The Debate on The Address.

If any additional proof was needed of the inefficiency of the present Dominion Government, the debate on the Address on Friday furnished all the necessary evidence to establish the fact. Mr. Mackenzie in his able and exhaustive speech preferred a very grave bill of indictment against them, which no one except the asttue Finance Minister had the hardihood to answer. Speaking in a general in regard to the Washington Treaty Mr. Mackenzie characterized the con duct of Sir John A. Macdonald, who represented Canada at the Commis sion, as utterly inexcusable. He showed, amid the laughter of the CLOSE OF THE LISTS TO SHARE House, that the members of Sir John's Government were all at sixes and CANADA LIFE sevens on this question. Mr. Howe had called the Treaty as concluded "a comedy of errors." Mr. Langevin in his speech at Quebec, had assured Cash Income over $1,000 per day ment, had protested against the Security of Over $2,000,000 Treaty, but that Sir. John had been compelled to sign it, although in the general instructions by the British Government to the Commissioners the necessity of every one signing it was not contemplated, for it was expressly stipulated that it might be signed by the commissioners, or a majority of them. Mr. Mackenzie therefore argued that he had no call the C to sign the Treaty if he considered it injust to Canada, and that if he did | protest against its provisions in refer- F. W. STONE, Agent at Guelph. ence to Canada, that protest was rendered of no effect by his signing it.

dered of no effect by his signing it.

In attempting to reply to Mr. Mackenzie, Sir Francis Hineks sought to shield his leader, Sir John, in this way. He took the ground that Sir John was a free man with regard to the Treaty, though he had signed it, as an Imperial Commissioner! That is, as a representative of the interests of Canada he protested against its injustice to this country, but as one of the Imperial Commissioners he consented to it. This position, Sir Francis said, was also assumed by the other members of the Government. They all protested against the Treaty, but its passage was a necessity in carrying its passage was a necessity in currying out the policy of the Imperial Gov-ernment and therefore they would favor its ratification. No reference here to the interests of Canada, which here to the interests of Canada, which they were sworn's ministers to maintain. No reference to their policy as members of a Government, responsible not to the British Government but to the people of Canada.

We question if ever any Government had to make such a humiliating confession, or so wantonly trilled with the rights and interests of a people. The Government may, by the aid of a subservient majority, carry this Treaty through Parliament, in the teeth of their own convictions, and in deference of the policy of the Imperial Government, but the people of Canada will call them to account for their pulsilanimous conduct, and sternly condemn them for thus wantonly bartering away their rights without anything like adequate remuneration.

HELEN MOIR

LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXVI.

CHAPTER NNYI.

ENTIAGED.

"News of Hermann?" cried Helen, starting up in breathless haste.

"No, dear, but news at which Hermann will rejoice, for it affects him too, as it affects as ail, most happily, and you, dear Edwin, most of all."

"News what concerns me, Violet? What mean you?"

"I may speak out now," rejoined his sister-in-law. "I have been bound to silence hitherto, but the reason for it no longer exists. Edwin had a purpose in going to London beyond taking it on his way to the Continent. We all, dear Edwin, had suspicions after listening to your story, that you had been made the victim of a foul conspiracy; nay, more, that you really had not committed the forgery which even yourself supposed."

"Yes," cried Helen, "I know Edwin suspected that, and Hermann, too, but can it ever be proved?"

"My darling, it has been proved. Edwin has unravelled the mystery, and your father is innocent. The bank bill was not signed by him."

"The bank bill not signed by me!" cchoed Bridgenorth. "Alas! Violet, there it no mistakeas to that fact. In the state in which I was, I had no real consciousness of the purport of the act, but I had a distinct recollection of writing the name of Waldegrave Winthorp on the paper."

"Not on the paper which was cashed at the bank. You did indeed try to write

The name of Waldegrave Winthorp on the paper."

"Not on the paper which was eashed at the bank. You did indeed try to write my father's name, but your writing was illegible. Philip-Jordan drew out another bill, and signed my father's name himself. That was the bill which was operated on—that was the forgery to which you pled guilty, but on which you were innocent."

"Violet," said Bridgenorth, trembling with agitation, "is there a possibility of this? For God's sake do not open the door to this heaven of hope if it is but a conjecture. Tell me—in a word tell me—if any foundation has been found for the supposition?"

You all know how good it is to get it at supposition?"

"Yes, Edwin, the proof is ample and conclusive. Edwin has seen the man named Mangles, and he has divulged all."

"Mangles," exclaimed Bridgenorth— CAROLINA RICE
"that was the man to whom I lost the

"that was the man to whom a rose are money."
"Say rather the man who cheated you out of the money, for it was a deep-laid plan between him and Jerdam. Read Edwin's letter, and you will be convinced of the truth of all that has been discovered—how he found out Mangles, and how Mangles was made to disclose everything."
With an eager and shaking handBridgenorth took the sheets from Mrs. Allerton, but his agitation was too great to allow him to read the writing, though it was very plain.

him to read the writing though very plain.

"My child, there a mist before my eyes," he faltered. "I cannot see the letters. Do you read it aloud. Helen received the letter with eager alacrity, and though her hand also trepubled with excitement, she had no difficulty in reading it with ease and rapidity.

alacrity, and though her hand also trembled with excitement, she had no difficulty in reading it with case and rapidity.

David Bridgenorth heard its contents in silence, with bowed head and a heart almost bursting with emotion—emotion of both joy and sorrow. It was like a balm of heading consolution to learn that he was even mechanically inneent of the crime which had lain for years with all the weight of guilt and inisery on his soul, and brought upon him an amount of suffering and-woe never to be summed up. But oh! as the weight lifted in the one side it fell with heavy saddening power on the other. His expatriation, the death of his young wife, the long years of joyless exile—all had sprung from this mythical crime, which had no existence in fact, yet had been so real in consequence. In the bitterness of his regret he cursed the men who had brought all the evil upon him, Mangles and Philip Jordan. Nor was Jasper Jaquin excluded, for he had known and taken part in the conspiracy, he had been cognisant of all the particulars, and was all the while aware that Jerdan was the forger, whose crime had been laid on his innocent shoulders.

But of what avail could be the curse, however bitter, to which his surging heart gave utterance? The evil could heaver be remedied, the twenty years with their pain and loss could not be recalled. Nothing could revive the dust of Kilmun churchyard, or give back the sweet joys of Glenfruin.

Still there was solace in the glad congratulations of Mrs. Allerton and Helen. Especially was there pleasure to him in
