and that the final delimitations of Poland's western frontier should thereafter await the Peace Conference.

The Polish Ambassador in London was notified on the 12th February of these decisions, which the Polish Cabinet met to consider on the 13th. In a statement issued after this meeting, the Polish Government declared that the decisions of the Three-Power Conference were taken without its participation, authorisation or knowledge, and could neither be recognised by it nor bind the Polish nation. The Polish Government would consider the severance of the eastern half of the territory of Poland as "a fifth partition of Poland now accomplished by her allies." Moreover, the creation of a Provisional Polish Government of National Unity on the lines proposed "can only legalise Soviet interference in Polish internal affairs"; a Government of that kind could not, while Polish territory remained under the sole occupation of Soviet troops, safeguard the unfettered right of free expression. Finally, the statement reaffirmed the Polish Government's readiness, expressed in its recent memorandum to the British and United States Governments, to "co-operate in the creation of a Government in Poland truly representative of the will of the Polish nation."

On the 8th February a farewell Order issued by the Commander of the Home Army, disbanding it and releasing its members from their oath, was published in London; in a broadcast message to the Home Army on the same day, President Raczkiewicz broadcast to Poland a message of farewell and thanks to the Home Army.

On the 5th February the Warsaw Administration decreed the withdrawal of all Reich German currency (excluding specie) circulating in those liberated Polish areas which were formerly incorporated in the Reich. Up to the 28th, Polish and Allied private persons might exchange sums up to RM.500 against Polish National Bank notes at the rate of RM.2 = 1 zloty. Special regulations were also decreed for the withdrawal of "Cracow zlotys" in those areas of the former "General Government" which had been liberated since the 6th January, and which were not covered by the decree of that date (see Summary No. 278).

SOVIET UNION.

During the past week General Cherniakhovsky's troops in East Prussia have continued to close slowly in on Königsberg from the east and south. Further west Marshal Rokossovsky captured Elbing on the 10th February, thus broadening and consolidating the wedge which the Red Army has driven between the German troops in East Prussia and the Reich. In Pomerania Marshal Zhukov has penetrated German territory to a depth of 35 miles on a front which now extends for 130 miles. The most important advance of the week, however, has been that of Marshal Koniev. An order of the day, dated the 6th February, announced that his troops had established bridgeheads across the Oder north of Breslau; by the 12th February they had reached Bunzlau, 60 miles west of Breslau. This push already means that the German troops in Silesia have little chance of escape except over the mountains into Bohemia; if it can be developed, it will outflank Frankfurt, where the Germans have held Marshal Zhukov on the Oder, and threaten Berlin from the south. In Polish Silesia General Petrov captured Bielsko, in the Carpathian foothills, on the 12th February. There have been no reports of progress in Slovakia from the Russian side. On the 13th February an Order of the Day announced that Budapest had fallen at the end of three months' fighting.

Mr. Arthur Herbert Birse, Second Secretary and Translator at the British Embassy, Moscow, has been awarded the Order of the Red Banner of Labour for his successful work as translator to the Prime Minister during the Tehran Conference and at subsequent meetings. While British statesmen like Lord Beaverbrook and Mr. Lyttelton have been decorated by the Soviet Government, this award to a member of the British Embassy staff in Moscow is exceptional.

The appeal to all Christians issued by the Sobor (General Assembly) of the Russian Church noted in last week's Summary has been followed by a similar message to the peoples of the whole world from the visiting Patriarchs and Prelates of the Orthodox Church outside the U.S.S.R. who attended the Patriarchal election in Moscow. This message, like the former, condemned those who were pleading for mercy for the Hitlerites, but explicitly named the Vatican as the chief culprit in this connexion. The internal affairs of the Russian Church were dealt with in a message from the Sobor to "the Prelates, Pastors and all true children of the Russian Church" published in Izvestiya on the 6th February, but not broadcast. The message, which was a striking departure from anything hitherto put out by the revived Moscow Patriarchate, referred to "unhealthy signs" which negligence had allowed "to cloud the purity of the Bride of Christ." The self-sacrifice of churchmen in the patriotic war, their religious enthusiasm and unity in rallying round the Patriarchate and the almost complete extinction of the "Living Church" schism dating from 1918, were said to be indeed matters for thankfulness, but the Sobor referred with distress to negligence, even on the part of many pastors, in the observances of Church life. The fact that even church-goers were dispensing with the religious forms of marriage, that fasts were not always observed even by the clergy, and that there had been a gradual decline in confession and absolution before receiving communion were particularly deplored. There was also a reference in the message to numerous impostors who were daring to administer the sacraments without being properly ordained, and whom the faithful, inadequately instructed as they were, were unable to distinguish from true priests. The message concluded by urging that Orthodox Christians should be animated by as fervent a spirit in fighting deviations from the true way of Church life as the people of the Soviet Union had shown in resisting the enemy. The Russian Church "would then shine in piety and in faith as in olden times and serve as a support of the might and prosperity of the country, founding the Kingdom of God upon Earth." It is indeed a startling sign of the times that such a message exhorting Christians to fulfil their religious duties should have been published in an official Soviet organ.

Spanish affairs have recently been coming once more into the foreground in Moscow. An article in The War and the Working Class, broadcast on the Soviet European Service in Spanish on the 3rd February, strongly criticised all suggestions that some sort of military dictatorship should be substituted for Franco, "whose bankruptcy sooner or later is a certainty in view of Hitlerite Germany's inevitable defeat." Señor Salvador de Madariaga's scheme for the replacement of Franco by a liberal general who would make way for a restoration of the monarchy was described as "the invention of an oddity under the influence of opium." The plans of Indalecio Prieto and of Maura in Paris were equally dismissed; "the liquidation of a Fascist régime cannot be caused by a mere change of label." The Spanish Republic should be restored above all by those Spaniards who had organised the forces of resistance inside the country during the past years. The article ended by affirming the deep sympathy of the Soviet people for the heroic Spaniards who for three years withstood "the first blow struck by the forces in league with the Fascist aggressors," and by suggesting that the third world war might well be hatched in Spain if the country could not rid itself of control by German financiers and industrialists. This danger could not be averted by any change over of personalities but only by returning to the Spanish people full liberty independently to arrange their own destiny.

The Moscow wireless (7th February) came out with a vigorous direct attack on Franco Spain as Germany's last ally and a "channel for the propagation of Fascism in the Western Hemisphere." Madrid was described as the advance post of the German espionage service, and Franco as the active conductor of German plans for the preparation of a third world war.

Tass (5th February) reported a meeting of Spanish Republicans, including Señor Alvarez del Vayo, held in Mexico on the 29th January. In contrast to the unrealistic exiles castigated in The War and the Working Class "who felt more at home in no man's land than in the trenches," those present at the meeting in Mexico were described as making solid plans for the unification of Spanish Republicans with the aim of opening the way for a Republican Government led by Dr. Negrín.

The space and prominence recently allocated by the Soviet press and wireless to the World Trade Union Conference and future international trade union organisation reflects the high political significance attached to these questions in the Soviet Union. Though comment has been profuse, a few basic recurring points emerge. (These points also predominated in the opening speech of M. Vassily Kuznetsov, leader of the Soviet delegation at the World Trade Union Conference.) They may be summarised as follows: (1) The importance of working-class unity in democratic countries for the final defeat of Hitlerite Germany; (2) an appeal to workers' organisations to throw their political influence into a struggle against all survivals of pro-Fascist policy and against all who sow dissension in the United Nations' ranks; (3) the necessity for a new international trade union organisation; (4) insistence on the disintegration of the "bankrupt Amsterdam International" (always coupled with charges of pro-Fascism) and of "all obsolete and glaringly unfit forms of organisation which have not met the test of history"; (5) the importance of effective international trade union co-operation for "the most advanced class in modern society—the working class." On the eve of the World Trade Union Conference, Trud (the organ of the Soviet trade unions) expressed alarm at an "obviously inspired Reuter report" that the International Federation of Trade Unions ("the Amsterdam International") was unlikely to be replaced by a new world organisation of trade unions and that a modernisation of the old trade union structure might be contemplated. In a later article during the Conference Trud exhorted the democratic trade unions to insist on their Governments breaking off relations with the Fascist régimes of Spain, Portugal and the Argentine. Thus, the Soviet thesis is that the trade unions of the world should become a major political force and a lever for political action along unified lines in their respective countries in the post-war world. In the course of these articles on trade unionism, Anglo-Soviet trade union co-operation is praised for having given "a fillip to the idea of establishing closer business-like contact between the trade unions of the U.S.S.R. and other democratic countries."

SCANDINAVIA.

On the 8th February Major-General Marthinsen, the chief of Quisling's State Police and commander of the Hird from July 1943, was ambushed and shot on the way to his office. While no sympathy need be wasted on the victim, who seems to have been a typical Nazi ruffian, the incident has raised in many minds, Norwegian as well as English, the legitimate place of political assassination in the operations of an underground front. The liquidation of spies and informers may no doubt be justified as a necessary act of self-protection, which saves the lives and liberty of many deserving persons, but the elimination by such means of individuals in general command is more questionable, and is probably better left to the post-war machinery for the trial and punishment of war criminals. It seems probable, indeed, that the act in question was perpetrated by irresponsible individuals, without any encouragement from the authorised leadership of the Home Front.

It has produced an immediate holocaust of reprisals. Jonas Lie was immediately equipped by Quisling with extraordinary powers for the maintenance of order, and on the same day eight patriots were shot by judgment of the N.S. special court, and eleven others by that of German courts-martial brought into action by a state of emergency proclaimed by Terboven over the whole of occupied Norway. The following day, 9th February, saw the execution of fifteen more persons, five by the sentence of Norwegian courts and ten of German. There has been no attempt to attach responsibility for the death of Marthinsen to any of these thirty-four victims: all of them, indeed, were under arrest before the occurrence, and many of them for two or three months. Ostensibly, they were executed for other illegal activities, but no serious effort has been made to suggest that they would have suffered death but for the killing of the head of the State Police. The death of Marthinsen figured prominently in a press conference addressed by Jonas Lie and SS. Colonel Feylis on the 9th February, on the subject of Norwegian underground activities.

An exceedingly daring and successful operation was carried out towards the end of last week by Norwegian patriots, or, according to some reports, Norwegian commandos smuggled into Norway from Great Britain. Eleven tugs and a salvage vessel were stolen from Frederikstad harbour and taken across to Sweden, where they were interned. One of the boats was lying actually alongside a German warship, while another was operated by its captors for a whole day towing targets for German gun-practice, before it made good its escape.

The transfer of German troops from North Norway has been increasingly delayed by the shortage of fuel and locomotives. Until nearly the end of January this transfer was proceeding at the rate of about 500 men daily, but this figure has recently dropped to about 350–370. In the Tröndelag area, only 79 locomotives out of a total of 128 are at present in running order.

In connexion with the questions raised as to the war-guilt of members of former Finnish Governments, a committee has been set up under the chairmanship of Eirik Hornborg, a Finish historian, to make an objective survey of the recent foreign policy of Finland. Left-wing views are represented on the Committee by Dr. Eino Pekkala and M. Ruutu, but its composition seems to be largely academic. Hornborg's appointment is, however, severely criticised by the Communist organ Vapaa Sana on the ground of his alleged anti-Russian bias, and his authorship of a pamphlet defending the Ryti–Tanner alliance with Hitler. Aftonposten, on the other hand, approves of the selection of Hornborg, and considers his impartiality beyond question, but criticises the appointment of Eino Pekkala as a near relative of the Minister of the same name. The latter is no doubt a member of the Social Democrat opposition at present, but was also a member of the Government which entered the war against Russia in 1941. The Finnish Communists appear to be far more vindictive than the Russians themselves in the matter of war-criminals, and Vapaa Sana has expressed the view that they will be punished irrespective of the views of the President. If Finnish law stands in the way, the Communists urge that special legislation should be passed.

There have been rumours, mainly voiced in Communist circles, as by the Swedish Communist paper Norrskensflamman, to the effect that a number of German Nazis have been able to enter Sweden on Finnish passports. The persons specifically mentioned appear to be naturalised Finnish citizens though of German birth. A somewhat similar question has been raised in Göteborgs Handelstidning, which alleges rumours worth investigation as to the existence of a "Jumpers-off Club" in Stockholm, the activities of which are promoted by a German journalist who came from Finland. The object is said to be to procure the illegal return to Germany of persons purporting to have abandoned the Nazi Party, who will, after arrival, organise an underground movement against the Allies in Germany.

Danish patriots brought off on the 7th February a somewhat similar coup to that mentioned earlier in connexion with Norway. They secretly boarded the dredger Storebjörn and forced the captain to steer for Sweden, where the boat eventually arrived with twenty-six refugees.

The German authorities have demanded the disarmament of the Sommer Corps, an organisation of Danish Nazis resembling the Schalburg Corps. Most of the personnel are, however, enrolled in the auxiliary police (Hilfspolizei or Hipo, assisting the Gestapo), and the measure is therefore regarded as designed to bring all Danish Nazis under direct German control.

Rumours have been circulating in Denmark to the effect that the population should rise in open revolt against the Germans on the 15th February. This report is ascribed to London and ridiculed by the Danish radio, but there seems reason to think that it is a German attempt to provoke premature action.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

The Dutch Cabinet has resigned in circumstances which were thus explained by Radio Orange on the 8th. The course of the war had resulted in the liberation of most of the Southern Netherlands with a population of some 2 million, but the Northern Netherlands were still subject to the German occupation. The Dutch Government, which had always intended to resign upon the total liberation of the country, had now authorised the Prime Minister to tender to Queen Wilhelmina the resignation of the whole Cabinet. This had been done to enable the Queen to remodel the Cabinet in accordance with present conditions; the new Cabinet, however, would resign as soon as the whole of the Netherlands had been freed. Moreover, M. Albarda and Dr. van den Tempel, the Socialist Ministers of Waterways and Social Affairs, had resigned because they were not in agreement with the methods employed by Dr. Gerbrandy to secure the resignation of M. Burger. Queen Wilhelmina was considering whether or no she would accept the resignations, and, meanwhile, had asked Dr. Gerbrandy so to reconstruct the Cabinet that it should contain representatives of the liberated Netherlands, and should be in a position to make the utmost use of the forces in the liberated Netherlands in taking measures to meet the situation that would arise when the rest of the country had been freed. Dr. Gerbrandy had requested the Queen to give him time to consider whether or no he would undertake the task.

In a letter to The Times M. Albarda explained further that he and Dr. van den Tempel had not differed from their colleagues on the policy to be adopted towards collaborators; the sole reason for their resignation had been the actual procedure adopted by the Prime Minister in the matter of M. Burger's resignation. He added that their resignation had not been the cause of the attempt to reconstruct the Cabinet. "The desirability and possibility of doing so existed before as the result of both vacancies to be filled and the fact of re-established contacts in the liberated areas."

The fate of the Pierlot Government was decided by the debate in the Chamber which began on the 6th. M. Buset, the Socialist who moved the vote of censure, accused the Government of slackness and inefficiency in every sphere; they had failed to prosecute the purge with due vigour, to reorganise the Army on a sound basis, to make proper use of the Resistance Movement, and adequately to organise the distribution and supply of food and coal. Why had not supplies been imported? Granted that account must be taken of military needs, none the less Belgium's Allies, especially the English, were not deficient in understanding, and the Belgian Government should make vigorous representations to them; in so doing, it would have the country behind it.

A Liberal spokesman declared that his Party had lost confidence in the Government. A Catholic spokesman attacked the Socialists for having demanded the resignation of the Socialist Ministers before the debate (see last Summary); he then defended the Government on some points and criticised it on others, and concluded with an appeal for national unity. A Communist Deputy declared that his Party associated themselves with M. Buset's criticisms of the Government. M. Pierlot defended the Government and complained sharply of the Press, which had not treated it fairly. The Government, he added, had done its best in difficult circumstances. But conditions in Belgium could not substantially improve until imports and exports had greatly increased. The Government had obtained promises from the Allies; but those promises had not been fully kept; hence the daily ration was still one of 1,500 calories instead of 2,400. The Government had 200,000 tons of wheat in Canada and 200,000 tons of food in the Congo, apart from stocks of palm oil. But military needs had prevented the Allies from making more shipping available. After touching on certain other points M. Pierlot concluded by warning the house that the question of Communist participation in a new Government was probably about to be raised. After his experiences, he himself would not like to have Communist colleagues. Others, however, might think differently.

The whole tone—and not merely the conclusion—of M. Pierlot's speech showed that he knew his Ministry was doomed, and little surprise was caused when soon after the resumption of the debate on the 7th he rose and declared that, since it was obvious that the Government had not the confidence of the Chamber, he felt it his duty to report the position to the Prince Regent. The House then adjourned without dividing.

The Regent asked M. van Acker, a Socialist who had been Minister of Labour in M. Pierlot's Cabinet, to form a new Ministry. On the 11th it was announced that M. van Acker had been successful. The new Cabinet is not, as some had desired, a purely Left-wing coalition. The refusal of the Christian Democrats to break away from the Conservative Catholics made such a coalition impossible. But M. van Acker was able to form a Ministry which included representatives of the Right-wing and Left-wing Catholics of the Socialists, of the Liberals and the Communists. The Cabinet contains six Catholics, five Socialists, four Liberals, two Communists and one member who belongs to no party. M. Spaak remains Foreign Minister and has become Deputy Prime Minister. The Ministry of the Interior has gone to a Liberal, and Catholics have been appointed to the Ministries of Finance and Justice; a Communist has had the courage to accept the Ministry of Food. The Communist Party is said to have promised to give the new Government genuine support and will probably find it difficult to avoid doing so, as one of its members holds so responsible a post. The Government, however, has yet to ascertain whether it can command the support of Parliament. It is quite likely that the Catholic Conservatives will sooner or later try to wreck it and it is in any case tolerably certain that storms will blow up both inside and outside Parliament unless larger supplies of food and coal soon become available. It is a good omen that the coal strikes have practically ceased, but the fact that M. van Acker has assumed the functions of what is virtually a Minister of Fuel shows that the coal problem is not yet solved.

FRANCE.

The headquarters of the First French Army announced on the 9th February that the enemy had been driven from the Alsatian plain and that the Allied forces were now on the Rhine for the whole length of the First Army sector. General Eisenhower has asked General Devers, the Commander of the Sixth Army Group, to convey his congratulations to General Delattre de Tassigny and to all the forces under his command. In an order of the day addressed to the First French Army General Devers mentioned that they had taken over 15,000 prisoners.

General de Gaulle spent the week-end in Alsace and Lorraine and visited Mulhouse, Colmar, Strasbourg, Saverne and Metz. At Strasbourg he attended a Te Deum in the Cathedral. In a speech at the Town Hall he said that Alsace "on our Rhine" had a great future, and both at Strasbourg and at Metz he declared that the Rhine must become a great French highway.

General de Gaulle's broadcast speech of the 5th February (see last Summary) gave rise to fresh and sharper press complaints of France's exclusion from the Crimea Conference. Wireless comment on the decisions of the Conference, and in particular on the invitation to France to take a zone of occupation in Germany and to participate as a fourth member of the Control Commission, has been generally favourable but unenthusiastic. The Government is understood to be making a detailed study of the communiqué issued by the "Big Three."

In a recent interview published by the Knickerbocker Weekly M. Henri Bonnet, the new French Ambassador in Washington, has expressed sympathy with the action of the Netherlands Government in reserving the right to claim territory from Germany as compensation for Dutch land which has been deliberately ruined. Similar sympathy was expressed to the Free Dutch News Agency on the 9th February by M. Offroy, a spokesman of the Quai d'Orsay. M. Offroy also drew attention to the reference in General de Gaulle's speech to France's desire for control all along the Rhine (see last Summary), and said: "If you look at the map you will see that there is room enough for changes. In the end Holland might well have the same claims as France."

The situation in the Levant States continues to cause misunderstandings and to embarrass Anglo-French relations. Every effort is, however, being made to impress on the French Government the need for moderation in order to prevent the outbreak of disturbances which can only be detrimental to the interests of Great Britain and France. The recent approach made by the Syrian authorities to ascertain French requirements is now being considered by the French Government. In conversation M. Dejean, the Political Director at the Quai d'Orsay, has said that France had only two requirements in the Levant, oil and security. A weak country like Syria needed the protection of a great Power and this France was able and anxious to provide. If the States were reluctant to recognise France's "predominant position" he saw no reason why the words "special interests" should not be used instead. (See also under "Middle East.")

Captain Fouché, the French representative in Warsaw in charge of French prisoners of war in Poland, Silesia and East Prussia, estimates that over 150,000 Frenchmen have now been liberated. They belong to three categories: prisoners of war proper; political prisoners; and deportees. The Polish authorities have undertaken to keep where they are the Frenchmen found in camps and to concentrate those who are found wandering in special encampments. In a broadcast on the 9th February M. Frenay warned listeners against newspaper reports that repatriation would take place within two months. The difficulties of transport while the battle on the Eastern front was still in progress made this quite impossible. French families must be patient and trust to the authorities to have proper care of their men and to repatriate them as quickly as military operations permit.

M. Pleven is said to be very well pleased with his recent talks in London with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The readiness of His Majesty's Government to place all available information about French holdings in the United Kingdom at the disposal of the French Government has given much satisfaction. Inspired French comment suggests that the French Government are now ready to open negotiations for a financial and payments agreement with Great Britain.

The meeting of the Council of Ministers on the 6th February decided that the municipal and cantonal elections originally intended to take place in February (see Summary No. 262) should be held on the 29th April and the 13th May and on the 20th May and 3rd June respectively. The Government thus appears to have reversed its decision that elections should take place in each department as soon as the necessary preparations were completed.

The Consultative Assembly reassembled on the 6th February. It has before it the formidable task of considering the budget for 1945, but cannot make much progress as yet since it has so far received estimates for only a few Ministries, and the draft of the Finance Bill, setting out proposed means of expenditure, has yet to be submitted to it.

SWITZERLAND.

The economic negotiations, in which a French delegation is also taking part, opened on the 12th February. In the temporary absence through illness of Professor Keller, Professor Rappard is acting as Chairman on the Swiss side.

At a press conference held before the official opening of the talks Dr. Laughlin Currie read a statement on behalf of the three visiting delegations. This made it clear that among the matters raised would be Switzerland's economic relations with Germany, transit traffic between Germany and Italy and the question of enemy possessions concealed in Switzerland. The pill was, however, sweetened by the assurance that the delegations had come "to give as well as to receive"—with special reference to the Swiss needs for food supplies, fodder, raw material and transport facilities over sea and land—and by an expression of the belief that Switzerland could "give substantial support to the reconstruction of Europe."

Mr. Dingle Foot, speaking for the British delegation, said that British public opinion had been greatly impressed by the way in which the Swiss press had maintained its freedom of opinion even in the darkest days.

It is reported that some thirty Swiss citizens resident in France lost their lives at the hands of the German occupation forces or in the disorders accompanying liberation.

SPAIN.

Recent interest in Spanish affairs has been focussed upon figures and events outside rather than inside Spain. Some prominence was given in the British press to reports about the correspondence between General Franco and the Prime Minister, which had their origin, in the way these things happen, in the United States press some weeks ago. There is as yet no mention in the Spanish press of this publicity which cannot be welcome to General Franco. Apart from this, it is the extra-mural activities of the opponents in exile of the régime which have been attracting most attention. For instance, the arrival in London of Señor López Oliván, political adviser to the Spanish Pretender, has caused much journalistic speculation. Some papers have linked his name with those of Indalecio Prieto, Gil Robles and Negrín, the suggestion being that the imminent presence of all these gentlemen in London is a sign that this metropolis has been chosen as the preliminary headquarters of a United Spanish Exiles' Front against the present régime. It is an idea worthy of the pen of David Low, but it has less relation to reality than most of his cartoons. In fact, Señor Oliván, a career diplomat, who for a few weeks in the summer of 1936 was Ambassador in London, is here for the meeting of the Supervisory Commission of the League of Nations, at which the future of the Permanent Court of International Justice is to be discussed. Since the outbreak of the Civil War, Señor Oliván has been Registrar of the Court; he joined Don Juan in 1941 as the young Prince's tutor in constitutional law, and thereafter became his chief adviser. There are no indications that Señor Oliván has come here with any hopes of finding political support in this country.

The prospect of the coincidental appearance in London of Señor Gil Robles, Don Juan's chief political backer outside Spain, not unnaturally excited the curiosity of the diplomatic correspondents. Here, again, this is no conspiratorial gambit. Exile in Portugal has not been an undisturbed reclusion for Robles—his long-range skirmishes with Franco have been reported in previous Summaries—and a few months ago he was obliged by the Portuguese authorities to move north from Estoril to Bussaco (where in a famous battle Wellington beat Masséna in September 1810). Robles then had the idea of joining his master in Lausanne, and was granted a visa to pass through this country on his way to Switzerland. He will presumably be arriving shortly, but he is not likely to stay long in London, and he will certainly not be able to ask Don Juan for "albricias," like the messengers in old Spanish plays who always demanded a reward for bringing good tidings.

Dr. Negrín is another, but outward-bound traveller; he has left our shores for France, where he is reported to be busy planning and plotting, whether with or against Señor Maura is not clear. Maura is still busy conspiring against Franco, though with perhaps a little less publicity, from the commodious flat near the Invalides which he alleges the French Government have placed at his disposal. He spends a great part of his day receiving visitors, some of whom he impresses with frequent and cordial conversations with Cabinet Ministers on a dead telephone. Negrín will be returning to London shortly as he wishes to go to Mexico, where the rump Cortes held in Mexico City on the 10th January was a complete fiasco because no one attended save the supporters of the Junta de Liberación directed by Martinez Barrio and Indalecio Prieto. Barrio, the last President of the Republican Cortes, called another meeting of Deputies, who decided that nothing could be done until Negrín and the "Government" could be present. It is extremely hard to pin down Negrín to any definite statement of intention, but there are indications that he may be proposing to do a deal with Barrio to the possible detriment of Prieto. There is certainly a lot of telegram talk about closing the ranks and healing the breach. As for Prieto, he was invited to attend the World Trade Union Conference now being held in London, and His Majesty's Government raised no objection. In the event, however, he has not arrived.

To complete the list, Señora Dolores Ibarruri, better known as "La Pasionaria," the fiery Muse of Communist oratory, proposes to leave Russia and go to Paris. So, of all these Spaniards, Robles, Negrín and "La Pasionaria," of very different political faith, each convinced that the salvation of Spain lies at the end of one road only, are now hopefully setting out along that road. And the waiting-rooms of the airports of Europe will be full of the smoke of the endless cigarettes of these alchemists of happiness as they dreamily wait and wait . . . . If, indeed, it is better to travel hopefully than to arrive, some at least of these peregrinators may perhaps not be disappointed.

ITALY.

In addition to the Italian Government's plea that the financial burden imposed on Italy under the armistice be reduced, Signor Bonomi sent a special appeal to Mr. Churchill, M. Stalin and President Roosevelt at the Crimean Conference. Signor Bonomi not only repeated the request that the financial burden be lightened, but also urged that the terms of the Armistice in general be reviewed. In support of this demand Signor Bonomi quoted the supreme effort Italy was making in every sphere to co-operate with the Allies and the great hardships the country in general has had to put up with.

A story, said to have come from a Congressional source, has appeared in the American Press to the effect that the Italian Armistice terms include the loss of all her colonies, the cession of Pantelleria to Great Britain and the possible loss of Trieste to Yugoslavia. The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Grew, contradicted this report at his Press Conference and drew attention to Signor Bonomi's statement to the Italian Press on the 5th February. Signor Bonomi had stated that, although unconditional surrender meant that the Allies had complete control of Italy's internal financial, economic and military life, there was no reference in the Armistice terms to Italy's future frontiers nor to the fate of her colonies.

It has since transpired that the raid, as reported in last week's Summary, was not on the official Communist Headquarters, but on an organisation which calls itself the "Movimento Communista." This organisation is apparently made up of so-called Trotzkyists who are not in accord with the policy of the Italian Communist Party. The Secretary-General of the Unione Proletaria, Salvarezza by name, has now been arrested. It is not yet known whether he is a monarchist or a Communist, although the Unione Proletaria is said to be principally an anti-Communist organisation. More raids by the Carabinieri may take place, as it is known that there is still a large quantity of arms in unauthorised hands.

After the recent spate of decrees regarding the control of food and labour and the defence of the lira, there has been markedly little news from the Italian Social Republic and the Fascist-controlled radio has concentrated chiefly on sarcastic comments about events in liberated Italy.

Evacuation rumours continue. According to Swiss reports two German divisions have been withdrawn from Liguria and Piedmont and German troops have evacuated the Val d'Ossola, where they have been replaced by Fascist units. The captain of these units is said to have already gone over to the Partisans with all his men! From later reports it would appear that the German divisions withdrawn were territorial troops, while regular army troops are still holding the battle-front. The Fascists who are left to maintain order in the evacuated zones seem to be intensifying their terrorist tactics and much looting and arbitrary requisitioning is going on.

The Fascist official attitude regarding the Partisans is one of optimism. According to Fascist propaganda they have been completely wiped out in the north-west as a result of mopping-up operations. This optimism, however, is not shared by the Germans who appear to think that the Partisans still represent a very real danger and are taking steps to repress them independently of the Fascists. The C.N.L. for Northern Italy has stated that, though many of the groups have temporarily disbanded and have hidden their arms for the winter in accordance with orders received from Allied command, the framework of the Partisan organisation remains intact.

Food and transport chaos seems to be greater than ever in Milan. Local train services have been greatly curtailed and the postal services have been seriously affected.

THE VATICAN.

Soviet press and wireless attacks on the Vatican continue (see Summaries Nos. 274, 275, 276, under "Soviet Union"). The Orthodox Bishops assembled at Moscow "raised their voices against the Vatican pleading for mercy for the Hitlerites who drenched all Europe in blood and seeking to allow the continued existence on earth of the misanthropic Fascist doctrine and its agents." Red Star accuses the Pope of "blessing pro-Fascist Poles," plotting against the "democratisation" of Italy, showing undue interest in the political structure of Austria and Hungary and seeking to counter Allied plans for Europe with a Universal Peace Organisation of his own. His Christmas-time message is again misinterpreted as a plea for war criminals. Finally, it is pointed out that the Vatican, active now when Russia is "liberating" Poland, was silent when the Germans were murdering Poles. These and many similar charges were refuted in the Osservatore Romano of the 10th February, which the Vatican's Italian and English transmissions quoted on the 10th and 12th. "There is no element, however slender, which could serve as foundation for what has been said." On the 7th February the Vatican wireless recalled the passage in the Christmas-time message which contrasted the Christian with the totalitarian conception of justice.

These attacks are due partly to the Vatican's refusal to condemn atrocities publicly and in plain language and partly to the friendly relations it maintains with Governments under whose rule the atrocities have been committed. The Catholic reasons for this policy would not interest the attackers. On the other hand, with Allied permission, the Vatican investigates conditions in prisoners of war camps and reports openly upon what it finds. On the 9th February it broadcast to Germany that its prisoners in Italy were "well cared for, very well indeed." (For its adverse comments on a French-controlled camp in Tunisia, see Summary No. 268 under "Vatican.")

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

On the 12th February the siege of Budapest ended with the capture of the Royal Palace and Fortress Hill of Bude, with over 30,000 prisoners. The total siege yielded over 120,000 prisoners, including many officers of high rank. West of the capital, the line altered little in the last week, although the Russians improved their positions south of Székesfehérvár.

In liberated Pest, work is proceeding on the restoration of the public services; electric light has reappeared on the outskirts of the city. A first meeting has been held of the "National Municipal Committee," which includes representatives of "four democratic parties" (presumably the regular quartet of Social Democrats, Communists, Smallholders and National Peasants). The Chairman is Zoltan Tildy, leader of the Smallholders' Party, who had been in hiding for many months. The Peoples' Courts have begun their work and a few executions have already been recorded.

Reports coming in from Pest suggest that the destruction and removal of machinery has been far from complete, thanks to the resistance offered to these measures by the workers of Csepel and other places. They also indicate an increase of resistance and sabotage in German-occupied Hungary. It is suggested that even Volksdeutsche have been resisting evacuation, out of fear that if they left Hungary they would be deprived of their Hungarian nationality. A private source gives 500,000 as the total number of persons evacuated from Hungary.

In Arrow Cross Hungary, the Upper House has ratified three Bills: the Enabling Bill; a Bill empowering non-Jews married to Jews to obtain a divorce; and a Bill commemorating the merits of parties and other bodies fighting for National Socialism. The Grand Council of the Arrow Cross Party met at Kaposvár on the 3rd February; the Deputy Premier demanded the incorporation of the party into the constitutional law and life of the country. Four new "Hungarist" Divisions are to be raised to form "the nucleus of the new Hungarist Army in the battle against Bolshevism."

Prince Nicholas Odescalchi has been hanged for treasonable correspondence with the Allies. He had allegedly attempted to hand over military secrets to the Allies, and to arrange for the escape of "prominent politicians of the fallen régime."

The Yugoslav State Commission for the Investigation of Crimes published a report on the 6th January on crimes committed by the Hungarians in occupation of Bačka and Baranja, assessing the extent of material damage and treatment of the Serb population, and declaring as war criminals Horthy, Bárdossy (Premier at the time of the occupation of these areas), Szálasi, Imrédy, Bártha (Minister of War, 1941–42) and a large number of military and civilian occupation officials.

Roumania.

The salient features of Roumanian news are the strength and competence of General Radescu's Government, and the consequent efforts of the Communist Party to overthrow it. The Communists are a small group representing not more than 5 per cent. of the people. Their strength consists in their assurance that they have the authority of the Soviet Government behind them. It must be admitted that some events which may be accounted for by coincidence point in this direction, and it is fairly certain that the activities of the Communists receive some backing from local Soviet officials. The impression has been gaining ground for some time past that the Communists have been planning a coup d'État to overthrow the Government. General Radescu arranged to address a meeting in Bucarest last Sunday and arranged that his speech should be broadcast. On Saturday night Communists took possession of the hall where the meeting was to be held and refused admission to all but their own sympathisers. This manœuvre became known to the general, who removed the venue of his meeting to another hall and collected an audience by means of a procession of students through the streets. The first news of how the general had checkmated them reached the Communist meeting when the general's speech was broadcast. Their meeting then broke up in disorder.

General Radescu's speech was an explanation and justification of the line taken by his Government. He was not, he said, a member of any political party, and he condemned in vigorous language "party politicians who were seeking their own satisfaction to the detriment of the country" and to whom "chaos is convenient." In Roumanian politics calumny has always played a leading rôle. He was in favour of the freedom of the press, with the proviso that "a decent and dignified form should be respected." He sternly condemned the action of a section of the printing trade, which had refused to print matter which did not harmonise with their own views. Passing to the subject of the carrying out of the armistice, he declared that lack of means and not ill-will was the reason why progress was not more rapid. He did not consider the present a proper time to institute further agrarian reforms, as changes made now would affect adversely the interests of the serving soldiers. The speech concluded with a reference to the grant of co-belligerent status, which should not be made a subject of personal quarrels but which, when granted, would be due to the extent of the assistance Roumania had given in the field; and to Transylvania, the Roumanian administration of which was not something to be asked for as a favour, since that country beyond question belonged to Roumania; a good note on which to end his speech.

Some misgiving has been caused by the fact that an increase in the number of armed Communist guards, and the threat of a coup d'État, was followed by the removal of the one remaining tank unit in Bucarest, on which dependence was placed for the preservation of order. As noted above, there may not be more in this than coincidence. The tanks are urgently required at the front. Presumably they are the genuine article.

