How to Mind a Baby.

First, a man must needs have one to take care of. It isn't every one that is fortunate enough to have one, and when he does his wife is always wanting to run over to the neighbour's only five minutes, and he has to attend to the baby.
Sometimes she caresses him, and oftener she says sternly:

"John, take good care of the child till I return."

You want to remonstrate, but cannot pluck up courage while that awful female eye is upon you; so you prudently refrain and merely remark:

"Don't stay long, my dear."

She is scarcely out of sight when the luckless babe opens its eyes, and its mouth also emits a yell which causes the cat to bounce out of the door as if something had stung it. You timidly lift the cherub and sing an operatic air; he does not appreciate it, and yells the louder. You try to bribe him with a bit of sugar; not a bit of use, he spits it out.
You get wrathful and shake him. He stops a second, and you venture another when, good heavens! he sets up such a roar that the passers-by look up in astonishment. You feel desperate: your hair stands on end and the perspiration oozes out of every pore as the agonizing thought comes over you, what if the luckless child should have a fit! You try baby talk; but "litty, litty, lamby" has been laid up on his spine, and still he yells. You are afraid the neighbourhood will be alarmed and give him your good watch as a last resource, just in time to save your whiskers; though he throws down a handful of your cherished moustache to take the watch, and you thankfully find an easy chair to rest your aching limbs; when down comes the costly watch on the floor and the cause of all the trouble breaks into an ear-splitting roar, and you set your teeth and prepare to administer personal chastisement when in rushes the unhappy woman known as your wife, snatches the long suffering child from your willing arms, and, sitting down, stills it by magic, while you gaze mournfully at the remains of your watch and cherished moustache, and muttering a malediction of babykind in general, and on the image of his father in particular, you never to take of a baby again—until the next time.—Evening Telegram.

A YOUNG GIRL SLEEPS FOR MANY MONTHS.

Scarcely less astonishing than Dr Tanner's recent feat of fasting is the condition of a young lady, the daughter of the Mayor of Grambke, a village near Bremen, in Germany, who is said to have been fast asleep ever since the second week in January with the exception of a few hours of semi-wakefulness at intervals of from six to eight weeks. An interesting account of her extraordinary state is published in the London Courier.
It appears that she lies plunged in a profound slumber and entirely unconscious of all that goes on around her, night and day, reclining on her left side, warmly covered up and with a light gauze spread over her head. Nourishment, chiefly in a liquid form, is daily administered to her, which she swallows without awaking for a second.

She is a pretty, slender girl, of a pallid complexion, but she does not lose in weight during trances of from forty to sixty days, and, when awake, exhibits a cheerful disposition and an eager desire to perform such small household tasks as her strength enables her to fulfil. Her father is a well-to-do man, who has consulted several eminent medical men, in the hope of discovering some remedy for his daughter's abnormal condition, which entails serious inconvenience and constant anxiety upon the other members of his family; but all efforts hitherto made to keep the unlucky girl awake have resulted in total failure. Since the case of the sleeping Uhan at Potsdam, no such interesting subject for study and observation on the part of the faculty has arisen as that of the strangely somnolent, burgmaster's daughter of Grombe.

The Dilemma of Daughters.

"What am I to do with my girls?" is an anxious inquiry, which one finds made very frequently in these days. When there are a lot of daughters and only a life income, this becomes a very anxious inquiry indeed. The wedding breakfast gives one solution of it, furnishes the one good old-fashioned British, or rather Adamic, way of solving it. There was a worthy cleric who married his daughters so prudently that his friends called him the Judicious Hooker. At the same time, we think that the plan of training young women up simply with a view to matrimony is one of the worst mistakes in the world. It often means that they have had no careful well-planned training at all, which is one of the worst things towards making good, efficient wives of them. If you people are not to struggle on in life together, not to emigrate, not to depart from any standard of gentleness; but are to start in the front places with villa, furniture fine raiment, obsequious attendance; then the middle classes will less and less be inclined to marriage, and Paterfamilias will be worrying himself with the inquiry, "What am I to do with my girls?" Though marriage is the lot of most, still it is an accident to each, and my own notion is that young ladies should be made independent of marriage, and such matters not be allowed to monopolize the chief places in their ideas.

