faculty of expressing himself in verse, and who recently published a little pamphlet called "The Canadian Knights' Entertainment" in which he deals with the creation of certain knights in Canada in a humourous way. I said a moment ago that recognitions were given for political contributions, and Mr. Thompson has so aptly hit it off that I hope it will not be improper that I shall read to the House some of his verses on the subject. I might say that there are various verses in regard to various classes of knights, but I shall just read one or two. This is entitled "The Contributor Knight":—

Appears to speak his part,
A pros'prous man, of middle age,
And not too big a heart.

"I won my title well," said he,
"I saved my country dear,
Subscribing to election funds,
When there was cause to fear.

"Unless the boodle pot were full,
The other side would win,
And so wipe out all vested rights,
Which surely were a sin.

"I spent my thousands lavishly,
And when we won the day?
They handed me my knight-hood, and—
That's all I've got to say."

Then there are verses in regard to "The Railway Knight," and I feel sure the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) will appreciate these:

A sterner man succeeds the last,
A man of threat'ning mien,
And masterful—a leader he,
It's easy to be seen.

"Ye prate of ancestry," quote he,
"And blood both red and blue,
But my descent can straight be traced—
I swear to you it's true—

"From brave Sir Henry Morgan,
Of buccaneers the King,
Who swaggered through the Spanish Main,
And robbed like anything.

"Of Spanish ships he took his toll,
He raided many a city,
His fame's kept fresh unto this day,
In roaring sailor ditty.

'The Freedom of the seas' was his,
For none dare say him nay,
He took his tithe from anywhere,
His motto, 'Make them pay.'

"From his hot veins my blood I draw,
His watch-word, too, is mine,
I love to ponder on his might,
In the days of Auld Lang Syne.

"'From near Atlantic's sounding wave,
To far Pacific's shore,'
I've looted ev'ry treasury,
I've gathered more and more.

"Until, my primacy confessed,
They made of me a Knight,
In ermine's white and spotless fur,
I'm safely now bedight."

In other words, it simply means that these recognitions are not given on account of worth or of greatness of service or sacrifice, but on account of the attainment of an influential position.

Now, Sir, I said that I proposed to show or to endeavour to show, that in England, the home of these distinctions, corruption is playing a not insignificant part in the awarding of titles. Lord Bryce, whom we all know and for whose opinion we have the highest respect, says in his American Commonwealth:

It may seem a paradox to observe that a millionaire has a better and easier social career open to him in England than in America. Nevertheless there is a sense in which this is true. In America, if his private character be bad, if he be mean, or openly immoral, or personally vulgar, or dishonest, the best society may keep its doors closed against him. In England great wealth skilfully employed, will more readily force these doors to open. For in England great wealth can, by using the appropriate methods, practically buy rank from those who bestow it; or by obliging persons whose position enables them to command fashionable society, can induce them to stand sponsors for the upstart, and force him into society, a thing which no person in America has the power of doing. To affect such a stroke in England the rich man must of course have stopped short of positive frauds, that is, of such frauds as could be proved in court. But he may be still distrusted and disliked by the elite of the commercial world, he may be vulgar and ill-educated, and indeed have nothing to recommend him except his wealth and his willingness to spend it in providing amusement for fashionable people. All this will not prevent him from becoming a baronet, or possibly a peer, and thereby acquiring a position of assured dignity which he can transmit to his offspring. The existence of a system of artificial rank enables a stamp to be given to base metal in Europe which cannot be given in a thoroughly republican country.

I am not going to read extracts, as I did last year, from the House of Lords Debates of 1914 and 1917. Hon. members who are interested in the subject can refer to Hansard of last year in reference to the debate on hereditary titles, or if they wish to imbibe more fully they may read the debates in the House of Lords to which I have referred. No man can read those debates and not be impressed with the fact that it is generally recognized that distinctions which should be the reward of merit are not always so awarded, but that they are bought and sold, and that money considerations, not national contributions, are the factor that to a very great extent determine their award. But, Sir, it may be said: I have nothing to do with what takes place in England. I am not willing to go exactly that far, as I said last year, because so long as Great Britain has legislative authority over Canada, so long do I think that Canada and Canadian legislatures are interested in the personnel of the House of Lords and of those who are influential in the Imperial Councils. But if in England with its traditions, with its conservatism, with its worship of the old, corruption has become a dominant source of recognition in the awarding of titles, then, I say, how long is the Canadian executive going to be able to stand against the attacks that will be assuredly be made upon it in the days that are to come unless once for all we put an end to the practice, and the time to do so is before it gets well begun.

I have puzzled my mind trying to discover why it is that any one should contend for a continuance of these titular distinctions in Canada. I have considered the arguments advanced by this one and by that to determine the philosophy of the thing, the natural reason for the existence of the practice, and the best that I have been able to get from what I have read and heard is this: That there are three reasons why men should get titular distinctions. One is, that there is an innate desire in human nature to be recognized, that recognition is very dear to some people; that other people are instigated to efforts through the belief that they may get recognition; and that man will render service to the State if they think there is a possibility of recognition coming. Let us see what all this means. It means, if you are prepared to admit the correctness of such philosophy, that human nature is so weak that it will not do great things unless there is something in it for the doer. It brings human nature down to the standard of a cynic, who was described as being a man who knew the price of everything and the value of nothing. Now, I have more faith in human nature than that. I am not prepared to admit that Canadian life is so poor that our men are not willing to serve the State and do big things, unless they think there is recognition in respect of the services rendered. Why, Sir, the consciousness of duty well done should be reward enough for any man; virtue should be its own reward; and while, as I said a moment ago, some men may be carried away with vanity, I see no reason why the desire of a few should result in the stamping—if I might so express the idea—with baseness those who have done public service for the sake of public service. I said a moment ago that in a war such as this, when the whole nation has been organized for the purpose of its successful prosecution, it is ridiculous to think that it is possible to distinguish between those who should obtain reward and those to whom reward should not be given.

You cannot begin to do it. The complexity of the situation is too great; the ramification of the service is too far extended.

How are you going to determine what man shall be given an honour, or what woman, as the case may be; and what man and what woman shall be left out? It is beyond the ability of any Prime Minister, any Government or any group of men to determine where reward shall go and from whom it shall be withheld. How are you going to determine the relative qualities of service and sacrifice in one man as against service and sacrifice in another? Why, Sir, it came home to me with crushing force within the last few weeks. I was speaking to a man from overseas who has been connected with a battalion that has done magnificent work; what they did was well done and was of signal service in the war. He was critical of me, because, he said, my attitude in reference to titles last session had stayed the Government's hands and certain recognitions that would have come to him and his fellow officers and men had been withheld pending the presentation of this resolution to the House. I said to him: "Are you not satisfied with the consciousness that you have done good work and that the people of Canada know that your work has been efficient"? He said, in effect: "No, I am not, and the reason why I am not satisfied is this: if these recognitions do not come through for us, the world will say that our work has not been well done, because others have them and they are the only imprimatur or recognition that will make the people feel that service has been adequately rendered." That is a false standard, Mr. Speaker; it is a standard that you cannot apply in a war like this; because just as sure as you try to apply it you are bound to have jealousies, you are bound to have heart-burnings, you are bound to have bitterness—and that is what we do not want to come out of this war.

I said that you cannot measure sacrifice and you cannot measure service. As I stand here this afternoon speaking to this House I see a woman in dull black who came into my office some five or six months ago and told me that she was a widow; that her only son, who had gone to the front, had been killed. She said: "All I ask is that you get me a picture of the cross that marks his grave in Flanders fields; I shall be content to have that as a memento that he did his duty in a time of national peril and in a time of world crisis." Could you measure that woman's sacrifice and service as against the sacrifice, if needs be, and probably the service, of hundreds of men who stayed at home and did their best, but whose best was incomparably less in sacrifice than the sacrifice that this widow made in giving her only son to a great cause? The Postmaster General in the late administration expressed the idea a few days ago that these titles went by favour, and that when the Government of which he was a member was in power certain people transferred their allegiance from his Government to another party because they did not obtain from his leader the recognition by way of titular distinction to which they thought they were entitled. Sir, the idea is absolutely exploded that the King is the source of honour. We exploded that idea last year when the Prime Minister announced to the House that his Order in Council, which had anticipated the debate that took place, provided for recognitions to Canadians being given on the responsibility of the ministry. That inevitably carries with it the conclusion that while the source of the bestowment may be his Majesty, or Her Majesty as the case may be, the recommendation comes from the Prime Minister of the day, and the ministry of the day really are responsible in that they make the selection.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), in a debate which took place in this House when the member for West Peterborough (Mr. J. H. Burnham) introduced a resolution on this subject some four or five years ago, said:—

> I have not very much to say upon this question except that I think the bestowment of honours comes from the source of all honours, that is, the King; and that we must allow the King to have unrestricted scope as to the selection of persons upon whom to bestow these titles of honour.

That may have been the old doctrine; the Minister of Trade and Commerce may have considered this view sound at that day, because it was made abundantly clear in the discussion that took place last year that there had been a conflict of authority between the Canadian authorities and the Colonial Office in England as to who was responsible for those recognitions. But the Order in Council of last year, as read in this House by the Prime Minister, if it has been accepted by the British Government, makes it clear and beyond discussion that hereafter while these bestowments come from His Majesty, they come on the recommendation of the ministry of the day.

I have been told that these recognitions coming from overseas stimulate loyalty to the Empire. Well, I do not believe it. I do not believe one bit of loyalty is stimulated by these overseas recognitions. People know that they come on the recommendation of the Canadian ministry, and I cannot bring myself to believe that they tend to produce any greater loyalty. Loyalty in Canada to the British Empire is not in respect of titular distinction, is not in respect of badges, bands or sashes, but is in respect of the sentimental tie that binds us to a country which, we realize, has done much for civilization and which we believe still has a great work to do. We are proud to be British citizens, yet, while we are British citizens, we are equally proud in knowing that we are Canadian citizens. I do not think there is an iota of truth in the assumption that we shall longer remain British simply because His Majesty may from time to time take it into his mind, on the recommendation of the Canadian Ministry, to confer certain honours and distinctions on people in Canada. The question we have to decide in this House of Commons is: What is best for Canada? We have not an aristocracy such as England has; we are a democracy—and I hope we are going to be a democracy in the broad and true sense of that word. And if I might say a word without being considered as preaching, I would say that to my mind the great sin of the day—although sin is not the proper word—is the love of extravagance and show in Canada, the false standard of living that prevails, the development in some quarters of what the military people would term "swank" and what in the vulgar parlance of the street I would term "snobbery." What I should like to do is to lay down some principle that would aid us in getting away from these false standards and realizing that newer and simpler standards are what should govern in this country; that the recognition of value, not price, is what should count.

The sentiment of the people is against the conferring of these titles. I said last year that I doubted it, but if I doubted it last year I am confident of it this year. The President of the Privy Council (Hon. N. W. Rowell) in his public utterances has time and again stated where he stood. Why, Sir, the farmer's platform, a copy of which I have in my hand, states distinctly that the discontinuance of the practice of conferring titles upon citizens of Canada is one of its foremost democratic planks. It was not many evenings ago that the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar) stated that he believed that that was a good platform when it was enunciated and that it is a good platform to-day. So I have at least one member of the Government with me.