Dl Gh. Tatarescu, who was Prime Minister from 1934–37 and again from 1939–40 has been trying to stage a come-back, and has made a bid for the leadership of the Liberal Party. In view of his past record and that of his supporters, this is not very impressive. He was an active supporter of the former King Carol. This move is quite on the lines of Roumanian political activity.

The Quisling Government of Horia Sima has set up an Orthodox episcopate in Vienna to look after the spiritual welfare of Roumanians in Germany, under Visarion Puiu as Metropolitan. Another "chicken" come home to roost under the wing of Seraphim Lade.

Yugoslavia.

The negotiations over the selection of the Regents proceeded confusedly. Only over one name has agreement been reached, that of the Slovene Regent, Dr. Sernec, who was Minister under the dictatorship fifteen years ago and joined the Partisans early in the war. General Simovitch, who was proposed by King Peter as the Serb Regent, is acceptable to Marshal Tito but has been rejected by Shubashitch. Tito has objected to the King's proposal of Dr. Shutet as the Croat Regent, which was acceptable to Shubashitch.

These exchanges were overtaken by the declaration of the three Allied Heads of Governments from the Crimea, published on the 13th, stating they had agreed to recommend that a Yugoslav Government should be formed immediately on the basis of the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement. This new Government should accept two points: (a) that A.V.N.O.J., the Partisans' legislature, should be enlarged to include members of the last Yugoslav Parliament [elected under the dictatorship in 1935 and dissolved in 1939. The Croat and Independent Democratic (Serbs of Croatia) Deputies never took their seats in it]. Only those members, however, should be admitted "who have not compromised themselves by collaboration with the enemy." This enlarged body should be known as a "temporary Parliament"; and (b) that the legislative acts of A.V.N.O.J. should be subject to subsequent ratification by a Constituent Assembly.

At a meeting of the Royal Yugoslav Government, over which the King presided, on the 12th, summoned to consider the recommendation of the Crimean Conference which had been communicated to them the previous evening, it was decided, with the King's approval, that the Government should proceed without delay to Belgrade, there to complete the arrangements for the Regency and the unified Government.

The cause of the crown and of legal continuity has not received encouragement from the disproportionate publicity recently given in the Partisan press to the trial and condemnation of Prince Cyril and the other Bulgarian Regents and numerous references to King Peter's past support of Mihailovitch against the Partisans.

The Partisans' rule in Yugoslavia has been criticised on the grounds that they expelled the British and American correspondents admitted to the country for a few days in November last and are reluctant to sanction the admission of others. The Commissar for Information has now issued a long justificatory statement, chiefly directed to the United States, protesting that discrimination has only been shown against unfriendly journalists, that the Allies themselves were responsible for keeping correspondents out of Yugoslavia, and that, in addition to Mr. Harrison, of Reuter's (see Summary No. 279, p. 14), four British and Canadian correspondents have now been admitted to Yugoslavia.

It is rumoured in Belgrade that a capital levy is to be effected by means of the issue of a new currency. The black market rate for dollars has risen from 2,000 dinars in November to 14,100 dinars. Should the financial operation indicated take place, the dollar would shoot further up.

For the Partisan War Crimes Commission's denunciation of Hungarian personalities as "War Criminals," see "Hungary."

Greece.

After discussions lasting several days, the representatives of the Greek Government and the E.L.A.S. delegates finally reached agreement in the early hours of the 12th February. In the presence of Mr. Leeper and of Mr. Macmillan, a short protocol was signed stating that full agreement had been reached. Later in the day a detailed agreement was signed, of which the main points were as follows: (1) the Government guaranteed freedom to express political and social opinions, also freedom of assembly and of association, and, in particular, the liberties of the trade unions; (2) as soon as the present agreement was signed, martial law would be lifted; at the same time an Act would be brought into force which permitted the suspension of certain articles of the 1911 Constitution, some of which would be suspended forthwith throughout the country; the suspension would last until disarmament was complete and administrative, judicial and military authorities had been established throughout the country; (3) there would be an amnesty for political crimes committed between the 3rd December, 1944, and the publication of the Amnesty Decree; from this amnesty would be excluded common law crimes against life and property which were not absolutely necessary to the achievement of the political crime concerned; members of E.L.A.S., E.L.A.N. and the E.L.A.S. police who had not handed over their arms by the 15th March would not be covered by the amnesty; (4) all civilians arrested by E.L.A.S. or by the E.L.A.S. police must be set at liberty immediately; any of them who were held on charges of collaboration must be handed over to the State for trial in the courts; (5) the new National Army was to be formed by calling up certain classes from time to time; the Sacred Battalion, being under the immediate orders of the Allied High Command, would temporarily remain as at present; after the demobilisation of E.L.A.S., any of its members who fell within the groups to be called up would report for enrolment; the political and social views of citizens serving in the army would be respected; (6) as soon as the agreement was published, all the armed forces of resistance would be demobilised, surrendering their arms; (7) the Government would proceed to a purge of civil servants and other public officials, including those who had been instruments of the dictatorship; no official would be dismissed simply on account of his political opinions; (8) a purge of the security services would be carried out as soon as possible; (9) at the earliest possible date, and in any case within the current year, a free plebiscite would be held to let the people decide the constitutional issue; as soon as possible after the plebiscite, elections would be held for a Constituent Assembly; the representatives of both sides agreed that the great Allied Powers be invited to send observers to verify that the people's will had been freely and genuinely expressed.

Albania.

Enver Hoxha's provisional Government declares that at the congress which it called at Permet in May 1944 it was invested with authority by the representatives of the people. It also claims to have accomplished a social revolution by moderate methods. But all is not over yet. Enver Hoxha evidently does not feel assured enough to form a constituent assembly. His Government is responsible meanwhile to a central committee of 45 called the "Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation." The leading members of the Government belong to this central committee, and on it depend sub-committees—appointed in fact by the Communist Party—in the provinces and in Government departments. Demonstrations which have been staged in Tirana and south Albanian towns demanding the trial of "war criminals" and the extradition of those in Allied hands show that the Government has still adversaries of whom it means to dispose. As recorded last week, the Government has met opposition in the north where the Catholic tribes may be expected to take none too kindly to a Communist régime. The Ball Kombetar (Nationalist) leaders, when they escaped, left an underground organisation behind. In Tirana and Scutari there has been considerable opposition. Merchants and landowners have tried non-co-operation. Even within the Government Enver Hoxha has had difficulties, for Myslim Peza, an influential peasant notable who has been a leader of the liberation movement from the beginning, demanded an end to saluting with the clenched fist, to wearing the red star and to putting women in important Government posts.

Bulgaria.

All accounts of the way in which Prince Kiril faced execution redound to his credit. The Bulgarian Prime Minister has repeated in private the assurance that so long as Bulgaria remains a monarchy the safety and dignity of the Queen and her children will be respected. He also stated that Princess Eudoxie was still kept isolated. Meanwhile the People's Courts in a score of provincial places have been busy trying civil administrators, army and gendarmerie officers, chiefs of police, informers and others for murder, torture, rape, robbery, burning down houses and other excesses committed in the course of repressing the partisans. At Burgas 19 were sentenced to death and 3 to imprisonment for life; at Botevgrad 35 to death (13 in absentia) and 10 to imprisonment for life; at Kula 26 (13 in absentia) to death; at Varna 51 to death out of 140 accused.

The Communist Party was presumably behind an attempt which the youthful Left extremists in the Social Democrat Party—one of the two smaller components of the Fatherland Front coalition—made to capture the Party committee. Eighty to ninety per cent. of the Social Democrats are reported to have been against the extremists, but under the compromise which was reached a new committee, more to the Left than the majority of the Party like, was appointed: Pastuhov who had virtually led the Party for twenty years was forced to resign, if not arrested, and the leadership of the Party passed to Chesmedzhiev, the Social Democrat Minister for Social Affairs.

According to an American observer, the Bulgarian people now find to their chagrin that they have only exchanged one tyranny for another. The Communists, he declares, have established a terror based on tommy-guns put in the hands of the partisans, hooligans and released convicts who make up the Militia. That body, he further maintains, which is under Yugov, the Communist Minister of the Interior, and polices the country, imposes the will of the Communist Party, of which the moving spirit is Mlle. Tsola Dragoitcheva, a fervid Communist who returned from Moscow at the time of the September revolution. These allegations, though perhaps exaggerated, are not without some substance, and it would seem that in the end popular feeling must turn not only against the Communists but also against the Russians, who at least tolerate the Communist excesses.

On the 4th February a congress of Macedonians living in Bulgaria met at Sofia. Greetings were received from Marshal Tito, from the new Macedonian Assembly (A.S.N.O.M.) and from the Bulgarian Fatherland Front, and messages were despatched to President Roosevelt, Marshal Stalin and Mr. Churchill. The congress pledged itself to oppose Bulgarian expansionism and to support a free Macedonia within a federal Yugoslavia; an alliance of all southern Slavs; fraternal relations with Balkan peoples; and the Fatherland Front Government.

Turkey.

The sweeping successes of the Red army caused considerable anxiety in the Turkish mind, and the press, while expressing every confidence that the Big Three would establish sure foundations for peace and for the rights of small nations, evinced some impatience to know precisely what the Allied decisions might be. There has for some time been a natural tendency to turn to the United States as the one country that can help the Old World and Turkey in particular. Business men seek relations with the United States, students want to go there and the American schools in Turkey are popular. As regards Turco-Greek relations, the friendly statement which Archbishop Damaskinos made to a representative of the Anatolia Agency produced a prompt echo in the Turkish press. No greater service, wrote M. Atay in the semi-official Ulus, could be rendered to the cause of peace in the Near East than that Greece and Turkey should protect themselves against the anarchy now threatening everywhere.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

During the debate in the Egyptian Parliament on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, speeches of an extreme nationalist character were made by more than one speaker. Fikri Abaza, for instance, is reported to have gone so far as to suggest that the Anglo-Egyptian treaty should be regarded as no longer valid. The Prime Minister seems to have dealt very firmly with Fikri. Although he hoped that Great Britain would remove certain restrictions imposed under the treaty, there was no question of Egypt's not maintaining Great Britain as her ally. He protested vigorously against Fikri's improper suggestion, and asked the Chamber to support the maintenance of friendship with Great Britain, upon whom Egypt still relied for complete independence.

As far as is known at present, nothing further has been decided by the Egyptian Prime Minister regarding the proposal to prosecute the members of the late Government. According to Amr Pasha, who is still acting as intermediary between the Palace and His Majesty's Embassy in the absence, owing to illness, of Hassanein, Ahmad Maher will eventually succeed in disposing of the matter to his own satisfaction, since he has no wish to wash this dirty linen in public. There is, too, an indication that King Farouk may be willing after all not to press the matter to extremes.

Ibn Saud's account of his recent meeting with King Farouk, given in last week's Summary, has now been supplemented by that of King Farouk himself. Ibn Saud had impressed him even more forcibly than he had expected, and the visit had been a great success from every point of view. According to the King, little of real importance had been discussed between them, and their talks on Arab affairs had mainly centred on the question of Syria, on which King Farouk himself had had little to say, except that he hoped that the French would not prove too intransigent. Ibn Saud had also emphasised his great friendship for Great Britain, a sentiment which King Farouk had for his part warmly endorsed.

Since then, Ibn Saud has had another visitor in the person of Shukri Quwatli, the Syrian President, who came last week to the Hejaz at Ibn Saud's invitation to talk over the Syrian problem with him. Ibn Saud has been at pains to impress upon Shukri the importance of composing his differences with the French as soon as possible, on the clear understanding that His Majesty's Government would continue to support the independence of the Levant States, and do their best not only to persuade the French to modify their claims, but also to make Shukri himself adopt a more reasonable attitude.

At a later meeting, at which His Majesty's Minister was present, Shukri said that he would not object to the Troupes Spéciales being demobilised by the French instead of being transferred. He was even ready to offer to France concessions regarding railways, ports, &c. But what was the good of all this if the French, on their side, would do nothing? He feared that they would not state their desiderata as they had promised, and he believed that France's real intention was to turn Syria into a French colony. Shukri indeed made it quite clear that he did not trust the French, and that therefore it was of little use trying to discuss anything with them.

Something, however, has been gained by the fact that conversations have begun between Count Ostrorog and the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs. Jamil Mardam asked that the French should state categorically what they wanted, on which his Government would consider the French proposals, subject of course to Syria's independence not being prejudiced. He also told Count Ostrorog that the only demand they had to make was for the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales. This conversation, which is believed to have been frank and friendly on both sides, took place in Damascus on the 5th February, but no tangible result can be expected until instructions from Paris have been received by General Beynet. It is understood that General Catroux, who was recently appointed French Ambassador at Moscow, is to spend a few days at Beirut and Damascus on his way to Russia. This is highly satisfactory. It was General Catroux whose courage and determination helped to solve the serious crisis that occurred in the Lebanon in November 1943 and there is no senior French official who understands better the complexities of the problem now awaiting solution in the Levant States. (See also under "France.")

It will be remembered that in October 1944 Dr. Millspaugh tried to dismiss Ibtihaj, the Governor of the National Bank of Persia, on the ground that it was impossible for the American Financial Mission to continue working with him (see Summary No. 263). The Persian Government, however, came to the conclusion that Dr. Millspaugh was not entitled to dismiss Ibtihaj, who remained at his post. Dr. Millspaugh recently wrote to the Persian Prime Minister to say that he could not stay unless Ibtihaj was dismissed, and he was given assurances by the Persia Government on various other points. As the Cabinet was unable to meet Dr. Millspaugh's wishes, he said that the Government had broken its contract with him and that he would take the leave due to him. Dr. Millspaugh denies that he has resigned, but it is clear that he will not return. Nothing has yet been decided as to his successor, and the future of the mission is uncertain.

THE FAR EAST.

The 86th session of the Japanese Diet has completed its deliberations. The Nippon Times on the 10th February said that the Diet was to be commended for its substantial and constructive contribution to the strengthening of the nation's war effort. The Diet's attempt to clarify and emphasise Japanese war aims was considered by the Nippon Times to be of particular interest to the outside world. On the home front, the Diet had given full legislative support to the Government's measures designed to mobilise more labour for war production, to improve transport, to promote scientific research, and to control inflation.

The Asahi (10th February) was less enthusiastic about the Diet session. It said that many questions relating to various decisive war-time problems were asked and various Ministers had replied; there was no doubt that such questions and replies were of vital importance, but they would not lead Japan to even a single victory. "What we earnestly hope is that the Government will, without a moment's delay, put into practice what it promises."

Sharp criticism of the Koiso Government was voiced by some members of the Lower House. Thus Chu Funada declared (24th January), that not a single satisfactory solution had been devised to increase the output of munitions during the six months that Koiso had been in office. He asked why there were not enough aircraft at the front. The poor quality of Japanese aircraft was also the subject of criticism. In this connection Chungking, on the 23rd January, said that it had picked up a broadcast by Takeo Shinmiyo, a Japanese war correspondent who had just returned to Japan from the Phiiippines. Shinmiyo declared that the average life expectancy of a new Japanese aeroplane in the Philippines was twenty-four hours. Japanese aircraft in the Philippines, he said, were of poor quality and were not arriving in sufficient numbers. Lieutenant-General Endo, the chief of the General Aircraft Office of the Ministry of War Production, was queried about this state of affairs by a member of the Lower House. He admitted that the quantity of aircraft was inadequate, but said that the machines produced were subjected to strong tests and were "almost without exception" suitable for use at the front. But as mechanisms were extremely delicate it was not easy entirely to exclude small defects (Domei, 29th January).

A more general attack on the Government came from Ichiro Kiyose, who declared in the Lower House on the 7th February that the Koiso Cabinet had formulated a six-point policy in the previous Diet session, but that no results worthy of mention had been achieved. The Government ought to control prices and improve the distribution of goods so as to eliminate Black Market transactions. Kiyose declared that Government officials were not as efficient as they should be and the Government should do more to remedy this. He said that "State character" (presumably he meant nationalisation) should be imposed on industry and that those engaged in it should be on an Army basis and subject to Army regulations. The Government ought to trust the people and tell them the truth about the military situation. Kiyose's final point was that "young men of high spirit" should be employed as extensively in administration and industry as they were on the battle-fronts.

From the tone of Kiyose's remarks it may be inferred that he is a spokesman for the group that is striving behind the scenes to impose a full-blooded Fascist régime upon Japan. So far the movement to replace the Seijikai and the Taisei Yokusankai by a new political association (see this Summary No. 277) has produced little concrete result. On the 7th February a group of 26 members of the Lower House announced the formation of "A Certain Victory Structure Promotion League." Domei (8th February) said that this League would reject the former party leaders and would draw its personnel from the younger groups. The Yomiuri-Hochi (8th February) said that "unfortunately" the Diet members showed the most interest in the formation of a new political organisation; the discussions on economic matters were not what they should have been.

Meanwhile Koiso has made some changes in his Ministry, but the only one of significance is the appointment of Hisatada Hirose to be Chief Cabinet Secretary and Minister of State without portfolio. Hirose, who comes from Yamanashi, is a member of the House of Peers and was formerly Minister of Welfare in the Koiso Cabinet. He had previously held this Ministry in the Hiranuma Cabinet in 1939 and had been Director of the Cabinet Legislative Bureau in the Yonai Cabinet. Domei (12th February) said that Hirose replaced Takeo Tanaka, Koiso's personal confidant, as Chief Cabinet Secretary, and that the appointment meant the bringing in of a "big calibre" man to act as "chief of staff" in carrying out the national mobilisation programme. The new Welfare Minister is Katsuroku Aikawa, formerly vice-Minister of Welfare. The Minister of Education, Lieut.-General Harushige Ninomiya, has been dropped and replaced by Count Hideo Kodama. Ninomiya had not previously held Cabinet office and has presumably been a failure; Count Kodama has held various ministerial posts in previous Cabinets, and was Minister of State in the Koiso Cabinet. The Asahi (11th February) commented sourly that little political significance could be attached to the changes in the Cabinet; Koiso was trying to tide over the existing crisis with the least possible change in the Ministers appointed when the Cabinet was first formed. Domei (12th February) said that the Diet would go into recess from the 13th February until the end of March, when the present session comes to a formal close; but that both Houses would remain ready to reassemble at a moment's notice should the occasion arise. Evidently the Koiso Cabinet is still in a very shaky position.

The Chungking radio on the 10th February announced that a new army command, called Chinese Army Headquarters, had been established some time ago at Kunming. The Commander-in-chief is General Ho Ying-chin, and the deputy Commander-in-chief is General Lung Yun, the Governor of Yunnan Province. A report from Kunming summarised an inauguration speech made by General Ho on the 25th December. He said that the most important object of the new command was the formation of a modern national army, with proper training and with modern equipment, to be secured from the United States via the new land route. The new army headquarters would plan a final offensive against the Japanese, with the modernised Chinese army as the main force and with the assistance of Allied troops.

As the head of this new command and as Chief of Staff to the Generalissimo Ho Ying-chin remains in a very strong position, despite his vacation of the War Ministry. Indeed, if a better disciplined and well-equipped Chinese army can be built up under his auspices, he will come to wield much more power than he did in the Chungking War Ministry, which is now under Chen Cheng. The Chinese Communists, who regard General Ho as their chief antagonist, will not relish the prospect of his emergence as commander of an efficient force, equipped with American weapons, but trained politically by the Kuomintang.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Between the interim announcement of the Crimea Conference on the 7th February and the final declaration on the 12th, American opinion seemed to be finally making up its mind to the inevitable participation of the United States in the post-war control of Germany, in the political and economic settlement of Europe, in the building and working of a world organisation for peace and security. Even the more Conservative newspapers were concerned rather that the United States should play a leading rôle than that it should avoid commitments. "The American people," was a characteristic comment, "want a peace based on principles of freedom and justice. They are entitled to more than an onlooker's part in the settlement of Europe; they are ready to strive for lasting peace, but they want Roosevelt to let Churchill and Stalin know exactly how they stand." The only serious criticism of the Conference procedure was the conditions of secrecy surrounding its earlier stages and the fear that the exclusion of the press (not, it is understood, desired by President Roosevelt) might prejudice the American public against some of the conclusions reached.

Support for the general policy formulated at the Conference seems assured. In a speech at Detroit on the 5th February Senator Vandenberg (Republican, Michigan) reiterated his proposal for a "hard and fast" demilitarisation treaty, but not as a substitute for the Dumbarton Oaks plan. On the contrary, he maintained that the latter would be "an indispensable sequel to the former." A few days later Governor Dewey was also at pains to remove suspicions that the Republican Party was not wholeheartedly in favour of the larger and more permanent scheme. He told an audience at the Lincoln Commemoration Dinner on the 8th February that "there need no longer be any doubt anywhere that the American people are prepared to exercise their great power actively, continuously and effectively in the interest of a just and lasting peace." This speech was well received by the Republican press, although the Isolationist wing of the party was noticeably cool about it.

The first reactions to the Conference agreements were certainly favourable. Both the Senate and House of Representatives had adjourned for the day when the news came through, but Senator Barkley, the Democratic leader, recalled the Senate to receive the report and described the declaration as " a source of great gratification to me and to all the peace-loving people of the world." Senator Connally, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, also welcomed the joint statement; while Senator Vandenberg described it as " by far the best issued from any major conference." He seized on the terms of the proposed demilitarisation of Germany as " greatly encouraging—a pledge among our Allied friends on the basis of the Atlantic Charter." Mr. Sol Bloom, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, was also glad to see the principles of the Atlantic Charter reaffirmed, " a pretty good basis to work from."

This is the general line taken in American press comment so far. There is likely to be controversy over the Polish settlement, though the solution proposed is one that has been foreseen in the United States. Consideration of this and other questions must, however, await the further details expected when the President and the Secretary of State return home. Congress then anticipates at least a statement from the Administration to a bipartisan group of Senators and Representatives. The desire of the Executive to associate the Legislature in foreign negotiations has again been evidenced by the invitation of Senator Connally, Senator Austin (Republican), Representative Bloom and Representative Edith Rogers (Republican) to the Inter-American Conference which opens at Mexico City on the 21st of this month. This may provide a precedent for similar procedure at other international conferences.

Economic arrangements are likely to occupy an increasing proportion of the agenda at future meetings of the Powers. The fact that a Presidential message to Congress urging attention to the Bretton Woods proposals was sent to Congress on the last day of the Crimea Conference indicated the priority accorded to financial matters by the Administration. " We must see," said the President, " that institutions of peace rest firmly on solid foundations of international, political and economic co-operation." He proposed shortly to lay before Congress plans for the establishment of a United Nations food and agriculture organisation, for broadening and strengthening the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, for reducing tariff barriers, for the control of cartels and the orderly marketing of world surpluses. As " a good start " he suggested that " the United States should act promptly on the plan for an international bank which will guarantee sound loans for foreign currency agreements. . . . ." Whether Congress is now prepared to accept the whole Bretton Woods scheme may still be doubted. The American Bankers' Association, while approving the Administration's plea for extended use of Export–Import Bank funds and for repeal of the Johnson Act, is not in favour of a separate international monetary fund, which it thinks should be made part of any International Bank for Reconstruction set up (see Summary No. 276). Newspapers such as the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune side with the bankers rather than the Administration on this topic, and the monetary proposals seem destined for a stormy passage in Congress.

Meanwhile Lend-Lease arrangements and the work of U.N.R.R.A. have been under fire (see Summary No. 279 under " Italy "). The Foreign Economic Administration has issued one of its periodical scotchings of fictions about abuse of American material by foreign countries, and has warned the public that insinuations are likely to continue. Not without need, for that tireless lion-baiter, Mr. Drew Pearson, has since brought up another charge : that London cab-drivers are taking parties to Windsor races on Lend-Lease gasoline, while horse-racing in the United States is forbidden for the duration. A more serious attack was made in a press interview given by Mr. James M. Landis, Dean of Harvard Law School, on his resignation from the post of Director of Economic Operations for the Middle East. He did, however, conclude his somewhat vague criticism of British handling of Lend-Lease items in those regions with the remark " I think there is nothing wrong now." The Lend-Lease Act must be renewed before the end of June and hearings have begun before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Both Mr. Crowley, the F.E.A. Administrator, and Assistant Secretary of State Acheson testified to the indispensability of Lend-Lease as a weapon for Allied victory, and emphasised that aid must be continued " just as long as it is required in the war." The point is now being reached, however, where direct loans, either public or private, are being considered as an alternative to what many Americans still regard as largesse. It was announced on the 8th February that a further loan, amounting to 100 million dollars, has been negotiated by the Netherlands Government with several New York banks, headed by the Chase National Bank (see Summary No. 259). The bankers are also reported as studying possible loans to the Netherlands East Indies, Norway, Czechoslovakia, and the two corporations recently formed in London, with the backing of the Bank of England, for financing the post-war expansion of British industry.

LATIN AMERICA.

The State Department has announced that the United States delegation to the Inter-American Conference, which will meet at Mexico City on the 21st February, is to consist of Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, together with five Congressional advisers, including the Chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Foreign Affairs, and 32 other advisers. The latter include the Ambassadors to Brazil and Mexico, the Assistant-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Mr. William Clayton), the Acting-Secretary of Commerce (Mr. Wayne Taylor), the Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Harry White), Dr. Leo Pasvolsky, the President of the United States Chamber of Commerce (Mr. Eric Johnston) and representatives of the Export-Import Bank (Mr. Warren Lee Pierson), the Departments of Labour and Agriculture, the American Federation of Labour and the National Farmers' Union, as well as of the armed services. The delegation is thus as strong on the economic as on the political side and is widely representative of United States opinion. According to press reports Brazil is likely to ask for a permanent seat in the future international security organisation, and Mexico is anxious to make membership of it universal and obligatory (thus including ex-enemy nations, though at first with restricted rights), to increase the authority of the Assembly and to prohibit the Great Powers from voting in disputes to which they are parties.

An apparent attempt to pave the way for an eventual reconciliation between Argentina and the United States is suggested by the appearance of a decree on the 8th February by virtue of which the Argentine Government accepted an invitation of the Pan-American Union to attend the inter-American economic and technical conference which is to meet in Washington on the 15th June. It would thus appear that Argentina's decision to take no part in Pan-American activities until her request for a meeting of Foreign Ministers had been granted has been annulled. On the 10th February, moreover, the Argentine Government issued decrees restoring the autonomy of Argentine universities and reinstating those professors who were dismissed in October 1943 by the Ramírez Government for signing a public manifesto in favour of democracy and Pan-American co-operation (see Summary No. 211). Dr. Bramuglia, the Interventor of Buenos Aires (see Summary No. 275) has also withdrawn from the police the power to reprimand, seize and close newspapers (granted in January 1942 under the state of siege). Nevertheless, the pro-Axis papers Cabildo and Federal (ex-Pampero), which ceased publication when the Government withheld supplies of newsprint in the middle of January, reappeared on the 9th February.

By a decree dated the 8th February, Paraguay declared war on the Axis Powers. Ecuador, we are now to understand, according to an official statement of her President, is to be regarded as having been at war with Japan since the 7th December, 1941 (" although no formal declaration had been made previously "), and on the 13th February the President of Peru declared that a state of belligerency existed between Peru on the one hand and Japan and Germany on the other. The Ambassadors of all three countries in Washington together with the Ambassador of Chile signed the Declaration of the United Nations on the 14th February, and the Chilean Ambassador then stated that Chile had been in a state of belligerency since her severance of relations with the Axis in January, 1943. It is probable that Venezuela and Uruguay will also join the United Nations' ranks shortly.

In Guatemala the Legislative Assembly has proclaimed Dr. Juan José Arévalo to be President Elect. It is, however, doubtful whether Dr. Arévalo enjoys much support in the army.

UNITED NATIONS.

The Crimea Conference.

The far-reaching results of the conference were achieved in a remarkably short period of time. This was no doubt partly due to the preliminary Conference at Malta between the United Kingdom and the United States. That so much has been accomplished with so great a measure of general approval justifies the special efforts of the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary to obtain a Conference at the earliest possible moment. The three heads of Governments and Foreign Secretaries were accompanied by a large number of ministers, military, diplomatic and economic advisers and officials, nearly 600 in all. The results issued under ten main heads may roughly be divided into three main parts, the treatment of Germany, the measures for Liberated Europe and the setting up of a general international organisation.

As regards Germany complete agreement has been reached on future plans and new and powerful blows will be directed against Germany from every quarter. Meetings of the three staffs will be held whenever necessary. The terms of the "unconditional surrender" will not be disclosed until the final defeat of the Nazis. But the means to enforce them are described. A Control Commission is to be set up at Berlin under the Commanders-in-Chief of the three Powers, with which France, if she wishes, is to be associated in full equality, with a fourth zone of occupation assigned to her, the details being worked out by the European Advisory Commission. Special agreements have been signed between the U.S.S.R. and the United Kingdom and the United States dealing with the care and repatriation of rescued prisoners of war which are nationals of any one of them.

Meanwhile the determination is expressed to destroy, root and branch, the Nazi Party, institutions and influence, to break up "for all time" the German General Staff, to bring all war criminals to justice and to eliminate or control all German industry that can be used for military production. But "reparation of all kind" will also be exacted from Germany and for this purpose a three-Power Commission for the Compensation of Damage will be set up in Moscow which will work out the extent and methods of such compensation.

It is added that it is not the purpose to destroy the people of Germany—only Nazism and militarism. Only thus can Germans achieve a decent life and a place in the comity of nations.

As regards Liberated Europe a Declaration has been signed that the three Powers intend to work together to deal with the political and economic problems of Liberated Europe in accordance with democratic principles. They will consult together in order to assist both the liberated peoples and those of the former Axis satellite States to solve their pressing problems by democratic means. Order and reconstruction must be obtained by methods which lead to the destruction of Nazism and Fascism and the creation of freely chosen democratic institutions. For this purpose the three Governments promise to assist the European peoples, where they think it necessary, "(a) to establish conditions of peace; (b) to carry out emergency measures for the relief of distressed people; (c) to form interim Governmental authorities broadly representative of all democratic elements in the population and pledged to the earliest possible establishment through free elections of Governments responsive to the will of the people; and (d) to facilitate where necessary the holding of such elections." Other European Governments will be consulted when the direct interests of their peoples are involved and, when action is necessary, the three Governments will immediately consult together as to how their joint responsibilities are to be discharged.

This Declaration is asserted to be a reaffirmation of their faith in the principles of the Atlantic Charter, their pledge in the United Nations Declaration and their determination to build a "world order under law dedicated to peace, security, freedom and the general well-being of all mankind." (For the immediate application of these principles to Poland and Yugoslavia see under those countries.) France is invited to associate herself in the above procedure. There are also to be meetings of the Foreign Secretaries of the three Powers such as have been held daily with great success in the Crimea. These will be held successively in the capitals of the three Powers every three or four months, and the first of these will be held in London after the United Nations Conference at San Francisco.

As regards the establishment of a general international organisation, the necessity of setting this up at the earliest possible moment is again affirmed. Its foundations were already laid at Dumbarton Oaks, but the problem of voting procedure then left unsettled has been resolved at the Crimea Conference. Consequently, a Conference of the United Nations is to be called to meet at San Francisco on the 25th April, 1945. France and China will be immediately consulted and invited to join the other three Powers in issuing the invitations. The text of the agreement on the voting procedure will then be published.

In a final passage these decisions are underlined by reasserting the determination of the three Powers to maintain their unity of purpose and action. Only such close and continuing co-operation together with the other peace-loving countries can make possible that peace under which the aspiration of the Atlantic Charter can be realised. Victory and the general international organisation will provide the opportunity to create the essential conditions of such a peace.

GERMANY.

THE Crimea Conference has certainly added to the anxieties of the German Propaganda Ministry. The text of its decisions has had to be withheld from the German people; lavish comment has been given to those which might serve to strengthen German morale; the rest have been either ignored or obliquely referred to. References on the German Home Service of the 14th and 15th February to decisions of which the public had never been officially informed suggested that the authorities reckoned with a good deal of listening to foreign news bulletins.

Even before the conference met, indications were not wanting that German Propaganda was far from sure as to the line it ought to take regarding an Allied declaration of policy concerning Germany. For months past it has drawn gruesome pictures of Allied severity, and has rubbed in the intention to dismember and destroy Germany, to deport Germans into slavery and to put an end not only to their national greatness but to an adequate standard of life. Yet recently it has taken the very different line of warning the people against an Allied appeal, against any offer of a way out of the war. The German leaders clearly feared such an appeal, possibly because they feared its effect on the hard-driven people of Germany. This fear was already evident in Hitler's speech on the 30th January. On the 2nd February, D.N.B. said the Allies were planning to employ a "huge propaganda trick," by "re-editing Wilson's notorious 14 points," to make their "destruction slogan of the unconditional surrender of the German people" more agreeable. Warnings against this "Wilson swindle" continued, and a major propaganda campaign was launched. German forces in Italy, for example, were told that the "Big Three" would probably produce a manifesto to the German people, making promises to them if they would surrender. On the 6th Dietrich told foreign journalists that the Allies aimed at persuading the German people to surrender, and intended to promise mankind that they would lay the foundations for world peace.

After the Yalta communiqué had been issued, the German propagandists seemed relieved that there had been no appeal to the German people, and no "modification" of unconditional surrender. A transmission for the foreign press on the 14th said that the "swindle" might still come, when the Allies had agreed on the terms of the appeal; but Schmidt on the previous day said that the document was excellent "in so far as it gives the German leaders the opportunity to maintain the war morale of the German people and to increase the spirit of resistance and devotion of every individual German to the utmost." On the 13th Kriegk said that the enemy had given up the attempt to propose a "new set of 14 Points" and there could now be no question of any compromise, or "diplomatic negotiations round some conference table."

The decisions taken at Yalta (summarised here last week, P.I. Summary No. 280, p. 22) are so comprehensive and far-reaching that it is interesting to see how the present leaders of Germany have reacted to their publication. Certain of them (those dealing with occupation, territory, industry) have been fitted in without much difficulty to the pattern of propaganda on the destruction of Germany. Certain others have proved too delicate to discuss in any detail and have been more or less passed over: reparation, destruction of the Nazi party and the trial of war criminals were all avoided. Nothing, of course, has been said of the final Allied declaration suggesting a place for Germany within the comity of nations. One comment noted the absence of any declaration regarding Japan.

The decision to occupy Germany has been given some prominence in comment. Zones of occupation would mean "the enslavement and subjugation of Germany." A Military Commission in Berlin was ridiculed as an attempt "to get hold of the last toy pistols in Germany." Schwarz van Berk said on the 14th, "they set out to smash German militarism and now Berlin is to become the city of the new super-militarism." The same speaker described the proposals regarding German industry as "pure Morgenthau"; like others he avoided direct mention of "reparation" and spoke only of mass deportation of German workers. D.N.B., in a detailed comment of the 14th, said that the "forced deportation of millions of German workers" had been officially decided upon.

Propaganda showed some hesitation on the whole subject of German war-guilt. A D.N.B. forecast of the 12th said that the "war-guilt lie" would be revived. Yet after the event expressions suggesting war-guilt were significantly avoided. D.N.B. commented on the 18th that the Allies intended "to exterminate all nationalist-minded Germans" and again that "the three war criminals are seeking to separate the German people from its leaders as they did in 1918." The public should not think, said a later message, that the Allies wished only to destroy military Germany; "it was quite evident that the Soviets are serious in their intention to destroy the German people."

