General Chen Cheng, the new War Minister, is grappling with the task of Army reform. On the first March he announced that 396,759 officers and men had already been disbanded and that during 1945 a total of 1,800,000 would be discharged. The forces retained would be better equipped and would receive substantial increases in pay and allowances. Military training schools were also to be reformed and redundant ones were to be abolished or amalgamated with others.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

On Thursday, the 1st March, President Roosevelt paid his first visit to Congress since January 1943 in order to present his report on the Crimea Conference. His speech, which was simultaneously broadcast over the radio networks, has become this week's main topic of conversation, overshadowing even the military news. That he was wise and prudent to make a personal and prompt appearance before Congress even his political opponents admit. His informal, almost conversational manner, his conciliatory and persuasive tone, his concern for the constitutional processes of the United States, and his explicit recognition of the treaty-ratifying powers of the Senate, together with his emphasis on the fact that world peace is not, and can never be, a party issue, have secured the speech a reception which, if not exactly enthusiastic, is on the whole distinctly favourable. Although one or two papers have been at pains to point out that Mr. Churchill had already skimmed the cream, and that Mr. Roosevelt added little to the Yalta communiqué, the general opinion would seem to be, to quote the Baltimore Sun, that the President's report was his "most effective effort to bring the American people to full acceptance of the responsibilities which must be ours if we are to avoid another world war." Mr. Roosevelt spoke for over an hour and constantly departed from the prepared text which he had written. "It has been a long journey. The question of whether it is to be entirely fruitful or not," he told Congress, "lies to a great extent in your hands. For unless you concur in the decisions reached at Yalta and give them your active support, the meeting will not have produced lasting results." After detailing the Conference decisions, which as a result of friendly and frank negotiations had been accepted by the Three Powers, Mr. Roosevelt stated his belief that "the Conference in the Crimea was a turning point in American history. There will soon," he continued with reference to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, "be presented to the Senate and to the American people the great decision which will determine the fate of the United States and of the world—for many generations to come. There can be no middle ground here. We shall have to take the responsibility for world collaboration or we shall have to bear the responsibility for another world conflict. The Crimean Conference was a successful effort by the three leading nations to find the common ground for peace. . . . . It spells the end of the system of unilateral action, and exclusive alliances, and spheres of influence, and balances of power, and all the other expedients which have been tried for centuries—and have failed."

Later Mr. Roosevelt told the press that several minor treaties, arising from the Crimean Conference, as well as the world security charter which would be drafted at San Francisco, would be submitted to the Senate for their approval. Mr. Roosevelt also said he thought the periodic meetings of the Foreign Secretaries would ensure that there would be no recurrence of the incidents which this winter had disturbed the friends of world-wide collaboration.

The proposed Polish settlement remains the focal point of opposition which argues that the proposal was a capitulation to Russian demands and a betrayal of the principles of the Atlantic Charter. One of the most significant and disarming of the President's statements, which is not to be found in his prepared text, was the remark, after admitting that the decision with respect to the Polish boundaries was a compromise, "Frankly I did not agree with all of it by any means. It did not go as far as I wanted in certain areas. But all of the British and Russian desires were not satisfied." Quite apart from this specific issue, doubts concerning Russian good faith continue to be expressed in anti-Russian and ultra-Conservative papers. In several quarters the President's interpolation on prima donnas has been interpreted as a sly reference to General de Gaulle, despite the fact that this was made in discussing Yugoslav affairs.

With the exception of a small group of Nationalist and anti-Russian papers, there runs through press and radio comment a conviction that the American people realise the gravity of the challenge and are determined to play their part in the "give and take" of international compromise and collaboration. In general there is considerable support for the conclusion of the Christian Science Monitor that Mr. Roosevelt "by appearing to share freely with his fellow citizens the partial failures, as well as the successes of the Yalta Agreement, went far to disarm criticism."

Congressional opinion which had already reacted favourably to the President's bi-partisan selection of delegates to attend the San Francisco conference, has on the whole endorsed the President's speech. It is now believed that more than the necessary two-thirds majority of the Senate would be willing to accept American membership of a world security organisation involving the use of force. Senator Vandenberg (Republican, Michigan) has accepted the invitation to be one of the American delegates at San Francisco. He has stated that the President had assured him that he would not in any way be bound at the conference and that he would retain his freedom of action. An excellent start towards the goal of collective security had already been made, and the Senator said he wanted to do everything in his power to establish a practical system. In his view no permanent peace was possible, however, without a constant and conscious mandate to seek and maintain justice as the basis of peace, and he would have proposals to submit to his colleagues along these lines.

The United States Senate has confirmed the nomination of Mr. Henry Wallace as Secretary of Commerce by 56 to 32 votes, not all of which, however, followed strict party lines. Ten Republicans voted for Mr. Wallace and five Democrats against him.' The way for the acceptance of Mr. Wallace's nomination was paved by the passage of the George Bill separating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its associate agencies from the Department of Commerce. The appointment of Mr. Fred M. Vinson to succeed Mr. Jesse Jones as the new Federal Loan Administrator has now been announced. Mr. Vinson leaves the Office of Economic Stabilisation. Previously he was a member of Congress and later on the Bench. Like Mr. Jesse Jones, Mr. Vinson is a Southerner and there seems little doubt that his nomination will be confirmed since Mr. Jesse Jones himself has hailed it as "an excellent appointment." No successor to Mr. Vinson will be named until the Senate has approved of his nomination.

In spite of violent protests by owners of night clubs, especially in New York City, the new order closing all places of amusement by midnight has gone into force throughout the United States. The main reason given for the imposition of the order, which on the whole has been approved by the press and radio, is to prevent absenteeism. It is maintained that war workers sit up most of the night and then miss a day's work. The secondary reasons given are to save fuel, electricity, food and man-power. This Act, which affects all the small cafes on the highways and applies to establishments in small as well as large towns, may bring to Americans a wider realisation of the implications of the war. It is interesting to note that a recent Gallup Poll on the question "Have you had to make any real sacrifices for the war?" found 60 per cent. of people had the refreshing honesty to reply "no" as against 36 per cent. who replied "yes."

LATIN AMERICA.

The "Act of Chapultepec," which was presented on the 3rd March at the Mexico City Conference, opens with a Declaration proclaiming the juridical equality of sovereign States and the right of every State to respect for its individuality and independence, and providing for consultation in the event of aggression. "During the war and until treaty arrangements recommended in Part Two hereof," the signatories recognise that threats and acts of aggression call for such procedure, "within the scope of their constitutional war powers, as may be found necessary," including the use of armed force. Part Two is a Recommendation that the American Republics should consider the conclusion of a treaty providing for the use "by all or some of the signatories" of similar procedures. Part Three states that the Declaration and Recommendation provide for a regional agreement which "shall be consistent with the purposes and principles of the general international organisation when formed."

A proposed Economic Charter put forward by the United States delegation aimed at the continued mobilisation of economic resources until the achievement of victory, an orderly transition to peacetime conditions, a constructive basis for economic expansion, increased industrialisation, the development of transport, agriculture and power, and the improvement of labour standards and working conditions, including collective bargaining. Ten guiding principles were proposed. These comprised "co-operation in eliminating discrimination," equal access to trade and raw materials, early consultation for the effective reduction of trade barriers (especially the stabilisation of currency and international investment), Government action to prevent the stifling of competition by cartels, the renunciation of economic nationalism, just and equitable treatment for foreign enterprise and capital, and the encouragement of private enterprise and elimination of State enterprises for the conduct of trade. Latin-American reactions to the Economic Charter, particularly to its free trade clauses, were not wholly favourable, and the proposals are reported to have been referred to the Inter-American Economic and Technical Conference to be held in Washington in June.

Further proposals include one by the United States and Cuba which would bind the American nations to hand over war criminals for judgment and punishment.

The Argentine question seems to have passed for the moment into the background, and even the Argentine Government is apparently discouraged by the lack of support at Mexico City for the Paraguayan move (see last week's Summary). In Argentina Colonel Perón, in a Press interview, has expressed his desire for the full restoration of cordiality with the United States, comparing his own efforts to improve the lot of the working-class with the New Deal, and expressing his admiration for President Roosevelt. Asked what steps the Argentine Government could take to restore harmony with the United States, he said that they could not be expected to declare war, but that there had been an important evolution in the Government and the men who initiated the policy that alienated Argentina from the Pan American system were no longer in power. Colonel Perón said that the Government would "follow events with loyalty" until the elections: "the problem would then have disappeared." A sudden declaration of war on Germany, he added, would be undignified: the dispute with Germany over the repatriation of diplomats (see Summary No. 279) had been completely and satisfactorily terminated. Elsewhere in the interview, Colonel Perón declared that he had long considered that Argentina could not ignore Russia and should establish normal relations with Moscow.

On internal affairs, Colonel Perón affirmed his desire for formal elections, adding that the political parties could count on full liberty to choose candidates "after undesirable elements had been eliminated."

Clashes between the police and armed bands have been reported in the Press from Buenos Aires.

On the 1st March the Brazilian Government published a Constitutional Amendment which provides for the election of a President, Chamber, Federal Council and State Governors. The date of the election is to be announced within ninety days, and all Brazilians of both sexes over the age of 18, except other ranks in the forces, are entitled to vote. However, no sudden plunge into the unaccustomed waters of democracy need be feared. Parliament is to sit for only four months a year, and the President retains the right to prorogue, postpone, or summon it in extraordinary session. He is elected for six years (and the legislature for only four), is enabled to issue decree laws "which should be explained in parliament," and has powers to proceed by decree law alone if he declares a state of emergency. The reform of the Constitution may be initiated by the President or the Chamber, the former having the right to call a plebiscite if a conflict of opinion should occur between him and the Chamber. The President remains in office until his successor takes over. It appears, therefore, that apart from the promise of elections at an indefinite date, the President has maintained his autocratic powers almost intact, together with much of the authoritarian Constitution of 1937.

Dr. Vargas is reported to have told journalists that the freedom of the Press would be guaranteed, "subject to restrictions connected with the state of war." It is reported that Dr. Agamemnon Magalhães, the astute Interventor in Pernambuco, has been named Minister of Justice.

Like Colonel Perón, Dr. Vargas has also faced the problem of relations with Russia: having made the curious statement that diplomatic relations had only been "interrupted," not broken off, in 1917, he has declared his opinion that the moment has arrived to examine the possibility of recognising the U.S.S.R.

Incomplete results of the Chilean elections held on the 4th March show the parties of the right as having gained a majority of one in the Senate, while the coalition of the left retains its majority in the Chamber.

UNITED NATIONS.

The invitations to the San Francisco Conference: the Proposals as to voting.

Invitations to the San Francisco Conference have been issued by the United States Government on behalf of itself, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and the Republic of China to 40 other States in order to prepare the Charter for a General International Organisation for the maintenance of international peace and security. They suggest that the Proposals drawn up at Dumbarton Oaks shall be considered by the Conference "as affording a basis for such a Charter." There will be great regret that the French Government have not found it possible to join in the invitation because they were not associated in the discussions of the "basis." It should be emphasised, however, that they would still have been able, as are the other inviting Governments, to discuss the basis and make suggestions for its improvement. The French Government have, however, accepted the invitation to take part in the Conference. All the invited States have declared war on the Axis Powers and possess the other qualifications necessary to become one of the United Nations. It has not yet been possible to send an invitation to a Polish Government. The United States Government is prepared to receive any views or comments on the Proposals which any of the invited Governments care to make in advance of the Conference and transmit them to the other participating Governments.

In addition to the Proposals issued in October, the Four Powers have published additional Proposals for the method of voting in the Security Council (Chapter VI, Section C). Under these Proposals decisions in the Security Council will be made by an affirmative vote of 7 members out of 11. In questions of procedure the permanent members will have no special rights. But in other questions the assent of all the permanent members will be necessary, except that a party to a dispute will abstain from voting in decisions under Chapter VIII, Section A, and under the second sentence of paragraph 1 of Chapter VIII, Section C. Thus a party to a dispute, whether a permanent member or not, will not be able to prevent the Security Council from investigating a dispute or situation brought before it by a Member or by the Secretary-General in order to ascertain whether its continuance will endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. Nor (and this is most important) will it be able to prevent the Security Council from recommending appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment, thereby making it clear that the world as a whole thinks that a Great Power party to a dispute should conduct itself in a certain specified way. Similarly, a party to a dispute cannot prevent the Security Council referring to the Permanent Court of International Justice for advice or deciding whether the dispute or situation arises out of matters which by international law are solely within the domestic jurisdiction of the State concerned. Nor will it be able to prevent a decision of the Security Council as to whether a local dispute should be settled through suitable regional arrangements or agencies. But the Security Council will not be able to inflict sanctions on a permanent member without its consent, i.e., it will be precluded from so doing.

This formula, the result of long discussions between the four inviting Governments, is the same as that suggested by the British Delegation at Dumbarton Oaks after its original proposal that parties to a dispute should not vote had been rejected by the Soviet Delegation. This compromise received a considerable measure of approval there, but it was not at that time possible to come to such agreement as would enable it to be put in the Proposals. Subsequently, the United States Government, which in the first stages of the Dumbarton Oaks discussions had shown more disposition than that of the United Kingdom to insist on the unanimity of all the permanent members, even if one was a party to a dispute, took the initiative in again proposing this solution to the Soviet Government, which had been the strongest advocate of the veto of the permanent members in all cases.

It may be hoped that the compromise will be widely welcomed. It must be remembered, in comparing this proposal with the practice of the League of Nations, that the Security Council has much greater powers than the Council of the League. It was not possible for the Council (or Assembly) of the League to inflict sanctions on a recalcitrant State. It could only recommend them, and it was left for each State to decide whether it had the duty and power to join in them. Under the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals States agree to join in economic sanctions at the request of the Security Council and to make special agreements which will place military forces at the disposal of the Security Council for the same purpose.

Under the voting Proposal the Security Council will be able more easily than under the Covenant to take cognisance of a dispute or situation and to make recommendations for its settlement. Whereas the Council of the League could only take decisions by unanimous vote, with the exception of the parties to the dispute, the Security Council will be able to make such decisions by seven affirmative votes, the parties to the dispute not being allowed to vote, but the votes of all the other permanent members being necessary to the decision. And, if sanctions cannot be imposed on a permanent member, this position has been accepted because it is felt that the success of the organisation must depend on the unanimity of the Great Powers. If this cannot be achieved after the Security Council has considered the dispute and made recommendations for its settlement, sanctions would mean a major war and the organisation would have already failed to accomplish its main purpose. But it may be hoped that the means afforded by the Security Council for harmonising the policies of States and the constant association of all the Great Powers with one another and representatives of the smaller States will prevent this catastrophe from occurring. This process must, of course, be accompanied by the promotion of economic and social co-operation, which is provided for under Chapter IX of the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals and by other specialised agencies, so that peace may be not merely a negative process but concerted action for the advancement of common interests.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

WITHIN the past week Germany's military position has deteriorated on both east and west. The Red army has closed in on Danzig, approached within striking distance of Stettin and captured Küstrin. The Western Allies have not only reached but crossed the Rhine, have captured Cologne with surprising rapidity and have forced the powerful forces assembled by Rundstedt around Wesel to withdraw west of the river. These heavy blows have been tempered rather than transmitted by German propaganda, which has been more incoherent and evasive than usual. The High Command announced on the 10th and 11th repeated and powerful Russian attacks against Gdynia and Danzig. First place in the official bulletins has been given to the fighting in Hungary; the Allied advance in the west has been reported as secondary to events on the eastern front. The fall of Cologne has not been directly announced in these bulletins. The possession of an American bridgehead at Remagen was admitted for the first time on the 11th, accompanied by the statement that north of Andernach several German bridgeheads were still held on the western bank. The surrender of Bonn "after gallant resistance" was reported on the 10th. The same bulletin contained a curious new phrase referring to "sacrificial fighting" in defence of the Wesel position.

As usual, German news for foreign consumption has been much more circumstantial than that given to the home public. Transocean on the 9th quoted a military spokesman to explain away the fact that a Rhine bridge had been left intact. This "fortuitous event" he said had allowed the Americans to establish no more than weak forces across the Rhine; it should be regarded as a tactical success which could hardly produce any strategic result. A D.N.B. reporter said on the 11th that the American drive across the Rhine at Remagen, although unpleasant, had ceased to be dangerous. Similar attempts were made to explain, even to the inhabitants of the Reich, that things were not yet hopeless. Sertorius said on the 8th that Eisenhower had no longer any hope of fighting the decisive battle against the Germans on the left bank of the Rhine. The D.A.Z. was quoted for the view that the military situation was "extremely serious," but a broadcast to German Forces explained the advantage of the "elastic warfare" now resorted to. The fact that Germany was faced with large-scale attack from both east and west at the same time was used as excuse to explain elastic withdrawals in the west. The danger from the east, said the Völkischer Beobachter on the 9th, had increased to such an extent that Germany had been compelled to use the greater part of her armed force to repel this threat to Europe. D.N.B. put the point more crisply on the same date: "Where would our western enemies be now if our hands were not tied in the east?"

Perhaps the best German propaganda card of the moment is the claim that things might have been worse. This was put across to German Forces on the 11th in a forceful broadcast by a Party Political Guidance Officer: "One cannot speak," he said, "of a flight of the German armies, and even less of signs of disintegration in the German forces, for despite extremely painful loss of territory, in a short time they have built up improvised new lines of defence and continually go over to counter-attacks." The stubborn resistance put up by the élite German troops west of Wesel bore out this contention, although it now appears that in general, Rundstedt's forces are considerably disorganised, and need time to regroup for effective action. Furthermore, Allied progress has been achieved despite more extensive employment of the German Air Force than has for some time been the case. In the first days of March enemy fighters were reported to be operating over the battle area in increased strength. Night fighter opposition to the raid on Dessau (7th March) was also reported. The Germans also employed (on the night of the 3rd) 80 intruder planes to follow our bombers home and engage them over their own bases. This operation was repeated on a smaller scale on the following night.

The confusion into which events have thrown German propaganda is illustrated in the contradictory treatment of what D.N.B. called "the battle for Cologne." Before the event much was made of the determination to defend every inch of the Reich and it was suggested that such fanatical defence would be fully revealed in the case of a major city. The spirit of Königsberg, said one broadcast (2nd March), would prevail in the west. "Nothing will prevent us from defending every town, every building and every ruin." A week later the public was given a glowing description of "Frontstadt Köln." Its Gauleiter was described as energetically arming the whole male population with any weapons that were to hand. Yet the amount of such bombast was not great and it was clearly belied by the event. Cologne was not described as a fortress, as Breslau had been. Nothing was heard of or from its Gauleiter, Grohe, after the 8th March, although he was noted as a fanatical Party man. "Intense fighting" was reported to be going on in the town on the 6th, but such references were brief and were rapidly succeeded by explanations that Cologne no longer existed, having been converted into ruins by Allied bombing. Indeed, although as a broadcast phrased it, "the eyes of Germany were upon Cologne," the contrast between Nazi propaganda and the actual fate of the city must have been clear to many within the Reich. The evasions of propaganda are now much more obvious; the public has not been told even the names of several larger towns west of the Rhine which have been captured within the past fortnight.

It should not be supposed that the Germans' main difficulties are in the field of propaganda. Those of traffic congestion, of movement of population, of blocked food supplies can only be inferred from imperfect information, but it cannot be doubted that they contribute to a general situation of economic dislocation and political uncertainty. A Kreisleiter was praised for his initiative in organising defence within Cologne, but very little has been said of the Volkssturm in the west and there is evidence that both Party leaders and Volkssturm members have decamped at the enemy's approach. A recent decree (reported by D.N.B. on the 9th) orders all such people to report their presence wherever they may be and attempts to enforce against all who do not do so the refusal of both lodging and food. This decree follows several similar announcements as to the necessity of reporting for work or military duty, and the number of these makes it clear that the authorities can no longer keep as firm a check as they would like upon the people. A captured document gives a figure of persons evading wartime service in the latter half of 1943 as over 213,000, and the increased pressure on Germany during 1944 and 1945 must have considerably raised this total.

Many Germans are no doubt aware of what the Reich has lost economically by the Allied advance to the Rhine. The loss in production has not been felt all at once, since many of the mines and plants now captured have probably been crippled for some time past by bombing and transport dislocation. But these areas included between 10 and 30 per cent. of the Reich capacity to manufacture various heavy chemicals; they included a number of important electricity generating stations, transmission plants and coalfields, both of hard and of brown coal. Textile firms, armament firms, steel alloy plants, have also been captured. All navigation on the Rhine north of Coblenz has ceased. The Dortmund-Ems and the Mittelland canals are closed to through traffic. The main railway line on the east bank of the Rhine is out of service. Ruhr transport is subjected to constant and annihilating air attack. Miners in the Ruhr are reported to be working only three days a week, and although coal continues to accumulate at the pitheads the railways are unable to remove even the restricted amount now produced.

Hitler issued a Proclamation to the German Armed Forces on the eve of Heroes' Day, which was celebrated on the 12th by a ceremony in the blasted war memorial on the Unter den Linden, attended by Göring, Dönitz, Keitel and Schach, Deputy Gauleiter of Berlin. Himmler was represented by SS-General von Gottberg. Hitler's message consisted of an explanation of the war on the lines of his recent speeches. He defended the introduction of conscription ten years ago as an action without which Germany would already have ceased to exist. He praised "the magnificent resistance" of the Reich through six years of war and in spite of the "shameless desertion" of most of its allies. He foretold that present disasters would change and that 1918 would not be repeated. He again demanded fanatical resistance and told his countrymen what they had to do: "to continue to resist, and to strike at our enemies until in the end they grow weary and finally break."

Whatever be the Führer's present condition of mind there is no reason to doubt that in this message he meant what he said. To those Germans who ask rational grounds for a way out or for any hope of victory he had and has nothing to offer. To those who still want a call to dogged and desperate resistance, this message will perhaps bring new courage. But there is good reason to believe that Hitler and his colleagues are quite determined that there shall be no repetition of 1918, in other words no such capitulation as would probably have resulted had the attempt on Hitler's life been successful last July.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

President Beneš and most of the members of his Cabinet have now left this country en route for Czechoslovakia. The party is expected to stay for some weeks in Moscow, where negotiations for the formation of a new Government will take place. The members of the present Government will take part in these discussions as representatives of their political parties and not as Ministers. Dr. Ripka, Dr. Slávik and Dr. Feierabend, who have remained behind, will meanwhile carry on current Government business in London. M. Masaryk, who is to head the Czechoslovak delegation to San Francisco in April, will return to England after a short visit to Czechoslovakia.

On the 28th February the Swiss Government severed diplomatic relations with independent Slovakia and expressed its wish to resume relations with the Czechoslovak Government. Normal contact has been established and an exchange of Ministers is being agreed upon. Italy, too, has re-established diplomatic relations with the Czechoslovak Government, and M. Vanék has been appointed Czechoslovak Minister in Rome.

In the fighting in Slovakia the Red army on the 6th March took Liptovsky Svatý Mikuláš, on the Košice–Bohumin railway, and on the 7th March Banská Stiavnica, a German strong point barring the way into the interior from the south. Czechoslovak troops took part in the former action.

In liberated Slovakia the Slovak National Council passed a decree on the 27th February confiscating land owned by Germans, Hungarians and traitors. At the same time it was announced that the confiscated land was being distributed to needy farmers and agricultural workers.

POLAND.

No public pronouncement has as yet been made on the progress of arrangements for setting up the projected Polish Provisional Government in Warsaw.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons the Secretary of State said on the 7th March that he had no evidence that any decree had been issued by the Lublin Administration outlawing the Polish Home army as a whole. Many members of that army were alleged to have resisted measures taken by the Lublin Administration, and to have refused to submit to its authority. This Administration had announced its intention of taking severe measures against these allegedly irreconcilable elements of the Home army.

"In the view of His Majesty's Government," said Mr. Eden, "if the necessary atmosphere of confidence is to be created which alone can ensure the success of the present consultations in Moscow, it is imperative both that the Lublin Administration should take no measures against Poles merely because they do not recognise their authority, and that such Poles should cease active resistance to the local authorities which endangers the lines of communication of the advancing Russian armies."

In Poland, all of which has now been freed from German rule except Gdynia and the south-western corner of Silesia, provincial, municipal and industrial councils are being rapidly set up. General Zawadski has been made Voivode (Governor) of Polish Silesia, his place as head of the Political Education Service in the army being taken by his one-time deputy, M. Spychalski, recently Mayor of Warsaw. Dr. Iwerkiewicz, for years kept prisoner by the Germans in Oswiecim, is now Mayor of Cracow. The Supreme Court has been established at Lodz, with M. Barcikowski, described as "a well-known democrat" and barrister, as its President. The newly reconstituted trade unions, which claim a membership already of 500,000, have held a general council in Warsaw at which they called on all Polish workers to work their hardest for the restoration of Polish economic life. The Central Union of Co-operative Associations also met in Warsaw last week.

Land distribution, already completed in the provinces east of the Vistula, is reported to be nearly complete in Cracow Province, well in hand in that of Kielce, and begun in others. Industry is reported to have been either kept going or restarted in Lodz, Dombrowa, Polish Upper Silesia and other places, including the big railway works at Poznan, where wholesale German destruction was avoided. Warsaw and the central industrial region suffered more: while in German Upper Silesia it is stated that there is an almost complete lack of workers. Industries are at present working in large measure on orders for the Red army; and are given help, e.g., with raw materials for the Lodz textile mills and transport of coal. Other help has been given by the U.S.S.R. in the form of grain, soap, lorries, trolley buses, pre-fabricated houses, &c.; while the Soviet Commission for aid in the reconstruction of Warsaw (mentioned in the last issue of the Summary) is stated to have said that the U.S.S.R. would contribute up to 50 per cent. towards that end. In Poznan it is announced that 10,000 Volksdeutsche have been set to work on clearing up the town.

The State universities in Warsaw and Lodz have been reopened. The churches of Lodz, all of which are reported to have been closed by the Germans, have been restored to the ecclesiastical authorities, who are hampered by the grave lack of clergy, owing to the large number of deportations and executions at German hands.

It is announced from Paris that M. Roger Garreau, formerly French representative in Moscow, is now in Warsaw "charged with a mission to the Polish Provisional Government."

SOVIET UNION.

No change has been reported in the military situation round Königsberg. Marshal Rokossovsky's troops of the Second Byelorussian Front have closed rapidly in on Danzig and Gdynia from south and west. In the process Grudziadz was captured on the 6th March, Starogard on the 7th, Lauenburg on the 10th. On the 12th March the sea was reached in the Gulf of Danzig at Puck, only some 10 miles north of Gdynia. Meanwhile, Marshal Zhukov's troops of the First Byelorussian Front took Belgard on the 6th, and Gollnow on the 7th. Pomerania is thus also entirely under the control of the Red army. On the 12th March Küstrin also fell to Marshal Zhukov. Further south the only change reported from the Soviet side was the capture of Banska Stavnica on the 7th March. The communiqués have spoken of "heavy defensive fighting north-east and east of Lake Balaton," and it is clear that the Germans are making a determined counter-offensive here on a considerable scale. So far, however, no withdrawal by the Red army has been admitted.

The past week has produced the first public signs of a coolness between the Soviet and French Governments. It is now clear that it was the Soviet Government which objected to the French proposals for modifying the formula for issuing invitations to the San Francisco Conference, though it did in the end agree to a delay to give the French an opportunity to reconsider their position. Tass of the 8th March published a detailed refutation of the French thesis as put out by the London correspondent of France Presse concerning France's withholding of her consent to be one of the sponsoring Powers. According to Tass, the Soviet Government had not found it possible to accept the French amendments as they would have entailed a revision of the decisions of the Crimea Conference on the subject, which would have resulted "in a weakening of these decisions, which does not correspond to the interests of the post-war security of the peace-loving nations." However, in view of the importance of France's participation in the sponsoring of the invitations, the Soviet Government had expressed readiness to postpone sending them out for a day or two in order to give the French Government time to make a final decision. Tass maintained that the statement put out in France Presse that M. Molotov had bluntly asserted that the formula should be adopted as it was or not at all and that the debate was thereupon terminated was a complete fabrication. What M. Molotov did in fact state on the 1st March was that the amendments proposed by the French Government were equivalent to a change in the Crimea Conference decisions and that the Soviet Government therefore considered it impossible to agree. It is interesting in connexion with this stiffening of the Soviet attitude towards France that M. Maisky should have spoken critically about France in conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow. He stated that he saw no reason why France should receive any reparations at all, seeing that she did not bear responsibility for the main organisation of the war, had made no outstanding contribution to victory, and had not suffered as severely as other claimants. M. Maisky also thought the French claim of an occupation zone extending as far as Cologne "ridiculously large."

The Soviet Union has taken prompt steps to support the new Groza Government in Roumania by the immediate return of Northern Transylvania to the Roumanian administration. According to the Tass account, the initiative was taken from the Roumanian side, the Premier and Vice-Premier addressing a letter to Marshal Stalin on the 8th March, requestng the handing over of Northern Transylvania and promising that the rights of nationalities would be respected, and that perfect order should be maintained behind the battle front. The Marshal's reply made the return conditional on the strict carrying out of these promises. Pravda and Izvestiya, in long articles discussing Northern Transylvania, pointed out that last autumn, immediately after the ejection of the German and Hungarian troops, the Soviet authorities had found it possible to start handing over the promised territory to the Roumanian Government, thus "showing their trust in the new Roumania." The papers alleged, however, that the Roumanian authorities, spurred on by Maniu's volunteer detachments, had maltreated the local Hungarian population and had allowed German Fascist agents to carry on subversive activities, thus creating "absolutely intolerable conditions" in the immediate rear of the Red army. The Soviet Command had therefore been compelled to establish order, and thus to take over administrative functions in Transylvania.

The escape of General Roatta has called forth sharp comment from M. Zaslavsky, and has also provided the occasion for a long article in The War and the Working Class, criticising the Italian Government for its dilatoriness in bringing war criminals to justice. The Vatican was again arraigned as an accomplice of fascism: "The Vatican wants to preserve as far as possible Fascist principles without the Fascist signboard, and without the most compromised Fascist leaders." In this connexion it may be noted that the recent activities of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Great Britain on behalf of Poland have not failed to elicit the expected comment in Izvestiya, which was vigorously sarcastic at the expense of "politicians in cassocks."

It was reported on the 13th March that M. I. V. Sadchikov had been appointed Soviet Ambassador to the new Yugoslav Government.

A message telephoned from London by Mrs. Churchill to Soviet women in connexion wth International Women's Day was broadcast verbatim by the Soviet Home Service. Having conveyed the congratulations of British women to the women of the Soviet Union on this occasion, Mrs. Churchill announced her impending visit to the Soviet Union, and dwelt on the wartime bonds of losses and separation which united the women of Great Britain and of the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Government accepted the proposal of the Government of the Dominican Republic to establish diplomatic and consular relations between the U.S.S.R. and the Dominican Republic, in an exchange of notes between the Soviet Chargé d'Affaires in Mexico and the Foreign Minister of the Dominican Republic on the 8th March. It has been suggested that as a result of the recent conference at Mexico City, the establishment of diplomatic relations between the U.S.S.R. and a number of Latin American States which do not yet recognise the Soviet Union may be discussed in the near future.

The current issue of The War and the Working Class contains a long article analysing the composition, proceedings and results of the World Trade Union Conference. The widely representative character of this Conference in which representatives not only "of the land of Socialism" but also of "dependencies and colonies" took part was stressed, as was the unrepresentative nature of the I.F.T.U. Nevertheless, declares this journal, "there were of course ticklish moments." Among these, Sir Walter Citrine's opposition to the invitation of the representatives of the former enemy countries and of liberated Poland to the Conference is cited in the first place. In this connexion it is pointed out that there is no justification for ignoring the extremely important changes that have taken place in the international situation since the Conference's composition was originally discussed by the General Council of the T.U.C. in 1943. As a result of a compromise proposal by the United States delegate an unpleasant situation was averted but "the trade unions of liberated Poland were unjustly left out of the Conference." The decision to set up an Organising Committee for the new International Trades Union Centre is greeted with great satisfaction but, it is pointed out, "the work of uniting and consolidating the ranks of organised workers in the democratic countries is only beginning; enormous tasks still lie ahead."

Since the establishment of the new Republican Foreign Commissariats in February 1944, little or nothing has been heard about their internal organisation or relations with All-Union Commissariat for Foreign Affairs. It is now reported that the diplomatic rank of Minister, Second Class, has been conferred on the following Republican Foreign Commissars: Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tadjikistan, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Kirghizia, Armenia, Georgia and the Karelo-Finnish Republic. So far there is apparently no mention in this connexion of the more important republics: R.S.F.S.R., Byelo-russia, Azerbaidzhan, Ukraine and Kazakhstan, which have frontier contacts with other countries.

SCANDINAVIA.

A number of somewhat disquieting rumours seem to have been laid to rest by the announcement on the Finnish radio on the 10th March that Field-Marshal Mannerheim has now resumed his duties as President of the Finnish Republic. His illness has been widely interpreted as diplomatic, and even pro-Allied sources have shown an inclination to follow the line of German propaganda, and to regard the illness as a pretext or a preliminary for resignation. Independent reports, indeed, seem to support the view that Mannerheim is unwilling to go so far as, for example, M. Paasikivi in concession to Russian wishes, but he appears willing at present to remain at his post, though there remains a widespread impression that he will retire from office not long after the forthcoming elections.

Some misgivings with regard to the Soviet attitude are inevitably colouring the question of these elections, which are fixed for the 17th and 18th March. How far, it is asked, will these elections be allowed to be a free and unfettered expression of Finnish public opinion? So far, there has certainly been no direct pressure, and the closing of the air service between Finland and Sweden, though the date of it provided a rather ominous coincidence, has been explained as due to military reasons. But the extreme views of the Democratic League, as expressed in Vapaa Sana and Kansan Sanomat, the organ of the Finno-Soviet society, as well as by the Finnish Freedom Radio, which is believed to operate from Russia, are being regularly echoed by Tass and the Soviet press, and these views would seem to amount to condemning as Fascists and war criminals practically all sections of Finnish opinion which are opposed to their own. The committee appointed on the 8th March to consider the reorganisation of the State police is justifiably regarded as a concession to pressure from the Left, which has obtained Russian press support for its condemnation of this body.

At present, the most general apprehension is not of a direct interference with the freedom of the elections, but of intervention at a later stage, if the result of these elections does not conform to Soviet desires. If, as seems likely, the success achieved by Finnish Communism and the near-Communists of the Democratic League is insufficient to give them control, a possibility is feared of organised disturbance which may have the support of the Soviet Union. M. Orlov's hint that the result of the elections would be regarded in Russia as a test of Finnish bona fides is not an isolated phenomenon; there seem to have been further indications that the Soviet authorities are not prepared to accept whatever arrangement of political parties the Finnish electorate may favour. The position must therefore be regarded as somewhat critical, though on the other hand it seems that the bulk of Finnish opinion is convinced of the necessity for a break with the past and a cultivation of as friendly relations as possible with the Soviet Union.

On the 10th March the German authorities in Denmark officially admitted the executions of Danish patriots reported in last week's Summary. Since the date of these executions there have been ten more, unofficially but reliably reported on the 8th March. Of these, however, only five appear to have been executed in fulfilment of regular judicial sentences, the remainder are said to have been taken from prison and killed, and then thrown down in various streets of Copenhagen. There is, however, no sign that these severe measures are having a deterrent effect upon sabotage.

There have recently been repeated reports of outbreaks of mutiny among the German troops in Denmark. It does not appear, however, that the occupying Power is any longer apprehensive that Denmark may become a theatre of war, since the country is now being increasingly used as a place of refuge for German civilians. A conference attended by Dr. Best and General Lindemann is said to have been held recently in Berlin on the subject of accommodating these refugee contingents.

It was announced on the 12th March that a group of New York banks have arranged a credit of 16 million dollars to facilitate the financing of Norwegian industry and trade during the post-war period.

The monetary agreement between the United Kingdom and Sweden, the signature of which on the 6th March was reported in last week's Summary, has now been published as a White Paper, and has had a favourable reception in the press of both the nations concerned, with the exception of the Swedish Nazi organ, Folkets Dagblad. This paper indulges in sensational headlines: "British blackmail. Swedish people to become Britain's slaves. Big Swedish exports to Britain without payment. National Bank to collect worthless paper pounds."

LOW COUNTRIES.

M. van Acker has sustained a defeat in the Senate. The Bill to confer special powers upon the Government which has passed the Chamber by 84 votes to 29 and 10 abstentions met with a far stronger opposition in the Senate, where an amendment providing that undertakings could be closed only by the judgment of a court—and not, as in the original draft of the Bill, by a Minister's order—was carried by 66 votes to 63. M. van Acker thereupon announced that the Bill would be withdrawn.

The vote of the Senate placed the Catholic Ministers in a difficult position, since the majority consisted of 53 Catholics, 9 Liberals and 4 others, while only two Catholics voted for the Government. Press comment, which was divided upon the merits of the amendment, indicated a general desire that M. van Acker should remain in office. In a broadcast, delivered on the 11th, M. van Acker appealed to the country to support the Government's programme, which was to increase Belgium's participation in the war effort, to step up the output of coal, to stamp out the black market, to complete the purge, to secure reparation from Germany, and to co-operate in a system of collective security. The passing of a special powers Bill was essential if the Government was to do its job; but the ameendment carried by the Senate had so mutilated the original Bill that its withdrawal had been imperative. The Government, however, would introduce another Bill, which would grant powers for six months only. This Bill must become law if the black market was to be suppressed. Without such powers as the Bill would confer it would be impossible to govern the country.

Mr. Attlee has visited Brussels in order to confer with M. van Acker and other Belgian Ministers about Belgium's supply problems. Before leaving Brussels, Mr. Attlee sent a message to the Belgian people, in which he said he knew the winter had been a hard one; military requirements had prevented the Allies from releasing as much shipping as they would have wished for the import of food and raw materials; but the war was going well and he was confident that, if all did their duty, conditions would improve. He thanked the Belgian people for their hospitality to the British troops and hoped that the long-standing friendship between Britain and Belgium would become yet stronger.

FRANCE.

The Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, visited Paris first in the course of a journey of enquiry into the material needs of France, Belgium, liberated Holland and occupied Germany He saw General de Gaulle and the leading French ministers, and before leaving Paris for Brussels on the 7th March in an interview expressed admiration for the French people's efforts during present difficulties.

Another event which will make for the strengthening of bonds between France and Great Britain is the inauguration of the French European wireless service in English on the 11th March, when Mr. Duff Cooper and M. Bidault spoke, as well as Jacques Duchesne—the creator of the London team "Les Français parlent aux Français."

The circumstances surrounding the French decision not to sponsor the San Francisco Conference are now generally known; but it remains difficult to understand why, in addition to their unilateral declaration of the 28th February, in which they agreed to be one of the inviting Powers, but at the same time explained the conditions on which their acceptance was based, the French Government insisted on an alteration in the text of the invitation. To this the United States and British Governments agreed, but not the Soviet Government (see above under "Soviet Union") and as there was no time for the matter to be examined more fully the invitations were sent out by the United States Government on the 5th March in the name of the four Powers. Thereupon, the French Government published a further statement on the 7th March regretting that "it was not possible for the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and China to reach agreement" on a formula "within the time limit they had set themselves," but stressing that the Government, "firmly attached to the principle of collective security," would participate in the Conference and collaborate fully in the working of the new pact. Inspired comment in most papers emphasised the Government's desire to retain full liberty of action; that in the Figaro also made the point that the Government had been influenced by learning that the Three Powers had decided independently on the creation of a Rheno–Westphalian State and that "further surprises of this sort" might be in store.

Though the Government's statement received some general support, Libération and the Communist-inspired Humanité and Front National were critical and at a meeting on the 9th March, M. Thorez said the Government's attitude had not been in accord with France's interests. The Paris wireless has reflected the differences of opinion, Maurice Schumann (the former London spokesman of General de Gaulle) defending the Government's action, while Pierre Bourdan (the former political commentator of the B.B.C. French team) criticised the abstention as quixotic. M. d'Ormesson was quoted as taking a somewhat similar line in the Figaro: the enormous responsibilities awaiting France were incompatible with pin-prick tactics. After hearing M. Bidault, the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Consultative Assembly issued a statement on the 10th March calling for the strengthening of the links "between France and her great friends and allies," agreeing that "there can be no true French security outside collective security," regretting misleading reports and asking for an interview with General de Gaulle "to make collaboration effective between the Commission and the Government."

Much severe criticism of the Government was made in the debate of the Consultative Assembly on the Press, but M. Teitgen, the Minister of Information, is reported by the press and wireless to have turned what looked like a defeat into a triumph by his speech of the 9th March.

It was announced on the 10th March that by ordinance the President of the Civil Court of the Seine had ordered the sequestration of the property of all Vichy ex-Ministers.

Considerable publicity has recently been given to renewed activities of the Parti Social Français (formerly the Croix de feu), whose newspaper, the Petit Journal continued to appear in Vichy France until July 1944, but whose leader was arrested by Vichy in March 1943 and deported to Germany in 1944. M. Duclos devoted most of his recent speech (see last Summary) to the P.S.F.

and the press states that at its meeting on the 9th March the Government took note that the P.S.F. remains dissolved in view of the legislation of the Republic and decisions of the Paris Court of Appeal.

The food situation is one of the two subjects (the other being the purge) on which the Government has been most attacked, and the debate in the Consultative Assembly on the 22nd, 23rd, 27th and 28th February was marked by violent criticisms, mainly from the Communists and their friends, of the organisation of the Ministry of Food, of its personnel and of the system of food transport and collection. The fact that the full rations, which are in any case lower than the minimum considered necessary for existence, have not been available in Paris during the winter, and that for two months there has been no butter at all, lends weight to these criticisms. Recourse to the black market is a necessity, and it is difficult to see how it can be suppressed until the legal rations can be increased and fully honoured. Milk is one of the worst shortages, and M. Debû-Bridel stated in the debate that, according to a member of the Academy of Medicine, infantile mortality in Paris rose by 40 per cent. this winter. The debate on public health on the 12th March also emphasised the gravity of the present situation.

M. Ramadier, the Minister of Food, pointed out that since the beginning of the year a new system of food collection and distribution had been set up and that by the end of March no trace of the Vichy system would remain. He was able to announce on the 4th March that the transport situation was improving, thanks to Allied co-operation, and that it would now be possible to build up stock of food instead of living from hand to mouth. The lorries which the Allies are supplying to the French began arriving at the beginning of the month. The French have also been encouraged by the sympathetic manner in which their appeals for short-term assistance from the United Kingdom were heard during the recent conversations in London and on the occasion of Mr. Attlee's visit to Paris.

The Lend-Lease Agreement concluded between France and the United States (see Summary No. 282) includes provision for post-war aid to France. Thus deliveries of raw materials and civilian goods now under contract may be continued after the cessation of hostilities in return for payment in thirty yearly instalments. The Agreement also provides for deliveries of capital goods necessary for the war effort to France, for which she will pay 20 per cent. of the price in cash and the rest over thirty years.

SWITZERLAND.

After negotiations extending over nearly four weeks an agreement was signed between Switzerland and Great Britain, the United States and France on the 8th March. The Swiss have made very considerable concessions, the chief of which are: the prohibition of the carriage of coal, iron, scrap iron and steel from Germany to Italy, other traffic being limited to 14,100 tons monthly as compared with a monthly average of 460,000 tons during the first half of 1944; the reduction of total exports to Germany to 2½ million francs for each of the next three months and one million francs thereafter, as compared with a monthly average of 24½ millions in 1944 and more than twice that in 1942, all important items, such as precision instruments, being virtually eliminated; the taking of all practicable steps to cut off the supply of electricity to Germany; the prohibition of all dealings in foreign currency and the continuance in force of the decree blocking German funds; the co-ordination with the Allied Supply Authorities of purchases of scarce commodities and co-operation with United Nations in rehabilitation and relief in Europe. In return the three Allied Powers undertake to do everything in their power to reserve from world stocks a due share for Switzerland and to ensure its transport by water and land. A major part of the discussions was devoted to the ways and means for carrying this undertaking into effect.

The Swiss press has welcomed the agreement with satisfaction. Whilst it is recognised that Switzerland has exchanged solid concessions for nothing more concrete than hopes and promises, the upshot of the negotiations is regarded as a political success, since Switzerland has been lifted out of a dangerous position of isolation and has been able to explain her difficulties to the Allies, and especially to the United States. Moreover, she has emerged with her cherished neutrality intact. The principal anxiety at the moment is regarding the supply of coal, on which no assurances were given in the Agreement: the progress of the operations in the Saar Basin is being watched with tense interest as the maintenance of Swiss industry depends on the Silesian coal supplies being replaced from Allied sources.

The lifting of the ban on the extremist parties mentioned in last week's Summary, has been quickly followed by a meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist party in Zürich, at which a committee was appointed to draw up a programme. Among the points which, it is foreshadowed, will be embodied in this, are the election of the Federal Council by popular vote, the repeal of all indirect taxes, the adjustment of wages to the increased cost of living, and the abolition of the extraordinary war-time powers of the Federal Council. Collaboration with organisations with similar political programmes in other countries is also to be promoted.

Lieutenant-General Spaatz, Commander of the United States Strategic Air Force in Europe, paid a visit to Berne on the 8th March and conferred with the Federal military and political authorities in connexion with the recent bombing incidents.

PORTUGAL.

Dr. Salazar seems, at least for the moment, to have emerged with tolerable success from the most serious crisis of his régime (see Summaries Nos. 277 and 278). It is not yet clear whether the malcontents have been assuaged by the promised rise in pay; whether, in fact, it is check or checkmate. But the present situation and the future possibilities are so interesting that it is worth while making an analysis of the background to the attempted coup, which was seemingly planned within the higher ranks of the army.

More than any other form of government, a dictatorship depends for its power upon the goodwill of the armed forces. Franco would be nothing without the support of the Spanish generals, and Dr. Salazar is equally dependent upon the Portuguese officer class. The fact that he is an ardent pacifist and has no great esteem for the military men has, perhaps surprisingly, not turned to his disadvantage because the army is devoted to the old President, General Carmona; so long as Dr. Salazar enjoyed his confidence he could afford to behave rather inconsiderately towards the colonels and generals. The doctor's main preoccupation in home politics has been the effect of an Allied victory upon the long-suffering, liberty-starved Portuguese public, and this Summary has referred more than once to Dr. Salazar's probable reaction to the popular clamour for a return to democratic institutions which will inevitably break out so soon as Germany is defeated. It never seemed likely that he would yield to any such outcry; vox populi for him is far from being vox dei, and he has never hesitated to use the firm hand in dealing with any industrial unrest (e.g., see Summary No. 200, the repression of the strikers in Lisbon in May 1944). And the Cabinet changes last September, for instance, were all in the direction of preparation for a repressive policy. Of course, the determination to use strict measures against a popular movement implies a belief in the continued loyalty of the army. It looks as if Dr. Salazar stretched the patience of the officers rather too far when, announcing the last budget on the 29th December, 1944, he refused to provide for a much-needed rise in army pay, and, moreover, did it in a supercilious way which merely added insult to injury. Besides economic distress, other causes of discontent were Dr. Salazar's failure to implement his promise, made at an army banquet last May, to stamp out corruption in the gremios (employers' associations); the Winter Help campaign, which, besides having a Nazi odour, was not efficiently organised; and the lavish spending of public money on monuments such as the new stadium near Lisbon, while hospitals for the poor were not even planned.

The crisis came to a head about the middle of January, when a group of officers provocatively calling themselves the "Military Committee of National Liberation" presented General Carmona with a memorandum of complaint. Dr. Salazar retired to his country house at Santa Comba Dão, as he always does when there is high political tension, and went back to Lisbon a few days later. Then on the 13th February came the official statement of the increase in the pay of all Government servants. (The rise was given to the whole civil service in order to camouflage the concession which was made only to appease the army.) This decision must have cost Dr. Salazar dear, not only because he lost face by such a rapid surrender, but because he passionately hates having to change his mind. But there was no choice; with the prospect of trouble from the masses in the near future, he simply could not afford to antagonise the army further. And he doubtless hoped that the increase in pay, amounting to 15 per cent., would keep the soldiers quiet. If he has succeeded in buying them off, Dr. Salazar will have gained a victory, but it will be a victory at the expense of his prestige, which depended upon a profound belief in his moral integrity and constant, but wise, intransigence. And to that extent he will face any future crisis in the army or elsewhere with his outstanding position weakened. However, Dr. Salazar is not only a good, but a very clever man.

ITALY.

General Roatta's escape has caused general indignation in Rome which culminated in a public demonstration before the Quirinal. While the Carabinieri were trying to restore order a bomb was thrown by someone in the crowd killing one person and wounding two or three others. At this the Carabinieri fired some shots over the heads of the crowd which then dispersed, carrying with them the body of the dead man, which they took to the office of the President of the Council, Signor Bonomi. A deputation from the crowd was received by Signor Bonomi and demanded the resignation of the Government. Signor Bonomi replied that he could not abandon his post at this juncture but that he would bear the entire responsibility before the Council of Ministers. At the subsequent Council of Ministers it was decided that nothing would be gained by breaking up the present coalition Government, while a great deal might be lost since, when calm had been restored, it might be possible to re-unite in the present Government all the parties of the Committee of National Liberation—an unspoken invitation to the Socialist and Action Parties to re-enter the Government. Various measures were then agreed to. These measures coincided, more or less, with demands which the Communist Party executive had published after the disturbance as a condition to their future adherence to the Coalition. (1) General Orlando, the officer commanding the Carabinieri, was to be dismissed and General Bruno Brunetti was chosen to replace him; (2) the police were to be made more effective; (3) the smaller part of S.I.M. (Military Intelligence Service), which functioned under the Italian Supreme Command, was to pass under the direct jurisdiction of the War Minister. This step was agreed to by the Allied Supreme Command on the condition that the larger part of S.I.M., which had for some time been working with the Allies, should continue under the Allied Military authorities. In addition, the details of the transfer of the smaller section of S.I.M. to the War Ministry were to be approved by Allied Supreme Command before it took place and it was to be organised in such a way as to prevent it becoming a political instrument and ensure that it should co-operate fully in the Allied war effort; (4) "Socially dangerous elements of the old régime" were to be immediately interned; (5) a list of persons genuinely anti-fascist and of "absolute political impartiality" was to be drawn up, with a view to appointing them to political posts in the Provinces and to intensifying the purge of public organisations; (6) finally, four Ministers were appointed, with the task of reorganising the Purge Commission, of drafting a decree to hasten the punishment of fascism in whatever way it may manifest itself and of establishing a legal procedure for taking action against Fascists in North Italy. The four Ministers are Cevelotto, Labour Democrat and Minister of Communications, Brosio, Liberal Minister without Portfolio, Tupini, Christian Democrat and Minister of Justice, and Scoccimarro, Communist and Minister for occupied Italy. The publication of the Government communiqué seems to have been fairly well received, although the Socialist Party paper Avanti complains that no real change has been made either in the composition or in the policy of the present Government and it turns down the offer to join the Coalition. The Action Party paper also finds fault with the communiqué, which it considers weak and evasive, while Unità, the Communist Party paper, says that the Party's support of the Government will depend on the manner in which the measures set out in the communiqué are applied.

There seems no doubt that the Government will find itself in difficulties unless it takes stronger measures against subversive elements. In general, the Government's intentions are viewed with suspicion in Rome. The feeling has been growing in the public mind that there are certain forces within the Government over which the Government itself has little or no control. The most generally accepted theory is that, hidden below the surface, there still exists a Fascist organisation with which the King, the Government, the General Staff and the Carabinieri are believed to be involved.

Risorgimento Liberale reports a meeting of the National Committee of the Italian Liberal Party on the 2nd March in Rome. Signor Cattani, the Secretary of the party, after making a general report, made some remarks about the Institutional question. He said that the Liberal Party would not be asked to vote for either a monarchy or a republic in the abstract, but that the party would have to choose between a parliamentary constitutional monarchy and a parliamentary republic. Cattani stated that, in the party, there were some who desired a monarchy and some who desired a republic, but that the Institutional question must not be allowed to break the national unity. The people's choice must be accepted and revolutions, either by the Right or the Left, must not be allowed to hinder Italy's revival. The Liberal Party held a centre position against any Right or Left totalitarianism. Cattani finished by saying that, in the Liberal view, the Committees of National Liberation should act as consultative and liaison organs between the parties, but that they must not attempt to crush their individuality or independence.

In the north, Mussolini has addressed a large group of National Republican Guard officers at Brescia, in what he describes as the first of a series of meetings by which he intends to make contact with officers and legionaries. In his speech, which was evidently aimed at providing the N.R.G. officers with stimulating thoughts which could be passed on to the legionaries, he dwelt on the need for faith in victory and reiterated his conviction, recently expressed on several occasions, that Germany cannot be beaten—" for her, as indeed for us, it is a matter of life or death." The Italians would defend the Po Valley " town by town, house by house." Mussolini stressed the need for loyal collaboration with the Germans, at the same time hinting at the friction which must exist; he spoke of " difficulties of language and of temper," but added that " it is necessary to remember that we are on the same ship and we want to reach port together victoriously." This speech seems to have been given great prominence in the Fascist Press, the Corriere della Sera speaking of a resurrection. Later in the week Mussolini also addressed troops in Mantua.

According to Swiss reports, the Germans, who had hitherto opposed any attempt on Mussolini's part to move from Lake Garda to Milan, as he wished to do in December, now appear to have withdrawn their opposition, and the Duce is moving, not to Milan, but to Monza, some 10 miles to the north. The same reports state that preparations are being made to convert Milan into a fortress and to defend it to the last.

Fascist propaganda regarding Roatta's escape has made the most of the situation to discredit the Government in the south. No sympathy, however, was shown for Roatta, who was described as a " bad Italian " and a Badoglio man; there could be no question of Fascist complicity in his escape, for " the Fascists' only interest would be to execute him."

VATICAN.

On the 9th March the Vatican broadcast in Spanish a talk on the " Church and International morality in the Pope's messages." Both title and content are significant. It pointed out the futility not of war but of " aggressive war," and argued strongly for an international authority from whose decisions no State would be immune. All States would renounce certain rights, and " their absolute sovereignty would become a relative sovereignty more in keeping with the general good of the human family, and of their own members."

Last Sunday the Pope addressed the Italian Christian Workers' Associations. Recently a General Confederation of Italian Labour was set up and the Christian Associations joined it. He was a little apprehensive of this co-operation, whose success he thought depended on the Trades Union " remaining within the limits of its essential mission, and not taking on the right to control the workers entirely." The Christian workers must fight to ensure that justice prevails over material force and charity over class-hatred. Socialisation was justified only when the common good really required it. What he called the " democratisation of economy " had two equal foes, monopolies and the preponderant power of the organised masses, ready to use their power against Justice and the rights of others.

" The time has come to repudiate empty phrases and to attempt to attain that higher unity which is a bond between all who co-operate for production to satisfy the needs of the community."

A notable Vatican broadcast in German, to commemorate the Pope's Coronation Day, summarised his attitude to world events. It began in gloom—" impenetrable is the night of our age "—but seemed to find hope in a new missionary spirit to human beings—" within the upright heart begins the true rebuilding of the world "—and in a concentration on social problems—" more than ever before must the Church assume a social character in the proclamation and realisation of the gospel."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The German offensive in Hungary developed in strength during the week, and also extended southward, crossings of the Drave being made from Srem. The Germans achieved some local advances.

The official comment of the Debrecen Government on the decision to transfer the administration of northern Transylvania was to emphasise Marshal Stalin's insistence that the rights of the minorities should be guaranteed, while the further lesson was drawn " that only full and honest compliance with the terms of the armistice agreement can ensure the new democratic national development of Hungary and Roumania."

The armistice condition which General Miklós is sincerely anxious to fulfil, because of its potential effect on the future, is the raising of a new army. This does not seem to be going too easily, in spite of repeated appeals and the throwing open of the ranks to women. Miklós, however, has stated that he had collected two divisions, and the ceremonial liberation of several thousand prisoners of war, reported this week, will provide at least one division more. The men have, however, no arms except rifles, and need equipment from the U.S.S.R. if they are to become an effective fighting force.

Meanwhile, although some friction is reported between the Government and local National Committees, in which the Communists form the majority, the Soviet authorities have hitherto supported the Government in maintaining order.

Reports of conditions in Budapest show the situation there to be serious. There is much under-nourishment and many deaths from starvation. Shops are closed and food coming in is distributed in the streets. There is no light and little water. There has hitherto been no serious outbreak of disease, but both typhus and typhoid have appeared and medical supplies are urgently needed, as are food and milk.

Radio Kossuth has described as a " Fascist lie " the allegations of deportations made by the German-controlled wireless.

A private report from a Swedish paper says that of 250,000 Budapest Jews, 150,000 were saved, 55,000 have perished and 45,000 are in labour camps in Germany or Austria.

Roumania.

After the King had declined to accept Grozea's first list of new Ministers demonstrations were organised in the approved Roumanian manner. These took place on the 6th March. The crowds marched to the Royal Palace to present petitions demanding the formation of a " Democratic " Government, that is to say, a Government representing the Communists and parties and groups in sympathy with them. The King accepted a Government in which fourteen out of eighteen places were assigned to the parties of the National Democratic Front, as he felt that to refuse would be an affront to Marshal Stalin. The Soviet Government have been quick to honour the first of Mrs. Anna Pauker's promises that the establishment of a Communist régime would be followed by the re-establishment of Roumanian administration in Northern Transylvania. Roumanian administration was restored after the conclusion of the armistice, but some trouble ensued as a matter of course between the Roumanian officials and the Hungarian section of the population, and the direction of affairs was taken over by the Soviet authorities. Roumanian control has now been formally restored with a proviso that order must be kept on Malinovsky's lines of communication and the right of minorities safeguarded. Other promises made by Mrs. Pauker included the return of Roumanian prisoners of war from Russia and agrarian reform, which Radescu did not consider could be undertaken until the conclusion of hostilities.

General Radescu, who felt that his life was in danger, has been given sanctuary in the British Legation building. This step has been approved by His Majesty's Government but M. Molotov is painfully surprised at this action, as he does not consider that the general was in any danger. Some fears are entertained for the safety of Maniu.

The press censorship and broadcasting are occupying the attention of those on the spot. Some resentment was aroused by a Soviet broadcast to the effect that the "British army" had intervened to prevent Radescu firing on demonstrators. The country is known to be in a state of economic chaos. Details have been withheld by the Soviet censorship.

The British and American representatives have declined invitations to be present at the celebrations to be held at Cluj on the 13th March on the occasion of the restoration of Roumanian administration in Northern Transylvania, on the ground that acceptance might be interpreted as signifying agreement with the events of the past two weeks.

The present Roumanian Government continually refer to the restoration of Roumanian administration as "the return of Northern Transylvania" to Roumania. The "return of Northern Transylvania" was effected by the armistice of last September, and this phraseology suggests an attempt by the Communist parties to take to themselves the whole credit for what was actually done by agreement between the Allied Governments and the first Government of General Sanatescu.

Mr. Le Rougetel, the British Political Representative, after being delayed for some days at Bari, has returned to Bucarest in an American plane.

Yugoslavia.

The United Yugoslav Government has been formed. The three Regents were sworn in on the 5th March—Budisavljevitch by the Orthodox Metropolitan Josip, Manditch and Sernec by the Catholic Archbishop of Belgrade (whose execution was reported by the enemy propaganda in January). (The Belgrade press omitted to mention that the Regents swore loyalty to King Peter.) Thereupon Shubashitch handed to the Regents the resignation of the Royal Government; and Tito handed that of the National Liberation Committee to Dr. Ribar, chairman of the Presidium of AVNOJ. The Regents consulted Dr. Ribar about a Premier. They then asked Tito to form a Government. This did not take him long, and the new Government was announced on the 7th.

It consists of :—

1. Tito (Premier, Defence, Commander-in-Chief).
2. Grol (Vice-Premier).
3. Kardelj (V-P and Constituent Assembly).
4. Shubashitch (Foreign Affairs).
5. Smodlaka (without Portfolio).
6. Zechevitch (Interior).
7. Frol (Justice).
8. Ribnikar (Education).
9. Zhujovitch (Finance).
10. Shutej (without Portfolio).
11. Vujasinovitch (Transport).
12. Hebrang (Industry).
13. Petrovitch (Trade and Supply).
14. V. Chubrilovitch (Agriculture).
15. Filipovitch (Forests).
16. Andrejev (Mines).
17. Vukosavljevitch (Colonisation).
18. Krzhishnik (Social Policy).
19. Sremec (Health).
20. Marushitch (Post).
21. Pribichevitch (Works).
22. Kosanovitch (Information).
23. Prodanovitch (Serbia).
24. Gregoritch (Croatia).
25. Kocbek (Slovenia).
26. Cholakovitch (Bosnia).
27. Chuchkov (Macedonia).
28. Djilas (Montenegro).

The chief constitutional novelty is the presence of six Ministers for the six prospective federated regions; with a Serbian for Serbia, and so on. Of the other 22 Ministers, 7 are Croats (Nos. 1, 4, 5, 7, 10, 12, 19; though Tito's bonds with Croatia are slight by now); 5 are Serbians (2, 6, 8, 9, 14, though 14 is of Bosnian origin); 5 are Serbs from outside Serbia (11, 13, 17, 21, 22); 3 are Slovenes (3, 18, 20); 16 is a Macedonian, and 15 a Bosnian Moslem.

The Government includes 8 members of the Communist party (1, 3, 12, 16, 24, 26, 27, 28); 16 Ministers were members of the National Liberation Committee (1, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 18, 19, 21, 25, 27); 6 are men from London of whom 4 (2, 4, 10, 22) represented the pre-1941 political parties, and 2 (17, 20) were Tito's nominees; and 6 (14, 16, 23, 24, 26, 28) are new-comers.

The least-expected appointment was that of Grol, whom Tito had rejected for the Regency. It should do something to reassure the Serbian Opposition.

Grol has been allowed to write an article in Politika in praise of free discussion, so long as it is Progressive.

On the 5th Tito broadcast a long and masterly declaration of policy. The Government's chief aim would be to strengthen the army and expel the Germans. They would also aim at securing for Yugoslavia the territories which she failed to get after 1918. They would faithfully carry out AVNOJ's decisions of November 1943 and the equality of the six federated peoples. They promised freedom of religion, of speech, of the press and of association, as far as these were possible under war conditions. While showing severity to collaborationists, they would eschew mere revenge and offer the misled the chance to make good. For the urgent task of economic reconstruction they wished to enlist all the support possible and were proposing to add to AVNOJ uncompromised representatives of progressive and democratic groups (not just uncompromised members of the last Yugoslav Parliament, as the Crimea Conference recommended). They expected from their Allies assistance proportionate to Yugoslavia's sacrifices. As soon as possible a Constituent Assembly would be elected by universal secret ballot and would have the right to review the acts of AVNOJ and the temporary Parliament.

Greece.

Replying to a question in the House on the 7th March, Mr. Eden said that the number of Greeks detained by the British authorities in Africa amounted to about 12,000, of which 8,000 were E.L.A.S. prisoners. Arrangements were in hand to transfer all these men to Greece, and it was hoped that 1,500 would arrive about a week hence. Probably not more than about 200 would be charged with offences not covered by the amnesty. About 4,000 men were still under detention as a result of the mutinies of April 1944, and all of these would be repatriated as and when transport became available. Meantime, such of them as liked were being re-employed in the Greek armed forces. Those who did not wish to accept re-employment or who, from a strictly military point of view, were considered unreliable, could not be released in the Middle East and must be detained in camps; they could not expect to return to Greece before the loyal elements in the Greek forces. There were virtually no Greeks detained in India. In two camps near Athens under British control, in which a total of 5,000 men were detained, hunger strikes had taken place, but they had ceased after an E.L.A.S. liaison officer attached to General Scobie's headquarters had addressed the prisoners. Of these 5,000 men 150 were charged with crimes not covered by the amnesty. Of the rest, all except 18 had now been released.

Now that E.L.A.S. has been officially dissolved and that more than the specified quantity of arms has been handed in, the Communist leaders have evidently decided to abandon force as a weapon, and have returned to Athens to work as a legal Opposition. Their first move was to publish in the Left-wing press a report alleging that the Government was not keeping to the terms of the Varkiza Agreement; they also personally presented their complaints to General Plastiras, the Regent, M. Sophianopoulos, and His Majesty's Ambassador. Briefly, they allege that the police are preventing the Left-wing press from circulating freely in Athens and that they are making illegal arrests; that ex-members of the Security Battalions are now members of the National Guard and gendarmerie; that Left-wing civil servants are being dismissed; that certain security measures which have recently become law are contrary to the spirit of the agreement; that the Metropolitan of Janina, whose behaviour in April 1941 appears to have been open to grave suspicion, is to try two bishops who deserted their dioceses to join E.L.A.S.

Two new ministerial appointments were announced on the 7th March: M. A. Novas (Progressive) takes on the Ministry of the Interior, which had been held by General Plastiras since the resignation of M. Pericles Rallis (see Summary No. 282), and M. Stavros Nikolaïdis (Liberal) becomes Minister of Labour. Six new under-secretaries have also been appointed.

Athens Wireless reports that the Greek Government has accepted an invitation to the San Francisco Conference, and that the Greek delegation will probably be headed by M. Sophianopoulos.

Albania.

Brigadier Hodgson has proceeded to Tirana as head of a British Military Mission, Enver Hoxha having thought better of his refusal to receive such a mission in Albania. There are United States and French officers without official status in Albania, but neither Washington nor Paris proposes at present to recognise Enver Hoxha's Government. It was apparently Enver Hoxha's hope to postpone elections until he had obtained recognition of his Government from the Allies and established diplomatic relations with them, and this indication that he still feels unsure of the internal situation is borne out by the efforts which his Government is making to dispose of political opponents. The so-called "People's Courts," which have now begun to sit, bid fair to rival the Bulgarian People's courts, on a small scale, as a means of eliminating actual or potential rivals. Former cabinet ministers and officials who held office under the various quisling Governments are being tried on charges of promoting the Fascist occupation, opposing the F.N.Ç. and persecuting the people. The court at Tirana is composed of F.N.Ç. officers and other amateur judges. Another court has been started at Argyrocastro. An insistent demand is continually kept up that the Allies should surrender for trial not only Abas Kupi, Midhat Frasheri and other non-Communists who, with or without Allied assistance, have made their way to Italy, but also the three Italians whom the F.N.Ç. regard as the chief agents of the occupation: Jacomoni who was Minister and later Governor-General, his secretary and General Agostinucci who was head of the carabinieri in Italy.

Bulgaria.

The dominating note in the final speeches at the Slav Congress at Sofia which was reported last week was the need for unity among all Slavs. Petkov, the new Communist-minded secretary of the Agrarian Union, declared that this would be achieved in the near future. Vlahov, representing Macedonia, was confident that that country, being already united with Tito's Yugoslavia, was now indissolubly linked with the southern Slav peoples. Representatives of Poland, Byelorussia and Czechoslovakia also spoke. While devotion to Russia underlay all the proceedings, friendly references to Britain and the United States were not omitted.

On the 9th March, a congress of the Fatherland Front opened at Sofia. Its ostensible purpose was to report progress and to develop contact with the masses. Its real object was probably to establish a common platform for the elections which Moscow appears to demand. Thanks to the People's Court, to numerous arrests—sometimes on no charge whatever—to beatings and perhaps to executions without trial, the Communists have managed to intimidate Agrarians, Social Democrats and other non-Communists. But at heart 60 per cent. of the population may be Agrarian, and if the Communists were to be given their head they might precipitate a reaction which would paralyse the country's present contribution to the war. A continuance of the Fatherland Front coalition may therefore be in the general Allied interest, but not much confidence is inspired by a decree-law of the 8th March authorising severe punishment or death for "forming or leading an organisation of Fascist ideology" in order to upset the Fatherland Front, and at least five years' prison for belonging to such an organisation.

There was a considerable reaction to the Greek Regent's plea (see "Greece" in last Summary) that in view of the Bulgarians' insolent demand to be considered as co-belligerents the unspeakable crimes which they had committed should not be forgotten nor go unpunished. The Bulgarian papers contended firstly that the Bulgaria of to-day had broken with the shameful past, and hoped that if the Greeks cried "to Sofia," it would only be to hold out the hand of friendship. Secondly the press insinuated that Bulgaria was now making a much greater contribution to Allied victory than Greece. This was capped by a rather truculent speech in which Petko Stainov, the Foreign Minister, asseverated that the Bulgarians were not alone but, as the Slav congress had shown, were recognised as fellow Slavs by Marshals Stalin and Tito and all Slavdom, and that sooner or later their services against the Germans would be recognised.

Turkey.

The vituperation to which the Russian wireless has been treating Turkey is in part explained by the report that some sixty people are being tried in Angora, and rather more in Istanbul, for spreading Communist propaganda. The Turkish Republic has always repressed Communism within its own borders, and it is not surprising that it should be doing so at a moment when Russian policy in the Balkans causes it particular apprehension. No doubt it hoped to mollify the Russians by prosecuting Panturanians at the same time. But while denouncing the Communist trial as a persecution of "democrats," Russian commentators describe the Panturanian trial as mere eye-wash.

Suggestions in the Belgrade press that Turkey should have no say in Balkan affairs produced a firm Turkish reaction. M. Yalçin wrote that Marshal Tito's proposed Slav bloc would produce Balkan chaos, since it would outbalance a Turco-Greek-Albanian bloc—particularly if he annexed Trieste and Fiume—and that it was in fact directed against Turkey. On the constitution of the Tito-Shubashitch Government, however, the Turkish press and radio hastened to wish it well.

Although there has been some tendency in Turkey to resent foreign criticism of the country's inactvie share in the war and to regard the invitation to San Francisco as one addressed to poor relations, there is no doubt that the new Turkish Ambassador to Washington, M. Baydur, will make the most of his opportunities as head of the Turkish delegation. For one thing, he seems likely to object to the dropping of the undertaking to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the League which was contained in Article 10 of the Covenant.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The declaration of war against Germany and Japan by the Egyptian Government on the 26th February has begun to be viewed in a truer perspective by the public, although apprehensions still exist in the provinces, where it is feared that it may involve trouble for Egypt. It is reported, but not yet confirmed, that the Prime Minister, Nokrashi Pasha, will himself head the Egyptian delegation to San Francisco, and that he will be accompanied by Abdul Hamid Bedawi Pasha, whose appointment as Minister for Foreign Affairs was announced on the 8th March, and possibly by a military member as well. Bedawi, who was a useful member of the Egyptian delegation to the Capitulations Conference held at Montreux in 1937, and has been Minister in several previous Cabinets, is a highly intelligent man with a subtle lawyer's mind. Nokrashi Pasha, from whom Bedawi has taken over the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, is still in charge of the Ministry of the Interior, where he is said to be very unpopular. There is, indeed, a general feeling that, owing to his unadaptable temper and overbearing manner, he may not last long as Prime Minister. If, however, he remains subservient to the Palace, which is inclined to support him, he may survive.

The enquiry into the assassination of Ahmad Maher has not yet revealed any associates or connexions of the murderer, Mahmoud Issawi. According to the Director-General of Public Security, he was released from internment not, as at first reported, by Ahmad Maher, but by orders of the Wafd Government in June 1944.

Arab Union is still much to the fore in Egypt, and the Preparatory Committee has been summoned for the 17th March, when it is to examine the statutes of the Arab League prepared by the sub-committee. The statutes follow the general line of the Alexandria Protocol, but two important annexes are attached. The first of these recommends that the Preparatory Committee should establish "a basis of co-operation" with non-independent Arab countries, while the second proposes that there should be a Palestinian delegate on the Council. The wording of the first annex has been considerably modified, and is both briefer and more general than that of the original draft. But while the Arab delegates, as distinct from their Egyptian confrères, now realise the necessity of going slow on the subject of non-independent Arab States, they have made it clear that they will support Egypt in her opposition to the return of the Italians to Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. While, therefore, the Preparatory Committee may be able to gloss over the general question, it may well insist on some definite resolution concerning those two States. After approval of the statutes, it is understood that the Committee will convert itself into a general conference to draw up the constitution of the Arab League.

The claim of Syria and Lebanon to be admitted to the San Francisco Conference seems to be becoming a major issue in Middle Eastern politics. In Egypt Nokrashi Pasha has told the press that his Government attaches great importance to it. In Bagdad, the Iraqi Prime Minister and others have taken up the matter with His Majesty's Ambassador, representing that the exclusion of the Levant States would be regarded as an affront to the newly formed Arab League. Ibn Saud has also requested that we and the United States should reconsider the question of inviting Syria and Lebanon to the conference. At Beirut His Majesty's Minister has received communications from the Governments of the Levant States, informing him of a motion taken in their respective Chambers, urging them to secure an invitation to San Francisco.

Other steps are being taken by the two Governments with this end in view. The Lebanese President has telegraphed to President Roosevelt and to Chiang Kai-shek, and the Lebanese Prime Minister to M. Stalin and Mr. Churchill, setting forth the claims of the Lebanon to participate in the conference. On the 6th March the Syrian and Lebanese Ministers in London called at the Foreign Office and left a note on the subject. They were informed that it was not in our power alone to secure invitations, but that we would consult with the other principal Allied Governments to see whether anything could be done. The matter is primarily one for decision by the Government of the United States of America, in consultation with the Soviet Government and ourselves. Though His Majesty's Government would have no objection to an invitation being extended to the Levant States, it cannot be assumed that the French Provisional Government would take the same view. Nevertheless, French publicity in Syria has been at pains to disclaim any French intervention against the issue of an invitation to the States. Meanwhile, the Egyptian Minister at Washington has approached the State Department with the same request, and has been told that a reply cannot be given until the United States Government has consulted with its "principal associates."

No more will presumably be known of the main French proposals to the Levant Governments until the return of General Beynet from Paris, where he has gone to report on the present situation and to receive instructions. The French have, however, presented to the Syrian Government a new draft convention universitaire which the Syrians are still considering. Before leaving for Paris on the 9th March, General Beynet made a statement to the press, to the effect that there was no conflict between France and Syria, but merely divergence of views. France did not seek any position in Syria prejudicial to Syrian sovereignty; what she desired was to conserve her cultural mission and to strengthen her relations with Syria in that field. Asked whether a treaty was necessary for this purpose, General Beynet replied that an agreement would place France's cultural position outside political vicissitudes, and that a treaty would be the best conclusion of 25 years of friendly collaboration with Syria. This statement was no doubt designed to calm public opinion during the absence of General Beynet; but, if he returns with what Syrian opinion regards as less moderate demands, the local reaction may be all the more violent.

The Saudi Arabian Government has accepted the invitation to San Francisco sent by the United States Government on behalf of the four Powers. It is probable that the Amir Feisal, second son of Ibn Saud and Minister for Foreign Affairs, will lead the delegation. He visited the United States in 1943 at the invitation of President Roosevelt, and has been several times to this country.

A demonstration occurred outside the Majlis building in Tehran on the 6th March, when a crowd of students tried to enter the courtyard, with the object of securing the return to the Majlis of Dr. Musaddiq, who, a few days before, had accused the Majlis of condoning corruption, and declared that he would never again take his seat in the assembly. The Military Governor thereupon gave orders to disperse the crowd; with the result that one person was killed, at least one wounded, and several deputies injured. Musaddiq is one of the Persian Prime Minister's chief supporters, but the demonstration in Musaddiq's favour, with its resulting casualties, can hardly benefit the Prime Minister, whose position is in any case far from secure.

THE FAR EAST.

The past week has been marked by an event which will have important political and military repercussions; this is the Japanese suppression of the French administration in Indo-China. Indo-China had previously been unique among the Japanese-occupied colonial territories of Western Powers, for here the Japanese had preserved the existing administration. It was convenient for them to do so as long as they could rely upon the French to maintain order in Indo-China and carry on the ordinary tasks of governance, while the Japanese were free to occupy strategic points and to exploit the country economically. The Japanese forces in Indo-China were stationed there under the terms of the Pact concluded between the Vichy Government and Japan, on the 29th July, 1941, which provided for the joint defence of Indo-China. The fall of the Vichy régime was not considered by Tokyo to have invalidated the Pact, as the Government-General of Indo-China was entrusted by Pétain with full powers to act on its own. The theoretical status of the Indo-Chinese Union was held to be that of an ally of Japan, who has been represented by an Ambassador at Hanoi. This post was held by Kenkichi Yoshizawa from October 1941 until December 1944, when he was replaced by Shunichi Matsumoto. Both Yoshizawa and Matsumoto had professed satisfaction with the attitude of Admiral Decoux, the French Governor-General.

Beneath the outward show of amity a crisis had for some time been brewing. Decoux had made it plain that he regarded the Pact with Japan and the practical separation of Indo-China from France as of a temporary nature only, and that he looked forward to the time when the authority of France would be fully restored in Indo-China. He had remained cool to Japanese overtures about the future for Indo-China in the "Greater East Asiatic Order." He had also made no secret of his dissatisfaction at the one-sided economic agreements forced upon Indo-China by the Japanese. Neither he nor his subordinates had any love for the Japanese military in Indo-China who had exhibited their usual arrogance, brutality and greed. The Japanese had also been intriguing with Annamese nationalists, while Decoux had tried to counter this by giving the Annamese and other native peoples a somewhat larger voice in affairs of government. Tokyo had for some time shown signs of nervousness about the attitude of the French in Indo-China and some months ago a section of the Japanese Press declared roundly that Japan would tolerate no Darlan there.

The Japanese coup d'État in Indo-China was revealed by an Imperial Headquarters communiqué which said that "owing to the utter lack of sincerity of the French Indo-China authorities," which had rendered the joint defence of Indo-China impossible, Japanese forces in Indo-China had begun "to take the necessary measures" on the night of the 9th March. Domei broadcasts in English from Tokyo (9th and 10th March) made a list of charges against Decoux and his followers, who were said to have removed the Pétainist members of the administration and spoken openly in favour of General de Gaulle and of the approaching liberation of Indo-China. They were accused of having moved troops and supplies so as to be ready to attack the Japanese forces in concert with an invasion of Indo-China by United Nations troops; of assisting American air and naval raids upon Indo-China; and of refusing to hand over to the Japanese American airmen who baled out. Matsumoto had made repeated representations on these matters, but had been accorded no satisfaction, consequently on the 9th March he presented an ultimatum to Decoux; this was rejected and the Japanese military action followed. The Japanese say that some eight hours of fighting took place in Hanoi, but that the native troops went over to them and that the resistance of the remaining French forces was overcome. The leaders of the French administration either voluntarily surrendered to the Japanese or were arrested; those in custody include Decoux himself and the commanders of the French military, naval and air forces. Fighting also took place in Haiphong, Cholon, Langson, Vinh, Saigon and other cities, but in these, too, the Japanese claim that they quickly overcame the resistance. In Hué the Japanese arrested the Resident-Superior of Annam and got control of the Emperor Bao Dai, with the members of his family and his Ministers. A Japanese broadcast in Italian (12th March) said that the lives and property of the French in Indo-China had been guaranteed except in the case of Decoux and other high Government officials. By the 11th March the Japanese military had got control of all Indo-China except in the Dong Dang and Moncay sections along the northern border, where the French forces were still resisting (Domei, 12th March).

The Japanese Diet reconvened on the 11th March and heard a speech by Koiso. He asserted that the pro-Gaullist attitude of the French in Indo-China and the possibility of an enemy attack on this territory had left the Japanese no choice but to take over the defence of the country. The military measures would be kept to the absolute minimum and Japan's policy would be to help the races of Indo-China to attain their independence, in accordance with the principles of the Greater East Asia Joint Declaration.

On the 11th March the Emperor Bao Dai issued a proclamation in which he declared that the Franco-Annamese Treaty of 1886, whereby France secured a protectorate over Annam, was abrogated, and that Annam was henceforth independent. "As a member State of Greater East Asia it would co-operate with Japan with all its power, trusting in the sincerity and goodwill of the Japanese Empire." A report from Hanoi said that representatives of various independence parties had met there and established the "National Federation of Tongking" to secure independence and to co-operate with Japan (Domei, 10th March). The King of Cambodia has also been made to declare his independence of France. But the Japanese are maintaining the French administrative forms; the Japanese military commander is to be Governor-General, with Shunichi Matsumoto as his supreme adviser. Cochin-China, which is a French colony, as distinct from a protectorate, is to have a Japanese governor, Consul-General Minota. The rulers of Annam, Cambodia and Luang Prabang are to have Japanese advisers and Tongking a Japanese Resident-Superior. The Siamese have been told to arrest any French troops or police who seek refuge in their territory and to follow the example of Japan in the treatment of French diplomats and civilians already in Siam. The Siamese have perforce agreed and have temporarily closed the border between Siam and Indo-China.

The Japanese apparently do not regard their action as constituting formal war with France. The Japanese Commander in Indo-China proclaimed that his action was taken only against the existing administration and that, if any French civil servants wished to work for the new régime, they could do so at the same salaries (Indo-China Overseas Service, 10th March). Kusumoto, the Japanese Minister in Peking, said that Japan would not regard France as her enemy (Domei, 10th March). (It should be noted that the French National Committee declared war upon Japan on the 8th December, 1941. See Summary No. 219 under "France.") However, Henri Cosme, the (Vichy-appointed) French Ambassador in Tokyo, has been told by the Japanese that his official activities must cease; French (chiefly Annamese) troops and police in the French Concession in Shanghai have been disarmed, and French private residents in the Japanese-occupied areas of China have been warned to be sparing in their contacts with subjects of third Powers. They have been guaranteed their safety and property, provided they make no attempt to work against the Japanese. Koiso told the Diet that the Japanese Government were ready to approve the restoration to (Nanking) China of the leased territory of Kwanchouwan, which had been administered by the French as a part of the Indo-Chinese Union.

On the 10th March a spokesman of the Ministry of Information in Chungking said that, as soon as the Allies landed in Indo-China, Chinese troops in southern Yunnan would proceed southwards to link up with them. He declared that the native inhabitants of Indo-China would aid the Allies and that some of them had already formed units for guerrilla operations.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The capture of Cologne and the crossing of the Rhine has everywhere been greeted with the wildest joy. Developments on the Western front are seen as marking the "last convulsion of the dying German military machine." While exact predictions concerning the end of the war in Europe are absent, it is felt that anything can now happen and most editorials see the war shortened by months. The popular view is that this present drive, coupled with the Russian crossing of the Oder, "might be the one to deliver the final knockout." Everywhere there is a spirit of buoyant optimism, and there is general agreement, in the words of the St. Louis Star Times, that "the walls of the Reich are falling in; the end may be weeks on months away, but inevitable disaster to Germany is plain." One or two papers are fearful lest this mood lead to a slackening on the home front, and cause serious repercussions on the war in the Far East.

Despite President Roosevelt's expressed preference for man-power legislation which relies on authority rather than on the voluntary method, Congress presents a slightly Gilbertian spectacle of one House undoing the work of the other. The Senate has now sent back to the House a man-power control Bill which calls for co-operation between management, labour and Administration in canalising workers where they are most needed. Penalties for infringement are aimed at employers rather than at employees. This Bill has been labelled "a monstrosity" and "a fatal compromise," while the New York Times has described it as "a grim joke." The House of Representatives, however, is unlikely to accept it and may press for the reconsideration of the May–Bailey (Work-or-Fight) Bill, which it passed and forwarded to the Senate, who, however, preferred their own compromise, in spite of the pleas of the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

A third measure, the Revercomb Bill, is also being mooted. This Bill provides that men of 18 to 45, not employed in direct war work, can be inducted either under the Selective Service system or be directed by the War Manpower Commission to an essential job. The Bill also provides for employment ceilings in factories. Its merit is that it resolves the dispute between the civilian versus the military man-power agencies and makes them jointly responsible. As one or two papers feared, the break-through in the West has engendered great optimism, and approaching victory will not only increase the turnover of personnel in war plants but may well end any chance of a man-power Bill at all, although, as has been pointed out by responsible spokesmen, the United States is still short of soldiers and workers in war plants. The confusing nature of the picture is further emphasised when it is remembered that the House of Representatives, by a vote of 347 to 42, have passed and sent to the Senate a measure proposing the conscription of all unmarried registered nurses up to the age of 45 (see Summary No. 282, p. 21).

Despite Mr. William L. Clayton's remarks at the Mexico City Conference that he "confidently expected" that the Bretton Woods proposals would be accepted, the Administration is vigorously pursuing its policy to make the general public familiar with the issues involved, and the public relations campaign goes from strength to strength. The hearings in the House of Representatives on the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction began on the 7th March. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, the first witness, contended that the world security organisation proposed in the Dumbarton Oaks plan "needs the Bretton Woods agreements." "We cannot say that we will join the other nations in an organisation to maintain peace, but will not help to remove one of the most dangerous causes of war—economic dislocation." This view has been re-echoed by several speakers, notably by Mr. Dean Acheson, Assistant Secretary of the State Department, who maintained that "Bretton Woods is the complement of Dumbarton Oaks." The Wall Street bankers continue their attacks, but the Independent Bankers' Association, comprising 2,000 of the smaller banks, the National Cotton Council and the American Farm Bureau, one of the two most powerful farm groups in the country, have all pledged their support. The Congress of Industrial Organisations and other non-official bodies are assisting the Treasury in conducting a mass education campaign in the press and radio. The Bill itself has been skilfully drafted to disarm critics, and it is possible that before the final vote is taken further modifications, to meet the bankers' criticism, will be accepted.

Without a dissentient vote the Senate has approved the nomination of Mr. Fred M. Vinson as Federal Loan Administrator. In his place as Director of Economic Stabilisation President Roosevelt has appointed Mr. William H. Davis, Chairman of the War Labour Board. Mr. George W. Taylor, Vice-Chairman of the W.L.B., now becomes its Chairman. For several months there has been disagreement between Mr. Davis and Mr. Vinson over so-called fringe-wage increases or, in other words, increases which do not involve basic wages. The recommendations of the War Labour Board that certain groups of industrial workers should receive wage increases for improved output and for being up-graded into higher wage categories have been held up by Mr. Vinson because he feared that to accept them would lead to inflation. Naturally this view has aroused the antagonism of labour and particularly of the Congress of Industrial Organisations, whose members of the W.L.B. have threatened to resign. Congress, however, was delighted with Mr. Vinson's attempt to hold the wage line, and he has in consequence secured the reputation of being economical with public funds. Now that Mr. Davis is the Economic Stabilisation Director it is expected that fringe-wage increases will be immediately granted. The President has also appointed Vice-President Truman as his special link with the Senate on post-war policies. This appointment has caused great pleasure, since Mr. Truman is as popular with the Senate, over which he presides, as Mr. Henry Wallace was apparently unpopular.

Mr. James Byrnes, the Director of War Mobilisation, has created an executive board to investigate the exports of rationed produce. The new committee takes over the job of the War Food Administrations in deciding how the dwindling food reserves of the United States should be allocated among the American armed forces, the civilian population and the Allies. All food exports or contracts for food abroad, other than for essential military purposes, such as Lend-Lease, have been prohibited unless approved by this new Board. Mr. Leo Crowley, Foreign Economic Administrator, will be chairman and the other members will represent the State Department, the War Shipping Administration, the War Production Board, the War Department, the Food Administration and the Navy Department. It has been further announced that supplies of meat, sugar, butter, fats and canned goods in the United States are now at the lowest point in the war. "It must be recognised," said Mr. Byrnes, "that aid in occupied enemy countries may be provided under the existing law only to the extent required in the wake of battle. All other requirements for relief, rehabilitation and other export purposes must then be evaluated against our minimum essential civilian economy. Our foreign commitments must not disrupt our own economy." This view is seen to indicate that Germany has little hope of receiving supplies from America. In certain quarters the opinion has been advanced that stocks in Britain are too large and that they should now be used in part to feed liberated Europe, particularly as there is no longer any serious danger of enemy blockade.

Commander Stassen, one of the three Republican delegates to the San Francisco Conference, has given a national broadcast in which he urged that the United States should join now with the Allies to build a lasting United Nations organisation and to assist in forming a world police force. He proclaimed his faith in a higher level of world government, and even expressed his willingness to curtail national sovereignty. He also maintained that the welfare of America was inseparable from that of the rest of the world. The first reactions to the speech are strongly favourable. It is agreed that Commander Stassen "spoke out boldly," and several papers hail him as the new Willkie. A few papers expressed friendly reservations, but on the whole his speech is unreservedly approved and he is held to have justified his selection as a delegate to the forthcoming Conference.

While no particular enthusiasm is expressed over the formula for the voting in the Security Council, apart from all-out internationalists who express some disappointment at the alleged victory of Marshal Stalin, the plan is accepted by most newspapers as politically practical, particularly as it has the blessing of the Big Three. There is general agreement with the Springfield Republican that "preferential position for the big Powers is inevitable; it is that or nothing." The New York Times emphasises the fact that if the point is reached when a Great Power must be coerced by force, then the peace will already have been lost.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace at Mexico City ended on the 8th March. At a Plenary Session on the 6th March the Conference approved a proposal that centres of subversive influence be eliminated in the Americas and that the Emergency Committee for Political Defence be asked to submit recommendations for the political defence of the Continent after the war. It adopted resolutions providing for the military collaboration of the Republics, for the establishment of a permanent military advisory board, and for government control of the manufacture, distribution and export of armaments. It endorsed the Declaration of Mexico, proclaiming the rights of man and the juridical equality and inviolability of American States, the Act of Chapultepec (described in last week's Summary), and proposals for reorganising the Pan-American Union (see Summary No. 282). It was further resolved that information on the economic, financial and monetary situation of all the Republics be collected for the forthcoming Economic Conference at Washington (see last week's Summary), and that international law be incorporated into national legislation. About fifty other decisions are reported to have been taken.

The parts of the Economic Charter proposed by the United States delegation (see last week's Summary) referring to tariff reductions and the diminution of Government control of industries were much criticised by Brazil, Chile and Uruguay, while Venezuela announced her intention of maintaining exchange control; and major economic decisions have, in point of fact, been postponed.

Chile is reported to have proposed that Canada should be invited to enter the Pan-American Union, and Guatemala "reserved" her "rights" to Belize (British Honduras) in the final act of the Conference.

The Drafting Commission submitted for the approval of the Conference a declaration to the effect that the American Republics were determined to co-operate with each other and with other peace-loving nations in the establishment of a general international organisation, that they desired to harmonise the Inter-American system with that organisation, and that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals constituted a basis for, and a valuable contribution to, such an organisation. This was accompanied by a resolution that the Secretary of the Conference should transmit to the forthcoming San Francisco Conference and the nations invited thereto the views of the American Republics "that did not participate in the Dumbarton Oaks conversations." These include the desirability of amplifying and making more specific the principles and purposes of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, of amplifying the powers of the General Assembly and "harmonising" those of the Security Council with such an amplification, of giving adequate representation to Latin America in the Security Council, and the desirability of solving inter-American controversies by inter-American procedures.

On the 7th March the Conference unanimously approved a resolution regretting that the "Argentine Nation" had not found it possible to take measures that would have permitted its participation in the Conference, but recognising that it was, and always had been, an integral part of the union of American Republics, and expressing a desire that the "Argentine Nation" might find itself able to adhere to the principles and declarations of the Conference. It was hoped that the "Argentine Nation" would identify itself with the common policy of the other American Nations and "orientate its own policy towards incorporation in the United Nations as a signatory of the joint declaration." The final act of the Conference was declared to be open to adhesion by the "Argentine Nation" "in accordance with the criteria set up in this resolution," and Sr. Padilla was authorised to communicate the resolutions of the assembly to the Argentine Government through the Pan-American Union.

There seems to have been some doubt about these "criteria." According to broadcast reports from Buenos Aires, the Brazilian Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs appears to have stated that it would not be necessary for Argentina to declare war in order to secure recognition and that Argentina's adherence to the Act of Chapultepec would bring about the renewal of diplomatic relations "in the near future." In Buenos Aires, the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs had declared to the press (on the same day as the conference passed its resolution affecting his country) that Argentina had always maintained the need for perfecting the system of international co-operation, categorically rejected aggression, and "reaffirmed her determination to remain within the framework of continental solidarity, repudiating any ideology foreign to the Republican and Democratic tradition of the American nations." On the following day he described the conference's invitation to Argentina as "a courteous and honourable formula."

The Argentine Government have suspended postal services with the Axis, and are rumoured to plan to hold elections in September—though such plans are doubtless extremely fluid. The Government obviously desire to give the impression of goodwill without committing themselves to definite action.

The Brazilian Minister is reported to have stated that elections (see Summary No. 283) will be held in September. President Vargas has appointed Sr. João Alberto as Chief of Police: Sr. Alberto may be expected to display forcefulness and some independence of judgment, without the brutality of his predecessor, Sr. Coriolano Goes (see Summary Nos. 249, 256).

The Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the Dominican Republic has announced that the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. was agreed upon on the 8th March.

GERMANY.

THE Rhine continues to be the focal point of the fighting in the west. On the 14th March Hitler's communiqué reported slow progress by the Americans in the Remagen area. On the 15th it announced a "large-scale attack on the Moselle, the Saar and in Lower Alsace," and the Allied crossing of the Moselle was admitted. The home public were told on the 17th that American troops had reached the Cologne–Frankfurt Autobahn from the Remagen bridgehead, and that seasoned units had had to be sent to narrow down and eliminate it. Previously the danger from the bridgehead had been minimised, and the Allied crossing of the Rhine was dismissed as an accident which had come as a surprise to the Allies and was now proving an embarrassment to them. Now, however, a more serious view is taken of the situation. Scheelkopf told his listeners in the Reich on the 18th that this bridgehead constituted a danger for the German defence which was ever present in the minds of the commanders. A "handful of cowardly undutiful men, who in the meantime have met their death," were responsible. The supplement to the communiqué gave the names of these five officers who were sentenced to death by court-martial on charges of cowardice or neglect of duty in the field, "for failing to blow up the bridge at Remagen in good time, or else to defend it with determination." The officers included the commander of the A.A. forces stationed there, and the commander of the Remagen sector (who was sentenced in his absence). Scheelkopf said that the Allies had gained "valuable ground," and reached the Rhine on a very wide front. All recent Allied operations from Holland to Alsace were nothing but a preparation for the Battle of the Rhine.

Krull, for listeners abroad, spoke of the "step-by-step intensification," of the fighting in east and west, and said that the enemy's spring offensive was now, on the whole, synchronised—(a situation which the High Command has been trying hard to avoid).

In the east there was news of a new large-scale Russian attack on East Prussia on the 14th. General Rendulic was said to be in supreme command of formations fighting there, which confirms a report that shortly after the Russian break-through north of Warsaw, Rendulic was transferred from his command in Norway to replace General Reinhardt. Kolberg was holding out in "self-sacrificing fighting against the onslaught of superior Russian forces," said the O.K.W. of the 16th, and these ominous words were followed on the 18th by a report for European listeners that the remnants of the garrison had been embarked. The Transocean agency said that 60,000 women and children, including many refugees from East and West Prussia, were evacuated by sea from Kolberg, and 4,000 by air. The loss of Küstrin was persistently denied at home and abroad.

Front reports give a vivid picture of the devastation caused by Allied bombing. "It is almost impossible," said one observer, "to relate what the Rhineland and its population have suffered. . . . . I have never seen a town so much destroyed as Coblenz. Coblenz, in whose ruined streets there is fighting to-day, is no longer anything more than one large heap of rubble. And on the other side of the Rhine, things look hardly any better." Letters written by the people of these bombed towns in January and February are terrible evidence of the strain under which they live. One woman wrote after a raid on Düsseldorf, to an officer, in despairing tones: "I simply can't go on." Another woman wrote from the Rhineland to her husband that "we might be on the moon here, only it's not so peaceful." Postal and transport services were almost at a standstill, the two schools were hospitals, almost the only traffic in the streets was Red Cross vehicles. A similar picture of conditions, with no light, no post, no papers, no radio, ends in the comment: "Life is scarcely bearable . . . . who knows what lies before us?" A report from Berlin speaks of the serious psychological effects, especially upon older people, of the continued air raids. It also said that the strain of Mosquito raids every night was as effective as a mass daylight raid, that disturbances had already occurred over food distribution and that the authorities feared more serious incidents if raids continued.

Some recent broadcasts to troops on the eastern front have given evidence of the prevalence of desertion. On the 14th March one such broadcast called for "less fake politeness and more simple truth." A man should not be described as a "straggler looking for his superior authority" if, in fact, he was a coward who had run away. On the 16th the D.N.B. Home agency broadcast a long warning to the public not to help deserters. It blamed "enemy agents in German uniform" for stirring up unrest and exerting a "demoralising influence on the German troops." Isolated elements, due not least to the sinister influence of these agents, were deliberately trying to shirk their duty to serve and were becoming deserters. Such persons were "liquidated immediately and ruthlessly." The German people were told that they must not offer shelter to a soldier or give him food or ration cards without the necessary papers. "Any soldier who asks for shelter or food should therefore be directed in a firm and determined manner to the nearest Armed Forces Office." In addition, any strange soldier who appeared in a district, on suspiciously long leave, or without any apparent duties, must be reported to the nearest military authority.

The German peace feeler announced in The Times of the 16th was not the first, as it is not likely to be the last, of such attempts. German propaganda has for some time been very busy suggesting that it is an interest of the Western Allies to forestall a German collapse. Goebbels has often enough tried to split the Allies by insisting that Britain would be the first to suffer from a Russian victory. Seyss-Inquart, in a recent broadcast, described National Socialism as a harmless political creed at the same time as he emphasised the fact that any defeat of Germany would mean a temporary and not a permanent eclipse. The latest attempt at diplomatic contact seems to have been conceived in much the same fashion. The conversation which, after considerable difficulty, took place between Ribbentrop's emissary, Herr Hesse, and a leader of democratic Sudeten refugees in Sweden, apparently lasted four hours, Herr Hesse stressed the effect of bombing by Anglo-American forces and the new wave of hatred which this had enflamed throughout Germany. He suggested that the only way for the Western Allies to avoid "fatal consequences" arising out of this state of things was to conclude with Hitler a peace which would adequately guarantee the continued existence of Germany. No terms of such an offer were mentioned, but unless some such offer were made, Hesse was emphatic that Germany would continue the fight for some time yet, and that, if forced to capitulate, she would do so to Russia rather than to Britain and the United States. He finally expressed a desire to discuss the whole matter either with Mr. Churchill or Mr. Eden or Mr. Bevin.

This "peace offer" was officially ignored, but was communicated to the Governments of the United States and Russia. Having failed, it may well be followed by a similar approach to Russia, for the leaders of Germany are in such a desperate position that they are likely to make every possible effort to make peace on terms which would both preserve Germany intact and would also save themselves.

Evidence of friction between Himmler and Bormann has recently come to hand in a captured circular issued by Bormann in August of last year, in which he instructs Gauleiters how to reply to an enquiry from Himmler. As Minister of the Interior, Himmler had apparently demanded how a Prussian Oberpräsident (also a Gauleiter) had fared in carrying out a circular issued by Bormann which appears to have had reference to a future comb-out. Bormann asks the Gauleiters to give him the required information and to reply to all other requests with the plea that a Gauleiter may not deal directly with supreme Reich authorities but only through the head of the Party Chancery. The circular provides an illustration of the administrative difficulties inherent in the Party-State dualism. The Gauleiter in many cases combines in his own person three separate offices, being always Reich Defence Commissioner, and usually head of the regional administration (Oberpräsident, Reichsstatthalter). He is, that is to say, head of his Party Gau, head of the State Administration of a province and in charge of defence measures in his Gau. In the first of these three offices he is responsible to Bormann, in the other two to Himmler. It is probably not rash to conclude that, in this instance, Bormann is not merely dealing with a routine conflict of competence, but is defending his own authority as head of the Party organisation against the threat of encroachments upon it by Himmler, whose authority had been greatly expanded after the July Putsch.

Another striking example of Bormann's activities is the captured text of a lecture given to the Security Police and circulated to Gauleiters in May of last year on the prevalence of corruption in Germany. This supplies, from an unimpeachable source, first-hand information regarding widespread evasion of war-time controls. The lecturer, whether Bormann or another, chose his most revealing examples from the building trades, such as the supply of inferior material for defence works, faulty execution of drainage plans for aerodromes, poor-quality concrete for shelters and gun emplacements—in fact, a failure to deliver according to agreed specification, which was estimated as costing the Reich "millions if not milliards" of marks. What was a serious enough evil within the Reich he considered to be far more prevalent in the occupied territories, where police measures could not be as effectively enforced. Among the lurid features outlined was the reckless misappropriation of supplies for the German army in Roumania. The remedies sounded rather feeble, amounting to little more than a hope that, realising the danger, controlling authorities would act more energetically in future.

Yet control of any kind in the Reich is more difficult now than in 1944 and there are certain indications that the increasing corruption and venality of officials is still alarming high quarters. A recent report stated that Mutschmann, the Gauleiter of Saxony, and thus probably one of those to whom Bormann sent the lecture, is being watched by the Gestapo for complicity in such practices.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

President Beneš arrived in Moscow on the 17th March. Among those who met him at the air-port were MM. Molotov and Vyshinsky, representatives of the Czechoslovak colony, and members of the diplomatic corps in Moscow. Dr. Beneš's brief and formal speech on stepping from the plane was made in Russian. At present it is expected that the President will leave the Russian capital for Košice before the end of March.

The Red Army recorded further progress into the interior of Slovakia from the south with the liberation of Zvolen, described in a Stalin order of the day as a key-point in the German defence of the Hron, on the 14th March. Subsequent Soviet communiqués have announced further advances to the west and south-west of Zvolen. In the north, the Bratislava Government has claimed that the Russians have been forced out of Liptavský Svatý Mikuláš which was reported as taken by the Red Army last week. On the 17th March the Soviet communiqué reported that the Red Air Force had bombed Moravská Ostrava during the previous night.

The 14th March, the sixth anniversary of independent Slovakia, was celebrated by an order of the day from Tiso and speeches and articles by the leading members of his Government. All these were in familiar language and covered familiar ground. The anniversary of the Protectorate on the following day was signalised in the same way, the most important event being a long radio speech by Moravec extolling the benefits the Czechs had received from German protection. Hitler paid both Tiso and Hácha the compliment of a congratulatory telegram to mark the occasions.

On the 16th March the Soviet European Service broadcast an account of conditions in liberated Slovakia. The Praskovice metal-workers have been re-equipped and have resumed work; three tobacco factories, a glass factory and a paper-mill are operating again; all the technical workshops and mills in Košice are working; and railway traffic has been restored on some lines.

The London Czechoslovak Communist weekly of the 17th March published a report of the first conference of the united Communist Party of Slovakia, held in Košice on the 28th February. The main speech was made by Dr. Gustav Husák, deputy-chairman of the Party's central committee, who laid down the Slovak Communists' programme. According to this report Dr. Husák made the following points: the Czechoslovak Republic should be a popular democratic republic of two equal peoples, the Czechs and the Slovaks; the Slovak people fully respect the will of the Carpathian Ukrainians to join the Soviet Union; the equality of the Slovaks should be expressed by means of a Slovak democratic Parliament which would decide all Slovak matters not touching the joint interests of the two peoples; there can be no discussion about frontiers, the frontiers of 1938 being "inviolable and indivisible"; the Communist Party of Slovakia desires a national front with the widest possible representation of all sections of the Slovak people, but the Agrarian Party must perish along with the Hlinka Party; the land should be returned to those who work on it; the Communists stand for religious freedom and are willing to collaborate with the democratic representatives of the Church.

POLAND.

The Polish Government in London issued on the 15th March the text of a note which had been delivered three days before to the British, United States, and Chinese Governments protesting against the fact that it had received no invitation to the San Francisco Conference. The note suggested that this was "the first disquieting case of the right to veto of a Great Power." Actually the omission is a necessary consequence of the fact that the Polish Government is not recognised by all the Powers sponsoring the invitations and of the agreement reached by the Three Powers at Yalta, that they would endeavour to bring about "a new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity" which all could recognise. It would for obvious reasons be desirable that the new Government should be formed and secure the recognition of the Allied Powers in time for it to attend the Conference; but it is a familiar experience that the implementation of such agreements after a long war takes much longer than the time spent in framing them. Time has necessarily to be spent in agreeing on the interpretation to be placed on such phrases as "The Provisional Government which is now functioning in Poland should, therefore, be reorganised on a broader democratic basis with the inclusion of democratic leaders from Poland itself and from Poles abroad." It is indeed obvious that discussion may arise over the criteria to be followed in deciding who are to be classed as democratic leaders. Are they to be necessarily persons who have been recognised leaders of the parties as they were before September 1939? Or may one or other of the groups to be consulted put forward new names, unknown to the other groups? Is it desirable, or not, to insist that persons called for consultation should have declared themselves unequivocally in favour of the Yalta Agreement? Should persons who have supported the "Sanacja" (the pre-war Polish Government), or taken part in M. Arciszewski's Government, or been members of the Nationalist Party, be excluded. All such questions clearly have to be decided between the three Governments represented on the Moscow Commission before consultations with Poles can begin.

Moreover, it has been suggested that the phrasing of the communiqué implies the giving of a prior right of consultation to the Warsaw Administration about the other democratic leaders to be included in the new Government. It seems, however, that such an interpretation would clash with the primary object of the relevant section of the Yalta Agreement, as stated in its first paragraph, which is the formation of "a new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity."

Time is of importance, not only because Polish representation at San Francisco hangs on it, but because the internal administration in Poland, and the situation of the Parties there, are rapidly developing; while all delay in forming a united Provisional Government lengthens the time of suspense, during which the officials appointed in Poland by the London Government, the Party leaders and members who give allegiance to it, and the various agents hitherto employed by it, remain in an acute dilemma, having either to renounce it, or be liable to find themselves suspect of some form of disobedience to the de facto civil or military authorities in the country.

Some significance may certainly be attached to two fresh Party developments. In Poland it is reported that a group belonging to the Nationalist Party has decided to throw in its lot with the Warsaw Administration. In London an important group of the Polish Socialist Party, led by the former Minister of Labour, M. Stanczyk, has renounced allegiance to M. Arciszewski's Cabinet and indicated its sympathy with M. Mikolajczyk.

SOVIET UNION.

There is less to record from the Soviet-German front than for many weeks. The Red Army is pressing hard upon Königsberg, Danzig and Gdynia. Kolberg, the last German stronghold on the Pomeranian coast, was captured on the 18th March. Zvolen, in Slovakia, fell on the 14th March. Heavy fighting has continued between Lake Balaton and Budapest.

Attacks on General Franco have recently been renewed. The supplement to the Soviet communiqué of the 9th March contained an account of the capture of two soldiers from the Spanish Legion on the Second Ukrainian Front. Thus, according to this report, all the while that Spain was advertising her neutrality a Spanish Legion was fighting against Yugoslav patriots and against the Red Army in its campaign to liberate Czechoslovakia. A Soviet broadcast in Spanish of the same day again denounced Munoz Grandes and Esteban Infantes, former commanders of the Blue Division, as war criminals. M. Hoffman, in Krasnaya Zvezda of the 16th March, attacked Spanish Falangist intrigues in Latin America. "The Blue Legion [sic], with its headquarters in Innsbrück and its soldiers on the Soviet–German front, with the Falange reaching out tentacles like an octopus into Latin America—this is how neutral Madrid envisages international co-operation." There was also an article on the same theme in Trud.

Events in Roumania have continued to be the subject of much comment in the Soviet press, and British adverse treatment of the new Government has not been allowed to pass unobserved; Alastair Forbes, of the Daily Mail, for example, was said to be playing straight into the hands of Goebbels, who was already shedding copious tears over the fate of MM. Maniu and Bratianu. Roumania was now linked with Yugoslavia and Bulgaria as a country well on the road to putting the Crimea decisions into practice, and Pravda and Izvestiya, in long admonitory articles, made very clear the hope that the forthcoming elections would bring Finland also into line (for details see under "Finland"). It was announced on the 17th March that the Soviet-Finnish Commission had completed the demarcation of the Porkkala–Udd area ceded to the U.S.S.R.

The People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs has now told the Greek Ambassador in Moscow that a Soviet Ambassador is not at present to be sent to Greece. It had been stated at the beginning of January that M. Mikhail Sergeyev had been appointed to this post, so this holding it in abeyance may be connected with the increasingly unfavourable Soviet view of the present Greek Government. M. Sergeyev has now been appointed Soviet Ambassador to Belgium (Tass, 20th March).

Current rumours of a new Soviet-Vatican rapprochement have been officially repudiated from the Russian side; Tass (14th March) issued a denial of reports put out in the Rome bulletin Servizio Informazioni to the effect that negotiations were proceeding between the Soviet Union and the Vatican for the conclusion of an agreement, Great Britain and the United States acting as mediators (for Vatican denials see under "Vatican").

The Soviet Overseas Service in Persian recently introduced a new note in its regular admonitions to Persia. The latter country was told to take warning from recent events in Roumania. "Disgraced generals who are only Fascist idiots [sic] and reactionary elements associated with the police and army were preparing a Fascist coup d'Etat. These intriguers built up stocks of arms and were attacking the democratic elements. The nation's blood was shed in Bucharest and in other Roumanian towns. Is Persia's present position different from that described here?" Strong language subsequently described the reactionary elements, "feudalists, the superstitious and the supporters of the Reza Shah régime" who are alleged to be aiming at cutting the bonds uniting Persia to the Soviet Union and "are the country's enemies."

(See also under "Latin America.")

Writing in Izvestiya, M. Korovin, a Professor of International Law, commented with asperity on critics of the voting procedure in the world security organisation. "While aggressive nations and States exist on the earth," he said, "real and not fictitious international equality can be assured to weak States not by proclaiming juridical 'equalisation'—which failed disgracefully in the inglorious practice of the Versailles League of Nations—but by charging the strong peace-loving States with full responsibility . . . ." The Fascist international bandits were charged with doing everything possible to frustrate the effective organisation of world security, "using for this purpose the well-tried weapon of filthy lies and slander." "It is worth while noticing," the article concluded, "the striking similarity between German arguments and the criticism of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals coming from certain allies and neutral circles (American Isolationists, the Hearst press, Lewis, the Vatican, De Valera, Yalcin and others)."

SCANDINAVIA.

The true attitude of a large section of the Finnish nation to the election which has just been concluded is probably accurately reflected in the current epigram reported from Helsinki—"If it goes badly it goes well, and if it goes well it goes badly." The choice of the electors has been left quite free, in the sense that a man driving along a precipice is at liberty, if he chooses, to leave the road. In practice, his course is prescribed unless his intentions are suicidal, but he may none the less dislike the road which he is following. The necessity for allaying Soviet distrust by a complete reorientation of policy, and the view that this new policy demanded new men and a rejection of those associated with the errors of the past, was strongly emphasised by M. Paasikivi in a speech broadcast on the 15th March. The moral was reinforced by articles in Pravda (12th March) and Izvestiya (16th March), both organs of the Soviet Union strongly supporting the election claims of the Democratic League and adopting its view that practically all alternative parties were tainted with fascism. The electorate was left in no doubt as to the line which it would be prudent to follow.

In these circumstances, there was little substance in the complaint put forward by the Democratic League that it was unfairly handicapped by lack of electoral machinery and of newspapers championing its cause. In the latter respect, indeed, the group has had since last November the influential papers Vapaa Sana and Vapaa Pohjola as official supporters, while Kansan Sanomat, organ of the Finland–Soviet Society, could be relied on to throw its weight on the same side, and apart from these at least three new papers have recently been started—Kansan Ääni in Vasa, Uusi Nuoriso in Tampere, and the Swedish-language Folktidningen in Helsinki. Any possible handicap was moreover compensated by an arrangement which gave the group an allowance of six periods in the party election broadcasts, as against two for each of the parties opposed to it.

Its prospects were further improved by the disintegration of the old Social-Democrat Party, so predominant in the last election; apart from those members who have seceded to the Democratic League, it also suffers from an opposition within its own ranks, led by Fagerholm, Kallinen, Voionmaa and Wirtanen. This, though sufficiently distinct to be allowed separate representation in the pre-election broadcasts and to indulge in criticism of the official leaders of the Party, still claims to be an integral part of it. Its spokesman on the 16th March rather naïvely admitted that it could not be called a completely united group, since as to the reasons for its creation there existed as many different opinions as there were men composing it. Its existence, however, was obviously detrimental to solidarity.

Considered against this background, the success of the Democratic League, though greater than was generally forecast, is not perhaps surprising. Most of the seats which it has captured seem to have been at the expense of its proletarian rival, the Social Democrats, who have none the less succeeded in running more or less neck and neck with it for the position of the strongest single party in the new Riksdag. Final figures are not yet available, but the Social Democrats are credited with 52 or 53 seats, and the Democratic League with 50 or 51. The Agrarian Party, while it has lost 8 or 9 of the seats it held in the previous Riksdag, still follows pretty closely with 47 or 48 seats. The other Parties of the bourgeois bloc substantially retain their former strength, a fact which indicates a considerable degree of real independence in the voting of the electorate. Unless—as seems unlikely—the rival representatives of the proletariat unite, they can be outvoted by a combination of the Coalition, Agrarian, Progressive and Swedish Parties, even though the component parts of this bloc, considered separately, have none of them a representation equal to either of the groups or Parties of the Left. How far such a situation is likely to be viewed with satisfaction by the Soviet Union or its Finnish protégés remains an open question at the time of writing.

Turning to the rest of Scandinavia, the principal recent events have taken place in Norway, where, on the 14th March, an outstanding act of sabotage destroyed the main (east) station of Oslo, together with the buildings containing the German central administration of all Norwegian railways, while at the same time communications were disrupted by the destruction of numerous lines, bridges and rail crossings on the Östfold, Vestfold and Sörland railways. A considerable number of casualties were caused among the German personnel.

The Germans were quick to react to this occurrence with their customary severity and lack of civilised justice; on the 17th March it was announced that fourteen death sentences had been passed and executed on persons none of whom was accused of complicity in the action in question, though it was claimed that all were in fact saboteurs.

Norway was again prominent in the news on the 19th March, when the information was released that some 525 Norwegians had been rescued and removed to this country by British warships from the island of Söröy, west of Hammerfest, after preliminary arrangements had been made on the spot by an advance party of Norwegians.

LOW COUNTRIES.

M. van Acker has won a great victory. The new Special Powers Bill (see last Summary) has become law after passing the Chamber by 125 to 1 and 8 abstentions and the Senate by 119 to 2 and 2 abstentions. The passing of the Bill will inevitably increase the prestige of the Belgian Prime Minister, who has shown firmness, calm and good temper in a serious crisis. The popularity of the Government in general has also been increased by the publication of a new rationing table for the period the 17th March–15th April, which announces that the fat ration has been appreciably raised. Much of the credit for this will naturally accrue to the Communist Minister of Food, M. Lalamand. But he has been criticised in several quarters because the new table was published by the Drapeau Rouge a day before it had appeared in the official Moniteur or in any other paper.

As an inducement to the Belgian farmers to increase the output of food-stuffs they have been promised higher prices. The consumer, however, will not have to pay more, as the Government will subsidise the production of food.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 14th March, Mr. Churchill expressed the deep concern and sympathy which was felt for the Dutch people in their present ordeal and admiration of the magnificent spirit shown by them in the still occupied areas in resisting the repeated efforts of the enemy to exploit their distress. Though unfortunately we could do little to bring immediate relief to the occupied areas, we had already facilitated certain relief shipments through the blockade by the International Red Cross Committee and the Swedish Government and the possibility of extending such shipments was being urgently considered. A considerable stock of essential food-stuffs had also been accumulated which would be sent into Western Holland with all possible speed as soon as the Germans were driven out.

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle followed up a brief statement on the 11th March on the Japanese coup in Indo-China (see last Summary under "Far East") with a broadcast on the 14th March. He paid a tribute to the brave Frenchmen and Indo-Chinese who had made a stand under desperate conditions in 1940 and 1941 when Allied help could not be given, condemned Vichy's policy of renunciation, and maintained that France had never wavered in her resolve to free Indo-China. "To-day the struggle . . . . in Indo-China goes on in accordance with the Government's plan and under the orders of the leaders nominated by it." It was not only France's fault that the forces which she had long prepared to assist Indo-China had not been brought into line side by side with those of the Allies. France's honour was at stake and so was the future of Indo-China.

Though it would appear that by the 17th March the large Japanese forces, estimated at 45,000, were virtually in complete control, French resistance was continuing. Indeed, on the night of the 16th March an official French communiqué stated that resistance was developing according to established plans and civilian elements had joined French troops engaged in guerrilla operations.

M. Teitgen, the Minister of Information, at a Press Conference on the 16th March dealing with San Francisco, said that France supported the system of collective security which all civilised nations had striven for since 1914. In submitting amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, as modified at Yalta, the French aimed at being constructive and achieving co-ordination between the collective security system and bilateral agreements. He rejoiced that the United States was determined to enter an organisation for collective peace; but while that organisation still remained rudimentary, "particular securities" must not be sacrificed to it.

The Financial Agreements concluded between France and Belgium (see Summary No. 282) have been followed by a Financial Agreement between the French and Swiss Governments which was approved by the Cabinet on the 13th March (see below under "Switzerland"). The French Government's ordinances of the 15th and 17th January on exchange control are reported in the French and British press to be causing some alarm in foreign business circles in France since they prohibit the acquisition by foreigners, or corporate bodies including foreigners, of real estate or stocks and shares, and compel French banks, &c., to disclose all assets they hold for account of foreigners. It is, however, stated in the preamble that these measures will not be applied rigidly and that they will be relaxed in favour of residents in countries with which agreements on exchange control have been made. It is generally expected that a Franco-British Financial Agreement will soon be concluded.

One of the issues raised in the recent Information debate was the supply of newsprint. On this point the Minister of Industrial Production made no attempt to defend the muddle which had led to the refusal of a United Kingdom offer in January, and paid a tribute to the assistance given by the Economic Adviser to His Majesty's Ambassador in securing a renewal of the offer. This offer was confirmed by Mr. Eden when, in reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 14th March, he stated that in response to urgent French appeals, British newspapers had agreed to make 2,000 tons of newsprint available for immediate shipment to France. This addition should suffice to cover essential French needs pending the arrival of consignments which the French are expecting from South America.

The hostility shown by the Communists and a number of Resistance representatives to M. Teitgen (see last Summary), brought out the Mouvement Republicain Populaire (the Catholic Left) in defence of one of their Ministers and sharpened the opposition between them and the rest of the Resistance and of the Left. In this connexion, a recent decision of the Finance Committee of the Consultative Assembly is of considerable importance: by 16 votes to 7 it decided to recommend the cessation of the subsidies to Church schools (écoles libres), which were established by Vichy and have been provisionally continued by the present Government. M. Mauriac and others have pleaded in the press against the reintroduction of the anti-clerical issue into the arena of French politics; and the National Education Committee, while drafting a resolution asking for the famous Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques to be nationalised, is reported to be seeking in the matter of the (Catholic) écoles libres a solution such as would preserve the unity achieved in the Resistance while returning to the "objective secular spirit of the Republic." As so often before, it would seem, however, that a major issue has been raised by the educational question, and one which looks like swinging the "Catholic Left," who almost alone represent Catholic elements in French political life for the present, further towards the "Right."

The number of French prisoners liberated by the Red army in its advance (see Summary No. 280) is still uncertain, but some are already on their way home. On the Western Front, also, considerable numbers are being liberated and trainloads are arriving daily in Paris. The Government has made detailed arrangements for their reception, rehabilitation and re-employment but these are frequently criticised in the press as inadequate.

The first of the treason trials held by the High Court of Justice in Paris ended on the 15th March when Admiral Esteva, French Resident-General in Tunisia under Vichy, was condemned to life imprisonment, military degradation, national degradation and the confiscation of his property. Extenuating circumstances were admitted on the grounds that he had liberated patriots imprisoned in Tunis and had aided Allied subjects to escape before the arrival of the Germans. But the charge of treason was maintained on the ground that he had recruited labour and soldiers for the Germans, that he had incited Free Frenchmen to desert and had replied to Ribbentrop's letter of congratulation on his conduct during the Tunisian campaign.

SWITZERLAND.

One aspect of the recent economic negotiations which has been particularly welcomed is that they have put an end to the difficulties with France, which had political as well as economic bearings. The holdings in Switzerland of persons resident in France, which have been frozen since July 1940, will remain so and the French Government will be consulted before any change is made. This is a matter to which the French Government attaches much importance.

Professor Burckhardt, the newly-appointed Minister to France, has recently visited Germany, in his capacity of President of the International Committee of the Red Cross, to discuss with the German authorities the organisation of the transport of food, medical supplies and clothing for prisoners of war and internees of all nationalities and also the possibility of certain exchange measures.

The economic agreement with Germany, which had expired, is not being renewed, but the present clearing machinery will be maintained.

Relations have been re-established with Italy and Czechoslovakia, recognition having been withdrawn from the representative of the Slovak Government of Tiso.

SPAIN.

On the 23rd February the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires left at the Foreign Office a second letter from General Franco acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Churchill's letter of the 15th January. The tone is friendly—to the conventional courtesies at the end Franco added in his own hand the expression of his "particular esteem"—and it is quite clear that he has not understood the implications of the Prime Minister's letter. He still professes to consider that only some further "clarification" is needed to enable His Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government to reach agreement. Such monumental misunderstanding, however Machiavellian it may seem, is quite genuine. Everything goes to show that Franco really does believe a very great deal of what he says. He is perfectly satisfied with his war record, having successfully emulated that chieftain of whom the First Player in Hamlet said—

> "So as a painted tyrant Pyrrhus stood
> And, like a neutral to his will and matter, and he feels that there is no reason why, with the support of Great Britain and the United States, he should not safely guide Spain in the critical days of world peace. Franco is impervious to chilling words. They certainly mean less to him than to most citizens, for the increase of political executions recently reported signifies not only an astonishing self-confidence in the interpretation of justice, but a blindness to world opinion which, if it were not Spanish, would be disconcerting.
> Did nothing";

The arrival in Madrid of Mr. Norman Armour, the new United States Ambassador, gives additional force to the joint policy of His Majesty's Government and the United States Government towards the anomalous Spain of to-day which may well become the equivocal Spain of to-morrow. Joint diplomatic action in Madrid will continue to impress upon Franco that, while we have the friendliest of feelings towards the Spanish people, we dislike the present Government and the Falange, whom we consider an obstacle to good relations. But it is for the Spanish people themselves to decide what régime shall succeed Franco; and the nature of that Government is no more predictable than the date of its taking office. Franco's position is as strong as ever, and it will not be destroyed by the mere expression of disapproval.

When the Marquis of Santa Cruz presented General Franco's acknowledgement of the Prime Minister's reply, he said that he had received instructions to seek an early interview with the Secretary of State in order to discuss Anglo-Spanish relations. He was apparently instructed to express regret that the Spanish Government's recent attempts to improve relations had not been as successful as they would have wished, and he enquired what further steps His Majesty's Government would like to see the Spanish Government take. This is realistic enough, but the Spanish Government cannot expect His Majesty's Government to solve their problem for them.

Realism, as opposed to what the Spaniards like to call quixotry, is shown, too, in an anti-Japanese campaign which was launched in the Spanish press on St. Patrick's Day and which will be treated more fully in next week's Summary. This will hardly serve as a back door to San Francisco, but it looks like a determined attempt in the sphere of foreign policy to anticipate the sort of demand which is never likely to be made. One paradox of the Spanish problem to-day is that in the field of foreign policy, where Franco is most willing to make concessions, there is really little of serious importance to complain about—unless, of course, one is a member of the Soviet Government; it is the régime itself and the horrid working of the Falange upon Spanish minds and bodies that stinks to high heaven—" and that," in effect, says Franco, " is my business." But it is not his business alone, for the Falange régime is a magnet for mischief, a potential centre of infection of danger to the outside world. How and when this fact will impinge upon the mind of Francisco Franco is one of the most interesting political questions in Europe to-day.

ITALY.

On the 4th March the National Committee of the Christian Democrat party unanimously approved a declaration which stated that the most important question of the moment was whether the reconstruction of the new Italian State was to take place " with the people, for the people and by the people." The people must realise their responsibility and help to build up this new State, but in order to do this the people must be able to make free decisions. Any resort to force, violence or dictatorship must be vetoed at the outset, particularly if originating from active minorities, who, taking advantage of the present confused situation, may try to present the solution of fundamental questions to the people as accomplished facts, questions which only the Constituent Assembly should decide, as has already been agreed by all parties. If democracy is to mean anything in Italy every current of democratic opinion must combine to bring this about, since " democracy " will be judged by the outcome.

The same applies to the economic situation. Everyone must help to rebuild their devastated country. Italy will, however, need the help of the Allies, particularly as regards machinery and raw materials. " These vital requirements and the need for safeguarding the national frontiers in their essential lines will define the direction of a responsible foreign policy." The declaration concludes by saying that now that Italy has resumed friendly relations with France, she turns her eyes to the opposite shore of the Adriatic " with the same sentiments and aspirations."

The Liberal party paper, Risorgimento Liberale, has published a protest against alleged Communist interference with Liberal party meetings and asks Signor Togliatti, as Head of the Communist party, as well as other members of the Government, to put a stop to this state of affairs. Risorgimento Liberale adds that the Party's patience is exhausted and that it is determined to oppose any recourse to violence with all its strength. Unità, the Communist party organ, while denying any responsibility, accuses the Liberal party of lack of zeal in the complete purge of Fascist elements, elements who were not only responsible for the escape of Roatta, but who were secretly doing their best to keep Fascism alive. According to Unità, disciplined democracy and a static Government in Italy depend upon the destruction of Fascism, and if agitation and discontent exist amongst the people it is because " some people " have not understood the truth of this. Avanti, the Socialist party paper, considers the Liberal party's championing of public liberties to be ridiculous, and reminds the Liberals that it was the workers who assumed this rôle during the Fascist Régime. If liberty is threatened, says Avanti, there are better men to defend it than Liberal reactionaries, who are merely cloaking the defence of their privileges in this new warlike attitude.

The Head of the Government Press Office made a statement to the press on the 13th March. Recent events had shown that a danger still existed from underground Fascist elements. The Government were determined to take energetic steps to suppress any form of Fascist revival and would immediately put into force the decree which provided for the internment of anyone who was considered to be pro-Fascist or even of doubtful political views.

Filippo Anfuso, at present the Fascist Republican Government's Ambassador to Berlin and the most prominent diplomat who adhered to the Fascists, has been appointed Fascist Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in succession to Serafino Mazzolini, who died in February. Anfuso was sentenced to death for treachery on the 12th March by the Italian High Court of Justice.

THE VATICAN.

On the 18th March the Pope spoke to great crowds of Romans who had taken part in the Lenten mission. Many diplomats were also present. Two of his references to the international situation were significant. He condemned the " Servile docility of those who had allowed themselves to be led astray by the advocates of violence," and urged them to a " definite repudiation of absolute nationalism, of pride in race and blood," &c. This is a striking departure from the Pope's previous attitude to the question of a people's responsibility for its Government. Before his Christmas Eve message he seemed to regard a people as the innocent subjects of its Government. Now he accepts the logical consequences of his Christmas Eve distinction between a " people " and a " mass," and sees the relations between Government and people as the Western Democracies see them, as a living interdependence. " Reconciliation between the peoples can only endure if carried out in a spirit of truth and justice, loyalty and generosity." He then went on to what many will interpret as a condemnation of Russian policy. " We would be loath to say that there is anyone who takes advantage of the present situation to derive personal profit from the organisation of peace against all rules of justice. Such a one could pose for a time as one who contributed to deliver the world from oppression. He is, in fact, to be classed with those who betrayed the expectations of the peoples, on whom untold sufferings had conferred inviolable rights."

The United States press has been filled with Edward J. Flynn's " mission " to Moscow, where he is supposed to be working for a Vatican and Russian agreement. The mystery surrounding this " mission " is described in the New York Daily News of the 7th March: " Do you want to see the dignified worthies of the White House and the State Department turn hand springs and utter goose calls? Ask them just what former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, white-haired, world-travelled Edward Joseph Flynn, was doing in Russia when the Great White Father and Winston Churchill talked things over at Yalta." Rumours of Vatican–Soviet negotiations spread, and in the Figaro of the 13th March, Vladimir D'Ormesson, former French Ambassador at the Vatican, thought an agreement not impossible; for the " Vatican had never countenanced the Germans' ideological crusade in defence of Christendom."

The Vatican would welcome an agreement guaranteeing to the Roman Catholics in Russia and within Russian spheres freedom of organisation and of communication with Rome. For long the Vatican has had no news of Church life in Poland, the Baltic States and Finland. Only from Bulgaria can the Apostolic Delegate still communicate with the Vatican in cypher. The Vatican's great anxiety over Poland may be judged from an article in the Osservatore Romano of the 14th March, which describes the repressions and confiscations of the Lublin Committee. All the same, the Vatican has officially denied recent rumours of negotiations with U.S.S.R., and has no knowledge of Mr. Flynn's mission. For a Tass denial, see under " U.S.S.R."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

The German offensive in Hungary, after gaining little ground, was brought to a standstill about the 17th March. It had cost the enemy 20,000 officers and men and 600 tanks, self-propelled guns, &c. The Soviets explained this costly effort by the German need to retain the oil and bauxite of West Hungary; and also important secret industries said to be located north of Lake Balaton. The agricultural resources of the area were also used for Germany's food supply. After the 18th March the Red Army, assisted by Bulgarian troops and by Allied bombing, resumed the initiative on the Balaton front and against the bridgehead established by the Germans across the Drave.

The main preoccupations of the Debrecen Government remained the same. Radio Kossuth announced on the 15th March that any soldier crossing over from the Szálasi side would not be detained, but given the free choice of enlisting voluntarily in the new army or returning to his home and resuming civilian work. M. Fedorov, however, in his "commentary," issued a pointed warning that there was no room in the new army for "repentant Fascists" and that professional solidarity must not whitewash war criminals as repentant sinners.

The Budapest National Committee has set up a Committee to investigate Fascist atrocities. Its chairman is B. Várga, Vice-President of the Smallholders' Party. It contains one Communist and two Social Democrats, but most of its members are University teachers, medical men, including some of the most famous in Hungary, or prelates, including the Director of the Actio Catholica. The People's Courts have passed some more sentences. Reported arrests include that of A. Jaross, Minister of Interior under Sztojay at the time of the Jewish deportations for which his Ministry was responsible. The Szálasi Government had reported him as speaking in the rump Parliament in Szombathely only a day or two before Radio Kossuth announced his arrest in Budapest.

Parliament is to be convened for the 5th April, if possible in Budapest. It will have before it, amongst other measures, the Land Reform Bill, and Deputies are to be elected to represent Budapest and other liberated areas.

A private source gives the Party affiliations of the present 230 Deputies as follows: Communists, 68; Smallholders, 59; Social Democrats, 34; National Peasants, 13; Democrats, 10; Independents, 19; various small parties, 27. The Communists are to be divided into two groups: the "orthodox" or "international" Communists, who want complete obedience to Moscow, and the "Hungarian" or "national" Communists, a group founded in the summer of 1944, mostly from ex-Social Democrats, who want to "communise and democratise the Hungarian social order," but on the basis of an independent Hungary. Of the Ministers, Nagy is an "Orthodox" Communist; Molnár is probably a "National"; the affiliation of Gábor is unknown.

Roumania.

The strictness of the censorship has prevented news from Roumania from reaching this country for some time past. During last week notes on events in Roumania began to appear in English newspapers, and on Wednesday Mr. Eden made a statement in the House of Commons. In the American press accounts were much fuller and in general the information supplied to American papers was accurate. Roumania is regarded as a suitable test case for Yalta conclusions. The United States Ambassador at Moscow has been instructed to ask for a conference to be held forthwith at Moscow on the Roumanian situation, with particular reference to the necessity of setting up a coalition Government until elections can be held. This proposal, in which His Majesty's Government has joined with the United States, has been definitely rejected by the Soviet Government on the ground that the present democratic Government of Roumania (which, according to all except Russian reports, is in fact a minority Government) has restored order in the country and that the situation does not call for any special action by the Allied Governments.

The celebrations at Cluj on the occasion of the setting up of Roumanian administration in Northern Transylvania have been duly held and written up in the Roumanian press. These enthusiastic accounts do not altogether square with the observations of eye-witnesses. It appears that about 80 per cent. of those present were Hungarians, the King looked off-colour and depressed, and declined to make a speech, and although banners were paraded in the usual manner with captions demanding the "arrest of the assassins, Radescu and Maniu," these aroused little interest amongst the crowds.

The promised land reform has been started by the simple method of allowing Peasants' Committees to confiscate and divide up land in their neighbourhoods. This was the method adopted in Russia when the large estates were expropriated. The aim is to provide holdings of 12½ acres. At first sight this move looks as if it might produce considerable popularity for Grozea's Government, but as the last land reform showed the mere possession of land without either implements or capital is apt to leave the proprietor worse off than before.

The Prefect of the Bucarest Police has announced that, in order to maintain order, a new organisation of mixed patrols is to be created to be known as "Citizen's Guards." This ingenious dodge has the look of conferring official status on the Communist Party guards, who were allowed to retain arms when the other Party guards were disarmed.

It is reported but not yet confirmed that Maniu has retired from the leadership of the Peasants' Party. It is felt both amongst the adherents of this and of the Liberal Party that under present conditions there is no future for them, unless the party organisation is adapted to meet Soviet wishes.

Yugoslavia.

Mr. Stevenson arrived and reopened His Majesty's Embassy at Belgrade on the 12th March. Recognition of the present Yugoslav Government is implicit in the ambassador's arrival. Dr. Ribar, President of A.V.N.O.J., has decorated Brigadier MacLean, head of the British Military Mission, with the Partisan Star, First Class, and expressed the deepest gratitude to the Brigadier and to Great Britain for the assistance received from them.

Petrovitch, the Minister for Trade, has stated that the Allied Military Liaison's civilian supplies have alleviated the distress in Dalmatia, but not in the interior, from lack of vehicles. He also asserted that, whereas the agreement of the 19th January provided for 60,000 tons a month, only 10,000 tons had reached Yugoslavia by the 7th March. In fact the agreement does not mention any specific amounts. For the interim figures for supplies delivered by the 7th March see Summary No. 283, p. 13. Mr. Stevenson stated to the Belgrade press on the 17th that over 15,000 tons of supplies had been delivered.

A meeting of leaders of the Serb Agrarian Party has resolved to adhere to the National Liberation Front. The leaders concerned were mainly Serbs from outside Serbia. The resolution condemned Gavrilovitch, hitherto leader of the Party and now in London; and a new Party committee has been elected.

Shubashitch, now Foreign Minister, has expressed the hope that "freedom from fear" can be attained by an early restoration of the regular courts of law, when the so-called "people's courts" could disappear.

Tito, emphasising the severity of the fighting in Srem, has said that the Yugoslavs have 70,000 wounded in hospital. He estimates Mihailovitch's chetniks in North Bosnia at 16,000, armed with light weapons. (The figure may well be considerably higher.) The Belgrade press asserts that a number of Bosnian chetnik leaders, and Ljotitch, who collaborated with the Germans in Serbia, are in North-East Istria with their followers. Their propaganda line is that the British will come and restore King Peter.

The civil mobilisation proclaimed in Macedonia covers all persons, of both sexes, from 16 to 65, and all factories, businesses, &c. Foreign persons and concerns are not exempt. At the same time elections for local National Liberation Committees are being held in Macedonia. The ballot is stated to be secret, but it is made clear that the voters will be able to choose only between candidates acceptable to the régime. Meanwhile Macedonian agents in Sofia and Belgrade are reported to be working for the immediate creation of a customs union between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. The view of the British Government concerning any such plans is that treaties between Balkan States, especially exclusive ones, should not be made till conditions are more settled, and that Bulgaria, with undischarged obligations to Greece, cannot be treated as though already rehabilitated.

Greece.

Athenian newspapers of the 15th March carried messages to the Greek Government from three islands of the Dodecanese, Symi, Nisyros and Astypalaia, which announced that the population of these islands had unanimously proclaimed their union with Mother Greece and asked that representatives of the Greek Government be sent there forthwith. These messages, which had been handed to General Plastiras by representatives of the Dodecanese Association, were given to the Press by his "chef de cabinet" without consulting the Regent or the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and caused considerable embarrassment to the Regent, who was immediately bombarded with demands to send Government delegates. Radio Athens spoke of the deep feeling that had been aroused by these messages in political and other circles, and said that the action of the islanders was in full accord with the principles of the Atlantic Charter. General Plastiras is reported to be in favour of sending detachments of the new National Guard to the islands, a step which, as the Dodecanese are not part of the Greek kingdom, seems neither feasible nor desirable; the Regent, feeling that some friendly gesture is indicated, thinks of sending an ecclesiastical emissary to convey his greetings to the islanders.

On the 15th March MM. Siantos, Partsalidis and Tsirimokos called on Mr. Macmillan and submitted to him a long memorandum, on the same lines as the protest referred to in last week's Summary, pointing out that, while E.A.M. had fulfilled the terms of the Varkiza Agreement, the Government was contravening them. Briefly, the memorandum alleged: that the National Guard and other security bodies were, with the connivance and assistance of the Government, persecuting the Resistance Movement; that Bishops and Professors who had assisted that Movement were being dismissed; that the circulataion of Left-wing papers was being interfered with; that E.L.A.S. officers and men who had handed in their arms were the victims of organised terrorism in the country districts; that the conditions agreed for the formation of a National Army were not being carried out, since recruits were being asked for certificates of "national sentiment"; that E.L.A.S. officers were not being employed, nor were collaborationists being weeded out; that E.L.A.S. men belonging to the classes that had been called up were not being accepted for the National Guard; that the public services were not being purged; that a police-State, opposed to E.A.M., was being set up; that the extreme Right did not hesitate to express its hatred of Greece's great Ally, the U.S.S.R. The memorandum continued with a demand for a representative Government which would restore freedom and justice, mobilise all the moral and material forces of the country, see that Greece was properly represented at the forthcoming international conferences, and hold free and genuine plebiscite and elections. It concluded with a request for an Inter-Allied Commission which would "examine the situation in Greece and take such measures as would ensure for the Greek people democratic liberties, an indispensable and vital prerequisite if the result of the plebiscite and the elections were to be genuine."

Albania.

According to an unofficial report many Albanians had hoped that the Yalta Conference would pave the way for a regency in Albania. In any case there has been great disappointment that Albania has not been invited to San Francisco and the official paper contends that Albania, whose forces are still fighting alongside those of Marshal Tito against the Germans, should have a say in shaping the future. With regard to Greek designs in Korça and Argyrocastro (see Summary No. 283) it is likely enough that the provisional Government would have practically the entire country behind it in resisting the detachment of areas so vital to Albania. However, it may be hoped that these Greco-Albanian bickerings will have received a quietus from the opinion expressed by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons on the 14th March that such territorial questions should be settled at the peace conference.

Bulgaria.

The People's Courts have continued to sit at Sofia and in the provinces and, besides sentences to imprisonment for life of varying terms, more than 850 people had been executed by the 16th March. Among these were nine generals, twenty other officers and a sergeant held guilty of furthering the pro-German policy to the detriment of the country and showing cruelty in the repression of the Resistance movement.

The Fatherland Front Congress reaffirmed the principles of private property and private initiative and the need for continued unity in the coalition. As expected, the congress resolved that new elections should be held and that a new electoral law should provide for coalition lists of candidates, extension of the franchise to young people and, if possible, to the army and militia, proportional representation and revocation of the mandate of any Deputies contravening the coalition programme. A rider emphasised that candidates must be "true adherents of the Fatherland Front, anti-Fascists and honest Democrats." A decree-law on these lines will no doubt be promulgated and the ensuing elections seem likely to be even more of a farce than is usual in Bulgaria. Not only will non-Fatherland Front candidates be excluded, but within the Fatherland Front itself the Communist minority will almost certainly be strengthened by the new electoral measures which it seems to have jockeyed its Agrarian, Social-Democrat and Tsveno partners into accepting. Before the conference, there was reason to think, the Communists were uneasy about their future. They now seem to have a good prospect of establishing a Communist dictatorship behind a democratic façade. Indeed, the purge effected by the People's Court and by more direct measures is going to such lengths as to facilitate the development of single-party government into dictatorship.

Neither this conception of democracy nor the report that Bulgaria is sending supplies to Yugoslavia before making any attempt to provide reparations for Greece, is calculated to dispose the Western Powers in favour of accepting the Bulgarian demand for the status of co-belligerent.

The economic negotiations at Moscow, the conclusion of which was reported on the 3rd March, are stated to provide for the supply of Bulgarian strategic raw materials in exchange for certain Russian goods necessary to Bulgarian industry. There is, apparently, no question of Bulgaria exporting to Russia any of the food-stuffs which under the armistice she should have made available immediately to Greece and Yugoslavia.

Turkey.

Financial discussions with the Turkish delegation now in England are proceeding. Turkish experts have placed in this country orders for 1 million pounds' worth of railway material which British manufacturers are in fact in a position to supply. In spite of the magnitude of this order the Turkish authorities announce that Turkish railway experts now in the United States will order a further 5 million dollars' worth of material. Turkey's real economic trouble is that she has not yet seen fit to bring down her prices—by devaluation or otherwise. This is the only step which can revive her export trade.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The composition of the Egyptian delegation to the San Francisco Conference has been announced in Cairo. It will be headed by the Prime Minister (Nokrashi Pasha), who will be accompanied by the Minister for Foreign Affairs (Abdul Hamid Bedawi) and the Minister of Finance (Makram Ebeid), and six or seven others, including two ex-Prime Ministers. All parties except the Wafd are represented on the delegation. It is true that one member, Wasif Boutros Ghali, was formerly a Wafdist, but he has been out of politics, and indeed out of Egypt, since 1939, and the Wafd certainly do not regard him as an adequate representative. The Cabinet apparently decided to exclude the Wafd owing to their opposition to the Egyptian declaration of war. Though the Wafd not unnaturally resent being thus publicly cold-shouldered, there is reason to believe that they are secretly gratified at escaping from representation at San Francisco. If, as might happen (so the argument runs), the Egyptian delegation tried to air its country's alleged grievances and got snubbed for its pains, it would return with unfulfilled promises to a disappointed Egypt, and Wafdist stock would correspondingly rise.

It is reported from Cairo that the Preparatory Committee of the proposed Arab League held its first meeting on the 17th March. Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Transjordan and Saudi Arabia were all represented but not Palestine and the Yemen. The Egyptian Prime Minister, in welcoming the delegates, said that the meeting would decide on the charter for the League drafted by the sub-committee. A statement issued the same evening announced that the committee had discussed the project and had accepted it in principle. On the 18th March the Preparatory Committee approved the statutes of the Arab League with a few verbal modifications. The two annexes regarding non-independent Arab countries and the representation of Palestine were to be considered on the 20th. It is thought that on the same day the Preparatory Committee may convert itself into a general Arab Conference to approve the statutes, after which they will be referred to the States' respective Governments for final approval.

It is believed, however, that San Francisco, rather than the Arab League, took pride of place at the first day's meeting, when the question of the representation of the Levant States at the World Organisation Conference was discussed. The omission to invite these States to San Francisco has roused considerable feeling in Egypt, as well as in other Arab countries. It has been sharply criticised in the Egyptian press, which, however, tends to absolve the British from blame. It rather imputes the responsibility jointly to the Three Powers at the Crimea Conference, and suggests that the French would favour an invitation being extended to the Levant States.

In answer to a question in the House of Commons on the 14th March, Mr. Eden stated that applications by the Governments of Syria and Lebanon to be invited to San Francisco were under consideration, and that there was nothing further which he could say at present. In fact, His Majesty's Government favour the two States being invited to the conference, provided, of course, agreement can be reached between the other leading Powers. Steps have already been taken to secure the agreement of the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China. If, as now seems likely, France also agrees that the Levant States should be admitted to the United Nations and included in the list of those to be invited to San Francisco, the matter will be solved in their favour. There is, of course, no time to be lost, and a decision may be reached very shortly.

It is reported from Cairo that the Iraqi Government has accepted the invitation to attend the San Francisco Conference, and that the delegation is in process of formation.

There has been talk recently in Bagdad about a possible change of Government. The Regent, who will be leaving before long for his projected visit to the United States, seemed doubtful whether the present Cabinet was strong enough to maintain itself during his absence, and thought of inviting Nuri Pasha once more to form a Cabinet. He has, however, after further deliberation, decided not to make a change of Premier until after his return to Iraq. This is no doubt a wise decision. Nuri has definitely lost ground since last autumn, and he will have to re-establish his position in the country before he can resume the leadership with any hope of success. Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance is to go, and may be followed by his colleague of the Interior.

The President of Syria paid a short official visit to Bagdad at the beginning of last week. It was not much of a success. The Regent at first wanted to absent himself from Bagdad during the visit, and though persuaded to remain and to entertain the party at dinner, H.R.H. did not receive the President at the airport nor did he accept his return invitation. Nuri Pasha also saw fit to suffer from a "diplomatic illness," and saw nothing of the party. In Iraq, where, as in other Arab countries, the hospitable reception of guests is so highly rated, such seeming discourtesy is rare. In this case the reasons are not far to seek. The Regent regards Shukri Quwatli as the head of a State upon whose throne he considers a Hashimite should sit, while the refusal of the Syrian Government to let the Amir Abdullah pay a visit to Syria in August last still rankles. The fact, moreover, that Shukri had visited Saudi Arabia before Iraq caused much local resentment. All this may be very petty, but in the circumstances is perhaps understandable.

Some anxiety has been expressed in Persia as to the extent of the discussions on that country at the Crimea Conference. In reply to an enquiry by the Persian Ambassador in London on the 7th March, Mr. Eden told M. Taqizadeh that reference had been made informally at Yalta to the position of Persia, but that the matter was not raised at the conference table, nor at the meetings of the three heads of Governments. Mr. Eden went on to say that he thought the Russians fully understood the concern with which we had watched recent developments in Persia, and the sincerity with which we had held to the terms of the Tehran Declaration. The Persian Ambassador seemed slightly comforted by this assurance, but hinted that there could be no real easing of the situation as long as foreign armies remained on Persian soil; to which Mr. Eden replied that the Allies were bound to withdraw their troops within six months of the end of the war with Japan, and that our policy, which was to see a strong and independent Persia, remained unchanged.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese have evidently been considerably shaken by the heavy and repeated American air attacks upon their principal cities. Japanese official communiqués angrily describe the raids as indiscriminate terror attacks upon residential areas; they deny any serious damage to war industries and allege that the American losses in heavy bombers are outstripping their replacements. Thus Domei (18th March) said that the Americans had started night raids because of their previous heavy losses in daylight attacks. It asserted that the first night raid was made against Tokyo on the 9th March, with 130 B29 machines, and that of these 15 were shot down. An identical number raided Nagoya on the 12th March and 22 machines were lost. 90 attacked Osaka on the 14th March, of these 20 were lost. The Japanese say that the armament of the Super-Fortresses had been reduced so as to make possible a greater load of incendiaries and that this made them more vulnerable to Japanese night fighters.

It is questionable how far these flamboyant and untrue assertions will reassure the Japanese people who have been made painfully aware of the inadequacies of the arrangements for fire-fighting, for care of the injured and homeless and for evacuees. On the 14th March the House of Peers held a plenary session on the question of relief measures for air raid victims and urged that drastic measures should be taken. Members of the Taisei Yokusankai called on Koiso and said that the measures he was considering were still inadequate. Thousands of refugees are reported to be crowding the Tokyo railway stations in an endeavour to leave the stricken capital, others are getting out by all kinds of vehicles, including rickshaws. There is a shortage of eye specialists, so that the numerous persons with eye injuries do not receive adequate attention. Three days after a raid people were wandering about burned districts trying to get news of their missing relatives. The Government is urging all non-essential persons to evacuate Tokyo and other cities, but at the same time cannot assure them adequate transport and food (Asahi, 15th March). In the Chugoku region (south-western Honshu) the Japanese military authorities themselves described the arrangements for fire-fighting as "awful," and said that the public negligence was extremely surprising. Although this region contains some important military and naval bases, as well as industrial centres, many of its inhabitants thought that they were safe from air raids (Japanese Home Service, 8th March). It is fairly evident that the Japanese people were not led to expect air raids as heavy as they are now suffering and they are likely to be infuriated with the Administration in consequence. Meanwhile the War Ministry has announced that firemen called up for military service will be demobilised; and also the creation of the post of Inspector-General of the Anti-Aircraft Artillery Corps to be held by Lieutenant-General Kaoru Takeda.

On the 16th March the Japanese Board of Information announced that the Premier, General Koiso, would directly participate in the general conduct of the war at Imperial Headquarters on the same footing as the Ministers of War and of the Navy. Koiso himself declared that the Imperial Headquarters and the Government would unite as one body. This is an unwonted step, because normally the Emperor exercises his powers of supreme military command through organs which are quite separate from, and independent of, those which advise him in general matters of State. In time of war the supreme military command is concentrated in the Senji Daihonei, or Imperial Headquarters. The Emperor's leading advisers in this body are the Ministers of War and of the Navy, the Chief of the Army General Staff, the Chief of the Naval General Staff and the Chief Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor. A closer link between Imperial Headquarters and the Cabinet was established in the time of the Tojo Government, because Tojo was not only Premier, but also Minister of War and (in the end) Chief of the General Staff, and was therefore doubly entitled to attend Imperial Headquarters. His Minister of the Navy was also made Chief of the Naval General Staff. This concentration of offices was not well regarded by conservative Japanese circles and did not work well, especially in the case of Tojo, who was a veritable Pooh Bah, and greatly overburdened. There was a return to normal practice when Tojo fell. Koiso became Premier only, and so has not hitherto been a member of Supreme Headquarters; Sugiyama is War Minister, Umezu Chief of the General Staff, Yonai Navy Minister, and Shimada Chief of the Naval General Staff. Now, as Koiso has intimated, the approach of the war to Japan itself, in the form of air attack and of threatened invasion, has necessitated a closer liaison between Imperial Headquarters and the Cabinet. But the Tojo experiment has not been repeated; Koiso attends Imperial Headquarters by special command of the Emperor.

The new political association has now taken shape; it is to be known as the Dai Nippon Seijikai, and it will hold its inaugural meeting towards the end of March. It is said to be fundamentally different from the Taisei Yokusan Seijikai in that, whereas that body was concerned with political activities within the Diet and was chiefly active in Tokyo, the new association will give much more emphasis to organising the provincial areas and will be "an executive body for the popular movement for the defence of the Fatherland" (Domei, 18th March).

A "Civilian Special Attack Corps" is being organised throughout Japan for the defence of the country against possible enemy invasion. The Youth Association (see this Summary No. 283) is the guiding spirit in this movement and gatherings of local leaders from surrounding districts are meeting in Toyama, Mito, Kofu and other Japanese prefectural capitals.

In this Summary No. 275, reference was made to the establishment by Koiso of a Korea-Formosa Greater Poltical Privileges Investigation Committee. Its deliberations have now resulted in a draft Bill, which has been approved by the Privy Council and laid before the Diet. This Bill makes Koreans and Formosans eligible as members of both Houses of the Diet. Twenty-three Koreans and five Formosans are to be elected to the Lower House and the Emperor can nominate a maximum of ten Koreans and Formosans to the House of Peers. The inhabitants of Karafuto (Japanese Saghalien) are to have three elected representatives in the Lower House and one imperial nominee in the House of Peers. The Diet will thus become a sort of Imperial Parliament, although very late in the day. There were 405 members of the House of Peers in 1937 and the electoral reform of 1928 fixed the number of members of the Lower House at 464. There are seventy-five million Japanese, about twenty-five million Koreans, and some six million Formosans (mainly Chinese), so that the colonial representation in the Diet will not be very great, or in proportion to respective populations.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The appointment of an interagency Committee on "Foreign Shipments," which was reported in last week's Summary, is now the subject of considerable discussion. Majority opinion, particularly the internationalist, welcomed the formation of the Board as likely to result in improving the allocation of supplies at home and abroad. Meanwhile President Roosevelt remarked at his Press Conference that the war is not over, and that "the American people have got to tighten their belts," adding that he thought the United States would support the idea of keeping some other people from starving by restricting distribution at home. He said that a small percentage cut in the United States consumption of commodities which were in short supply, would keep people in other countries from starving, and he affirmed his belief that Americans were decent people, who would understand this when it was explained to them, though he pointed out, compared with other nationalities, they had not suffered much and they were not going to. Press and radio commentators have echoed the President's words, saying that the Americans are "the best fed people in the world," and they too declared that they believed that American food supplies should be shared with the destitute liberated areas. President Roosevelt's remarks have been followed by a 12 per cent. cut in the civilian meat allocation for the next three months and from the 1st April there are also cuts in the rations to industrial and commercial users of sugar, fats and oils.

Following the announcement of these cuts a minority have continued to protest that "the United States is not the food basket of the world," and protests have also been made in the Senate that too much food was being shipped from the United States to Europe, particularly to Britain and Russia. Senator Eastland (Dem. Mississippi), for example, complained that too much salt pork was being shipped to Russia.

During this discussion accusing fingers have been pointed at Britain, which is alleged to have large stocks, prepared for the possibility of invasion which could now be used for the liberated peoples in Europe. An 87 per cent. reduction in Lend-Lease shipments of meat to Britain during the next three months has since been announced. Instead of shipping 207 million pounds as was done during the first quarter of the year, only 25 million pounds will be shipped. Colonel Llewellin and Mr. Lyttelton may go to Washington to discuss the food situation and Anglo-American plans for meeting the acute shortage. It is generally agreed that the world food position is likely to be difficult for the next two years at least.

It is announced that Senator Vandenberg, one of the Republican delegates to the San Francisco Conference, has filed with the State Department proposals to amend the Dumbarton Oaks plan to provide for a review of war-time political decisions which might threaten future peace. He has declined to discuss these proposed amendments, but has declared that the San Francisco Conference faces the "tremendous responsibility" of deciding whether the projected international security organisation would be limited in its operations to the enforcement of decisions taken at the peace-table which could not be changed. "Peace-making," he said, "and peace-keeping are two different things. The San Francisco Conference will deal only with peace-keeping. It must be followed with another making peace."

Governor Green of Illinois, one of the die-hard isolationists, has sent a letter to Senator Vandenberg and Representative Charles Eaton suggesting that the armed forces should be represented at the peace arrangements and that therefore the San Francisco Conference was premature. Senator Vandenburg has, however, countered this by inviting the armed forces to advise him of their immediate views on his duties as a delegate to San Francisco. He has also stated that he will insist on the representation of men of the armed forces at the final peace table.

The Left-wing New York paper P.M. takes a gloomy view of the probability that the United States will endorse the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. In response to questions regarding the attitude of United States Senators to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals it found that while 49 were in favour and 4 probably in favour, 34 expressed themelves as doubtful and 9 could not be reached, or declined to answer. On the other hand, the Christian Science Monitor made its own deductions without, however, inviting replies to a questionnaire. In its view, 70 Senators are in favour, which is 4 more than the necessary 66, or two-thirds of the Senate, and 13 were listed as definitely opposed and 13 as doubtful. While there are obvious dangers ahead, there is, however, increasing evidence of the co-operative attitude towards United States participation in international affairs since the Crimea Conference. This is evidenced by the reception of Commander Stassen's recent speech, the restraint shown in criticism of the proposed voting procedure on the Security Council, and the almost unanimous approval of the decisions reached at the Mexico City Conference.

It is probable that several Senators who told P.M. that they were doubtful are on the whole in favour of an international organisation, though they may object to some of the terms of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, or they may be perturbed at some of the Yalta decisions. For instance, there is increasing comment on the political crisis in Roumania, which is seen as one of the tests of the Yalta Conference. (For fuller treatment of this see under "Roumania.") Even Mrs. Roosevelt, in her column "My Day," has expressed the view that she expects and favours revisions to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals following the nation-wide discussion which has been stimulated by the State Department.

Mr. Isidor Lubin has been appointed United States representative on the Allied Reparations Committee which will sit in Moscow to determine the reparations to be paid by Germany. Mr. Lubin for the past few years has been technical economic adviser to the President at the White House, and a member of the War Production Board and the Munitions Assignment Board.

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine Government have been engaged in attempting to define their attitude towards the Mexico City Conference which closed on the 8th March. As the resolution inviting Argentina to adhere to the final act of the Conference has not yet been officially received, no pronouncment has been made upon it, but the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs is reported to have said that "the terms of the invitation authorise the hope of a satisfactory and dignified outcome for the Argentine nation."

Meanwhile, Argentina has resumed her seat on the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union, and the Government continues to disseminate the impression that there will shortly be a return to "constitutional normality." Colonel Perón has let it be known that the revision of the electoral lists is almost completed, leaving the impression that the date for elections will soon be announced; and his own candidature is now coming into the open. The Under-Secretariat of Information, for example, has pointed out (with regard to his candidature) that "men on active service may take part in politics, but not actively belong to any political party. This does not prevent any member of the army from being President or from exercising any other Government office which the laws and constitution allow any Argentine citizen." On the whole it would seem that the position of the extreme Nationalists has been considerably weakened, and the Nationalist Press is now reduced to Fronda. On the other hand, the Radicals are acutely uneasy at the possibility that Colonel Perón may achieve recognition or election, and the Socalists are loud in condemnation.

It is reported that those professors dismissed for signing the manifesto in favour of democracy in 1943 and recently reinstated (see Summary No. 280) have reaffirmed their declarations. Not all have in fact been reinstated, and there have been renewed student disturbances in La Plata University, which led to the summoning of the police by the rector, the use of téar-gar, and the arrest of some students. A party of students complained of the police to the Interventor of Buenos Aires, and Dr. Bramuglia was careful to explain that properly-conducted meetings might be held.

President Vargas has stated publicly that he is not a candidate in the forthcoming Brazilian elections, but that nothing will cause him to abandon his position until his successor takes office. The name of the Minister of War has been advanced as a candidate, but he has not yet accepted nomination. An impression exists that the President's declared abstention and General Dutra's alleged candidacy may be designed to split the Opposition and rally the army. As the Opposition appear to be united only in their detestation of President Vargas, it is possible that his eclipse may confuse them; in any case General Dutra's forceful figure may well attract more support than the less-known Air-Brigadier Gomes (see Summary No. 282).

The final result of the Chilean elections (see Summary No. 283) gives the Right wing 23 seats and the Left wing 22 in the Senate, and the Right 71 and the Left 76 in the Chamber of Deputies. The gains of the Right are significant, if not sweeping, and are counterbalanced on the extreme Left by Communist gains. It remains to be seen whether the weakening of the moderate Left coalition will contribute anything to the stability of Chilean politics.

In Colombia the Government announced on the 10th March the discovery of a large quantity of bombs in the Cathedral at Bogotá and elsewhere. Some hundred persons were arrested, including a number of army officers retired after the Pasto coup (see Summaries Nos. 249 and 250); the Minister of War is reported as saying that no more than five officers are involved. El Siglo has protested the innocence of the Conservatives, but not very convincingly.

In Cuba President Grau San Martín has referred to an attempt on his life and that of his army chief of staff: he had no proof that ex-President Batista was involved, "nor that he was not involved." The revolutionaries were led by Colonel Pedraza, a chief of police under the Batista régime. Colonel Batista, in San Francisco, affected to denounce violence and expressed his concern about political events in Cuba.

In Bolivia President Villarroel's car was fired on in La Paz on the night of the 11th March, and it was later announced that the shots were fired by men who were "without political convictions" but who were very drunk.

It has been officially announced in Caracas that the Ambassador in Washington was authorised on the 14th May to exchange notes with the Russian Ambassador establishing diplomatic and consular relations.

The President-elect of Guatemala, Sr. Arévalo, assumed office on the 15th March. Of the former governing revolutionary Junta the civilian member, Sr. J. Toriello, has retired, but the two young officers retain control of the Army. The situation remains overcast.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE Rhine has been crossed in strength and evidence accumulates that a great strategic victory has been won which threatens complete disruption of the German forces in the west. The classic Rhine barrier has been overcome with suprising ease; Allied troops are firmly established on the eastern bank on a broad front; German resistance west of the Rhine has been practically eliminated. In the week ending 22nd March 100,000 prisoners were taken and 30,000 Germans were estimated killed. On the night of the 22nd/23rd a new bridgehead was won across the Rhine in the Oppenheim area, which was extended and consolidated by the 24th. On the night of the 23rd/24th March, the Northern Group of armies attacked across the Lower Rhine, north of the Ruhr. Wesel and Rees were entered. They encounterd stiff opposition, as the best German forces remaining in the west are concentrated in this sector. Airborne troops dropped several miles further east have linked up with the ground forces, and the British 2nd Army has linked with the American 9th Army on its right. The American 1st Army has broken out of the Remagen bridgehead: and further south the 3rd Army has a strong bridgehead between Mainz and Worms. Darmstadt has been cleared, and General Patton's men, striking swiftly and deeply, have captured intact a bridge across the Main, and are reported to have pushed armoured units well into the Frankfurt plain.

The German public has had to judge of the serious news of the situation in the west from the names appearing in the High Command official communiqué. This announced on the 21st that the "weak garrison of Coblenz" had been withdrawn across the Rhine; on the 23rd it admitted the loss of Bingen, bitter street fighting in Mainz, and a penetration into Worms. On the 25th it admitted the new crossings of the Rhine, the airborne landings and fighting in Wesel, where, however, it claimed that the enemy had been thrown back to the Rhine bank. On the 26th it spoke of "fairly deep penetrations" on the Lower Lippe. The general tone of German reports suggests fatalistic recognition of an almost incredible Allied superiority in material.

From Dittmar the home public heard an ominous name—that of Avranches. He said that the American advance was "an operation of considerably larger geographical scope than all the offensive movements since Avranches." Another commentator, on the 25th, said that the enemy was trying, by using "a gigantic amount of material, on the scale of the first invasion days, to prise open our defence lines between Rees and Wesel," but had only managed to achieve penetrations into the main fighting zones. For the first time since the opening of the Russian offensive in January a report (from the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung) spoke of the centre of gravity of military operations as being in the west, as a result of the "all-out offensive on the middle Rhine." The Völkischer Beobachter emphasised the importance of the airborne landings, more of which, it said, were expected on a large scale. Public anxiety was reflected in a front report on the 22nd March: "Everybody will ask, 'was it not possible to stop these quickly advancing enemy armoured formations? Have our troops lost their power of resistance?'"

It is now reported that Kesselring has been brought from his command in Italy to take charge of the desperate situation. On the 6th March a German military commentator praised Rundstedt's strategy for having made it impossible for Eisenhower to "jump the river barrier with a flying start." (Dittmar, broadcasting on the following day, apologised for the fact that the Germans had at the moment no other strategy save "constant makeshifts.") Some indication of uncertainty as to whether Rundstedt was still in supreme command was furnished in a report that Model had been appointed joint Commander-in-Chief with Rundstedt. At this stage it is profitless to enquire whether Rundstedt has thrown in his hand, or whether Hitler in desperation has called in a new expert in defensive warfare. The underlying fact, which does need emphasis, is that German forces in the West are facing enveloping attack of unparalleled intensity, that they are dwindling in numbers and are unsupported by adequate strategic reserves. Even more serious than this inferiority in numbers is the morale of the German troops, which is known to have been recently causing anxiety to commanding officers.

On the east, assurances that the front is more stable are belied by new danger signals in home propaganda. A Russian effort to "pinch off our front salient at Küstrin" was reported on the 24th. A Home Service survey mentioned a Soviet assault against Troppau (which is on the Czech-Silesian border). Another Home report stated ominously that in Hungary "the Bolsheviks intensified their pressure to prevent us building up new shortened lines of defence." Hungary still takes first place in the O.K.W.'s communiqués. Tolbukhin's advance has been reported as making use of "strong armoured forces" and as being opposed by the "dogged resistance" of German troops. Only to foreign listeners has it been admitted that the Hungarian fighting has increased in scale and ferocity. The German public are not encouraged to imagine the dangerous consequences of this latest thrust at the Reich.

The battle of Western Germany is being waged in the air as destructively as by ground forces. The week ending on the 23rd March has seen the greatest sustained effort by the Allied air forces since early June of last year. There have been heavy bomber attacks against enemy communications, oil targets and airfields. Bridges as far east as Bremen have been cut; movement through the city of Essen was thought to be virtually impossible after the attack of the 11th March. In addition to the great airborne operation already mentioned, invaluable tactical support has been rendered to the ground forces by air attack on German artillery positions and on concentrations of troops.

The continuous air attacks on industrial and communication centres in and around the Ruhr region had succeeded in closing the last two main railway connexions eastwards out of the Ruhr via Hamm and Schwerte before the main operations on the Lower Rhine began. The north-eastern route via Münster was closed at Löhne and the southern route via Kabel-Siegen was closed both at Wetzlar and Dillenburg. Thus for all practical purposes the economic isolation of the Ruhr from the rest of the Reich was completed in the middle of March.

The devastating effect on actual production in the Ruhr–Westphalian region of the intensified air bombardment which began in the beginning of October 1944 is substantiated in a recently captured document of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke A.G. This combine controls roughly 50 per cent. of the steel production in that region. In February 1945 its daily steel output amounted to barely 20 per cent. of the rate prevailing in September 1944. Assuming that the entire Ruhr–Westphalian region was affected to an equal degree, the global Reich steel production as at the 1st March would probably not be much more than 11 million tons. The maintenance of an adequate output of armaments appears to be virtually impossible on such a reduced steel production.

A direct result of this bombing, affecting the life of every German, is the increasing difficulty of distributing food in the Reich. Stock, on the 21st March, said that the various economic regions of the Reich would have to use "exclusively indigenous agricultural products." Transport conditions alone would dictate this, he said. But there were also the "millions of Germans repatriated from the frontier areas," who had to be fed on the shrunken territory. The Münchner Neueste Nachrichten, on the 17th March, said that before the war Germany had to feed 137 persons per square kilometre. Now, the figure was 304 per square kilometre. New measures were in prospect to deal with this situation.

These have already been made public. The German rationing system is to be drastically reorganised in the next rationing period, which begins on the 9th April. In future, food cards will have blank coupons only, and the Food Offices will announce the foodstuffs to be available. There may be local variations. The object is to make the control "more elastic" and to "facilitate the local exchange of individual allocations in case of transport difficulties." In view of the supply and transport situation it will no longer be possible to know sufficiently long in advance what supplies may be allocated. As a rule, says the announcement, the rations for basic foodstuffs such as bread, fat, meat and potatoes will continue to be fixed uniformly throughout the Reich, and the proposed amounts of these foodstuffs are given for the 74th period. Bread and meat show a reduction of 75 grammes per week; compared with the last rations received by the people, this means a reduction of approximately 4 per cent. in bread and 25 per cent. in meat. But there is obviously no guarantee that these rations will be available throughout the Reich, and the new system is clear indication that the authorities find it impossible to maintain a uniform distribution of food. In addition, the elaborate classification of age groups and special categories of workers is greatly simplified. Only the two groups of children under six, and from six to eighteen, and heavy and very heavy workers will continue to receive special allocations.

In parts of Germany threatened by the western Allied advance Germans are no longer dependent on their own propaganda for knowledge of their plight. The frequent instructions broadcast by S.H.A.E.F. have within the past fortnight given to the inhabitants of the Ruhr almost daily warnings and instructions as to how to get out of the danger zone. These messages are addressed to specific sections of the population, to foreign workers, to armament workers, to railwaymen, to women. These people are told in plain language that "the whole Ruhr area will become a death trap," that the districts in which they live are now combat areas, within which "no shelter or refuge can be considered safe." Civilians in the Frankfurt, Mannheim and Ludwigshafen regions were told that they lived "in one of the key areas of German war industry," and that "to prevent the further prolongation of a lost war, the whole armament industry of that area would "be subjected to a merciless bombardment." There is some evidence that precisely in this area workers acted on these instructions to seek safety, and that some 200 of them unfortunate enough to be caught by the SS were hanged outside their factories.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

A meeting took place in Moscow on the 19th March between President Beneš and Marshal Stalin, with the Czechoslovak Ambassador in Moscow, M. Fierlinger, M. Molotov and M. Šramek in attendance.

Under the leadership of President Beneš discussions are in progress among the representatives of Czechoslovak political parties to determine the membership of the new Government which is to be set up shortly at Košice. The Slovak National Council at Košice is represented in these discussions by a delegation of political and military leaders.

Further diplomatic appointments have been announced. M. V. A. Zorin is to be the Soviet Ambassador and M. Werblowski the Polish Ambassador to the Czechoslovak Government. The Czechoslovak Ambassador in Warsaw is M. Hejret.

The Red army has made important progress in its drive against the vital Moravian Gateway, which links Germany with the Danube lands. Marshal Koniev's forces have carried out a successful movement outflanking Moravska Ostravá (on the north-west). This large manufacturing town is the main German fortress of the corridor region. This followed on the break-through of the German positions south-west of Oppeln on the 21st March, since when all the foothills between the Oder and the Czechoslovak mountain frontier in this area have been overrun. On the 24th, a Stalin Order of the Day announced the occupation of Neisse and Loebschuetz, two important rail centres controlling routeways across the mountain frontier into Moravia. Supporting this advance, Red army aircraft bombed concentrations of German military transports in the railyards at Moravská Ostrava.

The same period has seen an advance by the troops of Marshal Malinowsky in the Carpathians and across the River Hron. The offensive, starting from the newly-taken base of Zvolen, led to the occupation of Banská Bystrica, a large and important town on the Hron, and formed the subject of an Order of the Day on the 26th. This movement parallels that of the Soviet forces south of the Danube sweeping towards the Austrian frontier. It constitutes an obvious threat to Bratislava, the Slovak capital, and is reflected in the increasing nervourness displayed there, in broadcasts and reports of hurried defence measures.

Italy-based Allied aircraft have carried out the strategic bombing of more targets in Czechoslovakia. Two airfields near Prague, railyards at Budejovice, and engineering works were attacked.

There are more details available of the recent land-reform decree of the Slovak National Committee. Under the slogan : " Slovak land belongs to the Slovaks," it orders the confiscation without compensation of land belonging to traitors and enemies of the people, regardless of nationality. Land owned by Germans, even if not guilty of collaboration with the enemy, is to be confiscated, as well as land owned by Hungarians with estates exceeding 50 hectares. Forests go mainly to local councils, buildings and machinery to peasants or co-operatives. The Slovak Agricultural Fund will administer land so confiscated until the local Peasant Commissions have completed their distribution, and will collect payment for buildings and machinery over a period of 15 years. The income thus derived is to be used on behalf of the small farmers to repair war damage and to pay for improvements.

POLAND.

Optimistic reports have been circulating in London anticipating an early summons for consultations in Moscow of a selected body of Poles in this country who are not committed to a policy of opposition to the Yalta Agreement. It is true that discussions here have narrowed down and improved the lists of Poles both in Poland and in Great Britain who are suggested for invitation. It is not, however, true that the Commission of Three has yet reached agreement either on the list of invitees or on the procedure to be followed in the consultations (see last Summary).

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has confirmed the position previously taken up as regards Polish representation at San Francisco, mentioned in the last Summary. In a written reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 21st March Mr. Hall said : " The Soviet Government do not recognise the Polish Government in London, and the other Allied Governments concerned do not recognise the Provisional Government established at Warsaw. In these circumstances, Poland can only be invited to the Conference if a Polish Provisional Government of National Unity, which will be recognised by all four Powers, can be formed in Poland in accordance with the recommendation of the Crimea Conference." On the 22nd March the Provisional Administration in Warsaw addressed a declaration to the four sponsoring Powers of the San Francisco Conference, claiming that, as Provisional Government in Poland, it should be represented by its delegate at the Conference.

On the 21st March the Polish National Council in London, appointed by President Raczkiewicz as a consultative body in February 1942, was dissolved, and it is stated that a new Council is shortly to be nominated. This body has no representative character, but has so far been selected from the four principal parties. Since M. Mikolajczyk's resignation the Peasants have been unrepresented, and lately there have been resignations by members of the other parties who support his efforts for agreement with the U.S.S.R. It is to be feared that these co-operative elements will either be much reduced or even completely absent from the new Council. It is, indeed, supposed, in well-informed Polish circles in London, that the President was partly led to dissolve the Council owing to the probability of strong opposition being offered by the Council to the coming budget proposals of the Arciszewski Cabinet.

It is reported on the 18th March that the Warsaw provisional administration incorporated in Poland the towns of Gleiwitz and Hindenburg (Zabrze), which are in the part of the Upper Silesian industrial triangle retained by Germany after the plebiscite of 1921. Such action was foreshadowed in a statement made by M. Bierut on the 2nd February. In view, however, of the fact that no definite Allied agreement has yet been reached as to the disposal of any German territory, it is possible that these German towns are being given civil administration under the Red Army Command, which is doubtless anxious that their economic life should be uninterrupted and as far as possible contribute to its own needs.

It has been stated in Paris that M. Garreau, whose appointment to Warsaw was mentioned in Summary No. 284, has merely succeeded M. Fouchet as liaison officer concerned with the care of liberated French citizens.

An announcement made on the 9th March from Moscow that the Belgian Government had made a large advance to the London Polish Government has been explained by the Belgian Minister of Finance, who has now declared that in January 1945 60 million francs were placed at the Polish Government's disposal for assistance to Poles now on Belgian territory. According to Tass a further 240 million francs were to be paid by instalments.

SOVIET UNION.

The guns of Moscow have thundered nine times this week in honour of renewed Soviet advances. In the approaches to Königsberg Marshal Vassilevsky, who has taken over the Third Byelorussian Front, formerly commanded by the late General Cherniakhovsky, captured Braunsberg on the 20th March and Heiligenbeil on the 25th March. The latter was described in Marshal Stalin's Order of the Day as " the last stronghold in the German defences on the coast of Frisches Haff." A wedge has been driven between the encircled German troops in Gdynia and Danzig by the capture of Zoppot, on the coast, on the 23rd March. On the Oder the only advance recorded was the capture of Altdamm, opposite Stettin, on the 20th March. Marshal Koniev meanwhile had broken through in Silesia south-west of Oppeln. On the 22nd March the fall of Neustadt was announced, and two days later the advance had reached Neisse and Leobschütz, the latter on the Czech border. Marshal Malinovsky's troops, continuing their difficult advance in Slovakia, took Banska Bystrica on the 26th March. In the Order of the Day recording this victory the co-operation of Roumanian formations was mentioned. In Hungary Marshal Malinovsky's troops are advancing on both sides of the Danube. Esztergom and Tata were captured on the 25th March, and Komárno is threatened. Further south Marshal Tolbukhin has at last beaten off the fierce German counter-offensive with heavy losses, and has himself swept forward between Lake Balaton and the Danube. Székesfehérvár was recaptured on the 24th March, and by the 26th March Pápa and Devecser, 45 miles to the west, had also fallen. Prospects are thus opened up for a rapid advance on Bratislava and Vienna on both sides of the Danube.

For the Soviet denunciation of the Soviet-Turkish Treaty see under Turkey. Commenting on this step, Izvestiya on the 21st March pointed out that the international situation had entirely changed since the treaty was signed in 1925. Twenty years ago relations with Great Britain were not as friendly as they are now, the article stated, and the Soviet Union did not even maintain diplomatic relations with the United States. The consolidation of friendly relations with democratic neighbours of the U.S.S.R., like Poland and Czechoslovakia, was another significant change which had occurred in the interim. " In the light of these and a number of other most important circumstances, the inconsistency with the new situation of the Soviet-Turkish Treaty . . . . strikes one's eye." Under the conditions of the present war Soviet-Turkish relations at certain moments left room for improvement. It would not be in the interests of the two countries, or of the fruitful development of international relations as a whole, " to leave automatically valid a Treaty concluded in a quite different situation." This presumably amounts to saying that the Soviet Government would like to see a revision of the Straits Convention, and may possibly indicate that she would be prepared to consider a military alliance with Turkey such as already exists with Czechoslovakia and has been offered to Poland.

A commentary on the situation in Poland in the light of the Crimea decisions was published in The War and the Working Class (22nd March). The achievements of the Provisional Government on the lines of the 1921 Constitution were extolled, and it was stated that the Crimea decisions on Poland (which ignored the "utterly discredited London émigré Government") had been arrived at in the light of the facts of the situation inside Poland. The familiar charge was made that the protests of the émigré Government against the Yalta Agreement were inspired by the handful of magnates in that Government who feared to lose their estates through the new land reform and by a "clique of reactionary politicians" who were afraid that the abrogation of the 1935 Constitution would make them lose their posts. Their objections to the accession of territory in the north and west at the expense of Germany were based on their dream of reverting to the pro-German and anti-Soviet policy which they had pursued in the period between the two wars. The British M.P.s who opposed the Crimea resolutions on Poland were severely criticised: having regard to their record it was evident that they were more concerned about hostility to the U.S.S.R. than they were to serve the best interests of the Poles. However, "attempts to place old prejudices above the actual state of affairs have never succeeded and never will." The article ended by stating flatly that "the Provisional Government now functioning in Warsaw . . . . must serve as the basis of the future Polish Provisional Government of National Unity." Although additional democratic leaders from inside Poland and abroad should be included, there must be no attempt "to galvanise into life again the political corpses of the bankrupt leaders of the utterly decayed camp of Polish reactionaries." The Crimea decision passed by the London Government, and "nobody will succeed in preventing the Crimea Agreement on Poland from being put into effect."

President Beneš, now in Moscow on his way back to Czechoslovakia, was received by Marshal Stalin on the 19th March. Pravda (25th March), in a long editorial inspired by the President's visit, laid emphasis on the historical roots of Soviet-Czechoslovak relations, and recapitulated the diplomatic developments of those relations since the Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1935. The article sounded a slightly admonitory note by underlining the necessity not only of restoring, but also of strengthening, democratic liberties in liberated Czechoslovakia, and of finding a correct solution for the national problem. It closed by reaffirming that the foundations of Czechoslovakia's future foreign policy would be the establishment of close relations with all freedom-loving countries, and in the first place with her neighbours and blood brothers, the Slav States. Such a policy would correspond fully to her own interests and to the interests of her friends. The appointment of M. V. A. Zorin as Ambassador to Czechoslovakia was announced on the Moscow wireless on the 21st March, 1945. Previous to this appointment he was Chief of the Fourth European Department of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. In November 1944 he was awarded the order of the "Red Banner of Labour" for outstanding services to the Soviet State and for successful fulfilment of the Government's assignments.

The current issue of The War and the Working Class discusses the Anglo-American colonial problem with the familiar pre-war Soviet bias. It points out the war-time failure of German and Japanese agents to incite the colonial peoples against the principal Powers in the democratic camp but states that it is obvious that the system of colonial enslavement of millions is a dangerous obstacle on the path of social progress. The interpretation of the Atlantic Charter with regard to the colonial question is alleged to vary among Allied countries: the Americans seek spheres of unhindered investment for American capital and free markets for American goods, while British circles resist this move in India.

A message from Tass, Delhi, published in the Soviet press of the 18th March, refers to the protest of the Indian opposition at the Government's choice of delegates to San Francisco. Mr. Rajagopalachariar was quoted as saying that the aim of the Conference was to set up an International Security Organisation and not to consolidate war-time Governments. It was well known, according to Tass, that the two party leaders of the Legislative Assembly, Bhulabhai Desai and Liaquat Ali Khan, had come to an agreement on the formation of a provisional national Government; the delegates representing India should have been chosen by these leaders and not by members of a Government which had suffered defeat and had not been elected by the people but appointed by the Viceroy.

SCANDINAVIA.

The result of the Finnish elections has been favourably received in most quarters. It seems to be generally regarded as a victory for the forces of the Left, in spite of the way in which these forces seem to be divided, and expectations have even been expressed that the Social Democrats and the Democratic League may act together for most purposes. M. Orlov, the Soviet political adviser on the Control Commission, is believed to be fairly well satisfied. An article in Izvestiya, quoted in a broadcast on the 22nd March, considers, however, that, while the elections reflect the popular desire in the proportion of votes gained by the forces of the Left, the distribution of seats in the Diet does not altogether correspond, and elements impeding the progress of the Finnish State have been retained, so that a further struggle is probable. It is evident that the Democratic League, with the support of the Russian press, is advocating an extensive purge of such elements. The appeal for new men has achieved some success; about half the members of the Diet will be fresh men; but the Soviet paper Trud has rather ominously commented on the retention of some 150 "persons responsible for the catastrophe of Finland," and there still remain possibilities of further trouble.