If my memory serves me correctly, in August, 1917, a great Liberal convention was held in Winnipeg, at which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) was present, and at that convention a resolution was passed denouncing titles in language much stronger than I have used this afternoon. I think, therefore, that I have shown that the agricultural population are against them; that what was called in 1917 the Liberal Party of the West were against them.

And surely the press are against them. You can hardly turn to a newspaper to-day in which something is not said against titles. For instance, I refer to an article in the Winnipeg Free Press which reads as follows:

> So luxuriously has the flower of knighthood been blooming in Canada, however, that there is grave danger of it becoming "common". Honorary colonels have become so plentiful since the war commenced that even the bearer of the real article is sometimes lightly looked upon. There is the same danger in connection with the honours of the King. In fact, men are suspected of going after knighthoods to-day! Yes, laying their plans deliberately to secure them. So much is this the case that when a wealthy individual undertakes to give his services free on behalf of any worthy war cause the casual and matter-of-fact remark is often heard, "Oh, he is looking for knighthood."

Other papers have expressed themselves pretty strongly on this question. There have been some very strong articles in a paper published in Woodstock, and let me read just one or two extracts because I do not want to take up much of the time of the House this afternoon:

> The sooner we learn to honestly face the facts of our national existence; the sooner we learn to distinguish between what is real and what is mere fiction, between the recognition that is earned and the recognition that is bestowed for a consideration, the better it will be for Canada, both as a young nation and as a part of the British Empire. The more faithfully Canada clings to her own ideals the better service she will be able to render to the Empire. They are no friends of Canada who are seeking to re-establish in this young land the worn out institutions of other countries, and especially such institutions as are antagonistic to the spirit of our democracy. . . . . It is no answer to say that these titles and honours come from the King, and that the bestowal of them is part of his prerogative. In a sense they do come from the King; but nobody believes that the King himself is responsible in this matter in any other way than as a constitutional ruler who acts on the advice of his responsible ministers.

And then the Kingston Whig, a paper published in my Riding, says:

> Public men in England are not so eager for knighthood. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright did without it in their day, and Mr. Balfour, Mr. Asquith and Lloyd George have done without it so far. Canada is being overladen with titles, and they are not congenial to the soil.

I might continue reading similar extracts for half an hour, but it would be wearisome to the House without giving members very much further information.

I admit there are difficulties in working out the problem to a logical conclusion, but I do not believe the difficulties are insurmountable. I believe the whole tendency of modern legislation is to do away with social distinctions. I have endeavoured to show this in relation to knighthoods as developed in Great Britain. We are on the threshold of a nation, and the problem we have to consider is: Are we to start aright, or are we "to get off on the left foot"? Is Canada to be a true democracy where equality before the law is recognized, where there is no such thing as social or ceremonial priority; or are we to allow this great war to be used as a means of getting the thin edge of the wedge of aristocratic practices into the life of this country? The mass of the people are against this, and the question which this House, as representing the people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, has to decide this afternoon is: Shall we voice the sentiments of our constituents, which I know by conversation with many members are the sentiments of the members of this House; or shall we submit to those who assume the right of thinking for us?

Mr. ROBERT LORNE RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can do better than begin my remarks by reciting another extract from that valuable collection of poems some of which the hon. member for Kingston, (Mr. Nickle) has just embalmed in Hansard. This is the product of an ex-member of the House (Colonel Thompson), and inasmuch as it refers to political knights, it will be of special interest at this time:

> In ancient armour now we see,
> It surely is a sight,
> A politician high in place,
> Who also is a Knight.
> "From turret to foundation stone
> I am a Democrat,
> 'The rank is but the guinea's stamp'
> Rab Burns was right in that.

"But when knighthood was offered me,—
Now show a little reason,—
To flout the kingly offer then,
Were surely like to treason.

"And don't forget, there's Lady Z.,
A wife both good and true,
Who wanted to be Lady Z.,
So pray what could I do?

"Don't bother with the 'Sir' to me,
I know it's not in favour,
And for a red-blood Democrat,
It hath too high a savour.

"Just call me Harry, Tom or Dick,
Or Cliff, or Bill or Sam,
All titles are, I'm quite sincere,
Not worth a tinker's damn."

I do not rise to second the motion of the hon. member for Kingston. You will recall, Sir, the discussion that occurred last year when my hon. friend introduced a resolution for the purpose of putting an end to hereditary titles. On that occasion I moved an amendment striking out the word "hereditary" and asking that an effectual end be placed to all titles in Canada. I want to congratulate my hon. friend in making real progress during the intermission. I am not accusing my hon. friend of grand larcency, but this session he steals my thunder by introducing a motion along the same line as my amendment of last year. I congratulate him upon the very able presentation of the case he made last session and the extremely able presentation he made on the present occasion.

My hon. friend has found, as I have and as, I am sure, all members have found during the recess, that the country is practically unanimous in favour of the abolition of all titles. That being the case, it was to me a source of great regret last session that the same practice as the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) introduced this session in connection with the subject of daylight saving, was not followed by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the question thrown open as a non-party one to the House generally. I am satisfied, had that been done, this House would have pronounced overwhelmingly in favour of the abolition of all titles. One of the regrets that I have over the passing of the late distinguished leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is that he is not here on the present occasion to participate in this debate. Hon. members and you, Sir, will recall the position he took last year when he declared that, notwithstanding the fact that he had taken a title himself, he did not believe in titles, and he declared his willingness to toss his title on a bonfire and have it consumed. Such an expression of opinion from a man holding the position of leader of a party in this House is bound to have an effect in this House and throughout the country. I agree with the hon. member for Kingston that the country is almost, if not unanimously in favour of the total extinction of titles of practically any kind. I was struck with the history which my hon. friend gave of titles. He went away back for almost a thousand years and traced the development of titles.

Now I have lived in Western Canada a great many years and in company with my hon. friend from South Winnipeg (Mr. Allan), whose effective tones we may expect to hear in this House one of these days, because he is a speaker of prominence and ability, has witnessed many an Indian pow-wow in the Northwest, where the big chiefs togged out in paint and feathers and the squaws wearing fantastically coloured blankets danced to the more or less seductive music of the tom-tom. To go back further into the animal kingdom, we all know how the peacock and the male turkey strut around the barnyard displaying their feathers and making a proud exihibition of themselves. The Indians follow their example, and I have always been astounded, Mr. Speaker—I do not know what you personally think about it—to see on the occasion of a coronation or some other great event, human beings, supposedly with God-given intelligence, wearing fantastic feathers in their hats, and bedecked with gold lace and ribbons and braid strutting along in grand procession, just like the Indians do. It does seem to me that, although these things cost a little more money, the human race has made very little real progress indeed.

We see this mad race for distinction even in the present day. Men do not seem to be satisfied with the real dignity of the honest name inherited from their parents with the simple dignity of citizenship, but must, forsooth, be Lord this or Duke that or Sir the other. I even understand that a new Order has been introduced for "dames" to appeal to the female portion of our community. That does not seem to me to comport with the idea of progress in this country; it does not comport well with the idea of real simple modest dignity. These things do not make the man. As Burns said:

A prince can make a belted knight,
A marquis, duke and all that;
But an honest man's above his might,
Good faith, he must not try that.

I have not rendered it in the Scotch, although I could do so. No potentate or body or army of potentates can add dignity to manhood or womanhood, and still we find even in this country the same mad race for social distinctions.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, when I moved my amendment last year the right hon. the Prime Minister took the view that it should not pass the House as he was in communication with the Government of the old land, to whom he had made certain proposals. He staked the Government's and his own existence on the fate of the amendment which I made to the motion of my hon. friend. The House was therefore suddenly confronted with a crisis. Had the amendment carried, as I certainly believe it would have done but for the Prime Minister's statement—I am satisfied that you too, Sir, believe that the House was overwhelmingly in favour of the abolition of titles—the country would have been faced with a crisis. The Union Government, for which so many sacrifices had been made by men of all parties, and the continuance of which was so essential to the country, especially in view of the war situation at that time, would have gone out of existence. What was a humble member like myself, without special experience in a situation of that kind, to do? I felt it was desirable to subordinate the less important matter to the carrying on of the war. I should not have liked to have the efficiency of the Canadian troops in any way impaired and the winning of the war jeopardized by the downfall of the Government, so I asked leave of the House to withdraw my amendment. That leave was not granted, and I was then up against the difficulty of deciding whether I should vote for or against my own amendment. I know some hon. gentlemen criticised me because I took a middle course. I declared then and I reiterate now, that when you do not know what to do, it is often a very good thing to do nothing. So I sat still in my seat and did not vote either way. The maxim does not always hold good, but in that case I thought it was the proper thing to do. A great deal of water has passed under the bridge since the House was face to face with that temporary crisis, and I am satisfied that most hon. members have found, as I have done, that the country is very largely, if not almost unanimously, in favour of the abolition of all titles. I therefore trust we shall not have a repetition of what happened last year, but that hon. members will be enabled to vote according to their convictions on this question. Though not of paramount importance, the question is of deep interest and considerable importance to the people of this country.

My hon. friend has explained pretty fully the ancient idea in the creation of knighthoods. In the old days knighthoods were created purely for military reasons and people did not go seeking knighthoods, but had them thrust upon them. I dislike reading, because it often tires the House, but just here I should like to quote from an excellent article I read in the Chronicle when I was in London last summer, written by Arthur Pollen, one of the greatest authorities on this question in the British Empire. He says:

> The number of honours bestowed by the King, on the recommendation of his ministers, has of late been so great that people have wondered how so many fellow-citizens, of whom they had never heard before, have earned the titles, hereditary and otherwise, by which they have been distinguished.

How similar has been our experience in Canada!

> The official reasons given for each selection fail to satisfy the pardonable curiosity so created.
> It is not, however, into this controversy that I propose to enter, but into another one raised two generations ago by Matthew Higgins, the famous "Jacob Omnium" of the Fifties. War, after all, is primarily an affair of the soldiers and sailors, and when, after the Crimean War, the civilians seemed to Higgins to have helped themselves too liberally to the decorations, he scored them with a very caustic pen on the text: "Kings with their armies did flee and were discomfited; and they of the household divided the spoil." It may be instructive to see how honours in our own time have been allotted between those defending their country at the war and those defending the war in the country.

Mark that distinction: "between those defending their country at the war, and those defending the war in the country." To continue:

> Dealing with the higher honours, that is, those which carry titles, how have these been distributed since the outbreak of hostilities? In all, 61 peerages have been created—

This is important as showing how few honours have been awarded to the men who fought for the liberty of the Empire, and how many titles have been awarded to politicians and others who did not go to the front.

> In all, 61 peerages have been created, including steps upward by those already ennobled. Of these, Mr. Asquith created 28 and Mr. Lloyd George 33.
> Civilians have received 58 of these. Only two have been conferred upon soldiers and one upon a sailor. Six Garters, four Thistles, and four Patricks have been given. With the exception of one, civilians have received all the Garters, and the same rule applies to both the Thistles and Patricks. Fifty-six favoured individuals have become "Right Honourable" as Privy Councillors, and they are all civilians; and 107 have been made baronets, of whom no fewer than 106 were civilians and only one a sailor. Of the honours, then, that confer hereditary rank 164 have been given to civilians and four to sailors and soldiers, the ratio being 41 to 1. The great Orders have been given in the ratio of 11 to 3, and Privy Councillorships in the ratio of 56 to nothing. Lump them all together, and it is 231 to 7.