On the whole it is clear that the Germans have been told only so much as would be likely to stiffen their resistance; the real state of affairs they have been left to glean from foreign broadcasts. Yet even so it is surprising that they should not have heard more from their leaders about the intended limitation of German territory. They have been given a vague forecast of Soviet influence advancing westwards "without limit." On the other hand, no ban seems to have been imposed on mention of the proposed destruction of German militarism. D.N.B. referred to "the disarming of all the German Armed Forces and the dissolution of the German General Staff" as being among the cardinal points of the Allied plan to destroy Germany. The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung on the 15th included "the abolition of all armed force" among the means of "biological extermination of the entire German nation." The most interesting comment on the fate of German militarism occurred in a foreign broadcast of the 13th directly referring to the Moscow Free German Committee: "The rôle of the Seydlitz Committee has thus been played out even before the war has come to an end." (Before the conference, rumours that a Free German Government might be set up as a result of it had been discussed in answer to questions from foreign correspondents.)

The official anxiety to shield the people from what was really decided at Yalta is quite in keeping with the depression and unrest now reported to be general in the Reich. In contrast to the propagandist indignation about a communiqué "employing a terminology not even used about uncivilised tribes" is a report emanating from Berlin stating that "unconditional surrender evokes no indignation among ordinary people, since many feel they cannot expect anything else." This and other reports concur to suggest that Germans are too tired and despondent to feel much interest in any Allied plans for Germany; what does still stir their attention is the more agonising question of whether the Allies, when they are established in the Reich, will be able to keep order and prevent anarchy. Letters written by German soldiers on the Western Front between November and January suggest that many of them, too, are tired out and longing for the end of the war, yet they cannot see any alternative to continuing to resist as long as possible. Reflections of the propaganda about Allied plans, referred to above, appear in some letters. One soldier writes to his family of his determination to defend the Fatherland, knowing that the enemy wants to destroy even German women and children. But more often a soldier looks forward to the time when "this misery is at an end," and life can be slowly rebuilt again. The important thing, said another man, is that they may find themselves back home in the end, safe and sound.

On the fighting fronts the main feature of the past week is still the absence of any major counter-blow by German forces. The O.K.W. has spoken of "stiffer" German resistance in Silesia and of more active fighting in East Prussia. The bulletin of the 15th February began with a post-mortem on Budapest, which had been held for almost fifty days after being completely encircled. Dittmar's weekly commentary spoke of the specially dangerous Russian thrusts across the Oder, but left a general impression that the situation was in hand, and that German resistance was gradually strengthening.

As often before, Dittmar's sternest words concerned the Home Front. He called for a new severity and disclipline. The time had gone for pretence, heroics and hollow phrases. "Everything that is not genuine must go. Every means is justified when it is a question of stamping out such things." As with his last week's commentary it is difficult to read between the lines and to say with any certainty what are the things to which he referred. But his call for discipline has been quickly answered by a decree of the Minister of Justice setting up summary courts (Standgerichte) administering martial law in districts of the Reich threatened by the enemy. These courts are to be set up in each Gau by the Gauleiter in his capacity as Reich Defence Commissioner, and are to have competence over "all criminal actions endangering German fighting strength and determination." Sentences, including the death penalty, need confirmation only by the Gauleiter and in urgent cases not even by him.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

On the 17th February President Beneš made what was announced as his last broadcast from London before return to Czechoslovakia. He stated that he would go first to Moscow and thence to the liberated territory of the Republic where he would appoint a new Government to include members of the resistance movement at home. Dr. Beneš's impending return to his own country has been the subject of intensive propaganda campaigns in both the Protectorate and Slovakia, the themes being that the Western Powers have no further use for the President, that his visit to Moscow is merely to receive further orders from his master, Stalin, and that bitter disappointment lies ahead of him. This propaganda is more important for its intensity than its subject-matter, which contains nothing new. The other main features of the Slovak press and radio during the past week have been open admissions that morale in the country is flagging, reports of Bolshevik atrocities in the liberated areas and endless variations on Slovakia's right to freedom and independence.

The Protectorate radio has reported that Prague, received its first bombing on the 14th February. The announcement spoke of damage to cultural monuments, hospitals, churches and schools and referred to "long rows of bodies laid out in Prague churches." There has so far been no confirmation of the raid from Allied sources.

The Red Army has claimed no noteworthy progress in Slovakia during the past week but in the last day or two has reported strong enemy counter-attacks on the north bank of the Danube between Komarno and the Hron. The loss of some inhabited localities is admitted.

President Beneš has accepted the resignation of his Finance Minister, the Agrarian, Dr. Feierabend. No public announcement of the change has been made and Dr. Feierabend will continue to discharge his functions for the present. This resignation is presumably the first step towards the reconstruction of the Czechoslovak Government which is to take place when Dr. Beneš reaches Slovakia.

POLAND.

On the 15th February M. Arciszewski reaffirmed at a press conference in London his Government's unanimous rejection of the decisions taken at the Crimea Conference. They did not believe, he said, in the Russian promise of free democracy for Poland, or that, even if new people were included in the proposed Government to be set up in Poland, the latter would be " any more free than it is now or any more free than the Governments of Roumania and Bulgaria." Asked whether M. Mikolajczyk would be treated as a traitor if he went to Poland, the Polish Premier replied that " for the time being it is clear that if any persons went they would lose any confidence they may possess among the Polish people . . . ."; and he added that, as his was the only legal and constitutional Polish Government, it could not resign as the result of a decision coming from outside.

In the meantime, however, in a broadcast message to the Polish fighting forces on the 14th February, the Polish Government have called on officers and men to maintain their calm, dignity and solidarity, and their brotherhood-in-arms with the soldiers of the British, Canadian, United States and French forces; while a similar appeal was made by General Anders in an Order of the Day issued to the Second Polish Corps serving with the Eighth Army. At the same time, in a telegram to President Raczkiewicz, General Anders stated that the Second Polish Corps could not recognise the " one-sided decisions " taken at the Crimea Conference, and reaffirmed its allegiance to the President and Polish Government in London.

While none of the Polish political party representations in London has so far indicated officially its attitude in regard to participation in the conferences which are to be held in Moscow under the auspices of the Allied Commission, it seems clear that the great majority of the Peasant Party members would support M. Mikolajczyk's acceptance of an invitation to Moscow, and that the Christian Democratic Party as a whole, led by M. Popiel, would follow the Peasant Party's lead (the two Christian Democrat members of M. Arciszewski's Cabinet can hardly be said to represent anyone but themselves). The Socialist Party, in its conferences during the week-end, was unable to clarify its position, and may therefore be presumed to remain divided on the issue. M. Mikolajczyk has thrown some light on his own position in an article in Jutro Polski, in which, while deploring the loss of Lwow and the Galician oilfields and the " prejudicing of the eastern frontier without a final delimitation of the western frontiers," he nevertheless welcomed the declaration on a strong, independent and democratic Poland and the fact that Russia, in establishing and recognising the Lublin Administration, had not, after all, said her last word. Professor Kot, also a member of the Peasant Party and formerly Minister of Information in the Sikorski and Mikolajczyk Cabinets, went considerably further, in an interview with the Observer (the 18th February), in stating his belief that " it is the task of responsible Polish leaders to try to put into operation the Crimea decision in a way that would secure the future of Poland and save her independence," and in suggesting that " the centre of gravity has now shifted from the groups in exile to the political movements in Poland itself."

Lublin press and wireless comment on the Crimea Conference communiqué welcomed it unreservedly as a triumph for the " Provisional Government." According to the Secretary-General of the Socialist Party (M. Matuszewski) the communiqué " recognised the de facto Provisional Government," and the absence from it of any reference to the Polish Government in London " indicates that this ' Government ' . . . . has entirely compromised itself and cannot be taken into consideration as a political force." Gazeta Lubelska, interpreting the provision for consultation with Polish democratic leaders at home and abroad as meaning " an understanding with the Parties of the Centre and Right," agreed that the adherents of these parties " who are acting openly and legally cannot be deprived of their rights of citizenship," but made no reference to any Left forces other than those which it is claimed are already represented in the " Provisional Government."

On the 14th February MM. Bierut and Osubka-Morawski arrived in Moscow, accompanied by the Soviet Ambassador to the " Provisional Government," M. Lebedev. (See also under " U.S.S.R.," " United States of America," and the " United Nations.")

SOVIET UNION.

There have been no startling advances by the Red Army this week, but progress has been steady along most of the front. In East Prussia pressure on Königsberg from the south continued, Wormditt and Mehlsack being captured on the 17th February. A Soviet thrust along the west bank of the Vistula has encircled Grudziadz, and further west Chojnice fell on the 15th February. Schneidemühl, which had been surrounded for some weeks, was captured the previous day. Marshal Koniev's wedge across the Oder has been extended northwards by the capture of Grünberg (15th February); his troops have now crossed the river Bober. Fighting continues round encircled Poznan and Breslau. No change has been reported from Polish Silesia or Slovakia. The fall of Budapest on the 13th February was celebrated by Moscow's biggest salute of 24 salvoes from 324 guns. 110,000 prisoners were captured, including the Commander of the Budapest Army Group, Col.-General Pfeffer-Wildenbruch, and his staff. Another 10,000 prisoners were brought in during the next two days, and much booty was taken.

Army-General I. D. Cherniakhovsky, Commander of the 3rd Byelorussian front, died on the 18th of February at the age of 37, after being severely wounded in East Prussia. He was the youngest Soviet General in command of a Front and the first to lead Soviet forces on to German territory. He came from Uman, in the Ukraine, and was the son of a Jewish railwayman. The Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R., the People's Commissariat of Defence of the U.S.S.R. and the Central Committee of the Communist Party have expressed their profund regret, and have announced that General Cherniakhovsky will receive a state funeral in Vilna, which was liberated by his troops; a monument will be erected to him in the city. All the Soviet papers on the 19th February published an obituary notice signed by seventeen Marshals of the Soviet Union, headed by Marshil Zhukov, and thirteen generals.

The Soviet press and wireless greeted the official announcement of the decisions of the Crimea Conference with acclamation, but in the first press and radio commentaries little or nothing was added to the details contained in the official communiqué. Many messages were published asserting the satisfaction of the Soviet people with the policy laid down in the Crimea, and reports were received of meetings of workers throughout the Soviet Union " pledging to increase output and muster every ounce of strength to complete the rout of Hitlerite Germany." Emphasis was laid on the successes achieved by the military strategy agreed upon at Tehran. The link between the World Trade Union Conference and the Crimea Conference was made in a special broadcast talk in English over Moscow Radio, promising strong Soviet Trade Union support for the Crimea decisions. The latter were also endorsed by Patriarch Alexei as laying " a firm foundation of future peace all over the world." " The Church blesses these bright Christian aspirations and hopes," and was praying and working even more fervently for final victory.

The treatment of the German problem in M. Zaslavsky's long broadcast on the Crimea Conference (18th February) is of especial interest. It is the clearest identification of Nazism and German militarism that has yet come from a Soviet source. " To wipe Nazism off the face of the earth, to destroy German militarism at the root—the one is indissolubly linked with the other." In this respect M. Zaslavsky's main thesis was practically on Vansittart lines: militarist Germany which had kept Europe in a condition of fear and tension for over a hundred years was merely fulfilling itself in Hitlerism, and would have to be utterly destroyed. M. Zaslavsky laid great stress on the decision come to at Yalta that the German General Staff should be broken up " for all time." Further, the entire economic life of defeated Germany would have to be reorganised, as German industry and finance had been just as much instrumental in carrying Hitler to power as the General Staff itself. M. Zaslavsky went on to point out that the Red Army was already putting the Crimea decisions into practice by " liquidating the most important social-political foundations " of German militarism in East Prussia and in Pomerania and Brandenburg. The Junkers had run away, and would never return. The broadcast did not touch on the former Soviet theme of distinguishing between the Hitlerites and the German people. The only comfort meted out to the latter was the phrase " it would not enter anyone's head to wipe even the most savage tribe off the face of the earth." The Allied occupation of Germany would prove a hard but fruitful school for the German people; they would have to learn the ABC of peaceful mutual existence before they were allowed with equal rights into the comity of peoples. M. Zaslavsky insisted that the Crimea would prove no Versailles. The Germans would not succeed again in "hiding their wolves' ears and claws under a grandmother's social-democratic kerchief," and the victors would not again turn a blind eye to the resurgence of German militarism. M. Zaslavsky concluded by saying that the balance of power system in Europe would have to go. Vigilance would remain and would even have to increase, but with the destruction of German militarism the prolonged tension of Europe would disappear.

Soviet press comment on the decisions of the Crimea Conference on Poland at first distinguished between the Polish Government in London and the followers of M. Mikolajczyk. Thus Krasnaya Zvezda (16th February) emphasised that the "reactionary Polish émigrés in London whose policy was based on hostility towards the Soviet Union and attempts to shake the unity of the Allies" had been "swept away by developments to the garbage heap of history" whilst at the same time implying that the Soviet Government was still ready to hold the door open for M. Mikolajczyk. According to Kramaya Zvezda, M. Mikolajczyk and his adherents, by refusing to recognise the London Government's repudiation of the Crimea decisions, had given ground for the expectation that among his group there were many ready to take part in the future reorganised Polish Government, and such an extension of the Warsaw Government through inclusion of democratic elements in Poland and abroad would fully meet the intentions of the Government of the U.S.S.R. After M. Mikolajczyk had published his views on Lvov and the oilfields, however, Pravda (19th February) declared that he had identified himself with the Arciszewski Government by coming out in the London press against the Crimea decisions. (See also under "Poland.")

It was announced on the 18th February that the Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. had decided to accede to the request of the Polish Provisional Government by sending a number of experts to assist in drafting plans for the reconstruction of Warsaw and by providing 50 per cent. of the cost of restoring the main districts of the city.

SCANDINAVIA.

In Sweden, recent events have produced some curious and almost bellicose reactions: there is indeed a temptation to feel that the events themselves are hardly sufficiently unprecedented wholly to account for the explosion. The principal bases for Swedish indignation are twofold; firstly, the ruthless reprisals in Norway following the liquidation of Marthinsen (see last week's Summary), and secondly the shooting down of Allied planes over Helsingborg on a recent occasion. The German blockade of the Skager Rak and the de facto cessation of the Swedish safe conduct traffic is a third grievance.

It is true that a good deal of the criticism of the Helsingborg incident has been founded on selfish fears that the shooting down of bomb-laden planes exposed the inhabitants of the district to danger, but there have been strongly-worded protests by individuals and organisations based on the higher ground that any action which impeded the destruction of Nazi tyranny was an insult to the conscience of right-thinking citizens, and the press has drawn sarcastic comparisons between the innocuous character of Swedish A.A. fire in the past, when the trespassers were German, and its deadliness now that the victims were the forces of liberation. A very general opinion has been expressed to the effect that this method of vindicating Swedish neutrality should now cease. Expressen has gone so far as to suggest that Allied belligerent aircraft should now be allowed to make intermediate landings in Sweden.

With regard to the Skager Rak blockade, Stockholms-Tidningen has stated that responsible Swedish circles are in favour of forcing it, and the Chairman of the Göteborg Seamen's Union has declared that blockade-runners certainly would not lack crews.

Still more violent has been the reaction against the latest events in Norway. Svenska Morgonbladet, on the 11th February, went so far as to assert that a growing body of opinion is impatiently urging Swedish intervention, even if it involved armed force, and the possibility has been freely discussed, even though with negative conclusions, by other organs of the press. A leaflet urging that "Hitler sadists should be kicked out of Norway" was circulated in Stockholm on the 10th February, and on the same day, in the Riksdag, a member stated that it was increasingly clear that Sweden could not face her contemporaries and posterity if she allowed the terror in Norway to continue without doing her utmost to terminate it. Svenska Dagbladet, in the same context, criticises the statement of M. Günther, the Foreign Minister, that "relations with foreign powers are good," saying that in fact Swedish relations with Germany are such that Swedes would prefer to have no relations at all, and would rather know what the Government intends to do about the ruthless measures of the gangsters in Norway.

On the 13th February, Eskilstuna Kuriren published an article by Bishop Aulén advocating that large forces of the Swedish army should be placed on the roads leading to Norway, and stating the opinion that diplomatic representations or reliance on the volunteer corps are inadequate measures in the circumstances. Örebro Kuriren, 14th February, similarly argues against undue caution and suggests that it would be more reasonable for armed intervention to take official form than to be masked by encouragement of the volunteer movement.

A further incident, the return to Germany from Sweden of three dismantled German aircraft stolen from Denmark by Danish patriots, has inspired Dagens Nyheter to some forceful reflections on Swedish neutrality, in which the paper deprecates as "unpardonably stupid" the continuance of "a narrow-minded system which threatens to make the policy of neutrality a conspicuous destroyer of Swedish dignity." Recently, however, there is evidence of a fear that these suggestions of an interventionist policy may be misinterpreted; Stockholms-Tidningen, 17th February, discussing a debate on the subject, is at pains to dispel exaggerated expectations, and Morgonbladet of the same date publishes a number of Norwegian opinions on the subject, indicating that intervention would be considered undesirable. The fact that the question has been widely discussed is, however, indisputable and possibly significant.

As a result of the disclosures in the Lönnegren-Paulsson espionage trial (Summary, No. 279), Colonel Wagner and four other members of the German Legation staff have been requested to withdraw from Sweden. On the other hand, on the 16th February, the Swedish press, led by Dagens Nyheter, opened an obviously inspired campaign against the Allied black-listing of Swedish firms, now that Swedish trade with the enemy has ceased.

At a meeting of the Council of the Finnish Social Democratic party on the 16th February, a resolution was carried expelling from the party members of the Opposition who were standing for election on lists other than that of the Social Democrats. A compromise proposal by M. Fagerholm, that such persons should merely be censured and further steps postponed until after the election, was not accepted. MM. Pekkala and Keto were consequently expelled from the party. M. Vuori also resigned from the party council, but it is not clear that his decision was affected by the resolution. He is not standing as a candidate, and is at present extremely busy with the task on which M. Paasikivi has asked him to concentrate, of organising the Finnish timber output. It must be remembered also that M. Vuori's main interest is the prosperity of Finnish Trade Unionism, and it is considered undesirable for this movement to become involved in the conflict between dissident sections of the Social Democrat party, a point which was clearly brought out by M. Härmäs, the vice-chairman of the Finnish T.U.C., who attended the Trade Union Conference in London. The decision of the Social Democrat Council is said by Suomen Sosialidemokraatti to please hardly any Social Democrats. Arbetarbladet also considers it a mistake.

Contrary to previous reports (see Summary No. 279) it is now announced that M. Horelli, one of the members of the Coalition Party who was asked to refrain from candidature, has, nevertheless, been nominated on the Coalition list for Vasa Län eastern district.

M. Fjellbu, the recently appointed Bishop in the liberated part of Norway, has issued a pastoral letter in which he emphasises that the breach between Church and State occasioned by the struggle with the quisling authorities must not be regarded as a permanent repudiation of the State connexion, but that the former relations will be resumed and the normal organisations reinstated as the constitutional Government recovers its authority. The Congregational Councils (Menighetsråd) will, however, need reconstruction, owing to the gaps created by mass evacuation.

The prospect of extensive unemployment in Norway, as a result of the discontinuance of German war industry, is giving rise to some concern, even in Quisling and German circles. It is possible that attempts may be made to meet it by some fresh method of labour mobilisation, but in any case the problem of employment is likely to be among the principal difficulties facing the country after liberation.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The new Belgian Cabinet (see last Summary) has had a moderately favourable reception from the Press. The general line is that it should be given a fair chance and judged according to its performace. The fact that Catholics agreed to sit in the same Cabinet as Cammunists almost immediately after the Catholic Party had declared its opposition to such a coalition has aroused some comment. The Catholics are plainly uneasy, and some of them at least hope that the Communists will not long be represented in the Government. It is significant that, although the Government obtained large majorities in both the Chamber and the Senate, practically all who voted against it or abstained were Catholics. It is possible, therefore, that the coalition may break up in the near future owing to Catholic opposition. In this connexion it may be noted that the Minister of Agriculture is a Catholic, while the Minister of Food is a Communist. Co-operation between the two, which is peculiarly desirable, may be difficult to achieve.

Finance may also cause difficulties. Many of the Catholics and most of the Liberals disliked M. Gutt's proposals for a tax on capital increases (see Summary No. 273). These proposals will probably be modified by the new Minister of Finance, M. Eyskens. If the changes are too great, the Socialists and Left-wing Catholics will be annoyed; if they are not fairly considerable the Right-wing Catholics and the Liberals will not be satisfied. M. Eyskens is prepared to make some changes, but is reputed to be in general sympathy with Gutt's proposals.

But the most serious problem which the Government has to tackle is the shortage of food. It has already been announced that rations have been reduced, and this announcement will strengthen the feeling expressed by several papers that imports must forthwith be increased considerably. M. van Acker himself stated in his first speech to the Chamber as Prime Minister that "it is essential that our Allies should realise that Belgium cannot exist on her own resources. Belgium can no longer carry on under the economic system in force for the last five months. She must be helped if she is to survive." General Bedele Smith, General Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, and General Grassell, the head of the Civil Affairs Bureau of S.H.A.E.F., have both visited Brussels during the past week for discussions with the new Prime Minister on supply questions. His Majesty's Government, as also the United States Government and S.H.A.E.F., are fully alive to the potential dangers of the supply situation and are concerting urgent measures aimed at increasing deliveries of the most essential food-stuffs. At the same time it has been impressed on M. van Acker that the economic crisis has been aggravated by the failure of the previous Government to organise adequate distribution or to check the rampant black market, and that the Allies rely on him to take immediate steps to remedy this state of affairs.

M. van Acker's speech shows that he is making a good start. After a warm tribute to M. Pierlot, he promised that vigorous action would be taken against collaborators and the black market, and an announcement made that labour would be mobilised in order to increase the war effort and economic activity in general. The Prime Minister added that Belgium desired inter-Allied solidarity and that if changes were imminent "in this westernmost corner of western Europe, she will defend her rights and show her readiness to shoulder all the burdens which the new situation entails, determined as she is to safeguard her own interests. It seems unnecessary to add that sorely-tried and impoverished Belgium, in conjunction with her Allies, intends to claim compensation from defeated Germany for the damage she has done."

On the 17th Queen Wilhelmina broadcast to the Conference of the Association of Women Directors of the National Association of Broadcasters at New York. Her Majesty, in drawing attention to the plight of her subjects in the Occupied Netherlands, said "some relief is already being brought to Holland. . . . This relief, however, has only been possible on quite a small scale, and it is quite certain that, if it is not provided on an adequate one, and at once, it will no more fulfil its purpose."

FRANCE.

It was reported by the Press of the 14th February that General de Gaulle had informed the Council of Ministers on the previous day of the communications made to him by the Ambassadors of the United States, Great Britain and the U.S.S.R. about the Crimea Conference. Another communiqué, issued after the meeting of the Ministers on the 16th February, stated that clarification of these communications was being sought in Washington, London and Moscow.

Inspired comment on the first of these communiqués showed satisfaction qualified by certain reserves. It repeated regret that France had not been present at the Conference and that her complete equality with the Three Powers had not yet been fully recognised. The Government, it emphasised, could not take an immediate decision about the precise limitation of the French zone of occupation and it regretted that France should not yet be associated with the Inter-Allied High Command. Press comment generally took the same line; and the idea that France should be placed below the Three Powers and on a level with China was particularly distasteful. The Humanité alone gave unreserved approval to the conclusions of the Conference; and M. Maurice Thorez in a speech at Toulouse on the 19th rejoiced and did not share "the regrets of those who are astonished that France was not invited to the Conference." Had France between 1934 and 1943 had the army of millions of men "which we wanted," she would have had her rightful place.

New light was thrown on French official reactions when it was reported that General de Gaulle had refused an invitation of President Roosevelt to meet him in the Mediterranean immediately after the Conference. This was revealed in various reports from Paris correspondents of the American Press printed on the 18th February, including the Paris edition of the New York Herald Tribune, but in none of the French newspapers.

A statement was finally issued from the White House on the 20th February, saying that General de Gaulle had been invited to meet the President in Algiers, pressure of time having made it impossible for the President to go to Paris as he had hoped. The invitation, sent from Yalta, six days in advance of the President's arrival in Algiers, had been given to General de Gaulle by Mr. Caffery. It "concluded with an expression of real hope that the alternative proposal for the meeting in Algiers would prove satisfactory to the French leader." The President was "much disappointed" when advised that official business did not permit the General to come to Algiers. "Questions of mutual interest and importance to France and the United States" were pending.

At midnight on the same day a statement, issued by General de Gaulle's office, was broadcast from Paris. It stated that on the 12th February Mr. Caffery had expressed to the General the President's regrets at being unable to go to Paris in accordance with the invitation given by the French Government in November 1944. If General de Gaulle would accept an alternative proposal to meet at Algiers, the date would be indicated later. General de Gaulle replied that he was glad to hear that the President intended to visit a French port, but that this invitation to go there had taken him by surprise at a time when many affairs required his presence in Paris, and on the morrow of a conference between three heads of Allied Governments in which France had taken no part, and the details of which she did not yet know. He still hoped the President would come to Paris, where the Government and the whole population would always be extremely happy to receive him. The statement concluded: "It is common knowledge that since then the French Government and services have been working actively on the necessary exchange of views between France and the Allied Governments on the conclusions of the Yalta Conference."

In a statement on the 21st February, M. Teitgen, the Minister of Information, stated that the invitation had been handed to General de Gaulle four hours before the three Ambassadors called to inform him of the decisions taken at the conference. He had thus, at that moment, no knowledge of what had happened at Yalta and told Mr. Caffery that he did not think it would be possible to accept, but he would consult his Cabinet. On the following day, after discussion, the Cabinet agreed unanimously that it was impossible to accept the invitation.

While the strict observance of the request for secrecy was given as sole cause of the absence from the French press for several days of any reference to the incident just mentioned, it is certain that the exiguous size of newspapers restricts full ventilation of issues, whether home or foreign. M. Vincent Auriol, President of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Consultative Assembly, in the Populaire of the 18th February found space, however, to express disapproval of French demands for sole control of the Rhineland. Only international control could, he urged, give France security in this region. Vital industrial regions in Eastern and Western Germany must be under the control of an international army, capable of dealing with military threats and attempts by German magnates to recover control of the industries. No separate alliance, however strong, could hope to ensure French security, and the country, while enthusiastic about the pact with Russia, wanted a similar one with Britain.

On the following day M. Bidault attended a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Commission and gave it what information he had on the Crimea Conference and the Government's attitude. They would whole-heartedly co-operate in working out an international system of security and peace and would obtain guarantees on France's eastern frontier against any further German aggression. This meant effective control of the Rhine. M. Bidault's statements (it was reported) would be discussed at the Commission's next meeting.

The Council of Ministers, at its meeting of the 13th February (see above), also dealt with matters relating to the Empire. Thus it approved the general plan for the creation at Dakar of a large military, naval and air base, intended to guarantee the communications of the French Empire, and a draft decree creating an inter-ministerial committee for Indo-China. General de Gaulle will preside over this Committee, whose task it will be to co-ordinate economic, political and military action for the reconquest of French Indo-China and its return to the French Commonwealth. Speaking on the 15th at the celebration of the Annamite feast of Têt, General de Gaulle declared that, after its liberation with the growing aid of French arms, France intended to make the political, economic, social and cultural development of Indo-China "a primary aim in France's renascent power and rediscovered greatness." France, who was her own trustee (mandataire) in this matter, would pursue her task by respecting the rights, customs and traditions of the peoples of whom she had charge.

M. Teitgen, Minister of Information, in a wireless talk on the 15th February gave some figures to exemplify the purge in the civil service, which was due to be completed on that day (see Summary No. 279). Of 500 agents in his own Ministry, 372 had been affected. Twenty leading officials of the Ministry of the Interior had been dismissed. The purge had especially hit high officials and in the Central administrations only good patriots remained, who were entitled to respect and gratitude. (See also under "Middle East.")

SWITZERLAND.

Nothing has yet transpired as to the course of the economic negotiations which are in progress at Berne. It is, however, symptomatic that on the 17th February it was officially announced that the Federal Council had decided to freeze German assets in Switzerland. The decision is in line with similar regulations made in 1940 and later for the freezing of the assets of a number of other States, including France, Italy and the U.S.S.R.

Meanwhile, the trade figures illustrate the conditions in which the Swiss find themselves for the negotiations. The January figures, published on the 15th February, showed a decline in imports of one-third and in exports of two-thirds as compared with December: the volume of imports represented only 6 per cent. of the normal monthly import of goods before the war. This decline is mainly due to the fact that, owing to transport difficulties, Germany can now deliver practically nothing to Switzerland. The Russian occupation of Silesia has in any case cut off the surplus of German coal normally available for Switzerland. As a result of all this the authorities are preparing the public for serious privations. The bread ration has already been reduced: fats, meat and potato bread rations are to be reduced from the 1st March and coffee and tea rationing is foreshadowed.

Comment on the Crimea Conference emphasises the remarkable way in which the communiqué blends the essential features of the western bourgeois democracy of the English-speaking peoples with those of the eastern socialist democracy of the Soviet peoples.

In the course of the recent international Trade Union Conference in London the Swiss delegation invited the Russian Trade Union delegation to visit Switzerland and the Federal Council has authorised the Department for Justice and Police to grant the necessary visas for this purpose.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Immediately after the publication of the communiqué of the Crimea Conference His Majesty's press attaché in Madrid visited the Under-Secretary for Press and Propaganda in order to persuade him to give proper guidance to the newspapers in their presentation of this most important event. Mr. Burns left with Señor Arias Salgado a memorandum explaining the communiqué, and the same points were made individually to the semi-official commentator, Manuel Aznar, one of the bulwarks of Arriba. This preparation was markedly successful; all the Madrid newspapers followed the lines indicated, and some even quoted verbatim passages from the memorandum. This is a welcome change from the practice of the bad old days, when it was the Germans who gave the Spanish press not guidance but directives. Another interesting event in the world of propaganda is the incorporation into the national system on the 12th February of the notorious Falange station Radio Valladolid. (The programmes, however, are still made up of splenetic tirades against democracy, liberal thought, capitalism and the U.S.S.R.) A few days later two bombs exploded in the Press and Propaganda section of the Falange. It is not known whether these petards were placed by some disillusioned "Old Shirt" as a protest against the new realism of Spanish propaganda, or whether they were intended as a gesture of encouragement by Anarcho-Syndicalist haters of Franco.

As a postscript to the reference in last week's Summary to Dr. Negrín's cross-channel journey, there is some interest in a report of his meeting with Señor Maura broadcast on the French Telegraph Service (AFP) on the 12th February. The announcement, seemingly put out by Negrín, which gave an impression of cordiality, said that "there exists no fundamental divergence of views between the Maura and the Negrín groups; the only difference is that of the methods to be employed." From a private source recently in close contact with Maura comes a very different account of the meeting which was achieved only after two abortive attempts. According to this story, after a few preliminary exchanges Negrín asked for Maura's support. Maura replied "When you have given a satisfactory account of the 45 million pesetas you took with you when you left Spain, we will talk about politics, but not before." The meeting then prorumped.

The Portuguese press is always slow in reacting to important events because the leaders writers wait for guidance from the authorities before writing their editorials. And in dealing with the Crimea Conference there was a longer delay than usual since no papers are published on Ash Wednesday. The adherence of the Russians to the principle of unconditional surrender is taken as a proof of success in achieving unity of purpose, and as an assurance that the U.S.S.R. will not try to set up a puppet Government in Berlin. The progress made in the security organisation is regarded as satisfactory, but most of the papers have their doubts of the possibility of holding really free elections in occupied territories, especially those under Russian control. And naturally the Nationalist and Catholic press is bitter over Poland. But in general the newspapers have given a good reception to the findings of the Conference which they describe as a solid contribution to the future welfare of the world.

ITALY.

The Congress of the General Confederation of Italian Labour, which began on the 28th January at Naples, came to an end on the 1st February. The delegates, 475 of them, including three from enemy-occupied Italy, had assembled there to rebuild the foundations of the Trade Union movement in Italy and to ensure that its unity as such should be preserved without regard to party politics. Throughout the Congress the raising of political issues was severely discouraged. The three Joint Secretaries, Achille Grandi, Christian Democrat, Oreste Lizzadri, Socialist, and Giuseppe di Vittorio, Communist, addressed the meeting, but di Vittorio was the outstanding personality and scored a personal triumph both by his powers of oratory and by his grasp of the various problems with which he was faced. After reporting the benefits already secured, such as the cost of living and Christmas bonuses and the right to work uncultivated land, the executive adopted a resolution recommending that a sliding wage scale adjustable to the cost of living should be fixed, that the South should share in the industries now concentrated in the North, and that requisitioned factories which are not doing essential war work should be handed back. The Labour Offices came in for strong criticism and a demand was made for the restriction of their activities, if not for their complete abolition. Agricultural and social insurance reforms, the protection of women and children in industry and improved pensions were voted and carried. The constitution and rules of the Confederation were drafted and adopted subject to revision by a new Congress when the North was liberated. In the opinion of observers, the Confederation has strengthened its position and deserves to be recognised by the Italian Government. But whether the Government will take any action before the North is freed seems doubtful, but it would seem of great value that the Government and the Confederation should keep in close touch, particularly as regards the industrial North.

In an attempt to check inflation, the Council of Ministers has passed certain measures. By abolishing the "political" price of bread, 5 lire a kilogram, and substituting an "economic" price of about 15 lire a kilogram, the Council estimates that the Treasury will be relieved of an annual subsidy of 12 milliard lire. The workers and their dependants are, however, to receive a compensatory allowance as well as increased wages, but whether the cost of this has been taken into account when calculating the saving to the Treasury is not mentioned. Reforms in taxation, directed particularly against Fascist and black market fortunes are to be introduced and agriculture is to be included in the excess profits laws. Fixed-price shops and restaurants, workers' canteens and co-operative stores are to be started by the Government in a further attempt to fight the black market. Finally the Council decided to double all army pay.

Although the Roman Press expresses satisfaction at the general results of the Yalta Conference it is a little disappointed that Signor Bonomi's telegram brought no specific reference to Italy in the communiqué. A Press report mentioned, however, that Mr. Eden was to meet Judge Rosenman, President Roosevelt's new adviser on European affairs, in order to discuss Italy's financial position and consider how the armistice terms could be adjusted to lighten the burden

On the 7th February the Communist paper Unità published an article on the Italo-Yugoslav frontier question. Italy, according to Unità, must pursue a pro-Yugoslav policy since she has nothing to fear from a strong Yugoslavia. Those parts of the Venezia Giulia which are prevalently Slovene must, if they wish, return to Yugoslavia, but a distinction is made as regards the four towns of Trieste, Fiume, Gorizia and Zara, whose population, the article points out, is mainly Italian. There are, however, other territories which are predominantly Italian and wish to remain Italian and it is this problem Unità says, which remains to be solved by the two Governments. But if the wishes of the population and the needs of the new Yugoslav States are taken into account, a solution, Unità is sure, can be found.

Neo-Fascist comment on the Yalta Conference is remarkable chiefly for its tacit acceptance of the prospect of an Allied victory. The main exception to this trend is in the comments of Farinacci, who still continues to reaffirm his faith in the final victory of Fascism; but his rival Pettinato, of the Stampa, whose articles have for some time expressed a more gloomy realism, is already discussing what sort of a peace Germany and Italy can expect.

Swiss papers report that the people of North Italy are increasingly conscious of the deteriorating military situation and its probable effect on themselves. The Russian victories are now openly discussed and the Fascists, especially the many thousands of refugees from the South, no longer conceal their anxiety about the fate in store for them. Fascist leaders are said to be making plans for the transfer of their families to Switzerland or Austria. Recent reports suggest that more German divisions are being moved north, both towards the Brenner and also through Treviso and Ljubljana in the direction of Vienna.