The British air attack upon the Gestapo headquarters in the Shell building in Copenhagen on the 21st March seems to have been remarkably successful, though the German-controlled news service has been careful to make no mention of the main objective, concentrating principally on the destruction of the French School by a stray bomb. The inhabitants of the town are reported to be exhilarated and happy. Bouquets were delivered to the British Consulate-General in Göteborg from grateful Danish refugees. D.P.T. states that a number of Danish patriot prisoners were released by the efforts of sympathisers from the damaged headquarters of the Gestapo, and that street-fighting ensued for about an hour.

The execution of seven more alleged Danish saboteurs was officially announced on the 24th March but is said to have taken place on the 17th.

The influx of German refugees and wounded into Denmark continues. Between the 16th and 19th March about 15,000 civilians and 9,000 military casualties are reported to have reached Copenhagen. Three ships arrived in the harbour on the 23rd March with a further 6,000 refugees and 300 wounded soldiers. The Freedom Council, on the 21st March, issued a protest against the responsibility for sick persons from Germany, including those suffering from dangerous contagious diseases, being thrown upon Danish doctors and nurses. Concern has also been expressed in official quarters in Sweden at the problem created in Denmark by the large additions to the population which the German proposal to transfer 2 million refugees would bring about.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Norwegian Chamber of Commerce in London, in the presence of M. Nygaardsvold and other representatives of the Norwegian Government, the vice-chairman drew attention to the question of post-war supplies to Norway. While realising that Norwegian tonnage would be bound until the defeat of Japan, he hoped that enough would be released to avert a catastrophe, saying that Norwegians at home and abroad, especially the crews of all Norwegian ships, were greatly preoccupied with this question. In spite of the serious transport difficulties involved in supplying the continent, he felt that the problem in Norway should be easier owing to the fact that the principal towns were situated on the coast.

Conversations have recently taken place in London with representatives of the Swedish Government with regard to the risk that German capital assets might be removed to Sweden.

The Swedish Government has agreed to join the International Shipping Pool and a Bill was laid before the Riksdag on the 21st March to provide the necessary ratification.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 13th March, after an absence of nearly five years, Queen Wilhelmina returned to the Netherlands to make a ten-day tour of the liberated provinces. Her Majesty was welcomed everywhere with tremendous enthusiasm.

Dr. van Kleffens, the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs, arrived in Paris on the 18th March. He was received by General de Gaulle, and in conversations with M. Bidault, the French Foreign Minister, all matters of common interest to the two countries were discussed. There was no great divergence of opinion on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, in regard to which the Dutch attached importance to the voting system, the question of the smaller Powers and the position of the Court of International Justice. The French Government made it clear that they wanted a predominant position in the Rhineland, but that they would welcome the presence of Allied troops in that territory. Holland would not suffer commercially or economically from any new régime that might be set up. M. van Kleffens pointed out that no commitments as to zones of occupation or possible annexation could be made until the liberation of the Netherlands was completed and the existing Government was replaced by one representing the whole nation. In the event of annexations being considered, the Dutch might claim up to the boundary of the Oldenburg province. The question of the French and Dutch possessions in the Far East was also considered. The French view on the setting up of international bases in the existing French colonies was that any such arrangement would have to be reciprocal and, while foreign experts and credits would be employed, the bases would have to remain under French sovereignty. No objection would be raised if the United States were given trusteeship over any Japanese territories. An official communiqué issued in Paris stated that the Dutch and French Governments were agreed in their determination to join in building up an organisation capable of ensuring world peace and security in Europe. In this spirit they took a favourable view of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The discussions on the German problem had shown that there was identity of views on the necessity of depriving Germany permanently of the material means for future aggression.

The Economic Consultative Agreement between France, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxemburg, which had been discussed during the visit of M. Spaak, the Belgian Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Paris in February (see Summary No. 282), was signed at the Quai d'Orsay on the 20th March. The Agreement provides for the setting up of a Council of Economic Co-operation composed of three delegations, representing respectively France, the Netherlands and the Belgian-Luxemburg Economic Union. A permanent Secretariat will maintain constant contact between the Council, the experts who will assist it and the signatory Governments. Through these agencies the four countries, which all face similar problems, will consult each other with a view to mutual economic aid, thus ensuring the best possible use of available resources and encouraging the gradual resumption of international trade.

On the 21st March M. van Kleffens left Paris for Brussels to discuss with M. Spaak questions relating to this agreement and to the San Francisco Conference. In a press conference in Brussels on the 23rd he stated that, while the Netherlands and Belgium would retain entire freedom of initiative, they would pursue a closely parallel policy at San Francisco. He also expressed the hope that the bonds uniting Great Britain to Western Europe would, in the future, be strengthened. The Belgian Government has communicated to His Majesty's Government, and also it is understood, to the United States Government a note on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals inspired by the same principles as that previously presented by the Netherlands.

The Belgian Ministry of Information has announced that during February the number of unemployed decreased by nearly 80,000, falling from more than 300,000 to under 230,000, a figure not appreciably greater than that for the same period in 1940.

The Luxemburg Consultative Assembly, which was set up in order to maintain contact between the Government and public opinion (see Summary No. 283), met for the first time on the 20th March to hear the Prime Minister, M. Dupong's report on the activity of the Government in exile. The Assembly is made up of 27 members of the former Parliament and 30 members proposed by the Government and nominated by the Grand Duchess and includes, besides representatives of the old-established Catholic, Liberal, Socialist and Independent parties, three Communists and several members of the Resistance movements.

FRANCE.

The chief issue of importance in foreign affairs continues to be the attitude of the French Government to the San Francisco Conference. The absence of the French Government from the ranks of the inviting Powers and the failure of the Soviet Government to give the support which had been expected after the conclusion of the Franco-Soviet pact, have created general disappointment. The feeling also exists that this setback, the absence of any Anglo-French pact and General de Gaulle's refusal to meet President Roosevelt at Algiers must be due to lack of experience in those directing French foreign policy.

A memorandum was approved by the Council of Ministers and communicated to the United Nations Governments, setting out French views on, and amendments to, the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The eight points outlined in the memorandum and the text of the proposed amendments were published in the press of the 23rd March and comment was favourable. The proposals, which cover such points as the method of voting, representation on the Security Council, the recruitment and stationing of international security troops and the future of the Economic Council, show that the chief anxiety of the French Government is—in the interests of French security—to reconcile regional pacts with the machinery of world organisation. (See also under "Low Countries.")

General de Gaulle's recent speech on domestic policy (see Summary No. 283) and subsequent ministerial statements have not materially changed the situation and the general verdict of the Left and the Resistance is that everything depends on when some definite action is taken. Nor have relations between the Government and the Consultative Assembly improved, despite meetings between representatives of the Assembly and General de Gaulle on the 28th February and the 14th March. The General appears to have made no major concessions on the grounds that the Assembly is not representative and that he alone is responsible to the country. Indeed it is unlikely that he will make any change in his Cabinet at present or increase the Assembly's powers over legislation; but he has made it clear that the local elections will be held on the dates fixed (sc. 29th April and 20th May) unless in the meantime the war has come to an end, and that he may make additions to the Assembly in the light of the election results. Most sections of the press are now, however, hinting at the desirability of postponing the elections just because of the approaching end of the war in Europe.

On the question of the eligibility of the Senators and Deputies who voted for the delegation of full powers to Marshal Pétain in July 1940 (see Summary No. 282), M. Jeanneney, who himself presided over the National Assembly on that occasion, would appear to favour complete liberty for those who did not occupy any official post under Vichy, or collaborate, to present themselves for election, whilst M. Tixier proposes to set up a jury d'honneur of twenty-five members drawn from the Parliamentary resistance groups to decide each case on its merits. It is believed that General de Gaulle favours the more liberal view of M. Jeanneney. The Government is expected to submit shortly a draft ordinance to the Assembly. Differences on this issue, the reported desire of MM. Tixier and de Menthon to resign, and the increasingly critical attitude of the Communist Party towards the Government, have given rise to rumours of a ministerial crisis.

The announcement of a small decline in the total of unemployed persons in France is interpreted as a sign that the period of maximum industrial inactivity has passed. The Minister of National Economy recently pointed to some improvement in the flow of civil imports and in the internal transport situation. It is feared, however, that the coal shortage will impede industrial recovery; and the food position in the Paris area continues to be most unsatisfactory.

The Government has now presented to the Assembly the budget for 1945, which is shortly to be debated, the estimates for the different Ministries having nearly all now been approved. Total civilian expenditure for 1945 is estimated at 217 milliard francs, of which 61 milliard are a direct result of the war. Military expenditure proper is estimated at 173 milliard. Revenue, estimated at over 172 milliard, will cover 44 per cent. of total expenditure. Certain taxes are to be raised, but the Government's tentative scheme, already applied to civil servants, for forced saving on incomes over 100,000 francs, has been rejected by the Assembly's Finance Committee on the ground that it would penalise certain sections of the community and leave others untouched.

The Arab Conference at Cairo was the subject of an important leading article in the Monde of the 20th March, which expressed friendly sentiments on Arab aspirations in the Middle East, where France continues to have considerable interests, and suggested that Arab Federation might provide the first practical realisation of the world-wide application of the federal principle.

This was followed by an interesting speech about French relations with Syria and Lebanon, made in the course of the Consultative Assembly debate on the Foreign Affairs estimates on the 21st March by M. Gorse, the Overseas Resistance delegate. After the usual references to British interference (which was also sharply attacked by the Paris wireless on the same evening), he frankly admitted French mistakes and the decline in French prestige in the Levant. He urged that France should make a generous settlement with the Levant States, take the initiative in securing their representation at San Francisco and support the formation of an Arab League. In the course of his reply M. Bidault claimed that France's attitude was one of progress, good faith and independence. Though France was not one of the inviting nations to the San Francisco Conference, she raised no objection to the presence of Syria and Lebanon, and when he went he would "be delighted to see their representatives there if this is possible." (See also under "Middle East.")

During the Consultative Assembly debate on the 20th March on the Colonial estimates General de Gaulle commented briefly on the emphasis laid by all speakers on the close co-operation and cohesion between the mother-country and the Overseas territories. This revealed a common conception of "La Communauté Française," a phrase which should be retained "not only in our language but in our institutions." He then read out a telegram just received from Indo-China calling for the supply of arms and ammunition by parachute to enable the French forces to continue resistance to the Japanese. General de Gaulle stressed the appeal and implied that the Allies were not doing all in their power to back up French troops. Considerable prominence has been given in France to reports of resistance by French Colonial troops to Japanese attempts to disarm them, the general tendency being to over-estimate the military significance of resistance which, however gallant, cannot have more than a moral effect.

On the 23rd March the Council of Ministers approved proposals for forming Indo-China after liberation into a federal union of States with a large measure of autonomy. With France and other parts of the imperial community, Indo-China will form a "French Union" within which it will have a freedom of its own.

SWITZERLAND.

The military events in Germany have naturally engrossed the attention of the Swiss public and there has been much speculation as to their political consequences.

An agreement has been reached between the French State Railways and the Swiss Federal Railways for the resumption of goods and passenger traffic to and from Switzerland. The French will run three goods trains a day between points on the Spanish frontier and Switzerland and two goods trains daily between Toulon and Switzerland. Repairs to French locomotives and rolling stock will be carried out without delay in the workshops of the Swiss Federal Railways and in other Swiss establishments. It is hoped to resume direct passenger services between Paris and Berne and Paris and Geneva from the 1st July. Traffic on the local lines connecting with Bâle, Lausanne and Geneva is to be resumed shortly.

The Foreign Minister has received a delegation from the Swiss society for the furtherance of relations between Switzerland and the Soviet Union for the discussion of Swiss relations with Russia.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The Infante Don Juan, third son of the late King Alfonso and claimant to the throne of Spain, issued on the 22nd March from Lausanne a manifesto to the Spanish people. As an act of courtesy a member of Don Juan's entourage called at His Majesty's Legation in Berne on the eve of publication and communicated the sense of the message. It is in essence a call to Franco to relinquish power and to leave the way open for a restoration of the Monarchy, the traditional Spanish régime which "alone can provide an effective guarantee of religion, order and liberty." Franco's Government, "modelled on the totalitarian system of the Axis Powers," is condemned as being both contrary to the character of the Spanish people and fundamentally inconsistent with the world of to-day. And because of this anomaly the future of the nation itself is compromised. Spain to-day is in double danger of fratricidal strife within and isolation without. The alternative régime of a republic, "even though at first and in intention it were moderate, could not help moving towards an extreme, and that would provoke a corresponding movement towards the other extreme with civil war as the inevitable result." The only régime capable of reconciling all Spaniards and re-establishing peace and harmony is the traditional Monarchy. Towards the end of the manifesto there is a paragraph reminding Franco's supporters of "the tremendous responsibility they incur by contributing to a prolongation of the situation which will inevitably bring the country to irreparable ruin."

It appears that the Monarchists had made no preparations inside the country. First impressions in Madrid seem to be of surprise, for some Royalists, including the Duke of Alba, had been advising Don Juan that the present moment was not opportune for issuing a manifesto. It is known, however, that others, and among them the Prince's closest advisers inside Spain, were urging him to come out in the open and declare himself. But it is significant of the state of the Monarchist movement that these counsellors would not commit themselves to suggesting the right moment for the pronouncement; they said it must be done before the autumn, and left the date to Lausanne. The impending crossing of the Rhine by the Allied armies was probably as big a factor in the timing of Don Juan's challenge to Franco as the internal situation of Spain. Franco's reaction is the natural one of ignoring the manifesto, and it would not be surprising if the Spaniards were now to be treated to a press campaign discrediting the Monarchy and Don Juan.

At the moment the strength of the movement is largely theoretical; the Monarchy alone, so the Royalists claim, because it is, so to speak, "au dessus de la mêlée," can bring conciliation. Don Juan's intentions are most honourable; a political amnesty, the immediate adoption by popular vote of a political charter of individual rights and political liberties, the election of a legislative assembly, the recognition of regional characteristics, more equitable distribution of wealth, suppression of unjust social differences, &c. But the present weakness of the Monarchy lies in the lack of unity in action, as opposed to talk, of its chief supporters. Until the generals move Franco is safe; it remains to be seen whether they consider their prospects under Don Juan attractive enough to say to the Caudillo "Farewell! thou are too dear for my possessing." If so, we may see a change before long; if they continue to argue the point, Don Juan's manifesto will merely be one more squib that went off in the afternoon.

The anti-Japanese campaign in the Spanish press, to which reference was made last week, continues with increasing vigour, and the newspapers are full of reports about Japanese outrages against Spanish nationals and property in the Philippines. Spanish interests there, both sentimental and material, are by no means negligible. There is much more genuine "Hispanity" about Spanish feelings towards the Philippines than towards Cuba, for instance, and the powerful Spanish-controlled Cia General de Tabacos de Filipinas has considerable influence in the politics of Manila. At a private dinner party last week the Minister for Foreign Affairs unburdened himself so far as to say that the Spanish Government were going through the necessary procedure preparatory to declaring war. Asked for a date, Señor Lequerica replied, "Pretty soon, I expect. We must get in before Portugal!" But he also said that in accordance with the protocol to the Treaty of Friendship and Non-aggression of 1939 the Portuguese Government were being consulted. The latest step is the sending to Japan of a note of protest, which also communicates the Spanish decision to cease safeguarding Japanese interests in the countries with which Japan is at war. Whatever happens, we may be sure that Spanish motives will rise ever higher; with the Generalíssimo, the world must forget those happy stories of the kind little yellow man which appeared in the Spanish press of 1942 and 1943, and think only on the menacing barbarian who now outrages the country which first brought European civilisation to the Philippine Islands.

The Portuguese, who since 1941 have had rather more to put up with from the yellow men than the Spaniards, are also fluttering their hackles about Manila, and the press published on the 23rd March a statement issued by the Presidency of the Council. It was more moderate in tone than the Spanish pronouncements, partly because there are only 140 Portuguese subjects in Manila. But it is also true that in the Pacific stakes for Allied favour—for this is the prize at which Peninsular eyes are looking—Dr. Salazar is handicapped rather more heavily than the Caudillo; he has to carry the weight of both Macao and Timor. So we may yet see the spectacle of Spain, with no sovereign interests in the Pacific, declaring war upon Japan ahead of Portugal, who has solid colonial responsibilities in the Far East.

ITALY.

Signor Togliatti, the head of the Communist Party, is making capital out of his support of the Government at the time of the disturbances at the Quirinal following on General Roatta's escape. Signor Togliatti has asked for greater participation in the Government for the Communist Party, and has asked that a Communist be appointed at the Ministry of the Interior when Northern Italy is freed. This Ministry is now held by Signor Bonomi himself. In addition to this, the Communist Party paper Unità, backed up by the Socialist and Action Party organs, is keeping alive the general discontent felt at Roatta's escape and is suggesting that the Government was fully aware of the inefficiency which made such an escape possible. This suggestion is likely to fall on fertile ground since there has been, for some time, a feeling amongst the general public, irrespective of party, that too much latitude has been granted to the Italian General Staff, and that up to now it has escaped a much-needed purge. It is even being whispered that Great Britain may have had something to do with General Roatta's escape. There is, of course, nothing unexpected in this, since any and every group suspected of being "reactionary and pro-monarchist" has been accused of complicity. It was therefore inevitable that Great Britain, in Italian eyes the arch-reactionary and pro-monarchist, should, sooner or later, be added to the list of possible suspects. It is, however, thought that the Government should now survive the crisis and that Signor Bonomi should be able to remain in office until Italy is freed providing that nothing happens in the north to give power to the extremists either of the Left or of the Right. If, however, the Communists, through over-confidence, were to show their hand too openly, it might throw the moderates into the arms of the Fascists. Control by either would be a calamity for Italy, but the return to power of the Fascists would probably be the greater danger since Communism, to succeed in Italy, would have to adapt itself to the individualistic character of the Italian people.

The Trades Union paper Il Lavoro publishes a resolution passed by the Italian Trades Union movement which more or less repeats the Communist Party's demands at the time of General Roatta's escape (see Summary No. 284). The resolution criticises the Government for its weakness in dealing with the country's most pressing problems and, in particular, epuration.

Signor Giuseppe Saragat has been nominated Italian Ambassador in Paris and now awaits the French Government's approval. Signor Saragat belongs to the Socialist Party but, although a moderate, he holds strong views regarding the Socialist Party's policy. He fled from Italy in 1926 but returned in 1943 and eventually became a Minister without Portfolio in Signor Bonomi's first Government.

Signor Nenni on his return from Paris has published an article in Avanti on his impressions. Signor Nenni is convinced that really responsible circles in France wish to forget June 1940 and that they wish to collaborate with the new democratic Italy. Those who attempt to raise controversial questions, such as the Val d'Aosta or Elba, are only of secondary importance. The lack of raw materials is the chief obstacle to reconstruction in Italy, while France's chief problem is manpower. This should in itself be a great help to collaboration.

In the North, the twenty-sixth anniversary of the foundation of the Fasci di Combattimento was celebrated with great ceremony on the 23rd March in Milan, the birthplace of Fascism, and in other northern towns. The Fascists have always made much of this anniversary, and seized this opportunity to stage a full-dress parade of units of the Republican Armed Forces, no doubt hoping thereby to evoke memories of the palmier days of Fascism and to instil confidence into the wavering masses. Mussolini addressed Blackshirts at his Headquarters, the Chaplain-in-Chief of the Black Brigades celebrated Mass in Piazza San Sepolcro in Milan, and the Federal Commissioner of Milan and the Commandant of the "Muti" Black Brigade also made speeches. To mark the anniversary further steps in the socialisation programme outlined in the Verona Manifesto of November 1943 were announced: all larger industrial undertakings are to be "socialised" by the 21st April, and tenants of flats belonging to the Istituti delle Case Popolari (Institutes of People's Houses) are to become owners of their dwellings. These measures are said to have aroused great enthusiasm, but it seems likely that at least the more intelligent of the workers must realise that the Fascists are only putting them into effect now as a sop to the multitude for the immediate present and as a source of embarrassment to the Allies and the Italian Government in the future.

Cione's new Republican Socialist opposition group appears to be viewed with great suspicion by the Germans. This group would also seem to be linked up with the Tenth MAS and the Muti Legions, which, being autonomous, are outside the control of the Fascist Party and strongly critical of it. Swiss papers have even mentioned rumours of a plot organised by these groups with the aim of supplanting Fascism and setting up a Communist Republic, though with no affiliations with Moscow.

THE VATICAN.

Mr. Flynn (see Summary No. 285 under "Vatican") has been received by the Pope. According to the Agenzia Romana Informazioni, which is close to the Vatican, his visits were "purely informative," to seek information about Catholics under Russian control, with whom the Vatican has no contact. Vatican relations with Russia were a more complex question and "might be dealt with at another moment." Mr. Flynn himself told the Italian press that his mission concerned a Vatican-Moscow understanding, but that his audience with the Pope was purely personal.

Moved by its apparent fear that German aggressive spirit may revive under a cloak of Catholicism, the Russian press stresses that German peace feelers coincide with a soft-peace campaign by the Heads of the Catholic Church. It so misreads the Pope's speech of the 18th March as to see in it only a plea to forgive the Germans. A Pravda article by Ehrenburg accuses the Roman Catholic "Vicar-General in Prussia" of planning to create a strong German Catholic Power through the Catholic Centre Party: "the priest's cassock is to cover the shame of the Walkyrie" and "Hitler is to be followed by Bruening, who saved the Krupp factories and the General Staff." According to the same article, Catholic papers in Britain and the United States are "rehabilitating Germany, and the director of those Germans who live in the United States, or of Americans who think in German, namely the Pope, is bent on the same thing . . . . but the Red Army will take care of this."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Russian advance in Hungary, the beginning of which was recorded in last week's Summary, gained momentum quickly during the week. The German bridgehead across the Drave was liquidated with the help of Yugoslav and Bulgarian troops; further north Russian forces operating from both sides of the Danube, had by 29th March almost reached the Austrian frontier.

The Government, instead of waiting for the adoption by the Assembly of the Land Reform Bill, has put the measure into force by decree. The reasons given were the urgency of starting cultivation and the fact that peasants were already beginning to divide up the land. The adoption of the Bill by the Government had been made the occasion of many speeches stressing its importance. The Debrecen Government has repealed all the anti-Jewish measures of its predecessors and has dissolved all "Fascist political and military orgnisations," confiscating their property, monies and documents. The list includes not only all the "Right Radical" parties (now merged, in German-controlled Hungary, in the Arrow Cross) and their para-military organisation, the Comrades of the Eastern Front, but also the Imredists, the old Government Party (M.E.P.) and the "Vitézi Rend" (Order of Heroes). The only political party in Hungary which has not yet been dissolved either by the Right or by the Left is thus the Catholic People's Party.

The Government has also decreed the destruction of all Fascist literature, in any language (the destruction of all Left-wing literature had been ordered under Sztojay and Szálasi, so that here, too, little seems likely to survive the dual purge except the Bible). Count Teleki has ordered a radical reform of educational literature. Russian is introduced as a second language in the schools.

Orders have been issued regulating wages in industry and establishing joint arbitration boards of workers and employers, which have to determine working hours and conditions by collective agreement. Hungaro-Soviet and Hungaro-Yugoslav Cultural Societies have been formed. The Peoples' Courts have enacted a few more death sentences.

All this took place to the accompaniment of a running commentary on the Soviet Radio from M. Fedorov, who showed particular zeal in insisting on the punishment of "Fascists" by the courts and the elimination through the Land Reform of "Fascist" and "feudal" influences in Hungarian society. The tone of these harangues continued benevolent, but showed an occasional hint of impatience. This was reflected in a speech recently made in Budapest by Rákosi, the most important of the Hungarian Communists who had been refugees in the U.S.S.R. Rákosi rebuked accusations that his party's programme was insufficiently Radical, and spoke confidently of the collaboration of the Communists with the Social Democrats and Smallholders; but he deprecated the formation of "mushroom political parties," especially attacking a new formation, the "Christian Democratic People's Party," as being simply a rehash of the old "reactionary Christian Party." He was distressed at the insufficient activity of the intelligentsia; and he made a strong attack on the Minister of Supply (General Faragnó).

The Soviet authorities have furnished some supplies of wheat, meat and sugar for Budapest and the industrial regions. These are loans to be repaid in kind.

It is reported that two leading figures in Hungarian intellectual circles are safe: Professors Szentgyörgyi and Szekeü.

The Budapest National Committee has invited Count M. Károlyi to become a member of it.

Roumania.

Interest has shifted for the time being to the new law for the Expropriation of Land, the text of which has now been published. At first sight it appears to equip a large number of landless peasants with holdings of 12½ acres. It also provides for allotments in the neighbourhood of towns, and for unspecified areas under State administration for the improvement of cultivation and cattle breeding. The procedure is that in the first place the State appropriates without paying compensation: (1) the property of Germans and Roumanians of German descent, (2) of war criminals, (3) of absentee landlords and refugees in enemy countries since August 1944, (4) land left uncultivated for seven years, the goods and machinery of Roumanians who volunteered to fight against the Allies, and (5) the surplus of any landowner of more than 125 acres. There are certain exemptions, such as the Royal domains, land belonging to ecclesiastical institutions and certain corporations. The distribution is to be made by local expropriation committees. The law recognises that some estates have already been taken possession of and distributed and these proceedings are to be made to conform to the new law.

The peasants are to pay for the land allotted to them a nominal price, the object of which appears to be to give a sense of security. The new holdings may not be sub-divided, rented or mortgaged, but all these things may be done "in exceptional cases with the permission of the Ministry of Agriculture." Anybody who knows Roumania will have no difficulty in appreciating the sinister significance of this proviso.

The new law has been received by the Roumanian press and radio with a chorus of approval such as greeted the accession to power of the present Government. One would suppose that there had never been any expropriation of land in Roumania until now. Pravda is equally enthusiastic but in rejoicing at the spoliation of the great landlords, adds a remark which will cause some misgiving, "the large landowners have always been against the industrialisation of the country." This suggests the coming of a system of co-operative farming, like the Obstii method, which was tried during the German occupation and which did not win approval from the Roumanians.

The question of granting co-belligerent status to Roumania has been to the fore. His Majesty's Government does not consider that the time is ripe for this step while the feeling of the United States is less strong. But there is agreement that no such step should be taken except by the consent of the three chief Allies. There is an undercurrent of apprehension lest the U.S.S.R. should take action on her own account, perhaps as a means of showing approval of the present Roumanian Government.

Permission has been asked for clearances for aircraft to convey 55 persons, mostly British subjects, to Roumania. Permission has been given for six and refused for one, which leaves 48 cases still undecided.

Meanwhile, no doubt as a result of representations made by His Majesty's Government and the United States Government and of comments by the British and United States press, the Soviet press has been at pains to justify recent political developments. Moscow papers assert that these developments "fully correspond to the decisions of the Crimea Conference." According to Pravda the "Roumanian people spoke with their own voice for the first time," "showed themselves to be a true force," and "brought forth from among themselves a new Government."

Yugoslavia.

The enemy's bridgehead north of the Drave, near Valpovo, has been eliminated by either Yugoslav or Bulgarian forces, according to their respective national news agencies. Otherwise no military development has occurred since the German retreat from the south into Bosnia last December.

The Sóviet Ambassador, Sadchikov, arrived in Belgrade on the 20th March with his staff and a trade delegation. On the 24th an agreement, similar to those for Greece and Czechoslovakia, was signed between the Yugoslav Government and U.N.R.R.A. It provides that U.N.R.R.A. shall begin its task of supplying Yugoslavia on the 15th April, and that distribution shall be made without regard to race, creed or political views. The Yugoslav Government made it clear that supplies, as soon as unloaded, would become their property and that they would carry out the distribution and control their own nationals in U.N.R.R.A.'s service. The Head of the U.N.R.R.A. Mission is to be a Russian, Sergeichik.

Contradictory reports describe the régime in Serbia as moderate and responsible for comparatively few arrests and executions, and as a reign of terror. Owing to the firm official control of information it is as yet impossible to evaluate the situation. The request of the new Serb Agrarian leaders for the admission of their party into the National Liberation Front of Serbia (see last Summary) has been granted. The régime's economic policy is illustrated by a decree placing all imports and exports under State supervision; and by a broadcast speech by Pijade, a Communist and Vice-President of A.V.N.O.J. After denouncing the richer peasants and townsfolk and praising the poor, Pijade outlined the proposed land settlement. The poorer peasants would receive land as far as possible. On most of the large areas now confiscated by the State peasants would be settled as permanent tenants, unable to sell their holdings (and therefore apparently tied to the soil). Other parts of the State's land would be co-operatively worked by groups, a method rendered necessary in any case by the proposed greatly increased mechanisation of agriculture. The whole scheme would require a considerable transference of families to new districts. Efforts would be made to make the Yugoslav peoples territorially compact.

In Macedonia a people's court, for "offences against the national honour of Macedonia," has been appointed similar to the courts already operating in Serbia. Another assertion of Macedonian autonomy is the proposal of an Orthodox congress at Skoplje for the creation of a Macedonian Orthodox Church. It was decided to await the assent of the English [sic] and Russian Churches before proceeding further.

Articles in the official Borba have continued to attack Turkey and to demand the delivery of Roatta and other Italians for trial before a Yugoslav court. The frequently expressed Yugoslav claims to Venezia Giulia are causing increased anger and alarm in Italy.

Greece.

The situation in Greece, although it has continued to improve, is still confused. The date of the plebiscite which is to decide for or against the Monarchy has yet to be fixed. A plebiscite held soon, while reaction against the extreme Left is in full swing, would almost certainly yield a handsome majority for the King. But with the decline of party passions this reaction is likely to lose force, and were the King to return soon he might become identified with the extreme Right only to find, after a brief triumph, that he was faced with a violent swing to the Left such as may be expected in many countries. Meanwhile, as there is no Parliament, there is no constitutional outlet for public opinion. General Plastiras, who is a straightforward soldier and has been making rather arbitrary changes in his Government, is hardly the man to find the way out of this political tangle. But the Regent, who is regarded both as the wisest man in Greece and as the only man who can prevent another revolution, can be relied on to follow the course most likely to lead to something like parliamentary government.

In accordance with the Greek tradition of keeping a Cabinet representative in the north, General Manettas, a former Chief of Staff, has been appointed Minister for the Co-ordination of Thrace and Macedonia. He will reside at Salonica and have under him the governorates-general of Western, Central and Eastern Macedonia and of Thrace. In these parts the general situation continues to develop satisfactorily. British troops have now occupied Thrace as far as Komotini (Gumuljina) and all Greek Macedonia, and the national guards are moving in as quickly as possible behind them, and beginning to settle down although they are nervous of the well-organised Communist bands which terrorise certain districts of Western Macedonia.

Athens celebrated Independence Day, the 25th March, in festive mood. The Communists participated in the ceremonies but there were no disturbances. The Regent took the salute at a review of the Greek forces, scouts and girl-guides. Two days earlier, as Archbishop, he had carried the miraculous eikon which had been brought from Tinos at the head of a religious procession through the centre of the city.

Albania.

When Brigadier Hadgson, the head of the British military mission, arrived at Tirana on the 21st March to take up his duties, he was greeted not only by representatives of the régime, but also by large crowds which, though doubtless encouraged by the authorities to assemble and to demand representation at San Francisco, were genuinely enthusiastic. Enver Hoxha's position is now none too strong, and he appears to have tried thus to create the impression, upon a populace which can hardly appreciate the nicety of the distinction between a military and a political representative, that Great Britain has recognised his Government. When he received Brigadier Hodgson he was most friendly and grateful for past British help. He promised that the movements of the military mission would not be restricted. Demonstrations continue to be staged throughout the country demanding recognition of the Government and an invitation to San Francisco. Bishop Fan Noli too has telegraphed to Mr. Churchill on behalf of the Orthodox Albanians in America urging that an invitation be issued.

The People's Court has been hearing charges of collaboration and persecution brought against former prefects and others.

The Italian Under-Secretary for War, General Mario Palermo, arrived on the 10th March at Tirana to examine the possibility of repatriating the many thousands of Italians employed on forced labour by the F.N.Ç. without pay and in appalling living conditions. In a press interview the General is reported to have given a categorical assurance, which Albanians have heard from Italian lips before, that Italy would insist on Albanian independence.

On the 19th March Enver Hoxha protested strongly to all the Allied representatives against the atrocities which he allaged Greek troops were committing against Albanian nationals in the district of Chamuria on the Greek side of the frontier. He asserted that thousands were fleeing into Albania. It is, however, to be noted that the Germans employed Chams (Moslems of Albanian stock living in this district) in fighting against Colonel Zervas and that, when the Germans evacuated, thousands of Chams also crossed into Albania but were sent back into Greece by Enver Hoxha.

Bulgaria.

A good deal of publicity has been given to the annihilation of the German bridgehead on the Drava by the Bulgarian 1st Army, and it is clearly hoped that this achievement may strengthen the Bulgarian claim to the status of a co-belligerent. The truth, however, is that although in Macedonia the Bulgarian army fought well against the Germans it has latterly not had much stomach for a struggle which it hardly understands. It is far from home, it has suffered many casualties, it has been purged of a number of its best officers and the arrogance of the assistant commanders (i.e., political commissars) is reported to have led to incidents which have impaired its efficiency.

If read between the lines, a report issued by the Central Fatherland Front Committee on the recent Fatherland Front congress throws light on the intentions of the Communists. Political training is said to be satisfactory but capable of improvement—which means that the Communists, who already dominate the Fatherland Front, intend to gain more ground. The "foreign insinuation" that one party in the Fatherland Front dominates any other is indignantly denied, and the conviction—which doubtless contains a threat—is expressed that all the four coalition parties will co-operate. Lastly, it is stated that the Fatherland Front committees must be reorganised on a basis of equality and thoroughly purged—which may be taken as meaning that the non-Communist elements in the coalition will be drastically reduced.

The so-called Freedom Loan which has for some months been officially boosted as the one means of saving the leva and Bulgarian economy in general, is reported to have reached 25,107 million levas. Urgent exhortations have now been issued to complete spring sowings. The vigour with which such campaigns are conducted is fairly evidently due to Russian inspiration. Indeed, the Russians' control over Bulgaria is so absolute that anything done by the Bulgarian authorities may be assumed to have at least tacit Russian approval. And so long as Bulgaria remains a Red Army base Russia must be directly interested in measures for supporting Bulgarian economy and increasing Bulgarian production.

Proceedings in the People's Court have been on a reduced scale, but a special division of the court has been set up to try some 200 civil officials who are charged with showing cruelty to the populations of occupied Greek and Yugoslav territory.

Turkey.

On 19th March the Soviet Government denounced the Turco-Soviet Treaty of Neutrality and Non-Aggression of 1925, which, had it not been denounced before the 7th May next, would have been automatically prolonged for two years from the 7th November, 1945, when it is due to expire. The published Soviet explanation was that circumstances had changed completely since 1925, that Russia was now engaged in political and military collaboration with Britain and the United States, that Turco-Russian relations during the war had left something to be desired and that there was need for substantial improvement in a treaty obviously out of date. There were indeed indications in 1939 that Soviet Russia—then the ally of Germany—was far from pleased when Turkey entered into her alliance with Britain in that year. Further, it was clear in 1936, when the Montreux Convention was concluded, and it has been increasingly plain since, that the Soviet Government is dissatisfied with an instrument which, though it severely restricts entry into the Black Sea, in practice leaves much discretion to Turkey as the armed guardian of the Straits. It may well be, therefore, that the heat which Soviet propaganda has turned onto Turkey for the last few weeks, culminating in the denunciation of the treaty, is all meant to be a preliminary softening of Turkey before the opening of negotiations for a new treaty covering the Straits.

It might be thought that such tactics would hardly produce the best atmosphere for negotiation, but the Turkish press has been kept dumb and the Turkish authorities do not seem to have been greatly upset by the Soviet move. When hard pressed by Russia it is their traditional policy to rely on Britain and they doubtless hope to find salvation in some multilateral arrangement rather than to be forced into an exclusively Turco-Soviet agreement. The absence of M. Molotov will preclude any serious negotiations at San Francisco.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

On the 22nd March the Covenant of the Arab League was signed in Cairo by representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Lebanon and Transjordan. It will be sent to the Imam of Yemen for signature on his behalf. Provision is made for the future accession of other independent Arab States, and from the outset the Council of the League will appoint a Palestinian Arab to participate in its activities. The following analysis of the Covenant is based in part on a monitored version; any inaccuracies resulting from this will be corrected in next week's Summary.

The organs of the League will be a Council, a number of functional Committees and a Secretariat. Each member State is to have one representative on the Council, which will normally meet twice a year, the office of chairman passing in rotation among the members. Decisions taken by a majority of the Council will bind only those States which accept them. Its functions are to include the consideration of disputes arising between members or between members and other States. In the event of any disagreement which might involve a member State in war, the Council is apparently bound to mediate with a view to conciliation. It is not altogether clear what steps are to be taken if such mediation should fail, or if the dispute should have reached an acute stage before mediation is attempted. Any member of the League attacked or threatened with attack is entitled to summon a meeting of the Council, which "will decide on the measures to be taken." If one member State has committed an act of aggression against another, thus violating the provision forbidding the use of force to settle disputes between members, the offender shall not attend this Council meeting. If the aggressor is a non-member, the Council's only guidance would seem to be the definition of the objects of the League in article 2, which includes the protection of the independence and sovereignty of the members. Arbitration, by majority vote and with binding effect on the disputants, is to be confined to disputes between members which do not involve their integrity, independence or sovereignty, and which they voluntarily and jointly submit to the Council for settlement.

Proposals for agreements on such matters as trade communications and social and cultural co-operation are to be submitted to the Council by a number of specialised committees; and on these committees representatives of other Arab countries may be invited to sit together with those of member States. An Annex to the Covenant emphasises the importance of such co-operation with non-member Arab countries, whose aspirations the League must use its best endeavours to realise.

Another Annex appoints Abdul-Rahman Azzam Bey as the League's first Secretary-General, his appointment to have effect for two years. The League's headquarters are to be in Cairo, but the Council may decide to hold meetings elsewhere.

Provision is made for withdrawal from the League, for the dismissal of a member State failing to carry out its commitments, and for the revision of the Covenant. The article bearing on this last point seems to have been drafted in the expectation that such revision will be in the direction of extending the League's powers, and looks forward to the establishment of an "Arab Court of Justice." The way is also left open for associations between two or more of the members closer than that resulting from the Covenant.

The indications of a desire that the League should exercise some control over the external policies of member States, which appeared in the protocol signed at Alexandria last October, are less evident in the text of the Covenant. Copies of all treaties or agreements concluded or to be concluded by member States are to be communicated to the Secretariat. To this is added an apparently anodyne declaration that agreements between a member and a non-member are not binding on other members. Of more importance, perhaps, will be the power given to the Council of deciding on means of co-operation between the League and future international organisations.

Although the meetings in Cairo reached this successful conclusion, they also served to emphasise the traditional discords between certain of the participating Governments, whose mutual distrust is reflected in Article 8 of the Covenant, obliging member States to refrain from any action tending towards the modification of one another's internal régimes. The extent of the success achieved should probably be attributed in part to the pressure of an expectant public opinion. The Syrian Prime Minister, lunching together with the other heads of the Arab delegations in the British Embassy on the 23rd March, stressed the importance of Mr. Eden's official declaration of sympathy for Arab aspirations towards unity, first made in 1941, as a factor in the formation of the League.

On the same occasion the Syrian delegation told Lord Killearn that they had been informed by the French Minister in Cairo that the United States, Russian and British Governments were benig officially notified that the French would welcome the invitation of representatives of the Levant States to San Francisco. (For M. Bidault's announcement of the French attitude, see under "France.") The Governments represented at the Arab Conference had previously decided to make joint representations, in London and Washington, in favour of the admission of the two States.

The assassins of Lord Moyne were hanged on the 22nd March. In Palestine, Arab feeling has been aroused by a decision of the High Commissioner to appoint two British members on the Jerusalem Municipal Council, and a proposal that the office of mayor should be filled in successive years by a Moslem, a Jew and a Christian (the last not necessarily an Arab). Hitherto the mayoralty has been held by an Arab continuously, a situation against which the Jews have protested on the ground that they form a majority of the city's population. (It should be noted, however, that only Palestinian citizens may vote in municipal elections, and that a substantial proportion of Jewish immigrants are not naturalised.) The Palestine Arab Party issued a manifesto against the new proposals, and called for a one-day strike of the Arab population, which took place on the 24th March and appears to have passed off quietly.

Sir Kinahan Cornwallis has conveyed orally to the Regent of Iraq a message from His Majesty The King, expressing deep appreciation of the friendship and co-operation of the Regent himself, his Government and the Iraqi people since 1941, and assuring him that The King and Queen look forward to seeing him in England after his forthcoming visit to the United States. His Royal Highness was touched and delighted by this evidence of Their Majesties' regard for him.

The publication in the Tehran Daily News of a Reuter telegram, conveying the information recently released on German fifth column activities in Persia, has been interpreted in the Persian press as a move to belittle Persia's war effort on the eve of the San Francisco Conference. M. Bayat's Government clings precariously to office, but political circles in Tehran are busily discussing the relative chances of his possible successors. Seyyid Zia, who is not in the running, is at present occupied with an attempt to form an organised party, to which he has given the name "National Will" and a detailed programme of a generally Liberal character.

THE FAR EAST.

In a special broadcast to the Japanese people Koiso on the 21st March admitted the loss of Iwojima. He did not attempt to conceal the serious nature of this event and warned that the situation would become more tense as the war neared the main islands of Japan. He asserted that, "in this decisive struggle for the existence of the Japanese race," there could be no alternative but victory or death and there was no room to compromise with the enemy (Domei, 21st March). The Japanese Government are endeavouring to encourage their people by exaggerated accounts of the American casualties on Iwojima and by sweeping claims of victory over the American task force which raided Kyushu. An official communiqué of the 23rd March said that this force had lost eleven warships, including five aircraft carriers and two battleships, as well as 180 aircraft; Japanese losses were given as 150 aircraft and damage to their warships and shore installations was said to be slight. The Transocean correspondent in Tokyo said that the reading of this communiqué was prefaced by the Navy March, which had not been played for some time. The Japanese further claim that in a raid on the 11th March on the Uluthi Islands, north-west of Yap, their naval airmen badly damaged the aircraft-carriers Randolph and Cowpens (Domei, 24th March). They also say that they have organised the Kamishio (Divine Current) Special Attack Corps, which is a submarine counterpart of the Kamikaze air corps. These submarines are supposed to ram enemy vessels at anchor and the Japanese allege that through attacks by these craft at Uluthi (12th and 21st January), at Apra Harbour (12th January), at Hollandia, New Guinea, and the Kosusoru Straits, in the Palau Islands (12th January), a number of American warships were sunk or damaged.

Koiso on the 23rd March told the Diet that the Government were fully prepared to deal with any attempt to invade Japan and, moreover, intended to take the offensive to recapture Iwojima, Saipan and Guadalcanal. He was backed up by Sugiyama, who said that Japanese troops were stoutly holding their positions at Rabaul, Truk, the Philippines and other Pacific Islands, and that they were not there solely for defence. Yonai said that the Navy was fully determined to take the offensive. These may be simply brave words, but they may also indicate that those who favour holding on to all Japanese conquests for as long as possible have gained the day over those who would prefer to withdraw to the inner zone of Japan, Korea, Manchuria and North China, extricating such Japanese troops as could still be got out of more exposed positions.

Shigemitsu on the 23rd March told a committee of Diet members that the San Francisco Conference would only mark a step towards the next war, because the American and British plan for a world organisation rested on the three principles of political and economic monopoly by the anti-Axis countries; the domination of the world by the Great Powers; and the right of these Powers to intervene in the affairs of smaller nations. He asserted that Japan's concept of peace was one based on racial emancipation and equal opportunity. "When the devil was sick the devil a saint would be."

The spokesman of the Board of Information, Sadao Iguchi, on the 24th March, told correspondents that there was no truth in the reports in Spanish papers of atrocities committed by the Japanese military upon Spaniards in the Philippines. He claimed that an enquiry had shown such reports to be without foundation and suggested that they had been concocted by the Americans in the Philippines for propaganda purposes. (For the Spanish attitude see under "Spain.")

The Chungking radio has reported a new Japanese offensive in China; the Japanese have so far remained silent about this. The Chinese say it began on the 21st March in northern Hupeh and southern Honan, and that the main Japanese objective is the city and air base of Laohokow, on the Han River some 200 miles north-west of Hankow. The Japanese have four divisions at their disposal and are admitted by the Chinese to have made steady progress. One Japanese column has taken Icheng, on the Han River, two more advancing westwards from Honan have taken the cities of Nanchao and Fangcheng, while yet another Japanese force in Honan is moving south-west from Loning in order to intercept Chinese reinforcements (Chungking Radio, 24th and 26th March).

It remains to be seen whether this is only a local Japanese operation to drive the Chinese from Laohokow and to remove any threat to the stretch of the Peking–Hankow railway which the Japanese captured last autumn or whether it is the preliminary to something more ambitious. There are have been reports of a Japanese concentration preparatory to an attack on Sian, and such a scheme might include an advance up the Han valley upon Hingan and Hanchung, to cut Sian off from the south. The Japanese would then menace Szechwan from the north-east and might hope that disaffection from Chungking would appear among the local Szechwanese armies.

Japanese broadcasts indicate that the Tokyo Government are uncertain whether the next main American offensive will be directed against Japan itself or against the Japanese forces in China; on the whole they incline to the second alternative. While they are watching the South China coast, especially between Swatow and Hong Kong, they are also apprehensive of possible landings in Hangchow Bay, with Shanghai as the first objective. Chungking Radio (24th March) said that reports had been received from Japanese-occupied China according to which the Japanese had brought some of the Kwantung army from Manchuria to Shanghai, and were busy upon strengthening their defences around the city. If the Americans take the Loochoo Islands, which are now under attack, the way would be clear for a blow at Shanghai. There are indications that Chinese business circles in Shanghai are not happy at the prospect of a battle in and around the city and would welcome some understanding whereby at any rate the former French Concession and International Settlement areas would be immune from military operations. The local Japanese military have declared that they will defend Shanghai to the last, and will destroy it should they have to retreat. It would ease their task of defence if they could get any part of the Chinese coast "neutralised," and they know that there are Chinese and foreign interests which would not care to see Shanghai reduced to ashes.

The Chinese Government announced on the 22nd March that their legation in Tehran had been raised to the status of an embassy. This step is of some significance for the Chinese carefully cultivate their relations with the smaller Asiatic States. China is conscious of her former position as the leading Power in Asia; she will be one of the "Big Four" at San Francisco and, while her Government has repudiated any intention of forming an Asiatic bloc on the Japanese model, China would probably like to feel that she could count on the support, perhaps the votes, of some little friends in Asia. (For Indo-China see under "France.")

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

News from the battle-fronts has naturally assumed first place in the public mind in the United States. The new Rhine crossings have created a jubilant, exhilarating mood of high optimism. Estimates of the duration of the European war now range from a few days to two months. While the deeds of General Patton and his troops have captured the imagination, great emphasis has also been placed on the heroism and success of the British and American troops under Field-Marshal Montgomery. The Western front naturally is the dominating topic of conversation, but newspaper and radio commentators alike have not overlooked the Russian drive towards Vienna, the British victory in Mandalay and Admiral Mitscher's blow at the Japanese navy, which is interpreted as evidence that the Japanese fleet is unable to protect itself even in its home waters.

Discussion of the food situation is declining. Colonel Llewellin and Mr. Lytttelton have arrived in Washington to discuss the whole complex problem of world food production, distribution and equitable allocation. Some surprise was occasioned by the postponement of the promised statement on this subject by President Roosevelt. It was expected that the statement would be issued on Friday, the 23rd March, but the press conference was cancelled, and Mr. Jonathan Daniels, of the White House, told reporters that, while the President still desired to speak on food he might prefer to discuss the matter informally with the press this week, rather than issue a formal statement. Meanwhile, Senator Elmer Thomas (Democrat, Oklahama) has announced that the Senate's food investigating committee would begin its hearings this week. This special committee, which is a sub-committee of the Senate Agricultural Committee, has welcomed the establishment of the Administration's Byrnes' committee (see last week's Summary) and states that its task is to "aid" and facilitate the work of that committee. There is a widespread feeling that, unless home-front production and distribution is brought under further control, no one's claim will be fully met.

The first round in the vital United States tariff controversy has now opened. A Bill has been introduced by Mr. Robert L. Doughton (Democrat, N. Carolina), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which couples reductions in the tariff rates with the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934. The last general tariff revision took place in 1930, under the Hawley–Smoot Act which established such high tariff barriers that the State Department in 1934, admitting their severity, advocated the passing of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act under which the Secretary of State was empowered to make reductions up to 50 per cent. in the Hawley–Smoot tariff line as a result of reciprocal bargains with individual countries. There is a widespread belief that the Hawley–Smoot tariff was one of the drastic measures which contributed so greatly to the world economic depression. Trade associations of more than thirty nations signed an immediate protest and many took steps to adjust their own position. Despite opposition the Treaty Agreements Act has been renewed from time to time and it can claim to have been at least partially successful. The present proposals allow cuts in the tariff rate of 50 per cent. of their current level. Where rates have already been cut by 50 per cent. under the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Act of Mr. Cordell Hull, the New Bill would establish rates amounting to 25 per cent. only of the Hawley–Smoot level.

In a special message to Congress, President Roosevelt has urged the acceptance of Mr. Doughton's proposals. "Trade is fundamental to the prosperity of nations," said the message. "We have tried often to protect some special interest by excluding strangers' goods from competition. In the long run everyone has suffered. The coming total defeat of our enemies . . . . gives us a new chance, and a better chance than we have ever had, to bring about conditions under which the nations of the world can substitute co-operation and sound business principles for warfare in economic relations." He reminded his readers that the United States was the largest creditor nation, and that, unless the United States bought the produets of other countries, it would be impossible for the other nations to pay. He maintained that the Doughton Bill would mean more exports and imports for the United States, adding that, unless both imports and exports were increased, the United States would have a hard time finding jobs for everyone after the war.

According to the Wall Street Journal, however, the Republican party has declared for a "last-ditch battle" to preserve existing tariff rates. While some Republicans are more enlightened and wish to follow expansionist trade policies, there are still Congressmen who see in these new proposals "as great a threat to the American way of life as the Jap and German armies combined." The Congressional battle is likely to be fierce, and the outcome will be vital to the rest of the world.

This week the President has been rebuffed by the Senate, who rejected his nomination of Mr. Aubrey Williams for the post of Rural Electrification Administrator. The usual combination of Republicans and Southern Democrats, after reluctantly agreeing to Mr. Wallace's appointment, once more demonstrated their continued dislike of anything that smacks of the New Deal. (See also under "Latin America.")

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine Government declared war on Germany and Japan and announced its adhesion to the Act of Chapultepec on the 27th March. The text of the resolution of the Mexico City Conference affecting Argentina was reported to have reached Buenos Aires by the 21st March, and the Cabinet then began a series of deliberations which appeared likely to bear fruit on the 24th, when the Acting Foreign Minister said, according to broadcast reports, that there was agreement on the "essential part of the question" and that the main points under consideration were whether war should be declared, against whom war should be declared, and how public confirmation of the decision should be secured. The answer to the third question has not yet been revealed.

The Government's statement is in four articles: (1) an acceptance of the invitation extended to it by the 20 American Republics which took part in the Inter-American Conference at Mexico City, and adhesion to the final Act of the Conference; (2) a declaration, "in order to identify Argentine policy with that of the other American Republics and to forestall with them any threat or act of aggression against the security of any American State," that a state of war exists between Argentina and the Japanese Empire; (3) a declaration that a state of war exists between Argentina and Germany, "considering Germany's position as an ally of Japan"; (4) instructions to the Ministries and Secretaries of State to take the steps rendered necessary," as well as measures necessary to put a definite end to all activities by persons, firms and companies of any nationality who may attempt to hinder the war effort of the United Nations, affect the security of the State or threaten the peace, security and well-being of the American nations."

These decisions were taken in the presence of the Commander of the Campo de Mayo Base, General Avalos, and of the Commander-in-Chief, General von der Becke. Soon after the announcement, the Buenos Aires wireless declared that an extraordinary meeting of the Pan American Union had been called for the 28th in Washington to study the situation, and that the 20 Republics were considering plans to expedite recognition. While the same sources described the "pleasure" and "complete calm" with which the public had received the announcement, other broadcasting stations reported a hostile demonstration outside the United States Embassy and Nationalist anti-war (and anti-Perón) demonstrations, which were broken up by the Police.

The declaration of war in fact appears to have had a mixed reception in the country at large. The Minister of Justice, Dr. Echeverry Boneo has resigned. The doctrinaire nationalists will carp, and some of the Army may sulk, and the "liberal" and Socialist opposition will certainly regard with mixed feelings the prospect of Colonel Perón's snatching recognition in stolen clothes. Colonel Perón, however, appears to have been confident of his ability to cope with the situation.

There is no doubt that the Argentine Government hope, and indeed expect, that their actions will lead to recognition. A statement released by the State Department shortly after Argentina's declaration announced that an early exchange of views between the American Republics is expected "in the spirit of the final act of the Mexico City Conference concerning the restoration of American solidarity." It is possible that the Argentine Government also hope to secure an invitation to the San Francisco Conference (Uruguayan broadcasts report Dr. Serrato as saying that Argentina should be invited after signing the United Nations declaration). But Colonel Perón has still added nothing to his remark about the establishment of relations between Argentina and the U.S.S.R. (see Summary No. 283), and the Soviet Press continues to tar Argentina with the same brush as Spain, and to report allegations of facilities given to Nazis and Fascists there.

There are no fresh developments in the political situation in Brazil. So apparently free is the Brazilian Press that details of the recent sinking of a British ship off the coast of Brazil have been given wide publicity, and an official at the Brazilian Ministry for Foreign Affairs has stated that the press is now free to publish even, for example, such information as the sailings of convoys to Italy.

A Chilean vessel, the Mapocho, sank in the night of the 19th March off Iquique with heavy loss of life. This disaster, following on the loss of the training vessel Lautaro, has tardily aroused the Chilean Government to the danger of sabotage. There has been little restriction on the movements of Japanese residents in Chile; and these events, so soon after Chile's declaration of war on Japan, may be more than coincidental.

In Colombia Congressional elections are reported to have given the Liberal party a slight increase in its already considerable majority.

The inclusion of the Guatemalan claim to British Honduras in the new Guatemalan Constitution has been the subject of a vigorous protest by His Majesty's Government. On the 21st the Guatemalan Press printed an inspired memorandum in which the protest was rejected, and the Guatemalan Counsellor in London, has presented a note rehearsing the familian Guatemalan contentions.

President Roosevelt has ordered that the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs shall be replaced by an Office of Inter-American Affairs, whose director shall be subordinate to the Assistant Secretary in charge of relations with the American Republics. The Office is thus still under the ultimate control of the former Coordinator, Mr. Nelson Rockefeller.

GERMANY.

THE disintegration of German power proceeds apace. The forces of the Western Allies have broken far and wide out of their Rhine bridgeheads and have fanned out over Central Germany to an extent not yet officially revealed. But certain information has been released. Advance units are known to be in Rheine, beyond Münster, and now Osnabrück, in Kassel, in Würzburg. This means that they have already covered more than half the distance from the German frontier to the capital; they are less than 160 miles from Berlin and only some 200 miles from the advancing Russians. The Red Army's progress, if less spectacular, has equal strategic importance. Marshal Malinovsky has driven along the Danube through Czechoslovakia into Bratislava. Marshal Tolbukhin, on the other side of the great river, has outflanked Wiener-Neustadt and is reported to be within 15 miles of Vienna itself. In Silesia Glogau has fallen and, in Western Prussia, Danzig. The all-important Oder section of the front due east of Berlin is at the moment still stationary.

There is no doubt about the extreme interest shown by the German people in this converging advance. Newspapers are bought up, atlases consulted. The absorption in the western campaign was said by one neutral correspondent to be such that the eastern fighting seemed by comparison to attract little attention. The official communiqués have not been calculated to satisfy this curiosity to any great extent. That of Good Friday said that the Allied Armies had been checked on the Lower Rhine, but referred to American units "in the Marburg area," "south of Aschaffenburg" and to "penetrations of some depth" north of the Main. On the following day the O.K.W. spoke of the American advance being slowed up by the attacks of German battle-groups. It claimed that the Danubian positions were being held and that Glogau was still holding out, but admitted that at last Küstrin had fallen. In the west, it reported that "counter-measures had been taken," that the Americans had forced an entry into Heidelberg and had been dislodged by a counter-attack. Easter Sunday's communiqué spoke of renewed attacks on Breslau, "grim defensive fighting on the Dutch frontier" and fierce battles west of Kassel.

Gossip in Germany seems to have more than made up for what the official bulletins did not say and semi-official reporters have been busy denying "fantastic B.B.C. reports" that the western thrust had reached Nuremberg and was approaching Leipzig and Dresden. They assured the public that the report of French troops crossing the Rhine was an invention, that the Allies had not broken through to Würzburg and that the entire area east of Aschaffenburg was under German control. A Good Friday comment (for foreign consumption only) spoke of Montgomery's clearly-emerging plan to encircle the Ruhr and conjectured that the intended link-up of the two pincer arms in the Münster–Paderborn area would no doubt be resisted by all available German reserves.

The evasive tone of official reports does not seem to have availed to conceal from the Germans the gravity of their military situation, and in true Nazi manner this has been within the last week suddenly admitted. A Home Service broadcast on Easter Sunday said it was now obvious to every German that the climax of the six years' struggle had been reached: "There is no longer any German Gau left which is not liable to feel to the greatest possible extent the terrific threat of the enemy onslaught. The long-awaited all-out assault from West and East has become a reality. The heart of the Reich—the Reich, Germany—is exposed to the gravest danger of her long history." General Dittmar was less pompous and more impressive. On Thursday, the 29th March, he emphasised the "extremely grave implications" of the fact that the Rhine barrier had been overcome, and went on to suggest that it was now doubtful whether Germany should carry on the war at all: "The question of the sense of continuing the struggle, which can never be entirely dissociated from its chances, now confronts the fighting soldier and the whole German people with increased urgency."

It would be interesting to know what answer the German leaders give to this political problem, which absorbs public attention and on which the German press and radio are making repeated efforts to spread reassurance. The political effect of the military retreats is not, of course, known in detail, but it is clear that the task of governing a Germany increasingly open to every threat must be getting beyond even German powers of organisation. The Ruhr is isolated, the West is largely in enemy hands, Austria is partly overrun, Saxony is threatened. Communications are everywhere blocked or impeded. The main railway from Berlin to Munich is so far intact, but is in danger of being cut before long. All these facts make unified control and any single strategic plan nearly impossible. As General Eisenhower's message of the 31st March expressed it: "The German Government has ceased to exercise effective control over wide areas." There is, indeed, no sign that the Nazis have a strategic plan for the progressive defence of their country. Their best forces would seem to be east of Berlin and north of the Ruhr. Some reports speak of the withdrawal of S.S. units to a stronghold in Bavaria, and there have been others to the effect that prominent Nazis (Göring, Ley) have already sent their families to the southern mountains. But the evidence of a Nazi intention to man and hold a great "Keep" in the Alpine districts is not wholly satisfying, and, in any case, the rapidity of the Allied advance may seriously interfere with the execution of such a scheme.

On the Home front, too, at a moment when national discipline is of prime importance, the people neither see nor hear their leaders. The red execution placards are more prominent in German cities than appeals to resist to the last. The Gauleiters, whose regional powers increase as their regions become more isolated, have this week been warned by Bormann not to leave their own district and told in unvarnished terms that any who do so will be treated as common deserters. Such an announcement broadcast over the German Home Service can hardly increase confidence in the Nazi leadership.

One substitute for active direction of the making the Nazis have, indeed, discovered in their new German Freedom Movement which is claimed to have arisen in the Western occupied districts. This is being publicised by a special Werwolf radio station and is said to inaugurate a new stage of savage guerrilla warfare. The werwolf, taking his name, as one broadcast explained, from the wild men of the German sagas who, "clad in the skins of animals bound from the darkness of the woods with the utmost fury upon everything living," would resist to the last, and in unorthodox fashion: "The werwolf does not heed the restriction imposed upon combatants in the regular forces." It is significant that, after two or three days of intense publicity, this Movement is now stated to be an independent growth, having no direct connexion with the German Government or the Nazi Party.

Civilian discipline has not so far proved an insoluble problem for Himmler's police forces. One section only of the population is considered to threaten disorder—the foreign workers. Here the most remarkable piece of evidence comes from Recklinghausen, a Ruhr town, whose Police Chief issued on the 23rd February a series of measures designed to combat activities of foreign workers. This document prescribes drastic measures to "counter the insecurity" caused by the presence in both town and country of workers absent from their factories. Together with escaped prisoners of war and "other elements," these were thought to constitute potential centres of revolt, and were to be not only more strictly supervised but raided from time to time by police and Wehrmacht in order to be kept in check. Police authorities are urged in military orders to sanction no wireless sets for any foreign workers; the population are reproved for giving them food, and special vigilance is required after raids. The Gestapo of Düsseldorf reports that foreign workers in that area expect supplies of weapons to be dropped on their camps by Allied aircraft (this rumour is said to have been exploited to the invaders' advantage by the workers of Treves). Violence is reported from a camp of 1,000 Russian workers near Dresden; the guards were killed and the gates forced. Sabotage on the railway track in the Wetzlar area is said to have reached such proportions that several station-masters have had to be dismissed.

The speedy progress of the Allied Forces east of the Rhine has culminated in the complete isolation of the Ruhr from the rest of the Reich. In 1943 roughly half of Germany's total output of hard coal was produced in this area. Taking into account the previous loss of Silesia, Lorraine and the Saar, hard coal output which still remains at the Reich's disposal hardly exceeds 5 per cent. of that in 1942–43. Moreover, more than two-thirds of Germany's pig-iron and crude steel was produced in the Ruhr; and although previous to its present isolation much of the capacity was out of action, owing to bombing and a shortage of ores, such supplies as could still reach the finishing industries in the centre of the Reich were of the greatest value. Apart from coal and steel, the Ruhr also possessed much chemical capacity. This loss, together with that of the chemical centres in the Rhine Province, at Frankfurt a/M., at Ludwigshafen/Oppau, Darmstadt, Wiesbaden, &c., will adversely affect the German munition and explosive industries. Above all, it will deprive Germany of essential medical supplies both for the forces and for civilians. Finally, the areas now overrun by the Allies include 90 per cent. and 60 per cent., respectively, of Germany's sulphate and sulphite capacities, which means that the basic materials needed for many important industries will in future only be available in negligible proportions. All these losses must have crippling effects on continued production in the more central industrial areas of the Reich.

The entry of Russian troops into Austria and the despatch of the notorious Sepp Dietrich to organise the defence of Vienna lend importance to the scanty material of an authentic kind on the attitude of the Austrians to the Nazi régime. The capital itself has suffered heavily from Allied bombing and, in early March, was already reported to be without the normal supply of water, light, gas and trams. Anti-Nazi feeling is said to be very widespread, even among former Nazis, and disaffection amongst the Volkssturm battalions to be so prevalent that the Nazi officers dare not arm them fully. Several reports speak of the extreme apathy and hopelessness of the people, whose one desire is peace. As in Germany, the grip of the Gestapo has tightened of late and there is little active resistance in the large towns. Certain Austrian circles outside the country claim that there is an organised all-party underground movement which may prove of assistance to the Allies during the final breakdown of the Nazi power. But the fact that the Nazis were able to hold Budapest so long against the wishes of many of its inhabitants, the lack of evidence of any large amount of arms in the hands of anti-Nazi Austrians, and the apathetic temper of the people already referred to must make it doubtful whether any assistance of much value is likely to be rendered.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

President Beneš has at last returned to his own country. He left Moscow for liberated Slovakia on the 31st March, accompanied by members of his newly-formed Cabinet, and attended by the Soviet Ambassador M. Zorin. The Cabinet formed in Miscow is to assume control of Czechoslovak territory until the holding of parliamentary elections, which will probably take place in each province as liberation proceeds. Provincial autonomy and federation are promised developments.

The President has emphasised the desire of Czechoslovakia to maintain friendly relations with the democratic Western Powers. Soviet-Czechoslovak relations are still firmly based on the 1943 Treaty of Friendship, Mutual Assistance and Post-War Collaboration, described by Dr. Ripka recently as "the basic guarantee of Czechoslovakia's security."

The new Cabinet includes the following members: MM. Fierlinger (Czechoslovak Ambassador in Moscow) as Premier, Nosek, Vice-Premier, Masaryk, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr. Ripka, Minister of Overseas Trade, Šrobár (Chairman of the Slovak National Council), Šramek, Stránsky, Bečko, Majer, Lichner, Gottwald, Smutný and Prof. Nejedlý. The Communist and National Socialist parties are thus represented, but not the Agrarian. There is no representative of Ruthenia.

Before leaving Moscow, Czechoslovak representatives made broadcast appeals to their countrymen to rise in support of the rapidly-advancing Soviet armies. On the 26th an urgent appeal was made by Nosek, the Vice-Premier, addressed specially to the coal and metal workers of the Moravská Ostrava) and Karvinńa area. On the 28th Colonel Ferencík, military delegate of the Slovak National Council at the Moscow discussions, appealed to all former Czechoslovak soldiers in occupied territory to join the partisans who have for so long been harassing the enemy.

The Deputy President of the Slovak National Council, M. Husak, speaking on the 27th, called upon the Slovak nation to do all in its power to assist the Soviet advance by the rapid repair of transport and industrial plant in the freed areas. To deal with the political and economic problems now arising the Slovak Communist and Democratic Parties in Košice, have formed a new National Front Committee, on which the parties are each represented by four members.

During the past week the Red Army forces under Marshal Malinovsky's Command have made triumphant progress in the drive on the Slovak capital, Bratislava. This campaign has gone forward in a series of pounces, interrupted only by the natural obstacles of the flooded rivers flowing south from the Carpathians to the Danube. Orders of the Day announced the fall of Levice (on the Hron), Vrable (on the Zitava), Nitra, Noyé Zámky and Surany (on the Nitra), and Hlohovec (on the Vah). The important Danubian port of Komárno was also occupied. Other points defending the direct approaches to the Slovak capital were seized on the 1st April. On the 3rd these Soviet forces were fighting in the suburbs of Bratislava.

At the other end of the Moravian Gate, the campaign against the strongly fortified enemy lines protecting Moravská Ostrava proceeds more slowly. The Red Army under Marshal Koniev has occupied more of the Silesian industrial belt and closed up to the actual Czechoslovak frontier. Rybnik and Strehlen were taken on the 27th March, Ratibor and Bieskau on the 30th, and the besieged garrison at Glogau on the 1st April. Berlin announces that the German Minister of State, Frank, and Gauleiter Konrad Henlein have been placed in charge of the defence of the M. Ostrava–Opava line of fortifications.

POLAND.

The claim of the Warsaw Administration that it should be represented at San Francisco has received support from the Soviet Government (see below under "Soviet Union"), and from a body of the Warsaw Administration's supporters in London, known as the Polish Council of Democratic Unity.

Since the dissolution of the Polish National Council in London by President Raczkiewicz, reported in the last Summary, fourteen of its twenty-nine members have dissociated themselves from the Arciszewski Cabinet's policy of opposition to the Yalta Agreement. "The chief and most urgent task of the Polish parties" they say, "is to do their utmost, on the basis of the Crimea decisions, for the speedy setting up in Poland of a really representative democratic Polish Government." The signatures are headed by that of Professor Grabski, formerly president of the National Council, and include, besides those of Peasant Party members, those of five members of the Christian Labour Party, of which General Sikorski was an adherent. This Party declared its support for M. Mikolajczyk last week.

On the capture by the Red Army of the former Free City of Danzig on the 30th March the Polish flag was immediately hoisted, and the heads of the Warsaw Administration telegraphed the thanks of the Polish nation to Marshal Stalin. On the same day the Warsaw "Cabinet" decreed the Constitution of Danzig, with Gdynia and five rural districts of Polish Pomerania, into a new Polish province of Gdansk (Danzig). On the 31st March M. Osobka-Morawski broadcast an address in celebration of these events, for which, according to a Tass communiqué, he gave credit to the Red Army, the Polish Army, and the "correct attitude of the resurrected democratic Polish State." "Besides Gdansk," he added, "we have received back the Masurian lands" (i.e., Southern East Prussia) "Lower and Oppeln Silesia, and the hour is not distant when the Polish frontiers will be established on the Neisse, on the Oder, and on the Baltic shore."

On the 30th March an announcement was made over the Yugoslav Radio that Marshal Tito's Government had recognised the "Provisional Government" in Warsaw, and that representatives would be exchanged.

The Lublin radio has recently broadcast an authorative account of the "Provisional Government's" policy in regard to the various categories of Polish citizens placed by the Germans on the "Deutsche Volksliste." The latter, it will be recalled, was divided into four classes: Categories I and II comprised, respectively, politically "active" and politically "passive" members of the pre-1939 German minority in Poland; Category III—by far the largest group—consisted of persons who, although claimed to be of German origin, had become more or less Polish by inter-marriage, by the adoption of Polish culture, and by adherence to Polish economic and political organisations; those in Category IV were "absolute renegades" and completely Polonised Germans. The "Provisional Government," in its Decree of the 28th February, 1945, discriminates between these groups as follows: Members of Category I are automatically deprived of civil and political rights, and forfeit their property; their ultimate fate is not indicated, but it seems probable that they are destined for deportation to forced labour in the U.S.S.R. Members of Category II are given the "opportunity to redeem themselves," by application for a process of rehabilitation," provided that they can prove compulsion by the German authorities, and if they behaved "as Poles" during the Occupation. Those in Categories III and IV, similarly, will enjoy full rights as citizens if they can prove compulsion and "their Polish national consciousness by their behaviour." Unsatisfactory members of the last three Categories, on the other hand, will be isolated for an indeterminate period in a camp, will be liable for compulsory labour, and will lose for ever their civil and political rights and their property. In no case does there seem to be any question of evacuation to Germany.

SOVIET UNION.

Sixteen Orders of the Day have greeted Soviet victories during the past week. In the North, Gdynia fell on the 28th and Danzig on the 30th March, after hard fighting, while the encircled German troops south-west of Königsberg were liquidated on the 29th March. Glogau was finally captured by Marshal Koniev's troops on the 1st April, "after prolonged siege and stubborn battles." The greatest progress has been made in the south, where Marshal Malinovsky's troops, advancing on both sides of the Danube towards Bratislava, took Györ on the 28th, Komarno on the 30th and Galanta on the 31st March, while on the 3rd April fighting began in the suburbs of Bratislava. Marshal Tolbukhin's troops reached the Austrian frontier on the 29th March at Köszeg and on the 1st April, after capturing Sopron, they actually crossed that frontier further north; in the course of their advance they took Csorna and Sárvár (28th March), Szombathely and Kapuvár (29th March), and Nagykanizsa (2nd April).

It was announced on the 2nd April that the Order of Victory, the highest military decoration in the Soviet Union, has been awarded to Marshals Koniev, Zhukov and Rokossovsky for their victorious campaigns.

The crossing of the Austrian frontier was not marked by any official statement on Soviet policy towards that country, as had been the case with Roumania and Poland, but Izvestiya (31st March), discussing the offensive, stated "our troops have reached the frontier of Austria filled with determination to secure the restoration of that country's independence." Pravda (31st March), commenting on the liberation of Danzig, underlined its Polish nature, writing of "this ancient Polish city, this most important Polish port on the shores of the Baltic Sea, this custodian of Polish culture."

The claim of the Warsaw Polish Government to representation at San Francisco, put out in its statement of the 22nd March, was strongly supported from the Soviet side in an official Tass message of the 31st March. According to that message, the Soviet Government, even before the issue of the Polish statement, had signified to the Governments of Great Britain and the United States that if reorganisation of the Provisional Polish Government had not been completed before the opening of the Conference, representatives of the existing Warsaw Government should be invited to San Francisco. The Soviet statement went on to refute the contention of Great Britain and the United States that the Warsaw Government could not be invited since their respective Governments were not in diplomatic relations with it, by pointing out that the Soviet Union had met the wishes of the Western Allies in agreeing to the issue of invitations to India, Hayti, Liberia and Paraguay, though the U.S.S.R. had no diplomatic relations with such countries.

There has been no specific statement of Soviet support for Albania's claim to be represented at San Francisco, but considerable publicity has been given to reports from the Albanian press, that in view of Albania's aid to Yugoslav partisans the exclusion of the country would be an act of injustice.

France's attitude to San Francisco was discussed at length in an article in The War and the Working Class (23rd March) designed to allay French fears that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were inconsistent with the Franco-Soviet Pact. It was pointed out that as that Pact had been signed after the Dumbarton Oaks conversations, it could not run counter to the decisions there adopted. The Franco-Soviet Pact, like the Soviet-Czechoslovak and Anglo-Soviet Treaties merely implied that these countries assumed in advance a voluntary obligation to strike the first blow at a new German aggression. The new International Organisation would not make bilateral treaties superfluous—indeed the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France and Czechoslovakia had suffered too much in the present war to found their security on hope alone. The article concluded that if in spite of these arguments the French still feared any inconsistency, a resolution might be moved at San Francisco whereby the Conference would take special cognisance of bilateral treaties previously concluded between countries directly liable to German aggression.

The rumour put out in the American Daily Mirror to the effect that the Franco-Soviet Pact contained a secret clause approving freedom of action for the French in the west and for the Soviet Union in the east was officially repudiated by Tass (27th March), which affirmed that that Pact contained no secret clause whatsoever.

The official Soviet account of the arrangement for the eventual participation of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Republics in the proposed new International Organisation was put out by Tass on the 2nd April. According to this version, the Soviet Government proposed at the Crimea Conference that these two Republics should be represented in the new Organisation on the ground that they surpassed in population and in contribution to the war effort certain other States which by general agreement had been classed as founder members. The Governments of Great Britain and the United States agreed to support this proposal at San Francisco, and in return the U.S.S.R. assented to the American proposal that the votes of the United States Government in the Assembly should be increased to three. The question of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Republics sending representatives to San Francisco was not raised by the Soviet delegation at Yalta.

Some interesting points have emerged during the conversations of the Czechoslovak Government representatives with the Soviet authorities in Moscow (see under "Czechoslovakia"). It has been affirmed from the Czech side that there was no Russian interference in the reconstruction of their Government, though the Soviet Government did apparently offer to use its influence to restrain the Czechoslovak Communists from making excessive demands. This fits in with the damping down received by the Bulgarian Communists in Moscow at the end of last year (see Summary No. 267). Marshal Stalin is reported to have gone out of his way to make the significant pronouncement that the old Russian Pan-Slav policy was dead, and that the U.S.S.R. did not desire to exercise any hegemony over smaller Slav States, which should develop along their own lines without aping the Soviet Union.

In connexion with recent reports of excessively boisterous behaviour on the part of the Red Army abroad, particularly in Slovakia and Ruthenia, and also in Yugoslavia, it is of interest to note a Pravda editorial of the 26th March impressing on Soviet troops abroad the need for being worthy of their high mission. The Soviet man in Europe must reveal to peoples blinded by propaganda the attractive side of the Soviet character, and make it clear that he belongs to a State where national and racial exclusiveness is prosecuted as a crime. Finding himself in "an atmosphere of private property and profit, speculation; predatory interests, prostitution and insulting disrespect of man," he must keep himself unspotted from the world.

The well-known Marshal Shaposhnikov died after a long illness on the 26th March, his death and funeral being given great publicity in the Soviet press. He was one of the most colourful military figures in the U.S.S.R., being one of the first and proving the most important of the Tsarist officers to join the Red Army, which he did as early as May 1918. He rose to be Chief of the General Staff of the Red Army in 1928, and after an interval was again appointed to that post in 1940, being relieved later in the year owing to ill-health. In August 1941 he was made Chief of Staff of the Supreme Commander-in-Chief, or virtually technical adviser to Marshal Stalin. Recently bad health has kept him in the background. Apart from his military posts, Marshal Shaposhnikov was a candidate for the Central Committee of the Communist Party and Deputy of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. He was three times awarded the Order of Lenin as well as numerous other decorations. He was accorded a most impressive State funeral attended by all the leading personalities in the U.S.S.R., his ashes being buried in the Kremlin; his widow was given a grant of 200,000 roubles, together with a monthly pension of 5,000 roubles.

SCANDINAVIA.

The flow of German refugees into Denmark continues on an alarming scale. It is reported in the Swedish press that the numbers now exceed 300,000, and that instructions have been issued that billets are to be found for no less than 2 million in the next few weeks. The danger both to public health and to food supplies is arousing anxiety. On the 25th March the Central Committee of the Danish Medical Society passed a resolution to the effect that Danish doctors, while they may treat individual refugees in special circumstances, are not to organise any medical service for German civilians entering the country, claiming that International Law places them under no such obligation, and stressing that the influx has occurred in spite of the protests of the Danish authorities.

This exodus from Germany has aroused fear among the Swedes that attempts will also be made to find a refuge in Sweden. This fear seems to be justified, for a steamer arrived at the Swedish island of Öland from Gdynia on the 1st April carrying 51 German refugees, of whom nearly half were in the uniform of the Todt organisation. On the following day seven German officers reached the same island, and two more boat-loads of fugitives arrived at Kalmar.

The Swedish press has for some time been alive to the problem. A warning was uttered by Öresunds Posten on the 22nd March, which stated that four German civilians from Danzig, probably high party officials, landed from an aircraft on the 20th March alleging that they had lost their way. The paper commented that if persons of this kind received permission to remain in Sweden such errors in navigation would probably become common. On the 28th March Dagens Nyheter reverted to the question in some detail, urging that there was reason to stress the pronouncedly anti-Nazi Swedish refugee policy during recent stages of the war, and calling for increased stringency of control. On the same day a Swedish broadcast announced that the Minister of Justice was laying a new Aliens Bill before the Riksdag, in conformity with the stricter refugee policy which it was proposed to adopt.

At a meeting of the Swedish Communist Party during the last week of March, a resolution was adopted calling on the Government to sever all connexion with Nazi Germany, to intern all Fascists and to expel all Germans holding Nazi passports.

The arrival in Stockholm, by air from Berlin, of the German economic expert, Dr. Schnurre, on the 27th March, has aroused considerable curiosity. The object of his visit at this particular juncture remains obscure, but it has naturally given rise to a good deal of rumour and speculation.

There has been some criticism in the Swedish press of a speech by the Premier, M. Hansson, delivered on the 25th March, in which he asserted that "our Northern neighbours agree that the best interests of all are served by Sweden keeping out of the war." It is suggested in various quarters that this statement would not apply if, after the general collapse of Germany, an attempt were made to continue resistance in Norway and Denmark. There are indeed some indications of such a possibility. In Norway, work is being completed on a strong fortification in Stjördal, commanding Vaernes airfield in Tröndelagen, and an enormous quantity of ammunition and food are reported to have been stored in tunnels blasted in the hills. Yellow brassards marked Deutsche Wehrmacht are being distributed, together with a combatant's certificate, to members of the quisling Hird. A recent concentration of this force in Oslo has stimulated the suspicion that a final desperate resistance may be contemplated. The prospect does not seem to be relished by the majority of the Hird men, many of whom are reported to have gone into hiding. In Denmark, also, the construction of fortifications continues across northern Sjaelland, and the garrison of Naestved in the south of the island is reported to be engaged in strengthening its defences. Work on fortification is also stated to be continuing in the extremity of the Jutland peninsula, from Aalborg northwards. On the 21st March the Freedom Council issued an appeal to their countrymen to do everything possible to delay work of this kind and to refuse to take part in it.

German executions of Danish patriots continue. Eight more took place on the 28th and 29th March, the victims including Count Lennart Ahlefeldt-Laurvig-Lehn, who is said to have been closely connected with the Danish Royal Family. This action may have been intended as a reprisal for the destruction, by sabotage on the 26th March, of the "Always" Radio Factory in Copenhagen, which played an important part in German war production. It seems evident, however, that no severities will deter the Danish Freedom Movement from pursuing its activities.

The death of Professor Segerstedt, the famous editor of Göteborgs Handels Tidning, on the 31st March, deprives the Allied cause of a distinguished champion and the Nazis of a most inveterate and outspoken enemy.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

Events on the Western front are being followed with the greatest interest in the Low Countries. A Belgian unit is included in the Allied forces that have crossed the Rhine. Further parts of the Netherlands, including the town of Enschede, have been liberated.

According to Radio Brussels, M. Spaak has given assurances to the Senate's Commission on Foreign Affairs that the Belgian Government will endeavour to safeguard the interests of Belgian river traffic on the Rhine and has imparted to them his views on the coming collapse of Germany and the situation that will then occur, including Belgium's claim for reparation. It has also been announced that M. Spaak will lead the Belgian delegation to San Francisco, which will include members of all parties.

In a letter to The Times, Jhr. Beelaerts van Blokland, Vice-President of the Dutch Council of State, has strongly criticised the proposals that are to be laid before the San Francisco Conference. "Is it unreasonable," he asks, "because legalistic and unduly idealistic, for the smaller Powers to ask that the decisions of the new organisation for security as well as for peace be made on a basis of some measure of justice and regard for international law, so as to condemn in advance any fresh tendencies to reach "solutions" on the basis of appeasement?" He adds that the small Powers do not think it inconsistent with realism to ask that "the Security Council be empowered to pronounce a verdict of breach of the peace without running the risk, resulting from the compromise as drafted at Yalta, of a Great Power that has broken the peace vetoing this pronouncement."

The Belgian Minister of Agriculture has paid a visit to England in order to study British methods of food production.

In a statement to the Belgian Chamber on the 28th March M. van Acker gave some interesting information about economic conditions. Unemployment had fallen heavily; indeed, there was already a shortage of skilled labour and a general labour shortage appeared to be imminent. In order to solve the problem, labour would be directed to the industries where it was most needed, in particular to agriculture, forestry and metallurgy. M. van Acker added that the output of coal had increased appreciably, but that it was not yet satisfactory; in order to increase the labour force, the Government had obtained the permission of the Allied authorities to employ in the mines prisoners of war who volunteered to work there up to the number of 14,000. M. van Acker also promised vigorous measures against the black market and a prompt purge of the public services.

Shortly after her return to England from her visit to the Netherlands (see last Summary) Queen Wilhelmina directed that Radio Orange should broadcast a message thanking her subjects for their welcome, in which she also stated that "to make the acquaintance of the brave men of the Resistance Movement and the Forces of the Interior was of great significance and satisfaction to me, as well as being able to hear at first hand of the union and mutual co-operation which has grown in our people during the years that have passed. My Ministers and I will be only too glad to give you the fullest possible opportunities of fulfilling your ardent desire to co-operate in the reconstruction of the fatherland."

FRANCE.

French participation in the great military events in the West was signalised by the crossing of the Rhine by the 1st French Army and their advance into Baden. This news provided a fitting background for the great military parade held in Paris on Easter Monday. It was preceded by the re-kindling of the flame on the Unknown Warrior's tomb by ex-Service men of both wars on the evening of Easter Day followed by one minute's silence salvoes of artillery and the pealing of the bells of the Paris churches. At the Easter Monday parade, held on the Place de la Concorde, General de Gaulle reviewed 12,000 French troops and presented to 131 colonels commanding regiments the colours hidden during the German occupation or new ones to replace those destroyed.

Speaking later at the Hôtel de Ville where, in the presence of the Diplomatic Corps, he presented the Cross of Liberation to the City of Paris, he paid a tribute to the reborn French Army which was at that moment "crossing the Rhine between Speyer and Basle, while holding the Alpine front from end to end and the Atlantic Front, and holding the Japanese in check in Indo-China." He stressed the need for hard work, discipline and national unity. Though entering on a harsher world, France intended to be loyal to her friends and to make every effort to build up in justice a world organisation which might enable "all nations, of whatever size," to find peace and equity.

M. Bidault, in the course of his reply to the debate on foreign policy in the Consultative Assembly on the 27th March, while strongly reaffirming France's will to co-operate fully in collective security and to play a constructive part at San Francisco, defended France's colonial record against a press and book campaign: let those who had done better throw the first stone. While desiring the collaboration of all, they would not accept that French sovereignty over certain territories should be questioned. After M. Vincent Auriol had spoken of the complete agreement between the Minister and the Assembly, the latter unanimously voted a motion of support.

On the 30th March the Council of Ministers approved M. Bidault's list of delegates for the San Francisco Conference. They are: MM. Bidault, Pleven, Billoux, Paul-Boncour, Henry Bonnet as "délégués titulaires," and MM. Monnet, Naggiar, Basdevant, General Juin and Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu as "délégués adjoints." Owing to the war developments interest in the Conference is to some extent abating and it is thought that certain delegates may be prevented from attending.

The question of the number of votes which each country should have in the General Assembly has received some attention in the Press. If the United States and the Soviet Union are each to have three votes the view is expressed that units of the new "French Union" (see last Summary) should also have separate votes, e.g., Morocco, Tunisia, French West Africa, Equatorial Africa, Madagascar and Indo-China, all of which are to receive a considerable degree of autonomy after the war. Furthermore, the report that French will not be recognised as one of the official languages at the Conference has been the subject of strong criticism. (See also under "Soviet Union.")

The Financial Agreement between the British and French Governments, which was signed in Paris on the 27th March by Sir John Anderson and M. Pleven, replaces both the Simon–Reynaud Agreement of December 1939 and the Agreement of the 8th February, 1944 (see Summary No. 227), and clears up all outstanding debts between the two countries. Although the Agreement is narrower than had been hoped and only runs from the 1st March, 1945, to the 28th February, 1946, it allows for the resumption of trade between the franc and sterling areas and for freedom of transfer of payments within those areas. Each Government is to open a credit equivalent to £100 million in favour of the other and any outstanding balance at the end of the year, which is expected to be in favour of this country, is to be paid partly in gold. Both French debts to Britain, dating back to the beginning of the war (including also British advances to the Free French under the Agreement of August 1940, and recent civilian supplies furnished to France) and British debts to France are to be repaid through a special account; it appears that the French debit balance will be met by the requisitioning of French funds in this country. The French munition contracts in the United States, taken over by the British Government after June 1940 are the subject of a special arrangement whereby France refunds to us the dollar cost of those munitions and we agree to send to France an equivalent amount of war supplies which can be put to civilian use. Certain claims on either side are waived, including general claims arising out of the Simon–Reynaud Agreement, under which Britain and France shared war expenditure in the ratio of 60 to 40.

On the 28th March M. Capitant, in the Consultative Assembly's education debate, announced that the Government intended to abolish Vichy legislation on the (largely Catholic) écoles libres (see Summary No. 284), though this did not mean that the State would not help associations or movements having educational value. He stated that the Vichy subsidies to the écoles libres would be temporarily continued to avoid hardship; but the Assembly after an impassioned debate voted for their immediate suppression by 128 votes to 49.

The Budget (see last Summary) was finally adopted by the Consultative Assembly in the early hours of the morning of the 1st April and promulgated the same day. M. Pleven's speech of the 29th March was noteworthy for its announcement of a new tax which is to be introduced, after consideration by the Assembly, and which appears to amount to a capital levy. This tax, called the Péréquation Nationale, will be imposed on all types of property, increases in property since the war being taxed at the highest rate. It will be payable over four years and is estimated to yield 100 to 125 milliard fr.

The more positive French policy towards the States of Levant and the Arab World (see last Summary) was further exemplified by the request of M. Costa at the Consultative Assembly on the 27th March that there should be more and better broadcasts in Arabic. On the 1st April the French Home Service announced that three daily half-hour news bulletins would shortly be broadcast in Arabic for the Middle East and North Africa. Full wireless publicity was given on the 26th March to the friendly press interview of the Syrian Foreign Minister in Cairo and on the 31st the Syrian Minister in an interview in Paris with the A.F.P. said that the official invitation to San Francisco had caused great satisfaction in both countries. Syrians in particular were "happy that France, to whom they are linked by ties of traditional friendship, took the initiative in this invitation." (See under "Middle East.")

SWITZERLAND.

On the 27th March the Federal Councillor for Agriculture and Industry, M. Stampfli, reported on the recent economic negotiations to the National Council. He stressed the fact that the principle of neutrality, which had been maintained for five years under the most difficult conditions, had been preserved. Reviewing the supply situation, he said that the most urgent problem was coal. At one time during the negotiations the Allies had promised a supply of 7,000 tons a month but, for reasons which were difficult to understand, this assurance had later been withdrawn. On the whole, the Swiss delegates had made the best of a difficult situation, thanks to the efforts of M. Stucki and Professor Rappard. But the country's lack of raw material left them in an unstable situation which might turn suddenly for the worse at any time, involving them in a severe crisis with political and social consequences. He was, however, confident that the Allies, who had every interest in maintaining social stability, would not allow this to come about.

The Press is beginning to view with concern the possibilities of trouble and infection involved in a ruined Germany and to emphasise the urgency of a broad policy of reconstruction.

SPAIN.

The reported resignation of the Duke of Alba from his post as Ambassador in London is the first significant consequence of the manifesto issued by Don Juan on the 22nd March. The Duke's position as one of the leading Royalists and an outstanding figure in the Council of Grandees gives some force to this decision, for he has held office under Franco since the days of the Civil War when, before becoming Ambassador, he was the Nationalist Agent in London. It will be remembered that the Duke was the leading signatory to the memorial to Franco sent by a group of members of the Cortes in June 1943 (see Summary No. 196). There was some talk then about the propriety of his continuing in the London

Embassy after this gesture of, if not revolt, at least dissatisfaction with the régime; but nothing came of it. Franco remained at the Pardo, and the Duke of Alba, quite unperturbed, stayed on at No. 24, Belgrave Square. Now, after Don Juan's call, not only to Franco, but to all those who are supporting his régime by remaining in office, the Duke, as befits his position, has given the lead by resigning. The Minister for Foreign Affairs apparently tried to dissuade him, but he said that his decision was irrevocable, and was based on his orders from Don Juan, his lack of confidence in Franco and his knowledge that His Majesty's Government believed that relations with Spain could not be cordial so long as the present régime continued.

At the moment it is not possible to say if this lead will be followed by others. There are many Royalist sympathisers who hold office under Franco. Apart from Generals like Varela and Kindelán—Aranda is unemployed—diplomats like Mateu, recently sent to Paris (see Summary No. 279) and Sangroniz, Ambassador in Rome, are avowed Monarchists; and Lequerica himself, provided he continues in office, would be only too willing to serve Don Juan, or for that matter anyone else who would employ him. It all depends on the Generals—such is the prestige, and power, of the Army in Spain that even a regular avalanche of diplomatic resignations would not produce the effect of half a dozen military leaders withdrawing their support from the Franco régime. And one may be permitted to doubt if soldierly devotion to "mi rey" has yet crystallised into the solidarity which will push the Caudillo out of the Pardo. "Poderoso caballero es don Dinero"—a very powerful knight is Don Doubloon.

As far as one can see, Franco himself, though not quite so buoyant as he was about his relations with Great Britain, is still persuaded that he can get himself accepted by the United States. For instance, he told Mr. Armour, the new United States Ambassador who presented his letters of credence on the 28th March, that there was a clear distinction between the war in Europe, which was disagreeably associated with the danger of communism, and the war in the Far East, which was a perfectly clear-cut issue. And there may be a few Generals who have insufficient training in political reality to disabuse him. But it is gradually being borne upon the leaders of all professions in Spain that, whether Franco be willing or no, change is not far below the horizon.

Relations with Japan have deteriorated. The Note sent to the Japanese Government demanded reparations for the considerable damage which Spanish subjects had suffered in the Philippines, but no one in Madrid expects anything but an unfavourable reply. The position is accepted that Spain will then have to take the logical course of breaking off relations and possibly declaring war. But the Ministry for Foreign Affairs is careful to insist that the matter is a purely Spanish-Japanese issue and that, whatever may be thought or said, Spain is not seeking to obtain from it credit of any kind, such as representation at any war or peace conferences. Whatever may be the outcome of this high-minded policy, His Majesty's Government and the United States Government are at one in not being interested. It is a matter of indifference to us, and a Spanish declaration of war would not in any way affect our attitude towards the Franco régime.

ITALY.

The Council of Ministers' approval of the setting up of a Consultative Council is the most interesting event in Italy this week. The formation of a national Consultative Council or "Consulta," as it is called in Italian, is a big step towards remedying the oft-voiced complaint that the Government, which, for obvious reasons, is not an elected one, is not in touch with public opinion. The Council is to be composed of ten Commissions. Each Commission will deal with Foreign Affairs, Labour, Justice, Agriculture, &c., respectively, and the members are to be chosen from practically any party or organisation provided they are, without any doubt, anti-Fascist. Members will be added from Occupied Italy as it is freed and comes under the Italian Government's jurisdiction. The Government will seek the Council's help in all general problems, but is bound to do so in the case of budgetary taxation and electoral laws. It is intended that the Consultative Council shall continue to function until free elections can be held when Italy is completely liberated.

It is reported from Rome that the present Government is considered in Occupied Italy to be the best in present circumstances, but that the Socialist Party should rejoin it to make it more fully representative, particularly when Northern Italy is freed. It is thought that the Socialist Party would be willing, but there is apparently one difficulty in that the Socialist Party have laid claim to the Ministry of the Interior, as have the Communist Party. Should the Socialist Party make this a condition for re-entering the Government, negotiations are likely to be protracted.

Signor Nenni, the leader of the Socialist Party, appears to have been much gratified by his reception in London. But what is more interesting is that Signor Nenni is said to have changed his opinion and to have realised that the people of Great Britain are genuinely democratic and that they are not reactionary as the Italian people have, up to now, believed. If Signor Nenni would make this clear in the Socialist party paper Avanti he would do a great deal to clear up this misconception which has made relations between the two countries, at times, unnecessarily difficult.

General Mark Clark, commander of the Allied armies in Italy, has broadcast a message to the patriots in Northern Italy telling them that large-scale operations are about to begin and requesting them to reorganise and overhaul their equipment. In this connexion there has been an unconfirmed press report that French forces have attacked on the Franco-Italian frontier south of the Swiss border.

The Swiss Press have given some further details about the alleged plot organised by the "Muti" Legion in North Italy (see last week's Summary). It now appears that the main object of this scheme, which is said to have been propounded at the "Muti" Legion Headquarters and submitted to Mussolini, is to confront the Allies, when they reach the north, with "a new and precise fact of revolutionary significance"; in other words, with a provisional workers' Government with a Republican and radical programme, thereby both forestalling a Communist coup d'État and also preventing an extension of "the Royal Bonomi Government with its reactionary and capitalist views." The promoters of the scheme argue that clearly Mussolini and the Fascists could not bring about this "new fact," but, if Mussolini were to go into the background for the time being, he would be able to stage a come-back when the provisional workers' Government, backed by the Armed Forces, came to negotiate with the Allies, on the supposition that the Allies would choose to negotiate rather than use force, as in Greece. The Provisional Government would then demand a Republic, socialisation and the vindication of Mussolini. It is difficult to estimate at this stage whether movements such as this and Professor Cione's Socialist Republican group are likely to find much following. Their main raison d'être appears to be an elaborate attempt to save their promoters' skins, a cause in which the popular masses in the North are not likely to be much interested, still less when combined with an attempt to save Mussolini.

Kesselring's departure appears to have increased the anxiety of the Fascists about their own fate. There have been rumours that Graziani is to take his place as Commander-in-Chief on the Italian front, the Germans intending that the onus of defeat should thus fall on him. However, these rumours are unconfirmed, and the Germans still control the Italian front.

THE VATICAN.

The Holy Office has excommunicated Don Tullio Calcagno, the Cremona priest who during the neo-Fascist period gained some notoriety by his activities on behalf of the Italian Social Republic, notably through his periodical, Crociata Italiana.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The swift advance of the Soviet and Bulgarian armies through West Hungary continued during the week, and on the 4th April the whole country was reported clear of the enemy. Such Hungarian troops as were engaged surrendered in large numbers; among the prisoners taken was General Aggteleki, commanding the Hungarian Third Army. General L. Veress, formerly commanding the Second Army, who had been imprisoned by the Szálasi Government, was released when the Russian troops entered Sopron, and placed at the disposal of the Debrecen Government.

The strength of the Debrecen Government's new army is now reported to be two divisions of 10,500 men each.

The food situation in Budapest continues serious, but it is reported that essential minimum supplies are now assured for some three months to come.

The Soviet authorities have removed the staff of the Swiss Legation from Budapest and placed them in protective custody near the city.

There is no foundation for the report that M. Kállay, the Hungarian ex-Premier, has fled to England. This canard, which originated in Moscow, seems to have been hatched out of a confusion between M. Kállay and General Radescu. Actually M. Kállay is believed to have been captured by the Gestapo some months ago, and to be either dead or a prisoner in Germany.

Roumania.

The difficulty of obtaining clearance for aircraft continues. Permits have been refused at one moment because the list of the crew was not signed on the dotted line, but a little above or below it. At another time the objection was that the list was in handwriting and not typed. The correction of these "errors" was received with the information that the regulations had been changed. Any instructions issued are verbal, which does not help matters for us.

On the ground that it is necessary to keep open lines of communication the Control Commission have taken over control of navigation, normally under the authority of the European Danube Commission. His Majesty's Government recognises the importance of the lines of communication argument, but for the present acts on the assumption that the operations of bodies under Soviet control are merely provisional.

Recently cars have been stationed at both ends of the street in which the British Legation building is situated, and all cars leaving the building are tracked. The occupants of these cars could not, or would not, produce any papers when asked, and declined to give any account of themselves. The Soviet High Commission repudiate all responsibility in the matter. The Roumanian Prefect of Police has stated that the unofficial Communist police are probably responsible. The Minister of the Interior is stated to have given orders for this activity to cease. It is, however, suspected that these cars were operating under the orders of the Minister.

Efforts are being made to obtain from the Roumanian Government and the Soviet High Commission a guarantee that if General Radescu leaves the British Legation and returns home, he shall not be in any way molested. The fact of his being given sanctuary has raised the question of other persons who are in some danger of arrest. This is still sub judice.

Arrests of suspected war criminals continue on a large scale. The people's courts are functioning and there is an unpleasant feeling of apprehension that "purging" may shortly begin. A number of Polish citizens have been arrested. This matter is occupying the attention of the British section of the Control Commission. It is reported from a trustworthy source that the Polish prisoners are well treated, but are under constant pressure to throw in their lot with the Lublin "Government."

Yugoslavia.

The Yugoslav forces have captured Bihatch in western Bosnia.

The 27th March, the anniversary of the coup d'État in 1941, was celebrated by a review of troops in Belgrade and many speeches. The speakers used the occasion to claim the coup d'État, of which the Serbians are intensely proud, as having been the work of the Partisan movement. They said it was the work of "the people," not of "reactionaries," who had only exploited it. General Zhujovitch, Minister of Finance, said that the "people" had then wanted to resist the Germans and "to lean on the U.S.S.R. and the democratic States." [It will be remembered that in March 1941 Great Britain stood alone, except for Polish and Greek co-operation, and that the U.S.S.R. then had a Pact of Friendship with Germany.] He also said "the 27th March was the day when the Partisan Front went forth to meet its fate." Leading articles in Borba and 20 Oktobar told the same story. The latter said that on the 27th March "the people's movement broke the old party framework into which politicians from various parties had tried to force it." [Thus is history re-edited. The coup d'État was effected by a few officers and leaders of the former Serbian political parties, with enthusiastic popular approval in Serbia.]

On the same occasion Tito spoke of Yugoslav claims in Venezia Giulia ("our Istria, our Slovene littoral") and Carinthia. Kosanovitch, Minister of Information, repeated the claims. To a delegation of women from Istria, Tito said "soon our army will come there." Of south Carinthia Borba wrote that "the plebiscite of 1920 [when a substantial majority voted for Austria] is worthless," because the voters rejected the old Yugoslavia, but would not reject the present "democratic" Yugoslavia." It also claimed, quite unjustifiably according to reports, much popular support for Yugoslav Partisans in Carinthia.

The Yugoslav Government have decided to establish a War Cabinet consisting of Tito, Kardelj, Zhujovitch, Hebrang, Shubashitch, Grol and Kosanovitch; i.e., four Partisans and three representatives of the former parties. They have also decided to recognise the Lublin Committee as the Provisional Government of Poland and to establish diplomatic relations with it. The demand of the revolutionary Government of Albania for admission to the Conference at San Francisco has received vigorous support in the Belgrade Press; as has the new Government of Roumania.

An outbreak of typhus is amongst the chief problems of Yugoslavia, but a United States Commission is already grappling with it in east Bosnia and Macedonia. Other troubles are the outbreak of resistance, apparently on a small scale, by Dalmatian malcontents, and the parachuting of some Chetniks into Serbia by the Germans.

The United States Ambassador, Mr. R. C. Patterson, arrived in Belgrade on the 31st March.

Greece.

Replying to questions in the House of Commons on the 28th March, Mr. Eden said that, as far as His Majesty's Government was concerned, he could give an asssurance that the results of the plebiscite and the general elections would not affect any promises of assistance which had been made to Greece. His Majesty's Government would be prepared to help in supervising elections in Greece and would welcome the co-operation of their Allies; the Greek Government had stated that they intended to ask for such assistance. No detailed preparations had yet been made to provide observers, since it was not yet possible to fix even an approximate date for the plebiscite or elections. When the time came, His Majesty's Government would try to ensure that any supervision agreed upon should be effective. British forces in Greece had at no time been, nor would they be, used to intimidate Greek citizens or to prevent the free expression of political and social opinions. The constant objective of His Majesty's Government in Greece had been to create conditions in which the Greek people could freely take their own decisions about the future form and composition of their Government.

Athens Wireless (28th March) broadcast a proclamation by the King of the Hellenes which, though destined to be broadcast on Greek Independence Day (25th March), had, it was stated, only just been received. In this proclamation the King emphasised the necessity of uniting the political forces of the country to achieve solidarity. There was no time to lose; the war was in its final phase and Greece must have her army ready for battle and her political life functioning normally. There was much to be done before the time when Greeks would be called on to safeguard their new frontiers and their national rights.

It is reliably reported from Athens that the rank and file of the Communist Party are criticising their leaders for what they allege to be mistakes in policy during the last year. They aver that E.A.M. representatives had no clear-cut policy either at the Lebanon Conference or subsequently after they assumed office under M. Papandreou; that E.A.M. did not get out of the Civil War early enough; that the forces of the Left gave no assistance to members of E.A.M. who were tried for executions which they had performed on orders from above. In consequence of these mistakes it is believed that there may at some future date be changes in the leadership of the Communist Party; it would not, in the present situation, be opportune, or even possible, to hold a Party Congress. Many Greek Communists are said to be pinning their faith to the return of M. Zachariadis, the former head of the Party, who was at one time believed to have been murdered by the Germans, but is now reported a prisoner.

Some 1,300 E.L.A.S. prisoners from the Middle East landed at the Piræus on the 18th March, and a further 1,650 on the 24th; there were no incidents, and they were all released on the days of their arrival, with the exception of about 170, who were identified by the police as men wanted for offences against the civil code.

M. Alexander Mylonas (Agrarian Democrat) has taken over the Finance Ministry from M. Sideris, who remains in the Government as Minister-without-Portfolio.

Albania.

Claiming that his previous categorical refusal of Allied relief was due to a misunderstanding of the terms on which it was offered, Enver Hoxha recently expressed the desire to receive relief. In the course of cordial conversations representatives of U.N.R.R.A. made it very plain to him that U.N.R.R.A. was not prepared to function in Albania until there had been a preliminary period of relief by Allied military authorities. This, too, he at first seemed ready to accept and it was hoped that military liaison might begin relief work shortly and that U.N.R.R.A. might take it over after a month or two. But in the end Enver Hoxha refused the terms for military relief and seemed to be hoping to play military liaison off on U.N.R.R.A. However, his anxiety to obtain supplies somehow or other is likely to remain acute on account of internal difficulties. He is faced by considerable, and perhaps increasing, opposition, which in its turn is due in great measure to the inability of his Government to solve economic problems. Even among his own colleagues criticism is reported, and among the partisans there are disillusion and desertions.

Enver Hoxha's complaint mentioned last week seems to have been justified to the extent that small numbers of disbanded E.D.E.S. troops have been persecuting the Chams in Epirus. The Greek Government has given orders to ensure that the National Guard shall not attack the Chams and shall prevent others from doing so.

Bulgaria.

The People's Court has passed comparatively few sentences in recent weeks. The Minister of Justice has announced that the trials will end early this month and that there will be no fresh prosecutions. The Government has also issued two decree-laws authorising in certain cases the mitigation of sentences of long imprisonment and the loss of civil rights.

While there is no indication that Moscow or its protégé, the Fatherland Front Government, has the intention—anyhow at present—of introducing Communism, it is inevitable that, with the Red Army in occupation and with Soviet authority all-powerful, democracy as practised in Bulgaria should have a Soviet complexion, rather than one familiar to the West. Wireless sets, for example, are no longer to be supplied to private individuals. A woman working in a textile mill who is reported to have discovered a new method in weaving, has been declared to be the first Bulgarian Stakhanovite. The public has been exhorted to use shock-brigade methods in tackling the dangerously unhygienic conditions that prevail. The soldier now swears loyalty not only by God and his conscience but also by the people. The voluntary character of the Freedom Loan is stressed, but the peasants and well-to-do are constantly stimulated to subscribe more by reminders that their contributions will be taken as indicating their attitude to the new régime. Lastly, as part of the Communist effort to get hold of the young, a Communist Youth Conference has recently been held at Sofia and it is claimed that the Septemvritsi, a new organisation on Soviet lines for children between 7 and 14 years, already has 222,000 members.

Turkey.

The Turkish Government shews every disposition to replace the pact which Moscow has denounced, by negotiating a fresh treaty with the Soviet Union and, further, to modify the régime of the Straits by multilateral discussion of the Montreux Convention. So far as it goes this attitude seems to meet Russian views. Russian wireless attacks on Turkey have almost, if not quite, ceased and so have Yalçin's pin-pricks against the Soviet Union. Yet the Turks can hardly fail to be deeply perturbed not only by Russian predominance in the Balkans but also by the quiet sapping which the Soviet Union appears to have been doing in recent years round the frontiers of Turkey in Asia. In Caucasia the Armenians who are naturally anti-Turkish, have always enjoyed a full measure of Soviet support, and among the Moslems official propaganda vilifies the Turks as Fascists, capitalists and atheists. The interest taken in the local Kurds by the Russian authorities since their arrival in Persia must tend to increase the normal disaffection of the Turkish Kurds. Finally, Moscow has developed a sympathetic interest in Turkey's southern neighbours, Iraq and Syria, and there is a suggestion that the Soviet Government might support the retrocession of the Hatay or district of Alexandretta to Syria (see under "Middle East"). Whether these considerations will have the effect of softening the Turks or the reverse remains to be seen.

With regard to San Francisco M. Atay in the semi-official Ulus expresses very firmly the view that the new organisation must be based not on the hegemony of the big Powers but on the equality of all, for the dictatorship of the big Four would be a Fascist arrangement. If the small nations lack confidence in the Dumbarton Oaks scheme it is, he says, only because the big Powers are not agreed among themselves.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

According to the Egyptian press, the Prime Minister has told the Senate that the Government aim at obtaining release from all Treaty restrictions, while preserving the friendship of Great Britain. Wafdist spokesmen continue to advocate a new settlement of Anglo-Egyptian relations before the opening of the conference at San Francisco.

Operatives in the Egyptian railway workshops downed tools on the 25th March, and attempted to interfere with the movement of trains. The trouble seems to have resulted from Makram Ebeid Pasha's desire to make himself popular with the workers. He seems to have let them know that he was proposing increases of pay which, as they afterwards heard, the Finance Committee of the Chamber were unwilling to approve. The Prime Minister ordered the workshops to be closed, stationed troops at key points and informed His Majesty's Ambassador that he was determined not to permit interference with communications. The workshops are believed to have been reopened on the 31st, after the strikers had given a written assurance that they were prepared to work peacefully and not to agitate about wages. Makram Ebeid, whose newspaper, on the second day of the strike, published an article praising his wage policy, is also said to have been infuriated by the Prime Minister's apparent intention to let the accusations against Wafdist Ministers die a natural death, and to have threatened resignation.

As was foreseen in last week's Summary, the version of the Arab Convention, on which the account given there was based, was not accurate in every detail. The official text, since received, shows that the article defining the obligations of the League in the event of aggression or threatened aggression against a member State is slightly more definite than the earlier version suggested. In these circumstances the Council is to "decide upon the measures necessary to repel the aggression." Such a decision must, however, be unanimous. If the offender is a member State, it is entitled to send representatives to the Council meeting, but its vote will be disregarded in the calculation of unanimity. It should also be noted that members are limited not to one representative each on the Council, as was stated last week, but to one vote each.

In the course of the discussions leading to the formation of the Arab League, there was a natural tendency for those countries which for varying reasons desired a loose form of association—Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Lebanon—to draw together in opposition to the two Hashimite States, with their more ambitious plans. Syria also inclined towards the former group, and her leaders were described by the Amir Abdullah in an interview with an American journalist as "self-seeking politicians." It seems likely therefore that, Egypt, as the strongest State in the larger group, will play a leading part in the early meetings of the Council; and that Hashimite prestige will suffer as a result of this alignment.

The State Department announced on the 28th March that the Syrian and Lebanese Governments were being invited to send delegations to San Francisco. The four Governments sponsoring the conference had agreed on this step, and the French had taken the initiative in proposing it. (See also under "France.") A Beirut newspaper has appealed to the Arab representatives at San Francisco to demand the return of the Sanjak of Alexandretta to Syria. Turkey's intentions towards the Arab countries, the writer declared, were unknown, and her possession of Alexandretta was a threat to the whole of Northern Syria. It is reported that the Orthodox Patriarch of Antioch, during his recent visit to Moscow, tried to interest the Soviet Government in this question. (See also under "Turkey.")

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese are fully aware of the serious consequences to themselves which would follow an American occupation of the Ryukyu Islands. The Asahi on the 27th March said that, if these islands fell into enemy hands, it would mean the severance of communications between Japan and Korea, as well as of those with southern Manchuria and "the strategically important zones on the Chinese continent." Actually the Japanese could probably still keep open the route to Korea across the Korean straits as well as their Japan Sea routes to north-eastern Korean ports, but their shipping along the west coast of Korea and in the Gulf of Pechihli would certainly be severely harried. This would throw a heavier strain upon their already overburdened rail transport between north China, Manchuria and Korea. Formosa would be isolated and could be attacked from both north and south.

The Asahi on the 1st April said that it was impossible to predict whether the Americans ultimately intended to land in China or to make a direct attack upon the Japanese main islands. The paper alleged that there were differences of opinion on this matter among American military and naval leaders, but it inclined to the view that those who favoured a direct attack upon Japan had gained ground, although the others remained influential. In Chungking both the official Central Daily News and the Army paper Sao Tang Jih Pao considered that the capture of the Ryukyu Islands would be followed by an American landing on the China coast, possibly between the Yangtse delta and the Shantung peninsula (Chungking Radio, 28th March).

On the 30th March the Taisei Yokusan Seijikai was formally dissolved and its successor, the Dai Nippon Seijikai, held its inaugural meeting in the Diet building. Koiso and all his Cabinet Ministers were present. The chairman of the meeting was Dr. Rentaro Mizuno, an elderly parliamentarian who was for many years a leading member of the former Seiyukai and who has been twice Home Minister. The representative of the preparatory committee was Goro Ito, a prominent member of the former Minseito. Mizuno proposed General Jiro Minami as first President of the Dai Nippon Seijikai and his appointment was approved. Upon his acceptance of the post Minami resigned his position as Privy Councillor. Minami was born in 1874; he was Minister of War in the Wakatsuki Cabinet in 1931, at the time of the Manchurian affair; from 1934 to 1936 he was Commander-in-Chief of the Kwantung Army and concurrently Ambassador to "Manchukuo." From 1936 to 1942 he was Governor-General of Korea. Domei (29th March) said that Minami had often been mentioned as a possible Premier, and that, as he had innumerable political friends, he was regarded as the best choice for the presidency of the new Party in view of the necessity of very close collaboration between the military and the political leaders.

Minami in his inaugural speech said that the purpose of the new Party was to organise the total strength of the people for the war effort. Later he told the Press that the Dai Nippon Seijikai was completely independent of the Government and would not hesitate to criticise it when necessary. The Party would co-operate with the fighting services but would not be completely subject to their orders. It would be representative of the nation as a whole and there might be times when it would advise or urge reflection by the Government and the fighting services (Domei, 31st March).

It will be observed that the Dai Nippon Seijikai is under the direction of the same type of men as was its predecessor. Minami, it is true, is something of a fire-eater, he sabotaged the Wakatsuki Cabinet, and, like Tojo and Koiso, he is a leading militarist of the Kwantung Army clique. But, like most of the senior Japanese generals, he has connexions with the older political parties and with the industrialists: thus he is no extremist of the Hashimoto variety.

Domei on the 30th March made the first reference to the Japanese offensive in Honan and Hupeh. It said that this had begun on the 22nd March, that the city of Nanyang, in Honan, fell on the 25th March, and that the airfield near Laohokow was taken two days later. Chungking reports deny the loss of Nanyang, but admit the abandonment of the airfield near Laohokow and also that the Japanese broke into the city itself on the 30th March (Chungking Radio, the 2nd April). Heinz Ross, the Transocean correspondent in Shanghai, said that the American 14th Air Force had been using Laohokow as a base for raids upon Japanese communications between northern and central China; it had now been deprived of this and, in addition, the Japanese had captured a valuable wheat-growing region, the loss of which would add to Chungking's economic difficulties. He added that Laohokow could be used as a base for a Japanese advance into southern Shensi, aimed at Sian, and he claimed to have heard that Chungking was anxious on this score (Transocean, 1st April).

accompanied by Dr. Wellington Koo: Dr. Wang Chung-hui; Mr. Wei Tao-ming; Mr. Hu Lin; Dr. Hu Shih; Dr. Wu Yi-fang, a noted woman educationalist; Mr. Li Huang, representing the National Youth Party, and Dr. Carson Chang, leader of the National Socialist Party. The Communist Party has demanded three representatives, but the Government was willing to accord them one only. Tung Pi-wu, the Communist member of the People's Political Council, was first mentioned, but, according to a British Press report, Lin Tzu-han, chairman of the Communist Border Government, is to go. This has not so far been confirmed by Chungking, nor is it certain whether the Communists will agree to any of their members going if they cannot have all the three they want—these are Chou En-lai, Lin Tzu-han and Tung Pi-wu. Tung Pi-wu is not a particularly impressive figure and he speaks little English; he is no doubt, for these reasons, the least objectionable from the Koumintang standpoint.

Provided that this Communist difficulty can be resolved, China will have an all-party representation at San Francisco and can claim to speak as a united nation. In any case some of her most able and eloquent leaders will be there. A Reuter message from Chungking on the 28th March said that T. V. Soong had told correspondents that the Chinese delegation hoped to see the early establishment of world security organisations. He was asked whether anything about Hong Kong or other colonial matters would be raised at the Conference, but he evaded this question.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The excellence of the news from all battlefronts has been tempered by sobering indications this week that peace negotiations will not be all plain sailing. Sensational accounts in the American press of the advances beyond the Rhine, in which the part played by British forces was given prominent mention, together with the announcement that the Russians had crossed the Austrian border roused intense expectation in the United States of an early German surrender. Indeed the irresistible urge to be first with the news overreached itself once again. A misinterpreted White House circular requesting high officials to stay at their posts coupled with General Eisenhower's statement that the Germans were "done for" was sufficient for a nation-wide rumour to spread over the radio on the 27th March that the end of the European war was expected "hourly." After this impression had been corrected, excitement somewhat abated, but it is ready to rise again on the slightest encouragement.

At the same time concern over the international diplomatic situation became apparent beyond those Washington circles which have been disturbed of late. Side by side with its vigorous campaign to make the features of the Dumbarton Oaks scheme thoroughly understood by the American public, the Administration has been discouraging exaggerated expectations from the forthcoming conference at San Francisco. A column by Arthur Krock, in the New York Times of the 21st March, was thought to reflect official views in its insistence on the limited agenda, which he summarised as the establishment of a World Security League, particularly an Economic Council, the drafting of a statute for a World Court and a trusteeship plan for the Colonies and Mandates of the enemy nations. "Beyond these duties and responsibilities, with the possible addition of some minor points, the San Francisco Conference has none." Ernest K. Lindley, another well-informed commentator, has been writing in similar strain. Mr. Lindley favours within the overall organisation more freedom for regional action, a subject much debated since the Act of Chapultepec. Walter Lippmann, incidentally the most influential exponent of regionalism, is perhaps more individual in his approach to the conference. His latest article calls for "an escape clause against the consequences of having to do too big a job too quickly, at the wrong place, under very difficult conditions, at a supreme juncture in human affairs." This insistence on provision for easy revision is, however, in line with several pronouncements by Republican leaders such as Governor Dewey, Mr. Dulles and ex-President Hoover, who has been writing widely-syndicated articles on the proposed World Organisation.

Mr. Hoover advocates a "Charter of Human Rights," an idea also favoured by Commander Stassen, one of the American delegation to San Francisco. Another delegate, Dean Virginia Gildersleeve, has also revealed some of her views this week; at a testimonial dinner she warned her hosts not to expect too much from the conference. Senator Connally has continued to insist that peace plans are "only beginning," and Senator Vandenberg has found fresh ammunition in support of his well-known views on limited objectives and alternative methods. The Senator from Michigan has many Polish constituents who were disturbed by the Soviet suggestion that, failing agreement on a provisional Government for Poland, the present Warsaw Administration should be represented at San Francisco, and the refusal of the United States to consider the idea was welcomed. The subsequent announcement that M. Gromyko, Soviet Ambassador to the United States, would head the Russian delegation to the Conference, instead of M. Molotov as anticipated, was linked with this refusal in the minds of the public, and some newspapers drew the inference that the Soviet Government intended to agree only to what was agreed at Yalta and not to accept any material alterations proposed by other nations at San Francisco.

Above all, the disclosure that the Soviet Union and the United States were proposing to have three votes each in the projected International Assembly, roused Senator Vandenberg's ire, and not his alone. He told journalists on the 29th March that he would oppose any voting proposals which would destroy the promised "sovereign equality" of nations in "to-morrow's free and untrammelled town meeting of the world." He contended that "this applies to extra votes for us just as much as to extra votes for anyone else," and added: "The voice of the Great Powers will be amply protected in the Council." Representative Sol Bloom, another delegate, has also been critical of the proposal, and Senator Fulbright protested in the name of Liberal Internationalists at "secret deals" of this kind. It was this aspect which pervaded newspaper comments. At his press conference on the 30th March the Secretary of State was bombarded with such questions as: "Were any other secret agreements on the Dumbarton Oaks plan or other subjects made at Yalta?" "Why has this matter been kept secret for 47 days?" "How does this secrecy fit in with the State Department's professed policy of taking the people into its confidence and of building a people's foreign policy?"

Some thirty of these questions were in writing, and Mr. Stettinius dealt with them in an important statement on the 3rd April. On the Soviet suggestion of separate votes for White Russia and the Ukraine in the General Assembly, he repeated that American representatives had agreed at Yalta that "the Government of the United States would support such a Soviet proposal at San Francisco, if made." While the question as to whether the United States should or should not ask for three votes was being considered, "partial publication of the facts" had caused the White House to make its announcement, but the President had since decided that "the United States will not request additional votes in the Assembly." Apart from military plans and the subsequently-revealed formula for voting in the Security Council, the only other decisions reached at Yalta and not published related to initial membership in the international organisation and to territorial trusteeship. Rumours of a possible postponement of the Conference were scotched by the Secretary of State. "This Government believes," he said, "that the rapid tempo of military and political developments, far from requiring the postponement of the San Francisco Conference on international organisation, makes it increasingly necessary that plans for this organisation worked out at Dumbarton Oaks be carried on promptly."

LATIN AMERICA.

The Argentine Government has supplemented its declaration of war against Germany and Japan by measures which include additional intervention in Axis firms, the blocking of bank accounts, strict vigilance over the seamen of the Graf Spee, and the internment of the staff of the Japanese Embassy. All German, Japanese and Hungarian newspapers (with one or two pro-Allied exceptions) have been shut down. These measures appear to fulfil the conditions requisite for the return of Argentina to normal relations with the Pan-American family, and His Majesty's Government will, of course, keep in step with the United States on the question of recognition. It is expected that Argentina will have taken the formal step of signing the final Act of the Mexico City Conference before this Summary appears in print, and recognition is hardly likely to be long delayed.

After the first plunge, Argentine public opinion seems to have taken the declaration of war with an apathy which is not surprising in the circumstances. In contrast to the Nationalists and to the Socialist organ, Vanguardia, the great Liberal dailies, Prensa and Nación, expressed approval. Vanguardia's freely voiced resentment brought about a momentary closure, but the Government,

In Montevideo the opposition in exile has made a statement condemning the declaration of war as an opportunist manœuvre to obtain recognition, and declaring that the military dictatorship has not carried out any effective or sincere act for the re-establishment of individual rights, and that Argentine democracy will be sacrificed if the pretended democratic façade is accepted.

GERMANY.

THE past week has witnessed much deeper penetrations into Western and Central Germany by Allied forces. The Weser has been crossed in several places, Bremen is under Allied artillery fire and Hanover has fallen. Yet, in many places, the Allies are meeting very stiff opposition—for example in Holland, between Arnhem and the Zuyder Zee, in the pocket encircled in the Ruhr, and at Heilbronn. There are still enough German units imbued with a fanatical Nazi spirit to make the Allied advance anything but a "walk-over."

The Western front, however, does present a contrast to the Eastern. Despite the Russian capture of Königsberg, and their penetration into Vienna, there is a solid and coherent German front on the east at least as far south as the Czechoslovak mountains. On the west the front has no such coherence. There is, in fact, nothing to show that the German High Command, so far as it still controls the battle, has now the necessary resources at its disposal, even if it had the time, to create a continuous line of defence on the west (e.g., along the Elbe from Hamburg southwards).

The German High Command has done its best, without actual lying, to be encouraging in a week of bad news. It announced on the 5th April a defensive success on the central eastern front under the supreme command of General Schoerner, who has this week been made a field-marshal. It admitted on the same day the loss of Münster, on the 6th that of Bratislava and the withdrawal of German forces from Gdynia (which fell on the 28th March), on the 7th the loss of Eisenach and Langensalza. But each of these bulletins also contained reports of successful German counter-attacks, that in the Ruhr preventing the Allied drive on Dortmund, others being launched "from the mountain massif of the Thuringian forest." Kiel was twice mentioned during the week as the target of heavy air raids. The bulletin of the 8th April spoke of the heavy losses inflicted on American bombers by German fighter planes. In other German reports the attacks on Vienna loomed large. Russian attempts to force a break-through had been halted "on the whole." The population of this "truly German bulwark of the south-east" was preparing to defend its native town "to the last cellar."

This statement appeared on the same day as the Soviet Government's declaration on Austria, issued on the 8th April, according to which the Austrian population was behaving in a different manner from that of Germany: it was resisting evacuation and warmly welcoming the Red Army.

German propaganda to foreign countries has shown some uneasiness as to the absence of firm military resistance in the West. "After fifteen stormy days," announced a Transocean official on the 8th, "we can once more speak of a certain stabilisation . . . . the time will soon come when the Germans will once again hold a coherent front line." The public within the Reich were told that "even enemy propaganda" had been "forced to speak of a new consolidation of German resistance in the West."

There is recent evidence of further decline in officer morale within the Wehrmacht. The Nazi leaders are apparently even more anxious about the reliability of the German officer than about the fighting spirit of the troops. This was evident in Himmler's order to the Army Group Weichsel, on the Eastern front, on the 11th February, in which he announced the execution for cowardice of officers at Bromberg and demanded the utmost severity in the conduct of courts martial, "as at all times was customary in the Prussian-German Army." Germany, he said, in the course of a long appeal for loyalty, was still strong enough to resist the Bolshevik hordes, if only everybody, and particularly the officer, did his duty. A similar order to the Western Army Group B lists the offences of which officers have been recently found guilty and prescribes stricter punishment. They include: political divergence (this to be punished regardless of military record), loyalty to colleagues accused of misdemeanour, theft and other forms of corruption, misbehaviour with women in the forces, drunkenness and failure to denounce a superior officer. An indication of the lukewarm political attitude here stigmatised is afforded by the statement of a recently captured general that the Wehrmacht is still fighting to keep the Party bosses in power. The past week has brought further evidence of friction and uncertainty between personnel of the Wehrmacht and the Waffen-S.S. A joint communiqué, issued by Himmler and Keitel, "in order to remove all existing possibilities of doubt," lays down that officers of each force are to be considered the superiors of N.C.O.s and men of the other force.

On the home front, apart from foreign workers (cf. last week's Summary) the German authorities do not appear to expect active disorder on a serious scale. The evidence here points rather to defeatism, apathy, hopelessness, to endless discussions of "why go on?" or "is there a way out?" Press and wireless have recently made serious efforts to counteract the spread of this mood. They have denounced as "rumours" the reports heard and spread by Germans after listening to the B.B.C. They have insisted ad nauseam on the necessity of fanatical resistance by all Germans if the Reich is to achieve victory. They have allowed it to appear that by no means all Germans are actively concerned to resist. Their anxiety is not so much with active opposition as with a complete absence of activity, a mood of passivity which is now seen to be growing dangerous in its effect on the German war effort. This has been defined by a Swiss journalist, writing late in March, as the "dumb revolution," a compound of nervous and physical strain leading to evasion of work and avoidance of energetic participation, whether in factory or fighting squad.

This is not to say that exasperation may not lead to outbreaks of disorder. Some would seem already to have occurred. Railway traffic was stopped in Munich from the 12th to the 15th March. Skirmishes were reported between civilians and the S.S. who occupied the chief public buildings. In Berlin demonstrations were reported early in March at certain community kitchens. The mood of the population was thought to be getting so angry that serious disturbances were expected before long.

The competence of regional authorities in German administration is now of the first importance in view of the way in which the Reich is being isolated into regions by the cutting of transport routes and by the western invading troops. The behaviour of several Gauleiters, whose provinces have been already overrun, would seem to have aroused criticism, which a recent broadcast from a West German station was concerned to answer. It explained that the Gauleiter of Düsseldorf attended a conference in the Reich and that it had been physically impossible for him to reach his own territory again. (Cf. Bormann's order to Gauleiters not to leave their district, quoted here last week.) He had now achieved the impossible and succeeded in getting through the American lines. The Gauleiter, Florian, himself spoke at the microphone and took occasion to remind his hearers that his colleagues Grohé, Hofman and Schlessmann were all present in their Gaus.

A Führer's order published on the 7th April stated that in the Kreise the holding of more than one office by one man is to be abolished. In publishing the order Bormann defines its scope as providing that no Kreisleiter may administer other Party offices, nor any office in the State Administration such as that of mayor. He adds in explanation that the war-time emergency has proved that "it is not possible for one person to discharge more than one office without neglecting one of them." The present would seem to be a curious time to iron out an administrative difficulty. The recent tendency has rather been to concentrate power in order to secure more direct and energetic action, and the approach of enemy forces might have been expected to increase it. This order therefore suggests either that the tendency has gone too far and that Nazi officials have proved overburdened or incompetent to carry out their duties or, possibly, that Party officials are being divested of other duties in order to be free for employment elsewhere, wherever and in whatever formations their fanatically resisting leaders decide.

The new rationing system comes into force with the 74th rationing period, lasting for three weeks only, from the 9th–29th April. As announced at the end of March for the 74th period, the normal consumer's weekly bread ration, which at the beginning of the year was 2,225 gr., would appear now to be 1,700 gr. The weekly fats ration has fallen from 156 gr. to 125 gr. Since local Food Offices may issue different rations if their stocks do not avail to meet the basic Reich rations, consumers may get even less than the amounts specified. An official statement issued on the 6th April boasted that it had on the whole proved possible to keep the food ration at last month's level, but added that an initial period would of course elapse before the new ration card system would be working smoothly. The real position is more accurately gauged from a captured report of mid-February, in the course of which a Convention of Food Administration Chiefs in the Rhineland state bluntly that they do not see how to provide sufficient food for future needs: "The cut in rations is ridiculous and should have been made long ago. We face a complete breakdown."

On entering Austria our Russian Allies have issued a proclamation which reaffirms the Moscow declaration in favour of Austrian independence and offers assistance to the Austrians, in "working their passage home," by "the liquidation of the régime of the German Fascist invaders and the restoration of democratic ways and institutions." But an article in Pravda on this subject indicates that neither Catholics, Monarchists nor at least some Social Democrats are regarded by the Russians as satisfactory representatives of democracy.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

President Beneš and the Czechoslovak Government party, with M. Zorin, the Soviet Ambassador, arrived in Košice on the 3rd April. There were no other diplomatic representatives in the party, as the Soviet Government refused at the last moment to permit the Allied corps to proceed through Roumania. M. Gousev assured His Majesty's Government that it was entirely a question of accommodation. The American Government has asked for permission for a small party of its representatives, consisting of a chargé d'affaires and two or three others, to proceed at the earliest moment to Košice; the State Department pointed out that unless this is agreed to, it can hardly regard the Government in Košice as truly independent.

On the 4th April, President Beneš accepted the formal resignation of the old Government headed by Mgr. Šrámek, and thanked Minister Nemec for the work he had done as delegate for liberated territories. As already reported, the new Government was set up with M. Fierlinger (formerly Ambassador in Moscow, and a left-wing Social Democrat) as Premier. Of the twenty-two members appointed, twelve are Czech politicians, the four parties of Christian Socialists, National Socialists, Social Democrats and Communists having equal representation; six are Slovak politicians, the Communists and Democrats being equally represented. There are four non-party members.

Spokesmen of the new Government have emphasised its temporary character. Elections are to be held as soon as possible after liberation. Great admiration for and gratitude to the Soviet Army and people were the keynotes of General Svoboda's address at a gathering in Košice on the 5th April. The desire to include Poland in a tripartite pact on the basis of the 1943 Czechoslovak-Soviet Agreement was put as one of the main points of foreign policy, as well as close collaboration with the other Slav neighbours. On the 8th April, Vice-Premier Gottwald (Czech Communist) dealt with Czech-Slovak relations, which are to be developed on lines of equality, with full recognition of the executive authority of the Slovak National Council in Slovak territory, and the formation of Slovak units of the new Czechoslovak Army.

The return of the new Government to Czechoslovakia coincided with two important Soviet advances. The first along the Danube by Malinovsky resulted in the fall of the Slovak capital Bratislava, on the 4th April. This was achieved by a series of rapid manœuvres along the river plain itself and across the Little Carpathians which run north-eastwards from the city to become the main mountain knot of Slovakia. These forces have fanned out further to the north, east and west, pushing up the mountainous valleys of the Nitra and Vah, occupying fortified centres like Topolčany, Banovce, Trnava, Kremnice and Nové Mesto, and crossing the Little Carpathians into the flatter country between them and the Morava. A bridgehead has been established on the west bank of the Morava along the Bratislava–Vienna railway at Marchegg on the Czechoslovak-Austrian frontier. The other advance, in which Czechoslovak troops under Brigadier-General Svoboda took part, was westwards along the upper Vah valley, the main trunk route from Prague through Zilina to the east. Liptovský Svatý Mikulaš has been recaptured, and Ružomberok, a rail centre still further west, taken on the 5th April. At the same time, Soviet forces of this front thrust across the Slovak frontier from the Polish town of Nowy Targ, forced the River Orava and occupied Námestovo, adding to the threat to Zilina. Heavy fighting but little change is reported in the sector menacing Moravská Ostrava.

POLAND.

It was announced by the London Polish Government on the 6th April that their Chief Delegate in Poland, together with the Chairman of the Council of National Unity, the commander of the Home Army (now disbanded), and twelve other leaders of the former Underground Movement, accepted an invitation to meet General Ivanov, of the Red Army's White Russian Front, on the 27th March in order to discuss the coming into the open of the Polish political parties which had so far not revealed themselves. No news had since, it was stated, been received from or about any of this party, and anxiety was expressed as to their fate. Rumours current during the past week-end, that they were engaged in consultations in Moscow, have so far not been confirmed.

It is announced that Cardinal Hlond, Primate of Poland, has been set free by the American Forces advancing in Central Germany and has arrived in Paris by air. The Cardinal left Poland with the Government in 1939, living first in Italy, then in France, where he was caught by the German invasion. He had been removed to Germany on the approach of the Allied forces in 1944.

The Warsaw Administration announces that reconstruction of the city is proceeding with the aid of engineers and other troops of General Zymierski's Polish Army.

A decree has been issued by which all Polish citizens are bound to give their services if required for aiding in the city's reconstruction. It is stated that trams are running in Praga, and that the water supply will be partly restored by the 15th May.

Complaints that the acreage allotted under the original Land Reform decrees was too small seem to have been partly met in a revised law of the 18th January, under which larger holdings could be given to various classes of applicants. Polish military engineers are said to be taking part in the application of the Reform in some districts.

It is announced that a beginning is now being made in the organised voluntary repatriation of Poles from territories east of the Curzon Line, and that room will be found for them in the newly-added western territories.

Progress continues to be made in extending the Warsaw administration's authority in the territory claimed by it for Poland beyond the 1939 frontier. It has been stated during the past week that "task-groups," whose duty is normally to take over the management of abandoned factories, estates, &c., have started work in Marienburg, Marienwerder, Elbing, and parts of Western (i.e., German) Pomerania; that the district of Olecko in south-eastern East Prussia (recently renamed Treuburg) has been incorporated in Poland; and that blast furnaces in Gleiwitz and Zabrze (Hindenburg) have been amalgamated with the Polish Pokoj company, i.e., the old German Friedenshütte.

A White Paper was issued on the 6th April containing the text of the secret Protocol signed by Great Britain and Poland at the same time as the Mutual Assistance Agreement of the 25th August, 1939. As was stated publicly in October 1939 the principal effect of the Protocol was to make it clear that the provisions of the main agreement, which was couched in general terms, were to be understood as applying solely to the case of aggression by Germany.

SOVIET UNION.

In an Order of the Day on the 9th April Marshal Stalin announced the fall of Königsberg. The Order was addressed to Marshal Vassilevsky, to his Chief of Staff, and to no fewer than ninety-two other Marshals and Generals. This victory was greeted with Moscow's biggest salute of twenty-four salvoes from 324 guns; the formations and units which particularly distinguished themselves are to be decorated and named after Königsberg. Elsewhere from Germany nothing new has been reported, but a double drive is closing in on Slovakia. From the north General Yeremenko, commanding the Fourth Ukrainian Front, captured Ruzomberok on the River Vah on the 5th April. Marshal Malinovsky's troops of the Second Ukrainian Front are less than 30 miles away to the south. Further south again his troops have reached the Morava from its mouth to Kuty. They also took Bratislava on the 4th April, crossed the Danube and are only a few miles east of Vienna on the north bank of the river. South of the Danube Marshal Tolbukhin's troops of the Third Ukrainian Front have swept round to the south and west of Lake Neusiedler. Wiener Neustadt fell on the 3rd April, and the Danube has been reached north-west of Vienna, which is thus cut off from the west and all but surrounded. Fighting is taking place in the city. On the 4th April it was announced that the whole of Hungary had been cleared of the enemy; Marshal Tolbukhin's troops are now fighting in Yugoslavia north of the Drava.

At 3 p.m. on the 5th April the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, M. Molotov, received the Japanese Ambassador, Mr. Sato, and informed him, on behalf of the Soviet Government, that "the Neutrality Pact between Japan and the U.S.S.R. had lost its sense and that the prolongation of this pact has become impossible." In his statement M. Molotov declared that the situation had radically changed since the pact was concluded in April 1941; Germany had attacked the U.S.S.R., while Japan, Germany's ally, was helping the latter in her war against the U.S.S.R.; and besides Japan was at war with the United States and Great Britain, allies of the Soviet Union. Commenting on the denunciation of the Neutrality Pact, Izvestiya stated that for over twenty years preceding its signature in 1941, Soviet–Japanese relations "were of an entirely unsatisfactory nature." The conclusion of the Neutrality Pact was proof, it was stated, of the collapse of the long-standing aggressive policy towards the Soviet Union conducted by the ruling circles of Japan. The Neutrality Pact had played a positive rôle by eliminating a number of causes for misunderstandings and conflicts with Japan. But, subsequently, in the most difficult times for the U.S.S.R., Japan continued her collaboration with Germany, which was not only of great political importance but also, Izvestiya said, represented real assistance to Germany in her war with the Soviet Union. The Soviet press and wireless gave considerable prominence to British and American press comments on the denunciation of the Soviet–Japanese Pact. (See also under "Far East.")

A Soviet declaration on Austria was made on the 8th April, a week after the Red Army had reached the frontier. The declaration asserted that, in contrast to the Germans, the Austrian population were resisting the evacuation orders issued by the Nazi authorities, and were hospitably greeting the Red Army as the liberator of their country from Hitler's yoke. As in the declaration on Roumania of April 1944, the Soviet Government maintained that it did not intend to acquire any part of Austrian territory, or to change the social system in Austria; the adherence of the U.S.S.R. to the Moscow Declaration was reaffirmed, and it was promised that the Soviet authorities would assist in the re-establishment of democratic order and institutions in Austria. An appeal from Marshal Tolbukhin to the population of Vienna, broadcast immediately after the issue of the Declaration, made the same points, adding that the Nazi Party would be dissolved, but that rank and file members would not be molested if they showed a correct attitude towards the Soviet troops. The marshal urged the population not to evacuate Vienna, but to assist the Red Army in all possible ways, and to hinder the Germans from carrying off industrial equipment and provisions. A

Pravda article of the 8th April was at pains to emphasise Austria's responsibility for joining in the war on Hitler's side, and to insist that she could only redeem herself by active participation in the struggle for liberation. It was pointed out that the formation of a patriotic democratic internal front was going on less vigorously in Austria than in other European countries. Social Democrat émigrés, especially those in London, were castigated for cherishing designs of again turning Austria into a "bulwark against the East." Plans for creating a Monarchist State, including Hungary and parts of Italy and Croatia, or those for setting up a Catholic State of Austria, Bavaria and the Rhineland, were singled out as especially provocative attempts to undermine Allied unity. Austria must not be a rampart of German imperialism, but an outpost against it.

The visit of Marshal Tito and Dr. Shubashitch to Moscow now proceeding has been given much publicity in the Soviet press; Marshal Tito, who has not been to Moscow since he became Prime Minister, was received by Marshal Stalin on the 6th April, and the whole delegation were entertained at luncheon by M. Molotov on the following day (see under "Yugoslavia"). Among those greeting Marshal Tito on his arrival at the Moscow airport was Army General A. I. Antonov, who was described as Chief of the Red Army General Staff. He was formerly Deputy Chief of General Staff, and has evidently now succeeded General Vassilievsky, who recently took over the command of the Third Byelorussian Front (see Summary No. 286).

Two Orthodox ecclesiastical delegations left Moscow on the 6th April, one for Belgrade, headed by Bishop Sergius of Kirovograd, and another for Sofia led by Archbishop Gregory of Pskov and Porkhov. The Belgrade visit was stated to have been a return courtesy for the delegation sent by the Serbian Patriarchate to Moscow for the election of Patriarch Alexei, and that to Sofia was to consolidate relations between the Russian and Bulgarian churches after the healing of the Bulgarian schism. The Bulgarian Exarch Stefan, in his speech of welcome to the delegates, praised the wise foresight of the great leader of the Soviet Union, who had helped the Russian Orthodox Church to take its dominating place in the large family of the Slav nations as the eldest and leading Church among the Orthodox Churches. The delegation to Yugoslavia stopped at Bucharest on their way to Belgrade, and were received by the Roumanian Patriarch and the Minister of Cults. The Roumanian press hailed the visit as the first step towards a rapprochement between the two Churches.

Almost simultaneously with the denunciation of the Soviet-Japanese pact, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. has appointed M. Apollon Alexandrovich Petrov Ambassador to China and has released the former Ambassador, M. Panyushkin from his duties, on account of illness. The new Ambassador has been Head of the Press Department of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs since 1943, and previously served in Chungking. He is one of the few Soviet writers on Chinese philosophy; he speaks Chinese and a little English.

The political and military situation in China was analysed with considerable bias and bitterness by I. Aleksandrov in Trud of the 6th April. China was criticised for not fully utilising the exceptionally favourable conditions offered by the opening of the Burma Road and the liquidation [sic] of the Burma–Yunnan front. Great stress was laid on the achievements of the United Nations in adopting "harmonious decisions on important war questions," while the Kuomintang and the Chinese Government were alleged to ignore these reasons for unity and to be openly hostile to all political forces in opposition. The large-scale reorganisation and demobilisation [sic] of the Chinese army at this stage was also much criticised, while the many restrictions against Communist representation on the special "Consultative Organ" were viewed as the beginning of a new campaign in China against the democratic forces.

The Soviet press and wireless continue to stress the dangers from the neutrals and from the Argentine in particular—in spite of the latter's declaration of war—as hotbeds of Hitlerite intrigue. In an international review broadcast by Moscow wireless, M. G. Bespalov declared that "although the Argentine Government has declared war on the Axis, it has not changed its pro-Fascist character. . . . . Argentina's declaration of war on Germany is justly evaluated by several foreign papers as an attempt to win the confidence of the victorious Powers, and under this cloak to preserve Nazi centres in Latin America capable of conducting underground work against the United Nations."

The "Handbook of the Composition of the Fleets of the World" for 1944, published by the Red Navy Press, shows that several British and United States vessels (including the Royal Sovereign, now the Archangelsk, and the cruiser Milwaukee, now the Murmansk) have been transferred to the Red Navy. It is pointed out that no Italian ships have been transferred to the Soviet Union, while details are given of the Italian fleets operating under Anglo-United States command. A number of recent articles in the Soviet press stress the importance for the Soviet Union of a powerful fleet; one article asserted that "our Fatherland has the right to be one of the greatest naval Powers in the world."

SCANDINAVIA.

The former Finnish Diet was dissolved on the 4th April, after continuing its legislative activities to the very last. The new Diet held its first plenary session on the 6th, when M. Fagerholm, representing the non-seceding oppositionists in the Social Democrat Party, was elected speaker by a record majority, and M. Sundström, a "Sixling" in the Democratic League, was chosen as deputy speaker. The Government tendered its resignation on the 9th April, but was asked by the President to continue to act until a new Government could be formed; this delay suggests that there may still be difficulty in reconciling divergent views as to the proper composition of the new administration.

Presiding at a meeting of the Finno-Soviet Society on the 6th April, M. Mauri Ryomä claimed that membership of or eligibility for this society should be a condition of membership of the Government or the Diet. The society endorsed this view by a resolution.

Considerable misgivings have recently been expressed as to the risk of inflation in Finland as the result of the marked intensification of the rise in wages and prices. An influential deputation which waited on the Prime Minister towards the end of March expressed a fear that a further inflation might endanger the power of the country to carry out its obligations in respect of war reparations. The prospect of inflation has also been a prominent topic of discussion in the press. A Swedish paper has reported that the Soviet Commission in Finland has objected to Socialistic proposals for the nationalisation of big businesses and banks, on the ground that such a step would reduce the country's productive capacity, and consequently render extremely difficulty the fulfilment of Finland's obligations in respect of war damages.

The Swedish Minister of Justice issued a statement on the 4th April on the question of German refugees. He said that there must be a general refusal of permits to enter Sweden, since it was impossible for the authorities to distinguish between the sheep and the goats, and that it was therefore necessary to reject everyone, whether a war criminal or not. Should it prove impossible, for technical or humanitarian reasons, to turn such visitors away at once, they would have to be detained until means could be found of sending them back to their own country. The Swedish Cabinet has now endorsed this view, and has decided to introduce a new Bill for the restriction of alien immigration. Civilian refugees from Germany are to be returned to their own country, while military refugees will be interned.

Some deterrent is undoubtedly necessary to check attempts by Germans to seek refuge in Sweden. The fear expressed in a Swedish paper, that increasing numbers of Germans would "lose their way" and arrive in Sweden unless permission to remain were refused them, seems to be justified. On the 8th April six German aircraft landed in the neighbourhood of Ystad in southern Sweden, alleging that they had mistaken this coast for that of Bornholm. On the previous day a tug arrived at the island of Öland carrying twelve refugees from Danzig, and on the 9th April 50 Germans in four boats reached Trelleborg. Öresunds Posten suggests that such wanderers should be met out at sea and put on the right course.

Great indignation is expressed in the Swedish press on the subject of an incident on the 3rd April when a Swedish fighter was shot down by a German sea-plane over Swedish territory. It is announced, however, that the German Government, through its Minister in Stockholm, has apologised and offered to pay compensation.

The Swedish Government has now given official encouragement to the volunteer movement for service in Norway. On the 8th April it was announced that a company would be allowed to train at a Swedish regimental depot. On the general question of Swedish intervention in Norway, the Norwegian clandestine paper Bulletinen states as the view of the Resistance Movement that such help would only be acceptable if desired by the Allied High Command or if the German policy of destruction and terrorism should create a desperate situation. But in that case it is considered that the whole of Sweden's military strength would be required, and the use of forces recruited by the volunteer movement would be inadequate. Stress is also laid on the importance of Swedish preparedness and will to intervene, as a deterrent.

It is reported from Norway that the Germans are preparing for the contingency of a Swedish attack by the construction of a defensive line from Brekken, about 20 miles east of Röros, using the Fæmund Lake and the Trysil River as obstacles, and south of these Lake Mjösen and the Vorma and Glomma rivers.

Daring and effective sabotage continues in Denmark, and no less than four informers have been liquidated in the last few days. On the 9th April patriots effected an impressive coup, carrying off a 3,200-ton steamer and some 20 tugs to Sweden. On the other hand, executions of patriots continue; on the 6th April four more took place, the victims including Count Ludwig Reventlow, a nephew of the Danish Minister in London. No time for appeal was granted.

In connexion with the anniversary of the German invasion—the 9th April—the Freedom Council appealed for a two-minute strike by way of demonstration. In England the anniversary was commemorated by an impressive Dano-Norwegian ceremony in Westminster Abbey, in which Bishop Fjellbu and the Danish pastor Sandbaek officiated.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

When Professor Gerbrandy reconstructed his Cabinet at the end of February (see Summary No. 282) three posts were left vacant, but it was stated that two of them would be filled shortly. On the 6th April Radio Orange announced that Professor J. E. de Quay had been appointed Minister of War and M. T. P. Tromp, Minister of Waterways. Professor de Quay is a Catholic and was one of the triumvirate who headed the Netherlands Union; M. Tromp held an important position in the firm of Philips.

In a broadcast occasioned by the new appointment Professor Gerbrandy declared that it had been sought, though with incomplete success, to secure in his Cabinet the representation of the main currents of opinion among the Dutch people. The policy of the Government was to work for the liberation and restoration of the occupied Netherlands and the East Indies. After the Netherlands had been completely freed they would make way for a new Government. The present Government did not wish to confront their successors with accomplished facts in important spheres. But, while they were in office, their policy would be limited to working for the following ends; a fair division of burdens without respect of classes, the provision of food for the now-occupied Netherlands immediately after their liberation, a drastic purge, a speedy punishment of traitors, the restoration of local representative bodies in the near future, and the limitation of the powers of the Dutch military authorities in the liberated Netherlands. Professor Gerbrandy added that, in the international sphere, the Netherlands favoured the equality of all States before the law and that that law should have a moral basis.

The liberation of the Netherlands is proceeding in the face of stiff opposition. Broadcasts from Radio Hilversum state that the Germans intend to hold out in the Western part of the country. Such assertions obviously cannot be taken at their face value, but it is doubtful if the Germans could retreat, if they wished to do so. Whether they will surrender quickly or hold out till the possibilities of further resistance are exhausted is a matter of conjecture. What is certain is that, unless the big cities are speedily liberated, famine, and possibly pestilence, face their inhabitants.

The Governor-General of the Congo, who has come to Brussels for consultations in a press conference held on the 4th, stressed the magnitude of the Congo's war effort and the self-sacrifice displayed by its inhabitants. The Germans had lied when they said the Congo had been sold. The Congo had voluntarily made her contribution to the common cause. Nor had England ever asked for anything that was incompatible with Belgium's national dignity. M. Ryckmans went on to say that there was talk in some countries of the desirability of giving independence to colonies. But it would be a long time before the Congolese natives were fit to govern themselves. Meanwhile Belgium must protect them and civilise them. Some Belgians were apprehensive of the policy of the United States on the question of the future of colonies. It had even been insinuated that the United States coveted the Congo. But there was no cause for anxiety. The United States had never given any official indication of an intention to meddle in Congolese internal affairs or to dispute Belgium's rights in the Congo. Naturally world opinion was interested in the way in which colonies were governed. But opinion in Belgium was no more tolerant of abuses than opinion anywhere else. Belgium had nothing to hide in the Congo, and nothing to fear from the publication—should such occur—of reports on conditions in the various colonies. Moreover, Belgium was in good company in her attitude to the future of her colony. Britain also intended to maintain her right over her colonies. Had not Mr. Churchill said that he had no intention of presiding over the liquidation of the British Empire? M. Ryckmans further pointed out that it would be necessary to make a great effort to improve the standard of living of the natives, which had inevitably declined during the war years. In conclusion he drew attention to the fact that the colony's economic position was sound and its prospects fair.

FRANCE.

The First French Army entered Karlsruhe on the 4th April, and General de Gaulle himself crossed the French frontier into the Palatinate on the 7th and later visited Karlsruhe. In a short speech he pointed out that for the first time for 150 years the French Army had crossed the Rhine in military operations. M. Robert Holveck, a prefect en disponibilité, has been appointed special delegate in Karlsruhe of the Strasbourg Commissariat of the Republic. On the 8th April French elements crossed the Enz and captured the Stuttgart broadcasting station from which the traitor Ferdonnet had broadcast early in 1940, and from which the "Radio Patrie" programmes organised by de Brinon and Luchaire had latterly been broadcast.

The first National Congress of French Aviation held at the Sorbonne came to an end on the 8th April, when a message was read from General de Gaulle recalling that France was the birthplace of aviation and M. Tillon, the Minister for Air, revealed that the French Air Force was making more than 4,000 sorties a month while its effectives had increased since the liberation from 30,000 to 100,000 men.

The impressive list of the supplies which have reached France since the liberation, issued by S.H.A.E.F. Public Relations Department, was duly reported in France; but while appreciation was expressed for the help given, the A.F.P. on the 3rd April criticised the presentation of the facts as misleading both with regard to the amount of supplies actually delivered, and because no mention was made in the documents of French participation, e.g., in the repairing of railways and bridges and in supplying large quantities of coal to the forces. It was feared that the document would be used with damaging effect by the enemies of Lend-Lease in America, as quite wrongly suggesting that France had received all the supplies she needs; this was far from being the case.

The absence of any Anglo-French political agreement following on the Anglo-Soviet Treaty and the recent far-reaching economic agreements concluded between France and the Low Countries has been the subject of comment in the French press and on the air. Speaking from Paris in the new French service in English on the 5th April, M. Pierre Bourdan gave forceful expression to what he declared was the demand of the vast majority of French people for such a pact. He pointed out that it was somewhat illogical that the two nations that were the first to declare war on Germany when Poland was attacked and the only nations to challenge Germany deliberately, should be bound to others by agreement and not be bound between themselves.

One of the seeming obstacles to Anglo-French agreement—the conflict of British and French interests in the Levant—was the subject of a frank discussion between Mr. Duff Cooper and General de Gaulle on the 5th April. General de Gaulle said that the French had no wish to govern Syria or the Lebanon; all they wanted was a military and air base, and proper treatment for their schools and universities. Though France was now weak in the Middle East, there was still considerable French influence in all Arab countries, including Egypt (and even in Turkey); and if it was known to the Arabs that England and France were firm friends, both our tasks would be rendered the easier. (For further information on relations in the Levant and for the establishment of diplomatic relations between France and Ethiopia, see under "Middle East.")

The constantly rumoured resignation of M. Mendès-France, Minister of National Economy (see Summary No. 277) was announced on the 5th April as having been accepted by General de Gaulle. By a decree of the same day M. Pleven, Minister of Finance, became Minister of National Economy and Finance.

The position regarding the eligibility, among other persons, of those Deputies and Senators who voted full powers to Pétain in July 1940 (see Summary No. 286) is now clear. After considerable debate in the Consultative Assembly on the 31st March, the Government finally adopted an Ordinance establishing a jury d'honneur consisting of the Vice-President of the Council of State (M. Cassin), a member of the C.N.R., and a member of the Council of the Order of Liberation, who would decide regarding the eligibility in the forthcoming elections of (a) Senators and Deputies, (b) persons who accepted membership of the Vichy Conseil National, and (c) persons appointed by Vichy to any Conseil Général or to the Municipal Council of Paris. All members of the Vichy Government and all persons who have been dismissed from office or deprived of the right of exercising a profession or fined on grounds of illegal profits, will be ineligible.

SWITZERLAND.

The Press is at pains to point out that there is no valid analogy between the Alpine "redoubt" prepared in the event of an invasion of Switzerland and the "redoubt" to which the Nazi leaders are said to be planning their retreat in Bavaria or Austria. A "redoubt," however fanatical its defence may be, cannot be maintained for any length of time if the mass of the people are not at one with its defenders. Even in the "redoubt" the Swiss Government would have remained the legitimate Government of the country because it would have had the whole Swiss people behind it. But a German "redoubt government," without any possibility of exercising power outside the "redoubt" and abjured by its own people, would no longer be a government as understood by international law. In the same way the "Werewolves" would not be a national uprising but simply an organisation for murder.

It is officially stated that there is no truth in the report that asylum had been offered to Mussolini in Switzerland. The rule made last year, refusing admission to foreigners guilty of felonious acts, or of having endangered Swiss interests by their activities and attitude, will be upheld.

154 Swiss citizens were killed during 1944 in air raids in Europe. The Government is doing its best to obtain compensation for their relations.

The Switzerland-Soviet Union Association has held its first meeting at Zurich. It was attended by more than 200 delegates from all over the country. A resolution was passed calling on the Federal Council for permission to circulate the monthly journal of the Union and to lift the ban on posters.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The resignation of the Duke of Alba, to which some publicity was given in the British press, is a fact: but it will not be announced for the present, and the Duke intends to return to London next month. Both the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Franco himself, who was rather put out by the Duke's instant response to Don Juan's call, seem to hope that time will soften the Ambassador's decision.

But the Duke is not to be a solitary figure in the slightly petulant pride of retreat. His lead has been followed by the Infante Alfonso de Orléans y Bourbón, who commands the second Air Arm at Seville. As a prince of both the Spanish and French Royal families, Don Alfonso, who is the most picturesque figure in the Spanish Air Force, was naturally one of the chief representatives in Spain of the exiled Don Juan. The official bulletin announcing the relinquishment of his post added that he was to reside at San Lucar de Barrameda, his country estate near Jerez de la Frontera; this implication of banishment looks like Franco's riposte to the Infante's "You can't fire me—I quit!" Surrounded by orange groves, the port of San Lucar, from which Columbus sailed on his third voyage to America, is to-day the principal depot for the export of manzanilla; there is, too, lovely sea-bathing there, so this is no harsh Siberian exile. But apart from the Duke of Alba no diplomats have yet answered the Royal call, and Don Juan seemingly enjoined on his followers in the Army a provisional passivity. The defection of one Prince and a Duke will not cause Franco's throne to totter.

The workings of the Spanish administration, frequently a source of smoky resentment for its victims, may on occasion cause bemused delight in the circumspective student of politics. Recently the Province of Santa Cruz de Tenerife (Canary Islands), needing women teachers for primary schools, invited applications from the didactically-minded "Canarias." Here, in order of priority, are the qualifications which will ensure success:—

(1) To have been an ex-combatant.
(2) To have suffered imprisonment or grievous bodily abuse at the hands of the "Reds."

(3) To be related in the second degree of relationship by blood or affinity with someone who died or was wounded in the campaign of liberation.
(4) To have lost in the same degree of relationship the largest number of relatives by assassination by the "Reds," or as a result of their barbarous acts.
(5) To have lost many worldly goods in consequence of the war.
(6) To have obtained a diploma after attending national courses of instruction.

The Civil War in Spain, the memories of which are so vividly kept alive in this scholastic invitation, ended just over six years ago. The Bourbons are truly not the only ones who learnt nothing and forgot nothing: the last qualification, however, does seem a little out of place.

As the war draws to an end Portugal is in the interesting situation of having benefited financially and suffered economically. It was inevitable that the sale of her products to both groups of belligerents, each bidding against the other, should bring in large profits; and she was in the happy position of finding in the production of two particular commodities a compensation for the partial stoppage of her trade in the traditional exports for which there was little foreign demand in war-time. The sale of sardines and wolfram, for which she was able to get almost any price she asked, helped to fill the exchequer with foreign exchange, and the—until quite recently—stationary imports had the effect, early in 1941, of turning the Commercial Balance from an unfavourable to a very favourable one. This financial advantage, however, was accompanied by the economic disadvantage of a shortage of certain essential imports. This was partly alleviated by the end of 1944; but since not even in the science of economics can you have it both ways, the increase in imports naturally had an adverse, though not very serious, effect upon the Trade Balance. The time is ripe for a much larger governmental expenditure on public works in order to better the health living conditions and education of the people. Such State expenditure has been inadequate in the past; it would be a very good long-term economic and social investment to increase it now, for, if Portugal is to make any progress as a modern State, it will have to be done sooner or later.

ITALY.

Signor Scoccimarro, the Minister for Occupied Italy, stated at a Press Conference in Rome, that the Italian Government reserves the right to try all Germans responsible for atrocities in Italy, and demands that German labour be forced to rebuild at least part of what they so criminally and needlessly destroyed. Enormous problems would have to be solved on the liberation of North Italy and the Government and the people must co-operate in this task. The Government felt sure the Committee of National Liberation and the Allies would mutually assist each other in the administration of newly freed areas, while the task of safeguarding every means of production had been entrusted to the Corps of Liberty Volunteers. The decision to unify all partisan formations under one command was, said Signor Scoccimarro, of the greatest importance, and a press report mentions General Carlo Cadorna, son of the Commander-in-Chief of the Italian Army in the last war, as taking over command of all partisans in North Italy. Signor Scoccimarro finished by saying that the Government was drafting new epuration laws to make certain that Fascist traitors received swift and severe punishment.

Italy continues to be very troubled by her exclusion from participation, even as an observer, in the San Francisco Conference. Signor Benedetto Croce has apparently taken it very much to heart and has called the exclusion of Italy "worse than a crime—a mistake." Count Sforza, on the other hand, has done his best to calm the agitation, urging Italians to trust "their noble and generous friends."

After reviewing the financial situation in Liberated Italy, Signor Soleri, the Finance Minister, announced the opening of a Government Loan. The subscription of 5 per cent. Bonds, which carry prizes as well, will be open from the 5th April to the 19th May. These bonds are to be exempt from taxation duties, taxes on gifts, dowries and family estates. The prizes and interest are also exempt from any tax. As these 5 per cent. Bonds are issued at 97·50 lire and redeemable at par at the end of five years, the rate of interest is actually 5·65 per cent.

It is reported from Rome that a group of eleven young Fascists has been arrested, the eldest of whom is 26 years old. It seems that their aim was to obtain explosives and arms for sabotage, to obtain a printing press, to spread propaganda and to contact any other Fascist elements. They had already murdered a certain Professor Giuseppe Salto in Florence and were on the point of issuing a manifesto attacking the Communist and Socialist Party leaders as well as the Allies, ending up with an appeal to Mussolini to return and all would be forgiven. The Carabinieri, however, arrested them before it was issued. A small quantity of arms, a radio transmission set and some incriminating papers were discovered where they lived, but it appears that they had not progressed very far in their designs. Investigation has not yet been carried far enough to be sure as to whether this group acted independently or whether it was in touch with another two suspected groups. It is also thought possible that all three groups may form part of a much larger organisation.

The Duke of Aosta, second cousin to King Victor Emmanuel, has been dismissed from his post as Admiral in the Italian Navy owing to an indiscreet remark made at a dinner party. The Duke of Aosta is alleged to have said that he would have liked to have shot the judges who presided at the trial of General Roatta and other high-ranking Fascists. This remark reached the ears of the editor of the Socialist paper Avanti, who used it to attack the Monarchy. Dr. Maroni, the president, and other members of the High Court complained to Signor Bonomi, who ordered an enquiry. Although the Duke protested that the whole thing was a mistake, it was considered that he had not acted in accordance with the responsibilities of his post and he was therefore dismissed by order of the Lieutenant of the Realm, acting on the advice of Admiral de Courten, the Minister of Marine.

In the North, the Fascist Republican Government is embarking on an intensified propaganda campaign, both for international consumption and for what is, from their point of view, "invaded" Italy. The campaign against the South is conducted largely through a daily radio bulletin, said to emanate from a "Committee for the Insurrection of Invaded Italy." The bulletin has exploited the recent discovery of a Fascist underground movement in Rome and urges Fascists to do everything in their power to obstruct the Bonomi Government through sabotage and the formation of armed bands for whom, it is promised, arms will be dropped by aircraft.

In pursuance of the propaganda drive in the North, Pavolini, the Fascist Party Secretary, summoned a meeting of the Party Directorate which issue an Order of the Day defining anew the Party's policy. Loyalty to the alliance with Germany and Japan was reaffirmed. It was stated that the complete mobilisation of the Republican Fascists in Black Brigades must be finished by the 30th April. The Party's social policy, as outlined in the Verona manifesto of November 1943, was restated. This includes the socialisation of industry and, to a certain extent, of agricultural management; nationalisation of banks and public credit institutions; syndical organisation within a single Confederation; and extensive schemes for workers' housing. On the subject of private ownership and enterprise the Fascists evidently mean to have the best of both worlds: and the Fascist social system in this respect is said to be "a new and unifying system which does not stop this side of Communism but goes beyond it just as it goes beyond the capitalist system of society."

Professor Cione's Opposition group now has a daily paper, Italia del popolo, printed, paradoxically enough, at Mussolini's orders, in the offices of its rival, the Repubblica Fascista of Milan. One of its first editorials strongly advocates support of Germany. In a statement to a Transocean correspondent Mussolini said that it was a part of his policy as laid down in the Verona manifesto and elsewhere to allow non-Fascist groups to exist, but their development would depend on their programme and activities. The Fascist Party alone remained responsible for leading the country, and the groups could only exist on condition that they accepted the main tenets of the State's programme—Republic, socialisation, and continuation of the war beside Germany.

THE VATICAN.

An article in the Osservatore Romano of the 3rd April discusses the imminent end of the war and appeals for a cessation of hostilities in order to put an end to further bloodshed. The writer points to the tragic irony of the present position, where the very country which advocated euthanasia is now wilfully prolonging the war by a refusal to recognise the inevitability of the end.

In a recent audience granted to Sir D'Arcy Osborne, the Pope deplored the anti-Vatican campaign of the Russian press and radio. His Holiness described as fantastic the accusation that he was trying to revive Fascism in Italy or to save the Nazi régime in Germany.

The anniversary of the Pope's coronation appears to have been celebrated in Germany with especial solemnity this year, and German Catholics in large numbers took part in the ceremonies.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Hungarian Government has now moved to Budapest. It was accompanied by the Russian members of the Control Commission, but the British and American Missions, having failed to secure tolerable accommodation, are remaining temporarily in Debrecen.

Miklós has again telegraphed to Stalin asking that Hungary's democratic army should be at the front at the final hour. The Press reports the recruiting of volunteers to be complete. Either then the recruiting has had a very great last-minute success, or the attempt to raise the eight whole divisions promised in the armistice has been abandoned. The Turkish Legation and the Papal Nuncio have now left Budapest. All neutral representatives are being asked to leave. The Hungarian Government has sent a representative named Tarnay to Bucarest to establish commercial and other relations with Roumania.

The food position in Budapest is said to be slightly easier, thanks in part to the supplies sent by the U.S.S.R., which are now arriving. Switzerland has also offered relief. Prices have fallen slightly. Clearly, however, the future supply position depends greatly on this year's harvest in view of which the big estates are being hurriedly parcelled out. Land distribution was reported to have been completed in 366 villages. In West Hungary elements of the population who had been impressed to dig fortifications on the frontier or in Austria are filtering back to their homes, but it is reported that they will be unable to till their land without assistance, as the Germans have removed stock, seed and implements.

More sentences were passed by the Budapest People's Court.

Nothing has been heard of the Szálasi "Government." The Hungarian armed forces on the German side seem to be dispersed and disintegrating. The remnants of one Division (the 24th) surrendered with their commander near Bratislava. Other Hungarians captured by the British in Central Germany said that 14 Hungarian training regiments, comprising 45,000 men, had been transferred to the Western Front in December last. Honvéds continue to arrive in large numbers in Denmark, but they are considered unreliable and kept practically interned, few being sent to the front.

Roumania.

The carefully constructed Roumanian Constitution of 1923, which had been set aside, quite illegally, by King Carol in successive stages between 1937 and 1940, was restored, as it had been set aside, by decree at the time of the surrender of Roumania in August 1944. The procedure for the amendment of this constitution is elaborate and was obviously designed to prevent any such step being taken in a hurry. In fact, the procedure is so complicated that it is doubtful if any amendment could be successfully carried through. The present Government are anxious that the constitution should be amended in certain particulars. The Ministers want provision made for confiscation of property by the State without compensation, partly in order to legalise their scheme for redistribution of land, and partly to enable property to be confiscated as a punishment for "war criminals." They also desire to introduce the death penalty for certain crimes. A decree purporting to amend the constitution has been presented to the King for signature. King Mihai is understood to be unwilling to sign this decree, but the Government would not readily accept a decision in this sense.

One difficulty is that the King has no means of explaining and justifying his action to the country. The censorship on broadcasting is strict at all times, and now the Broadcasting Company has been placed under the control of the Ministry of Propaganda, and the Board of Directors has been dissolved. The Minister of Propaganda is the Communist, Constantinescu-Iași, and the new Board is overwhelmingly Communist.

The difficulties about clearance of aircraft to and from Bucarest have not yet been got over.

It is announced that Dr. Maniu has resigned the leadership of the National Peasant Party.

Cases have occurred in which correspondence addressed from the British Consulate to British subjects in Roumania has been opened by the Roumanian censor, acting on Soviet instructions. In reply to a request from the British authorities that consular mail should not be censored, General Vinogradov has undertaken to discuss the matter with the Russian censor and communicate his decision in due course.

Yugoslavia.

The German tentacles which stretched along the main lines of communications in Bosnia and Lika are now being withdrawn. Sarajevo was taken by the Yugoslav Army on the 6th April after a stiff fight; Bijeljina, Brtchko and other places in Eastern Bosnia have been liberated; so have Gospitch, Ototchatz and a number of points on the Senj–Ogulin road in Lika. Units of the Red Army have penetrated North-East Slovenia in the direction of Maribor and Celje.

Marshal Tito, with Dr. Shubashitch, General Dzhilas and the Minister of Trade have arrived in Moscow. This is Tito's first visit abroad as head of the Yugoslav Government, and it is believed that a pact similar to the Soviet Treaty with the Czechs is under discussion.

One of the reasons for the "first extraordinary session" of ASNOS (Anti-Fascist Skupshtina of Serbia), which opened on the 7th April in Belgrade seems to have been the decision to include in the federal unit of Serbia the Sandjak of Novi Pazar (comprising the districts of Priboj, Miloshevo, Zlatar, Sjenica, Dezhevo and Stavitch), the Vojvodina and the Kosovo–Metohija area on the Albanian border. The Pljevlja and Bijelo Polje districts of the Sandjak have been transferred to Montenegro. Delegates from the areas concerned claimed that the request for transfer came from the inhabitants themselves; but these changes conveniently reduce the number of federal units to the six proclaimed at Jajtse in November 1943. The Vojvodina, however, is to enjoy limited independence as a semi-autonomous province of Serbia.

The Albanians of Kosovo have been told by Tito that their future lies with Yugoslavia, wherein they will enjoy full national and cultural rights. Those who are loyal to Tito must be responsible for bringing their erring and dissident brethren into line by an amnesty or by sterner measures.

The Minister of Agriculture has proposed the use of troops in agricultural areas where there is a great shortage of manpower, especially in the Vojvodina, and has suggested that agricultural experts should be mobilised.

The press has criticised the Pope for appealing for an end to bloodshed, Time and Tide for supplying Goebbels with anti-Partisan propaganda, as well as Italy and Turkey.

Greece.

At the request of the Regent, General Plastiras has reluctantly tendered his own resignation and that of his Ministers. The immediate occasion of the political crisis which led to the Government's resignation was a manœuvre by the Populist Party, whose press came out with extracts from a letter written by General Plastiras (then in Nice) to the Greek Ambassador at Vichy in 1941; from the passages quoted it appeared that General Plastiras had been in favour of the Greek Government's using German mediation to negotiate a peace with Italy in 1940. In an interview with His Majesty's Ambassador, General Plastiras has stated that he is quite prepared to publish the full text of the letter in question, and has added that, when approached by the S.S. in 1940, he told them that no Greek would ever agree to negotiate behind the backs of his British Allies.

In fact, however, for quite other reasons, the days of the Plastiras Government were already numbered. It had for some time been becoming increasingly clear that General Plastiras had served the purpose for which he was appointed in January, and that his Government was losing popular support. He had made various mistakes; some of his appointments were injudicious (that of General Gonatas as Governor-General of Macedonia had to be cancelled), and his decision to create an Under-Secretariate of Public Security (see Summary No. 282) not only resulted in the resignation of his Minister of the Interior, but caused widespread apprehension at a time when it was vitally important that the extreme Left should have no pretext for calling in question the good faith of the Government.

In his letter accepting the Plastiras Government's resignation the Regent made no mention of the extracts published by the Populist press. The Government, he said, had contributed greatly to ironing out internal differences, to reorganising the armed forces, and to restoring the authority of the State, and for all this he warmly thanked the General and his colleagues. Any unbiassed critic, however, must realise that the Plastiras Government was not the type required for "despatching the business in hand," which must be accomplished before the normal political life of the country could be restored. With real sorrow, therefore, he had decided to deprive himself of the services of the present Government. He thanked them for their invaluable services, and in particular expressed his deep appreciation of General Plastiras, that honest soldier who had always been distinguished for his sincerity and devotion to duty. General Plastiras replied that for some time he had realised that he was being hindered on all sides in carrying out his duty; he had continued his work with bitterness, but with tireless devotion. He was now convinced that it was no longer possible for him to continue at the head of the Government, and therefore tendered his resignation, "casting the responsibility on those who provoked it." In a message to the Press, which was also broadcast by Radio Athens, General Plastiras pointed out that it was only after repeated requests by the Regent, pressure from popular deputations, and requests from the Allies, that he had agreed to form a transitional Government to restore order. He had obeyed the command of the nation and now laid down his office convinced that he and his colleagues had done their duty.

General Plastiras is succeeded by Admiral Voulgaris, a distinguished Venizelist, who, as Commander-in-Chief of the Greek Navy, quelled the mutinies of April 1944. M. Sophianopoulos remains Foreign Minister; otherwise the new Government consists largely, not of professional politicians, but of officials, including a number of university professors.

Albania.

Demonstrations demanding Allied recognition of the provisional Government and an invitation to San Francisco continue to be staged at various places. Enver Hoxha has written to President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, expressing the hope that he may yet be invited. Bishop Fan Noli and other Albanians in the United States have begged the United States Government to invite Enver Hoxha, and the Bishop has appealed to Mr. Churchill. The reply has been in each case that invitations are confined to members of the United Nations.

Half-a-dozen men, described as "military criminals," were recently executed on the order of a military court at Argyrocastro. They had presumably been engaged in past operations against the partisans. Bahri Omari, Xhavet Leskovic, who is another former Foreign Minister, and several others are being tried at Tirana, apparently on the charge of collaboration with the enemy.

Bulgaria.

In recent fighting in Yugoslavia and Hungary the Bulgarian Army has suffered heavy casualties, which have been roughly estimated at 30,000. Discontent arising from such losses was perhaps the chief reason why Nikola Petkov, the near-Communist Minister without Portfolio who now leads the Agrarian Party, denounced those who were agitating for peace and insisted that Bulgaria could only take her place among the democratic nations by fighting to the end. In the same vein the Communist newspaper declared that, whether invited to San Francisco or not, Bulgaria would be represented there by the guns of Moscow which had saluted the Bulgarian victory on the third Ukrainian front.

The Communists' struggle for power continues. After the September revolution there was a general move to reorganise the trades unions on a Fatherland Front basis, which meant in practice to bring them under Communist control. This move was resisted by some of the unions of Government employees, notably that of the Finance Ministry officials who in the course of years had built up an efficient and wealthy organisation owning property worth 400 million levas, and were unwilling to let the Communists get hold of it. Accordingly the new Communist-run General Workers' Union organised a demonstration in Sofia on the 31st March in order to attack the Finance Ministry Union. A rival Agrarian demonstration clashed with the Communists, and the militia being under Communist control naturally obstructed it. It is anticipated that the Communists, true to their approved tactics, will now agitate for the removal of the leader of the Finance Ministry Union. They already dub him "a G. M. Dimitrov Agrarian"—which is anathema. That the onward surge of the Communists is not entirely unopposed appears also from the fact that the Communists have still not succeeded in laying hands on Napred, the old-established Socialist Co-operative (see Summary No. 278), about the absorption of which discussions are still proceeding. In the face of this Communist aggressiveness and dominance the moderates would like to postpone elections. In present circumstances there would be not the least guarantee of freedom or secrecy, and Communist intimidation would lead direct to a Communist victory. However, Mlle. Tsola Dragoicheva, the secretary of the Central Fatherland Front Committee, who seems remarkable for fanaticism rather than a sense of humour, has stated that henceforth the liquidation of Fascists—i.e., non-Communists—must be effected by strictly legal means, and that merciless measures will be taken against members of Fatherland Front committees who act arbitrarily.

The People's Court seems to be finishing its activities, but since the 20th March it has imposed at various places in the provinces 150 sentences of death and nearly 100 for life imprisonment as well as less heavy penalties.

For the visit of the Archbishop of Moscow see under "Soviet Union."

Turkey.

On the 4th April, the day after the arrival on leave of the Turkish Ambassador from Moscow, the Turkish Government replied in friendly terms to the Soviet Government's denunciation of the Turco-Soviet Pact. The Turkish note stated that the Turkish Government had always desired to maintain and consolidate good and neighbourly relations with the Soviet Union and was willing to replace a pact, which it valued as having rendered great service to Turco-Soviet friendship, by one substantially improved in accordance with the present interests of the two countries, and to examine any Soviet proposals with good will. This soft answer was followed by comment in the semi-official Ulus admitting that conditions had so changed as to justify a desire for a new pact, but pointing out that when she allied herself with Britain, Turkey took particular care to stipulate that her friendship with the Soviet Union came first. Considering that Russian complaints are largely concerned with the part which Turkey has played in the war, the writer was perhaps unwise in venturing to add that during the war Turkey had devoted all her resources to the cause of the Allies.

M. Hassan Saka, the Foreign Minister, after handing the above-mentioned reply to the Soviet Ambassador, M. Vinogradov, left next day to lead the Turkish delegation at San Francisco. Although they are unlikely to offer comment on the Dumbarton Oaks scheme at the present stage, the Turks are uneasy—obviously with Russia in mind—lest the Security Council should appease a big Power at the expense of a small one, and they would like some guarantee of the independence and integrity of member States.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

It has now been announced that Nokrashi Pasha will not go to San Francisco, and that the Egyptian Delegation will be reduced in size and headed by the Foreign Minister, Bedawi Pasha. The meetings in Fayum of a conference of British Representatives in the Middle East, the object of which was to review economic and financial policy in that area, have given rise to the usual unfounded rumours of momentous political consultations. Nahas Pasha's brother-in-law, Ahmad al Wakil, has been convicted by court-martial, together with some of his business associates, of irregularities in connexion with taxation and supplies; his sentence was the heaviest, amounting, however, to nothing worse than one year's imprisonment with stay of execution and a fine of £500.

The process of ratifying the Arab Convention is now complete in Egypt and Iraq, and a motion for its ratification has been carried unanimously in the Syrian Chamber of Deputies; it will enter into force fifteen days after four States have notified the Secretary-General of their ratification. The vote in the Syrian Chamber was preceded by the criticism of the departures in the text of the Covenant from the Alexandria Protocol. In the Iraqi Chamber almost all the speakers demanded further efforts to obtain independence for Arab countries not yet free. The Prime Minister, speaking in the Senate, referred particularly to the Arabs of Palestine. The Iraqi Government had already made financial provision for conducting propaganda on their behalf, and had contributed I.D. 150,000 to the Arab National Fund, which would also be financed by the other Arab countries; the Council of the League would itself take diplomatic action. Published exchanges of telegrams between the Heads of State in Syria and Egypt, and between their Ministers for Foreign Affairs, tend to depict the admission of Syria to San Francisco as the first success of the Arab League.

The Syrian Prime Minister, Faris al Khury, announced the resignation of his Government to the Chamber of Deputies on the 4th April. He declared that they had completed their immediate tasks, and that Syrian independence had been consummated by the signature of the Arab Covenant and the invitation to San Francisco. The Cabinet had been in difficulties with the Chamber, but it is reported that Faris al Khury has succeeded in reconstituting it, retaining three of his former colleagues. (See also under "France.")

The Persian press has announced the resignation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. As the Minister for War has at the same time gone to Palestine for prolonged medical treatment, M. Bayat's Cabinet seems even less viable than it did before.

Diplomatic relations have been established between the Governments of France and Ethiopia.

THE FAR EAST.

The week has been marked by the fall of the Koiso Cabinet and by the formation of a new one under the leadership of the aged Admiral Kantaro Suzuki. The Koiso Cabinet held an extraordinary meeting on the morning of the 5th April and at 10·30 a.m. Koiso went to the Imperial Palace and tendered the resignations of himself and his colleagues. The Japanese Board of Information in a communiqué issued on the evening of the 5th said that Koiso had resigned to make way for a stronger Government in view of the gravity of the situation. This does not explain why the resignation should have come at that time. It should be noted that the decision of the Soviet Government not to continue the Neutrality Pact with Japan after its expiration in April 1946 was formally communicated to the Japanese Ambassador in Moscow at 3 p.m. on the 5th April—this would be the evening of the 5th in Tokyo, so that it does not seem to have been this event which precipitated the downfall of the Koiso Cabinet. However, the Japanese Government certainly feared such an eventuality.

Upon receiving the resignation of the Cabinet, the Emperor summoned the Lord Privy Seal, Marquis Kido, to select a new Premier, seeking advice from the "new Genro," consisting of ex-Premiers, namely, Prince Konoye, Baron Hiranuma, Baron Wakatsuki, General Tojo, Admiral Okada and Mr. Hirota, and the President of the Privy Council, Admiral Suzuki, and their deliberations resulted in the choice of the last-named as Premier. Kido then formally recommended Suzuki to the Emperor, commanded him to form a Cabinet.

Admiral Baron Suzuki is 77 years old; he had a distinguished naval career and rendered important services in the war with China in 1894–95 and in that with Russia in 1904–05. He rose to be Commander-in-Chief of the Combined Fleet, Chief of the Naval General Staff, and Supreme War Councillor. In 1929 Suzuki retired from active service in the Navy and was appointed Grand Chamberlain. He held this Court position for seven years; he was one of those marked for assassination by the military extremists who attempted the coup d'Etat of the 26th February, 1936. Suzuki was severely wounded on that occasion and resigned his post in the following November. He became a Privy Councillor, and in August 1944 was appointed President of the Privy Council. This post has now been filled by Baron Hiranuma, who previously held it from 1936 until 1939.

Suzuki is thus a leading member of the Court clique and one of the elder statesmen. In this lies the significance of the appointment of a man who would appear to be too old to shoulder the responsibilities of office at such a critical period. The Japanese press has emphasised that the new Cabinet has been formed under the influence of the elder statesmen close to the Throne; they have, indeed, chosen one of themselves as Premier. Usually the elder statesmen prefer to rule from behind the scenes, but they have now come much more into the foreground.