The fighting men fare, of course, a good deal better when it comes to the humbler business of knighthoods. Omitting the Indian honours, 262 soldiers and sailors have either been admitted to the rank of an Order that carried a title with it, or have received the advancement from Knight Commander to Grand Cross. If I am not mistaken, no soldiers or sailors at all have been made Knights Bachelor—at least not for military or naval services—a matter which has created some comment; for knighthood, after all, suggests nothing if not service in arms.

I call particular attention to that phrase: "For knighthood, after all, suggests nothing if not service in arms."

Still they have received 262 knighthoods or advances. But a considerable number of these have not been given for services in the war at all. They have followed from seniority, administrative services at home, and so forth, just as they would have followed in peace. They are practically civilian honours conferred on soldiers. They include, for instance, officers employed in the War Office and at the Admiralty, who have presided over departments, the responsibility for which has always conferred a claim for a K.C.B.; and the same is true of advancements from K.C.B. to G.C.B. In ordinary times such knighthoods and advancements would amount to 15 or 20 a year, so that it would probably not be safe to reckon more than 180 or 200 at most as honours for special war services. In the meantime, civilians, men and women, have received 739 knighthooods or their equivalents! Both Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George have bestowed these decorations in about the same proportions. Mr. Asquith made 210 civil and 84 military knights, Mr. Lloyd George 473 civil knights, 46 dames, and 178 military and naval. The score then stands, for the greater honours, at the ratio of 46 to 1, and in the lesser, in the ratio of rather over 3 to 1.

This gives some idea of the way in which honours have been distributed in the Old Country. Do we desire to emulate the example of Great Britain? Sometimes she is set up as a proper example to follow, but I am sure that in a matter such as is under consideration this afternoon this Dominion should act on its own judgment. When I was in England I was struck with an article written by Robert Blatchford, the great socialist writer in England and one of the most prominent socialists in the world. In this article the writer advanced what in my opinion is an unanswerable argument against the conferring of titles, and an indictment of all classes of snobbery. Mr. Blatchford had received a letter from an optician in England, who wrote as follows:

I am practical watch and clock maker and optician, and, besides possessing the oldest business in the town, I am old-fashioned enough to love my children, and to wish to do my best for them, and pay for it.

I approached the principal of one of those higher schools, somewhat snobbishly described as "for the sons of gentlemen," and was told that my boys could not be accepted beacuse I "kept a shop" in the town. In other words, because my children have been so foolish as to choose a vulgar tradesman for a father, they are to be socially and educationally ostracised.

I had hoped that four years of horrible war had washed out that kind of snobbery and class cleavage, but it appears I was wrong.

I may mention that the parents of at least two of the high school scholars owe me money which I shall never get.

Commenting on this letter, Mr. Blatchford, in the article referred to, states:—

This matter of the optician's letter may seem trivial. But it is not.

Nor does the matter end there, for the letter indicates something more than a class or caste division amongst the people; it shows us quite plainly that there is something radically and seriously wrong with a nation in which such blind snobbery is possible. It shows a national misreading of values, an appraisement of men not by their deservings, nor by their utility, nor by their character, but by their garments, or their occupations, or their manner of pronouncing certain words.

I do not think Mr. Blatchford overdraws the situation in that description. Does this new western nation desire to set up an aristocracy and to institute a reign of snobbery such as that here described? If it does not it must set its face unalterably and determinedly against all social distinction and titles, and this Parliament, in my judgment, is in duty bound to express its opinion on the matter. I discussed with Mr. Lloyd George, that great tribune of the people, the question of titles, and I presume I violate no secret—he did not ask me not to repeat his words, and I have no doubt he would be ready to pronounce them himself publicly if he were requested to do so—I do not think I violate any confidence when I say that he informed me that he was unalterably opposed especially to hereditary titles, and that it had been his intention, and he hoped still to be able to do so, to introduce a Bill that would abolish hereditary titles altogether. He did not so much object to temporary titles being conferred on men who had distinguished themselves on the field or in some other striking capacity, but he was absolutely opposed to hereditary titles. I drew a bow at a venture, in speaking with the right hon. gentleman, and suggested that possibly I might some day be obliged as a journalist to record the fact that he had accepted a title himself. He laughed heartily and answered: "My dear friend, you can set your mind absolutely at rest on that point. Lloyd George will die, as he has lived, a plain man of the people." Would the acquiring of a title add anything to the majesty of character and the greatness of the career of Mr. Lloyd George? On the contrary, I think it would seriously detract from his greatness.

I do not purpose to speak at any great length on this subject, but I shall conclude with an amendment to my hon. friend's motion, as I did last year, but I shall present it at the conclusion of my remarks. I have always thought that if you are to have titles, (and I of course disapprove of them in any form), if the sense of the public were in favour of titles, they should have been fairly distributed among the people of the country. The valuable services of the educationists of the country should be recognized. The farmers —a class without whom it would be impossible to successfully develop this country—should also be recognized. Have we ever seen a farmer knighted in this country? Then I think that prominent physicians and surgeons, men who have done much for the alleviation of human suffering, should have been recognized.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Is the hon. gentleman now defending the bestowal of titles?

Mr. RICHARDSON: No. I am saying that if you are to have this excrescence on the body politic recognitions should have been bestowed fairly. I want to assure my hon. friend from Peterborough that I take second place to no man in this country in my opposition to the very idea of titles. I think it is utterly derogatory to the country and a very great mistake, but I was saying that if you were going to have such things, men of the type I have mentioned should have been remembered.

An hon. MEMBER: Cut out the last line of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I will deal with the resolution in a suitable manner before I have finished, if my good friend will give me the opportunity. In Canada titles have largely been distributed amongst partisan politicians, railway promoters and exploiters, big business financiers, and rich nabobs and plutocrats. Just look over the list of recipients throughout the Dominion. It embraces men of uncanny reputation, little capacity, no record of achievement except it be in the line of the bedevilment of public affairs, and certainly no accomplishment of an altruistic or patriotic character. I should think that a considerable number of them possess a sufficient sense of humour and idea of the fitness of things to imitate the promised example of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this House last session, and to hurl their decorations into a bonfire if they could only do it stealthily and by night. Especially in this critical and menacing time of social unrest and reconstruction, those responsible for the administration of public affairs, responsible for the impressions that are being stamped upon the restless, uneasy, jealous, if you will, exacting, and in view of all the past, perhaps pardonably resentful minds of a portion of the populace with its varied factions, must exercise a determined and insistent care that the idea of social justice and equality and opportunities for all shall be the resounding and dominant key-note of every act of legislation. There must be no attempt to set up a cheap, tinsel aristocracy in this young western nation. The idea of conferring social distinctions must be effaced,—nay, the plant that has been inserted in our soil must be rooted out and destroyed. But if the mistake is to be persisted in, which God forbid, the authorities better have a care that the distribution shall embrace the dignity of toil, the genuine aristocracy of industrial and mechanical achievement, and the simple, modest dignity of living, exemplified in the life of Cincinnatus, the old Roman hero. The class of men who have received social distinction, compared with those worthy citizens who have been overlooked, has caused an offensive odour in the nostrils of decent-going reflecting Canadians.

I should not think that hereditary titles would have any defenders whatever, and especially not in this House. Surely we do not want to plant in this country an hereditary aristocracy. We see the evils of hereditary aristocracy in the Old Land, and I cannot conceive of anything that has done more for the enslavement or degradation of the people than an hereditary aristocracy —the "gentry" as they call them over there. When I visited the Old Land upon several occasions I used to sit with the drivers in the busses and used to take every opportunity to draw out the workingman, to get his viewpoint on the question of the aristocracy or the gentry, and I want to confess with most profound disappointment the experiences that I had. The men over there, the lower classes as they call them—and it is a term that I dislike very much to use—the greater portion of them seemed to have an admiration and a love for the gentry, they seemed actually to wish to be patronized, to be spat upon as it were. The result of all these distinctions throughout the old world has been the degradation of the human race, and we should not think for an instant of following the old European nations in maintaining such class or caste distinctions. Let us teach the race, the dignity of manhood, and the equality of opportunity. All men, says the American Declaration of Independence written by Thomas Jefferson, are born equal. I think if you took that pronouncement literally it is probably not true. All men are not born with equal endowments; but I suppose what Jefferson intended to say was that all men are born with equal opportunity and should before the law be regarded as possessing equal advantages. If we in this country were to allow the introduction of an hereditary aristocracy we would be striking a blow at citizenship, and a blow at the progress of our own country. We cannot afford to allow such a plant to flourish in Canada. It is doubtful if even the very limited number of possessors in the Dominion of these hereditary titles, after they have, like children, amused themselves with the tinselled toy, would not rejoice to be in a position to gracefully toss it into the Laurier bonfire. It must not be perpetuated in the life of the nation.

I was going to ask, what dignity would be added to Gladstone if he had accepted a knighthood or a peerage? What better would the human race have thought of him to-day, or of John Bright and Cobden, those great industrial and economic liberators? Why the very acceptance of a title, in my judgment, would degrade such names as theirs. Would Edmund Burke, perhaps the greatest orator the world has ever produced, be as dear in name to us all if he had been translated to a dukedom or a peerage? Coming to our own country, take Edward Blake, the great commoner, who sat in this House, I believe for twenty or twenty-five years, devoting that magnificent ability of his to the service of the nation, and Alexander Mackenzie, as honest a man as ever trod the soil. Would they be ennobled, would they be greater men had they been knighted in the old days? I think, Mr. Speaker, that every thoughtful Canadian respects and loves the names of the Hon. Edward Blake and the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. Yes, and you might add to theirs the name of that other great Canadian William Lyon Mackenzie, to whom this country owes far more than the average citizen dreams of to-day. Because the people have short memories and I find that we Canadians make a great mistake when we fail to study the lives of the men that served us. Think of William Lyon Mackenzie, who fought for representative and responsible government, who fought against the old Family Compact, a man with Scotch blood in his veins who refused to be domineered, who stood nobly for right and principle, and was willing even to place his life and liberty in jeopardy by entering upon rebellion against what he considered the wrongs of the day. Perhaps he was mistaken—I would certainly in the light of history and of developments not like to venture the idea that he was mistaken—but he took the consequences of his act, and it is to William Lyon Mackenzie that this Dominion owes so much at the present day. Driven from his own country he became an exile in a foreign land for years, often going for days if not weeks without food. He was without friends, without a man to say a kind word to him. Then an amnesty was declared, and he returned to Canada and died a broken old man. Would it endear the name of William Lyon Mackenzie to the people of Canada if a knighthood or any other honour that a human potentate might control had been conferred upon him? Not at all. The memory and name of William Lyon Mackenzie to those who have studied and appreciated his life and work will live as long as Canadian history lives. These are the men who are entitled to honour, the men who spurned anything that kings could do for them, the men who fought for principle and placed their lives in jeopardy. This nation little dreams how much it owes to men like William Lyon Mackenzie and as a Canadian I would deeply deplore the conference of any title that a human potentate could confer.

Let me add: How myriads of hearts the world over, whether descendants of Auld Scotia or not, would have burned with regret had their beloved bard who wrote:

> The man o' independent mind,
> He's king o' men for a' that.

Been de-dignified—if I may be allowed to coin a word for the occasion—by allowing any human potentate to transform him into "a belted knight"?