According to the press, the Committee of National Liberation for Northern Italy has informed the Rome Government of its decision to incorporate all partisans in Northern Italy in a single national army under a unified command. This will mean that the local and political groups will all come under recognised military leaders and political distinctions will be abolished. This step is said to have been taken on the initiative of the Communist Party. General Mark Clark has issued a broadcast appeal to partisans in the North, telling them that the time has now come for them to re-form their bands and prepare for the moment of attack.

THE VATICAN.

The Vatican appears to be taking Moscow's attacks on itself seriously. On the 10th February its wireless quoted a root and branch repudiation by the Osservatore Romano (see Summary No. 280 under "Vatican"). On the 13th it pointed out that the Pope wished "not a hard nor a mild but a just peace"; and on the 17th its wireless in English, Italian, German and Spanish denied the latest Soviet assertion, that "the Holy See was displeased with the results of Crimea, because it had not been invited to take part itself." The words of the denial obviously refer only to the second half of the charge: "The Holy See has never had the remotest thought of taking part in the Conference." There is undoubtedly a desire amongst Roman Catholics in many countries that the Pope should help in making the Peace. An article in the Spanish La Vanguardia, quoted on the Spanish wireless of the 13th February, ascribes the Russian attacks on the Pope to a desire to facilitate attacks on the Poles, to favour the Orthodox Church at the expense of the Roman Catholic and to undermine Catholicism in Italy, France, "and even Germany, where Catholics have always remained aloof from National Socialism, and could become an influential element in a future Germany." On the other hand, articles in United States and British Communist papers tell how the Russians have restored religious freedom to Catholic Poles and how both they and the Catholics are strictly observing the Concordat.

On the 14th February the Vatican wireless announced the baptism of the Ex-Chief Rabbi of Rome, Dr. Zolli. He chose the christian name of Eugenio. Two days later the enemy wireless broadcast a burlesque recording of the ceremony, in which the altar was decorated with seven branch candlesticks and Masonic symbols, and the preacher concluded his sermon with the words: "Through Roosevelt's intervention, the Churches have been opened to you as never before, with a breach in the walls. You have chosen the name Eugenio. His holiness has been touched by your act of loyalty: he therefore has felt bound to express his gratitude to your whole race by adding to his own name that of Ezekiel."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

A small proportion of the German and Hungarian garrison of Buda appears to have fought their way out and reached the German lines; but most of those attempting to do so were rounded up. Elsewhere the front in Hungary has been stationary.

The clearance of the capital is now complete, and the next session of the Provisional National Assembly is to be held there. It will be attended by additional representatives, for areas liberated since its formation, including Budapest and its suburbs. Elections will be held here as soon as possible.

Recruiting for the new Hungarian army is so far proceeding by voluntary enlistment. Mass meetings to discuss the question have been held in several towns. The inflow of recruits is said to be good; about 6 per cent. are women. The city of Szeged has decided to raise and recruit a division bearing its name. In the internal field, local committees have been set up to establish lists of claimants for land under the proposed reform, and to designate land for distribution. The proposal of the National Peasant's Party is to set an upper limit of 200 hold (Hungarian acres) for peasants or 100 hold for the "feudal" class. The Communist Party has approved these proposals, but suggests that especially deserving recipients may get up to 300 hold. It is proposed to carry through the reform by the 1st October. The trade unions are also resuming activity. The invitation to them from the World Trade Union Conference was received with enthusiasm. The Peoples' Courts have executed further persons, including several officers, convicted of brutality to Jews in labour battalions.

A number of laws in execution of the armistice terms have been passed. The laws incorporating Yugoslav, Roumanian and Czechoslovak territory have been abrogated; German subjects are interned; German newspapers and books are to be destroyed; persons imprisoned for anti-German activities are released; security for anti-Fascist refugees in Hungary is guaranteed.

The British and American members of the Inter-Allied Commission have left for Hungary. The head of the British Military Mission is Major-General Edgcumbe; the political representative is Mr. Gascoigne.

The Courts of Arrow Cross, Hungary, have sentenced Colonel-General Veres, who in October last was commanding the Second Army (Transylvania) to 15 years' imprisonment, and Lt.-General Hardy, commander of the Danube Flotilla, to death. Hardy is said to have brought to Budapest an emissary from Tito, who then got into touch with N. Horthy, junior, "whom the German Security Service caught red-handed and arrested."

The training of the first batch of Hungarian officers in Germany is reported to be completed. It is also reported that some Hungarian troops have been sent to Denmark.

Roumania.

The proceedings for the trial of "war criminals" still hang fire. A number of military officers, including Mareşal Antonescu have been dismissed from the army. Mareşal Antonescu has been a prisoner in Russia for the last five months so this order does not amount to much more than the giving of formal expression to a fait accompli.

The Trades Union Congress which opened in Bucharest at the end of January appears to have followed the usual lines of such gatherings. The Congress was made use of by the National Democratic Front for the purpose of advertising their programme, which includes getting control of the Government. So far little progress has been made in this direction and any success would depend upon Soviet support, which is problematical.

The directors of a leading industrial concern in Ploieşti report damage to their property caused by American bombing amounting to 17 million lei, and by Russian looting, 12 million lei.

Yugoslavia.

The enemy maintain their defensive positions in east Slavonia and north-east Bosnia. Behind that screen their Balkan retreat continues. They have retired from most of Hercegovina, and the partisans claim to be only 10 kilometres from Sarajevo. Meanwhile the enemy have secured their communications in Slavonia by establishing control of a broad belt north of Brod from the Save to the Drave, capturing Virovitica and eliminating the bridgehead south of the Drave. Partisan sources assert that the Croat forces under German command have been fighting very well. In Slovenia the enemy, continuing their drive to clear the province of partisans, have crossed the Krka river and advanced to the south-east. They have also reappeared in the valleys leading down to Gorizia. They captured several places in the hills north-east of Gorizia on the 7th and 8th February, but by the 14th the partisans had reoccupied them. In this area the Slovene partisans have the support of Italian Communist units, but have attacked the Italian Osoppo (non-Communist) partisans. The enemy have attacked westwards from Bihatch in west Bosnia and appear to aim at establishing control of all south Croatia.

Djilas, the editor of Borba, the official Communist organ, has written an article welcoming the pronouncements of the Crimean Conference. He wrote that they would put an end to the Yugoslav intrigues in London and gave international sanction to AVNOJ's legislation. As to the recommendation that members of the last Yugoslav Parliament should enter AVNOJ, this "appeared at first sight somewhat odd." For, Djilas emphasised, most of the members had been adherents of Stojadinovitch, whom he described as "a German agent." [Stojadinovitch was handed over to the British for internment in 1941 before the German attack on Yugoslavia.] However, he pointed out that a safeguard was provided in the reservation that only those members should be admitted who had not "collaborated with the invader." Subject to that proviso the partisans had no objection to the proposal; and the importance of the suggestion lay in the fact that it would assure vis-à-vis the Great Powers the legal, constitutional continuity between the new and the old Yugoslavia.

Partisan opinion in Belgrade holds that since over four-fifths of the last Parliament supported Stojadinovitch, an "enemy of the people," and the remainder supported Machek, also an "enemy of the people," few of them appear likely to qualify for admission to AVNOJ. Tito, however, appears to be hopeful that he will be able to dig out enough former Deputies to comply with the letter, if not with the spirit, of the undertaking which he has given.

Shubashitch and his colleagues of the Royal Yugoslav Government arrived in Belgrade on the 16th February. He gave very optimistic interviews to the press, suggesting that agreement on the Regents would be easy, and that all members of the last Parliament "who truly enjoyed the confidence of the people" would be able to enter AVNOJ. Pressed about the gold reserves of the National Bank, help from U.N.R.R.A., and the use of Yugoslav ships, he stated that the Allies were sympathetic and understanding.

Kardelj, Tito's chief political expert, has spoken on the national economy, in carefully balanced antitheses. There was no question of a change in the economic system; but political democracy was useless without economic control by the State. Officialdom must be overcome by the organisation of the masses. The immediate need was hard work.

ERRATA.

Summary No. 280, p. 14, Yugoslavia, para. 2, l. 7, for "1935" read "1938"; and para. 6, l. 3, for "14,100" read "14,400."

Greece.

There would appear to be in Athens a general atmosphere of relief that the agreement with E.L.A.S. (see last Summary) has put an end to the fighting and that there is now a prospect of a return to more normal conditions. The more moderate papers at once expressed their approval of the agreement, though they criticised certain of its terms, as, for instance, the immediate lifting of martial law. The first reaction of the E.D.E.S. press was to express its anger and amazement that the Government had given the rebels absolution for their sins and begged them to return to the fold as if nothing had happened. What value, said these papers, could be set on the agreement, when so many earlier ones had been broken by the extreme Left? The same view appears to be held by General Gonatas, the veteran Venizelist, who had stated that the agreement gives no guarantees for further security. Later reports, however, indicate that the anti-E.L.A.S. press is now becoming more moderate in its comment, while Rizospastis and Eleftheri Ellada, which are now on sale again, are taking the same line as M. Siantos in his statement after signing the agreement, i.e., that the agreement is a fair one, and that the extreme Left will honour its terms.

Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden had a great reception when they visited Athens on the 14th February on their way home from the Crimea Conference. It was not until three hours before their arrival that the news of their visit was generally known; even so, over a hundred thousand people assembled in Constitution Square to listen to their impromptu speeches. Mr. Churchill said that the freedom, prosperity and happiness of the Greek people was dear to all the nations of the British Commonwealth and Empire. He hoped that Greece would take her proper place in the circle of victorious nations. Party hatreds must die, and there must be unity and resolute comradeship. Mr. Eden remained in Greece a day or two longer than Mr. Churchill, in order to hold discussions with members of the Greek Government. Three T.U.C. officials have arrived in Athens to act as observers at the forthcoming Greek Trade Union elections.

Albania.

So far as internal reconstruction is concerned the Provisional Government has clear ideas as to its aims and how it will try to attain them. Constant emphasis, which is doubtless necessary, but cannot be welcome to an indolent people, is laid on the need for all to work, and it is reported that all persons between 17 and 35 will be mobilised for the purpose. Efforts are being made to end blood feuds as unfitting between comrades in the new democratic Albania. The educational aim is to do away with illiteracy by having classes for adults and a children's school in every village. In trade and industry, it is repeated, the Government proposes not to abolish private enterprise, but to control it in order to prevent excessive profit-making and anarchy in production. Part of the Government's agricultural policy is the fixing of prices for corn. Round the nucleus of one or two old craftsmen's guilds the Government has organised a general workers' union among the duties of which—as Sejfulla Malleshova, the Communist Minister of Propaganda, explained—it would be to support the economic system, the army and the workers' Government which had been set up thanks to the shedding of the workers' blood.

A partisan military court at Scutari has been imposing sentences of death or long imprisonment on "war criminals," which seems to mean prisoners taken in the recent fighting in the north or people who helped the Nationalists.

Bulgaria.

It is generally recognised in Bulgaria that the fierce sentences imposed by the People's Court on the ex-Regents, former Ministers and Deputies and others were dictated by the central Fatherland Front Committee, a body which is dominated by Communists and may be regarded as the supreme political organisation in Bulgaria and as roughly comparable with the Supreme Soviet in the U.S.S.R. While the more enlightened Bulgarians have been depressed and alarmed by the trials, the average Bulgarian reaction has been one of passivity coupled with a characteristic desire to be, or appear to be, on the strongest side—the Left. Meanwhile, the trials in the provinces of officers, officials and others involved in the repression of the partisans continue. At three places—Plovdiv, Gorna Orehovitsa and Trn—alone 141 have been condemned to death, 33 to imprisonment for life and some to lesser terms, while very few have been acquitted. New divisions of the People's Court have been set up at Sofia to deal respectively with army officers, former members of military courts and 111 members of the police. Besides this, 110 persons are to be tried for the persecution of Jews.

The Communists no doubt hope that the Fatherland Front coalition is merely temporary and that they will be able to hoist themselves into power from the shoulders of their present partners—viz., the Agrarians, the Social Democrats and the Tsveno. Knowing that if genuinely free election were held the Agrarians would sweep the board, the Communists have been taking all possible steps to make up for their lack of numbers by capturing key positions. In several branches of the Administration Communist influence already predominates. The Fatherland Front committees in the provinces, in Government departments and in industry are virtually Communist. More important, the Communists have gradually been acquiring a monopoly of physical force. Non-Communists have been disarmed, but a National Guard has been formed of Communists—mainly youths—and a number of members of the party have been secretly armed and keep an eye, for example, on every village. Anyone who proves recalcitrant to Communist influence—whether he be employer or workman or merely a potential subscriber to the much-boosted Freedom Loan—is liable to be denounced as a Fascist and to be arrested. In the face of this terrorism, the Agrarians, despite their numbers, are powerless and the bulk of the peasant population is passive, if not non-co-operative. According to one account—which may be based on nothing more than gossip—10,000 people had been killed in the "purge" before the trials began. The crux of the situation no doubt lies in the army. Besides the introduction of political commissars, Communists have already been put in several of the chief army posts and the People's Court may be expected to deal wholesale with non-Communist officers.

A delegation left Bulgaria on the 15th February, but failed to reach London before the close of the Trades Union Conference.

Turkey.

The Crimea Conference caused great satisfaction in Turkey and in a chorus of praise for its results the Turkish press described it as a success which demonstrated Allied solidarity and by solving thorny problems like those of Poland and Yugoslavia gave good hope for future peace and the rights of small nations. The Turks' chronic fear of Russian policy in the Balkans will not have been lessened by an article in the Belgrade Communist paper Borba, of the 14th February, sharply criticising Turkey's pro-German conception of neutrality and warning her not to meddle wth the Balkan countries' new-found unity. All indications, such as the Crimea decisions, that Russia will keep step in this area with Britain and the United States are very welcome to the Turks. The deep satisfaction, moreover, which they derive from the restoration of the Greek situation was reflected in an article in Ulus emphasising that between Mr. Churchill's two visits Greece had moved from deplorable chaos to being an example for all Balkan countries.

Under the auspices of the International Red Cross, caïques were to leave Izmir last week with foodstuffs for Rhodes, Leros and Kalymnos.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of King Farouk's birthday was celebrated on the 11th February with greater elaboration than usual. The Egyptian army played a prominent part in the ceremonies, and articles in the press and eulogies by prominent Egyptians were even more numerous than in the past. One of the birthday gifts to the King was a collection of Russian arms presented by the Government of the U.S.R.R. through the Soviet Minister at Cairo.

Arab Union has once more come to the fore in Egypt with the meeting in Cairo, beginning on the 14th February, of Arab Foreign Ministers. An official communiqué issued by the Egyptian Ministry for Foreign Affairs on the opening day stated that this meeting was being held to "elaborate the principles which should govern the League of Arab Nations." Egypt, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Transjordan, Syria and the Lebanon were all represented; the Yemen alone had been unable to send her delegate owing to lack of time. Musa Alami was again invited to represent the Arabs of Palestine. According to The Times of the 19th February, Abdul Rahman Azzam, head of the Department of Arab Affairs in the Egyptian Foreign Office, informed the press that draft statutes of the proposed Arab League might be ready before the end of the month. The Egyptian Government would then invite the Governments of the Arab States to send representatives to Cairo to approve them.

The arrival in Cairo last week of Shukri Quwatli, the President of Syria, on the completion of his talks with Ibn Saud, also attracted the interest of the Egyptian public. King Farouk gave an official dinner-party and reception in honour of Shukri, who himself entertained the King at the Syrian Legation in Cairo. No doubt Shukri took the opportunity of his visit to Egypt to discuss with the King and his Ministers the question of Syria, which has received of late a good deal of sympathetic attention in that country.

The visit to Egypt on their way back from the Crimea Conference of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, together with that of President Roosevelt, has naturally given rise to wide speculation. The official announcement, published on the evening of the 20th February, refers briefly to the Prime Minister's talks, in which Mr. Eden took part, with Haile Selassie, Ibn Saud, King Farouk and Shukri Quwatli. Discussions of importance took place at these meetings, as no doubt at those between President Roosevelt and his same three Royal visitors, but it would be unwise to assume that any final decisions were reached such as some wishful-thinkers in the press would have the world believe.

Up to date the Syrian Government is still awaiting from the French authorities the detailed proposals they have promised to make for a final settlement. We have urged the French Foreign Minister in Paris to see that these proposals, including the question of the Troupes Spéciales, are presented without further delay, and have emphasised to him the great importance of the proposals being stated in as conciliatory a manner as possible. M. Bidault has promised to let us have a reply by the 22nd February.

The State Department has also instructed the American Ambassador at Paris to urge the French Provisional Government to show moderation in their dealings with the Levant States, and in particular to abstain from the use of force. The State Department hopes that the French will agree to make certain concessions, if the Levant States for their part are ready to give assurances for the protection of French interests there. The concessions to which special reference is made are: the establishment of normal French diplomatic representation at Beirut and Damascus; the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales, subject to such supervision as may be thought necessary during the war; and the provision of equipment for the local gendarmerie. The State Department has likewise instructed the American Minister to the Levant States to impress upon the two local Governments the advisability of negotiating with the French an agreement defining their mutual relations.

Interest in the Syrian question continues to occupy the attention of Iraqi statesmen, official and unofficial. It need hardly be said that among the latter Nuri Pasha is the most prominent. During a recent visit to Istanbul he made a statement to the Arab News Agency, clearly implying that Iraq was prepared to assist Syria by furnishing her with arms, and ending with the words: "If the Syrian Government will define now the help it desires, Iraq will promptly meet its appeal."

On his return to Bagdad Nuri communicated his idea to the Regent, the Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, explaining that his proposal was to send, not only arms, but also five or six thousand "volunteers," to be chosen from Iraqis of Syrian origin already serving in the Iraqi army. These would form the nucleus of a national Syrian army, while the Troupes Spéciales would be given a status similar to that of the Assyrian Levies in Iraq, being maintained by the French in agreement with the Syrian Government. Thanks to the intervention of His Majesty's Ambassador, who pointed out the folly and danger of any such step on the part of Iraq, the scheme has been dropped for the moment, but the idea has caught on and may well be revived. Certain inflammatory anti-French articles having recently appeared in the local press, all editorial reference to Syria has now been forbidden by the Iraqi authorities until further notice.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese claim that they were not taken by surprise at the American attack on Iwojima. Domei on the 16th February said that at the end of January an American task force had disappeared from Philippine waters, and that the Japanese military and naval authorities had been on the watch for its reappearance nearer Japan. An attack on Iwojima was expected because the island had been used as a forward air observation post to detect American bombers from Saipan and report their course to the Japanese fighter stations in Japan proper. Should the Americans take Iwojima they could establish an air base there for fighters which could then escort and protect the B29 bombers. The Japanese assert that they beat off four attempts to land on Iwojima and also allege that several American warships were sunk (Domei, the 18th February).

Japanese reports on the carrier-borne aircraft which raided the Tokyo area say that 1,000 aircraft took part in the first day's raid, but only 600 on the second day. The Japanese say that the attacks were directed chiefly against airfields and aeroplane factories around Tokyo, but that trains and shipping were also assailed. They admit that military objectives were the main target, but complain that, in Shizuoka, Chiba and Ibaragi prefectures, Buddhist temples used as refuges for evacuee children were attacked, though the evacuees sustained no casualties. The Japanese also allege that the aircraft dropped propaganda leaflets but say that these "ridiculous and amusing" handbills were immediately collected and turned over to the authorities. The Japanese Imperial Headquarters communiqué claimed that on the 16th February 147 American aircraft were shot down for a Japanese loss of 61; while on the 17th February the communiqué claimed 109 American aircraft downed for the loss of seventeen Japanese aeroplanes. The Japanese further asserted that only slight damage had been sustained through the bombing and that the Tokyo people had gone about their daily tasks with calm and resolution (Domei, the 17th and 18th February).

On the 14th February Iguchi, the spokesman of the Japanese Board of Information, gave foreign correspondents his views on the communiqué issued at the close of the Crimea Conference. According to the Domei broadcast in English, what Iguchi said was that, despite their professions of idealism, the United States and Great Britain "had sold Poland in one of the most shameful acts in the game of power politics that the modern world has known." Poland's fate was an example of the menace under which all small nations must live. After predicting the failure of the Crimea Conference objectives, Iguchi concluded: "Future world peace and security cannot be found by driving hard bargains for personal gains, at a cost paid by others, but by honest statesmanship, guided by the principles adhered to by Japan, which, as Shigemitsu has explained, exclude none, but invite the collaboration of all." The Japanese overseas service in German rendered Iguchi's concluding remark: "World peace can only be achieved by just government as outlined by Minister Shigemitsu in his speech on Japanese foreign policy. That is to say, peace is only possible by acting on Shigemitsu's principle of not rejecting any hand which offers peace."

The Japanese overseas service in English (the 15th February) indignantly denied that Iguchi had made any peace overtures to the Allies. It is said that the Domei version in English was the original one used by Iguchi and that the phrase "excluding none, but inviting the collaboration of all," embodies a familiar principle.

Shigemitsu, in his speech to the Diet on the 21st January, was quoted by Domei (the 24th January) as saying that the Anglo-American policy of force could never secure enduring peace and that a peaceful world order could be brought into being only in an atmosphere of international amity and co-operation which excluded none, but invited the collaboration of all. He went on to re-enunciate the five principles of the Joint Declaration of the East Asiatic Nations—originally promulgated in November 1943—the first principle of which is equality and reciprocity of nations. The Japanese Government are thus trying to represent themselves as the champions of the rights among small States and as opponents of "Great Power" politics. The Domei broadcast from Singapore (the 19th February) said that, following the Polish precedent, Chungking China would be carved up too, and that the internal strife between the Kuomintang and the Communists would facilitate this. Japanese radio and press comment on the forthcoming San Francisco conference betrays considerable uneasiness about possible Russian action against Japan.

The renewed negotiations between the Kuomintang and the Communist Parties, which began towards the end of January (see this Summary, No. 278), have again broken down and little sign of progress is seen. Chou En-lai returned to Yenan on the 16th February after giving out a statement to the press in which he said that the Kuomintang had rejected the Communist demand for the establishment of a coalition Government and of a joint High Command over all the military forces in China. The Kuomintang, he said, had insisted on the retention of its dictatorship, and had demanded that the Communist forces should submit to the control of the existing Kuomintang-controlled National Military Council. Chou declared that the Kuomintang had been willing only to hold a conference of parties of a consultative nature, with a prearranged agenda which would preserve the Kuomintang dictatorship. This proposal Chou had rejected and he had decided to return to Yenan to report to the Communist Central Executive Committee. He expressed the gratitude of his Party to the American Ambassador, Major-General Hurley, for his untiring efforts to promote a settlement (Yenan Radio, 17th February). According to Kuomintang sources the Chungking Government offered the Communists legal status for their party, participation in the Executive Yuan and National Military Council and creation of a joint Government Communist committee presided over by a neutral observer, preferably an American officer, for the reorganisation and supply of the Communist forces.

Chungking Press comment on the Crimea Conference has in general been favourable; the Chinese Catholic paper Yi Shih Pao (15th February), however, expressed dissatisfaction at the treatment of the Polish Government in London and also at the exclusion of General de Gaulle from the Conference. The paper expressed the hope that the "appeasement policy" would not be repeated at the San Francisco meeting, where China would have to make her opinions heard in order that "some happiness might result for the Far East and the seeds of yet another war be got rid of." The Sao Tang Pao (15th February) opined that the Americans and British would hasten to score victories in the Far East and Pacific so as to enhance their prestige at the San Francisco meeting. A Yenan daily paper said that there was no democratic coalition Government able to represent all parties, groups and classes in China and declared that the Kuomintang Government should be allowed to send only one-third of the Chinese representatives to San Francisco; the other two-thirds should be made up of representatives of the Chinese Communist Party, of the China Democratic League, and of "noted non-party figures who would represent the broad masses of liberated and occupied China and the Chungking-controlled areas." The paper (presumably the Emancipation Daily) hoped that this important point would receive due consideration from the three great Allies (Yenan Radio, 17th February).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

On the whole it is undoubtedly true to say that the American reaction to the Crimea Conference continues to be extremely favourable. Sober praise is bestowed for the work accomplished and the conference has been hailed "as a milestone on the road to victory and peace." Several columnists have pointed out that, in part at least owing to the actions of President Roosevelt since the issue of the communiqué from Yalta, America has given a cautious endorsement which may be worth considerably more than a superficial enthusiasm. The principal significance of the decisions reached at Yalta, according to the New York Times, lies in the fact that they represent a sincere effort by the Three Big Powers to find common ground for collaboration in peace as well as war and that they mark the end of unilateral action. Considerable stress is laid on the tremendous importance of United States participation in European affairs in that, "while every move of every European Power is suspected of ulterior purposes, the United States is above such suspicions." As was only to be expected, a critical note is struck by the Scripps–Howard newspapers, which feel that "Stalin dictated most of the terms and [that] the Atlantic Charter pledges, other than the German disarmament, come off a bad second." Doubts about the Polish settlement continue to be expressed particularly by Congressmen of Polish origin and by representatives of the large Polish population of the United States.

The statement by Mr. Byrnes that President Roosevelt himself had proposed the formula for settling the complicated Polish question has helped somewhat to allay suspicions of a Russian victory, particularly as he also stated that the voting procedure for the proposed United Nations Security Council, to which Russia agreed, was also the President's suggestion. In response to questions at his press conference on whether there would be two Polish Governments present at the San Francisco Conference Mr. Byrnes made the statement that the Lublin Committee was the only Provisional Government, though he added that it must be reorganised and replaced. This, however, does not conform to His Majesty's Government's interpretation of the published Yalta document and they will continue to recognise the Polish Government in London until they are satisfied that a Government of National Unity has been properly formed as a result of the work of the Commission consisting of M. Molotov and the British and United States Ambassadors in Moscow. At the end of his press conference Mr. Byrnes said he hoped that the President would give a radio talk or would address Congress. This suggestion has been taken up by Vice-President Truman, the Chairman of the Senate, and it is reported to have received support from both parties.

Mr. Roosevelt's desire to give the fullest information to the American people is seen in Mr. Byrnes's speedy return from the Crimea. Not only is Mr. Byrnes particularly influential in the Senate, but he is an impressive speaker, and the elaborations and explanations he was able to give the press undoubtedly have helped to mould public opinion.

Even more important has been the President's brilliant selection of the United States delegates to the San Francisco Conference, which has been praised with remarkable unanimity. While Mr. Stettinius will head the delegation, satisfaction is expressed at the emergence from his retirement of his predecessor, Mr. Cordell Hull, who will act as Chief Adviser. Some papers go so far as to forecast the election of Mr. Hull as Chairman of the Conference. In addition to Democratic members of the Congress, Mr. Roosevelt has also appointed three Republicans, Senator Vandenberg, Representative Charles Eaton and Commander Stassen.

Particular emphasis is placed on the importance of the choice of Senator Vandenberg, who exercises great influence among the Republicans in the Senate on matters of foreign policy. It is understood that Senator Vandenberg will not signify his acceptance until he has had a talk with the President, though it is confidently expected that he will not refuse to serve. The selection of the former Governor of Minnesota, Commander Stassen, who is 38 and an ardent internationalist, has provoked considerable comment. In some quarters it is regarded as a snub to Governor Dewey, the titular leader of the Republican party, and as a "political pay-off" to Senator Ball (a follower of Commander Stassen), in return for his support at the November elections. It is even held that by his action the President has deliberately enhanced Commander Stassen's chances of securing the Republican Presidential nomination in 1948. The general opinion has been well summed up by the Newark News, which states: "The President has realistically given recognition to Congress, to women's stake in the world peace (a reference to Dean Virginia Gildersleeve, of Barnard College), and to the principle that our internal policy should be non-partisan; he has shown that he does not intend to repeat the mistakes of Wilson; he has acted to obtain essential unity; the balanced representation provides reasonable assurance that the nation and the Senate will support the decisions agreed upon, if they hold a promise of respite from war."

There are increasing indications of "high hopes" in connexion with the San Francisco meeting, which is often described as "the most important decision" reached at Yalta. While Americans were entitled to look forward with solid confidence to the work of the United Nations Conference at San Francisco, Mr. Grew, the Acting Secretary of State, has warned them against too great optimism, pointing out that "the peace plan which will emerge from the conference cannot possibly satisfy everybody." "It must be fashioned," he said, "through mutual adjustment by many minds, and by many nations. It will not be to everyone a perfect instrument. Yet, if we condemn and discard that plan simply because we do not regard it as perfect, the alternative will assuredly be another war."

The fact that Russia and China are both taking part in the San Francisco Conference and the additional fact that the 25th April is the last day for the renewal of the non-aggression pact between the U.S.S.R. and Japan have led to the widespread hope in many quarters that Marshal Stalin will join the Allies in the Far Eastern war.

A letter has been sent to the New York Times signed by Mr. John Davies, former United States Ambassador to this country, and consultant on international organisation to the State Department, Mr. Sumner Welles, former Under-Secretary of State, and other people, referring to Colonel Oliver Stanley's recent address to the Foreign Policy Association in New York in which he is alleged to have referred to the mandate system as representing the "old theory on trusteeship." "It seems pertinent and proper to ask," said the letter, "whether we have correctly understood the policy of Colonel Stanley and whether he is now perhaps in favour of the annexation of mandated territories by the Power administering them. We also believe it pertinent to ask what is the policy of our own Government and the Government of other Powers on this point. In our opinion," the letter continued, "the Pacific islands formerly mandated to Japan should not be annexed by the United States, but should be governed by this country as trustee for the United Nations. Suitable strategic arrangements should, of course, be assured." The letter urges that this subject should be discussed at the San Francisco Conference.

American participation in the Bretton Woods financial programme was submitted to both Houses of Congress this week in a Bill which treats the matter as an executive agreement rather than a treaty. The measure was introduced into the Senate by Senator Wagner, Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and by Senator Tobey, senior minority member of the Committee, while in the House of Representatives Mr. Spence, Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, introduced the Bill, which also provides for the repeal of the Johnson Act in favour of any of the affected countries which might become members of the proposed international institutions. Mr. Spence told the House of Representatives that the measure was the "fruit of non-partisan co-operation." The Bill also reserves to Congress such powers as changing the value of the dollar in terms of gold and continues indefinitely the United States Treasury stabilisation fund.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Mexico City Conference, which opened on the 21st, has been preceded by a series of significant, but not altogether surprising, moves in Latin America. As reported in last week's Summary, Chile, Ecuador, Paraguay and Peru signed the United Nations declaration in Washington on the 14th; on the 16th Venezuela announced the existence of a state of war with Germany and Japan, while the President of Uruguay has drafted a bill by which Uruguay will adhere to the United Nations' declaration. It is expected that the Chambers, at present in recess, will be summoned to consider this bill. All Latin America, with the exception of Argentina, will thus be at war with one or both members of the Axis, and it is even possible that Argentina may herself declare war (see below).

Before his departure for Mexico, the Brazilian Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs is reported to have emphasised "the outstanding part that would fall to Brazil in the Conference, by reason of her active participation in the war," and to have stated that one of the items on the agenda would be to see that the largest possible number of American countries had seats at the Peace Conference. The outstanding political problem before the Conference would be to adapt the Inter-American system to the world peace and security plan. The majority of the American nations would desire that, within the framework of the world security organisation, they should form a union "which, although accepting the general rules for the settlement of international disputes, should conserve its characteristics of a union of sister peoples."

Though the principal items on the agenda of the Conference are the questions of present co-operation between the American States during the war and the post-war transitional period, and their rôle in world organisation, the problem of Argentina cannot fail to be in the minds of the delegates, and indeed, figures in a subordinate position on the agenda. It is, therefore, of considerable interest that on the 18th February an exchange of notes between the Argentine and German Governments through the Swiss Legation was divulged in Buenos Aires. The Argentine Government accused Germany of holding Argentine diplomatic and consular officials as hostages and declared that if Germany persisted in this attitude, the Argentine Government would consider it a hostile act. They therefore reserved the freedom to take the necessary steps to defend their sovereignty and citizens. The Argentine note pointed out that the German Government had "sorely tried the patience and goodwill of the Argentine Government and the British and United States Governments"—much, presumably, as the first of these has "tried the patience" of the last two—and catalogued the tale of German procrastinations. The Acting Foreign Minister, however, informed the Press that he did not at present consider the question to be of such gravity as to be likely to lead to a declaration of war. This rather minor incident has obviously been pushed forward in such a way that it may be inflated into a full casus belli or allowed to resume its natural obscurity according to developments at Mexico City. Meanwhile, the Argentine Government are reported to have placed an embargo on German funds, and to have announced that Germany will be required to make good Argentine shipping losses and the cost of interning the crew of the Graf Spee. The pro-Axis newspapers Cabildo and Federal are now stated to have been closed down for an indefinite period, and the Argentine Minister of Justice, Dr. Rómulo Etcheverry Boneo, is reported to have resigned.

The Bolivian Government has raised the state of siege which has been in force since the Oruro rebellion last November, and in Ecuador President Velasco Ibarra is reported to have threatened to resign if the Constitution just elaborated by the Constituent Assembly is not amended.

On the 19th February recognition was extended to the Salvadorean régime of Colonel Aguirre Salinas by His Majesty's Government and the United States Government. At his Press Conference, Mr. Grew stated that it would rest with the Mexican Government to determine whether El Salvador should be invited to the Mexico City Conference. According to a Guatemalan broadcast the possibility of such an invitation has led the Guatemalan authorities, at least temporarily, to delay the departure of their delegation. The Minister of National Defence in the Guatemalan junta has published a denial of rumoured unrest in the army.

UNITED NATIONS.

World Trade Union Conference.

The World Trade Union Conference of Trade Unions held in County Hall, London, between the 6th–17th February, has been an event of considerable interest and significance. It has been the most representative international trade union gathering since the split in the ranks of international labour which followed the triumph of revolutionary communism in the Soviet Union. And the presence of delegations from three ex-enemy countries—Finland, Bulgaria and Italy (unexpectedly invited as a result of a decision of the Conference itself) in addition to delegations from most of the United Nations, made it the most representative international conference of any kind for many years. A large delegation of Soviet trade unionists was led by M. Kuznetsov, who made a deep impression on the Conference not only on account of his considerable force and ability, but also because of the restraint with which he used the position of ascendancy which he quickly established at the outset. (He did not press, for example, his original demand that invitations should be sent to the Lublin Poles.) Trade unionism in the United States was represented by delegations from the C.I.O. and the Railway Brotherhoods; but the A.F. of L. was a conspicuous absentee, having refused an invitation owing to its unwillingness to associate with Soviet trade unions or with the C.I.O. The presence of Señor Lombardo Toledano ensured that the point of view now dominant in Latin American trade unionism would be effectively expressed. It is significant that on most controversial issues the representatives of the Soviet trade unions, the C.I.O., the Latin Americans, and the French C.G.T., led by M. Louis Saillant, were closely in agreement.

A considerable part of the time of the Conference was devoted to the discussion of general resolutions relating to the part which should be played by trade unions in achieving victory, in the discussion of peace terms, and in dealing with the problems of post-war reconstruction. The discussion of these matters aroused little controversy though Sir Walter Citrine felt it necessary to warn the Conference that the employment of German labour for reparations under slave conditions might undermine trade union standards everywhere, and Señor Toledano made a pointed attack on the present régimes in the Argentine, Spain and Portugal.