There are now so many avenues in which the skilled intelligence of women can make resources or add to the resources that are possessed.

A most important section of the whole work of education is in their hands.
There is an immense and increasing demand for dressmakers in the common schools under government inspection.
Medicine governesses will always be poorly paid and not very respectably regarded; but there is an unsatisfied demand of governesses of the highest stamp.
Art literature find constant employment, and fit her to discharge a useful post in life. When there is seen a good woman nobly fulfilling a noble vocation, as a school mistress, widow, a most powerful and illuminating influence

on the maiden aunt being the strength and light of a dwelling, we recognize that she is probably fulfilling a more blessed and important sphere than wifehood and maternity can confer. So far as material ease and comfort go, the wife has often far less than the unmarried sisterhood often suppose. When we know that the lady of the house is bothered about her weekly bills, about her servants, that she has to bear a full share of other husbands' anxieties that after all she has to devote her main energies to cutting bread and butter, and altering and adopting juvenile raiment, we think the governess, who takes her regular salary and has all the comforts of the establishment without its responsibilities, has the best share in the whole concern. Worst of all is it when a father or mother pushes a young girl to matrimony with a man who has a good house and a plentiful income, when the girl's heart is not engaged, and there is no solid foundation for reference and affection. Without going so far as the ungallant bishop who said that in matrimony the bat was put into a bag, where one might draw an eel, but more probably a snake, it is sad to think in what a large proportion of cases marriage simply leads up to indifference, incompatibility, hatred, despair, and though there may be something glorious in the festivities and triumph of the wedding breakfast we are sure no maiden will even be in a hurry for the lace veil and the orange wreath.

The Houses of English Nobles in the Middle Ages.

It is an error to suppose that the English gentry were lodged in stately, or even in well-sized, houses. Generally speaking their dwellings were almost as inferior to those of their descendants in capacity as they were in convenience.
The usual arrangement consisted of an entrance passage running through the house, with a hall on one side, a parlour beyond, and one or two chambers above, and on the opposite side, a kitchen, pantry and other offices. Such was the ordinary manner of house of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, as appears not only from the documents and engravings, but as to the latter period, from the buildings themselves—sometimes, though not very frequently occupied by families of consideration, more often converted into farm houses or distinct tenements.
Larger structures were erected by men of greater estates during the reigns of Henry IV. and Edward IV.; but very few can be traced higher; and such has been the effect of time, still more through the arrival and decline of families, and the progress of architectural improvement, that the natural decay of these buildings, that I should conceive it difficult to name a house in England, still inhabited by a gentleman, and not belonging to the order of castles, the principle departments of which are older than the reign of Henry VII. The instances at least must be extremely few.

The most essential improvements in architecture during this period, one of which had been missed by the sagacity of Greece and Rome, were chimneys and glass windows. Nothing apparently can be more simple than the former; yet the wisdom of ancient times has been content to let the smoke escape by an aperture in the centre of the roof; and a discovery, of which Vitruvius had not a glimpse, was made, perhaps, by some forgotten semi-barbarian about the middle of the fourteenth century the use of chimneys is distinctly mentioned in England and in Italy; but they are found in several of our castles which bear a much older date. The country seems to have lost very early the art of making glass, which was preserved in France, whence artificers were brought into England to furnish the windows in some new churches in the seventh century. It is said that, in the reign of Henry III., a few ecclesiastical buildings had glazed windows. Surger, however, a century before, had adorned his great work, the Abbey of St. Denis, with windows not only glazed but painted; and I presume that churches of the same class, both in France and England, especially after the lancet-shaped window had yielded to one of ampler dimensions, were generally decorated in a similar manner. Yet glass is said not to have been employed in the domestic architecture of France before the fourteenth century; and its introduction into England was probably by no means earlier. Nor, indeed, did it come into general use during the period of the middle ages. Glazed window were considered as movable furniture, and probably bore a high price. When the Barons of Northumberland, as late as the reign of Elizabeth, left Alnwick Castle, the windows were taken out of their frames and lain carefully by.