You cannot elevate men of the type of Burns or of Thomas Carlyle, the great Scottish philosopher and historian, by conferring titular distinction on them. The other day I noticed in the newspaper an extract from one of Carlyle's essays, and I am going to take a minute or two to read this great literature that it may be embalmed in the pages of Hansard. It is entitled "Two men I honour":

> Two men I honour, and no third. First, the toil-worn craftsman that with earth-made implement laboriously conquers the earth and makes her man's. Venerable to me is the hard hand—crooked, coarse; wherein notwithstanding lies a cunning virtue, indefeasibly royal, as of the sceptre of this planet. Venerable, too, is the rugged face, all weather-tanned, besoiled, with its rude intelligence; for it is the face of a man living manlike. Oh, but the more venerable for thy rudeness, and even because we must pity as well as love thee! Hardly-entreated brother! For us was thy back so bent, for us were thy straight limbs and fingers so deformed; thou wert our conscript, on whom the lot fell, and fighting our battles wert so marred. For in there, too, lay a God-created form, but it was not to be unfolded; encrusted must it stand with the thick adhesions and defacements of labour, and thy body was not to know freedom. Yet toil on, toil on: thou art in thy duty, be out of it who may; thou toilest for the altogether, for daily bread.
> A second man I honour, and still more highly him who is seen toiling for the spiritually indispensable; not daily bread, but the bread of life. Is not he, too, in his duty; endeavouring towards inward harmony; revealing this, by act or by word, through all his outward endeavours, be they high or low? Highest of all when his outward and his inward endeavour are one, when we can name him artist, not earthly craftsman only, but inspired thinker, who with heaven-made implement conquers heaven for us. If the poor and humble toil that we have food, must not the high and glorious toil for him in return, that he have light, have guidance, freedom, immortality? These two, in all their degrees, I honour; all else is chaff and dust, which let the wind blow whither it listeth.
> Unspeakably touching is it, however, when I find both dignities united; and he that must toil outwardly for the lowest of men's wants is also toiling inwardly for the highest. Sublimer in this world know I nothing than a peasant saint, could such now anywhere be met with. Such a one will take thee back to Nazareth itself; thou wilt see the splendour of heaven spring forth from the humblest depths of earth, like a light shining in great darkness.

I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, if you do not think it was really worth while to read to the hon. members such a classic?

I will continue my imperfect and perhaps somewhat rambling remarks with this amendment to my hon friend's motion. I move, seconded by Mr. Cruise:

> That the following words be inserted after the word "message" at the beginning of the third line:
> "May take measures to ensure the extinction of the hereditary titles at present in existence in the Dominion at the death of the present possessors thereof and"

Some people would probably be disposed to cut off these titles at once. I would not have any objections if it could be done easily and would not raise a constitutional issue in the old land, but it might be considered a more graceful act to allow the four or five Canadians who possess hereditary titles to die in peace. The hand of time will remove them and with their removal let us earnestly trust that we shall see the last of this miserable institution in the Dominion.

You cannot make a man greater than he is, and no higher keynote should be sounded than that of service, because the Master Himself said that "Whosoever would be chiefest among you shall be servant of all." If men get the idea that the greatest honour is to serve their country and their fellowmen they will not think so much of having temporary titles conferred upon them. And at this time, after the sacrifices our noble sons and the country generally have made, this Parliament should hold up the highest ideals to the men who have served their country so faithfully and so well, and if we maintain those ideals, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that our nation shall measure up to the standard that God intended it should reach.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what has got into the minds of the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that those learned and able gentlemen should have made any exception whatever in favour of titles.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: I certainly have made none.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am absolutely opposed to the amendment by the hon. member for Springfield, who first of all says that one of the objections to titular honours is that they have been incorrectly handed out.

That is an apology which logically and argumentatively means that if they had been correctly handed out, they might be excused. That of course, is absolutely a violation of the principle underlying the abolition of honours. We do not want titular honours in this country; that is the point. The people do not want them and we, being representatives of the people, are here for the purpose of voting them out of existence.

The member for Kingston is labouring, I think, under a misapprehension. He has two exceptions in his resolution, one with respect to military and naval officers and the other with respect to judges and administrative officers.

Mr. NICKLE: No. Just read the resolution.

Mr. BURNHAM: The resolution says:

It being always understood that this humble prayer has no reference to professional or vocational appellations.

"Colonel" is not called by the King a title. A man may be John Smith, Colonel commanding the Buffs of Kingston; he is not called "Colonel" at all; that is simply a way of designating him. You do not call a judge "Judge So-and-So;" that is only our Canadian vulgarity. He is Mr. Smith, Judge of the Supreme Court—or wherever he may be.

Mr. FRIPP: Mr. Justice Smith.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Justice Smith, of the Supreme Court—there is no titular honour in that case. So that this resolution might convey a misunderstanding and might lead to very serious results, if what I say is true. It may be presumed that the member for Kingston knows all about it, and that the words of his resolution must refer to something else—that the exception could only be a title such as a knighthood, or something of that kind. But it mixes the resolution all up; there is nothing definite or clear about it. Away with the whole thing. These gentlemen may bring in their resolutions or their amendments, but the people will be satisfied with neither. They do not want any compromise. If this House has not learned what the feeling of the country is, they will probably learn it at the next election—and they will learn that titular honours must be abolished in this country. It will come; we need not hurry ourselves; we need not fret ourselves unduly. We need not have any serious apprehension about it. We need not deal in an hour-long historical review of it, for God knows the whole thing is founded on democracy, not on the aristocratic pretensions on which the historical review is given. Nor is there any necessity for arguing from analogy. The simple fundamental principle of social distinctions is abominable and must be done away with. The people are desirous of destroying it, and, that being the case, let us have no more of it.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly and heartily agree with all that the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) said this afternoon, and likewise with what was said by the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). It is not necessary, as the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) said a moment ago, that this question should be laboured further. My own opinion is that titles are not good for the country, and I have very grave doubts whether they are good for the persons upon whom they are bestowed. I think we would be far better without them. Our country would be better; the people would be better. It is indisputable that the vast majority of the people are bitterly opposed to titles being handed out.

But I did not rise so much to discuss that question as to say a word or two with regard to the position I took last year when this matter came before the House. At that time much fault was found with me because I was the first to introduce this matter in the early part of a session a good number of years ago, and my position last year was regarded by my friends as very extraordinary. It was in May last—those days in May were dark and dreary days—that the question of titles came up in this House—and we had the very extraordinary spectacle of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), upon a private member's resolution, suddenly taking to himself the right to say that that resolution should be treated as a want of confidence motion, and that did the resolution carry he would feel it essential that his Government should resign and go to the country. To me that was most extraordinary. A general election in May of 1918 would have been an absolute calamity. I was returned on the question of conscription; I was given a mandate from my constituents to see that conscription was carried out. At the time that that resolution was brought up conscription had not been carried out, and had I, with others who felt just as strongly on the subject as I did, voted against the Government on this subject, and had the Government been defeated, it would have meant a general election; it would have meant the disruption of business; it would have meant that I was not carrying out the mandate of my constituents. Therefore, it was, Sir, that I absolutely sunk my own convictions, that I let them go where they might, and that I stood by the Government, with the result that you know of.

To-day I feel just as strongly on this question as I ever did. To-day I believe that the abolishing of titles is true Liberalism. May I say, if it is of any import to anybody, that I differed from my chief and from others of my party on one question, and on one question only? That question was conscription. I consider it to-day, however much others may differ from me, to have been good Liberalism on my part to support that policy. But my political faith and tenets are the same that I have always held. In these great days of reconstruction my Liberalism is, perhaps, better than it ever was, because I believe the country needs it. But as I say, when this matter was up last session, I sunk my convictions and voted as I did to support a Government in war time. I do not consider that such is necessary to-day, but I do consider that so far as this country is concerned we must come to one form of government, and one only, and that is the party system.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss upon its merits the subject of this resolution, because, having accepted the honour of knighthood, I should feel myself at a certain disadvantage in doing so. If I spoke in favour of titles, it might be considered that my view was biased or prejudiced. If on the other hand I spoke against titles, I might be regarded as ungenerous to those having greater merits than myself. My intention to-night is to indicate the present position of this matter so far as concerns action by the Dominion Government and by the Imperial Government, and to suggest a certain disposition of the resolution and of the amendment to the resolution, which disposition will, I trust, be of advantage to the Government in giving the matter further consideration and will meet with the views of the House.

While this is a question upon which there is room for difference of opinion, a question upon which members may not agree, it is not in any respect a party question. Both Liberal and Conservative Governments have in the past recommended to His Majesty the bestowal of knighthood and other titular distinctions, and adherents of both political parties have been the recipients of such distinctions. I think I am correct in stating that every Prime Minister of Canada, with the exception of one, has accepted knighthood. That exception was the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who, I feel certain, must have been offered the distinction, although I do not know that that is so. I think, therefore, that in all probability he declined the honour; but with that exception, as I have stated, all the Prime Ministers of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, accepted the honour of knighthood at the hand of their Sovereign. In addition to these distinguished men in the public life of Canada, many other members of Government were similarly honoured. I recall amongst others Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Sir George Ross, Sir James Whitney, in Ontario, and Sir Lomer Gouin in Quebec. I mention only outstanding men, for the purpose of showing that the acceptance of titular distinctions in this country has not been confined to any one party and that therefore the question is not in any respect a party one. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, while Prime Minister of Canada in 1902 had an Order in Council passed and forwarded to the Imperial Government, in which were these observations:

> In Canada a Government similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom has been established, and the advisers of His Majesty in Canada are the proper advisers of His Majesty for every kind of reward bestowed upon His Majesty's subjects for services performed within the legal and constitutional sphere of Canadian jurisdiction. His Majesty's ministers in Canada are acquainted with the standing in the community of the persons upon whom it may be proposed to confer honours, and of the character of the services for which these honours are the reward, and to have those rewards bestowed by His Majesty on the advice of those who are but imperfectly informed as to the estimation in which the recipients are held, or of the character of the services for which the honours are bestowed, is practically an invasion of the right of local self-government.

This report was based upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister of that date, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Order in Council goes on as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council concurring in the report of the Prime Minister, recommend that the same be presented to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, and respectfully ask that the Royal Instructions be modified to the effect that the same rules which apply for the exercise of the Royal Prerogative in granting honours and titular distinctions to subjects of the King in the United Kingdom be made likewise to apply to all recommendations by the Governor General for the exercise of the Prerogative to the King's subjects in the Colonies, and that all such recommendations by the Governor General to the Sovereign in such matters be made upon the advice of his responsible ministers.

I am quoting this in order to show the progressive steps which have been made in this matter of the bestowal of titles down to the present time. In a despatch dated 23rd April, 1902, and signed by Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, then Colonial Secretary, the following observation was made with reference to the Order in Council which I read and which was submitted to the Imperial Government as I stated:

> In dealing with this subject I have been desirous of meeting the views of your ministers so far as possible, but as the responsibility for making recommendations to the Sovereign in regard to appointments to an Imperial Order such as that of Saint Michael and Saint George rests with the Secretary of State and not with your ministers, it is his duty to obtain the best advice he can and he must be the sole judge of what is the best advice.