The most dangerous threat to the success of the Conference arose over the discussion of future international trade union organisation. It was the hope of the British T.U.C., who were anxious to base any new organisation on the existing International Federation of Trade Unions (of which the A.F. of L., but not the C.I.O. or the Soviet trade unions, are members), that the Conference would confine itself to a non-committal discussion. But Mr. Sidney Hillman, of the C.I.O., expressed the dominant mood of the Conference in an eloquent speech moving that an entirely new World Trade Union Organisation should be established immediately. A compromise solution was eventually agreed whereby it was decided in principle to set up the new Organisation but to refer constitutional details (including the vital question of voting procedure) to a continuing Committee.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE 25th anniversary of the foundation of the Nazi Party was celebrated on the 24th February. Last year there was no proclamation by Hitler on this occasion, but a number of speeches were made by Party leaders, including Goebbels, Ley and Backe. This year, at the meeting of old Party members in Munich, an address by the Führer was read by the Under-Secretary of State, Esser, since Hitler's "duty and work" did not permit him to leave his headquarters. Hitler drew encouragement from the parallel between the successful struggle of the Party and Germany's present struggle. The German people, he said, was still facing the same coalition of deadly enemies—"the unnatural alliance between capitalist exploitation and Bolshevik murder"—as on the 24th February, 1920, when the Party had "declared war to preserve the nation." He admitted that the programme proclaimed then was not popular—many did not understand the salient points, and it was rejected by an overwhelming majority of the people. But without the National Socialist revolution, and Germany's material rearmament, the German people could not have risen to the present crisis. Hitler derided Allied plans for world security. "Asiatic Bolshevism" would not be hurled back in the "Geneva fun-fair" but by force of German arms.

He admitted that the struggle was difficult to-day, but repeated the familiar argument that "whatever we may lose in it is incomparably less than we should lose if the struggle were not brought to a successful end." Rome, after the battle of Cannae, did not win by attempting a "cowardly compromise" but by the "uncompromising decision to continue the fight for her existence by throwing in the uttermost strength left to the people." He promised that the turning-point would come this year, and appealed for continued and intensified determination by Front and Homeland, until a German victory could be placed in the hands of the young generation, the product of National Socialist education.

Hitler said that his life was only of value in so far as it served the nation, and referred to reports that the enemy intended to destroy his country home.

He would be happy to share in "bearing to the last every burden which others have to bear. The only thing I could not bear would be signs of weakness among my people." He was working ceaselessly, not only for the strengthening of the fronts, but "if need be, for the elimination of all anti-social elements," elements "which either do not wish to participate in the preservation of our national existence or even try to oppose it." He concluded by declaring that, just as 25 years ago he had announced the victory of the Party, so to-day, "inspired as ever by faith in our people, I prophesy the final victory of the Reich."

This speech is the only one so far reported. Bormann sent telegrams to the Munich meeting on behalf of the party's leaders, and Hitler himself sent telegrams to Gauleiters Hanke and Koch from his headquarters, where he received Reichsleiters, Gauleiters and Formation leaders of the Party, to give them "directives for the victorious continuation of the struggle, for the comprehensive organisation of all forces of resistance, and for the unreserved employment of the party in the fateful struggle of the German nation."

Recent evidence, although fragmentary, confirms the impression that the Nazi party is relentless in its efforts to control the nation. A report from Bochum speaks of foreign workers as dispirited and angry but completely quelled by the armed vigilance of the S.S. Captured instructions for the evacuation of foreign workers from Alsace reveal meticulous care to guard and control them at every stage of their journey. Even the present travel difficulties have not prevented H.J. leaders from the entire Reich being given special training in Bavaria at the end of 1944. The course is said to have lasted several weeks, during which time all correspondence with the outside was forbidden to the boys. S.S "extermination units" are reported to exist in Bavaria and to have already carried out mass executions in Dachau. The Gestapo is said to have made a further extensive purge of possible "democratic" leaders in Vienna.

What can be said of the mass of the nation thus held in check? Letters and similar evidence show signs of increasing weariness and apathy which seems now to be expressing itself in more frequent if not more outspoken criticism, directed not so much against the authorities as against the fact that the war is still allowed to go on. Civilian letters in January contained references to the hopelessness caused by a breakdown in postal arrangements. One writer's only comment on the news was that, if the Russians could not be halted, then all was lost. Another saw no hope for peace in 1945, since "we won't be allowed to give in." The rising discontent is more clearly reflected, curiously enough, in the press. Leading articles written within the last ten days reprove those "weak-kneed" citizens who "meet the constant difficulties with the suicidal enemy slogan of 'Make an end of it' ('Schluss machen!')." Seibert wrote in the Völkischer Beobachter on the 20th that everyone was now asking how all this would end. The real danger he saw not in any collapse of the will to resistance but in "a kind of paralysis of initiative," a certain fatalism; "a heavy weight of psychic and physical burdens leads to an inner and outward fatigue which for hours, and even days, places us in a half-dreaming condition. We are not 'up to it.'"

The High Command communiqués gave prominence to the successful German attacks on the Hron bridgehead, and on the 25th announced that it had been smashed, and that elsewhere on the East Front German troops had persistently opposed Soviet attacks and made local counter-attacks. The Russians were being held on the Neisse. On the 23rd the O.K.W. reported heavy fighting in the inner fortifications of Poznan and Grudziadz. Since then these places have not been mentioned, and the communiqué has not yet admitted the loss of Poznan. Some anxiety and criticism at home as to the wisdom of defending encircled fortresses to the last is reflected in Dittmar's talk, which he devoted to a defence of the High Command's policy. There are signs that the German people are being prepared for the possibility that the Russians may launch a new large-scale offensive before the long-awaited German offensive begins. The Political Review of the 23rd suggested that the Command had not yet the "prerequisites" for passing from the defensive to the offensive.

In the West, the "long-expected large-scale attack" on the Roer was announced on the 23rd. Linnich, Jülich, and Düren were mentioned on the 24th and 25th, but it was claimed that no deeper penetrations had been made, and on the whole the tone of reports from the west is confident.

Publicity given to recent Allied raids on Berlin and Dresden culminated in a broadcast talk by Fritzsche on the 24th claiming that "the terrible crime of the 18th February on the town of Dresden had surpassed all previous examples of Allied cruelty." The speaker denied that Dresden was either a centre of war production or of communications: only "one thin line of communications" ran through the city. The city was said to be full of refugees from more eastern districts; crowds of people took refuge in the parks, which were themselves bombed in the second raid. It was recently reported that several Government offices had moved from Berlin to Dresden and that space was being created to accommodate still more.

A recent S.H.A.E.F. review of the numbers of refugees and displaced persons in Germany stresses the fact that the total effect of all evacuation movements, whether from East or West, from invasion or bombing, is "to crowd the displaced persons into an ever-narrowing area of Central and South-western Germany." In this area all kinds of improvised movement are now taking place. People go on foot, in lorries and in horse-drawn vehicles to a railway centre, and then, if rail transport is not possible, may continue their journey as they have begun it. Prisoners of war have now joined the stream of migrants. The Protecting Power has obtained from O.K.W. a good deal of information regarding the fate of such prisoners evacuated from camps in Silesia and Saxony. For instance, over a thousand British officers of Stalag Luft 3 have been moved from Sagan to Lückenwalde, about 30 miles from Berlin on the main line to Dresden. Accommodation in this town (of 25,000 inhabitants) is said to be bad, overcrowding being such that the sick cannot be given separate quarters, and medical supplies are very short owing to the impossibility of transport of drugs from the Red Cross depots situated in Northern and Southern Germany. Treatment is reported to be on the whole good and there are said to have been few attempts to escape. But the severe cold, the lack of food and the necessity of travelling on foot are said to be causing much hardship, to civilians no less than to military prisoners. A further danger according to the Swiss authorities is the possible mishandling of prisoners in areas recently bombed. Representations have been made by the Swiss Legation to the O.K.W., who admitted that they had been surprised by events and promised to take remedial steps.

The German authorities have increasing difficulty in maintaining order in towns from which most of the men have gone. One report speaks of the lack of uniformed policemen in Germany, and the resulting large increase in robberies and crimes. The problem is complicated by the presence of large numbers of foreign workers. Round Chemnitz, which is now a threatened town, there are now said to be 700,000 foreign workers, more than four times as many as before the Russian offensive. They are becoming increasingly restive. Towards the end of last year, in many places, no foreign worker was allowed to live in a private billet, but there is evidence that this measure is not a sufficient safeguard. The National-Zeitung on the 28th January reported that "a few days ago the Deputy Ortsgruppenleiter of Alten-Essen was killed in a struggle with foreign burglars when he and two other Party leaders surprised a gang rifling food stores." This incident, said the paper, drew attention to a problem which "has been worrying the population for a long time." This confirms evidence contained in Kreisleiters' reports in October last year concerning the terrorisation of their neighbourhood by foreign workers. They are apparently able to break out of their camps, and the National-Zeitung calls for measures in the camps and the mobilisation of the Stadtwacht in the town to combat the danger. On the 2nd February the same paper appealed again for the help of everyone in fighting these "bandits," some of whom were armed, who hid in the cellars of partly destroyed houses, and burgled shops and storehouses.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

President Beneš's broadcast from London on the 17th February, referred to in last week's Summary, included a succinct account of the preparations his Government has made for the administration of Czechoslovakia in the transition period between its liberation and the holding of formal elections. These plans are, for the most part, embodied in Presidential decrees, and the present is an appropriate moment to summarise them.

The Czechoslovak governmental organisation abroad will be dissolved on the President's return to his own country; a new Government will be appointed immediately by the President and will include representatives of the home front; each commune will be administered by an elected local National Committee which will nominate its representatives to the district National Committee; the latter will send members to a provincial National Committee and the provincial bodies will then select the members of a Provisional National Assembly which will have legislative powers and to which the Government will be responsible. Regions containing a German or Magyar population will be administered by Government commissioners and Government commissions. At the earliest possible moment regular elections will be held; in Dr. Beneš's view this ought to take place not more than "six months from the moment when the whole Republic has been liberated." Speaking of his own position, Dr. Beneš said it would be necessary, after the establishment of a Government at home, "to settle the question of the status of the President of the Republic on democratic lines in conformity with our Constitution, and also to decide how and when a new presidential election is to be held."

That part of Slovakia which is regarded as outside the operational zone has now been handed over to the Czechoslovak Government Delegate, M. Nemec, by the Soviet military authorities. Its administration has been entrusted to the Slovak National Council, with its seat at Košice, in accordance with the agreement reached between the Council and the Czechoslovak Government. Mobilisation has been proclaimed for service in the Czechoslovak armed forces, but recruitment is so far on a voluntary basis. The Government Delegate has reported that practically no Jews remain in Eastern Slovakia.

On the 21st February President Beneš, speaking in the Home Service of the B.B.C., expressed his own and his nation's gratitude to the British for their help and hospitality during the past five years.

POLAND.

While the leaders of the various Polish groups in this country, preferring no doubt to await this week's debate on the Crimea Conference in the House of Commons, have refrained from defining their attitude towards those of its decisions which relate to Poland, the split within M. Arciszewski's coalition is becoming more pronounced. After a conversation with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 20th February, M. Mikolajczyk had discussions on the 21st with M. Popiel, the Chairman of the Christian (Democratic) Labour Party, and with the Socialist leader, M. Stanczyk, both of whom had held portfolios in his Cabinet. On the following day the Committee of the Christian Labour Party announced its withdrawal from the Government. In the communiqué explaining this decision, however, the Committee was careful to point out that it was taken on the 5th February (i.e., before the publication of the Crimea Conference communiqué); that the Party had already withdrawn one of its two representatives in the Cabinet on the 29th January; and that the reason for these measures was M. Arciszewski's failure to act on a proposal submitted by the Christian Labour Party on the 10th January, urging that the Government should be enlarged by the inclusion of representatives of the Peasant Party. At the same time, the communiqué also stated that the Christian Labour Party shared the views of M. Mikolajczyk as to the desirability of entering into negotiations with the U.S.S.R., Great Britain and the United States. On the 23rd February the Polish Ministry of Information issued a denial that the two Ministers in question had resigned, and asserted that they, with General Haller (the chairman of the Christian Labour Party's national council), questioned the legality "of the announcements made from time to time by a group of members of the party on its behalf."

In the meantime General Anders, the Commander of the Polish Forces in Italy, had arrived in London and had been received by the Prime Minister on the 21st February. On the 26th February it was officially announced that President Raczkiewicz had appointed him to be Acting Commander-in-Chief of the Polish Armed Forces, in accordance with the decree of the 29th September, 1944 (which entrusted the President with the issue of "necessary orders to secure the continuity of the functions of the Commander-in-Chief if he is unable to carry out his duties"), and in view of the fact that General Bor-Komorowski, who succeeded General Sosnkowski in October 1944, was still a prisoner in German hands. (For General Anders's reaction to the Crimean Conference communiqué which alone might be thought sufficient to make his new appointment inacceptable to the Soviet Government, see Summary No. 281.) In British official circles it was stated on the same day that General Anders's appointment had been made without the knowledge or approval of the British Government, which, as they had not been consulted, took no responsibility in the matter.

At the close of their stay in Moscow from the 14th to the 20th February, a communiqué was issued stating that MM. Bierut and Morawski and General

Rola-Zymierski had had talks with Marshal Stalin and M. Molotov, in which questions concerning Soviet–Polish relations and Soviet assistance in the reconstruction of Warsaw were discussed. On the 21st the Lublin radio announced that a conference had been held at Lodz between representatives of the "Provisional Government," of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R., and of the Lodz textile industries, at which the Soviet representatives accepted orders from Lodz industries for the delivery of textile raw materials.

On the 21st February M. Lukasiak, the "representative in London of the Polish Provisional Government," issued a statement referring to rumours that the Association of Polish Shipowners intended to transfer their interests in the ships of the Polish merchant fleet, and giving due warning that such transfers, in so far as they involved shares held by the Polish State, would be considered null and void by the Polish "Provisional Government."

SOVIET UNION.

This has been a week of consolidation for the Red Army. In the Samland Peninsula north-west of Königsberg the communiqués speak of defensive fighting and of a slight retreat. There were minor advances south-west of Königsberg and also south-west of Danzig, including the capture of Czersk (21st February). The major event of the week, reported in an Order of the Day of the 23rd February, was the fall of Poznan after a month's siege. With it were taken 23,000 prisoners and much booty, whilst the enemy lost 25,000 killed. The restoration of the railway through Poznan will make a substantial difference to the supply position of Marshal Zhukov's troops, who have been held up in the Oder bend before Frankfurt. Further south Marshal Koniev's forces have reached the western Neisse south of Guben. Fighting continues for encircled Breslau. During the week aircraft of the Red Army have bombed Königsberg, Stettin, Stargard, Breslau and Bratislava.

On the 23rd February, Red Army Day, Marshal Stalin issued his usual Order of the Day, the first to be issued with the Red Army fighting on German soil, and its tone was correspondingly triumphant. He was also very cordial in his references to Allied co-operation, declaring: "The successes of our winter offensive have in the first place resulted in the disruption of the German winter offensive in the west, which aimed at the capture of Belgium and Alsace, and have enabled the armies of our Allies to launch an offensive against the Germans in their turn, and in this way to link up their offensive operations in the west with the Red Army's offensive operations in the east." Marshal Stalin revealed that in forty days of the offensive of January and February the Germans lost 800,000 killed and 350,000 prisoners. He ended with the warning that "The nearer our victory, the greater must be our vigilance, the stronger our blows at the enemy." In honour of the 27th anniversary of the Red Army he ordered a salute of twenty salvoes to be fired in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Petrozavodsk, Tallinn, Riga, Vilna, Kishinev, Tiflis, Stalingrad, Sevastopol, Odessa, and Lvov. The Order of Lenin "for long and faultless service in the Red Army" was presented to a number of high Red Army officers, including Marshals Budenny, Voronov and Rotmistrov.

Major-General Adrian Vasiliev, formerly Deputy Head of the Soviet Military Mission in Great Britain, has taken over the duties of representative of the U.S.S.R. on the Advisory Council for Italy from Major-General Susloparov. Major-General Susloparov has also been superseded as Soviet Representative on the Allied Control Commission by Major-General Kislenko.

The Soviet press has now for the first time come out openly against General Radescu's Government in connexion with the present Roumanian crisis. Pravda (the 22nd February) published a vigorous editorial stating that the broad popular masses in Roumania were being checked in their demands for reform by the "vacillating and ofter openly anti-democratic policy" of their Prime Minister. Radescu's speech of the 12th February in which he urged workers to engage less in politics and more in their work was singled out for special attack. "Elimination of the workers from participation in political life is typical of a Fascist, not a democratic régime." Unwilling to lean for support on the masses of the people, the Radescu Government had had to seek help from among the reactionary elements, and was thus deliberately fomenting the activities of Hitlerites. Much capital was made by Pravda of the delegations of printers who went to General Radescu to protest against the use of troops in their works to compel them to continue printing the National Peasant Party's newspaper Dreptatea. Radescu is reported to have threatened the delegation that he would mete out to the workers the same treatment that they had received in Greece. Pravda, commenting cynically on the "Greek" language of the General, pointed out that it was entirely his own fault that he was losing democratic support. The article concluded by stating decisively that the Soviet public could not watch with indifference this internal struggle between democratic and Fascist agents in Roumania; it was not purely an internal affair, for Hitler was not yet beaten and Roumania was in the rear of the Red Army. The historic decisions of the Crimea Conference demanded that an end should be put to pro-Fascist elements in the Soviet rear.

The War and the Working Class in its latest issue carried an article in similar terms, affirming that the National Democratic Front would once and for all crush the rising forces of reaction in Roumania.

The situation in Transylvania is still somewhat obscure. It is interesting that in the Maramureș, a district covering some 3,381 sq. kilom. in the extreme north of Transylvania adjoining Sub-Carpathian Ukraine, a meeting should have been called by the new prefect of the chief town Sighet, under the auspices, it is reported, of the local Soviet Command, requesting the union of the province with the Ukrainian S.S.R. This new prefect is probably one of those constituted locally by popular acclamation, of which there have recently been numerous cases throughout Roumania. The former mayor of Sighet, who fled to Budapest, maintained that the majority of the inhabitants were opposed to such a union. The account of the meeting and the petition is strongly reminiscent of the manifesto said to have been put out last November by a Congress of People's Committees of Sub-Carpathian Ukraine demanding union with the Soviet Ukraine. (See Summary No. 276 under "Czechoslovakia.") In the case of Maramureș, desire for incorporation in the U.S.S.R. seems less probable, as according to the Roumanian census of 1930 of a total of 161,575 inhabitants 93,207 were Roumanian and only 19,230 Ukrainian. Geographically, the area could clearly not be incorporated in the U.S.S.R. unless Sub-Carpathian Ukraine were also, for although there is a small frontier with Eastern Galicia, communications across the mountains would be impossible. The only road eastwards over the mountains goes into Roumanian, not Soviet, Bukovina.

Little has lately been heard of events in Soviet Bukovina, but on the 20th February the peasants of that region sent a message of thanks for their liberation to Marshal Stalin, stating that 500,000 acres of arable land had been distributed among them. (This was double the amount distributed under Soviet auspices in 1940–41.) In return, they had, over and above their deliveries to the Soviet State, given 11,000 tons of grain to the Red Army fund, subscribed 15,400,000 roubles to the State loan and given 11 million roubles to build a "Soviet Bukovina" tank column. These contributions seem very large from such a small, poverty-stricken and war-torn district.

The Council of People's Commissars and the Central Committee of the Communist Party announced on the 24th February the death after a serious illness of M. Alexei Nikolaevich Tolstoy, outstanding Soviet writer and Deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R.

After the Revolution Count Alexei Tolstoy lived as a émigré until the middle twenties, when he returned to the Soviet Union. He visited England in 1937 as Soviet Representative at the Congress of Peace and Friendship and became a member of the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R. He was on the Presidium of the All-Slav Committee and the All-Union Committee for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries (V.O.K.S.), being made chairman of the new literary section of the latter in July 1944. He was also a member of the Extraordinary State Commission for Investigating Atrocities. In 1943, on his 60th birthday, he was decorated with the Order of Lenin, in addition to the "Red Banner of Labour" which he already held. He was awarded the Stalin Prize twice, first for Peter the First, which Gorky considered to be the best historical Soviet novel, and again for his best-known work, The Road to Calvary. His works have been published in the U.S.S.R. in more than 8 million copies in thirty-two languages. A tribute to his memory, signed by sixty leading writers, was published in the Soviet press.

SCANDINAVIA.

The statement made by M. Günther, the Swedish Foreign Minister, in the Riksdag of the 22nd February, in reply to a question, was framed in remarkably firm and serious language, particularly having regard to the speaker's reputation for weakness. He was quite uncompromising in his denunciation of the German terrorism in Norway, and left no doubt that the question was to be regarded as being very important to Sweden. He naturally refused to make an official disclosure of the steps which his Government might consider it necessary to take, but he did not dissociate himself from the view expressed by his questioner, M. Ström, that "Sweden must become the fire brigade that can extinguish German murder and arson." M. Ström conceded, however, that intervention could only take place in agreement with the Danish and Norwegian people. A request from these quarters might, in fact, be of crucial importance in the determination of Swedish policy. Swedish opinion, as voiced in the press and in official quarters, is definitely contemptuous of the policy of eleventh hour intervention for purposes of influence or prestige, but there are indications that the practical object of helping a sister nation might, in certain circumstances, be differently regarded.

Railway traffic from Sweden to Norway via Riksgränsen was suspended on the 24th February, in consequence of an incident when a Norwegian State policeman searched a train and removed a Norwegian refugee, using threats to the railway officials. The State Railway Board has delivered a written protest to the German authorities, demanding the removal of the offending policeman.

A recent meeting of the Swedo-German Association in Stockholm is reported to have taken place in a funereal atmosphere. It was however attended by a number of socially prominent persons, including the Duke d'Otrante, a relative of the Swedish King, and a considerable sprinkling of army and navy officers.

It has now been disclosed that Iceland (C) is among the countries which have been given the opportunity to qualify for attendance at the San Francisco Conference by a declaration of war on Germany and Japan. The Icelandic constitution may however create a complication, since, at the time of its adoption, Iceland declared herself perpetually neutral. If an amendment should prove necessary, the time limit (1st March) for complying with the invitation might make the obstacle insurmountable.

The arrival of General Lindemann in Denmark has been associated with an intensification of German severities, for which it has been suggested that he is responsible. On the 22nd February it was reported that a general curfew had been proclaimed, though this has not so far been officially confirmed. There have, however, been a large number of arrests, and the Danish prisoners deported to Germany on the 16th February have now been removed to the notorious Dachau. Among a number of acts of "Schalburgtage" or "clearing murder," a particularly shocking case occurred on the 20th February, when masked men shot four doctors in Odense hospital. On the 23rd February, an attempt is reported to have been made to eliminate General Lindemann by blowing up a special train on which he was travelling. The General, however, escaped unharmed. On the following night the Aalborg to Copenhagen express was wrecked with bombs, and this incident is generally and reasonably interpreted as an act of retaliation, since no Germans were on the train.

In view of the conjecture in Summary 280 to the effect that the liquidation of General Marthinsen in Norway was the unauthorised act of an individual, it must be stated that the Home Front leadership has publicly assumed responsibility for this act, which it justifies on the ground that Marthinsen was particularly implicated in the policy of taking hostages, and was therefore a danger to Norwegian lives. It is noticeable, however, that the clandestine paper Siste Runde expresses some misgivings as to the soundness of this policy. The Home Front leadership indeed has made in clear that it is itself generally opposed to lynch law. In a recent directive it emphasises the importance of dealing with traitors by legal trial rather than by such methods. It points out the necessity for prompt and expeditious procedure, the lack of which in some recently liberated countries has given rise to unrest. It attributes such delay largely to the lack of immediately available evidence, urges Norwegians to begin the careful preparation of such material in an objective manner, and lists a number of matters on which evidence of this description is desirable.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

It was announced on the 23rd February that Dr. Gerbrandy had completed the reconstruction of his Cabinet, (see Summary No. 280), with certain exceptions. Of the old Ministers only five—Dr. Gerbrandy himself. Dr. van Kleffens, Mr. de Booy and Jhr. Michiels van Verduynen and Dr. Bolkestein—remain, all in their former posts. The Ministries of Justice, War and Waterways have not yet been filled. For the time being Dr. Gerbrandy is acting as Minister of Justice, Mr. de Booy as Minister of War, and Mr. Wijffels as Minister of Waterways. According to Radio Orange the appointment of new Ministers of War and Waterways will shortly be announced. Dr. van Mook has relinquished, at his own wish, the Ministry of Colonies, now renamed Ministry of Overseas Territories, in order that he may remain Acting Lieutenant-Governor-General of the East Indies, since the two posts could not properly continue to be held by the same person. Admiral Furstnur has similarly relinquished the Ministry of Marine, in order to devote himself entirely to his duties of Commander-in-Chief of the Dutch Navy.

Of the political affiliation of the five new Ministers not much is known as yet. But some of them are reputed to belong to the Left-wing of the Catholic Party.

The official statement broadcast by Radio Orange on the 23rd announced that "men from the liberated territory who experienced the Occupation are members of the new Cabinet. The aim of the reconstruction has been to bring the Cabinet into harmony with the democratic nature of our State structure and our people, as far as was possible with the personalities available. The reconstruction has also aimed at making the Cabinet representative of the spiritual currents moving in the Dutch nation. The representatives of the resistance movement . . . . have been given the place in the Cabinet to which they are entitled in view of the part they have played. The reconstructed Cabinet sees its main task in the mobilisation of forces available for a united participation in the war against Germany and Japan, the organisation of the liberated territory for powerful assistance in the liberation of the entire Kingdom in Europe and Asia, the furthering of the reconstruction of the liberated South. In pursuing these labours close attention will be given to the creation of conditions propitious for the reinvigoration of the State and the people without unnecessarily anticipating fundamental measures. Fundamental measures must wait until the whole country is free. This does not, however, exclude provision for the creation of healthier social conditions in industry."

The reconstruction of the Cabinet was also the occasion of a broadcast by Queen Wilhelmina to her subjects, in which she stressed the importance of national unity and declared that "competent men who enjoy the confidence of the freed population have been found to enter the Cabinet." On the complete liberation of the Netherlands the Cabinet would resign; then the Queen hoped "to give instructions for the formation of a Ministry consisting of men possessing the confidence of the whole nation."

The Belgian press published a long statement by the Belga News Agency on the 23rd, which purported to correct certain statements made at the International Trade Union Congress and in the House of Commons. It was not true that Belgium had refused the aid of U.N.R.R.A. The Allied High Command had decided that for the time being the military authorities were to be solely responsible for imports; U.N.R.R.A. could not intervene till this stage had been passed. U.N.R.R.A. was ready to assist Belgium when the time should come, and Belgium would welcome such assistance. What she would not do, would be to receive goods without paying for them. Nor could the low level of Belgian rations be entirely imputed to the faults of the Belgian Government. It was true that mistakes had been made, but these had been largely due to the fact that the Pierlot Government, when in London, had failed to foresee that Belgium would be freed long before the complete liberation of the Netherlands and the collapse of Germany. Moreover, even if all the food in Belgium were to be equally shared, there would not be enough to provide 2,000 calories a day per person. Belgium needed imports, not merely of food, but also of the commodities that were required for the working of industry and transport. It is a matter of some significance that a semi-official statement of such a character should have been issued at this juncture.

FRANCE.

On the invitation of His Majesty's Government M. Bidault came to England on the 25th February for talks with the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary which covered all matters of common interest to France and Great Britain. He was accompanied by M. Chauvel and M. Alphand. In particular the British Ministers gave their French colleagues an account of the subjects dealt with at the Crimea Conference. Supply problems were also discussed at the Foreign Office with M. Alphand. M. Bidault returned to Paris on the 27th and reported to General de Gaulle.

M. Bidault has also held conversations in Paris with M. Spaak, the Belgian Foreign Minister, in which all questions of common interest were reviewed. They were in agreement on the security measures to be taken after the war and on the formation of a separate Rheno-Westphalian territory, although the political status of such a territory would have to be reserved for joint decision by the Allies. According to the Belgian home service report of a press conference given by M. Spaak on the 26th February the Belgian Minister was less explicit, saying that one thing was definite, namely the interest of the two countries in the freedom of the Rhine.

The economic results of M. Spaak's visit were announced in a French communiqué of the 23rd February. A commercial agreement designed to restore trade was concluded between France and the Belgo-Luxemburg Union; the rate of exchange between French and Belgian francs was fixed; it was agreed in principle to exchange information on the assets held in either country by nationals of the other country; and the Governors of the Banks of France and Belgium had conversations concerning an eventual payments agreement. In addition the Governments of France, Belgium, Luxemburg and Holland agreed to consult together regularly on the problems of reconstruction and on future economic co-operation. The French paper, the Monde, went out of its way to forestall possible Communist criticism by remarking that these agreements, which would enable the regional interests of France, Belgium and eventually Holland, to be brought into harmony, in nowise corresponded to what had come to be called a "western bloc" policy.

The first cargoes have begun to arrive in France from the United Kingdom and the United States under the Civil Imports programme, and the French have officially requested S.H.A.E.F. that military responsibility for civilian imports into France should cease with the March shipments. M. René Mayer has, however, complained that insufficient shipping has been allocated for imports from the French Empire, among which edible oils are particularly important in view of the shortage of fats in France. He stated that he was being subjected to increasing criticism and political pressure, and that while he would continue to defend the Allied shipping pool it was difficult to do this when the pooling arrangement was unable to ensure delivery of even a reasonable proportion of the supplies allocated to France by the Combined Boards.

On the 23rd February the Cabinet approved the draft Lend-Lease Agreement with the United States which M. Jean Monnet has been negotiating in Washington. This will cover military supplies, certain raw materials, rolling-stock and other goods, while France will pay a preliminary sum of 500 million dollars out of her dollar assets in the United States to cover imports to North Africa and civilian imports into France.

On the 22nd February the Consultative Assembly concluded a three days' debate on the estimates of the Ministry of Justice in which M. de Menthon's Administration came in for severe criticism. By 169 votes to 14 the Assembly carried a motion expressing regret that no notice had been taken of the Assembly's repeated resolutions on the purge and reserving the vote on the Minister's salary until the Bureau of the Assembly had been received by General de Gaulle and heard from him a full explanation of the Government's intentions. After this rebuff it remains to be seen whether M. de Menthon will offer, and whether General de Gaulle will accept, his resignation.

While the Minister of Justice was the scapegoat, the course of the debate and the motion showed that the real source of trouble was the Assembly's dissatisfaction at its treatment by the Government. Ministers have attended debates only when they themselves have been directly concerned. Some of them, in particular the Minister of War, have given offence by refusing to answer parliamentary questions. Furthermore, little notice has been taken even of the Assembly's most important resulutions, such as the one of the 28th December on economic and social reforms (see Summary No. 274). It is noteworthy that since this debate the Conseil National de la Résistance has issued a manifesto in which it declares its view that the advice of the Consultative Assembly should be taken into consideration by the Government "in a spirit of confident collaboration."

The position of the Parliamentarians who voted in favour of the grant of full powers to Pétain in July 1940 is also a subject of contention. The inclusion of nine of them in the list of fifty names of persons submitted for approval by the Consultative Assembly as jurors in the forthcoming High Court purge trials aroused vigorous protests from Radical and Resistance Deputies. The claims of these Parliamentarians that the Algiers Ordinance of the 21st April, 1944, should be revised so as to enable them to stand as candidates in the forthcoming local elections are also warmly contested by Resistance and Left wing representatives. The Government has not yet declared itself.

According to a German news agency statement Jacques Doriot, "President of the French Liberation Committee and leader of the French People's Party," has been killed in an air attack in south-western Germany. Doriot is the first of the chief French quislings in Germany to meet a violent end.

SWITZERLAND.

The economic negotiations are continuing in a good atmosphere, but the problem of meeting Swiss requirements in face of the present shortage of transport in France is not proving easy of solution.

The food situation continues to deteriorate. Owing to bad weather and the labour shortage the winter crops were one-third short of the target set. Industrial prospects are also unfavourable, and increased unemployment has only been averted by the fact that more men have been called to the colours.

The Zürich authorities have banned a concert which Furtwängler was to have come from Berlin to conduct. At the neighbouring city of Winterthur, which did not apply the ban, Furtwängler's visit evoked a hostile demonstration.

After a long delay the post of Swiss Minister in Paris has been filled by the appointment of Professor Karl Burckhardt, former President of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The Soviet Trade Union delegation has found it impossible, owing to its fixed itinerary, to accept the invitations of the Swiss Trade Unionists to visit Switzerland.

SPAIN.

When, some twenty years before the sailing of the Armada, Philip II was casting an eager eye on the throne of Portugal, he looked round for all the support he could muster. So he approached Fray Luís de Granada, the confessor of the Portuguese Queen Mother, who was to become one of the great masters of Spanish mysticism. Luís de Granada replied that as a Castilian he would do all he could to further the ambition of the King, but that as a priest his functions were limited to beseeching God that He should endorse the dreams of his sovereign. General Franco has no ambitions in Portugal, but he does covet the continuation of the Caudilloship. And since here, as elsewhere, the right to a position is no more than the power to maintain it, Franco, like Philip II, looks about him. He now knows—and it has cost him something to arrive at this solid, severely intellectual conclusion—that Nazi Germany is beaten and is going to be destroyed. So he turns to Great Britain. But his blandishment fails, even though he may brazenly hint that the Prime Minister's reply to his amazing letter is an "open door" to friendly discussion. Then he lifts an eye westward, hoping as a Falangist that—

"not by eastern windows only When daylight comes, comes in the light," and tries to cozen the United States of America with soft sooth about "Hispanity." Newspaper articles and broadcasts explain that Spain is forced to turn towards the United States because she has been misunderstood in Great Britain. All sorts of reasons are given. For instance, there is the sentimental argument that Great Britain has many friends in Spain, but that Anglophile sympathies would dry up if she were to interfere in Spanish affairs; and there is the practical one that the Americans appreciate better than the British the serious plight in which Europe would find herself should Spain, through internal disorder, cease to be the economic bridge for supplies to the devastated continent. But these fail too. (European attempts to play off Great Britain against the United States have not succeeded since the failure at the Washington Conference in 1921). The State Department, backed by American opinion, do not rise to the Spanish fly, and Franco will have to think again.

Another tactical move is seen in a statement of Señor Carceller, Minister of Commerce, published last week in the Barcelona newspaper Vanguardia, on the willingness of Spain to co-operate "for the sake of solidarity" in the reconstruction of Europe—provided, of course, that "the international organisations which finance the schemes be successful in readjusting prices so as to facilitate the export of the required products." And when Señor Carceller says readjust, he does not mean lower the prices of the Spanish textiles which, owing to the shortage of shipping, would, if carried in Spanish vessels, be most useful in helping to supply the needs of the liberated countries. Once shipping is available to transport raw material, Allied requirements could be met from the resources of the Allied textile industries alone.

ITALY.