By the 8th April Suzuki had completed the formation of his Cabinet, which is composed of the following members:—

Premier: Admiral Baron Kantaro Suzuki.
Foreign Minister and Minister of Greater East Asiatic Affairs: Mr. Shigenori Togo.
Minister of War: General Korechika Anami.
Minister of the Navy: Admiral Mitsumasa Yonai.
Minister of Home Affairs: Mr. Genki Abe.
Minister of Finance: Mr. Toyosaku Hirose.
Minister of Munitions: Vice-Admiral Teijiro Toyoda.
Minister of Transport and Communications: Mr. Naoto Kohiyama.
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce: Mr. Tadatsu Ishiguro.

Minister of Justice: Mr. Hiromasu Matsusaka.
Minister of Welfare: Mr. Tadahiko Okada.
Minister of Education: Mr. Kozo Ota.
Minister without Portfolio and President of the Board of Information: Dr. Hiroshi Shimomura.
Minister without Portfolio: General Jiro Minami.
Minister without Portfolio: Vice-Admiral Seizo Sakonji.
Minister without Portfolio: Mr. Hyoguro Sakurai.
Chief Secretary to the Cabinet: Mr. Hisatsune Sekomizu.

Apart from that of Suzuki himself, the most significant appointments are those of Togo as Foreign Minister and of Minami as Minister without Portfolio. Togo was Ambassador to the Soviet Union from October 1938 to August 1940. He was Foreign Minister in the Tojo Cabinet from its formation in October 1941 until September 1942. Domei (9th April) said that Togo was Suzuki's first choice as Foreign Minister, but that, as Togo did not arrive from Karuizawa in time, Suzuki himself took over the Foreign Ministry until Togo reached Tokyo. Togo was formally installed on the 9th April.

It is possible that Togo's appointment is due to the hope that he will be able to preserve peaceful relations with the U.S.S.R., as he is believed by Tokyo to be persona grata in Moscow. Japanese Foreign Office circles declared that they were not surprised by the Soviet action in respect of the Neutrality Pact, that the pact was a factor of peace and stability in East Asia, and that the Japanese Government would make the greatest possible efforts to preserve this situation but were prepared for all eventualities. (See also under "U.S.S.R.")

The Domei broadcast from Singapore (9th April) said that the new Cabinet was the logical outcome of the creation of a new political party. Minami's appointment indicates a close connexion between the Cabinet and the Dai Nippon Seijikai, and he will probably be the strongest figure in an administration which as a whole is not impressive. The Nippon Times (9th April) scouted the idea that this is in any way a "peace Cabinet." Lily Abegg, the Transocean correspondent in Tokyo, remarked (8th April) that the new Cabinet showed that Japan was determined to exploit every possibility to the last, both in the military and the political spheres.

On the 7th April the Tokyo War Office announced that, in order to strengthen Japan's mainland defence, an overall Army Command and an overall Army Air Command has been established. Field-Marshals Sugiyama and Hata had been appointed to the Army Command. These new Commands are a result of Japanese anticipation that invasion is imminent; it was not stated whether Hata and Sugiyama would have separate geographical areas of Command or whether they would work conjointly. The importance of air defence needs no elaboration; the new War Minister, General Anami, was formerly Director-General of Army Aviation.

On the 8th April an Imperial communiqué said that since the night of the 5th Japanese sea and air forces had been attacking the American task force off Okinawa. The communiqué said that Japanese losses included a battleship, a cruiser and three destroyers sunk; it claimed that an American battleship, two aircraft carriers and various smaller units had also been sunk. This is presumably the Japanese version of the action in which Vice-Admiral Mitscher's task force sank the Yamato and several smaller Japanese warships.

The sad plight to which the Japanese Navy has been reduced was indirectly admitted by Admiral Takahashi, a former Commander-in-Chief, in an interview with Mainichi representatives. He said that the main strength of the Japanese Navy now consisted of land-based aircraft scattered in various areas, as well as of carrier-borne aircraft. Warships were now playing an auxiliary rôle. He, of course, added that the Fleet was waiting for an opportunity to deal the enemy a fatal blow, and that this chance would come when Japan secured supremacy in the air (Domei, 6th April).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

General Eisenhower's warning, in a letter to the President made public on the 5th April, that there might never be "a clean-cut military surrender" on the western front, that V-E Day would probably come by "a proclamation on our part" and that the ensuing guerrilla warfare would require for its suppression "a very large number of troops," has further damped down the blaze of excitement caused by the war news. Optimism is, however, the prevailing note, especially as one triumph after another is also reported from the Far East. Referring to the consolidation on Okinawa, the Secretary of War observed on the 5th April that "Here at Japan's doorstep, even though much heavy fighting may lie ahead, American forces are now assured of air bases and harbours from which Japan may be blockaded on the outside and destroyed within by the bombs of our planes." The regrouping of the two Pacific commands into one theatre, with General MacArthur in command of all military forces and Admiral Nimitz in command of all naval forces, was another indication of how the Allies are closing in on the eastern enemy. The Soviet denunciation of the neutrality pact with Japan was not so exuberantly welcomed in the United States as would have been the case earlier, although the gesture has undoubtedly restored some of the good-will which the Soviet Union lost through the recent difficulties over Poland and the Balkans. Whether bases for bombing Japan from Siberia are involved is not considered to matter so much now that the American commanders feel that their latest conquests are adequate for the purpose.

The need for maintaining the supply of man-power in war industries, no less than in the field, was again stressed by Mr. James F. Byrnes in his last report as Director of War Mobilisation and Reconversion, a position he resigned on the 2nd April. He indicated the limited extent to which controls might be relaxed after the end of the European war: a doubling of the amount of steel and other materials at present available for civilian production, the gradual release of from 20 to 30 per cent. of present war production facilities for peace-time manufactures, as well as more petrol for motorists, the end of the curfew and the resumption of horse-racing. Four high officials have since addressed the President urging that many controls should be retained beyond the war to prevent "runaway inflation." The heads of the Office of Economic Stabilisation, the War Food Administration, the Office of Price Administration and the War Labour Board join in pointing out that, while the cost of living has risen only 2 per cent. in the last two years, average earnings have gone up 10 per cent. An incautious removal of controls might produce a catastrophic rise in prices and fall in real wages. Observers also recall the inflation which followed the sudden removal of controls after the last war, but there appears a tendency to think such fears exaggerated. The Senate's rejection of even the modified Man-power Bill passed by the House of Representatives has not greatly perturbed the American public, while the strike in the soft-coal industry continued to spread until on the 10th April President Roosevelt ordered the seizure of affected mines to prevent interference with the war effort. The resignation of Mr. Byrnes, whose importance in the Administration was indicated by his soubriquet of "the Assistant President," was a surprise at this critical time, though it had long been known that he wished to retire. His successor, Mr. Fred M. Vinson, was only appointed Federal Loan Administrator a few weeks ago. Judge Vinson is popular with Congress, where he sat for almost fifteen years, and his nomination as Mobilisation Director has been speedily confirmed by the Senate.

A large number of Bills or Resolutions relating to post-war arrangements are now being debated in Congress. Hearings on the Bretton Woods plan for an international bank and an international monetary fund have reached the final stages in the House Banking and Currency Committee. Sub-committees of the Senate Inter-State Commerce Committee, of which Senator Wheeler is chairman, are considering Civil Aviation and Telecommunications, about both of which divergent views are expressed. Testifying on the McCarran Aviation Bill, the Assistant Secretary of War indicated that his Department thought it "infinitely wiser" to foster competition among American airlines than to set up a monopoly airline for all overseas operations. On the other hand, for telecommunications Mr. Forrestal, the Secretary of the Navy, advocates a single privately-owned system under Government control, while the State Departement, supported by much of the press, would prefer to rely on competing companies, also under supervision.

These subjects are arousing much feeling in the United States, and the even more contentious question of tariffs has been brought forward by the Doughton Bill, now before the House of Representatives (see Summary No. 286, p. 21). The President has consistently urged a low-tariff policy as vital to his country's well-being and the Secretary of State devoted a large part of a broadcast speech at Chicago on the 4th April to underlining his "firm conviction that tariffs must be further lowered in the next few years both by other countries and by ourselves." Signs of the most bitter controversy for years on this subject are already apparent in Congress. Referring to the Bretton Woods proposals, Mr. Stettinius announced that Congress would in the near future be asked to expand the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank and emphasised that "Lend-Lease is solely a war-time measure." He drew attention to the draft constitution of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation, which the President had asked Congress to approve the previous week, and added: "The food organisation, like all the other post-war international agencies, to which I have referred this evening, would eventually come within the framework of the world organisation when it is established."

Preparatory work for the San Francisco Conference goes on apace at Washington. The State Department convened on the 3rd April a meeting of what is described as an "informal organising group" for the discussion of procedure and arrangements. Mr. Stettinius was in the chair and the British, Chinese and Soviet ambassadors attended. On Monday, the 9th April, jurists of twenty-nine nations met at the Department to draw up alternative drafts for either a new World Court Statute, or a modification of the existing Permanent Court of International Justice, which is the course favoured by the American Bar Association. The American delegation to San Francisco, with the exception of Mr. Cordell Hull, who is still in hospital, and Commander Stassen, who is back on duty in the Pacific, began daily meetings on the same Monday. Mr. John Foster Dulles, after some hesitation, has accepted the invitation to become "an official adviser" to the American delegation. This further concession to the Republican party, made, it is understood, after consultation with Governor Dewey, whose chief adviser on foreign policy Mr. Dulles has been, should improve the prospects of the Conference decisions winning Congressional and public approval.

Since, however, Mr. Dulles is also a recognised leader of Protestant opinion on foreign affairs, there may be repercussions in the large Catholic community.

Senator Vandenberg's suggested amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks plan have now been disclosed by the State Department. They are explicitly designed to avoid a new "League in a strait jacket, which attempts to preserve the status quo," and to rectify "the total lack of any reference to justice as a League criterion (except in the World Court section)." How far the Senator has moved from his former isolationist attitude may be seen in his third general observation: "Senate ratification will be seriously jeopardised by our failure to disarm the critics, who will magnify the flaws I seek to correct."

(See also "France," "the Low Countries" and "Latin America.")

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 4th April the Argentine chargé d'affaires in Mexico signed the final Act of the Mexico City Conference on behalf of Argentina, and on the 9th, after the prior consultation between the United States Government and His Majesty's Government, and between the United States and the Latin-American countries concerned, recognition of the Argentine Government was announced. It will be recalled that normal diplomatic relations have been suspended since March 1944, when General Ramírez was overthrown by General Farrell. The United States and British Ambassadors were recalled from Buenos Aires last year. Sir D. Kelly is expected shortly to return to his post, and the American press has reported that Mr. Spruille Braden, now Ambassador at Havana, will be the new United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires.

The Argentine Government has taken action against a number of Axis enterprises. I.M.P.A. (founded by the former Austrian munition merchant Fritz Mandl, who has assumed Argentine nationality) has been placed under supervision, and is apparently to be nationalised. Intervention has been ordered in the case of nineteen other firms. The Government of Santa Fé province, till lately a Nationalist stronghold, has released a considerable number of political prisoners.

Colonel Perón, however, is still under attack both from the Nationalists and militarists, and from his "democratic" opponents. The former constitute much the more serious threat to him. Recognition will, no doubt, be to his advantage. Meanwhile, the turn of events is a matter for relief rather than for enthusiasm.

In Guatemala, where the situation is still uneasy (see Summary No. 285), about fifty arrests have been made among opposition leaders and their supporters. Guatemala has resumed relations with El Salvador (see Summary No. 274).

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE Allies are fulfilling their intention, expressed in the Yalta communiqué, of striking "mightier blows into the heart of Germany." The Germans, on the 16th April, announced the opening of a new Russian offensive on the Oder, which has not yet been admitted by the Russians themselves. In the West the Elbe has been reached on a broad front and the Germans are fighting hard to contain the American bridgehead across it near Magdeburg. Hanover, Brunswick, Halle, Leuna with its great oil refineries, and Weimar have fallen. American troops have reached the Leipzig area and are within a few miles of the Czechoslovak border near Chemnitz, whilst further south they have entered Nürnberg and are developing a threat to the Danube valley from the north-west. In Austria the Russians, after clearing Vienna, have captured the important railway junction of St. Pölten and are moving on Linz. The vital supply lines between the German fronts in the northern and central Reich and the German forces in southern Germany, Austria, and Italy are thus threatened with disruption by a possible juncture of American and Russian forces either in Saxony or in the Danube valley.

In this situation Hitler has divided the command of his western armies. Kesselring's command is now limited to central and southern Germany, whilst Field-Marshal Busch, commander of the Army Group Centre in Russia until his replacement by Model in July 1944, has been given command of the armies in northern Germany. In Italy Kesselring has for the moment been replaced by von Viettinghoff Scheel, a specialist in defensive and tank warfare, who was falsely rumoured to have succeeded Kesselring in October 1943. He is a career soldier and is not known to have any close Party connexion.

Meanwhile, far in the rear of the advanced Anglo-American troops in central Germany the Ruhr pocket has been heavily reduced and has yielded, among other prisoners, the crack Panzer Lehr Division, with its commander. Canadian and Polish troops have reached the North Sea, and the German forces in western Holland are now completely isolated from the Reich.

Germany's naval and air forces are rapidly being crippled. The Scheer capsized and the Emden was damaged in the raids on Kiel. The Köln is now known to have been sunk at Wilhelmshafen during a raid by the 8th United States Air Force on the 30th March, the Gneisenau and Schleswig-Holstein are presumed to have been scuttled at Gdynia and the Seydlitz at Königsberg. The Luftwaffe is crowded into the remaining airfields in the centre of the Reich and is extremely vulnerable to Allied air attack. 1,119 German planes were destroyed or damaged on the ground during March and many more have suffered the same fate since.

The High Command communiqué has pursued the policy of tardy admission of unpleasant facts. On the 13th it said that the focal point of the fighting in the west was in the Central German area, where there was a strong Allied wedge eastwards. On the 15th it claimed that American forces south-east of Magdeburg had been thrown back across the Elbe, but admitted that counter-attacks against other "local bridgeheads" were still in progress. In the East, the outstanding admissions of the week were the loss of Vienna and Königsberg. Despite claims that strong resistance had foiled many enemy attacks, each day's communiqué described the "failure" of these attacks at a point still nearer the heart of the Reich. An article in the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung on the 14th said that a mere glance at the map could no longer do justice to the crisis which had developed in the last few weeks. "If little flags pinned on the maps were a true reflection of victory or defeat, then, indeed, Germany's dramatic hour would not only have come but would already have been passed." If one judged solely by external appearances, the Reich was to-day "a heap of ruins and a vale of tears." Its inhabitants, however, were fighting in front of the enemy and in his rear, "in the open and from secret hideouts." The front was composed of "individual fighters."

There is no doubt that the policy of the German leaders remains that of "unconditional resistance," in spite of the disasters which are falling on their country, and the increasing disintegration of the Reich. There is so far no firm evidence that they have abandoned the principle of governmental control from a single centre, although the splitting-up of the Reich must make its administrative units relatively independent of each other. The great fear appears to be that men in responsible positions will surrender, or desert their posts. A Hitler order of the 21st January ordered all officers down to divisional level to inform him of operational orders in time for these to be countermanded, including any projected withdrawal or abandonment of position, fortified town, or fortress. A supplement to the communiqué of the 12th April, which announced the surrender of Königsberg by its commander, General Lasch, contained an order signed by Himmler, Keitel, and Bormann. This stated that towns must be defended to the last, and the sector commandants appointed in each town were personally responsible. They, or any civilian officials who failed in their duty, would be sentenced to death. Exceptions would be decided upon exclusively by the High Command of the Armed Forces. Earlier on the same day an order had been issued by Himmler saying that no German town would be declared an open city, and any German who did not do his duty in this respect would lose his life and honour. The example of Breslau was held up to admiration—Hitler sent Hanke, the Gauleiter, a telegram of thanks for his continued resistance there, and awarded him the Gold Cross.

Hitler's Order of the Day to the troops in the east on the 16th, even more desperate in tone than the warnings and admonitions already quoted, admitted that German soldiers were helping the Russians. "I warn you to keep an eye on the few treacherous officers and soldiers who, to save their miserable skins, are in Russian pay and perhaps German uniform, and will fight against us." Anyone who gave the order to retreat, and was not well known, was to be immediately arrested and if necessary shot, "regardless of what rank he holds in the army." He assured his listeners that the new blows from the east had been foreseen and prepared for since last January, and that Bolshevism would "bleed to death in front of the capital of the German Reich." If every soldier did his duty, the "last onslaught from Asia" would collapse, as the breakthrough of the enemy in the west would collapse in the end: "Berlin remains German. Vienna will become German again. Europe will never be Russian."

The death of President Roosevelt has provoked from Nazi propaganda the reactions of a primitive people. The striking down of "one of the greatest war criminals of all time" is hailed by D.N.B. as an act of avenging justice. A broadcast on the German Home Service contrasted the preservation of Hitler last July "even though a human hand was raised against him" with the fact that Roosevelt "was smitten inexorably but justly by a sudden death expected by none." The event was indeed a reward for the endurance of the German people, for had the Germans capitulated as their enemies had expected a year or six months ago, the Allies would not have been struck by this blow "at the climax of their war effort." Such "intervention of a just fate" was a reason for Germans to grasp their weapons still more firmly; it was fraught with political consequences. Roosevelt had been Churchill's sole support against Stalin. With the advent of Truman and Stettinius American policy had passed into the hands of small men. The character of the Allied coalition had undergone a decisive change. A study of the German text of Hitler's Order of the 16th and the identity of phrasing with the extract from D.N.B. already quoted, make it clear that his reference to "the greatest war criminal of all time" was indeed to Roosevelt and not, as would appear from the Times report, to Stalin.

Gauleiter Eigruber, broadcasting from Linz on the 14th, gave the news that a number of Party officials who had fled from Vienna were awaiting trial. He warned those who believed in Bolshevism and its promises and tried to stab their own country in the back. He forbade all evacuation of his Gau, Oberdonau, because no accommodation was available in Bavaria and because "if anyone runs, this only means a delay of a few days till the enemy overtakes everything." He also gave a warning similar to that in Hitler's Order against "German prisoners-of-war wearing German uniform" who were being dropped or smuggled into the German lines with the object of creating confusion and terror. No clemency could be applied to such "creatures infected with Communism."

Having been already deprived of their supplies of hard coal and steel from Silesia, the Saar and the Ruhr, manufacturing concerns still in German control are now further prevented from continuous production by the rapid Allied advances, which are interrupting all the main arteries of communication, and by the severity of Allied air attacks. After the capture of the Henschel works at Kassel the remaining five major assembly plants for armoured fighting vehicles were so successfully bombed in the fortnight ending on the 8th April that only two of them near Berlin continued to operate and at a reduced scale. In Kothen, south-west of Dessau, the Allies have captured the largest plant for Junker aircraft; and since the 3rd April four heavy raids have been carried out against shipping, and against the shipbuilding and submarine yards at Kiel. The effective elimination near Heilbronn, of plants which produced more than 80 per cent. of Germany's motor vehicle pistons and 25 per cent. of her tank and Diesel engine pistons has reduced this type of industry in her control to one plant at Nürnberg. Similarly as a result of the attack on the 16th March on Europe's largest alumina and aluminium establishments, 50 kilometres north-east of Dresden, there is now only one alumina plant in working order in the German-controlled territory. Moreover, the Americans have captured the largest German synthetic oil plant at Leuna, 12 miles west of Leipzig, and entered the Hanoverian oilfields, and the Russians have overrun the crude oilfields in the Vienna basin as well as six refineries in and around Vienna. The only oilfields which remain in German hands are located in the north near Hamburg and Heide, already threatened by British forces. It is evident that, as a result of her losses of territory, Germany is no longer able to produce sufficient war supplies to satisfy the needs of her armed forces.

Reports of A.M.G. in west Germany throw some light on present trends within the German nation. A certain amount of terrorism has been met with. The Oberbürgermeister of Aachen, who had been appointed by A.M.G. was murdered at the back door of his home at 10.30 p.m. on the 25th March, but the identity of the criminals remains unknown. Investigation has been made into the rumoured existence of a secret organisation in Cologne, said to exist for the purpose of terrorising civilian collaborators with the Americans. Leaflets have been distributed in the city signed by "The Avengers of German Honour," one of which promised a return of the Germans by the 1st May. A member of the auxiliary police has been murdered, and some American soldiers wounded at night by knife attacks. The number of such incidents has, however, been relatively small and there is very little evidence to suggest that the much-advertised Werewolf organisation has, as yet, begun serious operations.

On the other hand, there is evidence of resistance by the German population to Nazi orders of evacuation and demolition. In one district between the Roer and the Rhine 50 per cent. of the cattle were removed by the Wehrmacht in December last. Two days before the arrival of the Allies, the Bürgermeister ordered the surrender of all the rest, excepting one cow per owner. This order was widely disregarded. So many cows were hidden that there are still enough within the community to provide milk for everyone. Similarly the publishers of the Kölnische Zeitung were ordered on the 3rd March to dismantle key parts of the machinery and remove them across the Rhine. All these essential parts were later found hidden on the premises. At München-Gladbach, the municipal water-works were found intact. Under threat of death from the local Volkssturm if they put them out of action, the engineers ordered to do so failed to carry out their orders. Force had to be used to evacuate civilians from Coblenz. After fake air raid alarms, S.S. men rounded up people in the shelters, packed them into waiting cars and sent them into Thuringia.

There is evidence, too, that military morale of troops fighting within the Reich is being affected by civilians. Many prisoners speak of being entreated by civilians to lay down their arms (in Bonn soldiers were stopped in the streets with such requests). Certain units were said to have been stoned. Deserters testify to the bold efforts made by civilians to hide them to give them food and clothes, and to bring them into the American lines. That so many units continue to fight, and to fight well, is surprising. But there is evidence that some at least have no overall picture of the situation and fight on in ignorance of the hopelessness of their position. In other cases genuine fanaticism for the Nazi cause preserves morale, whilst the habit of obedience to officers and N.C.O.'s, and the presence of S.S. units, ready to shoot down would-be capitulators, may account in general for the apparently blind pertinacity of the German forces.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

From Czechoslovak sources in London more detailed reports are available of the draft programme of the new Government at Košice. The main lines of foreign policy—the close alliance with U.S.S.R. and collaboration with neighbouring Slav States—have been indicated in Summaries Nos. 287 and 288; the plans for the reconstruction of the Czechoslovak Army, and for Czech-Slovak relations in Summary No. 288; and land reform in Summary No. 286.

The liberation of Bohemia and Moravia is to be followed by the establishment of a Provisional National Assembly based on national committees like those already formed in the wake of the Red Army advance. The President, Dr. Beneš, will then appoint a new Government in which the national resistance movements, both at home and abroad, will have proportionate representation. The main task of these provisional bodies will be to organise as rapidly as possible a general election, for the purpose of setting-up a fully constitutional National Assembly and Government.

The draft programme presents in unequivocal terms the Government's attitude towards the German and Hungarian minorities. Czechoslovak citizenship is to be confirmed only to those who were anti-Nazi and anti-Fascist and fought for the Republic before Munich, and who were persecuted for their faithfulness after the occupation or who maintained the struggle in exile. All other members of these minorities will have their citizenship cancelled; they may again opt for Czechoslovakia, but condemned traitors will be exiled if not sentenced to capital punishment.

A National Court is to try persons accused of high treason; these include Hacha and members of the Beran Government agreeing to the signing of the "Berlin Pact," the Protectorate Governments from the 16th March, 1939, Tiso and the Slovak Governments from the 14th March, 1939, and members of the Slovak Parliament. Included in the general ban against Fascist organisations are the Agrarian Party and its branches, and parties which linked up with the Slovak Hlinka Party in 1938.

The question of the future of Carpatho-Ukraine, which has no representative in the present Czechoslovak Government, is to be solved "in accordance with the democratically expressed will of the Carpathian and Ukrainian people and in complete friendship with U.S.S.R."

The document embodying the draft programme was signed by the Communist Party, the Social Democratic Labour Party, the Social National Party, the People's (Catholic) Party and the Slovak National Council.

Practically the whole of Slovakia has now been liberated by the Red Army's operations in the Vah valley. On the 10th April, forces advancing from the lower plains occupied the town of Trenčín, while mountain fighting under very difficult conditions brought the Russian advance westwards as far as Svatý Martin and Vrútky in the upper Vah. The campaign across the lower Morava proceeds with the occupation of Skalica on the 12th April and Hodonín the following day; the important rail centre of Breclav was taken on the 16th April, thus constituting a serious threat to Brno, the capital of Moravia. A new military element is the approach of the American armies to within a few miles of the Bohemian frontier at the western end of the Ore Mountains.

POLAND.

In the absence of any announcement as to the whereabouts of the delegates who were reported in the last Summary as having gone to meet General Ivanov on the 27th March, rumours have been current that they are in Moscow; and that direct conversations have been proceeding between them and Soviet representatives. It has even been suggested that agreement on the forming of a new Provisional Government is on the way to being reached; and that, though contrary to the Yalta decisions, such an agreement might conceivably be made to fit in with them. There is no confirmation of any sort for any of these speculations. It is, however, stated on good authority that M. Witos, twice Prime Minister of Poland and veteran leader of the Peasant Party, has been drawn into the conversations which, it is supposed, are still being carried on.

M. Mikolajczyk, who has for some time been accused by the Lublin press and radio of being opposed to the Yalta agreement, issued the following important statement on the 14th April:—

> "I consider close and lasting friendship with Russia is the keystone of future Polish policy within the wider friendship of the United Nations.
>
> "To remove all doubt as to my attitude, I declare that I accept the Crimea decision in regard to the future of Poland, its sovereign independent position and the formation of a Provisional Government representative of national unity.
>
> "I support the decision arrived at in the Crimea, that a conference of leading Polish personalities be called with a view to constituting a Government of National Unity as widely and fairly representative of the Polish people as possible, and one which will command recognition by the three major Powers."

A number of questions about Polish affairs, asked in the House of Commons on the 11th April, were answered by the Secretary of State's announcement that the Prime Minister would make a statement this week, probably on Thursday. In reply to another question, Mr. Eden stated that when a "broadly representative new Provisional Government of National Unity" had been set up, and when "His Majesty's Government are represented in Poland, they will be in a better position to form a final opinion as to what parties should be entitled to take part in elections, which clearly could not take place for some considerable time after the formation of the new Government. The scanty information at present available to His Majesty's Government about conditions in Poland indicates, as one would expect, that as a result of the long German occupation and the recent operations in Poland, party political warfare is not yet working in a normal manner. It may also clearly be that before elections were held new parties might emerge."

The signing of a treaty between the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia has been given much publicity in the press and radio broadcasts in Poland, and has been followed by an agitation in favour of a similar alliance between Poland and the U.S.S.R. This has been advocated notably at workers' meetings in Warsaw, Lodz, Cracow and other towns, as well as on the radio and in the press. Glos Ludu is quoted as saying, in an editorial, "The tragic experience of September 1939 showed that Poland, being isolated and having no support from Slav people, proved helpless against the German Fascist invaders. After this war we want to build a stronger Poland. This is a great and important task, and we can only carry it out when we are sure of our own security. We can achieve this by concluding a pact of friendship with the Soviet Union."

SOVIET UNION.

Fighting for the annihilation of the remaining German troops in the Samland Peninsula west of Königsberg has continued, and appears to be nearly at an end. The air arm of the Baltic Fleet has been bombing German shipping at the escape port of Pillau: 5 destroyers, 13 transports, 2 tankers, 27 supply ships and numerous smaller vessels were claimed as destroyed; and 1 cruiser, 2 destroyers and many other vessels as damaged. There is as yet no confirmation from the Soviet side of German reports that Marshal Zhukov has begun an offensive across the Oder opposite Berlin. In Slovakia Hodonin and other towns on the Morava have been captured, as well as a triangle to the east of Vienna between the Morava and the Danube. Vienna itself fell on the 13th April, a victory celebrated in Moscow with 24 salvoes from 324 guns. Formations and units which distinguished themselves in its capture are to be decorated and named after the city. 130,000 prisoners were taken in the fighting for Vienna and its approaches between the 16th March and the 13th April. Marshal Tolbukhin's troops have swept on, and on the 15th April took St. Pölten, over 30 miles west of the Austrian capital. To the south further progress has been made; the Red Army is now within 30 miles of Graz.

In a tersely worded article in Pravda on the 14th April M. Alexandrov, writing with all the weight of the head of the Propaganda Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, attacked Ilya Ehrenburg for the recent series of articles in which he (and, indeed, other journalists who were not attacked by name) had suggested that the Germans were opening the gates to the western Allies. On the contrary, said M. Alexandrov, "the Hitlerites are trying by their actions to arouse mistrust in the camp of the United Nations, to cause dissension among the Allies . . . . and to gain with the help of a provocational military and political trick that which they failed to gain by force of arms." He pointed out that the Germans were still continuing to sink Anglo-American ships, were until recently sending flying bombs against Britain, and were continuing to murder prisoners of the Allied armies. As well as making this amende honorable, M. Alexandrov attacked M. Ehrenburg for writing that nothing was now left of Germany but a colossal gang, and, in general, for presenting in all his articles a picture of Germany as a single entity. M. Alexandrov reaffirmed the Soviet view put forward consistently in the earlier years of the war that the Red Army had never set itself the aim of annihilating the German nation, and had never identified the population of Germany with the criminal Fascist ruling clique. In this connection he quoted Marshal Stalin's famous speech of February 1942: "Hitlers come and go, but the German people and the German State remain." This restatement of the old position is of great interest in view of the "Vansittartite" tone that had crept into Soviet propaganda during recent months (see Summary No. 281). Indeed, M. Ehrenburg has by no means stood alone in his denunciations of all things German. As recently as the 9th April, in a long article broadcast in Red Army Hour, M. Yovchuk, M. Alexandrov's immediate subordinate, categorically stated that the whole population of Germany was responsible for the crimes committed by the German-Fascist Army, and that Germans could not be separated into two categories.

Clearly there have been two schools of thought in high Soviet circles on "the German problem." Whether M. Alexandrov's statement indicates the triumph of his view remains to be seen. Now that victory is in sight it is possible that the vigorous views of M. Ehrenburg, useful enough for arousing the fighting spirit of the rank and file in the Red Army, may yield place to the older Marxist orthodoxy.

All reports agree that the news of the death of President Roosevelt was received with profound and sincere grief by all sections of the Soviet population. M. Molotov and many other high officials of the Soviet Government attended a memorial service at the American Embassy, all Government buildings hung out flags of mourning and the State Public Library in Leningrad has already opened a Roosevelt Memorial Exhibition. The Soviet press referred to the late President as a "pioneer of peace and security," and a great statesman "who realised that there could be no peace without collaboration with the U.S.S.R.," his rôle in securing the resumption of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and the United States being singled out as a major proof of his far-sighted policy. Marshal Stalin is reported to have given Mr. Harriman an assurance that his Government would support President Truman with "all our forces and all our will"; though President Roosevelt was dead his cause must live on. The fact that it was announced on the Moscow wireless on the 16th April that M. Molotov had accepted the special invitation of President Truman and Mr. Stettinius to head the Soviet Delegation to San Francisco may be taken as a first step towards implementation of Marshal Stalin's words. The official statement did not fail to enhance the importance of the acceptance by pointing out that M. Molotov's presence was required in Moscow for the forthcoming session of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R.

Two new appointments to the Soviet Delegation to San Francisco have just been announced—M. A. I. Lavrentiev, People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs of the R.S.F.S.R., formerly head of the Near Eastern Department of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and Minister in both Sofia and Bucharest, and M. V. V. Kuznetsov, chairman of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions.

The signing of the Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty on the 11th April (see under "Yugoslavia") was greeted enthusiastically in the Soviet press, Izvestiya pointing out that it would serve the vital interests of both peoples, which required the erection of a reliable bulwark against German aggression. Pravda singled out for praise Article III in which both parties solemnly declared that they would participate "in a spirit of the most sincere collaboration" in all international activities designed to ensure the peace and security of the nations. This important principle did not figure in the Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty of December 1943, and is indeed a new departure designed presumably to allay fears that the Soviet system of bilateral pacts might not fit in with the new world organisation. The Soviet press has recently been at pains to point out that there is no incompatibility between such pacts and a general security organisation in connexion with French hesitation over San Francisco. Much publicity has been given by Tass to reports of meetings throughout Poland welcoming the new Treaty as a sign of growing friendship among Slav peoples and a guarantee of peace in post-war Europe, and urging the conclusion of a Soviet-Polish Treaty on the same lines (see under "Poland").

Commenting on the seven months' trial of 23 persons accused of Pan-Turanianism, which recently ended in Istanbul, Pravda described the sentences as "remarkable for a leniency unprecedented in Turkish justice." It stated that the accused conducted propaganda advocating certain racial theories and fascism in Turkey and suggested an attack on the U.S.S.R. "with the aim of incorporating a part of its territory into Turkey." The sentence of the Istanbul court, according to Pravda, "has caused consternation and indignation among progressive Turkish political circles . . . . Turkish democratic circles consider the sentence a proof that the Pan-Turk anti-Soviet activities in Turkey in recent years will continue, since the authorities do not consider them reprehensible." (See also under "Turkey.")

The first April number of The War and the Working Class contained another article by M. Diakov on the political situation in India (see Summary No. 278). The general tone of the article was critical and unfriendly to the British authorities (though the information in itself is apparently accurate). M. Diakov stated that a number of signs point to an imminent crisis in Indian politics. After describing the unrepresentative nature of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, M. Diakov enumerated the many conflicts which have occurred with the Government regarding finance, representation at San Francisco, &c. Alleged extracts were given from the Phillips report to the effect that "the Indian soldier is fighting like a slave." M. Diakov concluded that only a narrow group of reactionaries in India still support the present colonial régime; Field-Marshal Lord Wavell's visit, he thought, might herald a British attempt to break the deadlock, while even the pro-Government press has admitted that the Cripps proposals do not go far enough.

The Russian Orthodox Church is coming to play a prominent rôle; Patriarch Alexei was received by Marshal Stalin and M. Molotov on the 11th April, and the visits of the Church delegations to the Balkans, recorded in last week's Summary, are receiving a good deal of publicity. This may be connected with a renewed tug-of-war between the Soviet Union and the Vatican. Attacks, mainly indirect, on Vatican policy, particularly in connexion with Soviet fears of a soft peace, have continued in a steady trickle during the last few weeks, and these were renewed in a message sent through his delegate by Patriarch Alexei to the Bulgarian Exarch. The Patriarch stressed the need for unity and a peaceful alliance between the Orthodox Churches in view of the "increasing aspirations of Catholicism as represented by the Vatican, which seeks to dominate religion and the Lord's heritage, and to enforce its views," views which, in fact, had their source not in the gospel, but in sympathy for fascism. The same point was taken up strongly by Metropolitan Benjamin, Exarch of the Moscow Patriarchate in North America, in a recent report issued on his return from the U.S.S.R., when he spoke at length of the hostile anti-Soviet stand taken up by the Catholic Church.

The report of the Extraordinary State Commission on Atrocities in the Latvian S.S.R. was issued on the 9th April. This report, constructed on the usual lines, affirmed that over 250,000 civilians and 327,000 Soviet prisoners of war had been massacred, and that 175,000 Latvian citizens had been carried off to forced labour in Germany.

A recent broadcast entitled "Sidelights on Life in the U.S.S.R." described the progress of the U.S.S.R. towards becoming a strong sea power. Great efforts are now being made to build new ports and to repair the damage inflicted by the Germans on Odessa. Work on similar lines has been carried out in other Russian ports and as a result a great many more ships will be accommodated during the current navigation season than last year. In this connexion it is interesting to note the report by Rear-Admiral Redkin, Deputy People's Commissar for the Shipbuilding Industry, on the reorganisation of Soviet merchant shipping. Designs for new types of vessels for the merchant fleet, including new types of craft for carrying timber and cargo and passenger vessels, have been prepared; these vessels are being equipped with improved boilers, engines are being switched over to turbines and all loading and unloading equipment is being electrified. The Soviet Pacific Fleet has come into the limelight of Soviet news by the recent decree decorating officers and N.C.Os. of the Red Navy and personnel of the fishing industry engaged in Pacific waters. The Petropavlovsk (Kaamchatka) shipbuilding yards and their workers figured prominently in these awards.

SCANDINAVIA.

There have been startling developments in the Finnish internal political situation. The Democratic League and the Social Democratic Party have issued a manifesto together with the Agrarian Party on the programme of future collaboration of these three groups. There is little in this programme to which other political parties in present day Finland would not subscribe, and the most interesting point about it is really that it should have been issued jointly by the three largest groups in the Diet.

Though not entirely unexpected, the agreement between the two Left-wing parties is certainly surprising, and that the Agrarian Party should have associated itself with the declaration can only be described as astonishing. It could hardly be expected that a party which had leading men like the pro-German Horelli and Reinikka and which, owing to its past policy, has suffered a heavy set-back in the elections, would be the first of the Right-wing parties ready to collaborate. It may, however, be as well not to over-estimate the significance of this sudden coalition. It remains to be seen whether the three groups were really inspired by a sincere desire to collaborate with the other for the good of the country, or whether one of them, the Democratic League being perhaps the most likely one, was in fact hoping to use the coalition to further its own ends. Should the first assumption prove correct, a united policy would have the backing of 148 out of 200 votes in the Diet.

Meanwhile the first news about the new Finnish Government has been received. There are only three new names. M. Paasikivi, as was expected, remains Prime Minister with M. Enckell as Foreign Minister. The Democratic League receives the important positions of Deputy Foreign Minister, Minister of the Interior, Minister of Defence, Minister of Education, Deputy Minister of Communications and Deputy Minister of Social Affairs, while the Social Democrats will hold the offices of Minister of Communications, Minister of Social Affairs, Deputy Minister of Finance and Deputy Minister of Supplies. M. Vuori; who has shown rather Leftist sympathies, will be Minister of Communications. The Agrarian Party will provide both the Minister and the Deputy Minister of Agriculture as well as the Ministers of Justice and of Supplies. The Swedish Party is going to fill the post of Minister of Trade and Industry, while the Progressives will provide the Minister of Finance. It will be seen that the new coalition will dominate the Government entirely, provided always that the three groups will collaborate harmoniously. The Democratic League holds practically all the aces.

The death of President Roosevelt overshadowed all other news in the Swedish and Finnish press. Both countries were convinced that it would not affect Allied collaboration because, thanks to Mr. Roosevelt, the ties had become too strong to be broken. Finland deplored the passing of a man well known to be one of the few great statesmen who felt sympathy towards her and wished to aid her. Memorial services were held both in Stockholm and Helsinki. In the Swedish capital King Gustaf was represented by a member of his entourage, Colonel Count von Stedingk, and several members of the Royal family attended, while in Helsinki Field-Marshal Mannerheim himself as well as the Prime Minister, other ministers, Deputies and many prominent men were present at the service.

Some details regarding the possible evacuation of the population of Copenhagen have become known. It is said that about 900,000 people would be affected, approximately 93,000 remaining in the city excluding members of the fire services, A.R.P. Wardens, &c. It is not clear, however, whether these arrangements take into account the 231,700 German refugees who have recently arrived in the capital. The situation is obviously becoming increasingly serious and it is reported that the Germans will shortly confiscate all hospitals, hotels, nursing homes, assembly halls, barracks and similar accommodation.

In Sweden Bishop Aulen, who in February advocated Swedish military aid to Norway, has again emphasised that it was Sweden's obvious duty to intervene "if terror and banditry threatened in Norway." At the same time he expressed the hope that fear of Swedish intervention might act as a break on the occupying Power and possibly even ease capitulation.

A report from Sweden states that the German naval authorities in Norway have closed new sea areas near Sweden, apparently because four German patrol boats have recently fled to that country. There are also said to be some indications that the victualling of German troops has recently deteriorated, as contingents waiting for shipment to Germany have been seen begging for bread and other food-stuffs. No explanation has been given for the sudden release by the Germans of fifty-five political prisoners from Grini, among them MM. Tschudi and Yngvar Åbye, the two "grand old men" of that concentration camp.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Peuple, the leading Belgian Socialist daily, has devoted an article to the question of King Leopold. Since liberation, said the paper, the Parties and the Press had by tacit agreement refrained from discussing the King. There was a general feeling that it would not be discreet to do so while he was a captive and also that it would be dangerous to raise the matter prematurely. However, there had of late been signs that a long-prepared propaganda campaign was to be launched. Public demonstrations had taken place. Nothing, said the Peuple, could be more ill-advised than the conduct of those responsible for such happenings. They might well provoke a passionate and spontaneous reaction. It must not be imagined that the Socialists were indifferent because they had been silent. When the time came they and many other Belgians would demand that a decision be taken after due deliberation. But "the question of the King—that is to say, the brief and lucid explanation which Belgium's former leaders, as well as her King, owe the country—cannot be evaded or settled by the methods of propaganda."

The news of Mr. Roosevelt's death was received with sorrow by the peoples of the Low Countries. Innumerable tributes have been paid to the late President. Cardinal van Roey, for instance, said that the Belgians had deeply admired those qualities which had made him during his life "the greatest statesman in the world" and would never forget their country's debt to him.

The Grand Duchess of Luxemburg has returned to her country and has received a loyal and enthusiastic welcome from her subjects. Before her departure she stated in a message to the people of Britain: "I go home strengthened and inspired by the contagious example of the virtue of the British character, and by the confidence that your ideals in respect of human rights and liberties will prevail in the establishment of a better world."

On the 12th Dr. van Kleffens broadcast to his countrymen on the subject of the San Francisco Conference. It was essential that an international organisation be created that would maintain security and peace. The Dutch delegation would put forward the views of the Dutch, but they had too much sober Dutch common sense to advocate any fantastic, impracticable schemes; at the same time they were keenly aware of the most urgent needs of the community of peace-loving peoples. The Dutch delegation knew, too, that rights and duties went together, and the Netherlands, while claiming their rights, would declare their readiness to perform their international duties.

Dr. van Kleffens subsequently declared at a Press conference in Ottawa that, when the liberation of the Netherlands had been completed, the new Dutch Government might demand the annexation of a strip of German territory, either in perpetuity, or for a term of years, to compensate for the temporary reduction in the area of Dutch agricultural land caused by flooding. Dr. Gerbrandy, speaking at a Press conference at Eindhoven, alluded to the looting of the Netherlands and stated that a commission had been set up to ascertain the ways in which reparation in kind could be made. Dr. Gerbrandy also referred to the recent (see Summary No. 288) Ministerial appointments and explained that a seat in the Cabinet had been offered to M. Oldenbroek, Secretary of the International Transport Workers' Federation, who, however, had declined it because of his other commitments. The Government, continued Dr. Gerbrandy, would come to the Netherlands as soon as the liberated parts of the country had ceased to be operational areas.

The liberation of the Northern and Eastern Netherlands has almost been completed, but the Germans continue to hold out in the densely-populated Western area.

FRANCE.

President Roosevelt's death was described by the Paris wireless as having plunged French political circles into sorrowful consternation. General de Gaulle sent messages of condolence to the new President and to Mrs. Roosevelt and ordered all flags to be flown half-mast throughout France and the French Empire. The 14th and 15th April were observed as days of national mourning and General de Gaulle and all the Ministers present in Paris, including M. Bidault, attended a special service at Notre Dame. The French newspapers were specially authorised to go to press full size so that they might comment on this great world event. Press and wireless comment contained heartfelt tributes on the late President and revealed a deep sense of loss and some concern as to the consequences of his death for the future of the world.

It was announced by Supreme Headquarters on the 13th April that the French Army of the Alps had, in conjunction with General Clark's offensive on the Po, launched an attack in Savoy on the German forces which hold the Franco-Italian frontier and had already cleared the Maurienne Area. On the 14th an Allied offensive against the German forces still holding the "Gironde pocket" began at dawn by heavy artillery and aircraft bombardment, in which French forces participated, while French warships joined in the operations on the following day. The land forces, under the command of General de Larminat and assisted by General Leclerc's tanks entered Royan late on the 15th; but the Germans are still putting up a stubborn resistance.

In the meantime the offensive of the French First Army continues into Württemberg. It was announced on the 14th that Major William Bullitt, the former United States Ambassador, who at present holds a commission in the French Army, had been appointed Military Governor of Baden-Baden by General de Lattre de Tassigny.

Mr. Duff Cooper has returned to Paris after having paid a visit to the provinces. In Lyons he was received by the municipality and an honorary degree was conferred on him by the university.

The Australian Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Forde, and the Australian Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Evatt, who are to attend the San Francisco Conference, in the course of their visit to France were received by M. Bidault and General de Gaulle. A Quai d'Orsay communiqué broadcast on the 16th attached much importance to the conferences held between Messrs. Bidault and Evatt, recalled Mr. Evatt's statement to the Australian Parliament in 1943 on the United Nations' debt to the Free French Forces in New Caledonia and emphasised the two Powers' solidarity of interests in the Pacific, their identity of views on the utility of regional agreements such as the Canberra Treaty, their resolve to co-ordinate their action in the interest of the native populations without prejudice to the sovereignty of Metropolitan France and their readiness to consider themselves as "trustees" in mandated territories and report to a body similar to the former Mandates Commission of the League of Nations.

The press has recently stated that there is considerable division of opinion in the Government about the desirability of holding the local elections on the dates announced. Certain Ministers, including the Minister of the Interior, are stated to favour postponing the elections in view of the considerable numbers of prisoners now returning. General de Gaulle is, however, stated to be insistent that the elections should take place as announced, and it appears, therefore, that the municipal elections will be held on the 29th April.

The announcement on the 4th April by the A.F.P. of the arrest in Paris of seventeen members of the "Parti Populaire Français" has drawn attention to a revival of activity on the part of the Doriotists, who are stated to have threatened to reappear in the guise of a new political party, the "Parti Français d'Action Socialiste," under Jean Amedéo, who took over the leadership of the remnants of the P.P.F. after Doriot's death in Germany (see Summary No. 282). Amadéo was among those arrested. Vague references to further (apparently unrelated) arrests have since appeared in the press and the reports have been elaborately embroidered by the Left and Resistance newspapers to further their own ends by exploiting the Fifth Column bogy. There would appear to be no serious conspiracy, and on the 16th April the Minister of the Interior, reassuring a delegation of the Consultative Assembly's Commissions of the Interior and of Justice, declared that to his knowledge there was no plot against the security of the State, but that enemy agents, in liaison with anti-national groups such as Darnand's Militia, the P.P.F. and the Francistes, were trying to provoke disorders, whilst very rarely having recourse to outrages.

The new wage rates decided on by the Government were outlined by M. Parodi at a press conference on the 7th April. They amount to a 30 to 35 per cent. increase—as opposed to the C.G.T. demands for an increase of 60 to 70 per cent.—and they lesson the gap between men's and women's wages from 20 to 10 per cent., while where equal production can justifiably be claimed the rates are now to be the same. The C.G.T. has declared these rates to be unacceptable, and has also protested strongly against the Government decision to remove the bread subsidy and thus increase the price of bread to over 7 francs per kg. as from the 15th April. The C.G.T. Administrative Committee has been called to consider the position on the 17th. M. Parodi, however, declared that any further wage increases would lead to a parallel rise in prices, and that the Government were resolved to maintain the revised wages at this level until production had risen sufficiently to absorb the further increase.

M. Mendès-France's resignation (see last Summary) met with expressions of regret on the Left. He declared in an interview with the Press that his policy had led to vigorous opposition, particularly from the Bank of France. He added, however, that he differed from M. Pleven only on questions of method, and he welcomed the concentration of the two Ministries of Finance and National Economy under one head, since he himself had found his powers insufficient on the financial side. M. Pleven made his first statement of policy after taking over from M. Mendès-France on the 7th April. The emphasis he laid on the need for improving the supply position and the uselessness of carrying through measures of nationalisation without solving the fundamental problem of production has clearly reassured business circles in France, whose fears had already been lessened by the Minister's budget speech with its rejection of deflationary plans for the exchange of banknotes and its appeal to voluntary saving.

M. Tillon, the Minister for Air, stated on the 8th April, at the Congress of French Aviation (see last Summary) that the Government had decided to nationalise the Gnome-et-Rhône aeroplane engine works, as a result of the company's attitude under the occupation and in order to increase production. The big civil aviation companies, such as Air-France, are also to be nationalised. Speaking at Algiers on the 12th April, M. Tillon said that France was now in a position to manufacture 5-ton seaplanes, and to create a great aluminium industry.

SWITZERLAND.

It is announced that the Swiss Minister to Germany has left Berlin with part of the Legation staff and established himself at Tegernsee in southern Bavaria.

Plans have been made for a new military call-up to man Switzerland's north-eastern frontiers during the final phase of the war, and to deal with the anticipated stream of refugees.

SPAIN.

Whatever posterity may say of General Franco, it will not be able to accuse him of supine inaction as the great crisis of his régime was gathering. Compared with the masterly inactivity he has shown on occasions in the past when danger threatened and everyone expected fireworks from the Caudillo, he is being positively dynamic—or at the very least going through the motions. The direction in which Spanish policy towards Japan was veering was indicated in Summary No. 287; the next step has since been taken, and the ignoring by the Tokyo Government of the Spanish note of protest at Japanese treatment of Spanish nationals and property in the Philippines has led to the expected rupture of diplomatic relations. The press has played up with noble unanimity, and no one in Spain who reads a newspaper can escape the conclusion that the Japanese, who in 1941 were hailed in all their "strength and glory," are now very bad men.

This indignation with Japan, which makes, of course, a nice pretext for sidling up to the Allies, is in the background of the press celebration of the six-year-old treaty of friendship and non-aggression between Spain and Portugal. Quite a lot of fulsome plaster has been slapped over the always threatening cracks of the Iberian bloc. The newspapers of Madrid were very pleased with the example of high-minded loyalty which the two Peninsular nations offered to the world community, and they laid special emphasis on the "noble, disinterested generosity" with which both countries had "received with open arms the flotsam and jetsam of the world war" (Alcázar 21st March). It was pointed out that, material absence from the battlefield did not preclude a "close, passionate, moral presence," and the conclusion was drawn that it would be to the eternal glory of Spain and Portugal that by giving their service of "pure ideas" they had been of even greater help to the belligerents (the winners, of course) than by "involving themselves in practical designs." Naturally, the Iberian partners would not dream of sending in a bill for their Christian attitude during the war, but they begged, nay demanded, that the world should acknowledge that they had been "belligerents in the alleviation of misery, grief and human sorrow." One must be a long way from the reality of war to produce this sort of ragamodoglio.

But besides offering gestures of solidarity with the victorious Allies on the diplomatic front, Franco is making a show of liberalising the domestic workings of his régime. The press has announced that the political Junta has approved a bill dealing with the rights of the Spanish people and has agreed to refer it to the National Council. It will then be passed to the Cortes and will probably become law in two or three weeks. From what one can gather at the moment the Bill defines the rights and duties of Spanish citizens; the first include guarantees against arbitrary arrest and detention, search of domicile without warrant and censorship of correspondence. Happily for Franco—who knows his countrymen—there is in Spain a very wide gap between paper promises and practical performance. Otherwise the realisation of this modest, civilised programme would destroy the very basis of his régime, which is the principle that no Spaniard may think, say or do anything of which the Caudillo, and particularly all his "caudillitos" may disapprove.

It is presumably in this mood of benign, worldly-wise and always cautious tolerance that Franco has decided to invite back to Spain all those exiles who fled from the Nationalist vengeance—or, as he would say, justice. Consular officials abroad, it is stated in Madrid, have been authorised to accept applications to return to Spain from exiles against whom there is no criminal charge. This gesture of pseudo-appeasement will probably be unproductive; the Republicans in exile are no more likely to accept Franco's invitation to walk in than are the Monarchists now serving the régime to respond to Don Juan's call to them to walk out.

ITALY.

A general attack, which may presage the end of the war in Italy, has begun and good progress has been made on either flank. But the nature of the country is against any spectacular advance, on the right flank a network of canals and waterways and on the left flank the Apennines, which come right down to the sea as far as Genoa. General Viettinghoff-Scheel has taken over command of the German forces in Italy in succession to Marshal Kesselring. He is said to be a specialist on defence and tank warfare and he is not known to have any particular party connections.

Feeling regarding the future frontier line between Italy and Yugoslavia, but particularly the fate of Trieste, seems to be increasing daily in both countries. In Italy it threatens to become an issue of national importance, and interest in this question is not confined to Venezia Giulia and the North but has become a matter of equal concern in the Central and Southern Regions. The Italian Press, although maintaining the "italianità" of Trieste and other areas in dispute, is, in general, doing its best to calm the rising temperature. Signor Togliatti, the leader of the Communist Party, has, in his party paper Unità, reminded Italians that their country's aggression against Yugoslavia has to be taken into account and that some concessions will have to be made. But Signor Togliatti is between the devil and the deep sea, and in his report to the Second National Council of the Italian Communist Party, he was not so definite regarding the concessions Italy would have to make and he admitted that Trieste was a problem which would have to be solved by friendly agreement. Other party papers stress the necessity of approaching the question in a friendly and not a nationalistic spirit. Italia Nuova, the Italian Democrat Party paper, points out that, although Fascist Italy has lost the war, Italians have been fighting the common enemy with the Yugoslavs for the last two years and that Yugoslavia might take this into account in her attitude to Italy. Risorgimento Liberale publishes an Order of the Day passed by the executive of the Italian Liberal Party on the question of Trieste, founded on a report received from the Trieste branch of the party. This Order of the Day, although it draws attention to the unhappy lot of the people of Venezia Giulia under German, Slovene and Croat troops, recalls the Capital Conference of Oppressed Nationalities in Rome in 1918 in the hopes that the collaboration, then decided on, will continue and that the new Yugoslavia will approach the frontier question in a friendly and non-nationalistic spirit. The Yugoslav Press, on the other hand, appears to have no wish to attempt a solution of the problem in a peaceable way, but seems bent on inflaming public opinion against Italy in every possible way. The throwing of a bomb in the neighbourhood of the Yugoslav Partisan Headquarters in Rome has also been used to work up the feelings of the Yugoslav public. Who threw the bomb and for what purpose is not known, and the Italian Government has naturally disclaimed all responsibility. The bomb was apparently so small that all the damage it did was to blacken part of the wall in a convent garden near which it fell. This garden was near the Yugoslav Partisan Headquarters.

It will be remembered that Signor Azzolini, the Governor of the Bank of Italy, was tried and sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment, towards the end of last year, for handing over to the Germans the gold reserve of the Bank. There is, according to a Press report, great excitement in Rome on the finding of the Nazi hoard of gold in the Merkers Salt Mines. It is apparently hoped that a proportion of this gold is the Italian gold handed over to the Germans by Signor Azzolini.

The neo-Fascists, in continuation of their intensified propaganda drive referred to in last week's Summary, have now directed their fire towards the problem of Trieste—a question which provides them with ample opportunities for exploiting the disagreement already existing on this subject between the Left Wing Parties and the more nationalistically inclined groups in Liberated Italy. Popular demonstrations for Trieste appear to have been organised in Milan. Several provocative statements have been put out over the Fascist-controlled radio, representing that Venezia Giulia has already been virtually sold to Yugoslavia at Russia's command, and declaring that the Fascists are the sole champions of Italy's frontiers. The incident of the hand-grenade thrown outside the headquarters of Tito's Military Mission in Rome was applauded as "the first symptom of revolt against the traitors of Rome."

There are conflicting reports regarding a German evacuation of the Como and Varese region. Four German divisions are said to have left Italy for Germany at the end of March, but Fascist troops trained and equipped in Germany appear to have arrived on the Italian front. In Milan, a state of siege is said to have been declared, according to Swiss reports, owing to signs of preparation for a general strike.

The Swiss press reports rumours that Mussolini is preparing a last ditch "redoubt" for himself and his followers in the Val Tellina on the Swiss border. Pavolini and Pini, the Minister of the Interior, are said to have inspected the region, and the Federal Commissioner of Como has been charged with freeing the district from partisans. According to another source attempts have been made by the Germans to induce the partisans to withdraw from this region on the understanding that all electric power stations and installations would be left intact and all Fascist units withdrawn if the partisans would allow the Germans to reorganise unmolested in the Val Tellina region. The partisans have refused.

THE VATICAN.

The Osservatore Romano of the 13th April devoted the whole of its front page to the death of President Roosevelt, praising the friendly relations he maintained with the Holy See and "his democratic Christian outlook, an outlook which is one of the profoundest reasons why the whole world to-day bows in homage before the figure of the great man."

For Russian attacks on the Vatican see under "Soviet Union."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Elections have, after all, not been held for the representation of Budapest and other "newly liberated" districts in the Provisional Assembly. The seats have been allocated by the National Committee of Budapest between the five parties forming the "Independence Front." The Communists and Social Democrats receive 30 each, the Smallholders 25, the National Peasants and Citizens' Democratic Party 10 each. Professors Szekfü and Szentgyörgyi and Count M. Károlyi have been allotted seats in a personal capacity. Excluding these three men, the representation in the Assembly to-day is: Communists 98, Social Democrats 65, Smallholders 78, National Peasants 25, Democrats 19. The seats for Transdanubia remain to be filled.

The Vatican Radio now reports that Cardinal Archbishop Serédi died of heart failure on the 29th March. Other sources had stated that he was killed in the ruins of the Basilica during an air raid on Esztergrgom.

Conditions in Budapest appear to be improving gradually, and almost all essentials can now be bought in the shops (which are reopening rapidly), but at very high prices, which are, however, falling. Two of the old bridges are also standing. There have as yet been no serious epidemics. But there is a desperate shortage of medical supplies and apparatus, and if the coming harvest is not successful (and much militates against it: disorganisation, lack of implements and even of seed, as well as of animals) the autumn and winter may prove very difficult indeed.

The partitioning of the estates under the Land Reform Act is now practically complete. Among the objects affected are lands belonging to British subjects, and His Majesty's Representative has protested against this violation of the Armistice terms.

Hungarians conscripted for service by the Germans are still from time to time reported among the prisoners taken on the Western Front. Many of them are boys hardly in their teens.

Roumania.

It appears that the King has under protest signed the decree purporting to alter the Constitution of 1923 in respect of the confiscation of land. In doing so, he is reported to have remarked that the Constitution still gave the dispossessed landlords a right to compensation, and that they could take proceedings in the courts. Two hours later, the Minister of Justice, Patrașcanus issued a decree annulling this provision. The King is still holding out over the decree introducing the death penalty. There are rumours that he may demand the resignation of the Prime Minister. For some time past there have been reports that the position of the Government was not as secure as the fact of its backing by the Soviet Government led people to suppose.

Proposals are on foot for the formation of a new party under the Presidency of the Prime Minister. This is to include dissidents from the older parties. It is to be known as the "National and Socialist Union of Roumania." This will give Dr. Grozea the backing which every politician needs. It is quite in line with established practice.

The refusal of M. Molotov to accede to the demand of the United States for consultations in accordance with the Yalta decisions on the subject of the imposition of a minority government in Roumania, has failed to satisfy the United States Government, which has repeated its demand, with an expression of the hope that the Soviet Government will not persist in its refusal.

Yugoslavia.

The military front has begun to move rapidly. Partisan forces have pressed rapidly westward across southern Croatia to occupy Senj, on the coast, and Ogulin, on the Fiume-Zagreb railway. The enemy are retreating northwards down the Bosna-river, the Partisans have over-run north-east Bosnia, and at last the German front in Srem is being withdrawn and is now west of Osijek. In the Gorizia district the Partisans are surviving with difficulty. The R.A.F. has given strong and active support to all these operations; but the Yugoslavs' communiqués only mention their own Air Force.

A Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty of Alliance was signed on the 11th April at Moscow. It is the second exception, after the Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty, to the principle of no alliances during the war between one of the greater Allies and one of the lesser European States. Article 1 binds the two States to continue the present war against Germany to final victory. Article 2 binds either State after the war to assist the other against German aggression and against any other State in any way assisting Germany. Article 3 provides that both States shall co-operate in international efforts to achieve peace and security. Article 4 forbids either State to participate in any coalition directed against the other. Article 5 provides for economic and cultural co-operation. The treaty is for 20 years and thereafter for periods of 5 years, unless denounced one year before the expiry of one of these terms.

The Treaty was hailed with enthusiasm by Radio Belgrade. Hebrang, Minister of Industry, addressing a mass demonstration on the subject, is reported to have said: "Now all our enemies must think twice about how to deal with Yugoslavia. Anybody who attempts to snatch our lands from us will meet with violent resistance. Nobody will ever again be able with impunity to trifle with Yugoslavia's fate." Shubashitch, speaking in Moscow, is reported to have said: "Now the rock-like anti-Fascist coalition of the freedom-loving peoples of Central Europe and the Balkans has been formally set up."

Changes in the central Government have been announced. Tito has selected a War Cabinet from amongst the 28 Ministers. It consists of himself, Kardelj and Grol (Vice-Premiers), Zechevitch (Interior), Zhujovitch (Finance), Kosanovitch (Information) and Hebrang (Industry). A Legislative Council has also been set up, consisting of Kardelj (as Minister for the Constituent Assembly, Chairman), Frol (Justice) and the six Ministers for the federated regions of Yugoslavia (four of whom are Communist party members). Its functions are important and include the initial and final drafting of legislative measures, the binding interpretation of all laws, and the issuing of instructions on behalf of the Cabinet to the federated regions. The position of Kardelj, as in charge of the preparations for the Constituent Assembly, a member of the War Cabinet and Chairman of the Legislative Council, is striking.

Much emphasis is being laid on Serbian nationalism. At the "first extraordinary session" of A.S.N.O.S. (see preceding Summary, p. 14) that body was converted into the "National Skupshtina of Serbia" and local liberation committees into subordinate skupshtine; the Skupshtina received additional members nominated by the Presidium; members of the Skupshtina took an oath to the people before the Presidium, to whom they are responsible. Mosha Pijade, Vice-President of Avnoj, made a speech, emphasising that "we, in our Serbia, know no authority at the head of the State administration except the Presidium of the National Skupshtina." [This seems to imply that the King or his Regents have no authority in Serbian affairs and to veil the fact of the power of the Yugoslav Government.] Serbians have also been assured by the press that the Vojvodina, the Sandjak and the Albanian-inhabited Kosovo-Metohija area are being included in Serbia, allegedly on the demand of delegates from those districts.

An ecclesiastical delegation from the Russian Patriarchate has visited Belgrade. The Bishop of Kirovograd made a speech, full of military ardour and hatred of the enemy, and pointedly expressed the hope that the Serb Orthodox Church would show the same lofty patriotism as does the Russian. Pop Zechevitch, Minister of the Interior, described the part played by his clerical colleagues in the National Liberation Movement. Nevertheless, it appears that late in January the Commissar for the Interior for Serbia demanded that the Holy Synod of the Serb Orthodox Church should forbid the mention of the King's name in church services; and that the Holy Synod replied that the hierarchy, having taken an oath to the King, could not discuss the matter, until the constitution should be altered by legitimate means.

The Belgrade press and radio maintained a barrage of abuse of Turkey, Greece, and especially Italy. The alleged throwing of a bomb at the building occupied by the Yugoslav military mission in Rome was made the occasion for demonstrations and articles claiming Venezia Giulia, including Trieste, for Yugoslavia. An official Italian communiqué stated that a very small bomb was in fact thrown into the garden of some nuns, in the neighbourhood of the Yugoslav building, which was undamaged. The suspicion has been expressed that the incident was the work of an agent provocateur. Authoritative Yugoslav claims to Venezia Giulia were contained in a broadcast address by Kardelj to Slovenes, claiming the whole Slovene-inhabited area [which in this context would also include Klagenfurt and its neighbourhood, in Austria] "together with certain de-nationalised towns"; and in an interview given by Tito to the Soviet military Red Star.

Greece.

When the Plastiras Government fell, the press of the extreme Left, which had ruthlessly criticised the Premier while he was in office, proceeded to abuse the Regent and the British for bringing about the Government's downfall. The Communist Rizospastis (8th April) accused the Regent of dismissing Plastiras "in the face of the expressed opinion of the whole democratic world and of the democratic parties" and of yielding to the violent threats of Monarchists and Fascists and to the demands of the British. Eleftheri Ellada (E.A.M.) said that the Regent had assisted a nefarious monarchist conspiracy, with His Majesty's Ambassador and General Scobie working behind the scenes. The Royalist press was glad that the "erring" Government had been dismissed, and reproached General Plastiras for having done nothing to hasten the plebiscite which the Royalists so earnestly desire. The Nationalist Ellinikon Aima, in which the extracts from the Plastiras letter (see last Summary) first appeared, assured its readers that it had published these only from a strong sense of duty; the resignation of General Plastiras was a moral issue, not a political one.

Admiral Voulgaris has made further appointments to his Cabinet, several of them men belonging to the Left Centre. According to Radio Athens, M. Varvaressos has agreed to join the Cabinet; he will probably be offered the post of Minister of Co-ordination, which will mean that he has general control of economic and financial affairs. The new Minister of the Interior has informed the Press that preparatory work on revision of the electoral lists has been begun; as soon as this work is finished, the Government will call upon the people to vote. Whether elections or a plebiscite will be the first to be held, he is unable at the moment to say.

Papers of the 10th April carried an announcement by the Committees of the Union of Popular Democracy (E.L.D.), and the Socialist Party of Greece (S.K.E.), both of which recently broke away from E.A.M., stating that the Parties had amalgamated and would be known temporarly as E.L.D.—Socialist Party of Greece. Professor Svolos will be president of the new Party, among whose adherents are reported to be MM. Askoutsis, Tsirimokos, and Stratis.

The death of President Roosevelt has profoundly shocked the Greek public. The Regent has gone into official mourning for three weeks, and a memorial service was held in Athens at which Admiral Voulgaris delivered an address. The Greeks, he said, mourned the loss of the President even more than did the other Allies, because they particularly needed a guardian of their national liberty. The interest and understanding that President Roosevelt had shewn for the Greek people in their hour of distress he would undoubtedly have shewn again at the Peace Conference.

Albania.

Enver Hoxha has at last brought himself to agree to the Allied military authorities controlling relief for a preliminary period, after which U.N.R.R.A. will be ready to deal direct with the Albanian authorities. Supplies will be handed for distribution to the Albanian military authorities, but United States and British advisers will ensure that full use is made of local and imported supplies. Enver Hoxha had hoped to have the control of supplies himself at once, and so to offset the discredit which the incompetence of his administration has already gained. He would doubtless also have been glad to construe the agreement as implying Allied recognition of his Government, but it has been made clear that no such recognition is entailed.

It has been agreed between Enver Hoxha and the Government in Rome that 10,000 Italians shall be repatriated as soon as transport is available, the remaining Italians in Albania—about 10,000 more—later on, and Italian experts in essential enterprises as soon as they can be replaced.

Enver Hoxha has asked that forty Albanians now in camps in Italy may be repatriated for trial in Albania as war criminals.

Bulgaria.

According to the Bulgarian Foreign Minister the elections will at any rate not take place before July. Antonyugov, the loquacious Communist Minister of the Interior, promises that under the new electoral law there will be a secret and free vote, on the basis of proportional representation, for everybody except proved "Fascists," and wide facilities for the opposition. The Agrarians, who are strongly opposed to early elections and to the Communist proposal to enfranchise boys and girls of 18, are fully conscious of the steady efforts now being made by their Communist partners to monopolise power. The Communists' insistence on a one-party electoral campaign and on electoral innovations which can but favour themselves indicate clearly enough that the Communists hope so to rig the elections as to obtain an overwhelming majority by so-called "democratic" procedure. It may be presumed that they would then formally abolish the Monarchy and set up the Republic at which the Fatherland Government has from the first declared that it aims. It may be that the headship of the State is being kept for George Dimitrov, the splendour of whose life in Moscow has been duly reported in Bulgaria and whose lightest word on any current matter is received —at any rate by the Communists—with awe. The Agrarians, though they far outnumber the Communists, have difficulty in standing up to them, because in the last resort the Communists have at least tacit Russian support. For example, the Communists recently staged such an insistent agitation against the Agrarian manager of the Pernik coal mines that a deputation of Cabinet Ministers who visited the mine decided to transfer him, although they found nothing against him. Again, the secretary of the General Trades Union, who is a Moscow-trained Bulgarian and enjoys great influence, is actively turning to political ends a Union which until the revolution had been chiefly concerned with working conditions. Another Communist manœuvre is to discourage home industries, so that the peasants may become dependent on the workers whom the Communists aspire to control. To this end the Communists try to persuade the peasants to give up weaving and shoe-making and to hand their raw materials over to factories. Recently the Young Agrarian League, meeting in some secrecy, elected a new permanent præsidium of exclusively Right-wing Agrarians and passed a resolution in favour of maintaining itself independent of other youth associations. This did not suit the Communists, one of whose main schemes it is to get hold of all the youth organisations and particularly the Young Agrarian League, which is the largest. The Communists published a violent attack on the Young Agrarian League, protesting against secret proceedings and alleging that they afforded cover for "Fascists" and for the followers of Dr. G. M. Dimitrov—who is now taboo—and were consequently detrimental to the unity of the Fatherland Front, to friendship with the Soviet Union and to the prosecution of the war. It is fairly certain that the majority of the Bulgarians have no wish for Communist domination, but it is doubtful whether, disarmed as they now are and with the Red Army in the background, the non-Communists can defeat the Communists' manœuvres, although there are rumours of the Tsveno Party co-operating with the Agrarians in this sense.

Sentences to death, life imprisonment and less severe penalties have been passed by the People's Court on quisling publicists, on officials and others charged with persecuting Jews and on police officers.

Turkey.

Reports of Red Army concentrations on the Bulgarian side of the Turco-Bulgarian frontier have perhaps been deliberately exaggerated in order to make the Turkish mind receptive to Russian proposals for a new régime of the Straits and a new treaty. Speculating on what these proposals are likely to be Yalçin opines that Russia wants neither to take Turkish territory nor to break the Anglo-Turkish alliance, and he declares that Turkey is ready to discuss the Straits in the spirit of Montreux and to guarantee friendship and non-aggression. Other commentators point out that modern Turkey cannot allow herself to fall within any sphere of influence. Sertel, a writer friendly to Russia, remarks that Turkey's object has been and is to belong to the Mediterranean system without incurring a clash with the Soviet Union. The Russian press and wireless has complained of the unprecedented leniency of the Turkish military court which has been trying twenty-three individuals for indulging in racialism and Pan-Turanian activities. It sentenced Zeki Velidi Toğan, one of the leaders, to ten years' imprisonment, four others to four or five years, and another five to shorter terms. Recalling that these people had proposed the annexation of Russian territory by Turkey, a Russian broadcast drew the conclusion that Pan-Turanian anti-Soviet activities would continue in Turkey. This all seems to be part of the Russian approach to fresh negotiations. Possibly the proposal to publish fuller reports of the debates both of the Popular Party and of the Grand National Assembly is designed to meet Soviet charges that democracy does not exist in Turkey.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

On the occasion of President Roosevelt's death, King Farouk sent messages of condolence to Mrs. Roosevelt and to President Truman. The Iraqi Court went into mourning for ten days, and the Regent has cancelled, at least temporarily, his visit to the United States. In Syria the Government went into mourning for three days, and the Chamber was adjourned after a tribute by Faris al Khury to the late President.

Before leaving for San Francisco the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs told the press that he had agreed with the other Arab delegations to examine jointly in the United States the proposals that each delegation would make to the conference. It is to be expected that the Arab representatives will be particularly concerned with the problems of regional arrangements for peace and security, and with regional representation on the Security Council and other bodies. Reports indicate that the Egyptians are hoping that existing bilateral treaties which, like the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936, give to a Great Power a privileged position in the territory of a small State will not be automatically incorporated in the plans of the future world organisation; and that they will closely scrutinise the effect on the Suez Canal of any projects for the protection of international waterways.

Speaking in the Chamber on the 9th April, the Syrian Premier enumerated three issues on which no agreement had yet been concluded with France. These were the army, on which he expressed hope of an early and satisfactory settlement, the establishment of diplomatic relations and the financial relationship between the two countries. On another outstanding issue the Prime Minister was able to report progress; the original and unacceptable draft of an educational convention had been withdrawn by the French, who had substituted a new text which might provide a basis of discussion. In conversation with His Majesty's Minister on the same day, Faris al Khury stated that agreement had been reached on the establishment of a joint committee to examine the new draft convention. If this resulted in an agreed text, it would be initialled and put aside until it could be incorporated in a general settlement. The Prime Minister also seemed ready to consider the acceptance of a French Military Mission, on the fulfilment of certain conditions which would include the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales. He hoped, however, that it would be possible to conclude agreements regulating the relations of Syria with Great Britain and the United States in much the same way as with France, and he concluded by observing that any agreements reached with France would have to be approved by the Chamber of Deputies.

It may therefore be said that there are indications of a détente in Franco-Syrian relations, but Jamil Mardam, who in the absence of the Prime Minister at San Francisco will have the primary responsibility on the Syrian side for the next stage of the conversations, spoke to Mr. Shone in less optimistic terms. His gloom, however, seems to have been occasioned in part by an unfounded report from Paris to the effect that the French Ambassador in London had approached His Majesty's Government with the suggestion that the British troops should be removed from the Levant States and the French forces there withdrawn from British command. There can be little doubt that any such change would be regarded in the two States with the utmost dismay.

The Lebanese Chamber voted unanimously on the 7th April for the ratification of the Arab Pact. There is said to be disappointment among the Palestinian Arabs over the discreet terminology of the appendix dealing with Palestine, and the exclusion of their representative from full membership of the League Council.

In conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador, the Iraqi Premier has affirmed that no political question divides the two Allies in Iraq. (Nevertheless suggestions of a desire for revision of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty have recently appeared in the Bagdad press). Hamdi Pachachi went on to discuss his country's need for the advice of British experts, particularly on irrigation, and also for Englishmen in the Administration. Sir Hugh Stonehewer Bird, while expressing his full sympathy with the Premier's wishes in this matter, reminded him that the end of hostilities in Europe would not at once ease the shortage of British man-power.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese people have been warned by their political and military leaders not to imagine that the death of President Roosevelt will mean any slackening in the American determination to prosecute the war. Admiral Suzuki, who in an interview on the 14th April with a Domei correspondent paid a tribute to the late President which has aroused much comment in Japan and abroad, went on to say that he did not expect any change to result in the American war effort against Japan, while Japanese determination to continue the war also remained the same. However, Iguchi, the spokesman of the Board of Information, said that the Americans had an opportunity to reconsider the reasons for which they were fighting. So did Kurusu, the Japanese special envoy to Washington in 1941. He spoke of "this disastrous war." Nomura, the regular ambassador at that time, said that he had foreseen in a dream the death of the President, but that this event would not affect the American war programme and that the Japanese must renew their determination to fight to a finish (Domei, 14th April). The Nippon Times (15th April) indulged in some wishful thinking, to the effect that the loss of President Roosevelt's skilled leadership would result in a deterioration in Anglo-American relations.

The disastrous nature of the war has been brought home to the Japanese by renewed heavy air raids on Tokyo; among other things the Meiji Shrine has been destroyed and Suzuki has had to apologise to the Emperor for this. The fires in part of the Yotsuya Ward got out of control and a number of civilians were saved only by being allowed to enter the Imperial Garden of Shinjuku (Domei, 16th April). The Japanese are putting out fantastic figures of American aircraft destroyed and claim to have a new type of anti-aircraft gun in action.

On the 11th April the Japanese Information Board announced that, on the recommendation of the Premier, Lieutenant-General Toji Yasui had been appointed Minister of State. The Asahi (13th April) said that as there were several representatives of the navy in the Cabinet, Suzuki decided to fill the remaining vacancy with a soldier and entrusted the selection to Anami, who chose Yasui. Yasui, the paper added, had played a big part in quelling the disturbances arising from the mutiny of the 26th February, 1936; he was chief of staff of the Martial Law Hedquarters at that time. He was later in charge of defences in North Manchuria; returning to Japan in 1941, he became in the following year head of the Imperial Rule Assistance Corps in Tokyo. Motoi Yukawa, Director of the Food Control Bureau, has been appointed Vice-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, and Masamichi Yamagiwa, Chief of the General Affairs Bureau of the Finance Ministry, has been appointed Vice-Minister of Finance. Prince Higashikuni has been made a Supreme War Councillor.

In Free China there has so far been no resumption of the negotiations between the Government and the Communists; indeed the attitude of both sides seems to be hardening. P. H. Chang, the spokesman of the Executive Yuan, when asked why foreign correspondents were not permitted to visit Yenan, replied that as normal political relationships between the Central Government and the Communist area were not restored, there was no regular civilian traffic between Yenan and other parts of Free China. To the query when normal relationships would be restored he replied "when Government orders are observed there" (Chungking radio, 12th April).

General Hurley, the United States Ambassador to China, on the 2nd April, told a Press conference in Washington that the United States Government could not grant a Chinese Communist request for arms and ammunition as this would be equivalent to recognising the Communists as belligerents. The Ambassador's statement was welcomed by the Kuomintang Press; the Shihshih Hsin Pao (4th April) saying that many, both Chinese and foreigners, sympathised with the Communists, but that no matter how much reason there was in some of their demands, nothing could be discussed so long as they held a part of the national territory by armed force. The Communist paper Hsin Hua Jih Pao (5th April) deplored the Ambassador's statement, and said that it might increase the possibility of schism and of civil war in China. However, the Communists have agreed that Tung Pi-wu shall be a member of the Chinese delegation to the San Francisco Conference; he will take as his assistants the editor-in-chief of the Hsin Hua Jih Pao and the private secretary of Chou En-lai.

The press in Chungking generally commended the denunciation by the U.S.S.R. of the Pact of Neutrality with Japan, although the Hsin Hua Jih Pao made no comment. A Chinese military spokesman refused to discuss the possibility of Soviet entry into war against Japan. The Chungking radio (6th April) in reporting this, said that it was felt in Chungking that, even without a declaration of war, China would henceforth receive more material aid from the U.S.S.R., it was also hoped that the Japanese would have to transfer some of their forces from central and southern China to Manchuria, thus lessening the menace to Free China. Shao Li-tze, Secretary-General of the People's Political Council and a former Ambassador in Moscow, said (8th April) that the U.S.S.R. might possibly declare war on Japan within a year. He urged the strengthening of Sino-Soviet relations, including a mutual understanding about certain minority problems, such as that of the Kazaks in Sinkiang. He suggested that T. V. Soong might soon visit Moscow. The Takung Pao (7th April) suggested that either T. V. Soong, Sun Fo, or Shao Li-tze himself should be sent to Moscow to express Chinese appreciation of the denunciation of the Pact, and to confer on Far Eastern matters. Other Chinese papers have also approved the idea of a special envoy to Moscow.

Domei on the 10th April said that, in Indo-China, King Sisavang Vong of Luang Prabang had formally proclaimed his independence of France. This followed similar proclamations by the Emperor of Annam and the King of Cambodia (see this Summary No. 284).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The American people were momentarily stunned by the sudden death of President Roosevelt on the 12th April. Hard things had been said of Mr. Roosevelt on many occasions by political opponents and sometimes by fellow Democrats, but everyone recognised the quality of greatness about him. His loss at so critical a time was regarded in America, as in Britain and throughout the Allied nations, as a tragedy for his country and for the world. His name will live among the greatest of American Presidents.

Mr. Roosevelt's successor for the remainder of the Presidential term—that is, until January 1949—is Mr. Harry S. Truman, aged 61, who after ten years' service in the United States Senate as a Democratic Senator from Missouri, was selected last summer, in preference to Mr. Henry Wallace or Mr. James F. Byrnes, as his Party's candidate for the Vice-Presidency and was elected with Mr. Roosevelt in November 1944. There is now no Vice-President, and the next in succession to the Presidency is the Secretary of State. The chairmanship of the Senate devolves on the President pro tempore of that body, who at the moment is Senator McKellar (Democrat, Tennessee), an elderly Right-wing member of the party. President Truman was popular in the Senate and may help in Executive dealings with the Legislature, with which the late President was sometimes at odds: this may well be important in relation to the ratification of any post-war arrangements which may be arrived at in San Francisco or at other international discussions. At the same time it is felt that the strongly-personal rule of the Roosevelt Administrations may be relaxed and the new President may rely more upon his former colleagues in the Legislative Branch when deciding upon his policies.

President Truman has already made a favourable impression by his firm handling of a difficult situation and by his modest bearing. He refused to postpone the San Francisco Conference, asked the Cabinet to remain at their posts meanwhile and called into consultation Mr. Byrnes, whose recent resignation from the office of War Mobilisation Director leaves him available as an adviser, whether in an official or unofficial capacity is not yet apparent. There is naturally much speculation about possible Cabinet changes, and it is suggested that an office may be found for Mr. Hugh Fulton, the New York lawyer who briefed Mr. Truman when he was chairman of the Senate Committee for Investigating the Defence Programme. Mr. Truman's relations with Labour are good and, although his voting record in the Senate shows that he followed President Roosevelt's policies closely in both the domestic and foreign fields, he managed to maintain friendly relations with other Southern Democrats, to whom indeed he owed his election to the Vice-Presidency last year.

It was at once made clear that, in the words of Mr. Stettinius on the 13th April, "there will be no change of purpose or break of continuity in the foreign policy of the United States Government." In his first appearance before a sympathetic Congress, on the 16th April, President Truman enlarged on this statement of the Secretary of State. "So that there can be no possible misunderstanding, both Germany and Japan can be certain, beyond any shadow of doubt, that America will continue the fight for freedom until no vestige of resistance remains . . . Our demand has been, and it remains, unconditional surrender . . . Nothing shall shake our determination to punish the war criminals, even though we must pursue them to the ends of the earth . . . The grand strategy of the United Nations war has been determined . . . we are now carrying out our part of that strategy under the able direction of Admiral Leahy, General Marshall, Admiral King, General Arnold, General Eisenhower, Admiral Nimitz and General MacArthur . . . I want the entire world to know that this direction must and will remain unhampered. . . "

Turning from the conduct of the war to the making of the peace, the President declared "Machinery for the just settlement of international differences must be found; without such machinery the entire world will have to remain an armed camp . . . . The responsibility of the great States is to serve and not dominate the peoples of the world . . . . I appeal to every American, regardless of party, race, creed or colour, to support our efforts to build a strong and lasting United Nations organisation." "To-day," President Truman went on, "America has become one of the most powerful forces for good on earth; we must keep it so . . . . we must now learn to live with other nations for our mutual good. We must learn to trade more with other nations, so that there may be, for our mutual advantage, increased production, increased employment and better standards of living throughout the world. May we Americans live up to our glorious heritage. In that way America may well lead the world to peace and prosperity."

This has the authentic Roosevelt ring, and there is every reason to anticipate that the lines along which United States policy, particularly in foreign affairs, was so firmly directed by the late President will continue with far less friction and unsteadiness than might have been expected. Editorial comment on the new President has so far been guarded, though encouraging. The Washington Post points out that "his first day brought a number of important decisions. In each case they appear to have been made with despatch and good judgment." The New York Times speaks of his combination of "political experience, common sense and wise Senate friendships." One of Mr. Truman's last actions as Vice-President was to give a casting vote against an amendment to the Lend-Lease Bill which was passed by the Senate on the 10th April and is now law. The defeated Taft Amendment would have stopped the sending of supplies to Europe as soon as peace was declared. As it is, Mutual Aid Agreements may be continued for a further year after the 30th June. In one of his last messages to Congress President Roosevelt announced that the work of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (U.N.R.R.A.) must also go on until countries free themselves "from the hunger and diseases that the enemy left."

The reactions of other countries to the news of President Roosevelt's death must be sought elsewhere in this Summary. One related event, for which the new Administration has been given credit, is the decision of the Soviet Union to send M. Molotov as one of their representatives to the San Francisco Conference after all. This is a happy augury. A large number of other delegates are beginning to arrive in the United States; Mr. Eden himself attended President Roosevelt's funeral service in Washington last Saturday.

LATIN AMERICA.

Argentina has continued to make gestures in proof of the reorientation of her foreign policy, both in the sense of imposing restrictions on Axis activities and in that of displaying her attachment to the Pan-American family. Under the former heading the "nationalisation" of German clubs may be cited; under the latter the organisation of numerous ceremonies for the Day of the Americas (the 14th April) (which were, however, cancelled in view of the death of President Roosevelt). The United States Foreign Economic Administration has placed Argentina on the same footing as other Latin American States in respect of commercial transactions, and the Argentine Government has asked for the revision of the statutory list system.

As the Buenos Aires broadcasting service has remarked, the appearance of Argentina at San Francisco depends on the attitude of the Soviet Union, from whom " an appropriate gesture is indispensable in order to facilitate plans for an invitation to the Argentine Government " (see last week's Summary under " U.S.S.R.").

As to the internal situation, an official broadcast has warned " Argentine Anti-Axis organisations " that the decree prohibiting political parties is still in force and that promoters of recently-created bodies formed under the pretext of adherence to the Allied cause should abstain from politics, " since it had been proved that they were trying to carry on activities of a subversive nature."

GERMANY.

ANOTHER German defence line has gone the way of the rest, and the Russian armies have succeeded in forcing their way forward from the Central Oder front right into the suburbs of Berlin. Marshal Zhukov's detachments are reported to have penetrated into the working-class district of Wedding on the north side of the city, and those of Marshal Koniev by a sudden turn northwards are said to have reached Potsdam. This would leave a third of the circle to be completed on the west and north, and some reports assert that this has already taken place and that the German capital is now surrounded. Meanwhile, in north-west Germany, British troops are on the fringes of Hamburg and are threatening Bremen from three sides. Resistance in the Ruhr pocket has ended, and over 300,000 prisoners were taken. But American Armies have had to face a German counter attack on their Magdeburg bridgehead and have met stiff opposition north-east of Brunswick and in the Nürnberg area. Nevertheless there seems every likelihood that American and Russian forces will soon meet in the Chemnitz–Dresden area, whilst the armies under Generals Patch and Patton are pressing down the Danube valley towards Regensburg and are already reported across the river in two places. A southern link-up between American and Russian forces in the Danube valley and a second barrier between the German forces in the north and the redoubt in the Alps continues to take shape. In Württemberg a swift advance on Stuttgart by French and American troops has isolated two German divisions to the south-west of that city, whilst Allied forces have reached the Swiss frontier and have isolated Baden from the rest of the Reich. Heavily out-numbered, the Luftwaffe has been effective only in a few isolated areas, notably round Bremen in the north and Chemnitz in Saxony. The Allied offensive in Italy has captured and passed beyond Bologna and approached the River Po, the last serious obstacle before Milan and the northern cities. German troops recently in Italy have been identified on the eastern front.

Very little of this synchronised battering has been officially announced in Germany. The O.K.W. has striven to give the impression that the Russian penetrations have been made slowly and at great cost. It has described prodigies of heroism performed by Germans in " the great defensive battle before Berlin "; the bulletin of the 20th claimed a restoration of the " old main fighting line " on both sides of Frankfurt. That of the 22nd reported that the enemy had reached " the Reich capital's outer defence zone." D.N.B. explained on the 17th that the advances from east and west towards Berlin had " modified the organic structure of the fronts" and created what are called " battle-sectors," one of which, the Bavarian fortress, would yet prove to be of " historic military importance."

German comment on the battle for the capital has shown the expected mixture of bravado and realistic admission. To the trials of nightly bombing has now been added that of Russian shells falling in the centre of the city. The bombing of Potsdam on the 15th April is reported by a neutral journalist to have " caused a profound impression, particularly among the officers of the old school." The same source spoke of the public as impressed by the announcement that the family of the general commanding Königsberg would be held responsible for the surrender of that town. There is much talk (according to a Transocean correspondent) of the possibility of Berlin being declared an open town; so that a population still numbering, it is said, three million souls, may be spared the ordeal of street fighting. " If," said this account, " the Berliners are afraid of anything, it is hunger." Against these natural reactions of a bombed and beleaguered population the Nazi leaders have reacted with increasingly energetic and strident calls for resistance by everyone and to the last. A D.N.B. message on the 20th said that the people were " fully conscious of the fact that even house-to-house fighting was infinitely easier to put up with than a permanent occupation by the Asiatic hordes of Stalin." " Strong counter-attack reserves " were reported to have been brought from the west to reinforce the Berlin defences. Goebbels' special message to the inhabitants on the 22nd was both buoyant and drastic in tone. He declared himself confident that the resistance of the capital would beat the Bolshevik onslaught, and that the fight for Berlin would be a beacon for further resistance throughout the Reich. But at the same time he explained that the state of " active defence " into which the capital was now transformed meant that every Berliner was responsible for his own dwelling. Houses showing the white flag would lose all right to protection and their inhabitants would be dealt with as they deserved on the instructions of the local Party leader; they were " infectious bacilli " in the city's organism. He forbade " inquisitive loitering "; as Reich Defence Commissioner, he issued a special instruction that those unable to get to their place of work should report for emergency jobs on the spot. He gave an assurance that he with his wife and children would remain in the city, but he made no mention of Hitler's presence until the 23rd when in a second appeal he explained that the Führer had decided to remain in Berlin at an hour when German leaders had to prove their worth and accomplish their destined task. The new " Werewolves " transmitter suggested that talk of desperate resistance would not save Berlin for long: " Whatever may happen to the Reich capital, the Werewolves in it will never be overcome . . . . we shall fight until the Reich capital is once again the capital of freedom." Kriegk, on the German Home Service, committed himself to the statement that if Berlin and Prague were conquered, there would be no Europe left.

Hitler's 56th birthday on the 20th has been dutifully celebrated by Nazi propaganda even in a week of such alarms and disasters. Foreign messages were this year confined to telegrams from Hacha and Mussolini. Goebbels' usual evening speech of the 19th was, it was said, read by many people in the air-raid shelters on the following morning as an electricity cut had prevented them from hearing it as delivered. Apart from stereotyped adulation and affirmations of loyalty there were one or two new notes in the tributes of the press and wireless. Prof. Walter Frank, for example, who holds the Chair of History in Berlin, contrasted the Reich of Bismarck " founded from above " with that of Hitler " forged from below, by the growing unity of people and Führer." Another broadcaster saw in Hitler's loyalty to his people a providential guarantee of their redemption in Germany's darkest hour. Rosenberg celebrated his chief as one who had " worked untiringly for peace and to obtain equal rights for the German people." His great effort towards the pacification of Europe at Munich in 1938 had been brought to naught by Roosevelt. A broadcast for soldiers concentrated on Hitler the Socialist. " Hitler has given us Socialism." This was the line taken by the Werewolves who attacked " bourgeois souls " who had doubted and betrayed this " revolutionary Socialist."

The man himself has been silent and has given no sign, by deed or word, that he is conscious of leading his people, that he has any feeling for their preservation or care for their future. Apart from his reported presence in Berlin, where he is said to be in command of the city's defence, his only known activity in the course of the week is the signing of an order degrading the Deputy Gauleiter of Halle for suggesting withdrawal.

Such inactivity and retirement stand in sharp contrast to the behaviour of his chief subordinate Himmler. While nothing is heard of Göring and while Goebbels may do little but talk, Himmler is reported to be energetic in arranging not only present but future resistance. He is said to have this week visited both Bremen and Hamburg. He is presumably still in command of a section of the Eastern Front. The plans for the establishment and equipment of the Austrian redoubt are in his hands. Since October last he has been in charge of all prison and internment camps in Germany, and has recently conducted with Swedish envoys negotiations for the transport to Sweden of both Swedish and Jewish internees. Captured evidence shows him to have been the chief agent, with Speer, of German production of " V " weapons and to have worked out such reorganisation of German armanent production as would have ensured, but for Allied bombing, the employment of such weapons on a more considerable and dangerous scale.

Both in the East and the West some industrial plant and public utilities in working order have fallen into Allied hands. In many cases the military advance was so rapid that there was no time for destruction. This is true of much of the industrial capacity captured intact in Upper Silesia. In more numerous cases, persons ordered to destroy property either disobeyed these orders or were prevented from acting by the local population. But there are also cases where superior authorities deliberately exempted certain properties from the application of the scorched earth policy in general. In accordance with broad instructions agreed between the O.K.W., Himmler and the Plenipotentiary for the Chemical Industry, the Arms Inspector of Essen ordered on the 13th February, 1945, that the I.G. Farbenindustrie works at Leverkusen " must on no account be purposely destroyed, in particular the fighting troops must not blow up or intentionally destroy anything even if this appears desirable for tactical military reasons." The official justification for this order was that the plants should be capable of use if the territory were retaken; but it is possible that the decisive consideration was the anticipation of leniency on the part of the Allies vis-à-vis post-war I.G. Farben property. A month later the Chief of the O.K.W., Keitel, issued on the 13th March a " Top Secret " order which stipulated that transport installations are not to be destroyed beyond repair. But on the 19th March Hitler himself issued an order for the complete destruction of all installations that might have to be kept behind in German territory occupied by the Allies. He said that exceptions from the scorched earth policy on the ground of future reconquest are not permissible because " the enemy if he is forced to retreat will leave us nothing but a scorched earth." All previous orders which run counter to this order " are invalid." There are, however, signs that even this definite Hitler order was not fully carried out subsequently. It has been estimated that I.G. Farben plants at Ludwigshafen can be operated on a part-time schedule within thirty days. The Henschel works at Kassel, largely underground, continued to produce tanks until the Americans entered the city on the 4th April. And the manager of a printing press at Kaiserslautern stated that " his original instructions to demolish the plant completely in the event of evacuation were revised, about ten days before the Americans arrived, into an immobilisation order." In fact, even this order was not obeyed.

AUSTRIA.

The Russian advance in Austria has continued, although it was less spectacular than in the previous week. On the 22nd April Marshal Stalin announced the capture of thirty more places north of Vienna, including Neudorf and Altmarkt. The communiqués of the German High Command, however, have endeavoured to give the impression that Russian gains were slight, and that German counter-attacks regained ground in some places.

There is little information available yet as to the reactions of the people of Austria to the Russian advance. The Soviet Press and radio emphasise the active support which the Red Army is receiving from the Austrian population. Eigruber, the Gauleiter of Oberdonau, broadcasting from Linz on the 17th April, warned his listeners against the " scoundrels and traitors of our own nation who either side with the Bolshevists or who have been parachuted by our enemies into their own homeland." He ridiculed Marshal Tolbukhin's appeal to Austrians, and the proclamation issued by the Soviet Government as the Red Army crossed the Austrian frontier. For the Bolsheviks to pretend that they merely wished to restore the position of 1938, and to talk of liberation was ridiculous, he said. From this it would appear that the German authorities fear the effect of the Russian proclamation upon the people.

The rapid advance of the Red Army, and the capture of Vienna, has increased the urgency of various questions relating to the interim control of Austria. Marshal Stalin personally expressed a wish that these questions should be settled without delay, and proposed that the United States, British, and French Governments should send their officers at once to Vienna to work out the necessary arrangements on the spot. The British Government have accepted the proposal, and have welcomed the statement issued on the 8th April by the Soviet Government, affirming that they stand firmly by the Allied declaration issued at Moscow in 1943. It is hoped that the Four Powers will be able to work out in Vienna the respective zones there, the airfields to be available, the size of the Vienna area of joint occupation, and a joint policy in regard to the establishment of interim control machinery for Austria.

Reports from various sources continue to suggest that serious preparations, including fortifications and stores of food and ammunition, are being made to provide a last stronghold in the Alpine country, from Vorarlberg to the neighbourhood of Salzburg, into which the Nazi Government, its most fanatical S.S. and S.A. supporters, and such of the Wehrmacht as can be withdrawn and is thought suitable, can retire for a last stand. There are indications that Departments of the central Government, and what remains of the Diplomatic Corps are being moved into the Salzburg area. The efficacy of these measures clearly depends very largely on the Allied military operations now taking place, which will decide how many Nazi supporters are available to make a " last stand " in Austria for Hitler's Grossdeutschland.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The Czechoslovak Government party which left the United Kingdom by sea disembarked at Constanza on the 15th April and is now in Košice. News from Košice is still scanty, as communications with the rest of Europe are almost entirely via Moscow, no diplomats other than the Soviet Ambassador having so far been able to reach Slovakia. The Czechoslovaks report that the one line between Košice and their representatives in Moscow is practically unserviceable. The Tass agency and the radio station Slovenska Sloboda (broadcasting presumably from Košice) are the chief sources of information. The Government is, of course, largely preoccupied with the maintenance of the Red Army offensive being fought on its territory, and with all the problems attendant upon recent liberation.

The reconstruction of the Army has commenced with the appointment of General Svoboda, commander of the Czechoslovak Brigade operating with the Soviet armies and the new Minister of National Defence in the Košice Government, to be Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. He replaces General Ingr, who held that post in the London Government. A further Presidential Decree of the same date, the 18th April, appoints General Bocek to be Chief of Staff in place of General Miroslav, and relieves his deputy, General František Moravec, of his duties also.

The Minister of Foreign Trade, M. Ripka, signed a further six agreements with U.N.R.R.A. on the 12th April, supplementary to the principal agreement of the 26th February (see Summary No. 283). These concern the administration of relief and rehabilitation services, relating to health, agriculture, industries, public utilities and repatriation.

The Minister for the Interior, M. Nosek, has handed over to the Slovak National Council for administration further areas, including the district of Ružomberok, which have now been released by the Soviet Commander from military occupation. Slovak relations with the democratic elements of the Hungarian minority appear to be developing with the appointment of the Hungarian Communist, Haracsek, as their organiser.

Stubborn German resistance has met the Red Army fighting in Czechoslovakia during the past seven days, but the fall of Opava, a large industrial town, on the 23rd, indicates that the fortifications blocking the Moravian Gateway are crumbling. Further ground was made in the direction of Brno and a big assault upon the Bohemian bastion is expected to follow the appeal made from Košice to the people of Bohemia and Moravia to rise against the enemy. General Patton's troops, who occupied the Sudeten town of Aš, appear to have turned their main spearheads towards Bavaria rather than the Bohemian interior.

POLAND.

The statement on Poland which the Prime Minister was to have made in the House of Commons on the 19th April was postponed, as he explained, owing to his wish that it should be of a satisfactory nature. The belief, entertained in some quarters, that this delay was a hopeful sign was, however, to be discouraged by subsequent developments. For, when the San Francisco Conference opened on the 25th, the prospect of forming a Polish Provisional Government of National Unity which could be represented there seemed still remote. In a Note addressed to the United States Government (as the inviting Power), and received in Washington on the 18th April, the Soviet Government had reiterated their request of the 31st March that " the Provisional Government now functioning in Warsaw be invited to send representatives to San Francisco "; and the State Department, replying on the 19th April, had reaffirmed its view that such an invitation should be extended only to " a new Provisional Government of National Unity formed in accordance with the Crimea Agreement." The Polish Government in London, for their part, in a Memorandum handed to the British and United States Governments on the 21st, had reasserted their right to represent Poland at the Conference.

In the meantime the discussions directed towards the formation of a new Provisional Government had been transferred from Moscow to Washington and there extended to a higher level. The British and United States Ambassadors in Moscow reached Washington by air on the 18th April, to be followed on the 21st by M. Molotov, the third member of the Commission on Poland. On the 23rd, at the close of discussions between President Truman, Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Eden and M. Molotov, it was officially announced that: " In view of the limited time at their disposal in Washington prior to the opening of the San Francisco Conference on Wednesday, and in order to permit M. Molotov to consult with his Government, the discussions in regard to the Polish situation will be continued by the three Foreign Secretaries at San Francisco."

The difficulties reflected in this communiqué may well have been increased by two factors: namely, in the first place, the Soviet Government's decision to conclude, at this stage in the negotiations and with a Polish administration not recognised by Great Britain or the United States, a treaty which in more normal circumstances would be generally welcomed; and, secondly, the obscurity which still surrounds the negotiations reported to be in progress between the Soviet authorities and certain Polish politicians from inside Poland.

The " Treaty of Friendship, Mutual Assistance and Post-War Co-operation between the U.S.S.R. and the Polish Republic " was signed in Moscow on the 21st April (two days after the arrival of a Polish delegation for the purpose) by Marshal Stalin himself and by M. Morawski, in the presence of President Kalinin and M. Bierut (see also under " Soviet Union "). It bound the contracting parties (as did the Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty of Alliance of the 11th April) to continue the present war against Germany to final victory (Article 1); to co-operate in international efforts to achieve peace and security (Article 3); to assist one another, in the post-war period, against any renewed German aggression and against any other State assisting Germany in any way (Article 4); to abstain from participation in any alliance or coalition directed against either one of the two parties (Article 6); and to strengthen and develop economic and cultural ties between the two countries. Two other clauses, not included in the Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty, introduced a pledge (Article 2) of " mutual respect for their independence and sovereignty as well as non-interference in the internal affairs of the other State "; and an undertaking (Article 5) " not to conclude, without mutual agreement, an armistice or peace treaty, either with the Hitlerite Government or any other régime in Germany, encroaching or which might encroach on the independence, territorial integrity and security of each of the high contracting parties." (This latter provision is of interest, inasmuch as it could be interpreted as implying an understanding as to what are the frontiers of Poland. In this connexion it is perhaps worth quoting a recent Order of the Day, issued by General Rola-Zymierski to the "Second Polish Army" on the 17th April, in which he said: "This day you crossed the river Neisse . . . and . . . captured the town . . . of Rothenburg. In doing so, you have crossed the Western frontiers of Poland.")

In a statement issued on the 16th April, and subsequently in their Memorandum of the 21st (quoted above), the Polish Government in London recalled that, before leaving on the 28th March to take part in conversations with the Soviet military authorities, the Polish Ministers and party leaders residing in Poland sought and obtained from those authorities permission to travel to London for direct discussion with their Government there. The Polish Government urged the earliest possible realisation of this request, "after which they would be in a position to define their attitude on the subject of the conversations." At the same time, they reiterated, in the Memorandum, their "willingness to consider, together with the Soviet Government, all the existing disputes and to conclude a treaty with the U.S.S.R. to guarantee the security of both States . . ." On the other hand, in their statement of the 16th, they severely castigated M. Mikolajczyk, who, "by accepting the results of the Crimea Conference without reservation . . . clearly appears as a belated candidate for inclusion in conversations . . . to which quite possibly he will not be admitted." Unmoved by this attack, M. Mikolajczyk has since defined his attitude towards the problem of Poland's eastern frontier in an article in Jutro Polski (22nd April), where he says: "My own point of view was that at least Lwow and the oil district should be left to Poland. Considering, however . . . that the existence side by side of our two nations is dependent on the fulfilment of this condition, we Poles are obliged to ask ourselves whether . . . we are to reject it and thereby jeopardise the whole body of our country's interests. The answer to this question must be 'No'."

On the 22nd April certain changes in the composition of the Warsaw administration were announced: the resignations had been accepted of MM. Maslanka (Peasant Party) and Piotrkowski (Socialist Party), "Ministers," respectively, of Public Administration and of Food Supplies and Commerce; their respective posts had been filled by M. Edward Ochab (hitherto "Under-Secretary of State" for Public Administration) and M. Jerzy Sztachelski (hitherto Voivode of Bialystok, and a member of the Workers' Party). A separate "Ministry" of Health, detached from that of Labour and Social Welfare, had been set up under Dr. Franciszek Litwin (a member of the Peasant Party); and four new "Under-Secretaries of State" had been appointed.

SOVIET UNION.

The Red Army is fighting in Berlin. An Order of the Day to Marshal Zhukov, dated the 23rd April, reported an advance of 36 to 60 miles to the north of the city. In this advance Frankfurt-on-Oder was captured, and Soviet spearheads have penetrated as far west as Oranienburg. An Order of the Day of the same date to Marshal Koniev revealed a simultaneous advance of 50 to 100 miles on Berlin from the south. In this sweep forward Kottbus was captured, and in addition to fighting in the southern suburbs of Berlin the Red Army is within 35 miles of Leipzig; a junction with the United States First Army may be expected at any time. Further south Bautzen was captured on the 21st April; Marshal Koniev's troops are 10 miles east of Dresden and have reached the Elbe 30 miles north-west of the city. Yet another Order of the Day on the 23rd April announced the capture of Troppau (Opava), just across the Czechoslovak frontier south-west of Ratibor. There have been minor advances north of Vienna.

The reaffirmation of the Soviet Government's insistence on the participation of representatives of the Polish Provisional Government in the San Francisco Conference, put out by Tass on the 17th April, was followed four days later by the announcement of the signing of a Soviet-Polish Treaty of Friendship, Mutual Assistance and Post-War Collaboration (see under "Poland"). The new treaty, on similar lines to the Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty concluded in the preceding week, has been greeted with even more enthusiasm in the Soviet press; the fact that in the absence of M. Molotov, Marshal Stalin himself signed the treaty and made a speech at the signing ceremony is evidence of the great importance attached to the occasion from the Soviet side. Marshal Stalin described the new Treaty as nailing down the lid on the coffin of the old Polish-Russian hostility of five centuries standing, which had done so much to strengthen German imperialism. No longer would the rulers of Poland follow their old and ruinous policy of playing off Germany against Russia, which had ended in their country's loss of independence. This would not happen again, for the Treaty was a firm pledge of the independence of a new and democratic Poland. In future there would be a barrier in the east against German aggression, and if this were complemented by a barrier in the west it would be safe to say that German aggression would be curbed and that it would not be easy for it again to run loose. Pravda and Izvestiya in their editorials took up this last point, laying special emphasis on the place of the Treaty in the general post-war security system.

On the 16th March Pravda published a review, largely critical, of Mr. Walter Lippmann's book "United States War Aims." On the 20th April Pravda printed a letter from Mr. Lippmann replying to these criticisms, together with its own editorial comments on this letter. Mr. Lippmann complained that he had been misunderstood, and that he was a firm supporter of Anglo-Soviet co-operation. The points to which Pravda returned in its final summing up were: (1) Mr. Lippmann's "attempt to supplement the international security organisation by a system of orbits and spheres of influence has muddled a straightforward question." The important thing was not "competitive military blocs" which smacked of a cordon sanitaire, but "a firm union of all freedom-loving States"; (2) a division of Europe into spheres of influence might lead to trouble over Germany between rival groups; (3) Mr. Lippmann defined precisely only his vast "Atlantic Community," comprising the British, French, Belgian and Dutch Empires, the rest of western and southern Europe, together with the American continent; the Russian sphere was left vague, and the Far Eastern and Middle Eastern-African groupings were still vaguer; (4) in any case, these latter groups were to be formed at some unspecified date in the future. "What," Pravda asked, "is to happen to these States until they form their own system?" The silent implication was, no doubt, that Pravda suspected Mr. Lippmann of intending these groups to be under Anglo-American tutelage in this interim period.

It is encouraging to see Pravda thus allowing the victims of its criticism to hit back, even though the paper retains the last word. And the comments of the Communist Party journal are also welcome, with their firm reiteration of faith in international co-operation, their not unreasonable criticisms of Mr. Lippmann's scheme for regional groups, and their concern lest Germany should become a bone of contention between rival European blocs. Such things are not said in vain in Pravda; the points will be repeated at countless party meetings all over the U.S.S.R.

Switzerland during the past few months has come in for sporadic hostile comment in the Soviet press on the ground that "so-called Swiss neutrality" was merely helping German war criminals to cover up their tracks. There have been specific allegations that the Swiss Government had allowed German funds on a large scale to be deposited in the country, and that a hide-out had been afforded to Nazi gang leaders and S.S. men. These charges have now been followed by stories of maltreatment of Soviet internees in Switzerland, in the form of a Tass report (16th April) of a statement said to have been made to its correspondent in Cairo by some Soviet officers who, on escaping from German captivity, had been interned in Switzerland and were being repatriated via Egypt. The statement alleged that Russian prisoners had originally been extradited and handed back to the Gestapo; and went on to make highly-coloured and altogether improbable charges against the Swiss authorities for the treatment they had suffered later, when interned in Swiss internment camps. For Swiss denials of these charges see under "Switzerland."

In view of the impending election of the Catholicos of the Armenian Catholic Church and the interest of the far-flung Armenian diaspora in this election, it is interesting to note a conversation between Marshal Stalin and the deputy-Catholicos of Armenia, Archbishop Gevork Cheorekchian. The Chairman of the Council for Religious Affairs attached to the Council of People's Commissars, M. I. V. Polyansky, was present. No further details of this conversation have yet been published.

Some weeks ago The War and the Working Class attacked International Cartels and the sinister international ramifications developed by them in the pre-war period. The subject of international cartels has now been discussed by Pravda's international observer, M. Boris Izakov, in a vehement article betraying considerable apprehension of Germany's powers of industrial revival after the war. "In the days of the final collapse of Hitlerite Germany," states M. Izakov, "German industrial and financial magnates are developing energetic activities behind the scenes." The foreign press was stated to be filled with "reports of intrigues of German munitions barons on territory occupied by the Allies, about trips of travelling salesmen of German imperialism to neutral countries and about secret negotiations and shady financial manipulations." The war, according to M. Izakov, did not sever the international economic ties of German imperialism. Some American and British firms, connected with international cartels, are alleged "to have obligingly helped their German partners to conceal their property from confiscation by the Allied authorities."

An interesting analysis of Soviet war decorations was recently made public by Tass. In the three and a half years of war ending the 1st January, 1945, it was stated that a total of about 3,400,000 persons, representing 175 different nationalities, were decorated with orders and medals of the U.S.S.R. Among those decorated were 2,373,000 Russians, 482,000 Ukrainians, 116,000 Byelo-russians, 65,000 Tatars, about 64,000 Jews, about 37,000 Kazakhs, 26,500 Uzbeks, an equal number of Armenians, 20,000 Georgians, 13,500 Azerbaidjanians, about 22,000 Mordovians, 20,000 Chuvashis, etc.

SCANDINAVIA.

The Swedish paper Stockholms Tidningen, 21st April, makes some sarcastic comment on the efforts to preserve official secrecy about the controversy between the Norwegian and Swedish Governments on the request by the former for military preparations directed as a deterrent against the Germans in Norway. There seems some justification for the observation that the Swedish people are growing accustomed to the fact that "they are never informed about anything till the whole world knows it, and scarcely even then." Apart from the press of the United States and other countries, such papers as The Times and the Manchester Guardian have reported the essential features of the case in considerable detail. That the Norwegian Government have addressed a request to Sweden, and that the Swedish Government has so far demurred to its demands, is now a matter of general knowledge. Hitherto, the official argument in Sweden against preparatory steps for any kind of intervention has largely been that there was no evidence that such a policy was desired by the Norwegians. The line now adopted appears to be that the Swedish Government is a better judge of the true interests of Norway, and in closer touch with the Norwegian Home Front, than the Norwegian Government in London. It is contended that Swedish mobilisation at the present juncture would provoke the German forces in Norway into an attitude of obstinate resistance and a campaign of destruction which they would not otherwise be likely to adopt. It seems rather difficult to believe that the Germans in Norway have not already decided upon the policy which they intend in any event to pursue, though, as Dagens Nyheter points out, their attitude is difficult to conjecture beforehand. This paper suggests that the situation might vary in different districts of the country, according to the proportion of S.S. forces situated in them. Terboven has sent a birthday telegram to the Führer (20th April) pledging all, regardless of rank, to a defence of "The Fortress of Norway" till the day of German victory; this, therefore, must be regarded as the official policy, though there is considerable evidence that it derives support mainly from the S.S. and that the attitude of the ordinary Wehrmacht is likely to be different.

In Denmark, the cleavage between these two branches of the German army has been even more clearly demonstrated. In clear conflict with an order issued in the first week of April by Himmler and Keitel, placing the officers of both forces on an equal footing, General Lindemann, commanding in Denmark, put out a "Sonderbefehl" on the 14th April to the effect that orders by S.S. officers were only valid if countersigned by commanding officers in the Wehrmacht.

According to statements in the Swedish press and radio, which hitherto lack authoritative confirmation but appear to be generally accepted in Sweden, the Norwegian bishop Berggrav was released from his internment on the 16th April by some twenty members of the Home Front, who overpowered the guards and removed him to a place of safety. Vestmanlands Läns Tidning, the 21st April, asserts that the abduction of the bishop as a hostage was contemplated by the German and Quisling authorities, but that the fact became known in time through a careless remark by a member of the N.S.

In Denmark an even more prominent member of the resistance movement has certainly succeeded in effecting his escape. Professor Mogens Fog, who fell into the hands of the Gestapo last October, was enabled to free himself from the headquarters in the Shell building on the occasion of the R.A.F. raid on those premises, and has now written an account of his experiences in the April issue of the clandestine organ Frit Danmark, which has been reproduced in the paper of the same name published in London. He concludes his article with an appeal to the resistance movement to continue sabotage and the liquidation of informers, and to be ready, at a given signal, to proceed to definite warfare, but he cautions his countrymen against the murder of casual Germans or reprisals of a character which he describes as unworthy.

In Finland, the new Government presented its programme in the Diet on the 19th April. It had on the whole a very favourable reception, and appears to have been framed in a moderate and non-controversial spirit. It is somewhat curious, however, that the Helsinki correspondent of Svenska Dagbladet contrasts it sharply with the manifesto of the Three-Party bloc, which it appears superficially to resemble in most essentials, to judge from the broadcast summary of the manifesto, though it omits certain socialistic proposals which, according to another report, are included in this document. In fact, both programmes, as was to be expected, have been framed in a spirit of widely acceptable compromise, and the principal importance of the programme seems to lie in its omissions; bourgeois circles noted with satisfaction the absence of any mention of socialistic nationalisation or the institution of People's Courts. There is no indication of an intention to carry a purge against Fascist elements to undue length, in fact the absence of such a pledge was made a matter of complaint by one member in the debate. On the other hand, Hertha Kuusinen, leader of the Democratic League Group, hinted in her speech that the programme was not an exhaustive catalogue of all the measures which would, in fact, be carried out.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Quotations from the free Dutch Press in broadcasts from the liberated Netherlands show that considerable anxiety is felt lest the rest of the country be freed too late to save its inhabitants from starvation. The Allies are urged to do everything in their power to avert this catastrophe. The Chairman of the Synodal Commission of the Reformed Church has sent a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which he draws the attention of His Grace to the terrible plight of the Dutch in the Occupied Netherlands. Stocks of food, he says, are so low that even the present inadequate rations cannot be supplied after the end of April. "We will not express an opinion," the letter adds, "whether military operations could or could not be speeded up, nor whether it might be possible to provide the large centres of population with food by means of aircraft, nor whether the evacuation of large sections of the population could be considered by agreement between the contending forces. These are all questions of a technical character upon which we are not competent to express an opinion. But we know that God is able to move men's hearts to seek means to prevent the destruction of this sorely-tried part of the Dutch people."

At a Press Conference in San Francisco Rear-Admiral Helfrich, a member of the Dutch delegation, gave his views on a number of topics, but refused to touch on political questions. When asked what he considered should be the attitude of the small nations at the Conference, he replied that that was a political question, but added that the Kingdom of the Netherlands was not a small nation. Referring to the war against Japan, he pointed out that many people had forgotten what the Dutch forces had done at the beginning of the war. The Dutch Far Eastern Fleet had played a great part in saving Australia from invasion. Admiral Helfrich also praised American strategy in the Pacific, and stated that in his view the Americans should retain bases there. He added that he had always held the view that the Japanese would fight to the bitter end; there was, however, a possibility that their reverses had somewhat weakened their morale. In any case, their surrender must be unconditional; they must be "smashed."

Unrest among the Belgian miners continues and strikes are still frequent. M. van Acker has told the Chamber that great concessions have been made to the miners and that there is now no excuse for strikes. Unfortunately, much trouble had been made by agitators.

FRANCE.

The German resistance has been overcome in the Gironde pocket and the port of Bordeaux is now open to shipping though the island of Oléron is still in German hands. On the 22nd April General de Gaulle, accompanied by M. Diethelm, his Minister for War, visited the French forces engaged, paid a tribute to the former F.F.I., who constitute the bulk of those forces, and decorated General de Larminat and other French and American senior officers. The French First Army have occupied Tübingen and captured Stuttgart after overcoming the stubborn defence of four German divisions in street battles on the 21st and 22nd April, and are now advancing towards Munich. (For the French advance into Italy and its political implications, see below under "Italy.") In the meantime a Paris communiqué of the 20th reports that French resistance continues in Indo-China.

By agreement with the Allied armies French prisoners of war and political prisoners from the German areas now occupied are being brought back by air. M. Frenay, Minister for Prisoners and Deportees, announced on the 13th April that about 1 million Frenchmen had already been liberated in Germany and over 100,000 repatriated since the beginning of March, while 15–20,000 were now arriving home every day. It appears that the arrangements made in Paris to receive the returned prisoners are admirable and all the men are enthusiastic at the reception they are given. There is an atmosphere of friendly efficiency and a notable absence of the usual official autocracy. 3,500 Frenchmen were freed from the concentration camp at Buchenwald and some have already been brought back to Paris, where they were received by General de Gaulle. Among them are MM. Julien Cain, former Administrateur Général of the Bibliothèque Nationale; Baillou, General Secretary of the École Normale Supérieure; Richet, professor at the Paris Faculty of Medicine, and Mazeaud, professor at the Paris Faculty of Law; Musset, Dean of the Faculty of Letters at the University of Caen; the Bâtonnier Teitgen, father of the Minister; Claude Bourdet, member of the C.N.R. and son of the dramatist; General Audibert; Commandant Lhopital, former aide-de-camp to Foch; the Deputies Eugène Thomas, Forcinal, Marie and Crutel; and the aircraft manufacturer Marcel Bloch. Among those who have died at Buchenwald are MM. Maspero and Halbwachs, professors at the Collège de France, and Bruhat, Assistant Director of the École Normale Supérieure. Previously a party of Frenchwomen who had been interned at the camp of Ravensbrück had returned through Switzerland; other repatriations include the family of General Giraud, and, from the camp at Belsen, M. Bolaert formerly General de Gaulle's delegate for the occupied territories, the business men MM. Chandon and Roland Coty, and the sons of M. Marc Rucart.

Already it has been announced that two of the returned deportees, the Christian Democrat M. Teitgen and the Radical M. Crutel will stand as candidates in the local elections, while one who has not yet been freed, the Socialist Mayor of Roubaix and ex-Minister, Jean Lebas, is also up for election. It would not, however, appear that a large proportion of the prisoners will be able actually to vote in the elections.

General Eisenhower announced on the 23rd April that the French Government is to take over, as from the 1st May, responsibility for the bulk of the French supply programme, much of which has hitherto been handled by S.H.A.E.F. Coal and petroleum products will, however, continue to be provided through military channels as well as supplies for civilian needs in such forward operational areas as are included in France.

M. Pleven made an important broadcast on economic policy on the 21st April before leaving for San Francisco. He emphasised the Government's determination to achieve effective stabilisation of prices, wages and salaries and gradually to increase the purchasing power of wage-earners through priority allocation of food-stuffs as increased supplies became available. Workers' rents would remain frozen for the rest of 1945. Industrial price increases had had to be authorised, but they would not cover the whole rise in wage-costs and the difference must be made good by increased efficiency. As regards agricultural prices, those of cattle and sheep, which had hitherto been too low to cover costs, were being raised. The Government intended to hold conferences with producers and consumers to discuss methods of stimulating production, beginning with the coal problem.

Recent financial measures published in the Journal Officiel on the 14th and 21st April tighten up the Government's control of credit and of tax liability by obliging banks and insurance companies to deposit their holdings of Treasury bonds with the Bank of France, and by ordering the deposit of all bearer shares with the Caisse Centrale de dépôts et de virements des titres or their transformation into registered holdings.

On the 20th April General Dentz was condemned to death by the High Court of Justice in Paris on the charges of having facilitated the supply of arms to the rebels in Iraq, handed over Syrian air bases to the Germans, taken measures to ensure secrecy of installation of the Luftwaffe in Syria, organised armed resistance to Gaullist and British troops in Syria and demanded reinforcements from the Germans in men and material.

It was officially announced on the 23rd April that the trial of Marshal Pétain is to open on the 17th May. It was generally assumed, however, that he would not be present and that he would be judged by default. But, on the 24th April, the Swiss Federal Political Department issued a communiqué stating that Pétain had requested the Federal Council to grant him, his wife and a small suite permission to travel through Switzerland to France, where he would place himself at the disposal of the Judicial authorities. The Federal Council had granted this request. Pétain would await the instructions of the French Government concerning the place and time of his transfer to France.

It would appear that Laval, Déat and Marion were all refused entry by the Swiss Government; but that M. Rochat was admitted as a refugee.

SWITZERLAND.

An official announcement was issued on the 23rd April stating that the Federal Council had decided at a recent session that, in order to prevent the country from being submerged by a flood of refugees, the Northern, Eastern and Southern frontiers should be completely closed, either in whole or in part, whenever the situation was such as to call for such a measure. The statement went on to say that, in accordance with this policy, the frontier between Bâle and Lichtenstein had been closed on the 21st April. The effect of this is that the frontier, in the sectors affected, is no longer guarded by police but by the military, who are equipped with all the means necessary to prevent any individual from penetrating into Switzerland. Nevertheless admission is being granted at certain points to persons worthy of being granted the right of asylum who are seeking a temporary refuge in the country, in accordance with the Swiss humanitarian tradition: but careful steps are being taken at the same time both to turn back undesirables and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases. In accordance with this rule Marshal Pétain, who presented himself at the frontier at St. Margarethen expressing the desire to traverse the country in order to return to France, was admitted on the 24th April, whilst Laval and other prominent French "collaborators" have been turned back.

Swiss citizens are, of course, free to return to their country on proof of their identity. Two prominent Swiss pro-German propagandists, Georges Oltramare and Paul Bonnet, both from Geneva, were thus admitted on the 21st April but immediately placed under arrest.

The Lichtenstein authorities have also closed their frontier with Austria.

It is officially announced that twenty officials and employees of the Swiss legation in Budapest and their families have reached Instanbul but that two members of the legation staff, including M. Feller, the late Chargé d'Affaires, are missing (see Summary No. 287 under "Hungary"). There has been some anxious comment on this in the press.

The press has always shown concern over the accusations of ill-treatment of Soviet internees made in the Soviet press (see under "Soviet Union"). On the 20th April the Federal Council issued a statement vigorously rebutting these allegations and declaring that the care of Russian internees had been under the control of the International Committee of the Red Cross and that Switzerland was in a position to prove that their treatment had been both correct and humane.

SPAIN.

The tide of appeasement is running strongly in Spain. The break with Japan was reported last week; since then there have been two more signs of General Franco's intention to go a long way in placating Allied opinion. The first is the suspension by the Spanish Government of the Lufthansa service between Germany and Spain. For the past few months this service has been working irregularly; now, from the 17th April no more German aircraft will be allowed to land in Spain. The second pointer to conciliation is the abandonment by the Government of the censorship of foreign press messages, and Allied correspondents were called to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs on the 16th April to be given this agreeable news by Señor Lequerica himself. Inasmuch as press censorship was in the hands of the Vice-Secretary of Press and Propaganda, this means a lessening of Falange control.

Internally the most important political development is the preparation of the so-called Bill of Rights to which reference was made in last week's Summary. The following explanation of this proposal has been obtained in strict confidence from an extremely high-placed source, and there is every reason to believe in its authenticity. The Bill is substantially identical with the proposal submitted to Franco a year ago by Señor Aunos, Minister of Justice, which was then rejected. When it becomes law—which should happen in the near future—the Bill will be implemented by statutes specifically safeguarding each of the rights in question. All Falange activities in connexion with police investigation or interference with the liberty of the subject will cease automatically, and any such authority hitherto wielded by the Falange will revert to the State. The Bill will include an all-important provision of habeas corpus whereby no person will henceforth be exposed to detention for more than 48 hours without a charge being preferred and his committal for trial. There will be no further death sentences for Civil War offences; this decision has already been communicated by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires and to the United States Ambassador. A decree is to be issued immediately by the Minister of Justice which will give legal effect to an announcement made after a Cabinet meeting on the 13th April. Under this decree the so-called Tribunal of Political Responsibilities, created in 1939, will cease to exist as such; but it will continue to function for a time as a commission of liquidation with the duty of revising all outstanding sentences. As a result of revision, these sentences will be brought within the scope of amnesties already in force for political offences committed before the Tribunal was set up—that is to say, during the Civil War—and which were tried by military courts. Together with the Bill of Rights this decree aims at clearing the way for the Minister of Justice to empty the prisons of Civil War offenders, and it should facilitate the freeing of political prisoners. Under the contemplated legislation, all those political exiles who apply to Spanish Consulates for repatriation (see last week's Summary) will be issued with a written guarantee which will be tantamount to ensuring for them the full enjoyment of civil rights and protection, particularly against Falange persecution.

On paper these reforms are certainly an important step in the evolution of the régime. They mean, first, a reduction of the power of the Falange in its most objectionable feature, namely, the interference with the liberty of the subject. Then, they represent a reasonable system of justice with the abolition of special courts and the curtailing of the jurisdiction of military tribunals. They are, too, a serious attempt to wipe out the fouling memories of the Civil War. Franco may by now have grasped the truth that > "Only the actions of the just > Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

But everything depends on whether the laws are to be strictly enforced and whether the authorities charged with enforcing them are to be protected from political pressure.

If Franco is really sincere in his reforming zeal, it is a sign of grace. But one is entitled to be sceptical of these handsome gestures by hard-pressed dictators, and the question springs to mind—is Franco the man to carry through this desirable project? Can he, indeed, clip the wings of Falange without deforming his own régime to the point of dissolution? Has he even any real intention to "defalangizarse"? We know his profession of regard for the Allies; does he really love us as much as all that?

The appointment was announced on the 21st April of Sir Victor Mallet as His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid in succession to Lord Templewood. Sir Victor Mallet has been His Majesty's Minister at Stockholm since January 1940.

ITALY.

Bologna has fallen and Ferrara should soon be in our hands. This means that, on the Eastern flank we are on the south bank of the Po. From accounts to hand Bologna has not suffered a great deal of damage. According to a Press report, the Mayor of Bologna and the German Commander seem to have come to some understanding although, before leaving, the Germans destroyed the telephone exchange and the electric power station.

The Council of Ministers has passed certain new measures to deal with Fascists and others accused of collaborating with the Germans in North Italy. Assize Courts are to be formed, composed of one magistrate and four representatives of the local Committee of National Liberation. They have the power to impose sentence of death and are to function for six months.

Marshal Messe, Chief of Staff of the Italian Army, was made prisoner in North Africa, and was sent back to Italy after the armistice at Marshal Badoglio's request. General Trezzani was captured in Abyssinia.

Although the Italian Democrat Party is not one of the parties forming the Government, and cannot compare either in size or importance with these parties, yet it is well run and has an energetic and intelligent leader, Selvaggi. In view of Signor Togliatti's speech, in which he explained the policy of the Communist Party, it is interesting to note the programme of a Right-Wing party. A resolution recently passed by the National Council of the Italian Democratic Party states that the policy of the party is to uphold the Monarchy, since it is the best guarantee of individual liberty and political unity. Christian and Catholic ideals, as opposed to materialistic and class ideologies, must be respected, as well as private property and enterprise, and any form of individual, class or party dictatorship is to be resisted. Relations between the Government and the Vatican are to remain as at present. The State must guarantee public order and ensure that political activities are carried on within the bounds of the law. The right of Italy to retain her pre-war frontier and her pre-war African colonies is insisted on, as well as Italy's right to be granted the status of a United Nation.

Paris Radio reports that French troops have penetrated into Piedmont and the French occupation of Breil, or Breglio in Italian, was also reported on the 20th April. Breil is about 15 miles north of Ventimiglia on the French side of the frontier.

Speaking of Italian nervousness regarding French intentions in the Val d'Aosta M. Dejean explained to the British Minister in Paris that, although France desired minor rectifications of the Franco-Italian Frontier, the French Government, in his opinion, had no designs on the Val d'Aosta. M. Dejean admitted that a good deal of propaganda was going on locally, but said that his Government was not responsible for it.

The Under-Secretary for Occupied Italy, Medici Tornaquinti, a Liberal, has recently spent a fortnight in North Italy. He was dropped by parachute, and with the aid of the local anti-Fascists visited many centres, including Milan, Turin and Genoa. On his return to Rome he reported that the spirit of the partisans was extremely high.

The Committees of National Liberation in the North have drawn up plans for maintaining law and order during the interim period immediately following on liberation. Signor Longhi, the President of the Northern C.N.L., and the partisan military leader, General Cadorna, visited Allied Force Headquarters and discussed the prospects in the North. Signor Longhi was especially insistent on the importance of preventing as far as possible a widespread demolition of the hydro-electric plants in Northern Italy.

The Fascists appear to have set on foot vast mopping-up operations in the Val Tellina region, with a view to clearing this area of partisans and preparing a "redoubt" for Mussolini and the Fascist hierarchs. The Swiss Popolo e Libertà speaks of a projected Fascist plot to seize Milan at the time of the German evacuation. Mussolini is said to be taking part in the plan. Anarchist elements, including the so-called "League of Workers' Union," are also said to be involved, in hopes of seizing power at the critical moment and attempting a revolutionary experiment.

The Cione opposition group appears to be still active despite the suppression, after a few days, of its paper, Italia del Popolo. Medici Tornaquinti reported after his visit to North Italy that there seemed to be little truth in the suggestion, put out by Fascist propaganda, that some patriots were accepting the Cione movement as a half-way house towards neo-Fascism.

THE VATICAN.

As in previous years, the Pope devotes the month of May to prayers for peace, "a peace of justice and equity; for whatever goes beyond this has the seeds of future war." In words of St. Augustine of Hippo, quoted by Pope, "If you do not love justice, you will not have peace." This idea that justice, or the rendering to every man his due, is fundamental to peace, was mentioned in Professor Aguirre's Vatican broadcast. His subject was "the basis for a true peace, as conceived by the Pope," and he argued that the rights of human beings, not as citizens of this State or that, but as members of the human family, are the basis of any juridical order. Now the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of the United States, in a notable pronouncement before San Francisco Conference, reiterates the Pope's conception of peace, and urges the acceptance of an "international Bill of Rights; for will a nation which does not make its own citizens secure in the enjoyment of their human rights work honestly for the maintenance of world peace in the international community?"

The Bishops go on to defend true democracy, "Which is built on respect for the dignity of the human person with his God-given, inviolable rights," against "Marxist totalitarianism which herds the mass under dictatorial leadership." Increasingly official Catholicism identifies this genuine democracy with the Christian conception of man. In the Bishop's words: "Democracy's bulwark is religion, and justice is its watchword."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The British Military Mission in Hungary has now moved to Budapest. The Hungarian Government, on arriving in Budapest, was ceremonially welcomed by the Mayor and by the president of the National Committee and acting Chairman of the Social Democrat Party, A. Szákasits, who hoped that the Government would quickly implement its programme of land reform, industrial reform and full liquidation of feudalism, with the necessary purge. The distribution of land is now reported complete in Eastern Hungary, and is proceeding in Transdanubia. With this, a certain tension which had been noticeable in the relations between the extreme political parties and the more conservative elements in the Government has somewhat relaxed. The Communists, in particular, still seem dissatisfied with the Generals and unconvinced, in particular of their zeal in respect of the purge; while Gyöngyössy is attacked for insufficient energy in repatriating Jewish deportees. The extreme Left is certainly manœuvring for increased representation in the National Assembly; and no party to the Right of the Smallholders (who themselves are often attacked) can make its voice heard. For the present, however, the Soviet Command seems to be rather discouraging agitation against the Government.

Besides the three persons mentioned in last week's Summary, five others are being offered personal seats in the National Assembly. These include three more émigrés: Bela Bartok, the famous composer, and R. Vambery from the United States, and the leader of the Hungarian colony in France.

On the 20th April Gyöngyössy made his first statement to the press on Hungary's international relations. He promised complete renunciation of the historic ambitions of earlier régimes and the closest economic and political co-operation with Hungary's neighbours, speaking warmly of Yugoslavia, against whom Hungary had sinned "to a tremendous extent." Efforts were being made to trace and repatriate deportees. The foreign service would be reorganised. Of these deportees, survivors are now returning to Hungary; but they confirm that many Hungarian Jews were exterminated in Oswiecim and elsewhere. Admiral Horthy is reported alive and in internment at Tegernsee. The press mentions him, when it does so, as the "ex-Regent" but the form of the Hungarian State is being left open. The word "royal" is, however, provisionally omitted from treaty, documents, &c.

Negotiations for a trade agreement with Roumania are proceeding. Meanwhile many supplies are coming into Hungary from Roumania in "caravans" organised by local authorities or traders.

The first battalion of the new "Hungarian Democratic Army" has left for the front.

Roumania.

On the 17th April the Roumanian Government intimated that they were prepared to guarantee General Radescu's safety if he returned to his home. The same day Dl Tatarescu wrote that "he will have the same protection as any other citizen, under the laws of the country which will assure him the protection of the Government against any ill-treatment. The object of the guarding of his dwelling will be to safeguard his liberty and not to deprive him of it. He will, of course, have to respect the laws of the country and abstain from any action which might provoke disorder." On consideration the British authorities did not feel reassured. Realising how fluid the "laws of the country" are at the present time, it was felt that this letter left too many loopholes. The careful watch kept on all movements to and from the British Legation did not inspire confidence in the Government's benevolent intentions. The General accordingly remains in sanctuary, pending the receipt of a letter from the Allied (Soviet) Commission, confirming the promise of the Roumanian Government. The General himself is willing to leave, but wishes to be provided with a permit to leave the country.

On the 20th April the King signed an amended form of the proposed Purge Law. The amendments for which he stipulated included limiting the death penalty to "war criminals," the omission of "all enemies of the present régime" from the operation of the law, and insistence on certain legal forms, such as the necessity for proper warrants for arrest, and safeguarding of the right of appeal. Immediately after signing the decree, the King received an intimation to the effect that this version of the law would not satisfy the Government. The opinion grows that in certain quarters efforts are being made to make His Majesty's position untenable.

In January last undertakings were given by M. Vyshinsky and by General Vinogradov that there should be no further removal of oil-field equipment from Roumania to Russia. On the 10th April the Soviet authorities proceeded to load 60 tons of equipment from the Unirea warehouse at Ploesti. In reply to a protest by the British Acting Commissioner, the Soviet authorities asserted that the material in question had not been paid for and was therefore still German property. Proof of payment was demanded, and a promise given that the despatch should be delayed to allow of this being done. Colonel Masterson was requested to communicate with the Soviet officer in charge in two or three days' time. Meanwhile, on the 20th April the Unirea equipment, together with 250 tons of material belonging to other companies, was despatched to Galati for shipment.

Universul, writing on the subject of the San Francisco Conference reminds its readers that it will be a great error for small States to assume that they are entitled to the same international juridical rights as the big nations. They cannot share in the benefits of peace without also sharing the obligations of the defence of general security. This is an amazing volte face for any Roumanian, and for Dl Logoşianu (the Editor of Universul) in particular, and it is not difficult to guess the source of his inspiration.

Yugoslavia.

The enemy's retreat from Slavonia and Bosnia continues. On the coast the Yugoslavs have occupied the Quarnero islands and are closing up to Fiume.

New Governments have been formed for four out of the six component regions of Yugoslavia. For Serbia, Croatia and Macedonia (perhaps Montenegro also) the secretary of the National Liberation Front, i.e., the holder of the key position up to date, has become the Premier. The other Ministers in each region are either Communist party members or well-established adherents of the Partisan movement. (The preceding Summary, p. 15, para. 5, should have stated that the members of the Serbian Government, not of the Skupshtina, took an oath to the people.) The independent line hitherto taken by the Macedonian authorities presumably accounts for the presence of the all-powerful Kardelj at the Macedonian Assembly; and for the reproof which Chuchkov, the Minister for Macedonia, gave the Assembly for the tendency to exclude Serbians from Macedonia.

On the 13th April a Soviet-Yugoslav Commercial Agreement was signed in Moscow. In his interview to the Red Star Tito said, "we count primarily on the Soviet Union which has already begun to help us. Assistance from other Allies, particularly America, is also particularly necessary." In this statement no reference whatever was made to Great Britain. Tito was back at Belgrade on the 20th.

Evidence is accumulating of the application of totalitarian government in the political and economic spheres. At the local elections in Macedonia only candidates of the N.L. Front, being unopposed, were elected. Zhujovitch, addressing the Serbian Skupshtina, declared that "all who are outside the Front are outside the State." He quoted the Soviet Union as illustrative of how to apply the co-operative principle to agriculture. The Commissar for Trade for Serbia wrote in Politika that County Committees were responsible for all economic matters in their areas; but warned them against any show of independence. They must strictly adhere to the plans of the Serbian Government. It is not surprising that he went on to complain of some committees lack of initiative and their refusal to act without definite orders. Industrialists are hard hit. In 1941–4 many were in a position which virtually forced them to work to the advantage of the Germans. Now their factories are being confiscated one by one. Over 300 confiscated undertakings have been handed over to the Belgrade municipality. Where factories are not confiscated, their management has been transferred to the State labour unions.

Although the Government's following is slowly increasing, Serbian opposition, if cautious, is widespread. It is attributed to the sense of the loss of Macedonia, the propaganda for fraternisation with the Bulgarians, the severe treatment of Mihailovitch's followers, and, above all, to the partisans' monopoly of jobs and the inefficiency of many of their officials. Meanwhile, the harvest prospects are discouraging. Only 50 per cent. of land for autumn sowing has been tilled. There is a terrible shortage of animals, of man-power and of implements. An optimum estimate of the grain harvest reckons on a deficit of 1,000,000 metric tons. The Central Government propose to intervene, mobilising man-power all over Yugoslavia and directing it where it can be best used. The proposed similar mobilisation of draught animals will be unpopular.

A new dinar currency is being issued. The currencies hitherto circulating must be handed in by the 30th April, but holders will only receive immediate payment up to 5,000 of the new dinars. The new dinar is to be valued at 20 Serbian dinars, 40 Croatian kune, 10 Bulgarian leva, one Hungarian pengo, &c.

Greece.

On the 18th April the Archbishop of York arrived in Athens; though lodged at the British Embassy, he was officially the guest of the Regent, to whom he conveyed a message from the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, expressing admiration for the spirit of resistance shown by the Greek people and stressing the hope that close contacts might soon be renewed between the Church of Greece and the Church of England.

The Communist party, while on the whole appearing scrupulously to adhere to the letter of the Varkiza Agreement, is at the same time by subterranean methods working against the Government. While it is true that more than the number of arms stipulated in the Agreement were handed over, yet in nearly every area formerly occupied by E.L.A.S. the National Guard and British troops have discovered hidden dumps of arms, some of them in better condition than those that had been surrendered. There are still bands of E.L.A.S. guerrillas at large in the country, and O.P.L.A. is still active in certain towns. Communist elements are often at pains to provoke the raw recruits of the National Guard, which was, in fact, fired on by armed Communists on entering Alexandroupolis. Recently the Communists have formed an anti-Fascist workers' organisation, known as E.R.G.A.S., which has proclaimed a general strike throughout Greece for the 1st May. Communist propaganda insists that the Government has persistently violated the spirit and letter of Varkiza, and it is, of course, possible to cite various instances where the Government's instructions have not been carried out. Both the Plastiras Government and the Voulgaris Government have had many difficulties to contend with: the National Guard is half-trained and ill-equipped, and in Salonica certain rabid Royalist elements are reported out of control; in Salonica, too, some of the police have obstructed the execution of warrants for the arrest of notorious collaborators; the administrative machinery is in a state of disorganisation; the confidence of the public in public security and in the drachma has been badly shaken and has not yet recovered. In spite of difficulties, however, the Voulgaris Government has declared itself bound by the Varkiza Agreement, and has given earnest proof of its good faith by executing a notorious traitor who had worked for the S.S. The Minister of the Interior hopes that the long-drawn-out trial of the traitor Ministers may be concluded early in May. The Government will also enforce a law passed by the Plastiras Government providing for a thorough purge of the police and gendarmerie. E.L.A.S. officers and men are now being accepted for the National Guard, though it is true that in the early stages of the call-up a certain amount of discrimination was employed to prevent excessive infiltration by the Communists.

The financial situation in Greece is grave. Since the 1st January a deficit of 10 milliard drachmas has accumulated, while note circulation has doubled since the 1st March; the currency is threatened by the prevailing flight from the drachma. A small committee of British and American advisers has been set up to examine the situation with the Finance Minister.

Albania.

In a recent press interview the Albanian Minister of Propaganda is reported to have said that—as has indeed long been clear—Enver Hoxha's régime was on the same lines as that of Marshal Tito. The other remarks ascribed to Professor Sejfulla Malleshova are coloured with an optimism appropriate to his office. After being a semi-colonial State under the Fascists, he said, Albania was now well off. Financial institutions had been nationalised. Land was being distributed to those who had hitherto had to till it for others. The Government's two great aims were first to develop an economic system which would serve the interests of the people and, secondly, to ensure Albania's political independence.

The semi-official newspaper, if correctly quoted by the Yugoslav telegraph agency, describes very favourably the rights now enjoyed by Albanians in Yugoslav Macedonia. Albanians, it says, are on the various national liberation committees, an Albanian is vice-president of the Macedonian assembly, there are Albanian schools and in Skoplje an Albanian newspaper is being published.

Bulgaria.

Reports of casualties sustained by the Bulgarian army in Hungary have again been causing uneasiness in Bulgaria. Whether in this connection or not, Colonel Damian Velchev, the War Minister, recently visited the Bulgarian units on the front and decorated General Stoichev who is Commander-in-chief, and the two corps commanders, Generals Toshev and Trendafilov. The Commander-in-chief and the two corps commanders have also received respectively the first and second class of the Russian order of Kutuzov, and Colonel Velchev conferred the highest Bulgarian decoration on Marshal Tolbukhin. More important than the bestowal of honours is the amnesty which has now been granted, under Marshal Tolbukhin's orders, to cover all Bulgarians serving at the front and thus relieves more than 200 officers of the fear of Communist vengeance. At the same time the Social-Democrat newspaper asks whether the new Bulgaria will be represented at San Francisco and declares that, in return for her co-operation with the Soviet Union and for her fight against the Germans, she expects justice.

Continuing tension between the Communists and the Agrarians occasioned some free fights and rumours of a Cabinet crisis which were mostly exaggerated, although there is some reason to think that the four Agrarian Ministers offered their resignations only to be told by the Russian authorities that for the present they must not leave the coalition Government. The independence of the Agrarian youth association remains one of the chief points of contention. The Prime Minister, M. Gheorghiev, and other members of the Zveno party which is trying to play a part as mediator, have given rather lukewarm support to the principle of combining all youth associations in one and have strongly deprecated party fanaticism. The general public seem to have little confidence in the Government and none at all in elections which, if held under present circumstances, would only hand the country over to unqualified Communist control.

Two new measures have been introduced. In the first place, the Government, which has always repudiated any intention of collectivising agriculture, has published a "law"—to be submitted presumably to a Parliament when there is one—for extending agricultural co-operation. It is claimed that, though voluntary, the practice will gradually be adopted all over the country. Large-scale scientific and mechanical cultivation will be encouraged, and facilities will be given for grouping small holdings, for obtaining expert advice, for using agricultural machinery and for marketing, the general aim being to raise quality and quantity. A second law introduces civil marriage and is based on advanced principles. While leaving the religious ceremony no legality, it abolishes all distinction between legitimate and illegitimate children and, subject to certain conditions, allows divorce by mutual consent.

The decisions of the People's Court have included a greater proportion of acquittals and light sentences than formerly. But sentences of death have been passed on nine generals, including the last Chief of Staff (Trifonov) and Inspector-General (Lukash), the former chief president of the military courts, chief of the gendarmerie, commandant of Sofia (Nakov) and commander of the army of occupation in Serbia (Nikolov). Eleven colonels and ten other officers have also been executed. General Hadji-Petkov (a former Chief of Staff) and twenty-two junior officers have been acquitted. According to the Foreign Minister 2,138 people were sentenced to death out of 10,897 accused up to the 26th March.

Turkey.

Criticism on the part of certain Deputies seems to have been the chief reason for the decision to give more publicity in future to the debates of the Party and of the Grand National Assembly. There is, in fact, some reason to suppose that opposition to M. Saracoğlu's Government, which has been dormant for some months, has now been aroused again by the unsatisfactory state of Turco-Russian relations. Although Russian propaganda has hardly attacked Turkey since the Kremlin denounced the Turco-Soviet Pact, the recent Russian attitude to Turkey and the systematic consolidation of Russian influence in eastern Europe and the Balkans may well make the Turks wonder what is in store for them as the southern neighbours of the Soviet Union. Outwardly, however, the Turks profess to have great confidence in the San Francisco Conference, and the relief expressed in the papers at Mr. Truman's determination to hold the conference and continue his predecessor's policy was no doubt as genuine as their regret at the death of Mr. Roosevelt.

The Turkish Government is still unwilling to face the unpleasant necessity for reducing Turkish prices to the level ruling elsewhere, and obstinacy on this and other points has protracted the financial discussions which are still proceeding with the Turkish delegation in London.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Attention having been removed to America by the death of the President, who had so recently visited the Middle East, it continued to be diverted there by the departure of the delegations for San Francisco, and apart from some last-minute manœuvring over the composition of delegations there has been a lull in Middle Eastern political activity.

In Egypt a recent editorial in The Times dealing with Great Britain's relations with the Middle East, suggesting "Big Powers" management, has been subjected to highly adverse comment in al-Moqattam and other newspapers, which criticised the article as reactionary. The official Wafdist newspaper took the opportunity to insist upon complete political freedom for the whole of the Middle East, and relations with both the European and American nations have in consequence come under fire. The Times editorial, as usually happens, was generally assumed to be a reflection of the British official point of view, which in this case was particularly unfortunate.

General Beynet has not yet returned from Paris to Syria, and the Syrian Government, which will have to face criticism for a further delay in obtaining agreement over the Troupes Spéciales, is awaiting developments with anxiety.

The Persian Government, which has been weakening for some time, has resigned, having failed to secure a vote of confidence in the Chamber. There have been several recent incidents in northern Persia in which Soviet subjects are alleged to have been the victims of violence; these incidents have furnished material for a renewed campaign against Persia in the Russian press, which is causing considerable anxiety to the Persian authorities.

THE FAR EAST.

In an attempt to forestall the San Francisco Conference a "Greater East Asiatic Ambassadorial Conference" has been held in Tokyo. Domei announced this on the 23rd April and said that the meeting was attended by Togo, the Japanese Foreign Minister and Greater East Asiatic Minister; Wang Yun-ching, the "Manchukuo" Ambassador; Tsai Pei, the Nanking Ambassador; Wichit Wathakan (Siam); Tsen Maung (Burma); and Jorge Vargas (Philippines). The object of the Conference was "to further the aims and decisions of the Greater East Asia Assembly, held in November 1943, and to adopt new measures in connexion with the existing world situation and the joint war objective."

The Conference resulted in an official statement which asserted that the United States and Great Britain were endeavouring to establish a military, political and economic hegemony, under the guise of a world security organisation. No mention was made of the U.S.S.R. The Greater East Asia group intended to found a world order based on the complete equality and freedom of nations, whereby people could choose their own Governments without foreign interference. Monopolistic control of commerce and of international communications would be abolished and full economic collaboration assured. There would be no establishment of a security system of arbitrary rule by the big Powers, nor the institution of any uniform formula to the entire world, nor would there be any "provocation or oppression" through economic measures, or by armed force.

The Conference also adopted four resolutions; these were, to support the independence of the States of Indo-China; to encourage the attainment of independence by the East Indies; to make the Ambassadors' Conference a permanent liaison organ for the assembly of the nations of Greater East Asia; and to communicate the results of the Conference to the "Azad Hind Provisional Government."

Togo in his opening speech told the Conference that the war situation was extremely grave, but asserted that "we possess both confidence and wherewithal to ensure ourselves a decisive victory." He denounced Anglo-American post-war plans and said that their scheme for maintaining peace was built upon racial discrimination and colonial exploitation. In his speech at the closing of the Conference Togo expressed his gratification that "we have had an opportunity to announce to the world in the form of a joint statement what our nations consider the guiding principles for the construction of a true world (order)." The various puppet representatives all spoke in similar vein.

Domei on the 19th April announced that Suzuki had received the Emperor's command to attend meetings of Imperial Headquarters and that he would participate in its deliberations on the general conduct of the war. His predecessor, Koiso, received a similar command on the 16th March (see this Summary, No. 285).

The new Japanese political party, the Dai Nippon Seijikai (see this Summary No. 287), appears likely to have a rival. The Seijikai has 355 out of the 430 members of the Lower House of the Diet (Domei, 22nd April), but, according to the Tokyo Shimbun (22nd April), some of the dissenting members of the Lower House have organised a party called the Gokoku Doshikai, and have asked Suzuki to give it official recognition. The Tokyo Shimbun did not name any of the sponsors of this minority party.

Indirect testimony to the effect of air attack on Japanese cities was provided by Lieutenant-General Saburo Endo, Director of the Bureau of Aircraft Production in the Ministry of Munitions. Speaking on the 19th April to war workers in Tokyo, he declared that the struggle in Okinawa would decide Japan's fate and that the outcome depended entirely upon increased war production, especially of aircraft, in Japan. He said that he had inspected areas in Kobe and Osaka which had been devastated by bombing and that he fully realised the difficulties with which war workers were confronted; but, nevertheless, they must not slacken in their efforts, and those who had temporarily left their posts had to return immediately.

The Japanese Government are organising a Civilian Volunteer Corps. The function of this body was explained by Lieutenant-General Homma in an article in Mainichi. He said that the fighting services were in the first line, the reservists formed a second-line army, while the new volunteer corps formed a third-line force. It would remain at work in factories and other production tasks until an emergency, when it would be employed in guarding communications and helping to maintain peace and order; it would therefore need some military training and organisation (Domei, 17th April). An "All-Japan Nation's Special Attack Corps" is also to be inaugurated on the 25th April; it will act in close co-operation with the Civilian Volunteer Corps.

In the field of prefectoral administration, the prefects who are also chairmen of the regional councils of prefectures have been made Shinnin, or first rank, officials by an Imperial ordinance of the 21st April. They were formerly Chokunin, or second rank, officials. At the same time seven new chairmen of the regional councils were appointed.

The Japanese offensive in Honan and Hupeh has come to an end. The Chinese supported by the 14th American Air Force, claim that they have driven back the Japanese, and have recaptured all the cities along the Han River which were recently occupied by the Japanese. These include Laohokow, Siangyang, Icheng and Fancheng. In Honan fighting is going on near Shanhsien, on the Lunghai Railway, while further south Chinese forces operating behind the Japanese lines are said to be threatening Nanyang (Chungking Radio, 17th–22nd April).

The Japanese have begun a new offensive in Western Hunan; this is aimed at Chihkiang (Yuanchow), where there is an airfield. A Chungking military spokesmen said that the Japanese were using 60,000 men in the advance on Chihkiang; they were moving on the city from the north and east, but that the Chinese, aided by American aircraft, were resisting stubbornly and had badly mauled the Japanese centre column (Chungking Radio, 20th April).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The habitual air of expectancy in the United States has been more than usually tense during the last week—the big news from the European theatre, the final preparations for the San Francisco Conference, the first steps of the new President, have all been eagerly awaited and canvassed. Jubilation over the Russian entry into Berlin has been sobered by a quick corrective to over-optimism from S.H.A.E.F. On the 21st April General Eisenhower's Chief-of-Staff told war correspondents that the junction of American and Russian armies in the heart of Germany would not mean the end of the war in Europe, "on the contrary, there may be much more bitter fighting and heavy casualties." Every newspaper in the United States has carried gruesome pictures and stories from Buchenwald and other prison camps overrun by the advancing armies. These have strengthened the demand for a hard peace and for a stricter interpretation of the Geneva Convention in the treatment of German prisoners of war. The Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives is conducting a full investigation of this subject, while a delegation of twelve Congressmen, together with seventeen newspaper editors and publishers, are flying to Germany to see conditions in concentration camps for themselves. Considerable impatience with the "farce" of the War Crimes Commission is expressed in such liberal papers as the Washington Post, which demand prompt trial of captives like Von Papen and Krupp von Bohlen.

At his first press conference on the 17th April President Truman announced that the Roosevelt custom of frequent meetings of this kind would be continued, probably once a week. The new President made a very good impression on the large crowd of journalists by his confident manner and candid answers to numerous questions. His selection of Charles G. Ross, an old school-mate and seasoned Radical of the St. Louis Post Despatch, to be his Press Secretary from the 15th May, is popular with newspapermen. Other changes in his entourage are the appointment of Matthew J. Connelly from Massachusetts as his Senior Secretary; and a last-war friend, Colonel Harry H. Vaughan, as his Military Aide. Leading members of the late President's personal staff—Mr. Stephen Early, Mr. Hassett, Judge Rosenman and Mr. Jonathan Daniels, have been asked to stay by the new President "until everything is organised and his own staff trained." The only important nomination so far is that of Mr. John W. Snyder, a Missouri banker, to the post of Federal Loan Administrator left vacant by President Roosevelt's appointment of Judge Vinson as War Mobilisation Director.

Indications of closer collaboration between the Executive and Legislature are increasingly apparent. The action of the new President in attending a lunch with leading Senators of both parties, soon after taking the oath of office, was hailed as the beginning of a new "era of good feeling." President Truman has also invited Senator McKellar, who now presides over the Senate, to attend Cabinet meetings. Although Vice-Presidents have in the past attended cabinets, an invitation to the President pro tempore of the Senate is believed to be without precedent. Eight Republican Senators, headed by Senator Taft and appointed by the party members in the Senate, waited on the President on the 18th April "to pledge their loyalty to him and offer to consult with him at any time." Making a final appearance in the Senate before his departure for the San Francisco Conference, Senator Connally publicly congratulated Mr. Truman on his swift grasp of the foreign situation and thanked him for his support to the American delegation. It can be said that for the moment the sense of national unity is very strong. Even the isolationist McCormick–Patterson press has promised not to attack the new President for three, possibly six, months.

President Truman early decided not to attend the San Francisco Conference in person, but to broadcast a formal welcome to the delegates. He declared that he had a competent delegation and that he would stay at his desk where he belonged. The American delegation finished its daily deliberations at Washington on the 18th April and announced agreement on all major points. Senators Vandenberg and Connally have both indicated that they expect differences of opinion between members to be resolved privately, so that the delegation will continue to speak with one voice at the Conference table. They reserve the right to speak as individuals, however, and to freedom of action. Mr. Cordell Hull, on the advice of his physician, has announced that he will be unable to attend the opening sessions, but he hopes that his health will permit him to join in the discussions later. Forty-two American organisations have been invited to send "consultants" to the United States delegation at San Francisco. They include the Chambers of Commerce and Industry, professional and labour unions, veterans, farmers and women's organisations, religious groups, educational associations, rotary clubs and the like. Most of them have amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals to suggest, though all favour the scheme as a whole. The Roman Catholic hierarchy in the United States on the 14th April again strongly denounced Marxist tendencies, urged an international Bill of Rights, and uttered a warning of the fate in store for all settlements which ignore the rights of small nations and the principles of justice.

Of some significance for the San Francisco Conference is the Senate vote on the Mexican Water Treaty, which was approved on the 18th April by a vote of 76 to 10. Though Californians are a little perturbed by what they consider over-generous treatment of Mexico in allocating the water-power of the Colorado and Rio Grande, there is general praise for this further manifestation of the "good neighbour" policy. The insertion of reservations, which, according to the State Department, "clarify certain provisions but do not impair the rights and obligations of the United States," is regarded in some quarters as somewhat ominous. If, the argument runs, the Senate is still going to assert its authority by amending or adding reservations to even a happily-concluded minor treaty of this kind, what may happen to more controversial agreements emanating from San Francisco?

LATIN AMERICA.

The death of President Roosevelt was received in Latin America with deep and sincere grief. The President was identified in Latin America with the "Good Neighbour" policy and no American statesman has so deeply engaged the affections and trust of the Latin American peoples. Even in Argentina, whose relations with the United States had so long been strained, the flood of tributes on the radio and in the press were characterised by their obvious sincerity. The only exceptions were the Nationalist-Catholic Pueblo and the ex-enemy Fronda, representing a small but apparently irreconcilable hard core of recalcitrant opinion.

A United States mission led by Mr. Avra Warren visited Buenos Aires from the 19th to the 21st April for talks with the Argentine Government, covering military and economic matters arising from Argentina's declaration of war. Mr. Warren told His Majesty's chargé d'affaires that the Argentine requirements had been on the whole reasonable, though some of their economic requests were excessive. They had drawn attention to the fact that the bulk of Argentine trade was with Great Britain and seemed to expect the United States to do something to modify this. Mr. Warren, however, made it clear that the United States Government accepted this situation. As regards the eventual recognition of the U.S.S.R., Colonel Perón appears to have made an approach to the Russian legation in Montevideo, and it is understood that negotiations are in progress in Washington. Meanwhile the Argentine Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs saw fit to inform the press that the possibility of Argentina's signing the United Nations pact and subsequent invitation to San Francisco had been considered and that negotiations had been "satisfactorily begun."

It is still, of course, questionable whether Colonel Perón will succeed in remaining in power in Argentina. His endeavours to secure the sympathy of labour have deeply embroiled him with management, and members of the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange are reported to have gone to General Farrell with strong complaints against him. He is also said to be at odds with the President himself. Meanwhile a strike in the frigorificos continues, and is affecting food supplies for Europe. Colonel Perón maintains that the obstacle to a solution is the "unreasonable" attitude of the employers, and claims that the workers would return if he told them to. It therefore rests with him to find a speedy solution. Indeed, according to broadcasts, the Government have now asked the workers to return and have promised to consider their grievances: the benefits of the Labour Charter have also been applied to the frigorífico workers by decree. Meanwhile, further disturbances are reported from the University of La Plata, where students are on strike and demand the removal of the rector, Dr. Labougle (see Summary No. 285). The Government, according to the Buenos Aires radio, has taken control of the university and has appointed an interventor.

In Brazil President Vargas signed a decree on the 18th April by which an amnesty was granted to all persons detained for political offences committed since July 1934. It is reported that those deemed guilty of common crimes or crimes against the security of the State committed during the war period are excluded, and that military and civil commissions will judge whether or not released members of the armed forces and civil service may be reinstated when vacancies occur: no claims for arrears of salary or indemnity are to be entertained. According to broadcast reports, about 600 persons were released on the following day, including the Communist leader Carlos Luis Prestes, who has been in prison for ten years; Dr. Oswaldo Aranha has assumed the presidency of the Sociedade Amigos de América (it will be recalled that his association with this group was one of the causes of his fall last autumn. (See Summary No. 256); and the opposition candidate, Brigadier-General Gomes, has opened his campaign with a demand for the transference of the executive power to the President of the Supreme Court as a guarantee of free expression in the elections.

In Chile President Rios is again cabinet-making. As a result of the rightward swing in the recent elections (see Summary No. 285), the new Cabinet will probably be based on the Radicals, Liberals, Democrats and Agrarians, with whose leaders the President is conferring. The opposition would thus be formed by the Conservatives on the Right, and the Socialists and Communists on the Left: in any case, the fate of the Government's measures would appear to lie in the hands of a few independents.

Diplomatic and consular relations have been established between the U.S.S.R. and Bolivia (18th April) and the U.S.S.R. and Guatemala (19th April). Twelve of the twenty Latin American Republics have now taken this step.

GERMANY.

THE week has seen great victories for all the Allied forces. Bremen has been taken by the British; Munich—home of the Nazi movement—by the Americans; Berlin almost completely reduced by the Russians. Milan, Turin, Genoa, Venice and almost all northern Italy have been captured, with valuable partisan aid, by the Allied armies of Italy. The link-up between American and Russian forces in Central Germany has been strengthened and a new junction in the region of Linz is in sight. Everywhere, piecemeal, yet often fighting desperately, the armed forces of Germany are being ground to pieces. At this moment of supreme crisis in the fortunes of the Wehrmacht, upon which German hope and pride have been based, the news has been broadcast that Adolf Hitler, Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces, Führer and Reichschancellor, has died amongst the ruins of Berlin.

The announcement was made, after suitable musical preparation, at 10·25 p.m. on Tuesday night (1st May). It was followed by a broadcast from Admiral Dönitz, who said that Hitler "recognised beforehand the terrible danger of Bolshevism and devoted his life to fighting it. At the end of this, his battle, stands his death as a hero in the capital of the Reich." Dönitz continued, "The Führer has appointed me as his successor . . . . It is my first task to save the German people from destruction by the Bolsheviks and it is only to achieve this that the fight continues. As long as the British and Americans hamper us from reaching this end we shall fight and defend ourselves against them as well." On assuming the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces Dönitz issued an Order of the Day on closely similar lines. It ended with the very significant passage, "The oath of allegiance you swore to the Führer is now valid for each one of you without further formality to myself, as the successor appointed by the Führer. German soldiers do your duty. The life of our people is at stake." No details of the composition of Dönitz's Government have yet been published, except that a Hamburg broadcast on the 2nd May announced that Schwerin von Krosigk, the somewhat colourless but "respectable" Minister of Finance in both Papen's and Hitler's Governments, has replaced Ribbentrop as Foreign Minister.

It is possible that we are faced with the "Great Lie" advocated in Mein Kampf, that, as the Moscow radio has suggested, Hitler is still alive, and that the Nazis are engaged in a gigantic bluff to cover their retreat into a safe obscurity. But this view has inherent improbabilities. The announcements of Hitler's death and of Dönitz's succession follow on the news that Himmler had offered, at an interview with Count Bernadotte, the head of the Swedish Red Cross, on the 24th April, the unconditional surrender of Germany to Great Britain and America on the understanding that fighting would continue against the Russians. In communicating this offer to the Russian Government the Prime Minister made it clear that it was his intention to send a reply to the effect that surrender must be made to all Three Powers. The President sent a similar message. As a result of a leakage in the American press a statement was issued from No. 10 Downing Street on the 28th April, which reaffirmed that Britain and the United States "will not accept unconditional surrender except on behalf of all the Allies, including Russia." Since the news of Himmler's offer was published a spate of wild rumour has flooded the press, but it has now been announced (2nd May) from Stockholm that Count Bernadotte has returned from a second visit to Germany without seeing Himmler and without bringing any further offer from him.

It is known that, at his interview with Bernadotte on the 24th April, Himmler professed himself able to answer for the acceptance of surrender by the German forces and that he said that Hitler was desperately ill and would not live more than two days. A member of his staff said that Hitler was suffering from cerebral hæmorrhage. Two days earlier it had been announced that Göring, designated successor to the Führer on the 1st September, 1939, had resigned on account of heart disease and that his place as head of the Luftwaffe had been taken by Generaloberst Ritter von Greim. No mention was made of Göring's other posts—Head of the Four-Years' Plan, Minister-President of Prussia, &c.—or of any successors to him in these capacities. The fact that, at such a moment of crisis, so prominent a Nazi leader as Göring should be allowed to resign, that his resignation should be announced at all and that it should be attributed to so convenient an ailment as "heart disease" is certainly not without significance. It is not improbable that he is already either in custody or dead or has fled.

There is, at first sight, a superficial contrast between Himmler's conditional offer of unconditional surrender and Dönitz's defiant proclamations of continued resistance. But there is no necessary contradiction between them. For Dönitz qualifies his defiance towards the Western Allies by saying "as long as the British and Americans hamper us" (i.e., in fighting Bolshevism) "we shall fight and defend ourselves against them as well." His proclamation, in fact, is in line with the political strategy of Himmler's offer—a final gamble on the hope of splitting the Western Allies from Russia.

No facts are at present available to explain the relation between Dönitz and Himmler. It appears unlikely that Dönitz either could or would have declared himself Hitler's successor without Himmler's knowledge and consent, if only because the support of the S.S. would be necessary to maintain any serious resistance to the Allies even in those maritime areas still unoccupied—Kiel, Denmark and Southern Norway—where Dönitz's authority as Grossadmiral and Commander-in-Chief of the Navy is strongest. It is, of course, possible, since in such a régime anything is possible, that Himmler himself has been "liquidated." But it may be that he realised that, whilst he could inspire terror, he could not arouse the emotional loyalty of the German people and that he yielded the succession to Dönitz, the strongest supporter of the Nazis amongst the military leaders, on the ground that he had a better chance than any available party figure —e.g., Goebbels or Bormann—of retaining control of the Wehrmacht as a whole. Yet, at present, Himmler has given no public support to Dönitz as he might have been expected to do both in his capacity as Reichsführer S.S. and as Commander-in-Chief of the home forces. The possibility that he has either gone underground himself, or that he has gone to one of the areas in Saxony, the Protectorate or Austria as yet unoccupied by the Allies, to reappear as a rival to Dönitz cannot be excluded.

There can be no certainty at present—and Dönitz's sentence about the oath of loyalty already quoted from his Order of the Day shows his own misgiving—that the Wehrmacht will accept the new Führer. The personal oath of loyalty to the Supreme Commander has always been an important factor, impressed by ceremonial, in the cohesion of the German Army. In a situation where any excuse for surrender must be welcome, Dönitz's claim that the loyalty expressed in the oath must be transferred to him "ohne weiteres" may not be accepted by at least some of them. There can be little doubt, in any case, that the announcement of Hitler's death will tend to hasten the German collapse.

From Bavaria has come this week news of an organised attempt to defy the Nazis in the original home of the movement. The Munich wireless transmitter, for some five hours on the morning of the 28th April, broadcast appeals for surrender from a "Bavarian Freedom Movement." How much support this body had within the city is not known, but Giesler, Gauleiter of Bavaria, denounced "the small clique at present broadcasting treasonable news north of the Danube" and in the course of the same day it was stated that "ruthless action" had put things right in a few hours and that all Party offices and key-points were "in loyal hands." During its brief period of publicity the Freedom Movement claimed to have "taken over the powers of Government" and to be led "at the battle-front" by the Statthalter of Bavaria, General Ritter von Epp, one of the earliest influential supporters of the Nazi movement.

As Hitler's Reich disintegrates and communications between the different regions become increasingly disrupted it might have been expected that the Gauleiters would play an important part in rallying their people to resist to the last, in accordance with Nazi policy. In some cases they appear to have done so. Goebbels, as Gauleiter of Berlin, appears to be active in the city, and (until the 26th) continued to broadcast appeals to the population over the Drahtfunk. Hanke still holds out in Breslau, and for his "inspiring example" to the rest of the Reich, was awarded the Gold Cross by Hitler on the 11th April. The same honour was bestowed upon Holz on the 19th, after he had stated that he would remain "to fight and die" in Nürnberg. Mutschmann was said to be in Dresden on the 20th. Eggeling is the only one who has been described as having "died a hero's death." He was reported killed in the fighting in Halle on the 19th April. His deputy, Tesche, was expelled from the Party and degraded by Hitler's order, because he telephoned to Hitler's H.Q. asking permission to break off the fight. Giesler seems to have been on the spot in Munich to quell the revolt there. In Austria Eigruber broadcasts daily from Linz, issuing appeals and warnings to the people.

But others have either been killed or have fled. Schirach has not been heard of since the 7th April, when he issued his last order before the fall of Vienna. Koch (East Prussia) and Bracht (Upper Silesia) fled early in the Russian advance. In the west, Florian (Düsseldorf) declared on the 9th April that Schlessmann (acting-Gauleiter of Essen in Terboven's absence), Grohé (Köln-Aachen), Hoffmann (Westfalen-Süd), and he were in their Gaus—and claims that he had himself returned through the American lines to his post. But there has been little evidence to support this claim, which was probably designed to combat rumours among the civilian population that the Nazi leaders had deserted their posts. Kaufmann who also holds the post of Reich Commissioner for Shipping, is reported to be in Oslo and Uiberreither (Steiermark) in Vorarlberg. There is, indeed, evidence that the higher officers of the S.S. have been given secret orders to withdraw before capture and to join the underground resistance movement. The fact that none of the "resistant" Gauleiters, whose Gaue have been overrun, has been announced as captured suggests that, despite Hitler's public orders, Himmler may have instructed them to disappear in order to live "to fight another day."

AUSTRIA.

While the Russian armies have made little further progress in Austria the Western Allies have advanced to the south-east and American forces have crossed the Austrian frontier near Passau. A North German Home Service broadcast on the 29th April said that fighting was crystallising round the Alps, between Lake Constance and the Ammersee, and in the Danube valley. Eigruber, broadcasting from Linz on the 28th, claimed that the Russians had not made any further progress in the last eight days, and that German forces had even regained some ground. The situation on the border between Oberdonau and Bavaria, however, had become more acute. But he did not encourage "total resistance," or Werewolf tactics—"fighting is the concern of the soldiers and the Volkssturm."

Local government is being rapidly re-established in Austria. The Soviet Service for Austria broadcast on the 28th April that "Vienna has a Mayor again, and its own administration." The Mayor is General Körner, a professional soldier, who is also a Social-Democrat and was an organiser of the Social-Democrat para-military organisation—the Schutzbund. His two deputies are Leopold Kunschak (one of the Ministers of State in the Provisional Government), and Karl Steinhardt, a Communist.

The outstanding event of the week in the political field was the unexpected emergence of an Austrian "Provisional Government." The proclamation by the Soviet Government to the Austrians on the 8th April expressed the Russian desire to see established an "independent Austrian Government and a democratic régime in accordance with the terms of the Moscow declaration." It has been assumed, however, in earlier discussions between the "Big Three" that self-government in Austria would have to be gradually built up again with the joint co-operation of the occupying Powers, beginning with local government, and that this would take some time after the occupation of Austria. At present only a part of Austria is as yet occupied by the Russians and, for obvious reasons, the holding of elections will be impossible for some time to come.

The announcement by the Russians, on the 28th April, that a Provisional Government had been formed for Austria under Dr. Karl Renner came as a surprise to Russia's Allies, who had only been informed a few days earlier that Dr. Renner was in touch with the Russian High Command, that he desired to form a provisional Austrian Government representing all parties, and that the Russians did not feel disposed to prevent him doing so. The proclamation of Dr. Renner's committee as a Provisional Government, without further consultation with Great Britain or the United States, has been met by a refusal of the State Department to recognise the new Government and by a protest from this country against such unilateral action. The membership of the new "Government" is distributed between the two major Austrian parties (Christian-Social and Social Democrat) of the pre-Dollfuss era, together with the Communists. Dr. Renner himself, who is 74 years old, is the most distinguished survivor of the Social Democrats of Austria. He was Chancellor of the new Republic from February 1919 to June 1920 and, as Foreign Minister also, headed the Austrian delegation to the Peace Conference. From April 1931 to March 1933 he was President ("Speaker") of the Austrian National Council (Lower House). He was arrested during the suppression of the Socialists by Dollfuss in February 1934 but was later amnestied. He has always had a reputation for moderation and willingness to compromise, but both in 1918 and in March 1938, after Hitler had overrun Austria, he was an advocate of the Anschluss. The Social Democrats are also represented by Lieut.-Colonel Winterer (Armed Forces), a regular soldier and a former leader of the Social Democrat Schutzbund, and by the Ministers for Food (Kort) and Social Welfare (Böhm). The most important Christian Social Ministers are Leopold Kuntschak (Minister of State), a prominent member of the genuinely democratic wing of his party, but himself the same age as Dr. Renner, and Eduard Heinl, twice Minister of Commerce before 1934, and an anti-Nazi. The three Communists are Johann Koplenig (Minister of State), Chairman of the Austrian Communist Party, an exile since 1934; Ernst Fischer (Education), a former Social Democrat, who fled to Russia after February 1934 and has regularly broadcast from Moscow; and Franz Horner, another exile since 1934, who holds the key post of Minister of the Interior. There are also two non-party Ministers, Dr. Gerl (Justice) and Dr. Zimmermann (Finance).

While agreement in principle has been reached regarding the allocation of zones of occupation in Austria, difficulties have arisen over the allocation of zones in Vienna between the four Powers to be represented in the Control Commission. In response to Marshal Stalin's suggestion (see P.I. Summary 290) that the matter should be settled on the spot, British, American and French delegations have been preparing to go to Vienna; but the Russians are now taking the line that the Mission can only go in when agreement has been reached in the E.A.C. on the question of zones and provisional control machinery. The question is being taken up in Moscow.

A Yugoslav request to be allowed to participate in the occupation of Austria was refused by the Allied Governments. The Austro-Yugoslav frontier question is coming increasingly to the fore. An "Austrian Battalion" forms part of the Yugoslav partisan forces in Slovenia, and Yugoslav sources assert that representatives from it have expressed their gratitude for Yugoslav arms and assistance, and a wish that "the Slovene people should have all the rights belonging to it." "We know, therefore," the speaker is asserted to have said, "that our frontiers must be altered to the advantage of Slovenia." This "advantage" appears to include Villach and Klangenfurt, and the Yugoslav claim is now supported by the presence of some Slovene troops on Austrian soil in this area, where a Slovene partisan force had operated last year but had received little local support and had been withdrawn in September 1944.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Three highly important victories by the Soviet and Czechoslovak troops have this week dimmed whatever hopes the Nazis entertained of holding the approaches to the Bohemian bastion. Brno, the capital of Moravia and a great industrial city controlling the south-eastern approaches, fell on the 26th April. Moravská-Ostrava, capital of the Silesian industrial complex and guardian of the Moravian Gateway, was entered on the 30th. The same day saw the occupation of Zilina, key town on the River Vah through which pass all the direct communications from the eastern part of the Republic to Bratislava and beyond. Cheb (Eger), the frontier town near Aš, controlling the main routes from Bavaria into Bohemia, was entered by United States troops on the 27th, while other American forces (now joined by a Czechoslovak Tank Brigade from the West) have closed most of the escape routes further south along the whole of the Bavarian frontier. These have penetrated into the Bohemian Forest at Maxberg only 40 km. from the great arsenal city of Plzeň.

The precarious military situation and last minute hopes of escape have driven the Protectorate quislings to attempt an approach to the United States armies. On the 30th April Reichsprotektor Frank, addressing "Czech fellow-citizens" made a long speech against the Košice Government and the U.S.S.R., and emphasised that the Protectorate in common with Germany was struggling against "the enemies of Western culture." A few hours later, Radio Luxembourg reported that Minister Bienert, with the approval of Frank, was seeking to throw Bohemia open to an occupation by General Patton's armies. The Košice radio immediately denied the right of Bienert to act in the name of the Czech nation.

The familiar aftermath of German occupation forms the background of events in the liberated territories. Czechoslovak citizens are being repatriated from prison camps such as Buchenwald (1,200 persons, including Dr. Zenkl the last Lord Mayor of Prague) and Oswieczim (253) aided by the Czechoslovak representative of the War Crimes Commission and the Polish Czechoslovak Union, as well as by the military governments concerned. Army units forced to serve the Nazis in North Italy appealed on Milan Free Radio for instructions to enable them to join the Czechoslovak Armed Forces. Košice radio reported on the 26th April that several hundred political prisoners were hurriedly executed at Bratislava before the entry of the Red army, and at least 4,000 Jews were massacred across the Danube in the suburb of Petrzalka. Of 141,996 Jews (official 1937 estimate) only 5,000 now remain in Slovakia. Mass graves which are being investigated in central Slovakia give evidence of the usual brutality handed out by the Germans in quelling the Slovak rising of last autumn. The Press and Radio report numerous tributes paid by the Government and the Slovak National Council to these partisans. General Svoboda announced that partisans were being absorbed into the newly-constituted Army and some were already attached to officers' training units.

M. Nosek, Minister for the Interior, is visiting Carpatho-Ukraine for the purpose of gathering information on the progress of reconstruction in that part of the Republic.

POLAND.

There is still no information as to the whereabouts of the fifteen representative Poles who, as reported in Summary No. 288, met with Red army representatives in Poland more than a month ago, on the 28th March.

At the San Francisco Conference the question of inviting a representative of the Warsaw "Provisional Government" has again been raised by M. Molotov (see under "United Nations"). No progress in arrangements for the projected New Polish Provisional Government has yet been announced.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 25th April Marshal Vassilievsky's troops captured Pillau, "the last stronghold of the German defence on the Samland Peninsula" west of Königsberg. Marshal Rokossovsky's troops of the Second Byelorussian Front took Stettin on the 26th April, and have since advanced rapidly. Prenzlau fell on the 27th April, Neubrandenburg on the 29th April, and on the 30th April the coastal town of Greifenwald, 70 miles north-west of Stettin. Potsdam was occupied on the 27th April, and Marshal Zhukov's troops reached Rathenow, 40 miles west of the centre of Berlin. To the south Marshal Koniev's troops have taken Wittenberg and Torgau. The capture of Berlin by the armies of Marshal Zhukov and Marshal Koniev was announced by Marshal Stalin on the 2nd May. Across the northern border of Slovakia Moravska Ostrava was captured on the 30th April, and Marshal Malinovsky's troops have leapt forward to take Brno on the 26th April. No advance has been reported from Austria.

On the 27th April an Order of the Day from Marshal Stalin and a salute of 24 salvoes from 324 guns in Moscow greeted the link-up of the Red Army with the American First Army at Torgau. In a message to the Soviet and Allied troops on this occasion Marshal Stalin reiterated that "our task and our duty are to complete the destruction of the enemy, to force him to lay down his arms and surrender unconditionally."

On the 1st May Marshal Stalin issued his usual Order of the Day. In this he declared that in three to four months the Germans had lost on the Soviet front over 800,000 prisoners and about 1 million killed, as well as a vast quantity of equipment. The Marshal recorded that in these battles Polish, Yugoslav, Czechoslovak, Bulgarian and Roumanian troops had advanced "shoulder to shoulder with the Red Army." Now "Germany is completely isolated and stands alone, if one excludes her ally—Japan." Her attempts to sow dissension among the Allies by peace-feelers were doomed to complete failure. "Mendacious German propaganda," Marshal Stalin continued, "is frightening the German population with absurd stories that the United Nations want to destroy the German people. The destruction of the German people does not form part of the tasks of the United Nations. The United Nations will destroy fascism and German militarism, will sternly punish war criminals, and will compel the Germans to give compensation for the damage inflicted upon other countries. But the United Nations do not touch, and will not touch, the civilian population of Germany, if it will loyally carry out the demands of the Allied military authorities." Marshal Stalin concluded by urging Red Army men to "be particularly vigilant beyond the boundaries of our country," and to "maintain as before the honour and dignity of the Soviet warrior." He ordered a salute of 20 artillery salvoes to be fired in the 16 capitals of the Union republics," and also in "the heroic cities of Leningrad, Stalingrad, Sevastopol and Odessa."

On the 30th April Colonel-General Golikov, Commissioner of the Council of People's Commissars for Repatriation, made a number of detailed allegations against the Wesetrn Allies of dilatoriness in the repatriation of liberated Soviet prisoners of war, and of bad conditions in the camps in which they were detained, particularly in Egypt. He maintained that Russian behaviour to Allied prisoners provided a striking contrast, seeing that practically all the British and American prisoners had already returned home. Many of the Colonel-General's points are much exaggerated; and it must be remembered that transport for returning prisoners of war, British and Soviet, was provided by British ships. In this connexion it is interesting to note that the Soviet Government have now proposed (30th April) that since the link-up of the Allied armies exchange of prisoners should take place in Germany itself, and that they should then be repatriated direct overland, avoiding the circuitous sea route.

Mr. Drew Pearson's recent statement in the American Daily Mirror, that American troops had withdrawn from the neighbourhood of Berlin because of a previous agreement that the Russians should be first in the German capital, was vigorously denied by Tass (25th April), which maintained that the report was an invention from beginning to end.

On the 29th April Tass confirmed from the Soviet side Mr. Churchill's statement that Great Britain and the United States had refused to consider Himmler's offer of unconditional surrender and had insisted that such an offer could only be accepted if made to all the Allies including the Soviet Union.

Leaflets circulated to the San Francisco Conference by the Governments of Ukrainian and Byelorussian Republics put forward the claims of these Republics not only to join the World Organisation but to participate in the Conference itself. The Ukrainian statement claimed participation on the grounds not only of the constitutional amendments of March 1944 providing the Republic with the right to establish direct relations with foreign States, but also on the ground of its population of 40 million, its area, and its sufferings not only during the present war but during the past thirty years, which made the Ukraine one of the States most interested in safeguarding its security against aggressors. The important contribution of the Ukraine to victory in the present struggle, both through its regular troops, which formed one-fifth of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R., and through its gallant partisans, provided the concluding argument. The Byelorussian claim ran on very similar lines. For the decision to admit these republics, and for the attitude of the U.S.S.R. to the San Francisco Conference in general see under "United Nations."

For the Soviet statement on the formation of the Austrian Provisional Government see under "Austria."