That was the position taken by the late Liberal Government and by the Colonial Secretary in 1902. The matter rested there until the present leader of the Government took it up shortly before the last session of Parliament. The present Prime Minister took the most advanced ground that had been taken up to that time with respect to this matter of titles; and in order that his views may be upon Hansard for the consideration of the committee to which I propose asking this House to have this matter referred, and for the information of the members of the House, I hope I may be pardoned if I quote from the Order in Council which was passed at the instance of the Prime Minister on the 25th March, 1918. After submitting that the subject demands consideration and attention and that the bestowal or honours is a matter of concern to the whole community and has a direct relation to the orderly government of the State, and after referring to the Order in Council from which I have read, passed on the 19th February, 1902, the present Prime Minister proceeds:

> The Prime Minister is firmly of opinion that the creation or continuance of hereditary titles in Canada is entirely incompatible with the ideals of democracy as they have developed in this country and that the time has arrived when their heritable quality or effect should be abolished in this Dominion.
> The hereditary peerage as an institution can find neither historic justification nor scope for usefulness in a state structure and social tradition such as that which now exists in Canada. Consequently the effect of such an institution in this country is merely, on the one hand, to confer and to perpetuate arbitrarily for some members of the community a titular distinction or status of honour, and on the other hand to imply a position of special though ill-defined privilege to which there is not and cannot be assigned any obligation or function in the activities of Canadian national life. Honours conferred directly upon deserving recipients under appropriate conditions and by proper authority will be respected by the community; but a decoration or titular distinction which is attached to the holder not in recognition of his own services, but merely from incidence of birth, and which is invested with no special or public duties or responsibilities, will inevitably arouse in this country a sense of utter incongruity and a feeling of keen impatience.

That was the advanced ground with respect to hereditary titles taken by the Prime Minister of this country in March, 1918. The following recommendations were made in the Order in Council:

> 1. No honour or titular distinction (saving those granted in recognition of military service during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the Sovereign proprio motu) shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada.
> 2. The Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.
> 4. Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

I am tracing the development of the principle of responsibility of government with respect to this matter of titles, and I think it will be clear from this Order in Council, which was passed before the last session of Parliament, that the present Prime Minister took at that time the most advanced ground which had been taken upon this subject.

The House will recall what I said a few minutes ago as to the reply which had been made by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, in 1902. He stated in effect that the Colonial Secretary was responsible for the recommendation to His Majesty. Since the last session of the House, dispatches have been received from the Imperial Government with respect to this Order in Council, which was laid before the Imperial Government shortly after its adoption in March, 1918, and to which reply had not been received from the Imperial Government at the time of the debate in the House last session. The present position of the Imperial Government with respect to this Order in Council is as follows. They accept without question recommendations Nos. 1 and 2, reading as follows:

> 1. No honour or titular distinction (saving those granted in recognition of military service during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the Sovereign proprio motu) shall he conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada.

2. The Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

That means that no honour or titular distinction, with the above exceptions, shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval and upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada, and that the Government of the United Kingdom will exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

Now I come to the third recommendation of the Order in Council of March 25, 1918, which reads as follows:

3. No hereditary title of honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

The reply from the Imperial Government to that was as follows:

His Majesty will not hereafter be advised to confer any hereditary honour upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, save on the formal recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Now, the Prime Minister of Canada has recommended, and his recommendation is embodied in the report of the 25th March, 1918, that he is firmly of opinion that the creation or continuance of hereditary titles in Canada is entirely incompatible with the ideals of democracy as they have developed in this country, and that the time has arrived when their hereditary quality or effect should be abolished. That means that, as a result of the action taken by the Government of Canada upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister in March, 1918, hereditary titles, so far as the future is concerned, are abolished.

The fourth recommendation of the Order in Council is as follows:

4. Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

The reply to that was:

This presents many difficulties that would require very careful consideration. Action for the present remains in abeyance.

There is one further step which has been taken since the last session of the House.

[Sir Thomas White.]

It will be recalled that the Order in Council expressly excepts honours or titular distinctions granted in recognition of military service during the present war. The word "military" there would include "naval." With regard to knighthoods to those who have rendered military or naval service during the present war, the Army Council, through the Rt. Hon. Secretary of State, has advised that no grant of the distinction of knighthood to any Canadian military officer shall be recommended without previous reference to the Prime Minister of Canada.

I have shown the attitude taken by the late Liberal Government in 1902 with respect to titles, and the reply to their representations by the Imperial authorities. I have also shown the action taken by the present Government of Canada, and the reply to the Imperial authorities of to-day. I do not in any way contrast the two positions. I think the differing attitudes are entirely due to the advance in public opinion with respect to the subject under consideration; but I desire to emphasize the fact that the matter is not a party question. It was advanced considerably in 1902, when the Liberal Government took the view that the principles of responsible Government should apply to the bestowal of honours in Canada. It was further advanced in 1918 when the present Government, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, took a position which has resulted in the abolition of hereditary titles so far as concerns the future and in the acquiescence of the Imperial authorities in the principle that titular honours and distinctions, with the exceptions which I have mentioned, should be granted only upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister or the Government of Canada. Reference was made this afternoon to the debate of last session, and owing to the absence of the Prime Minister I feel that I must say a few words with regard to the position which then existed when he moved an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). The Order in Council had been passed and forwarded to the Imperial authorities, and no answer had yet been received from them. In his speech on May 21, 1918, the Prime Minister used these words. I quote from page 2343 of Hansard:

There is another consideration which I submit to the House and it is this: His Majesty's Government have to take into consideration, of course, the relation of this proposal not only to Canada but to all the dominions of the Empire and they have asked us, in a respectful and courteous way, that the whole subject be brought under discussion during the coming summer when certain of the Canadian ministers are to visit the United Kingdom. It seems to me that as the Order in Council has been passed and has been communicated to His Majesty's Government, the delay that would ensue between this session and the next session, when the matter might be taken up again, if desired, ought not to stand in the way of our acceding to that respectful request. I do not imagine that the public interest will suffer by any action taken before Parliament shall assemble again. The Government of this country will then be in a position to announce to Parliament the result, of their conference with the Imperial authorities in respect to this subject. So, I would suggest to my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson)—and I hope he will accept this suggestion—that the sub-amendment which I have proposed be accepted.

The Government, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, had taken certain advanced action with regard to this subject. The report embodying its recommendations was before the Imperial authorities, and request had been made that the matter should be allowed to stand in abeyance until they should have an opportunity of considering it in the summer. I am confident in my own mind that it was on account of the situation which existed with respect to the Order in Council and the Imperial authorities that the Prime Minister felt as he did with regard to the importance of the amendment to the amendment which he proposed.

There is just one other matter to which I desire to refer. It has not been mentioned in this House but reference has been made to it outside. Owing to the fact that the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues were obliged to go overseas in May last at the urgent solicitation of the Imperial authorities, and at a time of great national danger—in fact, the most critical period of the entire war—the session of Parliament came to an end earlier than would have been the case in the ordinary course. Some three distinctions were granted after Parliament rose. I have taken the opportunity to inquire respecting these distinctions, and I find that they had all been recommended months before Parliament rose, and that in the case of one of them the person who was to receive the honour had requested that so far as he was concerned it should be deferred in order to allow some one else to obtain an honour of which it was thought he was worthy. The point I desire to make with regard to that transaction is that the recommendations had all been made and were before the Imperial authorities before this House rose. I have explained the situation as it exists and the action taken by the Imperial Government since last session. The Order in Council of March, 1918, makes exception in cases of honours and decorations granted in recognition of military service during the war, and I have already explained that honours and titular distinctions can be conferred, under the existing regulations, upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada only with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since the last session of the House and down to the present time, the Government has been confronted with a situation respecting honours which I should like to describe to the House. We have in the military forces overseas many who have distinguished themselves and who would be eligible for honours and recognition, subject to what I have said as to the honour of knighthood; and there are in Canada many officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces who have rendered distinguished service in Canada. These men were all desirous to go overseas and felt keenly disappointed at not being permitted to do so. Their duty lay in Canada, however, and many of them have rendered service of a most meritorious character. With regard to those who have served overseas in the military or naval forces there is a well-established channel of recommendation for honours, namely, the Army Council, upon the report and recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief. No difficulty arises in connection with those. But with regard to officers in Canada who have served in Canada and have not been able to go overseas, the initiative had to be taken here, if taken at all. In addition to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and those who have remained in Canada, and in addition to those who have served in the navy overseas and those who have served in Canada, there is a very large number of civilian workers in the Red Cross, the Patriotic Fund, Munitions and many other services; and if Canada followed the same course as is adopted in Great Britain and, I think, the Overseas Dominions, there would be a considerable number of civilian workers in England and in Canada to be recommended for honours or decorations.

Now the Government last autumn, in connection with the New Year's list, decided that the granting of titular honours and decorations in respect of civilian services, viz.: the Red Cross, the Patriotic Fund, munitions, etc., should be suspended, with the object of having the whole question given the fullest consideration. I have explained to the House that a very large list indeed was involved in Canada and in London. On January 3, 1919, we received a cablegram from the Prime Minister to which I especially desire to draw the attention of the House, because the suggestion is contained in it that I propose to make here this evening for the disposition of this motion. That cable stated that the opinion of the Prime Minister and his colleagues was that for the present there should be no deviation from the decision of the Canadian Government to suspend the granting of titular honours and decorations in respect of civilian services, viz.: Red Cross, Patriotic Fund, munitions, matrons, nursing sisters, and others.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the cablegram that brought forth this answer?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This cablegram came from the Prime Minister. The point that I am making is that the Prime Minister, having taken the ground that he had taken in March, 1918, in the House of Commons during the debate on this subject, had suggested the action which I propose to the House should be taken with regard to this motion. The same cablegram suggested for the consideration of council whether the question of civil honours for war services, as well as the whole question of honours, might be referred to a committee of the House of Commons for consideration and report. It was not intended that the duty of personal selection should be referred to the committee, but merely the general question of the principle to be adopted. On January 18, the Government informed the Prime Minister by cable of the decision of council that no honours or decorations should be recommended for the present for those engaged in military and naval service in Canada, and that action in this respect should be deferred until after the whole question of honours is referred to a committee of the House of Commons for consideration and report. Just let me summarize the position. The Order in Council of March, 1918, excepted from its provisions honours or distinctions granted to those engaged in military and naval services in Canada. A well established channel of communications exists in the War Council, upon the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, as to those who have served Overseas, but with regard to those who have served in Canada in the naval or military service the initiative in recommendation is to be taken here. With respect to that latter class, and with respect to civilian workers both here and overseas, the Government view was that no recommendation should be made until the matter had been referred to a select committee of the House for consideration and report.

Now, with respect to civilian services I quote an extract from a letter of the Prime Minister:

> If it proposed to recognize the work of this character as justifying a recommendation for honours by reason of service, the list will be a very large one, but not by any means so large as to do full justice to all those who have unselfishly and devotedly given their best effort to such service. The selection will be not only arbitrary but invidious, as it will not be possible to obtain that full knowledge of relative service which will be essential. On the other hand if such service is not to be recognized by Canada, then Canadians will feel a sense of injustice and discrimination. For example, scores of Canadian men and women have worked unselfishly and devotedly in London during the past four years. Persons giving no greater or perhaps less worthy service in the British Red Cross, or in the Red Cross of any Dominion, are recognized by the bestowal of suitable honours with the consent of their governments, while the Canadians receive no recognitions whatever. There will undoubtedly be much bitterness among those who will feel themselves thus placed under an unjust discrimination. Possibly it may be considered desirable to include work in the Red Cross as work in the military service. If so we cannot very well shut out service in the Y.M.C.A. or similar organizations.