Discussions have been taking place in Washington as to the most practical way of fulfilling the joint declaration made at Hyde Park on the 26th September last by Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt which announced that, subject to the maintenance of law and order and the administration of justice, more control would gradually be granted to the Italian Government. The Supreme Allied Commander, Field-Marshal Sir Harold Alexander, has now been directed to give effect to these measures. Subject, therefore, to the demands of the campaign in Italy, the Italian Government is to have a free hand in matters of day-to-day administration and, in general, the rôle of the Allied Commission will be one of advice and consultation rather than one of control. Communications between the Italian Government and other Governments, with which the latter has diplomatic relations, may proceed directly instead of through the Allied Commission, but the Allied Commission is to be informed of any negotiations between the Italian Government and foreign Governments. The approval of the Allied Commission will no longer be necessary for the passing of laws and decrees or for the appointment of officials except in the case of certain appointments of military importance. Allied regional officers in areas under Italian jurisdiction are to be withdrawn as quickly as possible and local elections in these areas will be encouraged. Italian prisoners of war in Italy, with the exception of those who fought for the Germans after the Armistice, are to be released from their status as such, subject to the Italian Government giving satisfactory assurances that their services are available for work in connexion with the war when necessary. Steps are to be taken to resume cultural relations by means of the exchange of books and publications devoted to science, politics, philosophy and art, and every possible facility is to be given to visits, to and from Italy and the United Nations, of professional men, artists and scholars. As regards the economic side, the Supreme Allied Commander's directions are founded on the understanding that the Italian Government will build up a fair and efficient system of control and distribution of the consumption of the country's resources as well as imports and also do everything possible to improve production. In view of the needs of the armed forces, imports will, unavoidably, depend on available shipping. Subject to the above considerations, civilians are to receive additional kinds of goods for their essential needs, and the supply of these goods will form part of the military supply programme. The Italian Government will, in addition, be helped by the Allied Commission in drawing up a programme of the supplies necessary for the rehabilitation of Italian agriculture and industry. The resulting imports, which will be over and above the military programme, will be covered by the financial arrangements referred to in President Roosevelt's statement of the 10th October. Finally, as regards the granting of more responsibility to the Italian Government on financial matters, discussions are now taking place between the British and United States Governments.

Subsequently, in announcing these concessions at a Press Conference, Mr. Macmillan made a short review of the situation in Italy since the Armistice. Mr. Macmillan drew attention to the speed with which the Allies had begun the task of reconstruction, despite the fact that the war in Italy was still in progress. This was because they understood Italy's enslavement under Fascism and afterwards under Germany. Although Italy had gone through a dismal period of waiting, that time had not been wasted because the Italian Government had been gradually built up and increased authority had, by degrees, been granted to it. Mr. Macmillan then explained the difficulties in the way of implementing Italy's oft-repeated demands for an increased share in the war against Germany. The Italian force, now in the field, had been equipped by the Allies but owing to the enormous demands for our armies in other theatres, shipping had not been available for any further commitments. It was due to this shortage of shipping, Mr. Macmillan explained, that the uniform ration of 300 grammes of bread for Southern Italy had been delayed. This ration, was, however, now to be increased to the promised 300 grammes as from the 1st March. Mr. Macmillan finished by saying that, when the difficulties with which the Allies had been faced were understood, he was of the opinion that it would be generally agreed that Great Britain and the United States had nothing to reproach themselves with, either with the spirit in which our representatives had tackled their task or with the efficiency with which they had carried it out.

News from North Italy this week is scrappy and in some instances self-contradictory. For example, Mussolini received a delegation of workers from Padua, led by the Head of the Province, who recounted in some detail the progress made in Padua Province towards putting into effect Mussolini's socialisation schemes. Yet it must be clear to all concerned that such long-term plans are unlikely to come to fruition. Similarly, the socialisation of more industrial concerns is announced; yet Swiss reports state that work in some of these concerns is practically at a standstill—Fiat is particularly mentioned in this connexion.

Two Fascist Republican Ministers have resigned. They are Guido Buffarini-Guidi, Minister of the Interior, and Admiral Giuseppe Sparzani, Under-Secretary for the Navy. The latter's post has naturally been something of a sinecure, but Buffarini-Guidi's position is important, and it is only surprising that he has been allowed to remain in it so long, in view of the frequent rumours that he was attempting to make good his escape to Switzerland. He is said to be a personal friend of Mussolini, which may have kept him in office till now. According to anti-Fascist circles, he is accused of having under-estimated the seriousness of the resistance movement. He is now succeeded by one of the few "coming men" of the Italian Social Republic, Dr. Paolo Zerbino, formerly Under-Secretary to the Ministry of the Interior and High Commissioner for Piedmont Province, where, according to the Fascists, he has "practically eliminated" the partisan danger.

Mussolini has permitted the formation of an opposition group within the Italian Social Republic, to be known as the National Socialist Republican Group. This group is headed by Dr. Edmondo Cione, of Milan, whose ideas for a new Nationalist Party had already received some attention from Mussolini last autumn.

THE VATICAN.

On the 23rd February the Vatican broadcast in German a Statement by the Roman Catholic Hierarchies of England and Wales and of Scotland on the "principles of a just and lasting peace." It follows very closely the Pope's great Xmas Eve message and invites comparison with the United States Hierarchy's pronouncement after Dumbarton Oaks (see Summary No. 269 under "Vatican"). The three form parts of a sustained Catholic campaign to build an order in which man's rights derive "not from membership of any State or party, but from membership of the human family; in which Christian and eternal standards of truth prevail over mind-disintegrating propaganda; in which statesmen recognise their democratic obligation to educate and inform the people they exist to serve, warning them" in particular of any commitments they wish to propose for them to undertake; in which there is agreement not only on basic principles but also on the meaning of words. British and United States hierarchies are at one in pushing the acceptance of a world community to its logical conclusion and rejecting as untrue "the often repeated claim that its régime is the private affair of each nation." And point 7 of the British statement argues logically that true internationalism must regard "nations which refuse to allow their nationals to visit the outside world and receive ideas from abroad as wreckers of harmony in the whole world family." One further quotation confirms the breadth of this Catholic care for freedom: "During the war the liberation of citizens from foreign oppression has often meant subjugation to fresh oppression, either of foreigners or of native ideologists. With dismal regularity we have seen Christian families raise their heads in hope only to be crushed again by politicians determined to control their whole life."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

There have been no appreciable movements on the front in Hungary. In Liberated Hungary, Miklos, the Premier, Gyongyössy and others have addressed meetings, and the Budapest National Committee has met. Recruiting for the new Hungarian army is in full swing. The Budapest People's Tribunal has passed more death sentences and more war criminals have been arrested, including a gendarmerie officer accused of responsibility for the Novisad massacre of January 1942. Miklos, the Premier, has stated that the draft of the Land Reform Bill is now complete, and will be submitted to the next Cabinet meeting. The higher Catholic clergy are reported to have asked their flocks to co-operate with the Soviet authorities, and this has provoked an outburst of fury from Szálasi Hungary.

The Arrow Cross Foreign Minister has visited his opposite number in Zagreb. The communiqué reported full agreement, particularly on questions of minorities and frontier traffic. The supply position in Szálasi Hungary seems to be acute, and drastic requisitioning has been enacted to meet shortages.

Debrecen sources report that the Smallholders' leader, Bajcsy-Zsilinsky, has been murdered by his guards in prison.

The British Military and Political Mission has now arrived in Hungary.

Roumania.

In order to appreciate the latest phase of Roumanian affairs, the background is of greater significance than the actual events of the past week. It was understood from the start that Roumania was to be a country in which the U.S.S.R. "took the lead." A tripartite control commission was set up on which the function of Great Britain and the United States was to watch the course of events, to safeguard the commercial interests of their own countries, and to be "informed" beforehand, but not "consulted," about any important steps which the U.S.S.R. proposed to take. The British members of the Commission have found it an increasingly up-hill job to keep au fait with the U.S.S.R. moves. In the past, whenever anything happened which on the face of it looked like a display of high-handedness on the part of the U.S.S.R., the tendency has been to excuse it by attributing what was done to excessive zeal on the part of local Soviet officials, without any backing from Moscow. It must be admitted, however, that during the past few weeks this explanation has worn a bit thin. It is increasingly difficult to feel that what is happening is taking place without deliberate intention.

Since the 23rd August, 1944, the tiny Communist clique in Roumania has set itself to gain control of the country. All the usual phrases are employed in speeches and in the press about "democratic institutions," the "will of the people," "Fascist scum" (see the Soviet Summary on articles in Pravda). The fact is that most Roumanians have a cordial detestation of communism that they have not for many years had an opportunity of expressing their will, and being largely illiterate, would not know how to do it if they had. Communist agitators have been able to stir up a lot of trouble. Two factors have aided them. It is beyond question that at the start the Governments of General Sanatescu did not set themselves wholeheartedly to carry out the conditions of the Armistice. They tried to be too clever by half, and by so doing they played into the hands of the Soviet authorities, who could accuse them with justice of evading their obligations. The scales were also heavily weighted in favour of the Communists by the suppression of all liberal papers while Communist papers which have reprinted anti-Allied diatribes, are permitted to continue publication. Air Vice-Marshal Stevenson raised the question of freedom of the press at the last meeting of the Allied Control Commission and was promised an improvement. The Government claimed to have been deprived of the only forces on which it could rely for the preservation of order by their removal to the front. The forces at their disposal were certainly reduced, but their claim appears to have been exaggerated, since although the Communists had obtained a quantity of arms they were worsted in such disturbances as have taken place.

The whole situation has taken a turn for the worse since the arrival at the end of January of M. Pavlov as Soviet Political Representative.

On the 11th February, after the return of Mrs. Pauker, the Communist agitator from Moscow, the Prime Minister broadcast to the nation and addressed a meeting in Bucharest (see Summary No. 280). Communist efforts on the occasion resulted in a distinct score for General Radescu. It was obvious that the Communists would not sit down under this rebuff. A demonstration by the N.D.F. was fixed for the 24th February and there were rumours that it would develop into an insurrection. Meanwhile interviews took place between the Prime Minister and M. Pavlov. Members of the Roumanian Government have alleged that Pavlov was overbearing and truculent and attempted to wear down General Radescu's resistance and to force his resignation. Subsequent developments make it highly probable that this was so.

Then, on the 20th February, an " incident " occurred at the Malăxa works in Bucharest. The employees resented the setting up of a self-elected committee of Communists and expelled them. They then proceeded to elect a committee by ballot in which the Communists obtained 60 votes as against 3,750. On the following morning a number of armed Communists arrived with Dl Gheorghiu-Dej, the Minister of Communications, and some firing took place in which a labour leader was wounded. A totally different version of the incident has been issued by the N.D.F. and has appeared in the majority of Moscow papers, and, judging by the reports which have appeared elsewhere, the Communists seem also to have ready access to the foreign press.

The demonstration fixed for the 24th February duly took place. Shots were fired at the Palace, and at the Ministry of the Interior and the Police Headquarters but order was restored before any serious clash occurred. Subsequently the Prime Minister broadcast a speech the substance of which was that the Government would remain at their posts to prevent the nation being " subdued by a few nonentities, under the mask of democracy." One result is that Admiral Bogdenko, in the absence of Pavlov and Vinogradov, who have gone to Moscow, has insisted that all broadcasts shall in future be submitted to Soviet censorship.

Meanwhile the British and United States Ambassadors in Moscow informed the Soviet Government of their Governments' concern at the present situation and their anxiety that interference in Roumanian internal affairs should not result in the assumption of power by a minority group. M. Molotov replied that these representations did not correspond with the facts of the situation, that the Radescu Government was controlled by Fascists and that the N.D.F. had wide popular support. He added that the Soviet Government had no wish to intervene in Roumanian internal affairs but could not tolerate disorder on the lines of communication of the Red army.

M. Vishinski arrived in Bucharest on the 27th February and at once had an audience of the King. Since midnight on the 28th February a good deal has happened. M. Vishinsky pressed strongly for the dismissal of General Radescu, who has resigned. Prince Stirbey, who was received by the King on the 26th February, on the 1st March reluctantly accepted the premiership.

Yugoslavia.

Field-Marshal Alexander arrived in Belgrade on the 21st February and spent four days in military consultations with Marshal Tito.

The agreement of Tito and Shubashitch on the three Regents has not been easy to obtain. They were agreed on Sernec, the Slovene. Shubashitch proposed Shutej as a Croat, and Grol, the leader of the Democratic party, as a Serbian. Both of these were unacceptable to Tito, who proposed Manditch as a Croat, and either General Simovitch or Professor Belitch, president of the Serbian Academy of Science, a non-political figure, whom the enemy propaganda describes as a Hungarian Jew, Sandor Weisz. Shubashitch took the line that the Tito-Shubashitch Agreement could not be implemented without the King's consent. He was reminded that the Crimean Conference's recommendation was addressed to him and Tito, not to the King. On the 26th Shubashitch agreed to accept Manditch; while Shutej was to enter the Government, together with the four other Ministers from London. For a Serb Regent Shubashitch has agreed to, and recommended to King Peter, one of the following four: Professor Belitch; Dr. S. Budisavljevitch, who was leader of the Independent Democrats, a party of Serbs of Croatia (he resigned from the Yugoslav Government in March 1941 rather than agree to the signing of the treaty with Germany. After the coup d'État of the 27th March, 1941, he became Minister of the Interior, and remained in office in London till June 1943. He is generally respected. But, as he does not come from Serbia his appointment might be unwelcome to Serbians); Dr. Obrad Blagojevitch, president of the Corporation of Barristers (he was said by the Neditch press to have gone into hiding after the collapse of the Partisan " Republic of Uzhice " in 1941 and to have been arrested by Neditch troops in 1943. In November 1944 he became the Partisan Deputy Commissar for Finance); Dr. Kirilo Savitch, a professor of Belgrade University Concerning the Crimea Conference's recommendation that members of the last Yugoslav Parliament should enter AVNOJ, Borba has criticised such members on the grounds that most of them never had any considerable popular support and have collaborated with the foreign invaders or with Pavelitch, or Neditch, or Mihailovitch or Rupnik. It was stated that a committee would examine the records of all such members.

Two Serbian political groups have lately adhered to the Partisans; a number of members of the former " Napred " group, i.e., Democrats who supported the federalisation of Yugoslavia, and Dragoljub Jovanovitch's Peasant Party, the Left wing of the Serbian Agrarians. Jovanovitch has long been in friendly relations with the Partisans and his policy of Russophilism, of socialism for the towns and co-operatives for the peasants, should facilitate his party's entry into the National Liberation Front.

Between the 9th December and the 17th January the press reported the execution of 96 persons and prison sentences on 38 others. Rumour places the figures far higher. What appears certain is that a considerable number of persons is in the custody of the secret police (OZNA), and that fear of OZNA causes many to avoid contact with foreigners.

With regard to the possibility of a Yugoslav-Bulgarian alliance, Tito has been informed that, in the British Government's opinion, an enemy State, and one with undischarged obligations to Greece, must be debarred from concluding a treaty with another State without the explicit approval of all the Allies with whom the Bulgarian armistice was made.

The temperature is reported to be rising on the Græco-Yugoslav frontier. The Partisan leaders in Yugoslav Macedonia discourage any public demand for Greek territory or support of ELAS. But there is much coming and going across the frontier.

On the 20th February Borba had a leading article entitled " Imperialist intrigues," demanding Venezia Giulia for Yugoslavia and especially attacking Italian proposals for an autonomous Slav area within Italy. A second article demanded the trial, as " war criminals," of Italian officials who took measures against the Yugoslav irredentist leaders in the area.

Greece.

On the 13th February General Simon Vlachos was sworn in as Under-Secretary of the Interior, with a seat in the Cabinet and control over Public Security independent of the Minister of the Interior. General Plastiras made this appointment without consulting his Minister of the Interior, M. Pericles Rallis, who immediately hastened to deny that a Security Ministry had been created; the police and gendarmerie, he said, were still under the Ministry of the Interior. A Ministry of Public Security is, of course, associated in the mind of the public with the Metaxas régime and the methods of M. Maniadakis. Further, M. Rallis, as a signatory of the agreement with ELAS, felt a personal responsibility for seeing that its provisions, and particularly those connected with public security, were duly carried out; he strongly objected to the creation of this special post, which was, to say the least of it, unfortunate. General Plastiras thereupon brusquely informed him that his services were no longer required, and M. Rallis resigned. It seemed at first likely that the other two signatories of the Varkiza agreement, MM. Sophianopoulos and Makropoulos, would also resign, so precipitating a political crisis, but in the end they did not do so, and, rather than provoke a serious crisis over one resignation, the Regent reluctantly agreed to the appointment of General Vlachos and to General Plastiras himself taking over the Ministry of the Interior. MM. Zevgos and Partsalidis, who, with other leading Communists, have now returned to Athens, called on M. Sophianopoulos to express their concern at the creation of the new Under-Secretariate, and there is no doubt that in many quarters grave doubts are felt as to the wisdom of the step taken by the Prime Minister, a step which he has now followed up by placing the Athens police and gendarmerie under the control of the Military Governor of Attica. Nevertheless, public opinion in Athens still appears to be in favour of General Plastiras remaining Prime Minister, believing that his continuance in office is a guarantee against further outbreaks by the Extreme Left.

Owing to the illness of the Regent, his proposed visit to Salonica had to be postponed, and he is now due to arrive there on the 27th. Meantime, he has received a message from Mr. Churchill thanking him for the reception accorded by the Greek people to Mr. Eden and himself on their recent visit to Athens and expressing confidence that Greece will regain peace and prosperity under his wise leadership.

On the 21st February, before a special tribunal, the trial opened of thirty-three persons accused of collaborating with the enemy. In fact, only twenty-five of those named in the various indictments were in court. Of the three Puppet Premiers accused, one had escaped to Germany, as had three other Ministers; one of the accused was assassinated before liberation, two were recently executed by E.L.A.S., and one is still in Egypt. The first four days of the trial, which appears likely to last some weeks, were taken up by several of the numerous counsel for the defence pleading to jurisdiction; in the case of only two of the accused, however, has the tribunal admitted that it is incompetent to try them.

Albania.

His Majesty's Government have informed Enver Hoxha, through the British liaison officer at Tirana, that they cannot recognise any Albanian Government until the internal situation becomes more stabilised, but that the offer to send a British military mission to him still stands.

F.N.Ç. headquarters recently complained that in early February the Royal Navy on three occasions stopped and searched Albanian vessels off Sarande (Santi Quaranta), and that one of these vessels was carrying F.N.Ç. troops. It has been explained to F.N.Ç. that the Royal Navy, which has been patrolling this area in order to prevent the infiltration of arms into Corfu, has for purposes of investigation twice sent ships into Sarande and once landed a party south of the town, and a promise has been given that in future no landings will be made on Albanian territory.

From a recent article in the F.N.Ç. paper it seems clear that the provisional Government contemplates drastic agrarian reform, especially in northern and central Albania. How, it is asked, can Albania be a democratic State if most of the land is in the hands of only three or four hundred families? The day of feudalism is over, and the farms of the Beys who have oppressed the people and been the tools of the enemy must be given at once to the peasants.

Bulgaria.

In a dozen provincial places the People's Courts which have been hearing charges of persecution of the partisans have sentenced another 440 persons to death, more than another 100 to life imprisonment and others to less severe penalties. Among the condemned were a few civil administrators, but most were officers and men belonging to the army, gendarmerie and police. Death sentences were carried out at once, and few of those arraigned were acquitted. Replying to the charge of savagery, made "mostly abroad," the Fatherland Front paper declared that the process of purification continued and would continue, as the Bulgarian people had decided to rid itself of Fascism for ever. Considerable publicity was given to the unanimity with which two doctors and two archimandrites who were charged with testifying against Russia after their visit to Katyn or Vinnitsa, were now reported to have recanted and declared that both affairs were a German fake.

The order calling to the colours Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, who recently thought it wise to withdraw from the leadership of the Agrarian Party, was no doubt issued at the Communists' instigation as a means of eliminating still further their strongest potential rival. The order was revoked by the Minister of War, Colonel Velchev, who belongs to the Tsveno Party, on the ground that no other professional democratic politician had been victimised. All the same, the Communists seem to be in a fair way of encompassing the dissolution of the Agrarian Party, for Petkov, who, in deference to the Communists, was chosen as the new leader of the Agrarians, is so incompetent and so little trusted by the peasants that some of them may secede to the Communists. The Government talks—no doubt with Soviet approval—of holding elections in the near future. If, in compliance with the Crimea resolutions and contrary to all Bulgarian practice, the elections were genuinely free, the result could hardly be other than an Agrarian victory. But a new electoral law is being drafted, and it remains to be seen what devices Communist influence will introduce for the discomfiture of the Agrarians.

Early in February the Bulgarian Exarchate sent delegates to Istanbul to try to induce the Œcumenical Patriarchate to recognise the autocephalous Bulgarian Church. The successful conclusion of the negotiations ends a schism which, involving no point of doctrine, began in 1872, before the creation of Bulgaria. At that time Bulgarian-inhabited territory was part of Turkey, and the Œcumenical Patriarch refused to recognise the establishment of a Bulgarian Exarchate within his province. But since Bulgaria has been an independent country there has been no good reason for a schism which has served to embitter Bulgar-Greek relations. It is reported that the Œcumenical Patriarch did not entirely reject the suggestion that the Bulgarian Exarch might later be made a Patriarch, and that the reconciliation was followed by a mass at the Phanar which consular representatives of the Soviet Union, Roumania and Yugoslavia attended.

Turkey.

On the 20th February Sir Maurice Peterson informed the Turkish Government of the decision taken at Yalta that if Turkey had declared war on Germany and Japan by the 1st March and if immediately thereafter she subscribed to the United Nations Declaration, she would be invited to the San Francisco Conference. With a promptness which was in marked contrast with her vacillation on previous occasions Turkey took this modest plunge or, as her Prime Minister called it, "historic decision" on the 23rd February when the Grand National Assembly in special session went through the motions of unanimously and formally approving the step. Comment in the debate and in the press left little doubt about the gratification felt by the Turkish Government at the prospect of having its say in the reorganisation of the world. Turkish participation in the war is unlikely to be active, and remarks like that of M. Yalçin in Tanin that "the whole Turkish nation is prepared to die for Turkish freedom and independence" only help to justify the derision which the Turkish declaration has provoked in some quarters abroad.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Less than four months after the murder of Lord Moyne, Ahmad Maher Pasha, the Egyptian Prime Minister, has been likewise assassinated in Cairo. This time the murderer was an Egyptian, a young nationalist lawyer named Mahmoud Issawi, who is said to have been interned since the early days of the war for pro-Axis sympathies, and to have been released recently by orders of the Prime Minister himself. According to Makram Pasha the assassin said that there were twenty others like himself ready to kill any Egyptian Prime Minister who declared war. It may therefore be assumed that, however strange it may appear at this stage of the war, the Government's decision to declare war was the motive for the crime. The steps that led to this decision were as follows.

It was decided at the Crimea Conference that, in addition to the United Nations as they existed on the 9th February, only those should be invited to San Francisco which, being already "associated nations," should have declared war before the 1st March, 1945, and adhered to the United Nations declaration. It was agreed that all the "associated nations" should be told the position and given a chance to qualify, and this was undertaken by His Majesty's Government in the case of Egypt. No pressure whatever was brought to bear, but the Egyptian Cabinet did not take long to make up its mind in favour of declaring war.

Instead, however, of issuing the declaration before informing Parliament, the Prime Minister decided to inform the Chamber on the 24th February, and to ask for a vote of confidence. The debate in the Chamber proved longer than was expected, and the Prime Minister left to inform the Senate that there would be some delay. It was while he was on his way to the Senate that he was shot in the Pharaonic Hall, which lies between the two Houses. Although, therefore, at the moment of the Prime Minister's death the royal rescript on the declaration of war was already signed, its submission to Parliament was still uncompleted. The new Prime Minister has, however, since completed the task, and Egypt declared war against Germany and Japan on the 26th February.

Ever since the negotiation of the Anglo-Egyptian treaty of 1936, in which he took a helpful and prominent part, Ahmad Maher Pasha has shown himself a consistently loyal ally. Only a few days before his death he told His Majesty's Ambassador that he was striving for the same democratic ideology as we, namely, the extirpation of Nazism and Fascism and all that they stood for. It is an irony of fate that Ahmad Maher should himself fall a victim to an assassin in Cairo nineteen years after his own trial—as some think, not without good reason—for complicity in the murder campaign that involved the death—among others—of Sir Lee Stack. He has been succeeded as Prime Minister by his Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mahmoud Nokrashi. The only changes made in the Cabinet are that Nokrashi takes over the Ministry of the Interior while remaining Minister for Foreign Affairs. Nokrashi has for long been a close friend of Ahmad Maher, and was indeed arrested and tried at the same time as the late Prime Minister for complicity in the murder campaign, but was acquitted for lack of evidence.

Less than four months after the murder of Lord Moyne, Ahmad Maher Pasha, the Egyptian Prime Minister, has been likewise assassinated in Cairo. This time the murderer was an Egyptian, a young nationalist lawyer named Mahmoud Issawi, who is said to have been interned since the early days of the war for pro-Axis sympathies, and to have been released recently by orders of the Prime Minister himself. According to Makram Pasha the assassin said that there were twenty others like himself ready to kill any Egyptian Prime Minister who declared war. It may therefore be assumed that, however strange it may appear at this stage of the war, the Government's decision to declare war was the motive for the crime. The steps that led to this decision were as follows.

It was decided at the Crimea Conference that, in addition to the United Nations as they existed on the 9th February, only those should be invited to San Francisco which, being already "associated nations," should have declared war before the 1st March, 1945, and adhered to the United Nations declaration. It was agreed that all the "associated nations" should be told the position and given a chance to qualify, and this was undertaken by His Majesty's Government in the case of Egypt. No pressure whatever was brought to bear, but the Egyptian Cabinet did not take long to make up its mind in favour of declaring war.

Instead, however, of issuing the declaration before informing Parliament, the Prime Minister decided to inform the Chamber on the 24th February, and to ask for a vote of confidence. The debate in the Chamber proved longer than was expected, and the Prime Minister left to inform the Senate that there would be some delay. It was while he was on his way to the Senate that he was shot in the Pharaonic Hall, which lies between the two Houses. Although, therefore, at the moment of the Prime Minister's death the royal rescript on the declaration of war was already signed, its submission to Parliament was still uncompleted. The new Prime Minister has, however, since completed the task, and Egypt declared war against Germany and Japan on the 26th February.

Ever since the negotiation of the Anglo-Egyptian treaty of 1936, in which he took a helpful and prominent part, Ahmad Maher Pasha has shown himself a consistently loyal ally. Only a few days before his death he told His Majesty's Ambassador that he was striving for the same democratic ideology as we, namely, the extirpation of Nazism and Fascism and all that they stood for. It is an irony of fate that Ahmad Maher should himself fall a victim to an assassin in Cairo nineteen years after his own trial—as some think, not without good reason—for complicity in the murder campaign that involved the death—among others—of Sir Lee Stack. He has been succeeded as Prime Minister by his Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mahmoud Nokrashi. The only changes made in the Cabinet are that Nokrashi takes over the Ministry of the Interior while remaining Minister for Foreign Affairs. Nokrashi has for long been a close friend of Ahmad Maher, and was indeed arrested and tried at the same time as the late Prime Minister for complicity in the murder campaign, but was acquitted for lack of evidence.

The Wafd was not slow to announce its strong opposition to the proposed declaration of war. On the 25th February the Wafd issued a statement to the effect that successive Egyptian Governments had decided not to enter the war, and that Egypt had rendered to the Allies all possible help, even in excess of that laid down by the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. The statement goes on to point out the supposed dangers of Egypt's becoming a belligerent, possibly necessitating the despatch of an Egyptian expeditionary force. The statement makes out that Egyptian aspirations are mainly confined to "the abolition of treaty restrictions and the completion of independence," which is a matter that should be settled between Egypt and Great Britain alone. It ends by asserting that the Wafd has therefore decided not to agree to a declaration of war; to warn the Government not to commit itself on the question; and to transmit its decision to King Farouk, to the Egyptian Prime Minister and to the representatives of the three Great Powers. There is, however, no reason to connect the Wafd with the murder of Ahmad Maher: indeed they have publicly denounced the crime.

Brief reference was made last week to the talks held between, on the one side, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden during their recent visit to Egypt, and, on the other, King Farouk, Ibn Saud, Haile Selassie and Shukri Quwatli, respectively. These meetings were arranged primarily for reasons of courtesy. President Roosevelt had wished to take the opportunity of meeting Ibn Saud and Haile Selassie and had invited them accordingly. Mr. Churchill was naturally glad to avail himself of their presence in Egypt for meeting them subsequently, and also of having a talk with King Farouk and the Syrian President. The conversations were general in character, and no decisions of political importance were either envisaged or reached. They covered many of the topics of major interest in the Middle East, but no new views on them were expressed by any side.

Meanwhile the "sub-committee" of Arab Ministers for Foreign Affairs has continued its discussions in Cairo for the constitution of the proposed League of Arab States. There has been some difference of opinion between Iraq and Saudi Arabia over one point in the Alexandria Protocol, but apparently a satisfactory compromise has been reached. The Lebanese delegation has been chiefly anxious to emphasise the independence of Lebanon, and to combat any attempt to impose an Arab Union that might compromise Lebanese freedom to act independently of the League.

The discussions that Mr. Churchill held in Cairo with the President of Syria have, it seems, borne good fruit. In an interview on the 23rd February with His Majesty's Minister, Shukri Quwatli said that he would carefully consider the French proposals, when they were submitted, but hoped that they would be soon ready and that in the interval the French would refrain from staging military parades or otherwise acting provocatively. Shukri also raised the time-worn questions of equipment for the gendarmerie, and the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales, both of which matters he hoped would be discussed by us with M. Bidault in London. Shukri seems genuinely anxious to make a settlement with the French as long as it will not affect Syria's independence, but he is clearly determined not to grant any pre-eminent position to France. Much will depend on the way in which the French deal with the question themselves. If there is further undue delay, or if the French proposals are unreasonable, there may well be a return to the original impasse. In that event the position would be very unpromising.

The Syrian Government has decided to declare war on Germany, no doubt in the hope that Syria will be invited to participate in the San Francisco conference. The Syrian President, however, has been informed that his country is not to receive an invitation to the conference even if she does declare war, as she is not included in the list of States agreed at Yalta as qualifying for invitation. The same argument applies to the Lebanon, which intends to follow suit. No other reason has been given, but it would appear that, as the Levant States are still technically under mandate, difficulties might have arisen with France on that score, were they to have been included. Nevertheless, by declaring war the two States will have clarified their position as belligerents, which up to now has been held in some quarters to be in doubt.

Ibn Saud returned to Jedda on the 20th February in good spirits and much pleased at having met Mr. Churchill in Egypt. The question of Saudi Arabia being invited to San Francisco was discussed at Yalta. Saudi Arabia is not included in the official list of "associated nations," but she is in our opinion entitled to special consideration, owing both to her refusal in 1940 to receive a German Minister and to the friendship and help she has accorded to the cause of the United Nations. At the Crimea Conference M. Molotov opposed the participation of Saudi Arabia, but has since agreed that, if Saudi Arabia were to qualify by declaring war before the 1st March, and adhering to the United Nations declaration, she should be asked to attend the conference at San Francisco. However, Ibn Saud, to whom the advantages have been fully explained, has not yet decided to take action in the sense contemplated. It is still uncertain, therefore, whether Saudi Arabia will be represented at San Francisco.

THE FAR EAST.

Domei on the 21st February announced that Sotaro Ishiwata, previously Finance Minister, had been appointed Chief Secretary to the Cabinet and Minister of State without Portfolio. Hisatada Hirose had been relieved of these two posts, which he had held for only eleven days (see this Summary, No. 280). The new Finance Minister is Juichi Tsushima, previously the president of the North China Development Company. Yutaka Tanaka, Director of the Revenue Bureau of the Ministry of Finance, has become Vice-Minister of Finance; for the time being he remains Revenue Director as well.

Domei (22nd February) said that there was considerable significance in the latest Cabinet reshuffle because it concerned the vitally important post of Chief Secretary of the Cabinet, the holder of which was now also "Chief of Staff of the War Cabinet"—meaning presumably the Supreme Defence Council on which the Prime Minister and a selection of his colleagues sit with the Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs. Ishiwata was Chief Secretary to the Yonai Cabinet from January to July 1940; he has twice held the Ministry of Finance; he has also been Secretary-General of the Taisei Yokusankai, and Supreme Economic Adviser to the Nanking Government. He is thus a bigger political figure than is Hirose. There may be some significance in the fact that both Ishiwata and Tsushima have held high office in connexion with Japanese economic policy in China, which is at present undergoing another overhaul.

Koiso is endeavouring to remedy the various deficiencies in his Administration, which were the subject of criticisms in the recent session of the Diet. He has set up a War-time Price Investigation Committee, to replace the former Central Price Committee; he himself is chairman and Ishiwata vice-chairman of the new committee. It remains to be seen whether the new body will have more success than its predecessor in reducing black market activities and in providing adequate supplies, especially if certain food-stuffs, at reasonable prices.

Domei (23rd February) reported that a War Construction Corporation would be set up, which would have a management appointed by the Government from among private concerns, and whose functions would include the construction or removal of important war enterprises, except those under the direct operation of the military or civil authorities. Presumably the chief task of the new organisation will be the dispersal in face of air raids of all enterprises engaged on war production, but still under private management. Government control over shipping is to be further enhanced by the establishment of a Shipping Management Corporation; in view of the critical shipping situation the opposition to this scheme on the part of some shipping companies has been overcome (Domei, 24th February).

The desperate struggle for Iwojima continues; Japanese accounts have been full of the fanatical resistance of the garrison troops, and the heavy losses by land and sea which they claim to have inflicted upon the Americans. Domei (21st February) said that every inch of the island was strongly defended and criss-crossed with gun emplacements, pillboxes, blockhouses, tunnels and shelters. Iwojima was too small for an invading force to carry out any outflanking tactics; the Americans were compelled to make a frontal attack on the defences, and must therefore be prepared for heavy losses. The Japanese allege that the American losses up to the evening of the 23rd February were over 17,000 killed and wounded. Domei on the 26th February referred to the Japanese 1,000-pound rocket bomb, and said that the shock it caused was all the greater because, unlike the German V weapon, the new Japanese bomb was actively used in front-line engagements.

The Japanese Government-General of Korea have established a war-time industrial headquarters, composed of four sections, to enhance the output of war industries and to co-ordinate central and local economic activities. As a conciliatory gesture to the Korean people and probably also to encourage the migration of Korean labourers to Japan, the special restrictions on Koreans travelling to Japan are to be abolished and Koreans are henceforth to come under the same regulations as Japanese with regard to travel within the Empire.

The Chungking Radio (22nd February) said that a Korean revolutionary, whose name was given as Lee Ping-chan, had arrived in Chungking from Seoul. Lee said that an underground force of 300,000 had been organised in Korea and was awaiting its opportunity. He further declared that since the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese conflict 200,000 Koreans had been arrested by the Japanese for alleged revolutionary activities; of these, 70,000 were still in jail. Lee remarked that the Korean revolutionary army in Manchuria would play an important part in the final liberation of Korea. According to him there were in December, 1944, 3,800 factories in Korea engaged on war production; they turned out arms, aircraft, shipping, motor vehicles and uniforms and accounted for 35 per cent. or more of the total war production of the Japanese Empire.

The Chinese Communists are taking an interest in Korea; on the 5th February a Korean Revolutionary Military School was formally inaugurated in Yenan. Lin Tzu-han, chairman of the Communist Border Administration, Chu Teh, and Susumu Okano, the Communist leader of the Japanese Emancipation League, were among those who attended the ceremony. Chu Teh said that the Korean revolutionaries should learn how to establish a national united front against the Japanese and to establish their own armed forces to fight for national independence and liberation. Okano declared that the liberated Korea and Japan of the future would be brother-countries on a footing of equality and help. It is unlikely that a liberated Korea under Communist auspices would be welcome to Chungking; on the 26th February Chungking Radio said that a group of young Koreans in Chungking had organised the "Korean Democratic Party" to organise guerrilla warfare in Korea. This may be intended as an offset to the Communist activities. The Korean Provisional Government, which is patronised, though not officially recognised, by the Chinese Government, is formed out of an alliance of four parties, of which the Conservative Korean Independence Party is the largest; the Communists have a minority representation.