The most ominously outspoken criticism of the Kuomintang régime which has yet appeared in the Soviet Union is published in the current number of The War and the Working Class. In an article "Whither China?" M. Avarin criticises attempts by the reactionary Kuomintang leaders to thwart a democratic union of the country for war purposes, and their efforts to hold up economic, political and cultural developments. M. Avarin says that extremely influential Kuomintang elements are stubbornly perpetuating Chinese backwardness, while Japanese victories were helped by Kuomintang defections. Chungking territory is stated to be in economic chaos; "window-dressing, parasitism, bureaucracy, corruption and abuse of power are widespread." Reforms proposed by the Chinese Communist Party are then outlined, including what is described as "real democracy" and "the liquidation of Kuomintang dictatorship." The article concludes with the warning that "unless urgent measures for the democratisation of political life and the creation of national unity are carried out, China cannot occupy the place in the comity of democratic nations that she ought."

The eleventh session of the Supreme Soviet was opened on the 24th April by M. Nikolai Shvernik, chairman of the Council of Nationalities, who devoted his inaugural speech to the memory of the late President Roosevelt. The Law on the State Budget of the U.S.S.R. for 1945 as submitted by the Council of People's Commissars was unanimously adopted at this session, with the incorporation of some amendments proposed by the Budget Commission of the Supreme Soviet. The budget for the current year accordingly stands at 308 milliard roubles (see Summary No. 226 for account of the 1944 budget). The provisional estimates of the execution of the 1944 budget as laid before the Supreme Soviet by the People's Commissar for Finance, M. Zverev, show that revenue exceeded 268 milliard roubles (or 106 per cent. of the planned figure), while expenditure rose to 263 milliard roubles (or 105 per cent. of the planned figure). The 1945 budget followed the now conventional pattern of Soviet planned finance. 45·1 per cent. of the entire budgetary expenditure in the current year (137·9 milliard roubles, corresponding to the amount actually spent under this heading in 1944) is allocated to defence requirements. It may be noted that for the first time since the beginning of the Soviet-German war, the U.S.S.R. State Budget for 1945 includes budgets for all the republics of the Union. A larger percentage of revenue from the State Loan and from the war tax will be passed on this year to the Republican and local budgets than previously.

In a recent talk broadcast during Red Army Hour, Academician E. D. Tarle stressed at length certain themes which have frequently recurred in Soviet propaganda in the last phase of the war. The subject of this talk was "The Historical Merits of the Peoples of the Soviet Union before Mankind." "The world will never forget," declared Professor Tarle, "that it is from the Soviet peoples and from them only that the salvation of world civilisation has come." He then analysed in detail his country's "previous historical merits before Europe," concluding that they "pale before the Soviet people's deeds in this war." Finally, the question is asked: what is the main source of our power? "It is the Soviet rule and the powerful Bolshevik party which united all the peoples of our country in a selfless struggle against the German invaders." In a talk some months ago Professor Tarle stated that the Russian people have never exercised such a powerful influence on world history as at the present time. In extolling "the superiority of Soviet civilisation" (Tarle) and setting the military achievements of the Red Army in a framework of "the Soviet conscience" and "the moral countenance of our people" (President Kalinin), this line of propaganda seems aimed at countering criticism of Soviet methods in occupied Europe.

SCANDINAVIA.

There has lately been evidence of a significant change of front in the Quisling ranks in Norway. Whereas until recently everything was done to urge the party to prepare for a last ditch resistance on the side of Germany and to encourage active participation in the German war, the note now struck is an appeal to the Norwegian people to observe strict neutrality. There is a report from Stockholm, so far unconfirmed, that the Quisling "Government" has resigned and will be reconstituted with a view to the pursuance of a neutral policy. A curious article in Aftenposten, the 27th April, on this subject, distinguishes between the Norwegian State and the Nasjonal Samling Party and attributes to Quisling himself a kind of dual personality. "It is the N.S. Party," says this paper, "not the neutral Norwegian State, which sponsors the Front Volunteer Movement. When Quisling appears in connexion with Front Volunteers it is in his capacity as N.S. Party Leader not as Norwegian Minister-President." To such subtlety has the art of "rowing" now been reduced in Norway.

German sea communications round Scandinavia have been seriously affected by the exodus to Sweden of practically all the pilots of Norway, and a number of those of Denmark, on secret instructions conveyed through the underground movements in those countries.

On the 23rd April, the Norwegian Government in London delivered a reply to the Swedish refusal of their request for mobilisation. It expresses disagreement with the view that this step might stimulate and consolidate German resistance, and considers on the contrary that it would be more calculated to increase the possibility of a German surrender without fighting. In any case, it points out, preparation beforehand is advisable, since a situation calling for Swedish intervention might occur very suddenly. A pronouncement on the same subject, which bears all the marks of official inspiration, occurs in Norsk Tidend of the 28th April. This makes the additional point that anyhow "the question as to what risk is to be taken to liberate Norway is primarily one for Norwegians to decide."

The Swedish Riksdag held a secret session on the 27th April to consider further this question of intervention in Norway. It is understood to have given very strong support to the attitude assumed by the Swedish Government. Similar support has been very generally accorded by the press, though there have been reports from apparently reliable sources to the effect that Sweden may be prepared to adopt a different policy if the Germans should attempt resistance in Norway after a general capitulation. It is not altogether certain how far the views of the Norwegian Government are shared in Norway; an attempt to estimate public opinion on this question about two months ago arrived at the result that the bulk of the population was opposed to an eleventh-hour intervention by Sweden. The situation, however, has since been materially modified. On the one hand, the case for saving Norway from a desperate campaign of destruction has grown stronger, on the other, it seems less probable than before that the German forces in the country will persist in a hopeless resistance in the circumstances which now seem likely to arise.

A report from Stockholm published in a London evening paper on the 1st May stated that the surrender of Denmark by the German forces had already begun and a Swedish commission was negotiating with Dr. Best for the disarmament and withdrawal of these troops. On the same day, however, D.P.T. stated that no change in Denmark's military or political status had taken place, though it did not dispute the fact of Swedo-German discussions in Denmark. A more categorical denial of the report was broadcast by General Lindemann on the 2nd May over the Danish radio. The situation is probably correctly appreciated in the following statement issued by representatives of the Danish Freedom Council in Stockholm: "Events in Denmark mark the beginning of voluntary German capitulation. But the formal and political consequences of this will not be seen until unconditional surrender is accepted by Britain, Russia and the United States."

The last German troops were withdrawn from Finnish soil on the 27th April. In a broadcast speech on the 29th April M. Paasikivi expressed his satisfaction with this development and also with the formation of the alliance between the three dominant political parties in the Diet, whom he described as having accepted the programme of the new Government. Most of his speech, however, was devoted to emphasising the serious dangers of inflation.

There is some uneasiness in Conservative and bourgeois circles in Finland at the occupation of key positions by members of the extreme Left. The choice of Mrs. Hela Vuolijoki to succeed M. Vakio, who was dismissed for political reasons, as manager of the Finnish broadcasting service, has aroused quite a storm of criticism, but has nevertheless been put into effect. Perhaps an even greater cause for misgiving is to be found in the report that M. Leino, the Communist Minister of the Interior, has handed over to the Soviet authorities at Porkkala a number of Russian refugees from the Czarist period who have been long resident in Finland with Nansen passports. The justification for this step is stated to be that the persons in question have been engaged, since 1918, in political activities directed against the Soviet Union, and that the deportees have been limited to such persons. On the other hand, it is said that these refugees formed a special democratic union, last autumn, with the object of precluding the action which now appears to have been taken.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The Allies have been able to convey some food to the sorely-tried inhabitants of the Occupied Netherlands. A broadcast in German from Radio Luxembourg announced on the 24th April that Allied aircraft would drop food and warned the Germans that any attempt to interfere with these aircraft was a crime against humanity. The news was conveyed to the Dutch in broadcasts from other stations. Radio Orange told them on the 25th that, although only limited supplies could be dropped by aircraft, there was reason to hope that food would also be brought them by other means. The announcement on the 26th that there would be some delay before food could be dropped inevitably caused bitter disappointment, which was reflected in a broadcast from the liberated Netherlands. However, the difficulties were soon overcome and, in accordance with arrangements made with the German Commander-in-chief, food was dropped near The Hague and Rotterdam and elsewhere on the 29th and 30th. It has been agreed that it will be distributed by the Dutch authorities.

Supplies are certainly badly needed. On the 28th—that is before the Allied planes had dropped any food—the free Dutch news agency stated that no more rations could be distributed after the 5th May (see also last Summary).

In a speech at San Francisco on the 28th, M. van Kleffens urged the Conference to proceed with its task as quickly as might be in a "spirit of sober optimism." In defining the Dutch standpoint he said: "We are ready to accept certain limitations of that more or less complete freedom of action which hitherto characterised the sovereign State. We should like to see these limitations accepted in the same measure by all States, great and small. If this cannot be obtained at once, and if, together with other medium and smaller States, we are to set an example in this respect, we shall be proud to do it. We fully recognise that, apart from the sovereign equality of peace-loving States, which is a legal concept, there are between them inequalities in the realm of facts which must duly be taken into account. Let me point out, however, that there is in another sense complete equality between larger and smaller States; good and just ideas may and do occur to either category without regard to size or power, and I need not remind anyone that the intrinsic force of good and just ideas is very great."

Much excitement was caused in Belgium by the publication of reports that King Leopold was expected to enter Switzerland very shortly. It was, however, officially denied that the Belgian Government had any news of the King's liberation. The Drapeau Rouge was moved by the reports of the King's return to print a leader stating that he was incapable of playing the part of a constitutional king and of being the centre of national unity; his abdication was imperative if dangerous dissensions were to be avoided. The Socialist daily, Le Peuple, published a leader entitled "Homage to the Regent," in which it argued that constitutional monarchy was a safeguard of national unity and highly praised the services of Prince Charles to Belgium during his regency. The publication of this article is particularly significant in view of the opinions which the Peuple recently (see Summary No. 289) expressed about King Leopold.

President Truman has conferred upon the Prince Regent the order of the Legion of Merit (Chief Commander).

FRANCE.

Mr. Churchill sent General de Gaulle a message of congratulation when the French First Army captured Ulm. Since then French troops have occupied Constance and Friedrichshafen and advanced to the Austrian border. On the Italian front they are reported to have penetrated beyond Bordighera.

A statement issued in Paris after the meeting of the French Council of Ministers on the 27th April said that the Council approved the maintenance at Stuttgart of French military government pending the conclusion of an agreement between the French and Allied Governments defining the limits of the French zone of occupation in Germany. This declaration was made after the publication of a report that the Allied Command had asked the French to evacuate Stuttgart, so that the town might be occupied by the Americans. Unofficial S.H.A.E.F. comment pointed out that the delimitation of zones of occupation was not within S.H.A.E.F.'s competence but that the delimitation of the boundaries of zones of operations between armies fighting side by side in the same area and pursuing the enemy under the strategic plan determined by Supreme Headquarters, depended on the commander of the army group, in this case General Devers, who would determine it in agreement with the army commanders under his orders. A subsequent official S.H.A.E.F. statement, issued on the 28th, said that Stuttgart was an important railway communications and supply centre, which was selected to serve the military requirements of the United States Seventh Army "so that the operations of that army in the defeat of the common enemy be facilitated." Should Stuttgart not be available "a less desirable and less efficient communications and supply centre" would have to be developed. A later Paris report that the Stuttgart incident had been satisfactorily settled presumably implies that the French are still in military control of the city, having successfully adhered to their determination (expressed by General de Gaulle in a press conference on the 25th October, 1944, see Summary No. 265) to undertake the military occupation of the territory they capture from the enemy.

Marshal Pétain, with his wife and a small entourage, entered France from Switzerland on the 26th April. He was met at the frontier by General Koenig, the Military Governor of Paris, and taken by special train to the wayside station of Igny, south of Paris, and thence by road under heavy guard to the fortress of Montrouge. The first reaction of the French press to the Marshal's return has been to regard it as "Hitler's V 5," a move carefully planned by the enemy to sow discord in France. The line taken at the Quai d'Orsay is that the Marshal's presence in France at this juncture may prove most embarrassing to General de Gaulle, since it will be used as a rallying point for supporters of Vichy and other collaborationists, and the parties of the Left will at the same time seize the opportunity to press for sterner measures of justice. It has in fact been reported that the Council of National Resistance has asked for special May Day demonstrations to demand the full application of its programme and the Marshal's immediate trial and execution.

General de Gaulle gave a broadcast speech on the 25th April which was mainly an enumeration of France's difficulties at home and abroad. In foreign affairs he once again complained that "our principal allies have not yet realised the necessity of treating with us concerning world affairs in the same way in which they treat with one another." The speech contained nothing new but was a review of France's position on the eve of the municipal elections which he said would restore to the Communes their traditional powers of local government, and would be followed, unless hostilities ceased, by departmental elections.

The municipal elections took place in some 32,000 of the 38,014 communes of France on the 29th April. Apart from the districts still in German occupation, there was no voting in the Haut-Rhin, Bas-Rhin, Moselle and Vosges on account of material difficulties and the impossibility of preparing electoral rolls. Results so far published indicate a marked swing to the Left in the big towns. Thus the Communists have obtained 27 and the Socialists 12 of the 90 seats in Paris, and elsewhere there have been considerable Communist and Socialist gains, apparently somewhat to the surprise of Government circles. The Left Catholic Mouvement Républicain Populaire has also made gains, mainly at the expense of the Right. MM. Billoux, Lacoste, de Menthon, René Mayer, Ramadier, Tanguy-Prigent and Tillon, are among the Ministers returned. In Lyons M. Herriot, who is now reported to have been liberated by the Red Army and to have arrived safely in Moscow with Mme. Herriot, was returned by an overwhelming vote, and it has already been suggested that he may be invited to take office if, as a result of the elections, General de Gaulle proceeds to a re-shuffle of his Cabinet.

SWITZERLAND.

The strict precautions at the Northern, Eastern and Southern frontiers continue. In conformity with international law, members and units of the German forces are being admitted when they reach the frontier with their arms—to be disarmed on Swiss soil. It is reported that entire German formations have been queueing up on the main road to the St. Gothard Pass, waiting to be interned On the Italian frontier Italian patriots have been demanding that the Germans surrender their arms and armoured cars and this has caused some difficulty to the Swiss authorities. Several thousand Russian ex-prisoners have reached the frontier in Eastern Switzerland and have been admitted.

It is officially reported that Mussolini reached the Swiss frontier at Chiasso in the early morning of the 26th April and was refused admission.

It transpires that, before he was permitted to cross the frontier, Marshal Pétain signed a written statement declaring that he would not ask for the right of asylum for himself or the members of his suite. There has been general approval in the Press of the decision to allow Marshal Pétain to traverse the country and to turn back Mussolini, Laval, Déat and other prominent refugees.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

On the 20th April the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires called at the Foreign Office in order to obtain further enlightenment on Anglo-Spanish relations (see Summary No. 285). In the absence of the Secretary of State the Marquess of Santa Cruz was received by Mr. Harvey who told him frankly that the record of the Spanish Government in the war was such that we could not easily forget those actions which, favouring our enemies, had been much to our detriment. And apart from the past policy of the Spanish Government, there was a further obstacle to friendly relations in the Falange Party, which to us seemed identical in character and aims with the Nazi and Fascist Parties which we had struggled to overthrow. The British people felt bitterly and strongly about this, and His Majesty's Government fully and fairly reflected their feelings. We had no hostility towards the Spanish people; on the contrary, we wished to foster friendly trade with a peaceful and prosperous Spain. We did not wish to interfere in Spanish domestic affairs, and the Spanish régime was a matter entirely for Spaniards. But so long as the present political situation continued Anglo-Spanish relations could be correct, but not cordial. The Spanish Chargé d'Affaires made it clear throughout that Mr. Harvey was preaching to the converted. But it is a far cry from the Spanish Embassy in Belgrave Square to the Palace of the Pardo outside Madrid.

In Portugal, though the situation is outwardly calm, dissatisfaction remains below the surface. Dr. Salazar's solution of the crisis in the early spring (see Summary No. 284), which seemed as inexplicable to the observer as the conjuror's trick with the Chinese rings, was achieved without any political concessions to the dissident elements in the Army, who appeared to accept in settlement a 15 per cent. increase in pay. The Army were not alone, of course, in their anxiety about the validity of Portuguese policy during the war; the aged President himself seemed in January to be wavering in his support of his brilliant and dogmatic Prime Minister. Dr. Salazar's recapture of General Carmona's absolute confidence was probably the chief factor in the personal triumph which he then achieved. The skill with which Dr. Salazar handled the most serious crisis of his régime—a crisis which certainly threatened to unseat him—the art he displayed in bringing the President round to his own view, and his uncanny adroitness in manœuvring his opponents into a seemingly spontaneous reaffirmation of unswerving loyalty were one more proof of his domination of the Portuguese people. He is indeed a giant among pygmies.

But, as Gulliver learnt to his discomfort, if a sufficient number of pygmies really make up their minds to tackle the giant there do occur opportunities, even though he may rarely slumber. The pygmies of the Portuguese opposition have plenty of grievances which chafe their minds a good deal more than a study of the press would reveal. They resent the persecution by the Policia de Vigilancia. They resent the heavy taxation, the high cost of living, the black market which favours the rich, and the corruption of the gremios (employers' associations); and they feel all the more angry when, knowing that the Portuguese State has done well out of the war, they see vast sums being spent on stadiums while hospitals are still lacking and the poor live in misery. When they look further afield they are conscious of the present inferiority of their country in the society of nations; they make much of the passive acceptance by the Government of the invasion of Timor and the assassination of Portuguese citizens by the Japanese. They feel that Portugal has suffered by comparison with her daughter Brazil in not declaring war on the Axis. And, fired by a thoroughly human ambition to enjoy freedom without responsibility—which is the Latin conception of democracy—they look enviously towards Great Britain and the United States, and are tempted to think that only a very little revolution would bring them the blessings of the Anglo-Saxon polity. Being perhaps rather more impressed than are the rest of us by the pronunciamentos of Don Juan and Señor Maura, they hope that Franco will not outlast Hitler, and that his departure will be followed by that of Salazar. It remains to be seen whether their high hopes are not being over-stretched. We know how clever Dr. Salazar is; but they have yet given no proof of either strength or determination. One thing, however, is tolerably certain. If Dr. Salazar ever becomes really convinced that he is no longer wanted by his people, he will withdraw into retirement as unostentatiously as 18 years ago he emerged from relative obscurity to control the fortunes of the Portuguese State. But he will take a lot of convincing.

ITALY.

This week has brought the virtual end of the war in North Italy. Practically all the main towns of the northern plain, from Genoa to Venice, have been freed, and at the time of writing the Allies have crossed the Piave. In several northern towns such as Milan, Genoa, Turin and Como the partisans themselves liberated the towns, and this has already done a great deal to stimulate self-confidence in the country. In accordance with the agreement already made between the Italian Government and the Allies, the Committee of National Liberation for North Italy has taken over the command until the Allies arrive. The Germans appear to have withdrawn so rapidly that less damage than was feared has, as far as can be ascertained at present, been done to hydro-electric power stations and public works. The port of Genoa is also said to be little damaged and can be used for shipping.

In Milan, contrary to Fascist claims before the event, little attempt was made to hold the town against the patriots, and the Committee of National Liberation took command on the 26th April and inaugurated broadcasts over the Free Milan Radio, issuing ordinances regarding the maintenance of public order, food distribution, the resumption of work in factories, schools, &c., and the repealing of Fascist laws. On the same day the Fascist-controlled broadcasts came to an end except for Trieste transmissions. Colonel Poletti, formerly Allied Regional Commissioner of Rome, who had already been designated Governor of Lombardy, has now arrived in Milan.

Not only has military resistance practically ceased in the North. The short-lived Italian Socialist Republic has also come to an end, with the extermination of Mussolini himself and many of the members of his Cabinet. Mussolini's original intention had been to make with his followers for a "redoubt" in the Val Tellina. But on the seizure of Milan by the patriots he appears to have abandoned this idea and made for the Swiss frontier. He was arrested near Como, together with several Fascist hierarchs, on the 27th April, and on the 28th April was condemned to death by a People's Tribunal and shot in the back by patriots. Other prominent Fascist leaders executed include Pavolini, Farinacci, Starace and Mezzasoma. Their bodies, 18 in all, were subsequently taken to Milan and exposed in the Piazza Loreto, where 15 patriots had recently been shot by the Fascists. The Italian Government has condoned these summary executions. The Northern Committee of Liberation subsequently issued a statement, taking full responsibility for "carrying out a judgment which had already been passed by history," but making it clear that there must be no more acts of violence.

Marshal Graziani, captured by patriots, is now in Allied hands.

Marshal Tito's troops are said to have entered Trieste and fierce street fighting is reported to be in progress (see under "Yugoslavia").

Signor Bonomi has suggested that he should supply a list of persons to the Allied Commission from which he would like prefects and chiefs of police in newly-liberated territory to be chosen. The Allied Commission have pointed out that it must be realised that the local Committee for National Liberation will have already appointed temporary officials. Although permanent appointments are subject to the approval of A.M.G., the appointment of Prefects locally unacceptable might cause disorder and even the breakdown of administration. Signor Bonomi has therefore been requested by the Allied Commission to propose a candidate for each particular post, but he has been informed that the A.M.G. officer must be free to use his discretion in the appointment either of a Government nominee or of a local C.N.L. candidate or, in certain circumstances, to make a personal choice among other local inhabitants. A.M.G. have been informed that they must do everything possible to secure the appointment of Government nominees providing the C.L.N. agrees.

Signor Togliatti is not finding the task of pleasing everybody easy. Some of the points he made in his speech to the National Council of the Party on the 7th April have, apparently, not been approved, and he has had to make a second speech in order to explain exactly what he did mean regarding the Regency, the Concordat and Italy's relations with Yugoslavia. Signor Togliatti explained that his proposal of a Regency only applied if the Constituent Assembly was unavoidably delayed and that even so he would not commit himself until he had had an opportunity to discuss the suggestion with the Communists in the North. The question of the Concordat had arisen because Signor Togliatti felt that the Church was using its religious power on the masses to influence their political opinions and principally against Communism. As regards Italo-Yugoslav relations Signor Togliatti said that reactionary and conservative forces were making use of the situation to disrupt a firm anti-Fascist front and to split the democratic front as well. In a third speech after the collapse of the German Army, Signor Togliatti emphasised the fact that, with the liberation of the North, changes in the Government were not sufficient, but that a complete transformation not only of the Government but also of policy was necessary.

The Italian Ambassador in London has been authorised to inform his Government that the use of French troops in Italy was solely dependent on military necessity and had no political significance. It appears, however, that, for military reasons, it will not be possible for French forces to penetrate to any depth into Italy.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Admiral Horthy has been found in Bavaria by American troops, who have taken him into protective custody.

The British Political Mission followed the Military Mission to Budapest and arrived there on the 24th April.

Further progress in the restoration of public services was marked by the proposed re-establishment of internal postal services in all districts except Transdanubia on the 1st May, and the resumption of broadcasts from Budapest on the same date. A low-powered transmission only was to be used and that for only six hours daily.

Substantial rises in workers' wages were to be introduced, wages of unskilled workers being increased by 130 per cent., of skilled workers by 110 per cent. and of miners by 180 per cent.

Roumania.

In the Summary of the 4th April, reference was made to the extension of Soviet control over the navigation of the Danube. There is no desire on our part to interfere with necessary measures during hostilities, but at the same time His Majesty's Government does not want to give the impression that we are not interested. In the opinion of the responsible officials on the spot, the course of events needs to be watched with some care. Under Article IX of the Armistice Roumania is under obligation to surrender to the Russians for the duration of the war, all Allied vessels in her ports. As was the case with the oilfields equipment, there are different views as to what is covered by this provision. Russia would like to include all Greek vessels. The Roumanian Ministry of Finance in conjunction with the Directorate of the Maritime Danube has drawn up a decree authorising a loan of one milliard lei for lengthening the dykes on the lower Danube and along the Sulina channel. At the same time the Soviet authorities have allowed the Administration of the Iron Gates and Cataracts to negotiate with the Roumanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs for 60 million lei for improvements from Turnul Severin to Moldova-Vecha.

There are still a good many mines left in the river, and the Russians would like our help in clearing these. They have been doing it themselves at the cost of lives and vessels belonging to the riparian States. The river could be used for the transport of goods for relief purposes, and also for general commercial traffic. We have not offered to help and the Russians appear to be reluctant to invite our assistance. A result of the present state of affairs may well provide an excuse for prolonging control of navigation.

Other trade matters are assuming importance. Experts in such matters feel that the time has come for development of trade with Roumania. Puchases by us would assist in the relief of Czechoslovakia and Poland as well as other countries. We are prepared to take in exchange amongst other goods, maize, window glass, timber and petroleum products, and such an arrangement would help Roumania to meet her obligations under the Armistice agreement. Meanwhile a Trade Delegation has left Bucarest for Moscow. Roumania is also prepared to make exchanges with Turkey which also would help in executing armistice obligations. For this permission has to be obtained from Russia, and no doubt the presence of a delegation in Moscow will forward a settlement of the question.

There is a considerable amount of political activity going on and there is an undercurrent of feeling that some members of the Government are not entirely acceptable to the Russians. There is some expectation that the Government may not survive for long.

A visit has been made by a doctor and some members of the Control Commission to a Soviet hospital in a provincial town. The report on this visit is of interest in showing that some common criticism of Soviet ways and methods is due to misunderstanding of a people with whom there has been little contact, and whose civilisation differs in many particulars from that of Western Europe. Here the Russians were dealing not with prisoners of war or internees in concentration camps, but with their own sick and wounded men. The party was shown round by an army medical officer. It was obvious that the visit had been carefully prepared for. Signs of recent cleaning were to be noticed everywhere, but when all was said and done, the condition of the wards fell so far below the standard expected in hospitals to which we are accustomed as to place it in a different category altogether. The visitors were shown round with evident pride, the conductor and staff being apparently quite unconscious of such things as the filthy condition of bedclothes, of the lack of proper sanitary arrangements, and of the childishness of the attempts at sterility. It was noticed that the hands and finger-nails of the nurses in charge of the sterilising room were far from clean. Truly, it takes all sorts to make a world—or to conquer one.

Yugoslavia.

The enemy appear to have completely evacuated Bosnia and Slavonia. Yugoslav forces have crossed the Italian frontier into Istria, and others the Austrian frontier into Carinthia. On the 30th April it was announced that Yugoslavs were fighting in Trieste. The Triestini have long feared this development and desperately hoped for the arrival of the British and Americans.

Hebrang, the Communist Minister for Industry, has made an important speech. He said that the Government were applying a strict and complete plan of economic controls. He emphasised that the Government and the Presidium of A.V.N.O.J. have enacted a drastic law against "economic sabotage." The law mentions sixteen forms of such sabotage, but adds the all-embracing statement that it includes "any act, or failure to act, aimed at interfering with or endangering the orderly and speedy working of economic or transport undertakings, shops or farms, as well as anything that could damage the interests of the State's economic policy." The law prescribes as penalties fines, forced labour up to ten years, confiscation of property, or death. Action can be taken against a business either on information by an individual or "by way of official duty." The Minister said that the Government's measures, including the new currency law (see preceding Summary, p. 16) had dismayed the "racketeers and saboteurs" (i.e., the business community); and that it was said that the peasants would not sell their produce at the low fixed prices. (In fact the food markets in Belgrade have emptied.) But, he said, the peasants would sell, because the Government would assure the speedy supply of manufactured goods at moderate prices. Further, he said that the increased wages of workers would result in better work. And he ended with a demand for intensified work all round. The totalitarian yoke is indeed being fitted to the Yugoslav people's necks.

Two months have now passed since the Crimean Conference recommended that A.V.N.O.J., the Partisan's supreme Assembly, should be enlarged to include all pre-war Deputies, who had not collaborated with the enemy. All that has been done to fulfil this recommendation is that "a committee has decided" on certain new members to be admitted as from Serbia and Macedonia; and that the same is being done for Bosnia-Hercegovina and Montenegro. Croatia's and Slovenia's turns will come when they are free of the Germans. But a high official has said that membership of the Front is necessary for admission to A.V.N.O.J.; and the Democratic (Grol's) Party has refused to join the Front. The whole matter seems academic for A.V.N.O.J. has not sat since November 1943, and the revolution is being carried out in virtue of legislation by the Government and A.V.N.O.J.'s Presidium.

Although Partisan sources declare that Albanians enjoy complete liberty in Macedonia, a formidable Albanian revolt is reported to have been in progress, west and south-west of Skoplje, for some weeks. Six Yugoslav brigades, as well as other forces, have been engaged, and some thousands of Albanians are reported to be in prison or deported.

The Macedonian Government appears to attempt some independence. Their trade delegation, sent to Athens to buy cotton, was recalled on instructions from Belgrade that foreign trade is under the central Government's control. The new Macedonian Premier, Kubishevski, lectured the Assembly on the serious danger of Macedonian separation.

Education in Macedonia is reported to present interesting features. In the primary schools the Serb language is banned. The text-books are mainly in Bulgarian. The history text-book, written by Tito, deals only with the Russian and Yugoslav revolutions of the 20th century. The French schools in Skoplje and Bitolj remain suppressed, as do the two Moslem colleges in Skoplje. The only foreign language taught is Russian.

On the Greek frontier south of Bitolj there is much activity and concentration of troops.

Greece.

The Central Committee for Greek claims has cabled to the Foreign Minister urging him to demand the "liberation of the Greek territories of Northern Epirus, North Macedonia, Thrace, Eastern Roumelia, and all the Greek islands of the Mediterranean." The Committee has also urged Admiral Voulgaris to take such steps as are appropriate to bring about the union of the Dodecanese with Greece, and have asked him for information on the way the question of Northern Epirus is being handled. Dodecanesian residents of Athens and Piræus held a large meeting on the 23rd April and enthusiastically endorsed resolutions of union with Greece already proclaimed by several of the islands.

There was a considerable amount of press comment on M. Tsouderos's allegations that Monarchist Military League had been formed within the army. Rizospastis clamoured for purges and arrests and for the disbandment, not only of the League, but of "X" and E.D.E.S., while Right-wing papers took the line that the League was a necessity for the time being; there was still a danger of a Communist outbreak and the League was unlikely to be dissolved at present. M. Tsouderos is reported as having said that "more than one" League had been founded in the Middle East, on the pretext of "supporting legality"; the press, however, concentrated on one organisation whose charter it published in full; this was S.A.N. (Syndesmos Axiomatikon Neon, or League of Young Officers). Among the objects set forth in the charter were the following: to combat all party or anti-national propaganda within the army; to assist in the creation of a national army to help the Allies; to resist any new attempt against "lawful authority" from whatever quarter and to impose order. By "lawful authority" was meant any Government appointed by the King until such time as a plebiscite was held; the King was recognised as the Supreme Authority. (No mention was made of the Regent, who was appointed by the King, and whose Government is a legally appointed body.) In consequence of M. Tsouderos's revelations, Admiral Voulgaris has issued an order of the day to all the armed forces bidding them devote themselves to their duty and warning them that the Government will not tolerate the formation of any Military League, while the Regent has issued a warning that any army officers found to have been engaged in activities against the State will be dismissed.

From various sources believed to be reliable, information has been received about the state of opinion in the northern provinces. In the town of Florina, it is reported, there is a majority of Right-wing sympathisers, many of them E.D.E.S. men; in the surrounding villages E.A.M. is in the majority; in the district as a whole E.A.M. is losing ground to the Right; a Centre Party would find little support. In Epirus, the former stronghold of E.D.E.S., the majority of the population is said to be pro-E.A.M. In Thrace there is acute tension between Left and Right, though there are signs that in this area, which is traditionally Venizelist, there may be a movement in favour of some sort of Liberal democracy. (See also under "Turkey.")

Albania.

Demonstrations are still being staged in Albania to make plain the dissatisfaction felt by Enver Hoxha's Government at being neither invited to San Francisco nor recognised. According to a broadcast, Enver Hoxha qualified exclusion from the conference as a gross injustice in view of the sacrifices made by Albania for the common cause, and on the same ground he has repeated his formal demand for an invitation. In an interview given to the Yugoslav press on the 21st April he hinted that the Soviet attitude in this matter was more sympathetic and that the Soviet Government would send a military mission to Albania.

A dozen more "war criminals," including a former Prime Minister and other ex-Cabinet Ministers, have been executed. The general charges were those of collaboration with the Fascists and Nazis, fighting against the partisans and persecuting the Albanian people. It is not easy to take seriously Enver Hoxha's assertion that all Albanians approved the previous sentences of the special court, nor to resist the conclusion that prosecution is often a mere pretext for removing actual or potential political opponents. There is indeed some ground to think that criticism of Enver Hoxha's Government has recently grown more outspoken.

Bulgaria.

Through the local committees of the Fatherland Front comprehensive measures were taken in true Soviet style for ensuring that the masses, peasants and workers alike, should all take part in celebrating Labour Day. Sunday, the 29th April, was made a working day, and the 1st May a holiday. A delegation of shock-workers was sent to attend the celebrations in Moscow, and the pontifical message from George Dimitrov, which has become a customary feature of great occasions, was duly received from Moscow.

Within the Fatherland Front there is evidently a good deal of discord between the component parties. Disagreement between the Left and Right Wings of the Social Democrat Party, for example, is no doubt due to the Communists outside playing their familiar game of supporting the leftist minority within it, in order first to disrupt and then to dominate the party. In a similar effort to obtain ultimate control of the Agrarian Party the Communist newspaper continues, in season and out, its vituperation of Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, who was recently forced by Communist agitation to resign the leadership of the party. The Communists are not popular, and they are clearly aware that their arbitrary methods do not help them to wean the majority of the population from their support of the Agrarian Party nor even to prevent recruits from joining the Social Democrats. Weakened though the Social Democrat and Zveno Parties are by the eclipse of the bourgeoisie, neither they nor the Agrarians are taking Communist manœuvres lying down. The position of the Communists, however, as the dominant element in the Fatherland Front will be considerably strengthened by the decree-law "for the defence of the people's authority," which has now been approved by the Regents. As recorded in Summary No. 284, it authorises capital punishment for belonging to any association directed against the Fatherland Front.

Turkey.

On the occasion of the recent celebration of the festivals of Turkish youth and of national sovereignty M. Sertel, who occasionally advances leftist views in Tan, gave vent in that paper to some frank criticism of the régime. They had, he said, not taught the meaning of democracy to the youth of the nation who would soon be in charge of its destinies. They had not implanted the ideal of national sovereignty in the soul of the people. Freedom of speech and thought existed on the statute book, but not in practice. Many in Turkey still led the life of slaves. The first thing was to intensify elementary education in a democratic spirit. It is hard to say whether this unusually outspoken criticism of the political conditions prevailing in Turkey to-day was intended for foreign, rather than home, consumption. In Turkey there is by no means universal approval of the dictatorial attitude often assumed by President Inönü. Abroad, the Turkish conception of democracy has from time to time aroused the fully-justified criticism of British and American commentators, and until quite lately Soviet propaganda has been using it as a stick with which to belabour Turkey.

A small number of Moslems have been trying to migrate from Western Thrace to Turkey. The movement seems to have been started by 2,500 Pomaks, who had been settled in Western Thrace during the Bulgarian occupation of that part of Greece. After some hesitation the Turkish authorities admitted these people. Thereupon some further hundreds of Moslems trekked to the Turkish frontier, but were firmly refused admittance. While the Turkish official attitude seems to be, correctly enough, that the Moslems of Western Thrace must stay where they are as the counterpart of the Greeks allowed by the Lausanne Treaty to remain in Istanbul, an underlying reason for the tendency to migrate may be the fear of Left extremists, on the one hand, and of Greek Nationalists on the other.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Ali Maher has been making an attempt to return to the political arena. He is making a special appeal to youth organisations, and has been giving to the press his ideas as to the future conduct of Egyptian political life.

The Egyptian press gave full publicity to the resolution of the Sudanese Graduates' Congress demanding the setting up of a democratic Sudanese Government in union with Egypt, although the Congress does not any longer represent the intelligentsia of Khartoum, recent elections having been "rigged" and contrary to the statutes approved by the Governor of Khartoum.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs for Syria sent telegrams of appreciative thanks to the Foreign Secretaries of Great Britain, the United States of America, China, Egypt, Iraq and Saudi Arabia for the support received in connection with the request for participation in the San Francisco Conference. The head of the Egyptian delegation to San Francisco told the press just before he left that all the Arab delegations had agreed to examine their proposals to the Conference jointly. He carried with him a note on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, printed by the Egyptian Government for distribution in San Francisco.

The French are disposed to strengthen their forces in the Levant with some battalions from North Africa. As the arrival of reinforcements at this moment would almost certainly be interpreted as an attempt to put pressure on the States in connexion with the Treaty negotiations, our Ambassador in Paris has made representations to the French Government.

Persia is still without a Cabinet, and speculation about the choice of a new Prime Minister continues. The selection of a suitable person, strong enough to maintain the authority of the Government and skilful enough to persuade the Majlis to carry out much-needed reforms, is likely to prove difficult.

THE FAR EAST.

The Japanese people are being prepared for the collapse of Germany and the end of the war in Europe, and are being fed such crumbs of comfort as can be found. Thus the Asahi (24th April) contained an article by Professor Matsumoto, formerly a lecturer at Bonn University. He declared that although some classes in Germany still refused to accept the idea of National Socialism, young people were so attached to it that it would never die; thus the spirit of resistance would continue in Germany even after actual fighting had ceased. Matsumoto quoted Hitler's saying that, even if he should die, other chosen men would preserve his ideas.

The Yomiuri-Hochi (28th April) dwelt on the difficulties which it declared would confront the Americans and British after the end of organised resistance by Germany. The paper's Stockholm correspondent had told it that the Americans and British considered that the fall of Berlin should mark the end of the war in Europe, whereas the Russians held that the war should not be considered as over until all German resistance, including underground resistance, had ceased, and so they were opposed to an early transfer of American and British troops to the Pacific. The editor had swallowed this yarn and was hoping for trouble between the Allies. Also the paper talked wishfully about shipping problems, war weariness and other obstacles to a prompt reinforcement of the forces confronting Japan.

On the 27th April Suzuki held a conference with Army and Navy leaders to "discuss measures for ensuring victory," as Domei put it. Among those present were the War and Navy Ministers, Anami and Yonai; the Chief of the Army General Staff, Umezu; the Chief of the Naval General Staff, Admiral Oikawa; and the Vice-Chiefs of the Army and of the Navy General Staffs, Lieut.-General Torashiro Kawabe and Vice-Admiral Jizaburo Ozawa.

The Japanese Press has had much to say about the San Francisco Conference. The Mainichi (25th April) asserted that, after the death of President Roosevelt, the U.S.S.R. had seen an opportunity to play the leading rôle at the Conference and had therefore decided after all to send its Foreign Minister there; the Yomiuri Hochi (27th April) took the same line. The Polish question was, of course, played up by all the Japanese papers, the Chubu Nippon (28th April) saying that it threatened the life of the Conference. The Japanese press eagerly anticipated that the Conference would fail or that at any rate future disputes between the "Big Three" would soon render any results nugatory. In this connexion the Chubu Nippon asserted that the question of what to do with Germany would cause more trouble than the Polish problem, because the Russians already controlled Poland, whereas Germany would be divided among "diametrically opposed Anglo-American and Soviet systems." The Nippon Times (28th April) anticipated a conflict over China; it alleged that Washington had abandoned "the so-called Lattimore line" of trying to bring about a rapprochement between Chungking and Yenan. It was now supporting Chungking because, said the Nippon Times, although "the Kremlin continued to maintain its enigmatic silence," Washington appeared to be already convinced of the advisability of taking precautionary steps against Moscow to safeguard American interests in China.

The Mainichi Shimbun has published a sixty-page booklet entitled "Catholicism in Nippon," written by Josef Roggendorf. According to him there are 120,000 Catholics in Japan proper, but they are representative of all classes and their influence is far greater than their numbers would suggest. There are over 400 parishes, organised into five dioceses and eight apolostic vicariates and prefectures. 135 out of about 300 priests are Japanese; there are 1,213 Japanese nuns and 772 foreign sisters. Since 1940 all the large administrative districts and the direction of all major social and educational establishments have been entrusted to Japanese. Roggendorf considered that Catholicsm n Japan was registering a slow, but steady, advance.

The Chungking Radio (29th April) said that the Japanese advance in Western Hunan continued and that, since they began to advance on the 8th April, the Japanese forces had covered about half the distance to Chihkiang. Their forces were said to include five divisions of the Nanking puppet army. The Japanese were reported to have 250,000 men in south-western China and if they took Chihkiang they would be free to move most of these to defend the Hong Kong region against a possible American landing.

There has been a reshuffle of the Nanking puppet officials. Chu Min-yi, the Foreign Minister, has been made Governor of Kwangtung Province and Peace Commissioner at Canton; Li Sheng-wu, the Education Minister, becomes concurrently Foreign Minister. General Pao Wen-yueh, Chief of the General Staff of the Nanking Military Council, has been made Governor of Honan and Peace Commissioner at Kaifeng; his post of Chief of Staff has been taken over by General Hu Yu-kun, a member of the North China Political Affairs Commission (Domei, 26th April).

General Chen Cheng, the Chinese Minister of War, declared on the 25th April that Chinese military casualties since the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War totalled 3,100,000 men. While certain non-combatant military organisations were being abolished, the War Ministry was recruiting 500,000 men for front-line duties in order to bring China's combat divisions up to full strength. In order to put a stop to the illegal seizure of conscripts the Government were planning to open conscription offices, to punish severely press gangs involved in illegal conscription activities, and to set up a system of supervision over conscription.

General Chen Cheng appears to be making a gallant effort to cope with the herculean task of reforming the Chinese military administration, but from his own remarks it is clear that he is only at the beginning of his labours. The Ta Kung Pao (19 April) said that a conference was to be called to discuss the improvement of the conditions of military service, as the emergency recruitment of troops for this year had already been completed. It was good news that, for a time at least, the forced recruitment of troops would be suspended. For months past letters had been pouring in from all over the country describing the state of terror caused by the methods of recruiting. Those responsible for recruiting "had acted like ravenous wolves" and, where one recruit might have been necessary, ten had been seized. Peasants working in the fields had been dragged off or had fled; this would have a disastrous effect on food production. The paper demanded a strict investigation into such abuses and said that the Government could never expect the soldiers to fight well, while such things went on.

Dr. Wong Wen-hao, Chairman of the War Production Board, declared in Chungking on the 28th April that the production of basic raw materials in Free China had increased by 21 per cent. since November 1944, when the Board was inaugurated. He gave figures to prove this, adjusted so as to be comparable in purchasing power. He hoped to keep production expanding, although he said that it was a long and uphill road.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The report of Himmler's offer on the 28th April was generally regarded as a ridiculous last-minute attempt to split the Allies. Later in the day an Associated Press statement, on the authority of "a high American official," that Germany's surrender had actually been received threw the United States into a ferment. Radio bulletins spread the story and Saturday evening crowds gathered in public places like Times Square, New York, to hear the expected peace proclamation. Excitement died quickly when President Truman's laconic démenti was broadcast soon after 9·30 p.m.: "I just got in touch with Admiral Leahy and had him call our Headquarters—the Commander-in-Chief in Europe—and there is no foundation for the rumour." The news ageney has been taken severely to task for "shabby play with human emotions," and Senator Connally, who admitted expressing the opinion that he expected "momentarily" an announcement that Germany had surrendered unconditionally, has also come in for some criticism. A strong impression that the European war would be all over in a few days persisted.

Apart from the irrepressible Drew Pearson, who felt that the opening session "had the atmosphere of an undertaker's parlour" and the isolationist newspapers which continue to attack the whole idea of "another League of Nations," the San Francisco Conference has had a favourable press so far. President Truman's "admirably-phrased" message of welcome was applauded, particularly for its emphasis on "the keynote of justice." This point is taken up in a significant article, in the issue dated the 30th April of the influential magazine, Life. After surveying the imperfections of the Dumbarton Oaks scheme, the writer suggests that the World Charter should "recognise the eternal principles of justice and law," by codification of international law and definition of aggression. More power, it is urged, should be given to the Assembly, and the Security Council should be able "to take action short of force by vote of seven members, including any three of the Big Five." The charter should also declare "a set of principles for colonial policies," and an International Bill of Rights should be adopted at San Francisco. Ten years hence the Signatories should meet again and review their handiwork.

There was gloom over the apparent Polish deadlock in the days immediately preceding the opening of the Conference, but comment was more than usually restrained and responsible. The exertions of Mr. Eden, Mr. Stettinius and President Truman, in their interviews with M. Molotov, were duly appreciated. Moderate Conservatives groaned at Russian intransigence, but refrained from attacks on the Soviet Union, and the Liberals did not this time accuse the State Department or the Foreign Office of "supine" or "reactionary" attitudes. Only the Scripps–Howard and kindred combines continued to declare that they were tired of being "pushed around" by Russia. The chairmanship controversy at San Francisco was similarly handled in the American press; Anne McCormick of the New York Times asserted that the American delegation viewed the compromise as a "ninety per cent. success for American diplomacy." The addition of the Ukraine and White Russia to the future General Assembly was taken as a foregone conclusion and their attendance at the Conference itself as a necessary corollary. Anxiety over the various difficulties with the Soviet Union was somewhat relieved by the news of the formation of a Provisional Austrian Government. "It makes the European picture much brighter," wrote Max Lerner in

P.M. "This is a representative group, not a puppet Government; we could not have done better ourselves," declored Raymond Moley. Acting Secretary of State Grew, however, pointed out to newspaper correspondents on the 30th April that this Provisional Government had not been recognised by the United States Government and that the whole question was being taken up with the U.S.S.R., "whose troops are now in occupation of Vienna."

The consultants to the United States U.N.C.I.O. delegation, representing some forty national organisations, held their first meeting on the 26th April and were assured by Mr. Stettinius that they would be kept regularly informed of the proceedings and that their advice would be sought. Speaking on the following day to members of about a hundred other organisations with observers at San Francisco, Commander Stassen revealed that the American delegation had worked out a concrete trusteeship plan, which might serve as a chapter in the San Francisoo charter. (See under "United Nations" below.) This question is likely to attract more and more attention in the American press as the Conference goes on. Newspaper and radio comment ranges from the jingoes, who clamour for satisfaction of the legitimate claims of the United States, to Liberals of the Lippmann school, who cannot see how the gradual "decolonising" of dependent areas through international action is to be realised if the United States insists on sovereign rights in Pacific islands, and perhaps elsewhere, which it would deny to other Powers. There seems, nevertheless, to be not inconsiderable support for the demand, voiced most loudly by such newspapers as the New York Daily News, for outright possession and heavy armament for "purely strategic places" and "a firmer hold" on Atlantic bases leased from Britain.

A number of further steps towards post-war arrangements have been taken in the United States during the week. Mr. Edwin W. Pauley, treasurer of the Democratic Party's National Committee, has been appointed "personal representative" of the President, with the rank of Ambassador, to assist in "exploring, developing and negotiating the formulæ and methods for exacting reparations from the aggressor nations in the current war." Mr. Pauley will represent the United States on the Reparations Commission, with Dr. Isador Lublin as his associate. Judge Rosenman has presented a sombre report to the President on his investigation of civilian supplies for the liberated areas of north-western Europe, and an equally sobering joint statement on food problems was issued in Washington on the 30th April by British, Canadian and American representatives who have been holding discussions. Mr. Rosenman affirmed that responsibility for providing a substantial share of supplies would fall on the United States and that a cut in American food rations would be necessary. The Office of Price Administration announced on the same day a reduction in the basic sugar allotment on each ration-book from 24 lb. to 15 lb. per annum. Meanwhile the War Department has already recognised what is popularly described as "the VE situation" by ordering substantial reductions within the next thirty to sixty days in supplies of Army material. Although the War Production Board has permitted certain industries, such as those producing farm machinery and automobiles, to place orders for tools and equipment, it is not anticipated that there will be any large-scale reconversion until the Japanese war is settled.

LATIN AMERICA.

The repercussions in Buenos Aires of the liberation of Paris last August took the Argentine Government by surprise, and the demonstrations which then occurred not only administered a severe shock to the military régime but left little doubt about the true feelings of the Argentine people. The example of Paris has not been lost upon the many enemies of the Farrell Government, nor upon the Farrell Government itself; and on the 25th April the Federal Police issued a statement that demonstrations in celebration of the fall of Berlin would be forcibly suppressed. This, coming from an ally (however belated), produces a strange effect. The Patria Libre movement in Montevideo, however, has broadcast appeals that everyone should go out in the streets and demand freedom. Clashes, therefore, seem probable.

Meanwhile, some sort of crisis occurred during the week-end of the 21st–23rd April. A number of persons were arrested on a charge of being implicated in a plot against the Government, and official statements were published on the 26th and 27th giving the Government's versions of what had happened. The first of these declared that the plot derived from Trade Union disturbances resulting in the frigorífico strikes and a campaign of alarmist rumours; all such manœuvres were "cloaked under democratic guise although carried out by complete reactionaries," and the object was to "impede the war effort and split Argentina." The second, and fuller, communiqué, accused the conspirators of being inspired by Patria Libre, the Asociación de Mayo and the exiles in Montevideo, of aiming at "civil war and of intending to assassinate all the leading members of the Government and to burn down their houses." The communiqué declared that General Espíndola (who was not concerned in the putsch of 1943) was to take command, and it implicated a number of other retired officers. Those "detained in order to decide their degree of culpability" included General Tonazzi, a former Minister of War, General Rawson (celebrated for his brief Presidency of twenty-four hours), Sr. A. Ghioldi, the Socialist leader, Sr. Noble of La Nación and Sr. Santamarina, the ex-Minister of Finance. All these persons appear to be eminently respectable, and despite official attempts to confuse the issue by dragging in the Nationalists, the arrests seem to have been directed almost exclusively against liberal, conservative and constitutionalist groups now known in Argentine terms as "Communists and reactionaries."

On the 27th, the President and Minister for Foreign Affairs assured Sir D. Kelly (who had arrived in Buenos Aires on the 25th) that the situation was under control, the President adding that he could not fix a date for elections until "tranquillity" was restored. The fact that the plot was apparently aimed at all the members of the Government and not particularly against Colonel Perón seems to have smoothed over, for the moment, the dissensions in the Government itself. Indeed, the affair could hardly have been more conveniently managed if Colonel Perón had invented it himself. The Colonel had earlier, on the 23rd April, issued a denial that the interests of the country were being subordinated to his "alleged candidature for the Presidency." He did not, he said, aspire to be President, would vigorously oppose any efforts to this end, and would not become "official candidate" for any position in the future Government, "since we must end the system of officially managed successions." He added, however, that he considered it necessary to ensure the continuity of the revolution's achievements and to work for the unity of all Argentines. This presumably means that there will be no elections for the time being.

Meanwhile, the San Francisco Conference, apparently moved by the other Latin American Governments, has agreed to invite Argentina to join the Conference. (See also "United Nations.")

UNITED NATIONS.

The San Francisco Conference.

Scope of the Conference.—The President of the United States has issued a warning that the Conference is not "the Peace Conference," but has before it one task only—the inauguration of an organisation to safeguard peace. This warning was needed in view both of widespread misconceptions in the United States and elsewhere and of the appearance in San Francisco of representatives of all kinds of interests (including, e.g., Calendar Reform) which hope to make their voices heard. While the Dumbarton Oaks proposals (especially those for an economic and social council) might seem to open the door to a swarm of reformers, it is the British view that all detail of this type (e.g., plans for drug control, international health organisations, &c.) should be left over for later expert discussion. Only if the Conference restricts itself to its proper task can it achieve the speed called for by Mr. Stettinius or justify Mr. Eden's hope that its work will be done in four weeks.

Organisation.—The procedure of the Conference is directed by a Steering Committee, consisting of the heads of the 49 national delegations. This committee is advised by a executive committee on which sit the heads of the delegations of the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R., China, France, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Mexico, the Netherlands, Persia and Yugoslavia.

Membership.—The Conference has agreed to admit the Ukraine and White Russia as initial members of the organisation and invited them to attend the Conference. M. Molotov rested their case on their special contribution to the war and their independence in matters of foreign policy. Czechoslovakia proposed that the Warsaw "Provisional Government" should be invited, but in the end the Conference restricted itself to expressing sympathy with the Polish nation and the hope that Poland would yet be represented at the Conference by a Government agreed on in accordance with the Crimea decisions. Argentina has also been invited to attend. This was a quid pro quo demanded by the Latin American States for the admission of the two Soviet Republics. But M. Molotov voted against it on the committee and opposed it in plenary session, particularly on the ground that Poland had not yet been admitted.

Chairmanship.—A difference of view on chairmanship manifested itself at the outset between the United Kingdom and the United States, who favoured the presidency of Mr. Stettinius as head of the Delegation of the inviting Power, and the Soviet Union, who pressed for a chairmanship rotating among the heads of Delegations of the four sponsoring Great Powers. This was resolved by a compromise whereby chairmanship of the Plenary Session rotates between the four sponsoring Powers, while Mr. Stettinius is to be Chairman of the Steering and Executive Committees. Thus prestige and efficiency should both be adequately safeguarded.

Charter Proposals.—The other sponsoring Powers have accepted three Chinese additions for the Charter: that disputes should be settled with due regard for the principles of justice and international law; that the Assembly should promote study and revision of the rules and principles of international law; and that the Economic and Social Council should promote cultural and educational co-operation. Uruguay's proposal made at the fourth Plenary Session, that the powers of the Assembly should be increased, is likely to have considerable support. There is a demand that non-permanent seats on the Security Council should be specially allocated to States which are ready to make a substantial contribution to the forces at the disposal of the Council for maintaining peace. The question how best to achieve this is one of some difficulty. The suggestion which has been put forward of an enlarged Council is open to objection, as it would make the executive body of the Organisation unwieldy and lead to undesirable manœuvring for places. The United States Government is reported to have formulated proposals for trusteeship for dependent territories on the lines that there should be two classes of territory: (A) strategic areas in territory at present under mandate or to be detached from the enemy; (B) the remainder of such territory. Both classes should be under United Nations supervision; but, in (A) territory, the mandatory should be responsible for rendering reports to the Security Council on the security aspect of its administration; while, for (B) territory, the United Nations should exercise supervision in respect of trusteeship through a body responsible to the General Assembly.

Charter Revision.—In their opening speeches, Mr. Eden and Mr. Stettinius both said that the Charter now to be adopted would be open to later revision. This assurance may help some delegates to accept points in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which they do not like, but on which they would not wish to wreck or delay the work of the Conference. But they may wish to propose that the Charter should contain express provisions for its own revision, perhaps after a stated period. (Uruguay suggested that the method of electing the Security Council should be reviewed after eight to ten years.)

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE unconditional surrender of all German armed forces in every theatre of the European war to the three major Allies—Great Britain, Russia and the United States—was officially announced to the world by Mr. Churchill at 1500 hours (B.D.S.T.) on Tuesday, the 8th May. The surrender had been signed by General Bedell Smith, Chief of Staff to General Eisenhower, and by General Jodl, Chief of the German General Staff, at Rheims on Monday, the 7th May. It was to take effect from 1201 a.m. on Thursday, the 10th May. A further ceremony of surrender took place in the early hours of Wednesday, the 9th May, in Berlin, when Marshal Zhukov, for the Soviet High Command, and Air Chief Marshal Sir Arthur Tedder, Deputy Supreme Commander of the Western Allies, received the surrender of Field-Marshal Keitel (OKW), General-Admiral Friedeburg (OKM) and of Colonel-General Stumpff (OKL). The signature of this document of surrender was witnessed by General de Lattre de Tassigny and by General Spaatz. Those signatures confirmed the final destruction of Hitler's Third Reich and of the rule of force and fraud which had been imposed by it on Europe.

The final surrender of all the German forces followed on a series of partial capitulations. On the 2nd May it was announced by Field-Marshal Alexander from Allied Headquarters, Mediterranean area, that all forces under the command of General von Vietinghoff-Scheel had surrendered unconditionally and that the surrender would become effective from 1200 G.M.T. on the 2nd May. The instrument of surrender had been signed on the 29th April by two German officers, one representing Vietinghoff-Scheel, the other Obergruppenführer Karl Wolff, Supreme Commander of the S.S. and police in Italy. The German forces covered by this surrender were all those in Italy to the Isonzo river in the north-east as well as all those in Vorarlberg, Tirol and Salzburg, and in parts of Carinthia and Styria. All told these forces numbered almost a million men.

On the 3rd May Hamburg was surrendered by its commander, General Woltz. On the 4th May Field-Marshal Montgomery reported to General Eisenhower that all enemy forces in Holland, North-West Germany and Denmark, including Heligoland and the Frisian Islands, had surrendered to the 21st Army Group as from 0800 hours B.D.S.T. on the 5th May. This instrument of surrender was signed, on behalf of the Germans, by General-Admiral von Friedeburg, Admiral Dönitz's successor as Commander-in-chief of the German Navy, General Kinsel, Chief of Staff to Field-Marshal Busch, and two other officers. On the same day remnants of the German 9th and 12th armies surrendered to the American 102nd infantry division on the Ninth Army front, and in the afternoon of the 5th May the German Army Group "G," commanded by General Schulz and comprising the German 1st and 19th armies, surrendered to General Devers, Commander of the 6th Army Group. Even before the final surrender, therefore, the unsurrendered German forces were confined to the pockets along the French coast and on the Channel Islands, those in the Mediterranean islands, the forces in Norway, the divisions still opposing the Russians along the eastern front, some still facing the Americans in Czechoslovakia and Austria, and the forces engaged with Tito's troops in the Balkans and Southern Austria.

The policy of surrender in the west but not in the east has been clearly expressed throughout the week by spokesmen of the German Government. Early on Saturday morning (5th) an appeal to soldiers of the centre, south and south-east groups of German armies was broadcast from Dönitz himself, admitting that the struggle against the Western Powers had lost all meaning, but that other troops must still fight on in order to "save as many Germans as possible from Bolshevisation and enslavement." The new Head of the State assured the troops that his every act, military or political, was undertaken towards this end of sparing German lives. Those who at such a moment thought only of their own life would be treated as traitors. A broadcast from south-eastern Germany explained that this policy of fighting to save life meant holding out "until an ordered withdrawal of the women and children from the danger zone of Bolshevik destruction and enslavement" had been achieved. A Forces broadcast from Norway announced (also on the 5th) that "the struggle against Bolshevism is being continued with determination and stubbornness by the German armies under the command of Field-Marshal Schröner in eastern Saxony, western Silesia, the northern Protectorate and in the north-east of the Ostmark."

Much the same had already been said to the German people by Reich Minister Speer on Thursday, but in terms less logical in form and more difficult for the ordinary German to understand. The state of Germany, Speer said, could be compared only with what it had been during the Thirty Years' War. He affirmed that the whole reason preventing Dönitz from ceasing to fight was the necessity of reducing the risk of famine and disease. Yet he denied that Germany was still in any sense master of its fate, which now rested entirely with the enemy. The main burden of the speech was an appeal to avert chaos in Germany by intensifying that "constructive spirit" whereby German workers had repeatedly overcome the damage caused by Allied air-raids. Speer urged that "the understandable lethargy" caused by terror and disappointment must disappear and that, if famine were to be prevented, urgent railway repairs must be attended to (even by the most primitive methods), that industry and trade must facilitate such repairs, that food transport must have priority, and that farmers must increase still further their delivery quotas.

Before admitting that things had come to such a pass as this, the German Government made somewhat obvious attempts to continue its policy of splitting the Allied coalition. On the 2nd May, the new Foreign Minister broadcast a rather confused denunciation of the San Francisco Conference, in later versions of which a passage was added to the effect that the world was faced with a fateful decision between chaos and order, peace and war, life and death. Even after the surrender of the German north-western forces, Radio Wilhelmshaven broadcast a speech by its Deputy Gauleiter, the content of which was really quite incompatible with such a surrender. It implied that very few divisions had actually surrendered, as the majority had been transferred to the eastern front and that her western enemies would one day recognise what Germany had achieved in order to save them from Bolshevism.

In almost all the speeches mentioned above stress was laid upon Germany's "heroic fight" which would, said Speer, one day meet with the admiration of just history, and which merited generous and decent treatment from the victor.

The latest pronouncement so far received, an address to troops in Norway by General Böhme on the 7th, urged Germans to remain what they had always been —decent, patriotic soldiers. But the most outspoken utterance on these lines occurred in a speech by Gauleiter Konrad Henlein on the 6th May, the final passage of which was a defence of the settlement at Munich in 1938 of the Sudeten question. This agreement, said Henlein, remained for the Sudetens the legal foundation of their membership of the German Reich, and to the world it could not become "a scrap of paper." The States, which in 1938 had decided on the separation of German from Czech territory in Bohemia, had thus taken over a moral guarantee, confirmed by the "most objective critical examination" made by the Runciman Committee. Henlein entreated Sudetens to believe that Right remained Right and was on their side.

It is as yet uncertain whether the Allied Powers will recognise Dönitz' Government, or any new body of Ministers to whom Dönitz may delegate the powers which he claims to have received from Hitler, as the Government of Germany. The present Government, so far as evidence now goes, must be presumed to consist of all the Ministers of Hitler's Government, except Göring (Air), resigned the 24th April; Goebbels (Propaganda), reported to be dead; Ribbentrop (Foreign Affairs), replaced by Schwerin-Krosigk (for whom, as Minister of Finance, no substitute has been announced); Bormann (reported killed), von Neurath and Hans Frank (captured by the Allies), and Hitler himself. The remaining Ministers are as follows: Thierack (Justice), Funk (Economics), Backe (Food and Agriculture), Seldte (Labour), Hierl (Leader of the R.A.D.), Speer (Armaments, Building, &c.), Rust (Science and Education), Dorpmüller (Transport), Ohnesorge (Posts and Telegraphs), Rosenberg, Lammers (Chief of the Reich Chancery), Meissner, Frick (Protector of Bohemia and Moravia), Seyss-Inquart (Commissar for Occupied Netherlands), K. H. Frank, and Keitel, Chief of the High Command.

During the last stages of the Nazi régime the principal party leaders have, not unnaturally, withdrawn from the limelight. Hitler's body has not been found and one of his personal physicians emphatically denies the probability of death from cerebral hæmorrhage. No convincing evidence of his death has indeed, yet been provided, though it remains inherently probable. The bodies of Goebbels and his wife and children have been found by the Russians. Death is attributed to poison. Göring, with his wife and child, has been captured by the Seventh Army in the Tirol. Bormann, head of the Party Chancery, was said by the German-controlled Prague radio on the 6th May to have been killed in fighting the Russians in the Reich Chancery, but this broadcast attributed the death of Goebbels to the same cause and, in any case, the source is more than tainted. Of Ley, or Himmler and his chief S.S. henchmen—Kaltenbrunner, Berger, &c.—no definite information is available. Stockholm reports suggest that many high Nazi officials are in Norway and it may be that some will be now found there. Others would seem more probably to be in the mountainous areas of the south. But, of the most notorious party figures, at present none of the first rank and only Hans Frank (Governor-General of Poland) of the second rank has, as yet, fallen into Allied hands.

At a moment when Germans in almost every fighting zone seem anxious to lay down their arms, the writ of Admiral Dönitz has been disregarded in one important area. The German radio station in Prague refused to recognise the surrender order issued from Flensburg and ordered German forces in the Protectorate to fight on. Not only so, but the city of Prague, which Dönitz had on the 3rd May declared a hospital town, has been the scene of a rising of Czech patriots against the German garrison. Although the American forces had advanced beyond Pilsen, and were considerably nearer to the city than the Russians, still over a hundred miles to the east, the patriots' appeals for help broadcast throughout the 5th and 6th, could not be answered at once, and it appears from German reports that the Germans were attempting to suppress the revolt throughout the 7th. This was done by troops given the savage order by General Schörner to "crush all Czech resistance with all modern means of war." The German efforts were never wholly successful and on the morning of the 8th May it was reported by the B.B.C. that negotiations for the unconditional surrender of the Germans in Prague were being conducted. But since then, although Russian troops are said to have occupied Prague, there have been further reports of brutal activities by groups of S.S. men both in Prague itself and in other parts of Bohemia and Moravia.

AUSTRIA.

The so-called Austrian "redoubt" has been split into isolated fragments by rapid Allied advances from several points. Passau, Braunau and Wasserburg were captured by the American Third Army, which went on to take Linz—declared an open city by the Gauleiter—on the 6th May. The provinces of Vorarlberg, Tirol, and Salzburg, and parts of Carinthia and Styria, were included in the general surrender of the forces commanded by General von Vietinghoff Scheel to Field-Marshal Alexander on the 2nd May. Salzburg surrendered without a fight, and Innsbruck has also fallen. General Patch's Seventh Army advanced through the Brenner Pass to make a junction with General Mark Clark's Fifth Army on the 4th.

Eigruber, the Gauleiter of Oberdonau, continued to broadcast exhortations and messages to the people from Linz until the 4th May, when he denied "surrender rumours spread by enemy stations with regard to Carinthia, Styria and the Tirol." Outside Linz the fighting was to go on. The tone of his utterances, however, was far from confident, and while urging continued resistance to the American forces he made it plain that the real enemy was Russia, and that no real opposition would be offered to the Western Allies. He prepared the population for immediate occupation by them, warning them to refrain from looting and hoarding food. He said that the Volkssturm would offer its services for the maintenance of order, "provided the occupying Power agree to this." Scheel, the Gauleiter of Salzburg, announced on the 6th that he had ordered the Volkssturm to be transferred into a Land und Stadtwacht, under the order of the "competent administrative authorities," to help the police and maintain order.

There is still little news from the part of Austria occupied by the Russians. A Moscow-controlled station broadcasting to Austria on the 2nd May described conditions in Vienna, where most districts were said to be lit once more, many factories working, and concerts and cinemas were open. In the districts occupied by the western Allies, the first liberated Austrian radio station began to broadcast on the 2nd May. It announced that General Leclerc's armoured troops coming from Bregenz had entered Dornbirn, and using the pre-1938 Austrian interval signal—a metronome—it relayed French and American programmes in German, and appealed to other Allied radio stations for equipment. On the 3rd this station, known as Radio Vorarlberg, claimed that it had prevented Gauleiter Hofer from broadcasting an appeal for further resistance. Another station, apparently also under the control of Austrian patriots, issued a warning on the 3rd on behalf of the "Executive Committee of the Austrian Resistance Movement," that no arms were to be carried in the streets. Arms were only to be carried by forces installed by the Austrian Resistance Movement to maintain peace and order, and recognised by the United States authorities. The same station later gave a list of the members of the "Executive Committee of the Austrian Resistance Movement for the Tirol," many of whom were from Innsbruck.

The deadlock of the question of the Provisional Austrian Government, and on the zones of occupation in Vienna, continues. A Russian broadcast on the 2nd May said that Dr. Renner's Government had assumed office. At noon on the 29th April the members walked in procession from the Town Hall to Parliament, amidst scenes of "enthusiasm and joy," and the first solemn session took place. Despite the patronage they have lent to its formation the Soviet Government have not yet formally recognised this Government. The French Ambassador in Moscow has added his protest to those of the United States and Great Britain, whose Governments continue to press for the speedy departure of the Allied Missions to Vienna, in the hope that some progress may be made towards the solution of this difficulty and of the question of zones, when our representatives are on the spot. M. Molotov, in reply to Mr. Stettinius, said that he did not think the discussions of the zoning in the E.A.C. should constitute an obstacle to the immediate despatch of the Missions, and said that he would report to Moscow and try to meet us on this.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Nowhere has the indeterminate character of the last days of the war been more in evidence than in Bohemia. The Czechs themselves, fearing the demoralising effect of the long years of German occupation and propaganda, were perturbed that no rising on which national revival could crystallise had taken place as it had in Slovakia. Those fears at any rate have been relieved; and first reports from the patriot-controlled Prague radio in the early hours of the 6th May suggest that a good deal of careful preparation and valour had gone into the planning. The order of events is still obscure, but it seems that an organised rising under the leadership of the Czech National Committees took place on the 5th May, and that a truce was arranged with the occupying troops who, however, broke the truce. Prague itself had been declared a "hospital city" by Dönitz on the 3rd, following on his decision to permit the International Red Cross to set up headquarters to care for the thousands of sick and wounded driven there within the tightening Allied ring.

It is doubtful if considerations of a humanitarian nature were the sole factor in this decision; Dönitz announced at the same time a reconstruction of the Protectorate Government which had previously sought a safe-conduct for the German forces in return for a capitulation to the Americans.

After the seizure of the radio by Prague patriots, the German and Quisling leaders continued to queer the issue by broadcasting from a station some miles north of the city, denying the general capitulation order, particularly with regard to the Russian front and retailing all the items of news considered likely to appeal to the Czech bourgeoisie—the Polish "crisis" at San Francisco, the Trieste "crisis," the "correctness" of the German soldier, and, of course, Bolshevik atrocities.

The presence of General Vlasov's Russian Army near Prague may indicate another deliberate attempt to confuse relations between the Allies. The patriots nevertheless knew that many of these men had joined the Wehrmacht only to escape the labour battalion, and when appealed to over the radio early on the 6th they came in force to the assistance of their brother Slavs. German troops were disarmed west of Prague, the city surrounded and finally entered. The patriots continued to call for Allied help throughout the 6th and 7th and after the general cease-fire order, which was disregarded by the Nazis. This final treachery, condemned by the German High Command itself, has undoubtedly destroyed whatever sign of compromise the Czechs might have displayed on the question of the German minorities.

The German-controlled radios in the Republic have made repeated reference to the anti-Beneš Czech and Slovak elements in the United Kingdom and the United States. These, such as the National Councils in London, generally discredited by the bulk of their fellow nations, have proposed an Allied military control of Czechoslovakia. A last fitful attempt to create division was made on the evening of the 7th in a curious broadcast in Slovak, claiming to speak for the Independent Slovak Republic and its President (Tiso) and denying the surrender order. It was not until 1·30 a.m. on the 8th May that Prague could report the cessation of hostilities.

The American and Soviet armies did not succeed in relieving Prague before the final capitulation, but American tanks, after capturing the great armaments centre of Plzeň, pushed on through Beroun to within a few miles of the western suburbs. Soviet forces, aided by Czechoslovak soldiers and airmen, completed the occupation of the heavily-defended Silesian industrial area, and joined forces with their other spearheads driving from Brno to capture Olomouc.

Meanwhile, life in Slovakia is returning gradually to normal. Bratislava, only moderately damaged, has been added to the territories already administered by the Slovak National Council for the Košice Government. Reconstruction work will be considerably speeded up now that U.N.R.R.A. supplies for Czechoslovakia are being unloaded at Constantsa.

POLAND.

After the Secretary of State's inconclusive conferences with Mr. Stettinius and M. Molotov in Washington, reported in Summary No. 289, further discussions, which were renewed early last week at San Francisco, gave a brighter promise. M. Molotov expressed himself hopeful of a speedy solution. It seemed that objections to M. Mikolajczyk had been overcome, since M. Mikolajczyk's statement on his attitude to the Crimea Agreement; and that nothing stood in the way of an early summons of Poles to Moscow for consultation, except perhaps the question of the proportions in which the new Provisional Government should be compounded of new Ministers and of the existing Warsaw Administration.

But over all these discussions hung the cloud of uncertainty as to the position of the representative Poles who had been reported by the London Polish Government as having gone to meet the Red Army General Ivanov on the 28th–29th March. Suddenly this uncertainty was ended by M. Molotov's announcement on the 4th May that the two parties referred to had been arrested on the charge of "diversionary activities against the Red Army." A Tass statement, given below under "U.S.S.R.," specifies charges of "sabotage in the rear of the Red Army" and of "maintaining illegal radio transmitters in the rear of Soviet troops"; Tass connects the charges emphatically with one of the arrested persons, General Okulicki, who, after serving under General Anders while the latter was still in the U.S.S.R., returned to Poland and was appointed successor to General Bor-Komorowski after his surrender following the crushing of the Warsaw rising.

The Secretary of State, after consultation with Mr. Stettinius and M. Molotov, issued the following statement from San Francisco: "The British and United States Governments have been making persistent enquiries of the Soviet Government about a group of prominent Polish Democratic leaders who were reported to have met the Soviet military authorities in Poland for discussions at the end of March. They have now been officially informed by M. Molotov on behalf of his Government that these leaders have been arrested on a charge of 'diversionary activities against the Red Army.' Mr. Eden and Mr. Stettinius immediately expressed their grave concern to M. Molotov at receiving this most disquieting information after so long a delay, and asked him to obtain a full explanation concerning the arrest of the Polish leaders, a complete list of their names, and news of their present whereabouts. The Foreign Secretary has reported this most serious development to His Majesty's Government, and has informed M. Molotov that meanwhile he cannot continue discussion on the Polish issue."

It has been indicated, also from San Francisco, that Mr. Eden's action has the entire support of the Prime Minister.

The Polish Government in London on the 6th May issued a statement giving the names of 15 persons who had gone to meet General Ivanov, and repeating the information it gave early in April as to the manner in which the meeting was arranged. This, they stated, took place in consequence of an invitation, received by the delegates in Poland of the London Polish Government from representatives of the Red Army, to discuss the reorganisation of the Provisional Government coupled with a specific invitation to General Okulicki to discuss the disbandment of the "Home Army."

As to the technical charges, the existence of the London Polish Government's delegates and their organisation in Poland is undeniable, as is likewise the fact that it still maintains a wireless communication with the Poles in London. It is also believed that the Home Army, though its members have been disbanded, still retains a skeleton organisation. These organs of the London Polish Government continue side by side with the de facto Warsaw administration and the Red Army. This clash of authorities seems inseparable from the situation in which one Government is recognised in London and another in Warsaw.

However, if the charges are persisted in, it can only be applied logically to the Delegates and the Home Army Commander, who together form only one-third of the number of persons "arrested." The majority of the mission consisted of representatives of political parties, who had no administrative responsibility. In any case, it seems extremely improbable that any of the 15 persons named, all men holding positions of responsibility, should have had a part in the deaths of 100 Red Army officers and men, as suggested by Tass. Some fatal incidents have occurred, but the evidence goes to show that the persons responsible for excesses in Poland have at least on some occasions been General Vlasov's forces or Ukrainian S.S. groups, both under German command; while on the Polish side there have been excesses committed by the N.S.Z., an extreme Right-wing irregular force which has long defied the orders of the Polish Government delegates and is also alleged to have had German support.

It is difficult to see how the conflict can be ended except by the formation of the new Provisional Government which will then be recognised by the three Great Powers. It is a misfortune that this incident has served to prolong the very state of divided loyalties which alone made it possible for it to occur.

As to the question of wireless transmission, while its technical illegality must be admitted, it cannot be overlooked that had it not been continued it is doubtful whether news of the mission and arrest of the 16 Polish representatives would ever have reached London.

The National Homeland Council, which is the nominated legislative body to which the Warsaw administration serves as an Executive, met last week for the first time in Warsaw. It ratified the Treaty with the U.S.S.R., recently signed; it approved the promotion of General Zymierski to the rank of Marshal; and confirmed certain "ministerial" changes, of which the most important was the appointment of M. Wincent Rzymowski as "Foreign Minister," a post hitherto held by the "Prime Minister," M. Osobka-Morawski.

SOVIET UNION.

Another link-up between Allied forces was reported on the 3rd May, when Soviet troops under Marshal Rokossovsky, after an advance during which Rostock was captured and enemy forces cleared from the island of Rügen, contacted the British Second Army along a 60-mile front from Wismar to Wittenberge. On the 5th May the capture of Swinemünde, on the Baltic Sea, was announced. During the capture of Berlin reported in last week's Summary, about 134,000 Germans were reported to have been taken prisoner; in the pocket south of Berlin more than 60,000 Germans were killed and about 120,000 were taken prisoner. Further advances were made during the week south-west of the city. A hundred miles to the south of the capital, Dresden was occupied on the 8th May, while the day before the capture of Breslau, after a prolonged siege, had been completed. Slower progress was made in Czechoslovakia, but troops of the 4th Ukrainian front took Tesin on the 3rd and Olomouc on the 8th May, while Marshal Malinovsky's forces have continued their offensive east of Brno.

No news of Germany's unconditional surrender was given in Moscow until 1 a.m. on the 9th May, when the Soviet Home Service relayed the terms of the instrument of unconditional surrender signed in Berlin on the 8th May. At the some time it was announced that the 9th May was to be a public holiday to be celebrated as the Day of Victory, and all Soviet State institutions were instructed to fly the State flag of the U.S.S.R. for the occasion; the broadcast ended with the National Anthems of the U.S.S.R., Britain, the United States and France. Fighting continued on several sectors of the Soviet-German front on the 8th May.

The official Soviet statement on the House of Commons questions concerning the disappearance of the Polish leaders, the alleged arrest of Witos and the reports of shootings of Poles in Siedlce was issued by Tass and broadcast on the 6th May. The facts as given by Tass were that the group of Poles referred to consisted of 16, not 15, persons, and that their leader was General Okulicki, who was mentioned as being an "especially odious person" and therefore conveniently passed over in silence by the British reports. This General and his group were accused by Tass of diversionary acts which resulted in the loss of the lives of over 100 Red Army officers and men and of illegally maintaining wireless stations in the rear of the Soviet troops. They had not "disappeared" but were arrested by the Soviet military authorities and were under examination in Moscow. The reports about the shootings in Siedlce were dismissed as "fabrications from beginning to end," which had evidently been planted on the Members of Parliament concerned in the enquiries by Arciszewski agents. The report of the arrest of Witos was also stigmatised as completely false. (See also under "Poland.")

The report of the Extraordinary State Commission for Investigating Atrocities on the Oswiecim concentration camp, compiled in February and March, was published by Tass on the 7th May. The camp was said to cover 467·5 hectares, and always to have contained from 180,000–250,000 prisoners. The account contained lurid details of "conveyor-belt" extermination of prisoners, of whom a total of 4 million were said to have been put to death; according to Pravda's editorial, the Oswiecim camp surpassed everything hitherto known in technique and cruelty. Pravda concluded with a solemn warning that these crimes would not be forgotten and that the Hitlerite scoundrels responsible would be found out in any hospitable neutral country or any uninhabited island, or at the very bottom of the ocean. British accounts of Belsen and Buchenwald have been reported briefly in the Soviet press, but they were not linked with Maidanek and Oswiecim in this Pravda indictment.

In The War and the Working Class (No. 8) M. A. Sokolov attempts to analyse the "Soviet and Anglo-Saxon conceptions of Democracy." M. Sokolov agrees that Soviet and Anglo-Saxon conceptions of democracy are fundamentally different as "the economic basis of society in the U.S.S.R. differs from that in England." There are, however, some very sharp references to the practice of democratic Powers in colonial countries and to the present state of affairs in Greece. "English democratic rights," asserts M. Sokolov, "are enjoyed only by the inhabitants of the metropolitan country whereas the far more numerous inhabitants of the British colonies . . . . are still waiting vainly for democratisation, freedom and independence. It is well-known that there is not even a whiff of democracy in colonial countries." A democrat "in our days" is defined as one who resolutely fights Fascism, while those who believe that democracy can be inaugurated by restoring pre-war forms of political life in many European countries are denounced. "In truth," argues M. Sokolov, "this life, for instance in Poland, Yugoslavia, Greece and Finland, had little in common with democracy." "Quite apart from universally known cases of the grossest violation of democracy in European countries like Greece," adds M. Sokolov, "it is sufficient to recall the state of affairs in the colonial world." "In Belgium, Holland, Denmark and Norway the political structures were honeycombed with reactions. . . . The liberated people therefore want a forward-looking democracy. . . . . Yugoslavia and Roumania have taken the first steps. The Polish people were building up their new life on democratic principles." This authoritative expression of the Soviet point of view shows how far the Anglo-Saxon and Soviet conception of democracy are at variance.

The Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. has issued a Fourth State War Loan to the amount of R. 25 milliards for a period of twenty years. (For the conditions of issue of the last Soviet State War Loan, see Summary No. 240.) The shares of the loan and the revenues therefrom, including prizes, are to be exempt from State and local taxation. As in previous issues, the Fourth State War Loan consists of a lottery and an interest issue. The former issue will be floated among the population while the latter is to be taken up by agricultural cartels and associations for the joint cultivation of land. In announcing this new war loan, the People's Commissar of Finance, M. Zverev, stated that it would be utilised for the "final defeat of Hitlerite Germany and the reconstruction of the country." Immediately after M. Zverev's speech, the Presidium of the Central T.U. Council met to organise an all-union campaign to launch the loan among the workers of the Soviet Union and to explain its importance.

The Council of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R. has celebrated the 50th anniversary of the invention of radio-telegraphy by the Russian scientist M. A. S. Popov (1859–1905), by a decree honouring the inventor and instituting various measures for the future promotion of radio science. A Popov gold medal is to be awarded annually to a Soviet or foreign scientist for outstanding work or inventions in the sphere of radio; the 7th May is to be set aside every year in the U.S.S.R. as Radio Day; several scholarships for students are to be established at technical institutes in Leningrad and Moscow, and the daughters and granddaughter of M. A. S. Popov are awarded pensions by the State.

Much publicity has been given to M. Herriot's sojourn in Moscow after his liberation by the Red army, and his address urging Franco-Soviet co-operation was broadcast (4th May).

The Soviet Ambassador to Italy, M. A. Kostylev, presented his credentials to Prince Umberto on the 28th April.

For General Vlasov's eleventh-hour attempt to secure a homeward passage by assisting the patriots of Prague to disarm German troops, see under "Czechoslovakia."

SCANDINAVIA.

The official liberation of Denmark took place at 8 a.m. on the 5th May, when cease fire was proclaimed in accordance with the terms of surrender. Fighting, however, continued in Copenhagen for some little time, between the patriot forces and fanatical Germans, who were supported by fire from their ships in the harbour; to an even greater extent the struggle took the form of a round-up of Danish collaborators.

At noon King Christian and the new Prime Minister, M. Buhl, broadcast to the Danish people to celebrate the liberation of the country, and to announce the formal appointment of a constitutional Government. This consists of 18 members, but an inner Cabinet of 10, representatives of all parties, has been appointed to deal with urgent problems. Seats in the Government are equally divided between the old politicians and the Freedom Council. While there are said to be only two representatives of the Communist party, Aksel Larsen and Alfred Jensen, Prof. Mogens Fog and M. Frode Jacobsen, who are also included, are generally considered to be in close sympathy with Communist views. M. Arne Sörensen's party, Dansk Samling, is represented by M. Sörensen himself and by M. Juel Christensen. The representatives of Danish resistance abroad, M. Christmas Möller, who becomes Minister for Foreign Affairs, and M. Kaufmann, appear to have been reckoned in the Freedom Council contingent, which also contributes the Minister of Justice, M. Busch Jensen, the drafter of the new penal laws, who is believed to have no party affiliations. The politicians consist of four Social Democrats, including the Premier and M. Hedtoft-Hansen, two Conservatives, MM. Ole Björn Kraft and Fibiger, two Liberals and one Radical. The new Government is only expected to hold office till the elections which will probably be held in the autumn. The Rigsdag has been summoned for the 9th May.

Norway has had to wait for liberation until the general capitulation of the 7th May. Until nearly the end of last week there was considerable apprehension in Norway that the Germans would make the country a final focus of resistance. On the 5th May, however, after a consultation with his Ministers, Quisling broadcast a conciliatory speech appealing for calm and order and expressing the willingness of his Government to collaborate with all active forces in the country in the endeavour to escape civil war. This passive attitude was generally accepted throughout the Quisling Party, though Jonas Lie struck a somewhat more bellicose note in a proclamation published in Germaneren on the 5th May and in a speech delivered on the same day. In the latter he said "it is our duty to fight so that our culture may survive."

On Monday night General Böhme, German Commander in Norway, conveyed the fact that capitulation in a somewhat tactlessly worded order of the day, in which he laid the blame on Count von Krosigk, claiming that "we are standing here undefeated and strong as before. No enemy has dared to attack us," and expressed the hope that his forces would be dealing with men who would respect a soldier's honour, and emulate the disciplined attitude which the Wehrmacht had displayed towards the Norwegian people.

Apart from a harmless and natural demonstration outside the Möllergaten Prison, calm seems to have prevailed, though as late as 10·30 a.m. on Monday the German police had made arrests in Oslo. At 6 p.m. the Swedish radio reported that an Allied Naval Force of forty-eight ships was entering Oslo Fjord, and stated that a landing was expected at any moment.

In preparation for the resumption of control by the constitutional Government, the Minister of Justice, M. Terje Wold, recently broadcast from London, announcing the supersession of the legislation promulgated in Norway by the Germans and their puppets, in favour of previously existing Norwegian law and the provisional ordinances drawn up by the Government in London. To this clean sweep of laws and orders made in Norway during the occupation there would, said M. Wold, be a few exceptions, covering such technical matters as price control and rationing, and such things as the provisions made by the Administrative Council in 1940.

LOW COUNTRIES.

At 8 p.m. on the 4th, a broadcast informed the Dutch that the German forces in the Western Netherlands had agreed to surrender unconditionally. The surrender came into force at 8 a.m. on the 5th. Twelve hours later Queen Wilhelmina, who together with Princess Juliana had recently arrived in the Netherlands, broadcast to her subjects. She expressed her joy at the completion of liberation and her gratitude to the Allies. She ended her speech with a reference to the great tasks that lay ahead: "Under the yoke of the oppressor we have rediscovered ourselves; our energy has reawakened. Now is the time to prove our mettle. Our balanced character, our centuries-old civilisation and our spiritual driving force will undoubtedly give us a strength in action by which we will show the world what we can do . . . . More than ever are we united in spirit with our fellow subjects of the Empire—in the Netherlands East Indies—who are still suffering so bitterly under the enemy's yoke. May the hour of deliverance soon dawn for them too—and through our efforts."

Since the 29th April (see also last Summary) large quantities of food have been daily sent to the Western Netherlands. As soon as the Germans had surrendered, arrangements were made for their speedy removal from their present quarters to designated prison camps. There is evidence that some S.S. troops—many of them Dutch traitors—disobeyed orders and fired on Dutch civilians and on the Dutch Forces of the Interior—whom General Blaskowitz agreed to regard as regular troops at the time of his surrender. But no possibility now remains of serious opposition to the Allies. Mussert, indeed, has been arrested by British troops.

It is to be noted that the Dutch at this moment of extreme need have been receiving aid from Belgium in the form of supplies and the services of doctors. The Dutch Ambassador to Belgium has expressed the gratitude of his countrymen in a broadcast from Brussels and expressed his belief that co-operation between the Netherlands and Belgium will be close, cordial and successful.

In a speech at the fourth plenary session of the San Francisco Conference, M. Spaak thus defined the point of view of the Belgian delegation. "Let the Great Powers be freely accepted leaders. We have confidence in their strength and experience. But they, on their part, should not forget that we are less inclined than they to trust in power which, indeed, we lack, and see in their respect for justice and law the supreme safeguard of our existence. Because of that preoccupation we cannot but hope, as do other delegations, that the juridical and moral bases of the new organisation will be more clearly defined."

The executive committee of the Belgian Socialist Party has passed a resolution to the effect that there will be dissension in Belgium should King Leopold return and automatically resume the exercise of the regal functions. The Socialist Party, therefore, must oppose the immediate restoration of power to the King and support any initiative tending to induce the King to abdicate The text of this resolution was published on the 4th and aroused much controversy. The Catholics take the line that the regency should be terminated by the King and reject the suggestion that it is for Parliament to declare it at an end. There are no precedents to follow; feeling on both sides is likely to be strong, and a major political crisis may well occur. It may be noted that M. Spaak has been recalled from San Francisco in view of impending events.

FRANCE.

General François Sevez, on behalf of France, signed at Rheims the Act of Unconditional Surrender of all the German forces on the 7th May. General de Lattre de Tassigny was one of the signatories of the ratification of the Act at Berlin the following day.

Before the cessation of hostilities the First French Army advanced into the Vorarlberg, took several towns in Austria, and on the 4th May received the surrender of the 24th German army. French forces also liberated the island of Oléron.

According to the French home service the French Government support the British and American Governments in their refusal to recognise the Provisional Government sponsored by the Russians in Austria. The French Mission for Austria, headed by M. Baudet, is now in Italy with the other Allied Missions waiting to proceed to Vienna.

The Foreign Affairs Commission of the Consultative Assembly has proposed that the Government should seek to obtain the inclusion of economic clauses in the terms of the German armistice. These would provide for the delivery to France of food and all kinds of raw material, the replacement of livestock and the allocation of prisoner-of-war labour. The Commission has also called for a Reparations Commission on which France would be represented and has asked the Government to negotiate the immediate transfer of the Saar coal mines to French ownership. A majority considered that this transfer should also carry with it the political annexation of the Saar territory. The Commission was unanimously in favour of putting the Ruhr under international mandate and opposed to the creation of a Rheno-Westphalian State. A majority advocated a security zone along the whole of the German left bank of the Rhine and held that this should be an international zone, and, like the Ruhr, controlled by an international force. In a press conference at San Francisco M. Bidault also has stated that the Ruhr must be placed under international control. At the same time he said he preferred to treat the idea of a Rheno-Westphalian State with reserve.

Among the prominent Frenchmen freed by the Allied armies are MM. Reynaud, Daladier, Léon Blum, Delbos, François-Poncet, Albert Sarraut, and Ybarnégaray, and Generals Gamelin and Weygand. Colonel de La Rocque was also found. Mr. Churchill has sent messages of congratulation to MM. Herriot, Reynaud, Daladier and Blum.

Although the final results of the municipal elections, save in Paris, will not be known until after the second ballot, it is clear that the swing to the Right which had been expected in the provinces as a reaction against the claims of the Resistance Movement has not occurred, that the women's vote has not been the Conservative influence it was expected to be, and that the country has moved to the Left. In spite of apparent apathy, public interest in the elections was considerable. In Paris, 80 per cent. of the electorate voted and the two most striking things about the results were the sweeping victory of the Communists, which would have been still greater but for the system of proportional representation in force, and the success of the Mouvement Républicain Populaire, which has clearly benefited from the mass of former Conservatives and Radicals who sought to vote further to the Left without going quite as far as the Socialists. The latter party has emerged with no great gains but has maintained its strong pre-war position. A number of Deputies and Senators who voted for Pétain in 1940 and were ineligible have been returned in country districts, but will be unable to assume office until the Jury d'honneur has rehabilitated them. The press interprets the election results as a victory for the ideas of the Resistance Movement, and the National Council of Resistance published a statement on the 5th May expressing deep satisfaction at the results, and at the May-Day demonstrations which followed the elections, and asking that General de Gaulle should now put an end to the period of waiting and introduce the new régime for which the country had voted.

In Algiers May-Day celebrations were marred by a clash between the police and Arab Nationalist demonstrators. There were other demonstrations elsewhere and, although the official communiqué admitted only three deaths in the whole of Algeria, it is believed that in Algiers alone one policeman and about ten Arabs were killed and three policemen and twenty-five Arabs wounded.

Mme. Pétain has been arrested on a charge of collusion with the enemy. The French wireless has stated that Rear-Admiral Bléhaut, the former Vichy Minister for the Navy, who accompanied Pétain on his return to France, will be tried by the High Court and that the chief witness for the prosecution in the trial of the Marshal will be M. Reynaud.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

On the 2nd May, after spending several days on the Austro-Swiss frontier trying to persuade the Swiss authorities to give him sanctuary, Pierre Laval, accompanied by his wife and four other French persons, of whom Abel Bonnard, ex-Vichy Minister of Education, was the most interesting, landed at the Barcelona airfield in a J.U. 88 German bomber. Their arrival being quite unexpected, they were detained at the airport. Laval and Bonnard have since been taken to the well-known fortress of Montjuich in Barcelona where they are being held incomunicados. Inasmuch as Laval is the first notorious traitor who, entering a neutral country unasked, has been refused asylum, his case is of some interest.

On the same day the Minister for Foreign Affairs told the United States Ambassador that, except for Mme. Laval, the party would be ordered to leave immediately, and, if they refused, that they would be handed over to the Allies. Laval, speaking on the telephone with Señor Lèquerica himself, not unnaturally was reluctant to relinquish what he hoped was going to be a congenial climate. However, he was ready, he said, to give himself up for judgment by an Allied tribunal, but he was not going to surrender to the French. He was therefore interned in the Montjuich prison.

His Majesty's Government and the United States Government are agreed in the opinion that, since Laval is not a United Nations war criminal, this is a matter for the French and Spaniards to settle. For their part, the French Government have not been backward in sharing the same view, and, while recognising that there were no legal grounds upon which they could demand the extradition of M. Pierre Laval, they did instruct M. Truelle, their non-accredited Minister in Madrid, to call on the Minister for Foreign Affairs to request that Laval, who is now, at least to us, hardly more than a "triste individu en cravate blanche," should be delivered across the frontier into their hands. The United States Ambassador and Mr. Bowker, His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, have together also urged this course on the Minister.

But this simple solution does not suit the Spaniards at all. Franco-Spanish relations are not good, the representatives in both capitals are still only unofficial, and although Laval's descent upon Barcelona is embarrassing to the Spanish Government, General Franco is not the man to shy at the chance of showing contumely to a neighbour who, once guilty of the solecism "Il n'y a plus de Pyrénées," has been a source of frequent annoyance ever since. And he backs his "pointe de malice" with reasons, rather good reasons. Señor Lequerica, well primed with the adjectives of international law, argued that to hand over Laval would be tantamount to extradition. Spain had no agreement with France which would permit that; it would be a measure which would constitute a flagrant violation of all the principles of international law and justice; it would create a most dangerous and objectionable precedent. Extradition of political offenders had never taken place between France and Spain, and if the Spanish Government were now to extradite Laval it would raise at once the thorny question of the Spanish political refugees in France. Not that they looked upon Pierre Laval as a welcome visitor; on the contrary his presence was an embarrassment. They would agree to any arrangement for his rapid departure save that of crossing the frontier from Spain into France. Let him be taken away by any Allied warship or merchantman, let him go to Gibraltar, let him go anywhere but to the Pyrenees. So now the ball is back in the Allied court. It is for the French to say how they would like it to be played.

It is reported from Madrid that on the 7th May the German Chargé d'Affaires was summoned to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and informed that relations between Spain and the Third Reich had ceased.

Some surprise and indignation have been shown among the Allies at the decision of the Portuguese Government to pay protocolary tribute to the alleged memory of Adolf Hitler. All official flags, including those of the large British-built Navy, were flown at half-mast. Indignation is permissible, but this gesture should surely not cause surprise, at least among the readers of this Summary. It is absolutely of a piece with Dr. Salazar's character, meticulously formal, rigidly remote, icily abstract. The gesture was not a condonation of Hitler's criminal lunacy, but a precise, detached observance of diplomatic usage. Dr. Salazar has, however, been rather shaken by Allied resentment, and, in reply to our representations, has tried to make amends for his quite explicable lack of tact by closing the German Legation and other Nazi establishments. Never have the Portuguese Government been known to act so quickly.

ITALY.

The unconditional surrender on the 2nd May of the German Army in Italy under the command of General von Vietinghoff-Scheel to Field-Marshal Sir Harold Alexander marked the first step of the complete collapse of Germany. The first contact between Allied and German representatives apparently took place last February, but owing to various difficulties amongst them—that of keeping Himmler in the dark—the pourparlers took two months. The number of men involved was a million and the area surrendered included all North Italy up to the Isonzo together with the Austrian provinces of Vorarlberg, Tirol and Salzburg as well as parts of Carinthia and Styria.

Mr. Churchill sent Signor Bonomi a message of congratulation on the liberation of Italy and the part the Italian regular forces as well as the patriots have played in the defeat of the Germans. Mr. Churchill also expressed his satisfaction that comparatively little damage had been done to the material resources of the North of Italy. The final paragraph in which Mr. Churchill said that he looked forward to the time not far distant when Italy would join the United Nations in the more fruitful labours of peace, has caused great pleasure both to the Italian Government as well as the people. The tribute to the part played by the patriots is that which has caused the greatest satisfaction. Signor Bonomi has sent a reply thanking Mr. Churchill in warm terms for his message.

The fact that Italian patriots were in control of the big cities in Northern Italy before the arrival of the Allies has enormously encouraged the nation as a whole. Honour has been vindicated and the period of humiliation is over. The Committees of National Liberation have undoubtedly been effective in their control generally and it looks as if they would co-operate usefully with Allied military authorities.

The absence of any invitation to San Francisco is still, however, keenly felt and the Council of Ministers have unanimously approved a declaration protesting against Italy's exclusion which the Foreign Minister, Signor de Gasperi, has been instructed to forward to the President of the San Francisco Conference and to all the Governments represented there.

It is reported in the press that representatives of the Central Committees of National Liberation of both North and South Italy as well as the leaders of the six Parties represented on the Central Committee of the South have held a meeting to discuss the future Italian Government. The representatives from the North, who have plenary powers, expect a new Ministry, representative of the whole of Italy, to emerge. There is said to be strong feeling against the retention of Signor Bonomi as Prime Minister and Signor Nenni, the leader of the Socialist Party, Signor Parri of the Action Party and Signor Longo of the Communist Party have been mentioned as alternatives.

THE VATICAN.

The immediate reaction of the Vatican to the news of the surrender was a prayer that "to this first mercy may be added the other and greater mercy, a durable, Christian peace for all nations without exception." The Vatican wireless in Italian hoped for a "just and loyal peace." This preoccupation with justice in the post-hostilities world was to be seen in Osservatore Romano's article on the death of Mussolini: Justice must be done; but justice must not be confused with revenge, or punishment descends to the level of the crime it punishes, and "becomes a manifestation of that execrable party spirit that led to the condemnation of a whole nation from the Christian point of view." This veiled allusion to the recent descriptions of German Concentration Camps, whose horrors the Vatican, along with other Governments, had known for years, was followed by a warning that "one should keep silence about the cruel episodes which fan human passions and induce the most irresponsible elements to indulge in insane imitation."

The Catholic-Communist controversy in Italy continues (see Summary No. 291 under "Italy"). On the 15th April Osservatore Romano denied that the Church had created what Togliatti called an anti-Communist terror and said that, so long as Atheism was an essential part of Communism, any truce Communists made was intended to last only until they felt able to ban Christianity. Quotidiano accused the Communists of using the wolf and lamb technique, and pointed out that the Church had not waited for Germany to attack Russia before condemning nazism. "The Church by championing liberty is the enemy of dictatorship in every form."

Moscow continued its attacks on the Vatican in a broadcast of the 30th April. In a list of those who wished to save Hitler and his evil friends it included business men, elderly ladies of high society and the Pope, "that Mysterious Shepherd who protects wolves from sheep." As usual, the main complaint is that the Pope has made no clear cut condemnation of Nazi excesses, and the care for legal forms which caused the flag of the Lisbon Nunciature to fly at half-mast when Hitler died would not make it more easy for the Russians to understand the Vatican's ways.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Professor Szentgyörgyi has arrived in Moscow at the invitation of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. A private source states that Count Stephen Bethlen, the ex-Premier, and Count Bela Teleki, formerly Chairman of the Transylvanian Party, have also been removed to Russia, but in this case by order of the Soviet authorities.

Allied troops are reported to have found in a German prison another ex-Premier, M. Kállay. Yet another, L. Bárdossy, took refuge in Switzerland (a week later he was ordered to leave); but the Archduke Albrecht is reported to have been refused admission to that country.

Roumania.

Progress over the trial of war criminals appears from public accounts to be slow. The "questioning" of the first batch seems to have been completed and they are to appear before a People's Court on the 14th May. This list includes the names of sixteen senior officers, together with "minor officials," school teachers and n.c.o.'s. In spite of the mass arrests, many members of the Iron Guard are still free, and, according to report, some are actually being welcomed into the Communist Party on the ground that they had all along constituted a fifth column in the Guardist movement. Meanwhile it has been announced that 1,283 political prisoners arrested before the 6th March are to be released, some of whom are admitted to have been Guardists.

On May Day organised demonstrations were held in Bucharest, a large part of the crowd consisting of school children who had evidently been trained to shout Communist slogans. Such slogans have been a feature of the Bucharest radio for some time past, and the general impression is that Communist propaganda has made a notable advance.

Recent reports from Maramures indicate that the local agitation in favour of union with the Ukrainian S.S.R., which had flared up in February, is dying down, possibly as a result of a change of directive from Moscow. The Ukrainian leader Odovichuk is still in Sighet, but his influence is on the wane, and a prefect appointed by Bucharest has recently been installed in the town.

Yugoslavia.

Events in Venezia Giulia overshadowed everything. On the evening of the 30th April Tito's Order of the Day announced that Yugoslav troops had occupied several towns north of Fiume and in eastern Istria and were fighting in Fiume, Pola and Trieste. His Order of the 1st May stated that Yugoslav troops had occupied Trieste, Monfalcone and Gorizia and reached the Isonzo on a wide front. But Tanjug, late that night and next morning, spoke of Trieste being "invested" and of fierce street fighting proceeding there. Nevertheless salvoes of artillery were fired at Belgrade in the early hours of the 2nd May and Tanjug described the enthusiasm with which the Triestini were welcoming the Yugoslav army and decorating their town. The official view had been expressed in a leading article in Borba of the 30th April. It was the unshakable determination of the Yugoslav peoples to incorporate Istria, Trieste and the Slovene Coastland (the hinterland north and east of Trieste) in their country and any attempt to frustrate these aims would "be brought to nought by the might of the new Yugoslavia."

On the 2nd May Politika, but not Borba, printed the Allied communiqué announcing the meeting of Allied and Yugoslav forces at Monfalcone on the 1st. What was never announced at Belgrade was the fact that at 1630 hours on the 2nd May the German Commander in Trieste surrendered to General Freyburg, commanding a New Zealand Division. Few Yugoslav troops were found in the city and the British troops firmly established control of the port area.

On the same day Radio Belgrade said that the Yugoslavs had crossed the Isonzo and were advancing on Gemona, north of Udine.

Also on the 2nd the Headquarters of the 4th Yugoslav Army issued a warning to the Allies that no Allied forces should cross the Isonzo, and on the 3rd it required Allied forces to retire to the west of the river. Nevertheless British troops entered Gorizia, without incidents, on the morning of the 3rd and Allied Force Headquarters had then received no reports of a Yugoslav crossing of the Isonzo.

On the 3rd May Yugoslav Supreme Headquarters issued a communiqué denying the accuracy of Field-Marshal Alexander's announcement of the occupation of Trieste and Gorizia by his troops; on the grounds that there had been no German garrison in Trieste after the 30th April. It added that some Allied forces had, without Yugoslav permission, entered these cities, "which might have undesirable consequences, unless the matter is settled by mutual agreement." The same day Radio Belgrade broadcast an article from Naprijed, rejecting any future for Trieste except inclusion in Yugoslavia and ending "Istria and Trieste are ours and will be ours."

Tito's Order of the Day on the 3rd May announced the Yugoslav capture of Fiume and Pola. Near Trieste the confusion was increased by the surrender to the Allies of some thousands of Serbian chetniks.

By the afternoon of the 4th May the New Zealand Division were holding Monfalcone and the port area of Trieste in strength, and moving up to the support of their forward elements in Gorizia. The Yugoslavs held most of the city of Trieste. German forces retiring north-west from Fiume had recaptured Sappiane.

On the 5th Allied forces had reached Plezzo near the northern end of the Isonzo valley; but the Yugoslavs controlled the valley from Gorizia to Caporetto and were further west at Cormons.

Later reports stated that the Yugoslav forces in and north of Trieste had been considerably increased; that in Trieste all the seven barracks and most large buildings had been seized by the Yugoslavs; that all man-power between the ages of 18 and 60 was being conscribed (in violation of the Law of War), the Italians for forced labour and the Yugoslav sympathisers of military age for the army; that all Italians of any standing had been arrested by the Yugoslavs; and that Yugoslav elements were infiltrating west of the Isonzo. The New Zealanders had been reinforced by an American Division. The situation was evidently explosive.

Borba of the 5th May contained a long article expressing surprise that demonstrations in support of the Italian retention of Trieste were allowed by the Allied authorities in Italy. It denounced the Italian Government for requesting the application of Allied Military Government to Venezia Giulia, and stated that the area was already under Allied (i.e., Yugoslav) administration. It was sarcastic about the Italian Government's expression of gratitude to the Supreme Allied Commander for liberating Trieste, saying that when the New Zealand troops entered Trieste "there was not a single German or Italian Fascist soldier in the town." It then proceeded to attack the British press, especially the Daily Herald and the Manchester Guardian, for advocating Allied Military Government of Venezia Giulia. Politika contained a similar attack.

Meanwhile a frank exchange of views by telegram had been taking place between Field-Marshal Alexander and Marshal Tito, the former basing himself on the oral understandings reached in Italy in August 1944 and at Belgrade in February 1945, the latter on the changing circumstances of the war and the political interest of Yugoslavia in Venezia Giulia. Finally Tito accepted the suggestion that General Morgan, Alexander's Chief of Staff, should meet him in Belgrade to settle differences.

In the north a Yugoslav Division, with orders to seize Klagenfurt, the capital of Carinthia, has begun to cross the Austrian frontier.

In Croatia, after the German surrender, the Yugoslavs have advanced rapidly and captured Zagreb. The partisan press has been threatening the Croat Catholic clergy, including by name the Archbishop of Zagreb, Mgr. Stepinac.

A Government of Bosnia-Hercegovina has been set up. As in the other four regions so far organised, the Premier is the Communist Secretary of the National Liberation Front. The Macedonian Government, it now appears, consists exclusively of Communists.

On the 30th April it was announced that the Yugoslav Government had decided to recognise the administration of General Hodza as the Government of Albania, to establish diplomatic relations with that Government and with the Government of Bulgaria [with which Yugoslavia is still technically in a state of war]. They had also decided, at the request of Syria and Lebanon, to recognise the independence of, and establish diplomatic relations with, those two States [with neither of which can Yugoslavia have extensive intercourse].

Greece.

M. Sophianopoulos' action at San Francisco, where he voted against the British and American delegates on the question of the admission of Argentina, is reported to have met with a good deal of disapproval in Athens, where it was felt in many quarters that it was unfortunate that the Greek delegation should have ranged itself with the U.S.S.R. in opposition to Great Britain and the United States. According to the Athens wireless, M. Sophianopoulos explained in an interview given to an Argentine newspaper that in fact the Greek delegation were looking forward to the collaboration of Argentina in the work of the Conference; the standpoint which Greece took up while the invitation was under discussion had been dictated by her sincere desire to emphasise that it was a matter of prime importance for the success of the Conference to maintain unanimity on serious matters between the four Powers taking part.

On the whole, the stock of the Voulgaris Government appears to be rising; leaders of both the Communist Party and the recently amalgamated E.L.D.-Socialist Party have had interviews with the Premier, after which the former went so far as to say that any change in their attitude towards the Government depended on whether measures were taken to restore normal conditions and to guarantee popular sovereignty, while the latter stated that, though on principle they disapproved of Service Governments, they were not prepared, simply for the sake of principle, to oppose the Government, and would support it in any steps it might take to ensure liberty and prosperity and to suppress the activities of Military Leagues. The Communist Party is believed to be heading for a purge, in which M. Siantos will probably lose his post as Secretary-General. Meantime, it has been announced in the Greek press that M. Zachariadis, the former leader of the Party (see Summary No. 287) has just been released from Dachau.

There is no improvement in the financial situation and the drachma is still declining; prices are rising, and in consequence there are many demands for increased wages and salaries. On the 3rd May there was a strike of bank employees, including those working in the Bank of Greece, because the Government had refused them the Easter bonus granted to industrial workers; there have also been other strikes which have had to be settled by an increase in wages. The Finance Minister has reached London for discussions with British officials.

Albania.

When in Belgrade towards the end of April, Enver Hoxha referred to Yugoslav friendship as vital to Albania. He thanked the Yugoslav army for equipping and training Albanian units, and he expressed the conviction that the two countries could help one another economically, Albania providing crude oil and petrol in exchange for Yugoslav wheat and maize. On the 30th April the Yugoslav Cabinet decided to recognise Enver Hoxha's administration as the Government of Albania and to establish diplomatic relations with it. This consecrates the close relations which have always existed between the two Leftist régimes, that of Enver Hoxha being in fact much like that of Marshal Tito in miniature. In consequence, Yugoslav influence on Enver Hoxha's policy may well become even greater than hitherto.

Bulgaria.

The decision taken on the 28th April by the Yugoslav Government to establish diplomatic relations with Bulgaria was warmly welcomed in Sofia. The Fatherland Front Government, which within a month of its obtaining power agreed with Marshal Tito's Government last October to collaborate in the fight against Germany and to settle all differences in a brotherly spirit, has consistently kept reconciliation with Yugoslavia in the forefront of its policy, and is doubtless gratified at the prospect of being at last in full diplomatic relations with one of the United Nations.

The Bulgarian authorities recently drew up a statement to show the extent of the military contribution of Bulgaria to the Allied cause. According to this, the Bulgarian troops, including reserves, employed against the Germans in Yugoslavia last year numbered 448,000 and suffered 17,000 casualties, while 100,000 Bulgarian field troops have co-operated with the Red Army in Yugoslavia and Hungary since December last, and have sustained 12,800 casualties.

According to fairly reliable reports several of the closest friends of Dr. J. M. Dimitrov, the former Agrarian leader, have been arrested in spite of the protests of the three Agrarian members of the Cabinet, and he himself has been put under house arrest. There are also indications that, with Soviet support, the Communists intend to dispose, by one means or another, of the possibility of his ever again leading the Agrarian Party and menacing the present dominance of the Communists. The vicious campaign which the Communists are conducting against him lends some colour to the suspicion that they intend to impeach him in the People's Court on charges of actively opposing the Government's foreign and home policy and spreading defeatism in order to split the coalition.

The People's Court is stated to be hearing no fresh cases. It recently sentenced to death eleven members of the judiciary and police and four business people, at the same time condemning a hundred or more of the accused to imprisonment, but acquitting an even greater number

Turkey.

More than two months of negotiation ended with the signature in London on the 4th May of an Anglo-Turkish Trade and Payments Agreement, which is regarded by both sides as satisfactory. As from the 21st May, when it comes into force, it abolishes the Anglo-Turkish clearing office and provides for payments between the sterling area and Turkey being settled in sterling through Turkish accounts. The Turkish Central Bank will publish its buying and selling rate for sterling, including the premium to be applied to certain operations. The Turkish delegates, who bargained with characteristic obstinacy, would not agree to a uniform rate of exchange applicable to all permitted transactions, nor would they accept any arrangement which would have reduced Turkish prices to a reasonable level. However, the right of the Turkish Central Bank to convert sterling into gold ceased on the 31st March and has not been revived.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Hassanein Pasha, Chief of King Farouk's Royal Cabinet, who first became ill at Lord Moyne's funeral and has been intermittently on the sick list ever since, has had another heart attack. It is questionable whether he will ever be fit to resume duty at the Palace, but King Farouk has so far been unable to find a suitable successor. As long as Amr Pasha was acting for Hassanein, the latter's absence was not so greatly felt, as Amr proved an excellent substitute; but since Amr's departure for London as Egyptian Chargé d'Affaires there, there has been no one to fill the gap at the Palace. It is not an easy post to fill, and much depends on the King's choice.

The Egyptian press has referred to a speech, delivered at the San Francisco Conference by the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which he expressed the view that the Conference should approve the revision of treaties which have now become incompatible with present circumstances. A statement by one of the experts attached to the Egyptian Delegation at San Francisco is also quoted, to the effect that the presence of British troops in Egypt was of no further use, and that the condominium of the Sudan must also be reconsidered.

In spite of our representations to the French, they seem determined to send reinforcements to Beyrouth. If it was merely a matter of replacement, possibly no great harm would be done, but for the French to send additional troops, especially coloured troops, is undoubtedly a dangerous move in present circumstances. The Ministers for Foreign Affairs of both the Levant States, especially of Syria, have expressed their apprehension at the projected move. They intend to address a note to the French as well as to the other Allies, requesting that the status of Allied troops in the Levant should be regularised.

We have again pointed out to the French the dangers of sending reinforcements, but so far without much success. General de Gaulle has said that General Beynet will be returning to Beyrouth this week, and will be empowered to hand over to the Levant States one brigade of troupes spéciales, which according to General de Gaulle would be numerically rather more than the reinforcements being sent. But if the troupes spéciales are to be replaced by French troops, the advantages of this gesture—so long delayed—will be more than outweighed by the apprehension caused by French reinforcements.

The Regent of Iraq is still hoping that the invitation to visit the United States originally issued to him by President Roosevelt, will be renewed by President Truman on the conclusion of the thirty days' mourning for the late President on the 12th May. If, however, as is possible, the invitation is delayed, the Regent would like instead to visit England, where he might meet the Iraqi delegates on their way home from San Francisco.

The notorious Rashid Ali, who was responsible for the coup d'État in Iraq in 1941, and who has since then spent most of his time as an exile in Germany, has just failed in an attempt to escape into Switzerland, having been turned back by the Swiss authorities at the frontier. It may therefore not be long before he falls into Allied hands, and we are considering what steps to take in this event.

Last week the Persian Majlis selected Ibrahim Hakimi as the new Prime Minister. Hakimi was Minister without Portfolio in the Cabinet of Qavam, and is reported to be pro-British. He is, however, 72 years of age, and is not thought to be a man of any importance.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 3rd May Admiral Suzuki said that Japan's position in East Asia had become more difficult and her responsibilities heavier because of the developments in Europe. He expressed deep sympathy for the German people who had fought valiantly for more than five years and had made enormous sacrifices. Japan, he declared, was fighting solely for her existence and in self-defence. Japan's integrity and the liberation of East Asia went together so that the countries of East Asia were united by identical war aims. Suzuki asserted that these war aims were essentially different from those of the war in Europe, "therefore our faith cannot be shaken by European developments." He declared his determination to fight on with everything he had got and that he wished to take this opportunity of proclaiming, both at home and abroad, Japan's faith in certain victory.

On the same day General Minami, the president of the Dai Nippon Seijikai, told members of the Lower House of the Diet that the Japanese Government had anticipated from the outset of the war the situation which had now arisen in Europe. Japan had fought in alliance with Germany, but recently the war situation had developed in such a way that co-operation between the two countries had become virtually impossible. Germany's plight, declared Minami, was sincerely regretted by Japan, but it would have almost no effect on her military strength. Japan must fight on whatever the odds against her.

The Chubu Nippon (4th May) said that Dönitz's avowed determination to fight to the last man deserved the highest admiration of the entire Japanese nation, and that it was particularly significant in view of reports of unconditional surrender proposals by Himmler to the United States and Great Britain, which had led some circles in Tokyo to entertain serious doubts as to German will to fight the second World War to a finish. "It is a well-known fact that there has been and still is a fundamental difference in the respective relations of Germany and of Japan with the Soviet Union. In the case of Germany continuing the war with the Soviet Union alone, or adopting a definite policy of making Soviet Russia her main enemy, we can see that the whole situation would have changed considerably." Japan's enemies were the United States and Great Britain and nobody else.

This foreshadowed Togo's statement to correspondents on the 6th May. He declared that Germany's attempt to conclude peace with the United States and Great Britain, but to continue the war against the U.S.S.R., conflicted with the war aims of Japan, who was at war with the United States and Great Britain but who maintained neutral relations with the U.S.S.R. It was also a flagrant violation by Germany of the agreement between Japan and Germany not to conclude a separate peace. In these circumstances Japan would reserve the right to deal with the Tripartite Pact and other political agreements with Germany from a new point of view.

The Japanese are continuing their stubborn defence of Okinawa and are making fantastic claims of American air and naval losses. The Domei naval correspondent on the 6th May declared that Admiral Toyoda had recently issued instructions to the Japanese Navy in which he had declared that the fate of the Japanese Empire depended on the issue of the Okinawa battle. The correspondent said that before the Okinawa operations suicide assaults by Japanese air units were a special means of attack, but in the Okinawa fighting this method had become a common practice and not only the Air Force, but also some units of the Japanese Fleet were engaged in attacks from which they did not return. The object now was to annihilate the American forces.

On the 5th May the Sixth National Congress of the Kuomintang was convened in Chungking. Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek spoke at the opening session. He said that the political sense of the Chinese people had been quickened by the war and that the early inauguration of a constitutional Government was necessary. He formally proposed that the National People's Assembly, which is to adopt the draft constitution, should be convened on the 12th November. He also told the Congress that its task was to improve the living conditions of the Chinese people, to prevent monopoly by capitalists and so to eliminate the causes of class struggle. The object of the Sixth National Congress of the Kuomintang should be to conclude the fifty years of revolutionary struggle in China and to secure a bright future for her.

A Chungking military spokesman asserted on the 5th May that the Japanese offensive in Western Hunan had been halted and that the threat to Chihkiang had been removed. He said that at one place 3,000 Japanese were killed. He revealed that Chinese reinforcements had been brought to the western Hunan front by air and that these included battle-tested units who were equipped with modern American weapons. The spokesman further said in Hupeh that some Japanese troops were cut off in the town of Laohokow and that these were making desperate efforts to break out and to join their main forces outside of the city. Another message from Chungking of the same date reported that Lieutenant-General Sultan was in Chungking and was discussing with Lieutenant-General Wedemeyer plans for the coming counter-offensive against the Japanese.

There has been another change of offices among the Nanking puppets (see this Summary, No. 291). Ting Mo-tsun, the Minister of Social Welfare, has been appointed Governor of Chekiang Province and concurrently head of the Peace Preservation Corps at Hangchow. Ting's former post has been filled by Peng Nien, formerly Director of the Social Welfare Department of the (Nanking) Kuomintang Central Party Headquarters (Domei, 4th May).

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

V–E Day was not officially celebrated as a public holiday in the United States. None the less there were scenes of wild excitement in the big cities as soon as the unconditional surrender of the German forces was known. Earlier false rumours of victory had somewhat taken the edge off the authentic news in advance, but Broadway was ankle-deep in the customary ticker-tape and torn-up paper some hours before the President's formal proclamation. The news of bitter fighting on Okinawa and in the Philippines reminded Americans, however, that the war was far from over, and this serious note was sounded by President Truman in his broadcast at 9 a.m. on the 8th May. "If I could give you a single watchword for the coming months that word is—work, work, work. We must work to finish the war. Our victory is but half-won. The West is free, but the East is still in bondage to the treacherous tyranny of the Japanese. When the last Japanese division has surrendered unconditionally, then only will our fighting job be done."

The extent of demobilisation in the American armed forces which will now take place was indicated in a War Department announcement on the 5th May. Only about 650,000 men in the European Theatre of Operations can expect their discharge, and it will be as much as a year before most of them get back home. Many troops will go straight to the Far East without a furlough in the United States. The present strength of the Army is 8,300,000, of whom 2 million altogether will be discharged in the next twelve months. Senator Edwin C. Johnson (Democrat, Colorado) has been campaigning for a simple "first-in, first-out" formula, akin to the British scheme of demobilisation. The present American arrangements depend on four factors—total length of service, number of months spent overseas, credit for combat, and number of dependent children. The allocation of points for these conditions will now be announced. There is unlikely to be any cut in inductions, since, as General Marshall explained to the House Military Affairs Committee on the 4th May, present arrangements will leave a shortage in man-power requirements. On the previous day a House joint resolution calling for the deferment of farmers was vetoed by the President, and the 185–177 tally against the veto failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority required to override it. President Truman thus won one of his first skirmishes with Congress.

The agitation on the subject of atrocities, particularly in Prisoner-of-War camps and civilian concentration camps, shows no signs of abating. Returned Congressmen and editors have reported the "inescapable" conclusion that the camps were operated on a "master plan of calculated and organised brutality." The editors urge that the "United Nations policy in regard to war criminals be speedily agreed to and the War Crimes Commission speedily empowered to put those policies into action." The appointment of Justice Jackson of the Supreme Court as the principal United States prosecutor in trials of war criminals was well received by the public as an earnest of a less procrastinating attitude, and another indication of opinion is a 61 per cent. Gallup poll in favour of obliging three or four million Germans to spend two or three years rebuilding the devastated cities of Russia.

The question of relief in Europe is also attracting increased attention. Following Judge Rosenman's report and the Presidential Message that accompanied it (see last week's Summary), Mr. Leo Crowley, the Foreign Economic Administrator, asserted on the 3rd May that between 200 and 300 million people in Europe would have to receive supplemental food "just to exist." "The United States," he added, "must of necessity be the main source of supply." Mr. Crowley emphasised that whatever food was shipped would be "only that which is left over after prior requirements are met." This included "first, food for our Army. Then a reasonable diet for civilians in the United States and continuation of lend-lease food shipments." His estimate of needy Europeans did not include any part of Germany proper. Mr. Crowley's remarks have received favourable comment, and signs of increasing activity by U.N.R.R.A. are also welcomed, especially as the press has in the past been highly critical of what is regarded as its limited usefulness.

Commentators are tending to picture the San Francisco Conference as a gigantic football game between the United States and the Soviet Union, with Britain and lesser Powers as onlookers. Mr. Molotov is reported in the press, for instance, to have scored one (admission of the two Soviet Republics) and lost two (on the Polish and Argentine issues). There was much concern in Liberal circles over the admission of Argentina, and the United States was considered to have weakened her moral position. The question of colonial trusteeship has been freely discussed since the American proposals and the outline of the British views became known. Except in the usual anti-British circles no great heat has so far been engendered. President Truman's announcement on the 5th May that the date of Philippine independence and economic freedom would be advanced and that a Commission would be appointed to assist him in attaining these objectives, represents one aspect of American colonial policy; while the insistence of Naval spokesmen, supported by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, that bases in the Pacific must be retained under American control represents another element which the Administration must take into account.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina the occasion of the fall of Berlin brought the anticipated clashes (See Summary No. 291), but as the streets of the capital were, according to Press reports, filled with mounted, motorised and pedestrian police, and the Government buildings held by troops, with carbines and tear-gar apparatus well in evidence, it is perhaps not surprising that Buenos Aires, unlike Berlin, survived the ordeal. Two policemen were reported killed, and one civilian. The Government connected the disturbances with the recent alleged plot, and the exiles in Montevideo have continued their propaganda barrage.

Meanwhile, Argentina's delegation to the San Francisco Conference has been appointed, and includes Dr. Cesar Ameghino (who now becomes Foreign Minister, no longer acting, and relinquishes the Ministry of Finance), and the Ambassadors in London and Washington.

In Chile, negotiations for the formation of a "political" Cabinet seem to have fallen through, and President Ríos is continuing to govern with a Cabinet of his "personal friends."

In Cuba, the Minister of Public Works has resigned, ostensibly on grounds of ill-health.

UNITED NATIONS.

The San Francisco Conference.

All proposed amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals had to be submitted by the national delegations by Friday night, the 4th May. They constitute 700 pages of documents; but it is known that they overlap very considerably in principle and often in detail also. The process of collation carried on by the four sponsoring Powers has already resulted in a set of amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals agreed between the latter. The most interesting of these agreed amendments are: (i) the suggestion that the Security Council should be empowered to recommend terms of settlement of a dispute between any two Powers which had proved incapable of agreed solution. A Great Power party to the dispute would not possess a veto on such recommendation; (ii) the proposal that, in electing to non-permanent seats on the Security Council, the Assembly should have regard, primarily, to the contribution made by member States to the maintenance of peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organisation, and, secondarily, to equitable geographical distribution.

Field-Marshal Smuts has drafted a preamble to the Charter which sets forth the aims and ideals of the organisation.

The detailed work of drafting the Charter has already begun in earnest. Four Commissions have been set up to deal with its principal aspects (General Provisions; the General Assembly; the Security Council; Judicial Organisation). These Commissions, however, are not likely to meet until reports have been prepared for them by the dozen technical Committees which have also been constituted. It is in these Committees that the drafting work will be begun, and some of them have already started on it. Besides the formal meetings of the Conference, there have throughout been constant consultations between the delegations of the four sponsoring Great Powers. During the last week, France has been associated with them in these discussions and will attend them regularly in future.

The Trusteeship Committee has already met twice and the five Great Powers have also met to discuss trusteeship for dependent territories. In addition to the United States trusteeship proposals (outlined in last week's Summary), these meetings have had before them detailed proposals from the United Kingdom and Australian delegations. In both the United States and the United Kingdom proposals it is made clear that the only territories to be brought under trusteeship machinery are (a) territories administered by any of the United Nations under League of Nations Mandates; (b) territories which may, as a result of the war, be removed from the sovereignty or mandate of non-members of the United Nations; (c) other territory which may be voluntarily brought under the machinery by the State now responsible for its administration as sovereign or protector. Australia has suggested the addition, to the last category, of territories which the Assembly might decide to bring under the machinery on the recommendation of a special Conference of Powers administering dependent territory. Even with this Australian addition it would still be clear that there is no suggestion that all colonial dependencies should be automatically brought under trusteeship machinery. The United Kingdom delegation have, however, emphasised that trusteeship principles are valid for all dependent territories and have been fully accepted for their dependent territories by His Majesty's Government. The United Kingdom delegation have suggested that the distinction of treatment proposed by the United States (see last week's Summary, page 22) between strategic and other areas would give rise to certain difficulties. They would prefer that the general trusteeship obligations (relating to the welfare of the inhabitants) should be binding in relation to all the territories in the three categories (a), (b) and (c) above, and should be the subject of reports to a body responsible to the Economic and Social Council. The Power administering any such territory should also ensure that the territory plays its part in the maintenance of peace and security and should furnish the Security Council with any information required on this aspect of the administration. Thus, instead of there being two distinct classes of areas there would be, for all such territories, two sets of obligations, each requiring the rendering of necessary information to the appropriate organ of the new Organisation.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE last official communiqué of the German High Command was broadcast from Flensburg shortly after 8 p.m. on the 8th May. Signed "on behalf of the Grand Admiral" by General Jodl, it announced that, from midnight on the 8th/9th May, hostilities would cease in all theatres of war, that destruction of stores, sinking of ships, &c., were in contradiction to the terms already signed (the word "surrender" was not used), and that communication in cypher must cease. Unconditional surrender had already been made known to the German people by Dönitz himself in a broadcast earlier on the same day. The "last sacrifice" of German soldiers who had "proved their mettle in countless battles" would, he said, be "to set out on the bitter road to captivity." He himself would do everything possible to fulfil his promise of securing "tolerable living conditions" for the German population. "We must," he continued, "face facts squarely. The foundations on which the German Reich was built have collapsed. The unity of State and Party no longer exists. The Party has left the scene." Regarding his tenure of office, Dönitz said that it rested with the Occupying Powers whether he would be able to function. He was willing, as long as they permitted, to remain until the will of the German people could be expressed in the selection of a Head of the State.

The uncertain position of Dönitz and his Government, if he has one in anything but name, has not yet been resolved. It has, indeed, been made the more apparent by an order issued on the 11th May over the signature of Field-Marshal Busch, who stated therein that he had taken over the command of Schleswig-Holstein and the areas occupied by Montgomery's troops. This he had done "by order of the Grand Admiral and in agreement with the British Occupation authorities." He declared that his task was to ensure discipline and supplies, and that all military and civil authorities in his sector had been put under his orders and would receive his directives.

Behind this looms the important question of the political interpretation of the German surrender. The instrument signed by the Germans was an instrument of military surrender, being the capitulation of the entire German armed forces and attested by Field-Marshal Keitel and other representatives of the High Command. "This act of military surrender" will, it is expressly stated, be superseded by any general instrument of surrender applicable to Germany and the German armed forces as a whole. This document does not therefore entail the political surrender of the German State, as did the instrument signed by Erzberger and his colleagues in 1918.

It should not be thought that chaos in Germany dates from last week's collapse. The after-effects of systematic Allied bombing of communications are proving almost as effective in hindering administration now as the bombing itself was in clogging the final efforts of the German war machine. In early April the Swiss Government complained that their Berlin embassy was out of reach and that communication with German Government departments was unobtainable. A confidential report by a Nazi official in Lemgo (a town of 12,000 people in the State of Lippe) stated late in February that every official journey had become a problem and that inordinate effort was necessary for the transmission of any instruction. Now, after defeat, Germans are finding it beyond their power even to ensure the food supply of large centres of population. From Munich A.M.G. therefore announced on the 12th that the transport of food and other goods towards the city would be started immediately and that American engineers were employing 1,000 workmen to repair the railways. The "Municipal Administration of Hamburg" announced on the 11th "by permission of the Military Government" that shops and businesses in the city must reopen forthwith between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

The larger task on which such arrangements as these depend, is the cleansing of the administration itself. Flensburg radio, on the 12th May, published the fact that A.M.G. had, among other decrees, dissolved the Nazi Party, repealed several of the most fundamental Nazi laws including those on the relation of State and Party, and on race, had set up military tribunals and abolished the Ministry of Propaganda. Germans are forbidden to cross the Reich frontier, to publish anything without permission and must use English as official language. The weekly reports of A.M.G. fill out this picture on the positive side by making plain the provisional arrangements so far tried out in occupied areas. The machinery of local administration is set in motion in so far as reasonably reliable officials are found to work it. If after observation these men prove to have a bad record or to be suspect they are removed and replaced. In the course of such experiments certain attitudes of the German population have emerged from the mass of dulled indifference which still seems to be the mood of the majority. "Obedient but sullen" is the keynote of the most recent summary available, which proceeds to comment on increasing evidence of attempts to disclaim responsibility for the Nazi régime, especially for the concentration camps, and some fear lest the Allied forces fail to protect Germans against foreign workers. On the other hand, meetings of former trade union members have been held in the Aachen region, and from Thuringia there is reported a move on the part of Social Democrats to round up Nazis and secure an efficient advisory body to assist A.M.G. This information, although the latest available, dates from before the German surrender; it is not clear what progress has been possible in the larger cities.

A.M.G's. most pressing problem would seem to be constituted by the foreign workers, of whom so far over a million and a half have been counted, two-thirds of this total being in camps. The largest number under the care of a single army is 750,000, reported held by the 9th U.S. Army. The problem of food and welfare has proved manageable in cases where German military food stocks could be drawn upon and where Allied military personnel were available to ensure discipline. Elsewhere looting would seem to have been fairly general, although it is stated that Displaced Persons have not been much more concerned in this than Germans. There have been no large-scale disorders and the behaviour of the mass of foreign workers is said to have been obedient and in many cases cheerful.

Despite the capture of important personalities during the final stages of the fighting, the leaders of Nazi Germany are not yet all accounted for. Hitler's body has not been found. The report of Bormann's death is not confirmed. The whereabouts of Himmler and Ribbentrop are not known. Both Göring and Kesselring made statements after their capture. Göring admitted that he realised after D-Day that the war was lost, that the Russian break through the central eastern line had made him still more certain, but in the same breath he said that had Germany been able to continue the war, new types of bombing planes would have been brought into use which would have surprised the world. His own biggest surprise of the war had been provided by the long-range Allied fighters able to accomplish the two-way journey between England and Berlin. Kesselring admitted (to Americans) that the German defeat was due to Allied air power and bombing policy. He spoke of Hitler as a great man who would have preferred an alliance with the United States and Great Britain, and of the Siegfried Line as impregnable if it had been properly manned. He had distrusted the "V" weapons but had strongly urged the direct invasion of England. The friendly treatment accorded to these captives has aroused resentment in various quarters and has evoked a sharp rebuke from the Supreme Allied Commander-in-Chief.

In view of suggestions made during the course of the war that German church leaders might have to assume political powers, it is of interest to note recent developments concerning two of the more outstanding among them. Pastor Niemöller has been recovered by the Allies on the Swiss border, having been hurriedly removed with other hostages from Dachau; according to photographs and reports he is in relatively good health. The Bishop of Münster, Count von Galen, interviewed in his diocese by American pressmen, stressed the fact that he was a German bishop, loyal to his country and unwilling to discuss political questions. He made it clear, however, that he was worried by the public danger constituted by foreign workers roaming through Germany at a time when the German police was powerless to maintain order, and that he feared the growth of Communism in Germany if the Allies allowed famine conditions to develop. He was also incensed by the destruction of churches by Allied bombers. His "unpolitical" attitude was, in fact, that of a thoroughly patriotic German and, despite his known and courageous opposition to some Nazi measures (e.g., "mercy killings") he uttered no word of condemnation of the German policy of aggression against other States.

AUSTRIA.

The situation in Austria, both military and political, appears to be difficult and confused. Allied troops are advancing from several points to occupy the country. In the west the French and American forces penetrated further, to disarm the German troops who were waiting for them. According to a French correspondent with the American Seventh Army on the 13th May, however, the equivalent of two SS divisions in the Salzburg mountains are refusing to surrender, and are waging a guerrilla war, destroying bridges, and carrying out small-scale night raids on villages in order to obtain food. The Red army, advancing from the east, linked up with Allied forces south-east of Linz, and since the 9th May claims to have disarmed 560,000 Germans and captured 45 generals. The Russians have entered Bruck and Graz, and have advanced still further to the west. Some difficulty has been encountered in defining the areas to which the troops of each of the Allies should confine their activities. The British troops coming up from the south have met Yugoslav troops, who are penetrating into Carinthia and some of whom have been in Klagenfurt. (See "Yugoslavia.")

On the 7th May a broadcast announced the formation of a new "provisional Provincial Government, formed from all parties," to take over the administration of Carinthia. This Government appealed to all Carinthians, whether German- or Slovene-speaking, for support, and said that its foremost task was to maintain "a free and unpartitioned Carinthia." No officials were to be dismissed without the consent of this provincial Government. On the following day (8th May) a complete list of offices in the new provincial administration was given, headed by the Landeshauptmann. On the same day this "supposed provisional Provincial Government of Carinthia" was denounced by "Station Austria" as a "sheer fake," and a "Nazi German trick and provocation." The statement about the dismissal of officials was used to support this claim, and the broadcast went on to assure listeners that Marshal Tito had expressly stated that he would not take an inch of foreign soil—his troops were coming as liberators, and had now liberated Klagenfurt. The Carinthians were urged to "submit to the Provisional Government in Vienna." ["Station Austria" is a Russian-controlled station believed to be on Yugoslav soil, and is the means by which news about Dr. Renner's Government and its proclamations are broadcast.]

A station describing itself as Graz announced the formation of a provisional Provincial Government of Styria on the 8th May. It was said to consist mainly of members of the former Provincial Government, led by a man who had performed the same office after the last war, and worked in the Government until 1934. Next day, however, orders were broadcast from Graz, dated the 9th May, by a Town Major, who said that complete power was concentrated in his person as the representative of the High Command of the Red Army. He issued a comprehensive series of orders, concerning amongst other things the registration of all Reich Germans over 16, the dissolution of the Nazi party, and the giving of information about hidden German soldiers, "criminal elements," stores, strongpoints and minefields. It would appear that two self-appointed and, perhaps, anti-Russian provisional Provincial Governments have been suppressed by Russian action before British forces arrived.

In the west an "Austrian Freedom Station" in Aussee claimed that the Freedom Movement there, in which hundreds of people of all parties in Aussee had rallied for weeks in the struggle against National Socialism, had taken over all offices and authority without bloodshed, and assumed full power. Relations with the American troops there were cordial. The food situation was satisfactory. Schools would remain closed for the time being.

From Vienna the "News Service New Austria" announced an agreement between the "three recognised parties," i.e., the Austrian Popular party (Österreichische Volkspartei), which may be the Christian-Social party under a new name, the Socialist party, consisting of the Social Democrats and the Revolutionary Socialists, and the Communist party. These had agreed to the formation of a "Provisional Provincial Executive Committee" (Landesausschuss) for the province of Lower Austria. Provisional Rural Executive Committees (Gemeindeausschüsse) were to be formed in all rural communities, the number of constituent members of each Committee to be determined in accordance with the votes cast at the last free democratic local elections.

"Station Austria" gave more news of conditions in Vienna. The food situation was eased by the supply of Red army stores to the population. 190 schools are open again in the city. There is a newspaper called Neues Österreich. An article in it describes the housing problem, and another calls for the employment of underground fighters in the public services. Cardinal Innitzer celebrated a Thanksgiving Mass on the announcement of Germany's unconditional surrender. Great May Day rallies were reported, in which many foreign workers took part, and the crowds were addressed by members of the Provisional Government.

The Provisional Government issued on the 11th May a message to the nation on Germany's capitulation, and a proclamation, in which it gave a stern warning to those who "despise democracy" or had supported the Nazi régime. Those who had done this "through pressure of economic circumstances," however, and did not take part in any Fascist crimes, had nothing to fear. Free Austria wished to live in friendship with the Danubian States, and would "strive to conclude treaties of peace and friendship with the numerous peoples against whom Hitler went to war, amongst these our closest neighbours."

The text of an "Austrian Declaration of Independence," signed by Dr. Renner and Dr. Scherf (Social Democrats), Kunschak (Christian Socialist), and Koplenig (Communist), was broadcast by "Station Austria" on the 12th May. This proclaimed the Democratic Republic of Austria to be restored and it was to be reconstructed in the spirit of the constitution of 1920. The Anschluss was declared void. In the Provisional Government was vested "all legislative and executive powers, due regard being paid to the rights of the occupying Powers."

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The national rising in Prague and other parts of Bohemia continued with confused fighting throughout the 8th and 9th May. The German forces refused to recognise the cease-fire order; those under General Reimann did negotiate a surrender to Czech representatives at Český Brod on the 8th, but units under Field-Marshal Schoerner and General Woebler maintained resistance as they fell back between the Americans and the advancing Soviet tanks. In the city itself, savage attacks were made upon civilians, hospitals and famous buildings, and an air attack was staged to synchronise with the relay of Mr. Churchill's victory broadcast. The following morning, the 9th May, Soviet tanks entered Prague after a rapid night thrust southward from Saxony through the Elbe gap. By the 11th, Soviet armies, fanning out in many directions, had cleared most of Bohemia and Moravia, and linked up with the Americans to west and south of Prague near Plzeň and České Budějovice.

With the liberation of the capital, the Czechoslovak Government has returned to Prague. The party, headed by Premier Fierlinger, was received at Kbely airport on the evening of the 10th May by the chairman and vice-chairman of the Prague National Council, Dr. Pražák and M. Smrkovský, and by the commander of the Czechoslovak forces in the rising, General Kutlvašr. The President, Dr. Beneš, in a triumphal progress through the Moravian countryside, arrived at Brno on the 13th from Bratislava. No statement on the situation has so far been attributed to him, and an earlier report that he had arrived in Prague with the ministerial party was premature.

The Soviet Army, immediately upon its entry into Prague, made a statement to the Czech National Council through Lt.-Colonel Zajcev, who said that the U.S.S.R. had no intention of forcing on the country one type or another of administration, for the Czechs were good patriots and well able to rule their own land; the sole aim of the Soviet Union was to liberate the Czech people. Dr. Ripka, Minister of Foreign Trade, in a farewell speech in London on the 14th May, reaffirmed the independent character of the Czechoslovak Government, although admitting the dependence of the small Central European States on Soviet Russia in matters of security. Marshal Koniev was given a public reception in Prague on the 11th May, and all public buildings were flying the Soviet flag beside the Czechoslovak one.

The work of the patriot National Councils is being taken over by the various Ministries, but they are charged with the work of preparing the way for the election of Provincial National Committees in Bohemia and Moravia-Silesia. Numerous speeches have been broadcast by Ministers outlining their programmes. All have been at pains to stress the debt owed to the Red Army, and the need for close co-operation with the U.S.S.R. The Defence Minister, General Svoboda, echoed the statements of Vice-Premier Gottwald and the Education Minister, Professor Nejedlý, when he proclaimed that "the new Republic will be a Slav State, a State of fraternal and equal nations of Czechs and Slovaks, without Germans and Hungarians." There were frequent references to Munich, and of the impossibility of co-operating with the Sudenten Germans.

The hunt for traitors and collaborators, who are to be brought before People's Courts, goes on. Henlein, after being captured by the Americans, escaped by suicide. Hacha, Bienert, ex-Generals Klecanda and Gajda, and many other quislings, are in Czech hands. The Czechoslovak Press has been carrying out its own purge of collaborators. The Social Democratic, Socialist, Communist, People's Catholic and the Revolutionary Trade Unionist organisations are already publishing their newspapers again. Česka Pravda (organ of Beneš's Socialist National Party) said that its Party had been resurrected "not for narrow Party aims, but to ensure the continuance of democratic competition, criticism and control, which distinguish democratic from totalitarian systems."

POLAND.

General Bor-Komorowski, who was released by the advancing American forces in Southern Germany, and reached London on the 12th May, is reported to have stated that when he gave the signal for the Warsaw Rising last summer he "expected the Russians in five to seven days, but after two days they were pushed back about 30 miles." As to the arms then available to the Polish forces in Warsaw he is reported to have said that 30 per cent. had been dropped by parachute from British planes before the Rising. Of those dropped during the Rising 85 per cent. fell in the German lines.

As stated in Summary No. 261, General Komorowski was appointed Commander-in-Chief by President Raczkiewicz shortly before the collapse of the Rising, a substitute being found for him during his captivity. Lately, General Anders was made Acting Commander-in-Chief. No statement has as yet been made on the question whether General Komorowski will now be instated in the Command.

The position as concerns the arrested Polish Delegates remains unchanged. As the Secretary of State is reported to have said in San Francisco, most of the arrested persons were just the sort who should be consulted before forming the new Provisional Government. M. Mikolajczyk has since stated that the Delegates were always "sincere advocates of co-operation with Russia." This does not necessarily hold good of General Okulicki, whom the Warsaw administration and the Soviet press chiefly accuse of anti-Russian activities. It is now reported from Lublin that there is "indignation" in Poland against General

Okulicki, and that the Warsaw administration may demand that he should be handed over to it for trial. Meantime, reports continue to circulate that more arrests are being made, in Poland, of persons suspected of carrying on communications with the London Government, or serving under its instructions.

A Victory Celebration was held throughout Poland on the 9th May. In Warsaw, at a meeting in the Theatre Square, a resolution was moved that "the Polish frontiers on the Oder, the Nissa (Neisse) and the Baltic, which have been gained by the heroism of our soldiers, cannot be changed."

A radio address given on the 13th May blamed the London Government for "rejecting" territorial compensation in the West and North for lands they would have to cede in the East. "It is not true," the speaker said, "that we had the choice of a Poland stretching from Woloczyska to Zbaszyn (Bentschen), and one from the Bug to the Oder. The choice was much narrower: between a Poland from the Bug to the Oder, and one from the Bug to Zbaszyn." According to a statement issued on the 11th May 1,000 persons are leaving Lodz shortly for Frankfurt-on-the-Oder to fill administrative and industrial posts.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 8th May the German group in Kurland, which had continued an isolated struggle for many months, ceased resistance. So, too, did the grouping in the Vistula estuary. German troops in Czechoslovakia, under Field-Marshal Schörner, continued to fight even after surrender had been signed in Berlin. But after the capture of Prague on the 9th May this group was split up, and by the 13th May its annihilation was almost complete. Between the 9th and 14th May over 1,230,000 prisoners were taken on all fronts, including 101 generals.

Marshal Stalin broadcast to the U.S.S.R. on the 9th May. He announced that "the preliminary protocol of surrender" (hitherto not mentioned in the U.S.S.R.) had been signed in Rheims on the 7th May, and the final instrument of surrender in Berlin on the following day. "Being aware of the wolfish habits of the German ringleaders, who regard treaties and agreements as an empty scrap of paper, we have no reason to trust their words. However, this morning, in pursuance of the instrument of surrender, the German troops began to lay down their arms and surrender to our troops en masse. This is no longer an empty scrap of paper. This is the actual surrender of Germany's armed forces. Three years ago, Marshal Stalin reminded his audience, Hitler had proclaimed as his aim the dismemberment of the U.S.S.R. To-day the Soviet is celebrating the victory, "although it does not intend either to dismember or destroy Germany." No doubt with Japan in mind, Marshal Stalin concluded: "The period of war in Europe is over. The period of peaceful development has begun." In an Order of the Day issued on the same evening, the Marshal ordered a victory salute of thirty salvoes from 1,000 guns. A victory medal is to be awarded to all who participated in fighting against the enemy. During the celebration on the 9th May cheering crowds visited the British and United States Embassies.

Many messages of congratulation have been published in the Soviet press, including those exchanged by His Majesty The King and M. Kalinin, Marshal Stalin, the Prime Minister and President Truman. The Patriarch Alexius was interviewed by Izvestiya and expressed his joy at the winning of victory. The Orthodox Church, he said, had contributed over 300 million roubles to the defence fund. But, even more important, it had demonstrated throughout the war its complete unity with the Government.

During the past week the Soviet press celebrated the unrivalled military prestige of the Red Army and the incomparable burdens borne by the Soviet peoples during the struggle. "The heroes of the Soviet people," declared Pravda, "delivered our country from the German invader and the whole of Europe from destruction." An editorial in The War and the Working Class (No. 9) on "The Soviet Union in the Struggle for International Security" succinctly expressed the prevailing attitude as follows: "The Soviet people emerge from the world war a victor people, tempered in the stern trial of nearly four years of a war unparalleled in magnitude, in effort and in material expenditure. The eyes of the world have been opened to the giant might of the Red Army, the invincible strength of the Soviet social system, the firmness of the Soviet State and the tremendous potentialities of the Socialist economic system." But the Western Allies were not forgotten. Konstantin Fedin wrote on the 14th May: "No other military alliance could have carried out with such iron consistency such an offensive and brought about such a defeat as the alliance between the U.S.S.R., the United States and Great Britain." On the 12th May Izvestiya carried an article by the London correspondent of Tass, describing the victory celebrations in London. M. Rogov added that he was convinced that Anglo-Soviet friendship means much more than diplomatic treaties, and stressed the warm welcome given to him as a Russian. Anglo-Soviet friendship, as many people told him, means in the first place friendship between the two peoples.

Mrs. Churchill's visit to the Soviet Union was very fully and cordially reported in the Soviet press. The high lights of her visit were her reception by Marshal Stalin on the 8th April, the award to her of the Order of Labour (the 12th April) "for outstanding merit in carrying out social measures for the collection of funds in Britain for medical aid to the Red Army" and her two broadcasts. After visiting hospitals and other institutions in Moscow, Mrs. Churchill travelled to Leningrad, Stalingrad, Rostov, the spas of the Northern Caucasus, Sebastopol and Odessa and thus had a very favourable opportunity for acquainting herself at first-hand with the extent of the Soviet need for Red Cross help. On the eve of her departure, she was entertained to lunch at the Kremlin by M. Shvernik on Victory Day; the tributes paid to her, to the Prime Minister and to Britain on this occasion by her host, Mme. Molotov and other speakers were stated to be extremely warm and sincere. Mrs. Churchill's broadcast of the Prime Minister's message on the same evening was a fitting climax not only to her visit but to a day celebrating the great Soviet victories.

Soviet scepticism about Hitler's death is still maintained, though official reports have been issued of the finding in Berlin of the bodies of Goebbels and his wife and children, dead from poisoning. The lenient treatment being accorded to Goering was sternly castigated in Izvestiya, which expressed great surprise that he should be receiving care and attention instead of being hanged as a murderer and gangster.

On the 11th May the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. ratified the Treaty of Friendship, Mutual Assistance and Post-War Collaboration between the U.S.S.R. and the Polish Republic, which had already been ratified a week earlier from the Polish side.

The important problem of reparations was dealt with in the current number of The War and the Working Class, in an article entitled "Rehabilitation through Man-power," by Professor Trainin. The thesis developed in this article was that the time had now come for the Germans to repair the damage wrought by their armies in Allied countries in accordance with the decision of the Crimea Conference. Professor Trainin emphasised the special importance of reparations "in kind," and of the provision by Germany of the man-power required to restore the devastated areas of Europe. Furthermore, the employment of Germans for this purpose, he asserted, would greatly contribute to Germany's economic disarmament. Professor Trainin, himself a jurist, argued that this question could not possibly give rise to any legal controversy.

Izvestiya's special correspondent has sent an interesting despatch to Moscow on the progress of the San Francisco Conference. The absence of certain political personnages (unnamed), as well as Mr. Eden's impending return to Britain, he said, indicated that international attention was again being focussed on Europe. San Francisco was criticised as being too remote from world affairs (though admittedly a magnificent city); this was reflected "in the people's less lively reaction to the celebration of victory." He recorded the attention given by the United States press to the claims of Latin American countries, who were striving to make their regional organisation completely independent of the international security organisation. In this connexion, Izvestiya observed "some Governments do not want the five Powers, including the Soviet Union . . . . to have the right to agree among themslves on principles affecting the western hemisphere countries. These are, of course, the reactionary critics of the Crimea Agreements." Finally (in spite of the Soviet Union's own marked preference for pacts of regional security in South-East Europe), Izvestiya attacked "the ferocious advocates of regional security who claim that regional interests are incompatible with the powers of the Security Council."

On the 10th May the death was announced from heart paralysis of Colonel-General Alexander Sergeyevitch Shcherbakov. Although only 44 years of age, M. Shcherbakov was one of the four or five most powerful figures in the U.S.S.R. He had for seven years been Secretary of the Moscow City and Regional Committees, in which capacity he was credited with the organisation of the defence of the capital during the war. He was one of the four secretaries of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. In 1941 he became a substitute member of the Politbureau, the real centre of power in the U.S.S.R.; he was also a member of the Organisation Bureau and of the Control Commission of the Party. He was a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., and a member of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian S.S.R. General Shcherbakov was head of the very important Political Department of the Red Army, and also Director of the Soviet Information Bureau. He was awarded the Order of Lenin three times, as well as the Orders of Suvorov and Kutuzov, 1st class. Tributes to his memory were published by all the papers. The Guard of Honour in the Hall of Columns in the House of the Trade Unions was mounted among many others by Marshals Stalin and Voroshilov and M. Malenkov. On the 12th May the urn with his ashes was carried by members of the Government headed by Marshal Stalin towards the Kremlin wall where it was placed next to the ashes of Marshal Shaposhnikov.

The fourth State War Loan, launched on the 5th May for the amount of 25 milliard roubles, was over-subscribed in eight days by more than 1 milliard roubles; the loan was closed on the 14th May (see last week's Summary).

SCANDINAVIA.

The restoration of satisfactory conditions in liberated Norway is proceeding with remarkable smoothness and rapidity. An advance party of the Norwegian Government has arrived, two Ministers entering the country via Sweden on Saturday and others accompanying Crown Prince Olav on a British warship which reached Oslo on Sunday, the 13th May. The Crown Prince was welcomed with scenes of extraordinary enthusiasm. As early as the 8th May, the local officials temporarily appointed by the Home Front in consultation with the Norwegian Government in London were told to assume their functions immediately after the German capitulation.

Banks have been instructed to block all accounts belonging to N.S. members and organisations, and the round-up of quislings by the Home Front has been immediate and comprehensive. Lists had long since been compiled, and hundreds of Nazi collaborators were at once arrested in all the principal centres—1,550 in Oslo alone. Quisling himself, with five of his Ministers, surrendered on the 9th May at Akershus, while two others had previously been taken into custody. Jonas Lie, Riisnaes and the notorious Rogstad were run to earth and surrounded at Skaldum Farm, Stabekk, a few miles west of Oslo, with the result that Riisnaes eventually gave himself up, while the other two committed suicide. Another criminal who chose the same course was the infamous S.S. General Fehlis, and two mangled bodies, believed to be those of Terboven and Rediess, were found in the residence of the former and await final identification. They are believed to have blown themselves up. According to the Swedish radio, Terboven's body has now been identified by means of X-ray photography, which revealed some old fractures in his arm.

The Supreme Court, the resignation of whose members in 1940 was one of the earliest gestures of resistance, reassembled for the first time on the 14th May. The reception of the Crown Prince, on behalf of the Home Front Leadership, by M. Paal Berg, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, revealed on Sunday the carefully guarded secret of M. Berg's connexion with the Home Front.

To meet the prevailing food-shortage in Norway, the Swedish Government have promised the delivery of 55,000 tons of grain, 5,000 tons of flour, 4,000 tons of fats and 10,000 tons of sugar, besides other food-stuffs, and intend to make very special efforts to overcome the formidable difficulties of transport. There is also a prospect of assistance from Denmark, and the position should soon be satisfactory, since a recent article in the clandestine press admits that in Norway there have been no famine conditions approaching those of Holland and some other occupied countries.

Denmark has also got quickly to work. On May 11th it was reported that more than 7,000 persons suspected of collaboration with the Germans, had already been arrested. The Rigsdag reassembled on the 9th May, and in his speech on this occasion, which he described as one of the greatest days in Danish parliamentary history, the Premier, M. Buhl, stated that the necessary steps had now been taken to achieve the recognition of Denmark as a member of the United Nations. He declared the Anti-Comintern Pact rescinded, on the ground that it had been signed under duress. With regard to the Slesvig question, M. Buhl stated that his Government regarded the Danish frontier as fixed, but that the position of the minorities on each side of the frontier required reinvestigation, owing to the complete change of conditions during the war. In conclusion, he made a strong appeal for national unity.

Some concern was caused in Denmark by the landing of Russian forces on Bornholm on the 9th May after bombing attacks on the island. On the 11th May 15,000 Russians were reported to have arrived. M. Christmas Möller, the new Foreign Minister, has expressed the intention of visiting the spot as soon as possible on behalf of the Government. Assurances have, however, been given by the Commander of the Soviet Forces to the effect that his troops will be withdrawn as soon as the Germans have been disarmed and evacuated.

On the 7th May the Swedish Radio announced the cessation of diplomatic relations between Sweden and Germany and the Government's intention to intern a number of members of the German legation and consulate staffs. Their premises had been taken over by the Swedish authorities. Considerable numbers of German officers and soldiers who arrived in Swedish ports with a request for internment were instructed to leave the country. On the 12th May, however, the Swedish Radio announced that some two thousand had now received permission to stay until further notice.

Finland has received the news of Germany's capitulation with an enthusiasm somewhat unusual in a recent ally of the defeated country. Rejoicings were to some extent camouflaged as being concerned with the liberation of occupied Scandinavia, but were none the less widespread and emphatic. A semi-official peace and victory celebration was arranged in the main square of Helsinki on the 8th May by the three dominant political parties, and was addressed by members of the Government. In the Diet on the same day, M. Fagerholm, the Speaker, expressed the deep gratitude of the Finns to the Allied Nations for having "saved Europe from the dreadful danger threatening it." Satisfaction was not confined to Russophil sections of the Left: the moderate and cautious Helsingin Sanomat published on the 11th May a eulogy on Mr. Churchill which could hardly have been more enthusiastically expressed. While England, said this paper, was fighting alone, behind her were the thoughts of the whole democratic world. Vapaa Sana, organ of the Democratic League, even went so far as to rebuke Sweden for her neutrality, an attitude rather difficult to assume in the press of a country which actually fought on the beaten side!

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

Broadcasting on the 5th, Professor Gerbrandy expressed gratitude to the Allies for the liberation of the Netherlands and the joy of the Dutch thereat. "You are free," he went on to say, "free to heal the wounds of our people. The Government knows by experience in the territories previously liberated how much our people long to take their share in this . . . . You are free to write the truth in your papers. . . . . You are free to revive our Dutch institutions. . . . . You are free to prepare yourselves for the gigantic task awaiting you in the Pacific."

In a press conference at the Hague on the 11th, General Kruls, head of the Dutch Military Administration, explained that authority in the Netherlands was for the time being vested in the Commander-in-Chief of the Canadian Army, to whom the Dutch Administration is subordinate. General Kruls added that he wished to avail himself of the advice of the "vertrouwensmannen" (Council of Confidential Advisers), which had been constituted during the German occupation and had performed valuable service before the arrival of the Dutch Military Administration in the Western Netherlands.

Preliminary reports indicate that the destruction of port installations at Rotterdam, though considerable, has not been as great as had been expected. Ships of less than 4,000 tons can already use the port; the grain elevators are intact, though the ore elevators have been destroyed; the slipways in the shipbuilding yards are undamaged. But all cranes and dredging equipment and much shipbuilding plant have been destroyed or carried off to Germany. Amsterdam has suffered less. On the other hand, most of the larger canals are temporarily blocked, and most of the bigger river bridges have been destroyed.

The food brought into the Western Netherlands by the Allies arrived only just in time to prevent a catastrophic famine. Its speedy distribution is proceeding smoothly. But, while rejoicing at their deliverance from famine and oppression, the Dutch are afraid the Germans may escape paying the full penalty for their misdeeds. A speaker on the Resurgent Netherlands Radio declared on the 14th: "It is—I expressly wish to make this public—extremely painful for us Dutchmen to see at this moment Allied soldiers sitting next to German soldiers who have plundered and maltreated us; sitting next to each other on peasants' carts, amiably talking to each other and smoking cigarettes." General Foulkes, however, the Allied Commander-in-Chief in the Netherlands, has broadcast a statement to the Dutch that "the prime task of the Allied Forces in Western Holland is to quickly clear out the Boches from the Netherlands. . . . . I can assure you," he added, "that as far as is physically possible no German will be allowed to take away with him any articles of loot."

The Belgians were informed on the 8th that King Leopold had been liberated by American forces near Salzburg. This news caused the "bureaux" of the Senate and the Chamber to send the King messages congratulating him on his liberation. The Catholic Senators and Deputies met and voted a resolution expressing the opinion that the King should forthwith resume the exercise of his regal functions. This was only to be expected in view of the professed attachment of the Catholic Party to the King. The Liberals are divided and the Liberal Senators and Deputies passed a vaguely-worded resolution which implied that a definite decision should not be taken until the nation had been fully informed. The attitude of the Socialists and the Communists to the King has remained unchanged (see last Summary).

The Prince Regent and the Prime Minister, accompanied by a Liberal, a Communist and a Catholic colleague, forthwith proceeded to Salzburg, where they saw King Leopold. On the 13th M. van Acker, who was then back in Brussels, read to a press conference a letter from the King to his brother, which said: "My state of health, as a result of my captivity, does not permit my immediate return to Belgium. During my detention all my thoughts have been for my people. I beg you to continue the mission you have assumed in the country's interest until my health is restored." M. van Acker deplored the mischief of spreading false news and said: "Belgium is in need of calm, and so are we all, regardless of our political opinions." He added that each member of the delegation had been separately received by the King and that no proposal or suggestion had been made by the Government to His Majesty. The King was not well, he had been subjected to a terrible strain, but the state of his health did not warrant any anxiety.

The King's children have also been liberated and will, according to M. van Acker, return to Belgium as soon as the King so directs.

Degrelle, the Rexist leader, has escaped from Germany to Spain. (See under "Spain and Portugal.")

FRANCE.

The German surrender entailed the liberation of the French ports still in German hands, Dunkirk, Lorient, La Rochelle and St. Nazaire. It was also the occasion of an exchange of cordial messages between The King and General de Gaulle and General de Gaulle and Mr. Churchill. The first reports of the cessation of hostilities appeared in the Paris afternoon papers of the 7th May and public rejoicing began at once. While the celebrations at first lacked spontaneity, and were to some extent overshadowed by the knowledge that great numbers of Frenchmen had still to be repatriated, there could be no doubt of the enthusiasm of the huge crowds which thronged the streets of Paris on the 8th May. On the 9th General de Gaulle, together with members of the Government and the Diplomatic Corps, attended a solemn Te Deum at Notre Dame. The General was escorted to and from the West Door by the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris who was excluded from the Te Deum after the liberation of the capital, but may now be presumed to have been officially rehabilitated.

The elections for the Conseils Généraux which were to take place on the 27th May and the 11th June have now been postponed until the autumn. By then all the prisoners and deportees may be expected to have returned. At present they are coming back to France by road, rail, and air at the rate of between ten and forty thousand a day, and General de Gaulle has thanked General Eisenhower for the assistance given by the United States Army and Air Force in the work of repatriation. There has been a steady trickle of suspicious characters among the repatriates, and the security control which has been tightened now constitutes the main bottleneck in the process of repatriation. Considerable resentment still persists because the municipal elections took place before the majority of prisoners and deportees could exercise their vote. Preliminary reports of the results of the second ballot in these elections, which was held in the provinces on the 13th May, indicate that the victory of the Left has been maintained.

While there is a general expectation that there will now be a reshuffle of the Government in view of the election results and the return of eminent French statesmen from Germany, it is interesting to note that the Communist Humanité and two well-known Resistance papers, Combat and Libération, contend that the men responsible for French policy in and before 1940 are not qualified to direct it in 1945. MM. Reynaud, Blum, Daladier, Albert Sarraut, Yvon Delbos, and Jouhaux are now back in France, as are Generals Weygand and Gamelin and Colonel de la Rocque. MM. Reynaud and Jouhaux are reported to have travelled from Strasbourg in General de Gaulle's personal aeroplane. Other well-known Frenchmen recently discovered in Germany are the resisting Bishop of Clermont-Ferrand, Mgr. Piquet, Prince Xavier of Bourbon-Parma, and the notorious quisling, Fernand de Brinon. (For Laval see "Spain and Portugal.") General Weygand and Jean Borotra were arrested on their return, but owing to his state of health Weygand has been detained at the Val de Grâce Military Hospital. The preliminary interrogation of Pétain has begun, and his trial is expected to take place before the end of June.

It has now been publicly announced that as from the 1st May the French authorities have taken over responsibility for all civil supplies for France. The practical effects of this change will, however, be small. The food situation in Paris shows little improvement but the authorities claim that the amount in calories of the rations is now twice that for the corresponding period last year. The meat position is still difficult, but there is less criticism of M. Ramadier and of the organisation of food supplies.

The fall in unemployment from about 600,000 at Christmas to about 300,000 now reflects the increase in industrial activity resulting from war contracts. The coal situation remains the principal supply problem and looms larger than ever. The French have been told that there is little hope of their receiving coal from the Saar or the Ruhr for many months to come, and they are therefore turning attention to the need for improving domestic production. They have submitted to the new Coal Sub-Committee of the Four-Party Committee a list of their urgent needs in mining material, clothing and supplementary rations for miners and have said that they will recruit extra personnel from returned French prisoners of war and will employ larger numbers of German prisoners of war. Meanwhile the question of coal supplies from French production to the Allied armies remains in suspense. The French have said that unless extra coal can be made available either by imports or from the Saar they will be unable to supply any to the Allied armies this month.

French reactions to the first reports of the San Francisco Conference showed disappointment that negotiations seemed to be strangled by apparently endless and insoluble discussions about procedure. It was also suspected that the real work of the Conference was being done in private by the "Big Four." The admission of France into the inner circle of Great Powers was therefore welcomed with special satisfaction. There was also considerable pleasure at the minor, but, to the French, important, success obtained by the acceptance of French as one of the two working languages of the Conference.

An official announcement from Algiers on the 10th May reported further disturbances in Algeria, stating that on VE-day Arabs had attacked the inhabitants of Setif and district in the neighbourhood of Constantine and that the army was assisting the police to maintain order. It has since been learnt that at least 50 Europeans have been killed. The French authorities are understood to have carried out punitive air bombing in the Guelma district and to be bringing reinforcements by air from France. There is no reason to doubt that they have the situation well in hand.

(See also "Italy" (for French activities in Piedmont and Liguria), situation well in hand.

SWITZERLAND.

Throughout Switzerland there was a spontaneous desire to share the joy of the rest of the world that the misery and destruction of war were over for Europe at least. The Federal Council gave a lead to the public by the announcement that, as Switzerland had come through the conflict for the second time in 30 years, practically unscathed, the nation would do well to celebrate the cessation of hostilities as discreetly as possible. Gratitude to God for their salvation was the keynote of the Swiss pronouncements, and the churches were filled to overflowing for the thanksgiving services held on V-day.

The end of the Reich as an independent State resulted in the decision by the Federal Council on the 8th May to recall the Swiss Minister from Germany and to close the German Legation in Berne. Members of the German Legation were instructed to leave the country within three days. Measures would be taken to enable the necessary consular activities to be carried on in the interests of Swiss subjects in Germany and the German colony in Switzerland.

The Swiss Legation in Washington has been requested by the State Department of the United States to take steps to effect the transfer to that Department of all German real estate, archives and property which had hitherto been under the protection of the Legation, the unconditional surrender of Germany rendering the services of a protecting Power no longer necessary.

Switzerland has received numerous messages of thanks, including a message from Mr. Churchill, for her humane services throughout the war, particularly in regard to prisoners of war and in the representation of foreign interests through the International Red Cross.

Great concern has been caused the Swiss Government by reports of the ill-treatment of Swiss citizens in Japan and Japanese-occupied areas. A number of Swiss in Manila have been killed by Japanese troops, while the Swiss Legation in Japan is subject to such severe restrictions that it is almost unable to carry out its duties. The Federal Council has sent a strongly-worded protest to the Japanese Government, claiming compensation where necessary and demanding a radical change in the treatment of Swiss citizens in the future.

The problem of distinguishing between the desirable and the undesirable from among the multitudes desiring admission to Switzerland continues. Among those recently refused entry were Rashid Ali, the former Prime Minister of Iraq, and the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. Allegations have appeared in the Swiss press that certain undesirable Hungarians had succeeded in slipping into Switzerland, where they were living in considerable affluence.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Beyond a request from the French Provisional Government that His Majesty's Government should approach the Spanish Government in order that Pierre Laval should, through our good offices, be handed over to them, there are no further developments to report. It is understood that the United States Government would be prepared to accept a solution on these lines. The position, therefore, in this delicate affair is that the ball is still in the Allied court. We are considering whether to play it, and if so how. In the meantime, another national criminal, as distinct from a United Nations war criminal, has arrived in Spain. On the 8th May an aircraft with Léon Degrelle, the notorious Belgian Rexist leader, crash-landed on the beach at San Sebastian. (The Rexists are Fascists who, incidentally, owe no special allegiance to the House of Coburg; their title, taken from a Catholic publishing firm, refers to Christus Rex.) The machine had flown from Oslo, and with Degrelle, who was wearing the uniform of a German colonel, were his secretary and four German airmen. All the party, who were injured, were removed to the Military Hospital, and His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires and the United States Embassy were informed by the Under-Secretary of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs that Degrelle was being held "at the disposal of the Allied Nations." The situation now is exactly the same as with Laval, the Spanish Government being anxious to be rid of him and ready to accept any arrangement for his removal, save that of handing him over directly to the Belgian authorities. It is difficult to say whether greater embarrassment is caused to the Spaniards or to the Allies by the flying visit of these unwanted guests, for nobody wishes to have anything to do with either Laval or Degrelle. The Spaniards as a people have never been particularly impressed with the achievements of modern science, and they now have an opportunity of reflecting upon one of the political disadvantages of air transport. How easy, if only these aerial fugitives had come by sea, how easy to say to them "Sorry—try Portugal." As things are, these incidents are not likely to improve anyone's relations with anyone else; moreover, the handling of them may well affect the fate of other European traitors.

In their attitude to the end of the war in Europe the Portuguese Government have certainly tried to efface the bad impression caused in Great Britain by their tactless commemoration of Hitler's death. Shortly after the Prime Minister's announcement on the 8th May Dr. Sampayo, the Secretary-General of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, called on His Majesty's Ambassador; he was followed by Dr. Salazar, who presented the congratulations of the Government and of the Portuguese people. Dr. Salazar also addressed the National Assembly on the 9th May. Portugal, he said, had passed unharmed through the war in Europe without sacrificing her national dignity, her interests or her friendships. When it had been necessary to take up an attitude in favour of friends or Allies she had done so serenely, accepting the risks and sacrifices involved. (This was a reference to the Azores operations, rather than to the decision, taken on the eve of D-day, 1944, to suspend the export of wolfram to Germany.) Portugal, he claimed, had maintained her position without subservience to the powerful and without disregard of the weak or oppressed who needed help and refuge. Dr. Salazar then paid a handsome tribute to Portugal's oldest ally. He confessed that his hopes of victory had turned to certainty only after the contemplation of the war effort which, although within the capacity of the British people, had probably never been equalled in the history of humanity. It was evident to all that the British victory and that of the United States—in which Brazil had actively collaborated—would have the effect so far as the west was concerned of transferring to the Atlantic the centre of gravity of international politics. "Although bleeding from countless wounds," Dr. Salazar concluded, "Great Britain rises amid great ruins not only victorious but invincible; and, having strengthened the links in the various parts of the Empire, she can appear before the world and among the greatest as a veritable educator of peoples, a mother and a leader of nations." Glowing words.

ITALY.

The question of Trieste and Venezia Giulia, which is dealt with mainly under Yugoslavia, is having a serious effect on the Italian political situation. Signor Bonomi and Signor de Gasperi have protested, on instructions from the Council of Ministers, to the Chief Commissioner of the Allied Commission regarding the situation in Venezia Giulia. Referring to the promised establishment of Allied military government, Signor de Gasperi showed the Chief Commissioner a copy of a Trieste newspaper in which the composition of the Slovene Government of Istria was published. According to journalists who had returned from that area, all men over 16 years were being conscripted to fight Chetniks in Yugoslavia and Venezia Giulia. These journalists also said that Italian political leaders were disappearing and that the Yugoslav Government had declared that it considered them as prisoners of war. Since Allied military government had not been set up in Venezia Giulia Signor de Gasperi told the Chief Commissioner that the Italian Government might be forced to resign because the question of Trieste and Venezia Giulia had become one of national importance on which Italians of all parties were united. This is undoubtedly true, except that Signor Togliatti, the leader of the Communist Party, appears to be in an ever-increasing dilemma as to the position he should adopt and to be as much in the dark regarding the extent of Moscow's commitments as everyone else. The Council of Ministers also issued on the 12th May a communiqué urging that Venezia Giulia should be occupied and administered by the Allied forces with whom the armistice was concluded because the difficulties of a final settlement would be greatly increased if the Yugoslav occupation was allowed to continue.

The Committee of National Liberation of the North, which visited Rome in order to get in touch with their party leaders and also to discuss a change of Prime Ministers as well as a reshuffle of the Government, seemed, after closer examination of the situation, to have come to the conclusion that Signor Bonomi might be, after all, the best man at any rate for the time being. But the situation in Venezia Giulia has encouraged the Communist-Socialist Alliance to press their demand that Signor Nenni, the leader of the Socialist party, should be given the Ministry of the Interior. Signor Togliatti has actually suggested that Signor Nenni should become President of the Council as well, but it is thought that he would be willing to agree to Signor De Gasperi as President of the Council providing Signor Nenni became Minister of the Interior. Signor Bonomi, accompanied by various Ministers, is said to be on his way to tour the north, where he will be able to judge for himself as regards the political situation in the industrial area. Although early elections and the Constituent Assembly are desired by all, the extremists are particularly anxious to hurry them on as they believe that abnormal conditions due to lack of food and general disorganisation will greatly favour their chances. The Committee of National Liberation of the North may, however, have appreciated the difficulties of holding any elections for some months and have decided that, in the meantime, co-operation between the parties is the most important thing to work for. Trials of Fascists in the north have gone on at express speed and already at least 1,500 have paid the extreme penalty. Although trial and execution have proceeded so rapidly, British liaison officers have reported that, in practically every case, the sentence was no more than deserved. In future all courts will be under the control of the Allied Military Government.

It is now confirmed that damage to industrial plants and hydro-electric power stations is only slight and that as soon as raw materials are available industry can make a start. Coal is particularly needed, since, although the main lines are electrified, practically all the side lines run on steam. Coal is also needed for the building trade, &c. The port of Venice, as well as Genoa, should soon be available for traffic and the railways are said to be in far better condition than expected.

The situation on the Franco-Italian frontier tends to become daily more obscure owing to the French forbidding entry into the zone occupied by their troops. In the Tenda area the French Commander is reported to have made compulsory the use of the French language and currency, and to be replacing Italian with French officials. The Tenda area forms part of the frontier rectifications unofficially suggested by the French as necessary for strategic reasons. In the Val d'Aosta a French Committee of National Liberation is said to have been set up with the intention of holding a plebiscite on annexation of the Valley to France. No frontier rectifications in this area have been suggested by France except for a small strip on the Col of the Little St. Bernard. Although the French Government has, on more than one occasion, denied any participation in political activities in the Val d'Aosta and has stated that it has no intention of influencing the Val d'Aostans, it has not yet confirmed Field-Marshal Alexander's orders to General Doyen, the French Commander, to withdraw his troops to the frontier and General Doyen refuses to move unless his orders are confirmed by his Government.

THE VATICAN.

On the 10th May, five years to the day since the Pope had sent to the rulers of Belgium, Holland and Luxemburg his sympathy at the loss of their countries' freedom, he congratulated them on its restoration. On the 9th May the Pope broadcast a message of thanksgiving for the end of the European war. He took it for granted that millions had given their lives for a new world founded on the fear of God, respect for human dignity and the sacred principle of equality of rights for all peoples and all States, large and small, a world wherein lies and rancour give place to truth and charity. The message called for a great drive for reconstruction.

The new French Ambassador to the Holy See, Jacques Maritain, the philosopher of Catholic Democracy, presented his credentials on the 10th May. In a short speech he addressed the Pope as "the man who had defended natural law and human dignity, justice and charity throughout these difficult years." In his reply, the Pope spread the mantle of his approval over the work of M. Maritain, whose writings have been attacked in some Catholic circles as dangerously "Left": "We appreciate the choice of the man who has openly avowed his acceptance of the Catholic faith and of the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, a man who has put his great abilities at the service of the doctrinal and moral principles which, at this time of universal discord, the Church never ceases to propagate in the world." The Pope then quoted the saying of another great Catholic democrat, Cardinal Verdier, that France must form a new axis of civilisation with the Church. He made a pointed reference to the attacks on Catholic secondary schools in France, which have been so cleverly disguised as attacks on Vichy legislation.

On the 12th May the Vatican Radio announced that the Archbishop of Gorizia had arrived in Rome. Earlier this month Yugoslav Partisans had arrested him and the Vatican had urged the Allies to secure his release. The same source that told of Mgr. Margotti's arrest reported the arrest by Partisans of the Bishops of Ljubliana and Trieste. According to a high Vatican authority the Bishop of Ljubliana's name was amongst those of 20,000 Slovenes listed by the Communists to be killed when the Partisans took Ljubliana.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The food and general supply position improved in Budapest but deteriorated in Debrecen following the departure of the Government and the Allied Control Commission. Prices consequently tended to rise in Debrecen although they fell in Budapest.

A recent report from the economic expert with the British Military Mission contained a recommendation that the activities of the Budapest Bourse in publishing quotations for dollars, sterling and Swiss francs should cease as they constituted an intrinsic violation of the Armistice terms, and all foreign currency holdings should be registered with the Provisional National Government and held for the eventual part settlement of reparations. There were, however, no reports that any transactions had in fact been carried through.

The Council of Ministers accepted a draft Bill providing for the dissolution of the gendarmerie and the punishment of all ex-gendarmes who opposed the democratic and anti-German movement. Szabadsàg, in a leading article, urged a more thorough purge of the professional staff of Budapest University, alleging that certain professors of the Faculty of Medicine had been involved in Fascist activities.

Gyöngyössi made a public statement on the 9th May on the implications for Hungary of the end of the war. He expressed satisfaction that Hungarian troops were then fighting with the Allies, and that the termination of hostilities would mean that henceforth deliveries made to Russia would be reckoned as payment of reparations. He expressed deep concern about the fate of Hungarian prisoners of war and deportees, counting on the goodwill of Russia to assist in their repatriation. He advanced the hope that Hungary would now be permitted direct contact with foreign countries. To the Press a few days later he reiterated the outlines of Hungary's foreign policy, stressing the desirability of Russo-Hungarian co-operation and friendship.

On VE-Day, Miklós sent a message of gratitude and appreciation to Mr. Churchill.

M. Kállay and M. Horthy junior arrived in Naples after being released from a concentration camp. Szálasi and Beregffy are reported to have been captured and interned. Bajcsi Zsilinszky, whose death was reported in Summary No. 282, was proclaimed a national hero.

Roumania.

The "All Clear" announcing the end of the war in Europe was sounded in Bucharest at 2 p.m. on the 9th May. The main celebrations of Victory took place however on the 10th May, Roumania's National Day. The official speeches on that occasion maintained that permanent friendship, mutual assistance and collaboration with the U.S.S.R. would be the basis of Roumania's foreign policy, though there were warm references to the part played by the Western Allies in the defeat of Germany. On the 10th May Roumanian troops were still reported as fighting along with the Red Army north-east of Brno.

General Radescu left the sanctuary of the British Legation on the 7th May on a guarantee of protection from M. Tatarescu and a statement from General Vinogradov that there was now no danger. His departure has done much to improve relations between His Majesty's representatives and the Russians, and gave added cordiality to the Allied VE-Day celebrations. At a party on that day given by General Susaikov, His Majesty's representatives were unexpectedly confronted by members of the Roumanian Government, headed by the Prime Minister. M. Groza delivered a tactful speech congratulating all three Great Powers in equal measure, and, the embarrassing opening having been successfully surmounted, the whole evening passed off in an atmosphere of unusual conviviality.

Bucharest radio has given much publicity to the Congress of the Magyar People's Union, which opened at Chuj on the 7th May, and to the good wishes sent to it by the Minister of Propaganda, Professor Constantinescu Iaşi.

Patriarch Alexei of Moscow has now sent a return delegation to the Orthodox Church of Roumania headed by Archbishop Ieronim of Kishinev—the delegation was given a big reception by Patriarch Nicodim, which was attended by the First Secretary to the Soviet political adviser.

Yugoslavia.

If the Yugoslav intention to annex Venezia Giulia needed further demonstration, that was given in a broadcast speech by one of the Regents, Dr. Manditch, who said: "By the occupation of Trieste, Monfalcone and Gorizia our heroic army has demarcated the new Yugoslavia's western frontier . . . . We have learned that borders are written with blood and not with ink. . . . "

On the 12th May the Belgrade press published an interview with the Yugoslav Chief of the Staff, who described the Yugoslavs' swift dash across Venezia Giulia and claimed that they were liquidating the last German pockets at Trieste when General Freyberg's troops arrived on the 2nd May [a variant from the Yugoslav communiqué of the 3rd May, that no German garrison existed after the 30th April]. "Thus," said the General, "our troops were able to conquer Istria, Trieste and the Slovene Coastland without anybody's help.'' He even went so far as to say that the Triestini had given the Yugoslavs ''a very cordial reception,'' and that the meeting with the Allies had been ''very cordial.'' Such statements will possibly make it difficult for Marshal Tito to modify his claims.

General Morgan met Tito at Belgrade on the 8th and 9th May. Tito rejected Field-Marshal Alexander's proposal of a military demarcation line east of Trieste and the Isonzo valley. He claimed Venezia Giulia by right of conquest and said that he would claim it, and territory further west, at the Peace Conference. He offered Field-Marshal Alexander the use of Trieste port and the communications to Austria, under an Allied-Yugoslav military commission, but stated that civil government would be carried on by the Partisan committees long established underground and now already in power. When General Morgan informed Tito that Field-Marshal Alexander was referring the issue to the British and United States Governments, Tito shrugged his shoulders. Field-Marshal Alexander subsequently informed Tito that he proposed to continue using the port of Trieste to maintain his forces and that he trusted that Tito would ensure that no regrettable incidents occurred.

As early as the 7th May a Yugoslav communiqué claimed the capture of Cividale and Udine (in pre-1914 Italy). There are considerable Yugoslav forces west of the Isonzo, and those around Trieste have been much increased.

To emphasise their contempt for International Law the Yugoslavs have set up the sixth and last of their regional Governments, that of Slovenia, not in Ljubljana, the Slovene capital, but in Trieste, i.e., on occupied Italian territory. As in the other five cases the Premier is the secretary of the Front (the party). In the same arbitrary manner the administration of Trieste has been handed over to the executive committee of the local Partisan committee. As contact with the rest of Italy has been stopped, and as Venezia Giulia has depended on food supplies from the Po valley, a serious food situation has already arisen. On the 8th Monfalcone was said to have supplies for only two days. The Italian press has daily been printing reports of Yugoslav terrorism, expropriations, executions and deportations, carried out presumably in anticipation of a possible plebiscite. The correspondents of at least five London newspapers have described Yugoslav troops firing on the populace and the treatment of Trieste as a conquered city.