The Prime Minister there touches upon the essential difficulties of this situation, which, in my view, render it highly important that a committee of this House should consider the whole question deliberately and maturely with a view of making a report to this House before the end of the session in order that it may be fully discussed, and, if approved, adopted here.

During the war thousands of people have rendered services involving the utmost self-sacrifice and devotion. If, on the one hand recognition is to be given, the difficulty is to choose those—and there will necessarily have to be a limited number—who should be recognized. There would, of course, be grave room for dissatisfaction on the part of the others if they were not also recognized. That is one aspect of the matter. On the other hand, you have the undoubted fact, as pointed out by the Prime Minister, that there are in London, and it is within the knowledge of the House that there are in Canada, hundreds of men and women who have worked most devotedly in civilian services connected with the war, and it is put forward by many that if in other parts of the Empire and in Great Britain there is recognition of such services, and no recognition of like services in Canada, there will be a feeling of injustice and discrimination. It seems to me therefore that the matter, as it relates to those who have served most devotedly the interests of the State, should receive the most deliberate consideration on the part of the House. I am going somewhat into detail, Mr. Speaker, because I desire to show the House how many questions are really involved in this matter. It is not only a question of abolishing hereditary titles, of abolishing titular distinctions such as knighthood, but it involves the question of what, if any, recognition shall be given to those who served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force Overseas and the Canadian Expeditionary Force in Canada only; in the Naval Service Overseas, and the Naval Service in Canada; and that multitude of civilan workers who gave so freely of their time, both here and in London, in connection with the various funds—Patriotic, Red Cross and others,—which I have mentioned.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the Government accept the advice of the committee to be formed and be governed by it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When I come to move my amendment I shall ask that the committee give careful consideration to this question and report back, and it will be for the House to adopt, modify, or reject the recommendations of the committee. The attitude of this House will, without question, be of the utmost value for the guidance of the Government. I do not wish to anticipate what the judgment of the committee and the House will be, but it is the sincere desire of the Prime Minister and of the Government to get the deliberate, reasoned opinion of this House upon all the questions I have mentioned this evening.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It may not be ready to give it with regard to those who have served in the naval and military forces.

Mr. BUREAU: With regard to anything.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It may be, as my hon. friend says, that the House is willing to give that decision which will prevent any distinctions being conferred upon those who have served in the naval and military forces overseas and in Canada, but I did not understand that the resolution went so far last year. Possibly I am in error. As to the present resolution, it may have in contemplation the wiping out of all distinctions to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

A letter from Sir George Perley, dated 10th February, states that there is a strong feeling that civilians who have been doing war work for Canada overseas should be treated in the same way as those who have done it for Great Britain and other parts of the Empire. The following is quoted from his letter:—

> A great many men and women have worked devotedly here, some of them throughout the whole length of the war, on various kinds of useful service. They did not do this for the purpose of obtaining recognition but when they see civilians from everywhere else in the King's Dominions getting honours it certainly seems strange that Canada should be the only part of the Empire which declines to make any recommendation for awards.

Now, I have pointed out the difficulty of making selections without injustice, and I propose, Mr. Speaker, to ask the House to adopt the suggestion of the Prime Minister, namely, that the whole question of honours be referred to a Special Committee of this House for consideration and report. It is not the desire of the Government to shelve this resolution, but to have a representative committee—whose names I shall give the House—take this matter up at once, consider it carefully and maturely, and report to this House with respect to the bestowal of various titular distinctions upon civilians, upon members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have served overseas and upon those who have remained in Canada, and also upon civilian war workers. I do not know what the view of the House is. It may be, as my hon. friend has said, that it is opposed to any decorations, let alone titular distinctions, for members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but I should doubt if that is the opinion of all the hon. members.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to be misrepresented. I said the House was ready to give its opinion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I misunderstood. It seems to me that the Committee would have to consider the question of hereditary titles. The Prime Minister in the Order in Council of March 25, 1918, recommended the abolition of all such titles for the future, and that recommendation has been concurred in by the Imperial authorities. Then there is the further question whether the title of knighthood should be conferred either for public service or for naval or military service. If the Committee is of the opinion that titular distinctions may be conferred upon members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, there is the question whether such distinctions should be limited to those who have served overseas, or whether they should also be awarded to those who have served with distinction in Canada. There is the further question whether there shall be lesser titular distinctions to civilians in future, and whether decorations or other distinctions shall be given to civilian war workers of the several classes which I have mentioned.

Since Confederation, titles have been bestowed in Canada for public service, and since the war many distinctions and decorations have been bestowed for distinguished naval and military service. Shall those be continued? It seems to me that the whole subject is so important, having regard especially to those who have served in the war, that the House of Commons might very well delegate it to a select and representative committee to consider and report as promptly as possible to this House for its conclusion upon the subject. I therefore beg to move the following amendment to the amendment; seconded by Mr. J. D. Reid:

That all the words after "that" in the first line of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "a Special Committee of this House be appointed for the purpose of considering and reporting upon the question of the conferring of honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who have performed overseas, in Canada or elsewhere, Naval, Military and civilian service in connection with the war. The said Committee to consist of the following members: Messrs. Nickle, Green, Peck, Buchanan, Clark (Red Deer), Thomson (Qu'Appelle), Cowan, Richardson, Whidden, Nesbitt, Middlebro, Pardee, Cockshutt, Murphy, McCoig, Ross, Ames, McMaster, Lemieux, Robb, Fielding, Elkin, Copp, McCurdy, Sinclair (Guysborough)."

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I am very glad that this is not a party question. I have had the honour to collaborate with the member from Kingston (Mr. W. F. Nickle) in this matter, and I am glad to know that we shall be able to express our views with regard to it irrespective of whether we sit upon your right, Mr. Speaker, or upon your left.

The present position has been gone into somewhat fully by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), but I do not altogether agree with some of the things that he has said. I am in thorough accord with him when he says that an advance has been made, but I am not satisfied with the present position. I am not satisfied, for instance, that the Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time. The number of knighthoods or the number of titles—I trust there will be none—to be granted to Canada should be a matter on which the Canadian people alone shall have the right to speak. I am not satisfied that the Government in London should say to us in Canada: "We shall decide how many knights or lesser luminaries you are to have in Canada."

[Sir Thomas White.]

Then, the Acting Prime Minister has said that no hereditary title or honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada. That was the advanced ground taken by this House and by the Government—I wish to be absolutely fair—last session. But the authorities in London have made this addition to it: "Save on the recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada." It is true that the Prime Minister of Canada has said that in his opinion it is unwise to have hereditary titles in Canada; all honour to him for taking that view. But always in the history of nations there is an ebb and flow of advance, and it is possible that sometimes in the ebb of public opinion from what I consider right and just—in a temporary time of reaction—we might have a Prime Minister who would suggest that there should be hereditary titles in Canada. I see no reason why the Government at London should not accept the general statement referred to—accept it holus bolus without any reservation whatsoever.

The fourth recommendation in the Order in Council of last session was that appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title or honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect. Well, what was the answer of the Government in London? The King's advisers in London gave what I might call a Scotch verdict; they merely suspended the matter— said that it might remain in abeyance. If this House, by an almost unanimous, if not an unanimous, vote accepts the resolution proposed by the member for Kingston, that will be a very good answer to these gentlemen and will impress them with the fact that the Canadian people not only do not want hereditary titles, but do not want titles of any kind. In saying this I hope that no one will think I am dealing in personalities, for I am not. There are those in this country and in this House whose amiability of character and whose democratic bearing shine out, perhaps, with greater brilliance on a background of knighthood. I am discussing this matter, therefore, merely as a question of principle.

Are we to have recognition of military service by way of title or distinction? I refer the House, as concerns this part of the discussion, to the following remarks of the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) last year:

> It occurs to me that if there ever was a time when a subject such as this should be brought before the House, it is a time when the nation is at war, because if war teaches us anything it teaches us this: that when the country is at war and when the war is over, you are likely to have the greatest crop, if I might use that term, of decorations and recognitions that are from time to time seen.

That reason is even stronger to-night than it was when the member for Kingston uttered these words, because we have the word of the Acting Prime Minister that a very avalanche of titles and distinctions is hanging over the Canadian people and may descend upon us at any time.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Before an election.

Mr. McMASTER: The Acting Prime Minister read a letter from Sir George Perley stating that civilian war workers in Great Britain, English folk, have received honours in large numbers from their Government, and that keen disappointment prevails among Canadians in London because similar showers—shall I say of blessing?—have not descended upon them. I wonder how far that is a correct statement of the fact. Some Canadian civilian war workers in London may be dissatisfied because knighthood has not been conferred upon them, but I doubt whether that is the sentiment of the majority of them. Although waves of titles have practically inundated the people of the British Isles, the matter of the conferring of titles is a subject there of keen criticism, aye, even of ridicule. I remember reading in a British paper not long since that people in England expressed the fear that under the administration of Mr. Lloyd George Great Britain was becoming one of the most decorated of nations. Certainly a great body of public opinion in England wants none of that sort of thing. Honours have been suspended since last session. Instead of putting them in a suspense account, may I implore this House to wipe them off the books altogether?

What is the position in regard to titles of all those who fought in the war, either on the field or at home? The vast majority of soldiers and sailors at the front or on the sea and the vast majority of workers in Canada worked faithfully and well, and if you are going to distribute titles or honours among them you must count them not in tens or hundreds, but in tens of thousands. You cannot do that. Well, then, let it be the proud record of this country that their people fought in the war not for knighthoods, not for titular distinctions, but from sense of duty, love of country, and regard for the principles for which the Allies contended.

Why are the Canadian people against titles? First of all, I think it is because titles are not in keeping with the very air of British North America.

We in this country are a democratic folk, and the giving of titles is an attack on democracy. What is a title? A title means that a man, by the appellation which is used in regard to him from day to day, is set apart from the great body of the Canadian people, and that is a mistake. We must insist in this country upon the three great principles of democracy. A good many years ago when I was a student in Paris, I was struck by the three great words which are found on the front of every public building, " Liberté," égalité, fraternité," and I believe the giving of knighthoods and titular distinctions in this country is an attack against the great principles of equality and fraternity. In this connection let me just repeat what the Prime Minister said last year in regard to hereditary titles:

> Consequently the effect of such an institution in this country is merely, on the one hand, to confer and to perpetuate arbitrarily for some members of the community a titular distinction or status of honour, and on the other hand to imply a position of special though ill-defined privilege to which there is not and cannot be assigned any obligation or function in the activities of Canadian national life.

Exactly the same principle applies to knighthoods and titular distinctions of that sort. I had not the privilege of being present at the debate this afternoon, but I understand the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) raised the question that the resolution as introduced by the hon. member for Kingston did not do away with the right of the Government to confer knighthood on persons who happened to be judges or to enjoy rank in the army. That is not the intention of the resolution, nor do I think it is a proper interpretation to place upon it. The resolution says:

It being always understood that this humble prayer has no reference to professional or vocational appellations conferred in respect to commissions issued by Your Majesty to persons in Military or Naval Services of Canada or to persons engaged in the administration of Justce of the Dominion.