A HORRIBLE DISTRICT. Dark and Bloody Ground.

Kentucky is well named the dark and bloody ground. Bloody it surely is in the extreme. For every day or two in the graph and the newspapers or that peculiar State furnish accounts of savage mobs, murders, riots and other sanguinary violations of law and order. Two or three days ago a despatch furnished a recital of a "picnic" as it is called there, at which half a dozen or more boys engaged in the favourite pastime of the State—a shootingsmatch. They all carried revolvers, of course, and at the close of the entertainment two of the boys were reported killed and several badly wounded.
This sort of thing would not be called a suicide in this part of the Republic. We should name it a miscellaneous murder or a dreadful butchery. Terms differ with sections. A picnic seems to mean in Kentucky, an occasion on which men meet to get drunk and settle old and new grudges by shooting one another. The latest announcement from Kentucky is the suicide Sadie White, the 19-year-old daughter of a prominent citizen of Richmond, by cutting her throat, from ear to ear. The telegram declares that she was generally conceded to be the belle of the Blue Grass region, where there are more belles to the square mile than in any territory of the known world. It is said that she is supposed to have been temporarily insane, though the cause probable or possible, or her insanity is left to perhaps too easy conjecture. The case is very sad, undeniably, and it is surprising withal. Belles in other parts of the country are not addicted to cutting their throats. The mere fact or belief in their bellehood is sufficient to put them on such terms with themselves as to keep them in life, even to afford them a keen relish of it. But Kentucky is an exceptional State, and can always be depended for lawlessness and savagery. Its entire history, public and private, is written in blood, and its best society literally streams with gore.—New York Times.

DUELLING IN VIRGINIA.

In the current number of the Virginia Law Journal is a glowing memoir of Patrick Henry Aylett—grandson of Patrick of Revolutionary fame—who died in 1870, aged forty-five. He seems to have been a brilliant popular orator, a lawyer engaged in important cause, a leading politician, and a statesman of promise.
At the present time we find an appropriate text in the following extract.
"In 1859 Patrick Henry Aylett challenged and fought a duel in North Carolina with the chivalrous and lionhearted O. Jennings Wise, whose ninty fifth fall at Roanoke Is and lost to his native state a son whose valor and brilliant genius shone with meteoric splendour along the short path of his early manhood. Mr.
Wise was editor of the Enquirer, and Mr.
Aylett was writing for the Examiner; their articles, and the antagonism which they roused, excited so much heat that all efforts at amicable adjustment proved abortive, and a hostile meeting became unavoidable. Escaping the Richmond police they got upon the Danville train some distance in the country, and fought with pistols early next morning just over the North Carolina line. Mr.
Aylett's bullet narrowly missed the person of Mr. Wise. Mr. Wise fired in the air. This ended the combat, as Mr.
Wise's noble and magnanimous behavior disarmed every feeling resentment in the brave and manly bosom of his antagonist.
As Mr. Wise in his duel with Hon. Sher-ard Clemens fired at and wounded him it was never known why he should have discharged his pistol in the air in his fight with Mr. Aylett, unless it was because his adversary was very near-sighted, and was, moreover, a married man with several small children. Both gentlemen bore themselves before the duel, upon the field, and afterward in a manner worthy of their names and ancestry. In courtesy, valor, and magnanimity neither Richard of the Iron Heart nor Ivanhoe could have surpassed them."

LITERARY. AUTUMN.

The summer flowers are faded now, The summer buds have flown, And in the woods the shadows lie...

The golden corn is gathered in; A rich and bounteous store, And creaking wains no longer stand...

The scarlet berries brightly gleam From many a hedge-row spray, Where erst in summer days we plucked...

So pass the seasons; and like them, Our life has seasons too, Spring's tender buds, and summer's flowers...

Pride and Jealousy Or a Wronged Husband.

'The joy I feel in this action, John,' said Hugh, with a flash of pride over-spreading his manly features...