The situation is extremely grave; and, if the practice of ''smash and grab'' is successful in Venezia Giulia, it is likely to be applied elsewhere. The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Grew, made a public statement of United States policy on the 12th May. He emphasised the need for settling the numerous territorial problems of Europe by discussion aiming at equity. ''. . . . The United States Government reiterates its view that a disinterested military government is essential in Venezia Giulia in order not to prejudice, through sudden unilateral action taken in the flush of victory, a final solution corresponding to the problems and principles involved . . . . no territorial problem can be solved by proclamations issued in the wake of an army on the march.'' Mr. Grew's statement has the full support of His Majesty's Government.

In Carinthia, in south-eastern Austria, events have followed a somewhat different course (see "Austria"). Yugoslav propaganda has long declared the Yugoslav intention of annexing southern Carinthia. But by the agreement of the greater Allies Carinthia and Styria are the zone of British occupation in Austria. British troops, approaching from the west, occupied Tarvis and Villach, just anticipated the Yugoslavs for the occupation of Klagenfurt, and encountered Yugoslav intention of annexing southern Carinthia. But by the agreement of side south of the Drave in force and were seizing motor-cars, printing-presses, the bicycles of the Austrian police and anything of value. A British correspondent stated that they set up a road-block which forced the British to redirect their traffic for a time. The British Ambassador on the 12th May delivered on instructions a note to Tito requiring the immediate withdrawal of Yugoslav troops to the south of the 1937 Austrian frontier. On the 14th Tito replied demanding that his forces should be allowed to remain where they were in Austria; but offering that they should come under Field-Marshal Alexander's command as other Yugoslav troops elsewhere in Austria, he stated, would be under Marshal Tolbukhin. Nevertheless reports state that some of the Yugoslav troops have been withdrawn from Tarvis and have retired from Völkermarkt, though swearing to return in force.

On the 7th May a broadcast speech by a Croat official called upon all in Zagreb to offer no resistance. Zagreb was occupied by the Yugoslavs next day. The capture of Ljubljana had been announced on the 7th. Unlike Trieste these two cities contain no British correspondents to describe their ''liberation.''

Radio Belgrade has been threatening "dissidents, reactionaries and clericals"; and at the victory rally in Zagreb on the 11th speakers denounced Dr. Machek (who, so they said, had fled with the Germans) and the Archbishop of Zagreb, as traitors. It is evident that the Catholic clergy are to receive harsh treatment. (For the arrests of Bishops, see "The Vatican.")

From Belgrade it was announced that the Yugoslav political police are "nearly every day" destroying "terrorist groups." Mihailovitch's forces in Bosnia, much reduced and in a bad way, are being chased in the mountains.

Greece.

On the 11th May it was officially announced by Mediterranean Headquarters that German garrisons had surrendered in Crete, Milos, Rhodes, Leros, Cos, and various smaller islands of the Aegean. On the same day Radio Athens announced that the Regent would shortly visit the Dodecanese on board the cruiser Averov, with a destroyer escort. The Regent's journey, it was stated, was significant in that it was being made at "an extremely delicate time as regards international politics before the Peace Conference." It was understood that Greece's Allies, particularly Great Britain, intended by this "decision" to make a gesture which would constitute a recognition of Greece's contribution to the common Allied struggle. No member of the Government would travel with the Regent, who would be accompanied by a delegation of military leaders and by members of the Dodecanese Committee. The Regent would visit all the islands, including Castellorizo. Particular significance must be attached to the fact that the Regent would be seen off by British officials and that on Rhodes he would receive a medal from General Paget; considering that such awards were given only on the native soil of the recipient, it might be understood that Rhodes was already regarded as Greek territory. No announcement had yet been made about the establishment of Greek political authority on the Dodecanese. The Regent would probably also take the opportunity to visit Crete. Later, Radio Athens announced that the Acropolis had been illuminated on the occasion of "the union of the Dodecanese with Greece." The Ministry of Supply was sending food to the Dodecanese and the Ministry of Education would be glad of British assistance in conveying school books to be distributed to the children.

For some time there have been indications that public opinion in Athens was becoming increasingly anxious for the Greek Government to make some official gesture towards the Dodecanese (General Plastiras, indeed, wanted to send detachments of the National Guard to the three islands liberated in March), and there were scenes of wild enthusiasm at the Piræus when the Regent set sail on the 13th May. His Majesty's Ambassador and General Scobie were there to see him off.

Replying to a question in the House of Commons on the 16th May, Mr. Hall said that His Majesty's Government realised the strength of the feeling about the Dodecanese, but they regarded it as essential that changes in the sovereignty over the islands, like any other territorial transfers, should not be decided in advance of the peace settlement. The Greek Regent had asked permission to pay a short visit to Rhodes to convey the greetings of the Greek people to the Greek inhabitants of the Dodecanese, and His Majesty's Government had willingly granted this request, as it in no way infringed the principle that the future status of the islands must be left over until the peace settlement.

Albania.

Public pronouncements during VE celebrations in Albania seem to have given the credit for victory not only to the Red Army but also, in fair measure, to the Anglo-Saxons. A broadcast stated that Albania's task now was to co-operate with freedom-loving nations for the establishment of peace, especially in the Balkans, to maintain independence, to reconstruct and to consolidate the Albanian democratic régime. But that Enver Hoxha's conception of democracy is on Russian rather than on Western lines appeared from the further statement that the army would act mercilessly against all who opposed the so-called "People's régime." Besides the army, Enver Hoxha's Government seems to rely on an efficient spy system. It has also been regimenting the people in various spheres —trades unions, women's associations and particularly youth organisations. Even the Bektashi community, which represents more than a quarter of the Moslem population, has been put under new chiefs who are doubtless in sympathy with the new régime.

Bulgaria.

Although in the Bulgarian celebration of VE-day the chief emphasis, as was to be expected, fell on the achievements of the Red Army, the part played by Britain and the United States was by no means ignored. On the 12th May Sofia Radio reported that Bulgarian troops were in touch near Klagenfurt with the British 8th Army.

The Communists have kept up their frantic efforts to bring the Agrarians under their control. Tension between the two parties is acute and the risk of a breach considerable. Having split the Agrarians, the Communists evidently now mean to suppress the moderate section. At an Agrarian party conference called on the 8th May for the avowed purpose of resolving the crisis the Agrarian Cabinet Ministers remained silent, but the extremists, besides continuing their shameless defamation of Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, started an agitation for the elimination of a score of his followers and obtained the election of a new executive committee, which they doubtless hope to find amenable. In an accompanying press campaign the Communists have not scrupled to invoke the name of Stambuliiski, nor to charge Dr. G. M. Dimitrov and his friends with being the tools of foreign interests. The Communists have foreshadowed "explaining" matters to the people with a view to "purging" the Agrarian Party, and they have asserted that the economic well-being of peasants and workers depends on maintaining the unity of the Fatherland Front.

The cessation of hostilities in Europe raises the question—left open by the terms of the Bulgarian armistice—of the degree to which during this second phase of the armistice period Britain and the United States will take an active part in the control of Bulgaria. On the other hand there is no indication that the Red Army commander, General Biryusov, intends to relax the unostentatious support which he has been giving to the Communists, and a resolution passed at the abovementioned Agrarian conference was in favour of the conclusion at the earliest possible moment of a political and military alliance with the U.S.S.R.

It is reported that Tsankov, who fled last September and headed the "free Bulgarian Government" in Germany, has been captured in Berlin with two Bulgarian Deputies and that all three will be returned to Bulgaria where they were some time ago condemned in absentia to death.

Turkey.

As became a member of the United Nations, Turkey did not fail to celebrate VE-day, but the form given to the congratulations which reached President Inönü and the Government in Angora from the provinces was ingenious and perhaps unique: the Turkish leaders were thanked for keeping the country out of the war. In the Grand National Assembly the Prime Minister, M. Saracoğlu paid a handsome tribute to Britain, Russia and the United States and their great leaders and also to Greece. He claimed that the decision taken by the Turkish Government six years ago to side with Britain—had been justified and that Turkey had given all assistance to her Allies. He expressed confidence in the San Francisco Conference and asked the Assembly in its turn to have confidence in him.

On receiving the news of Greek troops landing in the Dodecanese under British auspices the Turkish Government showed an interest in the future of the whole group and more particularly Leros, Kalimnos, Kos, Nisiros and Symi which are nearest the Anatolian coast. This interest is no doubt prompted by strategic considerations. About the 5,000 Turks who still live in Rhodes and Kos the Turkish Government does not seem to be much concerned. (See also under "Greece" above.)

Another cause of anxiety for the Turkish Government is the agitation now going on in Syria for the retrocession of the Hatay (district of Alexandretta) which Turkey extorted from France in 1939.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Both King Farouk and the Egyptian Prime Minister have conveyed their warmest congratulations to His Majesty's Government on the defeat of Germany. VE-day was celebrated in Egypt with expressions of Allied and democratic solidarity, though unblushing emphasis was, as usual, laid on the valuable services rendered by Egypt to the Allied cause, and on the rightful claim by the Egyptian people to a reward for their assistance.

In a victory statement published in the press Nahas Pasha urged that an end should be put to martial law in Egypt. The abolition in Great Britain of some of the Government's special war-time powers has provoked a movement in Egypt for a similar end to be made of political censorship, internment and the excessive use of military tribunals.

Among formal amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks Charter the Egyptian delegation at San Francisco have recommended the following insertion in Chapter 5, Section B, paragraph 1: "To advise, on the request of any member concerned, the reconsideration of treaties which have become inapplicable, and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace." This amendment, obviously based on the suggestion made by the head of the Egyptian delegation at the plenary session on the 28th April, clearly points to the oft-repeated desire expressed by successive Egyptian Governments for the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty.

(For recent discussion of the Zionist question in America see under "United States of America.")

On the 7th May the French Provisional Government issued a communiqué stating that General de Gaulle had received General Beynet, who would be returning to Beirut immediately, and had instructed him on the negotiations to be undertaken with the Syrian and Lebanese Governments, "taking account of the imminent ending of a state of war in the Eastern Mediterranean." The object of these negotiations would be to conclude treaties, "which will on the one hand settle questions raised by the substitution of a régime of independence of the Levant States for that of the French mandate, and on the other hand assure the cultural, economic and strategic interests of France."

As expected, a French cruiser reached Beirut on the 6th May with 900 troops, and left again on the 9th May with, it is said, about 500 on board. Though disembarkation took place without incident, the arrival of fresh troops, coupled with rumours of further reinforcements, has added colour to the belief that the French intend to build up enough forces in the Levant to compel the States to accept a dictated settlement.

In the Lebanese Chamber on the 8th May the Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that the troops in question had been sent as a relief in exchange for an equal number to be repatriated. He said that in future the Lebanese Government would insist on its consent being obtained for all such military movements, until peace allowed of the final departure of the Allied forces from the country. He added that his Government was willing to conclude agreements with any of the Allied States, but only on the basis of complete sovereignty and without giving a predominant position to any of them.

VE-day and those following were marked in Beirut by a display of French flags (distributed by the French); French lorries, decorated with tricolours, parading the town; tricolours attached to parachutes rocketed overhead by the French; and the shouting of such slogans as, "This is your country, O de Gaulle!" As a result, incidents have not been lacking, and clashes between the French and the local population have occurred not only in Beirut, but also in Damascus and Homs. All this has done nothing to lessen the excitement already prevailing, and the atmosphere thus created can hardly be propitious for the negotiations due to be opened. Nevertheless, it is believed that the local Governments intend to discuss terms with General Beynet, though they might, of course, break off negotiations in the event of more French troops arriving, unless these proved to be only replacements and not additional forces. The Jeanne d'Arc is due to reach Beirut on the 17th May, so it will not be long before we know how events will shape.

The apprehensions felt in the Levant States about French reinforcements are shared by the Iraqi Government. The Iraqi Prime Minister recently expressed to the Counsellor of the British Embassy his fears that such "provocative action" might have serious consequences, more especially as the troops being sent to the Levant were Senegalese.

The Regent has now received President Truman's invitation to visit the United States, where he is due to arrive on the 23rd May. His Royal Highness hopes to spend some three weeks there, after which he would like to pay unofficial visits to Canada and to this country.

Musa Alami, the Palestinian delegate at the recent Arab Congress, has been visiting Iraq, and left Bagdad for Damascus on the 9th May. The object of his mission was to obtain a promise from the Iraqi Government of a substantial contribution towards the expenses of the Arab propaganda offices to be set up in Washington and London. It was, however, only just before his departure from Bagdad that Musa succeeded, with the help of the Regent, in securing from the Iraqi Prime Minister a letter promising a contribution of £15,000 now, and a further £75,000 after the passing of the budget.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 9th May, Mr. Law said that His Majesty's Government had welcomed the successful formation of the League of Arab States. They would await with sympathy and interest the results of the detailed conversations which were now to be begun for reducing the barriers which divided the Arab peoples, and for promoting co-operation between them. His Majesty's Government hoped that these discussions would yield useful and practical results.

The new Prime Minister of Persia, Ibrahim Hakimi, presented his new Cabinet to the Shah on the 10th May. The composition of this Cabinet cannot be said to be very impressive, although several of its members have held ministerial office before. M. Zand, the Minister of War, held the same post in the previous Cabinet, while MM. Arasteh (Communications) and Adl (Minister without Portfolio) were also members of it, but occupied different positions. M. Salih, the Minister of Justice, who is attending the Conference at San Francisco, was in charge of that Ministry in the last of M. Said's Cabinets.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 9th May, after the news of the unconditional surrender of Germany, the Japanese Cabinet held an extraordinary meeting and issued an official statement to the effect that Japan's war aims were not altered by the collapse of Germany. Japanese press comment in general paid tribute to the tenacity with which the German armies had fought; but expressed regret that Germany had not after all held out to the very last, and asserted that Japan would not fail to do so. Ishiro Tokutomi, a veteran Japanese journalist, writing in the Mainichi (8th May) said that Hitler's greatest misfortunes were made by himself; in particular through his mistake in attacking the U.S.S.R. and so committing Germany to a two-front war. Dr. Shizo Koizumi, the President of Keio University, declared that a section of the German people, especially the middle-aged class, lacked strong faith in final victory. The result of this was the present pitiful plight of conquered Germany, which was an object lesson to the Japanese people that the war must be won at any cost (Domei, 8th May).

The Yomiuri-Hochi (11th May) said that there had been no sign of disappointment or dismay among the Japanese people at the final collapse of Germany, and this bore out the Government's statement that there would not be the slightest change in Japan's determination to fight on. The end of the European War would not mean peace or a new order in Europe, for the end of the common struggle against Germany was already marked by increased friction between the United States and Great Britain on the one hand and the U.S.S.R. on the other. But Japan was not over-estimating the divergencies between these Powers; also she was well aware that the United States and Great Britain were relieved of the strategically disadvantageous burden of fighting in two theatres of war. Henceforth their full strength would be thrown into the Pacific War. (This contradicted what the paper had said on the 8th May, when it had endeavoured to show that very little reinforcements could be sent from the European to the Pacific front.) The lesson Japan should learn from the defeat of Germany was that a war was always decided in the last five minutes. Unlike Germany, Japan would never flinch in her efforts to bring the war of Greater East Asia to a successful end. The Mainichi (11th May) said much the same.

With war industry in the Japanese homeland undergoing heavier air onslaughts, the importance of Manchuria as a supply and production base has been a constant theme in Japanese official and press comment. A Domei message of the 9th May from Hsinking said that a "fighting strength inspection system" had been established and that Ginjiro Fujiwara, formerly Minister of Munitions in the Koiso Cabinet, had been appointed as "Fighting Strength Inspector." Fujiwara and his assistants, who were all high Japanese industrial experts, would have the task of increasing the production of light metals and the manufacture of aircraft. A further report of the 12th May said that many measures had been adopted to increase the production of aircraft in "Manchukuo."

Motoki Yamazaki, the new-appointed president of the South Manchuria Railway Company, declared that he would make the greatest efforts to increase the transportation capacity of the lines under his control as well as to raise the production of coal, oil and other war materials in enterprises operated by the company (Domei, 11th May). The "Manchukuo" Premier, Chang Ching-hui, who has recently been on a visit to Tokyo, expressed his admiration at the spirit of the Japanese people under air-raids and declared that "Manchukuo" would make every effort in aid of Japan.

The Japanese continue to try to divert attention from the heavy blows which are being inflicted upon them by making fantastic assertions about American casualties.

Domei (10th May) said that, at the beginning of the fighting in Okinawa the American 24th Army Corps played the principal rôle, but that in a fortnight's struggle the 27th and 96th divisions of this Corps were reduced by more than a half. The Americans then withdrew these divisions and replaced them by the 1st Marine Division from Saipan and the 7th Army Division. With these they launched three offensives, on the 19th April, the 26th April and the 8th May, but each time met with bitter resistance from the Japanese defenders. Altogether the Americans were said to have eight divisions in the Ryukyu Islands; with over a half of their total strength engaged with the Japanese holding the southern part of Okinawa. The Japanese line ran from Aja on the west coast through Mayeda and Kochi to Gamasha on the east coast, a distance of 8 kilom. The Americans had managed to cross the Aja River at a point 3 kilom. north of Naha. The Japanese claimed that, up to the 7th May, the American ground forces had suffered 34,700 casualties, and that their sea and air forces had lost heavily through repeated attacks by Japanese air and submarine units, including Special Attack Corps (Domei, 11th, 12th May).

The Chinese claim to have begun a general counter-offensive against the Japanese forces in Western Hunan and to have driven them back on Paoching. This city has been heavily bombed by the American air force. The Chinese are jubilant over their success and say that it shows what properly equipped and trained Chinese troops can do (Chungking Radio, 11th May). The Chinese also say that they have retaken Foochow; their military communiqué spoke of street-fighting in the city when their troops broke into it on the 11th May. However, military observers in Chungking pointed out that the Japanese kept only a small garrison in Foochow and had quite probably withdrawn a part of this to Formosa (Chungking Radio, 14th May).

The Ta Kung Pao (8th May) said that, if the U.S.S.R. took part in the war against Japan, then the Kuriles and southern Sakhalin should come under her trusteeship. But, declared the paper, Formosa was Chinese territory and must be returned to China, not put under international trusteeship, even if American forces took part in an attack upon it. Referring to colonial territories which still remained under Japanese occupation, the paper declared that China must be the spokesman of the small nations and must demand a change in the colonial system. The Communist Hsin Hua Jih Pao (8th May) asserted that both the World Wars had arisen over the question of colonies. The colonial Powers, especially Great Britain, were increasingly dependent upon their colonies, as though they could not exist without them. But among colonial peoples the movement for liberation had reached its peak. Some countries, in particular the United States, would break down the barriers of the old imperialist Powers and cause their colonial possessions to draw away from them, at first economically and later politically. But the clash between the Great Powers might lead one to give help to an independence movement in the colonies of another and thus help to bring about the next World War.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Many American newspapers printed the complete text of Mr. Churchill's review of the war which was broadcast last Sunday and heard by a vast audience in the United States. As usual, the Prime Minister's speech has been received with acclaim. "His voice," said the New York Herald Tribune, "was the drum beat which rallied free men everywhere. Unmentioned in the speech, unnoted in the record, the voice, the heart, the mind and will of Winston Churchill united to form one of the greatest facts of the last five years of human history." His categorical assurances that Britain will stand shoulder to shoulder with the Americans in the war against Japan have, once again, been welcomed, and his remarks that the proposed world organisation must not become a shield for the strong and a mockery for the weak, together with his utterances against "totalitarian or police governments" were generally interpreted as a friendly reproof to the U.S.S.R.

Growing concern, however, is expressed on the radio and in the press on the development of Russo-American relations. Except for extreme Russophobes, all commentators are alike in agreeing that " something must be done " to overcome the present difficulties.

The statement by Mr. Crowley (Foreign Economic Administrator) that Lend-Lease programmes were being reviewed and that pending the completion of this study, " new shipments to Europe (were) being held up except those destined to countries now at war with Japan," was widely interpreted in the United States as signifying that Lend-Lease aid to Russia had been suspended. One leftish commentator saw in this alleged discontinuance of Lend-Lease aid to Russia, a " display of strength " which dealt a heavy blow to Russia but returned no profit to the United States. The Administration, however, has taken steps to correct this assumption. Mr. Crowley himself immediately declared that there was nothing ominous in his announcement of the suspension of Lend-Lease supplies to Russia, and in a statement to the press Mr. Grew, the Acting Secretary of State, again emphasised that the " end of organised resistance in Europe is not the end of the war," and that the President was empowered to continue to move Lend-Lease supplies to Europe during the continuing military occupation, as he was equally authorised to furnish necessary supplies to foreign countries on the basis of continuing hostilities in the Pacific. Referring to the Soviet Union, Mr. Grew said that Lend-Lease shipments to the Soviet Union would be " reviewed and continued where they were justified on the basis of adequate information regarding the essential nature of the Soviet military supply requirements, and in the light of competing demands." But he did anticipate substantial reductions in the current programme for the U.S.S.R. Mr. Grew's statement on Trieste (for fuller treatment, see under " Yugoslavia ") added, however, to the view held in certain quarters that the Americans were getting " tough and hard-boiled " with the Soviet Union. On the whole the press and radio have exercised a remarkable restraint on the subject of relations with the U.S.S.R., and in general there have been exhortations to practise " tolerance and patience." In some instances specific suggestions have been made for a meeting at which President Truman could confer with Marshal Stalin and Mr. Churchill on the various thorny problems, such as the Polish issue, which at present tend to divide the major Allies.

While discussions continue at San Francisco on the question of colonial trusteeship, Admiral King, Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, is reported as having informed the Appropriations Committee of the Senate that the Navy, with President Truman's approval, has delivered to the Secretary of State, Mr. Stettinius, a request for bases on a number of islands in the Philippines.

Mr. " Bob " Hannegan, the Chairman of the Democratic Party, who hails from Missouri and who is an old friend of President Truman, has been appointed, as was anticipated, Postmaster-General. This appointment, the first President Truman has made to the Cabinet, follows established tradition and has caused little comment, though one or two papers have interpreted it as signifying that the President is making active plans for the 1946 and 1948 elections. But while the majority of comment has been apathetic to the nomination of the new Postmaster-General, the re-nomination of Mr. Lilienthal as Administrator of the Tennessee Valley Authority (T.V.A.) has aroused quite genuine enthusiasm. Although an ardent New Dealer, Mr. Lilienthal has won the reputation of being an able and sound administrator, and his reappointment has been hailed by the Liberals as proof that, despite his desire to maintain good relations with Congress, President Truman has no intention of yielding to pressure groups.

On the 16th April Mr. Donald Nelson, the former chairman of the War Production Board and subsequently the personal representative of President Roosevelt in China, where his task was to organise Chinese war production, tendered his resignation. President Truman has accepted this as effective from the 15th May. In his stead, and at Mr. Nelson's suggestion, Mr. Edwin A. Locke, Jr., who has been associated with Mr. Nelson throughout the war, has been appointed to complete Mr. Nelson's mission, which it is anticipated will take three to six months.

The President has also appointed Lieutenant-Colonel Hodgson as United States Commissioner on the United Nations War Crimes Commission in London. He succeeds Mr. Herbert Pell whose deputy he has been for some time.

Widespread indignation has been aroused in the United States by the courteous treatment accorded to Goering. The Veterans of Foreign Wars Organisation has issued a protest against this " coddling," and fear has been expressed that because they hold military commands, high German personalities will escape trial as war criminals. General Eisenhower's promise of drastic action to prevent a future " coddling " of high German officers has been received with marked relief, though there is a growing demand for a speed-up of the trial of war criminals, among whom should be included, according to the New York Times, " the German generals and admirals who broke every merciful convention by which civilised society tried to limit the horrors of war." Goering himself is roundly condemned as a criminal of the worst type for whom the death penalty is demanded, and he is described as " the number two butcher."

Mayor La Guardia, who incidentally a short time ago announced that he would not seek a fourth term as Mayor of New York, has addressed a mass meeting which is said to have been attended by 60,000 persons and was organised by the Zionists. Senator Wagner formally denounced the British Government, along familiar lines, for its Palestine policy.

LATIN AMERICA.

Victory in Europe was celebrated with much enthusiasm throughout Latin America. Even in Argentina the Government attended a solemn thanksgiving service in the Cathedral at Buenos Aires and General Farrell hastened to declare his satisfaction to Sir D. Kelly and voiced his assurance that he himself had never been Nazi, Fascist nor even totalitarian. In Brazil there was jubilation; and President Vargas received representatives of the foreign press. Asked whether Brazil proposed to declare war on Japan, he was reported as saying that Brazil had been the first country to show her solidarity with the United States, that Brazil would not take an isolated attitude, and that she was ready to give the United States the co-operation that might be asked of her. Other countries that have not declared war on Japan are Colombia and the Dominican Republic.

The Latin American representatives at the San Francisco Conference have so far appeared prominently in two issues—that of the admittance of Argentina, and that concerning the part to be played by regional groups in the world security structure. In the case of Argentina, the Latin Americans were able to win United States support, and gained their objective, which they appeared to regard as a quid pro quo for their support in the admission of the Ukraine and White Russia. Mr. Molotov was able to marshal some strong objections, but the Latin Americans spoke and voted with ardour and won their case by a considerable majority. The number of votes at the disposal of this region thus rises to twenty. The United States press (except the Russophobe organs, which recorded it as a score against Mr. Molotov) has criticised the decision somewhat frankly, as giving away a moral point.

On the matter of regional organisation and the world security body, the Latin American delegates have demanded recognition of the special arrangement affecting the western hemisphere, apparently in such a way as to reserve for it the power to settle disputes without reference to the world organisation (see under " United Nations ").

In Argentina, Colonel Perón has admitted in the course of conversation that the attitude of the U.S.S.R. at San Francisco has discouraged his Government from pursuing the question of recognition. He may, however, congratulate himself that his elaborate precautions against disturbances upon the fall of Berlin and capitulation of Germany were adequate to secure the immediate survival of his régime. He himself seems to be bent on questions of post-war prosperity, and General Farrell has made high-minded declarations of Argentina's humanitarian duty of giving full collaboration by sending its produce to relieve the distress of others. The Interventor of Cordoba has, however, told the press that in his opinion elections would soon be called. Sr. Ameghino has been sworn in as Foreign Minister, and his place in the Ministry of Finance has been filled by Dr. Irigoyen, who was under-Secretary in the Castillo Government.

UNITED NATIONS.

Mr. Eden, Mr. Attlee, M. Molotov and Mr. T. V. Soong have left San Francisco, as also have some other leading delegates, including Mr. Mackenzie King (Canada) and M. Spaak (Belgium). Lord Halifax now heads the United Kingdom delegation, with Lord Cranborne and Sir Alexander Cadogan as his principal lieutenants. The Conference is carrying on with its Committee work, mainly conducted behind closed doors.

Mr. Eden said before leaving that the most difficult outstanding problem was that of fitting regional security arrangements into the pattern of world security. The Dumbarton Oaks plan had proposed that no regional security arrangement should be brought into active operation without the authorisation of the Security Council. The U.S.S.R., however, insisted that her bilateral security pacts with her western neighbours and with France should operate without awaiting such authorisation. The other three sponsoring Great Powers finally agreed to put forward an amendment which would have the effect that Council authorisation would not be required for the enforcement operation of regional arrangements directed against Germany and her associates, until such time as responsibility for maintaining the peace against our present enemies shall be transferred to the Organisation. This has caused the Latin American States to ask that the Pan-American regional security arrangements provided for by the Act of Chapultepec should be similarly exempted from Council authorisation. This raises the possibility that such claims might be extended even further to exempt other regional plans, and that such extensions would seriously reduce the importance of the Security Council. The United States, equally interested as a Great Power in the Dumbarton Oaks plan and as an American State in the Pan American system, was put in a difficult position. Australia proposed, as a compromise, that the operation of a regional security arrangement should require the votes of three permanent and four non-permanent members of the Council (which would remove the "Great Power veto" on such authorisation), and that, if no action had been agreed on by the Council within a specified time limit, regional arrangements might operate without its authorisation. The five Great Powers are considering an alternative solution on the lines that any regional arrangement may operate if the Council has failed to maintain peace and security and if an armed attack on a member State has actually occurred. Such operation would, however, have to be reported to the Council at once and would not impair the right and duty of the Council to take any subsequent action it deemed necessary to maintain or restore peace.

The problem of trusteeship for dependent territories, which required reconciliation between the United Kingdom and United States proposals (see last two issues of this Summary), has been further complicated by the submission of additional proposals by the U.S.S.R. The most important of these were (a) that "full national independence," and not merely "self-government," should be laid down as the goal of trusteeship administration; (b) that the Security Council should designate the strategic areas which, on the United States plan, were to be exempt from supervision by the Trusteeship Council; (c) that membership of the Trusteeship Council should include (besides the States exercising trusteeship and an equal number of States not exercising trusteeship) those permanent members of the Security Council not exercising trusteeship. It has been assumed in the press that the second proposal implies a right of the Security Council to inspect such strategic areas, but this assumption has no foundation in the text of the Soviet proposals. The third proposal would have the effect of putting the States exercising trusteeship in a minority on the Trusteeship Council.

The acceptance by the Great Powers of the amendment recognising the special position of the "middle Powers" in elections to the Security Council has averted the demand for an increase in its numbers, and the membership (eleven seats) suggested in the Dumbarton Oaks plan was accepted, after some initial difficulty, by the Conference committee which deals with this part of the Charter.

Throughout the Conference there has been pressure by the Committee of the World Trade Union Conference (which happens to have been meeting across the bay in Oaklands) that their representatives should attend San Francisco meetings as consultants. Any such special recognition of a non-governmental body would clearly have opened the door to a series of similar claims by other non-governmental bodies, and the Steering Committee of the Conference has therefore rejected this suggestion.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE military aftermath of the German collapse is confusion on a vast scale masked by a remarkable show of discipline. Almost all German fighting units, excluding nests of S.S. troops in the southern mountains, have now been captured and the fighting proper has therefore been succeeded by the scarcely less arduous tasks of locating forces, establishing camps and communications, maintaining supplies and preserving order. For the most part the German troops are being fed and policed under the control of their own commanders. The scale of the reorganisation may be gauged from the fact that the total of prisoners taken in the west is now set at 5 million. At sea, the U-boats continue to surrender promptly. Thirty-three out of sixty were located by the morning of the 18th May; nineteen of these had reached ports in the United Kingdom. Only one possible case of scuttling has been so far reported; the mood of the U-boat commander of 1945 is not that of his prototype of 1918.

There have been certain developments in the course of the past week regarding Dönitz and the Ministers of his self-styled Government. It was stated at S.H.A.E.F. on the 16th May that Dönitz and other German officers are being used temporarily under Allied control to help with the feeding, disarmament and medical care of the German armed forces. It is not known whether certain broadcasts which have been intermittently sent out from N.W. Germany are connected with any single directing authority. The latest of such broadcasts (on the 17th) purported to come from "Sender Lindemann of the Armeeoberkommando Lindemann." Prominent Nazi officials known to be in north-west Germany include Stuckart, State Secretary of the Ministry of the Interior, Riecke, second in command under Backe, Conti, the Reich Health Leader, Ganzenmüller, the able No. 2 of the Ministry of Transport, and Wegener, Gauleiter of Weser–Ems. Except in and around Flensburg, German military and political organisation is reported as practically non-existent. The rapidity with which the end came deprived the Germans of opportunity to destroy official records and files. Many more of these have been found intact, in dispersed hides, than was expected, for example the complete files of Reich Coal organisation.

More is now known of the revolt which took place in Munich on the 27th April, already referred to in this Summary (No. 242). Many of the young men involved in it have been interrogated and, in particular, its leader, a certain Captain Gerngross, aged 31, lawyer, artillery officer and High Command interpreter. This man impressed his interrogator as being a born leader, with considerable personal magnetism and genuine liberal and democratic convictions. His movement, known in its final stages as F.A.B. (Freiheitsaktion Bayern) consisted originally of small opposition groups formed after 1933. The key men secured appointment during the war as interpreters within Wehrkreise. Several of them worked in the Mossburg prisoners' camp and were instrumental in arranging the escape of, and the transmission of intelligence by, Allied officers. Stores of arms were assembled and the operation was fixed for the 27th April, since it was learnt that only one battalion of S.S. would be in Munich that afternoon. Main roads were blocked, Party officials killed, Giesler's headquarters seized (though the Gauleiter himself was absent), the local army commander, General von Westphal, imprisoned, the main Munich wireless transmitters captured, and Ritter von Epp besieged in his own house. The Statthalter is said to have given an undertaking that he would go to the American lines and was allowed to depart unescorted. (This would explain the announcement on the Freedom Radio at 10·15 a.m. on the 28th April that Ritter von Epp had decided to break off the fight against the Americans.) Owing to the unexpected arrival of a strong force of S.S., the street fighting went against the F.A.B. who were thus unable to hold their positions until the Americans entered Munich on the 29th. But (still according to the interrogations) members of the movement claimed that despite heavy casualties they had not only settled old scores, but had enabled the U.S. 7th Army to enter Munich practically without fighting and had given an example of German readiness to resist the Nazis by arms in a case which promised reasonable chances of success.

It is still not possible to know what has happened to the German press since the collapse. In some cases, no doubt, printing plant has been destroyed or removed. This happened to almost all the papers published in Frankfurt-am-Main. In Leipzig on the other hand, two local dailies appeared regularly up to the day of Allied entry. Machinery parts were found intact and paper stocks available. It was discovered on investigation that the editor of the Leipziger Neueste Nachrichten was arrested in January last for what was considered too free comment on the ineffectiveness of secret weapons and on the German chances of victory. Germans are reported to be desirous for news, both by wireless and press, and more interested in local than in world affairs. German prisoners in a French camp have started a German newspaper under Allied supervision. The journalists found in Buchenwald have formed an "International Press Section" intended both to handle publicity about the camp, and to issue daily news bulletins in the various languages of the inmates.

On the 5th May a message was broadcast from S.H.A.E.F., conveying in ten languages the instructions of the Supreme Commander to liberated prisoners and displaced persons in Germany. They were told not to move from their district, owing to the prior claim of military operations still impending, to form groups of their own nationality, choosing leaders who might deal with the Allied military authorities. They were warned that sabotage and looting would be punished and were given a general outline of the possibilities of repatriation, which in the case of the peoples of Western Europe would be naturally more rapid and easy than for those of the eastern and south-eastern countries. Russians were assured that they would be transferred to Russian authorities as soon as possible. Poles would be given an opportunity of saying whether they wished to return to Poland.

AUSTRIA.

No further development in arrangements for the establishment of the Allied Control Commission in Vienna has taken place. In Carinthia, however, the situation appears to be more encouraging, and the Yugoslav troops in Carinthia are withdrawing across the frontier into their own country. A Yugoslav broadcast on the 18th May said that in deciding to hand over the military administration of Carinthia to the Allies, Yugoslavia did not renounce her rights there. The Soviet Government had accepted the proposal that Yugoslav troops should occupy a part of Austrian territory east of Carinthia, the broadcast continued, and Yugoslav troops were already occupying this territory. The Soviet Government, however, have not indicated yet that they have replied to the Yugoslav proposal. Another Yugoslav broadcast on the 20th May reported the holding of a meeting in Klagenfurt on the 16th for "elections" to the "regional National Liberation Committee," an occasion which became a "solemn demonstration of Slovene-Austrian friendship." The Carinthian Provisional Government (see this Summary No. 293) of which nothing has been heard since the 9th May, was harshly attacked by speakers at this meeting.

Vienna Radio announced a meeting of the Cabinet Council on the 13th, at which a number of constitutional laws were passed. Dr. Renner, in the chair, stressed that the Provisional Government did not consider its task to be the introduction of new constitutional laws. It saw itself justified and obliged, however, to cut out all "Fascist experiments," and to take the 1918–33 democratic constitution as a basis, "from which to lead to a state of affairs in which the new Parliament will create the final constitution." Laws to be decided upon now were, therefore, "laws of transition, to guarantee the stability and continuity of legal life."

The Provisional Government has issued a decree outlawing the Nazi Party, and all pre-1918 members are required to register. Station Austria reported that Gerde, the Minister of Justice (said to have been a prisoner in a concentration camp for sixteen months), had outlined the "rehabilitation of Austrian legal procedure." The measures proposed included the abolishing of Nazi laws, the restoration of property and funds, and the acquittal of those unjustly imprisoned for political offences. These matters would be dealt with by a Ministerial Commission. A great purge of all Nazi elements in the Vienna City administration was reported to have begun, under the supervision of the Mayor, General Körner. All Army officers, N.C.O.'s, doctors and officials of the former Austrian Army, living in Vienna, were required to register.

The first steps in the reconstruction of Austria appear in a series of orders and appeals which have been made to the people. The Vienna Labour Office, on the 16th May, issued an appeal for the registration of all workers in the building and timber trades. On the 18th it was announced that all building materials were controlled by the State Office for Public Works and Reconstruction. In Graz on the 15th, factory managers were told to submit lists of employees. No new personnel were to be engaged without instructions from the Labour Exchange, and workers could only be directed to essential work, especially agriculture. On the 16th, the "Red Army Town Commandant of Greater Graz," who took up his appointment on that day, issued the first of a series of orders to the entire able-bodied population, who were called up, district by district, for a day's clearance work.

Although Styria is within the British zone of occupation, the Styrian Provisional Government, unlike the Carinthian, appears to have been confirmed in office. On the afternoon of the 19th, Dr. Renner arrived in Graz, and held discussions with the Chairman. He also visited the Red Army Town Commandant in the Town Hall. Graz Radio announced on the same day that a "Provisional Free Youth Committee" for Styria had been set up, consisting of three Communists, three members of the Austrian Socialist Party, and one of the "People's Party," which turns out to be the Christian Social Party under a new name.

Trade Unions are being re-established in the part of Austria under Soviet control. On the 14th, Station Austria reported that the Nazi Labour Front was to be "liquidated by the recently-formed Austrian Trade Union Council." On the 19th, it broadcast an article by the Chairman, the Secretary of State for Social Welfare in the Provisional Government, Böhm. He wrote in the paper Neues Österreich that the organisers felt from the very beginning that it was impossible to carry on from where the Trade Unions left off in 1934. Unity of purpose was to replace the former multiplicity. All parties would co-operate in the new Council. Within a few days the initial preparations would be concluded, and work might begin. In Styria, a provisional Trade Union Commission was established, with Fritz Matzner, a Social Democrat, as chairman, and Karl Eisner as deputy.

Vienna's artistic life is getting into its stride again, according to Station Austria, with a performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" in the Volksoper, and a concert by the Wiener Philharmoniker. Vienna Radio said on the 18th that the city's electricity supply would be normal soon; but in many households fuel stocks are exhausted, and stern warnings were given to the numbers of people who were causing destruction in the Wienerwald by carrying away trees and bushes for firewood. Cardinal Innitzer, who, according to another report, has been arrested, inspected the progress of the repair work on St. Stephen's Cathedral. The Vienna Technical College is to reopen on the 28th May. A scheme for the return from rural evacuation of the many children, of whom trace was lost during the winter transfer of camps, has been inaugurated.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

A new phase in Czechoslovakia affairs may be said to have been inaugurated on the 17th May by the return of the President, Dr. Beneš, to Prague. His arrival was the occasion for a triumphal procession from Wilson Station, down St. Wenceslas' Square, to the famous Old Town Square, scene of many dramatic events in Bohemian history. The President delivered his first important speech since his arrival on native soil. He described his own personal struggle against the conditions which had resulted in Munich, and his unshaken belief in Allied victory. He enlarged on the main points of the Government programme—the equality of Czechs and Slovaks within the State, the common policy with U.S.S.R., and the uncompromising purge of non-Slav and undemocratic elements in the political, economic and cultural life of the country.

On the 15th May, Dr. Ripka intimated that the Czechoslovak Government was now able to consider the question of the Diplomatic Corps proceeding to Prague. British and American parties are expected to proceed within a few days. The Premier, M. Fierlinger, in an interview with the Prague correspondent of the Bratislava Democratic newspaper Čas, denied that the Soviet authorities had obstructed communications between the Košice Government and Czechoslovak representatives in London; difficulties were the natural result of the war situation and the sole reason for the postponement of the invitation to the complete Diplomatic Corps. M. Fierlinger announced that an autonomous National Council had been set up in Carpatho-Ukraine, with M. Petruszak as Government delegate at Užhorod. The people of this province, who spoke the language of the peasants of Poltava and Kharkov regions, had expressed a wish to be joined to the Soviet Ukraine. The matter would be settled in a perfectly friendly way with the U.S.S.R.

The first contacts have been made with the Western Allies by the newly returned Government; Premier Fierlinger received General Hubert, who represents United States forces on Czechoslovak territory and made agreements with him concerning civil affairs in the occupied zone. On the 19th, President Beneš gave an interview to reporters of the military newspaper Stars and Stripes. Czechoslovak reporters from Prague Radio made a tour of the Sudeten areas under United States control west of Plzeň. These last confirm the American reports of the surly and hostile nature of the Sudeten German population, and of the difficulties in setting up Czech-controlled local National Committees in these areas. The Minister of Education, Professor Nejedlý, has decreed that all the former German schools are to be closed down, and the teaching of the German language forbidden, in keeping with the new minorities policy and the Slav-character of the new States.

Much space in the Czechoslovak Press and Radio was devoted to the demonstrations on the 20th of the Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R. The President of the Society is the Minister of Education, Professor Nejedlý, who has announced also that he will continue in his capacity as Vice-Chairman of the All-Slav Committee in Moscow.

The Minister of Defence, General Svoboda and his Chief-of-Staff, issued more detailed statements on the reconstruction of the Czechoslovak Army. Soviet method is to be closely studied and adopted; in fact, Soviet armaments and instructors are to be supplied. Red Army textbooks are being issued to the Czech and Slovak units, and the ablest officers are shortly to be sent to military schools in Russia itself. The Czechoslovak units fighting with the Western Allies have been largely recalled already, and negotiations are proceeding for the return of the Czechoslovak Fighter Wing of the R.A.F.

POLAND.

Details were given, in the Polish London Daily of the 19th May, of a questionnaire stated to have been handed by the Russian Colonel Pimienov to the Polish Party Representatives at the time when (according to the Polish London Government's statements) they arranged to meet General Ivanov. (For Marshal Stalin's recent denial that a meeting of Polish delegates with Red Army representatives was arranged, see below under "U.S.S.R."). The points in the questionnaire are: (1) Name of Party, (2) Outline of its history and social and geographical scope, (3) Party Programme, (4) Internal organisation of the Party, (5) Press organs, (6) List of subsidiary organisations of the Party, with their names and addresses, (7) Method for disclosing the Party and its subsidiary organisations, (8) Method for disclosing the military formations organised by the Party and formerly comprised in the Home Army, (9) List of Party members arrested during the occupation of Poland by the Red Army, (10) Indication of two or three Party representatives for discussion with the Russian Command.

M. Mikolajczyk, in addressing the Polish Peasant Party on the 21st May, as its acting chairman, said that he still "did not rule out the possibility that problems relating to the future of a free and independent Poland could find a satisfactory solution by an agreement of the Big Three Powers." He said that Poland needed a Government of national unity based on unfettered elections, with no foreign troops on Polish soil. The Soviet secret police should also be withdrawn. He emphasised the desire for friendship and close collaboration with Russia. "Should it, however (he added), be proved that the Yalta decisions cannot be put into effect, the authority over the Poles who could not return to their home country could not remain in the hands of the present Polish Government or of groups leaning towards totalitarian methods." The Government of M. Arciszewski could not pretend to represent the whole Polish nation, and should therefore resign.

M. Wojciech Trampczynski, former Marshal of the Senate, for many years a member of the Sejm, and before 1914 a member of the Prussian Landtag, has given a press interview in which he is reported as saying: "Notwithstanding this or that divergence between my views and those of the Provisional Government camp, I believe the time has come for all national forces to unite and present a single front to the world. . . . I will agree to any policy as long as it is independent and distinctly anti-German. As far as our relations with the U.S.S.R. are concerned, I have always believed that we should be friends with Russia." As to the Warsaw rising he said: "I have incontestable proof that the Germans tried to provoke a rising to find a pretext for destroying the capital."

Bishop Adamski of (Polish) Silesia has issued a pastoral letter expressing the gratitude of the Catholic Church in Poland for its liberation. "Religious life," he says, "is returning to normal. The Provisional Government has already returned to the Church its property the Germans had taken. . . . Children will not only go to Polish schools, but in those schools they will have the same measure of Catholic education as they had before. . . . Our services will be held once more at the usual hours. Religious processions will again march through our streets and squares. . . . Only one language, apart from Latin, will be heard in our churches: the Polish language. We are deeply grateful to the Polish Provisional Government which, by its existence and its activities, has secured for us the free exercise and care of our Catholic faith."

According to Warsaw broadcasts, increasing progress is being made in the settlement of Poles from cities, from over-crowded rural areas, and from districts east of the Curzon Line, in the area west of the Polish-German frontier, as well as in the former western provinces of Poland itself. There is an economic motive for this, in the fact that since a large proportion of the German owners have fled before the Red army, the land needs repopulation at once to save the present year's crops. The Warsaw Administration appears also to be anxious to find room both for Poles from east of the Curzon Line and from areas where the land available under the Land Reform is inadequate to satisfy the local demand. Towns in old Polish territory are being encouraged to "adopt" places in the liberated western territories and send settlers there. Thus Warsaw has adopted Elbing and Allenstein. Settlement in Opole Silesia is proceeding, and is now being extended to districts west of the Oder.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 15th May the Soviet Information Bureau announced that the registration of German prisoners taken on all fronts had been completed. No communiqués have been issued since that date.

Marshal Stalin's answer to Mr. Parker's letter concerning the arrest of the sixteen Poles was published by Tass on the 19th May :—

"1. The arrest of the sixteen Poles in Poland headed by the well-known diversionist General Okulicki has no connexion with the question of the reconstruction of the Polish Provisional Government. These 'gentlemen' were arrested in accordance with the law protecting the Red army rear from diversionists—a law similar to the British Defence of the Realm Act. The arrests were carried out by Soviet military authorities in accordance with an agreement concluded between the Polish Provisional Government and the Soviet Military Command.

"2. It is untrue that the arrested Poles were invited for negotiations with the Soviet authorities. The Soviet authorities do not and will not conduct negotiations with those who break the law on the protection of the Red army rear.

"3. As far as the question of the reorganisation of the Polish Provisional Government itself is concerned, it can only be solved on the basis of the Crimea decisions, because no deviation from these decisions can be permitted.

"4. I think the Polish question can be solved by agreement between the Allies only if the following elementary conditions are observed :—

"(a) If in the reconstruction of the Polish Provisional Government the latter is recognised as the basic core of the future Polish Government of National Unity, as in the case of Yugoslavia where the National Liberation Committee was recognised as the basic core of the United Yugoslav Government.

"(b) If as a result of the reconstruction a Government is created in Poland which will pursue a policy of friendship with the Soviet Union and not the policy of the cordon sanitaire against the Soviet Union.

"(c) If the question of the reconstruction of the Polish Government is resolved together with the Poles who now have ties with the Polish people, and not without them."

The only new point was Marshal Stalin's definite statement that it was untrue that the arrested Poles had been invited for negotiations with the Soviet authorities. The analogy of Yugoslavia for the reconstruction of the Polish Provisional Government had not previously been put before the Soviet public. (For Polish comment on Marshal Stalin's statement, see under "Poland.")

The Soviet press and radio has continued to exhibit great alarm and despondency about the degree of recognition which Admiral Dönitz and his "Ministers" have appeared to be receiving from the Western Allies, as well as about "the Göring incident," "the Guderian incident" and "the Busch incident." "The world expects political consolidation of victory," M. Hoffman declared in Krasnaya Zvezda, on the 17th May. "This is all the more important since there is already every indication of a political rallying of the friends of the utterly defeated imperialist Germany." He concluded in words of some significance : "The settlement of political problems connected with the occupation of Germany and the establishment of the control of the Allied Powers . . . will facilitate the settlement of a number of other post-war problems in Europe." M. Viktorov, writing in Pravda on the 19th May, spoke of world opinion "watching suspiciously the considerate attitude towards the worst criminals of all time and of all peoples." M. Yermashev, broadcasting in English on the same day, demanded, in addition to the speedy punishment of Nazi leaders, "that there must be no deals, no compromises, no tolerance in the sphere of economic relations, towards the organizers of German aggression." There can be no doubt that the most deeply rooted of all Soviet suspicions—that Great Britain may wish to preserve the "reactionary elements" in Germany as a bulwark against Bolshevism—has been revived in an acute form by the events of the past fortnight. This, as M. Hoffman hints, goes far to explain the intransigent Soviet attitude on other questions now in dispute. The announcement that Dönitz is being treated as a prisoner of war does not seem to have done much to reassure the Soviet authorities. On the 20th May Izvestiya, in an article entitled "A Dangerous Game," observed that "under pressure of public indignation, placatory assurances have been given. They have proved to be conflicting, equivocal and contradictory. . . . The Dönitz incident is . . . . causing alarm in all countries. It has already ceased to be a mere accident or misunderstanding."

Numerous Soviet reports are coming in about the situation in Berlin, where a municipal administration has already been formed under the Russian Commandant, Colonel-General Berzarin. Working directly under the Commandant is a German Lord Mayor, while local German mayors are subordinated to the District Commandants in each area of the city. The Lord Mayor, Dr. Arthur Werner, is described merely as an architect who had been persecuted under Hitler, but several of the District mayors held office before Hitler and subsequently been in prison.

M. Mikoyan, Deputy Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars and People's Commissar for Foreign Trade, was sent in person to investigate the food situation in Berlin and Dresden; he is familiar with the German economic situation, as he played an important part in the negotiations for the Soviet-German Trade Agreement of August 1939 and in subsequent economic relations between the two countries. His report published in Pravda (19th May) contained much of interest; in it he followed up the line taken by M. Alexandrov in his polemic with Ehrenburg (see Summary No. 289) that the Russians had no quarrel with the German people as such, and quoted in this connexion "the well-known Russian proverb—Don't hit a man when he's down." M. Mikoyan maintained that by organising in advance the Russians had been able to distribute rations which actually exceeded those provided by Hitler and his clique. The reasons he gave for the critical food situation in Germany have a certain piquancy, for he ascribed it to compulsory Government requisitioning of the total harvest, which did not permit peasants to sell on the open market any surplus they might have over and above their own immediate requirements. The Soviet Command was said now to be allowing free trading in Berlin to stimulate production and improve distribution.

A delayed Tass message from Chungking, dated the 8th May, stated that the Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the U.S.S.R. to the Chinese Republic, M. A. Petrov, has presented his credentials to Marshal Chiang Kai-shek.

The War and the Working Class (No. 9) contained a gloomy account of the stagnation now afflicting Dairen and the Japanese-occupied cities of Northern China, from the pen of M. A. Subbotin, a recent traveller in Northern China and Manchuria. M. Subbotin noted "the impress of the crisis on the Japanese Empire, like the indelible traces of disease on the face of a chronically sick man." "All key positions are held by Japanese, and all the skilled workers in the factories are likewise Japanese." The Chinese are chiefly employed for auxiliary jobs." The great port of Dairen (the second largest on the whole coast from the Okhotsk Sea to the South China Sea) "is dead." Details were given of the Japanese officials' high-handed requisitioning of agricultural produce and the deplorable state of agriculture, and of Japanese arrogance towards the Chinese. Vast stocks of metal, grain and soya beans were awaiting transportation in Dairen and along the Manchurian railway system. The author very bluntly stated his contempt for "the new order" and "the real state of the 'sphere of co-prosperity,' economically and politically." By contrast, he recalled the essential part played by the Russians in the construction of the South Manchurian railway, the port and the old city of Dalny.

The Secretary of the Sakhalin Communist Party, M. Chizkov, stated recently in connexion with the 20th Anniversary of Soviet Sakhalin that in the past four years the area under crops had increased by 16 per cent., that the population had increased ten-fold in two decades, and that the formerly impenetrable taiga was now the site of 113 schools, hospitals and many towns and villages.

The centenary of the Great Russian micro-biologist, I. I. Mechnikov, was celebrated in the Soviet Union by many measures to honour and perpetuate his memory. A Mechnikov gold medal is to be awarded annually to a Soviet or a foreign scientist, special Mechnikov prizes are to be offered annually to Soviet scientists for outstanding work in the sphere of micro-biology, epidemology, biology, &c., and various Mechnikov scholarships are to be established at Soviet medical and scientific Institutes.

SCANDINAVIA.

The situation on the Danish island of Bornholm was eased considerably on the 19th May, when a delegation of the Danish Government arrived by air. This consisted of M. Christmas Möller, the Foreign Minister, with M. Kristensen, the Minister for Internal Affairs, M. Hedtoft Hansen, Minister of Labour, and the Communist Minister, Axel Larsen. Up to the date of their visit, considerable anxiety had prevailed, particularly when on the 15th May the Soviet Commander severed all communication between Bornholm and Denmark, and the latest news received prior to that date reported the arrival of Russian artillery and tanks with reinforcements in numbers which seemed disproportionate to their ostensible task of dealing with the surrendered German garrison. The Swedish press especially displayed most serious misgivings, and Expressen on the 15th May reported a declaration by the Soviet Commander to the effect that the question whether the Russians would remain after evacuating the Germans was still undecided. Svenska Dagbladet (17th May) spoke of "clouds on the political horizon of the south-east Baltic," and described as "barbarous and senseless" the bombing operations which had preceded the Russian landing. The devastation caused by these operations to the towns of Rönne and Nexö, as disclosed in the report of the Amtmand, M. von Stemann, was indeed considerable, the damage being estimated at 60 million kroner. About 4,500 persons were rendered homeless. There was, however, no loss of Danish life, since warning leaflets dropped before the attack secured the complete evacuation of the two towns. The blame is attached by the Danes to the Commander of the German garrison, for his refusal to surrender.

On arrival at the airfield, M. Möller expressly thanked "the glorious Russian army," on behalf of the Government, for having liberated Bornholm from German occupation, and the Russian commander, Colonel Streptov, responded with the assurance "we have come here exclusively to clear out all that is German, and, this task once fulfilled, Denmark will continue to be a free and independent country."

The Danish Government announced on the 17th May, the severance of diplomatic relations between Denmark and Japan. They have also applied for the recognition of Denmark as one of the United Nations.

On the 19th May the South Slesvig Danish Minority sent a deputation to M. Buhl. While recognising that there is no support for the incorporation of this territory in Denmark, they were understood to propose a Danish mandate area extending to the Eider, in which only Danes could acquire full Danish civil rights.

The Norwegian National Day, the 17th May, was celebrated with special enthusiasm natural in the circumstances. In a message on this occasion, King Haakon urged a welcome of the Allied forces sent to complete the liberation of Norway, and called for loyal compliance with any regulations which they might issue. He also pointed out that the exigencies of the war with Japan might for some time impede the importation of civilian supplies in the quantities desirable.

Though the situation in Norway is generally quiet, a number of quisling volunteers fired from ambush in Oslo on the night of the 16th May, and there was an exchange of shots in several places.

On the 15th May, the arrival in Finland was announced of the Russian delegates to the Commission charged with fixing the frontier in the Petsamo area, now ceded to the Soviet Union. The leader of the Finnish delegation has also been appointed.

LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 16th the Dutch Cabinet tendered their resignation. Queen Wilhelmina has asked them to continue to act until she has had the consultations necessary for the formation of a new Ministry. In tendering their resignation the present Ministers were fulfilling an undertaking—first given in 1941 and since then often repeated—that a new Ministry would be formed when the liberation of the Netherlands had been completed.

Important pronouncements on two aspects of Dutch policy have recently been made. Broadcasting from San Francisco on the 17th to the American people, Dr. van Kleffens argued that the only way in which the Netherlands could obtain compensation from Germany was by the annexation of some small but fertile portion of German soil. "It need not be much, just a fraction of our total area, but some such measure must, in my opinion, be taken to enable us from the start to feed our people as best we can, to provide some compensation for the immeasurable damage which Germany inflicted on us . . . and also as an act of justice in order that Germany should realise that war does not pay. I think that on these three counts our case is unanswerable."

On the 18th Dr. van Mook addressed a meeting under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations and discussed proposals for a reform of the structure of the Netherlands Realm. "I can," he said, "only give an outline of some of the proposals that have been suggested. It will be for the people of the Netherlands, the Netherlands East Indies, Surinam, and Curaçao to decide. We may be certain these four parts will have internal autonomy and representative institutions; that is but an extension of what has already been evolved. The central government of the Kingdom may consist of a Ministry and Assembly, chosen by the four parts, or it may have legislation passed upon by regional representative bodies. Its function will probably comprise foreign affairs, defence, and international economic affairs. Matters between several parts may be dealt with by common consultation. . . . In the Indies themselves, the evolution towards responsible government, with a Ministry under the Governor-General, seems a logical consequence of their constitutional history up to the present."

Radio Brussels announced on the 30th that during the previous week King Leopold had suffered from acute heart trouble and was at present unable to travel; a Belgian specialist had been called in.

For some time strikes have been endemic among the Belgian miners. Drastic steps to put a stop to them have now been taken. M. van Acker has announced in a broadcast that all strikes were prohibited for three months and that all agitators and fifth columnists would be arrested. The recent strikes, said the Prime Minister, had been of a political character and had been caused by peripatetic agitators. The Government was determined not to increase wages further—that would lead to inflation. But they would do all they could to improve food supplies. Much, indeed, had already been done, largely owing to the aid of Belgium's Allies. But if "to-morrow they were to learn that instead of working we were folding our arms . . . . the Allies, doubting our goodwill and wisdom, would abandon us to our fate." M. van Acker went on to defend the direction of labour and said the trade unions approved of it. The Miners' Union, however, has resolved that it will oppose direction and will never renounce the right to strike, but has recommended the miners to suspend their strike for a week, to enable negotiations to be carried on and a referendum to be taken.

FRANCE.

Much satisfaction has been caused in France by the White House statement concerning the cordial interview between President Truman and M. Bidault on the 18th May. In this the President was said to have spoken warmly about France, to have expressed his desire to meet General de Gaulle, to have indicated his Government's appreciation of the part which France could and should play in the settlement of questions of European and world interest, and to have confirmed their willingness to relinquish to France part of the American zone of occupation of Germany. M. Bidault has since stated his hope that a meeting between the President and General de Gaulle would take place soon, perhaps when the President meets Mr. Churchill and Marshal Stalin. This hope, of course, voices the French desire that the General should take part in any future conversations of the "Big Three."

The President's assurance that French aid will be welcome in the war against Japan was also received with great satisfaction. Encouragement to the French to participate in the Far Eastern War has likewise been given in a telegram to General de Gaulle from General Cheng, the Chinese Minister of War. After congratulations on the victory in Europe General Cheng's telegram concluded: "We firmly believe that to restore peace in the world your brave troops will join their Allies, Britain and the United States, in hastening the defeat of Japan.'' According to the French Press Agency the movement of French troops now in progress, which involves a certain reinforcement of French units in Syria and the Lebanon, is being carried out with the idea of creating a zone d'étape for operations in the Far East as well as to enable the French authorities responsible for maintaining order in the Levant to meet their obligations. '' Well-informed '' French circles point out that these military movements in no way modify the French Government's decision to recognise the full and complete independence of the Syrian and Lebanese States, or their desire to bring the present negotiations with the Governments of those countries to a conclusion (see also under '' Middle East '').

On the 15th May the Consultative Assembly held a special victory session. The most outspoken speech was that of M. Saillant, the President of the C.N.R., who demanded a swift completion of the purge, acceleration of the work of repatriating prisoners and deportees, and the introduction of reforms such as those advocated by the C.N.R. He urged that a united effort should be made '' to achieve this second victory which France needs,'' and which he said had been so clearly asked for at the recent elections. After this, General de Gaulle's rather formal review of the part played by France in the war was evidently not entirely in accord with the spirit of his audience, who were perhaps hoping for some clue to the Government's plans to meet the urgent problems ahead. It was noticeable that on several occasions the Communists refrained from joining in the general applause by which the General's speech was punctuated. The Central Committee of the Party has, however, issued a manifesto in which it states its readiness '' to assume a greater share of responsibility for the management of public affairs within the Provisional Government headed by General de Gaulle.''

The results of the municipal elections show that the heavy Communist majority in Paris was not repeated to the same extent in the provinces, where the Socialists still retain control in most of the large towns. The common lists were generally successful and consisted of such broad and comprehensive coalitions that most parties can claim some measure of popular support. Hence it is not easy to make any clear deduction from the elections beyond the obvious fact that the majority of the population voted against the Right and that this was a reflection of their natural desire for a complete break with the past rather than of universal support for Left-wing parties. The Right, however, protest that the confusion in which the elections took place does not permit the drawing of any definite conclusions about the general feelings of the country. It is true that the Communists did help to confuse the issue by manœuvres to ensure that they should be associated with the winning side. At Compiègne, for example, a Resistance list in which they were included was opposed by an independent list sponsored by Baron de Rothschild. In the second ballot the Communists deserted the Resistance list and joined the Rothschild list which was eventually successful. The elections were also marked by a continuation of the violent Communist campaign designed to prevent co-operation between the M.R.P. and the Socialists and to represent the M.R.P. (the Left-wing Catholic party) as reactionary. The Communists undoubtedly fear the growth of a powerful centre party able to rally the progressive Conservatives. As a counter-move they are making a strong bid to persuade the Socialists to join them in a single '' Parti Ouvrier Français.'' Although the Communists are supported in this by the left wing of the M.L.N. they are unlikely to induce the Socialists to commit political suicide by such a a fusion.

There has been a wave of strikes in various parts of France during the past week, strikes of coal miners in the north, a brief general strike in the Rhone department, and threatened strikes of Marseilles tram workers and Paris insurance staffs. Repatriated prisoners and deportees have also demonstrated in Paris. The extreme gravity of the coal situation was emphasised in a broadcast appeal to the miners on the 17th May by the Minister of Industrial Production, M. Lacoste. The Minister stated that the National Railways had barely enough coal left for six days and that if the miners slowed up or temporarily ceased production the life of the nation would be paralysed. For lack of coal only 12 of the country's 108 blast furnaces were working. The supply of coal to industries making building materials had had to be cut by 75 per cent., yet there were many homeless people waiting for these materials. It had been impossible to put aside any coal for domestic heating in winter, and supplies to sugar refineries had also had to be cut by 50 per cent.

M. Léon Blum and M. Herriot have been received by General de Gaulle, and M. Blum has resumed political direction of the Populaire. The death is reported from Toulouse of M. Joseph Barthélemy, a former Vichy Minister of Justice.

SWITZERLAND.

Indignation was aroused in Switzerland by reproaches in certain American papers that Switzerland had failed to issue reports concerning the terrible conditions prevailing in the German prison camps, and more particularly the concentration camps. Both the Federal Council and the press emphatically repudiated all such criticism, maintaining that the Swiss delegates and the International Red Cross had done their best, obstructed as they often were by the attitude of the German authorities. As for the concentration camps, neither Switzerland in her capacity of Protecting Power, nor the International Red Cross had any authority to visit them, since there is no international law which allows a Protecting Power the right to aid political prisoners. Therefore Switzerland could not accept reproaches for failure to do her duty, and she meant to proclaim her innocence in no uncertain terms.

On the 15th May, the Federal Council dealt in detail with the demobilisation of the Army, which it was agreed should be carried out as quickly as possible. A considerable number have already been released, but the continuation of certain duties makes the retention of some troops essential.

Deutsche Zeitung in der Schweiz, the organ of the German colony in Switzerland, has been banned by order of the Federal Prosecutor. Many members of the colony had been obliged by the National Socialist Party to become regular subscribers to the paper, which had a German editor.

A Yugoslav Commercial Mission has arrived in Berne to discuss with the Federal authorities the resumption of trade between the two countries.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The case of Léon Degrelle, the Belgian Rexist who, as reported in last week's Summary, took refuge in Spain, is being handled by the Belgian Government themselves direct with the Spanish Government. There are no further developments in the Laval episode. However, it is the considered view of His Majesty's Government that this is a matter to be settled between the French and Spanish Governments and one in which they should not intervene.

Though there are rumours in plenty, there are still no proofs that General Franco really intends to bring the Spanish régime more into line with the political thought of other western European countries. There are, for instance, no signs of '' defalangización,'' though his interest in the newly-formed '' Guardia de Franco ''—recruited from Falange extremists and the Blue Division and groups of which now exist in Spain and even in Morocco—may foreshadow an apparent shift of political power away from the Falange (see Summary No. 262). But it is not likely to be more than a surface change, even if it comes off. The Party, who are uneasy at the possibility of a political defeat, are not likely to go down without a struggle; how bitter or prolonged that would be depends more on the Army than on the '' Old Shirts '' of the Falange itself. And at the moment it is not easy to say what the military attitude would be to a change of régime involving the disappearance of the Falange. The majority of the Generals are probably Monarchists, while the junior officers, much cosseted by Franco, are against any change. But it is the regimental commanders, the Colonels, who are the key men. They are by tradition the authors of flaming pronunciamentos, the leaders of revolt; and at the moment they are divided in their attitude to the political future. Meanwhile the Monarchists seem to be waiting on events in the hope that Don Juan's manifesto, which produced singularly meagre immediate results, may have a powerful delayed action.

There is something equivocal in Franco's own attitude to the victorious Allies who can exercise so much influence over the future of Spain. He pursues undaunted his courtship of the United States, which proves once again that he does not lack either optimism or courage in embarking upon a bold and imaginative enterprise. His attitude towards Great Britain is less clear. There is no question that in his approach to the Prime Minister last November he was sincere in his desire for a closer understanding with His Majesty's Government; and Mr. Churchill's cool reply did not seem to diminish his ardour. In a conversation last month with a visiting Roman Catholic journalist he still professed the same intentions, and spoke blandly of his hopes of creating a Spanish Institute in London, which would doubtless give employment to the recently appointed Cultural Attaché in the Spanish Embassy. But, according to reliable information, this hardly squares with the views of the Caudillo expressed on different occasions to the Generals and to the Duke of Alba, when he spoke of this country as being at the mercy of Freemasonry—which to him is almost the equivalent of Communism —and really not counting for anything in the world. From all reports of Caudillian cerebration two reasonably stable opinions emerge: one, that he counts on increasing disunity among the United Nations to ensure his own survival; and the other, a basic truth rather than an intellectual appraisal, that Francisco Franco continues to be highly satisfied with Francisco Franco.

Allied proposals made in Madrid and Lisbon have resulted in the placing of an embargo on Axis property in the Peninsula. Decree laws giving effect to the freezing of Axis assets have been issued in Madrid and Lisbon. The application of them will not be easy. In view of the strained relations between Spain and France, the French Provisional Government, while informed of the negotiations, were not associated with His Majesty's Government and the United States Government in the approach to the Spanish Government.

On the 18th May Dr. Salazar addressed the Portuguese National Assembly. The theme of his speech was a justification of the régime and of Portugal's policy of neutrality during the war.

ITALY.

The C.L.N.A.I. is apparently suffering from disillusionment. A party of representatives of the C.L.N.A.I. went to Rome with the intention of reconstructing the Government from top to toe in accordance with their wishes. They discovered, however, that this was not quite so simple as had been imagined, mainly owing to their "wishes" being all divergent. They have now returned to the North and have met with considerable criticism for their failure. Although the last thing to be desired is a wider rift between the North and South, it is to be hoped that the North will realise that, although it is more important industrially and agriculturally, the less favoured South is part of the same country and that North and South must combine. The latest reports indicate that the Socialist Party is probably the strongest in the North and that the Communist Party has not the following that was expected. Signor Togliatti's attitude to the Trieste question may have had something to do with this.

It is more difficult to assess the strength of the Christian Democrat Party since its followers are mainly from the agricultural areas. Stress is being laid on the importance of every Italian belonging to a political party and independents are being censured more and more because it is felt that unless the people become more politically educated another form of dictatorship may supervene. As regards the Monarchy, it is not yet possible to judge what the masses really think. A certain amount of organised anti-Monarchist propaganda is being carried on in the big cities, but it would not yet be safe to say that this represents the views of the majority.

A statement has been issued in Paris complaining that British press reports regarding the situation in zones in Italy occupied by French troops are inaccurate. This statement denies any wish on the part of the French Government to annex any "Italian nationals" but points out that certain villages "with a French population" were left on the Italian side of the frontier when this was drawn in 1860. These villages, according to the statement, have expressed a spontaneous wish to return to France. No particular areas are mentioned. If by "a French population" is meant a population which speaks French and the French Government does not consider French-speaking people to be "Italian nationals," then large areas of Italian territory will be involved. On the other hand, if it is only a question of certain villages in the Col di Tenda area then it is a different matter, but in any case the French claims ought to be reserved for the peace table.

THE VATICAN.

On the 16th May the Vatican wireless announced that Father Rupert Mayer, S.J., had been freed from Schloss Ettal where the Nazis had confined him. Even before 1933 Father Mayer had publicly pointed out that the Nazi doctrine of hatred made an insuperable barrier between Nazis and true Christians. Father Mayer, known in Germany as the Catholic Niemöller, was praised by the Pope last January for his great work in Munich, from which the Nazis drove him (see Summary No. 278, "Vatican"). Thus the Western Allies have in their hands the two German champions, Protestant and Catholic, of Christian freedom against the submergence of man.

In his speech to the Italian Sports Association the Pope warmly advocated sport, reasonably indulged in, as an essential part of character training, and repudiated the notion that the Church had ever belittled it. The English might perhaps be pardoned if they assumed that the Pope had them in mind when he said: "The country which gave origin to sport also originated the proverbial 'fair play' . . . . which preserves them from the dangers of a closed and uncompromising nationalism."

The Vatican is gravely disturbed at the reports that Tito's Yugoslavs (see Summary No. 293 under "Vatican") have killed thousands of Slovenes and Croats including many priests, and intend eliminating all who through education and independence of view, are not fit subjects for a Communist régime. Large numbers are appealing to the Vatican to save them.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Official lists of War Criminals were published in the Hungarian press, dividing the accused into various categories, of which the following are among the most important:—

(1) Those in leading positions who helped, or failed to prevent, Hungary's entry into the war.
(2) Those in leading positions who gave support to the Arrow Cross Movement and promoted a more intensive prosecution of the war.
(3) Those who participated in the Szálasi Coup of October 1944.
(4) Those who did intellectual work in furtherance of the prosecution of the war or in support of Arrow Cross propaganda.
(5) Those responsible for oppression and atrocities in occupied territories and for illegal executions and tortures.

The lists are probably not yet complete and do not include all those who are being brought before the People's Courts. They contain no reference to any member of the Horthy family.

Russian radio commentaries continued to urge greater energy in the prosecution of the purge and the eradication of Fascism, quoting criticisms in the Hungarian press which alleged undue leniency, and claimed that Arrow Cross men were to be found in the Army and the National Committees or, as in a certain internment establishment, enjoying "the height of luxury, getting excellent food, having dances and soirées, while the hard-working people of Budapest receive a daily bread ration of 150 grams."

Two new Hungarian ministers were appointed: E. Gerö as Minister of Trade and Transport, and F. Nagy as Minister of Rehabilitation. Z. Vas was reported to be the new Mayor of Budapest.

The establishment of a Christian Democratic Party was sanctioned by the Government but the parties represented in the Independence Front refused to recognise it.

A statement by the Minister of Agriculture expressed hope that no land would be left uncultivated in areas east of the Danube, while greater efforts would be needed in the Transdanubian districts where fighting had lasted longer. The petrol Hungary had received from the Soviet Government had done much to facilitate the agricultural revival.

On VE-Day, Miklós sent a telegram to Marshal Stalin expressing gratitude for Hungary's liberation, to which Marshal Stalin replied with his good wishes.

The Hungarian State treasures and gold reserve were discovered in the crypt of a monastry in Spital, Austria. The art treasures included 14th century manuscripts and 20 cases of jewels and other valuables.

Roumania.

The Roumanian Trade Delegation to Moscow has returned to Bucarest, after having completed a Trade Agreement which gives Russia substantial economic interests in Roumania. Russia within the next year is to receive 9 million dollars worth of goods. It was first suggested that 1938 prices should apply, but at present prices the goods would be worth nearly double that sum, and the final Agreement did, in fact, provide the higher assessment of value. Russia desires to acquire an interest in a number of Roumanian concerns, but repudiating any desire to monopolise Roumanian trade, and aiming only at being on a level with other countries. It is reported that a Russo-Roumanian Oil Company is to be formed, which is to have a first claim to any new concessions. The management of this concern is to be shared equally between Russia and Roumania, but Russia is to nominate the general manager of the company. A River and Maritime Navigation Company and a Civil Aviation Company are to be formed on the same lines. Roumania consents to Russia employing 58 per cent. Russian staff in all these concerns.

For the last week the Roumanian press and radio, which, of course, are strictly controlled, have been indulging in a series of hysterical outbursts by way of creating what the authorities no doubt consider the proper atmosphere for the trial of "war criminals." The slogan commended to the Roumanian people is "Death to all war criminals." Prominence is given to a resolution from the employees of the Official Gazette demanding that lawyers who have the audacity to defend the Fascist beasts shall themselves be put on trial beside them. The latest list of "criminals" includes editors of newspapers which were, or were supposed to be, pro-German in tendency, and which have been suppressed during the present régime. Side by side with this there is a hint that a way of escape may be found for "legionaries who repent." No doubt there will: after the time-honoured fashion in Roumania. There is no doubt that a fair trial would prove the guilt of many of the accused, but by no means of all of them. But no chances are to be taken. There is no inclination to forgo this opportunity of getting rid of private enemies, and at the same time of enriching a number of officials at the expense of "penitent legionaries."

The prohibition of the purchase and use of wireless receiving sets has been removed.

Yugoslavia.

The Belgrade press and radio maintained a barrage of propaganda about Venezia Giulia; the biggest gun being a long statement by Kardelj, Tito's chief political assistant, on the 13th May. Kardelj, while agreeing that the settlement must be made by the Peace Conference, insisted that Trieste and almost all Venezia Giulia must become Yugoslav and that the Yugoslavs must occupy the area now.

The British Embassy expressed the hope that the distorted view of events given by the Belgrade press would be met by reiterations of British communiqués by the B.B.C.

Mystery enshrouds the "election" of a body called the Executive Committee for the City of Trieste. Radio Belgrade announced, on the 16th and 18th May, two different lists of persons as elected, while Tanjug, on the 20th, stated that that day 156 "delegates" had elected 106 persons who would elect an executive committee to administer the city. Also on the 20th Radio Belgrade said that 1,348 delegates and 165 guests met "to elect delegates for the Municipal Liberation Assembly." The meeting was not reported to have elected anyone, but to have passed mutually contradictory motions against "Fascism" and for a "People's Court."

A high British military authority reported that the Yugoslavs' victimisation of the local population was rousing the indignation of the Allied troops and that a joint occupation or Yugoslav administration would not work. Food supplies for Venezia Giulia, earmarked and stock-piled for delivery, are held up by the Yugoslavs' refusal of Allied Military Government.

On the 15th identical British and United States Notes were presented in Belgrade. They protested against the settlement of territorial questions by violence, and asserted the need for disinterested Allied Military Government in Venezia Giulia; but, in view of previous plans proposed for the region, only demanded such Government in an area including Trieste, Gorizia, Monfalcone and Pola, and the communications through Gorizia to Austria. At the same time the Soviet Government were informed. Tito's reply on the 18th amounted to a repetition of his already rejected proposals to General Morgan (see preceding Summary, p. 16, paragraph 2).

Thereupon Field-Marshal Alexander sent the Commanding Officers of his units a message to be passed on to the Allied troops. It said that Tito's action in asserting his territorial aims in Italy and Austria by arms and occupation "would be all too reminiscent of Hitler, Mussolini and Japan"; that we had been fighting to prevent just such actions and to seek an international order based on equity; that we ourselves could be trusted to occupy the territory in question, since we did not covet it; and that it now remained to hear whether Tito would insist on establishing his claims by force.

The message, released on the 19th, provoked an angry retort from Tito, given to broadcast by Radio Belgrade.

Moscow maintained silence on the whole question till the 19th, when the press published Kardelj's statement of the 13th.

On the 21st the Yugoslav Government, without waiting for a reply to their Note of the 18th, modified their demands, offering to accept Field-Marshal Alexander's Military Government "in the Slovene Littoral area on the basis of the demarcation line proposed by Field-Marshal Alexander, subject to certain minor modifications," and provided that Yugoslavs should participate in the military administration, that Yugoslav units should remain in the area and that the Military Government should act through the civil authorities now set up in the area. The proposals sacrifice some appearances, but ingeniously retain the reality of the Yugoslav demands. Nevertheless, this offer of apparent compromise has some significance.

In Austria great confusion has reigned in Carinthia, where in addition to Allied, Yugoslav and Bulgarian troops, there have been retreating or captured Germans, Slovene and Croatian anti-Tito troops, and civilian refugees. The Yugoslavs proclaimed their military government in Klagenfurt and elsewhere, looted and established a "minor reign of terror." On the 15th May the United States Ambassador at Belgrade presented a Note, supporting the British Note of the 12th requiring the withdrawal of the Yugoslavs to the south of the Austrian frontier. On the 17th a second British Note, supported by a United States communication, was presented to the Yugoslav Government. It declared that, partly because of Yugoslav claims to the Austrian territory concerned, His Majesty's Government would not hand over part of the British zone to Yugoslav occupation nor permit Yugoslav units to share in the occupation of the zone. It repeated the request for the immediate withdrawal of Yugoslav troops to the Yugoslav side of the Austrian frontier. On the 18th an article in Politika said "it is true that Allied forces were the first to occupy the greater part of Carinthia . . . . The Yugoslav Government received with regret the Allied refusal of our request to occupy Carinthia." The article said that this did not affect the validity of the Yugoslav claims, and added that "the Soviet Government accepted our proposal by which our troops were to occupy a part of Austrian territory east of Carinthia. Our troops are already occupying this territory and at the same time withdrawing from Carinthia." The statement implied that Yugoslav troops were being withdrawn from Carinthia, but advancing into Styria, which is also in the British zone, though as yet almost entirely occupied by the Russians. The next day His Majesty's Ambassador was informed that Yugoslav troops had been ordered to retire from the area of Austria west of Dravograd (i.e., from Carinthia only); the movement would be somewhat delayed by the need to take their booty with them.

The reconditioning of the internal structure of Yugoslavia proceeds. The Minister of Commerce and Supplies has been authorised to regulate planned production and distribution of all grain and seeds, raw materials for textiles, all live-stock produce except milk and cheese, all wood for fuel and industrial needs, all coal and various other articles. It has been decided to establish a State Transport Concern, and a State Petroleum Concern, for the import, export and distribution of petroleum and its products. A State Commercial Corporation, the "People's Stores," has been established and "will deal in all industrial, agricultural, forestry and grocery goods." On the 2nd February the "Presidium of the National Liberation Assembly of Serbia" appointed eleven lawyers as a provisional executive of the Serbian Chamber of Lawyers (i.e., the free legal profession). This body refused to strike off the roll of Serbian lawyers certain "enemies of the nation and traitors." Accordingly the Presidium itself has struck the lawyers in question off the roll, dissolved the provisional executive and struck its resistant members off the roll, and suspended all lawyers and articled clerks on the roll of the Chamber of Lawyers. The Minister of Justice is to appoint someone to draw up a new roll of lawyers and articled clerks.

ERRATUM.

Summary No. 293, p. 16, paragraph 6, 1–7. In place of the whole line "Yugoslav intention . . .", read "Yugoslav troops at Völkermarkt. Meanwhile the Yugoslavs were in the countryside . . . ."

Greece.

The Regent had a spontaneous and enthusiastic welcome when he arrived in Rhodes (see last Summary), and there were Greek flags and slogans everywhere. According to Radio Athens, the whole population came into the capital to celebrate. General Paget received the Regent, who, after attending a service in the Cathedral, made a speech in the Cathedral Square, in which he said: "My present pilgrimage to Rhodes is an official confirmation of the indivisible intellectual and moral ties between the free Greek Dodecanese and the free Greek State . . . . The Dodecanese are free and Greek, and can wait with unshakeable confidence for the confirmation of this fact by the Allies." On his return to Athens the Regent informed His Majesty's Ambassador that he had never in his life seen such deep joy expressed by a whole population or encountered such a spirit of complete unity; after such an expression of feeling it would be easier to await with confidence the final decision of the Peace Conference. Meantime, lest there should be any suggestion that the future status of the islands is being prejudiced, all Greek troops are being withdrawn, a step which will certainly meet with an unfavourable reception in Athens.

Athens celebrated VE-day fairly soberly; the only incidents were an attack on the office of Rizospastis by some Right-wing extremists and the defacing of the sign outside Sovfilm (a Greek company which exploits Russian films). In Salonica armed clashes between National Guards, Royalist Youth (B.E.N.), and Communists resulted in three deaths. The King's Name Day was officially celebrated on the 7th May, and in and around Athens and Piræus and in the Peloponnese a good many Royalist posters and photographs were in evidence. In Salonica the occasion passed almost unnoticed. His Majesty's Ambassador, who has been travelling about the country, reports an almost embarrassingly enthusiastic reception wherever he went. British and Indian troops are universally liked and respected, while the authority of the Greek Government is still rather tenuous, and, indeed, the Government is rarely mentioned. The peasants are working hard, and there is an outward appearance of tranquillity, though under the surface there is still a lurking fear for the future, and in some districts the people are living in squalid poverty.

Generals Papagos, Bakopoulos, Pitsikas, Kosmas and Dedes have been released from imprisonment in Germany, and have returned to Athens. Eleftheria suggests that Right-wing circles are particularly interested in the return of General Papagos, whom they regard as the most suitable head of a Service Government, both on account of his connexions with the Royal Family and because it is thought that his conduct as Commander-in-Chief in Albania and his captivity in Germany will evoke the requisite popular sympathy.

M. Partsalidis, Secretary of the Central Committee of E.A.M., has sent a telegram to Marshal Stalin conveying the greetings of the Greek National Liberation Front to the Marshal and to the Russian people. The joy of the Greek people, he adds, is darkened by the fact that those who resisted are to-day subjected to unexpected persecutions. None the less, they are firmly convinced that Fascism and collaborators still dominating their political life will be uprooted. Marshal Stalin has replied briefly, conveying his greetings to the freedom-loving Greek people. Telegrams sent by the Regent and the Prime Minister to Marshal Stalin and M. Kalinin have not been acknowledged.

Albania.

The fixing of prices for local produce and for gold is an indication that Enver Hoxha's administration is still beset by economic difficulties, but it is making effort, not without success, to improve the situation. The administration claims to have sent representatives to enquire into the needs of the devastated South and already to have relieved 20,000 people. Sugar, flour, milk and coffee which the Allied military authorities are reported to have handed over in Durazzo will have been a godsend to populace and authorities alike.

The special court at Tirana has sentenced three more people to death and four to long terms of imprisonment. Six more have been executed at Valona. In and near Scutari more political arrests are reported.

Bulgaria.

Mr. Churchill's broadcast of the 13th May, and particularly his remarks about democracy and totalitarianism, attracted much attention in Bulgaria. The Fatherland Front newspaper reproduced the mild criticism of the Daily Worker.

The Bulgarian press and radio have given prominence to the recognition by Marshal Stalin, Marshal Zhukov and the Moscow wireless of the Bulgarian contribution to victory over Germany. Speaking at Plovdiv on the 13th May the Foreign Minister did not conceal his hope that Bulgaria would soon be considered to have worked her passage. He repeated the assertion that the Bulgarian people had always been on the side of the Allies and he contended that the Bulgarian partisans had made as great sacrifices as those of Belgium, Holland and other countries recognised as Allies because of their resistance. Proceeding to review foreign relations M. Stainov said that all quarrels with Yugoslavia had been eliminated and that Bulgaria readily accepted the new status of Macedonia as an independent State within the frontiers of Yugoslavia. He claimed that certain circles in Greece were displeased by the improvement in Yugoslav-Bulgarian relations and glossing over Bulgaria's utter failure so far to make the reparations to Greece stipulated in the armistice, professed disappointment that Greek politicians, far from reciprocating Bulgaria's desire for close relations—which was shown to be genuine by the conviction of more than a hundred Bulgarian officials for crimes perpetrated in occupied Greece—should be shouting "to Sofia!" Between Turkey and Bulgaria there were no territorial claims. Bulgaria, like the U.S.S.R., was locked up in the Black Sea, but the question of the Straits would be decided between the U.S.S.R. and Turkey. Bulgarian friendship with the Soviet Union was giving good results. The present shipping shortage would have prevented the United States or Britain from supplying the 13,000 tons of oil products, the 30 million kilog. of iron, the rubber and the cotton which had already been received from Russia in return for tobacco.

Turkey.

Mr. George Hall's statement of the 16th May about the Dodecanese (see "Greece" in last Summary) coupled with the withdrawal of Greek troops who had been landed should allay the anxieties of the Turkish Government lest the status of the islands should be settled over its head.

The Turkish Government has approved the passage through the Straits of twelve mine-sweepers which Russia is obtaining from the United States. Now that Turkey is technically a belligerent she has, under the Montreux Convention, full discretion to allow or forbid the passage of warships.

M. Saracoğlu sent Marshal Stalin a somewhat fulsome message of congratulation on the Red Army's victory. In return he received a remarkably frigid acknowledgment, and a Soviet broadcast in Turkish complained again of symptoms of fascism in Turkey.

In another outspoken article, M. Sertel criticised the Government for having done nothing, by regulating production and consumption, to keep down the cost of living and for failing, now that the German clearing system was no longer a factor, to adjust the Turkish economic system to that of the United Nations and to establish commercial relations with them.

Speaking at a festival of Turkish youth on the 19th May President Inönü expressed the opinion that the hope of future peace lay in the nations showing respect and understanding for one another. The emphasis which he proceeded to lay on democratic institutions in Turkey seems to have been a reply both to recent Russian aspersions and to local criticism. War-time restrictions, he said, would be lifted. The Grand National Assembly, while repressing disorder more firmly than former authoritarian régimes, would continue training the people to live and think in freedom and ensuring further progress in a country which had accomplished many reforms in a short time. Foreign propaganda and the rise and decline of foreign policies had left false impressions which must be guarded against. Profiteering had caused suffering to the public, but never tainted the leaders. The nation had successfully passed the moral and political tests of the war and the people's Government would continue to progress along the path of democracy.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Nahas Pasha has followed up his statement in the press on the abolition of martial law in Egypt by a letter to His Majesty's Ambassador on the same subject. In this letter Nahas Pasha refers to the recent revocation by His Majesty's Government of certain war-time regulations in Great Britain, and argues that liberties which have been restored to the British people should no longer be withheld from their Egyptian allies. Nahas goes on to say that he proposes shortly to raise the question in the Senate, and he hopes that His Majesty's Government will agree to the immediate abolition of martial law and various restrictions imposed on Egypt during the war.

While the news of the German surrender has been welcomed throughout Egypt, the general public hardly expect any immediate material benefit to accrue to them as a result of the end of the war in Europe. There is indeed a widespread fear of economic difficulties increasing in the near future—a fear that is not diminished by the public lack of confidence in the ability of the present Egyptian Government to meet these problems. The local press continues to publish highly-coloured and doubtless exaggerated accounts of the part played by the Egyptian delegation at San Francisco.

The situation in the Levant States has not improved: indeed it has deteriorated. General Beynet, who reached Beirut from Paris last week, told Mr. Shone that he seemed to have returned to "almost a battle atmosphere." His words soon proved true in Aleppo, where on the 20th May a serious riot took place, resulting in casualties among French troops and Syrian civilians. Elsewhere there have been demonstrations, and in most of the principal towns the shops are closed.

On the 17th May the French cruiser Jeanne d'Arc arrived at Beirut with a further battalion of French troops. The following day in the Chamber of Deputies, where the atmosphere was extremely tense, the Lebanese Prime Minister stated that his Government had more than once defined its attitude towards any attempt on its independence. "That attitude will not change," he went on. "The danger we see approaching threatens not only Lebanon, Syria and the Arab countries, but also the honour of Europe. All should be convinced that our brother Arab countries will, if necessary, join in the fight and die on our side. Those who threaten us should remember that they have important interests in neighbouring countries, and any aggression against us will infallibly have repercussions on those interests."

In spite of the unfavourable atmosphere prevailing, a meeting took place in Damascus on the 18th May between General Beynet and representatives of the Syrian and Lebanese Governments to discuss the French proposals for a treaty. In two identical notes for the consideration of each Government the French state that they, who are responsible for granting independence to the States, wish to safeguard France's interests, cultural, economic and strategic. When agreement has been reached on these three points, the French will be prepared to hand over the Troupes Spéciales to the Levant States, on condition that they remain under French military command "so long as considerations do not allow full exercise of national command." No reference is made to the immediate transfer of a brigade of Troupes Spéciales, to which it was understood General de Gaulle had agreed.

Replies to the notes have already been sent by both Governments, refusing to negotiate under what is alleged to be a threat of force. The deadlock therefore remains. Nor will the situation improve if, as is believed, a third French ship arrives shortly with further reinforcements. Every effort is being made by ourselves and by the United States Government to urge the Levant States to refrain from any untoward action, and at the same time to impress upon the French Provisional Government the dangers that are bound to arise from sending reinforcements at this time. (See also under "France.")

Events are being closely watched in neighbouring countries. Ibn Saud has asked that we shall continue to do all we can to maintain Syrian independence, and is sure that His Majesty's Government will not allow the French to impose Senegalese troops on the country. He also proposes to send a telegram to General de Gaulle, drafted in dignified and non-provocative terms, urging him to accept the fact of the Levant States' aspirations for complete independence.

Iraqi interest in the affair, to which reference was made in last week's Summary, has been encouraged by the recent visit to Bagdad of M. Chamoun, the Lebanese Minister in London, who has been spending some weeks in the Lebanon, and whose journey to Iraq is doubtless not unconnected with the situation in the Levant. The Iraqi Government is being pressed to send arms to the States, and, if things get worse there, it may well comply not only with arms but even with "volunteers."

It is reported from Washington that the Jewish Agency for Palestine has handed to the Soviet delegation at San Francisco a memorandum on Jewish rights in Palestine. The memorandum is said to explain the functions of the Jewish Agency as the internationally recognised representative Jewish body for Palestine, and to contain comments by the Agency on the proposals of the United States and Great Britain regarding trusteeship of mandated territories.

The Paris correspondent of The Times reports that the Mufti of Jerusalem was recently captured by French forces in Southern Germany and has been brought to Paris, where he is interned in a hotel. It had previously been reported that the Mufti, in trying to escape, had landed in a German aircraft near Berne, but had been arrested and deported by the Swiss authorities, who refused to grant him asylum.

His Majesty's Ambassador at Tehran has received a note from the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs requesting that British forces should be withdrawn from Persia forthwith. The note, which begins with congratulations on the end of the war with Germany, stresses the importance of Persia's returning to normal conditions as soon as possible in accordance with the wishes of her people. The note goes on to claim that the war with Japan cannot be affected by the presence of Allied troops in Persia, and that, now that the war with Germany is over, there is no longer any need for foreign troops to remain on Persian soil. A note requesting the withdrawal of their troops has been similarly addressed to the Governments of Russia and the United States through their respective representatives in Persia.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 15th May the Japanese Foreign Office declared that "owing to the unconditional surrender of Germany and to other developments in Europe, the Tripartite accord between Japan, Germany and Italy concluded on the 27th September, 1940, and various other relevant agreements providing for special collaboration as between Japan and Germany and other European Powers are deemed to have ceased to be effective" (Domei, 15th May). This declaration invalidated a total of eleven agreements. The most important of these are, in addition to the Tripartite Pact of 1940: the Anti-Comintern Pact between Germany and Japan, of the 25th November, 1936; the Protocol between Germany, Italy and Japan, of the 6th November, 1937, whereby Italy adhered to the original Anti-Comintern Pact; the Protocol extending the Anti-Comintern Pact, concluded on the 25th November, 1941 (this extended the 1936 Pact for five years); and the Tripartite Pact between Japan, Germany and Italy on the joint prosecution of the war, signed on the 11th December, 1941. The other six agreements are those on economic and on cultural co-operation concluded by Japan with Germany, Italy, Hungary and Bulgaria respectively between 1938 and 1943. The Japanese-sponsored Nanking China and "Manchukuo" Governments have announced their abrogation of the Anti-Comintern Pact (Domei, 17th May).

This step is an obvious gesture of appeasement to the U.S.S.R. in the hope of persuading that Power to remain neutral. The Yomiuri-Hochi (17th May) said that the principal objective of Japanese diplomacy should be the ensuring of security in the rear. The paper declared that throughout the war both Japan and the U.S.S.R. had faithfully adhered to their neutrality and had carefully avoided any betrayal of trust or confidence. This was a fact that would be remembered by the U.S.S.R. in the days to come. But the paper added that there was no knowing what line the U.S.S.R. would follow in the future. The Asahi (19th May) said that the Tripartite Pact had been concluded on the premise that the Soviet Union was to be neutral and the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact further endorsed this position. The Anti-Comintern Pact lost its meaning in 1943, when the Comintern was disbanded. Even during Shigemitsu's tenure of the Foreign Office the basis of Japanese diplomacy was found in the viewpoint that friendly relations between Japan "and its good-neighbour neutral Power" held the key to peace. The Asahi went on to recount how Togo, when Director of the Europe and America Affairs Bureau of the Foreign Office, had worked for a Soviet-Japanese Pact, and, when Director of the Asiatic Affairs Bureau, had furthered the agreement by which the U.S.S.R. sold its interests in the Chinese Eastern Railway. As Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., Togo had laid the foundations of the Neutrality Pact. He was now "racking his brains" for the furtherance of this diplomacy. (The Asahi did not refer to the Soviet declaration of the 5th April giving notice that it would not continue the Pact after 1946.)

The other aspect of Japan's "renovated diplomacy," dwelt on by the Japanese press, has to do with her relations with China. The hope of detaching Chungking from the coalition against Japan is evidently still cherished in Tokyo, despite the failure of previous ventures. The Mainichi (19th May) declared that the way the Great Powers were handling the Polish question indicated what was in store for Chungking when those Powers directed their full attention to East Asia in general and to China in particular. Chungking, aided by the United States, had taken advantage of Soviet preoccupation with the European War to extend its sphere of influence in Sinkiang Province; this action was like "that of a pilferer sneaking into another's house while its occupants were away." But now the U.S.S.R. had her hands free and the Soviet press was already giving increased prominence to Chinese matters. The Mainichi also alleged that some Chungking as well as Nanking leaders felt that a decisive battle between Japan and the United States fought out on Chinese soil would spell doom for the Chinese people, and that the only way to avoid such a danger would be to declare China neutral and to request both the Japanese and the American armies to withdraw from Chinese territory. The Mainichi said that Japan was bound by her alliance with Nanking to withdraw her troops upon the termination of the war, but that she could not possibly do so while the Americans were sending additional forces to China and were planning a landing on the Chinese coast. The hint to Chungking is plain enough.

On the 17th May Domei announced that the Taisei Yokusankai would be disbanded on or about the 10th June and that its subsidiary organs would be merged with the newly-formed People's Volunteer Corps. These organs included the Yokusan Men's Corps, the Dai Nippon Women's Association, the Dai Nippon Young Men's and Boys' Association, the National Commercial Service Association and the National Agricultural Service Association. The National Industrial Service Association, the National Labour Service Association and the National Marine Transport Service Association would continue to function in view of their independent character, while the disposal of the General Headquarters of the New Asia Movement would be handled separately by the Greater East Asiatic Affairs Ministry.

The Taisei Yokusankai should be distinguished from the Taisei Yokusan Seijikai, which has been replaced by the Dai Nippon Seijikai (see this Summary, Nos. 285, 287 and 290). The Asahi (18th May) said that the enthusiastic support given to the Taisei Yokusankai when it was inaugurated in 1940 had waned; it had become too bureaucratic in character and had lacked any clear policy. The Mainichi of the same date made similar criticisms and both papers hoped that the People's Volunteer Corps would prove more effective in organising the people in general for the furtherance of the war effort. Isamu Inouye, the Assistant Editor of Overseas News, in a radio broadcast on the 19th May, said that the dissolution of the Taisei Yokusankai, so far from having anything to do with a peace overture, was an unequivocal manifestation of Japan's determination to continue the war to the bitter end. On the 21st May Iguchi, the spokesman of the Board of Information, flatly denied that Japan had ever made any overtures for peace to the United States or Great Britain.

The Sixth National Congress of the Kuomintang has concluded its deliberations. These have been conducted in secret and little apart from brief statements on various resolutions passed has as yet been made public. On the 16th May Dr. Wang Shih-Chieh, the Chinese Minister of Information, said that after long deliberations a special committee of the Congress had fixed the 12th November as the date for convening the National People's Assembly. Questions as to the membership and the powers of this Assembly would be left to the decision of the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee, but opinions from members of other parties would be taken into account when the People's Political Council met at the beginning of July.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The volume of press and radio comment on the San Francisco Conference has considerably diminished, although the Conference is still prominently featured. President Truman's talk with M. Bidault has been given considerable space and it is generally felt that the White House statement, subsequently issued, not only reflected American goodwill towards France, but was also "a strong vote of confidence for General de Gaulle" (for fuller treatment of Franco-American relations see under France). News from the Far East is now naturally given more space, but attention is still concentrated on the troubles and turmoil in Europe, and there is much speculation concerning Russia's real intentions.

A burst of criticism greeted Mr. Elmer Davis's statement that the Office of War Information intended to monopolise German information media and that British and American papers would not be allowed to circulate in the American-occupied zone of Germany. President Truman's promptness in reversing this decision earned him almost unanimous praise, and confidence is expressed that General Eisenhower and the occupation authorities can be relied on to see that nothing is allowed to circulate which might foster anti-democratic sentiments. Unless Germans witness the functioning of a free press and radio, it is argued, they will never appreciate the advantages that accrue. A desire for the speedy trial and punishment of War Criminals, including the leading high ranking German officers, and all those who planned the war, also continues to be forcibly expressed.

The Bill which would give President Truman authority to reduce American import duties up to a further 50 per cent. by reciprocal trade agreements (see Summary No. 286, page 21) was approved last week by the House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee. This is regarded as an important victory for the President, though the fact that it was only approved by 14 votes to 11 is significant. The 11 opponents comprised 10 Republicans and 1 Democrat. "Such a line-up indicates," in the words of the New York Times, "that the vote on this measure in full Congress may be on traditional party lines. Apart from the danger to the extension of the Act, a vote of this type would," the New York Times maintained, "be an outstanding example, particularly from the Republican side, of the triumph of historic party politics over common-sense and present logical consistency . . . . and it is time for the Republicans, and in particular, those who sincerely wish to preserve free enterprise, to re-examine their first principles." The Washington Post also considered the Republican Party "ill-advised to make this a party issue."

The next stage is consideration of the measure this week by the House of Representatives followed by consideration in the Senate's Finance Committee and later by the Senate itself. In some circles it is considered that the President may yet be forced to accept some weakening amendments to secure the passage of the Act in the Senate, where the real battle will take place. While the parallel with the extension of the old Act in 1943 is imperfect, it is encouraging to bear in mind that although there were then fears of a stiff battle in the Senate after a comparatively easy passage in the House, these were not justified by the event.

Mr. William Batt, Vice-Chairman of the War Production Board, in a Speech at Chicago, gave it as his view that news of a United States policy of progressively lowered tariffs would probably be the best news that British business men could receive. In urging an extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, Mr. Batt added, "whereas we in the United States desire to increase exports after the war to ensure full employment, Britain's need to increase exports is fundamentally different. Britain needs to increase her exports primarily to meet the cost of her necessary imports, if she is to maintain anything approaching her pre-war standard of living, let alone provide full employment."

Attacks on international cartels have been made by Mr. William Clayton (Assistant Secretary of the State Department) and Mr. Biddle (the Attorney-General). Mr. Clayton proposed that there should be a world agreement for the control of cartels and suggested the establishment of an "international office for business practices, tied into the United Nations Organisation through the economic and social council, to facilitate inter-governmental co-operation." He described the O'Mahoney Bill, requiring the registration and public disclosure of restrictive contracts between American and foreign industries, now under consideration by a Senate Sub-Committee, as a useful element in this programme, which, if passed, would substantially discharge the obligations of the United States under the section calling upon each signatory nation to require registration of proper information relating to international business agreements. Mr. Biddle continues to inveigh against the old German cartels, particularly against I.G. Farbenindustrie. He maintained before the Senate Judiciary Sub-Committee, which is studying a Foreign Contracts Bill for the restriction of foreign contracts in which United States corporations participated, that " many cartel arrangements necessarily disrupted during the European phase of the war are being resumed," and he also urged the Senate to approve of the O'Mahoney Bill. Somewhat more surprisingly, Mr. Pew, the President of the Sun Oil Company, and powerful behind-the-scenes figure in the Republican Party, has advocated freeing world trade " from the straitjackets of cartels, unduly high tariffs, quotas and all other restraints that don't come from the free choice of a free people."

The House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee has unanimously approved a resolution urging that the United States should participate in an international educational and cultural organisation.

The Bill to substitute a majority of both Houses for the two-thirds rule of the Senate which is now required for treaty ratification, has been passed by the House of Representatives but, as on past occasions, it is exceedingly unlikely that the Senate will be willing to accept this proposal, thereby voluntarily surrendering one of its most cherished prerogatives. Senator Burton, however, is reported to have declared that he would support a constitutional amendment to provide for the ratification of treaties by a simple majority of the Senate.

Mr. Morgenthau, Secretary of the Treasury, reported last week that new dimes bearing President Franklin Roosevelt's likeness would be minted as soon as possible, and would probably be ready for distribution by the end of the year. He also said that Mr. Roosevelt's portrait would be used on one of the war bonds for the eighth war loan.

LATIN AMERICA.

In a statement to the Press on the integration of regional and collective systems in the general system of international security, Mr. Stettinius has recalled that the discussions at Mexico City envisaged, in the Act of Chapultepec, the conclusion of an inter-American Treaty. After the close of the San Francisco Conference, it was the intention of the United States Government to invite the other American Governments to undertake in the near future the negotiation of a treaty which " would be consistent with the charter of the world organisation and would support and strengthen that organisation, while at the same time advancing the development of the historic system of inter-American co-operation."

According to broadcast reports, the Brazilian Acting Foreign Minister has declared this to be one of the most far-reaching developments of the Conference; he added that the treaty would be signed before the end of the year. The compromise on the regional issue is described under " United Nations."

In Argentina, the Minister of the Interior has made a statement on the Government's attitude to a return to " institutional normality." Declaring that the Government had decided to begin the restoration of this long-promised and much-desired state of grace, Admiral Teisaire said that the following stages must be completed : the cancellation of the decree prohibiting political activities, approval of the charter for political parties and the creation of an electoral law, the organisation of the parties, the definitive preparation of voting lists, arrangements for elections, and finally elections. Admiral Teisaire also referred to the freedom of the Press and the release of political prisoners, " as things went on " —it would, however, be as well to maintain the state of siege while the country was at war. It is impossible not to question the sincerity of this statement, and it is notable that there is still no reference to a date at which elections will be held, while the liberty of the individual and of the Press remains subject to constant interference by the police.

At least a partial motive for this new manœuvre may be found in the record level of unpopularity which the Argentine Government has achieved for itself. The official attitude towards popular demonstrations, the encouragement of police repression, and the maladroitness of Colonel Perón's efforts at social legislation have bred an abundance of critics, who, however, appear to be unwilling to expose themselves to the Army and police, while complaining that the régime has been saved by recognition. Much of the Army is anxious to retain its privileged position, and though there are some soldiers who may be sensitive to civilian discontent and dislike, at the moment there appears little likelihood that the civilians by themselves will be able to eject the existing régime.

Sr. Ghioldi, the Secretary of the Socialist Party, is apparently to be sent to a convict settlement, though the Government did not implicate him in the recent " plot." The Interventor of Córdoba, reported in last week's Summary to have prophesied early elections, has resigned " for reasons of health "; three of his ministers, their under-secretaries and the chief of police appear to have shared in this sudden indisposition.

In Brazil, the newly-founded Social Democratic Party is reported to support General Dutra—its name may well add to the confusion of the situation. The death is reported of Sr. Armando Salles de Oliveira, former Governor of São Paulo, and in 1937 a candidate for the Presidency.

In Chile President Ríos has at length formed a Cabinet. It is apparently based on the Radical Party without Liberals, but with representatives of some of the smaller parties. The final representation in the new Chamber appears to be 74 for the Left-wing parties, and 71 for the Right : the new Cabinet cannot rely on a majority, and the temperature of Chilean political life is hardly likely to be lessened during the forthcoming session.

The Presidents of Guatemala and El Salvador are reported to have met at San Cristóbal in order, according to the Press, to exchange views about the federation of their countries : they are reported to have agreed to this in principle as a first step towards the establishment of a Central American Union.

UNITED NATIONS.

At San Francisco, the Committee dealing with trusteeship has had before it a working draft prepared by the United States in consultation with the United Kingdom. In the discussion on this draft Lord Cranborne pointed out that the adoption of " independence " as an aim for the administration of all dependent territories as proposed by China and the U.S.S.R.) would be unsuitable, and indeed harmful, to many dependent territories. The United Kingdom and the United States are, however, considering a formula whereby areas placed under the trusteeship arrangements of the new organisation should be assisted to attain " self-government or independence, according to the varying circumstances in each territory." Lord Cranborne also made a vigorous defence of the view that the imposition on dependent territories of the " open door " for immigrants and goods from all nations without discrimination might operate against the interests of the inhabitants of these territories, adding the strong point that no independent State would accept such an " open-door " policy for its own metropolitan territory.

On the regional security issue good progress was made. The desire of the Latin American States for a special mention in the Charter of their regional security plan (provided for in the Act of Chapultepec) had been damped by the discovery that this proposal was leading the Arab States to make similar demands for their regional security arrangements. Press reports during the past ten days that the five Great Powers had agreed on a solution for this problem were premature; but the U.S.S.R. has now accepted, with only minor amendments, the solution agreed on between the United States and the Latin American States and subsequently accepted by the United Kingdom, France and China. The proposal as finally agreed is that the Charter shall not impair the right of individual or collective self-defence, if a member State is subject to armed attack, until the Security Council has taken measures to maintain peace. Such individual or collective action would have to be reported to the Council at once and the Council would retain its right to take any subsequent action it might deem necessary.

The Committee dealing with the structure of the Security Council has agreed that France should have a permanent seat on it (the words " in due course " in the Dumbarton Oaks plan being now omitted).

Discussion in Committee has begun on the " Great Power veto " in the Security Council. The smaller Powers, which dislike the veto, are likely to try to have its operation limited to cases of enforcement action, and to ensure that it should not be used to block other types of action, e.g., amendment of the Charter, investigation of a dispute, or recommendation for its settlement by the Security Council. There is also a move to secure that no State will be called on by the Council to provide armed forces for enforcement action unless it has participated in the discussions on the Council leading to such action.

The Committee dealing with Economic and Social Co-operation has proposed to add to the "purposes" of the organisation in this field specified in the Dumbarton Oaks plan "the promotion of higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development."

The United Kingdom has proposed amendments to Section A of the Dumbarton Oaks plan which would mention the International Labour Organisation as a body to be associated, by special arrangements, with the economic and social work of the new organisation. The United States delegate on the Committee, while paying a high tribute to the work of the I.L.O., opposed this special mention of it, as did also the Soviet delegate, who said that the I.L.O. did not represent the workers of the U.S.S.R. The question was referred back for informal negotiations.

One important result of the Conference has been the explosion of the belief that representation of the Dominions there (or, indeed, on international organisations generally) meant "six votes for Britain." On almost every issue so far raised at the Conference, one or other Dominion has taken an independent line. Support of Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia for the U.S.S.R. has been more regular than support of the Dominions for the United Kingdom. In any case the six votes which might conceivably have supported a United Kingdom proposal or the five (counting the Ukraine and White Russia) which may be expected to support a Soviet proposal could not in themselves swing a Conference decision. In fact, the only delegations which have acted as a bloc at San Francisco have been those of the Latin American States; and, under the two-thirds rule, their twenty votes could block any decision by a plenary session of the Conference. Moreover, if the two-thirds rule proposed at Dumbarton Oaks for important Assembly decisions goes into the Charter, these same States will have a similar blocking power in the Assembly of the new organisation. Thus the "Great Power veto" is not the only kind of veto which may raise problems in world organisation.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

THE outstanding event of the past week has been the arrest of several hundred German personalities in the region of Flensburg. These include both military and civilian officials, members of the German High Command and the political colleagues of Dönitz. The Grand Admiral himself, Jodl, the Chief of Staff, Speer and Schwerin Krosigk are now held as prisoners. Thus ends an episode in German history as remarkable as it was brief. For just over three weeks Dönitz was able to proclaim himself Hitler's successor and Head of the German State. Whatever may be thought either of his pretensions or of the politicians whom he brought into partnership with him, there can be little doubt of his usefulness to the Allies in tiding over a most difficult transitional period. The unexpectedly rapid surrender of masses of troops and the general disruption of the means of communication throughout the Reich (as described in this Summary last week) made it imperative for the Allied Command to ward off even greater chaos by ensuring that orders were effectively given and rapidly obeyed. The obvious way to achieve this end was to use the chain of command already existent in the Reich. The end was achieved and the arrest of Dönitz and his officials has now put an end to idle talk about possible "recognition" of a Nazi German Government. But it should perhaps be put on record here that these arrests create a situation which may be called unique in modern European history, in that one of the great sovereign States of Europe is without any Government whatever as a result of military defeat. Germany is not annexed to, nor ruled by, a Foreign Power. The Reich is under the military control of the Allied Powers, but apart from this control there is no central civil authority in Germany. A political vacuum exists which will have to be filled.

The little brief authority which the Grand Admiral enjoyed may now therefore be reviewed in perspective. He assumed power on the 1st May, and claimed that he had been appointed on the previous day by Hitler as his successor. The claim received no very wide recognition and, indeed, the breakdown of communication throughout Germany made such recognition technically very difficult. Of the messages of German Commanders published by the two or three transmitters of north and south Germany, only two contained an outspoken adherence to Dönitz. K. H. Frank, Senior S.S. Leader in the Protectorate, said: "The oath of allegiance which we gave to the Führer from now on holds good for every German in regard to Grand Admiral Dönitz. We shall support and obey him." Friedeburg, the new Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, declared a very natural loyalty to his predecessor. But it was remarkable that such Commanders as Lindemann, Boehme and Busch issued no special assurances of the same kind.

The political activity of the Grand Admiral was neither spectacular nor far-reaching. His aim, he said, was to secure "tolerable living-conditions" for the people. In a broadcast of the 8th he urged them to face facts squarely and to realise that the foundations of the Reich had collapsed, and he warned them that it rested with the Occupying Powers whether he would be allowed to continue his functions. These, as far as publicly announced, amounted to little more than issuing orders for what a colleague termed "the winding-up of military tasks" and appointing a few essential collaborators. The first of these was Schwerin-Krosigk, whom Dönitz on the 2nd May transferred from the Finance Ministry to that of Foreign Affairs. The other appointments were not made public in Germany. The B.B.C. announced on the 14th that four members of Hitler's Government had been invited by Dönitz to form a "cabinet of experts." These were Speer (Armament Production), Backe (Food), Dorpmüller (Transport), and Seldte (Labour). The quartette is interesting and would seem to represent an attempt to continue essential services by safeguarding repairs, communications and food distribution, and at the same time to placate the Allies by the choice of "respectable" Germans. None of the four have been overtly concerned with atrocities; Speer and Backe are technical experts even more than Party men. The other two are pre-Hitlerian figures, Dorpmüller a civil servant, and Seldte a Stahlhelm leader. The political colour of such a Cabinet, apart from its head, could be claimed to be more Nationalist than Nazi, the brand of nationalism being not unlike that of the Papen Cabinet of 1932.

The dissolution of the Nazi hierarchy has been so rapid that all of Hitler's chief collaborators would now seem to be accounted for, with the exception of Ribbentrop. The most dramatic disappearance has been that of Himmler, who was arrested whilst trying to cross a bridge at Bremervoerde (between Wesermünde and Hamburg), by sentries of the British Second Army on the 21st May and who, during examination, succeeded in committing suicide by biting on a tube of poison concealed in his mouth. Thus ends, at the age of 44, the career of one who appeared to have outdistanced all his fellows in the race for power. He became head of the S.S. and master of the police forces of Germany, and developed the military formations of the S.S. (Waffen S.S.) on a lavish scale. Since 1943 he has been Minister of the Interior and in 1944 was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the German Home Army. He even commanded an army group on the eastern front. In the last weeks before the German collapse it was he who offered unconditional surrender to the Western Allies. No man bore a heavier responsibility than he for the atrocities committed in the concentration camps. He was the prototype of the fanatical Nazi, reported to be completely loyal to Hitler and to no one else, passionately concerned with the preservation and expansion of the Master Race, in whose service he created his ruthless machinery of espionage and torture. He was in some things as credulous as in others he was crafty; there is evidence that he believed the wildest stories of "V" damage in England.

Among other Nazis who have this week chosen the same end have been Friedeburg, the new head of the Navy, and von Greim, Göring's successor as Commander of the Luftwaffe. One of Himmler's chief adjutants in the SS, Werner Best, who since October 1942 has been Plenipotentiary of the Reich in Denmark, has been arrested in Copenhagen, together with important members of his staff. Among the recently captured are Forster, Gauleiter of Danzig, and the notorious Streicher. Among prominent Germans discovered in a concentration camp at Dobbiaco, just south of the Austro-Italian frontier, are Schacht, Niemöller, Thyssen, Generals Halder and Falkenhausen, and members of the families of Gördeler and Stauffenberg.

Information is now available concerning areas of the Reich under Russian occupation. The city of Berlin, so far administered by a military governor, has since the 21st May had a German Lord Mayor, Arthur Werner, an architect. His first assistant, Karl Maron, is said to be a metal worker. Health is looked after by the famous surgeon Sauerbruch, once a member of Niemöller's congregation in Dahlem. Andreas Hermes, a former Reich Minister belonging to the Centre Party, is in charge of food policy and a Social Democrat, and Protestant clergyman, Fritz Buchholz, has been appointed to advise on church matters. The first issues of a new Berliner Zeitung have appeared. The Russians have apparently been energetic in their endeavour to restore normal life to the city. A high Russian official described on his return to Moscow the appalling conditions regarding food and housing which were still to be found in Berlin as in other German towns. Russian treatment of civilians in Germany would seem to have become much more considerate since the last furious days of fighting. Whereas the town of Insterburg in East Prussia is said to have been sacked and burnt, Dresden has by contrast received supplies of food and materials for essential reconstruction; peasants are reported to be free to sell their produce in the open market and trade in consumption goods has been restarted. The lavish issue of occupation marks, which have in many cases penetrated to the American zone, is one among several indications that joint control of the volume of money in the Reich is an urgent necessity.

An interview given by Pastor Niemöller to Dorothy Thompson (printed in the Observer, 20th May) stands in sharp contrast to the remarks of Count von Galen quoted in this Summary recently (No. 293). The pastor painted a dark picture of the condition of his country. Germany, he said, was entirely adrift; there was nothing which had not been corrupted and compromised under Hitler. The only positive force which he discerned was an "unassuaged spiritual hunger after righteousness and truth." He prayed for a common programme of the administering Powers; any system suppressing personal conscience would bear too great a resemblance to Nazism. He thought it essential that western civilisation and Russian Communism should reconcile their systems and learn from each other. He seemed to contemplate for himself no other future than returning to preach the Gospel to his own people.

AUSTRIA.

Arrangements are now being made for British, United States and probably French representatives to visit Vienna in order to gain information upon which they can advise their Governments on the demarcation of the respective zones of occupation there. It is hoped that, as a result of these visits, outstanding questions before the European Advisory Council relating to the occupation and control of Austria will be settled.

During the past week the Government of Marshal Tito has withdrawn its troops from Carinthia, though claims to the areas previously occupied are still being vigorously made by Belgrade Radio (see under "Yugoslavia"). It also appears that Yugoslav forces have moved into parts of Styria now occupied by the Russians but provisionally allocated to the British zone of occupation. From "Station Austria" in the area occupied by the Russians the death by suicide of Jury, Gauleiter of Lower Austria, together with some of his intimate friends, was announced by a Herr Siegel, described as a Secretary of State but probably one of the Under-Secretaries of State, whose names have not yet all been officially given. From the same source also came an account of a visit by Dr. Renner, head of the Provisional Government, to Graz, where he addressed a meeting of officials of the Styrian provisional provincial administration. He laid particular emphasis in his speech on the critical food situation, which "caused the Government the most serious anxiety," but he also spoke of the other serious economic problems of Austria and explained the constitutional and anti-Nazi legislation already passed by the Provisional Government. Landeshauptmann Machold, head of the Styrian provisional administration, and his colleagues, promised to do all in their power to assist the plans of the Provisional Government.

Some remarkably optimistic reports on conditions in Vienna have been made by the Austrian radio stations under Russian control. The resumption of some train and postal services has been announced; it is also stated that electricity from Styrian water-power installations is soon to be available for Vienna; that assistance is being given by the Russians to the maintenance of rations for the population; that the Vienna District Health Insurance scheme has resumed its activities; and that a considerable number of Viennese theatres would give performances on Sunday, the 27th May. But one report, made by persons who have recently left the city, suggests that conditions may be much more difficult than could be gathered from the broadcasts. It says that the food situation is catastrophic, that the city is without gas, and that the Russians have requisitioned all transport.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The occasion of President Beneš's 61st birthday on the 28th May was celebrated by a performance of Smetana's opera "Libuše" in the Prague National Theatre. Both the opera and the theatre are symbolic of the national and cultural struggle of the Czechs, and the performance was preceded by appreciations of the work of the President. The Ministers of Defence and Education both praised the sober, statesmanlike qualities of Dr. Beneš, and following the now familiar line of all ministerial utterances, referred to the friendship with Russia, the all-Slav policy and the federal nature of the Republic. Criticisms of the new orientation of Czechoslovak foreign policy led M. Masaryk in a press statement to refute charges of Sovietisation. M. Fierlinger, discussing the 1943 Pact with U.S.S.R., showed awareness of the same criticisms, when he declared "this pact and our friendship with all other Slav nations must not encroach on our friendly and cordial relations with the other democratic States"—and an admonitory note, "It will, however, be necessary for certain remaining prejudices in the West with regard to the Soviet Union to be swept away."

On the 24th and 25th, President Beneš sent telegrams of greeting and thanks to the Heads of State of the major Allies, the Balkan countries, Holland and Norway. On the 23rd Paris Radio announced the departure of a French diplomatic mission for Prague.

One of the claims made by the Czechs in 1919 and dismissed by the Supreme Council—the recognition of a special status for Lusatia—has made an interesting re-emergence. Prague Radio, in broadcasts on the 24th, 25th and 26th, announced that a National Committee of Lusatian Wends had arrived in Prague, that this Committee had appealed to Stalin and the Allies, and had requested incorporation in Czechoslovakia. The Wends were urged to resume cultural activities, and proclaim their Slav character to the occupying forces. This small and scattered minority, numbering barely 100,000, speaks a language closely related to Czech, and inhabits localities in Prussia and Saxony. At any rate, before the rise of Hitler, the Wendic tongue was certainly spoken in this area, but the Slavs had suffered from century-old and almost overwhelming Germanisation. The Czechs probably regard this minority now as a means of bargaining over the proposals to expel Sudeten Germans. The instructions in Wendic, "Prague calling Bautzen," were couched in such terms, however, as to convey the idea of a territorial claim rather than a mere exchange of population.

By a ruling of the Ministry of the Interior, the term "Sudeten" is to be replaced by "Border Regions." This is a further development in the plan to liquidate the minorities. Czech schools have been reopened, and Czechoslovak troops, from the Soviet front, reinforced by reservists, are steadily occupying these regions. The district of Ceské Velenice (opposite the Austrian town of Gmünd) incorporated in 1920 and detached by the Munich Agreement, has been reoccupied by the army. Czech National Committees are to take over theatres, and Czech staffs are to be appointed to run the large hotel industries of the cities and spas of N. and W. Bohemia. The Ministry of Agriculture is to send special commissions into Sudetenland to advise the Committees on the problem of colonisation and confiscation of property occupied by Germans and collaborators.

Meanwhile, the work of general reconstruction goes on. The most urgent concerns of the Government, apart from questions of repatriation and medical aid for the Terezin concentration camp, are the restoration of transport and communication, and the organisation of food distribution and production. The Minister of Industry, M. Lausman, declared on the 22nd, that 60 per cent. to 70 per cent. of all industry, particularly the heavy branches, and all banks, were to be brought under the national administration. This nationalisation of resources is closely connected with the policy of confiscation as applied to the minorities and collaborators.

POLAND.

In a statement issued on the 22nd May the Polish Government in London dealt with certain points in Marshal Stalin's letter to the Moscow correspondent of The Times. There could be no doubt, they claimed, that the arrested Poles had been invited by the Soviet authorities for the negotiations, and had received assurances of personal safety; the Polish Government possessed the text of Colonel Pimenov's letter extending the invitation on behalf of Colonel-General Ivanov. In the course of the introductory conversations, it was added, Vice-Premier Jankowski had asked where lay the boundary line between the competence of the Lublin Committee and that of the Red army, and had received from Colonel Pimenov the reply that the committee must comply with the directions it received from the command of the 1st White Russian Front.

On the 28th May General Bor-Komorowski assumed the functions of Commander-in-Chief of the Polish Armed Forces, which had originally been assigned to him in September 1944, but which, during his absence, were at first shared by the President, the Minister of National Defence and the Chief-of-Staff, and later (in February 1945) taken over by General Anders as Acting Commander-in-Chief. In an interview with press representatives in London on the 18th May, General Bor-Komorowski said it was still his hope that Poland and Russia would work together in friendship. The Warsaw rising had been arranged to synchronise with the Russian advance, but he himself did not believe there was any other reason for their withdrawal on the east than the sharp German counter-attack which forced them to yield ground. Of the arrested Polish leaders, General Bor said that they were with him in Warsaw, and that he could testify to their being good democrats, patriotic, and thoroughly loyal to the Allies. He added that the future of the armed forces who had been fighting for the western allies was a matter to be decided by the Polish Government.

It is reported from Sweden that a commission of three, including a representative of the Swedish Foreign Office, will leave shortly for Warsaw to investigate the possibilities of importing Polish coal to Sweden; rumours of a Swedish offer to help in the reconstruction of Danzig harbour in return for coal deliveries have been described by the Swedish Foreign Office as premature. According to a recent Lublin broadcast report, on the other hand, to meet the Baltic countries' interest in the possibilities of importing Polish coal, the Central Maritime Office in Danzig has sent a special commission to Kolberg to report on the harbour's present condition.

Following a recent démenti by Polpress of reports that U.N.R.R.A. cargoes destined for Poland had been kept back unloaded at Constanza, it was announced on the 26th May that the fourth vessel carrying such supplies had arrived in that port, and was being unloaded immediately; one or two railway transports laden with U.N.R.R.A. cargo were leaving daily for Poland, and 500 railway trucks in all had so far been despatched.

A "Ministry of National Reconstruction" under Professor Michal Kaczorowski (stated to be a member of the Socialist Party) has been set up by a decree of the "Provisional Government" dated the 24th May. (For Soviet press comment on Polish questions see under "The Soviet Union").

SOVIET UNION.

On the 24th May the Soviet Government gave a reception in honour of Red army officers, at which among many other toasts Marshal Stalin proposed that of M. Molotov. "A good foreign policy," he said, "sometimes weighs more than two or three armies at the front." The only foreigners reported as present were a Polish miners' delegation now visiting Moscow; in their honour M. Molotov drank to friendly relations between the U.S.S.R. and Poland. Marshal Stalin proposed a toast to the Soviet people, and especially the Russian people. In 1941–42, he said, "our Government made not a few mistakes, and we experienced desperate moments. . . . . A different people could have said to the Government: 'You have failed to justify our expectations, go away, we shall install another Government which will conclude peace with Germany and assure us a quiet life.'" Not so the Russian people, whose confidence in the Soviet Government "proved to be the decisive force which ensured the historic victory over the enemy of humanity—over fascism."

Soviet publicists in San Francisco and Moscow have in the past week been sharply on the defensive in regard to Soviet aims in general and Soviet foreign policy and Soviet "democracy" in particular. The tone of laudatory self-righteousness which marks these articles suggests that recent speculation about Soviet policy in the British and American press has caused considerable irritation. M. Zaslavsky, writing in Pravda on the 26th May, attacked those British journalists (and especially the Yorkshire Post) who contrast "eastern" and "western" methods in diplomacy. "Before the war," M. Zaslavsky recalled, "the predominant 'western method' of British foreign policy consisted in setting whole West European world against the Soviet Union" and led up to Munich; this was, however, followed by the later "western method" of the Anglo-Soviet alliance. To which "western method" did the Yorkshire Post refer? M. Zaslavsky then went on to deny that the U.S.S.R. was acting unilaterally in, for instance, Poland and Austria. On the contrary, the Red army was acting in full conformity with the decisions of the Crimea Conference in destroying Fascist institutions in the countries which it liberated. Thereupon "democratic parties and groups which during the occupation waged an underground struggle against the Germans emerge into open political life; . . . . wherever the military situation permits, the Red Army turns over the administration to the liberated peoples themselves." "Soviet foreign policy is clear, logical and consistent," claimed Pravda's International Observer. The same article quoted Mr. H. G. Wells's letter in the Daily Worker "unmasking the new provocative campaign of reactionary elements. . . . and a systematic whispering campaign that the next war will be Anglo-American against Russia."

M. Zhukov (Izvestiya's special correspondent in San Francisco) described the freedom of the Anglo-American press as largely mythical in a message broadcast from Moscow in English. He declared that British and American newspapermen often pass trenchant and objective judgments on the principal problems connected with the United Nations' Conference—"but they never wrote in the same spirit and said in advance that they wouldn't." In another despatch M. Zhukov declared that "alarming rumours had crept into the press that there may be a serious change in British foreign policy in general." He hinted at the dangers that had been created at San Francisco by "talk about blocs" and that the Crimea decisions might be blasted by an accidental majority composed largely of small Powers.

The press conferences given on the 14th May by the representatives of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Republics at San Francisco, MM. Manuilsky and Kiselev, are of some interest. M. Manuilsky, whose utterances carry weight as he is not merely People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Ukraine but a member of the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party, insisted strongly on the loose federal nature of the U.S.S.R., maintaining that the Ukraine did not exercise its right to secede merely owing to the economic, political and strategic advantages deriving from union with the Great-Russian people. M. Manuilsky anticipated an extended development of the Ukraine's diplomatic and consular relations with other countries, including, of course, the United States, stating that the initiative for the opening of such relations should come from both sides. In reply to a question, he affirmed that all the sixteen Soviet Republics would seek individual membership in the new world organisation. On the subject of trade M. Manuilsky stated that the Ukraine intended to export only raw materials and not industrial goods, adding that so far the Ukraine preferred to conduct its foreign trade jointly with the other Soviet Republics. M. Kiselev's statement on the position of Byelorussia was on the same lines and contained no special point of interest. Both statements affirmed the desire of the two republics to maintain friendly relations with Poland, M. Manuilsky repeating the familiar Soviet pronouncements on the need for a strong Poland as a neighbour of the U.S.S.R. He laid great stress on the fact that Poland's economy, based on private property and private initiative, was no bar to her co-operating with States with a different social structure. Such a collaboration between differing systems had proved most fruitful in the case of Great Britain and the U.S.S.R. M. Manuilsky defended the Ukraine's need for a friendly Poland on the analogy of the desire of Great Britain and the United States not to have hostile neighbours. If Britain did not wish Antwerp to be a pistol pointed at her heart, the Ukraine was equally justified in not wanting Cracow to be a pistol pointed at "the ancient Ukrainian city of Lvov."

Marshal Stalin's statement on Poland recorded in last week's Summary has been followed by a fresh outcrop of prolific comment on the Polish situation in the Soviet press, the Government in exile and its adherents in Poland being denounced for the organisation of sabotage and murders inside the country. The activities of the Warsaw Government were analysed in an article in The War and question of a Communist system being inaugurated in Poland, and that private capital and private initiative were being encouraged. According to the article, medium and small enterprises, which had been taken over by the Government in the early stages of liberation, were already being handed back to their owners. Stress was also laid on the free development of the different political parties, and the article concluded that it was absurd to imagine, in view of all these developments, that the fate of Poland could be decided without the Polish people. Krasnaya Zvezda (24th May) expressed grave concern at the proposed reorganisation of the Polish Government (sic) in London to convert it into a "strong 'Fight Russia' team," and at the plans on foot for the future disposal of the Polish army abroad. The British and American press was quoted to the effect that this army, now some 300,000 strong with the addition of the Poles who had been mobilised into the German army, was to be transferred to north-western Germany on the pretext of helping in the occupation. "The plan to concentrate a 300,000 strong army of Poles with an anti-Soviet outlook on German territory not far from the Soviet occupation troops should put on their guard all who value the cause of peace and the freedom of the peoples." General Bor-Komarowski's interview to the press in London was treated with considerable sarcasm in Izvestiya (23rd May). One of the most interesting facts that emerged from the interview, according to Izvestiya, was that the Hitlerite Gauleiter, on General Bor's own admission, had so easily contacted the leaders of the "Polish Underground." Many British, according to Izvestiya, were at last beginning to understand with what "petty provocateurs and dirty adventurers" thy had to deal, but the article ended on a wistful note of "How long, O Lord, how long?"

The first comment in the Soviet press on the Trieste situation has appeared in the form of a historical survey of the problem by Professor Zvavich in Krasnaya Zvezda (26th May). The Professor, after contending that Trieste should have gone to the new Yugoslav State at the end of the first World War, maintained that the act of those who signed the secret Treaty of London in 1915 assigning it to Italy was prompted by the fear of a Slav bloc stretching from Vladivostok to Fiume—the first step to world conquest by the "Scythians," as Harold Nicolson had put it. The subsequent acceptance of Italian aggression in Fiume was "the original sin of those who stood in superstitious fear of the Scythians." After describing Trieste and Istria as a whole as an armed camp of fascism right up to 1945, Professor Zvavich affirmed that Marshal Tito's forces alone had liberated the area and were therefore entitled to occupy it, though the Yugoslav Government was quite ready to discuss the problem of Trieste at the Peace Conference. The same points were made by M. Viktorov in a Pravda article (26th May) deploring the "unexpected and provocative treatment" of the Trieste question in many American and British papers, which merely served to fan suspicions and prevent the development of collaboration between Italy and Yugoslavia. Such a noisy press campaign, according to M. Viktorov, was apparently meant to make up for the absence of weighty arguments against "Yugoslavia's realisation of her legitimate rights, won in heroic struggle."

The new Yugoslav Ambassador to the Soviet Union, M. Popovic, presented his credentials to M. Shvernik, vice-chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., on the 24th May.

Sweden has become a target for Soviet propaganda during the past week, in the form of a concerted attack on certain sections of the Swedish press for their failure to share in the general jubilation over the defeat of Hitlerite Germany, and for their anti-Soviet attitude. Izvestiya (25th May) particularly criticised Swedish suspicions about the Russian occupation of Bornholm, and also the "slanderous" reports put out in the Stockholm press to the effect that Soviet troops had wrecked and plundered the building of the Swedish Legation in Budapest. The Red army had, in fact, rendered every assistance to members of that Legation. Complaints of the cavalier treatment accorded in Sweden to Russian officers who had crossed over from Norway compared to the lavish reception given to Germans in similar case were published by Tass (27th May) in the form of quotations from the Swedish paper Expressen. On the following day Pravda came out with a vigorous article roundly trouncing the Swedes for having systematically violated their neutrality in Germany's favour during the war, and for keeping up a pro-German and anti-Soviet policy even now that hostilities had ceased. The article admitted that there were other circles in Sweden which did desire friendly relations with the U.S.S.R., and insisted that the vital interests of the Soviet and Swedish people in fact coincided.

One of the most distinguished scientists of the Soviet Union, Academician Alexander Fersman, died on the 20th May after a long illness. M. Fersman had received many high scientific awards both in the Soviet Union and abroad, and was awarded the Wollaston Medal by British geologists in 1943. After the Revolution he took an active part in the Commission for Studying the Natural Resources of Russia and in establishing new research institutions. His personal research work in mineralogy and geo-chemistry has contributed very largely to the development of the Kola peninsula, the Urals and Central Asia.

SCANDINAVIA.

The Soviet Government has renewed diplomatic relations with Denmark and has accepted the appointment of M. Dössing as Minister. The fact was reported in the Russian press on the 22nd May.

On the 23rd May the Soviet representatives on the island of Bornholm issued a written statement on the position. This recognises Bornholm as a part of Denmark, and states that the Russian occupation was merely due to the fact that the island lies behind the Russian zone of occupation in Germany. The occupation is stated to be temporary, "until questions pending in Germany in connexion with the war have been settled." The Danish Administration and the normal life of the population are not to be interfered with.

In response to an order to disband 80 per cent. of the armed forces of the Danish Resistance Movement by the 1st June, a number of the military groups in this movement forwarded, on the 23rd May, a resolution to the Government demanding an effective purge of the Officers' Corps and of those who had collaborated with the Germans in other branches of public life, with severe punishment for traitors. Until such a purge had taken place, the Freedom Fighters considered disbandment to be premature.

Any charge of slackness in dealing with collaborators appears, however, to be ill-founded. It was stated on the Danish radio on the 27th May that more than 12,000 arrests had been made since the date of liberation, and that in Copenhagen alone arrests had amounted on an average to a hundred a day.

In Finland the Central Committee of the Social Democrat Opposition has sent a circular to Finnish workers announcing its decision to join the Democratic League, in further pursuit of the policy adopted for the election. It claims, however, that this does not involve its severance from the Social Democratic Party, in spite of the formal expulsion of these secessionists by the party council at the time of the election. On the 20th May the amalgamation was welcomed at a meeting of the enlarged Council of the League. It is claimed that this step will result in the allocation of four or five seats on the Council of the League to the Social Democratic element. In an article in his paper Vapaa Pohjola on the 24th May M. Keto, a leading spirit in the group, explains further that the reason for advising members of the Opposition not to resign from the Social Democrats is that otherwise the property of the branches would revert to the party. He hopes that the effect of the policy adopted may be "gradually and painlessly" to subject the Social Democrat Party to the influence of the Democratic League.

On the 22nd May it was announced that the chairman of the Finnish Communist Party, Aimo Aaltonen, had been appointed deputy head of the State police. His chief, Dr. Brusiin, has no known political affiliations, but was the president of the Committee of Investigation into the former activities of the State police, and owed his appointment to the Communist Minister Leino.

A certain number of hints have appeared in the press of the Left in Finland as to the desirability of a pact of friendship and mutual assistance between Finland and the Soviet Union, on the lines of those concluded with some other countries. The prevalent opinion seems, however, to be that expressed by Ilta Sanomat, to the effect that Finland is not in a position to conclude such a treaty at present, and that the proposal would not be entertained by the Soviet Union until the armistice had been superseded by a definitive peace and normal relations re-established.

A speech by M. Hansson, the Swedish Prime Minister, at Karlskrona on Whit-Sunday, foreshadowed the probable dissolution of the existing political coalition in Sweden at an early date. He asked the parties concerned to discuss the question, in view of the contemplated resignation of the present Government in the autumn. In the circumstances, expectations are entertained that a purely Social Democrat administration will come to power.

The Norwegian Government left London for Norway on Sunday, the 27th May. The King is expected to follow somewhat later.

The Norwegian Trade Union Secretariat has taken the initiative in a move to secure a union of the Communists and other elements in Norwegian labour in a single Labour Party. The boards of the Labour Party and the Communist Party have been invited to appoint three representatives each, to start negotiations for that purpose. The Communist Party has promised to take immediate steps to discuss the question internally.

The preliminary examination of Quisling, in preparation for his trial, began on Saturday, the 26th May.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Some interesting observations on political trends in the Netherlands have been made by a Dutch journalist. He holds that it will not be easy to constitute the new Cabinet and that, when constituted, it is unlikely to last much longer than two months. He adds that most people hope that at least one Communist will be included in the Cabinet "as a matter of practical politics . . . . though communism is not widely spread. Very few red flags or Stalin slogans can be seen anywhere, even in the working-class districts of Rotterdam or Amsterdam." It is of some significance that he notes that "no single figure has appeared on the Dutch political stage since the liberation who is universally proclaimed as a future Prime Minister. The political aspect of the illegal movement is also confused. They were definitely united in Resistance. Now that Resistance is over, there is not necessarily political unity among them."

The distribution of food in the recently liberated parts of the Netherlands is rapidly improving, but coal is still desperately scarce and, until transport has improved, the maintenance of food supplies and the provision of adequate coal supplies will be extremely difficult. Fortunately, the arrangements made for the feeding of those suffering from the worst effects of starvation are working well. Several teams are engaged in administering special treatment to such cases. Sir Jack Drummond, a distinguished nutritional expert, has declared after a visit to the Netherlands that such aid is most necessary. "Reports," he says, "of a large number of deaths in the western Dutch towns from starvation are quite correct. We saw hundreds of people of both sexes and all ages as emaciated from starvation as any we had seen at Belsen concentration camp."

The fact that malnutrition and actual starvation have seriously, if temporarily, reduced the working capacity of many Dutchmen should be borne in mind when estimating the difficulties which will attend reconstruction in the Netherlands. Some particulars of another aspect of these difficulties have just been given by the Finance Minister. At the end of 1944 the national debt amounted to more than 12·5 milliard guilders. The Netherlands Bank has a claim in reichsmarks valued at 4–5 milliard guilders.

M. van Acker's strong measures against strikes (see last Summary) have achieved a considerable initial success. Most of the Belgian miners are reported to be back at work.

On the 26th Radio Brussels broadcast a medical bulletin, signed on the 24th by two doctors who were attending King Leopold, which ran as follows: "The King's health has improved and continues to progress favourably."

FRANCE.

On the 25th May Field-Marshal Montgomery was invested by General de Gaulle with the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour in the Cour d'Honneur of the Invalides. He was entertained to lunch at the Ministry of War, when General de Gaulle paid a glowing tribute to him and "the glorious British Armies," and emphasised the bonds between "our two old and noble countries." In the afternoon he opened the British Army Exhibition and was received by M. le Troquer at the Hôtel de Ville.

Recent developments in the Levant have been the subject of Anglo-French diplomatic exchanges on the spot and in Paris, of press and wireless comment and of official statements. The French have made much of an unfortunate incident which took place on VE + 1 Day but has not been reported in the British press, when some 200 men of the 16th Arab Battalion of the Palestine Regiment took part in demonstrations in the Lebanon and paraded a portrait of the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, and damage was done to a French convent and other Christian establishments. Following French representations to His Majesty's representative, this unit has since been removed from the Levant; but the incident has been reported on the French wireless and was referred to by General de Gaulle in his last conversation with Mr. Duff Cooper on the 26th May.

On the following day General de Gaulle, in his speech at the anniversary ceremony of the Conseil National de la Résistance, is reported to have alluded to the differences between the French and Levant Governments; certain foreign papers, said the wireless commentator, seemed to take a delight in magnifying the episodes. That evening the French Ministry of Information (apparently replying to the Foreign Office statement issued on the 26th—see under "Middle East") announced that the French troop movements in the Levant were merely reliefs and replacements; much greater military movements had been carried out at the same time, and certainly for the same reasons, by the British authorities, who had not previously concerted them with the responsible French authorities. The French Government regretted that the Syrian and Lebanese Governments had seized this opportunity for refusing to negotiate with General Beynet, who was charged with reaching a general settlement of questions of common interest. As France had proclaimed the independence of Syria and Lebanon, as she to-day proposed settling with them the conditions guaranteeing that independence and as she had given proof of her intentions by securing their participation at San Francisco, the Syrian and Lebanese Governments had no real ground for fearing French intentions.

General de Gaulle followed up his "victory speech" to the Consultative Assembly (see last Summary) with a broadcast on the 24th May inspired by the recent wave of strikes and the public discontent at the food distribution. "Yesterday there was no national duty more important than to fight. To-day there is none more important than production." He vigorously defended the Government's policy of refusing to follow the demagogic line of "artificially increasing the fictitious incomes of all and sundry." He warned against slackness in producers and against strikes as contrary to the public interest. But reconstruction did not mean a return to the state of affairs existing before the war. He announced that before the end of 1945 three important reforms would have been made: (1) a reform of the civil service, to enable the Administration to cope with modern problems; (2) the control by the State, but "without spoliation," of the production of coal and electricity and of the distribution of credit; (3) measures to increase the population by family grants and "rational rules concerning immigration." Let Frenchmen be united, patient and hard-working.

The speech had a good press, though the Radical Dépêche de Paris regretted that the head of the Provisional Government had now "for the fourth time" buried pre-war institutions, while the Communist Humanité protested that no mention was made of an early general election, of the application of the programme of the C.N.R. and of the purge. The C.G.T., on the other hand, issued a statement welcoming reform No. 2 as a first step towards the application of the C.N.R. programme and demanded that it should be carried through at once in consultation with the C.G.T. and the C.N.R.

While strikes continue in various regions and new ones threaten, as at Nancy and Nice, negotiations have been proceeding between the Government and the C.G.T. on the question of wages. The C.G.T., in which the Communist element is now very strong, maintain that they have long warned the Government of the gravity of the food situation and at the same time stopped incipient strike movements to ensure France's wholehearted support of the war effort. The Christian Workers (C.F.T.C.) have joined with the C.G.T. in approving token strikes undertaken for "strictly professional" reasons only. The present strikes have mostly had a "token" character and have generally had a sympathetic press.

After a meeting of the Council of Ministers on the 22nd May, a communiqué was issued stating that the present level of prices and wage-rates would be maintained but that certain modifications of wages in territorial zones and of maximum wage-rates would be introduced. The C.G.T. stated in reply that the concessions made were insufficient, that it would seek support from the Consultative Assembly, and that the suppression of the black market and an equitable food distribution were equally necessary.

The serious food situation has an important inter-Allied aspect. In Paris senior French officials have made it clear to us that their loyal acquiescence in working hitherto through the Anglo-American Combined Boards and refraining from independent purchasing has produced extremely disappointing results, since even when the French have received allocations either shipping has not been forthcoming or difficulties over procurement have stultified allocation. In other cases allocations of supplies have been inadequate and in the particular case of meat nil. The French also allege that more favourable treatment has been accorded to Belgium. The state of alarm apparent in official circles in Paris has been accentuated by the estimates now available of the enormous cereal requirements of French North Africa—where undoubtedly economic hardship has contributed to the recent troubles. In general His Majesty's Embassy fear that the economic situation in France is rapidly deteriorating and that unless great efforts are made there will be serious trouble.

SWITZERLAND.

The resumption of normal relations between Switzerland and France—admittedly a matter of considerable importance to Switzerland—appears likely to be effected with the arrival in the near future of M. Karl Burckhardt to head the Swiss Legation in Paris. The appointment was made last February, but at the request of the French Government M. Burckhardt remained at the head of the International Red Cross until the duties of that organisation became less delicate and numerous.

Meanwhile, discussion has been continued in Paris on the question of the granting of French port and transit facilities to Switzerland. Agreement has been reached on many points of vital interest to Switzerland—e.g., the maximum draught of ships to be unloaded at Marseilles and other ports; the tonnage that may be unloaded daily at Toulon; the use of Marseilles by Swiss export traffic for overseas.

With the exception of a few districts telegraphic communication has also been resumed between the two countries.

Since the closing of the German Legation, the Swiss Government has carried out an intensive search of consulates, flats, houses and clubs. Investigations are still proceeding. According to a statement by M. Kobelt, chief of the Federal Military Department, German espionage in Switzerland had increased to such an extent since 1940 that there was ground for believing that an attack was being prepared against Switzerland.

Twenty-five persons, mostly former members of German Legation or Consulate staffs, whose acts had endangered the safety of Switzerland, have been expelled. Similar action is likely against some 250 more, whose cases are at present under examination.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Mopping-up operations continue in Madrid and Lisbon. The disposal of the person of Pierre Laval (which presumably forms a precedent for the case of Léon Degrelle) is still puzzling the Spaniards. His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Madrid has informed the Spanish Foreign Minister that His Majesty's Government regard the problem as a purely Franco-Spanish one, to which the obvious solution is the delivery of Laval to the French authorities without further delay. The Spanish Government are reluctant to deport Laval as an undesirable alien, alleging that extradition is not in the Franco-Spanish tradition. Certainly the rule of live and let live has been much favoured among Latin politicians. But Señor Lequerica is probably most unwilling to bestow any favours on France at the moment. Alternative solutions appear to be to put Laval and his party into a plane with orders to fly back where they came from (a scheme which might be baulked by the pilot's refusal to take off), or the provision of a Spanish pilot for the same purpose.

Meanwhile, most of the German schools in Spain are now reported to be closed, and arrangements are being made in Madrid and Lisbon for the examination of the contents of the German Embassy and Legation.

No such sign of post-war mopping-up has been given by General Franco, who, speaking at Valladolid, the birthplace of Falange, on the 20th May, referred in traditional style to the unity of the armed forces and the movement, and roundly denounced the absence of progress which characterised pre-Franco Spain. E.F.E., the Spanish Press agency, complacently reported that the American Press had "emphasised in their headlines the Caudillo's devotion to the Falange"—thus wilfully misreading the American Press's pronounced dislike for that institution.

Dr. Salazar's address to the National Assembly (briefly referred to in last week's Summary) contained a defence of Portugal's policy of neutrality and an explanation of her loyalty to the Anglo-Portuguese Alliance. In post-war affairs Dr. Salazar reverted to his favourite theme of the overriding importance of the Atlantic basin—a western European bloc looking towards and supported by the Americas and Africa. Like General Franco, he attacked the opponents of his régime, and left no doubt that he was determined not to allow them to unseat him. Finally, he referred to proposals for a moderate constitutional reform which was to be presented for the consideration of the Chamber. He envisaged the granting of increased legislative functions to the Assembly and Corporative Chamber, and hinted that elections might follow.

TANGIER.

It will be recalled that on the night of the 13th–14th June, 1940, Spanish Moroccan troops entered Tangier and took control of the International Zone. On the 14th June the Spanish Consul-General informed the foreign representatives that Spain had occupied Tangier for the sole purpose of defending the neutrality of the Zone, which was threatened by events in Europe. The Commander of the Spanish troops subsequently told His Majesty's Consul-General that all rights of Statutory Powers would be respected, and that the troops would act in the name of the Sultan "as police." In view of the general situation, the only course for the representatives of the Statutory Powers was to maintain correct relations with the Spaniards, but not to acknowledge the Spanish usurpation. In the following November the Spaniards suppressed most of the administrative machinery of the international régime, and in December officially incorporated the Zone into Spanish Morocco. With some difficulty His Majesty's Government were able to negotiate with the Spanish Government at the close of the year a modus vivendi which safeguarded the special personal rights of British subjects in Tangier and guaranteed the continued functioning of British institutions. In return His Majesty's Government accepted the de facto Spanish occupation of Tangier and recognised Spain's "special interest" in the Zone. It was made clear, however, that this arrangement was only provisional and was without prejudice to the rights of His Majesty's Government or to third parties to the relevant international instruments. This also included a Spanish assurance that there would be no fortification of the Zone. (At the time of the Allied landings in North Africa in November 1942 it may be noted, His Majesty's Government gave the Spanish Government an assurance that "these operations would not compromise the existing modus vivendi in Tangier in any way.")

In 1941 the Spaniards ejected the Mendoub (the representative of the Sultan), invited the German Government to send a consular representative, and suppressed the French (Shereefian) Customs Administration. There was an epidemic of major and minor vexations, and in February 1942 serious outrages led to energetic British protests in London and Madrid. Nevertheless, unpleasant incidents continued to occur. As part of the agreement of May 1944 with His Majesty's Government and the United States Government, the Spanish Government at length promised to suppress the German Consulate-General and to repatriate all German agents: in dealing with the latter they displayed true Spanish dilatoriness.

Subsequent events have probably taught even the most dyed-in-the-wool Falangists not to be sanguine about the survival of this experiment in empire-building. His Majesty's Government have repeatedly made it clear that they proposed at the appropriate moment to put forward to the interested parties suggestions for the future of Tangier. On the 12th May His Majesty's Embassy in Washington submitted to the State Department a memorandum setting out the views of His Majesty's Government regarding the future of Tangier and proposing the holding of discussions, first between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government, and then between the two Governments and the French Government, in order to prepare joint representations to the Spanish Government for the withdrawal of their troops from Tangier, and to re-establish a provisional international régime, pending the negotiation of a new agreement between the powers concerned.

ITALY.

One of Allied Military Government's first orders on taking over the administration of territories in Southern Italy after the Allied landing in 1943 was to prohibit the holding of political meetings except with A.M.G. consent. Despite this and despite an undertaking not to address public meetings on the part of Signor Bonomi and the other political leaders on their departure to the North, Signor Nenni, the Socialist Party leader, saw fit to address a workers' mass meeting at Vercelli with the result that he was arrested on the 25th May. He was subsequently released on his giving an undertaking not to repeat the offence. Signor Nenni has also written a letter of apology to the Allied military authorities. Signor Togliatti, the Communist Party leader, is also reported to have addressed a meeting at Novara. He was not arrested but was warned that a repetition would mean his having to leave the area under A.M.G.

It is still difficult to appreciate what are the real relations between Signor Nenni and Signor Togliatti and their respective parties. Signor Togliatti is, apparently, of the opinion that he and his party are not yet in a strong enough position to press for the Presidency of the Council and instead is pressing Signor Nenni's claims. Whether Signor Nenni realises he is being used as a stalking horse can only be guessed. He may, of course, be perfectly aware of the situation but feels that once in he can stay in since his party seems, on reports received from the North, to be stronger, at least numerically, than the Communist Party. Signor Togliatti, however, knowing Signor Nenni's hot-headedness, may be banking on his making some major blunder which will give the Communist leader a chance to show his Party's capability to govern. It is still too early to judge, but the way the situation is developing within the Socialist-Communist alliance seems to be increasingly reminiscent of the split which arose within the Socialist Party after the last war and which gave Mussolini his chance.

After so long a period in authority, the C.L.N.A.I. is finding it rather difficult to cede its position to A.M.G. According to the Rome Press the Val d'Aosta has been granted regional autonomy by the Prefecture of Turin on instructions from the C.L.N. of Turin, with French and Italian as the official languages and the right to re-draw the communal boundaries according to the 1922 decisions. This resolution has been confirmed by the C.L.N.A.I. As, however, the Val d'Aosta, together with the rest of Northern Italy, with the exception of Venezia Giulia, is under A.M.G., the C.L.N.A.I. has been informed that the C.L.N. of Turin has acted beyond its present powers and that this grant of autonomy to the Val d'Aosta has no foundation in law. There is nothing new to report in the situation in the Valley.

The barrier imposed between the North and the South has been lifted and civilians are free to travel without a permit up to a line marked by the River Piave and running 25 miles inside and parallel with the frontier. The economic cordon is also done away with but the movement of goods will still be controlled.

THE VATICAN.

Mgr. Johann Neuhaeusler of Munich Cathedral Chapter, Vicargeneral of Cardinal Faulhaber and since 1934 one of the Pope's domestic prelates, had spent four years in Dachau Concentration Camp. He was with the 150 special prisoners whom the Germans moved to the Italian frontier. Eventually, by Ascension Day, they were lodged by the Americans in a hotel in Anacapri "Where we are looked after very well indeed." These details were given by Mgr. Neuhaeusler on the 23rd May when he broadcast from the Vatican in German. (For the list of the important Germans, whose names he read out, see under "Germany".) Perhaps the fact that this German prelate has been allowed to visit the Vatican may do something to meet the Pope's often expressed desire for direct news from German Ecclesiastics, and the Allies' wish that the Vatican should learn at first hand of life in German Concentration Camps. It is noteworthy that Mgr. Neuhaeusler's talk dwelt on the anxiety of prisoners' relatives, on "our sorely tried compatriots," and the need to follow the Pope and cherish Christian ideals still more in rebuilding the beloved fatherland. There was no mention of Nazis, and no condemnation of Concentration Camps. Mgr. Neuhaeusler was received in audience by the Pope on the 28th May.

The long views and to the belligerents often exasperatingly detached outlook of the Holy See were vividly displayed in a Vatican wireless talk in French on the 23rd May: the new world must be built with all that was good in the old. It would be childish to reject an experiment merely because enemies had employed it. "Fine factories, holidays with pay, joy cruises, comfortable houses are in achievement, but the country must not be regimented." State ownership was better than the power of Trusts; but the State must respect the nature of man, who "must be free to lead his private life." The talk ended with the plea of that great friend of the Resistance, the Archbishop of Toulouse, for a "world not built for Titans or wild beasts but for men and children and God."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Soviet Commission in Hungary has presented the Hungarian Government with a demand for deliveries of machinery and factory fittings. These are on reparation account (under the Annex to Article 12 of the Armistice), and it is a fact that Gyöngyössy, the Foreign Minister, had said on the 9th May that all future demands would be on that account, not on that of current supplies. Nevertheless, the demand has badly shaken the Hungarian Government. They state that the figures are much larger than those originally agreed. The machinery amounts to 25 per cent. of that in Hungarian factories, and the steel demanded for this year alone is 170,000 tons. The Hungarian Government is nevertheless working out the details for compliance with the demand and Miklós, the Prime Minister, has apparently reconsidered his first thought, which was of resignation.

Miklós' position is, however, certainly unhappy. He is subjected to continuous and active pressure from the Left-wing members of the Government, with whom Gyöngyössy apparently now associates himself. Outside the Government, the Social Democrats have concluded a fresh agreement with the Communists, which apparently means that the former have moved still further to the Left. The press of both parties now appears with the heading "Proletariat of the World Unite!" The two parties, with the Trade Unions and the National Peasants, now describe themselves as presenting a solid common front against reaction.

A plan initiated by the National Peasants for expelling to Germany all the "Swabians" (Hungarians of German origin) who recently showed themselves disloyal to Hungary (about 350,000 persons) has been approved by the Ministerial Council. A substantial number of the persons affected have indeed already fled into Germany, and it is not impossible that others have been taken to the U.S.S.R.

The Seventh Army has arrested the "Quisling" ex-Prime Minister, Szálasi, and some of his staff.

Roumania.

Dl Gheorghiu-Dej, the Minister of Communications, has been conferring with delegates of the Merchants' Union. It was fairly evident that the purpose of this conference was to set at rest Roumanian apprehensions as to whither she was being led. The Minister began by explaining that although the socialisation of industry did originally form part of the programme of the Government and the Communist party, it did so no longer, although certain ill-disposed persons had asserted that it did. The Minister also said that he was assured during his recent visit to Moscow that the Soviet Government had no intention of interfering with the internal affairs of Roumania, a statement with which his hearers must by this time be painfully familiar. Referring to the fact that Great Britain and the United States have not recognised the present Roumanian Government, Dl Gheorghiu-Dej said that this was of no importance as the Government was backed by the Soviet Union, and at the end of the war England and America will have no other choice but to recognise it. He then asked for a vote of confidence from the Merchants' Union. The President of the Union hesitated about this and thought that such a declaration if made should be made by all the Roumanian trade organisations, and said that he would like to consult Dl Max Ausnit. The Minister did not seem very happy over this suggestion, as he said that Dl Ausnit had close relations with the Americans. There, for the moment, the incident closed.

Radio Bucharest broadcasts the intelligence that the "rapprochement of the Russian and Roumanian churches has become a reality, and the outlook is very promising." The Minister of Cults, Parinte Burducea has told the press that the Roumanian Church has recognised the Russian Church. The Roumanian Church has always recognised the Russian Church while there was a Russian Church in effective being to recognise. The nature of the "rapprochement" and the consequent "outlook" is not specified. The present position is that the Roumanian and Russian Churches are sister churches, each under its own Patriarch, and independent of, but recognising the spiritual leadership of the Œcumenical Patriarch. The Russian practice has been to absorb the Churches of subject countries into the Russian Patriarchate.

Yugoslavia.

The British and United States Governments have been considering the Yugoslav communication of the 21st May. Despite superficial calm and the complacency of certain correspondents, the tension in Trieste increased. By the 22nd May it was estimated that the Yugoslavs had carried out about 150 political executions and held about 1,000 political prisoners. They had also looted extensively, and appointed a new management of the port. When they tried to move a 150-ton crane from the port, Field-Marshal Alexander firmly forbade the removal of port equipment. The Yugoslav-created Executive Committee issued a manifesto to the inhabitants of the city, stating their intention to eliminate all "Fascists and pro-Fascists" and to prepare for "democratic elections." Their radio explained that by "fascism" was meant the upper class and "anti-democratic Conservative forces," and said "we are right in lumping together all forces in the other camp under the single name of fascism." For the purpose of such elimination a "People's Court" of twelve persons was appointed.

There has been a sharp exchange of views over the movement of Allied troops in the area north of Trieste; and the Allied Liaison Mission in Trieste has been formally requested by the Chief of Staff of the Yugoslav 4th Army, on instructions from Belgrade, to withdraw. Allied liaison with the 4th Army is effected through the Yugoslav military commander of Trieste.

On the 20th May Radio Belgrade announced the formation of National Liberation Committees all over Carinthia, demonstrations against the Carinthian provincial Government, elections in Klagenfurt for a new provincial committee, and so on and so forth. Five days later it announced, with extreme indignation, that the Allied military authorities had searched the premises of the National Liberation Committee in Klagenfurt, arrested several persons and closed the printing press of the Slovene partisans. It is confirmed that the Yugoslav forces have withdrawn from Carinthia, and that some Yugoslav troops have crossed the Austrian frontier into Styria at present occupied by the Russians.

Tito made two speeches, at Zagreb and Ljubljana. In the first he declared that the partisan movement had welded the peoples of Yugoslavia into a unity, and invoked the Soviet Union as an example of the solution of complex national problems. He announced "We are facing the great historic turning-point of the unification of the Slavs in the Balkans." He then spoke of Venezia Giulia. He admitted that he and Field-Marshal Alexander had made an agreement over its occupation, but said "we came first" and had to protect "our people against the butchery of the Italian Fascists." He insisted that the Yugoslav forces had the right to remain in the disputed areas and that the right would be insisted on; but also that agreement with the Allies would be reached. The new Yugoslavia's first step had been her alliance with the Soviet Union. She must now turn to internal reconstruction, based on the co-operation of the workers, the peasants and the "honest" intellectuals. In the second speech Tito adopted a different tone. Speaking of Carinthia he said: "Our brothers are not yet free . . . . In the name of the new Federal Yugoslavia I say here to-day that we have not forgotten our brothers in Carinthia, who still have to suffer from the Gestapo terror that is clad in a different uniform . . . . A few days after our troops had left Carinthia, we heard cries for help from our brothers there. We have informed our Allies that the responsibility for all that happens there will fall on them alone." Speaking of Venezia Giulia, he expressed resentment at the criticisms of Yugoslavia in the Allied press, and said: "It would be a terrible tragedy if we had to fight again for what we have won in this war."

The tone of Tito's speech at Ljubljana has been faithfully echoed by intransigent articles in the Belgrade press, which resented foreign criticisms and naïvely said that only "Fascists" found life difficult under the new Yugoslav régime. (For comment from Moscow see "Soviet Union.")

Considerable movements of Yugoslav and former E.L.A.S. troops towards the Greek frontier, and the evacuation of villagers are reported.

Pijade, Vice-President of A.V.N.O.J., has published a statement on the enlargement of A.V.N.O.J. by the inclusion of members of the last Yugoslav Parliament, as recommended by the Crimean Conference. He indicated that few such members could clear themselves of collaboration with the enemy. He thought that A.V.N.O.J. would meet in late June and take in some men "of political standing." He hoped that the Constituent Assembly would meet in October.

Greece.

His Majesty's Ambassador has been visiting Corfu, where, by invitation of the Mayor, he attended the anniversary celebrations of the union of the Ionian Islands with Greece. He reports that the population displayed a great love and respect for everything British; he also states that his visit confirmed the impression, already gathered from visits to other parts of Greece, that there is a strong desire for the return of the King. From Salonica His Majesty's Consul-General reports that the Governor-General for Central Macedonia has informed him that a delegation of Macedonian Liberals, which has the support of the three Governors-General, has left for Athens to represent to M. Sophoulis that the internal situation is rapidly deteriorating, largely owing to the somewhat ineffective and irresponsible amateurs of whom, in their opinion, the present Service Government is composed. The delegation would prefer to see a representative political Government, in which the Provinces would be strongly represented. The Governor-General added that what most people wanted was to get back to normal conditions; in comparison with this desire, constitutional issues were of little account.

Meantime, the Minister of National Economy has been touring the larger towns of Thrace and Macedonia and has announced various measures which the Government is taking to ameliorate conditions in the northern provinces.

The Greek Government has been facing a serious labour situation; there have been strikes in Salonica and elsewhere, which at one point seemed likely to become general. The tobacco workers demanded an increase in wages of 250 per cent., and, had their demands been met, an impossible situation would have been created, as similar demands would immediately have been made by other industries. It has now been reported from Salonica that strikes there have been settled on the basis of an increase in wages of 125 per cent. Meantime, it is interesting to note the increasing number of responsible newspapers which advocate various forms of economic control as a remedy for Greece's economic and financial difficulties; legislation on gold dealings and a general rationing system for all commodities are among the measures suggested. The Greek Government have been reluctant to impose controls, claiming that the public associate such measures with General Metaxas and the Germans; in any case, the Government still look to His Majesty's Government to solve most of their problems by sending them increased supplies. They have gone so far as to establish certain controls over the cotton industry, but are afraid to fix food prices, lest food-stuffs simply disappear from the market. It is to be hoped that M. Varvaressos, who is now back in Athens, and who is known to favour the introduction of controls, may succeed in getting the Government to take the necessary measures.

Albania.

Speaking on the 24th May, the first anniversary of the Permet Congress, which gave birth to the partisan provisional Government, Lieut.-General Koçi Xhoxhe, vice-president of F.N.Ç., expressed gratification—which was no doubt sincere—at Marshal Tito's recent recognition of that Government. He also denounced the provocation of "pro-Fascist jackals" in Greece and reverted to the Government's constant demand that the Nationalists and other Albanians who have taken refuge in Italy should be surrendered by the Allies for trial. He repeated that the present Albanian régime was democratic and had the bulk of the people behind it—an assertion on which the continual publication of messages of loyalty from the provinces is alone enough to cast some doubt.

As a temporary judicial organisation the Government is reported to be setting up a central court at Tirana, a court of first instance in each prefecture and sub-prefecture, and magistrates' courts in other localities. But in the judicial sphere the chief interest lies in the sinister activities of the special court which is still trying "war criminals."

To the division of Italians who fought alongside the F.N.Ç. against the Germans and are now being repatriated, Enver Hoxha sent an appreciative message of farewell.

Bulgaria.

On the 20th May the Communist-inspired agitation against the former Agrarian leader, Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, took the form of Agrarian meetings in Sofia and the provinces at which the near-Communists emphasised the need for collaboration between Agrarians and Communists and consequently for the elimination of Dr. Dimitrov and his closest friends from the Agrarian party. On the 26th May it was announced that as a result of these meetings it had been decided to expel Dr. Dimitrov from the party for trying to cause a breach in the Fatherland Front and for intriguing against that front "with regard to" the Allies. Meanwhile Dr. Dimitrov, who seems to have suspected that the militia were about to seize and do away with him, escaped on the 23rd May from house arrest and went first to the flat of a member of the staff of the British political representative and then to the house of the United States political representative. Militia were posted round the house but subsequently replaced by Soviet troops. In 1941 we had to help Dr. Dimitrov to escape from the Germans in Bulgaria, and from then until his return to Bulgaria last autumn his work in Palestine for the Allies showed him to be a consistent and active anti-Nazi and anti-Fascist. Neither the British nor the United States Government, therefore, can condone what seems to be a flagrant case of political persecution.

When M. Kovačević, the new Yugoslav Minister, presented his credentials on the 22nd May to the three Regents, great emphasis was laid by both parties on the fraternal character of present Yugoslav-Bulgar relations. Elaborating the theme in a press interview afterwards, M. Kovačević said that much remained to be done on both sides and each must support all the just claims of the other.

It has been announced that the public prosecutors attached to the People's Court will cease their activities towards the end of May.

Turkey.

Particular prominence was given in Turkey to Mr. Churchill's warning of the danger that the words freedom, democracy and liberation might be distorted or brushed aside; and that Hitlerism might be replaced by other totalitarian or police Governments.

Angora Radio broadcast the news in Turkish that telegrams of congratulation had been despatched by M. Saracoğlu to Mr. Churchill, General de Gaulle and Mr. Soong on the occasion of the Allied victory in Europe. The telegram to Mr. Churchill acclaimed him as the defender of freedom and justice. No mention was made of the telegram of congratulation sent to Marshal Stalin.

The debate on the new budget took place as usual during the last weeks of May. It had already been decided, however, that in future the financial year would terminate on the 31st December; so that the budget which is under discussion covers only the seven months from the 1st June to the 31st December, 1945. M. Saracoğlu referred, in the course of the debate, to Turkey's heavy commitments for the army, education, public health and assistance for the needy. He stated that the Government possessed 200 tons of gold and 52 million liras in foreign exchange. It intended to utilise these resources productively, to make up for the unavoidable retardations of the war period. Ordinary expenditure for the seven months was estimated at 419 million liras and extraordinary expenditure at 184·4 million, a total of 603·4 million. It had been previously stated that all but 11 per cent. of the total expenditure would be covered by taxation—a very creditable performance, if achieved.

Turkish press reports from San Francisco stated that the Armenian National Committee had submitted a memorandum to the Conference pressing for the transfer of all Armenians in Turkey to Soviet Russia. The reason given was the danger of the extermination of the Armenians by the Turks. The Turkish press declared that the memorandum had aroused the resentment of the Armenians in Istanbul, who were loyal to the Republican Government. Although no doubt Russia still maintains an interest in the Armenians of Turkey, there is no evidence that the Soviet delegation had anything to do with this memorandum. The Turkish Ambassador has returned to Moscow after consultation with his Government. Turco-Soviet relations are still fluid: each side appears to be waiting for the other to make the first advance.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

During the past week the situation in the Levant States continued to deteriorate, and as the days passed it became fairly clear that, unless one side or the other gave way, the tension would soon reach breaking-point. All towns in Syria remained closed, and demonstrations took place in several of the larger centres. Finally, on the 27th May, fighting broke out in Hama, where the local population was joined by some hundreds of tribesmen, and in Homs. Though full details have not yet been received it is clear that the situation in Syria is very serious. The fact is that, in spite of our efforts and those of the United States to persuade both sides to refrain from any action that might lead to a breach of the peace, mere words are no longer of any avail. The Syrian authorities have warned us many times in recent weeks that the time might come when they could no longer handle the situation with their inadequately-armed forces, and now that actual fighting has broken out, none can say when or where it will end.

Three recent statements, one from each of the protagonists in the dispute, and one from ourselves, give the background to the present picture.

On the 22nd May an official communiqué issued by the Syrian and Lebanese Governments stated that in their view the recent arrival of French troops in the Levant States was an infringement of their sovereignty, and that the French proposals for negotiations were incompatible with their independence. The two Governments had therefore refused to enter into negotiations and had decided to unite for the defence of their independence.

On the same evening a local French communiqué was broadcast in reply, pointing out that the movement of Allied troops in the Levant States was subject since 1941 to the military régime which could not be modified unilaterally. It went on: "The French authorities are therefore astonished at the protests at the arrival of 500 troops on board the Jeanne d'Arc, and consider that the Syrian and Lebanese Governments, by invoking a normal troop movement, ... have seized the first opportunity to refuse to negotiate. As regards the treaty proposals, the French authorities have the utmost respect for the independence of the States which France herself was the first to proclaim. . . . With a view to the final settlement the French Government has proposed the conclusion of certain agreements of a cultural, economic and strategic character which in no way affect the independence of those countries."

On the 26th May an official statement was put out by the Foreign Office: "His Majesty's Government are aware of the serious situation which has developed in the last few days in Syria and Lebanon, but specially in Syria. They regret that the improved atmosphere should have been disturbed by the despatch of certain French reinforcements, and that these should have been the occasion for breaking off negotiations for a general settlement between the Levant States and the French Government. His Majesty's Government are in consultation with the United States Government and in constant contact with the parties concerned regarding these developments, and it is earnestly hoped that no action will be taken in the meanwhile to prejudice the amicable solution of the issues involved." This announcement has been favourably received both in the Levant States and throughout the Arab World.

The two main cruxes in the way of a settlement are the demand by the French for military bases and their failure to hand over the Troupes Spéciales. If the French would now agree to send no more reinforcements; to withdraw their forces from the towns (as they did earlier in certain cases); to issue the gendarmerie with additional arms; and to transfer at least some of the Troupes Spéciales, the situation might still be saved. Unfortunately there is little indication of the French agreeing to yield on any of these points; and a satisfactory settlement can now only be reached by discussions on the highest level.

In reply to a telegram from the Acting Prime Minister of Syria, asking Mr. Churchill to intervene and to persuade France to withdraw her troops from Syria, the Prime Minister has expressed his regret at the breakdown of negotiations between the French and Syrian Governments. Mr. Churchill explains that His Majesty's Government are anxious to see a settlement of the outstanding questions between France and the Levant States which will be satisfactory to all parties, and which will take full account of Syrian and Lebanese independence. The Prime Minister goes on to say that nothing has happened which could possibly justify hostilities between the States and France, and that it is the duty of Syria to refrain from precipitating any situation which might impede the war with Japan.

(For French reactions see under "France.")

There is considerable feeling in Egypt, as in other neighbouring States, over the situation, and Egyptian sentiment has expressed itself in complete sympathy with the Levant States. Both King Farouk and the Egyptian Government are watching events closely. On the 26th May Abdul Rahman Azzam, the Secretary-General of the Arab League, made a statement to the press in which he described the situation as very serious and predicted "a devastating storm about to break." After criticising French action, he went on to announce a meeting of the Council of the Arab League in Cairo in the first week of June to discuss the question, and ended with these words: "Our brothers the Syrians and Lebanese are asking the help of Arab countries in support of their rightful cause. I am confident that they will receive the assistance they are hoping for, and that it will come from the whole of the Arab nation, Kings, Amirs, Governments and peoples alike." It is understood that the Council has been summoned for the 4th June, and that the result of its deliberations will be communicated to San Francisco before the Conference dissolves.

The Egyptian delegation at San Francisco has been very vocal in the discussions on trusteeship, in which Egyptian delegates have argued that the mandatory or trustee Power has no rights, but only duties in the mandated territory. So far, however, they have been heavily defeated on each occasion. In the committee on regional arrangements they have attempted to give the Assembly power to take a hand in revising treaties, no doubt with a view to the ultimate revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. It is believed that the Egyptian delegation may even be trying to establish that the only true regional organisation in the Middle East is the Arab League, which should be recognised as such and be given responsibility for maintaining peace and security in that part of the world. They have, however, received little support except from the Arab States and Liberia, and are unlikely to get a sympathetic hearing.

In Iraq, it need hardly be said, the feeling over the Levant States is just as intense as in Egypt. The Iraqi Prime Minister, in a recent interview with a representative of The News of the World, was at pains to emphasise the strength of Iraqi sympathy. He could not say what action the Arab League would take, but if the League should decide on the Iraqi army going to the assistance of the Levant States, he, the Prime Minister, would consider ordering it to do so. If the situation should deteriorate, "grave issues" might arise. The position to-day, he said, was quite different from that which developed after the last war, when Syria was "first betrayed and King Feisal turned off the throne by the French." Iraq looked to Great Britain to ensure the complete independence of the Levant States. He saw no possible hope of any compromise between France and the States, "because France could never adjust her interests to those of any other people." Further, the French were incapable of abiding by their pledged word, and the only solution was the complete withdrawal of France from the Levant.

H.R.H. the Regent left Bagdad for his visit to the United States on the 22nd May.

Ibn Saud is naturally also showing anxiety over the crisis in the Levant. In reply to his request for our advice, we are informing him that, while His Majesty's Government regret the despatch of French reinforcements, we still hope that the Levant Governments will continue negotiations with the French by putting forward counter-proposals. We also hope that Ibn Saud will continue to use his influence in the direction of moderation, and will urge the Levant States to refrain from any step likely to lead to a clash with the French.

Meanwhile, Ibn Saud has sent messages to His Majesty's Government and to the United States Government, begging them to effect a settlement on lines which their honour, their war aims and their endorsement of the States' independence must dictate. If these two Governments do not intervene it will mean "failure and disgrace for all concerned." The message ends by stating that Ibn Saud is always advising the Syrians to observe calm and restraint and to trust in the Allies.

As mentioned in last week's Summary, the Persian Government has officially requested the British, Soviet and American Governments to withdraw their troops from Persian territory. The Anglo-Soviet-Persian treaty gives the British and Russian Governments the right to maintain troops in Persia until six months after the end of the Japanese war, but the Persian request is nevertheless being sympathetically considered on the British side.

THE FAR EAST.

Although Japanese official communiqués on the Tokyo air raids are careful to minimise both the number of raiders and the damage they caused, while vastly exaggerating the number shot down, it is clear from Domei reports that immense damage has been done, especially by the second raid on the night of the 25th–26th May. Suzuki called an extraordinary Cabinet meeting on the morning of the 26th and told his colleagues that he had apologised to the Throne for the damage done to the Imperial Palace; he said that the Imperial Family were safe. He expressed indignation at the "outrageous and indiscriminate attack." He admitted that considerable damage had been done owing to a strong wind fanning the fires, although he warned against over-estimation of the losses incurred. Various Ministerial buildings had suffered and Suzuki said that this provided an excellent opportunity for Ministers to simplify administrative routine. Among the buildings reported to be burned out are those of the Foreign Office and the Great East Asia Ministry, the Soviet, Chinese, "Manchukuo," and Siamese Embassies, the Swedish and Finnish Legations, the Imperial and Keio Universities, and the offices of the Tokyo Shimbun and the Yomiuri-Hochi newspapers. Tokyo Radio in Italian (the 26th May) said that the greater part of the capital had been reduced to smoking ruins.

Japanese reports betray the fact that the raids on Tokyo and other large cities are affecting war production and in particular the output of aircraft. Thus, on the 24th May, Suzuki had a conference with the representatives of aircraft companies in Tokyo. He said that aircraft were the key to victory in modern warfare and that those engaged in aircraft production should redouble their efforts in view of the serious situation on the Okinawa front. He said that workers in aircraft factories must stay on their jobs to the last despite the "difficult conditions" in war-time. The Kokusaku Dankokai, or Society for carrying out National Policies, advised Suzuki to supply food, clothing and living quarters to war workers and to give them military status as "soldiers on the production front."

The Suzuki Cabinet, grappling with worsening economic conditions and the havoc caused by air attack, is faced with more political unrest. Domei, on the 26th May, said that there had been a conference of representatives of the Dai Nippon Seijikai, the Gokoku Doshikai, the National Defence Comrades Association and other groups, and that these had urged that a special session of the Diet should be convened. (For the Gokoku Doshikai, see this Summary, No. 240.) An article appeared in the Tokyo Shimbun (the 22nd May) which could hardly have been very palatable to the industrialists and Court party. It was written by Shigemori, described as a noted commentator on Russian affairs. He asked why the U.S.S.R. had been ultimately victorious over Germany, despite the vast territories overrun by the Germans and the great losses sustained by the Red Army. It was not, he held, due to the huge area and resources of Russia; these had not averted defeat in the first World War. It was due to the Soviet system and to the strong leadership provided by Stalin. This was a most valuable lesson for the Japanese people. The crisis which confronted Japan appeared almost hopelessly serious, but the Russian position in 1941–42 was equivalent to one in which a large part of Japan was under enemy occupation and the major part of the Japanese army had been destroyed.

Masaharu Hatanaka, a former Moscow correspondent, wrote in the Asahi (24th May) that the racial characteristics of the Russians, especially their tenacity and fortitude, had much in common with those of Asiatic races. But these characteristics would not have been sufficient to enable the Russians to win final victory had it not been for their success in organisation for war strength. So brilliant were the achievements of this organisation that by the time the Germans launched their attack the Russians had come to have a keen interest in the maintenance of their system. Remarks such as these provide good ammunition for those who would overthrow the Zaibatsu and set up a thorough-going State Socialist and single-party system in Japan. They were admirers of the Nazis when these were strong, now that Germany has fallen, they may transfer their worship to the other totalitarian shrine.

At the close of its deliberations the Sixth National Congress of the Kuomintang (see this Summary, No. 294) issued a manifesto which urged that all patriotic leaders should work together for the early inauguration of constitutional government. It further declared that victory could only be considered complete when the north-eastern provinces (Manchuria) were liberated, Formosa secured, Korean independence restored and Japanese aggression totally eliminated. The manifesto promised respect for the languages, religions and customs of racial minorities within China and said that a high degree of autonomy would be given to Outer Mongolia and Tibet. On economic matters the Kuomintang apologised for its failure to carry out Sun Yat-sen's programme for the equalisation of land ownership and the prevention of capitalist monopolies and promised reforms in these matters in the future (Chungking Radio, 21st May).

A Reuter message of the 27th May said that the newly elected Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang would meet on the 28th to implement the resolutions of the Party Congress. It was thought in Chungking, however, that neither the Party Congress nor the new Central Executive Committee would produce any marked change in the Government or its policies.

The Party Congress decreed an increase of 200 in the membership of the Central Executive and Central Supervising Committees so that the total membership of these two Central Party organs is now 460. These will all be ex officio members of the forthcoming National People's Congress, scheduled to meet on the 12th November. According to a report from Shanghai, the number of delegates to this Congress was fixed at 1,440, and of these the Kuomintang will nominate 240. The Party would thus have a safe 700 nominees at the Congress. As it could certainly count on the support of a good proportion of the remainder, the People's Congress would thus be very much in the Party's hands. If such is its design fierce opposition can be expected from the Communists and from the smaller "splinter parties."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

With few exceptions newspapers of all political complexions have greeted President Truman's Cabinet changes with applause. The resignations include Mr. Claude Wickard (Secretary for Agriculture), Miss Frances Perkins (Secretary for Labour), and Mr. Francis Biddle (Attorney-General). To fill these places the President has appointed Representative Clinton P. Anderson (Democrat, New Mexico), Judge Lewis P. Schwellenbach (of Spokane, Washington), and Mr. Thomas C. Clark (of Texas), who since 1943 has been Assistant Attorney-General in charge of the Criminal Division). At the same time Mr. Truman announced that Mr. Marvin Jones would relinquish his post as head of the War Food Administration and that that body would now be merged with the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Wickard has been nominated director of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Miss Perkins is the first woman ever to hold Cabinet office in the United States, and she has held such office since being first appointed Secretary for Labour by President Roosevelt in 1933. Her resignation has been continually offered and her task has of late not been easy owing to the creation of numerous agencies, all dealing with Labour, with the consequent loss of prestige in her own department. In his letter to Miss Perkins, the President wrote: "the rights of Labour as a partner in the system of private enterprise in the United States have been more firmly established than ever before. There has been created a co-operative relationship between industry and labour which has been largely instrumental in turning out the weapons of war."

It is generally felt that by these changes the Cabinet has been "substantially strengthened," particularly by the establishment of a better geographical balance —most of Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet were from the East. At the same time, the new men are "neither Leftists or Rightists (but men) with records of achievement behind them." In some quarters the change is interpreted as a trend from "government by bureaucracy back to Cabinet government," and a determination by Mr. Truman to have a Cabinet of his own choosing without departing from the major policies of the late President.

President Truman has also asked Congress to pass legislation to enable him to reorganise the executive branch of the Government. The War Powers Act and its amendments, which empower the President to make the necessary adjustments in the executive branch, expire after the ending of the Japanese war and every step which has been taken to date will automatically revert to the status existing before the 1941 Act. While Congress had legislated for the orderly conversion from war to peace in other fields, as the President pointed out, "adequate provision had not yet been made" for conversion of the executive arm of government.

In the view of the Washington Post, the President's call for reorganisation powers is closely related to the Cabinet changes, actual or pending. While praising him for "moving resolutely to put the Government's house in order," the Post added, however, that "his request is probably too sweeping to be granted in full: what he has requested is nothing less than full power to make over the entire structure of the executive branch at any time, subject to the right of Congress to nullify any such object by majority vote."