All that that means is that a judge will continue to be called a judge; that a colonel will continue to be called a colonel; that a captain will continue to be called captain; it does not in any way infer that a special privilege is to be given to judges or officers in the army to receive titles of knighthood. I ask this: In the present state of feeling in Canada and throughout the world, when those whom we have been prone to call the working classes, those who work with their hands as well as with their brains, feel that there is unfairness in society, when they feel that society as at present organized does not give them a fair deal, is it wise to perpetuate such things as knighthoods? I do not think so, I believe we shall in this country tend to carry on the nation's business more harmoniously, and therefore more efficiently, if we apply in fullest measure those principles of democracy—liberty, equality and fraternity, if we make it known to all the world that the Canadian people do not wish to have titular distinctions or knighthoods; that they are all prepared to adopt an almost Quaker like simplicity in the appellation by which one or another is called. As regards the form of this question, I think it would be well for this House to vote for the resolution. I do not say that there might not be room for a committee to consider the best way in which the expression of the House might be put into effect, but it would possibly be as well for this House to put itself clearly and emphatically on record as being opposed to titles of any sort in Canada.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I shall with great pleasure vote for the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), if for no other reason than this, that I think we should all want to be just a little careful in these times of world impulse before we do anything in haste to prevent this generation from doing honour to itself by possibly doing something to honour those who have borne themselves in the late war in Europe beyond their fellows in the matter of earning human praise.

I rise, however, not with the purpose of saying anything more than that upon the parliamentary position of this question, but to indicate that I am not quite at one with what I understood to be the attitude of my democratic, radical, iconoclastic and, I might almost say, Bolshevistic, friends from Springfield and Kingston. I am sure I shall have the whole-hearted approval of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) when, in attempting to secure a right ground of thought upon this question, I have recourse to any teaching that is to be found in Holy Writ. My hon. friend knows very well the writings of the Apostle Peter, and he will remember that Peter was very severe upon a certain class of individuals about whom he said: "Presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities." St. Jude, as my hon. friend will also well remember, in speaking of a very bad class of people who were set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of hellfire, said: "They despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities." I do not think that I need quote at greater length from that Book to show that my hon. friends to whom I have referred were, to say the least of it, treading on very dangerous ground this afternoon. That is especially true of the hon. member for Springfield who, I think, actually went to the barnyard for comparisons of the peacock and turkey to those people who are referred to in Scripture as "dignities." Still, on the whole, seeking distinction from any one is not a Scriptural virtue.

I am bound to think honestly on this question, and there is a higher authority than even St. Jude or St. Peter, who said: "How can ye believe if ye receive honour one from another?"

That is the acid test on this question, and it is a test to which I am sure my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) would not submit himself, because it would debar a man from seeking any honour from his fellows whatsoever; he would have to stand always in the naked dignity of his manhood,—I am not sure, after listening to my hon. friend this afternoon, whether he would even be allowed to dress himself as a modern man does. What the hon. gentleman objected to, indeed, was not that a man wore dress, but that he wore gold braid. Well, Sir, that is not a very democratic distinction after all. The acid test is whether we seek honours from one another at all. My hon. friend from Springfield does not mind a little honour occasionally. There was a band of journalists went to Europe last summer, and he was picked out with others from among his fellow journalists, and had the distinction conferred upon him of being sent over to represent the journalism of Canada in the Old Country, where he conferred and confabulated with no less a person than Mr. Lloyd George. He had also the distinction of going over to the battlefields and parading with a few peacock feathers of his own.

The Quakers are the only people, I think, who have attempted to live literally up to the last Scripture which I have quoted; so they always refer to one another by their simple names. A Quaker is never anything more than William Simpson or John Richardson, but my hon. friend from Kingston and my hon. friend from Springfield pander with the rest of us to this inherent vice in human nature by which almost every human being seeks in some way or another—and I am not at all sure that he seeks it viciously—to raise himself above his fellows. I say that I am not at all sure that this is a vicious desire, because a fair amount of emulation in human life is a part of strong individualism, and I think there is a great deal of very frothy democracy going around in these days. But the Quaker is consistent; he neither calls his friend Mister nor Esquire. As there are no Quakers that I know of in this House, every member of this House has failed to submit himself successfully to the acid test, because we all get our typists to address our letters with either "Mr." in front or "Esq." behind.

The churches themselves have failed in regard to the teaching of the Founder, because they, too, have their dignitaries—their bishops, their moderators, and their presidents, showing that there is in human nature this tendency to be reaching out to higher positions. In society this same thing prevails. Mr. Speaker, it has not been without its uses in the case of hereditary aristocracies. I am the last man in the world to have any brief to speak for the British aristocracy, but I will say this: In the best hereditary families of Britain, there are traditions which have come down through generations—yes, through centuries—which have on the whole ennobled the public life of Britain. I say that as a Radical. Take the traditions of the house of Cavendish. The late distinguished head of that house, the late Duke of Devonshire, the uncle of his present Excellency, was a remarkable example of the best traditions of his family. Three times, without hesitation, in public life when the call of principle and of duty came to him, he left the party with which he had been associated, and on each occasion, such was his tremendous influence and such the clearness of his thinking, that he took the majority of his fellow-countrymen along with him. I hold that that ability to act independently, that ability to strike out for himself, was an adornment of British public life in his person, and an adornment which we should do well to reproduce some of, at least, in this country; because if there is anything that has been a curse to Canada, it has been straightlaced party politics, and I say that without any hesitation. The traditions of the English nobility—and the very word teaches us that we should not too lightly speak even of dignities, because it is not wrong to be noble—their traditions in this war have been of the very highest. The sons of British peers, and the brothers of British peers, and British peers themselves, have stood in the trenches and fought in the trenches with the humblest Tommies from London and from the agricultural fields of Britain. They have done that of their own free will; they were volunteers. As officers at the very beginning of the war they left all the appurtenances of their rank and titles, all their wealth, their stately homes, their lordly fields and parks, to go and face the foe, and to taste of death in no small numbers for the cause of freedom and democracy. I think it is only right, when our friends proclaim that this is a democratic country, that we should recognize these truly democratic qualities of character in those who were born in a very different sphere of society from that in which we had birth.

Then, I do not know that it is altogether an evil thing in society to have something to aspire to. I am not looking up now much myself; I am coming to the time of life when I would rather control my spirit and teach it by looking down. But I am not sure that my friends from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and Springfield (Mr. Richardson) are on safe ground when they say that the people of Canada are so very strongly with them on this question. We have titles in Canada that I have not heard any kick about in this House. There is the title of senator for example. Does anybody tell me that that is a title which is generally spurned in Canada? Sir, if one of the Senate's functions is to be looked up to, it certainly fulfils that function to the letter because members of the House of Commons in large number are often looking up there with longing eyes. So that when we examine this thing, we see that there is an inherent quality in human nature which recognizes, after all, that in human society, as in human nature itself, equality is sought in vain.

One of my two friends, the leading exponents of democracy in this House to-day —I think it was the hon. member for Kingston—described German autocracy, against which we have been fighting, as a state in which the few have the right to govern. Well, I do not quarrel with that; I think it would be a good definition of autocracy. But I should like to point out to my hon. friend that the few are not necessarily the titled few, and if Canada is to be a true democracy we must see to it that under democratic forms we do not allow ourselves to be governed by the few here—I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, even on such a subject as daylight saving. We must see to it, I repeat, that we do not allow ourselves to be governed by the few here. Government by the few is not necessarily government by the titled few, and if my friends will be radicals I will tell them what a radical is. A radical is a man who goes to the roots of things; he looks beneath the surface title to the real principles that prevail. If we accept that title let us accept it in the fullest of its meaning. If this House of Commons is the representative of a democracy and does not believe in autocracy, then let us, in all our approaches to public questions, whatsoever their size, whatsoever their bearing, see to it that we "hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may." Let us see to it that on no occasion do we allow any influences of the few to control the many in this House, and through us to control the many in this country. Autocracy does not reside in titles, Mr. Speaker, but in power. Autocracy resided in power, and it is the power that men grasp for before they seek the title. The power is there in many cases before the title is conferred—the title is a mere external emblem of the power. Wealth is a form of power, and I say deliberately that the autocracy that is to be really feared in its operations upon the rank and file of the people, whether in this country or in the United States of America, is not an autocracy of titles but an autocracy of wealth. A man becomes a real lord, Sir, before he becomes a titular one, and for my part I cannot profess to get very excited about titles. We have heard a great deal about individual cases of titles in recent years and individual cases of lordship. What was the process by which the titles were attained? Some one makes a fortune overnight almost—a large fortune. He goes to Britain and gets knighted, possibly finds his way into the British House of Lords and becomes, I suppose, an autocrat. But he was an autocrat by way of his millions before he was an autocrat through the peerage, and a real democrat would look into the state of the laws of his country to find out how it is possible for a man to accumulate huge amounts of wealth in a very brief time, these huge amounts of wealth being the natural road to the mere surface decorations over which we have got so excited and spent the whole day talking about. My hon. friend from Kingston said that there was great unrest among the workmen of this country and he thought that that unrest was in some way traceable to the conferring of titles. Well, Sir, I scarcely think so. I do not think the workmen of this country are troubling themselves a very great deal about the inequalities of social distinction. I do not think the labouring men of this country, even where they have come from across the seas, have very much of that quality of the Englishman which is embodied in the well known proverb "The Englishman dearly loves a lord." As a democrat, I believe in the removal of inequalities, but as a radical I think we should go to the root causes of inequalities; and if you want to deal rationally and effectively with any unrest there may be amongst the workmen of Canada to-day you must deal with the real causes of the real inequalities of society. The inequality of society which goes home to the workman is that inequality by which our soldiers, to the number of 55,000 or 60,000,—most of them serving for $1.10 a day,—have laid down their lives for society, while most of us who have remained at home have benefited in the way of making filthy pelf by dint of their sacrifices, in many cases making that pelf to the amount of actual enrichment. That is the inequality of society that is troubling our workmen to-day, and I should recommend to my hon. friends that after we have finished with this question we should settle down to deal with the real, the serious, inequalities which are disturbing society and which will be a terrific trouble to us, as to all other countries, unless they are dealt with along the line of drastic reform. That is all the contribution I have to make, Mr. Speaker, to this enormous question of titles.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion merely to correct a wrong impression which may have been created to-night by the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). In the course of his address he made the statement that there was not in this House a member of the Society of Friends otherwise known as Quakers. I wish to inform the hon. member that the speaker who is addressing the House at this moment, the member for South Renfrew, has the honour of being a member of that society. I might apologize somewhat for the extent to which I practise the tenets of the society, and possibly this fact may have influenced the hon. member for Red Deer in the conclusion at which he arrived. He must be aware that the Quakers of the present day are not the Quakers of the seventeenth, or the eighteenth or the nineteenth century. Like all other religious bodies they have changed considerably in recent years. So that, although they have adopted the plain language and the plain dress, and dispensed with titles entirely, even the common titles of " Mister," " Esquire," and so on, the Quakers of the present day are not as strict in the observance of these rules and regulations as they were in the days gone by. Consequently there is a possibility that the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has been misled in his judgment as to the personnel of the members of this assembly. I can assure him, though, that I am proud to be considered worthy of membership in that society, and I would be unworthy of that position if I sat silent on this occasion and failed to correct the impression that was left, although I know unintentionally, on this House.