The Chinese Press has voiced alarm lest the failure to achieve an understanding between the Kuomintang and Communist Parties should prejudice China's independence and equality of status. The Ta Kung Pao (the 20th February) said that, if China failed to achieve internal unity, she would sink to the level of a colony. The Kuo Min Kung Pao of the same date said that, if it depended on China's own efforts whether she shared in making the decisions which would be arrived at during the San Francisco Conference, or whether she would have decisions made for her. The Yi Shih Pao (the 21st February) feared that liberation committees might be set up in foreign countries "in the name of the so-called nations" in the border area of Chinese territory. "On the surface this would seem like national self-determination, but in fact it would represent the partitioning of a weak country by stronger Powers."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Initial enthusiasm on the Yalta Agreement continues to give way to more sober and realistic evaluations of the Conference's achievements; that is apart from continued attacks by the Russophobe and Catholic press, particularly on the proposed Polish Settlement. While there is general satisfaction that there was so much "give and take" at the Conference, particular satisfaction continues to be expressed at the evidences of Allied solidarity, and there is little criticism of the doctrine of American responsibility for, and participation in, European affairs. There has even been no notable criticism in Congress or the press, and indeed surprisingly little comment, on the President's colourful meetings with the leaders in the Middle East. In fact there is evidence that Americans are beginning to adjust themselves to the inevitability of a continuing rôle in international politics now and after the war. Even in Conservative circles there is a tendency to anticipate the acceptance, possibly with modifications, of the Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods proposals. The Administration, for its part, is doing all it can to enlighten the public. The State and Treasury Departments have launched nation-wide educational campaigns, on the radio, press and public platform, to drive home the crucial issues facing the United States. The first of seven broadcasts entitled "Building the Peace" was delivered this week by Mr. Stettinius, assisted by two Assistant Secretaries of the State Department.

Sympathy and understanding continues to be expressed for the supersensitive feelings of France, but even among General de Gaulle's supporters there has been a good deal of resentment against his refusal to meet the President in Algiers. There are signs, however, that the larger interests, such as the San Francisco Conference, will prevail over this resentment and stress is being laid on the importance of French-American friendship to both sides. It is hoped that the situation will be improved if the President pays his proposed visit to Paris and London after the forthcoming conference.

The May–Bailey (Work or Fight) Bill, which was adopted a few weeks ago by the House of Representatives, has been held up by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, despite burning pleas from Mr. Stimson. The excellent war news, and the absence of General Marshall and Admiral King, both of whom were at Yalta (and who had previously striven strenuously against the attacks of the Trades Unions and Employers organisations on more stringent man-power controls), have resulted in a decline of public interest. The Senate Committee substituted two alternatives, which are now being debated, the Kilgore and the Revercomb Bills, both of which purport to contain less compulsion and regimentation, and both of which oppose the integration of the civilian with the military man-power problem. Neither are likely to provide a real solution to the problem, however.

Meanwhile, the prospects of serious shortages in certain items of war production are beginning to loom up. Mr. J. A. Krug, the Chairman of the War Production Board, emphasised the need for more stringent man-power legislation, in drawing attention to the serious position of the steel industry, which maintains it requires an additional 100,000 workers in order to keep the plant working to capacity. The industry is expected to start the second quarter of the year with unfulfilled commitments amounting to 2 to 2½ million tons compared with the deficiency at the beginning of the year of 1½ million tons. Military requirements have gone up a million tons, so that the gap between supply and requirements is more likely to be in the region of 3 million tons. So great is the shortage that the War Production Board has reluctantly cut the allocation of carbon steel to the Office of Defence Transportation from 1,254,838 tons in the first quarter of the year to 1,065,000 tons in the coming second quarter.

To make matters worse Mr. John L. Lewis and his United Mine Workers have served notice to the War Labour Board, the National Labour Relations Board, and the Labour Department that, owing to a dispute on wages, a strike-vote would be taken in 30 days' time, when the existing wage contracts expire. So there is a prospect of a coal strike at the moment when stockpiles of coal are dwindling; partly because of increased demand, partly because the recent severe weather which seriously interfered with freight shipments. Labour is once more making a frontal attack on the "Little Steel" formula. The majority of the War Labour Board are standing by the formula, though the Board has lately been making adjustments and concessions on a scale which has disturbed Mr. Vinsen, the Director of Economic Stabilisation and led to pronouncements from his office which have angered the Labour Chiefs.

The expectation that Mr. Lewis and his powerful Union would be readmitted into the American Federation of Labour has been upset at the last moment by Mr. Lewis's demand for representation on the Executive Council It is thought, however, that this obstacle will be overcome in the next few weeks.

After much manœuvring, the George Bill, divorcing the lending agencies from the Department of Commerce has been passed by the House of Representatives by 204 to 196 votes. It is now thought there will be little difficulty in obtaining Senate approval of Mr. Wallace's nomination as Secretary of Commerce, particularly as the President has indicated that he will accept the George Bill.

LATIN AMERICA.

At the first plenary session of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace at Mexico City, Mr. Stettinius addressed the assembly and reaffirmed the belief of the United States in the good-neighbour policy and the development of inter-American co-operation as indispensable to a peaceful and democratic world order, and in the building of this world order by all nations, large and small, acting together as sovereign equals. Mr. Stettinius expressed his confidence that the American republics would join in whatever co-operative measures might be necessary to stamp out utterly every vestige of Nazi influence in the hemisphere, in combating Axis economic and political penetration and the flight of Nazi funds and underground leaders. He reminded his hearers that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals recognised the value of regional agreements for promoting peace and security: the United States Government believed that the stronger they could make the Inter-American system in its own sphere of activity the stronger the world organisation would be.

At the preliminary session six principal committees were set up: (1) War Problems (chairman, the Brazilian Acting Foreign Minister), (2) International Organisation proposed at Dumbarton Oaks (Mr. Stettinius), (3) Relations between the Inter-American system and the world security organisation (Colombian Foreign Minister), (4) Post-War Economic Problems (Cuban Secretary of State), (5) Economic Problems of the War and Transition Period (Peruvian Foreign Minister) (6) Co-ordination Committee (Uruguayan Ambassador in Washington).

Press reports state that discussion will be given to an Uruguayan proposal for a definite treaty engagement which should bind the American nations to protect each and all against aggression, to a Colombian resolution to guarantee territorial integrity and inviolability, and to various United States proposals, including a declaration in favour of freedom of the press and the abolition of all censorship as soon as possible after the war, and a series of reforms in the Pan-American system. These latter comprise the holding of an international conference every four years, an annual conference of Pan-American Foreign Ministers, an increase in the size of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union, the creation of an Inter-American, Social, Economic and Cultural Commission, and the co-ordination of the thirty-six existing inter-American organisations. The Brazilian delegation is reported to have put forward a proposal in six points covering the legal equality of all sovereign American States, the right of each to "respect for its individuality," condemnation of all wars of aggression and repudiation of the use of arms except in the case of defence against aggression or when used in conjunction with other nations as authorised by a competent international organisation, the solution of all international controversies by pacific means, the unity of American nations against external aggression against any one of them and, in the case of aggression by one American country against another, immediate consultation with a view to the defence of the country attacked.

The Argentine question was raised at the preliminary session by the Paraguayan delegate, who proposed that its discussion should be given a principal place on the agenda. The suggestion was opposed by Sr. Padilla, and the motion defeated. At the opening of the conference the President of Mexico was reported to have expressed the hope that "circumstances would soon permit the official reincorporation of Argentina into the family of American nations."

Meanwhile on the 23rd February the Argentine Government issued a decree cancelling the existing prohibition on Argentine shipping against entering war zones. It has been reported that elections are again under contemplation, but there is no evidence that a declaration of war is appreciably nearer.

Uruguay signd the United Nations declaration on the 24th February.

On his way to Mexico City M. Stettinius visited Rio de Janeiro, where he saw President Vargas. An official note stated that relations between Brazil and the United States, both during and after the war, were discussed, together with the "results of the inter-American system" and the significance of the Crimea Conference.

At a meeting of the Brazilian Cabinet on the 22nd February, President Vargas was presented with a long report on the constitutional position, which recommended that elections for the Presidency, Chamber, Senate, and State Governors and Chambers should be by direct popular suffrage, instead of by a plebiscite (to ratify the Constitution of 1937) followed by the complicated indirect system proposed in that Constitution. On the same day the Correio da Manhã published an article by Sr. José Américo (the Opposition candidate for the presidency in 1937) which constituted the most comprehensive public attack on the President and his régime that has appeared for many years. This was followed by an interview in O Globo in which Sr. Américo declared his support for Air-Brigadier Gomes as presidential candidate. Neither of these articles had been submitted to the President Vargas's Press Censor, whose authority appears to have been successfully challenged. Dr. Aranha has also given his support to Air-Brigadier Gomes. It is reported that the opposition is ready to meet any action that the President may take, and his position now seeems to depend on the loyalty or otherwise of General Dutra, the Minister for War.

GERMANY.

THE past week has seen the capture of important towns of western Germany. Trier had in peace-time 79,000 inhabitants, München-Gladbach 126,000 and Krefeld 165,000. There is now fighting opposite Düsseldorf, Cologne has fallen and the armies of the western Allies have reached the Rhine along a considerable distance. The main item on the other side of the account is that the crucial encounter with the main body of the German army has not taken place and that Rundstedt has succeeded in withdrawing his best troops across the river, in order, says a Berlin report of the 5th, "to fight the decisive battle of this war."

The communiqués of the German High Command were less informative than the Front Reports and surveys, from which "map-gazers" (cf. P.I. Summary No. 277) could get a fairly good idea of the Allied gains. These, although according to the Germans made only with difficulty and at great cost, were still continuing. On the 1st March the O.K.W. spoke of violent battles south of Trier, and on the 2nd, of the advance of United States tanks as far as Neuss, and an advance along the Düren–Cologne road. The fact that no break-through had yet taken place was stressed as a great feat in view of the Allied material superiority, a factor which is continually emphasised in reports from the Front, together with very heavy Allied losses. On the same day a D.N.B. transmission reported artillery fire on Cologne, and said that the fringe of Trier had been reached. The Political Review prepared the public for fighting to the last in Cologne and elsewhere. "Even if the enemy were to succeed at the cost of terrible sacrifice of blood in pushing further ahead, nothing will prevent us from defending every town, every building, every ruin," Cologne was already destroyed by bombing, and "what do we care if the ruins of former cultural monuments are wholly pulverised in house-to-house fighting?" On the 3rd the communiqué spoke of determined resistance east and south-east of Goch. What is called "the great defensive battle between the Roer and the Rhine" had extended to the sector between Kempen and Geldern in the North, and to the area north-west of Düsseldorf. German forces in the München-Gladbach sector were holding their positions, and there was bitter fighting for the Neuss bridgehead. The "superhuman efforts" of the German troops had caused a halt in the advance on Cologne, said one commentator. Shells were bursting in the centre of the city. On the 4th, the O.K.W. admitted that the enemy had penetrated into Krefeld, while Scheelkopf, in a Front report, said that "during the last few hours the enemy had reached the Rhine on a broad front north and south of Düsseldorf."

The relation between the western and eastern fronts was frankly discussed in the Völkischer Beobachter of the 1st March. "The German Command has had again to decide since the 12th January whether it regards the western or eastern front as decisive, and it has made its decisions about the distribution of forces according to the relative strength of our two enemies." Allied advances across the Roer were "naturally connected with events in the East." This is an admission that there are not enough German reserves for both fronts. Whatever Germans may think of the importance of the attack from the West, propaganda lays continued emphasis on the East as the decisive front.

Pomerania has been the main centre of attention. On the 28th the O.K.W. said that enemy tank forces had thrust far to the North in East Pomerania, west of Rummelsburg. On the 1st March, the fall of Poznan was announced, rather belatedly, and there was said to be street fighting in Breslau. On the 4th the communiqué announced the loss of Rummelsburg, and a Front Report described the "fighting on a broad front with advancing enemy tank packs and infantry following up."

The heavy and widespread Allied raids on the Reich continue. Every aspect of German life is affected by the bombing, and over an area wider than ever before. On the 22nd the 8th Air Force alone attacked forty-two different localities, most of them important marshalling yards and traffic points. Mosquitoes have raided Berlin almost nightly. No wonder that Goebbels should on the 1st March refer to this bombing as "hardly bearable."

Recent reports from Berlin indicate some of the technical difficulties which beset German propaganda. News Agency and Press buildings have been destroyed. Particularly since the Berlin raid of the 3rd February, the D.N.B. and other Press services have been frequently interrupted and irregular. There have been further severe restrictions in the size of the daily newspapers. On the 5th January the National-Zeitung announced cuts, due to shortage of paper pulp and to transport difficulties. On the 23rd January the President of the Reich Press Chamber announced general restrictions. All newspapers were to be reduced to two pages on three days a week, and would thus appear on alternate days with two and four pages. On the 16th February the Bodensee Rundschau said that the Reich Press Chamber had decreed that all German papers were to appear five times a week with two pages and only once with four. Front und Heimat, the Forces newspaper, is now reduced to half its size. On the 18th February the Angriff announced that from the 19th onwards it would be merged with the Berliner Illustrierte Nachtausgabe. A Transocean broadcast, describing one of the last issues of the Angriff, said that "the papers, consisting of only two pages, have entirely changed in form and content. The huge headlines give a poster-like effect. News has completely disappeared from the papers except for an essential minimum." Yet it is reported from Berlin that the only shop windows sure of attracting crowds are those of newspaper offices.

On the 28th February further "temporary" ration cuts were announced, in addition to the prolongation of the 72nd and 73rd periods, announced on the 2nd February (cf. P.I. Summary, No. 279). Reductions of 200 grammes of bread, 25 grammes of fat, and 50 grammes of Nährmittel per week have been made, apparently only in the 73rd period. These new cuts mean that since the beginning of the year, the rations of the normal consumer have been reduced by 20 per cent. in bread, 30 per cent. in fats, 11 per cent. in meat, and 51 per cent. in Nährmittel. It is calculated that the normal consumer now receives about 15 per cent. fewer calories. The same announcement by D.N.B. says that "Food Offices may in future in exceptional cases extend the validity of ration coupons beyond the period to which they apply, if, owing to transport difficulties or other reasons, the retailers are unable to supply goods on these coupons during the stipulated period." This is known to be the practice already in west German towns.

An article in the Gelsenkirchen edition of the National-Zeitung said that "owing to the present situation, a gradual change-over to vegetarian food will be unavoidable." But coupons are now required for vegetables and must be surrendered for meals served in restaurants. The situation is naturally most difficult in towns which are approaching, or actually undergoing, a state of siege, such as Breslau or Cologne or Berlin. Milk is available in Berlin only for children and invalids. Members of the Volkssturm, can feed from field kitchens and this eases the problem for most families. On the 12th February the Mayor of Berlin announced that coupons for vegetables might in future be honoured with frozen vegetables or fruit. The potato shortage is acute. About one quarter of Germany's potato production has been lost in the East. Backe recently ordered that all potatoes suitable for seed should not be used for consumption, but for extended contivation : that all supplies over and above the delivery quota and not intended for self-supplies should be surrendered : and that producers, like consumers, must give up one quarter of the quantities intended for their own use. Further measures were announced on the 3rd March. Persons who have stored more than 100 kg. must manage with these quantities until the 24th June, 1945. Those who have stored 150 kg. must surrender 25 kg., and if they do not comply by the 31st March, will receive reduced rations of bread, Nährmittel, &c.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

An agreement between the Czechoslovak Government and U.N.R.R.A. concerning relief for Czechoslovakia was signed in London on the 26th February. U.N.R.R.A. supplies to Czechoslovakia will be handed over to the Czechoslovak Government for distribution and the latter will afford U.N.R.R.A. facilities for supervision. Proceeds from the sale of these supplies are to be made available to meet the expenses of the Administration in Czechoslovakia and the balance will be at the disposal of the Czechoslovak Government for further relief and rehabilitation expenditure under programmes to be agreed. The Soviet Government has informed U.N.R.R.A. that Black Sea ports as well as land transport will be at its disposal for the despatch of these supplies. The agreement is to be reviewed after six months.

On the 26th February, London and Moscow radios broadcast simultaneously an appeal to the Czech people in the Protectorate to rise against the Germans and assist in their final destruction. The appeal was signed by eighteen leading Czech politicians, nine in London and nine in Moscow, representing the chief political parties. The Protectorate Government has replied with a proclamation condemning the appeal and warning the Czechs of the devastation that would ensue if they were to oppose the Germans.

Prague radio of the 3rd March reported that Chvalkovsky, the Protectorate Minister in Berlin, had been killed in an air-raid on the German capital. Hitler and other German leaders have sent their condolences to President Hácha.

POLAND.

The Commission of Three, comprising M. Molotov, Mr. Harriman and Sir Archibald Clark Kerr, held its first consultation on the 23rd February in Moscow; discussions concerning procedure, the issue of invitations to representatives of the several Polish elements, and the despatch of British and United States representatives to Poland who will report to the Commission on conditions there, are still in progress.

Meanwhile, in the course of the three-day parliamentary debate (27th February–1st March) on the Crimea Conference, the position of His Majesty's Government in regard to the decisions affecting Poland which were taken there has been made more explicit. Doubts concerning the exact delimitation of the southern sector of Poland's eastern frontier were resolved by the Prime Minister's defence of the Curzon Line, "including, of course, the exclusion of Lwow from Poland," as "the fairest division of territory that can, in all the circumstances, be made between the two countries." The "substantial accessions of territory in the north and west which the Yalta communiqué promised to Poland were now defined by Mr. Churchill as comprising, certainly, the city of Danzig, the greater part of East Prussia west and south of Königsberg, and "a long, wide seafront on the Baltic," and the German province of Upper Silesia in the west; and, further, "such other territories to the east of the Oder as it may be decided at the peace settlement to detach from Germany after the views of a broadly-based Polish Government have been ascertained." The Prime Minister added, however, that "it would be a great mistake to press Poland to take a larger portion of these lands than is considered by her and by her friends and Allies to be within her compass to man, develop and, with the aid of the Allies and the world organisation, to maintain." It is assumed, the Secretary of State told the House, that the German population in the areas attributed to Poland will be removed.

The Prime Minister assured those who feared for the future independence of Poland that: "The Poles will have their future in their own hands, with the single limitation that they must honestly follow, in harmony with their Allies, a policy friendly to Russia." It would be for the Poles themselves, with the assistance of the Allies, to agree upon the composition and constitution of the Polish Government of National Unity; and His Majesty's Government would thereafter, through their representatives in Poland, use all their influence to ensure that free elections should be fairly carried out. The Secretary of State further stated, in this connexion, that if, as he hoped, the new Polish Government should ask for international supervision of these elections, "we should certainly be prepared to join it. We could not agree to any inter-Allied supervision to which we were not parties, in view of our treaty relations with Poland." Both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State were at pains to make it quite clear that His Majesty's Government had no intention, pending the formation of the new Provisional Government, either of recognising the Administration at present functioning in Poland, or of withdrawing recognition from the Polish Government in London. Nor, Mr. Eden declared, would they recognise a new Government which they did not think representative; if a representative Government did not come into being, then "we remain as we are to-day . . . ."

At the conclusion of his speech opening the debate on the 27th February, Mr. Churchill paid a tribute to the gallantry of the Polish Armed Forces serving under British command: His Majesty's Government recognised, he said, that these troops owed allegiance to the Polish Government in London, but he expressed the hope that, given the establishment of a new and more representative Government, "means would be found of overcoming these formal difficulties in the wider interest of Poland." Above all, His Majesty's Government were resolved that as many as possible of the Polish troops should be enabled to return in due course to Poland, "of their own free will and under every safeguard . . . ." He added that, subject to the reservation that matters affecting citizenship must be discussed with the Dominions, he earnestly hoped it might be possible to offer to the Polish troops the citizenship and freedom of the British Empire, if they should so desire.

An article published by M. Mikolajczyk's organ Jutro Polski (25th February), exhorting Poles in this country to accept the assurances given in the Crimea Conference communiqué and not to be afraid of returning to Poland, has drawn upon its author, Professor Grabski, a violent attack by the Polish Government organ, Dziennik Polski (27th February), which has also published reports from Poland of mass arrests of members of the Home Army, carried out by "agents of the Lublin Committee" in close co-operation with the N.K.V.D. (His Majesty's Government have raised with the Soviet Government the question of the recently reported arrest in Poland of the wife of the Polish Prime Minister in London, Mme. Arciszewska, and of others working with her in the Polish Red Cross, and have received from them the assurance that Mme. Arciszewska shall be released.) A few days later M. Mikolajczyk contributed to Jutro Polski an article strongly condemning the appointment of General Anders as Acting Commander-in-Chief, as provocative to Russia and as contrary to the best interests of Poland and the Polish troops, who, he maintained, should be assisted to return to Poland, rather than encouraged to believe that return meant exile to Siberia. Lublin broadcasts, by contrast, have refrained from comment on General Anders' appointment.

A Soviet Commission of experts arrived in Warsaw on the 2nd March to implement the Soviet Government's promise to assist in the reconstruction of the city; it is of interest to note that the commission is led by M. Khrushchev, the Head of the Government of the Ukrainian Republic and includes M. Pronin, Vice-Chairman of People's Commissars of the R.S.F.S.R.—both of whom are presumably town-planning experts, as they were formerly second and first secretaries, respectively, of the Moscow City Soviet. The arrival in Lublin of a delegation of the United States Red Cross is also announced. On the 3rd March the Soviet Ambassador, M. Lebedev, presented his credentials to M. Bierut. The Lublin radio announced on the 4th that the first meeting of the Supreme Council of the Polish Socialist Party had been held in Warsaw; the Council had been broadened by the co-option of new members, and now numbered 57 persons. (See also under "United Nations," "United States of America" and "Vatican".)

SOVIET UNION.

Slight advances have been made towards Königsberg from the south, but the main centre of interest in the fighting this week has been in Pomerania. Marshal Rokossovsky's troops captured Neustettin on the 28th February, Rummelsburg on the 3rd March, and Koeslin on the 4th March, the sea being reached on the same day. The Germans in Danzig are thus cut off from the Reich. The day before Marshal Zhukov's forces broke through to the Baltic near Kolberg (25 miles west of Koeslin). On the 5th he took Stargard and Naugard, and is closing in on Stettin from the east. The only other progress reported for the Red Army has been in Slovakia, where a slow advance continues to be made in the difficult country north-west of Lucenec.

Attacks on General Radescu "the ill-starred candidate for the dictatorship of Roumania," and on MM. Maniu and Bratianu have continued with unabated vigour in the Soviet press since the arrival of M. Vyshinsky in Bucharest, while the fact that Dr. Groza had been asked to form a Government has been hailed with unqualified approval.

As noted in last week's Summary, the earlier attacks on General Radescu contained oblique references to the situation in Greece. Together with this the fact that the first overt Soviet comment on Greece should have appeared on the 2nd March might suggest that it is the efforts of the British and American representatives in Bucharest to intervene in the Roumanian situation that have caused Moscow to break its former silence. The Tass report from Athens, in which these comments were embodied, stated that elements of the extreme Right in Greece were endeavouring to exploit the recent agreement as a means of enabling them to disarm and then suppress all elements of the Left. It was alleged that, in spite of complete liberty of the press being granted under the Agreement, the E.A.M. papers Rizospastis and Elefteri Ellada were having to circulate illegally since ruffians of Nationalist organisations were smashing the news stands and beating up the newsmen, while the police were arresting the newsmen and not their attackers. This may be an indirect reply to British criticism of the suppression of National Peasant organs in Roumania. The establishment of "the public security organisation" even under its new guise of "Under-Secretariat of the Interior" was criticised strongly as reminiscent of the Metaxas régime.

Turkey's declaration of war on Germany provided an occasion for unfriendly comment in the Soviet press and wireless. Yermashev, in a Soviet Home Service International Review, queried the value of the Turkish Government's decision "now that Germany, with whom Turkey has maintained the closest relations during the whole war, is doomed to a rout." Izvestiya (the 1st March) joined in the hue and cry against Turkey, Egypt and a number of South American countries who were hurrying to join the United Nations' camp symbolically, "and to buy their fare to the San Francisco Conference." The presence "even now" of hostile organisations in the Near East, such as the "New Turanists" in Turkey and "Young Egypt," was also recalled by Izvestiya in connexion with the murder of the Egyptian Prime Minister "by a band of Hitler's mercenaries." A Soviet broadcast in Roumanian recently attacked "certain Turkish Fascist circles who are plotting the creation of an anti-democratic bloc under Turkey's influence." Indeed, fear that Turkey hopes eventually to resume her former leading place in Balkan affairs may play a part in inciting these recent Soviet attacks upon her.

The All-Slav Committee has recently been showing considerable activity. A big joint meeting was held in Moscow with the Union of Polish Patriots for a simultaneous celebration of Red Army Day and the liberation of Poland, at which the solidarity of Poles and Russians in the Slav family was reaffirmed. Leading members of the Moscow All-Slav Committee, including the Chairman, General Gundorov, went to Sofia on the 1st March for the big Slav meeting there (see under "Bulgaria"). Academician Derzhavin, who made the chief speech on behalf of the Russian delegation, maintained that the Slavs had been defeated in the past by the Germanic world not only because of their disunity but through lack of technical progress. Slavs must in the future strengthen their economic as well as their cultural relations with one another. He insisted that the Russian nation was democratic to the bone, loathed all national oppression and was a champion of national culture, religious toleration and the State independence of all the nations.

SCANDINAVIA.

On the 4th March the Finnish authorities published an announcement that Finland considered herself to have been in a state of war with Germany since the German attack on Hogland on the 15th September, 1944. A similar pronouncement is said to have been made by M. Paasikivi in the Finnish Cabinet on the 1st March. The announcement can hardly have been inspired, as suggested in The Times, by a hope of being invited to participate in the San Francisco Conference; it seems more likely that it is a step in the improvement of Finno-Russian relations. This interpretation is confirmed by an article in Uusi Suomi on the 5th March.

In some interesting reflections on the Yalta Conference broadcast by M. Vuori on the 2nd March, the speaker frankly admitted that, "according to the Yalta definition, Finland is an ex-Nazi satellite." He considered that a nation's absolute right to self-determination was obviously outside present-day realities, and that the Yalta Conference tended to limit freedom of action by the obligation to organise life on a democratic basis. "To win a place in post-war Europe, Finland must make some essential changes in her political and social life." The Yalta Powers had asserted their right to intervene to establish democratic conditions.

Reduced to realities, this seems to reflect a perception that much must be done to conciliate Russian susceptibilities. In this connexion, the Stockholm correspondent of The Times states that he was informed in Helsinki that M. Ryti and M. Randell would not only be removed from political activity but would be forced to leave their posts as heads of the Bank of Finland, and that other leading figures of the pro-Axis period would also certainly be removed. On the 2nd March the report with regard to Ryti and Randell was, however, denied by Tauner.

On the 5th March air traffic between Finland and Sweden was stopped. The reasons for this measure are at present obscure, but it is generally attributed to Russian influence.

An important Swedish view of post-war organisation was put forward by the Defence Minister, M. Sköld, in a recent speech on the 20th February. He said that the international peace organisation contemplated by the Great Powers was not ideal, and even conflicted with Swedish conceptions of international justice, since it provided no guarantee of the inviolability of minor States. Chances of success, on a realistic view, were uncertain, depending as they did on the capacity of the Great Powers to co-operate and abstain from conflicts of interest. Later in his speech M. Sköld betrayed even more scepticism, pointing out the necessity for continuous preoccupation with defence "having regard to the fact that the basis of peace was something so uncertain as the ability of the Great Powers to co-operate." If the organisation were to function successfully, Sweden would not be interested in regional alliances, and, if it were to fail, she should be even less inclined to join an alliance headed by one Great Power, which might well result in his country being used as a spearhead against another powerful State. In such case he therefore preferred a return to the policy of neutrality, in which he hoped he would be followed by other Scandinavian States.

Considerable progress has now been made in the discussion on future financial and trade relations with Sweden which has been proceeding for some time. A serious obstacle to agreement was, as disclosed in an article in the Manchester Guardian on the 28th February, the reluctance of the Swedes to accept payment in sterling. This difficulty has now been surmounted, and a Payments Agreement was signed in London on the 6th March.

After secret sessions of the Icelandic Althing on the 25th, 26th and 27th February, it was decided not to qualify for invitation to the San Francisco Conference by declaring war on Germany and Japan. The minority favouring the course rejected is understood to have consisted mainly of the Communists.

The important successes achieved by recent Danish sabotage were emphatically acknowledged in a communiqué from S.H.A.E.F. on the 5th March. The disruption of railway communications was specially noted as a most effective contribution to current military operations both on the eastern and western fronts.

The Danish press service (D.P.T.) announced the execution of ten Danish patriots during last week. No German announcement appears yet to have been made, but obituaries of three of the victims were published in the Danish press on the 2nd March, stating that they died on the 27th February, which was therefore presumably the date of the execution. No executions have been officially announced since the end of last June, but, apart from those now reported, some thirteen others are understood to have taken place in the interval.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Luxemburg Cabinet has been enlarged in order to make it more representative; the old Ministers remain in office, but two new Ministers have been appointed. Further, it is announced that, as Parliament cannot do business owing to the impossibility of assembling a quorum, a consultative assembly of 45 will be appointed by the Grand Duchess on the advice of her Ministers. It would appear that the Ministers will be responsible to this assembly, though it will not exercise legislative powers. Full legislative powers, it may be added, were conferred upon the Grand Duchess in 1939 just before the outbreak of the present war.

The economic position of the Grand Duchy is by no means good. Coal is in very short supply, and a large part of the agricultural area was devastated during the recent German offensive—the industrial area fortunately escaped serious damage. In these circumstances, the Sunday Times reports, a demand for reparation has been put forward by both the Luxemburg Government and the Luxemburg Press, which last points out that reparation could suitably consist of adjoining areas of German forest and agricultural land; forest land would be of value to Luxemburg because her own formerly extensive forests were greatly reduced by extensive felling during the German occupation. When Prince Felix was questioned about Luxemburg's territorial claims by a reporter he replied: "All I can say is that the dam on the River Our, proposed for many years, but impossible so far because some of the territory needed was outside Luxemburg, could be of the utmost importance in providing electricity, essential for our industry and agriculture. In another 60 to 80 years our iron ore reserves may be exhausted and we shall need our own electricity for new manufacturing industries."

Speaking of the need for a rapid increase in imports to Belgium, the Belgian Minister of the Interior bluntly told a correspondent of the New York Times that "chaos will break out in Belgium unless the United States furnishes plenty of food, medical supplies, and raw materials without delay."

The Governor-General of the Congo made a long speech on colonial questions at a luncheon in honour of Captain Balfour, the Resident Minister in West Africa, during his recent visit to Léopoldville. M. Ryckmans pointed out that world opinion was in favour of the development of backward regions; at the same time those United Nations that had large industries were seeking markets. It seemed, therefore, that it would be a simple matter for Europe and America to sell to Asia and Africa. Some, however, pointed to Soviet Russia as an example of what could be done in the rapid development of backward areas. But Soviet progress has been achieved by restricting imports and by imposing sacrifices on the consumer. A five-year plan on the Russian model was not what was wanted in the colonies. But there was a happy medium between such a solution and the exploitation of colonies by the mother countries. To invest money in a territory in order to secure markets and collect the profits was not to develop that territory in the interests of its own inhabitants. The Congo, as King Leopold had pointed out in 1933, must not be burdened with crushing interest and amortisation payments.

None the less, continued M. Ryckmans, the development of colonies for their own well-being would lead to an increase in their purchasing power. But the process would take time. At the moment the population of the Congo was tired and could not be asked to work harder. The productivity of labour could be increased only as the result of improvements in education and social services, a land-conservation policy, and a scientific investigation of the Congo's potential sources of wealth. How were these schemes to be financed? Certainly not by creating a debt whose service would cripple the Congo. The money must be obtained by setting aside a fair share of the profits of local enterprises and by subsidies from the mother country. The British Colonial Welfare and Development Fund was an example to be imitated.

M. Ryckmans ended by saying that there was room for inter-colonial collaboration. The studies and solutions which were of value for the British West African colonies were often of value for central Africa, and vice versa. "An exchange of information, a specialisation eliminating overlapping, the pooling of experiments and results" would be to the advantage of all.

The news of the appointment of the new Dutch Cabinet (see last Summary) appears to have been received without either much enthusiasm or hostility in the Liberated Netherlands.

FRANCE.

Mr. Churchill's important references to France in his speech in the House of Commons on the 27th February did not evoke much comment in the French press, nor did it discuss his reaffirmation of Britain's endeavour to preserve a special position for France in Syria and the Lebanon (for this and for recent discussions with M. Bidault see under "Middle East"). The Radical Aurore, while giving headlines to his insistence on the need for a strong France, wished that he had not sought to disguise the fact that the Three Great Powers had set themselves up "as a directory of Europe and the World," and M. Buré, of the Ordre, objected to Mr. Churchill's "patronising tone." Mr. Roosevelt's references to France in his speech to Congress led the Monde to ask if the conclusion to be drawn was that there was a certain hierarchy among the Great Powers. (See also under "United States.")

France was finally omitted from the inviting Powers, when the invitations to the San Francisco Conference were issued on the 5th March. It was explained in inspired Paris comment that French sponsorship of the invitation involved tacit acceptance of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which France had had no share in formulating. French efforts to have the invitation reworded in view of this difficulty had failed; but the Provisional Government would participate in the Conference (see also under "United Nations").

General de Gaulle made his long awaited declaration of the Government's internal policy in a speech in the Consultative Assembly on the estimates of the Ministry of Reconstruction, after M. Dautry had, with striking figures, stressed the vastness of a task which would take from 9 to 13 years. General de Gaulle said 400,000 workers were fully unemployed and 1,200,000 partly, and enumerated the great material difficulties of the situation. But the Government had the confidence of the entire country. On arriving in Paris on the 25th August, 1944, he had received a message from a representative of Pétain authorised to concert with him "a solution such as would avoid civil war." He had shown him the door—and where was the civil war?

The Government, he added, had resolved to give absolute priority to the war effort. Their armed forces now totalled 1,200,000 even before the mobilisation of the 1940, 1941 and 1942 classes (this had been announced on the 27th February). By September they would again be producing tanks. They had strengthened the internal and external credit of the State, had restored all the traditional liberties and would soon proceed to local elections. But to achieve the goal of power which he set before them there must be much greater and more rational production with the co-operation of employers and workers and the co-ordinating action of the State. While they wished to foster individual initiative and keep as large a "secteur libre" as possible in industry, the State must take charge of the exploitation of the major sources of power, of transport and of tele-communications and control credit and investment. It was, in fact, already directing the entire life of the country. But they should not proclaim changes by legislation which they could not apply. It would be for the elected representatives of the nation to confirm or alter the Government's provisional measures. In the meantime they needed to train personnel to carry out the State's undertakings, and this brought him to the problem of lack of men. France needed 12 million babies in the next ten years, she must reduce the death-rate and encourage suitable immigrants. A profound reform of education was equally necessary, and must be carried out by the whole nation. They should derive their inspiration from the men and women of the Resistance. These should not, however, form any single Resistance Party or League, but set an example inside each group by bowing before the higher interests of the nations. Between the soft twilight of decline and the clear cold light of renovation France's choice was certain.