Mr. Harry Hopkins and Mr. Joseph Davies have arrived in Moscow and London respectively, as special envoys of the President. The White House has made it quite clear that these missions do not take the place of the projected meeting of the Big Three. They are merely a prelude, not a substitute. Fears have been expressed in the press that the impending elections in England, which, incidentally, are arousing immense interest in America, might delay this meeting. They have, however, been dispelled by statements issued by the White House and by Mr. Churchill.

There is undoubtedly a large and growing anxiety at the deterioration of relations between Russia, Great Britain and the United States, and Russian foreign policy continues to provide the great enigma. In certain quarters, for instance, the New York Herald Tribune, the view is expressed that America is allowing herself to be inveigled by Great Britain into an "anti-Russian line-up" and there are calls for America to show an "independent policy" of its own in foreign affairs. Doubtless with the intention of relieving the mounting tension the President has sent to Moscow a man known to be closely associated with President Roosevelt's foreign policy—"the Grand Design"—who also enjoys a considerable measure of popularity in both Moscow and London. Mr. Davies, who was formerly United States Ambassador in Russia and author of the book Mission to Moscow is as it were a popular symbol of Soviet-American co-operation. While these missions have attracted little editorial comment they have been welcomed. The New York Times expresses the view that Mr. Hopkins' task is the more significant, since he is discussing with Marshal Stalin outstanding issues in Russo-American relations "with a view to smoothing out what everyone must hope are only passing difficulties."

President Truman has won his first important Congressional victory. After a dramatic appeal by him, the House of Representatives passed, by 239 to 153 votes, the Bill extending and broadening the programme of reciprocal trade treaties (see last week's Summary). The Opposition was almost entirely composed of Republicans, who, apparently, have returned to the high tariff policies for which their party fought many years ago. The Bill now goes to the Senate, where even the supporters of the Bill concede that they expect difficulty. Mr. Grew has applauded the action of the House, describing it as "an aid to world co-operation." Earlier, Mr. Doughton, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and sponsor of the Bill, claimed that it was the first real test whether the United States was to take part in international co-operation or revert to economic and political isolation.

In addition to the Doughton Tariff Bill, the Bretton Woods measure has made some progress. Although opposition has been strong, it has now been approved by a vote of 23 to 3 by the Banking Committee of the House of Representatives. The Bill is expected to reach the floor of the House almost immediately.

Other signs that the United States is moving along the path of international economic co-operation is the suggestion made by Senator Edwin Johnson (Democrat, Colorado) to the Senate Finance Committee, which is now considering the Repeal of the Johnson Act, which forbids private loans to debtor nations, that the United States should cancel the war debts of 1918. Agreeing with Senator Johnson, Mr. William Clayton (Assistant Secretary, State Department) declared: "It will be necessary to do a great deal of reconstruction work in Europe. It will be necessary for foreign Governments to float large loans and the United States is the only country in a position to furnish both tools and technology." Support for this view also comes from an exceptionally influential group of American business men and bankers, the Committee for Economic Development, which has just issued a report urging the repeal of the Johnson Act and the prompt settlement of all foreign Government debts to the United States arising from the last war, and also of all obligations arising under Lend-Lease or otherwise, for goods and services "actually used up in World War No. 2." This group also expresses itself in favour of lowering the protective American tariff.

LATIN AMERICA.

While it is difficult to assess the opinion of Latin America as a whole with regard to the San Francisco Conference, the degree of recognition now accorded to the Act of Chapultepec seems to have roused fairly widespread satisfaction. The discussion over the question of Trusteeship led the Guatemalan delegation to table an amendment to the effect that the Trusteeship system should not be applied to territories "concerning which there is pending any question, claim, controversy or litigation between States members of the international organisation." A statement appended explained Guatemala's fears lest the Trusteeship system should alter the status of British Honduras and thus "complicate Guatemala's action toward regaining this territory." This amendment was defeated. Shortly afterwards the Argentine delegation formulated a reservation against the application of Trusteeship to territories belonging to Argentina "whether they be the subject of claim or controversy, or are in the possession of other States." This was plainly a reference to the Argentine claim to the Falkland Islands. The Chairman of the appropriate committee, however, declined to accept reservations, and the matter was therefore confined to the minutes.

In a broadcast, Mr. Stettinius has made it clear that "the vote of the United States in favour of seating Argentina did not constitute a blanket endorsement of the policies of the Argentine Government. On the contrary, with many of these policies both the Government and people of the United States have no sympathy. But we recognise that the people of Argentina have been traditionally democratic . . . . By voting to admit Argentina, the United States has by no means changed its position that Argentina is expected to carry out effectively all her commitments under the Mexico City declaration. On the contrary, we consider that her admission to the San Francisco Conference increases her obligation to do so. We expect the Argentine nation to see that this obligation is fulfilled."

The Argentine Press also has published a statement from the New York Herald Tribune, in which the new United States Ambassador in Buenos Aires is reported to have replied to a journalist's question "whether the United States and Great Britain preferred dealing with General Farrell's Government" rather than with a democratic one by saying: "We would like to see democratic governments established everywhere." Mr. Braden has stated that he did not make the remark precisely in the form quoted, but it may well serve the Farrell régime as a reminder of the gap between its promises and its performances.

In other respects, the attitude of the Argentine Government is not precisely helpful. Strikes in meat processing factories have shown a tendency to spread, and negotiations for a new meat contract have again been delayed during the absence of the Argentine Ambassador in London at San Francisco. Argentina has yet to be brought to a sense of her responsibilities.

In Brazil the recently-released Communist leader, Carlos Luis Prestes, has been allowed to broadcast from a meeting held at the Vasco da Gama Stadium. The chairman of the meeting declared that Brazil was resolved to raise the banner of National Union, and had no more worthy leader than Prestes. Prestes' own speech was a denunciation of Fascism and an eulogy of those who struggled against it. Brazil, he added, had her own struggle. According to broadcast reports, Major Amilcar Dutra, head of the Department of Press and Propaganda, has been dismissed by President Vargas, and his Department merged into a new body under the Ministry of Justice.

According to a broadcast report, President Vargas has now announced that elections will be held for the Presidency and Congress on the 2nd December, that candidates holding public office must resign at least 90 days before the election date, that members of the armed forces, except officers, shall not vote, and that political parties must have at least 10,000 supporters to merit recognition under the new electoral law.

UNITED NATIONS.

At San Francisco discussions on trusteeship and on voting procedure in the Security Council have continued. No new decisions of importance on either subject have been reached during the past week. Moves by Guatemala and Argentina in connexion with trusteeship are noted above (see "Latin America"). As regards voting procedure, the smaller Powers have asked for clarification of the Crimea Conference formula. The four Great Powers other than France (who did not take part in the Yalta decision) are drafting a report on the question. The formula lays down that the veto shall not operate on questions of procedure, and the problem is whether " procedure " can be taken to include the preliminary consideration and discussion of any dispute, and such other matters as recommendation for the appointment of a Secretary-General and amendment of the Charter.

The Committee concerned with the Court of International Justice has proposed that the present Permanent Court of International Justice should be wound up and a new Court created.

As the Conference is expected to end early in June, attention is now being given to procedure for continuing the work it has begun. This will involve making arrangements and preparing agenda for the first meetings of the Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. These arrangements are likely to include plans for the transfer of functions from the League of Nations to the new organisation, and for the nomination of judges to the new Court of International Justice. To carry out these tasks it has been proposed that there should be a Preparatory Commission, including representatives of all States which sign the new Charter, and meeting at intervals as required. When it is not in session, its powers would be exercised by an Executive Committee, which would also prepare proposals to put before it. It has been suggested that this Executive Committee, which would be in permanent session, should consist of representatives of the States now represented on the Conference Executive Committee and should sit in London.

At a meeting held in London on the 28th May it was agreed to set up a provisional Emergency Economic Committee for Europe. Belgium, France, Greece, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Norway, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States are represented on the Committee, and other European Allied States have been invited to join it. It will deal with urgent and immediate economic questions, particularly the revival of production in Europe and the distribution of supplies from overseas.

GERMANY.

ON Tuesday the 5th June a joint declaration "regarding the defeat of Germany and the assumption of supreme authority with respect to Germany by the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Provisional Government of the French Republic" was signed in Berlin by Field-Marshal Sir Bernard Montgomery, General Eisenhower, Marshal Zhukov and General de Lattre de Tassigny. Whilst they "assume supreme authority with respect to Germany" the four Governments declare that this "does not effect the annexation of Germany." The declaration provides for the complete demobilisation of all German armed forces; for the transfer of all warlike equipment of the army, navy and air forces as well as of all merchant shipping to the Allied Representatives; for the release and maintenance of all Allied prisoners of war and other nationals until they can be repatriated; and for the arrest and surrender to the Allies of the Nazi leaders and of all others suspected of war crimes. It further declares that the Allied Governments will take such further steps "as they deem requisite for future peace and security," and that "the Allied Representatives will impose on Germany additional political, administrative, economic, financial, military and other requirements arising from the complete defeat of Germany." On the subject of Germany's future frontiers it is provided, in the preamble to the declaration, that the four Allied Governments "will hereafter determine the boundaries of Germany or any part thereof and the status of Germany or of any area at present being part of German territory." The first of three official statements issued concurrently with the declaration provides that "the frontiers of Germany as they existed on the 31st December, 1937," are to be taken as defining the area of Allied Administration.

In the second official statement the four Commanders-in-Chief, who signed the declaration, were appointed to form the Control Council, upon which will fall the task of governing Germany. It is to deal with " questions affecting Germany as a whole " and its decisions are to be unanimous. It is to be assisted by a Co-ordinating Committee and a Control Staff, the latter subdivided into twelve divisions roughly corresponding to the departments of a Central Government. The principle of inter-Allied control is maintained throughout, as it is in the administration of Greater Berlin, which will have four Commandants, each of whom will serve in rotation as Chief Commandant. The Allied Governments also issued a statement that, in the exercise of their supreme authority over Germany, they would consult with the Governments of other United Nations.

Considerable progress has been made during the past two weeks with the nomination of native Germans to higher administrative posts than the local government appointments to which they had hitherto been largely restricted. A former leader of the Bavarian People's Party, Friedrich Schaeffer, has been appointed " temporary Prime Minister " (zeitweiliger Minister-Präsident) of Bavaria by the American regional military government officer while a former Social Democratic Party official and ex-Mayor of Mannheim, Dr. Hermann Heimerich, has been made Oberpräsident of a large administrative district comprising the Saar, the Palatinate and Hessen south of the river Main. A pre-Nazi Landeshauptmann, Dr. Hagemann, has become Oberpräsident of Hanover. In the Saar—Palatinate—South Hessen administrative region, Dr. Heimerich is to be assisted by three departmental chiefs who claim to have participated in the abortive " Putsch " of the 20th July, 1944.

Other public officials, who likewise served with some distinction under the Weimar Republic, are re-emerging as heads of the municipalities. Dr. Konrad Adenauer, who was Mayor of Cologne from 1917 to 1933, President of the Prussian State Council and a director of several Rhineland business combines, has returned to office as Mayor of Coblence, after recently serving as special adviser to Military Government. The new Mayor of Leipzig is Dr. Viesling, a well-known lawyer and former member of the Hugenberg Nationalist Party. A member of one of Hamburg's most distinguished families, and a notable adherent of the old Democratic Party, Rudolf Petersen, has been appointed Mayor of that city, the largest in the British zone. The occasional allegation in the Allied press that Nazi officials are not being ousted from posts of minor responsibility as quickly as they might, is not supported by the growing evidence of a determined and on the whole successful drive by Military Government detachments to " de-Nazify " German public life by the earliest possible date. Only the dire need for experts to tackle public health problems has made it necessary in some instances, notably in the Regierungsbezirk Trier, to retain the services of former Nazi doctors.

Several well-known German factories, which prior to the Allied bombing offensive supplied the German Wehrmacht with great quantities of war materials, are now reported to have resumed production under Military Government control. These include the vast Hermann-Goering works near Brunswick, the People's Car factory at Fallersleben—both said to be devoting their entire production henceforth to the work of reconstruction—the Zeiss works at Jena (employing some 6,500 men and women), and the Henschel works at Kassel. The Behring plant at Marburg—still one of the largest serum producers on the Continent—is also stated to have resumed production with the help of Military Government. All banks and six insurance companies have re-opened for business in Kassel. Some cities, as for example Cologne, have re-instituted a postal system within their own boundaries, using plain post-cards and 5-pfennig stamps supplied by Military Government. Nine newspapers are at present circulating in the British and American zones and at least six in the Russian, distribution being arranged in some cases through the local police stations.

An order virtually cordoning Germany off from the rest of western Europe by means of a prohibited zone along her 1937 western frontier, extending in most places to a depth of 5 kilometres, has been imposed by S.H.A.E.F. as from the 31st May. The purpose of this measure is to prevent war criminals and other persons wanted by the Allied authorities from escaping. No one may for the time being enter this zone without military passes or other proper authorisation, and normal residents must leave at once unless they have a special permit issued by Military Government. Displaced persons—who are still estimated to number 4,000,000 in the British and American zones—have been told that they can in future only hope to cross the frontier as part of an official transport. A further ban exists in the North on all unauthorised travel by civilians across the Kiel Canal and the Elbe in both directions (the Flensburg area of Schleswig is thereby still isolated from the rest of the country), although regulations restricting the movements of population in the areas of Schleswig-Holstein and Hamburg bounded by these waterways have just been relaxed. Movements across the Rhine are likewise limited, and citizens of Cologne are for the moment not permitted to cross from Deutz on the right bank to the rest of the city on the left.

A warning by the new Mayor of Berlin, Dr. Arthur Werner, issued by radio on the 1st June, that anyone caught conspiring to do harm to officials and soldiers of the Red Army would forfeit with his own the lives of 50 members of the Nazi Party, stood out in singularly sharp contrast to the general publicity which the Russian-controlled broadcasts from Berlin have been giving to attempts by the Red Army to improve its relations with the German population. Dr. Werner implied that the Nazi fanatics were still active—especially among the remnants of the Hitler Youth. " Criminals and deluded persons," he said, " were still to be found, who, by ' acts of madness ' (arson was specified as one of the major crimes), wanted to prevent the return of law and order." It is, of course, interesting that such a warning should have been issued by a native German official acting under military control, and not by the Russian military commander himself, who would presumably be the person most concerned with attempts on the lives of his soldiers. So far, the most direct Russian reference to disorders in the Russian zone has been made by the Tass agency in a statement of the 28th May that German armed groups who refused to surrender were still roaming the forests. These waged guerilla warfare against isolated Red Army platoons and lived by plundering the remoter farms and villages. Competent observers returning from the Russian zone in the middle of May report that virtually no military Government was seen functioning there, and that there were no regularly established German or Russian police, although 3,000 Military Government troops were expected shortly in Berlin to replace the large numbers of ordinary Russian soldiers who had been withdrawn. Such laws and regulations as had been promulgated were largely concerned with food rationing. No passes or documents were apparently required for circulation. Requisitioning continued and the Red Army authorities were systematically moving from the Russian zone livestock, heavy industrial machinery, automobiles, watches and jewellery. The headquarters of the German Communist Party, which had been set up in Berlin shortly after the Russian entry, had been closed by the local Red Army commander, but party cells were still functioning unofficially in the working-class district of Wedding.

A special control party from S.H.A.E.F., headed by Major-General Robert W. Harper, of the U.S.A.A.F., and Air Vice-Marshal C. R. Steele, has now been established at Berchtesgaden to supervise the dissolution of the former Luftwaffe High Command. The choice of Hitler's own erstwhile stronghold as the seat of this control party is stated to have been influenced by the fact that it was to this " redoubt " area that remnants of the German air force staff withdrew. Presumably persons of importance connected with the Luftwaffe are still at large there, as are undoubtedly a number of Party leaders of lesser fame. Ribbentrop, however, remains the only really outstanding Nazi figure still not accounted for, although an entire section of his Foreign Office has been detained at Liebenau (previously used by the German Government as one of its principal camps for Allied internees) and put under local parole. An appeal to all young Germans to assist in the current pursuit of the Nazi Reich Youth Leader, Arthur Axmann, has been issued by the Moscow radio. One of the Third Reich's most notorious police officials, Kurt Daluege, who was Chief of the uniformed police up to August 1943, is reported to have been captured with twelve other S.S. officers of high rank and more than fifty prominent party officials in the British Second Army sector.

AUSTRIA.

The British, United States and French Missions moved to Vienna on the 3rd June. Marshal Tolbukhin at first requested some reduction in the size of the British and American parties, owing to accommodation difficulties, but later agreed that there should be no such reduction.

Belgrade Radio, on the 29th May, attacked the " so-called Carinthian Government " in Klagenfurt, and alleged that its officials, together with Anglo-United States military police, had " brutally entered the premises of the Slovene Regional National Liberation Committee for Carinthia, searched them, and arrested the Commissars, who were taken away to an unknown destination." The broadcast went on to declare that the "Fascist Government" remained in Klagenfurt and was supported by the Anglo-United States Army. The Carinthian Government referred to is probably the "Provisional Provincial Government" which was last heard of on the 8th May, and in its broadcasts strongly opposed all "foreign territorial claims" on Carinthia. A.M.G., however, has not as yet recognised a Provisional Government of Carinthia. On the 4th June Belgrade Radio reported that Marshal Tito, in a speech to the people of Slovenia, said: "Carinthia is ours, and we shall fight for her. We have liberated Carinthia, but international circumstances have been such that we have been obliged to withdraw temporarily."

M. Vyshinski has informed the British Government that the Soviet Government see no grounds for refusing to associate Yugoslav troops with Red Army units in joint occupation of the Soviet zone in Austria. The solution of territorial claims must be related to the peace settlement and cannot depend on the occupation by Allied troops of any given territory, said M. Vyshinski, and in the opinion of the Soviet Government it would be wrong to link the two issues of Yugoslav territorial claims and the participation of Yugoslav troops in the occupation of Austria.

The most urgent problem facing Dr. Renner's Government appears to be the food supply. Station Austria reported on the 29th May that Renner had sent a letter to Stalin on the 16th, describing the economic situation in Austria, and particularly the food supply difficulties. Marshal Stalin's answer promised Vienna supplies, including 45,000 tons of grain, 4,000 tons of meat, 2,700 tons of sugar, and 1,000 tons of fat. The State Food Office was said to have set up immediately a distribution system to ensure a better and more regular food supply for Vienna from the 1st June. On the 31st May, Vienna Radio announced that a rapid count of people living in the city had been made in connexion with the distribution—the number given was approximately 1,500,000. (The pre-war population of Vienna was 1,912,608.) Cardinal Innitzer issued a statement in which he instructed the clergy not to draw the preferential rations offered to them, but to take only the ordinary ration.

Station Austria on the 29th May said that a few days before the Conference of the Austrian Communist Party had been held in Vienna, in which hundreds of Party officials from all districts of Vienna participated. Communist members of the Government attended, as well as a delegation from the "2nd Austrian Battalion" (which had been fighting with the Yugoslav Partisans). The highlight of the Conference was a speech by Vice-Chancellor Koplenig, in which he said that "the only possible form of democratic government is by the collaboration of the three great democratic parties."

The inaugural meeting of the "Society for the Promotion of Cultural and Economic Relations with the U.S.S.R." was held on the 2nd June at the offices of the Secretary of State for Public Enlightenment, at which Ernst Fischer gave an address. Vienna Radio also announced that lessons in the Russian language would be broadcast, "to enable everybody to make themselves understood in Russian."

More measures have been taken to abolish Nazi influence. The Minister of the Interior in the Provisional Government broadcast an appeal for information to help in the capture of National Socialists, "particularly underground Nazis, officials of the Party and the Government, members of the S.S., and all other guilty persons of the Nazi dictatorship." The Vienna Labour Office is being reorganised, and a purge of Nazi officials in the Central and subsidiary offices is being carried out. The department of the Reich Trustee for Labour is to be dissolved.

From Graz on the 2nd June, there was an appeal against looting. Towns and villages would be patrolled night and day "to preserve the peace and security of the population." Landlords were told that they must see that a list was fixed to the front door of every house not later than the 5th June, bearing the name of the landlord and all civilian residents. In a list of films at present being shown in Graz cinemas, the names of several which were produced under the Nazi régime appear.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

His Majesty's Ambassador, Mr. Philip Nichols, and staff, arrived on the 2nd June at the Prague Ruzyň aerodrome. The party was met by the British and United States Chargés d'Affaires. On behalf of the Republic they were welcomed by Dr. Clementis, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and by Minister Smutný, representing Dr. Beneš, as well as by other State officials. With the party travelled M. Louis Keller, the French Chargé d'Affaires. Thus, with the arrival of the United States Chargé d'Affaires and staff on the 29th May, diplomatic contact between the Czechoslovak Republic and the Western Powers has at last been resumed. President Beneš received the United States Chargé d'Affaires on the 30th May, and decorated a number of United States army officers at a military parade on the same day. The British Ambassador was received by Dr. Clementis on the 3rd, and by President Beneš on the 4th.

The line of demarcation between the American and Soviet armies of occupation has been determined. The American zone includes all the Bohemian Forest area and stretches inland to include the large industrial city of Plzeň with the Škoda works; it runs from Kraslice south-eastwards to České Velenice on the Austrian border. The Russian zone is separated from it by a narrow strip of no-man's land a few kilometres in depth. Civil affairs are everywhere in Czechoslovak hands. The Russian forces have withdrawn from the district of Greater Prague to a distance of about 40 kilom., leaving a garrison behind in the city.

The status of Slovakia has been the subject of important discussions in Prague during the last week. The delegates of the Slovak National Council arrived by air from Bratislava and were given an official welcome and reception. The Government of the Republic and the Præsidium of the S.N.C. have agreed that the Council holds the legislative, governmental and executive power in the autonomous territory of Slovakia, and that until the formation of the Provisional Legislative Assembly, the President exercises the legislative power in affairs concerning the whole State, such as frontiers, security, defence, external affairs, currency and basic problems of education, economics and public welfare. One of the two chairmen of the Supreme Courts is to be permanently a Slovak. The popularity of the new measures is reflected in the volte-face made recently by the American Slovak autonomists and separatists, who, previously strongly anti-Beneš, have become supporters of the new régime, whereas the American Czechs have, apart from the Left wing, been more cautious in their attitude.

President Beneš has authorised the call-up of certain categories of officers and men for a period of special military service. This order, announced on the 30th May, affects those born between 1902 and 1915, and forms part of the scheme for rebuilding the army and dealing with the immediate post-war situation. The Minister of Defence outlined the Government's plans before a military gathering in Prague on the 1st June. The purge of anti-democratic elements is to be applied to the army, which is to lose its non-political character with the institution of education officers whose main task will be to educate the men politically.

On the 2nd the Minister of Industry described the new decree concerning the National Administration of Enterprises. The decree regulates the transfer of confiscated property to State control through the agency of the local National Committees. He described it as an important step towards "collectivistic principles" of a revolutionary as well as an economic character.

On the 3rd Prague Radio reported the proceedings at a meeting arranged to launch the Government's physical culture programme. All previous organisations, such as the Sokol movement, are to be merged into a unified system of physical training which will come under the Ministry of Education.

POLAND.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons as to the fate of the sixteen arrested Poles, the Secretary of State said on the 30th May that he had received "no further information additional to what has been published."

Mme. Cecilia Mikolajczyk, the wife of the ex-Prime Minister, has given a press interview since her recent arrival in London after internment in various German concentration camps, including Oswiecim, and eventual liberation by American forces at Plzen (Pilsen).

The London Polish Government issued a statement on the 23rd May concerning German war criminals and giving a short list of names of the principal offenders. "The complete list," the statement adds, "comprises already more than 15,000 names."

Competition for man-power is proceeding between the Warsaw Administration and the London Government. It takes the various forms of recruiting for their respective armies; of instituting rival associations of Poles in France, the United States, &c.; of appeals to miners and other liberated Poles in Europe on the one hand to return home, on the other to work in France or Belgium; of radio broadcasts; and of propaganda visits to ex-slave workers and prisoners of war still in German camps. These appeals from the Warsaw side form part of a general campaign for peopling the newly occupied areas of Eastern Germany, where, it is said, as much as 85 per cent. of the German population has left. It has been stated from Warsaw that there is room in these areas for 7,500,000 settlers, of whom 4 million would find accommodation in towns. Rural settlers are moving into southern East Prussia from areas east of the Curzon Line and into Silesia from Galicia. It is announced that the Red Army is now handing over the administration of southern East Prussia to Polish officials, and that Dr. Drobner, formerly a member of the "Lublin Committee," is now "President" of Breslau.

The output of coal in Poland and German Silesia together is stated to have reached 55,000 tons a day and is expected to reach 80,000 tons, or one-third of the 1913 level, in the course of this month.

SOVIET UNION.

The visit of Mr. Hopkins to Moscow seems to be producing a genuine détente in Soviet-American relations.

The Soviet Information Bureau issued a communiqué on the 2nd June dealing with the Soviet attitude to the crisis in the Levant. This stated that the Soviet Government had approached the French Government, and also the Governments of Great Britain, the United States and China, recommending that urgent measures should be taken to terminate hostilities in Syria and the Lebanon and to settle the conflict by peaceful means. "The events in Syria and the Lebanon do not correspond to the spirit of the decisions passed at Dumbarton Oaks nor to the aims of the San Francisco Conference of the United Nations for the creation of an organisation for the maintenance of peace and the security of nations." For this reason the Soviet Government addressed its proposal to the other four Powers which had taken the initiative in creating the post-war organisation for peace and international security. (See also under "France.")

M. Vyshinsky has now delivered the official Soviet reply to British objections concerning the participation of Yugoslav troops in the occupation of Austria. The Soviet Government, according to M. Vyshinsky's statement, felt that the contribution of the Yugoslav army in expelling "the German Fascist occupiers" from Austria gave it a right to share in the occupation. M. Vyshinsky went on to reject the British contention that the right of Allied troops to share in the occupation of Germany was no precedent for action in Austria, by arguing that the different treatment decided on for Germany and Austria was irrelevant to to the question of occupation. Finally, M. Vyshinsky expressed the view of the Soviet Government that it would be wrong to link the question of Yugoslav territorial claims on Austria with Yugoslav participation in the Soviet zone of occupation. "It goes without saying that the solution of territorial claims must be referred to the peace settlement and cannot depend on the occupation by Allied troops of any given territory."

The Soviet press has called attention to the situation in Carinthia by publishing reports of the statement made in Ljubljana by a delegation of the Carinthian National Liberation Committee asking that the local populace should be protected from the violence and atrocities of Fascist elements in the area. The delegation was alleged to have complained that the British military administration had incorporated many S.S. men and followers of Nedić into the local police, who were inaugurating a reign of terror, which increased after the Yugoslav troops were withdrawn at the request of the Allies.

It was announced on the 30th May that Marshal Zhukov had been appointed representative of the Soviet Supreme Command on the Allied Control Council in Germany. M. Vyshinsky arrived in Berlin from Moscow on the 31st May.

Major-General Korotkov, the Russian Commander on Bornholm, arrived in Copenhagen with his staff on the 1st June; in a speech at the airfield he expressed the belief that the presence of Soviet troops at Bornholm would only help to strengthen relations between the Danish and Russian peoples. Tass has meanwhile been publishing reports from the Danish press which pay tribute to the culture and high level of discipline of the Soviet troops on the island and to their excellent relations with the local population.

On the 28th May Patriarch Alexei of Moscow set out on a series of return visits to the Orthodox Patriarchs of the East at their invitation. The Oecumenical Patriarch had apparently not invited a visit, as Constantinople was not on the itinerary, which includes Damascus, Beirut, Jerusalem, Cairo and Alexandria. The leading members of the delegation accompanying Patriarch Alexei are the well-known Metropolitan Nikolai Krutitsky, and Archbishop Vitali of Tula. The former is to go on to London from Cairo at the invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Archbishop Vitali seems a strange choice for such a solemn occasion, as he was until his reconciliation a year ago head of the heretical Living Church and a somewhat notorious intriguer. Little news has come through about Patriarch Alexei's discussions at his different stopping places; his stay in Damascus was enlivened by the falling of French shells on his hotel. In Jerusalem it is of interest to note that some of the clergy belonging to the irreconcilable group of the Russian Church in exile came to see the Patriarch, and that many members of that community attended the Liturgy celebrated by him in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

It has been announced that as a result of two military topographical expeditions, headed by Lieut.-Colonels Utehkin and Slissenko, a new topographical map of Kamchatka has been made. These expeditions worked on this job through most difficult meteorological conditions for two years, and eventually completed a survey of some 200,000 square kilom. of the Kamchatka peninsula. The importance of this work in the event of the extension of hostilities to the North Pacific area is obvious.

The Soviet press has continued to show uneasiness and resentment at foreign criticisms of the internal organisation and foreign policy of the U.S.S.R. "To be quite frank," M. Isakov said in an English broadcast on the 30th May, "we did not expect that on literally the next day after victory such a furious anti-Soviet campaign could spring up right inside the camp of the United Nations." This campaign was "poisoning the whole post-war international atmosphere." Izvestiya's international observer attributed it to "pro-fascists" who regretted the completeness of Germany's defeat. Another English broadcast by M. Osipov on the 28th May dealt at length with "the stereotyped attacks on the U.S.S.R., and in particular, with the accusation that Soviet foreign policy was undemocratic and unco-operative. "Peace will only be lasting when the liberated nations are ensured genuine freedom, and this is inconceivable unless fascism and reaction are rooted out everywhere." The Soviet Union "refuses to act as a force imposing a reactionary Government" on the liberated nations, and that, M. Osipov said, is why its policy is denounced by "all the gentlemen who who are campaigning for the status quo, for the return of what once was," by the supporters of "the reactionary Polish clique in London" and of the fascist Franco.

A new article on war criminals by Professor Trainin appeared in Izvestiya on the 1st June. He distinguished two types of war crimes:—(1) "Encroachments upon peaceful relations among nations: aggression, organisation of 'fifth columns,' terroristic acts aimed at instigation of international conflicts, &c."; (2) "criminal violations of the laws and usages of war: murder of non-combatants and prisoners of war, organisation of slave labour." Under the main group of political criminals must be included "those who headed and guided the policies of the satellite countries (Antonescu and others)." Professor Trainin went on to criticise those who are looking for "loopholes in the law through which war criminals may escape." He repeated the Soviet arguments that prisoners of war status should not prevent a man being called to account for criminal actions committed by him before he was captured, and that obedience to orders was no justification for throwing women and children into the flames or for executing non-combatants in gas chambers. "The struggle against war crimes is not yet being waged on the proper scale or with the proper speed. In some places political circles in power or—which is sometimes still more convenient—those who are behind the scenes put spokes in the wheel of justice despite the will of the peoples." Professor Trainin especially criticised the London War Crimes Commission for attempting to compile beforehand "a list of all murderers and all traitors" before bringing any of them to justice. "The freedom-loving peoples must act in accord" to punish war criminals in an exemplary manner. "This is the right of the peoples; it is the duty of the governments."

Serious allegations regarding the resumption of international cartel activity were made in a recent article in Krasnaya Zvezda. Representatives of German concerns in neutral countries were stated to have signed documents for the resumption of cartel agreements while the representatives of the German Supreme Command were signing the instrument of unconditional surrender. As has been frequently asserted in the Soviet press, big German firms were stated to have set up new branches in neutral countries, especially Spain, Switzerland, Sweden, Argentina and some other Latin American countries, during the months preceding the end of the war. It was pointed out that the subsidiary enterprises of great German monopolistic firms such as Krupp and the I.G. Farbenindustrie are not subject to Allied control and that it is these subsidiaries that are at present engaged in re-establishing international cartel connections. Many of the above points were reiterated by M. Mikhailov in a broadcast commentary on the subject of cartels. M. Mikhailov also referred to an interview in London between Martin Agronsky (an American radio observer) and one of the directors of I. G. Farbenindustrie, who apparently still expected that this huge chemical concern should be preserved in the Allies' own interest.

A sharp comment on "American colonial opinion" was published in Izvestiya from the pen of its special San Francisco correspondent, M. Zhukov. M. Zhukov admitted the superiority of the United States over Japan in war equipment, but warned the Soviet public against excessive optimism in forecasting the possible duration of the war in the Pacific. On the basis of American reports on military casualties, he stated that "victory over Japan is possibly quite a costly proposition for the United States." Proceeding to the subject of trusteeship in the Pacific area, M. Zhukov quoted certain American authorities to the effect that the attitude of some Powers towards trusteeship deprives the Conference of the support of the majority of the colonial populations. "The American man in the street," he concluded, "is being frankly beguiled by traditional colonial exotic scenes. . . . The colonial propaganda which is zealously tied up with the Pacific war by part of the press reflects the views of those circles which dream of consolidating the victories in the Pacific by creating a substantial colonial fund."

LOW COUNTRIES.

A new movement, which may have considerable political importance, has been started in the Netherlands. This is the Netherlands People's Movement, of which the principles were drawn up by a number of prominent Dutchmen—including members of the Christian Historical, Socialist, and Catholic Parties—during their imprisonment in a concentration camp. The Movement champions freedom, democracy, and patriotism and denounces the class struggle. It appeals to all Dutchmen, irrespective of their Party affiliations, to co-operate in a common effort for the necessary reconstruction of the people's life based upon "personalistic socialism." Professor Schermerhorn, one of the founders of the Movement, has been requested by Queen Wilhelmina to form a new Cabinet in conjunction with Mr. M. W. Drees, a Socialist. It is, therefore, of interest to note that Professor Schermerhorn has expressed the view that the principles of the Movement "offer the only possible basis available at the moment to obtain a workable plan for the future of the Netherlands, because these principles have enough in common with all the trends of thought represented in our nation. Those who will make up the Government must be inspired by these principles. Such a Government may consist of people from various political Parties and of no Party, and there is no reason why the former should not remain loyal to their own Parties."

It may also be noted that Professor Gerbrandy stated at a Press Conference in London on the 1st, that he thought there would be a general trend towards radical Socialism in the Netherlands.

The question of King Leopold has been much discussed in the Belgian Press during the last days. The Communists reiterate their demand for abdication and accuse the King of having always entertained authoritarian and unconstitutional designs. The Socialists also demand abdication. But the Executive of the Party have given a specific reason for the demand. They contend that the King acted unconstitutionally in May 1940, when he refused to accept the advice of his Ministers to leave Belgium with them if the Belgian Army were compelled to surrender. By insisting on sharing the fate of his troops, they argue that he not only violated the constitution, which lays down the principle of responsible government, but also seriously injured the interests of Belgium. This declaration by the Executive will doubtless be debated at the Party Congress which begins on the 9th. The Catholic papers have continued to argue that the King should return and resume the exercise of his regal functions without impediment. They point out that, according to the Constitution, the King can do no wrong and also represent him as a man of noble character, who has suffered much for Belgium, but they do not reply to the constitutional arguments adduced by the Socialists.

On the 4th M. van Acker left Brussels of Salzburg. It is expected that his interview with King Leopold will be followed by important developments.

The Brussels Bourse has reopened in a quiet atmosphere.

FRANCE.

The Syrian crisis and Mr. Churchill's message of the 31st May to General de Gaulle, requesting him to order the French troops to cease fire and to withdraw to their barracks (see "Middle East"), led the General to defend his policy in two public statements. The first, a communiqué published on the 2nd June, said that the French troops had gained control of the situation everywhere except in the Jebel Druse, that their total losses were about twelve killed, and that they had been given the order to cease fire at 11 p.m. on the 30th May (an earlier official version had given the date as the 31st), the day before Mr. Churchill sent his message. The tone and form of this message called for a public reply "which the President of the Provisional Government had judged it preferable not to address to the British Prime Minister." This communiqué was followed later in the day by a press conference at which General de Gaulle read a prepared statement. The conference was reported in full in double-sized papers and was marked by a number of half truths, suppressions of inconvenient facts, and insinuations against Great Britain. After outlining the history of the Syrian problem as he saw it, the General said that France now retained only one power given her by mandate, namely the military command of the Troupes Spéciales, and that French troops in Syria numbered only 4,000–5,000, whereas the British still had some 600,000 men in the whole of the Middle and Near East. He complained that France's position had been complicated by the attitude of the British Government and British agents on the spot. France wished to negotiate treaties with the Levant States which would safeguard her cultural and economic interests and give her possession of certain bases. The General then gave his version of the recent troubles and said that: "To get out of the situation which is evidently very bitter for France" France was ready to negotiate, "but only over the whole matter" and not merely about the Levant States. She was also interested in events in other Arab States and discussions must cover the whole Near and Middle East. Many other Powers, such as the Soviet Union, were also interested in this region and the solution must now be a matter for international co-operation. In conclusion, he claimed that the whole French people was behind the Government on this issue. It is doubtful how far this claim could be substantiated. British press reports suggested that the Government themselves were divided and it is known that M. Bidault has by no means wholly approved the policy pursued during his absence at San Francisco and that he has done his utmost to urge moderation upon General de Gaulle. It also seems clear that there was considerable criticism of the Government at the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Consultative Assembly on the 1st June, and various Resistance papers, in particular Combat, while regretting the manner of British intervention, have been strongly critical of the Government's policy. Unfortunately it appears that the latest British measures to secure order in Syria, such as the imposition of a censorship and the alleged occupation of the Office for wheat distribution, have served only to incense General de Gaulle still more and to strengthen his unfortunate conviction that Great Britain is now carrying out the policy she has long planned of driving the French out of the Levant in order to take their place.

In a lengthy statement in the House of Commons on the 5th June Mr. Churchill replied to General de Gaulle and explained in detail how, so far from stirring up agitation in the Levant States, British influence had been used precisely in the other direction. He had done his utmost to dissuade the French from sending reinforcements to the Levant at the moment when they were making treaty proposals, since this would give the impression that they wished to impose a settlement to be completed under duress. He had told General de Gaulle that he would be willing to withdraw all British troops from the Levant the moment a treaty had been concluded and was in operation between the French Government and the Governments of Syria and the Lebanon. He explained the circumstances leading to British intervention and expressed his regret that his own message to General de Gaulle on the 31st May had reached the General after Mr. Eden had announced it in the House of Commons; no discourtesy had been intended. He also expressed regret that the General had not seen fit to inform His Majesty's Government of the instructions to cease fire said to have been sent to the French military authorities late on the 30th May. He made clear that the British authorities had issued no arms to the Syrian or Lebanese except by agreement with the French. Finally, in answer to a question by Mr. Attlee, he said that his proposal for a tripartite conference still held good, but that the suggestion that it should be a five-Power Conference, bringing in Russia and China, would "cause a great deal of delay and require very careful consideration on many grounds."

On the 29th May the French Press Agency issued a strongly-worded semi-official communiqué about the Reparations Commission. This said that Paris was without information about the constitution of the Commission or where it was to meet and that it was inconceivable that it should meet without French participation. "Moreover," the communiqué went on, "it is learnt that no measures have yet been agreed between the Allies with a view to organising and regulating the recovery and requisitioning of material in German territory. The urgency of this operation for many countries and for France in particular cannot be questioned. It is understood that, during the last few months, the French Government has made several approaches to the Allied Governments, none of which have led to any definite result."

Three changes in the Government were announced on the 31st May. M. Teitgen has been appointed to take M. de Menthon's place as Minister of Justice. M. Soustelle, Regional Commissioner in Bordeaux and former Director of the French Secret Services, has succeeded M. Teitgen at the Ministry of Information, and M. Christian Pineau, a Trade Union leader recently released from Buchenwald, has replaced M. Ramadier at the Ministry of Food. The only alteration in party representation is a reduction in the number of M.R.P. Ministers from three to two by the removal of M. de Menthon. M. Soustelle, a henchman of General de Gaulle, is not attached to any party. There has been general disappointment in the press that the municipal elections did not lead to a radical reshuffle of the Ministry and Communist regrets were expressed in a statement by the Political Bureau of the party, which, nevertheless, undertook to continue to support the Government pending elections to a Constituent Assembly. General de Gaulle recently said that a general election would be held before the end of the year, and it is thought unlikely that there will be any further changes in the Government before the election.

On the 3rd June M. Frenay, the Minister for Prisoners and Deportees, received the millionth Frenchman to be repatriated. He said that within a month or six weeks all the prisoners and deportees would be home. Repatriations from Odessa now number 22,899, but shipping difficulties are holding up further returns and it is hoped that an alternative route may be found for the large numbers of Frenchmen still in Poland. In Paris returned prisoners demonstrated on the 2nd June in protest against the inadequacy of the help given them on arrival in money and in kind. In a broadcast on the following day M. Frenay explained the Government's difficulties.

An exchange of banknotes began in France on the 4th June. This extensive operation, which covers all banknotes of 50 fr. and over, and also Liberation Loan, Treasury bills and other short-term Government bonds, is to be completed by the 15th June. By this date holders of banknotes will be repaid the full equivalent of the notes deposited, which will then cease to be legal tender. M. Pleven, the Minister of Finance, has explained that the object of the exchange was to neutralise the banknotes and bonds removed by the Germans, to make a census of all holdings of banknotes and bonds, and to encourage hoarders to put their money into Government bonds.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The Foreign Affairs Committee of the French National Consultative Assembly was reported recently to have recommended the French Provisional Government to ask the Allies to make a joint step requesting General Franco to abandon power forthwith and to give way to a Government in Spain which would organise a free election without delay. No communication has been received from the French Government on this subject and none is expected. Meanwhile, the Paris Monde of the 23rd May had published a report from San Francisco that the French Minister for Foreign Affairs had agreed that the Spanish Committee of National Liberation should install itself in France. This appears to have been the result of conversations between M. Bidault and Señor Alvaro de Albornoz (Chairman of the Committee) which took place at San Francisco. It has also been reported that M. Bidault recommended Señor Albornoz to come to an understanding with Dr. Negrín. This is easier said than done. The reaction in Spain to the French Foreign Affairs Committee's suggestion was naturally of the coolest. The well-known commentator, Eugenio Montes, broadcast an impolite dissertation on French chauvinism, enlarging on the inveterate French habit of making difficulties for the British, and concluding that the French would try to cover their misfortunes in Syria by meddling in Spain. Incidentally, the Spanish Government have chosen this moment to announce to His Majesty's Government their recognition of the independence of the Levant States, though adding that the decision has nothing to do with present events, having been reached some time early in May.

While all this obviously opens up the possibility of a serious embroilment of Franco-Spanish relations, there is now a chance that the situation may be eased by the solution of the Laval question. Señor Lequerica has told the United States Ambassador in confidence that Laval has now expressed the wish to surrender to the French authorities—a bold decision.

Furthermore, the Spaniards have paid a civil tribute to the late French Minister, M. Jacques Truelle, who died in Madrid on the 30th May. M. Truelle, who had been Free French representative in Spain since early in 1943, was at length received by the Spanish Foreign Minister in August 1944; he had his share of unpleasantness during the period of his semi-official mission—in November 1943, for example, armed Falangists raided his office (see Summary No. 217). While the Spaniards now attribute much good to M. Truelle, it is obviously a matter of some moment who should succeed him at a rather delicate juncture.

In Switzerland an Infante has been born to the Portuguese Pretender, Dom Duarte Nuno. This will obviously rejoice the hearts of the Portuguese Monarchists, who have hitherto found the lack one of their main handicaps. Obviously, the degree of continuity offered by an heirless monarch is not appreciably greater than that offered by the vigorous (if greying) bachelor who sits in the Presidência do Conselho. D. Duarte Nuno's baby may offer him a new argument.

TANGIER.

On the 30th May a Parliamentary Question about the future of Tangier elicited the reply that the matter was under active consideration. The secretary of the Netherlands Embassy and the counsellor of the Belgian Embassy have called at the Foreign Office to make enquiries on behalf of their respective Governments. The Spanish Chargé d'Affaires has also called. He was told that His Majesty's Government had naturally, with the end of the war in Europe, begun to think of the arrangements necessary for the restoration of the international régime, and that it was hoped, after consultation with the other interested parties, to notify the Spanish Government of proposals "fairly soon." The Marqués de Santa Cruz appeared to assume, as was natural, that His Majesty's Government would now be taking steps to reach an agreed termination of an abnormal state of affairs. The Spanish Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs has since broached the question to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, and outlined his own views, which appear to be in favour of a Four-Power control by Great Britain, the United States, Spain and France. The French Government, for their part, have proposed that the 1923 régime should be restored in full, and that pending its restoration the French, as the protecting Power in Morocco, should introduce a force of Sherifian Police for the maintenance of order. Their idea is that the landing of the police should serve as an occasion for a mild demonstration of French, supported by British and American, naval strength. The French Government further propose immediate conversations between the British, French and United States Governments with a view to preparing a joint approach to the Spanish Government and deciding on the steps to be taken to restore an international régime. The British Government and the United States Government, though by no means in entire agreement with the French upon the future, are agreeable to the holding of early conversations, which, however, they consider should take place in London and not in Paris.

ITALY.

The six anti-Fascist parties of the Committee of National Liberation have come to an agreement, mainly owing to the Liberal Party's calming influence, regarding the formation of a new Government and the rôle of the Committees of National Liberation. The Left wing wished to give the Committee a preponderant part in any future Government, but the parties have now, apparently, agreed that the provincial and communal committees shall act as advisory bodies to the prefects. The other committees are to resume a solely political character, while the factory committees are to be transformed into technical organs " in accordance with the needs of production and social justice." This is to last until the Constituent Assembly is formed. Once again the parties have agreed to collaborate closely and not allow their differences to develop into violent disputes. There now remains the task of forming a Cabinet. This will not be easy for, although the important ministries are coveted by both Right and Left, none of the parties seems to be really anxious to assume more responsibility at this juncture than they need. It is apparently realised that this next period, until the formation of the Constituent Assembly, will be extremely difficult and that it will make or break the party in power, and more probably the latter. Signor Nenni, the Socialist Party leader, and Signor De Gasperi, leader of the Christian Democrats, have both been mentioned as possible Prime Ministers, but a note of caution seems to have crept in and Signor Bonomi may, in the end, continue with his somewhat unenviable task.

The French have taken up an even more intransigent attitude with regard to the zones, occupied by their troops, in Piedmont and Liguria. French troops are reported to have occupied fourteen communes in the province of Imperia and to have refused to allow the establishment of A.M.G. Imperia lies more than 20 miles inside the Italian frontier and is no more connected with possible frontier rectifications than the Val d'Aosta. General Doyen, commanding the French forces in Italy, has confirmed this in a letter to General Crittenberger, commanding the American 4th Corps. General Doyen stated that he had received orders from General de Gaulle not to allow the establishment of A.M.G. in any of the areas occupied by French troops. Signor Saragat, the Italian representative in Paris, has protested to the French Government regarding the situation in the Val d'Aosta. The report that the C.L.N.A.I. had authorised the granting of autonomy to the Val d'Aosta is incorrect. A delegation from the Val d'Aosta apparently made representations to the C.L.N.A.I., which acknowledged the note but made no declaration regarding autonomy. The Press reports that the Italian Government has appointed a Commission to study the question in all its aspects.

THE VATICAN.

On the 2nd June, the day of his patron saint, the Pope spoke to the College of Cardinals. As the Vatican wireless had foretold, it was a speech of great political interest. The larger part of it was an authoritative summary and defence of the Vatican's policy towards the Nazis, and a definition of the Vatican's attitude to the German problem to-day. From that, it passed naturally to consider the nature of a true peace and the enemies that threaten it. Although he was speaking to the Cardinals, the Pope gave his Apostolic benediction to " all who share with us in the desire and search for peace," and the breadth of his appeal was emphasised again when he spoke of the German ministers of religion in Dachau, " Protestant and Catholic."

In the early days of Nazism, the Church did its best to stop the spread of its doctrine. When Hitler triumphed in 1933 it signed a Concordat with him. Pius XII's strenuous defence of the Concordat policy shows how alive he is to the criticism it has provoked. His arguments were that since the German Government asked for the Concordat, " responsibility for all regrettable consequences would have fallen on the Holy See," had it drawn back. The German bishops and the majority of German Catholics approved. The Holy See had no illusions about Nazism. It had no intention of giving approval to its doctrines. It sought only the welfare of German Catholics; and the following years proved that the Concordat had shielded them from worse evils. One argument shows a profound insight into German character: " the Concordat gave Catholics a juridicial basis for their defence and for opposition." Much space is devoted to Pius XI's flaming indictment of Nazi ways and theories, the Encyclical Mit brennender Sorge of the 14th March, 1937; but Pius XII adds what seems a criticism of his predecessor's political wisdom: " the reaction of those who had been inculpated was inevitable . . . . 1937 was a year of indescribable bitterness for Catholics." During the war, Pius XII pursued a less direct policy. He " constantly opposed the laws of humanity and Christian faith to the ruinous application of Nazi teaching." This seemed to him " the only efficacious way of proclaiming the moral law to the world and confirming German Catholics in the ideals of truth and justice," and he sees a proof of the success of this method in the fact that the papal message of Christmas 1942 was expounded to Catholics in Germany. Perhaps it should be said of the 1942 message that, although racialism and suchlike Nazi doctrines were condemned and Christian truth proclaimed, neither National Socialism nor Germany were mentioned by name, and the Pope spoke " to the whole world."

After recalling the number of priests, mainly Poles, who died in Dachau, the Pope condemned Nazi attempts to prove the Church the enemy of the German people, an allegation to which the present Pope and German Catholics are supersentitive.

True peace, he continued, must eliminate social and economic conditions that may again lead to war. It must " affirm human dignity and order in liberty, as did Magna Carta which closed a dark era of violence." Will leaders learn this, or will the powerful force their ways upon the weak? Are hopes to be measured by the " killing of priests, the deportations and arrests without trial that go on in Slovenia, Croatia and other regions"; or by the moral aims which responsible statesmen profess? The Pope has always called this a " fratricidal " war. For him peace means the brotherhood of all men.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The main task of the new Ministry of Rehabilitation will be the settlement, or resettlement, of the displaced persons and refugees of whom Hungary now contains large numbers. These include refugees from one part of Inner Hungary to another, persons swept away with the retreating German armies, as fugitives, conscripts or slave labourers, and also refugees from outside the Trianon frontiers. The Roumanian Government has consented to take back some of the refugees from Transylvania; but it is reported that many Magyars have been and are being expelled, without prospect of return, from Slovakia, Ruthenia and Northern Yugoslavia. (For the attitude of the new Czechoslovak Government towards minorities, see Summary No. 289.)

Tass reports that Archbishop Gross, the Acting Primate of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary, called upon the Russian Political Adviser of the Allied Control Commission to present the thanks of the Hungarian Roman Catholic Church to the Soviet Government, the Commander-in-chief of the Red Army and the Soviet Military authorities for the friendly attitude they had shown.

The United States Government has announced that it is prepared to accept immediately an unofficial Hungarian representative whose sole function would be to protect the interests of Hungarians in America. Final approval for this must, however, be given by the Allied Control Commission.

Roumania.

The trial of " war criminals " proceeds according to plan. Owners and editors of newspapers which circulated during the Antonescu régime are at present being dealt with. Meetings have been held in Bucharest at which members of the Government, as well as others, spoke, apparently doing their utmost to prejudice public opinion against the accused while their trial was still in progress. At the same time the Communist-controlled newspapers plead for severe punishment for the accused. Others, including Scânteia which is decidedly Communist in outlook, take another line. Scânteia gives an example of a camp where the inmates were well treated, and praises the humanity of the commandant. But Jurnalul de Dimineață and Semnalul were suspended for a period covering VE-day on flimsy excuses, no doubt for fear that they might not deal with the subject in a manner acceptable to Roumania's rulers. The reason given for the suspension of Jurnalul de Dimineață was that it had appeared in bad type! It would be difficult to find a Roumanian newspaper which did not appear in bad type, though some are worse than others. The complaint against

Semnalul was that it had been guilty of lès-majesté in printing a photograph of Stalin on the same page as an article entitled "The Dog Hibernates."

The accused journalists pleaded guilty, but asserted that they were working under orders from the Government of the day, and had no choice in deciding the policy of their papers. The prosecution admitted this, but still asked for their punishment for the "immense guilt of contributing to the country's catastrophe."

The earlier batch of accused who have been condemned to death have had their sentences commuted to hard labour for life. The King was advised to take this course by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, who had previously obtained the approval of the Soviet Government. The ground for this action was that those sentenced so far were the minor criminals, and that the trial of the chief culprits was still to come.

Surprise and resentment have been caused in Roumania by a broadcast made by the B.B.C. on the 26th May, which is said to have consisted of Communist propaganda, and to have borne no relation to the truth. The broadcast apparently emphasised the support which the Government enjoys, and the progress in "true freedom" which the country is making.

The house of General Radescu, who recently left the protection of the British Legation for his own home under a guarantee from the Soviet and Roumanian authorities that he would not be molested, was raided on the night of 1st June by an inspector and twenty men of the Siguranța, who asserted that they were searching for evidence against a Roumanian who shared the same house and who was away from home. The general was not molested. The search lasted for three hours and nothing was found.

Yugoslavia.

Trieste has been quiet. All ranks of Allied troops are reported as resenting the Yugoslav persecution of the city's inhabitants. Reports of the food shortage and of Cardinal Schuster's initiative in sending supplies were denounced by Radio Belgrade, which then announced that 30,000 kilog. of lard, 10,000 of tinned meat, 70,000 of flour and 2,400 of sugar had been sent to Trieste from an unnamed source.

Reports of events in Fiume have now come in, and state that the Yugoslavs entered the city on the 3rd May, after the Germans had evacuated it on the previous night; that on the same day Fiume was declared annexed to Croatia; that all official acts are in Croat, and non-Croat-speaking officials have been dismissed; that several leaders of the autonomist movement were murdered; that men under 46 have been conscribed, and doctors, veterinary surgeons and mechanics despatched into the interior of Yugoslavia.

On the 2nd June the British and American Ambassadors presented to Kardelj, in the absence of Tito, notes and a draft agreement providing for the division of Venezia Giulia into Allied and Yugoslav zones of occupation and for the withdrawal of Yugoslav troops to the east of the demarcation line. The Soviet Government had been previously informed of the contents of the agreement.

The Yugoslav press has been loud in its abuse of the "so-called provincial Government of Carinthia," and of the Allied military authorities for permitting such "Fascists" to persecute the Slovene population. As has been pointed out under "Austria," A.M.G. have not at present recognised a provisional Government of Carinthia. Accusations against the Allies of harbouring Slovene "quislings" have also been made.

Radio Belgrade has also criticised the present British Government, saying, "Apparently Churchill could not form a representative Government. Over 90 per cent. of his new Government are Tories."

After the movement of Yugoslav troops into Austrian Styria comes the news of a demonstration in the thoroughly Austrian district of Radkersburg in favour of annexation to Yugoslavia.

It is announced by Borba, the Communist paper, that up to the 15th May, 85,000 tons of supplies were delivered to Yugoslavia by Military Liaison and U.N.R.R.A.

Although Bulgaria is still technically an enemy State, the arrival of a Yugoslav Minister in Sofia has now been followed by that of a Bulgarian Minister, M. P. Todorov, in Belgrade.

The unification of the Yugoslav peoples, which is the partisan movement's proudest boast, has received the support of a law promulgated by A.V.N.O.J. [Note: Since A.V.N.O.J. is not in session, presumably its presidium is meant], which provides penalties up to death for incitement to racial or religious discord or for discrimination against Yugoslav citizens on racial or religious grounds. "Scientific criticism of religions" is not to be an offence. The presidium has also provided for the confiscation of profits acquired during the war and exceeding 25,000 dinars (about £125); for the return to its former owners of property confiscated during the enemy occupation; and for the protection of State property, which, with the addition of that of convicted persons, amounts to "great wealth." Even moderate critics of the Yugoslav régime assert that great popular dissatisfaction is being caused by the manipulation of "elections," the numerous trials and the slender chances of acquittal of persons brought before the military and civil courts.

Zhujovitch, the Finance Minister, lecturing a conference of delegates from Serbian district committees, assured them that the new dinar was backed by the Yugoslav gold in foreign banks. He denounced as "speculation" the unwillingness of the peasants to sell when there was nothing for them to buy; and as "bureaucracy" the slow working of the State salt and tobacco monopoly.

The Communist party of Serbia, at their recent conference, are said to have decided to extend the transitional period before the establishment of the State's economic dictatorship from five to ten or fifteen years.

Greece.

The former leader of the Greek Communist party, M. Zachariadis, is now back in Athens, where he will undoubtedly play an important part in directing the policy of his party. After his release from Dachau he gave a brief interview to the Paris correspondent of Embros, in which he defined his aims as genuine popular democracy, national independence, close co-operation in the Balkans, and more general co-operation in Europe. Speaking of Greek national claims, he said that in the Dodecanese and Cyprus, where the majority of the population was indisputably Greek, the population should decide its own fate. On the other hand, to raise claims to Northern Epirus and Eastern Roumelia was simply to endanger Balkan peace and co-operation. As was to be expected, M. Zachariadis's views produced a storm of protest in the press and from the leaders of the older political parties, all of whom have, at one time or another, declared in favour of claiming Northern Epirus from Albania and of demanding considerable "rectification" of the frontier with Bulgaria.

The trial of the Puppet Ministers, which has dragged on since the 21st February, has at last been concluded. Opening as it did just after the conclusion of an armistice with E.L.A.S., it was not surprising that the atmosphere of the trial reflected the opinion then prevalent in many circles in Athens, i.e., that E.L.A.S. and the Communists were far more dangerous than collaborationist ex-Ministers and that membership of a Puppet Government or of the Security Battalions was at worst a venial offence. There seems to have been throughout the proceedings an unfortunate lack of dignity, and, as reported in Summary No. 282, the defence caused a great deal of delay in the early stages of the trial by pleading to jurisdiction; they finally succeeded in obtaining a declaration by the court that it would suspend, even if it passed, any death sentences. Many of the political witnesses were interrogated on points of opinion rather than of fact, and a good deal of the evidence would certainly not have been admissible in a British court. General Tsolakoglou, the first Puppet Premier, who signed the armistice in 1941, has now been sentenced to death, but Radio Athens states that the sentence is to be commuted to one of life-imprisonment. Two Puppet Finance Ministers, MM. Kotzamanis and Tsironikos, were also condemned to death; the two other Puppet Premiers, Professor Logothetopoulos and M. John Rallis, were sentenced to life-imprisonment. Other former Ministers received terms of imprisonment varying from eleven to five years; six were acquitted. The court declared that in its findings it did not take into account the organisation of the Security Battalions by any of the accused, as it considered that those who organised them had done so simply with the purpose of maintaining order against criminal elements.

M. Varvaressos has now been sworn in as Vice-Premier and Minister of Supply. He has assured His Majesty's Ambassador that he is prepared to impose taxes on the wealthy and to institute rigorous economic controls on the British model.

Albania.

In Scutari and its neighbourhood, according to recent reports, the provisional Government has established complete control although it is distinctly less popular than in the South. Material conditions are also better in the North. There is enough food there and roads and bridges are on the whole in fair condition. In the South, on the contrary, there has been great devastation. In many places houses have been destroyed but the inhabitants, being dependent on their land for a living, cannot move elsewhere but try to subsist among the ruins in spite of appalling conditions. Although in a fertile area like that between Durazzo and Valona there is plenty of food, the destruction of roads and bridges prevents its transport to the area further south where there is a grave shortage and under-nourishment. The problem thus created was aggravated by the influx of 18,000 Chams (Moslem Albanians; see Summaries Nos. 286 and 287) from the Greek side of the frontier. These people first abetted the Italian invader and then helped the Germans against the Zervas forces. When the Germans departed the Chams fled into Albania to escape reprisals. Under an E.A.M.–F.N.C. agreement, however, some 5,000 Chams returned to Greece last January. Not unnaturally they were attacked by the Greeks whose thirst for vengeance was sharpened by the desire to dispossess them of the rich plain land which they monopolised. All the Chams are now in Albania.

Bulgaria.

A few days ago a woman who had been secretary to Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, the former leader of the Agrarian party, jumped to her death from the fourth floor of the central police station in Sofia after being foully tortured by the militia, the Communist-run force which now polices the country. This leaves little doubt as to what would be the fate of Dr. Dimitrov himself if, before guarantees had been obtained for his safety, he were to leave his sanctuary in the house of the United States political representative which is now watched by militia and plain-clothes police. The commandant of the Soviet forces in Bulgaria has spoken of Dr. Dimitrov as a criminal under Bulgarian law and a Fascist, and the Foreign Minister has tried to make out that Dr. Dimitrov impeded Bulgarian co-operation against Germany by conducting a pacifist agitation in furtherance of the policy of the Agrarian party. Dr. Dimitrov's sole offence, if the truth be told, is that, in the eyes of the Communists, his prestige with the Agrarian party is still such that he is the great obstacle, actual or potential, to the establishment of a Communist régime. In her short existence of nearly seventy years Bulgaria has certainly never brought democracy to a very high level. There has been constant resort to the revolver and brutality in order to settle acute differences. But Dr. Dimitrov can hardly be blamed if he clings to Western ideas of democracy, even as known in Bulgaria, and refuses to compound with communism, in the belief that his country has passed the stage where one-party Government is for the common good.

While his personal safety has been a matter of diplomatic negotiation Dr. Dimitrov has been formally expelled from the Agrarian party at a meeting rigged by extremists, unfounded statements have been broadcast to the effect that the party unanimously condemns his policy and the near-Communists have continued to sap the position of the Agrarian party; they have got seats on its executive committee; they are introducing disciplinary courts into the party, with the right of expulsion; prominent individuals unsympathetic to Communism are weeded out; a new committee has been set up in the Young Agrarian League with the avowed object of purging it of Right-wingers.

The People's Court has ceased its work. According to the Bulgarian authorities it passed the following sentences: death 2,850 (of which 2,025 have been carried out), life imprisonment 1,366, various terms of penal servitude 4,652, "provisional" 690, and acquittals 1,494. But besides all this a large number of people—perhaps as many as 30,000 or 40,000—have been shot or otherwise killed without even the pretence of a trial.

Turkey.

The long-awaited Land Reform Bill was recently laid before the Grand National Assembly. The aim of the Bill is to transform Turkey into a country of small-holders. It provides for the distribution among the landless peasants and immigrants of Turkish race of State and former ecclesiastical ("vakif") lands, uncultivated and reclaimed lands, and lands owned by individuals in excess of 5,000 dönüms (about 4½ sq. kilom.); for compensation in the form of State bonds to dispossessed owners; and for the grant of loans to the new proprietors—free of interest and repayable over twenty-five years—to assist them in stocking and equipping their farms. Special provisions are included in the Bill to prevent the partition of these holdings through inheritance.

Following the somewhat acrimonious debate on the budget, the Minister of Commerce has tendered his resignation. Rail Karandeniz, Deputy for Trebizond since 1931 and President of the Economic Commission of the Assembly, succeeds him.

While expressing, in connexion with the general election in Great Britain, admiration for British democratic institutions, the Turkish press has manifested some anxiety lest the resignation of Mr. Churchill's Coalition Government should result in a weakening of Britain's foreign policy.

The press and radio in Turkey fully support the Syrian and Lebanese Republics in their efforts to achieve complete independence. Ulus deplored the fact that Turkey's relations with the Republics were not as friendly as they might be.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Last week the situation in Syria went from bad to worse. Fighting between the Syrians and the French (which had already broken out in Hama and Homs) spread on the 29th May to Damascus, which up to that date had remained fairly quiet. Firing began at 7 p.m., and was followed by French shelling of the town both on that night and the next. Two great fires about a mile apart were started in the centre of the city. Many buildings were hit, including the Orient Palace Hotel and the Chamber of Deputies, which is said to have been more or less ruined.

There seems to be no evidence for the French contention that the Syrians first attacked their installations in Damascus, though there were individual attacks by Syrians on French personnel and vehicles. In any case the shelling of a thickly-populated and venerated city like Damascus is, in the circumstances, inexcusable. It is, in fact, a tragic repetition of what occurred in October 1925 when, by the orders of General Sarrail, then High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief, Damascus was bombarded by French troops. Grievous damage to the city was caused on that occasion, which has never been forgotten or forgiven by the people of Syria, although the French Government of the time tacitly admitted the error by immediately recalling General Sarrail from his post. The total number of casualties during the present troubles is not yet accurately known, but as stated by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on the 5th June, the official casualty figures for Damascus are: killed, gendarmes, 80, civilians 400; seriously wounded, 500; injured, 1,000. These figures are, of course, approximate.

On the 31st May Mr. Eden made his third successive statement that week in the House of Commons on the situation in the Levant. After reporting the shelling of Damascus, the bombing of the city from the air, and the cutting of telephone communication between Damascus and Beirut, Mr. Eden stated that we could "no longer stand aside," and that the Prime Minister had sent the following message to General de Gaulle: "In view of the grave situation which has arisen between your troops and the Levant States and the severe fighting which has broken out, we have with profound regret ordered the Commander-in-Chief, Middle East, to intervene to prevent a further effusion of blood in the interests of the security of the whole Middle East, which involves communications for the war against Japan. In order to avoid collision between British and French forces, we request you immediately to order the French troops to cease fire and to withdraw to their barracks. Once firing has ceased and order has been restored we shall be prepared to begin tripartite talks here in London."

This message had the desired effect and on the next day Mr. Eden was able to inform the House of Commons that General Humblot, Commanding French Forces in Syria, had received instructions from Paris not to oppose the orders of the British Commander-in-Chief. It has since been reported that General Oliva Roget, French Delegate in Damascus, left for France by air on the 4th June.

The French bombardment of Damascus actually ceased after the morning of the 31st May, though individual French soldiers continued to fire at random from roof-tops and doors. News of the decision of His Majesty's Government authorising British forces to intervene became known in Damascus by the evening of that day, and was warmly welcomed not only in Syria and the Lebanon, but throughout the Arab World. Shukri Quwatli, the President of Syria, who has been confined to his bed with a severe illness, expressed his profound gratitude to Mr. Shone for the action taken, and assured him and General Paget that all possible assistance would be given by the Syrian Government to the latter in his task of restoring order and security.

French troops have since been evacuated from Damascus under British escort, and the latest reports show that more normal conditions are gradually returning, although the bazaars had not yet opened on the 2nd June. There is no doubt that the prompt arrival of British troops, coupled with the French order to cease fire, prevented a bad situation from becoming worse. But if more reinforcements were to be landed at Beirut in the near future, as seems to be the French intention, further trouble would be certain, and we are doing everything possible to persuade the French to cancel the order.

Gratified as they are with British action, the Syrian Government, like that of the Lebanon, have nevertheless shown anxiety about the proposed tripartite discussions; and the Syrian President said that, after what the French had done in the four principal cities of Syria, "he would cut off his hand" rather than sign a treaty with the French. Both he and his Ministers, indeed, made it clear that they could not now co-operate with the French in any way.

(See also under "France" and "United States of America.")

The situation in the Levant States has been the chief topic of discussion in all neighbouring countries. The Egyptian Prime Minister made a statement in the Senate on the 28th May. After referring to the causes of dispute between the Levant States and the French, Nokrashi Pasha said that his Government had notified the Governments of Great Britain, Russia and the United States of recent events, and had made clear that the Levant States had the support of the Egyptian Government and that of other Arab States. In the course of his speech, Nokrashi Pasha spoke as follows: "The Covenant of the League of Arab States provides that its signatories shall co-ordinate their political plans to achieve co-operation between themselves and to safeguard their independence and sovereignty. . . . The Egyptian Government supports with all its strength the Syrian and Lebanese Governments in their attachment to complete independence and full sovereignty. I am sure of the solidarity of the States members of the League, whose Covenant lays down that the Council of the League will take all necessary measures to repel aggression committed against any one of its members."

Egyptian public opinion is severely critical of the French attitude, and holds that a satisfactory solution of the problem is of great importance to the Middle East as a whole and cannot be solved without due regard to the prestige of all Arab States. Anti-French demonstrations took place in Cairo on the 31st May and on the 1st June; and a petition was presented at the Palace demanding the immediate withdrawal of French forces from the Levant. At the opening session of the Arab League Council in Cairo on the 4th June, gratitude was expressed to Great Britain for her intervention, and to the United States and Russia for their support.

Nor has Iraqi interest in recent events in the Levant abated. On the 28th May the Prime Minister of Iraq told His Majesty's Ambassador that he intended to repeat at the meeting of the Arab League in Cairo on the 4th June much of what he had said to the representative of The News of the World (see Summary No. 295). The Levant States would never agree, he said, to the French retaining any military footing there, but as all the Arab States together were not in a position to fight France, they must look to Great Britain to restrain de Gaulle who was "acting like Hitler." He regarded the presence of British forces as the one stabilising element in the situation, and he proposed to emphasise this at the meeting of the Arab League and to move that His Majesty's Government should be asked not to withdraw their troops.

The announcement, a few days later, that we had intervened had an excellent effect in Iraq. An important meeting of Iraqi tribal shaikhs had been held in Bagdad on the 28th May, but instead of taking action as they had at first intended, they confined themselves to thanking the British for once more coming out as the friend of the Arabs. It is certainly a matter for satisfaction that the shaikhs have behaved so calmly, and that the Iraqi Government has shown such good sense in recent days.

VE-Day in Palestine was regarded by both Arabs and Jews as the signal for intensifying the political campaign. The Jews celebrated the day by ebullitions of strong nationalist sentiment; and in Tel Aviv few flags were in evidence except the blue and white banner of Zionism and a few red flags displayed by the Communist groups. Jubilation at the downfall of Germany was overshadowed for the Jews by their disappointment at the failure to secure a political settlement of the Palestine problem favourable to Zionism. There was widespread demand for free immigration into the country, with emphasis on the establishment of a Jewish State.

Arab reaction, on the other hand, was more superficial, and tended to be influenced by Jewish demonstrations, Arab flags becoming more in evidence in response to the Zionist display. Some anxiety too was felt that the end of the war might mean the end of prosperity, and that political decisions subject to Jewish pressure were at hand.

During the month of May there was a recrudescence of Jewish terrorism instigated by the Irgun Zvai Leumi. Telegraph poles were damaged; mortar bombs were fired on police stations and other places, and the oil pipe-line was damaged by explosions in two places. This return to terrorism has caused some anxiety to the Jewish Agency, and has inspired articles in the Jewish press condemning terrorism. At the same time hints from "official" Zionist quarters have been dropped that Jewish public opinion is not necessarily so opposed to terrorist activities as to provide assistance in its suppression.

The Persian Prime Minister, Ibrahim Hakimi, who only took office at the beginning of May, resigned the premiership on the 3rd June, after receiving only twenty-five votes from the Majlis in a vote of confidence.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 29th May the Japanese Ministry of the Navy announced important changes in the highest naval posts. Admiral Soyemu Toyoda, Commander-in-chief of the Combined Fleet and also of the recently created over-all Naval Command, has been replaced by Vice-Admiral Jisaburo Ozawa. Admiral Toyoda becomes Chief of the Naval Staff in place of Admiral Oikawa, who has been made a Supreme War Councillor. Vice-Admiral Takijiro Onishi becomes Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff. Vice-Admiral Ozawa was born in 1886; he rose to be Chief of Staff of the Combined Fleet in 1937, Director of the Naval Torpedo School in 1938, Director of the Naval Academy in 1941, and Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff in 1944. Vice-Admiral Onishi has been prominent in the Japanese naval air arm and became Director-General at Naval Air Headquarters in 1942 and Director-General in the Aeronautical Equipment Bureau of the Ministry of Munitions in 1943. In November 1944 he was appointed commander of the Japanese naval air forces in the Philippines. It was pointed out by "quarters close to the Ministry of the Navy" that both Ozawa and Onishi had long experience in the Fleet Air Arm and their appointment signified determined action by the Japanese Navy in carrying out the decisive battle for the defence of the Japanese mainland.

The Nippon Times (2nd June) admitted "shockingly great" damage to Japanese cities from the heavy American incendiary raids, but declared that the Japanese people had shown that they could endure these onslaughts and that the attempt to break their morale had failed. The people had shown their fortitude in the great earthquake of 1923; now the destruction was even greater, but Japan was "even more resolute than ever to combat the unspeakable enemy with whom there can be no compromise." Domei (30th May) said that more than half of Tokyo had been destroyed, that the familiar features of the streets and thoroughfares had been completely changed so that it was hard to know what the ruins had formerly been. Communications were much interrupted and many workers had to walk to their factories. However, the Mainichi (2nd June) claimed that the "severe damage" to railways in the Tokyo area had been repaired in twenty-four hours. The Asahi (1st June) said that the famous Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo was very nearly destroyed when the gale blew flames from the burning neighbourhood across to the roof of the inner sanctuary, but the Shrine Preservation Corps managed to put the fire out. Except for one section Yasukuni still stood amid the ruins of the surrounding residential districts.

One aftermath of the Tokyo raids has been the resignation of Tsuneo Matsudaira, who has been Minister of the Imperial Household since 1936. Domei (4th June), in announcing this, said that it was believed that Matsudaira held himself responsible for the partial destruction by fire of the Imperial Palace in the raid of the 25th May. The new Minister of the Imperial Household is Sotaro Ishiwata (for Ishiwata's career see this Summary, No. 282).

Domei (3rd June) said that the situation in Okinawa "could not be viewed with optimism." The Americans were attacking with all their available forces, they had penetrated into Naha and Shuri and had advanced to Inabushi about three kilometres beyond Yonabaru. They had also repaired the airfields damaged by Japanese airborne units. However, Domei claimed that the American task forces had suffered "crippling blows" at the hands of the Japanese Special Attack Corps. [Admiral Spruance recently declared that the Okinawa campaign had cost the United States' Navy the heaviest operational casualties it had yet sustained.]

The Nippon Times (4th June) said that the United States had launched an extensive propaganda campaign to induce Japan to surrender and that American aircraft had dropped leaflets urging the Japanese to sue for peace if they wished to be spared the horrors of further bombing. The Nippon Times asserted that this showed that the United States was anxious for an early peace because her people were weary of the sacrifices and privations of war. Japan was fighting for her very existence, for the "emancipation of the oppressed kindred peoples of Asia and for the principles of moral justice which alone could lead the world to harmony," and she could consider no peace with compromised these objectives.

The chief news of the week from Chungking is that of the appointment of Dr. T. V. Soong as President of the Executive Yuan and of Dr. Wong Wen-hao as its Vice-President. T. V. Soong has been Acting-President of the Executive Yuan since the 4th December, 1944; his new appointment will not add to his actual powers, but will increase his prestige in Chungking and also in connexion with his forthcoming visit to Moscow. The appointment of Wong Wen-hao as Vice-President is of significance, as Wong is also Minister of Economic Affairs and Chairman of the War Production Board. He is a man of Liberal and progressive views and his new appointment is probably intended by the Generalissimo to counter-balance the influential position of the Conservative group in the Kuomintang, which was strengthened by the proceedings of the Kuomintang Sixth National Congress and of the following Plenary Session of the Central Executive Committee. Chiang Kai-shek himself, as Director-General of the Party, Commander-in-Chief of the Army and President of the National Government, remains, as ever, in supreme control. H. H. Kung is now largely eclipsed since he has lost the Vice-Presidency of the Executive Yuan as well as the Finance Ministry. He remains, however, a member of the Standing Committee of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang and will still wield considerable influence.

The first Plenary Session of the newly-elected Kuomintang Central Executive Committee concluded a four days' meeting on the 1st June. It resolved to leave all matters concerning the convocation of the National People's Assembly to the Standing Committee of the C.E.C., except the date of convocation, which had been fixed for the 12th November by the Sixth Party Congress. It also decided that the Supreme National Defence Council should continue to function and that among the tasks of this body should be that of framing regulations to govern the organisation of political societies. The C.E.C. further decided that the Kuomintang Party programme, formulated by the Sixth Party Congress, should be referred to the various Ministries and departments of the Government whose duty it would be to put the programme into effect. This is to be accomplished within three months and the Kuomintang Central Supervisory Committee is to see that it is done.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In a message to Congress on the 1st June President Truman gave the American people a salutary reminder of the difficulties which confront them in finishing the war against Japan. He pointed out that, in spite of her heavy losses of aircraft and shipping, Japan has now a much smaller area to defend and an industrial output which is still very considerable, that as her situation becomes more desperate suicidal attacks may be expected to increase and heavy casualties may be inflicted on American forces. Although two million men were being demobilised, there could be no release of naval personnel until Japan was defeated. Within a year the United States would have seven million men in the Pacific, that is, double the number used in the European theatre. While the war continued, food, clothing, petroleum products, lumber, chemicals and many other commodities would remain in short supply. The Message concluded with a reaffirmation that while the United States had no desire or intention to destroy or enslave the Japanese people, "only surrender can prevent the kind of ruin which they have seen come to Germany as a result of continued useless resistance." The Japanese were hoping that "the temptation to return to the comforts and profits of peace will force us to settle for some compromise short of unconditional surrender. They should know better . . . . we will see this fight through to a complete and victorious finish." The New York Times describes this message as "combining confidence, determination and realism," and it has been well received in all quarters.

Another important pronouncement during the week was the "Report on the San Francisco Conference," broadcast by Mr. Stettinius on the 28th May. It surveyed progress so far and expressed confidence "that we will succeed in writing a strong and democratic Charter solidly based on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with which we started." After alluding to the admission of Argentina, whom the United States expected to carry out all her commitments under the Mexico City Declaration, and to the unsolved Polish problem, the American Secretary of State went on: "I wish to make it absolutely clear that the primary objective of United States foreign policy is to continue and strengthen, during the period of peace, that war-time solidarity which has made possible the defeat of Germany. This is as true of our relations with the Soviet Union as it is of our relations with Great Britain, China and France."

At the end of his long address Mr. Stettinius summarised "the major considerations which must govern our foreign policy": total victory over Japan, full collaboration with other great nations to secure the supremacy of justice, better social and economic conditions, a realisation that "we live in a world where the sovereignty of no nation, not even the most powerful, is absolute." Mr. Stettinius went on to say: "The interests of the United States extend to the whole world. We must maintain those interests in our relations with the other Great Powers, and we must mediate between them when their interests conflict among themselves." This stress on mediation was regarded by some sections of the American press as a change of position and warmly approved; it is interpreted to mean that the United States will be able to "remedy" situations considered liable to arise through clashes between the views of Britain and Russia.

In the complex Levantine crisis, the United States Government has given support of the British attitude. A note which the American Ambassador handed to the French Foreign Minister on the 28th May earnestly urged the Government of France "carefully to review its policy towards Syria and Lebanon, with the purpose of finding a way to make it clear to those countries and to all the world that in its dealings with the Levant States France intends to treat them as fully sovereign and independent members of the family of nations." President Truman disclosed on the 1st June that he was in daily communication with Mr. Churchill on the subject, and Mr. Grew, Acting Secretary of State, told journalists on the 2nd June that he had received the French reply, but refused to comment further. It was left for Mr. William Phillips, personal assistant to the Secretary of State, to expound the official American view. At a dinner of the Institute of Arab-American Affairs in New York on the same day he told his audience that the United States "welcome the development of Arab co-operation" as evidenced by the recent decision to form a League of Arab States. "The United States could not ignore recent events in Syria and Lebanon . . . . We have been in constant touch with all parties involved and sincerely hope that the British troops already on the spot will be able, with the co-operation of both sides, to prevent further bloodshed." Among the press and radio commentators there has been strong criticism of French action, coupled with the customary suspicion of Britain's motives, though Raymond Swing, George Fielding Eliot and others who have been most critical of British policy in Greece and elsewhere, approve what they describe as Britain's rôle of "policeman" in Syria. General de Gaulle's suggestion of a Four-Power conference to negotiate "the question of the whole Arab world" should, in the opinion of the Washington Post and other newspapers, be taken up without delay. (See also under "France," and "Middle East.")

The lesson drawn by some commentators from the Syrian imbroglio is that, were the present Soviet proposal at San Francisco in operation, France would have been able to veto all discussion of the question by the projected Security Council. The Russian insistence on this rigid interpretation of the Yalta decision on voting has added to the concern with which relations with the Soviet Union are regarded. Hopes are placed on the missions of Mr. Joseph Davies to London, which has now concluded, and that of Mr. Harry Hopkins to Moscow, from which his departure has been postponed for a few days. The announced cordiality of the negotiations in Moscow is thought to augur well for the Big Three meeting in the "not very distant future."

The British Parliamentary Election is being closely followed. With the exception of a few Left-wing spokesmen, the return of a Conservative Government is frankly hoped for by the majority of influential writers and broadcasters, not only so that Mr. Churchill may be available for meetings of the Big Three, but because his party is considered more pledged to the Pacific war, and he is seen as a strong bulwark against Socialism.

An emergency plan designed to tide over the difficult transition period, when men will be demobilised from the armed forces faster than they can be absorbed into industry, was put forward by the President on the 28th May. He suggested to Congress that the Federal Government should make grants to the forty-eight State Governments enabling them to pay larger benefits to the unemployed than they receive now. He asked for the speedy passage of emergency legislation giving unemployed men and women "at least 25 dollars a week" for twenty-six weeks in the year. By leaving the payment of benefits in the hands of State Governments, Mr. Truman's proposal avoids the accusation that a national dole would involve infringing State Rights. Existing Social Security legislation, operative only since 1937, provides for a flat 1 per cent. contribution from employers and employees alike, supplemented to some extent by the public assistance schemes of the various States. The Wagner–Dingell Bill, already before both Houses of Congress, provides for raising the compulsory contribution to 4 per cent. each by employer and employee, and is coupled with a health insurance scheme and the extension of the old-age pension scheme to embrace 15 million more farm workers, also domestic servants, professional and small business men. This proposal for a permanent Social Security code envisages the setting up of federal machinery, such as employment exchanges, for its administration throughout the United States, but, as President Truman pointed out, "Congressional deliberation on the broad issues will take time. . . . I earnestly hope, therefore, that the appropriate committees of Congress will undertake immediate consideration of the emergency problem."

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 1st June the Argentine Government published the Charter of the Political Parties, the results of the labours of a Commission appointed last November. Designed to "secure that parties shall be authentic organisations at the service of their country," and that their members shall be "fully conscious of the nation's needs," the Charter (which runs to 109 pages) requires the agreement of at least 1 per cent. of the electorate in a district before application can be made for the legal recognition of a party. The party programme must not advocate the use of force to suppress or alter the Constitution or present institutions; and the armed forces, police and judiciary are not allowed to belong to parties. A federal electoral court in Buenos Aires is to be the supreme electoral authority and can punish irregularities, including failure to vote; it will also control party budgets. Other electoral tribunals are created in the provincial capitals. According to the preamble, the Government now believes that "democracy is the only form of social organisation compatible with human dignity, and the spirit of the Argentine people is identified with democracy." The Minister of Finance has stated privately that parties will be free to resume their activities from the 1st August. In the present state of public feeling this would appear to be the equivalent of suicide on the part of the régime, and it is indeed difficult to believe that this can be Colonel Perón's intention. In any event more than laws are needed to purify Argentine politics.

Meanwhile, Mr. Stettinius's remarks about the Argentine Government, quoted in last week's Summary, have drawn a riposte from the Argentine Minister for Foreign Affairs, who, on the 29th May, stated that any doubts that his Government would fulfil their obligations could only arise from an "incomplete understanding of the Argentine situation." The Government, he maintained, had achieved it first task of "purifying the country" and raising the standard of living of the "disinherited classes," and were now entering upon the new stage of returning to normality. Dr. Ameghino complained of the "unfair opinions" that were being expressed about the Argentine Government, when it was "in fact engaged in constructive constitutional work."

A very different picture was presented by the Buenos Aires correspondent of the New York Times (1st June), who has produced a despatch violently condemning the Argentine régime. Mr. Cortesi emphasises the wholesale arrests that have filled the prisons, the restoration of political censorship, and the closure of eight newspapers in May alone, and declares that he has seen police directing the traffic, revolver in hand. This despatch has attracted considerable attention and no little criticism of the State Department and of Mr. Warren's Mission (see Summary No. 290). President Truman has told a group of Latin American newspapermen that he is "not very happy" about the situation in Argentina.

President Vargas, speaking at Juiz de Fóra (Minas Geraes), has reiterated his desire to leave office and retire to private life.

A further plot against the Colombian Government (see Summary No. 285) has been reported by various broadcasting services. According to Press reports, the Republics of Guatemala and El Salvador have now agreed to become a single State: it is reported that their respective Presidents will resign (see Summary No. 294). Such amalgamations have, of course, occurred before in Central America, but their duration has hitherto been limited. The projected union, should it be realised, will be peculiar in view of the opposing political complexions of the two régimes, and also in that the two countries were on the verge of hostilities a bare six months ago.

The rejection at San Francisco of the Guatemalan amendment on Trusteeship (see Summary No. 295) has caused some bitterness in Guatemala, where there has been an outburst of agitation in the Press over the question of British Honduras.

UNITED NATIONS.

The San Francisco Conference.—The Conference has reached a deadlock in the same field as that which produced the deadlock at Dumbarton Oaks—the question of the "Great Power veto." The Dumbarton Oaks deadlock was supposed to have been solved by the Crimea Conference formula, which dealt with the disputed issue as follows: (a) "Decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters should be made by an affirmative vote of seven members"; (b) "Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters should be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VIII, Section A, and under the second sentence of paragraph I of Chapter VIII, Section C, a party to a dispute should abstain from voting." (The passages referred to are those concerning (i) the peaceful settlement of disputes by the Security Council; (ii) reference of disputes by the Council to regional agencies for solution.) This formula ensures that, if a Great Power is a party to a dispute, it cannot veto the discussion or investigation of the dispute by the Council nor any recommendations by the Council for a peaceful settlement; but it could veto any decision to take "enforcement action." The formula, however, is open to the interpretation—which is maintained by the Soviet Government—that a Great Power which is not a party to a dispute can veto any proceedings on the Council in connexion with that dispute (including discussion, investigation and recommendation). It is on this extreme interpretation of the "third-party veto" that the deadlock has occurred.

The British delegation (with the strong support of the Dominions, led by Australia) had previously hoped that all stages of Council proceedings up to but excluding enforcement action might be free of the third-party veto. But they found there was no chance of Great Power agreement on this wide ground; and it might indeed have led to difficulties. For example, the Council might have passed, by the necessary seven votes, a recommendation for a peaceful solution, against which four of the five Great Powers had voted. The British view now is that the third-party veto should operate on questions of investigation and recommendation, but should not operate to prevent discussion and consideration of a dispute, for which purpose it is contended that an unqualified majority vote should suffice. They point out that Section VIII (A) 4 of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals expressly requires the holding of such discussions in certain circumstances, since it lays down that when the parties to a dispute have failed to settle it by peaceful means the Council should decide whether the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger security and accordingly whether the Council should take measures for its solution.

The British view has the support of the United States, China, France, the Dominions and probably of the great majority of the other smaller States, who have naturally wished to restrict the Great Power veto. There seemed to be hope of complete agreement on these lines until the question was referred to Moscow. The Soviet Government have rejected the Anglo-American view as to the intention of the Crimea formula and are reported to have recalled to Moscow M. Sobolev, the Soviet expert principally concerned in these "veto" discussions.

It is important to notice that the Soviet Government do not question the principle that a Great Power party to a dispute shall not be able to veto discussion, investigation, or recommendation for a peaceful settlement of that dispute. But they hold that on all other matters arising on the Council, except procedural matters (see (a) of the Crimea formula quoted above), the Great Power veto remains; and they take a literal view, with reference to Chapter VI (D) of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, of what constitutes a "procedural matter." In particular, they reject the view that the consideration or discussion of a particular dispute can be regarded as a procedural matter. There is evidently something to be said for the view that the decision to discuss a particular dispute would not normally be called "procedural." (Nor would recommendations for the post of Secretary-General or for amendments to the Charter—two other points on which the question of the operation of the veto has been raised.) But, apart from subtleties of interpretation, the strong feeling of the British delegation and of those who share their viewpoint is that a nation party to a dispute should have every possible opportunity to state its case before world opinion, and that the free ventilation of the issues involved is of value even if no agreed recommendation follows.

The Soviet Government also point out that there is a continuous link between the decision by the Council to consider a dispute and the series of possible consequent decisions up to and including sanctions, and they argue that if the later stages of this process are admittedly subject to the veto the first stage should be also, since discussion is useless and may even be harmful unless followed by some form of action. This is not so strong a point, as the Soviet Government have already agreed that, in the case of a party to a dispute, the veto should operate in the last stages only.

In connexion with the debate about procedure it may be recalled that on the League Council any member, whether party to a dispute or not, was able under Article 5 of the Covenant to veto a decision; but procedural matters did not require unanimity. The League Council found itself able to discuss particular questions at considerable length and with considerable moral effect by using "procedural" resolutions, e.g., the appointment of Committees to report on special points, or the asking of an Advisory Opinion from the Permanent Court of International Justice. Such reports and opinions could then be "received," though not "adopted" or "acted on," without requiring unanimity. But these methods, too, would appear to be an enlargement of what would normally be called decisions on procedure.

The whole issue cannot for the present be taken further at San Francisco and will have to be resolved at a higher level.

Other United Nations Organisations.—The War Crimes Commission held its first meeting in London on the 31st May. Lord Wright indicated the necessity for central machinery to deal with criminals whose responsibility was not limited to localised offences and who could not, therefore, be dealt with by National Courts. In reply to a parliamentary question on the organisations concerned with European relief and reconstruction, the Prime Minister gave a list of these organisations. It included the new Emergency Economic Committee (see last week's Summary) and a new European Coal Organisation, which at present has the same members as the Emergency Economic Committee with the addition of Denmark, and which has held its first meeting in London.

GERMANY.

FOR the second time within a week, Field-Marshal Montgomery, General Eisenhower and Marshal Zhukov have met on occupied German soil. On this occasion—the 10th June—the meeting took place at General Eisenhower's headquarters at Frankfurt-am-Main, where Marshal Zhukov decorated his British and American colleagues with the highest Soviet military award, the Order of Victory. The Quadripartite Control Commission, provided for in the second official statement issued by the four Allied Powers on the 5th June (see last week's Summary) has not, however, yet begun to function either from Berlin or from any other centre. A process of adjusting the areas actually occupied by the British and American forces to the areas of the agreed zones of occupation is now taking place.

In a message to the German people broadcast from the Hamburg radio the same night, Field-Marshal Montgomery explained why members of the Allied armed forces are not allowed to fraternise with German civilians. This time, he stated, the Allies were determined that the German people should learn their lesson once and for all—not only that they were defeated, but that they as a nation were again guilty of beginning a war and that they were responsible for their leaders.

In an equally significant proclamation which he issued on the 10th June, Marshal Zhukov granted all non-Nazi Germans in the Russian zone permission to proceed unhampered with the organisation of anti-Fascist political parties and of free trade unions to carry on collective bargaining with their employers. This proclamation followed a short period in which the Russian-controlled Berlin radio abandoned its normal emphasis on the conciliatory policy of the Red Army authorities towards the German population, and it was accompanied by a statement that the Red Army would, like the Western Allies, enforce some form of non-fraternisation order. It suggested that all German political parties aiming at the final eradication of National Socialism would be tolerated by the Russians but added that these, along with the trade unions, must publish a programme of their activities and submit a list of their executive officials. Presumably a careful scrutiny of the programmes and personalities concerned will in the end decide whether all the parties will in fact be allowed the complete freedom to organise and to propagate their views which Marshal Zhukov's proclamation promises. In the politics of occupied Germany, as elsewhere, it is clear that the Soviet authorities are already gravitating slowly towards the idea of a " popular front " of the Left, and remnants of the more conservative anti-Nazi groups, such as those represented, for example in the abortive Putsch against Hitler of the 20th July last, may find themselves labouring under some disadvantages when the time to bid for a wider following in Germany arrives. Neutral correspondents visiting Berlin again for the first time under Russian occupation have been impressed by the absence of any reference to Field-Marshal Paulus or the Free German Committee of General von Seydlitz, and conclude that the captured German Generals in Moscow have outlived their usefulness with the conclusion of hostilities. The Russian-controlled " German People's Station," which during the previous weeks had given considerable emphasis to the development of good relations between the German people and the occupying Russian authorities, announced on the 3rd June that it was speaking for the last time and has not, indeed, been heard of since.

On the 6th June, the Russian press published a map of the Russian zone of occupation in Germany, showing this as including, not only the eastern provinces, but also Thuringia, Mecklenburg, almost the whole of Saxony and the Baltic coast up to, but not including, Lübeck, which is in British hands. Towns in Central Germany, like Leipzig, Chemnitz, Halle, Dessau, Weimar, Jena, Eisenach and Magdeburg, which are still occupied by United States troops, were included. A similar delimitation of the British, American and French zones has yet to be published.

Serious handicaps are already being felt in the preparations for this year's harvest in the British and American zones, despite the determined drive by Military Government to make the land yield its maximum. Although 85 per cent. of the fields of Oldenburg are stated to have been sown, the general shortage of fertilisers is expected to result in crops far below the average. The Colorado beetle has become a serious pest in Bavaria, and a violent hailstorm which swept the local countryside on the 30th May has been found to have destroyed the rye and rape crops completely in some areas. With the gradual migration homewards of the several million Allied nationals and prisoners of war who previously constituted the main labour force on the German farms, the provision of native agricultural workers to take their place has become one of the most difficult problems with which Military Government has to contend. Fourteen special demobilisation centres have now been set up in the areas of North Germany under British occupation to get men of the German armed forces back to agriculture as quickly as possible, and the first batch of 300,000 on the Second Army front are stated to have already received their discharge papers and to be on their way home to the farms. In all zones, the principle that those who refuse to register for work on the land, or wherever else they may be directed, will not be allowed to register for rations, has already had to be enforced. Large numbers of workers who have been directed by Allied labour control officers to Germany's slowly reviving industries have latterly been found to be taking considerable time off to search for food in the agricultural districts further afield, and long columns of persons have been observed daily on the road leading from the Ruhr, where food is scarce, to the relatively rich Westphalian " larder " to the north.

In many parts of Germany the new pattern of ordered economic life continues to emerge satisfactorily. German railway workers, assisted by men impressed from other trades, are reported to be working hard under Military Government control to restore the Reichsbahn network, half of which is already usable again in the British and American zones. Trains are running on the Leipzig–Paris line, transporting French workers back to their homes. The railway repair shops at Nied and Frankfurt-am-Main are busy again. There is, however, an acute shortage of spare parts for locomotives, and almost the entire stocks of coal of the Reichsbahn would appear to have been pilfered by the German population. A branch of the Boach factory has resumed work at Frankfurt-am-Main, as has the " Miag " plant at Brunswick, which used to produce Messerschmidt fighters, but which is now manufacturing agricultural implements. The Frankfurt-Hoechst laboratories of the I.G.-Farben chemical concern are again producing insulin, and the Merck factory at Dortmund is manufacturing much-needed medical supplies. In the South, the Munich Chamber of Commerce has recommenced its activities, with special departments for crafts, trade and industry. More branches of the Reichsbank are expected to reopen shortly in Western Germany, where the Heidelberg branch, with supplies of cash amounting to 19 million Reichsmarks, has already resumed its activities. Some economic controls enforced by the Nazis—particularly in the field of prices and labour—are having to be retained for the time being in all zones. The Berlin radio, however, has promised farmers who grow more than their quotas that they will be permitted to sell their surplus in an open market.

Progress towards a more normal administration of justice has been made in the West with the establishment at Coblenz of the first German Superior Court (" Obergericht ") to work under the supervision of Military Government. This Court will deal with German cases involving more than 1,500 Reichsmarks, and its jurisdiction will extend over an area normally containing a million inhabitants. It will not, of course, deal with military charges. At the same time, Berlin radio has announced the reopening of a number of district courts (" Amtsgerichte ") to handle civil litigation, with a higher court, corresponding to what used to be the Oberlandesgericht, to hear appeals. One of the most common offences with which the Allied Military Tribunals still have to deal, sitting as they frequently do in the German Criminal Court buildings, is the unauthorised possession of property belonging to the British and American armies; another is the failure of German civilians to report the possession of hunting rifles and other firearms. The looting of farms is apparently a crime which frequently claims the attention of the Allied authorities in the Munich area.

To the growing list of high Nazi officials already in Allied hands have now been added the names of the Duke Carl Eduard of Coburg and Gauleiter Rudolf Jordan of Magdeburg-Anhalt, whose captures were announced on the 8th June. The Duke of Coburg, a grandson of Queen Victoria and reigning head of his line until 1918, was President of the German Red Cross, Nazi Member of the Reichstag and a high officer of the N.S. Motoring Corps. The head of the foreign branch of Himmler's Security Police, SS-Brigadeführer Walter Schellenberg, is stated to have been located in Sweden and to be living in Stockholm under supervision. Units of the American Third Army are reported to have found the former Gauleiter of Vienna and first Nazi Youth leader, Baldur von Schirach. The elusive Ribbentrop is still at large.

AUSTRIA.

The heads of the British, United States and French Military Missions, which arrived in Vienna on the 3rd June, had an interview with the Soviet Commandant of Vienna on the 4th June. It was arranged that technical reconnaissance should be made jointly by the three missions, while general reconnaissance for accommodation should be made by each mission independently. On the evening of the same day, the three heads were received by Marshal Tolbukhin, who was very cordial but insisted that the task of the missions must be completed in the shortest possible time, and that as soon as this was done they were to return for the purpose of reporting to their Governments. He said that this had been agreed to between the Prime Minister, President Truman and Marshal Stalin. On the 6th June the Allied Missions were informed that their task should be finished on the 10th, and that they would be expected to leave on the 11th June. The Russians refused to allow the missions to carry out reconnaissance in the Vienna Gau outside the old city limits, although the purpose of the missions was to inspect the whole Vienna Gau and all the airfields within it. It was clearly the Russian intention that the British, French and Americans should be confined to the joint use of Tulln airfield; and that only the city of Vienna, and not the Gau, should be sub-divided into the four Allied zones. A later report states that the heads of the British and United States Missions have protested against the limitation of reconnaissance, and it would seem that they have now been permitted to extend it to the airfields outside the old city area which are under Marshal Tolbukhin's command, that is on the west bank of the river It was expected that the missions would leave Vienna, as requested by the Russians, on the 11th June, and it is hoped that when they have made their reports to their Governments, a decision as to the zoning of Vienna can at last be reached in the E.A.C.

The Viennese have apparently greeted the Allied Missions with enthusiasm. Reports from the city indicate that the food situation is unsatisfactory, but is improving. Transport has been commandeered by the Russians, thus crippling industry, distribution and hygiene. Water and electricty are generally restored, but disease caused by bad water is not yet under control. Banks and most shops are shut.

On the 5th June Vienna Radio reported that Dr. Renner had taken the oath at a Cabinet meeting of the Provisional Government, and had then proceeded to swear in the other members of the Cabinet. One of these, Ernst Fischer, the Minister of Education, gave the opening address at a series of extension lectures held at Vienna University. Station Austria, on the 8th June, said that text-books used in schools before 1934 were now being used, and that new text-books were already in print for the first two forms. In future all children were to receive free text-books. The State Food Office was starting a large-scale school meals scheme, and special help was being given to those children who had been excluded from school education by the Nazis. The teaching of Russian and English was to be considerably extended. Vienna Radio announced that all secondary school-children in Vienna were to report to their schools between the 11th and 15th June.

Other members of Renner's Cabinet have been prominent this week in announcements concerning Trade Unions, which are being re-established in the Russian zone of occupation, and the formation of the "Austrian Economic League" (Wirtschaftsbund). On the 10th June Vienna Radio gave news of the first issue of the "journal of the Trade Unions Association and Social Insurance Institutes" Der Österreichische Arbeiter und Angestellte. Ernst Fischer wrote the leader, and Böhm (Minister of Social Welfare), described as "Provisional Chairman" of the new Association, urged the need for a strong and united Trade Union movement. It was a great step forward, he said, that to-day all workers, irrespective of party, belonged to the Association—only Fascists were excluded. The law relating to workers' councils was again in force. Trade Union representatives were again to have a vote in all legislative bodies, labour exchanges, and social welfare institutions.

At a meeting of the "Austrian Economic League," the President, Raab (Minister of Public Works and Reconstruction), said that the most important prerequisite for reconstruction was transport. Negotiations abroad for the purchase of equipment must be begun immediately. The second prerequisite was the decision as to who should be permitted to enter economic life from the political point of view—this must be established by the competent State offices. The third urgent necessity was the rebuilding of the heavily-hit tenement buildings.

Heinl (Minister of Industry) said at the same meeting that as long as the present state of emergency lasted, Austria needed a comprehensive rationing system, the direction of production, and the supervision and control of prices, foreign currency and export policies. Everywhere to-day economy was State-directed. A somewhat different point of view was expressed by Dr. Ernst Robitschek, speaking from Vienna on the 5th. A member of the Christian Social Party, like Raab and Heinl, he described the Wirtschaftsbund as the "association of all independent workers" and said that it was of the opinion that State direction of economic life must be "reduced to the extent made necessary by the requirements of taxation and inspection." He expressed the hope that a well-organised tourist traffic organisation would put Austria in the first rank of States visited by foreigners.

On the 6th June, a broadcast from Station Austria (a Russian-controlled station), speaking of the "Julius Deutsch group of Social Democrats in New York," approved the bulletin issued by them, which contained praise of the news broadcast from Vienna and Graz, and criticism of the Anglo-American silence, broken only by Field-Marshal Alexander's proclamation to the Austrian people.

It was reported that on the 21st May, Gruber, head of the Innsbruck resistance, called Christian Social and Social Democrat representatives together in Salzburg to propose the establishment of the resistance movement as a united body "for relations with the Military Government." The leaders of the two parties declined this proposal, maintaining that their parties, with the Communists, already co-operated and consulted each other. It was said that two-thirds of the resistance members were Social Democrats of Christian Socials, who now wanted their parties for political expression. The resistance as such had therefore no useful post-war function. It was reported by Vienna radio on the 7th June that Gruber had been appointed Landeshauptmann of the Tyrol (which is in the United States zone).

Yugoslav accusations that the British and Americans are supporting a "Nazi" Government in Carinthia are completely unfounded. It appears that a Provincial Government of Carinthia was formed, with the tacit consent of surrendered Nazi and Reichswehr groups, to take over the administration from Gauleiter Rainer, who was forced to resign on the 7th May. On the 8th May British troops entered Klagenfurt, and the Provincial Government at once offered its services to A.M.G. Certain Nazi officials were removed, and the "government" was officially told on the 28th May that it was not recognised by the Allies though on 5th June the formation of a "consultative committee" was announced. All the members were vetted and approved by A.M.G. Some members of the Provincial Government were included, others were dropped and some well-known anti-Nazis were included. The Yugoslav allegation that the local "liberation committee" was arrested is untrue. A committee consisting of Yugoslav military personnel, with two Yugoslav civilians, had been elected. This was dissolved by A.M.G. on the 25th May. There is no evidence of victimisation of the Slovene minority. A split in the ranks of the Communist Party in Carinthia is reported, one section supporting Yugoslav claims, the other opposing them.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Among the matters discussed on the 3rd and 4th June at the meetings which His Majesty's Ambassador, Mr. Nichols, had with President Beneš and Dr. Clementis, Acting Foreign Minister, was the Czechoslovak claim to the Glatz (Kladsko) salient. In a note addressed to the Governments of the United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R., France and Poland, Czechoslovakia announced its intention of occupying the whole of the Glatz district. The claim is based on its 200-year ownership by the Bohemian Crown, prior to its seizure by Prussia in 1742. Dr. Clementis asserted also that it has geographical affinities; in actual fact, it consists of a mountain-fringed basin with its highest rim towards Bohemia, drained through a narrow gap by the River Neisse into Lower Silesia, to which German province it is attached. Passes connect the region with Bohemia, and there are—or were until the Nazis came to power at least—remnants of the Czech-speaking minorities. The Czechoslovak action is prompted by the appointment of a Polish administrator (M. Piaskowski) for Lower Silesia, which is within the Soviet-occupied zone. Posters, it was stated, had appeared in Glatz itself, claiming it to be immemorial Slavonic territory torn from Poland. Having so far received no satisfaction over the Těšín (Teschen) area of Silesia, the Czechs did not wish to be forestalled over this claim, while yet recognising the fact that a final settlement would be made by the Peace Conference. His Majesty's Government in acknowledging the note points out that for the time being the supreme authority is of course the Allied Control Commission in Germany.

President Beneš expressed himself strongly over his resolve to maintain an open and independent Czechoslovakia. It is his fervent wish to preserve a balance in foreign relations between the east and the west. He said that he had been amazed by the warmth of his reception everywhere, and by the respect and trust shown for his authority, which had never been greater. Similarly, members of the late London Government had also been well received, and the reputation of the Czechoslovak fighting units from the west, which are to form cadres in the formation of an entire army unit, stands particularly high. The more battle-scarred Russian forces, very popular to begin with, had become less so, and this was expected to reflect upon the election campaign (Beneš hopes the voting will take place before December) which the Communists are pursuing with much vigour. Difficulties with the Russian forces were attributed to the complications of the command (elements of three armies are involved) and to the character of some of the troops, particularly those of Marshal Malinovsky's command. Discipline had at first been poor; there were instances of looting, raping and so forth, and other signs of long campaigning and social backwardness; punishment had been extreme, and conditions considerably improved. The President told the British Chargé d'Affaires on the 7th June, and M. Zorin confirmed to Mr. Nichols later, that Marshal Malinovsky's men, and Roumanian forces associated with the Red army, would be immediately withdrawn from Czechoslovakia. Radio Praha announced too that the Red army under General Eremenko were being withdrawn from Olomouc in North Moravia. The withdrawal of all Allied forces from the country is indeed one of the paramount desires of the population.

The President confirmed reports that the Czechs and Slovaks were filled with hatred for the German and Hungarian peoples. The population was restless, and pressing for an early solution of the minority problem. It had been expected that the minority problem would solve itself, by the people retreating before the Red army, but the rapid advance from the west had prevented this. In a very powerful speech on the 10th June before a gathering in commemoration of the Lidice massacre (attended by the Diplomatic Corps) Dr. Beneš once more laid responsibility for Nazi criminality upon the German nation as a whole and upon the Sudeten Germans in particular; a solution of the minorities problem was essential to avoid a repetition of the betrayal of 1938. Steps are in fact already being taken in the Border Regions by the various agricultural and trade union bodies appointed by the Government to carry out the confiscation of property and to settle Czechs and Slovaks there. The Slovak authorities have ordered the expulsion of all Hungarians who settled in Nové Zámký after the Vienna Award of November 1938 and the Czech authorities are negotiating for the expulsion of about 150,000 Reich Germans.

During recent weeks, U.N.R.R.A. supplies shipped from the United States via Constanza have been received by the appropriate departments in Bohemia and Slovakia. The Czechoslovak Minister of Food, M. Majer, announced on the 4th June that 18,000 tons of goods, mostly agricultural and medical, had been received so far, but that it would be necessary to increase this amount enormously, and that other ports besides Constanza would be needed to handle it.

POLAND.

The clearing of the air in the relations of the Big Three Powers at San Francisco has extended to the problem of the Moscow consultations; and invitations have now been issued by the Allied Commission to three Poles in London, to five in Poland, and to certain members of the Warsaw Administration, to consult with the Commission in Moscow on the formation of the projected New Provisional Government on the basis of the Crimea decisions.

From London MM. Mikolajczyk and Stanczyk will represent the Sikorski tradition; while another delegate may be invited to represent the "pro-Lublin" elements outside Poland. From Poland the veteran ex-Premier and Peasant leader, Wincenty Witos, has been invited, with two eminent Professors, Kutrzeba and Krzyzanowski; M. Zulawski, perhaps the best known Socialist leader; and M. Kolodzieiski, an organiser of the Co-operative Movement. The Warsaw Administration is expected to send MM. Bierut, Osobka-Morawski, and M. Gomolka. The consultations will thus include the best known leaders of the Peasant Party and the Workers' Party; and some of the best known Socialists, Co-operators and leaders of the intelligentsia.

The opening of consultations will mark the first step in the carrying out of the Yalta agreement.

After a rapid tour of Poland, Dr. Hewlett Johnson, the Dean of Canterbury, and Mr. D'Eye, organiser of the Workers' Educational Association for Kent, have given it as their impression that the Warsaw Administration has established itself on a solid basis, particularly through land reform and the army. The desire and need for relations with the English-speaking Powers were generally evident.

Complaints continue to be made from Poland that officers of the Polish forces in Western Europe are dissuading or preventing Polish "displaced persons" from returning to Poland. The "Lublin" Polish Press Association announced on the 8th May that the "Allied Occupation Command" in Germany had consented to the direct repatriation of Poles in Germany to Poland, and that delegates were going from Warsaw to organise repatriation. The same press association's representative in London, Dr. Jagodzinski, obtained much publicity through his arrest on the 8th June by the City of London Police, after he had been posted as a deserter by the Polish authorities under the statutory procedure of the Allied Forces Act. The Polish authorities seem to have had no intention of making a martyr and to have decided spontaneously to release him at once.

SOVIET UNION.

All the Moscow papers on the 6th June published the declaration on the defeat of Germany and the assumption of supreme authority over Germany by the Governments of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States and

C266273

France. The Soviet press also published, for the first time, a map distinguishing the Soviet zone of occupation from the area to be occupied by British, American and French troops. A note was added to the effect that "it is obvious that at present part of the Soviet occupation zone in Germany is still occupied by British and American troops." Commenting on the declaration, Izvestiya said: "These documents will go down in history as the first big step towards the political and military consolidation of the great victory. They testify to the victorious Powers' unity and co-ordination of action, to their determination to use a firm hand to neutralise Germany as a hotbed of aggression and disturbances in Europe and the world." Krasnaya Zvezda on the 9th June, whilst welcoming the declaration, noted that several organs of the British and American press had been reserved and perhaps intentionally ambiguous in their comments on its significance. "This reflects the uncertainty regarding the policy of the ruling circles of these countries on the German problem in connexion with the present alignment of internal political forces, and also, undoubtedly, the intensive pressure of the most reactionary elements, not only in America but also in Britain." It is clear that the evolution of British and American policy is being watched with an anxious eye in Moscow.

Tass on the 4th June issued a denial of a statement attributed to Senator Brewster, to the effect that German specialists, lawyers and business men were being liquidated in the Soviet-occupied areas of Germany. Such allegations were scandalous fabrications, Tass declared.

"The return of the spectres" to France in the shape of former politicians was viewed with alarm by Major Izakov in Pravda (4th June). German fascism in its death throes had played a mean trick on France by returning Pétain, who, even in his capacity as defendant, would provide a rallying point for reaction. More dangerous however was the resurrection of such political corpses as Daladier, Reynaud, Sarraut and Delbos, whom Reuter was actually tipping for high posts in the French Government. These men had brought about the fall of France, and they now yield place to men of the resistance movement; if the latter lacked "parliamentary manners" so much the better for them. It is interesting that M. Herriot was not mentioned.

The departure of the Normandie squadron from Moscow is proceeding in a warm atmosphere of Franco-Soviet cordiality. Several of the pilots have received decorations on the occasion, and General Petit, head of the French Military Mission in the U.S.S.R., has been awarded the Order of the Red Banner.

Sporadic attacks on the Vatican in the Soviet press have been growing in number during the past fortnight, and have now culminated in a vigorous criticism of the Pope's recent address to the College of Cardinals in an English broadcast from Moscow (9th June). Surprise was expressed that the Vatican should allege that it had boldly lifted its voice against Nazi crimes throughout Hitler's régime, while all the world knew that any Vatican action in the pre-war period was merely devoted to allaying fears of the Nazi danger, and to protecting Hitler and Mussolini. The speaker went on to contend that the attitude of the Vatican during the war derived logically from its pre-war benevolence to Nazism and Fascism, and contrasted the Pope's message of congratulation to Hitler on the latter's escape from assassination with his silence over the revelations of the concentration camps and over the bombing of London. The Pope was further accused of attempting to provoke disagreement among the United Nations by insinuations against the Soviet Union in his speech. The report of the Pope's recent benediction of General Franco was also singled out as an example of Papal predilection for the remnants of Fascism, while considerable publicity was given to the story that 50 soldiers of the Blue Division had recently arrived in Rome where they were receiving sanctuary in the Spanish Embassy to the Vatican. These reports incidentally were denied the next day by that Embassy.

The régime of General Franco has come under increasing fire in recent weeks, in particular for its harbouring of Laval and Degrelle "and other war criminals." M. Ehrenburg, writing in Moscow News, in an article subsequently broadcast in Spanish, urged the definite overthrow of the present régime in Spain. "To leave Franco in power amounts to preserving the focus of infection."

Indignation with the Argentine's "pro-Fascist policy" and with "her military ruling clique" is expressed almost daily by the Soviet press and wireless. In a Tass communiqué from San Francisco, Izvestiya's special correspondent sneered at "the quandary of the optimists who predicted the Argentine's transformation and reappearance with a virginal, pure and new democratic face" following the invitation to the San Francisco Conference. Another Moscow broadcast spoke of the "vicious censorship, wholesale arrest of democrats, overflowing prisons and deportations to distant parts of the country" which prevailed in the Argentine. No opportunity is lost of criticising the short-sightedness of the original invitations asking Argentina to participate in the Chapultepec and San Francisco Conferences in the hope of her regeneration, and it has been alleged that the Falange has sent several hundreds of Nazi war criminals "as missionaries, travellers or business men" to Latin America, mainly to the Argentine.

The recent Kuomintang Congress and the Kuomintang leadership in general were sharply criticised by Professor Krainov in a long article in Izvestiya. The undemocratic composition of the Congress and the nomination of party bureaucrats and Government officials was stressed, while the old charges against the Chinese military leaders "more concerned with liquidating partisans . . . . than fighting the Japanese" were reiterated. The Kuomintang leadership was indicted for repudiating "a policy of national unity by declining Communist and democratic proposals for a coalition democratic Government." All progressive forces in China and abroad, alleged Izvestiya, support the Communist proposals. The terms of this article suggest that the Soviets will take a firm line in the forthcoming discussions in Moscow with Mr. Soong, and do not augur an easy course for his mission.

Analysing the attitude of the Great Powers to problems of "colonies, dependent countries and international trusteeship," M. Leontev (Pravda) emphasised the swing over of the United States from its original standpoint to the British point of view. The part played by the Soviet Union in upholding the right of nations to self-determination and complete national independence was strongly stressed. The necessity for a radical solution of the colonial problem was illustrated by the Syrian crisis, which was represented as a colonial dispute between France and Great Britain "reeking of oil" (see under "Middle East").

The Soviet trade union journal, The War and the Working Class, which has appeared since June 1943 under this title, will appear henceforth as New Times. In an editorial recapitulating the policy of the journal since its inception it was stated that all "actions, views and concepts inimical to the cause of mutual understanding among the Allies" had been denounced. The responsibility of the working class in the forthcoming peace-making period to rout the forces of international reaction and fascism was stressed, as was the need for unity and solidarity of the working class and its trades union organisations. Finally, it was alleged that the Soviet Union was the only country in which there were no public circles opposed to international co-operation based on the just principle of complete mutual respect for legitimate rights and vital interests. In the future New Times will work on behalf of lasting peace and friendly co-operation among the freedom-loving nations and will resolutely combat everything that tends to undermine this co-operation."

SCANDINAVIA.

King Haakon arrived in Norway on the 7th June, an anniversary with associations both sad and proud in the Norwegian mind, since it was not only the date of the King's departure from his country in 1940, but also that of the resolution of the Storting claiming independence from the Union with the Swedish Crown in 1905. He enjoyed a most enthusiastic reception.

In a press interview published on the 6th June, M. Nygaardsvold announced that his Government would submit its resignation at the first council held after the King's return. This took place on the 12th June, when the Government was asked to continue in office pending the formation of an interim Government on a coalition basis, to serve until the next elections, which have now been fixed for the 8th October. Chief Justice Paal Berg, leader of the Home Front, is considered a probable choice for Premier, if he will accept office.

It has been decided to recall the old Storting on the 14th June, in spite of the objections entertained in some quarters to this procedure. Political opinion in Norway has been insistent on this step, mainly upon constitutional grounds. The Conservative Party, at a meeting held on the 26th May, unanimously recommended the summoning of the Storting, and the Liberal Executive followed suit on the 31st May, while the Communists are long known to have advocated this procedure, in spite of their lack of parliamentary strength. The functions of the old Parliament will probably be limited to the ratification of emergency decrees promulgated during the war.

General Thorne, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Military forces in Norway, announced on the 7th June the transfer of complete responsibility for civil administration to the Norwegian King and his Government. This, with certain reservations designed to cover military requirements, is stated to mark the conclusion of the "military period" of reconstruction.

The shipping of food-stuffs from Denmark to other countries has been delayed by a strike on the part of the seamen. The Danish Government is energetically endeavouring to mediate a settlement, since the supplies are badly needed and delay might cause waste of agricultural produce.

General Lindemann, who was at first permitted to act as a medium for the transmission of Allied orders for the withdrawal of German forces in Denmark, was arrested at his headquarters on the 4th June, after complaints in the Soviet press, and these headquarters were taken over by British troops on the 6th June. Other important Germans recently arrested are von Best and SS Police Chief Pancke, the latter of whom was found hiding in Flensborg.

On the 5th June, Denmark received an official invitation to join the San Francisco Conference. The vote in favour of this course on the executive committee was unanimous. The principal Danish representative will be M. Kaufmann.

The Soviet press has recently been generally critical of Sweden, and in particular of the anti-Russian line taken in certain organs of the Swedish press. Some tension has been occasioned between the two countries by a report to the Riksdag regarding the storming and looting of the Swedish legation in Budapest by Russian troops in the middle of May. A female member of the legation staff is alleged to have been violated and a safe broken open and rifled. This contained a large amount of money deposited there by Jewish refugees.

On the 2nd June the Swedish Government announced legislation intended to procure the control and return of property stolen by the Germans and lodged in Sweden. A panel of lawyers has been appointed to consider claims for restitution.

Speaking on the 5th June, Professor Ohlin, Swedish Minister of Trade, advocated a plan of common citizenship for all Scandinavians which would enable citizens of all the Northern countries to work wherever they might wish within the Scandinavian area.

It was announced on the 3rd June that agreements reached by the Ministry of Supply with Finnish producers for the purchase of timber and wood pulp in Finland had been ratified by the Finnish Government. Helsingin Sanomat, the 5th June, welcomed this development in a leading article, pointing out that the Soviet Union could not require Finland's principal exports—timber and paper—to the full extent of her productive capacity, and that England had always been the principal customer for these products.

Dr. Ryti, ex-President of Finland, was reported on the 8th June to have resigned his position as chairman of the Bank of Finland. His removal from this post has been under discussion for a considerable time.

LOW COUNTRIES.

Recent Dutch statements give further information about the problem of reconstruction in the Netherlands. A distinguished engineer states that "with the aid of America the Island of Walcheren and the Polder of Wieringermeer could be dried before the year is out. All the other inundations will be past history within a few weeks. But we cannot say yet, of course, how much damage has been done to the soil." The same authority calculates that, owing to the flooding, the Netherlands have lost for the time being the produce of 250,000 acres of arable land. But there are other urgent tasks to be tackled besides draining; over 1,500,000 land mines are estimated to have been laid by the Germans in the Provinces of North and South Holland; fortunately most of them are on the beaches and the dunes, not in the fields. Again, public utilities in the Western Netherlands can work only to a very limited extent, until coal can be brought by barge from the Limburg mines. But it is not expected that the Maas will be navigable until the 20th August.

According to Professor de Vries, conditions of life in the Netherlands will not, at the best, become normal before five years have elapsed. Moreover, the prosperity of the Netherlands will in any case, largely depend upon conditions in the German hinterland. Professor de Vries holds that the Netherlands, which have a surplus agricultural population and a great need to increase agricultural output, should annex an area of German soil as large as that of the three or four Northern Dutch Provinces and capable of taking a population of about two million.

On the 6th M. van Acker returned to Brussels from Salzburg, where he had been received by King Leopold. On the 7th M. van Acker stated at a Press Conference that while the King's health had improved, he was not yet able to return to Belgium, but that he would shortly take a decision. M. van Acker added that he had given the King a detailed account of the political situation in Belgium.

The Belgian Press continues to publish polemical articles about King Leopold. No new arguments of importance have been put forward, but there is general agreement that the present state of uncertainty cannot continue much longer. The Socialist Congress (see last Summary) has expressed its agreement with the line taken by the Party Executive. The Standing Committee of the Liberal Party has voted a resolution to the effect that it is not for Parliament to seek to influence the King's decision whether or not to resume the exercise of his regal functions, but that public opinion is divided on the subject, and that it is to be hoped that the King's decision will be such as to ensure the maintenance of tranquillity and the regular functioning of Parliamentary Government. The Committee added that they were opposed to Liberal participation in the Government, unless these questions were unequivocally settled.

FRANCE.

The Levant crisis has called forth further French statements during the week. On the 5th June, the day on which the Prime Minister made his statement in the House of Commons and said that the British proposal for a tripartite conference still held good (see last Summary), the French Council of Ministers met and issued a communiqué endorsing General de Gaulle's suggestion for a Five-Power conference and saying that they were proposing that "within the framework of international co-operation and with the assistance of the States concerned" all the problems of the Near and Middle East should be submitted to a conference of Five Great Powers. (For the American reaction to this proposal see "United States.")

On the following day a long and ironical statement was issued by the French Press Agency expressing disappointment with Mr. Churchill's explanations. It commented on the absence of any reference to the Lyttelton–De Gaulle agreement of July 1941 and to Great Britain's recognition of France's right to maintain order in the Levant, "an engagement which, to say the least of it, has been and is being violated by the British coup de force." It also said that the Prime Minister had made no mention of General de Gaulle's reply to his message of the 5th May last, in which the General expressly asked him to cancel the despatch of a whole new British division from Palestine: "It was in fact clear that this large reinforcement of British forces in Syria showed a premeditated intention to intervene and thus let disorderly elements understand that they could attack the French with impunity." The manner of British intervention on the 31st May was again criticised and regret was expressed that Britain's behaviour should "take on the character of an abuse of force towards a momentarily weakened ally." This statement was followed on the 7th June by a press conference given by General Oliva Roget in Paris and on the 9th by one given by General Beynet in Beirut. General Oliva Roget dealt with the military aspect of the crisis and General Beynet with his abortive negotiations with the Syrian and Lebanese Governments.

The presentation of General Oliva Roget's press conference and of the latest news from the Levant by the French press has been generally unfriendly. It is evident that opinion has hardened against Great Britain since General de Gaulle's press conference of the 2nd June and that British measures to maintain order, such as the imposition of a censorship and of a curfew and the supersession of the Office of Wheat Distribution, have been represented in such a way as to strengthen the belief that our main object is to supplant the French. General de Gaulle himself made a further somewhat embittered allusion to the crisis in a speech at Alençon on the 10th June in which he said that insufficient consideration had perhaps been given to "the fact that if France is at present in a somewhat difficult position, this will not always be the case, and that to humiliate her to-day may not prove to be a very good investment, as the peace now taking shape . . . . will not be brought about, whatever anyone may think, without France's collaboration." On the same day, at Lagnieu M. Herriot made a moving appeal to his countrymen to remain true to their old friendship with Great Britain. It remains to be seen whether this will have any effect in improving the atmosphere. It is, however, a significant and welcome fact that M. Herriot, who has greater prestige than any of the other deported statesmen of the Third Republic, not excluding M. Blum, should have gone out of his way to pay such a glowing tribute to Great Britain and to place such stress on the importance of Anglo-French relations in his first notable speech since his return from captivity.

A good deal of concern at the delay in the delimitation of zones of occupation in Germany and at Britain's alleged intransigence in refusing to France control of the left bank of the Rhine as far as Cologne has been reflected in recent comments of the French press and wireless.

In home affairs one of the questions which is causing the most discussion is whether the forthcoming general election should be for a Constituent Assembly or for a Senate and a Chamber. Both the Confederal Bureau of the C.G.T. and the Executive Committee of the M.L.N. have passed resolutions in favour of a Constituent Assembly and the weight of opinion seems to be on their side.

Anxiety is increasing over France's economic situation and the rising tide of Press complaints of the Government's failure to cope with the problems involved is causing official circles to become increasingly critical of the Allied combined supply and shipping control. Coal is still the vital factor and M. Lacoste, the Minister of Production, recently took advantage of the presence in Paris of Lord Hyndley and Dr. Potter, Chairmen of the London and Washington Coal Committees, to summon a meeting at which he described the full gravity of the coal position. Discussions are still going on at a high level on the replacement of coal supplied by the French to the Allied armies whose needs for May are, however, being met by the French as a result of the allocation to them of 20,000 tons of Saar coke and 50,000 tons of Ruhr coal (see Summary No. 293). The food situation is also a source of alarm, and as a result of impending shortages of meat and sugar and the appalling situation in North Africa, where drought has caused a disastrous failure in the crops, the French seem determined to use every means in their power to get favourable consideration for their imports programme.

Ferdonnet, the French "Haw-Haw," who used to broadcast from Stuttgart, has been arrested by the First French Army at Tuttlingen.

All daily papers are allowed to appear in full size, instead of on a single half-sheet, on two days a week as from the 12th June.

SWITZERLAND.

Since the cessation of hostilities in Europe, Switzerland has been concerned with the problem of re-establishing relations with other countries, more especially with her neighbours. The view is widely held by the Swiss people that, as far as cultural relations are concerned, Switzerland's first action must be to cleanse her own house of the Fifth Column, whether Swiss or foreign. Accordingly, the expulsion of Nazis and their sympathisers proceeds apace. By the 8th June, 294 Germans had been expelled, for reasons ranging from espionage, militant activities inimical to Switzerland, and membership of organisations notorious for violence, such as the S.S. and the Gestapo. The holding of any political opinion was not alone considered sufficient grounds for expulsion.

The repatriation of refugees and internees has been proceeding more or less smoothly since the middle of May, with the notable exception of the Italians, whose departure is delayed owing to the closing of the Italian-Swiss frontier by the Allies.

At the end of May the Federal Council decided to abolish censorship of Swiss papers in regard to political questions. At first, foreign papers, agencies and films remained under control, largely with a view to stopping any influx of propaganda. From the 1st June, however, this censorship was also removed, the supervision of foreign political propaganda material coming under the control of the Federal Attorney and the Customs and Postal Authorities. Press censorship has never been popular in Switzerland, and was accepted only as an unavoidable wartime measure.

Demobilisation of the armed forces continues. In addition, the Home Guard and the A.R.P. organisations have been disbanded, and territorial military courts will be dissolved in the near future. General Guisan, Commander-in-Chief of the Swiss Army, has asked to be relieved of his command as from the 20th August.

On the 3rd June, at a meeting at Berne, the executive of the Swiss Labour Party reached a decision to demand the renunciation of neutrality by Switzerland, in order that she might participate in the preservation of a lasting peace as a full member of the World Security Organisation. A radical change was also demanded in domestic and foreign policy, to facilitate the restoration of normal diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R.

SPAIN.

There have been many reports that Laval has decided to give himself up and return to France to face his trial. Those reports would appear to be confirmed but denials emanating from Paris have also been published and the situation is consequently obscure.

His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Madrid, together with the United States Ambassador, has communicated to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs the terms of the Berlin declaration and requested the handing over of all German official and semi-official buildings in Spain. This has been immediately complied with. There remains, however, the problem of German official personnel, probably 1,000 persons in all. If these are to be prevented from going to ground, it appears to be desirable that they should be removed as soon as possible either to Germany or elsewhere, where direct Anglo-American control may be exercised.

ITALY.

An agreement has, at last, been signed by Marshal Tito, by which Field-Marshal Sir Harold Alexander will control Pola, the anchorages off the west coast of Istria, Trieste and the lines of communication to Allied forces in Austria via Monfalcone, Gorizia and the Isonzo Valley. All Yugoslav troops will be withdrawn from this area except for a small token force (see under "Yugoslavia"). Signor De Gasperi, the Italian Foreign Minister, commenting on the agreement, criticises it in that the whole of the area up to the 1939 Italian frontier line will not be occupied by Allied forces and that many Italian subjects will therefore remain under Yugoslav administration. It is quite natural for Signor De Gasperi to be anxious for Italian nationals in this area in present circumstances, but the Italian Foreign Minister does not, perhaps, appreciate the difficulties which had to be overcome in order to reach this agreement, nor does he appear to have taken into account the fact that Trieste, the city with the largest Italian population, will be administered by A.M.G., not to mention Pola, Monfalcone and Gorizia.

Signor De Gasperi has since explained that he was far from wishing to give the impression that the Italian Government was not deeply grateful for what had been done. Signor De Gasperi said he was constantly being attacked for not doing enough in defence of the interests of Italian subjects and that since he was not in touch with the situation vis-à-vis Marshal Tito he had merely written to express the fears which members of the various parties were publicly expressing.

No agreement has yet been reached as to the formation of a new Italian Cabinet. Signor Bonomi had agreed to carry on for a few days longer while the argument continued, but resigned on the 12th June without a decision being reached regarding who is to be President of the Council. The Christian Democrats have proposed that Signor De Gasperi, their leader, should be President, and that Signor Nenni, the Socialist Party leader, should be Vice-President. This the Socialist Party has refused. But besides the Presidency of the Council there is also the question who is to have the Ministry of the Interior. This Ministry appoints the Prefects and controls the Carabinieri and Police. Signor Nenni, backed up by Signor Togliatti, put forward a claim to this Ministry during Signor Bonomi's last Government, but Signor Bonomi refused to allow a Ministry, with such potentialities in internal affairs, to pass into the hands of such a firebrand as Signor Nenni. It is possibly true that Signor Nenni's bite is not so bad as his bark, but he has barked enough to make moderates of nearly all the parties very distrustful of him personally. A solution may be found by putting forward another Socialist candidate for the Presidency with a more peaceful background. The deadlock in Rome appears, however, to have worried the C.L.N. of the North and they are sending representatives to the capital in an endeavour to help reach a solution. The C.L.N. of the North have in no way, as yet, subordinated themselves to the Committee in Rome. They appear to be waiting and summing up the leaders and their parties in the South before committing themselves to complete collaboration.

It is now reported that Signor Feruccio Parri has been invited by all six parties to become President of the Council. Signor Parri belongs to the Action Party and was one of the chief organisers of Partisan resistance in North Italy. When General Cadorna was made Commander-in-chief of the whole Partisan movement Signor, or "Generale" Parri, as he was called, became his second in command.

VATICAN.

The main Soviet charge against the Vatican (see under "Soviet Union") continues to be that the Pope condemns communism but fostered fascism and nazism before the war, ignored their excesses during the war and now pleads for mercy on their defeated adherents. The attacks quote his silence when V-bombs fell on London. Certainly the Pope said nothing officially, judging, as he let His Majesty's Minister know, that direct protests made things worse; the Osservatore Romano was moved to refer to the "lies Moscow put out through honest misunderstanding or of evil intent." For his part, the Pope has continued what might almost be called his apology for papal policy. On the 2nd June he explained the policy towards Germany. On the 10th June, speaking to the youth section of Italian Catholic Action, he explained his own direct action when Rome was threatened. "No narrow or personal feeling stirred us to intervene with such vigour for Rome's safety." The common father of all, "from Thames to Volga," "when we set Rome as the centre of our thoughts, we worked and strove for the entire world."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

In Hungary, various friendly or civil utterances from the U.S.S.R. have been interpreted optimistically and their importance stressed; and both the Foreign Minister, Gyöngyössy, and the Communist Party have repeated that Hungary's first duty is to win the full confidence of the U.S.S.R. M. Groza's advances (see below, under "Roumania") have had an extraordinarily favourable reception. Hungary seems reconciled to the loss of historic Translyvania (although not necessarily to the restoration of the Trianon frontier) and to accept with genuine enthusiasm M. Groza's concessions to the Magyars of Transylvania. The Press has urged Gyöngyössy to respond with something definite, and Gyöngyössy, in his official reply, said that Hungary indeed seized Roumania's proferred hand and hoped when the time came to give it a true Magyar squeeze; but in a later statement he repeated his usual thesis that Hungary was not yet free to make her own foreign policy. He was, however, in favour of close co-operation between the Danubian States, beginning in the economic field, where, if customs frontiers were not abolished, they should at least become unimportant.

There is, however, very serious uneasiness in the entire country, the Communists not excepted, about Czechoslovak proposals to expel Magyars from Southern Slovakia. There have been many discreet but perfectly obvious protesting references to these proposals.

In internal politics an event of the first importance was M. Rákosi's speech at the annual Conference of the Communist Party, held at Whitsun. The country had clearly been awaiting this event with much disquiet, perhaps anticipating a proclamation of a proletariat dictatorship. Instead, M. Rákosi told his hearers that their successes had been due to their collaboration with other parties. They must continue to work especially closely with the Social Democrats, but also with the National Peasants and Smallholders. He roundly condemned local excesses and "Left-wing sectarianism," in which the chief offenders were survivors from 1919, who had failed to learn how much things had altered since; and, invoking the precedent of Lenin's New Economic Policy, said that the Party would propose a large Government loan to private capitalist industry to get the country going again economically. A large and general detente in the internal political situation followed this speech, which was hailed by the other parties in the Independence Front as exceptionally moderate, courageous and statesmanlike, and as offering a wider basis of democratic co-operation, which they in their turn could accept.

Among its immediate consequences were, firstly, the issue of the loan in question, secondly, the replacement of the Minister of Industry, Takócs, by Bán, and thirdly, the announcement that the franchise bill for the elections to the Constituent Assembly would shortly be brought forward and the elections themselves probably held in the autumn. Further, the vacant places in the Provisional Assembly (for the relatively Conservative Transdanubia) would be filled. From their side the Smallholders have indicated a wish to continue in the present coalition with the "working class parties" after the elections, even though they obviously anticipate that these will bring a swing to the Right. They have been discouraging to other parties such as the "Christian People's Party," who probably hope, after the elections, to join the Smallholders in a coalition with the "working-class parties" in opposition.

Prices have again been rising sharply, and there are indications that the previous relatively conservative fiduciary policy has been abandoned and that almost unchecked inflation is on the way.

Roumania.

More than ordinary interest attaches to Dr. Groza's efforts to establish more friendly relations between his country and Hungary. Dr. Groza is himself a Transylvanian, and although this latest move would not be made if there were any chance of Russian disapproval, it is quite possible that it was not dictated by Moscow, but that the idea originated with Dr. Groza himself. In a statement to the press he speaks of complete collaboration in the near future between Roumania and Hungary. He goes further than this and envisages a defensive union of Roumania with Hungary, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, with Turkey participating. The proposed union is designed to meet the threats of any country with imperialistic aims, a statement which on the face of it is somewhat surprising, unquestionably praiseworthy as the sentiment is. As a first step, the Prime Minister proposes a customs union with Hungary. The Hungarian Foreign Minister has expressed approval of the plan. (For the Hungarian reaction to the Roumanian advances see also the Hungarian Summary.)

Amongst the plans for repatriating former residents in Bessarabia who are claimed as Russian subjects, is one for removing to Russia the members of the religious sect known as Lipovani, who are settled in the Tulcea district. About 17,000 would be affected. They are Russian in origin and came from the country round about the mouth of the Don, on account of religious persecution. Others of the sect are to be found in Bessarabia and scattered throughout Eastern Roumania. The total number in Roumania is about 57,000. Those removed are to be supplied with a small sum of money by the Roumanian Government and will be settled in the neighbourhood of the Sea of Azov, whence they originally came.

After the coup d'État of last August, Constanța was one of the first places where the imposition of a Communist régime was attempted. There have been complaints of arbitrary administration, especially of the levying of irregular taxation. The foreign consulates were amongst those who voiced this complaint. There was an atmosphere of tension and anxiety amongst the people. Since last January, after the withdrawal of part of the Russian garrison, the atmosphere has improved, but the economic position remains bad. Certain incidents tends to show what is likely to happen if the present régime becomes permanently established. Obligatory work on Soviet lines has been decreed. Any who fail to obtain work for themselves are liable to be conscripted in the interest of the community. Then by way of obliging people to join the workers' unions, certain articles, such as tobacco, matches and salt, are reserved for the unions and those outside cannot obtain them. Arrests have been made amongst school teachers, who are accused of teaching contrary to the views of the party in power.

Yugoslavia.

When Tito at last returned to Belgrade on the 7th June, the military agreement on zones of occupation in Venezia Giulia was quickly accepted; and it was signed at 0900 hours on the 9th.

It places an area including Trieste and the railways and roads leading thence, via Gorizia and Caporetto, to Austria, as well as Pola and such points on the west coast of Istria as he may deem necessary, under the command of Field-Marshal

Alexander. Yugoslav forces in this area are to be limited to not more than 2,000 regular troops, who will be maintained by the Allied services and restricted to a locality selected by Field-Marshal Alexander. A Yugoslav mission may be attached to the headquarters of the Eighth Army. The Allied Military Government will make use of any existing Yugoslav civil administration which appears to be working satisfactorily; but they may change the civil authorities as they think fit. Yugoslav regular forces were to be withdrawn from the area by 0800 hours (G.M.T.) on the 12th June. Irregular forces in the area are at Field-Marshal Alexander's direction either to hand in their arms and disband or to withdraw. The Yugoslav Government are to return all residents in the area whom they have arrested or deported, except those who were Yugoslav nationals in 1939, and restore property confiscated or removed. The Agreement in no way prejudices the ultimate disposal of any part of Venezia Giulia.

At the same time identical Yugoslav Notes were presented to the British and United States Ambassadors. They chiefly asserted that Yugoslavia was making great sacrifices for the sake of Allied co-operation, but added that there had been no confiscations or deportations and only "Fascists" or "war criminals" had been arrested. The British and United States Governments published the Agreement on the 9th; to the chagrin of the Yugoslav Government, who only issued a short communiqué stating that an Agreement had been reached.

Thus, if they surrender the "plums" of Trieste, Gorizia, Monfalcone and Pola, the Yugoslavs remain in factual possession of Fiume and the greater part of Venezia Giulia. His Majesty's Government had asked the Yugoslav Government if it is true that they have called up Italian nationals and tampered with civil and land registers.

At Celje, on the 3rd, Tito said of Carinthia: "We have been obliged to retreat temporarily. Carinthia is ours and we shall struggle for it." And at the ratification of the Soviet-Yugoslav Treaty, on the 10th, he complained of the attitude of some of our Allies, saying: "Such injustices are forgotten with difficulty."

Addressing a deputation of Croatian Catholic clergy Tito expressed his dislike of the international character of the Catholic Church. Like all dictators, he wishes to see religion nationalised. He spoke of creating "a great community of southern Slavs . . . . firmly linked with all other Slavs," and advised the Catholic clergy to adjust themselves to the position of a minority.

Five of Pavelitch's Croat Ministers have been sentenced by Court-Martial and executed.

Radio Belgrade attributed a big fire and explosion at Ljubljana railway station to elements opposed to the régime.

In the conversion effected at the end of April holders of the withdrawn currencies received only up to 5,000 new dinars (about £25) (see Summary No. 290, p. 16). The balances of accounts are now being paid, but subject to deductions, the scale of which varies ominously "according to the amount concerned and the bearer's profession." This form of capital levy is well calculated to destroy the possibility of opposition to the Government.

Movements of troops into Macedonia, and of E.L.A.S.-ites from over the Greek frontier, continued during May.

Greece.

The press of the 5th June carried a long statement by M. Varvaressos on his economic programme. By means of State control, he said, he hoped to reduce the price level and the cost of living, to distribute imported supplies speedily and equitably, to stabilise prices to producers at a fair level, to increase agricultural and industrial production, to restore communications, and to stabilise currency and balance the budget by taxing those who had maintained or increased their incomes during the occupation. As regards currency, the existing stabilisation law would be repealed, the drachma being stabilised at 2,000 to the pound sterling, and 500 to the dollar; the Bank of Greece would buy gold sovereigns at the international rate, i.e., 4,000 drachmæ. Persons who had exchanged remittances from abroad at 600 drachmæ to the pound and 150 to the dollar would be given additional payment of 600 to the pound and 150 to the dollar. Owners of small deposits wiped out by inflation would be compensated out of taxation on inflationary profits. Extraordinary taxation would be imposed immediately on those who had a disproportionately large purchasing power; the whole fiscal system would be overhauled and improved. There would be increases ranging from 50 to 83 per cent. on the rate of wages for various classes of workers; new salary scales would be announced for civil servants. The prices of U.N.R.R.A. supplies would be substantially lowered and distribution of clothing already imported would be organised as soon as possible. The first price controls would be applied to soap, vegetables, macaroni, cheese, meat, oil, and salt.

In the Athens press, except that of the extreme Left, the statement was favourably received; in Salonica the Right-wing papers approved M. Varvaressos's measures, at the same time suggesting that he might have gone further, while the first reaction of the Left press was to accuse the Government of making the people pay.

Papers of the extreme Left fulminated against the lightness of the sentences passed on the Puppet Ministers (see last Summary) and pointed out that, though M. Tsouderos had issued a warning from Cairo that persons who continued as members of the Security Battalions would be regarded as traitors, the Court had taken no account of the fact that certain of the accused had been instrumental in organising these Battalions. The Liberal Press expressed its disappointment at the leniency of the Court in rather milder terms. The Right-wing papers, apparently somewhat embarrassed, were sparing of comment, but they went so far as to admit that public opinion was not fully satisfied.

Bulgaria.

There have been no further developments regarding Dr. G. M. Dimitrov's persecution, except that his wife has now been arrested on a charge of having aided and abetted his escape. It is to be feared that she may be subjected by the Militia to the usual process of torture. The strongest possible representations have been made by the British and American authorities.

The trouble which has been brewing below the surface for some weeks past inside the Social-Democrat Party (see Summary No. 291) came to a head on the 31st May, when M. Neykov, Minister of Trade and Industry and leader of the near-Communist faction within the party, publicly dissociated himself from M. Cheshmedzhiev, the other Social-Democrat in the Cabinet, and asserted that the Party Congress "irresponsibly" called by the latter for the 10th June would not take place until some time later on. No doubt he wishes the purge of the party organisation to be completed first. According to one unconfirmed report M. Cheshmedzhiev then tendered his resignation from the Cabinet. (He has in any case been superseded as director of the Social-Democrat newspaper.) Meanwhile at least three out of the four Ministers belonging to the Agrarian Party are likewise reported to have sent in their resignations; and one of these, M. Bumbarov (Public Works), found himself expelled from his party Union on the 1st June for his alleged activity in support of Dr. Dimitrov.

On the 6th June it was announced that the Council of Ministers had passed a National Assembly Elections Bill, giving the vote to all Bulgarian subjects of both sexes aged 19 and upwards. Candidates for the Assembly must be 23. The proportional electoral system and the secret ballot are being introduced. However, it remains to be seen how these beneficent institutions will be worked Another announcement states that from the 1st June onwards all workers will be entirely supplied with food, clothes and personal requirements generally by two State-run organisations. This decision will put the bulk of small tradesmen out of retail business altogether, and cannot fail to have important social repercussions.

Turkey.

The Grand National Assembly on the 4th June approved the prolongation for another six months of the state of emergency which obtains in European Turkey and on the Asiatic side of the Straits. This seems to be an indication of Turkish anxieties. Although the Turkish Foreign Minister was reported to have seen M. Molotov soon after their arrival in San Francisco, no progress seems to have been made towards the conclusion of a new Soviet-Turkish treaty. Reported demands by Armenians for the annexation to Soviet Russia of the old Armenian provinces of Turkey ,and by Kurds for the creation of an autonomous Kurdistan are perhaps not unconnected with the Soviet technique for softening up the Turks prior to negotiation. The Turkish authorities, however, have been giving a little rein to Sertel, who is inclined to adopt the Soviet point of view in his paper, Tan. While all the rest of the Turkish press applauded British intervention in the Levant conflict, he attributed it to imperialist motives. Discussing the British election he spoke of the inertia of the Conservatives and of Labour's opposition to an anti-Soviet Western bloc.

The important land reform bill mentioned last week appears to have been passed without substantial, if any, amendment. During the budget debate the solitary Armenian Deputy suggested that foreign capital should be encouraged to come into the country to help its development. This idea was taken up by several newspapers, and it remains to be seen whether the authorities have learnt the lesson that foreign capital must be treated decently.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

While the situation in the Levant States is outwardly returning to normal, there is an undercurrent of grave anxiety throughout the whole country. There are certainly many difficulties ahead. Although French troops have been removed under our escort from the principal towns of Syria, and, for their own safety, French civilians likewise, the French may well try later on to reassert their former position by sending them back. Further, they have by no means given up their intention to seek to obtain a treaty giving them a privileged status.

Any attempt to return French forces to the towns would be strongly resisted by the Syrians, and would give rise to further disorders. Indeed, the Syrians are not content with the measures already taken. They are now talking of the withdrawal of all French troops from Syrian territory, and continue to demand the handing over to them of the Troupes Spéciales. They will henceforth, moreover, refuse to acquiesce in French participation in Allied security measures and will insist on French representation being placed on a normal diplomatic footing. As for the proposed treaty, it will be impossible to induce them to negotiate with the French at all unless the latter abandon all appearance of coercion. They are not in the mood at present even to consider negotiating, and will never do so on the basis of granting a special position to France. What the Syrians want now is to make a clean sweep of all French authority in their country, and to be completely independent in fact as well as in name.

In the Lebanon, where the situation is more complex, owing to the large Christian population and to the closer ties with France, the Government authorities are determined to align their policy with that of Syria. And, while there are in the Lebanon, especially among the Maronites, some who are still friendly to France, all the Moslems and many among the Christian communities are now bitterly opposed to her, and any attempt to solve the problem by differentiating between the two States as regards their future relations with France could only lead to trouble. The situation is further complicated in the Lebanon by the influx of French troops evacuated from Syria, and in both States by the fact that the French and local authorities are now not even on speaking terms.

The next step is, as the Prime Minister said in his statement in the House of Commons on the 5th June, to bring about a conference between the Governments of Great Britain, the United States and France. The suggestion put forward by General de Gaulle to hold a five-Power conference, to include Russia and China, would, as Mr. Churchill said, cause much delay and require very careful consideration on many grounds. The Levant Governments, not unnaturally from their point of view, wish to take part themselves in the proposed conference, as may also the Arab League, though in the event of Levant participation the League might not press its claim. But it is clearly of great importance to reach as quickly as possible a settlement of the most urgent outstanding questions between France and the Levant States, and the more the number of delegates is extended, the longer the discussions are likely to last. Nor can we accept with equanimity General de Gaulle's further proposal that the talks should cover other Middle Eastern States. We have no wish at this juncture to be dragged into controversies with other Powers over the future of the Middle East as a whole. For these reasons His Majesty's Government would prefer to confine the conference to the three Great Powers concerned, and to limit the discussions to a settlement of the Levant question. With this view the United States Government concurs.

News of the British intervention in the Levant States has been received with satisfaction by the Emperor of Ethiopia, who expressed to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires his pleasure at our action as an illustration of the way in which the rights of smaller nations could be protected. Our intervention has been no less warmly welcomed, for more selfish reasons, by the Nationalist party in Morocco, who claim to see in it the beginning of the eviction of France by Great Britain and the United States from Morocco, Tunis and Algeria.

The week in Egypt has been dominated by the crisis in the Levant and by the meeting of the Arab League Council, which opened in Cairo on the 4th June. Both King Farouk in a message to the Council, and the Egyptian Prime Minister, Nokrashi Pasha, in his inaugural speech, expressed their strong condemnation of recent French action in Syria. The delegates of Syria, the Lebanon, Iraq, Transjordan and Saudi Arabia all voiced their grave dissatisfaction over French behaviour, and their gratitude to Great Britain for having intervened. The Council also passed a resolution that the Arab League should be represented at the proposed Great Power conference, but no action on the resolution has been taken by the Council as yet.

After the meeting of the Council on the 7th June Abdul Rahman Azzam Bey, Secretary-General of the Arab League, issued a communiqué to the press stating that, in view of recent action by the French in Syria and the Lebanon, the Council demanded "the immediate withdrawal of all French forces which are in the territories of the two republics." The Council also considered that the Troupes Spéciales with their arms, equipment, munitions, &c., should be handed over intact to the local Governments. The communiqué went on to state that the Council had decided "to take all necessary measures in accordance with article 6 of the Covenant of the Arab League to counter French aggression," and to emphasise the identity of the aims of the League and of the two Arab republics, "which are the safeguarding of their independence and their sovereignty, as well as the withdrawal of foreign troops from their territories."

The Egyptian press warmly approves our action, and has equally commended the attitude of the United States and of Russia. Certain sections of the press indicate that now that the question is under discussion by the Council of the Arab League, imperialist ambitions in the Middle East from any quarter must be strongly opposed.

So far as concerns Iraq, British intervention in the Levant was taken just in time to prevent what was rapidly becoming a serious situation. On the 31st May, for instance, in the Iraqi Chamber of Deputies, many speakers called for armed intervention, and the Minister for Defence assured the House (though quite incorrectly) that the Iraqi army was fully trained and "ready to act when necessary." Fortunately, during the debate, the Prime Minister showed patience and sagacity, and calmed the House by assuring them that His Majesty's Government were doing their best to find a solution to the problem. After hearing the news of our intervention, deputations from the Senate and Chamber expressed to His Majesty's Ambassador their appreciation of the measures taken by His Majesty's Government, and urged that the French should now leave the Levant States altogether.

A new Prime Minister for Persia has been chosen to succeed Ibrahim Hakimi, who resigned on the 3rd June. He is Sadr al Ashraf, who was Minister of Justice in two former Cabinets. But his previous career as Mullah is against him, and he is already being fiercely attacked by the Tudeh press. It appears that he has been preferred to Hakimi as being more willing to accept suggestions for nominees to certain key positions in the Cabinet.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons on the 6th June regarding the evacuation of Allied forces from Persia, Mr. Law said that the tripartite treaty provided for the withdrawal of all troops from Persia six months after the end of the Japanese war. In view of the Persian request and our desire to meet Persia's wishes as far as possible, His Majesty's Government were in consultation with the United States and the Soviet Governments in this matter. Mr. Law added, in reply to a further question, that it was the intention of His Majesty's Government in all circumstances to safeguard our Imperial interests in South Persia and the Persian Gulf.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 9th June an Extraordinary Session of the Japanese Diet convened in Tokyo and was formally opened by the Emperor. The Premier, followed by the Ministers of War and of the Navy, spoke on the situation which confronted Japan. Suzuki declared that the demand for unconditional surrender, which, if it were yielded to, would mean slavery for Japan and for all East Asia, had stiffened Japan's resolve to fight on. He mentioned the contributions of "Manchukuo" and of Japan's other East Asiatic allies and said that Japan eagerly desired to promote friendly relations with neutral Powers. He recalled his visit to San Francisco in 1918, when he had told an American audience that there was absolutely no reason for war between Japan and the United States and that, if it did come, there would be an endless struggle in which both would suffer. That war had in fact come was a matter of the utmost regret; nevertheless, Japan had no alternative but to continue the struggle. Suzuki expressed his conviction that internal conditions in the United States and developments in the international situation were good reasons for Japan to go on fighting for victory.

General Anami said that it must be frankly admitted that the general military situation in East Asia was unfavourable to Japan. Heavier air raids, followed by an attempt at invasion, had to be expected. But, said Anami, since Guadalcanal, the Japanese forces, scattered in distant islands, had been compelled to bear the brunt of concentrated attacks and could not be reinforced. This state of affairs would be largely reversed in the event of an attack on Japan itself, since the main strength of the army could be employed for the first time since the outbreak of war. He said that the Special Attack Corps were steadily improving in skill; they, together with Japan's air forces in general, would assail the invasion forces while they were still at sea and the army would hurl itself upon those who succeeded in effecting a landing.

Admiral Yonai said that the situation on Okinawa was unfavourable; although the naval air, surface and undersea units had inflicted "enormous damage" upon the enemy fleet, they had not been able completely to destroy it or to gain control of the air. But he declared that it was an axiom of war that victory went to those who fought best in the last five minutes.

Domei (9th June) said that the chief business before the Diet was the consideration of the Extraordinary War Measures Bill, which would transfer to the Government practically all the rights and powers of the Diet, and would enable the Government to issue orders relating to all branches of the war effort; such orders would override all existing laws. Before the Diet session met, negotiations had taken place between the Government and leading members of the Diet; in these discussions an important rôle had been played by the Dai Nippon Seijikai. The general consequences of the Bill would be similar to the bringing into force of the Emergency Imperial Power referred to in Article 31 of the Constitution.

Article 31 of the Constitution of 1889 is included in the Chapter on Rights and Duties of Subjects and reads: "The provisions contained in the present Chapter shall not affect the exercise of the powers appertaining to the Emperor, in times of war or in cases of a national emergency." These powers are nowhere defined in the Constitution; they are in fact extra-constitutional, and, as Suzuki told the Diet, could be brought into effect without reference to it. But, he said, the Government did not wish to take such action; it preferred to retain parliamentary functions as much as possible under the circumstances. Therefore, instead of simply advising the Emperor to exercise his emergency powers, it had framed the Extraordinary War Measures Bill for Diet sanction. Suzuki pointed out that Article 4 of this Bill provided for a Committee, to be composed exclusively of those connected with Parliament, which would advise the Government on the exercise of its powers under the Act. The War Minister said that, under the proposed Act, administration would be carried on by the political departments of the Government and not by the military ones; this was where it differed from martial law, which the army did not want to invoke except where it became absolutely necessary. Some Diet members wanted to know how the proposed Act would differ from the existing General Mobilisation Act. The Minister of Justice explained that the latter Act presupposed the existence of a central Government with effective authority over the whole country; the new Act provided for an emergency in which the central authority might find it impossible to function, in which case the regional authorities would need full powers to act in their various areas.

Despite these official explanations there were prolonged and heated debates in the Lower House upon the Extraordinary War Measures Bill; the Diet session, originally scheduled for two days only, had to be twice prolonged by a day and the Bill did not get through the Committee stage in the Lower House without amendments, although these are stated to have been of a minor character (Domei, 11th June).

The Extraordinary War Measures Bill should be considered in conjunction with the establishment, on the 10th June, of Regional Superintendents-General.

These are the present chairmen of the eight regional councils, who thus become superintendents-general for their respective regions, with greatly-increased administrative powers. This is part of the general policy of administrative dencentralisation, which is being put into effect in Japan to cope with the heavy air attacks and with threatened invasion.

On the 8th June the Chinese Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs declared that no effort would be spared to foster Chinese-Soviet friendship; that relations between the Chinese and Soviet delegations at San Francisco had been very satisfactory, and that Molotov had expressed his "great gratification" at the co-operative spirit of the Chinese delegation. Mr. K. C. Wu also said that, with the signature of the new treaty between China and the Netherlands, China had completed the task of getting rid of the unequal treaties.

At a recent Press conference in Washington Mr. Grew denied that any secret arrangement about Korea had been concluded at Yalta and he declared that the decisions in respect of Korea reached at the Cairo Conference still held good. He further said that the Korean Provisional Government in Chungking could not be invited to San Francisco because it had no footing in Korea and was insufficiently representative of her people. It was the policy of the United States Government to take no action which might impede a liberated Korean people from freely choosing the kind of Government it desired.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The accumulating signs of unilateral action by the Soviet Union and the impression left by the Press of a general deterioration of inter-Allied relationships had engendered a mood of baffled despair in the United States. The excellent news, however, that Marshal Stalin had agreed to a solution of the veto issue at San Francisco, and the general report that Mr. Hopkins's series of talks in Moscow had been markedly successful and that there was again hope of a Polish Government along the lines of the Yalta agreement, have led to a wave of hope and good cheer, after a week of tension and uncertainty. The settlement of the veto deadlock was hailed as a victory for President Truman and Mr. Hopkins and, though to a lesser extent, tributes have also been paid to Marshal Stalin and Mr. Stettinius.

"For what the Russians lose" according to the New York Times, "in falling into line with the general sentiment at San Francisco, they gain in immediate and practical goodwill, by this demonstration of their willingness to break the deadlock and hold the Conference together." Strong evidence of the steeply declining confidence in the Soviet Union, indeed, had earlier been apparent in a public opinion poll, which found 45 per cent. optimistic about Russia's intentions and 38 per cent. mistrustful, as compared with 55 per cent. optimistic and 31 per cent. mistrustful during the Post-Yalta phase in March of this year.

It is significant, however, that depressed though the Americans have been about international relationships, there has been no recrudesence of isolationism. Even ex-Governor Landon has declared that America must "seize the balance of power," and the definition of America's rôle as that of "mediator," given by Mr. Stettinius, has been warmly welcomed. Part of this success, is undoubtedly due to President Truman's earnest endeavours to promote national unity and to perpetuate the "era of good feeling." In this respect, his interview with Ex-President Hoover and his invitation to Governors Landon and Dewey have been enthusiastically applauded in large sections of the press.

Discussion of the situation in the Levant continues to follow the lines indicated in last week's Summary. His Majesty's Government's intervention has so far met with general approval, and there is no doubt that the French action is considered to have been both violent and foolish. But there is also noticeable a strong undercurrent of suspicion in certain quarters that the British have been unduly rough, and that their motives are not entirely disinterested. This is particularly marked in the Left-Wing Press. President Truman, when asked by the Press if he would favour a big Five meeting to settle the dispute replied that he would not. In amplifying this view, Mr. Truman stated that he thought the near eastern situation could be worked out without a big Five meeting. As to the meeting of the big Three, that would be held to discuss world affairs, he said that he hoped that it would take place within the next forty days.

The President stated that approval by Congress of the Bretton Woods Monetary Agreement would be a step "of paramount importance in the establishment of a sound economic foundation for lasting peace . . . . a pattern for American participation in international economic and security co-operation"; and his call for "full bi-partisan support" was followed by the passage of the agreement by an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives (345 to 18 votes). Mr. Raymond Swing, expressing his elation at this result, maintains that the result cannot fail to impress America's Allies as "graphic evidence that the United States will accept its post-war responsibility." But it is still a little early for jubilation. The measure now goes to the Senate where Republicans are expected to open a vigorous battle.

That certain of the Republicans, despite Governor Dewey's appeal, have not yet abandoned the tenets of economic nationalism can be deduced from the decision of the Senate Finance Committee, by ten votes to nine, to recommend the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, only after striking out of the Doughton Bill the provisions which would allow the President to reduce tariff duties by as much as 50 per cent. below existing rates. A mere extension of the Act under these conditions is of little avail, as most of the powers to reduce the tariff have already been exercised. The Republicans voted as a bloc against these further provisions, supported by three Democrats, Senators Walsh (Massachusetts), Gerry (Rhode Island) and Johnson (Colorado). Surprisingly, Senator La Follette (Progressive, Wisconsin) supported the Administration. However, Senator Walter George (Democrat, Georgia), Chairman of the Committee, has announced that he will seek to restore this provision when the Act is debated on the floor of the Senate, or if not then, in the subsequent conference between the two Houses. Supporters of the Administration's policy are thought to be stronger in the Senate than in the Committee and Governor Dewey has done his best to give an internationalist lead to those Republicans who still show a tendency to return to economic isolationism.

In a notable speech, indeed, Mr. Dewey, as titular head of the Republican Party, has expressed himself in favour not only of the acceptance of the Bretton Woods monetary plan, but of the repeal of the Johnson Act, which forbids loans to nations in default on their 1914–18 War Debts, and of the cancellation of these debts and the speedy settlement of Lend Lease obligations. He has also advocated the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and has suggested that the United States should convene an international economic conference to bring about general tariff reductions. "We are entitled to ask in return," he said, "that our partners shall fully live up to the other part of their obligations by eliminating barriers to commerce, and by promoting the betterment of world-wide economic and social relations, as well as the cause of the freedom of the individual for which this war is being fought." And he added, "all of the work being done at San Francisco will mean tragically little if economic conflict is to divide the nations."

Despite representations to the President by the Labour Unions (The American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organisations, both of which are probably at the peak of their influence), there is to be no immediate relaxation of wage control, and the Little Steel formula limiting wage increases to 15 per cent. over January 1941 levels is to stand, pending a thorough study of wages and commodity prices. This was announced by President Truman in turning down the request from Mr. Willian Green that basic wages should be increased up to 20 per cent. above the present levels to compensate for loss of overtime payments following reconversion and to create "adequate buying power." Mr. Green and Mr. Philip Murray, Presidents of the A.F. of L. and the C.I.O. respectively, told the President that statistics showed that from January 1941 to April 1945 retail prices had risen by 29·6 per cent., while according to Mr. Green, wages had only risen by 19·7 per cent. Labour leaders, however, are said to be not discouraged, since on the same day officials of the United Automobile Workers' Union (C.I.O.) had an interview with the Chairman of the War Labour Board, from which, it is reported, they obtained the impression that within a month some way would be found to compensate the workers for their loss of earnings following reductions in the work week and in overtime payments. Meanwhile, Mr. Paul McNutt, War Man-Power Commissioner, warned returning Servicemen not to expect too much in the Labour market.

Ambassador Edwin Pauley, the President's personal representative on the Allied Reparations Commission, has now arrived in Moscow. In a press conference at Paris, he advocated that the Allies should confiscate Germany's heavy "war potential" industries. "What we can't move we must destroy."

He warned the Allies that they must avoid the fatal error made after the last war, when they helped the Germans to build up heavy industries and machine tool plants so that they could make reparation payments.

LATIN AMERICA.

On the 4th June, the second anniversary of the establishment of military government in Argentina, the President addressed a long statement to the nation describing the work done in the various spheres of public affairs during this period. General Farrell again gave no indication of a date for elections, but he concluded with a hint (referring to the " last days of my public life ") that he might be ready to hand over the Presidency. However, the whole speech was ambiguous, and this may be simply another example of Argentina viveza.

The Argentine Supreme War Council has imposed sentences of up to six months' detention, with or without dishonourable discharge, on General Espíndola and other officers implicated in the " conspiracy of the 27th April " (see Summary No. 291). The Government's emphasis on the heinousness of the offence is in sharp contrast with the lightness of the sentences passed; this suggests the weak position of the régime vis-à-vis the armed forces. The Governmment have also lifted the suspensions imposed on newspapers and printers, and promised that in future suspensions shall only be imposed by decree for reasons of public order. It was explaind that the Government's previous guarantee of full liberty for the Press had been subject to security measures which " had unmasked a vast conspiracy against the interests of the country." Meanwhile, no charges have been brought against the civilians who were arrested, and though many prominent figures have been released, it appears that the prisons are still well-appointed.

On the 6th June the Chilean Senate refused to confirm the appointment of the proposed new Ambassador to Argentina, apparently until the Chilean Foreign Minister should return from San Francisco. This is a marked departure from the normal course of Chilean policy towards Argentina. President Rîos has accepted an invitation from President Truman to visit the United States in October.

On the 5th June President Vargas signed a decree declaring a state of war between Brazil and Japan. He explained that this had been done in order to display Brazil's solidarity with the democracies. It is not impossible, however, that two other questions are in the President's mind—Brazil's prestige in the world and her internal situation.

UNITED NATIONS.

The San Francisco Conference welcomed with relief the announcement that an interview between M. Stalin and Mr. Hopkins, the United States special envoy to Moscow, had resulted in agreement of the four sponsoring Powers on the " veto issue " (described in last week's Summary). The Great Powers now agree in recommending that no member of the Security Council shall be able alone to prevent consideration or discussion of a dispute or situation brought to that body's attention by any State, whether a member of the Organisation or not. Dr. Evatt, of Australia, supported by some of the smaller States, is still unwilling to give up the attempt to raise the veto from formal investigation and recommendations for the peaceful settlement of disputes; but it does not seem likely that this final difficulty will seriously hold up progress on this part of the Charter.

The Committee dealing with arrangements for the enforcement of decisions by the Security Council has adopted an important amendment, proposed by Canada, that before calling on a State to provide armed forces in an emergency the Security Council should invite that State to participate in the decisions of the Council concerning the employment of these forces.

The discussions on trusteeship for dependent territories are nearing completion. Recent debates have centred round the provision that, pending the conclusion of trusteeship arrangements, nothing in the Charter shall alter the rights of any State or any peoples in any territory or the terms of existing international instruments (such as League of Nations Mandates). The Arab States have shown particular concern that nothing should prejudice the position of the Arabs in Palestine as provided for in the League Covenant.

There has been some discussion on a proposal, eventually rejected by the Committee concerned, to empower the Assembly to recommend revision of treaties. The British delegation held that such unqualified powers would be dangerous; but that the Assembly's power to recommend peaceful measures for the adjustment of any dispute, regardless of its origin, would cover the case of treaties whose provisions were impairing friendly relations.

It was noted (in Summary No. 291) that the statements of Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Eden, at the opening session, that the Charter would be open to subsequent revision might reconcile the smaller States to points in it which they did not like. An agreed four-Power amendment, submitted early in the Conference, provides that a Conference of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the Charter may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a three-quarters vote of the Assembly with the concurrence of the Security Council (the Council decision requiring seven affirmative votes but not necessarily unanimity among the permanent members); amendments decided upon by a two-thirds vote at such a Conference would, however, be subject to ratification by all the Great Powers and a majority of the other members of the Organisation. The small Powers welcome this provision for review of the Charter, but some of them dislike the opportunity given to the Great Powers to block amendments at the second stage; and some wish that the Conference should be held after a fixed period of years, or that the decision to hold it should be taken by an unqualified majority of the Assembly. There may, on the other hand, be a danger that enthusiasm in the cause of revision might cast doubt upon the stability of the new Organisation; and the fear has been expressed that, if the process of amendment were made too easy, this might enable isolationist forces in the United States or the U.S.S.R. to reduce or even withdraw the co-operation of their countries after a period of years.

Denmark has accepted an invitation to join the Conference, and her request to adhere to the United Nations Declaration is being granted. This raises the number of States represented at the Conference to fifty.

GERMANY.

THE first reshuffle of Allied troops in and out of the zones of Germany to be finally occupied by each of the four Great Powers has now begun. Units of a British corps were stated on the 12th June to be moving into the northern half of the Rhine province to take over areas occupied by the American XVth Army before the German surrender. Their movement was accompanied by the news that Field-Marshal Montgomery would take over the military administration of a region containing what is left of the heavy industries of the Ruhr valley, with the partially destroyed iron and steel plants of Essen, Duisburg, Wuppertal and Solingen, as well as the Regierungsbezirke of Düsseldorf, Cologne and Aachen. On the 14th, United States troops in the Chemnitz area were reported to have withdrawn to the western bank of the Mulde, a tributary of the Elbe, from 800 square kilometres of territory, which would be entered by the Russians. In the north the British military authorities were at the same time said to be taking steps to prevent an exodus westwards of German civilians from Schwerin, the provincial capital of Mecklenburg, after it had become known there that the whole of Mecklenburg would be occupied by the Red Army.

A clearer picture of the relationship between the executive branches of Allied Military Government and the German administrative units which are being revived under native leadership has begun to emerge in the past two weeks. Military Government detachments have been established at several levels to correspond to the pre-1933 German administrative units: a "P" Detachment controls the military Government of a province and corresponds to the German Oberpräsident; and an "RB" Detachment is set up at each of the subordinate Regierungsbezirke to control the work of the German Regierungspräsidenten. Local Military Government Detachments are distributed through the province, each usually covering a number of municipalities, although the major towns have Military Government Detachments of their own. Each Military Government Detachment from the provincial down to the municipal level is staffed with specialist officers to correspond to the food, labour and other public departments of the German administration. Some regional economic offices set up by the Nazis, as for instance the Landeswirtschaftsämter and the Landesbauernschaften, have been re-established, but others, like the Gau Economic Chambers, which were co-ordinated with the Party Gaus, have been abolished. The main disadvantage of the present arrangement is seen by Allied officers on the spot in its failure to provide for the gradual restoration of some form of self-government and for the re-education of the German people to a sense of responsibility. All native officials appointed so far are, from the Oberpräsident down to the village Bürgermeister, answerable only to Military Government and cannot be called to account by their local German communities. In some towns, however, notably at Arnsberg, a general " consultative committee " of responsible citizens drawn from the various anti-Nazi groups, has been successfully constituted to advise the Bürgermeister and, along with a number of specialised sub-committees, to serve as a link between the administration and the population on everyday matters like food and billeting.

Military Government's experiment with the appointment of a native administration in Bavaria (see this Summary No. 296) has been criticised in the Allied press on the grounds that the new German Prime Minister, Dr. Friedrich Schaeffer, is being asked to work with a Minister of the Interior, August Fischer, who served at a high level in the Bavarian Ministry of Education of the Nazis and who was only dismissed from Hitler's service in December 1941. The new Bavarian Minister of Economics, Dr. Karl Lange, has likewise been assailed as an abettor of National Socialism in his previous capacity as general manager of the Loewenbrau breweries and chairman of the Bavarian Brewers' Association. Minor officials who bullied their fellow-Bavarians throughout the twelve years of the Hitler régime are alleged to be still bullying them under Military Government, while landowners who by their loyalty to the Nazis received better equipment and fertilisers than their neighbours are said to be receiving preferential treatment from the Allied authorities because they have meanwhile become the more efficient farmers. " Werewolf " activities are reported to have become bolder in some parts of Bavaria, and Nazi slogans and typewritten proclamations have appeared in places near Munich. Against these and other such allegations, however, must be recorded the fact that Military Government has published over the Munich radio on the 12th June a number of unambiguous measures to purge the local administration of any last vestiges of National Socialism. Under these, all employees of the Munich municipality who had joined the Nazi Party or its affiliated organisations before the 30th January, 1933, are to be dismissed at once, as are all members of the S.S. and holders of Party distinctions like the Blutorden, irrespective of their date of joining.

Among a number of native officials whose appointment would appear so far to have been cordially approved in all quarters is the new Oberpräsident of the relatively large and populous Rhine province, Dr. Johannes Fuchs. Now 70 years of age, Dr. Fuchs has been a life-long adherent of the Catholic Centre Party and, as he himself has just confessed, a sworn enemy of the local big business men who made a fortune out of being Nazis. He held the post of Oberpräsident, to which he has now returned, from 1922 until the accession of Hitler to power in 1933, with a brief break in 1923, when he served in Stresemann's Cabinet as Reich Minister for the Occupied Areas (of Germany). Anti-Fascist committees and works councils have for some time existed in a number of communities in his province. In the industrial town of Solingen, representatives of these works councils have been given temporary authorisation to act as collective bargaining agents with local employers and permission to hold a series of meetings of their fellow-craftsmen. Some 120 miles to the south of Dr. Fuchs's province, the French authorities are just staging their first rehearsal of German democratic government at Constance. Here a new town council, consisting of two representatives of the Centre Party, one Democrat, one Social Democrat and one Communist, has been set up to help the local French military commander with the government of the municipality.

At least 4¼ million Germans are now stated to be receiving copies of the Allied-controlled German newspapers published in the 12th Army Group area, and up to 2 million more are expected to do so by the end of this month. At the moment, the newspapers are only published weekly, with special editions to cover important events like the meeting of the four supreme Control Officers in Berlin. Methods of distributing even the same newspaper are, however, still by no means uniform. The Münchner Zeitung, for example, is handed out free of charge by the Bürgermeister on the basis of one copy to five German residents in the outlying districts of Bavaria, whereas in Munich itself it is sold by regular newsvendors at 20 pfennig a copy. A substantial section of the German population still has no access to the press or wireless (the use of the latter being denied them in many places because the electric current is still cut off), and it is therefore not surprising that rumours have been found to circulate freely where firm information has been scarce and that evidence of an organised whispering campaign to the detriment of the Allies has been detected. Underground Nazi newspapers are reported to have made their appearance in districts along the Swiss frontier, bearing the names of two former official dailies in Baden, the Bodensee Rundschau and the Führer. Correspondents at 12th Army Group headquarters also state that a Nazi radio transmitter has been heard operating in the Weissenburg area, north of Augsburg.

The repatriation of the 3,300,000 displaced Allied nationals who are still in former Reich territory remains one of the major problems with which the Military Government authorities have to deal. A daily exchange of former prisoners of war and civilians liberated by the Red Army and the Western Allies, in accordance with the S.H.A.E.F.–U.S.S.R. agreement signed at Leipzig on the 22nd May, has now been in operation for just over three weeks and has already provided for the transfer of large numbers of Russians by the 6th, 12th and 21st Army Groups. U.N.R.R.A. is stated to be at work in 230 camps in western Germany, registering and medically examining men and women from all Allied countries for repatriation. In some cases there have been unavoidable delays, food shortages and recalcitrance on the part of the persons to be moved. The French Minister for Prisoners has been able to promise, however, that there would be none of his compatriots left in Germany after six weeks (there were some 1,200,000 to be repatriated), with the exception of Military Government personnel and men too ill to be moved. Radio Bratislava has announced the return home of 2,000 Czechs from Dachau, and the Netherlands Repatriation Bureau has stated that 120,000 Dutch nationals have already been brought back by road, rail or air. At the moment, the 600,000 Poles estimated to be left in Germany present the greatest difficulty of all. There is little evidence as yet that a high proportion of these are inclined to react favourably to the demands of the Lublin authorities that they return home at once, and many, especially from eastern Poland, are said to be eager to remain abroad. Radio Lublin itself has suggested that the 20,000 Poles in Berlin would be given every facility by the Russian Commandant to stay there.

A drastic measure of reorganisation in the Berlin banking system was announced by the head of the Financial Department of the Municipal Government, Dr. Liepert, on the 11th June. Only one bank, the Berliner Stadtbank, Dr. Liepert stated, would be permitted to function from now on, and this would absorb the former Reichsbank. Suburban branches of the Reichsbank would become branches of the Stadtbank, as would the old municipal banks and savings banks. All remaining banks were to hand over their current balances to the Stadtbank, and no withdrawals could be made even from the Stadtbank, except for work of reconstruction and the payment of wages. The issue of land reform has also been raised by the Russian-controlled publicity services, and the Berlin radio has depicted the present happy life of simple peasants on large estates where the Nazi owners have fled. A new Russian-controlled daily paper, the Deutsche Volkszeitung, stressed on the 15th June the desire of its sponsors for a " popular front " of all renascent German political parties with an appeal by the German Communist party for a " bloc of anti-Fascist organisations, Communist, Social Democratic, Centre and others." All classes of the community were stated on the 11th June to be eligible for the new Berlin police force, and ex-officers with clean records could find employment training others for its criminal branch. The new Police Chief himself, Colonel Markgraf, who is described as " comparatively young," is presumably a recruit from the German officer-class.

Ribbentrop, Hitler's Foreign Minister and the last leading Nazi to remain unaccounted for, was captured at Hamburg by members of the British Field Security Police on the 14th June. He had in his possession letters addressed to Mr. Churchill, Mr. Eden and Field-Marshal Montgomery, as well as the usual small amount of poison, and he told his captors that he had intended to remain hidden until British opinion had " quietened down." Apparently he had been in Hamburg under the name of Reise since the 20th April. The former Gauleiter of Saxony, Martin Mutschmann, is also stated to have been apprehended by the Russians. Friedrich Flick, the leading Nazi industrialist who perhaps prospered more than anyone else from his early support of Hitler, was reported on the 18th June to be in American hands. Altogether, some 16,000 potential Nazi criminals are said to have been rounded up by the United States Security Service, which is now detaining all members of the Gestapo and S.S. from the rank of Scharführer (Sergeant) upwards.

AUSTRIA.

At the meeting arranged between the heads of the Allied Missions and the Russians in Vienna on the 11th June, General Zheltov deputised for Marshal Tolbukhin, who was ill. He had insufficient authority, so that little was achieved, except that the Russians were given a general idea of our needs. They seemed anxious for a quick decision on the zoning arrangements, and genuinely surprised to hear that the Allies might want more than one airfield. There seems little chance that the Russians will withdraw their opposition to the British and American claim that the Gau of Vienna should be considered as the zone of international occupation, but it was thought that there was a good chance of obtaining a good airfield, preferably one for each occupying Power, and adequate accommodation and training facilities in the surrounding country, if this claim was given up. It was expected that the three Missions would leave Vienna for Klangenfurt on the 13th June.

The Carinthian Consultative Committee of 12, which has advisory powers only, held its first meeting on the 9th June. Its head is Hans Piesch, well-known as a former mayor of Villach, and a firm anti-Nazi. It contains a Slovene member and is said to be giving special attention to the views of the Slovene minority. Petek, the leader of the Slovene minority, has been given a special pass to travel from his home to Klagenfurt at any time, and the senior military government officer of Carinthia has personally invited Petek to see him on Slovene minority matters when he wishes, or alternatively to make any complaint he wishes to the local military government officer. No complaints have yet been made. It is proposed to invite correspondents to go to Carinthia to see matters for themselves, and to hold a press conference at which allegations in Pravda and the Yugoslav press can be dealt with. The Soviet-controlled Berlin radio, on the 14th, speaking of the building up of self-government in Austria, mentioned the "provincial committee in Carinthia in which all anti-Fascist parties are represented" with apparent approval.

The Neue Zürcher Zeitung of the 7th June reported good relations between the Austrians and the American forces, who recently paraded before General Patch in Innsbruck. Relations between the Military Government and the Provisional Provincial Government of the Tirol were developing favourably. As reported by Vienna radio on the 7th June, this Government is headed by Karl Gruber (independent), a prominent resistance leader, and consists of leaders of the Christian Social (four members), Social Democrat (two), and Communist (one) Parties in the Tirol. This article also mentioned that among the numerous Nazis arrested were Gauleiter Hofer and Dr. Primbs, Hofer's right-hand man and Kreisleiter at Innsbruck.

From the French-occupied zone of the Vorarlberg an A.F.P. correspondent reported that a Committee had been set up by the French authorities, with Ulrich Ilg, former Under-Secretary for Agriculture in the Dollfuss Government, at its head. A Zürich report of the 8th June said that the French were really treating Vorarlberg as a liberated country, and the only complaint heard was that the occupation forces were not proceeding energetically enough against former Nazis. The food situation was bad.

Dr. Renner and members of his Cabinet spoke at the inauguration of the short-wave station of Radio Vienna, which was made a political occasion. In his speech Renner spoke of the rising of the Austrian people at the approach of the Red Army, and asked all States to acknowledge the independence of Austria, and to "admit her to the community that the victorious Powers have undertaken to establish." Renner stressed that all political parties, except the Fascists, had joined together "in every district and every province, and finally in the State," in the creation of a new Austria. They had set up a Government in which all parties and all classes were proportionately represented; the Government had the unlimited confidence of all the people. The generous support of the Red Army would always be gratefully remembered. But "the military Power that first occupied Vienna and the most important part of our State has never linked its support with conditions, has never exercised any undue influence on our decisions, has never and nowhere simply appointed authorities." He looked to the time when the military occupation would no longer be necessary, and Austria would regain her full freedom. Secretary of State Schaerf then spoke for the Socialist Party, Riedl for the People's (Christian Social) Party, and Koplenig for the Communists. Koplenig sent "greetings to all true Austrians from Lake Neusiedl to Lake Constance, from the March to the mountains of Carinthia and Tirol."

Details of the law passed on the 9th May by the Provisional Government in Vienna, outlawing the Nazi Party, indicate that all Austrian members of the Nazi Party between July 1933 and April 1945 must register, even if their membership was only temporary. Registration lists giving name, function, &c., will be published, and a committee of seven, with a professional judge presiding, will investigate claims for the addition or removal of names. The committee is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Interior. Pre-1938 members of the Party are guilty of treason and subject to 5 to 10 years' hard labour, and longer terms of imprisonment are prescribed for those holding special office and distinctions, or who indulged in particular brutality. Comprehensive measures are described for the removal from office of people with Nazi affiliations and penalties against them. All cases tried under this law will appear before the "People's Court," in which normal criminal court procedure will be followed, but from which no appeal will be allowed.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

During the past week, the minorities question has made front page news in Czechoslovakia. Mr. Nichols had discussions with Dr. Clementis, Acting Foreign Minister, and the latter made a press statement on the subject on the 13th June. Dr. Clementis said that the bulk of the Germans would have to go, as only a few of them had been proved loyal to the Republic. The Hungarians were in much the same position, although the Government recognised the difference between the old and the new régimes in Hungary. Only those who settled in Slovakia after the 1938 Award, and the active Fascist sympathisers, had so far been expelled—this action was based on the Armistice concluded in Moscow on the 20th January under the terms of which Hungary undertook to recall all those sent in by the Horthy régime after the Award. Mr. Nichols pointed out that the recall applied only to soldiers and officials (Article 2 of the Armistice terms).