'It is easy to foresee who will be her husband,' said John, with a happy smile. 'Perhaps not,' sighed Hugh.

'Reason, eh?' said Hugh with an incredulous curl of his lip; 'what if my love is despised by her? There, there,' he hurried on...

'Amplify,' returned John. 'Then you will be kind enough to intimate that at the end of that time the business will be transferred to other hands,' said Hugh with peculiar emphasis.

'To other hands?' reiterated John in surprise. 'Yes,' said Hugh, smilingly, 'perhaps to mine. I may have a fancy to turning banker myself.'

John Rudderforth wisely refrained from further questioning. He gathered together the ledgers and papers, shook hands with Hugh, and departed to resume his old position at the bank.

hand of Clemency Maybrook. As John Rudderforth looked in her bright eyes; so full of trust and love, and listened to her artless words of welcome, a joy swept into his heart.

'Clemency, how care you!' exclaimed Grace, frowningly. Clemency, however, was gone with true feminine tact; she had linked her arm in John's and had disappeared through the open window.

Grace rose to follow them, when Hugh placed his hand restrainingly on her arm, saying, 'Do not fly from me cousin. My tongue is fraught with sad tidings for you.'

Grace turned, half in surprise, and looked at him fixedly. 'I am not to blame,' he continued, meeting her gaze; 'a reluctant duty is forced upon me, and further silence would be criminal.'

'Something very disagreeable; of course,' said Grace. 'Is it so extremely urgent?' 'It is,' he replied. Grace returned to her seat and he continued, 'I have, from sympathy with your tenderer woman's nature, deferred a statement which you ought otherwise to have known at an earlier period.'

'Are you quite sure your sympathy is needed?' inquired Grace, coldly. 'Of one thing at least I am sure,' was Hugh's earnest reply.

'And pray what may that be?' inquired Grace. 'That stern necessity alone unlocks the secret I am come to tell you,' replied Hugh.

'I shall, doubtless, be grateful for your forbearance, cousin,' said Grace in a more softened tone. 'Gather all your strength, dear Grace, while I tell you that your father's memory, his high name, and spotless reputation have only been preserved by a sacrifice, and that sacrifice is yours,' said Hugh, with earnest emotion.

'What mean you?' asked Grace in alarm. 'Several unforeseen failures and unfortunate speculations have wrecked your father's once prosperous fortunes,' replied Hugh. 'All that we have been enabled to save from the general ruin has been your marriage portion, twenty thousand pounds.'

A frigid smile played briefly round Hugh's compressed lips; but she spoke not. 'Till you marry,' continued Hugh, alteringly, 'the interest of this sum will afford you sufficient means, and even luxuries, although it will not procure you the brilliant assemblages which filled this mansion in your father's lifetime. But perhaps your heart, matured and chastened by the hand of sorrow, will hold those idle rarities at their true worth.'

'I am fully sensible of my errors, cousin,' said Grace, with haughty irony; 'therefore spare me the tedium of your wise schooling.' 'The sweetest flowers sometimes cover the sharpest thorns, cousin,' retorted Hugh, curtly. 'Our old friendship, our common ties of kindred may give too rude a frankness to my speech; if so, pardon me. But there is an affection, tender and profound, living in my heart for you, Grace. It has enriched and blessed my daily life or years. Oh! let me hear you say that you smile upon it.'

'Hugh Sherwood!' cried Grace, suddenly, 'have you no regard for her mourning robes?' 'Forgive me Grace!' said Hugh, passionately. 'I would not pain you; only tell me now that I may hereafter speak of my love, and that you will listen.'

Grace's brow contracted deeper as she turned coldly, silently, from his impassioned gaze. 'Oh, think!' continued Hugh, with the same flow of earnest feeling, 'we are both orphans now. Wearing as you do that bereaved and desolate name, you can divine how my empty heart must have hungered in bygone years for a parent's love. Cannot our mutual void be filled by an affection as imperishable and holy? I am content to live on—I heed not how long—in silent patience, if you will only aid me hope. One look, Grace! turn our face and let me read my fate.'