Criticism in the debate which followed and in the press was sharp—particularly from the Socialists and the Communists; and the absence of more precision on the Government's internal policy has created disappointment even amongst older supporters of the régime. The speech of M. Duclos and the attitude of the Humanité points to the abandonment of the short-lived rôle of whole-hearted supporters of the Government, recently adopted by the Communists (see Summary No. 278). The Populaire deplored the Government's intention to postpone major reforms indefinitely. Whole-hearted approval came only from the press of the Right and Centre.

The speech and the criticism which it aroused threw further light on the differences between the Government and bodies such as the Consultative Assembly and the Conseil National de la Résistance. The demand of the C.N.R. that the Government should heed the advice of the Consultative Assembly (see last Summary) was repeated by M. Saillant at the meeting of the departmental liberation committees on the 28th February and 1st March, when he declared that the Assembly ought either to be listened to or else be abolished. In an attack on General de Gaulle's foreign policy he said that if the Government could demand "reforms of the geographic structure" of the country before general elections were held, it could also carry through a reform of the economic structure before that date. On the morning of General de Gaulle's speech the Socialist and Communist Parties issued a joint manifesto demanding immediate nationalisation of key industries in accordance with the programme of the C.N.R. General de Gaulle, however, implicitly rejected these proposals when he said at Limoges on the 5th March (as reported by the Daily Telegraph) that the State was alone entitled to exercise power and that the consent of the vast majority of citizens was needed for the economic reforms demanded by the Resistance Parties.

(For renewal of Franco-Italian relations, see under "Italy").

SWITZERLAND.

The economic negotiations are continuing in an excellent atmosphere. There are good prospects of reaching an agreement by which Switzerland will discontinue all coal traffic from Germany to Northern Italy; will take steps to prevent Swiss banks becoming a safe deposit for German assets, and will reduce their remaining exports to Germany to an extremely small figure.

By a most unfortunate coincidence several violations of Swiss airspace—a matter on which Swiss public opinion is particularly sensitive—have occurred during the course of the negotiations; in the two most serious of these incidents, on the 22nd and 28th February, Allied aircraft caused twenty-one deaths, while a considerably larger number of persons was wounded.

The Federal Council has decided to lift the ban on extremist parties both of the Right and the Left, whilst reserving for itself the right to prosecute individual persons for activities dangerous to the State. At the same time, the definition of what constitutes treason under the Penal Code has been stiffened so as to bring within its ambit attempts to change the constitutional order by other than legal means. The chief object of these measures is to restrain the relatively small number of Communists who, when their party had been banned, simply reorganised themselves under other names.

Some regret has been expressed that Switzerland will not be invited to the San Francisco Conference in spite of her democratic experience and proved loyalty to her international engagements.

A steady flow of refugees is reaching the Swiss Northern frontier, including persons coming from as far as the Baltic States. Meanwhile, M. Musy, a former President of the Confederation, who is rumoured to have close relations with some of the Nazi leaders, has returned from a visit to Germany together with a contingent of 1,200 Jews whose liberation from a concentration camp he claims to have succeeded in procuring.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

It is clear that General Franco has not properly understood the implications of the Prime Minister's reply to his letter, and there is evidently a hope in high Spanish circles that the Allies would be prepared to come to terms with a Franco who had been "defalangizado." The Caudillo is undoubtedly convinced that his continuation in office is a Spanish interest; with all the sincerity born of vested interest, he believes that any change of régime would merely weaken the power of Spain to resist the pressure which he expects Russia will apply so soon as the war is ended. That belief is doubtless reinforced by the murder last week at their local headquarters of two minor Falangist officials who were shot by gunmen of the other persuasion. This useless liquidation, which was probably an act of private vengeance rather than of public justice, tends to strengthen the régime, for it merely increases the general fear of the "Reds." The execution of sixteen Communists followed this disturbance of Falange tranquillity.

There have been rumours for some time about the impending departure of General Orgaz from Tetuán, and on the 3rd March, among other changes in the military command, it was announced that Lieutenant-General Varela had been appointed High Commissioner in Morocco, and that Lieutenant-General Orgaz was to be provisionally attached to the Supreme General Staff. General Varela was Minister of War until the Cabinet reshuffle in August 1942 which saw the fall of Serrano Súñer; his succession to General Orgaz, a bull-like, blustering "Barlasch of the Guard" sort of man, who gave us much trouble in Tangier, is a welcome event and probably the only one of any political significance. Of the other generals involved in these military changes, General Muñoz Grandes, who relinquishes the charge of General Franco's Military Household in order to command the First Military Region (the area west of Madrid), is the best known. It will be remembered that he was the first commander of the Blue Division.

The prospect of Portugal not being invited to the San Francisco conference was naturally wounding to the susceptibilities of the Portuguese public who are notoriously touchy about their national honour, and there has been some criticism of the foreign policy which has led to this exclusion. An article, seemingly inspired by Dr. Salazar, in the Diário da Manhã of the 27th February, defended the Portuguese position, and produced evidence to show that Portuguese neutrality was approved by England, her oldest ally. Dr. Salazar himself is keenly interested in the results of the Crimea Conference, but does not appear to be either surprised or disappointed at not being invited to San Francisco. He feels strongly that the privilege of attending the conference would not compensate for the loss of dignity involved in a pier-head jump to victorious belligerency. Portuguese neutrality is too tender and too lovely a bloom to be crushed by the eager fingers of even a British Bellona. This attitude, consistently maintained throughout the whole course of the war, is to Dr. Salazar's credit.

A draft bill for an increase of up to 15 per cent. in official salaries (except in those of members of the Government) which has been sent by the Government to the National Assembly for consideration is not unconnected with the discontent, especially in the Army, which was at the root of the recent, and for the moment abortive, attempt to oust Dr. Salazar (see Summary Nos. 277 and 278). Although reports still come in to the effect that the Army intends to maintain its demand for a change, Dr. Salazar is in the best of spirits and has the situation thoroughly in hand. Dr. Caeiro da Matta, the Minister of Education, admitted to Sir R. Campbell that there was widespread discontent because Portugal was not moving with the times and was in danger of becoming a mere museum piece in the Europe of to-morrow. The situation, he said, had been discussed at a series of Cabinet meetings, and Ministers realised that something must be done to "blanco up" the régime for the peace parade, but were divided in opinion on how to set about it. Dr. Salazar was by no means the most backward, and Dr. Caeiro da Matta said that his mind was slowly evolving. The trouble was that a mind as rigid as Dr. Salazar's took a long time to adapt itself to changing circumstances. We in this country have good reason to subscribe to the Minister's diagnosis of the Salazarian problem.

ITALY.

Italy's disappointment that no specific reference was made to her (see Summary No. 150) in the Yalta Conference communiqué has been largely mitigated by Mr. Churchill's references to that country in his speech of the 27th February. Mr. Churchill's recognition of the value of Italian co-operation and in particular of the part played by the partisans, as well as his hopes that Italy will quickly resume her place amongst the great peace-loving nations of Europe, have given general satisfaction. Pleasure has also been expressed that Mr. Churchill recognises the difference between Fascist Italy and the Italy of to-day. A section of the Centre and Right-wing press, however, points out that the basis of Allied policy towards Italy remains the same, that the provisions of the Armistice have not been altered and that Italy has still not been granted Allied status. Mr. Churchill, speaking of the difficulties which may be encountered in the north when it is freed, mentioned the additional burden the Allies and the provisional Italian Government will have to bear in feeding the large population. This reference to the "provisional" Italian Government seems to have rather puzzled the Trade Union paper Il Lavoro and to have produced mixed reactions, but why does not seem clear, since all parties recognised that, with the liberation of the north, the Government would have to be reconstituted. The Communist Party paper Unità, while expressing satisfaction at the increased independence of the Italian Government, comments unfavourably on there being no mention of a greater Italian participation in the war. Avanti, the Socialist Party paper, recognises that the new concessions are an important step forward and says that the Italian Government will no longer be able to justify its inaction by throwing the blame on the Allies. Despite these minor criticisms Mr. Churchill's promise of material aid of which Italy will receiver her share, and of British and Allied goodwill in the nation's efforts to re-establish herself, has undoubtedly greatly encouraged the Italian people. Finally, Mr. Churchill's statement that no divergence of policy exists between the British and American Governments in regard to Italy and that the two countries "can proceed in the closest confidence and unity" will not only help and strengthen the Italian Government but will revive the drooping spirits of Italians who, in general, have been much depressed. In this connexion Count Carandini, the Italian Government representative in London, was instructed by Signor De Gasperi, the Italian Foreign Minister, to convey to Mr. Churchill a message of thanks for his generous remarks and to inform him of the satisfaction which they have given both to the Government and to the Italian people.

Direct relations are to be re-established between the French and Italian Governments. M. Couve de Murville, the French representative on the Advisory Council, is to be France's representative with the rank of ambassador. Italy is to send a representative to Paris in due course and Count Sforza's name has been mentioned in this connexion. Count Sforza has, however, denied this rumour and has stated that, after so long in exile, he wishes to remain in Italy. The two Governments have also agreed on the appointment of Italian consular agents in Paris, Toulouse and Marseilles. The status of Italians in Tunisia had been the chief obstacle to the resumption of diplomatic relations, but according to the Paris press the Italian Government has informed the French Government that it acknowledges that the 1896 Conventions are no longer in force. The French Government, on its side, has told the Italian Government that it is ready to negotiate another convention, based on the principles of international law, to determine the status of Italians in Tunisia (i.e., presumably an ordinary treaty of establishment).

The escape of General Mario Roatta has been reported in the press. General Roatta has been on trial since the 22nd January, accused of aiding and abetting the Fascist régime, but has been in hospital, at various times during his trial, as he suffered from heart trouble. The Italian Government has offered a reward of 1 million lire for evidence leading to his recapture.

In North Italy, there have been some reactions to the formation of Professor Cione's new opposition group, referred to in last week's Summary. According to Transocean, the group has not yet begun its political activities, but publication of its paper, Italia del Popolo, was to begin on the 1st March, and the political press censorship imposed last autumn has been lifted "as it cannot be reconciled with the existence of a free opposition." It remains to be seen how far the new group will, in fact, be allowed to voice any open criticisms of Fascism. Farinacci, in an article in Regime Fascista, confesses that he started out with an initial scepticism regarding the new group, but found in Professor Cione's recent statement of his views in the Corriere della Sera much that coincided with Farinacci's own frequently asserted criticisms of Fascism on the ground that it failed to remain true to its original tenet of "a totally Fascist State with a capable and courageous ruling class."

In the meantime, another source of criticism of the Italian Social Republic has been silenced. Concetto Pettinato, the editor of the Turin Stampa, a well-known journalist whose articles during the past months have reflected an increasing scepticism, appears at last to have gone too far in an article of the 20th February, in which he openly admitted that Italy's disappearance from the political horizon was her own fault, and suggested that her only hope now was to put aside internal strife: "hands should be held out even across the barrier of foreign bayonets." This attitude was stigmatised by Farinacci as defeatist, and Pavolini denounced Pettinato to the Party Disciplinary Commission, ordered his removal from the editorship of the Stampa, and replaced him by Francesco Scardaoni.

The Fascist-controlled radio has announced that no more Italian workers will be taken on for work in Germany. The alleged reason for this step is that a large number of former internees in Germany have now become free workers in Reich industries, with the result that "the contingent has been completed." A more probable reason may well be found in increasing unemployment in Germany owing to the crippling of her industries by bombing and transport difficulties.

THE VATICAN.

On the 1st March the Pope granted an audience of some 30 minutes to the German Ambassador to the Vatican.

During Lent the Vatican has been broadcasting lectures on "Questions of the Eastern Church." The first two insisted that the Catholic Church of the future would be less "overwhelmingly Latin than it was now," and argued that those Catholics who maintained that there was an inherent superiority in the Latin rite were jointly responsible for the persistence of the schism between West and East. "Only on the basis of an honestly recognised equality of all rites can we hope for a return of the separated Eastern Churches to Catholic Unity. The Church of Jesus Christ is, as Pope Benedict XV said, neither Latin, nor Greek, nor Slavonic, but Catholic." It is worth recalling that Popes have long hoped that the schismatic Orthodox would find it a small step to join their neighbours, the Uniats or Catholics of the Eastern rite.

Though the Vatican has not pronounced publicly on the Crimea decisions, the Roman Catholic Hierarchies of England and Wales and of Scotland made a statement on the principles underlying a lasting peace (see Summary No. 282 under "Vatican"). Now the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of Scotland has issued an unusually forthright application of those principles to the Polish question; and justified its intervention on the grounds that the "fate of a great Christian nation of 35 million persons is a moral issue." Archbishop Griffin of Westminster, on the other hand, exercised iron restraint when he addressed the Anglo-Polish Catholic Association on the 5th March, recommending the Christian virtues of faith and forgiveness: "I appeal to you in the name of your great Christian tradition to give the Soviet Union a chance to redeem itself. Give to your British Allies a last opportunity to honour the pledges which have been sealed by Polish and British blood."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

On the 6th March the Germans opened a sharp local offensive on both sides of Lake Balaton.

The Debrecen Government published further details of its draft Land Reform Bill, now before the Cabinet. Recipients are to receive this land in freehold, paying the State for it. Payment is to be spread over 10–20 years, no payments being made during the first three years. In the distribution, priority is given to members of the new army or of the resistance movement; and this was made a special feature of numerous appeals to the population of German-occupied Hungary, which was urged in its own interest to "group itself round the clandestine National Committees" which were organising the underground struggle. Hungarians joining the force being organised in Germany were warned that by doing so they forfeited their claim to land.

There is no reliable information on the real strength of those "underground Committees"; but increasing numbers of desertions to the Red army, the Slovak partisans and the new Hungarian army were claimed.

The accounts of conditions in Liberated Hungary vary. The Ministers of Industry and of Trade and Communications made optimistic reports on the speedy restoration of industry and transport, but it was admitted that the agricultural situation, on which the future food supply depended, was serious, "as the Nazis have stolen the larger part of our livestock and agricultural implements." The Szálasi Government's propaganda added to its usual stories of looting and rape by the Red army repeated allegations that large numbers of Hungarians—a figure up to 250,000 was given—were being transported to the U.S.S.R.

A new Lord Mayor of Budapest has been appointed: he is M. J. Csorba, a Deputy from the Smallholders' Party.

A group of "Hungarians" are reported to have escaped from Birkenau and returned to Hungary. They are presumably Jewish deportees.

The Roumanian crisis was greeted with expressions of smug satisfaction at the discomfiture of the "Fascist reactionary Radescu." Hungarian democracy wished to live at peace with Roumania, but the condition of this co-operation was that Roumania, too, should become truly democratic.

In Szálasi Hungary Dr. J. Gera has replaced F. Rajniss on the Regency Council. The local German troops have been ordered to help the population in agricultural work.

Roumania.

The situation in Roumania has seriously deteriorated.

Prince Barbu Stirbey, after consultation with the various parties, found himself unable to form a Cabinet. Vyshinsky intimated to the King that Dr. Grozea, the leader of the "Ploughmen's Front," was the person in whom the U.S.S.R. had confidence, and the King then commissioned Grozea to attempt to form a Cabinet composed of "all democratic parties in normal proportion." When this item of news was broadcast the "all" in this sentence had been removed by the Russian censor. It has become known on good authority that in recommending Grozea to the King, Vyshinsky asked the King not to tell the British or Americans that he had done so. Grozea produced a plan for a new government in which 14 out of a total of 19 places were assigned to Communists and parties of the Left, and this the King declined to accept. This was the position at midnight on Sunday. Grozea told the King that a Communist demonstration had been arranged for Monday, the 5th March, and that if his list of ministers is not accepted, he will not be responsible for the consequences. The King asked the advice both of His Majesty's Government and the American Government as to what action he should take. The two Allied Governments have not felt able to do more than offer negative advice that the King should not take any irrevocable action. The two Allied Governments propose a conference on the matters in dispute as provided for by the Crimean Conference. It has been suggested that such a conference should be held at Washington, but the Soviet Government have as yet shown no disposition to accept these proposals.

Some fears are felt for the safety of General Radescu. After refusing to have special protection to begin with the General has himself come to realise that his position is precarious. Representations have been made to the Soviet authorities as to the disastrous impression which would be created if the General were arrested.

The Communist demonstration fixed for the 5th March has been postponed for 24 hours. The Committee announced that the population is "to be given political enlightenment," and the inhabitants of Bucarest are invited to attend at one of four halls, one in each of the municipal districts, directions for finding which are given with some care and detail.

Yugoslavia.

In reply to the nominations for the Regency sent to him by Shubashitch and Tito (see last Summary), King Peter has accepted Sernec, the Slovene, Manditch, the Croat, and Budisavljevitch, the Serb.

While at Belgrade Field-Marshal Alexander was the object of remarkable demonstrations, large crowds remaining all day outside his billet and cheering him whenever he appeared. Rumours that he had come, accompanied by General Scobie, to liquidate the régime and himself assume the regency were exploded by the cordial speeches exchanged by the Field-Marshal and Tito and splashed in the press.

Between the 19th January and the 7th March, besides military supplies, the Allied Military Liaison have sent to Yugoslavia these civilian supplies—11,500 tons of food, 80 tons of medical stores, 330 vehicles and 930 tons miscellaneous, including clothing.

In Bosnia the Partisans have occupied Travnik and pressed on towards Sarajevo, which the Germans seem likely soon to evacuate. The German Division which retired from Vishegrad down the Drina suffered badly, and the Partisans have recaptured Zvornik. The Partisans have also regained Petrovo Selo in Lika, an important road junction between Dalmatia and Croatia.

Another party, J.N.S. (the Yugoslav National Party, consisting mainly of Serbians together with some anti-clerical Slovenes, which was created to support the dictatorship in the early 1930's, was in opposition from 1935 to 1941, and had very little popular support) has applied for inclusion in the National Liberation Front of Serbia. Its application has been rejected on the ground that it was a "Pro-Fascist" and Great Serbian Party, and that since 1941 most of its leaders either collaborated with the enemy or supported Mihailovitch. Individual members of the Party, who satisfy the Partisans' tests, can join the Front.

In Macedonia civil servants who held office during the foreign occupation have been ordered to register with O.Z.N.A. (the political police). Unofficial sources state that those so registering are being imprisoned.

On the 11th March Radio Free Yugoslavia, its mission accomplished, ceased to operate. It was not stated where the station had been located, but only that "certain technical considerations did not allow it to play the full rôle demanded of a radio station." It had not been able to give transmissions from Partisan meetings. But its significance for the Partisan cause had been enormous.

In Borba, Mosha Pijade, a Vice-President of A.V.N.O.J., has written with savage sarcasm about Turkey's entry into the war. He said that "the masses in Great Britain" had been disappointed in their Turkish Ally, who had kept out of the struggle when her help would have been valuable and had given economic and political assistance to Germany. The "Balkan democracies" would not tolerate Turkish pretensions to interfere in Balkan affairs. Similarly Radio Belgrade attacked the Roumanian Government, saying that "democratic forces" in that country "signed the Armistice with the Allies and declared war on Germany," but that "Fascist elements" were still active there; nevertheless "the national masses" would carry on the struggle.

Greece.

Speaking in the House of Commons on the 27th February Mr. Churchill alluded to the rapturous welcome with which he and Mr. Eden had been greeted in Athens. He could recollect no subject on which the policy of His Majesty's Government had been more completely vindicated than in regard to Greece. Peace without vengeance had been achieved; a great mass of arms had been surrendered; public order and security had been so established that U.N.R.R.A. was about to resume its functions. There were, of course, many difficulties ahead; the Greeks must not expect that the whole process of their restoration could be accomplished by British labours or American assistance.

On the 1st March an agreement was signed in Athens between representatives of the Greek Government and U.N.R.R.A. The agreement provides for rehabilitation and relief on a large scale throughout the whole of Greece, including the islands; according to the Deputy Director-General of U.N.R.R.A.'s Bureau of Supply, U.N.R.R.A. will assume financial responsibility for Greek relief as from the 1st April, and will probably have taken over completely from M.L. by about the beginning of May. General Plastiras has expressed his gratitude to M.L. and his steadfast hope in U.N.R.R.A.

The Regent's visit to Salonica was a great success; he had a tremendous reception, his every appearance being greeted with spontaneous and prolonged cheering. In the course of a long speech in which he expressed the gratitude of the Greek people to the Allies, and particularly to Great Britain, the Regent said that Greece must in good time consolidate her position by the side of the Allies. Greece would claim from her Allies nothing but justice, because justice meant recognition of the Greek contribution to the common struggle. There was no justice while Greek populations were still suffering under an enemy yoke, no justice while such enemies remained unpunished. The Regent went on to condemn the "unspeakable atrocities" committed by the Bulgarians, and was greeted with cries of "Revenge! Sofia! Greater Greece!"

Meantime the Athens press reports great activity by the political parties, old and new. M. Sophoulis has issued a statement that the Liberal Party declares itself unreservedly in favour of a kingless democracy, in reply to which the Populist Party, maintaining that the question of the régime ought not to be a subject of political controversy between the parties, has appealed to the Liberal Party to reconsider its decision.

Albania.

Athens and Tirana have been engaging in wireless polemics about Southern Albania, or, as the Greeks call it, Northern Epirus. Dr. Omer Nishani, the Albanian Foreign Minister, in a newspaper article which was broadcast accused General Plastiras of harbouring designs on the Albanian towns of Korça and Argyrokastro, as MM. Tsouderos and Papandreou had done before him. On the other hand, the committee of Northern Epirus irredentists in Greece, which is led by the former Greek Bishop of Argyrokastro, has urged the immediate occupation of Northern Epirus by Greek troops to stop the alleged persecution of the Christian inhabitants.

In contrast with this, Albanian relations with the Tito administration are very friendly. An Albanian military mission arrived in Belgrade early in February, Enver Hoxha and his colleagues have received A.V.N.O.J. decorations and, more important, F.N.Ç. forces continue to fight alongside the Tito partisans. In the political sphere, according to an unofficial report, agreement has been reached that Kosovo shall be an autonomous member of a federated Yugoslavia.

Bulgaria.

Up to the 21st February the People's Court had sent almost 600 people to execution in Sofia and the provinces. The trials are still going on, but it is hoped to finish them by the middle of March. The proceedings taken, no doubt at Russian instigation, against those who participated in the Germans' "international medical commission" at Katyn and Vinnitsa resulted in relatively light sentences. Two doctors were acquitted and three archimandrites and the former Director of Propaganda were condemned to between two and five years' prison, fines and the temporary loss of civil rights.

On the 3rd and 4th March a Slav Congress was held in Sofia and attended by delegations from Russia and Yugoslavia. In the course of what appear to have been enthusiastic proceedings messages were sent to President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill as well as to Marshals Stalin and Tito and it was frequently repeated that Germany was the inveterate enemy of Slavdom, and Russia the saviour of Bulgaria.

On the 22nd February the paper of the Tsveno party, which is led by the Prime Minister and stands particularly for Bulgar-Yugoslav collaboration, carried an article urging that with a view to an economic union between the two countries the recent postal agreement should be followed by Bulgar-Yugoslav agreements about customs, railways-and trade. As regards political matters it is undesirable that Bulgaria's new wish for close relations with Yugoslavia should at this stage find expression in a treaty. It is all to the good, therefore, that the press published on the 28th February a categorical official denial that M. Gheorghiev had discussed Greek Macedonia with Marshal Tito.

Although the original policy of the Fatherland Front was to bar "outside influences" in education, the Ministry of Education recently announced that voluntary religious teaching would continue to be given in the schools once a week by the priests.

Turkey.

There is some evidence that the Turks regard the measure of Allied agreement reached at Yalta as too good to be true. They are perturbed by Russian predominance in Roumania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria and can hardly persuade themselves that Soviet deference to Anglo-Saxon views will in fact be such as to remove all menace to Turkey's position in Europe and on the Straits. Nevertheless, they hope than San Francisco may bring this about, and the traditional Turkish view that Great Britain and the United States will need Turkey as a make-weight against Russia is reflected in Turkish press comment to the effect that Turkey has influence enough to play an important part at the conference. The Soviet Ambassador has returned to Turkey after a prolonged absence, and the Turkish press has evidently been told to observe extreme caution as regards Russia, for it has been submitting mutely to the constant flagellation of the Moscow wireless (see "Soviet Union").

In order to contribute towards easing the world tonnage situation and towards the carriage of relief to liberated countries the Turkish Government has agreed to release three of the five British merchantmen which were originally chartered to Turkey in 1943 to bring munitions and other supplies from Egypt.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The assassination of Ahmad Maher Pasha has greatly shocked the Egyptian public, and has been condemned by all responsible sections of political opinion. There seems to be no doubt that the opposition of the Wafd to Egypt's declaration of war, culminating in their manifesto that this meant for Egypt all sorts of material sacrifices, helped to excite public apprehension and to influence unbalanced persons like the assassin of the late Prime Minister. To that extent, therefore, the Wafd may be held to have had some indirect responsibility for the crime.

The fears of the public, thus falsely aroused, were, however, largely reduced by a British statement explaining that the Egyptian declaration of war would not in any way affect the assistance to be furnished by Egypt in virtue of her treaty with Great Britain, and that there was no intention to call upon Egyptians for service abroad.

When Mahmoud Nokrashi, the new Prime Minister, resumed on the 26th February the question in Parliament—held up for two days owing to Ahmad Maher's assassination—he obtained a vote of confidence in the Government's decision to declare war by 214 votes to 2 in the Chamber of Deputies, and in the Senate by 66 votes to 35. The vote in the Senate is noteworthy as indicating a marked reduction of the Wafdist vote, the total number of Wafdist Senators being 65. The loss of Ahmad Maher at this juncture is lamentable. Nor is the new Prime Minister to be compared with his predecessor. Nokrashi is difficult and touchy, and his despotic nature and pettifogging mentality will not help him either with his non-Saadist colleagues in the Cabinet or in the handling of Anglo-Egyptian problems.

It looks as if political assassination in Egypt was becoming infectious. On the 2nd March an attempt was made on the life of Amin Osman, the Minister of Finance in the Nahas Government and a firm upholder of the Allied cause. Fortunately, he escaped injury from the knife aimed at his breast through having a small Koran in his pocket, which turned the blow.

The discussions of the sub-committee on the constitution of the League of Arab States terminated in Cairo on the 3rd March, when the members present signed the procès-verbal including the proposed statutes. The Egyptian Prime Minister announced that he would communicate the draft statutes to the preparatory committee to be summoned shortly, and hoped that this committee would approve them quickly so as to enable the Council of the Arab League to meet in the spring of this year. He declared that the Arab League would be an important element in the service of peace, and would help to develop Arab prestige.

Apparently on the initiative of Abdul Rahman Azzam it was proposed that the Arab League should help "non-independent" countries to become independent and to join the League. No names of such States were given, but Palestine may be inferred, as well as Libya and other North African States. It was pointed out to Nokrashi that such a resolution if proceeded with would create difficulties for them, and though at a subsequent meeting of the conference he is said to have made light of this argument, it is believed that the relevant clause has been considerably modified. Another matter that has been raised concerns the signature by Musa Alami, the Palestinian representative, of the agreed instrument on the 18th March. Musa has attended the conference not, of course, in an official capacity, but as representing unofficially the Arabs of Palestine; and it is therefore open to question whether he has even any authority to sign. He certainly has no authority to commit Palestine to the provisions of the act.

In his speech in the House of Commons on the 27th February, the Prime Minister referred to the position of His Majesty's Government in respect of Syria and the Lebanon and in relation to the French. "That position is governed," said Mr. Churchill, "by the statements made in 1941, in which the independence of these Levant States was definitely declared by Great Britain and France. At that time, and ever since, His Majesty's Government have made it clear that they would never seek to supplant French influence by British influence in the Levant States. We are determined also to respect the independence of these States, and to use our best endeavours to preserve a special position for France in view of the many cultural and historic connexions which France has so long established with Syria. We hope that it may be possible for the French to preserve that special position. We trust that these States will be firmly established by the authority of the world organisation, and that French privilege will also be recognised.

"However, I must make it clear that it is not for us alone to defend by force either Syrian or Lebanese independence or French privilege. We seek both, and we do not believe that they are incompatible. Too much must not be placed therefore upon the shoulders of Great Britain alone. We have to take note of the fact that Russia and the United States have recognised and favour Syrian and Lebanese independence, but do not favour any special position for any other foreign country."

Lebanon followed the example of Syria by declaring war against Germany and Japan on the 27th February. Both States are greatly disappointed that they are not to be invited to the conference at San Francisco. In protest at the exclusion of Syria, the Syrian President, not without a touch of humour, quoted an Arabic proverb: "If you ask thirty guests and not me, does it mean that you have insufficient food or that I am not house-trained?" Perhaps in the hope that they may still be invited, both States are making enquiries in Washington as to what steps are necessary for their adherence to the United Nations' declaration. No applicant who has declared war has so far been refused adherence to the United Nations' declaration; but, even if the Levant States are permitted to adhere, there are difficulties in the way of inviting them to San Francisco.

Mr. Eden briefly discussed the Levant States in his talks with M. Bidault during the latter's recent visit to London. M. Bidault explained that all France desired in the Levant was a military base, a cultural convention and a pre-eminent position for the French representative; to which Mr. Eden replied that we wanted nothing there, except for the French to get their treaty. The French have not yet delivered their proposals as promised some time ago to the Syrian Government. General Beynet has twice interviewed the Syrian President, but nothing definite seems to have emerged. General Beynet is intending to leave for Paris this week to report on his conversations and to receive instructions. Unfortunately, he still does not appear to appreciate how strong the feeling is in Syria about the Troupes Spéciales and the special position which France claims in the Levant; nor does he seem to realise the increasing difficulty which the Syrian Government will have in controlling the situation, should the French still further delay their proposals, or should these proposals be too ambitious.

After consulting the Crown Prince and others in Nejd, Ibn Saud decided at the last moment to declare war against Germany and Japan as from the 1st March. The Holy Places of Mecca and Medina are, however, specifically excluded from being in a state of war. As Ibn Saud says in his communication to His Majesty's Government announcing his decision: "Because of their sanctity we reserve for the two Holy Shrines complete neutrality; they shall neither wage war nor shall war be waged against them, for the area in which they lie is one of peace and security for all its inhabitants and for all Moslems who proceed thither." Arrangements will be made in due course for Saudi Arabia to adhere to the United Nations' Declaration, and she has been included among the forty-five nations to be invited to San Francisco.

Mr. Wallace Murray, Director of the Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs in the State Department, has been appointed United States Ambassador to Persia.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese Diet, which is still in session, although for the time being in recess (see this Summary No. 280) is to reconvene. Koiso has agreed to this in consequence of a demand by political leaders in both the House of Peers and the House of Representatives. The chief subject of interest in the reassembled Diet will be the new political party which is to replace the Taisei Yokusankai and the Seijikai. It is now fairly apparent that a struggle is going on behind the scenes between Koiso, Kobayashi and the "moderates," on the one hand, and Hashimoto and the extremists on the other. The "moderates" may be defined as those who desire to retain the traditional Japanese political system of compromise and balance between various group interests; the "extremists" are those who favour a totalitarian single-party régime which would exercise absolute control over all political and economic activities. In regard to the war, it seems probable that the "moderates" would like a compromise peace if they could get one and there are reports in the American press that they have sounded out the United States through a non-Japanese medium, utilising the Bolshevik bogy in Asia as their chief argument. The "extremists" are for a war without compromise and believe that Japan might yet win.

Koiso has entrusted Admiral Kobayashi, the head of the Seijikai, with the task of forming a new political party in such a way as to ginger up the war effort and stiffen the morale of the people without yielding too much to the "extremists." So far, Koiso and Kobayashi appear to have had the better of the struggle within the Taisei Yokusankai. Hashimoto, who has been a member of the Diet since 1942, in August 1944 became vice-president of the Youth Association of the Taisei Yokusankai and director of its headquarters; he was also standing counsellor of the Taisei Yokusankai and bureau director at large. He has made the Youth Association—which is not confined to young men—a centre of extremism and has sought to utilise it as a means of gaining control over the whole Taisei Yokusankai. But on the 27th January last Domei reported that Hashimoto had resigned his directorate of the Youth Association headquarters and had been replaced by Sakio Tatebayashi. Hashimoto thus lost his key position in the Youth Corps. He was also a member of the Seijikai, but he was one of seven members who were reported by Domei (18th February) as having resigned on account of dissatisfaction with the way in which Koiso and Kobayashi were organising the proposed new party. The Tokyo Shimbun (26th February) hinted pretty plainly that the new party would not mean any decisive reform either in economics or politics because its formation was in the hands of the bureaucrats and of big businessmen who still put profits above their country.

Kobayashi has resigned his position as Minister of State without Portfolio in order to give his full time to the organisation of the new party. He has issued an appeal for support to some three thousand influential persons, including members of both Houses of the Diet, businessmen and administrators. He has secured as sponsors of the new party 141 members of the House of Peers, 174 members of the Lower House and 129 other prominent men. These sponsors have formed a sub-committee to work out the organisation and programme of the new party and to select its leaders (Domei, 5th March). Presumably, when this sub-committee has finished its labours, Koiso will call the Diet together to approve the results. He may obtain such approval, backed as he is by the conservative military and naval men, bureaucrats, industrialists and court officials who are opposed to full-blooded totalitarianism. But unless the new party is instrumental in securing a more favourable turn of events for Japan—a highly unlikely contingency—it will in its turn be denounced as inadequate and Hashimoto and his friends will return to the charge.

In Chungking on the 1st March Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek announced that the National People's Assembly would be convened on the 12th November of this year. He said that the Assembly would inaugurate constitutional Government and that this would entail the return of power from the Kuomintang to the people and would place all political parties on a legal and equal status. Referring to the recent negotiations with the Communists (see this Summary No. 281) Chiang declared that the Communists had rejected all the offers made to them by the Government; these offers included the proposal that an American General should command the Communist troops after these had been incorporated with the national forces and that an American officer should be made chairman of a proposed Committee of three persons who would resolve any problems of a military nature which might arise between the Kuomintang and the Communist forces. The Generalissimo said that he rejected the Communist demand that power should be transferred to a coalition of various parties; the result of such a surrender would be unending friction and the eventual collapse of the central authority altogether. He attacked the Communists for conducting a campaign of defamation against the Kuomintang during the course of the negotiations, and he also declared that it was his unvarying experience that no sooner were some Communist demands met than they raised fresh ones. He concluded by saying that the Kuomintang was the Party of National revolution, liberation and progress.

An answering broadside came from Yenan where it was declared (4th March) that the Generalissimo's speech reflected the views and plans of the most reactionary clique in the Kuomintang which meant to persist in one-party rule. This clique would make only a pretence of giving up its authority and would so manage the National Congress as to preserve its "Fascist dictatorship." Yenan radio hsa also continued its general onslaught upon Kuomintang policy both in the political and economic spheres. It asserted that the proposed military committee of three would have had no real power; that the Communist forces would have come under the control of the "incompetent one-party Government" and this would have resulted in the Japanese reoccupying the areas liberated by the Eighth Route and New Fourth Armies. The Communists also denounced Chungking's economic and financial measures which they asserted would lead to further inflation and increased hardships for the people.

However, it is possible that the Communists are uneasy lest their uncompromising rejection of the Government's proposals should alienate popular sympathy. The Ta Kung Pao, on the 2nd March, said that the Communists wished to resume the negotiations and to send Tung Pi-wu to Chungking for this purpose. Thus the verbal fireworks on both sides are not likely to result in a general armed clash, which neither Party at present desires.