Although waiting for the final decisions of the Peace Conference, the Government is proceeding with the military and civil occupation of the border regions. Two big rallies were organised over the week-end, one at Most, a mining town in N. Bohemia, the other at Náměstí-nad-Hanné in Moravia. At Most, the minorities policy was justified and explained by the Ministers of the Interior, Justice and Industry. M. Nosek (Interior) announced that the law on State citizenship, which will protect only the actively loyal members of the minorities, will soon be published. The Náměstí meeting was called to mark the taking-over of land confiscated from the minorities and traitors.

The property of former German agricultural co-operatives had been taken over by Czech co-operatives and German factories by national administrators appointed through the Ministry of Industry. German social insurance institutions at Reichenberg, Aussig and Karlsbad have been placed under the Trade Unions Council. There is some criticism of the type of settler in the border regions, as for example by the Czech paper published in Karlsbad (Karlový Vary), which complains about "the grabbing of directorships." The Youth Organisation journal has also made a plea for the careful selection of national administrators. Prague Radio on the 18th denied a statement attributed to Reuter that there was something approaching an internal crisis over the minorities programme, or that the government was taking unilateral action over frontier rectification.

In speeches at Plzeň and Tabor on the 15th and 16th, Dr. Beneš referred to the new measures of socialisation affecting heavy industry, to the political reorganisation taking place, to the minorities policy and to the desire of his country to remain sincere friends of the "Big Three." A further step in political reorganisation was announced on the 16th, when the text of the agreement between the three socialist parties was made public. These three parties, the Social Democrat, the Communist and Socialist National, now form what is called the National Bloc. While retaining their individual party organisations, they have agreed to follow a joint policy on all matters of public life. This is a move hinted at already and leaves the voters at the coming general elections with a clear cut decision between the Left-Wing and the Catholic Centre Party.

POLAND.

The Moscow Consultations concerning the setting up of a Provisional Government in Warsaw that would be recognised by the three Great Powers, as provided for in the Yalta Agreement, were resumed on the 15th March in a friendly atmosphere. As Mr. Law informed the House of Commons on the 13th June, invitations were sent by the Commission of Three in Moscow to an agreed list of Polish leaders from within Poland and from abroad. One member of each group, namely, M. Witos from Poland and M. Zakowski from London, having dropped out, the former owing to grave ill-health, the Commission is considering the invitation of M. Wladyslaw Kiernik, Vice-President of the Peasant Party in Poland, to take M. Witos's place; and has invited M. Kolodzej, secretary of the pro-"Lublin" Polish Seamen's Union in Great Britain, to replace M. Zakowski.

M. Mikolajczyk, who, in M. Vitos's absence, is the chief political figure, apart from the "Lublin" government, in the conversations, arrived on the afternoon of the 16th June; and the same evening M. Molotov gave a reception on behalf of the Commission at which all the Polish groups met. They met together again, but without the Commission, on the 17th and 18th. It is understood that the Commissioners are anxious that as great as possible a measure of agreement should be reached between the three groups of Poles before the Commission is brought into the discussion. So far it is believed that the results in this respect are satisfactory.

The trial of the sixteen arrested Poles opened in Moscow on the 18th June in the presence of members of the Diplomatic Corps and of a large body of reporters and film photographers. The arrests, as M. Molotov stated in San Francisco on the 4th May, were made on a charge of "diversionary activities against the Red army." Tass, at the same time, specified charges of "sabotage" and "maintaining illegal radio transmitters" "in the rear of the Red army." The Polish Government in London had early information of the disappearance of the arrested persons, which took place on the 27th March; and in the course of May issued statements of their names and functions and of the circumstances leading up to the arrests (see Summary Nos. 292, 294 and 295). The 16th accused person, whose name was not previously known in London, is M. Zwierzynski, stated to be Vice-President of the Underground Council of National Unity and chairman of the National Democratic Party.

The proceedings of the 18th June consisted of the statement by the Prosecution and the calling of witnesses and statements by many of the accused persons. The case for the prosecution was that (1) General Okulicki and the three Polish Government Delegates Jankowski, Bien and Jasiukowicz acted as organisers and leaders of Polish illegal organisations in Poland, Lithuania, Western Ukraine and Western White Russia after the liberation of these territories; (2) that, acting on instructions from the Polish Government in London, they misinformed the Soviet Command as to the dissolution of the "Home army" actually preserving its headquarters and officers' cadres, and on that basis created a new secret military-political organisation with the purpose of carrying on subversive work in the rear of the Red army and of preparing an act of war in a bloc with Germany against the U.S.S.R.; (3) that they directed acts of terrorism against the Red army; (4) and concealed and used radio sets for subversive activity against it. (5) General Okulicki is further accused of organising spying behind the Red army lines. (6) The remaining twelve persons are accused of taking part in such subversive activity on Polish territory in the rear of the Red army, and of being aware of the failure of the Underground leaders to carry out the Soviet Command's orders as to radio sets, arms, &c.

It is reported that fifteen out of the sixteen accused persons have pleaded "guilty" to some or all of the charges made against them, notably in regard to the maintenance of the skeleton organisations of the Underground State and the Home army; to the use of wireless receivers and transmitters; and to the retention of stocks of arms. Individuals have admitted the occurrence of attacks on Red army personnel, and stated that it was anticipated that the secret organisation known as N.I.E. (i.e., Niepodleglosc or Independence) would continue even after the formation of the New Provisional Government, and might be used against the U.S.S.R., possibly in an eventual coalition, which might include Germany.

The trial continues.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 12th June Tass published an official denial of a statement attributed to the News Chronicle to the effect that complete American evacuation of that portion of the Soviet zone of Germany still occupied by American troops was held up by shortage of Russian troops to replace them. Tass was authorised to state "that there will be no delay in the occupation by Soviet troops of the area from which the Allied forces are to be withdrawn."

On the 18th June the death was announced of Colonel-General Berzarin, Soviet Commandant of Berlin and Commander of the Fifth Army. He was stated to have died as the result of a motor-cycle accident.

The arrest of Dr. Jagodzinski, representative of Polpress in London, and his detention for a day "in the kingdom of the bludgeon and the whip" at Inverkeithing formed the subject of a scathing article in Pravda (13th June). "Around Inverkeithing is Scotland where British law and British customs rule; in Inverkeithing, behind barbed wire entanglements, cut off from the whole democratic world, is a corner of the old Fascist Poland." The incident was made the occasion for a renewed attack on the whole Polish Government in London, and a criticism by implication of the British Government for tolerating it. "Invite a pig to the table and it will put its feet on it."

The trial of the 16 arrested Poles opened on the 18th June, after the arrival in Moscow of the delegation of three from the London Poles. It is being reported in great detail in the Soviet press, but so far no general comment has been received (for details of the trial see under "Poland").

Switzerland has again come under the lash during the past week, particularly in connexion with the alleged harbouring of war criminals. M. Yermashev in an English commentary broadcast from Moscow (12th June) maintained that the Swiss had rendered the Hitlerite régime valuable service throughout the war, not only economically, but also in the political sphere. Not only were they receiving escaping Fascists from Germany and elsewhere, but a large Fascist group was arising in Switzerland itself. Tass (16th June) revived the charge of maltreatment of Soviet internees in Switzerland (see Summary No. 290) of whom there were stated to be some 9,000. The Swiss authorities were alleged not only to be obstructing the repatriation of these Soviet citizens, but to have placed many of them in unbearable conditions. In view of the above facts, Tass stated, the Soviet Government had instructed its organs to discontinue the despatch to Switzerland of all Swiss citizens at the disposal of the Soviet repatriation organs. These Swiss citizens, liberated by the Red Army, would not be sent home until precise information had been received that the authorities in Switzerland had taken effective measures to improve the conditions of Soviet citizens and to hasten their repatriation to the U.S.S.R.

The Soviet press has been devoting increasing attention to the Japanese war. Allied reports are published regularly in the Moscow dailies; the international review in the current number of Bolshevik commented on the Australian landings in Borneo and noted Japanese alarm about the course of the war. Colonel Tolchenov (an outstanding Soviet military critic) had a long review of the Pacific war in Krasnaya Zvezda of the 15th June, in which he stressed the deterioration of the Japanese position even before the fall of Germany, and pointed out that the total defeat of Germany cannot but influence Pacific operations. "Notes of concern are heard more and more frequently through the loud blare of Japanese propaganda's official optimism," declared Colonel Tolchenov. His final opinion was that Japan itself must be invaded: the Ryukyu Islands (of which the largest is Okinawa) are too small and the Philippines too far away for this purpose and only China can provide a suitable springboard for the final invasion of Japan.

The third anniversary of the Mutual Aid Agreement between the U.S.S.R. and the United States provided the occasion for a cordial exchange of messages between Marshal Stalin and President Truman, and M. Molotov and Mr. Stettinius. Both the messages from the Soviet leaders laid great stress on the important contribution of American aid to the victory of the Red Army, and expressed the conviction that the friendly ties between the two countries would develop successfully in the future. This friendly atmosphere has not precluded a continuance of curiously indiscriminating attacks in the Soviet press on American "reactionaries"; Izvestiya (17th June) dealt a particularly spirited blow at the "American advocates of fascism," but stated that they were only the mouthpieces of a small minority.

The Soviet press has, however, continued to register concern about America's ability to enjoy full employment in the post-war period, an anxiety rather obviously arising from the desire to ensure large-scale trade with the United States as soon as may be. M. Alexandrov in Trud described post-war difficulties in the United States and reconversion problems. One of the United States' acutest problems, he said, is the provision of work for the people, and reports from industrial centres show the inadequacy of the palliatives now being applied. He alleged, moreover, that the press was predicting unemployment and an inevitable fall in purchasing power, and asserted that the problem could not be solved internally but only by international collaboration and especially by trade with the U.S.S.R. The same moral was pointed by M. Zhukov in an article in Izvestiya from San Francisco. M. Zhukov described the Californian racial medley leading to race tension among the workers in times of unemployment and the superficially happy bourgeoisie "haunted by the nightmare of economic depression when war jobs cease."

The reports of election speeches and comment on the forthcoming election in Great Britain continue in the Soviet press. Pravda's international review recently noted the growing acerbity and mutual recriminations among the different parties, with each party claiming a monopoly to represent the will and interests of the whole nation. Internal questions were stated to overshadow foreign problems on which the party programmes agreed. The Conservative "bogey" describing the prompt introduction of Socialism as the immediate strangulation of private enterprise was described as "crude electoral strategy," as the Labour programme, according to Pravda, "naturally leaves English capital untouched." A survey of election prospects in Bolshevik indicated equal chances for victory between Labour with its progressive popular programme and the Conservatives, favoured by the old system of voting and unlimited financial means.

The 220th anniversary of the All-Union Academy of Sciences is being celebrated at a special Jubilee Session in Moscow from the 15th–18th June, attended by distinguished scientists from many foreign countries. The Soviet press and wireless have greeted this anniversary with a spate of congratulatory articles emphasising the special prestige enjoyed by science in the Soviet Union and the achievements of Soviet science since the revolution. Special articles on Soviet physics, astronomy, aviation, &c., in the chief Moscow dailies marked the opening of the Jubilee Session. Following its amalgamation with the Communist Academy in 1936, the All-Union Academy of Sciences is now the focal point for all branches of scientific research in the U.S.S.R. A new building facing the Park of Culture and Rest in Moscow was designed in 1940 by Academician Shchusev, to house this many-sided body; war interrupted the construction of the building which it is now anticipated will be completed in 1948.

Krasnaya Zvezda has attacked the Istanbul correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor for "libellously asserting that the intelligentsia is being destroyed en masse in Balkan countries." The correspondent was alleged to have been in touch with "dubious sources . . . anxious to discredit the democratic Governments in Bulgaria, Roumania and Yugoslavia." The same article also attacked Turkey for its attempts to divide the Great Powers. Turkish flirtation with "reactionary Greek forces" was declared suspect because it aimed at sabotaging a democratic solution of Balkan problems. Finally, Turkey's boast of having a well-equipped army ready to co-operate with Greece in the Eastern Mediterranean was compared with the much larger armed forces existing in Europe and able "to tip the political scales much more definitely."

SCANDINAVIA.

There has been an unexpected hitch in the formation of a new Norwegian Government, after it was authoritatively reported, on the 14th June, that Chief Justice Paal Berg had undertaken to form it. It was expected that at least one representative of the Communist Party would be included in it, and among those expected to be members were M. Gunnar Jahn, Minister of Finance in 1934–35, and Director of the Central Statistical Bureau, M. Einar Gerhardsen, chairman of the Labour Party and Mayor of Oslo since liberation, and General Ruge, who commanded the Norwegian forces during the period of war in Norway.

On the 18th June, however, a sensation was caused when it was announced that M. Berg had been unable to form a Government. It is understood that the crisis was brought about by the opposition of the Conservatives, led by M. Hambro, to the inclusion of M. Trygve Lie and M. Oscar Torp, which was advocated by the Labour party in the interests of continuity. M. Berg is reported to have recommended the King to apply to M. Fredrik Monsen, leader of the parliamentary group of the Labour party.

The Storting met on the 14th June. The Speaker, M. Hambro, in addressing it, stated that since December 1941 Norway had been at war with Japan, but it is anticipated that this will be given more formal recognition by the Storting itself. The Storting has officially published an account of its proceedings on the 9th April. Telegrams of greeting were sent to the United States Congress, the British Parliament and the Soviet Supreme Council.

The Danish Rigsdag, on the 15th June, set up a commission to investigate the responsibility of Ministers and other officials for the events of the 9th April, 1940. A special commission is also foreshadowed, to try civil servants charged with acting against the national interest during the occupation.

The Central Board of the Danish Social Democratic Party met on the 10th June and decided to set up a special party tribunal to examine cases of misbehaviour on the part of Social Democrat members during the occupation. It advocated the amalgamation, if found possible, of the Social Democrat and Communist parties.

The alliance between the Finnish Democratic League, the Social Democrats and the Agrarians is already showing some signs of instability. It is understood that a Cabinet crisis was narrowly averted in connexion with a proposal for large increases in the wages of industrial workers, which was eventually passed by the Finnish Diet. A considerable number of the Agrarians held the view that these increases gave an undue advantage to industrial as compared with agricultural workers.

Further signs of dissension are brought out in an article in Arbetarbladet for the 11th June, disputing a statement by M. Pohjanmaa, editor of Suomen Sosialidemokraatti, to the effect that the Social Democratic Party was now completely united. Arbetarbladet, representing the so-called opposition within the ranks of the party, contends that this body continues to object to the Right-wing section which was responsible for the war, and in particular to certain personal appointments made under the auspices of the party. The organ of the secessionists who joined the Democratic League—Vapaa Pohjola, has also protested strongly against M. Pohjanmaa's assertion.

In connexion with the Swedish metal workers' strike, which has been in progress for some time, a request was received from Finland that some special work should be allowed in the production of ball-bearings to enable Finland to fulfil her obligations to the Soviet Union. The request was refused on the 14th June, but, during their recent stay in Stockholm, M. Leino, Finnish Minister for the Interior, and his wife Mme. Kuusinen, made further representations as to the necessity for this dispensation, to members of the Swedish Communist Party, and a final decision does not yet appear to have been reached.

It was reported by the Stockholm correspondent of the Daily Telegraph on the 17th June that the Swedish Coalition Government was about to be dissolved in favour of a purely Social Democrat Cabinet. This report appears, however, to be premature: other accounts speak of the continuance of negotiations between the Premier, M. Hansson, and other party leaders in the Coalition, and M. Hansson is known to be constitutionally addicted to compromise. Speaking on the 17th June M. Bramstorp, Minister for Agriculture, said that he considered a continuance of the Coalition essential until the situation, especially abroad, had been further clarified.

Lecturing on the 14th June the Swedish Minister in Paris, M. Boheman, stated that Hitler had intended to attack Sweden in 1942, but that the plan was frustrated by preparations made in consequence of a disclosure by the German resistance movement. M. Günther, the Foreign Minister, has confirmed this statement in an interview with Morgon-Tidningen.

LOW COUNTRIES.

On the 14th M. van Acker flew to Salzburg in order to have an audience of King Leopold. He returned on the following day and was received by the Regent. On the 16th the Cabinet met and subsequently this statement was issued to the press: "The Prime Minister told the Cabinet that it was the King's intention to return soon to Belgium. The Government will not take the responsibility for the political developments which would inevitably result in the country as soon as the King returns. In these circumstances, the Government has offered its resignation to the Regent, with the additional declaration that it would be impossible for the Government to administer current affairs as from the moment when the King returns to Belgium, in view of the fact that current affairs would necessarily include the maintenance of public order, and political responsibility for words which the King might utter after his return. The Government therefore insists most strongly that the King should form a Government before his return to Belgium."

Radio Brussels also broadcast on the 16th a report of an interview with an unnamed Liberal Minister, who said that he and his Liberal colleagues were in entire agreement with M. van. Acker's point of view. He added that he thought it would be possible for the King to form a Government before his return. If, however, His Majesty were to follow precedent, he would have to consult the Presidents of the Chambers and political leaders. In conclusion he stated that the Liberals would not participate in such a Government.

The President of the Senate, in an interview published on the 17th said that, though he did not wish to make any political comment he desired to stress the gravity of the situation. He hoped that Belgians would remain level-headed and put the national interest before everything.

M. du Bus de Warnaffe, the Catholic Minister of Justice, also granted an interview, in which he said that the Government must ensure the maintenance of order until the King had formed another Government; there must be continuity in the exercise of power, and it was a primary duty of the Government to maintain order. A resigning Government must not engage in political acts; it must remain united, yet it must ensure the maintenance of order.

M. van Acker himself broadcast on the 18th and said "The Government decided that its strict duty was to inform the King, exhaustively and definitely about the different currents of public opinion, leaving it to His Majesty to take the decision he deemed most in keeping with the country's interests. The Government's decision was taken by all its members unanimously, as was also that of offering its resignation to the Prince Regent, of ensuring the transaction of ordinary business until the eventual return of the King, and of maintaining public order. Pending the King's final decision the Government appeals for calm and discipline. It wishes to state that it will be guided only by concern for the country's higher interests and by its resolve to maintain national unity."

In view of the fact that the King's abdication is now demanded by the great majority of the Liberals as well as by the Socialists and the Communists, it is hard to see how a Government could be formed that would command the confidence of Parliament. There are also other signs that the desire for abdication is growing. It is of interest to note that the Soir, a non-Party Brussels daily of good standing and large circulation, has now come out in favour of abdication. The advocates of abdication, however, are all at pains to point out that they desire the maintenance of the dynasty.

His Majesty's Government have throughout the controversy taken the line that the question of King Leopold was one to be settled by Belgium alone and have avoided any action that might give colour to suggestions that they wished to influence the course of events. In this connexion it should be noted that M. van Acker issued the following statement on the 15th: "A (Belgian) morning paper stated that Allied military authorities have refused to allow documents from the King's Household in Brussels specially prepared for him to reach him and that they have also refused to allow him to broadcast a message. This is contrary to the truth. Since the liberation of the King, the Allied authorities have placed at his and the Government's disposal all necessary means for full, free and quick communications. They have never opposed any trip of personalities called to Salzburg nor any transmission of documents; on the contrary, they have facilitated all such transmissions. As for the radio message, no one in official Allied or Belgian circles has ever heard of it."

FRANCE.

The visits of General Eisenhower and the Sultan of Morocco and the celebration of the anniversary of the 18th June, 1940, provided Paris with plenty of pageantry during the past week as an offset to the persistently unsatisfactory food situation.

On the 14th June General de Gaulle presented General Eisenhower with the "Croix de la Libération" at the Arc de Triomphe and later with the Sword of the First Consul. The Allied Commander-in-Chief was also received at the Hôtel de Ville and entertained to a luncheon, which General de Gaulle treated as a Franco-American rather than an Allied occasion.

On the 15th June the Sultan of Morocco, who had arrived at Cherbourg in the destroyer La Gloire, was met by General de Gaulle in person and received with all the pomp required to emphasise that France was welcoming an important representative of Islam. The Sultan is subsequently to visit Moroccan troops in Germany.

The highlight on the 18th June came when, on the Place de la Concorde following the parade down the Champs-Elysées, General de Gaulle, flanked by the Sultan, decorated various Frenchmen associated with his early stand with the "plaque" of Grand Officier of the Legion of Honour or the Cross of Liberation. It was very much a French ceremony; and the original plan for using the occasion to confer French decorations on Allied soldiers was dropped. That evening, however, the American Ambassador made a broadcast from Paris to the United States to mark "the fifth anniversary of the historic declaration made from London by de Gaulle."

The present lack of cordiality felt towards us in French official quarters is, indeed, quite evident and continues to find expression in press and wireless comment on the Levant crisis and far outweighs the criticism voiced even in some Resistance organs of the French Government's policy of prestige.

In the course of a statement in the House of Commons on the 14th June, Mr. Churchill reiterated that "the British have no ambitions or desires for aggrandisement in Syria" and "no idea of trying to supplant our French friends there." As for French influence, we should support it, "but only in counsel. It is not for us to secure the establishment of the influence any more than it is for us to pull it down." When a satisfactory treaty between France and the Syrians and Lebanese had been arrived at we would withdraw our troops. He was very glad to hear that M. Herriot was said to be coming to London on behalf of General de Gaulle. The last point was immediately answered by a semi-official A.F.P. communiqué, issued in Paris, which appeared in the French press of the 15th: M. Herriot had not been entrusted with any mission by General de Gaulle and had himself declared that afternoon that there was no question of his going to London in the near future.

The debate on the Levant in the Consultative Assembly was opened on the 15th June by M. Bidault, who read texts which showed (he claimed) that the powers granted to Britain by the de Gaulle-Lyttelton agreement were of a purely military nature and that France's special rights and her duty to maintain order within the territories had been recognised. France herself though a sovereign State had never raised the demand that troop movements in Allied territory in time of war should be subject to the previous authorisation of the authorities in the territory. French soldiers had been attacked in the Levant and had defended themselves. England was overstepping her rights and her intervention had not only involved the evacuation of French troops under painful circumstances: nuns who had been tending lepers for three-quarters of a century had been driven away. The French had no intention of giving up their position in the Middle East. France had proposed a Five-Power Conference—she did not fear to carry the question before ony international jurisdiction whatever. Let an impartial examination be made.

Mme. Viénot recalled her late husband's rôle in securing the 1936 treaties, and while speaking as a determined adherent of an Anglo-French alliance and criticising French mistakes, attacked the activities of General Spears, who had advised the Syrians not to negotiate with the French. M. Schumann referred to a letter from a British officer, dated the 3rd June, which he claimed, constituted a veritable indictment of a certain British line of policy. M. Gorse recalling his intervention of three months before (see Summary No. 286) recognised that France's position was compromised, but was critical of British military and economic control in the Near East, and declared that France ought to help the Arab League in a programme of internationalisation. M. Bonte took the Communist line of attacking General Beynet a former member of the Wiesbaden Armistice Commission, thus provoking an interruption by General de Gaulle, who made the point that half the men who fought at Bir Hakeim had served under General Dentz in Syria. The general note of the debate was one of sorrow rather than of anger, and any reference to the importance of Anglo-French friendship was received with cheers.

On the 16th June Mr. Duff Cooper handed to M. Bidault the long-awaited answer of His Majesty's Government to the French proposal for a Five-Power Conference. This states that we share the United States view (already intimated to the French on the 8th June): by bringing in other issues the Levant solution would be delayed, and we see no point in the participation of other Powers with no close associations in or knowledge of the Middle East. We propose Anglo-French-United States talks in London with which Syria and Lebanon should be associated. It was hoped that General de Gaulle might attend, as well as M. Bidault. M. Bidault immediately expressed the view that he could not persuade General de Gaulle to authorise conversations in London at the present time, but he thought if we agreed to hold them in Paris it could be arranged. He at the same time expressed himself frankly over General de Gaulle's irritability, criticised his Bir Hakeim reference as tactless, and showed concern at what the General might say when he spoke at the conclusion of the debate on the 19th.

The political manœuvring of parties and Resistance groups in preparation for the general elections to be held in the autumn illustrates the uneasy relations between the Communist and Socialist parties. The former is campaigning for complete fusion with the latter and issued on the 12th June a proposed constitution for a united workers' party to be discussed with the Socialists, the underlying assumption of the Communists being that if unity was achieved the entire Resistance movement would naturally come within the orbit of the new party. At present the Resistance movement is divided between those who are willing to co-operate with the Communists and those who incline more towards the Socialists. Thus the directing committee of the Mouvement de Libération Nationale (M.L.N.) decided at a recent meeting by a majority vote to propose a federation with Libération Nord, the Organisation Civile et Militaire (recently linked in the Union Travailliste) and Ceux de la Résistance, and to seek agreement on a permanent common policy with the Socialist and Jeune République (Left Catholic) parties. The dissenting minority of the M.L.N., however, led by M. d'Astier de la Vigerie, turned to the Communist-backed Front National, which is renewing its earlier attempts to unite the Resistance movement under Communist leadership. Attempts to constitute a Left-Centre part based on the Socialists and the Left Catholics are, however, likely to continue to founder on the anti-clerical issue which the Communists have sought to bring to a head. Moreover, while the Socialist Party is not willing for fusion with the Communist Party, the working alliance between the two, in spite of constant pin-pricks on either side, is being steadily strengthened by their joint dissatisfaction with the Government's internal and external policy.

SPAIN.

In an interview on the 16th June General Franco declared to a representative of the British United Press: "The Falange wields no political power in Spain and takes no political decisions, because all political power and decisions depend absolutely on the Government. There are some members of my Government who happen to be members of the Falange Party, just as they might happen to be anything else, but, first and last, they are my Cabinet Ministers." General Franco further denied that Spain had been allied in any way with Germany and Italy, and asserted that he had immediately dismissed those members of the Falange who had tried, when Germany seemed to be winning the war, to identify Spain with the Axis Powers. With regard to a restoration of the Monarchy, General Franco stated: "We have already decided upon the creation of a Council of State, which, whenever the necessity arises, would decide the problem of succession as regards the Spanish throne. The Council of State would join to the hereditary principle the traditional Spanish prerogative of demanding from the hereditary prince definite guarantees and the necessary prerequisites of fitness to ascend the Spanish throne."

The first part of General Franco's remarks is in striking contrast to declarations he made in a speech less than a month ago at Valladolid, when, resplendent in Falangist uniform, he reminded 70,000 hearers that Valladolid was the birthplace of a movement in which the blood of the army and the Falange was spilt together in forging a unity which embraced all Spaniards. General Franco has been informed, of course, that the Falange forms a barrier to the development of friendly relations between the British and American Governments and his own; and, according to reliable information, he did at one period heed the voice of reason so far as to prepare a decree dissolving the Falange. This intention, it would appear, was communicated by General Muñoz Grandes, the former Commander of the Blue Division and head of the Generalísimo's Military Household, to the Party leaders. They at once took the bull by the horns and threatened to go down fighting. The army could certainly have had little doubt of its ability to deal with the Party in the event of violence, but the fear of bloodshed is a very real nightmare in Spain to-day, and the Falange's blackmail seems to have been sufficiently realistic for their purpose. Hence General Franco's perhaps more than usually double-tongued declarations. Meanwhile, lest there be any error about the Falange's attitude, an anti-Allied riot occurred in Barcelona on the 15th June, when, according to press reports, about 100 Falangists paraded to attend a requiem mass for Hitler and Mussolini. On finding that permission for the mass had been withheld, they tried to wreck two cinemas where Allied newsreels and a film of the war in the Pacific were being displayed. Spanish explanations have been offered.

The remainder of General Franco's declarations require little comment. His remarks about Germany suggest that he still believes that, if he calls black white sufficiently often, we may be induced to believe that it is at least a dirty grey. Happily, the acquisition of the German Naval archives by the Allied Governments will make abundantly clear the length to which the Spaniards were prepared to go in providing facilities for our late enemies.

Meanwhile, the so-called "Chambéry incident" has come to complicate the already strained atmosphere of Franco-Spanish relations (see Summary No. 296). On the 15th June a trainload of some 470 Spanish nationals, described as diplomatic officials, workers and residents in Germany, were being repatriated via Switzerland and France, when they were set upon by a large mob at Chambéry, and a number of the party were beaten and otherwise misused. The train eventually returned to Switzerland. According to the Spanish version of the story the journey had been agreed to after lengthy negotiations between the Spanish and French Governments, and the passenger-list had been submitted and approved by the French Government, some ten persons having been eliminated on the grounds that they "might have had some connexion with the Blue Division." According to a semi-official French version, precautions were taken to keep secret the date of the departure and the route of the train (in addition to the prohibition on members of the Blue Division), but a Swiss paper, Voix Ouvrière, revealed the date and made allegations that the repatriates were in fact ex-members of the Blue Division. This was said to have been reproduced in a Grenoble newspaper, and it has been reported that pamphlets were distributed in Chambéry calling for a demonstration against the Spaniards. The Spanish version maintains that the French guard of 50 soldiers did nothing to protect the passengers, and that 61 of these were severely injured; 100 less severely and 20 were missing. The French appear to admit that 67 Spaniards were hurt. French reports have attributed the affair to the instigation of "pro-Nazi collaborators."

The Spanish authorities have presented the incident as a proof of the stability of conditions in Spain in contrast wth the chaos alleged to reign in France. M. Bernard Hardion, the present French representative in Madrid, has a task which is not to be envied.

ITALY.

The deadlock regarding the formation of a new Italian Government has, at last, apparently ended. Signor Ferruccio Parri has succeeded in persuading the six parties to co-operate with him and he has visited the Quirinal, where the Lieutenant of the Realm charged him to form a new Government. The choice of a Minister of the Interior was one of the chief difficulties but this has now been solved by Signor Parri retaining it himself as well as the Presidency of the Council. It is reported that Signor Nenni, the Socialist leader, and Signor Brosio, leader of the Liberal Party, will be joint Vice-Presidents. Signor Nenni's principal task will be to prepare for the elections of a Constituent Assembly. There is also a report that Signor Togliatti, the Communist Party leader, is to be Minister of Justice. This appointment may be made in order to convince the North that the Government intends to speed up Epuration. Signor De Gasperi is said to be remaining at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

Signor Ferruccio Parri was born in Genoa in 1890 but all his studies were done in Milan and he is more connected with that city than with any other. He became a professor of economics, but subsequently joined the staff of the Corriere della Sera. During the Fascist régime Signor Parri was imprisoned several times for his strongly anti-Fascist views. He was one of the anti-Fascists sent to the Lipari Islands, from whence, it is said, he helped Nitti to escape. He was again arrested in May 1943 but escaped to Switzerland, but returned secretly and became one of the most prominent partisan organisers and was known as "General Maurizio." Signor Parri is described as more of a philosopher and an idealist than a man of action, but he probably did more than anyone else to inspire the partisans with a sense of their mission and to get them to co-operate regardless of their political differences. Signor Parri has already told the six party leaders in Rome that he expects them to forget their diversity of opinion while working with him, since he considers that Italy is in the same state of emergency as during the war. Signor Parri has undoubtedly taken on a difficult task at a very difficult time. Whether he will be more successful than Signor Bonomi in making his Ministers collaborate, instead of indulging in Party polemics, remains to be seen. He is a much younger man than Signor Bonomi but, on the other hand, he has little or no political experience.

French troops, which have been occupying the Val d'Aosta, an area round Susa and Tenda and further south, along the Ligurian littoral as far as Imperia, are now being withdrawn to the French side of the frontier. They will be replaced by Anglo-American troops and A.M.G. will function in all the areas lately administered by the French.

THE VATICAN.

In the second part of his address to Catholic youth in Rome (see Summary No. 297, "Vatican," for the first part), the Pope pleaded for a definite faith to meet the mistaken but definite theories of to-day. He condemned compromise on the fundamentals of faith or of social life. "A believing Christian must hold firmly all revealed dogma and all the truths which derive from it, and therefore the fundamental principles on which rests the structure of every healthy social doctrine. Such fundamental principles oblige in conscience all Catholics, no one of whom may lawfully make compromise with systems, tendencies which contradict these same principles or against which the Church has set the faithful on their guard."

The papal Under-Secretary of State handed to the British and United States representatives the official archives of the German Embassy to the Vatican which the Vatican had asked the German Ambassador to surrender. It would seem, therefore, that the Vatican recognises the Allies as having assumed the government of Germany. At the same time Mgr. Montini hoped that in the future some new German government might accredit its representative to the Vatican, and that the Allies would not permanently turn the Embassy building (which is not in the Vatican City) from its traditional use.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

Hungary has been gratified by more strikingly friendly speeches from the U.S.S.R., which is also reported to be considering the conclusion of a commercial agreement with her. Trade negotiations are also proceeding with Roumania, with which country the political rapprochement is also being pushed forward, blessed by approving comment from M. Fedorov. An exchange of visits of democratic youth organisations has provided occasion for similar demonstrations of friendship towards Yugoslavia. Only towards Czechoslovakia is the tone different: pronouncements by Czechoslovak statesmen on their proposed policy towards the Magyar minority have evoked open protest.

The lull in internal politics inaugurated by Rákosi's Whitsuntide speech continues. The election or nomination of the Transdanubian Deputies to the Provisional Assembly has been officially authorised; the convocation of the Provisional Assembly has been promised for a near date; and the first draft of the Franchise Bill for the Constituent Assembly has passed the committee stage. Further, energetic steps are being taken to create order among the police, against whose excesses and Communist zeal complaints had been particularly rife. The Communists are, indeed, already complaining that they have been too conciliatory: while they were devoting all their energies to material restoration, especially on the railways, the "reaction" has stolen marches on them in the political field. The National Peasants, too, complain of lack of revolutionary enthusiasm among the masses. Many more ex-deportees and internees, including some well-known figures, have returned to Hungary. The Jewish population of Budapest is now estimated by the Jews themselves at 180,000 against a peace-time figure of 201,000—a smaller decrease than that of the non-Jewish population. B. Imrédy, the Right-wing ex-Premier, has been discovered and interned by the United States army.

Four Hungarian savants have gone to Moscow to participate in the anniversary celebrations of the Soviet Academy of Sciences.

Jozsef Grosz, Bishop of Csanad and acting Archbishop of Kalocsa, has been appointed ad interim Primate (see Summary No. 296).

There have been further increases in wages and taxes, but the upward movement of the cost of living figure has been halted, largely through the arrival from the country districts of more ample supplies of early summer produce.

Roumania.

The head of the Roumanian Press Department is reported to have announced to a gathering of journalists and editors of newspapers that Reuter's is a Fascist Agency. This remarkable report coincides with an official increase of pressure on the press. It appears that "agreements" with the Government have been made with certain of the papers which up to the present have been as independent as any newspaper can be in Roumania if it is to be allowed to appear at all. Those papers which accepted the situation were granted an increased quota of paper. A deputation of "democratic journalists," headed by the Socialist Minister Titel Petrescu, asked the Prime Minister to bring the censorship to an end now that the war was over. Dr. Grozea promised to convey their wishes to the Cabinet, but it is felt that there is little chance of the Communists who favour the censorship allowing it to come to an end. The independent paper Universul, which up to the present has carried on the front page the name of the director, appeared on the 3rd June with, in place of Dl Lugoşianu's name, the announcement, "published under the management of a committee of direction."

A communication from General Vinogradov makes it clear that almost all the Roumanian railway equipment is regarded by the Russians as spoils of war. The U.S.S.R. has consented to leave with Roumania 8,000 cars and 1,150 locomotives, instead of the 46,000 cars she previously possessed. It is not surprising that railway transport is difficult and much of the difficulty in getting the oilfields into proper working order is due to this. The diesel-engined trains from Bucarest to Braşov and to Constanţa have, however, begun to run again.

Carol, formerly King of Roumania, has received permission from the French Government to reside in Normandy and has been provided with the necessary visa.

Yugoslavia.

The Yugoslavia troops moved out of Trieste. They are reported to have taken furniture, tools, food and scientific equipment with them. On the 12th June Allied Military Government was established. The Yugoslav agency Tanyug on the 17th made many complaints: that the police had tried with a fire-hose to disperse 60,000 [sic] people demonstrating for Yugoslavia the previous day, that the military authorities had closed the Tanyug office and handed it over to Stefani [NOTE: The Stefani agency no longer exists], had put an end to the operations of the "People's Court," and had removed the officials of various Yugoslav organisations from their premises.

The first published commentary on the Agreement of the 9th June (see preceding Summary, p. 14) was an article in Politika on the 14th. The writer attacked the British and United States Governments and the utterances of Mr. Grew and Field-Marshal Alexander. He then described some of the terms of the Agreement; but omitted to mention Pola or the arrangement for the restoration of persons arrested and property removed, and falsely asserted that the Allies had promised to maintain the civil authorities installed during the Yugoslav occupation.

The two Chiefs of Staff met, to arrange matters arising out of the Agreement, at Allied 13th Corps H.Q., on the 13th. On the 17th Radio Belgrade announced that the talks had come to a standstill owing to differences over the civil administration in the Allied zone (about which a false account had been published in Belgrade, as mentioned above).

The Belgrade press continued to assert that a "Fascist" reign of terror existed in Carinthia under the Allied Military Government, which, among other things, allowed "foresters, who are mostly Hitlerites, to carry on."

On the 17th Tito, speaking at Mladenovac, paid a more exclusive tribute to the Soviet Union than he had previously done. "Thanks only to the invincible Soviet Union," he said, "did the sun of liberty dawn. . . . We have to thank our great Ally for our freedom to-day. . . . To discharge our debt we need do nothing else but live in most sincere friendship with this great Ally, the U.S.S.R. . . . Our destiny is linked with our Russian brothers and our Slav brothers. . . ." He mentioned no other Ally.

Much publicity was given to Yugoslav-Bulgarian fraternity and to the review of the Bulgarian First Army during its homeward journey through Belgrade.

A leading article in Borba of the 16th showed alarm at the paralysis of trade. It protested that many of the new authorities showed no understanding of their duties and had not "grasped that trade cannot be set in motion merely by laws and decrees." It was evident that merchants had been turned or frightened out of business and that the Liberation Committees had been incompetent.

The Belgrade–Zagreb line has been repaired and the first train left Zagreb on the 15th.

In north-west Macedonia the Albanian rebellion (see Summary No. 291, p. 15) has been suppressed. The Belgrade press is conducting a campaign of protest against the alleged oppression of the Slavs in Greek Macedonia. Yugoslav opinion is represented as indignant. 7,000 refugees from Greece are said to be coming, via Bulgaria, to be settled in Yugoslav Macedonia. This press campaign, combined with troop movements towards the Greek frontier, looks ominous.

Greece.

The Greek Government is taking steps to see that law and order shall be maintained until after elections can be held. To this end 4,000 members of the National Guard are being temporarily transferred to the Gendarmerie, and some 3,000 trained gendarmes at present otherwise employed are being made available. It is hoped that by the beginning of September 4,000 more gendarmes will have been recruited and trained. Both Left and Right-wing elements appear to be well-disposed to the Gendarmerie, who have now been placed completely under the control of the Minister of the Interior. Electoral lists are now in preparation, and should be completed and printed by about the middle of October. The Minister of the Interior now puts mid-November as the earliest possible date for an election. No decision has yet been taken on the method of voting (majority or proportional) or on whether a plebiscite should precede or follow the election.

Rizospastis has reported an interview given by M. Zachariadis to representatives of the Athens Press. Replying to questions M. Zachariadis expressed his surprise that he had not seen in the Press any claim to Cyprus, which was a Greek island. He was also surprised at not having seen any condemnation of those "foreign agitators" who were trying to create a movement for autonomy in Crete. (Commenting on this interview, Ellinikon Aima said "foreign agitators" must clearly refer to the British.) The fact that these anti-national efforts got no response from the people was no excuse for the Press not opposing them. As regards Northern Epirus, M. Zachariadis repeated what he had already said in his interview with Embros (see Summary No. 118), i.e., that it was not in the interests of Greece to solve the problem by violent action. The northern frontier of Greece must be so drawn as to give the country security. A democratic Greece and a democratic Bulgaria could settle the question in twenty-four hours without any bloodshed. As for the claim, voiced by Eleftheri Ellada, to Eastern Thrace, M. Zachariadis said that, if the democratic world urged this claim, the Communist Party would, while maintaining its own reservations, bow to the opinion of the majority. In this connexion it may be mentioned that the Salonica Left-wing paper Dimocratia has also put forward a claim to Eastern Thrace, alleging that the district is Greek, that Turkey has never done anything to help Greece, and that the wrongs of the Lausanne Treaty might be righted by resettling the Greek refugees in Eastern Thrace.

Albania.

According to a recent account of conditions in Southern Albania, there is little genuine support of Enver Hoxha's régime there, although plenty of lip-service is paid to it. While the south was the chief scene of the Partisans' activities, it is also the more enlightened region thanks to the presence of numerous emigrants returned from America, and to the Orthodox Albanians being on the whole better educated than the rest of the population. There is much criticism of continued conscription, of the Government's incompetence to relieve starvation or to reconstruct, of the contrast offered by the good living and clothes of the authorities with the starvation and rags of most people, and of the tax on war profits, which may be justified in principle but is levied so arbitrarily as to kill business. Three hundred people are in Korça jail awaiting trial as so-called war criminals, which is in itself a disturbing factor. As against all this criticism, however, it is true that roads and bridges have mostly been put in good enough order to last, at any rate, till autumn, that labour and materials—even nails for example—for rebuilding hardly exist and that the schools are open again, though many children are kept at home to replace the menfolk taken from the fields. Moreover, Korça, the principal southern town, was little damaged by the Germans, although most of the other towns and villages in the south were almost entirely destroyed.

A Soviet Military Mission has arrived at Tirana and been warmly welcomed by the authorities.

Bulgaria.

The break-up of the Government, which last week appeared to be imminent, has not yet occurred, and it seems after all to be the intention of the Communists to leave things as they are until at any rate after next month's meeting of the "Big Three." The process of fomenting discord within, as well as between, the other parties continues; but the façade of the "Fatherland Front" is allowed to remain. Thus, M. Petkov has been replaced by a pliable nonentity as secretary of the influential Agrarian Party Union, and M. Bumbarov actually expelled from its membership; yet both retain their places in the Cabinet. The date fixed for the elections is the 26th August.

The 14th June was the 22nd anniversary of the assassination of Alexander Stambuliski, founder and leader of the Agrarian League and the one outstanding political personality that Bulgaria has produced in recent times. It might have been thought by the country's present rulers inopportune to draw any special attention to this conspicuously independent figure, all the more so since it is upon the outlawed Dr. G. M. Dimitrov that his mantle has obviously fallen. However, strangely enough, the occasion was marked by official celebrations at his birth-place and at Sofia, and a special commemoration stamp bearing his portrait has been issued by the General Post Office. The peasants are evidently credited with surprisingly short memories.

M. Neykov, Minister of Commerce, has been busy warning profiteers and "speculators" that unless they take care they will soon find themselves declared defeatists and have their shops closed and their property confiscated. A special office has been set up by the Industrialists' Union at Sofia to deal with any complaints sent in.

At the bidding of the State the Bulgarian Clergy Congress, which ended its deliberations on the 10th June, tamely undertook to carry out a number of radical Church "reforms" which can hardly be acceptable to the country as a whole. The chief of these innovations are the establishment of a supreme central mixed Synod comprising clergy and laity in equal numbers; a similar mixed committee to administer each diocese; a drastic curtailment, in consequence, of the personal authority of the Bishops; and—perhaps most significantly of all—the restriction of the wearing of any ecclesiastical dress by the clergy to the celebration of the Liturgy in church.

Turkey.

The passing of the Land Reform Bill was celebrated on the 17th June as "Land Day," which is to be an annual festival. It appears that the translation of the proposals into law was largely due to President Inönü's personal intervention. The newspapers had for once been allowed to express themselves freely for or against the proposed measure, and in the Grand National Assembly it caused the most heated debates known for twenty years, taunts of Fascism and Communism being freely bandied about. Exasperated by these futile recriminations, President Inönü appears to have gone to the Assembly and insisted on the deputies—particularly the big landowners—putting country before self. But now, according to one expert foreign observer, it is doubtful whether the measure can be successfully put into force for lack of an accurate up-to-date land survey. This would seem to be an essential condition of land redistribution, but the last comprehensive Turkish survey is three hundred years old and the survey now in the making does not yet cover rural areas.

President Inönü's eagerness to push the Land Bill through and also the recent institution of a Labour Ministry are perhaps to be explained in part by a desire to meet the charge of reaction which Soviet propaganda has been directing against Turkish institutions. In the last few days Soviet propaganda has charged almost all the Turkish press with being reactionary and certain papers—which used undoubtedly to be in German pay—with being still the champions of Nazism. The Soviet Government seems to think this propaganda a useful prelude to negotiations. According to one report in the foreign press the U.S.S.R. is likely to demand inter alia the retrocession of Kars, Ardahan and Artvin which she herself restored to Turkey in 1921.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The last batch of about 200 French civilians was evacuated from Damascus on the 11th–12th June, but the Ninth Army Headquarters believe that the French Military Commander in Damascus has allowed a few families to stay at their own risk. The French civilians were evacuated in British army transport with their essential luggage. On their arrival at Beirut arrangements for them were made by the French military authorities. The situation still remains tense in Syria, and there have been several incidents. The atmosphere is not likely to clear until it becomes known that the conference, which His Majesty's Government has proposed to the French Government (see under " France ") between His Majesty's Government, the United States Government and the French Government, with the association of the Levant States, is in fact to be held. Troupes Spéciales are still endeavouring to desert. On the morning of the 8th June a company of the French Camel Corps at Dumair, near Damascus (men of the Ruwalla Anaza Bedouins), mutinied and killed their Commander and five out of seven other French officers, and four out of six French non-commissioned officers. Some of them went to Damascus in vehicles belonging to the company and offered their services to the Syrian President. The latter ordered them to be placed under supervision in gendarmerie headquarters, and at once informed the British Legation. The British military authorities sent out a column which succeeded in disarming the remaining mutineers without bloodshed—a task which was rendered considerably easier by Syrian co-operation.

The food position in the Levant has been giving cause for anxiety. On the 1st June there was only eight days' supply of grain in Damascus, and in Homs and Hama only enough grain to last until the end of June. In Aleppo there was even less grain. L'Office des Céréales Panifiables had ceased to function in Syria owing to hostility to the French, and the trouble was further aggravated by French conversion of O.C.P. transport to military purposes. Except for Latakia, the country would therefore have been without grain after the 30th June, and Damascus itself after the 8th June. At the same time no French personnel could be used in grain collection, not only because of danger to their lives, but also because no one would sell to them or to any organisation employing them. Finding ourselves confronted with a breakdown of existing grain-collecting arrangements, it was considered a matter of military necessity that arrangements should urgently be made to secure that there should be no interruption of food supplies to urban populations in the Levant States. The Minister Resident in the Middle East therefore asked the British Commander-in-chief to undertake provisional responsibility for grain collection as a part of military operations, as it is a major British interest, from the point of view of military security in the Middle East, that the population of the Levant States should be fed. The organisation set up for this purpose is known as MIRA. A temporary agreement to cover the activities of MIRA is being arranged between the Governments of Syria and the Lebanon, and the Commander-in-chief, British Forces in the Middle East. While appreciating that the collection and distribution of the cereal crop in the Levant States is of interest from the point of view of tranquillity and military security, we feel that British participation in any grain-collecting scheme should not involve us in any liability to purchase any part of the crop which might be surplus to local requirements. Our representatives therefore made it clear that His Majesty's Government could not accept such an obligation, and it was accordingly agreed that MIRA should limit its purchases to 250,000 tons, to which this year's crop would probably be limited, so that the question of purchasing the surplus should not arise. We have also been anxious to ensure that the purchase of the crop should be financed by the States themselves to the fullest extent of their capacity.

In Egypt public interest has been centred mainly on the meeting of the Council of the Arab League. The general opinion amongst Egyptians is that the present Syrian and Lebanese dispute with France constitutes the real test of the efficacy of the Arab League, whose meeting had adjourned pending further developments. The Secretary-General of the League issued a communiqué to the press in which he stated that the Council had studied the measures which its members should take individually and collectively to resist French aggression and to maintain the complete independence and sovereignty of Syria and the Lebanon. It had been decided by the Council that the Arab States should be informed of the recommendations decided upon by it, and that the present session was not to be considered as closed—but only postponed to a future date on the summons of the President of the League. It is clear that all the delegates were determined that France should quit the Levant States. On the other hand, at a banquet given on the occasion of the suspension of the League session, the Secretary-General, Azzam Bey, made a comparatively mild speech ending with the words: " We are extending our hand to the whole world, including France herself, for collaboration on the basis of brotherhood and peace. France has been a faithful friend to the Arab nations for several generations past. We are convinced that she will not desist from her civilising mission, and from the path of world collaboration in the East as in the West."

The Egyptian Prime Minister has declared the restoration of public liberties " in such a way that martial laws would be restricted to their narrowest limits and not go beyond military matters, matters of supplies and matters affecting the property of nationals of enemy countries and countries formerly under enemy occupation." Censorship of the press, periodicals and other printed matter published in Egypt is terminated except in so far as strictly military matters are concerned. Public meetings are not subject to any restrictions other than the provisions of common law, and the authority responsible for military laws no longer has the right to issue an order for detention.

The Wafd party, who considered that they had forced the abolition of martial law and press censorship upon the Government by an interpellation in the Senate last month and by press agitation, are claiming (not without reason) to have scored a noteworthy success. They are following this up by affirming that the time has come to hold free elections under a neutral Cabinet. The Council of Ministers has issued a communiqué on the subject of the Ministerial Commission instituted by a decision of the Council of Ministers last October, to enquire into the integrity of Nahas Pasha's Cabinet. They have decided to refer the report of the Commission to the Chamber of Deputies. It does not, however, follow that action will go further than this, or than possibly a debate in the Chamber of Deputies.

M. Muhsin Sadr, the new Persian Prime Minister, has made considerable progress in his task of Cabinet-making. Five members of the last administration, including M. Sipahbudi, the Foreign Minister, have agreed to serve under him. Three posts, namely, those of Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, Minister of the Interior, and Minister without Portfolio, remain to be filled.

The Freedom Front Press continues to make violent attacks on M. Sadr, while certain of the more moderate papers express regret at the resignation of M. Hakimi and deplore the lack of stability in the Governments since August 1941. It seems improbable that a durable Cabinet will be formed during the lifetime of the present Majlis.

There is no lessening of the agitation in the Persian press for the withdrawal of Allied troops from the country.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 11th June the Japanese House of Representatives passed the Extraordinary War Measures Bill as amended by the House Committee. The chief amendment was to Article 4 of the Bill, which provides for an Extraordinary War Measures Committee. By the original draft of this Article the Government would have been obliged merely to report to the Committee the measures taken under the Act. After a stiff fight the Lower House amended the draft to read: " The Government should consult the Extraordinary War Measures Committee, but in case of emergency the Government may report to the Committee after the measures have been taken " (Domei, 12th June). As the Government will presumably be the judge of when an emergency exists it is doubtful if the Diet has gained very much. The other amendments accepted by the Government referred to changes in methods of taxation and to the powers of the newly-established regional Superintendents-General; their nature was not specified. The Bill was sent to the House of Peers, which passed it on the 12th June. The 87th Extraordinary Session of the Diet was formally closed on the 13th June.

From what has been made public of the debate on the Bill, it is clear that some members of the Diet feared that, under the pretext of the crisis in the war situation, an attempt was being made to do away with the Diet altogether. Masamichi Koyama, a member of the Lower House, said pretty plainly that the Bill violated the Constitution; he pointed out that, whereas under the Constitution emergency Imperial Ordinances had to be laid before the Diet at its next sitting (under Article VIII of the Constitution such Ordinances are invalidated if the Diet disapproves of them), under the new Bill the Government were empowered to issue ministerial orders which were not to be referred subsequently to the Diet. Baron Hogami made a similar criticism in the House of Peers. The Government's answer was that, under its first Article, the Act would be effective only for the duration of the war and that its scope was limited to measures for coping with an emergency situation,, in which it would not be possible to assemble the Diet and in which the new regional authorities would need full powers to act upon their own initiative.

Despite these official assurances and explanations the suspicion lingered that the new Act might be utilised to bring about a totalitarian régime. Toshio Shimada, Speaker of the House of Representatives, issued a statement immediately after the close of the Diet session in which he disagreed with those who asserted that the Diet was no longer needed because all its functions had been mandated to the Government, and he urged the Government to be very careful about the measures it took under the Act. Suzuki, on the 14th June, told the Press that the new Act authorised the Government to exercise emergency powers only within narrow constitutional limits. He revealed that one of the main reasons why the Government introduced the Bill instead of simply invoking Article 31 of the Constitution (see this Summary No. 297), was the fear that the latter step would play into the hands of the enemy whose propaganda was aimed at alienating the Japanese people from their military leaders.

The Diet also passed an Act legalising the People's Volunteer Corps, the organisation of which is proceeding in all districts. All males from 15 to 65 years of age and females aged 25 to 45 can serve (Domei, 12th June). When needed, they will be mustered primarily for work in the transport of supplies and the repair of roads and airfields, but some at least will, if occasion arises, be organised for guerrilla warfare and will be equipped with all available weapons, including heirloom swords and bamboo spears. They will not receive any pay and will have to provide their own food and clothing. Members of the Corps who do good service will be awarded the Order of the Golden Kite and those killed in action will be deified with the war dead at the Yasukuni Shrine; their dependants will be entitled to pensions from the State.

On the 14th June Admiral Suzuki gave Japanese correspondents his views on the war situation. He said that he did not consider that the Okinawa battle was a decisive one. The Americans had suffered heavy losses on Iwojima and Okinawa; if the Japanese went on displaying the same fighting spirit and, if their enemies were confronted with the prospect of an endless struggle, they would surely propose a truce. Suzuki said that he had given a pledge to carry on until his death and that he would not resign if Okinawa were lost. With regard to an invasion of Japan itself, the Premier declared that he was confident of victory if the people stood firm. He considered it impossible for the Americans to land a million men at one time and even an invasion with half that strength would take several months to disembark. The Japanese forces would have the advantages of short communications and greatly superior numbers. Suzuki declared that some people were worried; these pointed to what had happened on Luzon, or to the defeat of Germany. But, said the Premier, Japan differed from Luzon, while Japanese officers and men would all fight to the death, which the German Army had not done.

The Mainichi (14th June) alleged that the first stage of general civil war between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists had begun with the movement of Communist forces into south China to counter the advance of the Kuomintang troops in Kwangsi and Chekiang, in the wake of the Japanese withdrawal. The Tokyo Shimbun (15th June) asserted that the Soviet Union was exerting increased pressure upon Chungking in favour of the Chinese Communists and referred to a report that Russian military and economic experts had been sent to Yenan. This report originally came from Domei at Canton; it said that twenty-five Soviet experts had arrived at Yenan to train the Chinese Communist Army in technical matters. It pointed out that this was the first time that the U.S.S.R. had sent such advisers to the Yenan régime. The Tass agent in Tokyo sent this report to Moscow without comment on the 6th June.

Yenan Radio on the 13th June reported that the Seventh National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party, which opened in Yenan on the 23rd April, had come to a successful close on the 11th June. The Congress had approved the report on the political situation made by Mao Tse-tung and had resolved that the recommendations he had made should be carried out. A summary of Mao's report appeared in Amerasia of the 18th May. He declared that the ruling clique of the Kuomintang was preparing for civil war against the Communists and that this clique hoped that the Allied commanders in China might play a rôle similar to that of General Scobie in Greece. Mao denounced the Kuomintang's plans for a National People's Assembly as a "mockery of democracy," and he insisted upon the immediate replacement of the Kuomintang dictatorship by a coalition Government embracing all parties and groups and also non-party elements. This would be a provisional régime for the duration of the war; after victory was won, a really democratic National Assembly should be convened and this would select a regular democratic coalition Government. He intimated that the Communists would not resume negotiations unless the Kuomintang were willing to accept these terms.

Mao also proposed to the Communist Congress that a conference of "people's representatives" from all parts of liberated China should be called in Yenan to discuss measures for unifying the political activities in these areas, to give directives to the anti-Japanese democratic movement among the people in Kuomintang-controlled areas and to underground movements in Japanese-occupied regions, with the object of forming a coalition Government.

On matters of foreign policy Mao declared that China must improve her relations with the Soviet Union and stated that it would not be possible to reach a final settlement of Far Eastern questions without Soviet participation. He thanked the United States and Great Britain for the aid they had rendered in the common struggle against the Japanese, but he warned the American and British Governments that they would make a grave mistake if they aided "China's reactionary clique in opposing the democratic cause of the Chinese people."

Mao further declared that after the defeat and unconditional surrender of Japan a truly democratic régime should be established there. Korea should be given her independence and independence should also be granted to India, Burma, the Dutch East Indies and Indo-China. Siam should be treated "according to the proper measures for dealing with a Fascist turncoat."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

President Truman's statement that the results of the Davies and Hopkins missions had "been completely satisfactory and gratifying" and his reminder that the Soviet Union had done some "very pleasant yielding" was greeted with profound relief throughout the United States. The press, ranging from Liberal to strongly Conservative, welcomed this news and took their cue from the President in assembling all the available evidence to prove that the Russians were "as anxious to preserve peace" as were the Americans. This is no time "to muddy the international waters," declared the President. "The all-important thing which confronts us is that the unity, mutual confidence and respect which resulted in the military victory should be continued to make a just and durable peace." The President also announced that a definite time and place had been set for the Big Three meeting. He would be accompanied by Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Byrnes, Admiral Leahy, Mr. Stettinius, the Chiefs of Staff and possibly Mr. Davies, if his health permitted. Later, Washington officials confirmed Mr. Atlee's disclosure that the meeting would take place "in the vicinity of Berlin." Some surprise and annoyance was expressed in the press at this apparent slip, which, according to Mr. David Lawrence, would endanger the lives of the participants. The New York Herald Tribune, however, termed the revelation "only a slight annoyance," and praised the choice of Berlin as "symbolically important" and of "practical utility" since it "satisfies Stalin's desires without impairing the prestige of the Western Allies."

It is perhaps largely due to the President himself that the good news this week has not led to exaggerated optimism. Instead the mood is one of restrained and sober satisfaction: partly attributable to obvious signs of improved inter-allied relationships as seen in the better atmosphere over Poland and Trieste and the joint meeting on the control of Germany. Many derive additional encouragement from the announcement that the Senate leaders will push for an early ratification of the United Nations Charter, and the possibility that Congress may have approved the Bretton Woods Agreement and the Reciprocal Trade Act in time for Mr. Truman to arrive at the Big Three meeting with "a trunk full of international bargaining power."

Interest in the question of compulsory military training has now revived as a result of the hearings on the May-Gurney Conscription Bill before the House Committee on Post-War Military Policy. General George Marshall, the Army Chief of Staff, in urging the recognition of the necessity for compulsory military training, told the Committee that such recognition would have a far-reaching effect in obtaining a satisfactory international agreement for the terms of peace. "A decision regarding the American Government's general military policy is a matter of urgent necessity at this time. To support our determination to maintain peace," he said, "the world must recognise our military power as realistic, and not as a remote potential." Mr. Grew, the Acting Secretary of State, supported this view, alleging that the scepticism of the Japanese as to the degree of military might behind United States' foreign policy was one of the factors most responsible for the attack on Pearl Harbour. Support for the view that compulsory military training is "a vital necessity" has also been given by Mr. Stimson, Secretary of War, Mr. Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Nimitz, Admiral King, General Eisenhower and General Bradley. Although the proposals in the May-Gurney Bill may ultimately be adopted, there is likely to be much opposition and much delay. Opposition to Labour and Educational circles is indeed strong. A recent poll disclosed that 47 per cent. of college Presidents are opposed to compulsory military training compared with 38 per cent. in favour.

General Bradley has been appointed, with universal acclaim, War Veterans' Administrator. The organisation which he is now to lead has recently been subjected to severe criticism and it is presumably hoped that he will introduce needed reforms.

The arrest by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (F.B.I.) of six persons, charged with the theft of secret documents from the Departments of State, War and Navy, has created great interest and there have been protests that the freedom of the press is in jeopardy. Three of the accused held confidential positions in the Federal Government and another, Philip Jaffé, one of the co-editors of Amerasia, a magazine dealing with Pacific affairs, is on the Council of America-Soviet Friendship Incorporated and is said to have made large contributions to the Communist cause in the United States. The Liberal and Left-wing papers avow that the State Department has started a Communist witch-hunt, reminiscent of the "Palmer prosecutions of President Harding's days." Others have alleged that Mr. Grew is attempting to stifle criticism of his Far-Eastern policy. In a statement to the press, however, Mr. Grew rebutted these charges and remarked "We heard somebody in the chicken coop and went to see who was there." He made it quite clear that the arrests were merely the beginning of an intensive drive to try to prevent the unauthorised leakage of confidential material and that this present case involved both the Navy and the State Departments.

The appropriation for the Office of War Information has been practically cut in half by the House of Representatives. Instead of 35 million dollars for the fiscal year beginning the 1st July which was requested, the House wants to give it only 17 million dollars. President Truman has told Congressional leaders that he was "very disturbed" over the action by the House and that it would be a mistake "to abolish some of its (the Office's) major functions while the war is still on." This is one of the issues that has recently led Mr. Arthur Krock to detect rifts in the existing "era of good feeling" between the President and Congress. Other emerging points of disagreement are the requests for expansion of the President's powers to reform the Executive machinery of government, the suggested rise in Congressional salaries and the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. But perhaps on no other issue to date has the President shown greater political courage than in his support for the Bill to establish a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission (F.E.P.C.). This Bill is designed primarily to safeguard the rights of negroes, and it is bitterly opposed by all Southern members of Congress, the vast majority of whom are, of course, Democrats.

The new proposals for India contained in the British White Paper have been received with deep satisfaction by the great majority of commentators. They prove the British to be sincere in their pledges to India and, to quote from the New York Times, "contradict charges that the Cripps offer was 'phoney,' and never intended as an honest attempt at settlement." The proposals are seen as an offer of virtual self-government and a step towards eventual independence. The general implication is that it would be foolish for the Indians to refuse to co-operate in this new offer. There have been occasional suggestions that the publication of the White Paper now is "shrewd electioneering," but as Mr. Raymond Swing pointed out, if this were so, then it was a matter for rejoicing, since it demonstrated that British public opinion favoured a more liberal policy towards India.

Mr. Justice Jackson's report on war criminals has been received with nation-wide praise. Mr. Walter Lippmann has described it as "perhaps the most impressive United States State paper of this war." From the extreme Left, as represented by the Communist Daily Worker, to the extreme Right, public sentiment seems solidly behind the recommendations. The principle of swift trial for war criminals, and the proposal to hold military commanders, financiers and industrialists criminally responsible for aggressive wars, and to establish the process of retribution by international law, have been greeted as "epoch-making."

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina Colonel Perón's industrial policy has been attacked with some vigour by the Bolsa de Comercio, which, after a meeting on the 12th June, published a manifesto signed by over 300 industrial and commercial organisations (though not by the powerful Unión Industrial) and printed by the leading newspapers. The Bolsa condemns the manner in which Colonel Perón's Secretariat of Labour has intervened in social questions "under the pretext of fighting Communism, but with the aim of gaining for the Government a reputation for an advanced social policy." This is the more objectionable because it depends on the temporary will of one man. The immediate cause of this denunciation appears to be an order fixing ceiling prices retroactively at the level of last December.

In the political field, Dr. Honorio Pueyrredón, the leader of the Radical Party, has, according to broadcast reports, initiated negotiations for the resumption of party activities. The Government, meanwhile, has decided to release political prisoners "with certain reservations." On the 13th June the United States Ambassador told Press correspondents that the Press Director of the Ministry of the Interior had stated that the Argentine Government were irrevocably decided to ensure complete liberty of the Press and had asked that any difficulty in transmitting messages should at once be reported for investigation and the punishment of those responsible.

The Colombian Government have announced that they consider Colombia to have been at war with Japan since November 1943. They have also, in view of student demonstrations of a Falangist character (which were followed by counter-demonstrations), declared a state of siege in the area of Bogotá: public meetings have been forbidden and the press subjected to censorship. The situation appears to be quiet.

The result of the Peruvian presidential elections is not yet officially announced, but first estimates suggest that Sr. Bustamante y Rivero of the Democratic Front (centre and left) has won a distinct victory over General Ureta and his Right-wing National Union. At one time it seemed that General Ureta would have the full backing of Sr. Prado, but the endorsement of Sr. Bustamante's candidature by Marshal Benavides and other Conservatives, as well as by A.P.R.A., gave him a broad front of support which General Ureta could hardly hope to challenge. President Prado appears to have recognised this, and the election has apparently been allowed to run its course.

On the 9th June a group of Salvadorean officers presented an ultimatum to their President, who rejected it; on the following day two aircraft of the Salvadorean air force unsuccessfully tried to bomb the President's house. The first crashed, and the second, on being driven off, took refuge in Guatemala, relying obviously on the continued existence of the frontier. Indeed, the recent premature announcement of a union of the two countries seems to partake rather of the nature of an engagement than of a marriage, and an engagement which may well be broken off on grounds of incompatibility.

The Constituent Assembly of Panamá has elected Sr. Enrique A. Jiménez Provisional President. Sr. Jiménez has been a First Vice-President, and more recently Ambassador in Washington.

UNITED NATIONS.

At San Francisco the question of voting on the Security Council has at last got through the Committee stage. An Australian proposal to remove the Great Power veto from all recommendations for peaceful settlement was defeated by 20 votes to 10; and the solution agreed by the Great Powers was then passed by 30 votes to 2. But the fact that there were 15 abstentions on both these votes showed that many of the smaller Powers were unenthusiastic about the outcome.

The subject was again linked with demands that amendments to the Charter should not be subject to the veto and that a conference to revise the Charter should be held after an interval of ten years. On the first point the Committee concerned voted by a narrow margin that any amendment recommended by a two-thirds vote of such a conference should come into force when ratified by two-thirds of all the member States, but that these ratifications should include those of all the five Great Powers. The second proposal (to hold a conference after a ten-year period) was lost, also by a narrow margin. There were 28 votes for it and 17 against it, but the majority fell just short of the two-thirds required for a decision. Agreement was then reached on the Committee on a United States proposal that, if a Conference to review the Charter had not been held before the 10th annual Assembly of the Organisation, the question of holding it should go on the Agenda of the 10th Assembly, and it should be held if a simple majority of the Assembly and any seven members of the Security Council so agreed.

Another debated issue has been that of domestic jurisdiction. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals included a provision (VIII (A) 7) that the procedure for peaceful settlement of disputes by the Security Council should not apply to disputes concerning matters which by international law were solely within the domestic jurisdiction of the States concerned. An amendment submitted by the four sponsoring Powers proposed that this clause should be deleted from Chapter VIII; but that a new clause in Chapter II (Principles) should provide that nothing contained in the Charter should authorise the Organisation to interfere in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the State concerned or should require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the Charter. The amendment added, however, that this principle should not prejudice the application of Chapter VIII, Section B. This addition would mean that even a dispute arising from matters within the domestic jurisdiction of a party, if it had not been settled between the parties and if it was deemed by the Security Council to constitute a threat to peace and security, should be dealt with by the Council, which would then be required to recommend any action necessary to keep the peace. The Australian delegation feared that the addition would encourage the Council to intervene in matters of domestic jurisdiction (such as the immigration laws based on the "White Australia" policy). They first proposed the omission of the addition; but, finding this could not be achieved, they went on to propose that the addition should be retained with the addition of the words "enforcement measures under" before "Chapter VIII, Section B." The latter proposal was passed by 31 votes to 3 in Committee. This decision may have repercussions later when the question of minority protection arises. This question will come up when the Organisation takes up the task of assisting in the realisation of human rights and basic freedoms, and when the transfer to it of the League's obligations under the existing Minority Treaties comes up for review.

Press and Parliament in the United Kingdom have recently been discussing the sponsoring Powers' amendment which proposed that the Secretary-General and his five deputies should be elected by the Assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council for a period of three years, and that the Secretary-General should be re-eligible. This proposal was criticised on the grounds that the separate election of the deputies would impair the authority of the Secretary-General, and that their election (especially for such short terms and with no explicit provision for re-election) would discourage them from becoming loyal and efficient servants of the new Organisation, and would open the door for political bargaining. On the other side it was argued that frequent changes would enable more States to share in the permanent work of the Organisation and would ensure that its senior officials were not isolated from active contact with political affairs. The committee concerned has rejected any mention of the deputy secretaries-general in the Charter; and, unless the question is re-opened, these appointments will thus be left to be regulated by the Organisation itself.

The main outstanding point of difference concerns the powers of the Assembly. The proposal passed by the Committee concerned was that the Assembly should have powers to discuss any matter within the sphere of international relations. The Soviet delegate, however, has now proposed that these powers of discussion should be limited to matters affecting the maintenance of international peace and security, which was the formula proposed in the Dumbarton Oaks draft and supported in Committee by the Great Powers.

GERMANY.

MORE details of the Allied plans for the administration of western Germany were given by Field-Marshal Montgomery in an informal interview with press correspondents at 21st Army Group headquarters on the 21st June. Members of the German General Staff, the Field-Marshal stated, would have to be isolated from each other to keep them from hatching new conspiracies, and men of the S.S. formations might be kept in prison camps for many years. Germany, he suggested, was not "down and out, but only on her knees," and the next three months would in his opinion be the testing period during which the German people would show whether they had any real desire to co-operate or not. Famine might occur in Germany this winter, but everything possible would be done to mitigate starvation. It was hoped to give every German in the British zone a ration of 2,000 calories daily. 1,500,000 tons of wheat or equivalent foodstuffs would have to be brought into the Ruhr to make up in part for the 4 million tons imported from the provinces of Germany now occupied by the Red Army. Miners in the Ruhr would receive sufficient rations (2,900 calories per day at present) to enable them to produce the coal required. The Ruhr valley already had 140 mines working, producing 40,000 tons daily—a target which would be raised to 100,000 tons daily by August and 200,000 tons daily by next spring. (Before the war, the Ruhr output was approximately 378,000 tons daily). At a press conference in Washington on the 18th, General Eisenhower pointed to the threat of starvation as one of the major problems in Germany to-day. He likewise insisted that members of the German General Staff must be segregated and their archives destroyed.

The seriousness of the food situation in the British and American zones was reflected in an announcement from the United States 12th Army Group headquarters on the 20th June that local food offices were compelled to reduce rations until the results of this season's hastily organised cultivation were available. The Archbishop of Munich, Cardinal Faulhaber, has instructed all his clergy to impress upon peasants from the pulpits the necessity of delivering even more food than has been asked of them. In Munich itself the situation is still rendered doubly difficult by the obligation of the city to supply in the first instance food for the 40,000 starved inmates of the Dachau and Allach concentration camps and for the displaced Allied nationals still encamped in the neighbourhood. Some persons, a spokesman of Military Government stated on the 23rd June, were receiving no more than 850 of the 2,000 calories fixed as their ration by the Allied authorities. A preliminary interchange of foodstuffs is shortly to take place between the main production and consumption areas in the West. Barley, oats, meat and cheese for the urban population of Frankfurt are to be acquired in Bavaria and grain supplies are eventually to be sent from the adjacent country districts of Hesse. Arrangements are being made for fish to be delivered inland from Hamburg, Wesermünde and Cuxhaven. United States Army vehicles are, according to the Münchner Zeitung, being made available for the distribution of foodstuffs in Bavaria and Württemberg. Captured German lorries are being used for the same purpose, and in Bavaria 12,000 horses of the German Wehrmacht have been handed over to the peasants.

Evidence that the work of reconstruction in the West is proceeding satisfactorily has been given by the Allied-controlled German press and radio in the past few days. Rehousing plans would seem to be well advanced in some localities and, according to the Frankfurt radio, nine blocks of flats are being erected for German civilians at Offenbach, where the efforts of Military Government to return all persons to useful work has reduced the number of unemployed to less than 400. Steps are stated to have been taken to re-establish the Frankfurt Office for Trunk Motor Roads (Reichsautobahnamt), the staff of which has already been sifted and instructed to proceed with plans for the repair of damaged highways and bridges. A recent issue of the Neue Westfälische Zeitung has published details of the reorganisation of the German railway network in Westphalia. Since the 9th June, the immediate responsibility for railway communications in that province has been placed in local German hands, and the Reichsbahndirektionen of Essen and Münster are already working again under general Allied supervision. Allied military traffic, of course, has priority, but German civilian goods may be sent over lines not required for this purpose. Military Government is providing material for repairs to permit the transportation of food and coal for the German population as well as to serve its own immediate needs. A German council of twelve is reported by the Kölnischer Kurier to be tackling food and transport problems in the Andernach region north-west of Coblentz. Here also, for the first time since 1933, farmers have just been able to choose by secret ballot a representative to voice their interests with the local Government.

The reopening of most primary schools by autumn is now being planned in all the zones. In Berlin it has been promised that school buildings would be available shortly, but the director of education in the new municipal government has made it clear that the shortage of suitable teachers may present great difficulties, now that the active Nazis have had to be removed. The new system of education, the director has added, would insist on the "direct participation of the children in the anti-Fascist movement" and vocational schools would first be required to minister to the needs of National Socialism's victims and from there they would learn to be of service to the rest of the community. One such vocational school in Charlottenburg has, according to Radio Moscow, already resumed instruction and all juveniles in the locality between the ages of 14 and 17 must attend it. Kindergartens are stated to have been reopened all over Berlin and to be regularly supplied with milk for the children. A new child welfare committee under the supervision of Military Government at Cologne is at present planning special children's centres (Kinderhorte) for all between the ages of 3 and 14. Welfare officials in Frankfurt are said to be looking after 2,000 children, for whom Military Government has released quantities of toys and clothing. The problems left by war, however, may be gauged by the experience of Munich, where all but two of the 75 school buildings have been either damaged or destroyed by Allied bombing. Hence many hundreds of thousands of German children of school age are meanwhile being left with no educational and little parental control, while others are at best employed on crude manual work on nearby farms or on the clearing of rubble from the damaged streets.

Religious life is now flourishing under its regained freedom in many parts of Germany as it has not done for many years. As the churches are the only places where Germans are allowed to congregate as they please and hear the opinions of their own compatriots, it is not surprising that attendances at church services are large. With some 36,000 Catholic priests and Protestant pastors preaching simultaneously throughout the Reich, it is difficult for Military Government with its present resources to check up on what may be said. It has therefore been suggested that the German clergy be asked to assure the Allied authorities of their good intentions, just as their secular brethren in public office are having to do. The freedom from all restrictions enjoyed by the Catholic and Protestant Churches alike under the Russian administration in Berlin was particularly emphasised by the late Red Army Commandant, Colonel-General Berzarin, only just before his fatal accident on the 18th June.

A Pastoral Letter issued by the Archbishop of Freiburg, Mgr. Conrad Groeber, on the 31st May was published by the Vatican radio between the 21st and 25th June. In this Mgr. Groeber dwelt upon the persecution to which his Church had been subjected under the National Socialist régime, when the People's Court issued "a stream of mass-produced sentences" against its servants. He had made representations in vain, he stated, against the Nazi practice of euthanasia and had been appalled by the atrocities committed by his fellow-countrymen in the occupied territories. A National Socialist victory would, in his opinion, have destroyed the Christian faith in Germany for ever; the National Socialist war had cost the German people 6 million lives since 1939. The German people would now have to prove to the victors that a large proportion of the nation could not be held responsible for the crimes committed by their leaders (see also under "Vatican").

A decision that may prove significant in the development of German political life in the Russian zone was taken by the Social Democratic and Communist Parties on the 19th June, when they met to form a joint committee to iron out ideological differences and prepare the way for a united front with other anti-Fascist groups. This joint Social Democratic-Communist committee would, according to the Berlin Deutsche Volkszeitung, work towards "the construction of an anti-Fascist democratic parliamentary republic, avoiding the mistakes and weaknesses of the past and ensuring all democratic rights and liberties for the working nation." The formation of an Association of Free Trade Unions for Greater Berlin, which, like the new entente between the German Left-wing Parties had been expected since Marshal Zhukov gave German workers freedom to organise in his proclamation of the 10th June, was revealed by the Berlin radio on the 21st June. This association claimed two days later to comprise seventeen individual unions and "to incorporate all former shades of political opinion . . . . in a fighting unit to strive for the total destruction of Fascism and the creation of a new democratic statute for craftsmen and employees."

AUSTRIA.

At the Cabinet meeting of the Provisional Government held on the 21st June, Dr. Renner read a letter from the Landeshauptmann of Styria about the constitution of the Provisional Government of that province. It was announced that, acting on the proposal of the executive committees of the political parties of Styria, the Austrian Government, "in accordance with the provisional Constitution," had appointed Reinhold Machhold as head of the Government and Alois Dienstleder and Viktor Eber as his deputies. This would seem to confer the final official blessing on this provincial Government, whose origin and history have been somewhat obscure (See Summaries No. 293, p. 4, and No. 294, p. 3.)

On the 19th June "Station Austria" (the Russian-controlled station on Yugoslav soil, which gave its farewell broadcast on the 21st June) reported a procession of Viennese women from Favoriten to the Ministry of Justice, where they demanded the quick punishment of Nazi criminals. On the 21st, Vienna Radio broadcast an interview with the Chief Public Prosecutor. He said that nearly 1,000 National Socialists were being dealt with already. Three Public Prosecutors and six examining judges were conducting preliminary examinations. Each examining judge dealt with about twenty-five cases a day. When the investigation of a case was complete, it was sent before the "People's Courts." These courts apparently consist of two professional judges and two jurors provided by the three main political parties, who are making out lists of suitable jurors. The courts have power to pass sentence of at least ten years' hard labour, and up to twenty years in serious cases. They can also pass sentence of death. Another broadcast from Vienna on the same day said that "we are not after the simple Party members and hangers-on—for them the road back to Austria shall remain open."

Karl Seitz, the former Mayor of Vienna, who has been in a concentration camp, was given an official welcome outside the Town Hall on his return to Vienna. General Körner, the present Mayor of Vienna, has appointed Professor Fritz as Head of the Vienna Health Administration. He was a professor at Graz, and was dismissed by the Nazis in 1938.

The three most serious problems in Vienna to-day are housing, electricity, and food. Earlier optimistic reports on the improvement in conditions there have given place to more realistic accounts, and details of urgent measures which must be taken to deal with the situation. Neues Österreich, commenting on the recent census of premises in Vienna, said that this was only to ascertain all available residential and shop premises, to register all new-comers, and ensure that changes of residence made since the liberation of Austria were justified. All applications for residence are to be suspended for a month while the affairs of victims of the Nazis returning from the concentration camps are attended to. When the number of rooms available is known, people will have to fill in a form to establish their category, and will be allotted accommodation accordingly.

There are evidently frequent breaks in the city's electricity supply, upon which transport (the tramways are in limited operation once more), cooking, and light entirely depend now. There is no coal or coke, and therefore no gas. All electric appliances are to be registered at the power station, and all consumers are urged to economise to the utmost.

The greatest problem, however, is the food supply. A great deal of attention has been paid to agriculture during the past week. A Vienna broadcast on the 20th said that the Agricultural chamber for Lower Austria was active again, and had done much work. It had taken over 1,900 horses from the Red army in the Burgenland, and distributed them to farmers, and arranged the exchange of draught oxen and cows. The Red army had also released petrol and diesel oil for tractors. Red army lorries bring milk and vegetables, fruit and seeds to Vienna every morning—520 lorries are being used for this purpose in the eastern part of Lower Austria. A "Harvest Emergency Scheme" to get all available workers on to the land has been sponsored by the Renner Government. All unemployed and partly employed workers are being urged to work on the land this summer. In addition to their pay, a bonus of 20 kilog. of flour for men workers, and 12 kilog. for women would be paid "providing the flour is available from this year's harvest." Former Nazis are not excluded from the scheme, but they will be employed in controlled working parties, and will not be eligible for the bonus.

Buchinger, the Secretary of State for Agriculture, said in a speech on the 24th June that he had had no intention of becoming a member of the Government—his name had been announced when he knew nothing about it himself, and he had obeyed orders. He went on to explain the new system of control of agriculture which is to replace the elaborate Reich Food Estate. He knew only too well, he said, that no farmer liked State intervention, but this was an emergency, and the controls would only remain as long as was necessary to ensure fair distribution. Chambers of Agriculture would soon be in action in the various provinces, and these would set up district chambers, which would implement the Government's directives regarding production and marketing. There are to be five agricultural unions, for corn-growing; cattle-breeding; dairying and fat production; gardening, potato and vine-growing; and sugar cultivation.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The growing likelihood of the advance of Polish sovereignty westwards to the Oder–Neisse line has brought the whole question of the northern Czechoslovak frontiers to a head. It has had two beneficial results at least; the Czechoslovak Government, in a statement on the 20th June to Mr. Nichols, the British Ambassador, has defined its attitude concerning the areas under dispute with Poland; and, at the invitation of the Soviet Government, Czech and Polish delegations are meeting in Moscow to attempt a settlement.

The Czechoslovak attitude was expressed as an intention to stand firm on the pre-Munich frontiers, particularly in the Těšín (Teschen) area. It was recognised that no decisions would be final until approved by the Peace Conference. Concerning the Glatz Salient (see Summary No. 297), which it was announced would be occupied by Czechoslovak forces, Dr. Clementis said that Czechoslovakia would apply under the declaration of the 2nd June relating to military occupation by minor Powers—this was a question for the Allied Control Commission and not regarded as a Polish-Czech affair. It was proposed that Slovaks from the Crava and Spis districts, part of the Polish enclave of Zakopane, who had sent representatives to the Czechoslovak Government while still in Košice, should be exchanged for Poles in the Těšín area. There was no objection from the Czechoslovak side to the proposed Oder–Neisse line.

The Poles have, however, occupied at least part of the Těšín area, and Dr. Beneš reported to Mr. Nichols on the 22nd that the Polish Minister of Defence had made an anti-Czech speech in the town. There have been other signs of the friction existing here, as for example an incident near the important Czech railway junction of Bohumin, in disputed territory, from which the Czechs were forced to withdraw on the 14th, although apparently being allowed the use of the railway, which is an essential part of their transport system. Dr. Beneš disclosed that he had received a warning from the Soviet Commander-in-Chief in Silesia that the Poles might attack, and that he had taken the necessary military precautions. A dispatch from Sir A. Clark Kerr on the 17th June, describing the discussions between M. Mikolajczyk and M. Morawski, throws some light on this. M. Morawski made violent criticism of the Czechs, accused them of opposing the Oder–Neisse line and occupying Silesian territory which should go to Poland, and talked of using the Polish Armoured Division to drive them out.

The Czechoslovak Delegation to the Moscow discussions arrived on the 21st, and includes M. Fierlinger, the Premier, and Ministers Svoboda, Nejedly, Ripka and Procházka. Agreement seems likely provided the Poles do not insist on keeping that section of the Těšín area which they seized after Munich, and which is coal producing. The Czechs have pointed out that Poland will be considerably enriched in coal resources by their gains in Silesia without this. All the frontier lines now under discussion were originally fixed by the Council of Ambassadors in 1920, but agitation on the Polish side recommenced when Colonel Beck came into power.

The incorporation of Lusatia (see Summary No. 295) in Czechoslovakia, claimed by the National Committee of Lusatian Wends, has been the subject of rather vague propaganda in the press and radio, but not of definite Czechoslovak demands. The Polish press has countered these suggestions by references to the connexions between this Slavic minority group and Poland.

On the 21st, President Beneš signed the decree ordering the confiscation of land belonging to Germans, Hungarians and traitors. One of the first acts of turning over land so confiscated was performed by the Minister of Agriculture on the 24th, when he distributed to local peasants the estates of Rudolf Beran, Prime Minister under the Hacha régime, and the President of the now banned Agrarian Party.

POLAND.

The Moscow trial of the 16 Poles (see last Summary) ended on the 21st June with verdicts ranging from 4 months' to 10 years' "deprivation of liberty" on 12 of the accused, while 3 were acquitted and one was not tried owing to illness. The later part of the trial was made interesting by the fact that General Okulicki and the Government Delegate Jankowicz took on themselves respectively full responsibility for the continuance of the underground activity under the Russian military occupation including the maintenance of wireless communication, of secret military cadres, and of stocks of arms. It was expressly stated that the formation of the new military organisation after the disbandment of the Home Army early this year, had been kept secret from M. Mikolajczyk. The fact that attacks had been made on personnel of the Red Army and sabotage committed, was admitted by some of the accused. General Okulicki admitted these occurrences and took responsibility for them as supreme commander, but denied that he had ordered them and said he had done his best to stop them.

All but one of the accused persons pleaded guilty in a technical sense to the charge of participation in the underground machine, but most denied that they had any knowledge of its being directed against the U.S.S.R. or the Red Army; and General Okulicki in a spirited defence maintained that, though the charges were technically founded and the trial was fair, he was only doing his duty and was acting under orders from the London Polish Government or the Polish Commander-in-Chief.

The Consultations held last week in Moscow with a view to forming a new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity were concluded on the 22nd June. On the 23rd June it was announced that the representatives of the Provisional Government of the Polish Republic and the democratic leaders from Poland and from abroad, convinced that the national dignity and sovereignty of the Polish State demand that Polish affairs should be decided by the Poles themselves, reached full agreement on the question of the reorganisation of the Provisional Government of the Polish Republic. This agreement is expressed in the following unanimously adopted resolutions: (1) to invite M. Wincenty Witos from Poland, and M. Stanislaw Grabski from abroad, to join the Praesidium of the Krajowa Rada Narodowa; (2) to include in the Provisional Government of National Unity MM. Wladyslaw Kiernik and Czeslaw Wyciech from Poland, and MM. Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, Jan Stanczyk and Mieczyslaw Thugutt from abroad; (3) to publish the full composition of the Provisional Government of National Unity within the next few days in Warsaw.

Simultaneously it was decided to include in the activities of the State a number of Polish Democratic leaders hitherto resident abroad, including the chairman of the "Stronnictwo Pracy" (Labour Party), M. Popiel, and MM. Kolodziej and Zakowski.

From other sources it is understood that M. Mikolajczyk is to be a Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Agriculture and Land Reform; that M. Kiernik is to have the very important post of Minister of the Interior and M. Thugutt that of Posts and Telegraphs; that M. Wyciech, who organised secret education in the Polish "Underground" during the war, is to be Minister of Education; and that M. Stanczyk is to be Minister of Labour as he was in M. Mikolajczyk's Cabinet in London.

While the final composition of the new Government has yet to be announced it appears that M. Mikolajczyk's Peasant Party, which is held to represent over half the population of Poland, has an ex-premier and at least two other Ministers in the Cabinet. The fact that the Peasant Party represents the largest section of the electorate, and that it has preserved its unity better than any other party during the war, has no doubt contributed to this success.

It is not anticipated that there will be any great delay in the completion of the Provisional Government or in its giving the necessary pledge that "free and unfettered elections" will be held "as soon as possible." It appears likely that its recognition by the Great Powers would follow. The way would thus be opened for the solution of such pressing problems as the return of displaced persons and ex-prisoners of war to Poland, or their accommodation elsewhere; and the future of the Polish forces under British command.

SOVIET UNION.

The dinner at the Kremlin given on Midsummer Day for the Polish leaders assembled in Moscow passed off in an atmosphere of unusual cordiality. The Polish negotiators were joined for the occasion by Generals Rola-Zymierski, Voplawski and Spychalski from Warsaw. All the Poles present, of whom there were many, got an individual toast from M. Molotov, while M. Mikolajczyk received a personal one from Marshal Stalin, who called him "a good Polish patriot." The event of the evening was an important speech from Marshal Stalin which far transcended the usual level of after dinner pronouncements. Referring to the misunderstandings and mutual bloodshed between Russia and Poland in the past, he admitted that Russia, as the bigger country, had been at fault to an even greater degree than Poland. The only hope for improvement lay in a change of régime in both countries, so that new men could apply themselves to the task of improving relations and removing old suspicions. Such a change had already come in Russia since the revolution with the adoption of Lenin's policy; in Poland the way had been prepared for a change of heart by the sufferings of the country during the present war and the German occupation. Marshal Stalin then went on to allow that there were still men, even among those gathered that evening at table, who doubted the sincerity of Russian intentions towards Poland, but he felt no concern over this. These men should watch events carefully, and in time they would discover that their present doubts were groundless. In closing, Marshal Stalin made a significant statement concerning Poland's future foreign relations. With the increase of territory in the west, Poland would become a great Power, and her position would be further strengthened by her treaty of alliance with the Soviet Union. No great Power, however, could be satisfied with having an alliance with only one country. Germany might rise again as she did after 1918, and Poland and Russia alone would be unable to resist a German attack; they needed alliances with the other Great Powers in the west and with the United States. The Soviet Union, therefore, would welcome the conclusion of treaties of alliance between Poland, Great Britain, France and the United States as well as with smaller countries such as Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. It was to this group of alliances that Marshal Stalin finally raised his glass. At the end of the party the Poles, led by General Rola Zymierski, burst into the Polish equivalent of "he's a jolly good fellow," which Marshal Stalin received with his usual impassivity.

M. Mikolajczyk afterwards expressed great pleasure at the speech and at Marshal Stalin's whole attitude.

The Twelfth Session of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. met on the 22nd June, the fourth anniversary of the German attack on the Soviet Union. The only item on the agenda was a Bill providing for the demobilisation of thirteen older age groups from the army in the field, this demobilisation to be completed by the end of 1945. The demobilised men are to receive a suit of clothes and footwear, and gratuities on the following scale: rank and file of all ordinary units—one year's pay for each year of service; rank and file of special units receiving higher pay—6 months' pay for each year of service; n.c.o.s—6 months' pay per year of service; officers—2 months' pay for 1 year, 3 months' for 2 years, 4 months' for 3 years and 5 months' for 4 years of service. Loans of 5,000 to 10,000 roubles are to be advanced to those whose homes have been destroyed by the Germans, and timber for repairs is to be made available free of charge. Employment is to be provided within one month for all demobilised persons, in positions not inferior to those which they held before joining the army. In introducing the Bill, which was adopted unanimously, Army-General Antonov revealed that during the war Soviet tank production had increased fifteen-fold, and that whereas at the beginning of the war "the enemy considerably outnumbered us in aircraft," at the end the air arm of the Red army was 5 times larger than in 1941. He emphasised that those who remained in the Red army must devote increased attention to military training and political education.

Two days later a victory parade was held in the Red Square. Marshal Zhukov reviewed the course of the war, from the days of 1941 when "not only our enemies but even many of our friends abroad believed that the Red army would not be able to withstand the powerful onslaught of the German war machine," to the final victory won "by the joint efforts of the three Great Powers." "The sources of our great victory," Marshal Zhukov declared, "are our socialist system, the wise leadership of the Bolshevik party, the correct policy of the Soviet Government, the moral and political unity of the people of our country, the gigantic strength of the Red army and the gallant labour of the Soviet people." Marshal Zhukov ended on the same note of caution as Army-General Antonov: "It does not become us Soviet people to grow self-conceited and complacent. We must in the future, too, strengthen the military and economic might of our country, constantly improve our fighting skill, study the rich experience of the war for the Fatherland, and develop our Soviet military science." During the course of the parade German banners were dragged in the dust through the Red Square, to the rolling of drums, whilst the announcer proclaimed: "This is the political execution of fascism."

Four new diplomatic appointments have been announced during the past week, all going to comparatively young men. M. Kuznetsov, who had been second secretary to the Allied Governments in London (in charge of Norwegian affairs), is to go as Ambassador to Oslo; the new Minister to Denmark, M. Plakhin, was consul in Sweden and later Counsellor to the Soviet Legation in Copenhagen before the rupture of relations in 1941. M. Valkov, now made Ambassador to the Netherlands, was in the Soviet Embassy to the Allied Governments in London as Minister 2nd class, and was decorated in 1944 with the Order of the Red Banner of Labour. M. Ziabkin, who has been appointed Minister to New Zealand, was formerly Soviet Consul-General in Pretoria.

SCANDINAVIA.

After the hitch in the formation of the new Norwegian Government to which reference was made in last week's Summary, the King called upon M. Einar Gerhardsen to assume the task of forming the Administration, and the complete list of the new Ministers was published on the 22nd June.

M. Hambro and the Conservatives appear to have achieved nothing by their opposition to the retention of MM. Lie and Torp: they may, indeed, have reduced the representation of their own Party in the Coalition. There are three Ministers described as Conservatives: two of these are Fylkesmenn, or County Governors, who have not hitherto taken a prominent share in Party politics. One of these, M. Gabrielsen, is specially charged with the tasks of reconstruction in the extreme north, for which his long connexion with Vardö and Vadsö should fit him. The other, M. Cappelen, a lawyer from Trondheim, is Minister of Justice. He was a substitute member of the Storting from 1925 to 1927, when he represented the Independent People's Party, which seems to have ceased to exist. The third Conservative, M. Egil Offenberg, is a business-man, who is entrusted with the Ministry of Supply. He has had previous experience of local government, but not of Parliament.

Lack of parliamentary experience is, indeed, a characteristic of the new Government which has been commented on in the press, but this is unlikely to prove a disadvantage in existing circumstances, when it is more important that the Home Front should be fully represented, as it undoubtedly is.

The Communists have two representatives, of whom perhaps the most interesting is Fru Kirsten Hansteen, widow of the adviser to the Trade Union Organisation who was shot by the Germans in September 1941. The statement that he was a Communist has been frequently denied and it hardly seems probable that his widow is very extreme in her political convictions. The other Communist post is that of the Ministry of Labour, held by M. Strand Johansen.

The Agrarian Party has one representative, M. Einar Frogner, who is suitably posted in the Ministry of Agriculture.

The Liberals are represented by M. Gunnar Jahn, one of the inner circle of the Home Front Leadership and before that a prominent member of the Administrative Council. He was Finance Minister, the post which he now resumes, in M. Mowinckel's Government of 1934–35, and has great experience in economic and financial matters.

Labour is strongly represented, firstly by the Premier M. Gerhardsen himself, who is very highly spoken of in Home Front circles and spent a long time during the war in German concentration camps, also by MM. Trygve Lie and Torp, who retain their former offices of Foreign Affairs and Defence. Besides these there are three others; M. Fostervoll, Minister of Education and a schoolmaster by profession, M. Evensen, deputy chairman of the T.U.C., and the journalist M. Sven Oftedal. The other two members of the Government seem to be without definite party affiliations; one of these, a clergyman, Pastor Bonnevie Svendsen, is expected to deal mainly with church affairs. On the whole, the Government appears extremely competent and well fitted for the tasks before it.

Considerable sensation has been aroused by the discovery of mass graves in Norway, containing the bodies of victims of the Gestapo. In particular, one of these has been found in the Forest of Trandum, near Gardermoen, in Romerike, between Lake Mjösen and Oslo. To meet Nazi rumours to the effect that the whole thing was British propaganda, a number of quislings have been compelled to visit the spot, including the leader himself, who was taken there in custody. His former Ministers Fuglesang, Lippestad and Stang were employed in the task of removing bodies for investigation in the Institute of Forensic Medicine. The grim facts have also been illustrated by numerous photographs in Norwegian press.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The new Dutch Cabinet has at last been appointed, and was sworn in on the 25th. Professor Schermerhorn (see Summary No. 296) is Prime Minister and M. Drees Minister of Social Affairs; three Ministers who served in the previous Cabinet retain their old posts, Dr. van Kleffens, Dr. Beel, and M. de Booy. The new Cabinet numbers sixteen; eleven of its members have been prominent in the resistance movements; only one of the Ministers, Mr. Drees, has been a member of the States General.

The Belgian crisis still continues. But certain noteworthy developments have occurred. The King has apparently decided that he cannot return to Belgium unless and until a new Government has been formed and is holding consultations with that end in view. He has seen the Presidents of the Chamber and Senate and also certain other persons. Meanwhile Prince Charles, at King Leopold's request, continues to act as Regent. According to the Soir M. van Acker doubts whether the King will be able to form a Government. It is certain that such a Government would not command a majority in the Chamber.

On the 19th the Catholic Deputies and Senators met and passed the following resolutions: " The Chamber and Senate Right Wing . . . . record that, following the news of the King's return the Government tendered its resignation to the Regent, to enable His Majesty to choose the Ministers who, according to the Constitution, will have to bear the responsibility for the King's words and actions; express disapproval of the text of the official statement announcing this resignation, which states that the resigning Government will transact current business, maintenance of order included, only until the King's return, and not, in accordance with convention and the principle of the continuity of the exercise of public power, until the new Government has been set up in the normal way; support the statement of the Catholic Ministers who always defended within the Government the King's constitutional rights and the necessity of maintaining order, whatever the Government responsible for the conduct of business; renew the expression of their unshakable loyalty to constitutional monarchy and to the dynasty, which are both the symbol and the main guarantees of national unity; certain that in so doing they are speaking for the great majority of Belgians, the Right lay before the King the assurance of their loyalty; they are ready to give him their support in a spirit of national concord for the country's reconstruction and the continuation of our public life in a spirit of attachment to our constitutional and Parliamentary institution; guided by the paramount interests of the State and the principles of democracy the Right are firmly opposed to all dictatorship, whether from above or from below and condemn all threats of violence, of political strikes, or intimidation, and of disorder from whatever quarter they may come; the Right hold it desirable that elections to all representative bodies should take place as soon as possible, and, therefore, that the electoral register should be revised with all speed and that laws should forthwith be passed to deprive unpatriotic persons of the vote and to grant women the right to vote on the same terms as men, so that the consultation of the electoral body, the supreme expression of the nation's sovereignty, from which all powers are derived, may be carried out with justice and dignity.

The language of this resolution, as certain papers did not fail to point out, is very guarded. There are, indeed, signs that Catholic support for King Leopold's return is weakening. On the other hand, the Parties opposed to the King's return are drawing closer together and are making preparations for close co-operation in that event. The trade unions, other than the Catholic trade unions, are threatening a general strike and there is a very real danger that the King's return would lead to serious disorders.

FRANCE.

The Levant controversy continues to dominate all other issues and Mr. Duff Cooper reports that Anglo-French relations are being subjected to considerable strain. The Consultative Assembly debate on the Levant (see last Summary) was concluded on the 19th June. Among the speakers, M. Pierre Cot was the most critical of the Government's policy. General de Gaulle read the text of a telegram which he sent to Mr. Churchill two days before the Allied entry into Syria in 1941, safeguarding French rights and interests. He referred to perpetual British interference which inevitably troubled French relations with the two States. He admitted that British policy was not wholly due to the desire to supplant France, but this was the object of the team of local Arab experts, whom the British used or disavowed as occasion served. Oil had also no doubt influenced British policy, though France's share was all she possessed. But Britain's anxiety about her position in other Arab States were certainly genuine, despite her varied and vast means of control in the area. Instead of adopting a common policy with France, as they had frequently proposed, Britain preferred to focus upon France the hostility of the Arabs. It remained to be seen whether this was good policy in the long run. Though order, he claimed, had been restored, there was a recrudescence of violence after British intervention. " Instead of repressing these crimes, the British authority proceeded to evacuate a great number of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen living in Syria. Under the fiction of the maintenance of order by the British, we were obliged to abandon schools, hospitals, a telephone system. . . ." France would not acquiesce in the action taken to her detriment in such conditions. To do so would be incompatible with her true strength now temporarily diminshed, with the interests of the Levant States themselves and with world peace. There was only one justice and one real international morality. (Here came his only warm applause.) If Britain had, now or later, any proposals to make to France she should do so; but France would not accept any arbitration but that of the " international concert." Franco-British friendship had been deeply wounded, but not by France. They wished to see it survive but intended that it should be respected in the person of France.

This not very optimistic reference to Anglo-French relations did not reflect the warm feeling of friendship for this country which was expressed throughout the debate, even by those most critical of our policy. This feeling was reflected in the resolution proposed by M. Auriol, president of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and passed unanimously. The Assembly expressed sympathy for all the victims of " the recent tragic events "; affirmed the friendship of Republican France for the Arab world and her will to adapt her policy in the Near East to the principles of the rights of man; adopted as its aim General Catroux's declaration of the States' independence; took note of Mr. Churchill's undertakings of the 13th June, which it quoted in full; asked the Government to discuss, " in a spirit of confident friendship," any agreement or treaty with an independent and sovereign Syria and Lebanon and any British proposals based on the statement of the 13th June and to " multiply its efforts to work out a Franco-British Pact, which, with the Franco-Soviet Pact, will be one of the European bases for the collective construction of universal peace " (this clause was added on the proposal of M. Daniel Mayer, speaking for the Socialist group); lastly it approved the Government's action in having, in accordance with previous obligations to the League of Nations and with the texts and spirit of the San Francisco Conference, put the conflict on the international plane.

On the suggestion of General Paget and Mr. Shone, the Foreign Office on the 23rd June issued a statement for the purpose of putting British intervention in a clear light, owing to misunderstanding in the Levant States, France and other countries. The fundamental issue, it was stated, was not one of Anglo-French relations but that of the future relation between France and the Levant States. Instructions to General Paget were given with a view to the restoration and maintenance of order pending some solution through diplomatic action. Evacuation of French troops had been essential to prevent further clashes and of French civilians to save their lives. The civil authorities should now resume at the earliest moment as great a measure as possible of responsibility for maintaining law and order. For this the Levant Governments were primarily responsible and the world would judge them by the way in which they executed their responsibility. The intervention by British troops implied no intention to supplant the French; the British authorities did not intend to prejudice in any way the final solution of the situation in the Levant States. If British forces had to intervene further, they would act impartially against anyone responsible for creating disturbances.

This statement, though not intended as a response to the important and liberally-worded resolution of the Consultative Assembly, has in the event, according to the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, " increased our reputation for hypocrisy " in France. The officially inspired reply, issued by the A.F.P. on the same day, said that authoritative French circles saw in the statement confirmation of their opinion regarding the character of British intervention, since it involved an implicit admission that His Majesty's Government had broken the Lyttelton–de Gaulle agreement signed on the 23rd July, 1941 and intended to continue to do so. The enforced evacuations showed that British forces had failed to ensure order, as was indeed proved by numerous incidents involving the death of several Frenchmen. His Majesty's Government was now handing over the duty of maintaining order to the very people who had provoked the troubles and in so doing were taking an initiative which had no juridical basis. Britain had no right except that of the stronger to deprive French authority of its powers and transfer them to any other authority. Finally, the sentence envisaging further troubles was interpreted in Paris as pointing to British advance preparations to take over further control. This statement did not, it seems, receive much more publicity from the French press than did the statements it answered.

French opinion, which was disposed, as in the Consultative Assembly debate, to emphasise that although the French case might be juridically sound it had been badly handled and that the conclusion of an Anglo-French alliance was above all things needful, has now been further disturbed by uncensored articles in Combat by M. Kauffmann who has returned from Beirut. He wildly accuses Britain of having prepared the intervention in Syria four months in advance; makes serious charges against British censorship in Beirut and Egypt; and prepares French opinion for British intervention in the Lebanon.

In the meantime a French effort to have the dispute submitted to a committee of three disinterested Powers set up under the (not yet existing) machinery of the new international organisation has also failed. Mr. Stettinius felt unable to accept the aide-mémoire on the subject which M. Paul-Boncour presented to him at San Francisco on the 24th June, and proposed that the matter should be broached through the State Department and the Foreign Office. No formal reply has yet been received to the British proposal for a conference in London (see last Summary) and there are signs that the French are trying to reopen direct negotiations with the Levant States.

M. Léon Jouhaux, general secretary of the C.G.T., stated at a press conference in New York on the 20th June that prompt economic help was essential for the political and social stabilisation of France. The new Minister of Food, M. Pineau, has promised measures to improve home production and distribution, knowing the effect which energetic action in France will have on foreign opinion, but he doubts whether internal measures will, in fact, bring much relief. The increased amount of shipping space allocated to France for June has, however, been very helpful.

The " instruction " of the case against Marshal Pétain has been pursuing its course since it began shortly after his return to France and many important witnesses have already been interrogated, including MM. Reynaud and General Gamelin. The lines of the Pétain defence have also been indicated and they will include reference to a supposed agreement between Vichy and London—which the Prime Minister disposed of in answer to a P.Q. on the 12th June, the Prime Minister's alleged " permission " to conclude an armistice in June 1940 and an alleged telegram of congratulation to the Marshal on that event from the French Communist Party. General de Gaulle, for his part, has allowed to be published (France-Soir, 19th June) an interview he gave last year in London throwing light on his rôle in the same events. In the meantime, it is announced that Pétain's trial, which was to have taken place on the 5th July, has been postponed. But the High Court is to judge Laval in his absence, and the trial is to begin before the 15th August.

Déat was sentenced to death in his absence on the 19th June.

SWITZERLAND.

The question of the expulsion of undesirable elements from Switzerland was debated in the National Council during the week. Some speakers were of the opinion that the Authorities had not acted with sufficient celerity; others, while agreeing that rigorous action was necessary, insisted that human rights must be respected, that no deportation should be ordered on denunciation alone, but only if guilt were clearly proved, and that Switzerland must abide by the principle of legality and must not borrow the methods of the nations which had just gone down in defeat. The head of the Federal Department of Justice and Police stated that, since the dissolution of the NSDAP, the Federal Council had deported 296 persons and the Cantons 255, while a further 780 cases were under consideration. In the course of the debate, it was emphasised that even during the war spies and German and Italian agents had been expelled, but that the presence of others who were suspect had had to be tolerated to avoid the danger of reprisals against Swiss citizens in Germany and German-occupied territory.

On the subject of Dr. Köcher, the former German Minister to Switzerland, the head of the Department of Justice and Police stated that, although his case presented some features which could be variously interpreted, the Federal Council was of the opinion that he had, all things considered, tried to work in Switzerland's favour so far as such action was possible within the sphere of his official activities.

On the 18th and the 20th June respectively, the Federal Council and the National Council discussed the Tass charges of the 16th June (see Summary No. 298 under "Soviet Union") that the 9,000 Russians interned in Switzerland were being kept in deplorable conditions, that their departure was being obstructed by the Swiss Authorities, and that the Soviet Government had accordingly decided to discontinue the repatriation of Swiss citizens until precise information was available about these internees. M. Petitpierre, head of the Political Department, declared that no Soviet citizen was being detained, and that the fact that these internees had not yet departed was due to the difficulty of repatriating them through surrounding countries. In point of fact, Switzerland had already made numerous unsuccessful efforts to secure their repatriation, and was ready to negotiate at once either directly or through another Power with civil or military Soviet Authorities on the subject of mutual repatriation of Russian and Swiss citizens. As to the treatment accorded the Russian internees, their food was the same as that of other internees; their rations were higher than those of Swiss civilians; there had been no ill-treatment or persecution; camps were visited by Swiss authorities and by a special delegate of the Red Cross who spoke perfect Russian, requests and complaints being examined on the spot; internees were shown films, including Russian ones, and given opportunities to enjoy music, singing, dancing and theatrical performances; an education camp had been formed at Bad Rudswil last year, with Russian teachers and a Russian officer as director. The Federal Council would welcome an Allied Commission of Investigation, including representatives of the Soviet Union, to examine the conditions under which the Russians were interned.

On the 22nd June, the Federal Council dealt with problems arising out of the coal situation, which was said to be precarious. Imports from the United States and France were below expectations, and Switzerland would be obliged to draw on her timber resources, already heavily taxed during the war, to meet her minimum industrial and domestic requirements.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

A statement on the 18th June by the Regional Commissioner at Lyons has largely confirmed the official Spanish version of the unfortunate Chambéry incident (see Summary No. 298). The trainload of Spanish nationals which was attacked, it is agreed, did not include any stragglers from the Blue Division—who, by virtue of their serving in German uniforms, would automatically be treated by the French Government as prisoners of war. Moreover, according to the semi-official Agence France-Presse, the passengers had undergone examination by a special French Security Commission in Switzerland. The French account, somewhat lamely, lays the blame for the fury of the mob on "certain elements compromised in the policy of collaboration."

An official expression of regret by the French Government will scarcely be sufficient, however, to allay the popular excitement, and Franco-Spanish relations are likely to remain in a sorry state. The only actual incident reported so far is the desecration of a monument to the French dead of the war of 1914–18 outside the French consulate at San Sebastian. But trade is already being affected. The Spanish authorities are at present busy explaining that the sudden closing of the French frontier on the 21st June, and suspension of all export permits for food and clothing, were purely economic measures necessitated by the exhaustion of the Spanish pesetas credit on the basis of which France was being supplied.

Meanwhile Pierre Laval continues to prove a very slippery customer. His communication to the Spanish Foreign Minister offering to surrender to French justice (see Summary No. 296) was very soon overtaken by another letter in which, according to the Basler National Zeitung, he threatened, if arraigned before the High Court of Justice, to come out with the whole story of General Franco's relations with Marshal Pétain. The official version is that he is now seeking to make conditions with regard to the court before which he is prepared to stand his trial.

A resolution barring Franco Spain from membership of the United Nations was presented by the delegate of Mexico at a meeting of Commission I of the San Francisco Conference on the 19th June and was adopted with acclamation for inclusion in the proceedings. (It was a pendant to the declaration introduced by Greece earlier in the day, which had the explicit approval of the Big Five, formally denying to the Axis nations membership of the new organisation.) The principle in question was the exclusion of States "whose régimes have been established with the help of enemy military forces," but Señor Quintanilla (formerly Mexican Ambassador in Moscow) made it perfectly clear that General Franco was the target. Such statements as "the Spanish Republic was one of the first victims of international Fascism" and "Republican Spain was our first fighting ally" were warmly applauded. The resolution was seconded by M. Paul Boncour, the head of the French delegation, and supporting speeches were made by the delegates of the United States, Chili, Guatemala, Uruguay, Belgium, Australia, White Russia and the Ukraine: after eight long weeks with their noses to the grindstone members evidently felt they were entitled to their little ideological fling. This "Exclusion Bill" is perhaps especially significant as a gesture made on behalf of the democratic world which even the Falangists cannot decry as a machination of the Soviet Union. In tones of injured innocence the Spanish Foreign Minister has hastily rejected the base calumny, calling to witness the Non-Intervention Committee! On the following day, ironically enough, the Generalissimo was inaugurating a new and powerful radio transmission beamed to the American continent; he made no attempt to explain away this body-blow.

Such testimony of world public opinion, bearing out what His Majesty's Government and the United States Government have repeatedly told Franco and his Foreign Minister, is scarcely likely to have any direct repercussions. What the Declaration does represent, however, undoubtedly, is a success for the lobbying activities of the Spanish Committee of Liberation (J.E.L.M.), the four executive members of which thus made the journey from Mexico City to San Francisco to good purpose. Incidentally they circulated to all delegations a well-written and well-produced statement of Franco's relations with Hitler and Mussolini, from which the speakers freely drew, and held two successful press conferences. Dr. Negrín also turned up at San Francisco on his way to Mexico City, but stayed only a short while, and the attempt by Jose-Antonio Aguirre, President of the one-time Basque Autonomous Government, to mediate between the two groups of expatriate Spaniards was, apparently, a fiasco.

By way of a farewell gesture His Majesty's Ambassador in Lisbon revived last week the annual embassy banquet in honour of President Carmona. Speaking in Portuguese he said he was glad to testify that, within the limits imposed by her neutrality, Portugal had maintained the mutual understanding between the two countries and, throughout these years of turmoil, had never forgotten her considerable commitments to her ancient ally. General Carmona replied in similar felicitous terms. The appointment of Sir Owen St. Clair O'Malley, our envoy accredited to the Polish Government in exile, to succeed Sir Ronald Campbell as His Majesty's Ambassador in Lisbon was announced in London on Monday.

Reconstruction: Meuccio Ruini (Labour Democrat).
Food: Enrico Mole (Labour Democrat).
Labour and Social Welfare: Gaetano Barbareschi (Socialist).
Post War Relief: Emilio Lussu (Action).

A short sketch of Signor Parri's career was given in last week's Summary. Of the new Ministers, Conte Jacini is a northerner and was Deputy in Como. During the Fascist régime he was in exile in Switzerland. On his return he was made president of the first section of the Purge Commission. Signor Cevelotto was Minister for Posts and Telegraphs in the second Bonomi Cabinet. Signor Romita was Minister for Public Works in the first Bonomi Cabinet and came to London with Signor Nenni for the International Labour Conference last March. Signor Lamalfa is a leading man on the right wing of the Action Party. He is said to be a brilliant politician. Signor Scelba was said to be one of the leaders of the Christian Democrat Party in the North. Later he became Vice-Secretary of the party in Rome. Signor Mole was Under-Secretary for the Interior in the second Bonomi Cabinet. Little is known of Signor Barbareschi except that he was a worker who had to give up his job in 1930 owing to Fascist persecution. Signor Lussu is well known not only for his violent anti-Fascism, but for his book "Enter Mussolini." He is a Sardinian and was a Deputy for the Island. He was sent to the Lipari Islands but escaped and sought refuge in France. He was one of the leaders of the left wing of the Action Party and is a convinced republican, but he has been accused in the past of advocating Sardinian separatism.

Owing to the size of the Cabinet Signor Parri has decided to form an inner Cabinet consisting of himself, the two Vice-Presidents and the remaining party leaders. This inner Cabinet has already met and has drawn up a statement of its policy. In an interview with the press, Nenni, Socialist Party leader, said that the first task of the new Government at home was to proceed as speedily as possible with the formation of the Constituent Assembly. In order to discuss how the Constituent Assembly is to be elected, the Consultative Assembly is to be summoned and this will consist of between 200 and 400 members. Municipal elections are to be held as soon as possible and the C.L.N.s are to continue as consultative bodies. The whole system of epuration is to be overhauled and speeded up. Signor Parri has also broadcast to the nation explaining the task that faces the Italian people to raise themselves once more to the status of a Great Power. Every citizen must show that he realises his responsibility, for only in this way will the world see that Italy is capable of governing herself. Signor Parri finished by saying that unless Italy can build up a new organic structure and gain a sense of moral seriousness the fruits of her liberation would be lost.

THE VATICAN.

Announced days ahead, the Vatican broadcast to Germany the text of Archbishop Conrad Groeber of Freiburg's Pastoral of the 31st May. Four whole transmissions were devoted to reading it. The Pastoral gives, with German directness, and not a little humour, as witness a reference to "brown coats now miraculously bleached," all that has been best in recent papal thought on the war, Germans, Nazism, and religious and political freedom. (For the political aspect see under "Germany.") A remarkable passage tells how common defence of Christianity has smoothed out denominational conflicts, and continues: "this opposition of camps has also its advantages, as experience shows. Negative and positive poles not only give us light, they also dominate our intellectual heritage; for dispassionate discussions clarify, broaden and deepen the outlook. Though they seem to harass, they really help to consolidate and keep us alert and vigorous." The Pastoral is of supreme importance from both religious and political points of view; for it offers, to those who have the skill to handle it, a key to the future of Europe.

In a recent audience he gave to Sir D'Arcy Osborne, the Pope seemed depressed about the future. The Nazi danger was gone; but Russia's isolation of large parts of East and South-East Europe, with their millions of Catholics, and Moscow's continued false charges against himself and the Church, revived all his old fears of bolshevism. He was pessimistic about Italy and France, regretted the departure of Mr. Harold Macmillan, whose understanding of Italy had greatly impressed him, and obviously pinned his hopes for the salvation of Europe on the British Prime Minister, whose "wise statesmanship" he praised.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The agreement was signed between Russia and Hungary on the 15th June, making detailed provisions for the fulfilment of that Article in the Armistice Terms which requires Hungary to make deliveries to Russia to the value of 200 million United States dollars between January 1945 and January 1951. The deliveries are to be in machinery, ships, grain, cattle and other specified commodities, and delivery dates are laid down in the agreement. The values are taken at the 1938 price level in United States dollars, increased by 15 per cent. for industrial equipment and 10 per cent. for other articles.

The protests in the Hungarian press against the measures of expropriation and expulsion, present and proposed, initiated by the Czechoslovak Government against the Magyar minority in Slovakia are increasing in number and vigour, and are now being voiced by all Hungarian political parties.

The inaugural meeting of the Hungarian Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R. was reported fully in the press of the 20th June. Professor Szentgyörgyi was elected President, and among other officers were prominent politicians and savants.

The electoral campaign by the mandates of Transdanubia to the Provisional Assembly has now begun. The elections themselves are announced for the coming week, and the convocation of the Assembly for the beginning of July. For purposes of speed, the electoral law for the Constituent Assembly will, after it has been agreed by the political parties, be issued as a loi décret. J. Révai (Communist) has been appointed to fill the position on the Supreme National Council vacated by E. Gerö, when he took up the portfolio of Trade and Communications.

Four new Secretaries of State in the Ministry of Reconstruction consist of one Communist, one Social Democrat, one Smallholder and one National Peasant. G. Kállai, the Communist journalist and Secretary of the Budapest National Committee, was one of six new Secretaries of State in the Ministry of the Interior.

The censorship of the press exercised by a Russian officer on the Allied Control Commission is said to be reasonably fair and liberal, and aims at preventing the publication of any news which might show dissension between the three Great Powers. While no newspaper has as yet been punished by the censor, the Communist organ Szabad Nép and the Social Democrat paper Népszava have both been cautioned.

The latest published figures show the food prospects for the coming autumn and winter to be exceedingly bad; in fact, Hungary will probably be faced with complete or near-starvation. Previous estimates of areas sown are now revealed to have been dangerously over-optimistic. The areas sown this year, compared with the normal, are officially stated to be: wheat 46 per cent., rye 52 per cent., barley 84 per cent., potatoes and maize 130–135 per cent. A wheat harvest of 9·5 million quintals is expected, and a rye harvest of 3·5 million quintals, against a peace-time average (1929–39) of 23 million quintals wheat and 7·25 million quintals rye. When the necessary reserves for seed are deducted, 9·5 million quintals of bread-grains (wheat and rye) will remain to satisfy a normal consumption (taking the present population of Hungary at 8·55 millions) of 17·1 million quintals. A good maize harvest (30 million quintals) is expected, from which 3·5 million quintals can be taken to mix with the bread, but a higher proportion of maize would make the bread uneatable. There thus remains a deficit of 4·1 million quintals. On top of this, some of the harvest is earmarked for reparations. Moreover, bad as these figures are, the Minister of Supply has criticised them as being over-optimistic. He has announced that he makes the prospective deficit in bread-grains not 4·1 million quintals, but 6·4; and that the Minister of Agriculture had made it still bigger—10·7.

This is the position as regards bread-grains only. All other food-stuffs are very short, or non-existent. The consumption of meat is forbidden altogether; the few surviving cows can provide milk only for infants; for fats the population will depend on oil-seeds. Potatoes are expected to be plentiful and the fruit crop is good, but much of it cannot be moved owing to lack of transport.

Roumania.

There is a lull in Roumanian affairs which is felt to be the proverbial calm before another outbreak of political excitement. The present moment is opportune for taking stock of the situation during the period covered by the Government's tenure of office. At the beginning of March, after a carefully planned series of disturbances designed to discredit General Rădescu, Vyshinsky appeared in Bucarest and a new administration, representing, according to Russia, "the will of the whole people," but actually representing only a small minority, was imposed upon the country. Fourteen out of the eighteen members of the new Council of Ministers professed to be Communist. As always in Roumanian politics, things are not quite what they appear to be on the surface, and the communism of the Government is largely a matter of profession. Of the leading members three may be reckoned as convinced Communists; Pătrășcanu, the Minister of Justice, is a Communist intellectual and no bad advertisement for the creed he professes; Gheorghiu-Dej, the Minister of Communications, and Constantinescu-Iași, the Minister of Propaganda, are Communist hacks ready to obey without question their orders from Moscow. The Prime Minister, Groza, is a Transylvanian Nationalist, who began life rather on the Right and has drifted somewhat towards the Left. He may be credited with being entirely genuine in his zeal for agrarian reform and his desire for a modus vivendi with Hungary. If agrarian reform turns out once again to be a paying proposition for those in control of it, so much the better. Of the rest, one is a renegade Iron Guardist, and the others, including Tătărescu, are time-servers pure and simple, but neither particularly pure or simple. The Government has shown itself ready to carry out the terms of the Armistice up to a point, and to simplify the process of riveting upon the country Soviet control, for example, in organising the Citizen Guard, which can easily become a local variant of the N.K.V.D. Recently there appears to have been a growing realisation on the part of Russia of the real character of this troupe of marionettes, and dissatisfaction that they show increasing signs of slowness in reacting to the pulling of strings. There have been rumours of further change, but these are connected with the course of events "on a higher level."

The British Political Representative, who was on his way back to Bucarest after having been home for consultation, was held up at Bari while the installation of the new Government was being effected. Both he and other members of the Control Commission had begun by trying to work in an entirely friendly spirit with their Soviet colleague and by giving the Soviet authorities credit for an intention to play fair. But it became increasingly difficult to maintain such an attitude in the face of the Soviet practice of taking action without either consulting or informing the British and Americans of their intentions.

By the end of May it became clear that definite and well-considered action in conjunction with America was desirable. The objectives of Great Britain and the United States are (a) to establish independent governments in Roumania and the other Eastern European countries, in harmony with the Crimea decisions, (b) to protect our interests in those countries, and (c) to improve the position of our representatives. To this end the United States Government have suggested the reorganisation of the Control Commission so as to secure equal representation and status for all three of the Allied Powers, the Commission in future to act on instructions from all three Governments and to have a Soviet chairman. This was in line with her plans for other ex-satellite countries.

The next move was made by Russia. Stalin approached the other Allies with regard to the exchange of diplomatic relations with Roumania and other ex-satellite countries, a proposal which is still under consideration here. Simultaneously the United States Government have revived previous suggestions for consultations designed to broaden the Governments now in power in Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary. Meanwhile the improvement which had taken place over carrying out the terms of the armistice showed distinct signs of slackening by the middle of June, and while there is much criticism of individual ministers there seems little prospect of Russia agreeing to a more representative Government. In fact Pavlov, the Soviet Political Representative, has said recently that Russia cannot risk a government in Roumania which she cannot control.

Yugoslavia.

The Yugoslavs' struggle to undermine Allied Military Government in north-western Venezia Giulia takes many forms. Their failure to concentrate the Yugoslav troops in the area, as agreed on the 15th June, caused General Morgan to send a sharp protest to the Yugoslav military delegation on the 19th. The Belgrade press and radio pour out accusations that A.M.G. is restoring Fascists to office and reviving Fascist institutions; they represent the Italian population as devoted to Yugoslavia; and they accuse the Allied Powers of a breach of the Agreement of the 9th June, which they falsely represent as obliging A.M.G.

to maintain the civil authorities set up during the Yugoslav occupation. Other methods have included Communist demonstrations, a dock strike, the maintenance of the armed "People's Guard" and of numerous Yugoslav military in civilian clothing. Tito himself, addressing a meeting of women, said that there was a tendency towards the re-establishment of the former Italian administration and that it was justifiable to oppose this with protests, mutinies and other merciless means. On the 20th the two military delegations signed an agreement, which, however, left unsettled the question of the civil authorities. On the 24th Radio Belgrade announced that the Yugoslav troops had been ordered to withdraw from the Allied zone (which, according to the Agreement of the 9th June, they should have done by 0800 hours on the 12th). A.M.G. has ordered the disbandment of all Italian and Slovene police organisations in Trieste and the substitution of Allied troops. On the 23rd Tito proclaimed Yugoslav Military Government in the Yugoslav zone, together with the maintenance of the civil authorities set up under Yugoslav patronage.

The Yugoslav Government have denied that they have called up Italian nationals or tampered with the registers in their area of occupation (see Summary No. 297, p. 15, para. 3), though stating that there has been some recruitment of "volunteers."

The flood of accusations about the persecution of Slavs in Greek Macedonia has swollen. On the 22nd June it included two important articles. One, by Čučkov, the Minister for Macedonia, said that the Slavs have deep cultural roots in this area, even in Salonica itself, that many Greek settlers have immigrated, and that, if the right of the Macedonian people to unification be long delayed, there will be no hope of peace in the Balkans. The other article argues that the region has been predominantly Slav from early times and that the Greek population is largely artificial. [Note: No corroboration of the existence of this persecution has been received from other quarters, and an official denial of it has appeared in the Greek press.]

Tanyug announces that A.V.N.O.J. will meet in July and will be broadened by "to allow for the greatest possible participation of all democratic, anti-Fascist political groups." Although most of the political groups are said to have made suggestions, the adjectives used in the announcement will permit of the careful hand-picking of new members.

Greece.

It has now been confirmed that the notorious ELAS leader, Aris Velouchiotis, who had refused to recognise the Varkiza Agreement, has been killed somewhere in the Pindus region, where his band is believed to have been surrounded by National Guards and Gendarmerie; reports differ as to whether Aris was shot or committed suicide; in any case, his head was cut off and displayed on a stake in Trikkala. Nearly all the press acclaimed his death, though Eleftheri Ellada represented him as a martyr; Rizospastis was unable to take this line, as the Communists had disavowed Aris a few days previously, so it contented itself with citing his achievements as a guerrilla leader during the Occupation.

According to Radio Athens, Rizospastis has published an article alleging that Greek troops are concentrated on the Albanian frontier preparatory to invading Northern Epirus. The Government has officially denied the allegations, and has stated that there are not more than six battalions (about 2,500 men) in the whole of the relevant area of northern Greece, including the Ionian Islands. It was further stated that, while Greece was making every effort to persuade the Allies to help the Greek elements in Northern Epirus, neither the Greek Government nor the Greek army, which implicitly obeyed the Government, had ever thought of carrying out a coup d'état which would disturb the peace of the Balkans. Meantime the Public Prosecutor is instituting criminal proceedings against M. Zachariadis and Rizospastis.

The Government's economic and financial programme seems to be inspiring public confidence. In Athens prices have fallen slightly, and there has been no important rise in the price of gold. A decree has been passed which declares certain acts to be contrary to the public interest and, as such, punishable by a term of imprisonment during which the State will control the business concerned; such acts are closing of industries and shops "to create reaction against Government measures," refusing to sell essential commodities, and selling or renting above the controlled rates. New taxation has been announced as from the 1st July, payable monthly for nine months. This taxation falls on the industrial and professional classes, who are to pay six, ten or fifteen times the present rent of their premises. Tax-payers are not expected to be able to meet this extraordinary taxation out of their current earnings, and are expected to sell stock. Increased rates of pay, ranging from 20 per cent. to 57 per cent. on the May salaries, have been announced for Civil Servants, and judges' salaries are raised by 54 per cent. to 82 per cent. on the May rates.

Albania.

Enver Hoxha's Government continues to demand Allied recognition, but it cannot be said to represent Albanians in general who, being mostly Moslems, are not predisposed to Communism. The F.N.Ç. contains, it is true, non-Communists, but it is run by Communists and it keeps itself in power by force of arms. It has at its disposal an army of some 60,000—an overwhelming force in so small a population—and also security brigades and an efficient spy system. Opinion is allowed no freedom of expression, even non-Communist members of the Government are watched, and there is no organised opposition. Nevertheless opposition, if unorganised, is latent, and it is plain that the F.N.Ç.'s continuance in power depends largely on its hold over the army, which in turn depends very much on whether the F.N.Ç. can provide food for the troops and their families. Recently the F.N.Ç. have had difficulty in feeding them and have been able to pay the officers only and not the men. The harvest now beginning, however, should ease these economic and financial difficulties. Meantime the authorities talk of holding elections, but they make no secret of their idea of excluding all non-Communists from participation and obtaining by this simple process ostensible popular endorsement of the one-party system. This would hardly carry conviction in Britain or the United States.

Bulgaria.

The text of the newly-enacted Bulgarian Franchise Bill has now reached this country. The elections are to be carried out in a single day (this is to be the 26th August). Any ten electors may put up a candidate, but people of known "Fascist" (that is, in practice, anti-Communist) views are ineligible. The final decision as to who has been elected will rest with the Provincial Courts; and any candidate who after being duly returned ventures to turn his coat will be ipso facto unseated. There remain two highly significant clauses: One lays it down that no member of a party included in the "Patriotic Front" list may present himself for election independently. This is designed to prevent any comparatively decent man—like Petkov, Bumbarov or Pavlov (from among the Agrarians) or Cheshmedzhiev (Social Democrat)—if once dismissed from the existing Government, as is more than likely, from ever returning to public life under the present dispensation. And finally, it is laid down that civilians are banned from holding political meetings in barrack areas: which, of course, means that electioneering in the army is to be left entirely in the hands of the Poltical Commissars, or "Assistant Commanders," as they are called in Bulgaria.

In this last connexion it is of some interest to note that General Kozovski, who was made Deputy Commander-in-chief last November, has just been appointed "Chief of Political Administration in the Army," with the title of Deputy Minister, while General Marinov, hitherto Commander-in-chief, has himself been relegated to the post of Chief Inspector of the Forces. General Kozovski is a Russian-trained Communist who fought in the International Brigade in Spain under the assumed name of Petrov.

Following strong British and American representations, Dr. G. M. Dimitrov's wife has been released and has been granted permission to live quietly in the country.

Turkey.

An atmosphere of mistrust—hardly conducive to the successful negotiation of a treaty of friendship—continues to pervade Russo-Turkish relations. From one side the Turkish Press and from the other Moscow Radio are carrying on a long-distance bombardment—discreet on the part of Turkey, ungracious on the part of her neighbour. Thus Tanin attributed to the Soviet Government a desire to make of the Straits an advanced offensive-defensive line for Russia. That, it declared, was tantamount to handing the Straits over to her, and it would involve Turkey's independence and the vital interests of other Powers. Moscow Radio at the same time continued its attacks on prominent Turkish publicists, whom it accused of reaction, pro-Nazism and attempts to promote discord between the Allies. Allied unity, however, had put an end to the old policy of the balance of power, upon which these reactionaries continued to rely. Moscow Radio also stated that a society of pro-Fascist Yugoslav reactionaries had been set up in Turkey under the presidency of Tsvetković, who had signed the pact with Hitler in 1941. General Zinković, it declared, was a member of it.

General satisfaction was expressed in Turkey at the improved prospects of the San Francisco Conference; although the semi-official Ulus declared, on the question of the veto, that the smaller nations had been given the choice of two evils: to accept the formula or abandon the hope of an international security organisation altogether.

It is reported from Angora that the establishment of a new party, to be known as the Democratic Party, is being considered. Dr. Rüştü Aras, the former Foreign Minister and Ambassador to London, is mentioned as one of the probable leaders of the new party. The Republican People's Party would, it is stated, welcome the creation of an official opposition. The proposed party would apparently be distinct from the existing Opposition wing of the Republican People's Party.

It was reported from Istanbul that the Turkish Government had decided to return to France the ten ships of small tonnage which were taken over early in the war.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The position regarding the Troupes Spéciales in the Levant is daily becoming more serious, as desertions increase, and is adding considerably to the difficulties of the situation. The British Minister and the British Commander-in-Chief have been impressing on the Syrian Government that they must not encourage desertions, and we have recently conveyed a new message from General Paget to them insisting that further strict orders should be issued forbidding any encouragement to desert. This the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs has promised to do. He has pointed out, however, that the present position was both dangerous and absurd. While the Syrian Government would not encourage desertion, they could not prevent it, nor could they regard as criminals men who felt their duty lay in supporting their own country rather than France, and who in their own eyes were displaying patriotism. He said that the number of deserters was increasing every day. At present they were coming over in dozens, but soon it would be in hundreds, and the presence of a force of armed bands in the country was a danger to Syrians, British and French. The Government would feel bound to take on, therefore, all who deserted though they might not all be desirable. He held that the longer the French delayed in disbanding the Troupes Spéciales the greater was the danger, and that an immediate solution was essential.

The greater part of Syria is now virtually in a state of revolt against the French. The south-east corner is about the only part of the country where anti-French feeling has not been intense so far While our forces are doing their utmost to protect French officers and others, it is unfortunately true that many Frenchmen seem unable to realise the danger to them and disregard the orders issued for their own safety by the British military authorities. A case in point ended in a tragic incident at Idlib on the 17th June, involving the death of two French officers, a matter which has now been investigated by British officers. A French Field officer was supposed to accompany a large convoy of British and French vehicles leaving Aleppo on that day. Instead, however, he went on ahead of the convoy without notifying any British officer. Having arrived at Idlib he ignored advice from a Syrian officer of the Troupes Spéciales not to go into the headquarters of the Kaimakam, owing to danger of attack by the crowd, but, accompanied by a French lieutenant, insisted on going there. The Kaimakam himself shouted to the two officers to stop them, but was unsuccessful. He posted gendarmes outside his office and kept the crowd back for a time. Eventually the crowd burst into the office and attacked and killed both French officers. As mentioned in last week's Summary, the atmosphere is not likely to clear until it becomes known that a conference, which His Majesty's Government has proposed, is in fact to be held. The venue and composition of it are under consideration. (See under "France.")

The French have asked us that the operation of O.C.P. (Office des Céréales Panifiables) should be maintained anywhere in the Levant States where disorders have not made its functioning impossible. Unfortunately it has been found impossible to secure its functioning. Moreover, out of the 250,000 tons of cereals estimated as the total crop from the Levant for 1945, the Lebanon is not likely to produce more than 10,000 tons. The burden of financing practically all purchases would, therefore, be transferred to the Syrians and would prove in all probability too much for their financial resources.

Agreement has now been reached between all parties for the setting up of the cereals commission to be known as the M.I.R.A. Commission. It will have a Syrian president, probably the Minister for Foreign Affairs or the Minister of Supplies, and representatives of the Lebanese Governments, of M.I.R.A. itself and of the 9th Army Headquarters as members. It was agreed that the function of the Commission would be to advise the General Officer Commanding the 9th Army on all matters concerning operations of M.I.R.A., and it would expedite current matters as was done by the O.C.P. Commission. The two Governments have also agreed to the setting up of a committee to be known as the Comité de Gestion de l'actif et du passif de l'O.C.P., the function of which will be to collect all debts due to O.C.P., to pay its liabilities and to draw up a balance-sheet at 31st May, 1945. It will have French, British, Syrian and Lebanese members.

The Syrian and Lebanese Governments have issued a joint communiqué, dated 21st June, 1945, at Damascus, following upon the Arab League meeting in Cairo and a meeting of the two Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers at Damascus. In it the two Governments announce that they have agreed to follow a joint policy the aims of which are :—(i) to put into operation the decisions taken by the Arab League Council; (ii) to dismiss all French employees in the service of the two Governments; (iii) to work for the withdrawal of all French troops from Syrian and Lebanese territory and to demand the handing over of the Troupes Spéciales to the two Governments. They took the opportunity to declare their determination not to grant a privileged or special position to any Power, and to pursue their policy of independence with resolution and vigour for the maintenance of their sovereignty. According to the Syrian Minister for Foreign Affairs, he hoped to be allowed to proceed gradually and not summarily to dismiss the French officials at once, but his Cabinet were having great difficulty as there was some violent opposition to the retention of French officials even for a time.

Ibn Saud has been playing a mediating rôle behind the scenes of the Arab League meeting. He has telegraphed to the President of Syria, to leading politicians of the Levant and to the Syrian Bedouin chieftains, urging them not to let the Bedouin take any part against the French. He similarly, through his representative, advised the Council of the Arab League, while it was meeting in Cairo, not to make foolish resolutions which they would not be able to implement, or to do anything which would lead to a misunderstanding with His Majesty's Government.

The Egyptian Government's promptitude in relaxing press censorship in Egypt has been hailed with approval on all sides, but an immediate outburst of political polemics has led to a general lowering of the tone of the press. There has been widespread speculation among the public as to the text of the unpublished resolutions concerning Syria and Lebanon of the Arab League Council. As a corollary to the suggested discussions regarding Syria and Lebanon in London, treaty revision remains very much to the fore in the public mind. Egypt, with her predominant position in the Arab League, it is argued, should be at least as independent as the Levant States. Articles by members of the Egyptian press delegation, who have been visiting London, figure prominently in the local press and have done much to enlighten the Egyptian public on the situation in Great Britain.

There has been a reaction among the more broad-minded Egyptians against the violent allegations and counter-allegations of the abuse of power made by Egyptian parliamentarians against each other. They deplore this exhibition of personal spite by their leaders, but Nokrashi Pasha has so far been unwilling or powerless to check this domestic strife. Anti-French feeling has been kept alive by reports now leaking out of excessively drastic repression of recent disorder in Algeria.

M. Sadr, the new Persian Prime Minister, took the members of his Cabinet to the Majlis for the first time on the 21st June. First reports indicate that M. Sadr's Government is no more popular with the Majlis than that of his predecessor, M. Hakimi.

The Persian Government has been awaiting replies from the Governments of Great Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States regarding the withdrawal of Allied troops from Persia; in the meanwhile, the press agitation for the evacuation of the country continues. It is noteworthy that the Tudeh section of the press is silent on the subject.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 20th June the Extraordinary War Measures Act was approved at a plenary session of the Japanese Privy Council convened at the Imperial Palace in the presence of the Emperor. The Act came into force on the 23rd June and applies to Korea and Formosa as well as to Japan proper. Members of the Tokyo Cabinet, the Regional Superintendents-General and the Governors-General of Korea and Formosa are empowered to apply the provisions of the Act, which cover all matters relating to business organisations, the employment of labour, supply of materials, property rights, wages and prices, and general movements of the population. Suzuki on the 22nd June told his colleagues in the Cabinet that they now had powers to carry out, speedily and resolutely, all measures deemed necessary, for the Act had freed both officials and the nation as a whole from red tape, and no officials could in future evade their duties and responsibilities on the pretext that legal formalities prevented them from taking prompt action. However, on the same day Tokyo Radio stressed the difference between the Extraordinary War Measures Act and an invocation of the Imperial Supreme Authority. The new Act must confine itself to the sphere of law, whereas the Imperial prerogative overrode all laws. Personal government by the Emperor, based on the traditions and sentiments of the Japanese nation, was more deeply rooted than government by law, and it was probable that, if a more serious emergency arose, the Imperial Supreme Authority would be invoked.

Now that Japanese resistance on Okinawa has virtually ended, the Tokyo Government are warning their people that an invasion of Kyushu may be imminent. The Superintendent-General of that region, while in Tokyo on the 19th June, declared that the construction of various defence works had been almost completed and that the people of Kyushu were ready to meet the invader. Other anti-invasion measures in Japan generally include the establishment of two new Army Regional Commands in Shikoku and Chugoku and of regional naval offices to deal with questions of defence, materials and labour, in so far as these affect naval activities. The new offices will be under the authority of the naval defence headquarters in each region and will work in close accord with the Army Regional Commands and the Regional Superintendents-General. The Volunteer Military Service Act came into force on the 23rd June, together with Army and Navy regulations for the organisation of the People's Volunteer Corps. The Tokyo P.V.C. was completely organised by the 22nd June; its first task will be the clearing of rubble and the reconstitution of transport facilities in the stricken capital. A manual setting out the duties of the P.V.C. has been published jointly by the Army and the Navy; the manual emphasises the maintenance of transport and supply facilities and also refers to the protection of important war establishments against "enemy schemes or disturbances which may be created by subversive elements" as well as to assistance to the police in the maintenance of peace and order. This need not be taken to mean that the authorities fear serious uprisings. The manual also states that the P.V.C. is organised to place the entire nation under the personal command of the Emperor as are the armed forces of the fighting services; this does not imply that the Emperor is going to command in the field in the event of an invasion.

The Tokyo broadcast in English of the 25th June quoted some remarks by Aiichiro Fujiyama on the relations between Big Business interests and the Army. Fujiyama is primarily a sugar magnate, he is president of the Dai Nippon Sugar Manufacturing Company and chairman of the Japan Sugar Producers' Association, but he has also large interests in a number of other concerns in Japan, Korea, Formosa and Manchuria, and is described as one of the Japanese Empire's outstanding financiers. He declared that Japanese Big Business was not in the least interested in anything short of a total Japanese victory and, notwithstanding enemy wishful thinking, business interests and the military were working together. But he was also quoted as saying that without the concerted co-operation of Japan's Big Business the Japanese war machine could hardly expect to last long; this remark can be taken as meaning that Big Business is doing its duty in the general Japanese war effort, but it may also be a warning to the military not to interfere overmuch with Big Business or to start any general policy of expropriation under the powers granted by the Extraordinary War Measures Act. It is reminiscent of the Roman general's message: "Cæsar may be sure of my loyalty as long as I retain my command." Fujiyama's interests are primarily, though not exclusively, in the Japanese overseas empire and, in view of the Cairo Declaration, he stands to lose them. But most of the Zaibatsu also have extensive interests outside Japan proper; this is a point of difference between them and the Court group who are more specially concerned with the maintenance of the Imperial authority within Japan.

The Japanese are still fighting a rearguard action in Liuchow, although the Chinese claim to have reached its southern suburbs, and also that another of their advancing columns has pushed down the Kweichow-Kwangsi railway to a point six miles north-west of Liuchow. Chungking puts the strength of the Japanese force in Liuchow at between 1,000 and 2,000 and says that it is holding out to ensure an organised withdrawal through Kweilin to Hengyang. North of Wenchow, in Chekiang, the Chinese have reached Hwangyen, on the Wenchow–Ningpo road. They now hold some 200 miles of the Fukien–Chekiang coast, but this is partly covered from invasion by Formosa, while the Japanese are still holding an island at the mouth of the Min River below Foochow. The Chungking military spokesman on the 22nd June said that the Japanese appeared to have largely completed their redeployment of troops in China and there was now much less movement by road and rail. The Japanese garrisons in Amoy and Swatow had been reduced to 2,000 or 3,000 men and some 5,000 had been withdrawn from Hainan Island. The Japanese were strengthening their field defences to the north of the Yellow River. The spokesman further said that transport difficulties were hampering the Chinese forces in Kwangsi, that very little fighting had occurred and that all Chinese military movements could be regarded as the prelude to a general counter-offensive. On the 20th June General Wedemeyer announced that new Tactical Headquarters for the American troops in China would soon be established and would be under the command of Major-General Douglas Weart.

The Yomiuri-Hochi (23rd June) quoted a Canton report that twenty Chinese divisions under General Ku Chu-tung were deploying for battle in Kiangsi and Chekiang and that the 14th United States Air Force was re-establishing airfields in Fukien, Kiangsi and Kwangtung. The armies of Generals Hsueh Yueh and Yu Han-mou were also said to be on the move in northern Kwangtung. Japanese propagandists in China have been representing the "Americanisation" of the Chinese Army as fatal to Chungking's independence and at the same time decrying the value of the new forces, though they admit that there has been some improvement in the training of the troops and in the liaison between air and ground forces.

Reuter on the 24th June reported from Chungking that the decision of the Chinese Communist Party not to send representatives to the forthcoming meeting of the People's Political Council had widened the breach between them and the Government, which had offered them eight seats on the Council, including one for Mao Tze-tung himself. The Chinese Democratic League of eight minority parties was discussing whether or not to follow the Communists' example and boycott the P.P.C., which is due to meet on the 7th July.

On the 24th June six American Congressmen, led by Mr. Harry R. Sheppard, the Chairman of the Naval Sub-Committee of the House Appropriations Committee, arrived in Chungking. They were accompanied by a group of Naval personnel, including the Navy Fiscal Director. The purpose of the visit was not announced.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In a special message to both Houses of Congress before leaving for his visit to the West Coast, President Truman recommended legislation to change the order of the Presidential succession. "The question is of great importance now," he said, "because there will be no elected Vice-President for almost four years." Under the existing law Mr. Truman would, in the event of his own death or inability to act, be succeeded by the Secretary of State (until Wednesday Mr. Stettinius) and thereafter by other members of the Cabinet successively in named order. In effect, therefore, it now lies within Mr. Truman's power to nominate his own successor. The President has, in consequence, suggested that it would be more democratic if the person to succeed him were an elective officer, and he has proposed that the Speaker of the House of Representatives (at present Mr. Rayburn) be first in order of succession, or, if this post were vacant, then the President pro tempore—temporary, because normally the Vice-President presides over the Senate. Mr. Truman suggested the Speaker of the House because he is chosen by a method that "can most accurately be said to stem from the people themselves." The message also expressed the belief that no matter who succeeded to the Presidency after the deaths of the President and Vice-President, "he should serve no longer than until the next Congressional election (Congressional elections take place every two years) or until a special election called for the purpose of electing a new President and Vice-President."

This proposal was at first generally welcomed, particularly as it was maintained that "American tradition demands that the President be elected by the people." The House of Representatives, not unnaturally, supported Mr. Truman's suggestions, though the Senate, despite hearty recommendation by individual Senators, appeared to be considerably more cautious. There was agreement, however, that prompt action was desirable and that the President's suggestions were "well thought out" and were a "sound basis for discussion." As the days have gone by, however, while there is still agreement with the President's objectives, there has been mounting criticism of his specific proposals, especially in Liberal circles. It has been pointed out, for example, that the Speaker of the House might belong to the Opposition party, and Mr. Walter Lippmann, while urging Congress to adopt the proposal as "a stop-gap measure," has expressed the view that Mr. Truman's proposal "may not be the best one." He thinks the solution of the "permanent problem . . . will be found in deciding how to choose a new Vice-President" and suggests that Congress provide for the election of a Vice-President as soon as possible after the office of Vice-President becomes vacant. Other voices have reiterated this, and in view of the many doubts, action is now likely to be slow and difficult. It is significant that the House Judiciary Committee approved the President's proposals by a bare vote of one, ten votes to nine.

Good news followed Mr. Truman as he set out West to address the closing session of the Conference at San Francisco. By a vote of 47 to 33 the Senate rejected an amendment of its own Finance Committee which would have robbed the President of powers to make tariff cuts up to 50 per cent. of the rate prevailing on the 1st January, 1945. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, without any "crippling" amendments, was finally passed by the surprisingly large majority of 54 to 21 votes—"a truly by-partisan vote." Mr. Truman hailed this news as "gratifying," adding, "the revitalisation of this Act places the United States squarely behind the principles of international trade co-operation which must prevail in the interests of world peace and economic well-being. Trade co-operation must go hand in hand with monetary and financial co-operation. I am confident," stated the President, "that the Senate will also take favourable action on the Bretton Woods legislation." Mr. Grew, in an address to the students at the Foreign Service Education Foundation, stressed the immense political and economic power of the United States, but admitted that, "on the basis of our past record, our economic power is distrusted or even feared abroad." He believed, however, that the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was one proof of America's real intentions, as would be the acceptance of the Bretton Woods proposals, and he pledged that the United States would "pursue the path of economic co-operation through the organisation of the United Nations, whose Economic and Social Council promises to be one of the most hopeful contributions to the future well-being of nations."

There is now a tendency to assert that it behoves Great Britain, as Mr. Dewey hinted in his recent speech, to show her good faith by abandoning "her restrictive trade and monetary policies," following the fine lead given by the United States.

A new buoyancy, particularly in relation to international affairs, has been observable this week. In addition to the good news about the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the announcement of an acceptable formula for the composition of the new Polish Government, and other evidences of Soviet willingness to compromise, Mr. Truman told the press that he was very happy that the San Francisco Conference had been a success. The press is actively supporting the President's desire for the early ratification of the Charter by the Senate, and it is significant that the emphasis now is on when rather than whether this will take place. The hope is expressed that the Senate ratification should precede the Big Three Meeting, in order to strengthen the President's hand. One Associated Press report maintained that there were less than a dozen potential votes in the Senate against the Charter, but several close observers doubt whether Senate ratification will be obtained before the Berlin meeting, and it is stated, though it is by no means certain, that the President will throw the fullest measure of his official weight behind the Charter by going before the Senate in person.

Three of the crusading B²H² Senators (Carl Hatch, Democrat, New Mexico, Joseph Ball, Republican, Minnesota, and Harold Burton, Republican, Ohio), worried by the outbreak of strikes and the fear that war production for the Far East may suffer despite pleas by the Service chiefs, have proposed a Bill to modify the Wagner Labour Relations Act and to substitute narrower restrictions on both employers and employees. This new proposal would deprive organised Labour of some of the advantages which it has gained during the Roosevelt régime. It would abolish the National Labour Relations Board, replacing it with a new five-man agency; would ultimately abolish the War Labour Board and establish a new three-man tribunal to prevent unfair practices not only by management, as at present, but also by Unions as well; and would outlaw the "closed shop," except under special conditions. The Act would apply only to employment affecting interstate commerce and not to the local handling or distribution of goods. Local labour disputes would be left to the States, thus narrowing the field in which the Wagner Act now operates. Finally, disputes arising in industries which would result in severe hardships to the public (public utilities, coal, milk, &c.) would be made subject to compulsory arbitration.

Naturally the three most powerful Labour organisations (the A.F. of L., C.I.O., and United Mine Workers) have bitterly denounced this new Bill, and have described it as "a Bill to enslave labour" and "a strait-jacket for labour." While it is unlikely that these exact proposals will become law, it seems certain that steps will be taken to secure industrial peace at home, particularly during the reconversion period. This will be one of the first problems facing Mr. Schwellenbach when he succeeds Miss Perkins as Secretary of Labour on the 1st July.

General Eisenhower has been welcomed with enthusiasm, not only as a great general but as "the great example of American democracy," entitled, as the President himself said, "to anything he wants." "It is doubtful," as one paper said, "if any legislative body heard from a professional soldier an address as masterly and inspiring," as his address to Congress. He is acclaimed everywhere and his talents as "a diplomat," his "statesmanship," his "grasp of international issues," and his ability to cement Allied friendship are extolled in glowing and unstinted phrases. General Eisenhower has undoubtedly become a national hero and a popular idol. (See also under "France.")

LATIN AMERICA.

The manifesto which was published by Argentine commercial and industrial interests and directed against Colonel Perón (see last week's Summary) has now been answered by a Vice-Presidential communiqué. This explains the friction and opposition brought about by the "creation of a new social and economic system" as a natural phenomenon in the free play of democratic institutions. The Argentine Government, it is asserted, is attempting to create a democracy of the centre in which neither capital nor labour would sway decisions. Those who had signed the manifesto represented an economic oligarchy which in the past had led to a dictatorship of capital in Argentina. The measures taken by the Government were justified by the contrast between wealth and poverty existing in the country. The minimum needs for a workman and family with three children were now 200 pesos; either this must be the minimum wage (which spelt inflation), or prices must come down so that a wage of 160 pesos would suffice. It is apparently in pursuance of this policy of deflation that the Government is preparing, according to broadcast reports, to reduce the current budget by 200 million pesos.

Meanwhile the Argentine and Rosario Rural Societies (representing farming and stock-raising interests) have issued a declaration of solidarity with the authors of the first manifesto, blaming the Government for the two-month-old meat-factory strike, which, they maintain, has led to a drop of 130,000 tons in meat exports in the first quarter of 1945 compared with the same period of 1944. The Unión Industrial has also now published a short statement approving the principles of the manifesto, though recording dissent on various points.

General Pedro Cavalcanti, president of the Brazilian Military Requisitioning Commission, has stated, in an interview, that Brazil would not at once join actively in the war against Japan, since the adaptation of her forces for amphibious warfare would involve a considerable period of training.

In Colombia President López is reported to have issued a statement attributing responsibility for all recently discovered disturbances, including the Pasto revolt, to the machinations of the Conservative leader, Dr. Laureano Gómez.

In the Dominican Republic, the efforts of General Trujillo to create a controlled "opposition" have led to the arrest of many of those who were unwise enough to come forward. General Trujillo is now faced with the most serious opposition he has known, though this does not mean that he is seriously inconvenienced. The atmosphere of malaise appears to extend to Haiti.

UNITED NATIONS.

President Truman addressed the final session of the San Francisco Conference on the 26th June, and it now remains for the member States to ratify the Charter.

The work of setting up the new Organisation is to be carried on by a Preparatory Commission which held its first meeting on the 27th June in San Francisco but which will have its seat in London. In will include representatives of all member States. Documents will be prepared for it and its powers between its sessions will be exercised by an Executive Committee in permanent session in London. The Executive Committee includes representatives of the fourteen States represented on the Conference Executive Committee.

An outstanding point settled during the past week concerned the Assembly (see last week's Summary.) It is now laid down that the Assembly shall have the right to discuss any matter within the scope of the Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs of the Charter and (except as regards matters which are being dealt with by the Security Council) to make recommendations to members or to the Security Council or to both on any such matters.

It was also agreed to insert in the Charter a provision for the expulsion of members (as well as for their suspension). It was decided not to mention in the Charter the right of withdrawal from membership though it was made clear in the records of the Conference that withdrawal for good and sufficient reasons would not be prevented. The French delegate observed that it was unwise to mention divorce on one's wedding day.

It is now possible to sum up the main results of the Conference.

All the essentials of the Dumbarton Oaks plan have been preserved. The intention of that plan was primarily to improve on the League arrangements for the maintenance of peace and security by setting up machinery which could operate more rapidly and more effectively than the League machinery. The new machinery was held to require, for its full operation, the unanimity of the Great Powers. Even before the Conference many small Powers had indicated that they would try to have the weight given to the Great Powers by the Dumbarton Oaks plan counterbalanced in three ways: (a) by limiting the scope of the "Great Power veto," (b) by increasing the powers of the Assembly, (c) by having the Charter revised after a fixed term of years. On none of these points were they completely successful, but on each they achieved some concession. The "Great Power veto" is not to prevent the discussion by the Security Council of any dispute; the powers of the Assembly have been widened (see above); and revision of the Charter is to be considered at latest after ten years.

Moreover, the principle (basic to the Dumbarton Oaks plan) of relating power within the Organisation to responsibility on its behalf has been extended in the interest of smaller Powers in two ways. Firstly, in electing members to the Security Council, the Assembly is to pay regard primarily to the contribution of members to the maintenance of peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organisation. Secondly, any State required to supply armed forces for enforcement action but not represented on the Security Council is to participate in the Council discussions on the use of such forces.

The purposes of the Economic and Social Council have been widened. It is to promote higher standards of living, full employment, conditions of social and economic progress and the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

A statute for a new World Court has been drafted. It follows the Statute of the Hague Court in most respects (including the absence of compulsory jurisdiction).

Finally there is a chapter on trusteeship for dependent territories. Its creation was perhaps the outstanding achievement of the Conference. For Dumbarton Oaks had provided no basis for this work; preliminary drafting, criticism, amendment, discussion, and final agreement had all to be achieved on the spot. Moreover, the first section of this new chapter breaks new ground by laying down principles for the administration of all dependent territories. The variety of national views on this subject and the even greater variety of conditions

Three of the crusading B²H² Senators (Carl Hatch, Democrat, New Mexico, Joseph Ball, Republican, Minnesota, and Harold Burton, Republican, Ohio), worried by the outbreak of strikes and the fear that war production for the Far East may suffer despite pleas by the Service chiefs, have proposed a Bill to modify the Wagner Labour Relations Act and to substitute narrower restrictions on both employers and employees. This new proposal would deprive organised Labour of some of the advantages which it has gained during the Roosevelt régime. It would abolish the National Labour Relations Board, replacing it with a new five-man agency; would ultimately abolish the War Labour Board and establish a new three-man tribunal to prevent unfair practices not only by management, as at present, but also by Unions as well; and would outlaw the "closed shop," except under special conditions. The Act would apply only to employment affecting interstate commerce and not to the local handling or distribution of goods. Local labour disputes would be left to the States, thus narrowing the field in which the Wagner Act now operates. Finally, disputes arising in industries which would result in severe hardships to the public (public utilities, coal, milk, &c.) would be made subject to compulsory arbitration.

Naturally the three most powerful Labour organisations (the A.F. of L., C.I.O., and United Mine Workers) have bitterly denounced this new Bill, and have described it as "a Bill to enslave labour" and "a strait-jacket for labour." While it is unlikely that these exact proposals will become law, it seems certain that steps will be taken to secure industrial peace at home, particularly during the reconversion period. This will be one of the first problems facing Mr. Schwellenbach when he succeeds Miss Perkins as Secretary of Labour on the 1st July.

General Eisenhower has been welcomed with enthusiasm, not only as a great general but as "the great example of American democracy," entitled, as the President himself said, "to anything he wants." "It is doubtful," as one paper said, "if any legislative body heard from a professional soldier an address as masterly and inspiring," as his address to Congress. He is acclaimed everywhere and his talents as "a diplomat," his "statesmanship," his "grasp of international issues," and his ability to cement Allied friendship are extolled in glowing and unstinted phrases. General Eisenhower has undoubtedly become a national hero and a popular idol. (See also under "France.")

LATIN AMERICA.

The manifesto which was published by Argentine commercial and industrial interests and directed against Colonel Perón (see last week's Summary) has now been answered by a Vice-Presidential communiqué. This explains the friction and opposition brought about by the "creation of a new social and economic system" as a natural phenomenon in the free play of democratic institutions. The Argentine Government, it is asserted, is attempting to create a democracy of the centre in which neither capital nor labour would sway decisions. Those who had signed the manifesto represented an economic oligarchy which in the past had led to a dictatorship of capital in Argentina. The measures taken by the Government were justified by the contrast between wealth and poverty existing in the country. The minimum needs for a workman and family with three children were now 200 pesos; either this must be the minimum wage (which spelt inflation), or prices must come down so that a wage of 160 pesos would suffice. It is apparently in pursuance of this policy of deflation that the Government is preparing, according to broadcast reports, to reduce the current budget by 200 million pesos.

Meanwhile the Argentine and Rosario Rural Societies (representing farming and stock-raising interests) have issued a declaration of solidarity with the authors of the first manifesto, blaming the Government for the two-month-old meat-factory strike, which, they maintain, has led to a drop of 130,000 tons in meat exports in the first quarter of 1945 compared with the same period of 1944. The Unión Industrial has also now published a short statement approving the principles of the manifesto, though recording dissent on various points.

General Pedro Cavalcanti, president of the Brazilian Military Requisitioning Commission, has stated, in an interview, that Brazil would not at once join actively in the war against Japan, since the adaptation of her forces for amphibious warfare would involve a considerable period of training.

In Colombia President López is reported to have issued a statement attributing responsibility for all recently discovered disturbances, including the Pasto revolt, to the machinations of the Conservative leader, Dr. Laureano Gómez.

In the Dominican Republic, the efforts of General Trujillo to create a controlled "opposition" have led to the arrest of many of those who were unwise enough to come forward. General Trujillo is now faced with the most serious opposition he has known, though this does not mean that he is seriously inconvenienced. The atmosphere of malaise appears to extend to Haiti.

UNITED NATIONS.

President Truman addressed the final session of the San Francisco Conference on the 26th June, and it now remains for the member States to ratify the Charter.

The work of setting up the new Organisation is to be carried on by a Preparatory Commission which held its first meeting on the 27th June in San Francisco but which will have its seat in London. In will include representatives of all member States. Documents will be prepared for it and its powers between its sessions will be exercised by an Executive Committee in permanent session in London. The Executive Committee includes representatives of the fourteen States represented on the Conference Executive Committee.

An outstanding point settled during the past week concerned the Assembly (see last week's Summary.) It is now laid down that the Assembly shall have the right to discuss any matter within the scope of the Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs of the Charter and (except as regards matters which are being dealt with by the Security Council) to make recommendations to members or to the Security Council or to both on any such matters.

It was also agreed to insert in the Charter a provision for the expulsion of members (as well as for their suspension). It was decided not to mention in the Charter the right of withdrawal from membership though it was made clear in the records of the Conference that withdrawal for good and sufficient reasons would not be prevented. The French delegate observed that it was unwise to mention divorce on one's wedding day.

in dependent territories themselves made agreement difficult, and the United Kingdom delegation took a leading part in providing the basis for it. Under this section members undertake not only to respect the principles laid down in it, but also to send to the Organisation regular reports on the economic, social and educational conditions in those of their dependent territories which are not brought under special trusteeship arrangements. This section, indeed, is likely to take its place as a Magna Charta in the development of the idea of empire. The second section of the new chapter provides for special trusteeship arrangements for dependent territories in three categories: (a) those taken from enemy States as a result of the present war; (b) those now under League of Nations Mandates; (c) those which the States responsible for their administration may voluntarily bring under trusteeship arrangements. The arrangements define the obligations of the administering States and the supervisory powers of the Organisation. Both the obligations and the powers in question resemble those under the League Mandate system, though a right of inspection by the new Organisation is also now included. The arrangements allows a distinction between strategic and other areas. For the former, the supervisory organ is the Security Council, for the latter a special Trusteeship Council, consisting of equal numbers of representatives of States administering and States not administering trusteeship territories, and including representatives of the five Great Powers.

Differences during the Conference (both inside and outside its walls) have reinforced the recognition that the success or failure of the Charter (like the "successes" and the "failure" of the League of Nations) will depend more on the will to co-operate between the Powers themselves (and particularly the Great Powers) than on the wording of any such document. Nevertheless, the provision of machinery which is likely to be accepted by the great majority of States (including, this time, all the Great Powers) is in itself a genuine contribution to the prospects of co-operation between them.

EUROPE.

GERMANY.

AT 11 a.m. on the 1st July Red Army troops took over from the Western Allies the occupation of Magdeburg and at the same time began in the North to enter an area 40 miles long and 27 miles wide covering the towns of Wismar, Schwerin, Ludwigslust and Hagenow, which had previously been garrisoned by the British. This further reshuffle of Allied troops followed an agreement that British and United States forces should begin on the 1st July to withdraw to their final occupation zones from the positions in which hostilities had left them. Men of the British Seventh Armoured Division passed through Magdeburg on the 1st July as the first of a number of advance parties now proceeding to occupy the British zone of Berlin. The first unit of the Division, a Squadron of the 11th Hussars, entered the German capital on the afternoon of the 4th July. A Four-Power Agreement on the final sectors to be taken over in Berlin has still to be concluded, but both His Majesty's Government and the United States Government have intimated their desire that French troops should, along with the British and American, be present in the German capital from the first. The French Provisional Government has therefore been invited to send a token force to Berlin with the British and American garrisons, with whom it will be accommodated until a fourfold division of the city has been agreed upon.

A disturbing picture of how authority is apt to break down and lawlessness to flourish in areas where the troops of one Allied nation are moving out and those of another are moving in, and of how gangs of displaced persons have, in some places, exploited the interregnum to terrorise the German population, has been given by a Military Government official at Herford in Westphalia. During a period of six weeks, this official stated, there had been in his sector of the British zone alone 100 murders, 60 cases of rape, 200 cases of robbery with violence, 150 thefts and slaughter of cattle and about 1,000 cases of looting by Allied nationals waiting for repatriation. In addition eight German policemen, acting under Military Government instructions, had been murdered. Neither in these areas, where British, American and Russian troops are at present on the move, nor elsewhere in the Reich, are German police allowed to take Allied civilian suspects into custody. In any case, the German police remain for the most part unarmed, except where their reorganisation under Military Government control has been satisfactorily completed. To deal with native law-breakers whose offences do not warrant the interference of the Allied military police, a new Schutzpolizei has been constituted from the non-Nazi members of the former German force, and to this have been added such remnants of the old Kriminalpolizei as are felt to be reliable.

Some delay is expected to be caused in the reconstruction of German peacetime industry in the British and American zones by the demand for some 25 million tons of German coal by the end of next year to overcome the fuel famine in the liberated Allied territories. The export of this German coal to the Allied territories should, it is felt, take precedence over the needs of both German civilians and German factories. In addition to the 140 coal mines recently referred to by Field-Marshal Montgomery as already working in the Ruhr, eight are stated to have restarted in the Saar and four more are due to resume their activity this week. 15,000 miners are at present employed in the Saar area, but there is said to be work for twice as many more, along with 10,000 new apprentices.

Where coal is not imperative for the work of reconstruction, the return to normality is still proceeding at a satisfactory pace. A postal system for the German public began to operate throughout the Ruhr and Westphalia on the 1st July. Postcards may be sent by anyone within this area, but letters are reserved for business purposes. The destroyed harbour area of Hamburg is being repaired with every priority by local German labour under the supervision of the British Navy, and the first Allied ships are stated to have already docked there. The German Co-operative Wholesale Society at Hamburg has been reconstituted and a number of its old directors who had been in retirement since 1933 have been reinstated. On the 27th June, however, the British press reported that the recently revived Socialist Free Trade Union—a major German workers' organisation before 1933—had been temporarily dissolved at Hamburg because Military Government could not approve of some members' efforts to turn it into an active political body. The Union is said to be free to start again, if it undertakes to keep out of politics and make no attempt to collective bargaining.

An official declaration on the agricultural and food situation over the Hamburg radio on the 27th June stated that the existing regional and district farmers' organisations (Landesbauernschaften and Kreisbauernschaften) would remain in control in the British zone, as would the various trade associations (Wirtschaftsverbände). Travel restrictions for agricultural workers and food distributors would be lifted as far as possible. All available tractors had already been returned to farmers and plans for supplying fuel had been completed. German sea fishing would be restarted as soon as crews and boats were available and mines had been swept. 1,000 unemployed Düsseldorf workers were reported on the 26th June to have been dispersed to local farms. Two days later, the Neue Westfälische Zeitung appealed to all craftsmen in Westphalia who had lost their livelihood through bombing to turn to agriculture and find a new life on the land. Unemployed armaments workers from as far away as Upper Silesia are now stated to be working on the farms of Hesse. The promise of extra rations for heavy workers and hospital patients during the next rationing period was held out by the new head of the Bavarian provincial food office, Staatsrat Ernst Ratterhuber, in a broadcast of the 1st July. Nevertheless, Rattenhuber warned his listeners that Bavarian food would have to be exported to other territories under United States administration and that, in any case, it would only be possible to pull through the coming winter "if the Lord grants a good harvest."

More than usual publicity has been given during the past few days by the Russian-controlled news agencies to the activities of the German Communist Party in Berlin. The programme of the party, as registered with the Soviet authorities, was published in Pravda on the 25th June. This admitted that the German people bore partial responsibility for the misdeeds of their leaders and put forward the party's demands for a bloc of all anti-Fascists to help them mend their ways. The establishment of a German Soviet system, it was nevertheless conceded, would be out of keeping with present conditions in the Reich. On the 30th, the Berlin radio broadcast a long speech by Walter Ulbricht of the Central Executive Committee of the German Communist Party, enlarging still further upon the need for a united front of German democratic organisations. Good relations, Ulbricht stated, would have to be established between the Communists and the Social Democrats "throughout the Reich, from Frankfurt-on-the-Oder to the Ruhr and from Mecklenburg to Württemberg" (that is, not merely in the Russian zone, where an agreement between the two parties is already in operation, but in the British and American zones as well). The new plans of the party for the nationalisation of the land, he added, should be put into effect as soon as possible "and the princes, Junkers and large estate-holders should be expropriated." Ulbricht, who would thus seem to be emerging as the principal spokesman of the reconstituted German Communist movement, was head of the party's political bureau and a member of the Reichstag before 1933. During the war he has been a frequent broadcaster from Moscow and a prominent member of the Free German Committee of General von Seydlitz. Ten of his sixteen colleagues on the new Central Committee of the German Communist Party are likewise leading representatives of that Moscow organisation.

Genuine efforts are apparently being made to give members of other anti-Nazi groups in Berlin the chance of organising and expressing themselves. Social Democrats and trade-union officials have been permitted to speak on the Berlin radio and to voice their views in the local press. A third and entirely new political party, the Christian Democratic Union of Germany (Christlich-Demokratische Union Deutschlands) came to life on the 29th June with an appeal in the Berliner Zeitung by 34 lay members of the Protestant and Catholic Churches. These included the former Centre Party Minister of Finance, Dr. Andreas Hermes, the former Centre Party leader in the West, Jakob Kaiser, the former (Protestant) Regierungspräsident of Kassel and economist, Dr. Ferdinand Friedensburg, and representatives of the families of von Arnim and Yorck von Wartenburg. Dr. Friedensburg also came into the public eye on the 27th June as one of the principal sponsors of a new "Cultural Association for Germany's Democratic Revival" (Kulturbund der Demokratischen Erneuerung Deutschlands). With him re-emerged a former Rector of the University of Berlin, Professor Eduard Spranger, who expressed guarded approval of National Socialism in 1933 and publicly stated at that time that he had for years been "harassed by the Left," and the veteran actor Paul Wegener. The Association pledged itself to work for a "complete change of heart and moral renascence" among the German people and to rally all scholars and artists for this purpose.

AUSTRIA.

In the American-occupied zone, a Provisional Provincial Government has been appointed in Salzburg, headed by Adolf Schemel, a Christian Socialist. Of the other members one is a Social Democrat, one Christian Social, one Communist and one of no party. This is the last of the regional administrations to be appointed in the United States zone. There were already organisations in Innsbruck and in Upper Austria. Over 100 of the most eminent Nazi personalities of Salzburg are reported to be employed in clearing the ruins.

From Carinthia, a news item broadcast by the Klagenfurt radio on the 26th quoted "a member of the Allied Control Commission for Austria" as saying that non-fraternisation would soon be relaxed, and expressing the hope that "Austria would soon be restored by a freely-elected government." The first newspaper in the British zone is published daily in Klagenfurt—the Kärntner Nachrichten. The Osterreichischer Kurier has begun to appear in Salzburg, while from the Russian zone comes news of the Neue Steierische Zeitung.

Radio Vorarlberg has relayed broadcasts from Radio Luxembourg and Paris since the French occupation. It now broadcasts mainly material of local origin, with the exception of the German transmission from Paris for Austria, which is relayed daily. On the 25th June this transmission included a talk, strongly advocating support for Dr. Renner's Provisional Government.

From Vienna on the 30th June came the news that during the evening of the 29th "further severe damage was caused to the grid system, and the district centre and transformer were damaged." It was said that the transformer would not be in working order for months, and it appears that this unexplained disaster has seriously affected the already limited supply in Vienna. Teaching at all Vienna secondary schools is to be resumed in the first week of July.

It would seem that the population of the British and American-occupied zones takes little interest in anything except day-to-day problems. The same is believed to be true for the Russian zone, although propaganda broadcasts convey the impression of ceaseless political activity. The opening announcement of the "Russian Hour," broadcast from Vienna on the 28th June, criticised "the people in Vienna who switch off their wireless when they are to hear something about Russian affairs."

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The talks held in Moscow between the Polish and Czechoslovak delegations, while serving the purpose of bringing territorial claims into the open, have not resulted in any agreement between the two countries. The Czechoslovak Ministers expressed uncertainty about the Russian attitude, an uncertainty echoed, too, by the Czech representatives in London. M. Fierlinger, however, said after the failure of the negotiations that he was satisfied with the official Soviet viewpoint, which recognises the pre-Munich frontiers and refers any frontier rectifications to the Peace Conference. According to M. Fierlinger and Dr. Ripka, the Polish delegates showed little knowledge of the localities involved, and behaved with unusual lack of courtesy; the Poles were claiming the Teschen area which they occupied after Munich, considered the Glatz (Kladsko) salient as included within the western Neisse frontier, and refused to negotiate over the Czech claim to the smaller Leobschütz–Ratibor salient lying between Glatz and Moravská Ostrava. The Poles describe the Czechoslovak delegates as stubborn, but the latter seem confident that the justness and moderation of their claims can now wait for the approval of the final peace settlement.

The Czechoslovak delegation to Moscow was there also to discuss Soviet-Czechoslovak relations with M. Vyshinski. One definite outcome was the agreement to transfer Carpatho-Ukraine to the Soviet Ukraine, which was regarded as a foregone conclusion by the Czechs. Since its liberation by the Red Army, the Czechoslovak Government has had no real authority in Carpatho-Ukraine, but has borne the expense of providing the administration, food-stuffs, &c., and has wanted to withdraw altogether. (See under "Soviet Union" and "Hungary.") Interest from the Czechoslovak point of view now centres in the transfer of Czechs and Slovaks from the transferred territory, and Russians and Ukrainians from Slovakia, all of whom have the right to opt for Soviet or Czechoslovak citizenship up to the 1st January, 1946; and in the frontier demarcation to be carried out by a Commission set up under the agreement with equal Czechoslovak and Soviet representation.

The other questions discussed with M. Vyshinski dealt mainly with the removal of German minorities and with military affairs. Dr. Ripka explained that his Government was anxious to reach an early agreement on the orderly transfer of Germans, both of Reich and Sudeten origin. Mr. Nichols, in a dispatch from Prague on the 25th, described the all-pervading and almost pathological character of this problem in the Republic, which applies to a less acute degree to the Magyar minorities. Dr. Beneš and the Foreign Under-Secretary have been informed by Mr. Nichols that it is on the agenda of the "Big Three" meeting. The agreement between Czechoslovakia and U.S.S.R. concerning war booty had worked badly, and an attempt was made by the Czechoslovak delegation to improve its working. The dwindling popularity of the Red Army, particularly in Slovakia, which had suffered from both the Soviet and German occupations, and the failure of the Soviet authorities to implement their pledge in providing equipment for the new Czechoslovak Army, together with anxiety over the frontier dispute and the loss of Carpatho-Ukraine, have all combined to produce a growing feeling of disillusionment.

In Slovakia, the two official parties (Democratic and Communist) associated in the National Front issued a proclamation on the 1st July, following the lines of the programme of the central Government concerning minorities and the purge of undesirable elements in the national life, and expressing complete agreement on all problems. Interesting references were to religion—"all citizens of whatever religion may have equal rights and equal status, but it is expected that churches . . . will not foster Fascist inclinations or become instruments of political agitation"—and private property—"they will protect that of peasants, workers, tradesmen, shopkeepers, craftsmen, owners of small and medium-sized enterprises, and officials."

The death of Hacha, the aged ex-President of the Protectorate, took place after an illness in Prague on the 27th June.

POLAND.

On the 27th June, five days after the agreement between the three Polish groups in Moscow, reported in the last Summary, the delegates had all reached Warsaw, and the complete list of the "new" Provisional Government was announced on the following day. It consisted of six members each of the Peasant, Socialist and Workers' parties, with one of the Democratic party and two "non-party" men. M. Thugutt has declined the invitation to join the Government; it is to be expected that a substitute will be found in his (i.e., the Peasant) party.

On the 26th June, before leaving Moscow, M. Mikolajczyk said at a press conference: "The present agreement ensures the opportunity for millions of Poles to return home and participate in building up their country." On the same occasion M. Gomulka, one of the Vice-Premiers, said the new Government would rely for support on four main parties, i.e., the Peasants, Workers and Socialists and the Democratic party. There was, he added, a plan for the Democratic party to reach agreement with the "Labour" party; M. Mikolajczyk added that the "Labour" party in London had resolved to support him in helping to form the new Government. Its chairman, M. Popiel, a former member of the Sikorski and Mikolajczyk Governments, is expected to go to Warsaw from London this week. Professor S. Grabski, a former National Democrat, who was Minister of Education in the early twenties, and acted as President of the Polish National Council in London until M. Mikolajczyk's resignation, flew on the 30th June to Warsaw, where he is now a member of the "Presidium" of the National Homeland Council. M. Wojcicki, the former secretary of the National Council in London, accompanied him.

Professor Grabski and M. Mikolajczyk and M. Stanczyk addressed an open-air meeting in the Theatre Square in Warsaw on the 1st July. "We have," said M. Mikolajczyk, "proclaimed our loyal collaboration within the ranks of the Government of National Unity. . . . I believe that, through this collaboration, we shall be able to get back to Poland the largest possible number of Poles abroad. For I want to tell you that there is not a single Polish soldier in Western Europe who, whatever his ideas while the fighting lasted, would not to-day deserve, when his moral fibre is being undermined, to return to you, to his family, to his children, to his nearest and dearest to join with you in working for a better future."

Professor Kot, who was M. Mikolajczyk's Minister of Information, has an article in Jutro Polski of the 1st July welcoming the new Provisional Government. Writing as a leader of the Peasant Party, he says: "Whatever may be our opinions as to what is lacking in the Moscow agreement, we declare publicly and solemnly that we regard it as the salvation of Poland. . . . We recognise the Government authorities which have thus been created in Poland as legal and national, and we shall demand of every Pole that he fulfil his duties as a citizen towards them."

The London Polish Government handed a statement to all the Governments of the United Nations except the U.S.S.R. on the 26th June, declaring that "the so-called Polish Provisional Government of National Unity is illegal," that the Poles called to Moscow for consultations "had no right to speak on behalf of the Polish people"; and that the London Government "will hand over its authority solely to a Government formed on free Polish soil which reflects the will of the people as expressed in free elections." On the 29th June President Raczkiewicz issued an address to the Polish nation, in the course of which he said: "The laws of the Republic have laid on me the duty, when peace has been concluded, of handing over the office of President of the Republic to the successor who shall be chosen by the Nation in democratic elections free of all constraint and menace. I shall so act as soon as the Nation is in a position to carry out such elections."

The Polish Military Headquarters in London have made a declaration, published in the press on the 2nd July, stating that the position of the Polish forces in Western Europe, "which total roughly a quarter of a million men and women, remains unchanged. . . . There is no question of troops not getting their pay."

It was announced in the Paris press on the 30th June that the French Government had recognised the new Provisional Government, and it is reported that M. Garreau, who is already in Warsaw, will be the new French Ambassador. It is reported that the Swedish Government has also accorded recognition and will give M. Eng, who is in Warsaw for negotiations concerning coal, the status of diplomatic representative there.

SOVIET UNION.

On the 26th June Marshal Stalin was awarded (for the second time) the Order of Victory "for exceptional services in the organisation of all armed forces of the Soviet Union and for skilful leadership of these forces in the great Fatherland war, which ended in complete victory over Hitlerite Germany." On the same day the title of Hero of the Soviet Union was conferred on him, together with the Order of Lenin and the Gold Star Medal. On the following day "the highest military rank of Generalissimo of the Soviet Union" was also conferred upon "the Supreme Commander-in-chief of all armed forces of the U.S.S.R., Josef Vissarionovich Stalin." This rank had been established by a decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet on the 26th June. The honour was particularly fitting in that the only holder of this title before Generalissimo Stalin was Suvorov, the great Russian Commander in the French Revolutionary wars.

The incorporation of Carpatho–Ukraine in the Ukrainian S.S.R., which, from various indications had appeared probable since the beginning of this year (see Summary No. 267), was finally settled in a Treaty between the U.S.S.R. and Czechoslovakia, signed in Moscow on the 29th June. The Treaty provided that Carpatho–Ukraine, "on the basis of friendly agreement of both the High Contracting Parties" should be "reunited in accordance with the desire manifested by its population . . . . with its ancient mother country the Ukraine" and included in the Ukrainian Soviet Republic. The Treaty had appended an important Protocol, which provided for a reciprocal right of option of citizenship. Up to the 1st January, 1946, persons of Ukrainian or Russian nationality residing on Czechoslovak territory (in districts of Slovakia) could opt for Soviet citizenship, and persons of Slovak or Czech nationality having permanent residence in Carpatho–Ukraine could opt for Czechoslovak citizenship. The option would only become valid with the consent of the Soviet or Czech authorities in each case. Optants were to be allowed to take with them all their movable property, free of duty, and would receive compensation for their real property. Czechs and Slovaks, who were compelled to leave Carpatho–Ukraine owing to enemy occupation, would also receive compensation. A Demarcation Commission was to be appointed to draw up the frontier line on the spot and a Commission for Liquidation to deal with the legal and financial questions arising from citizenship options. The Treaty was signed on behalf of the U.S.S.R. by M. Molotov in the presence of Generalissimo Stalin, and by MM. Fierlinger and Clementis on behalf of Czechoslovakia. M. Fierlinger, in his speech after the signing, maintained that the Treaty was proof of the fact that "given correct mutual understanding of just interests, there could be no issues between two countries which could not be settled in a friendly spirit and in mutual confidence." He referred to Carpatho–Ukraine as having been "temporarily wrested from her ancient mother country the Ukraine" when it became part of the Czechoslovak Republic in 1919, and said that the majority of the Czechs and Slovaks had regarded their possession of the area as "a temporary trusteeship." M. Molotov, in his speech, indulged in a diatribe against the Hungarian oppressors who had torn Carpatho-Ukraine away from its mother country at the end of the 9th century and had been trying in vain to suppress its national culture ever since. The new Treaty he regarded as a gesture from the President and Government of the Czechoslovak Republic towards meeting the desire of the inhabitants of Carpatho–Ukraine for union with their brothers, which had been manifested at the First Congress of People's Committees held in Mukacevo on the 26th November, 1944. The present Treaty was of great significance as uniting, for the first time in history, all the Ukrainian peoples in a single State.

The history of the connexion of the territory with the Ukraine would appear to be that after the Hungarian conquest at the end of the 9th century it was more or less permanently cut off politically from the rest of the Ukrainian family with the exception of some episodes at the time of the Galician–Volhynian Princedom in the 13th and 14th centuries. Some cultural contacts there had always been, and when Galicia also became part of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy relations became closer. With the break-up of the Monarchy these contacts bore fruit and on the 18th October, 1918, Carpatho–Ukraine declared itself part of the short-lived West Ukrainian Democratic Republic, which in January 1919 proclaimed its union with the Great Ukraine. There seems to have been a strong pro-Russian rather than pro-Ukrainian feeling in the territory, whose dialect is very close to Russian; in any case there is evidence both from the territory itself and from Carpatho–Ukrainian organisations in America of a genuine desire among a considerable section of the population to join the U.S.S.R.

There has been no reference in the Soviet press or wireless to the demands which it is understood have been submitted by the Soviet Government to Turkey (see under "Turkey"). On the other hand, the Soviet war of nerves and the sustained press hostility to Turkey continue. Some exceptionally bitter jibes at Turkey and "the notorious Turkish journalist Yalchin," "this filthy specimen of humanity," appeared in the Soviet press last week. A Moscow broadcast in Turkish alleged that although Yalchin never made a literary name for himself, he used his pen with great success "not only for Turkish money but also for British pounds." Yalchin was attacked as the leader of the anti-Soviet, pro-Fascist group in Turkey and the spokesman of all the Hitlerite remnants in Greece and Turkey. Soviet amour propre has obviously been offended by what is described as Yalchin's "distrust of Soviet Russia" "ignorance of Russia's love of peace and recognition of small nations' rights and independence" and avowed "suspicion of political motives behind the Russian Orthodox Patriarch's visit to the Near East."

The Council of the Armenian Church, convoked to elect a Catholicos of all the Armenians and to adopt a constitution of the Armenian Church, opened in the Echmiadzin Theological Academy (near Erivan) on the 16th June. Delegations from bishoprics of the Armenian Church in the Soviet Union, Syria, the Lebanon, Jerusalem, France, Great Britain, Bulgaria, the United States, Turkey (headed by the Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople) and from all the other Armenian communities throughout the world were present with the exception of those in South America, whose transport was delayed. The Deputy Catholicos, Archbishop Gevork Cheorekchian, was elected Catholicos by 110 out of 111 votes cast and assumed the name of Gevork VI. The ceremony was attended by M. Polyansky, Chairman of the Council for matters connected with religious denominations, representing the Soviet Government, and by M. Ovanesyan, People's Commissar of the Armenian S.S.R. for the Armenian Church. The Soviet delegation was stated to include collective farmers, scientists, engineers, and various State employees; no names of ecclesiastics appeared in the list. Of the foreign delegates some were laymen, including business men and manufacturers, and most were visiting Soviet Armenia for the first time. Interviewed after his election the new Patriarch dwelt on the necessity to reunite the Armenian people now scattered over four continents in the Armenian State and on the Armenian Church Constitution now being drafted with the object of uniting more closely the congregations of the Armenian Church throughout the world. Questioned about the part which the Armenian Church would play in helping to organise a durable peace, the Catholicos paid tribute to the active participation of most Christian Churches, "the Russian Orthodox, Anglican and Armenian, particularly, in the common struggle." "One Christian Church," he concluded, "did not join our common blessed cause, and what is more it supported the Nazi enemies of the Lord." The Dean of Canterbury, Dr. Hewlett Johnson, who was present at the enthronement ceremony, allowed himself to be the mouthpiece for the first statement on Soviet soil regarding the delicate question of the return to Armenia of the regions annexed by Turkey in 1920. At a Press Conference in Erivan he is reported to have stated: "The declaration of the National Council of the Armenians of America is perfectly right and justified . . . . the victorious Powers after the First World War said that justice demanded the restoration of these regions to their rightful owners." What the Dean did not mention (and perhaps did not know) was that the Kars-Ardagan territory ceded to Turkey by the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk was placed under Armenian control in 1919 by the British Military Occupation Authorities in Trans-Caucasia but was retroceded to Turkey by the Armenian Soviet Republic in October 1921 by the Treaty of Kars endorsing the agreement reached between Moscow and Mustapha Kemel in March of the same year.

An impressive group of Soviet and foreign diplomats and officials met Mr. T. V. Soong on his arrival at Moscow airport on the 30th June. His speech there was reported verbatim, without comment, by Moscow wireless. On the same day, Mr. Soong was received by Generalissimo Stalin, M. Molotov and the Soviet Ambassador to China also being present at this interview. Dr. Soong attended a performance of the "Nut-Cracker Suite" at the "Bolshoy Theatre" the following night accompanied by M. Molotov and his wife, and a group of high-ranking Soviet officials including MM. Vyshinsky and Lozovsky and the Deputy People's Commissar for Foreign Trade, M. Kaganovich. The party was loudly cheered by the audience. Soviet press criticism of China and Chinese affairs seems to have abated. (See also under "Far East.")

Leading articles in Izvestiya and Pravda on the 22nd June warmly welcomed the signing of the United Nations' Charter. Izvestiya observed that the final solution was perhaps not ideal but the best possible, and a great improvement on the League of Nations. "The feeling of their responsibility before the nations of the world helped to strengthen the unanimity of the Great Powers, and this unanimity is the main principle and the main guarantee of the competence of the new organisation." The powers conferred upon the Big Five "are least of all privileges and most of all obligations." Both Izvestiya and Pravda emphasised the readiness of the U.S.S.R. to stand by the cause of peace and security.

SCANDINAVIA.

The agitation on the subject of Finnish "war criminals," which has for some time been carried on in the organs of the Left, seems now to be coming to a head. On the 29th June, Mme. Hertta Kuusinen, chairman of the Democratic League, handed in an interpellation to the speaker of the Diet, signed by herself, twelve other members of the League, three Social Democrats and ten members of the Swedish party. It was later announced that fifty-five members of the Diet had signed the interpellation. This document complains that Fascists and pro-Germans still occupy leading posts in public and private service, and asks for a political purge; in particular it contemplates the extension of the term "war guilt" to include the question of entering into the war on the side of Germany, which, as will be remembered, was definitely excluded in the opinion obtained by M. Paasikivi from the leading Finnish jurist, ex-President Ståhlberg, in January. The ground for this view was that the declaration and prosecution of war are definitely authorised by the Finnish Constitution. It is expected that a debate in full session will now take place in the Diet before its adjournment on the 6th July. There is reason to believe that the demand for a more vigorous prosecution of "war criminals" has the support and encouragement of the Soviet authorities.

On the 29th June it was publicly announced that both M. Ryti and M. Rangell had at last resigned from the Board of the Bank of Finland.

The demolition of fortifications on the Aaland Islands is nearly completed, with a view to the demilitarisation of these islands.

M. Hansson, the Swedish Prime Minister, has now announced that the present Coalition Government will resign at the end of July. In the official communiqué it is explained that the Coalition was formed to deal with the war situation and that, in the opinion of the party leaders, grounds no longer exist for its continuance. M. Hansson himself is believed to have desired that it should continue. It is anticipated that the next Government will consist almost exclusively of Social Democrats.

On the 28th June, the new Norwegian Premier, M. Gerhardsen, outlined the Government programme before the Storting. As this was a programme agreed between all the political parties it was entirely non-controversial, and the Premier's statement was unanimously approved. In regard to foreign policy, the programme adheres to the lines laid down by the previous government and advocates an active part in the efforts of the United Nations to safeguard and defend peace.

The proposal of the juridical committee to retain the death sentence in Norway was passed by the Odelsting on the 30th June, and will no doubt be approved by the whole Storting.

The 30th June was made the occasion of special celebrations in honour of the Allies in Norway. Contingents, each of 500 men, representing the British, American and Russian forces, paraded and marched through Oslo, which was decorated with expressions of gratitude in various languages. They were then addressed by King Haakon, who declared that close and sincere co-operation with the Great Allied Powers was a main objective of the Norwegian Government. The celebrations continued throughout the day, and further speeches were made by M. Trygve Lie, Admiral Cornelius, General Riiser-Larsen and others. Air-Marshal Harris, General Omar Bradley and Marshal Falaleev arrived in Norway to represent the respective armed forces of their three countries. There were celebrations in many other parts of the country as well as the capital.

The inaugural meeting of a Norwegian Soviet Society was held on the 29th June. The meeting was attended by Prime Minister Gerhardsen.

A correspondent of N.T.B. at Arjeplog in Sweden, east of Mo in Rana, reports that refugees are still arriving who have escaped from German camps in that region of Norway. They allege that the Germans are still arrogant and that executions are still taking place in the camps. They state that conditions must remain intolerable so long as the Germans are still armed and in charge of the camps.

The Danes, and their Government, seem in danger of incurring some criticism, even in their own country, on the ground that they seem too exclusively preoccupied with a narrow self-satisfaction. In an outspoken article early in June M. Terkelsen, the well-known journalist, alleges that Denmark is in danger of losing much of the goodwill which it acquired with the Allies during the occupation, and in a later article he claims that, in all the controversy aroused by this pronouncement, this assertion stands uncontradicted. The activities of former Freedom Fighters in preferring charges without adequate grounds, and the lack of political capacity displayed by leading figures of the Resistance movement who have been included in the Government, are further subjects of criticism which have been raised in more than one quarter. On the other hand, there have also been criticisms from the Resistance movement of the slowness with which the purge is proceeding. The Government, however, continues to maintain a united front and appears to command general confidence.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

The reception of the new Dutch Cabinet in the Dutch press has been favourable, if reserved. The principal criticism is that its members may have insufficient political experience. Generally, the magnitude of the new Cabinet's task is fully realised, and it is felt that it must be judged only on its achievements.

The Queen and Professor Schermerhorn broadcast to the nation on the 27th June. The Queen, introducing the new Government, stressed the immediate necessity for action. "The future demands a democratic policy carried out with determination." The Prime Minister, in a sixty-minute speech, outlined the programme of his national Cabinet. Its two primary tasks were, he said, the reconstruction of Holland itself, and the prosecution of the war against Japan and the liberation of Indonesia. Other important points in the programme included statements that the annexation of certain territories from Germany was favoured, but must be fully discussed later, that the States General, the Provincial States and the Municipal Councils will be re-established as soon as is expedient, and that investigations into the desirability of State control in such institutions as the mines will be made. The Prime Minister stressed that only by the co-operative efforts of the whole nation could Holland's immense problems be overcome.

The Belgian crisis continues with another week of visits to Salzburg, mainly of Party leaders in the Senate and Chamber, of leading jurists, and of the ex-Ministers, Deveze, van Zeeland, and Pholien. General Ganshof van der Meersch appears to have been unable to form a Government. Apart from a short-lived miners' strike at Charleroi and a number of meetings calling for abdication and resolving to strike if the King returns, the country as a whole remains quiet. The Catholic Right-wing and Flemish opinion alone continue to support, although with certain evident misgivings, the return of the King.

On the 22nd June, the King made a statement to the President of the Chamber M. van Cauwelaert, and to the President of the Senate, M. Gillon. He said that, since his health was now sufficiently restored, his first concern was to resume contact with Parliament. He acknowledged the greetings of the Senate and Chamber. He affirmed that his actions during and after the German aggression in 1940 were performed in good faith for the salvation of the country and that his differences with his Ministers were differences of opinion and not of common feeling. He congratulated the Presidents of the Chambers on the re-establishment of Belgian institutions and constitutional liberties.

The publication of this message did not have the pacifying effect that was evidently intended, and only the Right Wing and Catholic and Flemish press accepted it as a basis for further discussion. The Liberal and Socialist parties both passed resolutions condemning the statement and demanding abdication on the grounds that the message was "tardy and of doubtful sincerity," that in itself it was an unconstitutional act, since it was not countersigned by a responsible Minister, and that it confirmed the accusations already made against the King, on account of his conduct in 1940, that his conception of power was personal and unconstitutional.

In the meantime further compromising stories of the relations of the King and his entourage with the Nazis continue to be published, the main theme still being the evidence for the King's intention to have Belgium included in the New Order. Publicity and criticism are also given to the apologia of his friend and political adviser, the former leader of the Socialist party, M. de Man, published from his exile in Switzerland.

It is possible that the King intends to postpone the final decision until after the Belgian election, which, if it is to be based on the new register, cannot take place for many months. To continue the present tension and political unrest is obviously not in the interests of the country as a whole, and there are already signs of general impatience. Moreover, such a situation inevitably redoubles the many difficulties of the present Government. If this deferment is the King's intention, it is probable that M. van Acker will be compelled to try to force a decision in the next few days. (See also under "Spain.")

FRANCE.

General de Gaulle has made a brief tour of Central France accompanied by the Sultan of Morocco.

According to an inspired press comment on the meeting of the Council of Ministers held on the 29th June the French Government will submit to the Allies a plan for military organisation in Germany. The French view is that the concentration of military Government in Berlin would lack flexibility and place dangerous emphasis on Germany's political unity. A Secretariat-General for German Affairs is to be set up in Paris attached to the Presidency of the Council.

In home affairs political interest is still centred on the constitutional question (see Summary No. 297). General de Gaulle, who has held a series of consultations with leaders of all shades of opinion, has promised to announce the Government's proposals before the 14th July. He is now believed to have decided in favour of a temporary return to the Constitution of 1875, with the election of two Chambers. Although all the main parties except the Radicals and the Right have publicly declared their support for a single Constituent Assembly, there are signs that opposition to the scheme supposed to be favoured by the General is weakening.

It was announced on the 26th June that M. Eugène Thomas, Deputy for the Nord, and recently returned from Buchenwald, will replace M. Augustin Laurent, who has had to resign for reasons of health, as Minister of Posts and Telegraphs. Since both are Socialists the party balance in the Government is not affected.

The divergent efforts of the Mouvement de Libération Nationale and of the Front National to unite the Resistance movement under Socialist and Communist ægis respectively (see Summary No. 298), have resulted in the formation of the Union Démocratique et Socialiste de la Résistance, to which the movements M.L.N., Libération-Nord, Organisation Civile et Militaire and Libérer et Fédérer have now adhered, and of the Comité d'Initiative du Mouvement Unifié de la Renaissance, sponsored by the Front National.

The 10th Communist Party Congress, the first to be held since 1937 and the first in which Communist Ministers have sat on the platform, took part in Paris from the 26th to 30th June. M. Thorez, in a speech which lasted five hours, claimed that the party now had over 900,000 members. He defined the party's attitude in the fields of foreign affairs, economic policy and political organisation, hoped for the continued maintenance in power of a Government of national unity and said that the party would accept "the obligations of national unity." The three main aims should be a speed-up in national reconstruction and production; the election of a sovereign Constituent Assembly; and the formation with the Socialists of a single French Workers' party. This last point was the subject of the speech by M. Duclos, who put forward proposals, unanimously adopted by the Congress, for submission to the Socialist Party Executive. The latter is referring them to the Socialist Party Congress to be held in August.

M. Pleven, in a broadcast speech of the 26th June announced the success of the banknote exchange operation (see Summary No. 296). About 50 milliard francs, over 10 per cent. of the circulation, had accrued to the Treasury, and through a great increase in the sums deposited in banks and savings banks the note circulation had fallen to less than 400 milliard francs against 586 milliards on the 17th May and 650 milliards before the issue of the Liberation loan. The operation had also provided essential information for the census of wealth on which the new capital levy, adopted by the Cabinet on the 29th June, will be based.

M. Tixier, the Minister of the Interior, broadcast from Algiers on the 29th June after his brief tour of enquiry into the disorders which occurred in the Constantine region early in May (see Summary No. 293). He admitted that the incidents had been serious. The area affected corresponded to about three French Departments and had a population of about 1 million French Moslems, but not more than 50,000 were involved in the disorders. Most of the leaders and chief participants belonged to the movement of the Amis du Manifeste and to local sections of the illegal Parti Populaire Algérien and it was evident, he said, that their attacks had been systematically aimed at the French authorities. Eighty-eight people had been killed and fifty wounded. With the aid of the military order had rapidly been re-established and the victims of "unavoidable repressive measures" were far fewer than had been suggested by certain foreign reports. The civil authorities put the total number of Moslem victims at between 1,200 and 1,500 and the military authorities had counted about 500 dead in their sectors. 2,400 people had been arrested: some of them had already been released; by the 26th June 231 sentences, including 28 death sentences, had been passed. The Minister assured his hearers that French policy remained unchanged; the Government were absolutely determined to maintain French sovereignty in Algeria and to protect all French settlers; at the same time they were fully resolved to carry out the ordinance of the 7th March, 1944, to extend French citizenship to the categories of Moslems mentioned in the ordinance, and to introduce all the political measures which it proposed. The plans for economic and social reforms approved in October 1944 would also be pursued. The fulfilment of the Government's policy would, however, necessitate far-reaching administrative reforms.

Joseph Darnand, the notorious chief of the Vichy Militia, is reported to have been arrested in N. Italy near the Swiss frontier. Georges Claude, the well-known physicist, has been sentenced to life imprisonment. (See also "Poland," "Middle East" and "Far East.")

SWITZERLAND.

In spite of the statement made by M. Petitpierre concerning the treatment of Russian internees in Switzerland (see Summary No. 299), fresh criticisms appeared on the 24th June in Pravda, which incidentally considered M. Petitpierre's rebuttal of the Soviet accusations "arrogant." On the 26th, however, it was stated in a Moscow broadcast that the Soviet Government had agreed to Swiss suggestions that a Commission, including Russian representatives, should investigate the conditions under which the Russian internees were living. The Soviet Government, through its Ambassador in France, had asked the French Government to inform the Swiss authorities of its agreement.

Discussions were held at Berne between the Federal authorities and Allied military representatives concerning the repatriation of Allied subjects who had escaped to Switzerland, but who, because of transport difficulties, had been unable to return home. It dealt also with the transit through Switzerland of freed Allied prisoners of war and civilian internees.

It is announced that, from the middle of July, American soldiers will visit Switzerland for a week's leave. According to some reports, about 250,000 will have visited the country by next spring.

According to a Red Cross announcement, the repatriation of Italian refugees interned in Switzerland began on the 28th June. The total number to be dealt with is around 40,000.

On the 28th June, twenty-eight lorries with trailers left Basle for Norway, carrying food, medicaments and shoes. They are accompanied by a delegate of the Swiss Relief Fund, and will travel via Magdeburg, Hamburg, Flensburg and Sweden. The transport was made possible by the co-operation of the Allied militiary authorities.

The new Chinese Minister to Switzerland—Mr. Lone Liang—presented his credentials to the President, Herr von Steiger, on the 26th June.

The Federal Council has decided to reopen the Swiss Consulate in Amsterdam.

SPAIN.

The Official Gazette of the 29th June published a decree of the Ministry of Justice abolishing the special tribunal for political offences, which was the instrument of the iniquitous Law of Political Responsibilities abrogated with due solemnity last April (see Summary No. 290). As was explained at the time, the Tribunal is being replaced by a Commission of "politically reliable" citizens, whose task will be to deal with outstanding cases and to keep a watch on political prisoners already liberated. The Tribunal for the Suppression of Freemasonry and Communism presumably lingers on.

This is welcome evidence that, on paper at any rate, the Franco régime is continuing along the road of respectability. And now the text of the much-vaunted Bill of Rights (see Summaries Nos. 289 and 290) is available. It is a document of some importance which compares favourably with its analogues in other Western European countries, inasmuch as it combines with the customary definition of the rights and duties of the individual a clear statement of the corresponding obligations of the State—and, what is more, constitutes an up-to-date charter of social security commitments.

The Preamble lays down the "guiding principle" of respect for the dignity, integrity and liberty of man. Article 6 declares that the State will protect "the profession and practice of the Catholic religion" and that "nobody will be persecuted for his religious beliefs, but external ceremonies or manifestations other than those of the State religion will not be permitted." The Constitution of 1876 said much the same thing. If the experience of Protestant Communities under the Restoration, however, is any guide, this rules out effectually any cult but the Roman Catholic: in present circumstances interpretation of such a precept is scarcely likely to be liberal. Article 10 provides for "the right of Spaniards to take part in public functions of a representative character, through the family, the municipality and the syndicate": that is the nearest Franco's "organic democracy" will ever get to representative Government. Freedom of expression is proclaimed in Article 12—subject to the caveat that the fundamental principles of the State may not be attacked—and laws for the regulation of the exercise of this right are promised. Finally, Article 19 furnishes the "habeas corpus" guarantee, stipulating that within three days every detained person will be set at liberty or handed over to the competent judicial authority. It need hardly be said that provision is made (Article 35) for suspension of all or part of these rights by decree-law in an emergency.

The Cortes, which meets in the middle of this month, will doubtless give its approval to the Bill; but, unless the Falange be first suppressed, there is not a hope of the "fuero" being put effectively into force. Most Spaniards, at any rate, will remain highly sceptical of the present Government's democratic pretensions. Certainly the attitude of the Spanish press is as arrogant and disingenuous as ever. Editors are faithfully carrying out the recent directive from the Falange-controlled Vice-Secretariat of Popular Education to the effect that Germany's case should be presented in the best possible light. Hostility to the Soviet Union is still the leitmotif, and no opportunity of making mischief in the relations of the Allies is neglected. This baleful policy has at length provoked a reaction from the British and American press offices in Madrid, whose special Embassy bulletins last week carried an outspoken editorial article rebuking those Spaniards who "under the guise of 'news' are continuing abroad the work of Dr. Goebbels."

His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Madrid has been instructed to support the representations of his Belgian colleague for the expulsion to France of the Rexist leader, Léon Degrelle. The case is not identical with that of Laval, since Degrelle is not "wanted" by the authorities in France; but, of course, his removal from Spain will merely shift the responsibility for his disposal to the French, who have already Pierre Laval on their hands.

ERRATUM.

ITALY.

The British Ambassador, Sir Noel Charles, paid a visit on the 19th June to Signor Parri to congratulate him on the formation of the new Government. During this visit Signor Parri made several points, which he desired to be transmitted to His Majesty's Government. Signor Parri first said that he wished to work in complete friendship and frankness with His Majesty's Government and that he wished to express his thanks for what had already been done for his country. Signor Parri went on to stress Italy's urgent need for material help and the chief need was coal—without coal there was bound to be unemployment and consequently unrest. Sir Noel Charles urged Signor Parri to press on the development of the Sardinian coal mines because the Allies were bound to be more sympathetic to Italy's call for help if they saw that the whole nation was doing its utmost to help itself. The British Ambassador, however, again pointed out that the question of transport and supply was an extremely difficult one. Signor Parri said that he realised this but that even if Italy did her utmost, she would be unable to extricate herself from the economic crisis in which she found herself without help from the Allies. Signor Parri explained his country's intense desire to raise herself from her position of inferiority and regain, at least to some extent, her former position.

Signor Parri has delivered the signed obligations of the Italian Government regarding the Armistice and the "Institutional" question to the Chief Commissioner of the Allied Commission.

The Socialist Party paper Avanti, commenting on the new Government, says that it is in reality a Government of the C.L.N., since Signor Parri was such an important figure on the Committee and will, in consequence, be strongly anti-Fascist. Avanti is also pleased because the importance of the Constituent Assembly is emphasised. Unità, the Communist Party paper, however, takes up the cudgels on behalf of Signor Nenni and expresses regret that his candidature for the Presidency of the Council was passed over and also that the Government was not more completely reconstructed. Unità, however, expresses great satisfaction at the strength of the Socialist-Communist bond and at the consequent power both these parties will wield in the present Government. Italia Libera, the Action Party paper, rather surprisingly, reminds the nation of the excellent work done by Signor Bonomi and says that history will appreciate the work done by his Administration more than his present critics.

General de Gaulle, in an interview with a correspondent of the small Rome paper La Capitale, said that, although he was against Fascism, he was not in any way anti-Italian. The withdrawal of French troops from the Val d'Aosta was proof of his friendship. General de Gaulle expressed a wish for a close collaboration between the two countries and stressed his and the French people's love of Italy, bound by tradition and so many memories. The General finished by stating that Trieste was ethnically and historically Italian and should remain Italian. Signor Scoccimarro has been sent to Bari province to try and obtain the disarmament of certain lawless bands which have been terrorising the district. The Communist Minister of Finance has probably been sent as local Communists are behind these disorders. Police reinforcements have been despatched and order is now said to have been restored.

THE VATICAN.

A Papal Mission, under Monsignor Walter Carroll of the Secretariat of State and Father Gilligan of the American National Catholic Welfare Conference, has been sent to German concentration camps. Food, clothing and medical and ecclesiastical necessities were given by the Pope, the Bishops of North Italy, the Italian Red Cross and the Vatican-Italian agency for handling the vast American gifts to Papal charity. Monsignor Carroll reports how three main centres had been set up at Munich, Ulm and Linz. Camps near Linz still hold 200,000 persons. Special attention is paid to the growing number of those for whom political exclusiveness at home makes repatriation unwise. Amongst these Monsignor Carroll mentions the 8,000 Poles, including 450 priests, in a camp north of Munich, and many dwellers in the Balkans. The Mission has already brought to Italy all the Albanians and some of the Greeks from Dachau. Besides working on problems of repatriation, it collects news for anxious relatives. Wherever it goes, it is greeted with enthusiasm.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Hungary.

The Hungarian Communist and Socialist Press has welcomed the agreement transferring Ruthenia to the U.S.S.R. on the following grounds: (1) the extension of the U.S.S.R. across the Carpathians will strengthen "democracy" in the Danube basin; (2) the existence of a common frontier between the U.S.S.R. and Hungary will strengthen "democracy" in Hungary; (3) the decision accords with the principle of national self-determination; (4) the U.S.S.R. will treat the Magyar minority in Ruthenia better than Czechoslovakia would.

Gyöngyössy has again expressed the hope that friendship and co-operation should prevail between the Danubian peoples. Hungary's present relations were good with all her neighbours except Czechoslovakia.

The Press reports that Marshal Voroshilov has endorsed Hungary's request for the extradition of Szálasi and his leading supporters, for trial in Hungary as war criminals.

In internal politics, Miklós has surveyed the situation, emphasising that the Government is firmly democratic, but stands on the basis of private property. The vacant seats for Transdanubia in the Provisional Assembly have now been filled by 51 Smallholders, 33 Social Democrats, 33 Communists, 21 Trade Unionists, 20 National Peasants and 3 Democrats. These figures, for a very Conservative area, again grossly over-represent the Left, although slightly strengthening the proportion of the Smallholders in the Assembly. The Democrats have protested. The Assembly will probably be convoked in mid-July and it is now stated that it will have to enact the Franchise Law for the Constituent Assembly. The parties are now discussing the draft of this Bill. The franchise will be wide, but will exclude "Fascists." It is still undecided whether any parties beyond the five at present approved will be allowed to present candidates.

The Governmental Decree on the future position of the "Swabians" (German minority in Hungary) has now appeared. Traitors are to lose their property; the remainder are to be dispersed throughout Hungary. It is still hoped to arrange eventually by international agreement for the expatriation to Germany of the unpatriotic elements.

The Soviet authorities have released as from 1st July all the factories and businesses which they had requisitioned. They have also granted a further "loan" (by releasing Hungarian stocks previously requisitioned by them) of 18,000 tons of bread grains, 1,400 tons of meat and quantities of sugar, salt, barley and oil, with 250 lorries and other materials including window-glass. These stocks, destined for the population of Budapest, have already begun to arrive. They came in the nick of time as reserves were practically exhausted, and the Budapest authorities were able at once to raise the ration from the starvation level of 100 gr. bread daily to the following figures: heavy workers, 500 gr.; other manual workers, 350 gr.; other public employees, 250 gr.; children, 250 gr.; other persons 200 gr. The more favoured categories get also a small meat, sugar and salt ration. Persons able to perform useful work but not doing so get no rations.

The Budapest National Committee has sent an appeal to all other National Committees to join in an intensified struggle against reaction. If the appeal failed to produce results "they would have to resort to stronger measures."

Roumania.

The Roumanian papers announce that the Roumanian army which has been fighting on the Western Front will be brought back home by the end of the month. The army will be demobilised at the frontier and the men sent to their homes by special trains. They will thus in the shortest possible time be available for industrial and agricultural work. In conjunction with this, however, a less reassuring piece of news is that the army of Marshal Tolbukhin, numbering over 1 million men is to be quartered in Roumania on its way home. The Soviet authorities decline to make any statement as to the length of stay of this force. It is to be quartered in the principal industrial and agricultural districts of the country, and of course, the support of it is to fall on Roumania under a characteristic reading of one of the clauses of the Armistice. Many public buildings in a number of provincial towns have been cleared in order to provide billets. At the same time the Soviet Air Force has been strengthened by the despatch of planes to Roumania from Russia. The Minister for War has been sent to Moscow to request information as to Russia's ultimate intentions.

The Phœnix Oil and Transport Company propose a moratorium on the preference dividend of the Unirea Company, the principal British oil company of Roumania. The Company's installations have suffered from bombing (the whole of the offices at one refinery have been destroyed except one corner), and the reparation demands will prevent there being any great quantity of products available for export for some time to come. Meanwhile the company is getting to work as best it can. Some of the English staff have returned to Roumania. All the staff of Saxon origin, with the exception of two, have been deported. Work is held up by the shortage of transport and of tyres. The Roumanian workers had got rather out of hand, but are improving under the supervision of the British staff.

There are two characteristically Roumanian items of news. A.R.L.U.S. (the Roumanian Association for Strengthening the Bonds with the Soviet Union) was founded in November 1944. Since then it has been well boosted by the press and radio. It transpires that expenditure at the rate of £2,000 a month in English money has been made, of which no account is forthcoming. This is a mere flea-bite according to the Roumanian standard for the administration of public funds, but it is no doubt only a beginning. Given a little rope, A.R.L.U.S. will prove a worthy—or unworthy—rival of Consiliul de Patronaj. It is now reported that all officers of the Roumanian army have been instructed to become members.

The other item is the announcement of the setting up of a commission to work under the Cabinet to control the application of the Land Reform. This looks as if the Government did not feel too certain about the probable length of its tenure of office—and opportunity.

Yugoslavia.

The Belgrade press and radio have continued and intensified their attacks on Allied Military Government in Venezia Giulia. One of their accusations is that the Allies are treating the area as occupied enemy territory (which is precisely what it is). They persist in maintaining that the Slovene-Communist committees imposed during the Yugoslav occupation of the Allied zone represent the wishes of the inhabitants and even that they are the legal organs of local government. They represent the local population as being bitterly anti-Allied and as cheering Russian officers whenever seen. Radio Belgrade made the curious announcement that three tugs are being built for the Yugoslav navy at Trieste. If this is true, it is a faithful imitation of the Nazi practice of using the resources of occupied enemy territory. The report has not been confirmed from Allied sources.

The considerable and determined underground organisation left behind by the Yugoslavs brought off a strike of dockyard and tramway workers on the 25th June. This organisation is reported to extend west of the Isonzo, far into Friuli, and to be working for Communist control of the towns, with a view to a declaration of autonomy and ultimate adhesion to Yugoslavia.

The campaign of abuse of A.M.G. in Carinthia also continues. A communiqué issued by His Majesty's Embassy in Belgrade on the 21st, refuting the allegations of the persecution of Slovenes, was published in Politika on the 28th, with a reply reaffirming the allegations.

The third campaign, that about Greek persecution of Macedonian Slavs, was also intensified. Tanyug quoted Elefteria, E.A.M.'s Macedonian paper, as writing: "The present terror puts in the shade both the years of Turkish slavery and the occupation." A trustworthy report stated that the area of the hitherto alleged terror was, in fact, little disturbed, and that the area which caused anxiety was the Florina–Kastoria district. On the 27th the Belgrade press and radio began to describe the horrors of an alleged persecution in the Kastoria area.

The conversion of currencies into new Yugoslav dinars has been applied to Croatia. As elsewhere, cash is only being paid up to 5,000 new dinars (about £25). Balances are to be paid within three months, but will presumably be subject, as elsewhere, to deductions (see Summary No. 297 p. 15). This capital levy has prevented persons in Serbia from living on the sale of their furniture and effects, since they could find no buyers.

An interesting sentence is that of death passed on a professor of theology of Dubrovnik, the Rev. D. Barac, for "giving false accounts of conditions in Yugoslavia to an Allied nation." The publication of such a sentence is calculated to make it more than ever difficult for non-Yugoslavs to obtain information about Yugoslavia.

Greece.

Trades Union negotiations, which have been in progress since the Citrine Agreement of the 29th January, came to a successful conclusion on the 27th June with the signature of an agreement for the reconstitution of the Provisional Executive of the General Confederation of Labour. This agreement, which marks the completion of the work of the British T.U.C. Mission, was signed by the four Trade Union leaders Kalomiris, Makris, Stratis and Theos, and provides for the redistribution of the twenty-one seats on the Executive. Eleven seats are now allocated to the Reformists, represented by Makris, 4 to Kalomiris, 4 to the Communists, represented by Theos, and 2 to the independent Socialists under Stratis. It is intended that the new Provisional Executive shall remain in office until elections have been completed and a National Congress held. A separate Proclamation calls for the completion of Athens/Piræus elections by the 10th July, and the holding of elections in every Trades Union throughout the country between the 15th July and the 31st August. The National Congress will probably meet on the 10th September.

On the 30th June M. Varvaressos issued orders for the application of the new Economic programme in the provinces. To ensure speed and uniformity, forty local economic committees have been set up in the main provincial centres. These committees, on which U.N.R.R.A. and British representation has been requested, are composed of the local judge, chief of police, bank manager and senior educational official, and their functions include: the control of manufacture, production and distribution; the enforcement of controlled prices; assistance in tax collection; the prevention of hoarding; road maintenance and other essential public works; and the submission of reports to the capital. The first payment of tax is due by the 10th July. Prices have already fallen appreciably, but there is considerable discontent among civil servants, since the increased salary rates (see Summary No. 299) have been accompanied by drastic measures for the suspension or demotion of persons appointed during the occupation. An abortive civil service strike was staged in Athens on the 28th June.

Usually reliable sources indicate considerable difference of views among the leaders of the Communist party as to the extent of the territorial claims to be put forward under their new foreign policy (see Summary No. 298). M. Zachariadis, who is busy reasserting his position as party leader, now supports the return to Greece of Cyprus and the Dodecanese without a plebiscite, but advocates a plebiscite in Northern Epirus. He puts forward no specific claims against Bulgaria. His critics within the party, while supporting the claim to Cyprus and the Dodecanese, demand the return of Northern Epirus on similar terms and an immediate readjustment of frontiers with Bulgaria. In this they are undoubtedly more representative of popular feeling.

Bulgaria.

Communist newspaper articles and broadcasts continue steadily to give the impression that the country is still engaged in a desperate struggle against Fascism. A typical Communist election speech was made (and afterwards broadcast) on the 25th June by the Minister of the Interior, M. Anton Yugov. For the first time in history, he said, the whole of the Bulgarian people would be able to participate in the election without fear of violence or pressure. It was well known that hostile circles abroad were insinuating that the Electoral Law favoured only the Patriotic Front; but such accusations were false. Certainly, he added, the Patriotic Front would not tolerate opposition from within its own ranks; but to suggest that the Communist party had any idea of seizing power was the grossest calumny. All patriots must unite in the struggle against Fascism. Like almost every other public speaker, civil or military, in Bulgaria to-day, M. Yugov emphasised the brotherhood in arms of the Bulgar and Yugoslav peoples, their determination to live in friendship together, and the great debt which both nations owed to the mighty Soviet Union for their liberation. This country and America are, by contrast, seldom mentioned.

It is reported that the Control Commission has authorised the re-establishment of direct wireless telegraphic communication between Bulgaria and the United Kingdom.

At a recent meeting of the newly resuscitated Bulgaro-Yugoslav Chamber of Commerce a number of speakers pleaded for the speedy setting-up of a Customs Union between their two countries. References were made to the allegedly "intolerable" conditions in Greek Macedonia and Thrace.

Radio Sofia announces that the Exarch Stefan, Head of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, will henceforward be styled "Patriarch." During the past week this prelate has been on an official visit to Moscow as the guest of Alexey, Patriarch of All Russia.

Turkey.

After the denunciation of the Russo-Turkish Treaty of Friendship on the 19th March the Turkish Government took the view that as the treaty had been denounced by Russia, it devolved upon her to initiate conversations for a new one. The Soviet Government, however, manifested no impatience to do so. It was not until the 7th June that, on the Turkish initiative, an exchange of views took place between M. Molotov and the Turkish Ambassador to Moscow. At this interview certain conditions were brought forward by the Soviet Government as a pre-requisite for the conclusion of a new treaty. These conditions were later confirmed by a verbal statement by M. Vinogradoff to the Turkish Acting Foreign Minister. The conditions are said to include the retrocession of the districts of Kars and Ardahan, and an alteration in the régime of the Straits which would permit Russia to share in their defence and which amounted to a revision of the Montreux Convention. It was rumoured in Angora that tentative proposals had been made regarding the cession of Aleppo to Turkey, by way of compensation. In the meantime, Moscow Radio continued its attacks on Turkey and suggested the formation of a more democratic and more representative Government in Angora.

The Turkish Government has kept the British Government fully informed of the Russian démarche. The Turks have also suggested that M. Hasan Saka, the Turkish Foreign Minister, who is on his way home from San Francisco, should stop in London to confer with the British Government; and this has been agreed.

The Turkish public has not been officially informed of the details of the Russian proposals, nor has the press been given any indication of the Government's attitude. This reticence has been criticised in the press, which has taken up the firmest possible stand against the grant of any concessions to Russia which would involve the sovereignty, integrity or independence of Turkey. As for the Montreux Convention, the press insisted that it could only be revised by a conference of its signatories. Tanin was especially bitter: M. Yalchin declared that the seeds of a third world war had been sown, and that Turkey would be in the front line. Tan was more conciliatory. M. Sertel stated that Britain and Russia were determined to work together; but that if the danger of a conflict should arise, Turkey might play the rôle of conciliator. She should not identify herself with one Power and turn her back on the other; she should become the ally of both.

The Turkish Government had expected to receive proposals from Russia for some modification of the present régime of the Straits—though not, perhaps, for cession of bases; but the suggested retrocession of Kars and Ardahan occasioned some surprise. It was regarded as one component of the general pressure which the Russians were applying. For these districts are small and of no special strategic or economic importance particularly to a State of the size and strength of the Soviet Union. They have had a chequered career: together with the adjoining district of Batum they were annexed by Russia in 1878 after the Russo-Turkish war. In 1918, by the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, the three areas were retroceded to Turkey. Turkish troops then reoccupied them, continuing their advance until they reached the Caspian. After the armistice of Mudros the Turks withdrew from the whole area, which was taken over by British troops. They, in turn, handed the districts of Batum, Kars and Ardahan partly to Georgia and partly to the Armenian Republic of Erivan. In 1920, however, the Turks invaded the Armenian Republic, captured Kars and compelled the Republic to retrocede Kars and Ardahan once more to Turkey. In the meantime Soviet forces from the north had overrun Azerbaijan and Georgia and had encountered Turkish forces in Batum. Negotiations had, however, been going on in Moscow between the two Governments, and a treaty was signed on the 16th March, 1921, under which the three districts, except the port of Batum, were assigned to Turkey. Turkey may fairly claim, therefore, that the territory was ceded to them by treaty, freely negotiated, and not under duress.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

Count Ostrorog, the head of General Beynet's Secretariat, returned to the Levant from Paris recently, but it is not entirely clear what he has been authorised to say; whether his offers are firm ones or whether he is merely taking soundings. He did not disclose at first to Mr. Shone that he was authorised to make any proposals, and seemed to believe that it was still possible for the French to start negotiations again with the local Governments, perhaps using the Troupes Spéciales as a bargaining-counter for securing other desiderata. On the other hand, the Syrian Government received a telegram from their Minister in Paris saying that Count Ostrorog was returning at once with an offer of the transfer of half the Troupes Spéciales now and the rest as soon as the question of their arms and equipment had been decided. The Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs understood from the Lebanese representative in Paris that Count Ostrorog's instructions included "wide proposals, with the transfer of the Troupes Spéciales." Later the Lebanese Minister for Foreign Affairs said that Ostrorog had informed him that General Beynet would telegraph at once to Paris recommending the immediate transfer of the Troupes Spéciales, although he himself has explained to our Minister that the recommendation would be telegraphed "for consideration." Other points would have to be left for subsequent discussion. He spoke in addition of a guarantee to withdraw French troops simultaneously with the British forces, and of the transfer to the States of all the remaining intérêts communs as a means of improving the atmosphere.

The Lebanese and Syrians on their side desire that the French Délégation Générale should be turned into a normal diplomatic mission. To this Count Ostrorog had merely replied that he would give the matter consideration. Undoubtedly the most urgent matter for action is that of the Troupes Spéciales. If there were a pronouncement now on this subject the Syrians and Lebanese would have more faith in the French, and a détente might result which would help towards the eventual discussion of other outstanding matters. It is clear that neither Government will agree to linking the question of the Troupes Spéciales with other matters, and that there is still a danger of fresh explosions unless French proposals to the States are in fact wide, definite and expeditious, or conversations are started between the three Western Powers and the Levant Governments.

The Syrian President has expressed his gratitude to us for British intervention, and has said that he fully appreciates the difficulties arising out of the situation for us. On the other hand, he made it clear that there was no weakening of Syrian determination to maintain their position and requirements (see last week's Summary).

Owing to the increasing number of cases not yet dealt with in the Syrian Mixed Courts, the Syrian legal authorities have been considering the abolition of the Mixed Courts; but it is hoped, and we have advised, that, in making provision for the uninterrupted administration of justice, any arrangements made should be purely temporary and entirely without prejudice to some future settlement.

We are endeavouring to obtain the services of some of the United States officials in the Middle East to help in the work of M.I.R.A. in agreement with the Levant States.

In Persia the position of the Poles there is now a matter for consideration. So long as British troops are in Persia there is no danger of Poles being deported en masse against their will, but after British troops have left, the Persian Government would almost certainly not have the courage to resist a Soviet-supported demand for deportation. When a census was taken last April, by a Polish delegation under a reasonable chief, nearly all the Poles in Persia declared freely that they wished to "return to Poland," i.e., to Poland within her new frontiers, governed by an independent Government. It is too early to state their reaction to recent events, but so far as Anglo-Soviet relations are concerned, it seems desirable that the Poles should leave Persia, as they would be a potential source of friction and of incidents.

Virulent attacks on the Government and upon the majority of the members of the Persian Majlis continue to be made in the Tudeh and associated newspapers, which demand the resignation of the Government. Journals of independent views also continue to attack the Majlis majority; each side accusing the other of acting unconstitutionally and paving the way to dictatorship. Public opinion in general is still mainly preoccupied with the Persian Cabinet crisis, and shows some nervousness about the delay in the evacuation of foreign troops.

THE FAR EAST.

On the 26th June the Japanese Government admitted the loss of Okinawa in a statement which asserted that the Japanese garrison had, by its stubborn defence, inflicted "a serious moral setback" upon the Americans, and had caused great uneasiness in the United States. But an invasion of Japan would certainly be attempted," and "this sacred land" must not be left to the enemy's mercy "and never must the foreigner tread on it." Rear-Admiral Kurihara, Vice-Chief of the Press Section of Imperial Headquarters, said that the loss of Okinawa was a bitter blow, but the most important fact was that an extra three months had been gained in which full preparations to meet an invasion of Japan proper had been made. He alleged that the Americans had lost 80,000 men in the land operations and 17,000 at sea.

The Yomiuri-Hochi (26th June) said that the islands of Amami Oshima and Kikaigashima would be the next to be attacked. The paper listed the air bases on Okinawa now in American hands as being at Kita, Naka, Oroku, Ono, Konaha, Kimbu and Iyejima, and said that the Americans had some 500 aircraft there. But it declared that these airfields would not be sufficient to accommodate the air force needed to cover an invasion of Japan; moreover Okinawa possessed only three small harbours, Naha, Unten and Matai and these would not hold a great number of ships. Therefore the Americans would probably resort to "stepping-stone tactics" to secure more air bases and better harbours.

The possibility that such bases and harbours might be found on the China coast has been engaging the attention of the Japanese Press and radio. A Tokyo broadcast of the 26th June said that, if the Americans did land in China, it would be interesting to see whether they chose the Chungking-controlled or the Yenan-controlled areas. (The Chinese Communists are not established on any part of the China coast, but they have forces in the vicinity of Shanghai, and of the Shantung ports.) The Tokyo broadcast declared that Yenan stood for a united group of Chinese, whereas there was disorder and anarchy in the Chungking zone. Therefore, if the Americans landed in the latter they would have to set up a military administration in the areas they occupied, and it was implied that this would be unwelcome to Chungking.

The Asahi (28th June) said that the air raids on Japanese secondary cities were intended to reduce Japan's fighting strength and also as a nerve war to weaken Japanese morale. It added, significantly enough, that psychological warfare could cause havoc with a nation the moment it began to lose confidence in victory. Suzuki, in a broadcast of the 26th June, warned that air raids would increase in fury, and urged all Japanese to stand firm and do their utmost. The continued exhortations of this nature would suggest that Japanese civilian morale is not too good and that the authorities are nervous. The food situation in the cities has for some time been serious, partly owing to transportation difficulties which will certainly be enhanced by the air raids. Tokyo Radio (27th June) said that the Government were trying to get the evacuees on to the land and had set up a special body in the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce to handle this problem. On the 27th June three of the directors of the Dai Nippon Seijikai called on Suzuki, Abe (the Home Minister), and Ishiguro (the Minister of Agriculture) and suggested measures, including the formation of an agricultural volunteer corps, to improve the food situation. Domei (27th June) said that an increase in salt production, for both food and industrial purposes, had become urgent, and a special ministerial body, headed by Juichi Tsushima, had been established for this purpose.

The special Advisory Committee provided for in the Extraordinary War Measures Act was organised on the 29th June. It is composed of twelve members of the House of Peers and twelve from the Lower House. It held its first meeting on the 30th June, when Tsuneo Kanemitsu, Speaker of the Lower House, was elected its Chairman and Prince Ieyasu Tokugawa, President of the House of Peers, its Deputy Chairman.

The Nippon Times (26th June) said that the task of the San Francisco Conference had somehow been finished, but that the process had left the "ineffaceable impression that the United Nations are actually far from being united." It prophesied the failure of the World Organisation on the ground that there was no agreement on basic principles, but only on procedure. The Asahi (28th June) declared that the Charter was simply an Anglo-American instrument to oppress the vanquished nations, isolate the Soviet Union and prevent the independence of colonial peoples. The Yomiuri-Hochi (29th June) declared that a grim political battle would have to be fought, especially between the United States and the U.S.S.R., before a new balance of power was established. This struggle might transform or jeopardise the World Organisation.

On the 25th June in Chungking Dr. T. V. Soong was formally inducted as President of the Executive Yuan, and Dr. Wong Wen-hao as Vice-President. Dr. Hsu Taolin became Director of the Political Affairs Department of the Executive Yuan and Dr. Chiang Mon-lin its Secretary-General. On the 30th June T. V. Soong arrived in Moscow; among his entourage were Mr. Victor Hoo, the Administrative Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, Admiral Shen Hung-lieh, and Chiang Ching-kuo, the son of the Generalissimo. M. Petrov, the Russian Ambassador to China, also arrived in Moscow at the same time. On the day of their arrival T. V. Soong and Victor Hoo were received by Stalin. Molotov, Petrov, and the Chinese Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., Fu Ping-Chang, were also present. The Chungking Press has laid stress upon the great importance of T. V. Soong's mission to Moscow, and expresses hope for Sino-Soviet military co-operation against Japan, but makes no reference to the various delicate issues pending between China and the Soviet Union.

Yenan Radio (1st July) said that on the 2nd June the People's Political Council had sent a telegram to Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai, asking them to renew the conversations with the Government. They replied on the 18th June that the Government had rejected all demands for a coalition Government, but that, if the People's Political Council could get the Kuomintang authorities to reconsider their attitude, the Communists would be glad to confer with them. The Communists would also welcome the arrival in Yenan of members of the P.P.C.; six of whom left for Yenan on the 1st July. The Communists are thus standing firm on their demand for an immediate coalition Government; it remains to be seen what effect the Moscow talks will have upon this situation.

The Chinese Government on the 26th June announced that General Hsueh Yueh had been replaced as Governor of Hunan by General Wu Chi-wei. It was not stated whether Hsueh Yueh had received another appointment. His former fame as the defender of Changsha had been somewhat eclipsed by his recent defeats and he was reported to be one of the group of generals who were lending support to the demand for a coalition Government; this may have been the cause of his removal. His successor is a Kwangtung man, who was formerly deputy commander-in-chief for Upper Yangtse River Defence.

Chinese forces advancing from Kwangsi have crossed the Indo-China border, but on the 2nd July Chungking reported that Japanese reinforcements had come up and had recaptured one of the border towns. Meanwhile, the Japanese are endeavouring to win support among the native peoples of Indo-China. They announced on the 27th June that most of the functions of the Government-General, including finance, are to be shared out among the Annamese Empire, the Kingdom of Cambodia and the Kingdom of Luang Prabang. Administration in Tongking is to be handed over to Annam. The Japanese have also released 178 Annamese who had been imprisoned by the French for political activities, and have replaced Domei in Indo-China by a new agency, called Agence de la Presse de l'Indochine. Domei took over from the former French news agency, following the Japanese coup d'état of the 9th March last. Volunteer armies of natives, who the Japanese hope will co-operate with the Japanese forces there in the event of an Allied invasion, are being organised in Annam, Cambodia and Luang Prabang. Annam is now to be called Viet Nam and is to have a national flag with a yellow background and three crimson parallel stripes running horizontally, the middle one being broken in the centre.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The resignation of Mr. Stettinius as Secretary of State has occasioned no surprise. Rumours that he would resign have been circulating ever since Mr. Roosevelt's death, and have continued to gain currency, particularly on account of the question of the Presidential succession. But Mr. Stettinius's appointment as the United States member of the Security Council and Chairman of the American delegation in the General Assembly of the United Nations, when that organisation is established, has been applauded by papers of all shades of opinion. In view of his "distinguished" record at San Francisco, several papers have pointed out that he is singularly fitted for the task of promoting the Charter in the Senate. President Truman has emphasised the importance of Mr. Stettinius's new post. There is much praise of the President for his "timing" and handling of the change. Mr. Churchill has sent a message of congratulation to Mr. Stettinius recalling his great help to this country as Lend-Lease Administrator.

The nomination of Mr. James F. Byrnes as Mr. Stettinius's successor also occasioned little surprise, and has been enthusiastically welcomed by the press and endorsed unanimously by the Senate. The Washington Post and other papers are now urging Mr. Byrnes to conduct an overhaul and a radical expansion of the State Department. Mr. Byrnes, who is 66, has risen, like the President himself, from humble beginnings. He became successively a Representative and then a Senator, a Justice of the Supreme Court, and, in more recent years, Director of Economic Stabilisation and later Director of War Mobilisation, during which time he earned the popular title of "Assistant President." He has been a strong and consistent supporter of Mr. Roosevelt's foreign policy and perhaps the most influential and effective advocate of Lend-Lease. Pending further action by Congress, he now becomes not only Secretary of State, but also next in the succession to the Presidency. His wide and long experience, his popularity with Congress, and his reputation as a conciliator who never loses sight of his objectives, make his selection extremely popular with all but certain sections of the Labour movement, who regard him as too Right of centre for their liking. Mr. Byrnes will accompany Mr. Truman to Berlin. After the Yalta meeting, which he had attended, Mr. Byrnes retired a few days before the late President's death, but he immediately returned to Washington to assist his friend, the new President, and to put at his disposal his knowledge of affairs, particularly concerning decisions taken at Yalta.

The House of Representatives have passed, and sent to the Senate, the measure which would put the Speaker of the House next in line for the Presidency after the Vice-President. Before passing the Bill, the House eliminated the President's suggestion for a special election whenever there is a double vacancy in the Presidency and Vice-Presidency more than 90 days before a regular off-year Congressional election. The Bill now goes to the Senate but that body's attitude is likely to be more cautious.

The dominant topic in the United States, however, has naturally been the historic signing of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco. Broadly speaking, all sections of the press have hailed the Charter with sober satisfaction. There is general agreement that the delegates to the Conference have done a "workmanlike" job and that the Charter, although not "a final or a perfect instrument" as the President himself stated, is "a distinctly worthwhile achievement and the beginning of the road to world peace," to quote the New York Times. A large group of commentators, predominantly Liberal, have described the Economic and Social Council as itself "more than justifying the entire conference."

The Charter is seen as a combination of Wilsonian idealism and Rooseveltian realism; and the press and radio have greeted it as an improvement over Dumbarton Oaks and as evidence that the United States and Soviet Russia have abandoned isolationism. Support for the prompt ratification of the Charter is truly bi-partisan. Mr. Dewey, the titular head of the Republican Party, has called for swift ratification, expresses his belief that no reservations are necessary, and maintains that there is a clear mandate from the American people. Mr. J. F. Dulles has called the Charter "a great human document," going, he said, "far beyond expectations." High praise also has been given to Senator Vandenberg's "masterful" speech on the World Charter, the more significant in view of his former position as a "most able isolationist." Senator Vandenberg declared that the Senate must accept the Charter or cheat the world of "its only collective chance" for peace. He himself would support the Charter "with all the resources at my command" and he predicted that "world chaos is the only alternative."

On the 28th June Senator Connally, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, addressed the Senate in favour of immediate ratification declaring that "the eyes of the entire world are centred on what we do here . . . : May the United States Senate proceed to ratification immediately"; and on Monday, the 2nd July, President Truman himself appeared before the Senate. He recalled that Congress had already approved resolutions (the Connally resolution in the Senate, and the Fulbright resolution in the House) calling for an international organisation for the maintenance of peace and security. "The choice before the Senate" declared the President, "is clear. It was a choice not between this Charter and something else but between this Charter and no Charter at all." The Charter was "the product of many hands and many influences. This is not a static treaty: it can be improved—and as the years go by it will be—just as our own Constitution has been improved . . . . This Charter points down the only road to enduring peace"; and, amid warm applause, the President urged its swift ratification.

Before going to the Senate, President Truman held a meeting with Congressional leaders. Afterwards, Senator Barkley, majority leader in the Senate, said he told the President "It's in the bag. I can't think of more than six Senators who will object to it." Hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, to which the public will be admitted, are to begin on the 9th July and are expected to last a fortnight, and a further two weeks will probably be needed to allow Senators to air their views on the floor of the House. Demands for early ratification are voiced in all quarters, and the last Gallup Poll estimates that of those expressing an opinion 90 per cent. are in favour. Even such Isolationists as Senator Burton K. Wheeler have declared they will not lead any opposition, and Mr. Ernest Lindley, who is usually well informed, expresses the view that " ratification is as nearly certain as anything can be in the world of politics." The general view is that " the United States, having taken the lead in promoting the League, now should set an example for the rest of the nations by ratifying the Charter without delay."

It is reported that in Washington Mr. Gromyko, the Soviet Ambassador, told the press that it would be a good idea if the United States and Soviet Russia ratified the Charter at the same time.

The House of Representatives passed by 255 to 96 votes the Bill to extend stabilisation and price controls for a further year under the Office of Price Administration (O.P.A.). Mr. Truman has signed this Bill and has drawn attention to the fact that it has now been passed " without being weakened by amendments. This gave the country " re-assurance that the fight against inflation will be carried on during the difficult years that lie ahead. We will have need for stabilisation not only in fighting the war but also in solving the problems of reconversion, which are already confronting us."

LATIN AMERICA.

The situation in Argentina is again tense. The manifestoes issued by commercial and agricultural interests against Colonel Perón have now been challenged by a series of declarations published on behalf of a considerable number of trade unions both in the capital and in the provinces. These declarations attribute purely selfish motives to the employers' manifestoes, praise the Government's social policy and particularly the work of the Secretariat of Labour, and point to the excess profits now earned by the large companies. To what extent these declarations represent any genuine opinion in favour of Colonel Perón, it is difficult to judge. It is reported on reliable authority that the Vice-President recently interviewed 70 labour leaders, mentioned that the industrialists had been asking him to " calm the workers " and adverted to the large profits that were being made by Argentine capitalists, after which his assistant warned the labour leaders of a possible general lock-out (said to have been contemplated by the employers who subscribed to the original manifesto) and suggested that they should be ready to take over their factories in case of need.

It thus appears that Colonel Perón has given up the position of " centre democracy " which he announced the intention of holding, on finding it exposed to strong cross-fire from Left and Right. The sharp-shooting of the employers has driven him to embrace the workers, and he seems to have no qualms about embroiling his countrymen in a characteristic attempt to bolster up the existing régime.

Meanwhile, he is quick to suppress opposition within the Government. Investigations of alleged corruption in the Secretariat of Industry and Commerce have led to the resignation of General Checchi, who, it is rumoured, had political ambitions of his own. Incidentally, General Checchi was in charge of meat negotiations, in which further delays now seem likely. The Government has also been doing its best to convince the public that there are no political prisoners (except such as " would be in prison in any free and civilised country for their crimes against society "), and has declared that certain prisons are open for inspection. It is further announced that control of German firms is to be tightened : the Minister for Foreign Affairs prepared a statement in which it was asserted that 124 German firms were under effective control, but the United States Ambassador pointed out that Colonel Perón had admitted that control had been ineffective. The message has now appeared with the emphasis transferred from the Government's achievements to its aspirations.

In Brazil, President Vargas has signed a drastic " anti-trust " decree which would apparently give him power to expropriate without appeal any undertaking considered to operate " harmfully to the public interest." This piece of legislation, which might serve equally to disarm opposition propaganda or to displace foreign enterprises, has raised a storm of protest, and its application is now reported to have been postponed until August.

The Ecuadorean Ministry for Foreign Affairs has announced the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. The Panamanian Constituent Assembly has unanimously recommended to the Government a similar measure and also the suspension of relations with the Government of General Franco.

GERMANY.

ALTHOUGH the joint military occupation of Berlin by British and American, as well as Russian, forces began over a week ago, difficulty in providing food and fuel for the inhabitants of their zones of the capital has delayed the application of British and American military government. At a meeting held on the 10th July, at which Marshal Zhukov met Generals Sir Ronald Weeks and Lucius Clay, representing the other two members of the Allied Control Council, Field-Marshal Montgomery and General Eisenhower, agreement was reached that supplies for Berlin should be drawn from all the three occupied zones of Germany. As a result of this agreement it may be expected that the British and American zones of Berlin will now be taken over by the occupying forces from the Russians, in whose hands it has so far remained.

The disparity between the political freedom permitted to the German people by the Russian and that permitted by the Western Allies may present a problem requiring classification before inter-Allied control of Berlin can operate smoothly. Three major political parties—the Communists, Social Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union—are already fully developed in the Russian zone, although, like all others, they have been forbidden to organise in the British and American zones. These political parties, it has now been officially suggested, might continue their activities in the British zone of the German capital until British Military Government begins to function. The future of political parties in Berlin as a whole will then become a subject for discussion by the Executive Military Council composed of the Allied commanders in the area.

Meanwhile, relatively little publicity is being given by the Russian-controlled news agencies on the spot to the presence of British, American and French troops in Berlin. In an evening news bulletin of the 6th July—two days after the formal entry of the Western Allies into the capital—the Berlin radio announced very briefly that "in accordance with the agreements between the Allies concerning the division of Berlin into a number of occupation zones, British and American troops have occupied their allotted sectors." On the following day it described the United States Independence Day celebrations and the hoisting of the British flag on the Victory Column of 1870–71, but offered no comment. The local press likewise ignored the arrival of our troops at the time, although the Berliner Zeitung and the Deutsche Volkszeitung both carried an official account of the occupation by the Red army of the areas in northern and central Germany which we had just handed over to the Russians. (See last week's Summary.)

On the 4th July, it was announced that the Russian military authorities had responded to the "request of democratic organisations and various other bodies" and set up a German provincial administration ("Provinzialverwaltung") for Brandenburg and regional administrations ("Landesverwaltungen") for Mecklenburg and Saxony. The provincial administration of Brandenburg is to have its seat at Potsdam; the regional administrations of Mecklenburg and Saxony at Schwerin and Dresden respectively. The "President" of Brandenburg is to be Dr. Steinhoff, a Social Democrat, who held a similar post in East Prussia before 1933. The heads of the Regional administrations in Mecklenburg and Saxony are likewise Social Democrats. Three of the Vice-Presidents of Brandenburg are former members of the Moscow Free German Committee, but only one is an official of the Communist Party. Commenting on the formation of these native administrations in the heart of the Russian zone, the Berlin radio on the 4th July emphasised that they were composed of representatives of all anti-Fascist groups and stated that "the formation of the provincial and regional administrations once again proves that our people have the opportunity for democratic self-administration within the framework of present conditions and the general directives and control of the occupying authorities." It added that the new bodies would have to take energetic steps to restore German economic life and, above all, to ensure the food supply. No reference has so far been made by the Russian authorities in Berlin to the setting up of similar native administrations in any German territory east of the Oder-Neisse line which, along with the port of Stettin, is at present being claimed and, it appears, organised and occupied by the Poles.

From the publicity which they have received in the past two weeks, the Social Democrats would seem to be the most active and vociferous political party in the Russian zone at the moment. Their programme is also without doubt the most radical. In a manifesto posted up on hoardings throughout Berlin, they demand the nationalisation of the banks, primary industries and public utilities, the reconstruction of economic life with the aid of trade unions and the redistribution of the big estates for the benefit of the community. It may, of course, be that the politically better tutored Communists are encouraging their Social Democratic comrades, with whom they in any case have a close working agreement, to test and prepare both German opinion and Allied Military Government for more advanced demands than they themselves have so far ventured to make. Of the 16 signatories of the Social Democratic manifesto, it has only been possible so far to identify five, and these have in the past all been so insignificant that they could stay in Germany after 1933 without serious recriminations from the Nazis. Yet they are at the moment coming more to the fore than many of the returning Communist émigrés, who since 1933 have enjoyed prominent positions in the inner councils of Moscow. Their first Social Democratic daily paper, Das Volk, appeared on the streets of Berlin on the 7th July and was given considerable advertisement by the Berlin radio. The extension of the "united front" between the Social Democrats and Communists beyond the Berlin area to outlying towns like Meissen in Saxony and Cottbus in Brandenburg was hailed with considerable satisfaction in a Berlin broadcast of the 6th July.

The possibility of Bavaria being handed over entirely to its native German government for administrative purposes, with only major problems of security being left to Allied military control, was reported on the 3rd July to have been mooted by the local United States Army Governor, who is stated to have referred to the 1st November as the date by which such a change might be expected to take place. At the same time, the German Prime Minister of Bavaria, Dr. Friedrich Schaeffer, made known his desire to reconstitute the Bavarian People's Party to "free Bavaria from Prussian influence," and restore her to the dignity of an independent State. In an earlier pronouncement, Schaeffer had declared in favour of a "Catholic Conservative" administration in his province—a régime, however, which not all Germans in the South and West would appear to relish.

Popular demonstrations are, for example, reported from Cologne in the West against the allegedly "totalitarian" rule of the Catholic Oberbürgermeister, Dr. Konrad Adenauer, who has insinuated that some of his left-wing critics are Nazis in disguise. Nevertheless, both Dr. Schaeffer and Dr. Adenauer administer territories which are 70 per cent. Catholic, and there is no reason to believe that the Catholic viewpoint has been favoured in the selection of native officials for other provinces. The German head of the new province of Starkenburg (embracing most of the former Land Hessen) is in fact the political historian, Professor Ludwig Bergstraesser, a former representative of the Democratic Party in the Reichstag, who later joined the Social Democratic Party. The Munich radio is giving strong emphasis to the principle of complete religious equality by broadcasting regular Sunday services for all denominations, including such minor (German) sects as the Methodists, Baptists and "Old Catholics"—descendants of the small body of Catholics who refused to accept the "Infallibility" Decree in 1871.

An increase in the German miners' ration from 2,800 to 3,400 calories per day was promised for the British and American zones on the 6th July. On the same day it was announced from the United States 15th Army headquarters that ordinary German civilians' rations would be increased locally from 1,150 to 1,550 calories per day (Field-Marshal Montgomery had previously suggested that a maximum of 2,000 calories would be aimed at), but it was pointed out that it would depend entirely on the German people themselves to produce the food-stuffs to maintain this increase. Several trainloads of food are reported by the Allied press to have reached Essen from Antwerp as a special reserve in case the threatened famine becomes a reality in the coming months. Food is stated to be at the moment the chief preoccupation of the population of the Ruhr, where the bread ration received by normal consumers is less than one kilog. per week, as against 1·7 kilogs. before the end of hostilities. One strike has been reported from the Ruhr as a protest by workers against what are considered insufficient rations. In some districts of the West, preparations for gathering in what may after all prove in some places to be a good harvest are stated to be nearing completion. Under the "Operation Barleycorn" more than 270,000 of the required 300,000 agricultural workers have already been demobilised from the Wehrmacht, and the further release of 12,000 per day is being aimed at. Special talks for farmers, giving advice on harvesting and emphasising their responsibility to the rest of the community, are being given from the controlled radio stations in all the Allied zones. Farmers in the Russian zone are still being assured that they can sell all the remainder of their produce on the open market once their delivery quotas have been met, and disabled ex-servicemen and smallholders over the age of 60 who do not employ other labour are not subject to compulsory deliveries in any form. Large numbers of auxiliary rural guards (Feld-Hüter und Feld-Schützen) are being recruited to assist the regular country police to protect the harvest from pilferers in some parts of the West.

An announcement by the United States Regional Military Government Office over the Stuttgart radio on the 8th July stated that the American zone of occupation in Germany had now been fixed and that Stuttgart itself had passed under American control. Simultaneously, the First French Army authorities made it known that they were moving out of the Stuttgart area. For administrative purposes, the United States announcement stated, the newly-defined American zone would be divided into two districts: the eastern district included the State of Bavaria; and the western district the northern halves of Baden and Württemberg (bounded in the south by the Landkreis boundary running just south of the Karlsruhe–Ulm Autobahn), part of Land-Hessen and Kur-Hessen. The officials appointed by the French would continue to function under the supervision of the United States Military Government.

AUSTRIA.

Field-Marshal Alexander has issued orders, on receipt of instructions from the Combined Chiefs of Staff, for British Forces to move into the British zone in Austria, all movements to be co-ordinated with the local Soviet Commander. The latter, however, has not yet received his orders from the Soviet High Command, and refuses to move his troops out of our zone until he receives them.

In Vienna, the former Mayor Karl Seitz has been appointed President of the Socialist Party Executive, with Schaerf as Vice-President. Karl Renner has been relieved of his duties as a member of the Committee for the period during which he holds office as State Chancellor. (This withdrawal is in accordance with pre-1934 practice.) A noticeable feature of the announcements of new committees and organisations in the Russian zone, is the frequency with which the same names appear. A recent example is in the revival of the "League of the Rights of Man," announced by Vienna Radio on the 5th July. Familiar names appearing were those of Böhm, Fischer, Lugmayr, Schaerf (all members of the Provisional Government), and Matejka, a Vienna Town Councillor, and like the others, a member of numerous other committees.

Raab, one of the most active members of the Provisional Government, spoke in very optimistic tones, on the 6th July, of the speedy restoration of Austria's oil production. "We shall soon be able to meet all our demands, including the needs of the occupation troops, from home production, with a surplus of diesel and fuel oil, lubricating oil, and grease available for export." Reports from other sources, however, suggest that public feeling on Austria's economic situation is not so optimistic, and that many people fear that the Russians, through the confiscation of livestock and machinery, have destroyed the economic basis of life in Austria for many years. At a meeting of the Styrian Provisional Government on the 27th May, State Secretary Waldbrunner said that the Red Army's intention was to remove from Austrian industry everything built by German capital. According to one report, the only exemptions from confiscation are bakeries, breweries, power plants, gas works and a small refinery used for refining the oil from Zisterdorf. The Russians are said to have taken all but about 50 of the 6,000 machines from the Ostmark aeroplane motor works, and to have removed all bridging equipment (this is in contradiction of favourable reports by Vienna Radio on the progress of bridge repairs). Fiala, the deputy Chairman of the Austrian Trade Union Association, endeavoured to reassure "those timid souls who ask 'what will become of us?'" and said "we shall scrape together all our tools and materials and despite all adverse circumstances produce the necessary articles for consumption and exchange." Stalin and Tolbukhin are said to have recently ordered that the Austrian Government should be informed beforehand about the confiscation of machinery. Apparently the procedure hitherto was one of dictation.

In the field of agriculture, Austria's plight seems to be no less serious. A speaker from Vienna on the 8th, appealing for neighbouring farmers to help each other, admitted that "it will be said that distress is now so general that everyone is in need of help." From Klagenfurt it is reported that heavy rain and cool weather have considerably damaged the rye, wheat and green fodder crops. The food shortage is already acute. At the end of May, normal consumers in Graz were getting approximately one-third of the daily ration being granted in Carinthia at the same time (which was roughly equivalent to that in Bavaria, and itself contained less than half the number of calories needed for normal life). One favourable aspect seems to be that the problem of displaced persons in the British and American zone has been dealt with rapidly, and large numbers have already been evacuated by the military. Large numbers of political prisoners remain in camps at Mauthausen and elsewhere, who must be fed by the authorities.

The Provisional Government in Vienna passed on the 3rd July a law which provisionally reconstitutes the National Bank of Austria. It was explained that the restoration of an Austrian Central Bank could not be postponed until the Peace Conference. The major functions of the Reichsbank, which in 1938 incorporated the Austrian Bank, are to be transferred to this provisional National Bank. It will take over Reichsbank notes in circulation which have been declared legal tender in Austria, as well as all Reichsbank assets on Austrian territory. The Provisional Government also passed a law for the control of public and private credits needed for the reconstruction of Austrian economy. For this purpose it has set up a Credit Control Commission, which is to advise the Government which enterprises should receive credits from budget funds, or loans from State, provincial or local authorities The commission will work in collaboration with private banks and other representatives of economic interest groups. It is too early to assess what the relations will be between the National Bank and the Credit Control Commission and between the National Bank and the Reichsbank regarding the disentanglement of assets and liabilities. Moreover, it is not clear how effectively the volume of notes in circulation in Austria can be controlled, and to what extent the Provisional Government can give permission for the creation of new credits.

Agreement has been reached between the Four Powers on the demarcation of the zones of occupation, both of Austria as a whole and of Vienna. Details will be supplied in next week's Summary.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The withdrawal and regrouping of Russian troops in Czechoslovakia is now in progress. The first intimation of this was given by President Beneš to General Harmon, commander of the United States zone, on the 29th June; the President suggested that a token withdrawal of some of the American forces was desirable. The Russian evacuation is to be carried out between the 5th and 15th July, on the orders of Stalin himself. It is not to be a complete withdrawal however; the remainder, apart from liaison officers in Prague, and H.Q.S. in transport centres to supervise Red Army communications, is to be concentrated along the northern frontier and the American demarcation line. It will comprise nine divisions, about 100,000 men, and will be placed, it has been hinted, largely between the Glatz salient and Karlový Vary (Karlsbad). Mr. Nichols reported from Prague on the 6th that the Czechoslovak Government had addressed a note to the United States Government requesting the withdrawal of American troops from Western Bohemia. A prior withdrawal by the Americans is desired only by the Communists and Premier Fierlinger apparently; ten higher officials of the Prague Foreign Office approached the American military attaché with the hope of preventing it. While such a step might simplify matters for the Czechoslovak Administration, it would be inconsistent with the policy of the Big Three and affect the prestige of the Western Powers, and leave the impression that the Prague Government was under pressure from Moscow. The views of His Majesty's Government have been communicated to Washington. It is understood that the United States Government, while ready to agree to a progressive reduction of their forces are not prepared to withdraw completely before the Russians do likewise.

In a note addressed to the British, American and Soviet Governments the Czechoslovak Government has clarified its attitude towards the German and Hungarian minorities. The note accepted the reaction of the Allies to the previous Czechoslovak memoranda, that the expulsion of the 2–2½ million Germans and 400,000 Hungarians must be carried out in agreement with the appropriate Allied bodies and according to an organised plan. Plans for transfer are being worked out in Prague. The number of Germans to be transferred, and the timings, are to be arranged with the Great Powers exercising control over the respective zones of Germany. The technical execution of the transfer is to be achieved by Czechoslovak co-ordinating missions attached to the headquarters of each particular zone. As regards the 400,000 Hungarians, the note refers to negotiations with the Allied Control Commission in Budapest on the basis of an exchange of population, as "345,000 Slovaks living in Hungary wish to go to Slovakia." This figure agrees in no way with the 104,819 Slovaks in the Hungarian census of 1930.

According to M. Fierlinger, Moscow would give its support to a plan of organised transfer which includes the movement from Southern Bohemia and Moravia of Germans of Austrian origin still possessing close family ties, and of Czechs and Slovaks from Vienna.

Further light has been thrown upon the cession of Carpatho-Ukraine in recent conversations between Mr. Nichols and the Czechoslovak Premier and Foreign Under-Secretary. In correspondence between Stalin and Beneš in January, any Soviet intention to undermine Czechoslovak integrity was disclaimed. It was agreed that the President should sound public opinion when he returned to Czechoslovakia. It is said that he found little interest in the matter, a state of mind applicable to the ordinary Czechoslovak citizen in Great Britain as well. American estimates of opinion among Ruthenians in the United States place a desire for union with the Soviet Ukraine as very widely felt.

In addition to the protocol, Molotov has addressed two letters to Fierlinger, the first concerned with the proportion of external debt to be taken over by the U.S.S.R., the second with the cession of Čop railway junction to the Soviet Ukraine, while leaving facilities for the use of the railway by Slovakia. At Čop, on the south-eastern corner of Slovakia, railways joining Poland with Hungary cross the main east–west trunk route.

Opinion in Czechoslovakia suggests that the speedy recovery of manufacturing industries will be assured if the Government plans for importing raw materials can be realised. As a result of the recent Moscow talks, Russia is to supply iron ore, cotton and naphtha; from Roumania and Bulgaria Czechoslovakia hopes to obtain by direct negotiation maize, wheat, oil, oil-seeds and tobacco. Dr. Ripka, Minister for Foreign Trade, is preparing to open trade missions in Moscow, London and Washington. According to the United States Commercial Attaché in Prague, the considerable Czechoslovak textile industry has suffered very little war damage, and could within a short time work at 90 per cent. of its pre-war capacity. The Škoda works has very large stocks of armaments, and at present can produce about 25 per cent. of its normal output; most of the bomb-damage, it is hoped, will be restored within six months—a matter of great interest to China, which has received considerable supplies of armaments from Škoda in the past. The coal shortage is, however, a serious economic handicap.

POLAND.

British and United States recognition of the new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity was announced early on the 6th July. In informing M. Osobka-Morawski of this step the British Government recalled that the Crimea decisions on Poland (which the new Polish Provisional Government had stated they "recognised in their entirety") included a provision that the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity shall be pledged to the "holding of free and unfettered elections as soon as possible on the basis of universal suffrage and secret ballot, in which all democratic and anti-Nazi parties shall have the right to take part and put forward candidates." M. Bierut has stated to Reuter's correspondent, two or three days earlier, that "The Polish democratic camp has been consistent in calling for elections to the Sejm as soon as conditions are ripe. The National Unity Government entirely confirms this attitude, which coincides with the Crimea decisions on the Polish question. The election date depends on when the bulk of repatriates return home and will be determined by our Provisional Parliament, the National Homeland Council." It is of interest, in this connection that, according to a Polpress statement, the Partja Pracy (Christian Democratic Labour Party) is to be recognised and take part in the Provisional Government in conjunction with the Democratic Party. It is the Partja Pracy to which General Sikorski belonged. (M. Popiel, former member of the Mikolajczyk Cabinet and leader of this party, is now in Warsaw.)

Governments which have recognised the Provisional Government to date, besides Great Britain and the United States of America, are: the U.S.S.R., France, China, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Canada, Norway, Sweden and Denmark.

Simultaneously with British recognition of the new Provisional Government, the Foreign Office announced that the liquidation of the machinery in this country of the London Polish Government had been placed under the supervision of an Interim Treasury Committee for Polish Questions. Some services, including the London Polish Ministries of Information and Foreign Affairs, and the Polish Government broadcasts have been, or are being, wound up immediately. Others, including those concerned with Polish hospitals and students and with the assistance of refugees, will be carried on, for the present, under the direction of the committee. Both the civil service expenditure and that of the Polish armed forces under British command have been met out of British funds, and there is thus no question of a very large amount of Polish Government property in this country, apart from the Polish merchant marine. All relevant matters, in any case, including the vital questions relating to the continued existence of the Polish armed forces, the transfer of archives and the return to Poland of all those who wish to go back, will be discussed with qualified representatives of the Provisional Government. A "Commission" appointed by the Provisional Government to take charge of Polish official property in this country has already reached London. It includes M. Drozniak, of the National Bank in Poland, M. Drohojowski, ex-secretary of the London Polish Ministry of Information, and M. Kolodzejski, formerly Librarian of the Sejm, who was in Moscow for the recent consultations. M. Lukasiak, the former unofficial representative in London of the Lublin Committee, and M. Grosfeld, late Finance Minister in M. Mikolajczyk's Cabinet, have also been appointed members of the "Commission." They have already met with members of the Polish Peasant and Socialist Parties in London who are supporters of the Provisional Government. Official discussions with the British authorities have, however, not yet begun, pending clarification by the Polish Provisional Government of the "Commission's" functions and of the basis upon which the discussions are to proceed.

A Russo-Polish treaty providing for the opting of Polish or Soviet citizenship of persons affected by the Polish-Soviet frontier changes, &c., was signed in Moscow on the 6th July (see below under "Soviet Union").

It has been announced in Poland that all German residents in Polish Upper Silesia, including part, if not all, of Oppeln Silesia, must register their names, stating where they propose to migrate to in Germany. The transfer is to be completed by the end of 1945.

On the 7th July a trade agreement was concluded between the Polish Provisional Government and the U.S.S.R. (see below under "Soviet Union"). Agreements are also contemplated, or in some cases completed, with Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Italy, Roumania and Sweden.

SOVIET UNION.

The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. issued on the 7th July an Amnesty Decree to mark the victorious conclusion of the war. Under it: (1) persons were to be released entirely from punishment who had been sentenced to not more than three years' imprisonment, and others who were sentenced for arbitrary abandonment of work, as well as certain categories of members of the forces sentenced for various military and criminal offences; (2) those sentenced to more than three years were to have their remaining term halved, except in cases of counter-revolutionary crimes, theft of Socialist property, banditry, forgery, premeditated murder and robbery; (3) those recently sentenced to not more than one year were to be reprieved, as well as certain other categories of offenders sentenced under war-time regulations. (4) Cases not yet examined by the Courts dealing with crimes amnestied under (1) were to be stopped. In those under (2) dealing with crimes liable to a sentence of over three years the terms were to be shortened; (5) all administrative fines and penalties not yet exacted under war-time regulations were to be cancelled; (6) persons repeatedly sentenced for embezzlement, theft and hooliganism were to be excluded from the amnesty.

With the establishment of the new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity it was evidently considered in Moscow that the mutual repatriation agreements signed on the 9th and the 22nd September, 1944, between the Governments of the Ukrainian, Byelorussian and Lithuanian Republics and the Polish Committee of National Liberation (see Summaries Nos. 259 and 260) needed confirmation. Accordingly a new Agreement was signed in Moscow on the 6th July between the Government of the U.S.S.R. and the new Polish Provisional Government, providing for the voluntary repatriation to Poland of persons of Polish and Jewish nationality living in the U.S.S.R. and having acquired Soviet citizenship since September 1939, and repatriation to the U.S.S.R. of Polish citizens of Russian, Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Ruthenian and Lithuanian nationality. Those who were already Soviet citizens and who, through serving in the Polish army in the U.S.S.R. had been allowed to opt for Polish nationality (according to the decrees of the 22nd June and the 14th July, 1944), were also to come under the scope of the new Agreement. The establishment of a mixed Polish-Soviet Commission to assist in resettlement was provided for in the Agreement.

The new Agreement was stated not to alter the provisions of the earlier Agreements referred to. The only noticeable difference is the fact that Jews were not mentioned in the September Agreements, and the distinction between Ukrainians and Ruthenians is also new, though it has been made in Soviet sources in other connexions. The permission to take 2 tons of movable property remains the same, but the sum of 1,000 zloty or 1,000 roubles which may be taken in cash was not mentioned in the former Agreements.

This Soviet Agreement with the new Polish Provisional Government was followed a day later by the signature of a Trade Treaty, including an Agreement on the reciprocal supply of goods. The new Treaty provides for the application by both parties of the most-favoured-nation clause in all reciprocal economic relations. Under the Agreement on supply of goods the total volume of exchange of goods between the U.S.S.R. and Poland is to amount during the second half of the current year to 120 million dollars, as against a total annual volume of 28 million dollars under the Polish-Soviet Trade Agreement of 1939. Poland is to supply the U.S.S.R. with 5 million tons of coal and coke, 67,000 tons of steel and iron, 5,000 tons of zinc, 70,000 tons of cement, 25,000 tons of calcinated soda, and also textiles produced from Soviet raw materials. In return the U.S.S.R. is to supply 250,000 tons of iron ore, 30,000 tons manganese, 25,000 tons cotton, 3,000 tons tobacco, 2,400 tons flax and 40,000 tons of apatites, cellulose, paper and other goods. This Agreement follows the Trade Agreements concluded earlier this year between the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia, and the ex-satellites, Bulgaria, Roumania and Finland, though it is clearly on a larger scale. The Soviet-Polish Trade Agreement of February 1939 also embodied the most-favoured-nation clause; under it Poland was to sell to the U.S.S.R. coal, zinc, textiles, textile machinery and leathers, while the U.S.S.R. was to supply raw cotton, cotton waste, furs, tobacco, manganese, asbestos and graphite. This Agreement, which had hardly time to come into effect before the war, and the more far-reaching new Agreement which has replaced it, revive a trade which has a natural economic basis and which existed to a considerable extent before 1914.

The Soviet attitude on the Tangier question was stated in Izvestiya (4th July) with a clarity which might suggest that it was intended as a warning that the U.S.S.R. was determined to participate in every important international settlement. After recalling the strategic significance of Tangier, the article referred to Russia's having taken part in the Treaty of Moroccan Affairs of the 3rd June, 1880, and in the Algeciras Conference of 1906. That she was left out of the 1923 Convention was owing to the fact that the two main participants, Great Britain and France, did not recognise the Soviet Government de jure, "and for that reason permitted themselves not to consider its lawful interests." Later, when relations were established, the Soviet Government delivered notes through its representatives in London, Rome and Paris, reserving the right not to recognise the decisions of the Conference. Izvestiya considered it strange that the U.S.S.R. should not have been invited to the proposed new conference on Tangier to be held after the defeat of General Franco's patron Hitler, seeing that her "legitimate interests" were involved. Even the United States, which had not taken part in the establishment of the status of Tangier, had been asked to participate. "It is therefore natural that any discussion of the Tangier problem without the participation of the Soviet Union should not be recognised as rightful." (See also under "Spain.")

A renewed press attack on General Franco has synchronised with the Tangier controversy. Pravda (the 6th July) came out with a vigorous denunciation of his régime, which was nothing but "organised brigandage, terrorism, and brutal exploitation of the masses." The article concluded on the warning note that General Franco had been carried to power not only by German and Italian bayonets, but by international reactionaries in the form of "appeasers." The general was now banking on an armed clash between the U.S.S.R. and the Anglo-Saxon countries. In the interests of European peace and security an early end should be put to the Fascist hotbed in the Iberian Peninsula.

The Premier of the Mongolian People's Republic, Marshal Choibalsan, arrived in Moscow on the 5th July for one of his now periodical discussions with the Soviet Government His last visit was in January 1944 (see Summary No. 225) when he was received by Generalissimo Stalin. On this occasion, the generalissimo both received him and gave a dinner in his honour at the Kremlin on the 7th July, at which M. Molotov and many high-ranking officials were present. The Mongols present included M. Shirendyb, the Rector of the Mongolian University, Dr. Sambu, Minister of the Mongolian People's Republic in the U.S.S.R., and M. Idamzhab, the Secretary of the Legation of the Mongolian People's Republic in the U.S.S.R This visit does not seem to have been further noticed in the Soviet press, nor has any hint been given as to the object of the Soviet-Mongolian discussions. The fact that it coincides with that of the Chinese Delegation suggests (as has already been noted in the British press) that Sino-Mongolian relations may be under consideration in Moscow and the opportunity taken to express the Soviet attitude to problems of interest to all three countries.

The British election campaign received considerable comment in the Soviet press. On the 5th July Krasny Flot published an explanatory article stressing the political uncertainty prevailing in this particular election and asserting that the disagreement and strife between the Left-Wing parties only benefited the Conservatives. The article gave examples and statistics on three-cornered contests and asserted that these were some of the peculiar features of the election system in Britain. Izvestiya's International Observer also commented on the fog of political uncertainty enveloping the election, when no party could be certain of the outcome. Reuter's observer allowed for the contingency that at the last moment some kind of accident would distract the electors from the real question and make them swing either Right or Left, and asserted that Churchill's letter to Attlee, published at the last moment before the election, was possibly to have been part of such an accident. It was also stated that the British press was equally uncertain of the election results, and that The Times predicted the probability of a coalition after indecisive returns.

It was announced on the 7th July that King Michael of Roumania had been decorated with the Order of Victory for his courageous act in breaking with Hitlerite Germany and forming an alliance with the United Nations at a moment when it was not yet clear that Germany would be defeated. This award of the highest Soviet military decoration to a sovereign is of some significance, particularly in view of the fact that, apart from General Eisenhower and Field-Marshal Montgomery, no other foreigners have received it, not even Marshal Tito. It may be taken in conjunction with a recent article in the Soviet press instancing Roumania as an example of the compatibility of monarchy and democracy. King Michael is also apparently to be presented with two Soviet aircraft in which to learn to fly.

SCANDINAVIA.

The Finnish Government's reply to the interpellation on the subject of war guilt handed in by Mme. Kuusinen and others (see Summary No. 300) was made on the 4th July by the Premier, M. Paasikivi. He expressed the general agreement of the Government with the signatories of the interpellation, even on the question of investigating the possibilities of criminality attaching to entry into the war and its prolongation. He urged, however, that a subsequent estimate of the expediency of steps taken in foreign policy did not ordinarily imply that those responsible were criminally culpable.

Among matters connected with Finnish war policy which might be the subject of judicial proceedings, he mentioned M. Ryti's agreement with Ribbentrop not to conclude a separate peace, which was made without previous consultation with the Diet, and the question whether joint military operations had been promised to Germany before her attack on the Soviet Union, a contingency which he described as "probable." On the other hand, he urged that criminal proceedings should be limited to a very few cases, where guilt seemed evident. He further favoured an investigation as to whether the advice tendered by friendly nations, that Finland should extricate herself from the war, had been sufficiently seriously considered.

Apart, however, from the question of criminal proceedings, M. Paasikivi urged that those responsible for the mistaken policy pursued, or for a pro-German orientation, not only in the Government and Civil Service but in the Universities and private business, should withdraw from their positions, preferably of their own accord, though he hinted that the Government reserved other means of producing the same result.

In the debate which ensued, the greatest sensation was caused by M. Leino, the Communist Minister of the Interior, who alleged the discovery of numerous arms dumps, which had been organised by high-ranking officers, in the General Headquarters of the defence forces. It has been questioned, however, by such papers as the moderate Progressive Ilta Sanomat, whether the implication of a reactionary conspiracy was justified, or whether the action was not merely an irresponsible step taken in connexion with the demobilisation. The resignation of the Commander-in-Chief, General Heinrichs, on the 30th June, in favour of General Lindquist, who is a prominent member of the Finno-British society, is generally ascribed to the discovery of these dumps, though this reason is officially repudiated.

On the 6th July the Metalworkers' strike in Sweden, the longest strike in Swedish industrial history, came to an end after a duration of five months. It directly affected at least 814 concerns and 123,000 workers, and it had widespread indirect repercussions, of which the effect on Finnish reparation payments to Russia has already been mentioned in Summary No. 298. It also caused a hold-up of ships in Göteborg harbour, since an attempt to secure coal for these from factories lying idle because of the dispute was frustrated by the strikers. Its length is alleged in some quarters to have been protracted by the policy of the Government in allowing strikers to accept employment as woodcutters in the forests. The Metalworkers' Union is under strong Communist influence. A preliminary agreement to terminate the dispute was reached as long ago as the 20th June, but the final settlement has been delayed until now. The Communist paper Ny Dag, as recently as the 25th June, was advocating a continued refusal on the part of the workers to come to terms.

Denmark has also been disturbed by industrial disputes. On the 25th June and again on the 2nd July a strike broke out at Burmeister and Wain's factory, and on the 4th the 5,000 workers in the shipyards marched to the Rigsdag to present a number of demands to the Government. These included the repeal of the Prohibition of Strikes Act, a forty-hour week, the resumption of the cost of living bonus agreed in 1939, the socialisation of factories, and the setting up of joint production committees. The demonstration assumed a dangerous character during the evening, and the police were deterred from attempts to clear the Town Hall Square by the threats of some armed demonstrators to open fire. On the morning of the 5th, however, work was temporarily resumed, but the strike began later in the day, and there were rumours that it would become general. There is also a strike in the milling industry and among apprentices in the Copenhagen bakeries, and it is clear that a state of considerable unrest prevails among workers in Denmark.

Denmark, Sweden and Norway have now all recognised the new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity.

LOW COUNTRIES.

The dockers at Rotterdam resumed work on the 6th July. Their main demands were for a 25 per cent. wage increase, a 40-hour week, and for clothes and boots for the workers and their families. A new Left Wing Trades Union, the so-called "Unity Trades Union," seems to have been at the root of the strike, and although some 80 per cent. of the strikers are reported to have been willing to listen to reason, the remaining Communist element were obdurate and deaf to the first calls to return to work. The Prime Minister broadcast to the strikers on the 3rd July and in a very moderate speech urged them to abandon a course which could only be disastrous for the whole nation and to co-operate on a basis of mutual trust and consultation for the improvement of their own living conditions and those of the whole people. Although much of the effect of this broadcast was lost through shortage of wireless sets, it was later distributed in leaflet form. The strike, which began on the 30th June, had caused a serious situation with only 6 days of civilian food supplies in hand and 16 ships lying idle in the port, and failure to produce a solution might well have caused the Government's downfall.

The Netherlands People's Movement, of which the Prime Minister is Chairman, held its first public meeting on the 4th July at The Hague. Its aim was expounded as the "striving for the renewal of national life by economic, social, political and spiritual co-operation."

The Canadian Army handed over its responsibilities in Holland to the S.H.A.E.F. mission to the Netherlands on the 1st July.

The Belgian crisis is still unsolved. There is growing impatience in the Left Wing and Liberal press. The Catholic parties have reaffirmed their loyalty to the King. It has now become clear that the King does not wish to return to Belgium except with firm constitutional backing, but at the same time he is unwilling to abdicate until every possible alternative has been tried. The main subject of his consultations with eminent jurists is thought to have been his constitutional right to form a Government when he is absent from Belgium. The principal motive for the reported action of the King in commissioning M. van Zeeland to form a Government after the failure of General Ganshof van de Meersch (see Summary No. 300) may also well have been his desire to prove at a later date that all possible alternatives were tried before abdication. At the same time if the King's absence is to continue, the alternative to abdication can only be some form of suspension of the Royal functions, which will undoubtedly provoke further dissension in a country already overburdened with the problems of reconstruction.

After the King's consultations were concluded on the 3rd July a message was delivered on his behalf to the Regent and the Prime Minister by the Prosecutor-General, M. Cornil. On the 4th July the Prime Minister received in turn the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber and the leaders of all political parties. The only obvious result of these meetings was a new resolution passed by the Catholic Groups confirming their previous attitude and suggesting that a plebiscite to decide the question of the King's return for all Belgians over 21 should be held, and that the compiling of the new Electoral Register should be speeded up. These suggestions were greeted by the opposing parties as a flimsy attempt to gain time.

On the 7th July the Prime Minister himself went to Salzburg, presumably to try to force the King to make a decision, the deferment of which may cause serious strikes and dissensions in the country. Since the deferment of the decision until the General Elections is unconstitutional as well as detrimental to the welfare of the country as a whole, the only two alternatives would seem to be either abdication or a full parliamentary debate in which all the evidence against the King and his entourage would be made public. It remains to be seen whether the Royal party are prepared to risk the consequences of the second course, which might well endanger the dynasty.

FRANCE.

American Independence Day was celebrated with particular warmth in France. Mr. Caffery unveiled a tablet to the memory of President Roosevelt in the avenue called after him; and General de Gaulle made a broadcast in English.

The absence of France from the "Big Three" Conference has, however, resulted in the paradoxical situation that President Truman will probably not see General de Gaulle during his visit to Europe (so he stated in his press conference on the 6th July), but that General de Gaulle will visit Washington at his invitation in August when it is all over. President Truman did, indeed, in his letter to General de Gaulle stress his intention to ask for preferential treatment for France in deliveries of German coal (see below); but there does not appear to be any prospect of French participation in high-level discussions on this or other matters connected with Germany. Mr. Churchill's visit to France (where he arrived for a short holiday at Hendaye on the 7th July) is described as being of a purely private character. Meanwhile French troops have arrived in Berlin; they are reported to have given way to American forces of Occupation in Stuttgart (see Summary No. 291) and to have taken over from the Americans in the Tyrol.

Failing direct Anglo-French conversations on the Levant, the French have now made a belated bid to solve the local problems on the spot (see under "Middle East"). M. Bidault had already expressed the opinion that the question of whether France should have a permanent base in the Levant is one for settlement in the new World Organisation. Government circles are much disappointed at Britain's refusal of a 5-Power conference and France's failure to secure approval at San Francisco for arbitration in the Levant. The press campaign has, however, somewhat abated; but it has been strongly hinted in the press that the sudden Russian interest in the Mediterranean—exemplified by Russian demands on Turkey and the request to participate in the talks in Tangier (see below under "Tangier")—is a consequence of the absence of Anglo-French co-operation.

Feeling in favour of this remains strong; and the absence of direct talks is deplored. M. Reynaud recently came forward with the proposal for an Anglo-French economic bloc, which far from prejudicing would further the co-operation of both countries with the United States and Russia. On the 7th July M. Teitgen, whose good feeling towards us is generally recognised, spoke strongly to Mr. Holman in favour of an Anglo-French alliance, deeply deplored the difficulties over the Levant and pointed out the dangers involved if it was really our policy to eliminate France completely from the Middle East. It is at the same time reliably reported that former supporters of Vichy are gaining credit on the count that present British policy justifies Vichy warnings in the past, and that this propaganda if not checked may destroy the capital of goodwill on which we are still able to draw in France.

The Consultative Assembly debated the Government's economic policy on the 3rd, 4th and 5th July. Most of the speeches were concerned with the somewhat barren issue of nationalisation but M. Pleven, the Minister of Finance and National Economy, made a good survey of the situation. After pointing out that economic policy had hitherto been dominated by the needs of the Allied war effort, he outlined the Government's plans for supplying the civil population with minimum supplies of coal, food and clothing next winter. He declared that an equilibrium had now been established between prices and wages and that rather than raise them any further aid would now be given to farmers by the provision of equipment and tools and to workers by making available more food and other goods at the legal prices. The Minister said that the vital problem of coal could only be solved through imports from the Saar and the Ruhr and welcomed President Truman's decision on the coal of the Ruhr. He announced that 3,700,000 tons of goods had been imported since the import programme came into operation last March and that for the rest of this year imports of 1,400,000 to 1,800,000 tons of foodstuffs and animal feeding-stuffs and 200,000 tons of textile materials were expected. The Minister concluded with promises to implement the nationalisation programme for the practical reason that only through State action could the necessary capital investment be brought about. Among the resolutions voted by the Assembly at the end of the debate was one asking that the greater part of the Ruhr and Saar coal should be placed at the disposal of France.

After a meeting of 6 hours the Council of Ministers on the 9th July unanimously adopted a draft Bill concerning the election of a Constituent Assembly. On the 14th October a general election will be held. A referendum, held at the same time, will decide whether the Assembly elected will be a Constituent Assembly (which would also elect the President of the Provisional Government) or a Chamber of Deputies. If the latter is favoured, this will involve a return to the 1875 Constitution, and the subsequent election of a Senate by indirect suffrage; and Chamber and Senate together would then constitute the alternative Constituent Assembly. This Bill, on which the opinion of the Consultative Assembly will now be taken, represents a compromise between the proposal for a single Assembly and the direct return to the 1875 Constitution with its two Chambers, latterly favoured by General de Gaulle.

SWITZERLAND.

The question of Swiss neutrality and the problems arising from it have again been under discussion in both press and radio. A typical example is the discussion following suggestions that British soldiers not yet repatriated from Italy because of damage to Italian ports might travel by train across Switzerland. Unofficial spokesmen gave the opinion that Swiss neutrality could hardly be compromised if it were merely a question of soldiers going back home to be demobilised; but doubts were expressed as to the position if any of the troops were destined for transfer to the Far East battle areas. The question also arose whether such troops could carry arms and war materials; and it was recalled that, even in peacetime, Switzerland had been opposed to the passage of armed troops through her territory. Another delicate question is Switzerland's position in regard to the new World Organisation—i.e., whether neutrality is compatible with membership or whether Switzerland might find herself faced with a choice between maintaining her tradition of neutrality or joining the new Organisation. Some fears have been expressed that for Switzerland to remain outside the Organisation might result in a dangerous isolation.

The French military authorities have asked for permission to fly non-stop over Swiss territory with unarmed military aircraft carrying sick prisoners of war and deportees from Germany to France. On their return journey the aircraft would be used for repatriating Russian prisoners of war. In view of the purpose of these flights, the Federal authorities have given their consent, and the flights will start at once.

On the 6th July the Federal Council reached the decision to recognise de jure the new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity and to resume diplomatic relations with Poland.

The purge of National Socialist elements continues. In addition, the Canton of Ticino has ordered the expulsion of 25 Italian nationals, in some cases including their entire families.

Swiss Air and Air-France will resume the Zürich–Geneva–Paris service on the 16th July. There will be one flight daily in each direction, the companies operating on alternating days. Swiss Air is also reported to be considering the possibility of resuming traffic with Barcelona and London.

The resumption on the 7th July of railway traffic between Geneva and Paris was celebrated by an official ceremony when the train, decorated with the flags of both countries, arrived at Geneva.

A Yugoslav delegation has arrived at Berne to study the possibilities of the resumption of economic relations with Switzerland. On the 4th July economic discussions also began between Switzerland and Italy.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The usual rumours of significant developments in Spain, on the occasion of the forthcoming meeting of the Cortes, are finding their way into the press. Whether we shall hear any more of General Franco's project for a "Council of the Realm" to prepare the way for a Monarchy remains to be seen. Meanwhile he has made another ceremonial speech at the reopening on the 2nd July of the Palace of the "Consejo de Estado," which had been badly damaged during the Civil War. The function of this body is to provide expert legal opinion on administrative decisions. Its powers were defined and elaborated by a law of the 25th November, 1944, since when, according to the President, Señor Raimundo Fernandez Cuesta, it has dealt with nearly 500 cases and settled some fifty appeals for redress. The Caudillo claimed that this Council of State, treated with scant respect by the men of the Republic, was now coming into its own and had become one of the essential institutions for the maintenance of order, good administration and justice under his beneficent régime.

Such assertions do not, of course, cut any ice with Spaniards when they read them interminably in their press. And nobody inside or outside Spain is really impressed by the various claims to normalisation of Spanish conditions, some of which were discussed in this Summary last week. There is nearly always a catch somewhere. For example, when the authorities recently freed the British and American Embassy bulletins from postal censorship and promised that there would be no interference with their circulation, they asked that in future—as a quid pro quo—these bulletins should not contain any criticism, direct or implied, of the Spanish régime. Actually, there is no difficulty in agreeing to this condition, since these bulletins have always left Spanish internal affairs severely alone. But the method of approach is characteristic.

The anniversary of the death in exile of Don Manoel, ex-King of Portugal, was commemorated on the Portuguese wireless, which has also paid warm tribute to ex-Queen Amelia on the occasion of her recent visit to the country. From the frontier Dona Amelia de Orleans e Braganza sent suitable telegrams of thanks and admiration to President Cormano and Dr. Salazar.

TANGIER.

British and American officials went to Paris at the beginning of last week for the tripartite conversations designed to work out the details of the provisional régime for Tangier to replace the Spanish administration. There was an early complication when the Government of the Soviet Union, which had been notified in a joint Anglo-French communication, made urgent representations in the three capitals asking for postponement to allow of Russian participation. This request is now under consideration. In the meantime, following an informal exchange of views, the talks have been suspended.

French concern for a restoration of the situation existing in fact and in law previous to the Spanish coup de force is understandable. His Majesty's Government contemplates some modification of the 1923 arrangement in order both to make the régime more truly international and to provide for United States participation, which would be in accordance with the present objectives of American foreign policy and hemispheric strategy. Russia, of course, like the United States, was a signatory of the Act of Algeciras, but neither the old Tsarist régime nor the U.S.S.R. ever evinced the slightest interest in Tangier; the Soviet Union, with the Central Powers, it may be remembered, were not invited to adhere to the Convention of 1923. Izvestiya now claims (see under "Soviet Russia"), that when the Statute was modified in 1928, the Soviet Government reserved the right not to recognise decisions taken without their participation and so informed the British, Italian and French Governments.

Although an exchange of correspondence in 1924 between France and the U.S.S.R. scarcely bears out this contention, the French Government now consider themselves obliged to support the inclusion of France's Russian ally in the ultimate settlement (see under "France"), and the United States will presumably raise no objection.

And finally, Dr. Van Kleffens, on behalf of the Netherlands Government, has protested against "the growing habit of the great Powers of arranging matters in which the small Powers have proportionately equal interest without the active participation of the latter."

ITALY.

Signor Parri's Government has issued a statement of policy which was approved by the Council of Ministers on the 26th June. The statement begins by declaring that the Constituent Assembly and reconstruction are the main points of the Government's policy and that all technical preparations for the Constituent Assembly are to be immediately put in hand. The Government further undertakes to convoke the Constituent Assembly as soon as possible on the basis of universal, direct and secret suffrage. In order to be in direct contact with the country, the Government will reconstitute all local representative bodies, and with the object of creating a new and truly democratic spirit, the law and the liberty of the individual will be energetically upheld. The demands by various regions for a measure of autonomy are also to be sympathetically examined and the Committees of National Liberation are to continue as advisory bodies to the prefects and local authorities, while as regards labour and food problems the Government will rely on the co-operation of the representative bodies concerned. Epuration is to be simplified and brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible. As regards unemployment the Government is to take steps to stabilise the purchasing power of the lira in order to balance the cost of living as against wages and salaries, and conditions in Northern Italy are to be adjusted to those obtaining in the rest of the country. The statement, however, affirms that the Government's policy depends on Allied help and support. Italy wishes to offer loyal co-operation in the peaceful and democratic reconstruction of the world, but in return requests the end of the Armistice régime, the conclusion of peace and the transfer of North Italy to Italian administration.

The Italian Government expresses the hope that the question of the Italo-Yugoslav frontier may be settled in a friendly spirit, in collaboration with the Allies, by means of a direct agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia. The Government intends to suppress the creation of monopolies, to develop the control of factory management by the workers, and at the same time to encourage private enterprise to stimulate economic activity. The Co-operative movement is also to be encouraged. Finally, the Government declares its right to maintain law and order by suppressing all forms of illegality and by disarming all citizens. To this end the police will be reconstituted so as to ensure a respect of the law and the holding of free and honest elections for the Constituent Assembly and all other elections. To implement its policy the Government appeals for the active co-operation of all citizens.

With regard to the maintenance of law and order Signor De Gasperi, the Foreign Minister, has expressed his anxiety about the present outbreaks of lawlessness to Sir Noel Charles. Not only in Bari Province (as reported in last week's Summary) but also in the north, particularly in Emilia, bands of armed men have broken into gaols and murdered a number of persons awaiting trial and have committed individual murders throughout the countryside. These murders are taking place despite the fact that the Assize Courts are functioning with speed and efficiency. The trouble, said Signor De Gasperi, was that the Carabinieri were too few and badly equipped to cope with the situation. It is thought that these acts form part of a general plan to weaken the Government's authority and to intimidate any moderate elements.

The question has arisen as to whether Italians resident in that part of Venezia Giulia administered by A.M.G. may vote in the elections of the Constituent Assembly when they take place. The question is obviously a very difficult one.

THE VATICAN.

Moscow continues to think the Vatican politically important enough to accuse of "Fascist intrigues in Germany, Italy, Poland and above all Spain." New Times calls its post-war policy "black reaction." Meanwhile the Pope, speaking to members of the United States Naval Affairs Committee and to representatives of the United States Foreign War Veterans has repeated his distinction between true and sham democracy. Another Vatican counter to Moscow's attacks was to hand to Sir D'Arcy Osborne copies of the German demand of the 29th August, 1941, for the right to raise political objections to ecclesiastical appointments in "the new territories of the Reich," and of the Vatican's firm rejection of the claim. Sir D'Arcy Osborne describes the documents as "an illustrative appendix to the Pope's exposition of the Vatican's relations with the Nazi régime in his Allocation of the 2nd June." (See Summary No. 296 under "Vatican.")

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Roumania.

The affairs of the National Liberal Party of Roumania have been prominent in the news of late. Dl Gh. Tătărescu, the Vice-Premier, was at one time the Secretary-General of the Party, and attempted to form a Left Wing of his own supporters. In view of his present position in the Government his activities have taken on a new lease of life. He is reported to have formed a plan for a new Radical-Socialist Party, with a press of its own. This is in accordance with the usual Roumanian practice. He is apparently anxious to increase the circulation and influence of his own paper Drapelul, and to secure the support also of Jurnalul and Semnalul. As the Government controls the supplies of newsprint, there is an obvious short cut to this desirable end. Incidentally, in the opinion of Dl Dinu Brătianu, Tătărescu is involved in a plot to get the ex-King Carol back, in spite of his recent professions of loyalty to and admiration for King Michael.

After a joint meeting on the 7th June of the executives of the Liberal and the National Peasant Parties, the National Liberal Party confirmed Brătianu in his leadership and expelled Tătărescu and some of his followers. Tătărescu then arranged a meeting of the dissident members of the party for the 1st July. This meeting was announced on the Bucarest Radio, which, of course, is Soviet controlled, as a "General Congress of the National Liberal Party." No newspaper or radio station was in a position to correct this misstatement. At the meeting, which was fully reported by press and radio, Tătărescu was elected chairman of the "National Liberal Party"! He made two speeches in which he made a bid for the support of the Right Wing. He expressed his devotion to the monarchy, stated emphatically that he was not a Communist, and not in favour of State ownership. He spoke against the abuses of capital, but declared that "the National Liberal Party is against the nationalisation or socialisation of all privately-owned property." The Moscow Radio in reporting the meeting abstained from quoting the salient points of Tătărescu's speech, but attacked the Liberal leaders in the now familiar form.

The Russian State has always been adept at making use of the Orthodox Church for political purposes. Since the election of a new Russian Patriarch, the Russian Church has shown considerable interest in the affairs of neighbouring Churches, particularly those in countries under Soviet rule. Delegations have paid visits of ceremony to various countries. The delegation to Roumania presented the Roumanian Patriarch with a message of "cordial greetings and with two demands. One of these was that the Roumanian Church should conform to the Russian calendar. In reply to this piece of impertinence the Patriarch Nicodim replied that the present calendar was adopted by a Synod presided over by the Œcumenical Patriarch at Constantinople. The reference to the Patriarch of Constantinople was a good point, as also was the thinly veiled reminder that the Roumanian Autocephalic Church did not owe obedience to the sister Church of Russia.

The other demand was that Russian priests from Bessarabia and Bukovina who have been detained in Roumania since the cession of the two provinces in 1940, should be "released from prison and returned to Russia." The fact is that when Russia took possession of the two provinces about 1,400 priests migrated to Roumania where they were well received. They are reckoned as Roumanian citizens by Roumania and as Soviet citizens by Russia. Employment in monasteries and parishes was found for these clergy and the Patriarch Nicodim replied to the Russian demand that he did not consider it his duty to force them to return to Russia.

The arrangements for the formation of a Russian-Roumanian Oil Company (see Summary for the 23rd May) which was to enjoy a specially privileged position, especially with regard to new concessions, are being hurried forward. In the opinion of experts the draft articles of association, if carried through, will mean the end of the British oil interests in Roumania and of British export trade in oilfield equipment. In connexion with this, the Soviet authorities are holding up and diverting to Russia supplies of certain products which were destined for export to Britain and which are needed for the purposes of the war with Japan.

The Russian Order of Victory has been conferred upon the King of Roumania. (See also under "Soviet Union.")

Yugoslavia.

The campaign of abuse of Allied Military Government in Venezia Giulia continues. The restoration of the Italian courts of law at Trieste, the reinstatement of the Professors of Trieste University and the Allied assumption of control over Trieste Radio Station were denounced. The Trieste National Liberation Committee's Public Prosecutor was said on the 3rd June to have called on all commissions, which had remained inactive owing to Allied intervention, at once to resume clearing out "Fascist" elements; and on the 7th Politika reported that "workers' patrols are looking for Fascists, resolved not to tolerate them in the city." There have been numerous interferences with the agreed Allied running rights between Trieste and Pola. Concerning the Yugoslav Government's denial of having mobilised Italian nationals (see Summary No. 299, page 17, paragraph 2), the Italian Government has stated that Voce del popolo, of Fiume (11th May), contained a summons to men of the 1900–27 classes for the Yugoslav Army. The Allied Commission for Italy has requested A.M.G. to furnish all possible information on persons deported by the Yugoslavs for whose return provision was made in the Agreement of the 9th June. That the Yugoslavs consider their zone not as occupied, but as annexed, was shown by a resolution of the Committee of the Titoist Croat Peasant Party, which stated that "Zara, Fiume and Istria have returned [sic] to Croatia."

The campaign about Carinthia has died down. A National Liberation Committee of Villach, composed of Communists, was formed by the Communist Party of Slovenia in January 1945. It came into the open in May, and was dissolved by A.M.G. in June, for contravention of orders. A National Committee of Slovenia (anti-Titoist) was formed in October 1944 to combat the Communists and work for an autonomous Slovenia within the restored Yugoslav kingdom. It came into the open on the 3rd May, issued an appeal to all Slovenes, and appointed an officer to command the Slovene conservative forces. A few days later the Committee and its troops were forced to flee over the mountains to the Allies in Carinthia.

The press campaign against Greece reached white heat. It included a speech by the Premier of Yugoslav Macedonia, and a passage in Tito's speech of the 7th July. After emphasising Yugoslavia's friendly relations with all the countries under Russian control, Tito said: "Unfortunately our relations with Greece are not very sound. . . . The Greek people again have the misfortune to be ruled by reactionaries. . . . A few days ago the Greek Minister of the Interior declared that not a single Greek or Slav from Greece had passed the frontier to seek refuge in Yugoslavia." [Note: What the Minister is reported to have said on the 3rd July was that he could categorically deny what had been published about persecution of Slavs in Greece and their flight.] Tito went on to say that Greek forces were "firing without any reason, from mortars and machine-guns, across our frontier in an effort to provoke us.

Although the Yugoslav authorities celebrated the anniversary of the coup d'État of the 27th March, 1941, and assumed the credit for that event, they also celebrated the 7th July as the date of the real beginning of resistance by the Partisans. It is now to be the Serbian national holiday. The Serbian Premier spoke, denouncing the enemies of the Yugoslav peoples, amongst whom he included "those who want to restore the King." Rankovitch represented the Partisan resistance as merely a continuation of pre-1941 class war. Kardelj, with greater respect for Serbian opinion, emphasised Serbia's stand on the 27th March. Finally, Tito's speech emphasised the "unbreakable alliance" with Russia and close relations with "other Slav brothers—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Albania." He looked to the "progressive elements" in Britain and the United States to see that no difficulties, but only help, came from those Allies. In Yugoslavia, he said, parties would be allowed to function, if they asked. There would soon be elections, when all could "freely say 'Yes' or 'No'" (to what question he did not say). Meanwhile, the army must remain partly mobilised.

It is clear that the Tito–Shubashitch Agreement, on which the "Big Three" based their recognition of the present régime, has not been carried out. There is no free political activity, nor a free press. Under the arbitrary control of the secret police there is no freedom from fear.

A memorandum from an assembly of Serb Orthodox clergy, held on the 14th and 15th March, to the Œcumenical Patriarch, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Metropolitan of Greece and two Serb Bishops overseas, has been published in London. The signatories appeal for help against what they call the totalitarian system of the Communist party; they name thirty-five Orthodox priests killed by the Partisans; and they say that they adhere to General Mihailovitch's "Christian and democratic" movement.

Greece.

The major problems confronting the Greek Government remain the re-establishment of internal security and economic stabilisation. Their successful solution in the reasonably near future, on which depends the resumption of normal Greek political life and of less acrimonious relations with Greece's Balkan neighbours, would deprive extremist politicians and other disruptive elements of their most powerful weapon, the existence of widespread and well-founded popular discontent.

The re-establishment of law and order is dependent on the replacement of the National Guard by a reorganised police and gendarmerie. The National Guard has undoubtedly been guilty—though not to the extent claimed by the Left-wing press—both of excesses against members of E.A.M./K.K.E. and others merely suspected of Left-wing sympathies, and of handing over arms taken from E.L.A.S. to illegal Royalist organisations. They are, therefore, compromised not only in fact but also in the eyes of the public both at home and abroad. Their replacement by gendarmerie, with which considerable progress has been made since the establishment of a British Police Mission was agreed on the 12th May, will doubtless be accelerated by the arrival of Sir Charles Wickham, head of the mission, who left for Athens on the 11th July. He will have absolute control over the organisation and administration of both police and gendarmerie, though the final responsibility for their operational use rests with the Greek Government. By a law of the 19th June the gendarmerie was divorced from the army and placed completely under the Ministry of the Interior, and a new post was created, to which General Ananiadis was subsequently appointed, to co-ordinate the police and gendarmerie under that Ministry. The organisation and deployment of the full number of gendarmes, 20,000, required by the Greek Government is of major importance as a prerequisite to the holding of free and orderly elections.

There appears to be considerable opposition in many quarters to the new taxation (see Summary No. 299) imposed under the Government's economic and financial programme. It is reliably reported that the regional commercial unions have regrouped into a central professional and political union—the Panhellenic Union of Commercial Syndicates—to protect the interests of private enterprise. Athens and Piræus Tradesmen's Associations instructed members to close their shops on the 9th July as a protest against the tax. A number of Ministers with big business connexions, notably those who were transferred from one post to another at Varvaressos's request before he took office, are believed to be covertly hostile. Strong opposition is also displayed, for political reasons, by the extremists of both Left and Right, who hope to profit by the economic chaos which would ensue if the Government were forced to abandon their programme. The Government, however, shows no signs of weakening and Athens prices have remained steady.

The question of Northern Epirus continues to be given the maximum publicity and the Government is clearly under considerable pressure from the public to take some definite step. Lists of Albanian atrocities against the Greek population have now been officially communicated to His Majesty's Government by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, with the comment that they form part of a methodical plan of extermination dating back to 1913. It has been publicly announced that a ten-page Memorandum on the Northern Epirus question, which may be assumed to set out in detail the Greek territorial claims against Albania, has been prepared for submission to the Governments of Great Britain, United States and U.S.S.R. A general claim was advanced by M. Zakynthinos, the Under-Secretary of State for Information, in a broadcast speech on the 3rd July, but it seems clear that the public will not long be satisfied without a more specific statement by the Government of Greece's territorial claims against her neighbours.

Albania.

The news that the Kosovo region, together with the frontier district of North-West Macedonia, is now definitely a part of Yugoslavia again—after being handed over by the Axis to Albania—is evidently beginning to become widely known in spite of the F.N.C.'s reticence on the subject. The fact that the F.N.C. agreed to give back this important area, with its largely Albanian population, certainly shows how thoroughly Enver Hoxha is dominated by Marshal Tito and must have alienated all Nationalist elements, particularly in the north of the country still further. Besides this, Enver Hoxha's insolvency only enables him to pay the officers, as opposed to the men, in his own army, so that there is bound also to be a good deal of dissatisfaction amongst the Partisans themselves.

Bishop Kotoko, of Argyrocastro, a Greek propagandist of Albanian nationality, has been dismissed from his see and branded by the Metropolitan as a traitor. The Bishop of Koritza is to take his place.

Enver Hoxha having refused to allow any members of Military Liaison to remain in Albania as members of U.N.R.R.A., or to permit more than fifteen persons in all to carry out the work, it has been decided to withdraw all U.N.R.R.A. and Military Liaison personnel at once. U.N.R.R.A. have written to Hoxha, and if he decides to adopt a sensible attitude, an agreement may yet be signed.

Bulgaria.

The Patriotic Front has not broken up yet, but one by one those individual members of the Cabinet who show any reluctance to toe the Communist line are being eliminated. On the 5th July M. Bumbarov, Minister of Public Works, was forced to resign, and his place was taken by a more amenable Agrarian called M. Dragnev, who was one of the founders of the Bulgarian Co-operative Movement and has been under Communist influence for many years. His first act on taking over the Ministry was to summon all the available members of the staff and tell them that he proposed to enquire how far the purge of Fascist elements among them had been carried out and that if necessary he would complete it.

The Minister most likely to qualify next for dismissal is another Agrarian, M. Nikola Petkov, the sure sign being that—like M. Bumbarov five weeks earlier—he was expelled from his Party Union on the 7th July. The present Agrarian Party Executive is only too ready to carry out Communist instructions faithfully; and what those instructions are can be seen very clearly from a perusal of the Fatherland Front Committee's Election Appeal, which, after expatiating upon the secrecy of the ballot and the perfect freedom of the electorate, naïvely adds: "The enemies of the people must not be allowed to vote."

Under a new order issued by the Ministry of the Interior an amnesty has been granted to all criminals who sought sanctuary in the Bulgarian army and are now victoriously returning home from active service.

Dr. Dimitrov's very dissimilar Moscow namesake, of Reichstag fire fame, has been awarded the Order of Lenin by the Supreme Soviet Presidium.

Turkey.

The British Ambassador in Moscow has informed the Soviet Government that in the view of the British Government the territorial claims of the U.S.S.R. on Turkey should be considered in the light of general World Organisation, and that the demand for bases affects the multilateral Montreux Convention. The Soviet Government was also reminded that it had agreed at Yalta to consult Britain and the United States before approaching the Turkish Government on matters affecting that convention. Also that Marshal Stalin had promised to take no action affecting the independence and integrity of Turkey and to adopt a reassuring attitude to the Turkish Government.

The United States Government, which had previously been consulted on the question, preferred not to join with Britain in making these representations, but approves of them.

The attitude of the Turkish press is firm and uncompromising. Russia was accused of using the words "democracy" and "anti-fascism" as a cloak for imperialism. The Soviet proposals were described as "senseless and improper," and the Government was called upon to reject them without discussion. There is no doubt that the Government can count on public support in resisting the Soviet claims.

M. Cevat Açikalin, Secretary-General of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, broadcast a message to the United States on the Fourth of July. He spoke of the affection and admiration of the Turkish people for the people of America, and added that the two nations were alike in their attitude towards life and political morality. The harbouring of aspirations and ambitions which involved the integrity and independence of another country was regarded by both nations as a crime.

Some amendments to the Constitution, in the direction of greater democratisation, and modifications of the Press Law were debated at a meeting of the Parliamentary Group of the Republican People's Party. There appears to be some dissatisfaction among a few of the Deputies with the constitutional position of the President, who is at the same time head of the State and leader of the only political party; for under his rule the formation of an Opposition might lead to a conflict in which the President would be involved.

The proposed amendments were rejected on the grounds that the question should, more properly, have been brought before a full party congress. The proposed modification in the Press Law centred on the article which empowers the Government to suspend a newspaper, without according any right of appeal. It was recommended that the power to suspend should be transferred to the Courts.

The Government made a small concession to the movement for greater electoral freedom by refraining from putting forward any official candidates at six by-elections which were recently held. They relied on the party loyalty of the secondary electors (each of whom represents 400 primary electors). The results of the elections justified their confidence.

The Anatolian Agency has been authorised to state that the report that Turkey has demanded the incorporation within her frontiers of the district of Aleppo is without foundation.

THE MIDDLE EAST.

The tension in the Levant States has been but slightly eased by the unilateral statement issued by the French Government on the 8th July regarding the transfer to the local Governments of the Troupes Spéciales. This statement declares that the Troupes Spéciales are to be "transferred to the Syrian and Lebanese Governments in accordance with arrangements which will be defined within 45 days." In the discussions between Count Ostrorog and the representatives of the Lebanese Government (who also acted on behalf of the Syrian Government, as the latter refused to meet Count Ostrorog direct), on the wording of the text of the declaration, His Majesty's Minister, though keeping well in the background, played a most helpful part, and it is largely due to his good offices that agreement on the text was reached. Thus, at long last, the French have come to a decision on a matter on which the Levant Governments have been pressing them for a very long time. Had this essential step been taken earlier, much trouble might have been avoided.

The fact remains, however, that any bargaining value which the Troupes Spéciales may have possessed at one time has disappeared through the procrastination of the French, who have now had to give something for nothing. That the Levant States are prepared to accept the declaration does not mean that there has necessarily been any marked improvement in their relations with the French, which still remain strained. The troubles that occurred in Latakia on the 5th July, and in Aleppo on the 9th July, show how tense the atmosphere still is, and there is certainly little ground for optimism. It is, moreover, fairly certain that the States will sooner or later make further demands, such as the withdrawal of all French troops and the transfer of the remaining "common interests."

The Treaty seems as far off as ever. In a recent conversation with the President of Syria, His Majesty's Minister tried to convince Shukri Quwatli that the declaration on the Troupes Spéciales represented a real effort on the part of the French to improve the atmosphere for the discussion of other matters. The President, however, affected to regard the wording of the declaration with indifference, and once again said that he would "cut off his hand" rather than sign a treaty with France. The President's intransigent attitude is a reflection of the profound mistrust engendered in the minds of the Syrian people by French policy for many years past, coupled with bitter hatred caused by recent events in Syria. If there is less hatred in the Lebanon, the mistrust is as deep as in Syria, except among the relatively small pro-French party.

There is more than ever urgent need for a conference between the French and the other interested parties to reach a settlement of the issues still outstanding in the Levant. But the French seem to be reluctant to agree to a tripartite conference in which the United States would participate with ourselves, and it is doubtful whether we can do any more at the moment to gain their acquiescence. (See also under "France.")

No enthusiasm has been shown in Egypt over the United Nations' Charter. The Wafdist press, which goes so far as to refer to the San Francisco Conference as a "catastrophe," has strongly criticised the Charter as being opposed to Egyptian interests and those of the Arab League. The view expressed by these papers, which is shared by many of the public, is that Egypt has not been accorded that place in the New World Security Organisation to which, as head of the Arab League, they claim she is entitled.

The Wafdists are also incensed over the issue of a military order by the Egyptian Prime Minister banning the proposed visit of Nahas Pasha to Port Said. Meanwhile, Makram Ebeid Pasha, Minister of Finance, is still pursuing his vindictive policy against his quondam colleagues, the leaders of the Wafd, and is reported to have sent to senators and deputies a copy of the committee of enquiry's report on the alleged misdemeanours of Nahas's Government while the case is still sub judice.

The Egyptian journalists who recently visited this country have now returned to Egypt, where they have expressed their keen appreciation of the warm reception given them by His Majesty's Government and by the British people in general.

H.R.H. the Amir Abdilillah, the Regent of Iraq, on the conclusion of his visit to President Truman, arrived in London from Canada on the 8th July. Although his visit here is "unofficial," arrangements are being made by His Majesty's Government to afford him all necessary facilities for making his stay in this country useful and enjoyable. His suite includes no Iraqi Minister at present in office, and it is therefore unlikely that any important political matters will be discussed with him.

M. Sadr, the new Persian Prime Minister, has not yet been able to collect the quorum necessary for the official presentation of his Government to the Majlis, and so far all his attempts to do so have been baffled by the minority who walk out of the Chamber. He may, however, succeed in time.

A report from Angora, attributed to Reuter, that Persian Azerbaijan is to be annexed by Russia in accordance with the demand of a local committee in that province, has caused astonishment and alarm in Tehran, as coming allegedly from a British journalist. There is in fact no truth in the story that any committee in Persian Azerbaijan has made such a demand, though no doubt it would be an easy matter for the Russians to provoke one if they wished to do so.

THE FAR EAST.

Dr. Soong's visit to Moscow and the meeting of the People's Political Council dominate all other news from China for the past week. Soong is reported to have been received on three separate occasions by Stalin himself, and Molotov gave a reception to the Diplomatic Corps in his honour. Nothing has yet been disclosed as to the results of Soong's mission, but an official source in Chungking has stated that "limited but not unsatisfactory results" have been obtained. According to this source the results do not include the concession that Moscow will bring pressure on Yenan to compromise with Chungking. According to Tass, Marshal Choibalsan, the Premier of the Mongol People's Republic (Outer Mongolia), arrived in Moscow on the 5th July, accompanied by the Soviet Minister to his country, and on the 7th July dined with Stalin at the Kremlin. His arrival may very well have an indirect bearing on Soong's visit (see also under "Soviet Union").

Japanese comment on Soong's visit is that he is negotiating in a dual capacity as representative of Chungking and as spokesman of the United States. The Yomiuri-Hochi said that Soong would first discuss the border problems arising from the contiguity of territory between the U.S.S.R. and China; although these problems were not urgent, it was impossible to obtain political stability between the two countries without aiming at a compromise, and from the United States viewpoint this would give an opportunity for judging the limits of Soviet policy towards China. Secondly, Soong would discuss the Yenan régime; the recent stiffening of the Soviet attitude towards Chungking on this issue made at least temporary agreement upon it a most important part of Soong's mission. It would be very difficult to reconcile the hostility between these two régimes, which the Americans had already failed to compose by mediation. In the final analysis, according to the Yomiuri Hochi, it was not Soong's negotiations, but the outcome of the next meeting of the Big Three which would really govern Soviet-Chinese relations.

A Domei report from Peking, transmitted by the Tass correspondent in Tokio, stated that the U.S.S.R. had taken up a definite attitude towards Chungking by replacing her ambassador (it was announced on the 3rd of April that M. Appolen A. Petrov had been appointed Soviet Ambassador to China in place of M. A. S. Paniushkin, who had resigned because of ill-health in the summer of 1944; M. Petrov arrived in Chungking on the 30th April) and despatching nearly thirty engineers to Yenan. Chungking, according to this version, was pursuing a complicated foreign policy, manipulated by Ho Ying-chin and Chen Li-fu, who adhered to an "independent" line, by T. V. Soong, who relied on American support, and by Sun Fo and H. H. Kung who were working for a pro-Soviet orientation. This Japanese report should be taken with due reserve, but on the evidence otherwise available the developments described are not altogether improbable. Some time ago, the party of British and American journalists who visited Yenan reported that the only Russians there were a doctor and two Tass correspondents. But now that American military instructors and technical experts are playing a continually increasing part in strengthening Chungking China, it would be a little surprising if the Soviet Union were to lend no assistance in personnel to the party which her press and radio so strongly favour, and, indeed, not to do so could only have a discouraging effect on the Chinese Communists and put a severe strain on their faith in Moscow. Thus, while there is no confirmation so far of the alleged arrival of Russian engineers in the Communist area, the recent stiffening of the Communist attitude towards Chungking may reflect a form of discreet Russian support for which parallels in Europe are not lacking.

Attention in Chungking has now turned to the People's Political Council, which was convened on the 7th July, the eighth anniversary of the beginning of China's war of resistance. Despite a last-minute effort by a group of its members, who have just returned from a flying visit to Yenan, the Communists have maintained their boycott of this session. The session is scheduled to last for two weeks and to close on the 21st July. This is the Fourth Council, and comprises 290 members, compared with the 240 of its predecessor, whose last session was held in September 1944.

A total of 218 persons are said to have actually attended the opening session, but these included foreign diplomatic representatives. President Chiang, in a speech of twenty minutes, stressed the Government's determination to conclude the period of political tutelage and to inaugurate constitutionalism in China.

The Japanese newspapers have been taken up with the 10 per cent. reduction in staple foods, which is to become effective in mid-July. Various substitutes are to be popularised, including flour made from sweet potatoes. The Nippon Sangyo of the 7th July said that this year's harvest of potatoes does not come up to expectations, particularly in Hokkaido, where 50 per cent. of Japan's potatoes are normally produced. The Tokio Shimbun declared: "In view of the mainland becoming a battlefield, the setting-up of a structure to make us self-supporting in food is imminent. Food will become scarcer. At this critical juncture all Japanese must learn to eat weeds." The Yomiuri Hochi complains of the black market. "Should Japan be defeated, it will not be by the enemy, but because of the black market. . . . Should the enmy land in Japan, how can uniform official prices be applied to localities cut off from one another? Official prices must be fixed locally. As long as the black market exists, victory cannot be won." The Minister of Agriculture issued an appeal on the 8th July. In his broadcast he is reported by the Asahi as saying that the reduction in rations was a very grave matter, because men cannot fight well when they are hungry, but that "the teaching we have inherited from our forefathers is that we are the descendants of the Samurai, who do not feel hunger, even if they are hungry. It is with this spirit the nation should fight this war to final victory."

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

President Truman has continued the reconstitution of his Administration. In less than three months he has accepted the resignation of six out of nine Cabinet members and of a dozen or so other high-placed officials. Last week he announced that he had accepted the resignation of Mr. Morgenthau, who for the last eleven years has been Secretary of the Treasury, a post ranking next in seniority to that of Secretary of State, and he has indicated that after his return from the Berlin Conference he will nominate Mr. Frederick M. Vinson to succeed Mr. Morgenthau. This solution has met with a generally favourable reception. Mr. Vinson, a middle-of-the-road Democrat, was recently appointed Director of War Mobilisation after having served less than a month as Federal Loans Administrator. He was a Congressman for most of eighteen years and is popular on Capital Hill. More recently he was Director of the Office of Economic Stabilisation, and while holding that post he was a member of the United States delegation to the International Monetary Convention held at Bretton Woods. (Incidentally, there are press predictions that if the Bretton Woods proposals are adopted, Mr. Morgenthau will be appointed one of the American representatives.) Mr. Vinson was an ardent supporter of President Roosevelt's business reforms, but he is known to hold the view that Federal taxes should be imposed in such a way as not to be a deterrent to business expansion and to favour the repeal of the Excess Profits Tax after the defeat of Japan. He has also supported the "Full Employment" Bill, which the President himself favours.

The President has also announced the resignation, on grounds of ill-health, of Mr. Harry Hopkins as a special adviser and assistant to the President. Mr. Truman has paid a special tribute to Mr. Hopkins's "tireless energies" in "carrying on the war in all parts of the globe." Mr. Justice Owen Roberts, who has reached the retirement age of 70, has announced his resignation from the Supreme Court. Mr. Roberts is one of the more Conservative members and in recent months, like Chief Justice Stone and Justices Felix Frankfurter and Robert Jackson, he has expressed disagreement with a great many of the Court's decisions.

Of President Roosevelt's Cabinet only four members now remain, Mr. Ickes, Mr. Henry Wallace, Mr. Stimson and Mr. Forrestal. It is believed that Mr. Forrestal (Secretary of the Navy) and Mr. Wallace (Secretary of Commerce) are likely to remain at their posts, but Mr. Stimson, the Secretary for War, is now in his 78th year and it is reported that he would like to retire when final victory over Japan is in sight. There have been many rumours that Mr. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, will not remain long in the Cabinet. The President, however, has denied these reports and at a Press Conference last week announced that Mr. Ickes would shortly be visiting London to re-negotiate the Anglo-American Oil Treaty.

Without doubt the reconstruction of the Administration has met with warm approval in the country. It is felt that Mr. Truman's approach to Government is less personal than that of his predecessor and that he has made these present appointments with the object of delegating substantial authority to his cabinet. The sweeping changes in the Administration do not foreshadow any major deviation from President Roosevelt's policies, but they probably do portend drastic changes in method. The President obviously hopes to conciliate Congress and to win its confidence, and his major appointments are of men who not only have themselves served in Congress but in whom Congress has full confidence.

In an article written for the August issue of the American Magazine, Mr. Byrnes, the newly appointed Secretary of State, recommended that the President should be given sweeping power to reorganise the agencies in the executive part of the Government, which "overlap, intertwine and even compete." He also recommended that the "dozen different Federal agencies elbowing one another for control of man-power" be concentrated under "a real Department of Labour"; a recommendation which seems to have met with praise, since Mr. Schwellenbach, the new Secretary of Labour, has announced his intention of amalgamating within his Department, so far as practical and legally feasible, the labour functions of some twenty or more Federal agencies which are now engaged in activities which properly belong to the Department of Labour. Mr. Byrnes also recommended in his article that the joint Chiefs of Staff be established permanently by law, one member serving as Chief of Staff to the Commander-in-Chief. Finally he proposed special legislation establishing a Department of the Armed Services with a Secretary for the Armed Services and four Under-Secretaries, one each for land forces, sea forces, air forces and supplies. General Eisenhower made an even more revolutionary suggestion at West Point, saying that he would like to see all the armed forces in the same uniform. Meanwhile Mr. Byrnes has himself asked the Bureau of the Budget to give him a report on the organisation of the Department of State and he has announced that Mr. Benjamin Cohen, Mr. Donald Russell and Mr. Walter Brown have joined his staff, each with a temporary assignment as special assistant to the Secretary of State.

The President, with Mr. Byrnes and a large number of political and military advisers, has sailed for Europe. The President goes abroad leaving a stable political situation behind him. Indeed, the general public mood of the United States at the moment is exceptionally hopeful and benevolent. The President's popularity is immense. A recent poll asked the public whether they approved of the way in which Mr. Truman is handling his task. 87 per cent. said they did, with only 3 per cent. disapproving and 10 per cent. saying that they had no opinion. President Truman goes to the meeting in Berlin almost with the certainty that the United Nations Charter will be ratified by the Senate. His hand has also been strengthened by the endorsement by the House of Representatives' Post-War Military Committee of the "broad principle" of universal military training in peacetime. The Committee recommended that Congress should give prompt and thorough consideration to this proposal. Trainees would not be subject to active military service except in the event of a national emergency being declared by Congress. The general plan is that, after a year of training, the trainees will become members of a reserve body subject to call to service in time of war or emergency.

The New York Times welcomes this action as valuable evidence of United States intentions to assume obligation as a peace-enforcing Power. Mr. Arthur Krock in approving the action of the Committee has stressed the need for power not only to enforce the United Nations Organisation decisions, but to hold that organisation to its principles and ideals.

The action of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in approving by a 14 to 4 vote the Bretton Woods proposals for an International Bank and Monetary Fund should also serve as a further encouragement to the President and as additional proof that the United States desire to participate in international co-operation, political, economic and military. This legislation, which has already been passed by the House of Representatives, is expected to go before the full Senate on the 16th July.

The one fly in the ointment on the home front is the labour situation. The Labour Department Conciliation Service reports that the daily average of strikes and walk-outs has risen from twenty before VE-day to approximately forty now. The chief cause behind this unrest is undoubtedly labour's fear of post-war unemployment and the reduction of workers' weekly pay following the cessation of overtime payment. The strikes have been emphasised in the press and have created a strong impression of growing unrest. Meanwhile the Ball–Burton–Hatch Labour Bill continues to be attacked by all labour leaders, but in other quarters it continues to be regarded favourably, being praised as an honest attempt to "meet one of the most challenging post-war issues." There is general agreement that responsibility for industrial peace must rest on the Labour Unions as well as on Management, but the position is aggravated by the inability of the two chief Labour organisations, the American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organisations, to reconcile their differences at this critical time.

LATIN AMERICA.

In Argentina President Farrell has now declared that elections will be called before the end of the year, and it is reported in the Press that this means that they will actually be held not later than March 1946. The President complained that the press had sometimes used its freedom to discredit the country, and added that the internal situation was disquieting. He repudiated the view that the Government were the enemies of capitalists, but blamed the well-to-do classes for the recent unrest: he denied that the Government's position was precarious. Possibly not; but it continues to waver between the dangerous and the ludicrous, and bears a disturbing resemblance to the situation reached a year ago.

The publication by the State Department on the 25th June of an analysis of measures taken by various Latin American Republics against German economic interests (showing Argentina as having 108 Axis "spearheads," of which none had been eliminated, and only four were in process of elimination) led to a statement by the Mexican Foreign Minister on the need for Argentina to fulfil the obligations contracted at Chapultepec. This drew a retort from the Argentine Foreign Minister, who declared that none of the American Republics had informed Argentina through their representatives in Buenos Aires that the Argentine Government was deemed to have failed in its obligations, and claimed that 134 German firms had been interviewed. Yet Sr. Ameghino was constrained to admit that only eight German firms were in process of liquidation, while two banks had been taken over.

The State Department's figures combined with Mr. Clayton's evidence to the Kilgore Committee on German attempts to create an economic safe-haven in Argentina, have brought a resurgence of anti-Argentine feeling in the United States. The publication of further news-reports damaging to the Farrell régime has induced Colonel Perón to make a clumsy attempt to silence United States correspondents. Thus, on the 30th June, he told the United States Ambassador that he intended to get the better of "economic interests," and made insinuations about the activities of United States Press correspondents, some of whom, he suggested, were in danger of assassination and should be taken into protective custody. Mr. Braden recalled that American writers had been threatened or assaulted before in Argentina, and added that any incident might gravely affect relations between the two countries. Colonel Perón at length said that he could control the fanatics he knew, but could not answer for "provincial fanatics." On the 3rd July Mr. Newman, the correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, took refuge in the United States Embassy, and the Argentine Under-Secretariat of Information issued a statement expressing its surprise at this "strange attitude" and "the complete unawareness of the authorities of the threats to which the correspondent was said to have been subjected." At a further interview Mr. Braden obtained guarantees from Colonel Perón and Mr. Newman emerged from his sanctuary. At this interview Colonel Perón insinuated that Mr. Braden was very unpopular, and when the ambassador cited Argentine opinion to the contrary, the Vice-President described his countrymen as the most double-faced nation on earth. Colonel Perón has now ordered Argentine newspapers not to publish reports about Argentina from the United States Press.

Nicaragua has become the first country to ratify the World Security Charter.

GERMANY.

FULL Military Government by British and American officials has been operating since the 11th July in the zones of Berlin occupied by the Western Allies. A proclamation, posted throughout the German capital, has announced the assumption of control by an inter-Allied Executive Military Council (Kommandantur) but has added that, until further notice, regulations hitherto issued by the Red Army command are to remain valid for all zones. There is thus to be no sudden change in matters where the Russian system of Military Government has differed from that of the British and Americans. Rations are to remain uniform throughout the German capital. Arrangements for the provision of food for the city would now appear, however, to be merely on an ad hoc basis, whereby Britain and the United States jointly provide 40,000 tons of foodstuffs from German stocks in their other zones to meet the first month's requirements. Dairy produce will apparently continue to be brought in to the British zone of Berlin from the Russian-occupied farming districts of Brandenburg, but the Russian authorities are themselves pressing for supplies of meat and fats for the whole of the city from the British and American zones of southern and western Germany. To meet some of the city's acute fuel problems, coal is for the time being to be brought to Berlin by rail from the British-controlled mines of the Ruhr at the rate of 2,400 tons per day. A number of special sub-committees are stated to have been set up under the inter-Allied Executive Military Council to supervise the work of the German Oberbürgermeister, Dr. Werner, and his municipal administration, and British and American Military Government officers have joined their Russian colleagues at Dr. Werner's headquarters in the Stadthaus near the Alexanderplatz. The relaxation on the 14th July of the ban on fraternisation for the British and United States troops has ended one discrepancy between the Anglo-American and the Russian systems of Military Government which, although not serious in itself, had become all the more obvious since the troops of the three nations had been stationed side-by-side in Berlin.

One observer has referred to Berlin as the focal point of all the complex problems that are going to arise in the occupation of Germany. Despite the glowing picture presented by the Russian-controlled news agencies before the arrival of the other Allied troops, conditions in the German capital would seem to be worse than in any badly-stricken city under British or American occupation in the south or west. The city is said to be virtually without shops, apart from food retailers and a few pharmacies, and the population is compelled to resort to a system of private barter to satisfy the needs of everyday life. Rations are at the moment so inadequate that many people are stated to be approaching starvation. The Berlin radio has had to warn the population against taking waste food from refuse bins, in view of the obvious dangers to public health. According to the Oberbürgermeister, Dr. Werner, about 100 persons are already dying every week from dysentery. Local labour offices are appealing to families to move from the capital and settle on the land in the surrounding villages, and about 10,000 persons are reported to have left so far. In the rural districts outside Berlin, however, Russian troops are said to be making the situation more difficult by rounding up and slaughtering cattle and stripping the country bare to satisfy their own immediate needs.

To the many thousands of homeless in Berlin have been added in the last few weeks large numbers of refugees from the eastern provinces of the Reich which are now occupied by the Poles. On the 9th July the municipal administration of the city was compelled to warn these refugees that there was no accommodation, food or work for them in Berlin, and that they would in future be stopped on the roads before they reached the capital. Nevertheless, there is stated to be no marked diminution in the migration into the Berlin area of dispossessed Germans from the former Polish Corridor and Silesia. The Central Executive of the German Communist Party has appealed to the refugees to halt permanently in the country districts which they have at present reached and has at the same time warned them that "any return to the regions east of the Oder is out of the question." At his meeting with Generals Weeks and Clay, on the 10th July, Marshal Zhukov made it clear that the Soviet authorities had agreed to leave the administration of all territory east of the Oder–Neisse line to the Poles—a decision, however, on which His Majesty's Government still reserves its position.

A new political organisation, the Liberal-Democratic Party, made its appearance in the Russian zone on the 13th July. Two of its principal aims were defined as "the assurance of the elementary requirements of life for the Germany people" and "the unqualified support of all moves to secure peaceful co-operation between nations and a place for Germany in such an international family." The new Liberal-Democratic Party would appear to be politically somewhat to the right of the other organisations so far constituted in Berlin. Its principal sponsors include the former Reich Minister of Economics and industrialist, Waldemar Koch, and the 85-year-old former Minister of Finance, Dr. Eugen Schiffer, both, for a time, members of the old Democratic Party. So far the Liberal-Democrats have not received from the Russian-controlled press and radio anything like the same degree of publicity as the Communists and the Social Democrats, or even the Christian Democratic Union which was formed last month. They were, however, included in the "united front" which, according to a broadcast by the Berlin radio of the 15th July, had been formed at a conference of the four existing German political parties.

The confiscation of all property owned by Germans who had belonged to the National Socialist Party or any of its subordinate organisations, including the S.A., the S.S. and the Gestapo, or who had "obtained from the Nazi régime well-paid posts in the Party, State, Armed Forces or industry and commerce," was announced in a drastic decree issued by the Berlin municipal administration on the 13th July. The significance of this decree, it was stated in its preamble, was "likely to reach far beyond Berlin, although for the present it applies only to Berlin." The presence in the Russian zone of large numbers of landless German peasants from the East has now given a considerable fillip to the agitation of the German Communists for the expropriation of the big estate-owners, and it would seem that officials of the party are already touring the villages and arranging the appointment of commissions to partition the estates into small-holdings.

Important progress towards the reconstitution of a sound German system of justice in the West has been made by the United States Military Government at Stuttgart with the reopening on the 17th July of all German law courts in the American-occupied area of Württemberg. Jurisdiction in normal civil and criminal matters will, it has been stated, henceforth be exercised by these German courts, although all decisions must in the last instance be submitted to Military Government. Among the courts reopened are the provincial courts ("Landgerichte") at Ulm, Ellwangen and Heilbronn and the district courts ("Amtsgerichte") subsidiary to them, along with other district courts in several small towns around Stuttgart. To the north-west of Württemberg, the Military Government authorities in the 15th United States Army area have reopened the provincial courts at Zweibrücken and Frankenthal, along with 13 district courts. In the area controlled by the United States 12th Army Group, the reopening of German courts has enabled the number of Military Government courts to be reduced from 469 to 343. Approximately 7,500 cases have so far been tried in these Military Government courts, but only 30 per cent. have involved anything more serious than violations of curfew or infractions of travel restrictions.

On the 10th July, the United States Military Government in Bavaria announced that judicial proceedings had been instituted against all persons in local economic life who had played a major part in Germany's rearmament, and on that and subsequent days the Munich radio published the names of 125 well-known Nazi businessmen and industrialists who had been arrested. These names included directors of important war plants like the Bayerische Mortorenwerke, A.E.G., Fichtel und Sachs, Kloeckner-Humboldt-Deutz, Junkers and Messerschmidt. Among them were Professor Willy Messerschmidt himself, Dr. Karl Roechling and the Silesian coal and steel magnate, Count Henckel von Donnersmarck. The property of those concerned was stated to have been seized. The news of the arrests followed only four days after the announcement that the United States Military Government had taken over the management, factories and equipment of all branches of the huge I.G.-Farben combine in the American zone as one of a series of measures to disarm Germany industrially.

The hitherto rigid ban on trade union activity in the West is now being gradually lifted. On the 10th July it was announced that a "General Free Trade Union" had been recognised by the United States Military Government authorities at Heidelberg, and that negotiations were in progress for it to receive former trade union property which had been taken over by the Nazi Labour Front. The "General Free Trade Union" would, it was stated, work towards the restoration of the 8-hour day and the introduction of a 40-hour week in the German factories. The revival of other trade unions is reported to be under consideration by the new provincial Ministry of Labour, which has been set up in Munich to take over for Bavaria the functions of the former Reich Ministry of Labour. Permission to form trade unions was stated on the 16th July to have been granted "on principle" by the United States Military Government in Württemberg.

Agreement has now been reached by the Allied Reparations Commission in Moscow as to the share of the final reparations from Germany which each of the three major Powers shall receive. 56 per cent. of the total amount of reparations, including the proceeds of German national wealth removed from the Reich and of deliveries from Germany since the end of hostilities, is to go to the Soviet Union and 22 per cent. each to the United Kingdom and the United States. Claims for reparations by the other Allied nations will be met by each of the three major Powers giving up a proportionate share of their own reparations. What was clearly an inspired address on the payment of reparations as a national duty was delivered to the German people over the Moscow Radio by the President of the Free German Committee, Erich Weinert, on the 11th July. Reparations in kind for the devastation caused in Russia, Weinert pointed out, must enjoy priority over the work of reconstruction in Germany. The more energetic and sincere the contribution of every German to the task of reparation, he added, the more prompt would be the return of German prisoners of war home from Russia, and the departure of the occupying Russian forces from Germany.

AUSTRIA.

The agreement on the control machinery for Austria was signed in the E.A.C. on the 4th July, and the agreement on the zones to be occupied by Great Britain, the United States, Russia and France, was signed on the 9th July. Within Austria's 1937 frontiers, Russia is to occupy Lower Austria (except the City of Vienna), that part of the province of Upper Austria situated on the left bank of the Danube, and the Burgenland. United States troops are to occupy the province of Salzberg, and that part of Upper Austria on the right bank of the Danube. The provinces of Tyrol and Vorarlberg will be occupied by France. Carinthia, including Ost-Tyrol, and the province of Styria, except the Burgenland, will be occupied by British troops.

The City of Vienna is to be an area of joint occupation by the Four Powers. The districts of Leopoldstadt, Brigittenau, and Floridsdorf in the north-east and Wieden and Favoriten in the south, will be occupied by Soviet troops. The districts of Neubau, Josefstadt, Hernals, Alsergrund, Währing and Döbling, in the north-west of the city, will be occupied by United States troops. South of the United States zone, the French will occupy Mariahilf, Penzing, Funfhaus (including Rudolfstein) and Ottakring. British troops will occupy Hietzing, Margareten, and Meidling in the south-west, and, separated from these districts by the Soviet-occupied wedge of Wieden and Favoriten, Landstrasse and Simmering in the south-east. The Innere Stadt will be jointly occupied by troops of all four Powers.

The boundaries between the zones of occupation, with the exception of the boundaries of the City of Vienna and of the Burgenland, will be those which came into effect by the German Decree of the 1st October, 1938. The boundaries of the City of Vienna and of the province of Burgenland will be the pre-Anschluss boundaries (see Map).

An Inter-Allied Governing Authority, consisting of four commandants appointed by their respective Commanders-in-Chief, will be established to direct jointly the administration of the City of Vienna,. General Mark Clark has been named as the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Forces in Austria, and American representative on the Allied Control Council for Austria. General McCreery is the British Commander-in-Chief and representative on the Council. Marshal Koniev is acting for Marshal Tolbukhin as Soviet Commander-in-Chief. The French Commander-in-Chief has not yet been officially announced.

The Tulln airfield is to be under the control of the United States forces, while the Schwechat airfield will be under British control, for the joint use of British and French forces. The occupying Powers will be allowed free access to the airfields assigned to them.

The non-fraternisation order has been relaxed in Austria.

On the 16th July one "Lambert," who is known to be a representative of the Comité Autrichien de la Libération and to have paid several visits to Austria recently, gave an interview to Press corespondents in Paris. Claiming to be the personal representative of Dr. Renner, he confirmed that large-scale removal of machinery, cattle, clothing and fuel stocks was taking place under the direction of the Russian Commissar for prizes of war, who works directly under the Government in Moscow, and who had also seized everything in the banks. Herr Lambert thought that the results of elections to factory committees reflected these conditions : at one big factory only one of twelve members was a Communist, the rest were Socialist. The system of refuse collection in Vienna was not functioning, and typhus had broken out. Because of the lack of electricity it was impossible to listen to the wireless, so that there was great ignorance of international affairs. Dr. Renner himself did not know what the San Francisco Conference was about. Herr Lambert emphasised the importance of the opening of communications between the zones, to enable food to be distributed equitably and the displaced population to return to their homes. He appealed to the western Allies not to let down the new Austrian Republic. The Austrian Provisional Government had enunciated the principle that Austrian liberty was destroyed when the Constitution was annulled in 1933. Although he gave a gloomy picture of conditions in Vienna, Herr Lambert was careful not to complain of the treatment which Austria was receiving. The interview as a whole definitely represents a Social Democrat as distinct from a Communist point of view.

On the 10th July an announcement on Vienna Radio said that " a number of incidents resulting from subversive propaganda, and sabotage, organised by underground Nazis,'' had been '' met by energetic and immediate State Police measures.'' Several hundred suspects were arrested in the first large-scale round-up. The Viennese were now asked, the broadcast continued, to obey unconditionally the instructions issued by the official organs in connexion with these measures, while they were assured that Red Army members engaged in this '' clearing-up process '' would always be accompanied by a German-speaking official. Previously, brief radio announcements had indicated that there was some sabotage and subversive activity, but this is the first direct admission and warning. It is possible that the unexplained disaster to Vienna's electricity system on the 29th June was caused by sabotage.

One provision of a new nationality law passed by the Renner Government is that pre-1938 members of the Nazi Party are to lose their Austrian nationality.

In the last days before Austria's collapse there was a run on the banks, with the result that when the banks were closed, most of the bank-notes were in private hands. The Renner Government has now taken measures to collect hoarded money, and has warned people that Reich bank-notes in circulation in Austria will soon be called in for stamping. The public are assured that the purchasing power will not be reduced thereby, but that those people who take their money to the Savings Bank now will have to pay less levy than those who wait for the stamping of the notes. There were considerable restrictions on the withdrawal and transfer of money, but if the hoarded money was paid back, they would be relaxed. Officials were told that it was their duty to '' calm and enlighten '' the population on this subject. The Government's appeals and warnings would seem to have had some success. On the 14th July Vienna Radio reported queues at the re-opening banks, and deposits in the first week were said to exceed withdrawals by RM. 100 million.

No clear picture of the strength and position of the old Austrian political parties has yet emerged. According to one report the People's Party in Vienna, at first thought to be the old Christian Social Party under a new name, is to include representatives of the Landbund, Heimatschutz, Monarchist, and Gross Deutschland parties, although it is composed mainly of Christian Socialists. In Graz, three parties exist openly—Communist, Social Democrat, and People's Party. One report says that the latter is numerically the strongest, but it is largely composed of people unwilling to undertake political and administrative activities, so that Socialists and Communists are prominent in official posts. In Innsbruck, the American-appointed Landeshauptmann, Gruber, seems to have been at least partly successful in his aim of forming a new party composed of resistance elements. The new group—the Demokratische Staatspartei—is composed of fairly right-wing members of the resistance, and its aim is said to be to create a strong conciliatory centre party between the Socialists and the extreme right. The party programme is identical with that of the Tyrol People's Party.

The Salzburg gendarmerie has been re-established, under a commander who suffered disciplinary action in 1938 for his loyalty to Austria.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

The reduction in the number of American and Soviet troops on Czechoslovak territory referred to in last week's Summary has been taking place. The Russians are apparently stationed almost wholly in the frontier districts, apart from Slovakia. The American forces have been reduced to three divisions with the removal of a further two divisions; the large number of displaced persons in the American zone has made it impossible for the Americans to withdraw so far from towns like Plzeň. The State Department is willing to take up with Moscow the question of a simultaneous and complete withdrawal of occupying armies if it receives a suggestion to this effect from the Czechoslovak Government.

The American attitude to the minorities and frontier questions is very close to that of His Majesty's Government. The State Department has recommended the Prague Government to lay its plans for the transfer of the minorities before the Allied States represented on the Control Council for Germany and the Control Commission for Hungary, through the appropriate Czechoslovak co-ordinating missions. In reply to the Czechoslovak note on the Kladsko (Glatz) salient, the State Department said that it cannot agree with the Czechoslovak Government that the end of military operations in Europe is a desirable opportunity for making frontier changes. The United States recognises the 1937 frontiers of Germany, and a formal occupation of the Kladsko area would be regarded as a unilateral act in disregard of the agreements between the major allies. Nevertheless, provided the other members of the Council agreed, the United States does not object in principle to a temporary occupation, nor to local administrations entrusted to indigenous Polish or Czech officials.

From Belgrade it is learnt that the Governments of Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia have reached an agreement concerning the division of their share of the Hungarian reparations payments. Of the 100 million dollars involved, the Czechoslovak Government has relinquished part of its half share previously agreed upon in recognition of the greater suffering endured by Yugoslavia, and is to receive now only 30 per cent. The arrival in Prague of Dr. Černej, the Yugoslav Minister, was the occasion for a ceremony at the Hradčaný on the 9th July. There was a very cordial exchange of greetings between the new Minister and the President, and an emphasis upon the bright prospects for economic and political co-operation between the two countries. "Apart from selling her own products to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia intends to place her great ports, which must became Czechoslovakia's gate to the world, at the disposal of Czechoslovak industry."

Press and radio comment during the last few days in Prague has been preoccupied with the publishing of the Presidential Decree, of the 19th June concerning the punishment of war criminals and traitors, and the setting up of the necessary Extraordinary People's Courts. At an industrial conference in Prague on the 11th July, Minister Laušman announced officially that the Government intended to proceed with the nationalisation of key and heavy industries. In a press statement, Premier Fierlinger referred to the Government plans for the setting up of the Provisional National Assembly by way of delegation from the local, district and provincial National Committees. He said it was considered necessary that some of the National Committees, formed in the heat of battle, should be reconstructed to reflect local opinion more fully. He declared that it was necessary to solve the pressing economic and social questions of the day, before the Provisional Assembly would be able to issue writs for the election of the Constitutional National Assembly. A Press Bureau Broadcast on the same day, the 11th, quoted Fierlinger as saying that the Soviet Government had promised full help in carrying out the transfer of minorities. "Regular trains are now already leaving for the Soviet zone of occupation in Germany and towns like Litomerice, Ustí, not to speak of Brno, Jihlava and Znojmo are again Czech."

Bratislava Radio issued a statement on the 11th from the Slovak National Council accusing some members of the Church of reintroducing Hlinka's policy of reaction. The Archbishop of Nitra and other Church officials, it was claimed, were attempting to oppose the decision of State control of education, by obtaining signatures to a petition. This would not be tolerated.

Dr. Hajek, Professor of Forensic Medicine in Prague, addressing a conference of doctors on the 10th, produced evidence to show that the German propaganda story in April 1943, accusing the Russians of having massacred thousands of Polish officers, was a lie. He had been forced by the Germans to witness the "disgusting comedy" at Katin near Smolensk, and had assisted in the investigations when the place had been retaken by the Red Army. The victims could not have been buried for more than eighteen months according to this evidence, and had been shot, without exception, with German ammunition.

POLAND.

Further recognitions of the Polish Provisional Government include those of the Governments of Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, Switzerland, Mexico and Finland. In addition to the earlier statement of President Raczkiewicz, reported in Summary No. 300, M. Raczynski, the Ambassador in London of the London Polish Government issued a dignified protest on the 6th July claiming that his Government was still the only legally valid Government of Poland, and enumerating the Alliances, Agreements and Declarations to which that Government was a party.

There are signs of the beginning of a return to more normal conditions in Poland. The Vistula is being reopened for passenger traffic from Warsaw to Torun. The Red Army has begun its withdrawal, and is to start handing over the main railways to the Polish administration on the 1st August. The Minister of Education has said he adheres to the principle of compulsory Religious Instruction in all state schools, according to Article 120 of the 1921 Constitution. A party of foreign journalists has visited the Greater Upper Silesia area, including the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph.

Three Polish submarines which had been interned in Sweden have been handed over to the Swedish Government with a view to eventual transfer.

Settlement of Poles in former German provinces continues and settlers have reached the Czech border in Oppeln Silesia, and the Oder estuary north of Stettin. The Warsaw Cabinet has approved a Bill for the alteration of provincial boundaries including the incorporation of considerable areas of German Pomerania and Brandenburg into the Polish Provinces of Gdansk (Danzig), Pomorze (Polish Pomerania) and Poznania. Other changes concern the Southern provinces and East Prussia.

Controversy is acute on the question of immediate return to Poland. In a recent speech in Italy General Anders warned members of the Polish forces of the possible consequences of return. A number of Poles in this country have appealed to all Poles to go back who can do so, notably Professor Kot in Jutro Polski, fifteen leading political figures (including M. Adam Romer) quoted in a Warsaw broadcast, and a group of four Polish generals in Great Britain, including Modelski, late Chief of Staff, and Boruta-Spiechowicz, late Corps Commander in Scotland. Public meetings in this country show majorities opposed to immediate return. Recent news from camps in Germany show large majorities in favour of going back at once. Many seemed to have been swayed by the return of MM. Mikolajczyk, Grabski and Stanczyk. They have now been joined by M. Eugeniusz Kwiatkowski who is credited with the responsibility for the construction of the port of Gdynia and is an ex-Cabinet Minister. The desire of Cardinal Hlond, the Polish Primate, to go back and resume his functions, important for ecclesiastical reasons, may, if realised, also have weight in all émigré circles. His Eminence was reported to have reached Turin by the 14th July on his way to Czechoslovakia where he hoped to arrange for the remainder of his journey.

Mr. R. M. A. Hankey took up his duties as Chargé d'Affaires in Warsaw on the 14th July. Mr. Victor Cavendish-Bentinck has been appointed British Ambassador. The date of his going to Warsaw has not been announced.

(For statement by Dr. Hayek of his impressions when shown the scene of the Katyn massacre by the Nazis see above under "Czechoslovakia.")

SOVIET UNION.

On the 11th July a decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. introduced the military ranks established for Red Army and Red Navy officers for the commanding personnel of organs of the People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs and the People's Commissariat for State Security. Junior officers are to continue to wear the existing uniforms and insignia, but N.K.V.D. generals and admirals will adopt the uniforms and insignia of the corresponding ranks of the Red Army and Red Navy. As a consequence of this decree the rank of Marshal of the Soviet Union has been conferred on M. Beriya, People's Commissar for Internal Affairs, and the rank of Colonel-General on M. Merkulov, Commissar of State Security, first rank.

Too much significance should not be attached to this decree. It brings the officers of the N.K.V.D. into line with Red Army and Navy officers, allows them to share the prestige now accorded to Soviet officers and perhaps to escape from some of the unpopularity attached to the N.K.V.D. In the early days of the war, when the loyalty of certain sections of the Red Army might be open to doubt, there may have been advantages in distinguishing the picked men of the N.K.V.D.; but if such a need ever existed it has long since vanished. On the other hand, with the cessation of hostilities, the N.K.V.D. may anticipate an attempt to curtail its powers; and this decree may be a defensive step aimed at consolidating its position by identifying its officers with the Red Army. One incidental consequence of the decree is that Marshal Beriya now outranks all his colleagues in the Politburo except Generalissimo Stalin and Marshal Voroshilov; in particular, he will take precedence over Colonel-General Zhdanov.

On the 12th July, in Berlin, Field-Marshal Montgomery decorated Marshal Zhukov with the G.C.B., Marshal Rokossovsky with the K.C.B., Generals Sokolovsky and Malinin with the K.B.E.

The reports of ill-treatment of Soviet citizens abroad have now been extended to include Palestine. Tass issued a statement on the 11th July claiming that Soviet citizens, mostly youths and children from Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina, who had fled to Palestine in 1943 from German and Roumanian persecution, were being cruelly treated in their place of refuge. The numbers involved appear to be very small, as representatives of the Soviet military mission in Egypt, who had visited Palestine two months before, had registered only 200 children and a number of adults. The British military authorities were stated to have promised that all the persons registered should be put into a special camp with a view to early repatriation, but the Tass report alleged that after the departure of the Soviet mission "reactionary Jewish organisations" began conducting anti-Soviet propaganda among these Soviet citizens, urging them not to return to their motherland; in spite of this, however, their burning desire to return home was not quenched. The report went on to allege that actual physical persecution had been conducted by "dark elements," who were unceremoniously dismissing Soviet citizens from work, expelling them from their flats and even beating them up, the pretext apparently being that they were Soviet spies. A statement was quoted from a group of Soviet youths among these exiles who had written to the Anti-Fascist Youth Committee in Moscow maintaining that they had been brought to Palestine against their wish, and were being persecuted for their political views, most of them being Komsomols. The Tass report concluded by criticising "reactionary organs of the Jewish press, obviously inspired," which were adopting a hostile attitude towards the Soviet citizens who wished to return to the U.S.S.R., and were spreading anti-Soviet lies. The truth of these reports is difficult to assess; it is, however, a fact that Zionist organisations do habitually bring pressure to bear on European Jewish refugees in Palestine not to return to their home country, and that a campaign urging them to remain in Palestine is conducted in the local press.

On the 13th July Krasnaya Zvezda published a two-column article on the Arab League by M. Belinkov, the first to appear on the subject in the Soviet press. M. Belinkov discussed the history of the Arab question since the Great Powers opposed a united Arab State at the Paris Peace Conference. At that date the Arabs were chiefly concerned with eliminating foreign domination; all that they got was a number of Arab States with restricted sovereignty and no real independence. The dynastic, political, economic and religious divergences of these States hampered the movement for political unity. But now, he argued, the Arabs saw that complete sovereignty might be reached through Arab unity, though there were still difficulties in the way. The Arab League had not solved the conflict between the Levant States and France, and could not solve the problem of Palestine. It had not proved a vital force in the Arab world. The article drew no conclusions, but implied that the Arab League, based on the existing Arab States, was favoured by Great Britain, whilst American opinion was more reserved. It also hinted that the Arab League was powerless in face of the strategic interests of the Great Powers, and perhaps intended to imply that a more democratic and radical Arab movement was required.

A renewed campaign against the Vatican has been set on foot during the past week. The challenge was first issued, not in an official Soviet source, but in an Appeal to the whole Christian world issued by the National Council of the Armenian Church, convened at Echmiadzin for the election of a Catholicos Patriarch (see Summary No. 300). The appeal stated that the Christian Church was called upon to establish the ideal of fraternity, justice and freedom in the life of the whole of humanity; politically tendentious efforts of Christian Churches could only hinder the attainment of this aim. The Roman Catholic Church by involving itself in political matters and defending the German destructive force was laying itself open to this very condemnation of hampering the true Christian purpose. The Council accordingly solemnly condemned the position of the Vatican as "incompatible with the high aims of Christianity."

New Times in its third issue argued on familiar lines that the post-war plans of the Vatican were cast in "a spirit of black reaction." The current number of the Journal of the Moscow Patriarchate carried two articles on the subject. The first by Metropolitan Benjamin, Exarch of the Moscow Patriarchate in North America, maintained that the Roman Catholic Church was fighting consciously and deliberately against the Soviet Union, and "trying to undermine one of the most powerful and most self-sacrificing members of the United Nations." A second article by the new Bishop of Volhynia and Rovno, Nikolai, dealt with the attempts of the Vatican to dominate the Orthodox Church in liberated Slav territories. His diocese in Western Ukraine was in fact the scene of a good deal of Uniate propaganda during the German occupation. A commentary by M. Mihailov, broadcast in English from Moscow (13th July), expressed alarm at the growing Catholic press campaign in favour of giving the Pope a say at the Peace Conference. After making the point that the Vatican, by aiming at "restoring the disturbed balance of Europe," was attempting to return to a system which had made Fascist aggression possible, M. Mihailov remarked on the present gravitation of reactionaries of many different countries towards Rome—Franco Spain, the remnants of the Hapsburg dynasty, royalists in Italy, Schuschnigg, Weizsäcker, Brüning, and Prince Rupprecht. It is interesting that King Leopold was omitted from the list. Brüning, and other German Catholics in the United States, were further criticised in the form of quotations from a favourite Soviet source, the magazine Protestant, which stated that they were trying to direct Anglo-United States policy towards Germany into reactionary channels and to create a cordon sanitaire west of the Elbe.

The Dean of Canterbury has been awarded the Order of the Red Banner of Labour "for outstanding organisational work in the collection of funds for aiding the people of the Soviet Union."

SCANDINAVIA.

On the 13th and 14th July the Nordic Labour Movement's Co-operation Committee met in Stockholm. It was influentially attended. The Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Norway represented their country in the conference, and the proceedings opened with a speech by M. Hansson, the Swedish Premier. Three members of the Finnish Government, MM. Hiltunen, Vuori and Kilpi, attended, together with M. Fagerholm, the Speaker of the Diet, and M. Varjonen, secretary of the Social Democrat Party. Denmark was represented by her Prime Minister, M. Buhl. On the 15th July the conference issued a statement expressing the determination to continue and extend organised co-operation between the Northern peoples, especially in the cultural sphere. Uniformity of legislation, so far as possible, and extended economic collaboration were mentioned as desirable aims, and the conference resolved to consider as soon as possible the co-ordination of social laws and services, a common Nordic labour market, the extended exchange of students and mutual recognition of school certificates. In international matters there should be permanent contact between the northern nations, who should all take part in the work of the organisation founded at San Francisco.

Further steps towards the cultivation of Scandinavian solidarity which have been announced are a resumption of the periodic Nordic inter-parliamentary meetings, discontinued during the war, in Copenhagen on the 10th and 11th August, and a meeting of the Kings of Norway, Sweden and Denmark in the Danish capital in September on King Christian's birthday. The bishops of the Scandinavian countries are also to meet in Copenhagen, about the 20th August, in preparation for the Lutheran World Congress. On the other hand, Göteborgs Handels Tidning for the 7th July has criticised somewhat bitterly a Danish restriction of book imports, as a deliberate breach of the normal cultural relations which it considers bound to have an adverse affect on Nordic unity.

The settlement of the Swedish Metalworkers' strike (see last week's Summary) does not yet appear to be secure. On the 12th July a meeting of the club and group managements in the Metalworkers' Union challenged the agreement by a large majority, and resolved that the representatives who had negotiated for the workers had forfeited their confidence and should resign.

THE LOW COUNTRIES.

The Unity Trades Union has demanded that the claims of the Rotterdam dockers should be met by the 26th July, failing which a general strike would be called. According to M. L. van Os, one of the leading members of this Union, the aims of the Union include the improvement of the mental and spiritual as well as of the social conditions of the workers, and he has complained that the motives for the Rotterdam strike were almost universally misrepresented in the press. The Prime Minister announced on the wireless on the 13th July that the Government would not tolerate strikes which took advantage of the abnormal conditions in Holland to demand disproportionate wage increases, and that he was prepared to take measures to curtail the right to strike, since all disputes should be settled by negotiation in a time of national necessity. He also announced that agricultural labour would be mobilised for the harvest on a voluntary basis and appealed to the people to answer the call. In the meantime the Rotterdam dockers have worked day and night to create a record in the unloading of three coal ships.

Great interest is shown in the press in the formation of a "Netherlands Committee for the Extension of Territory" under the chairmanship of M. van den Broeck, former Minister of Finance and Industry. The object of this Committee is to co-ordinate the findings of all other such committees, and to study and collect data on the annexation of German territory. The only paper directly opposed to annexation is the Communist De Waarheid on the ground that a policy of annexation is contrary to democratic principles.

The Government has set up a kind of emergency Parliament of 50 members called a "National Advisory Committee," which will meet for the first time on the 20th July.

The Belgian crisis remains unsolved in spite of the Prime Minister's seven days' visit to Salzburg. Although at the beginning of the visit abdication was considered likely in view of the summoning of the Prince Regent and the Presidents of the Chamber and Senate to Salzburg, the meeting ended by the King refusing either to return or to abdicate. On the 17th July the Prime Minister accordingly presented a Bill to the Chamber of Representatives amending the Constitution so as to provide that the Regency might not be terminated without the express permission of Parliament. The Bill was passed by 98 votes to 6 with 32 abstentions mostly from the parties on the Right. The six Catholic members of the Government had resigned before the introduction of the Bill. At the moment of writing the Bill has yet to be discussed in the Senate.

When the Prime Minister was in Austria the Minister of National Defence, M. Mundeler, issued an order forbidding demonstrations or public assemblies of more than four persons, and the big public demonstration planned for Sunday the 15th July was also expressly forbidden. This decree was accepted with surprisingly little comment in the press and was followed up by a statement of approval by the Central Committee of Democratic Unity. It was generally felt to be a sensible measure in view of the believed imminence of the solution of the crisis, and also of the impending arrival of President Truman in Belgium.

It is probable that the decisions of Parliament will tide over the crisis, of which the Belgian people, with their eyes on world events, are beginning to show themselves heartily tired.

FRANCE.

In a broadcast on the 12th July in which he dealt with the Provisional Government's Constitutional proposals (see last Summary) General de Gaulle paid a tribute to the achievements of the Third Republic at home and abroad. While recognising the need for changes he considered that the country as a whole must say whether the institutions of the Third Republic were still valid. It was inadvisable, moreover, that the Constituent Assembly should become an omnipotent institution, unlimited in scope and duration.

This broadcast was sharply criticised, particularly on the Left, which argued that it made no reference to the alternative danger of a dictatorial Government; and the Bill as finally tabled for discussion by the Consultative Assembly was modified so as to provide for two parallel referendums (simultaneously with the general election on the 14th October) on the two questions: (1) Do you favour a single Constituent Assembly? (2) If so, do you favour the Provisional Government's Bill defining the Constituent Assembly's powers in relation to the executive? A negative reply to the first question means a vote in favour of the Constitution of 1875 and its two Chambers (the election to the Conseils Généraux have been arranged to take place on the 23rd and the 30th September and preparations will thus have been made for the election of a new Senate). But those who favour a single-chamber Constituent Assembly can by the new arrangement decide whether it is to have unlimited powers, or is, during the seven months of its existence, to confine itself largely to drawing up a new draft Constitution while its function in respect of the Provisional Government would have a mainly consultative character.

It was in an atmosphere of détente, therefore, that the 14th July was celebrated in Paris. As in recent years, the military parade of the morning was followed by a political demonstration, largely "Leftist" in character, in the afternoon. But, for the first time, the Place de la Bastille was the centre of the official celebrations. General de Gaulle, accompanied by the Bey of Tunis (whose visit, like that of the Sultan of Morocco, has been made much of—see Summary No. 298), took the salute and later congratulated the British units on their appearance and expressed satisfaction at the fact that for the first time troops of other nations had joined in a 14th July review.

The afternoon procession was led by the Conseil National de la Résistance, and all Resistance organisations and Left parties were represented, the Communist Party being particularly conspicuous. Some banners demanded a sovereign Constituent Assembly, others the death sentence for Pétain; and in some cases costumes of the French Revolution were worn.

Among the most prominent demonstrators were the 2,200 delegates of the "Etats Généraux de la Renaissance Française." This body—whose first session (10th–14th July) had been arranged last December at the first Assembly of the Departmental Committees of Liberation (see Summary No. 272)—consists of delegates from each department, representing the organisation and parties which joined in last summer's liberation. At their meetings, under the chairmanship of M. Saillant, they had been vociferously demanding a "sovereign Constituent Assembly." That all Republican opinion did not favour this cause was, however, shown by M. Herriot's speech at the Lyons celebrations.

He supported General de Gaulle's attitude; defended the record of the Third Republic; and attacked the violent campaign against it and its institutions.

Among the many messages reported in connexion with the 14th July was one conveyed by the Lebanese Foreign Minister to the French Delegate-General to the Levant States, where French press and wireless messages report an improvement in the atmosphere (see under "Middle East"). But the exclusion of France from Potsdam is bitterly commented on by wireless spokesmen, who are suggesting that questions in the Levant, the Straits and Tangier are being settled there behind France's back. Moreover, it is added: "France's prestige in German eyes is part of her means of defence against the German Empire." Even commentators on foreign affairs of long experience like MM. Bernus and Mousset sadly shake their heads at the disregard of France's counsel and experience at a moment when decisions vitally affecting Europe's whole future are being taken.

In the meantime, MM. Tarbé de St. Hardouin and Jacques Rueff have been appointed legal and economic adviser respectively to the French occupation authorities in Germany; General Koenig, French Delegate to the Berlin Inter-Allied Commission; and General de Monsabert, Commander of the French troops in Germany. General de Lattre de Tassigny has been appointed to the post of Inspector-General of the Army.

The allegations contained in a book by M. Louis Rougier that an agreement had been concluded in 1940 between His Majesty's Government and the Vichy Government (see Summary No. 299) have been the subject of a Foreign Office statement which, according to The Times, has been received with satisfaction in French official circles. It is to be used in evidence by the prosecution at Pétain's trial, which is due to begin on the 23rd July.

SWITZERLAND.

The expulsion of National Socialists and Fascists continues. Among the latest batch of 448 to be deported were 90 members of the German Legation in Berne and 19 Italians.

From the 13th July, the funds of all persons expelled from Swiss territory have been frozen. Payments to such persons can be made only to the Swiss National Bank, and no property deals can be effected without the consent of the Swiss Clearing Office, while the transfer of such property abroad is absolutely prohibited. It was further decided, after discussions between the Swiss Government and the bankers, that all German holdings in Switzerland must be disclosed, together with the correct names of the owners. It was felt that this step, besides ascertaining whether high Nazi officials had large deposits in Swiss banks, would remove American fears that Swiss banks were hampering Allied efforts to track down German assets hidden in neutral countries. The Swiss Bankers' Association declares that, for a long time now, Swiss banks have exercised great restraint in accepting foreign capital, and that the figure mentioned abroad for German holdings in Swiss banks—16,000 million—is grossly exaggerated. One of the main problems associated with this measure is how the Swiss Government can meet Allied requests without violating the principle of secrecy which is regarded as vital to the Swiss banking system.

Another problem under discussion in the Federal Council arises out of the termination of active military service on the 20th August. As Swiss law allows the death penalty only in war-time, questions have arisen regarding traitors sentenced to death in absentia and not captured until after the 20th August. While opinion varies on the subject, many hold that, to ensure equality of treatment, the death sentences already passed should be carried out if the condemned persons are subsequently arrested.

The extension of Switzerland's diplomatic relations is forecast in Federal Council discussions on the advisability of opening Legations in Denmark, Norway, Canada, Australia, South Africa, China and certain South American States. Meanwhile, on the 13th July, the appointments were announced of M. René de Weck, former Minister in Roumania, as Swiss envoy in Rome; M. Henri Martin, Swiss envoy to Portugal; and Gérard Bauer, Commercial Attaché to the Swiss Legation in Paris. It is expected that in the near future Ministers will be appointed to Warsaw and Lisbon.

In other spheres, too, Swiss external relations are steadily returning to normal. A new trade agreement has just been concluded with Spain, from which a considerable increase in the exchange of goods is hoped for. Negotiations have also been carried out concerning the resumption of air communications between the two countries. This, however, depends on permission to fly over France. A visa and passport agreement has been signed with France, coming into force on the 15th July, providing a number of relaxations, but not, however, reaching pre-war conditions.

Imports for July showed a slight increase, though exports were lower. Rations for July were also increased, and a rather more optimistic view is taken of Switzerland's future food supply.

The Japanese Government has now replied to the Swiss protest about the killing of Swiss subjects in the Gilbert Islands and Manila. Japan has not yet explicitly admitted responsibility, on the ground that it is at present impossible to investigate the matter; but she has expressed regret and sympathy, and offered the sum of 1 million fr. for the victims' families. The Federal Council has decided to accept the proposed settlement as satisfactory.

SPAIN.

The canicular atmosphere of Madrid this July is heavily charged with rumours of impending political change. The old familiar stories of a Council of the Realm to be set up in a more liberal Spain purged of the Falange and fortified by "free" municipal elections have been re-told with insistency and specific detail. But chancellery and café gossip seem to have crystallised in a remarkable article in A.B.C. on the 11th July which declared that the time had come for Spain "to remove the camouflage made necessary by the war and now no longer required," and the authoritative sources of some of the current reports do suggest that something really is in the wind this time.

Through all the confused buzz of tittle-tattle, which lights now on Señor Benjumea, the ailing and conservative Minister of Finance, now on the equivocal trimming Lequerica, Minister for Foreign Affairs, finally to hover around Arrese, the dyed-in-the-wool Falangist Minister and Secretary of the Party, it seems that the plan of "de-falangización" previously prepared but not put into action (see Summary No. 289) is now taking shape. It apparently consists in shearing the Falange of all political power and replacing the Party Ministers by men who can be presented as Catholics, Conservatives and even Monarchists, but who are in fact "Franquistas" body and soul. Franco's sincerity is always suspect, but one preliminary test will be the position of Arrese. If, indeed, the key-office of Minister-Party Secretary be abolished and a non-Falangist be given the Ministry of Interior, which would then control the Civil Governors—who are also provincial delegates of the Falange—the Franco régime would be furnished with a façade at least of demi-respectability. Hitherto the Caudillo has shrunk from such a step. It was not that the Falange were particularly strong; the Army, who are the ultimate repository of power, have always been confident that in a show of force the result would not be in any doubt. But the Party has wielded the strength given by the menace of bloodshed; they countered hints of dissolution by threats of violence, and those threats, playing on fear, the most powerful collective emotion in Spain to-day, have been believed. The country is in the grip of a spiritual apathy, an "accidie," which stultifies any real attempt at reform. In a land so rich in monuments of the nobility of man, where the measure of human worth has been so satisfyingly displayed, it is distressing to see the complete thrall of fear with the consequent upthrust of material values. Faced with this inharmonius picture of a Western European nation still under the press of the evil things which we went to war to destroy, one is forced to ask the question, "How much do the Spaniards really want freedom?" Seemingly the answer must be that they are held by a neurosis, a Franco fixation, which, so long as they enjoy physical safety and material prosperity, limits their desire to a mere wordy longing for liberty. This is the source of the internal strength of Franco, and of the paradox that the most rebelliously individualistic people in the world are to-day passively accepting a tyrannical tutelage of which no civilised State could be anything but ashamed. The régime is reinforced, too, by Franco's own conviction, which is coming to be shared by his disillusioned political opponents, that Great Britain and the United States, officially limiting themselves to the frigid courtesies of correct relations, have no intention whatever of taking steps to turn him out. The only cloud on the Caudillo's horizon is Russia, and even that he thinks is silver lined, for he seems to be fooling himself with the hope of being delivered by a war between the Soviet Union and the Western Allies.

Given this situation, Franco must think himself a most generous-minded man to consent to play through for our benefit the solemn farce of making Spain into an "organic democracy." He may dismiss Arrese and the Party Ministers —and they are reported to be prudently going through their files—and he has had his famous Bill of Rights passed by the Cortes. (But note that most of the essential liberties defined in the charter will need special legislation before becoming operative.) The next step will be the promulgation of a new municipal law—elections are due to be held in the autumn—and of a law establishing the freedom of the press. All to the accompaniment of the usual transcendental stultiloquence. After that we shall see what all the shouting amounts to. There is a Spanish proverb peculiarly apposite whenever Franco makes fair promises: mucho ruido pocas nueces—a few nuts in a tin make a deuce of a din.