I might say in passing that in regard to the resolution now under discussion, I endorse to the limit some of the statements made by the last speaker, and I refer more particularly to his eulogy of the position taken by the scions of our aristocracy in the Old Land during the recent war. It has always been a delight and pleasure to me to look back on the history of the sons of the aristocracy of the Old Land who have been trained to live up to the privileges that they enjoy, which is so different from the condition that obtains in other lands in that respect. We find the sons of multi-millionaires, and of the so-called aristocracy, in this country, following a different course. They do not seem in many instances to rise equal to the occasion, or to their surroundings, whereas in the recent war there is no doubt that the aristocracy of the Old Land played an equal part with the sons of the poorer people. Coming down to the question of titles or otherwise, in this country I believe—and naturally it follows from my religious training—that titles do not improve the individual on whom they are conferred. Take some of the leading men of Canada; I do not grant for a moment that their position has been improved by the conferring of titles upon them. On the contrary, I know there have been individuals in this country and in the Old Land whose names were mentioned this afternoon—I refer to such men as Gladstone and John Bright in England, and Blake and Mackenzie in Canada—whose value would not be at all enhanced in the estimation of their fellow citizens by the conferring on them of titles. There are too, men in Canada who have had titles conferred on them and I know that these titles have not improved them in the estimation of their fellowmen—they were worthy men independent altogether of these honours. It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to vote in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), and I shall have very great pleasure in doing so.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House more than a minute or two. but it appears to me that I might back up the very excellent remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer, whose opinion on these matters I value very highly, and also endorse the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Acting Prime Minister. This debate has been largely academic. I was considerably wearied with it this afternoon, and because I thought we had heard too much already about the subject of titles. I think the word "democracy" has been worked to death these days, and there are a great many panaceas put forward in connection with it, which are really doing it a great deal of damage. What we want is to get to work to make a democracy that is satisfactory to the people of Canada, and not talk so much about the matter and use the word so often, because simply shouting "Democracy!" is not going to make us any more democratic, and is not going to settle those questions that are agitating the people. I think this subject received quite sufficient airing last year, and I had hoped that the member for Kingston would have been of the same opinion and not have introduced his motion again this session.

In the first place, I have no objection to titles if they are properly earned and are lived up to after they are obtained. We have a few titled gentlemen sitting in this Chamber. Who would say for a moment, knowing the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) as we know him, that he has in any way lost his hold upon the people, or upon the members of this House, because he has accepted the title "Sir." I think that he is a great deal broader man than when he received the title. I think he is more in touch with the members of the House and more in touch with the people than ever he was before, and he is growing rapidly. And now, having paid a compliment to the leader upon our side, let me say of our good friend across the way, the newly elected leader of the Opposition, that "Sir D. D. McKenzie" would sound very well indeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not believe that the leader of the Opposition would lose any dignity if he assumed that title, and I think that none of the members of this House would say that the "light in the window" would burn any less brightly because it was lighted by Sir Daniel McKenzie.

Mr. McKENZIE: Donald, it should be.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, Sir Donald be it; but I am saying this believing that the hon. gentleman is following in the steps of the great leader whom he has just succeeded, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The late lamented statesman bore the title with a great deal of distinction for a good many years, and although it is true that at times he spoke a little disparagingly of the title, he retained it, and lived up to it perhaps as well, or better, than a great many other men that have borne titles.

Now my good friend from Kingston is generally very consistent, indeed, but in respect to titles I do not think he has quite lived up to that reputation. I understand that he has a bosom friend, and if I were asked to mention that friend I would say he is a gentleman with a title. The hon. member will know to whom I refer. I do not believe the hon. member is any the worse for spending a good deal of his time in the society of that titled gentleman. I congratulate him upon having so brilliant a friend in a gentleman who is living up to the distinction that he has received, and, I think, has received deservedly.

The member for Red Deer has quoted a few passages from Scripture. He has quoted them remarkably well, and they are very apt and fitting to this question. It is true that some members of the House, if we were to believe them, would be quite prepared to call each other, Tom, Dick and Harry across the floor instead of using the expression "honourable gentlemen." I cannot see, however, that the dignity, or the decorum, that we have in the Chamber would be enhanced if we were to so style one another. Every assembly must guide itself and try to live up to the dignity that belongs to it. If any gentleman who is elected a member of this House, or appointed to the Senate, fails to live up to the title appended to his name, in my opinion, he should abandon that title. It is hard to live up to these things, it is a difficult matter to realize what the responsibility of titles means, but we use them everywhere, and there is no place where they are used more profusely than in the fraternal societies where "Worshipful Grand Master" is quite a common title. In some orders every one is a "Sir Knight." They have a lot of such appellations, there is no need to enumerate them all; and the very highest forms of titles are handed to these gentlemen as soon as they enter the cloisters of these secret societies. The world is full of titles, and the thing more necessary than anything else is to see that they are deserved and lived up to.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has just entered the Chamber, because I have a passage of Scripture to quote and I know that he is very fond of hearing such quotations. The passage that I was going to give is from the ancient sage, Job, and I fancy my hon. friend has heard it before. Job said:

> I know not to give flattering titles to men, for in so doing my Maker would soon take me away.

I want to draw the attention of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to the word "flattering." Job did not say "titles;" he said "flattering titles." Sir John Macdonald gave an interpretation of flattery which I think has never been bettered since his day, and no dictionary contains as good a definition. He said that flattery was an agreeable untruth. Now, if I were to tell the hon. member for Brome that he was the greatest statesman in this House or on earth I would be using a flattering title.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If I were to tell him that he has a long way to go before he becomes a great statesman, I would be telling him what I believe to be the truth. The word "flattering" is where the prophet stumbles; and as long as titles are not flattering there is no fault to be found with them. The whole trouble is in a man getting a title that he has not fairly won or does not live up to. It appears to me that the Acting Prime Minister has taken a very fair way of settling this thing, and I trust that the Committee, though a large one, will not take very long to settle the question. As I said at the outset, I think the subject has received far more attention than it deserves. The main thing is that our boys have won titles that are worth carrying, titles that they are entitled to for their heroism, their self-denial and their devotion to a great cause; and I say it is a poor time to cut off such titles now when our boys are on the eve of receiving them. We should not belittle the D.S.O., the V.C., the M.C., or the other decorations conferred on those who have won them only after tremendous effort. If those men never do anything more to distinguish themselves in this world, they have achieved what many in former days never reached to. I have very much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in heartily endorsing the Acting Prime Minister's amendment to the amendment.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Last session when this question of titles was gone into very fully I was only able to be present and hear the concluding part of the discussion. For that reason I have been very much pleased to hear the present lengthy and interesting debate. I listened, as usual, with a great deal of pleasure and profit to the address of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He is happy in mostly any realm, but he was particularly happy to-night when he launched into the realm of theology, although he went rather far afield for evidence in support of the amendment. The days of Peter are quite remote, and Jude lived about the same time, at all events their letters are in close juxtaposition. However, I am sure that there is nothing stronger in the mind of the hon. member for Red Deer than a sense of proportion and application —he always brings us severely to task if we are we not absolutely logical in everything that we say;—and I must tell him that the reasonings in the sphere of theology do not always fit in properly in the sphere of legislation and statesmanship. When he quotes Peter and Jude as having said certain things, he must not forget that those men were evangelists, preaching the gospel of the Nazarene, which was entirely theological and moral and had nothing to do with the legislative or political sphere. Therefore, I think my hon. friend will see that those quotations are not as apt as everything he quotes usually is. He must not forget that in those days the real dignitaries were the Scribes and Pharisees. But perhaps his recent acquaintance with such people constrained him to make those quotations. Another quotation from a higher source than even Peter or Jude might have come to his mind. He will remember that the Master himself said of those very dignitaries whom the hon. member for Red Deer defends to-day: "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites."

Mr. McKENZIE: I should think my hon. friend would rather be excused from defending such dignitaries. But as my good friend invited me into the field of Holy Writ, I will take him a little further, back to an authority that he will not despise. I am sure that no one in this House is more familiar with the writings and history of that great legislator, Moses, than my good friend from Red Deer. When we come to talk of Moses we are in the realm of lawmaking and politics, and anything that he said on questions of this kind is more to the point. Now, we find that Moses refused a title.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have it on the very highest of authority that Moses when he became of age refused to be called Pharoah's daughter's——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: He refused to be called the son of Pharoah's daughter. My hon. friends will understand that, will they?

Some hon. MEMBERS: We have it.

Mr. McKENZIE: He preferred to suffer privation with the people of God rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. That is authority to the point from one of the best men that ever lived, the man selected to take the people of God out of the darkness of Egypt. He refused a title, and that being the case, I have the very best reason for saying that no matter how excellent men may be, who have accepted titles, there are men equally as good who have refused them.

My good friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was bordering on the realm of theology, but he did no go very far. There is something in the Scripture about people beating their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks; I would expect the member for Brantford to be somewhat familiar with that quotation. The hon. gentleman said that the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), would find the way weary and long to the Emmaus of the political heaven. Let me express the hope that the member for Brome will not be alone on that weary road; that others will be trudging along with him towards the sunset, saying, "It is toward evening and the day is far spent." So much for the delectable course into which the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) assisted by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has led us.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), whose addresses are always logical and clear-cut and whose argument in support of any proposal that he makes is always satisfactory. We heard his argument last spring; we have heard him address the House several times on this question. About a year ago the House was quite ready to pass judgment on the question of titles, and but for the intervention of the Prime Minister on that occasion it would have done so. There was no dissenting voice at that time on the ground that there was not sufficient information. Now a year afterwards, the Acting Prime Minister says that we are not sufficiently enlightened on this question. For the last fifty years—all our lives, no matter how old or how young we are—we have heard about this thing. What information is to be gathered by this very excellent committee that is to be formed? What are they going to tell us? Where are they going to get their information? The member for Kingston, in dealing with this matter, did not go back quite as far as the member for Red Deer did, but he went quite a distance back. He was present at the battle of Hastings; he came into the country with William the Conqueror; divided up the lands with him, and did considerable surveying; so that he was able to come to us with a great deal of information, covering a period from the earliest times down to the present day. With the lucid and authoritative evidence that the member for Kingston presents to the House we ought to be satisfied. The House is as well prepared now to pass judgment on the question of titles as it will be a month hence or after we have heard the report of this committee.

Talking about committees, we have in the Government itself the very best committee that we could get from this House. Parliament is elected, and out of that Parliament the Governor General, on the advice of the Prime Minister, selects a committee from the House of Commons known as the Government. There are eighteen or twenty of them; let me hope they are the select men of the party on that side of the House. They are responsible to the people; they should come down with a policy on this matter. Are they going to play daylight saving again? Have they not enough courage and strength of conviction to reach a decision upon this very simple matter of titles, come down to the House with it and ask the House to endorse it? Surely that is responsible government. Why throw the responsibility upon the whole House, and upon a very large committee who may find it difficult to reach a concrete conclusion? I submit, therefore that we are just as well prepared now to pass judgment on this motion as we shall be at any time in the future.

On the 25th of March, 1918, the Government reached a conclusion with regard to the question of titles. They put that conclusion into the form of an Order in Council and submitted it to the House. Hon. gentlemen on the other side voted for it by a very large majority. The Prime Minister said: We have put three weeks of our time on this matter; we have looked at it from all sides; and we submit this Order in Council as the wisdom that we could bring to bear on the question. That was not long ago. But the difficulty is that the Prime Minister and the Government cannot stay put; you cannot keep them anywhere. I am reminded of the time when I heard the member for Red Deer designate the Government that preceded this one—a Tory Government, nevertheless, and as close to this one as you could possibly get—as an "aggregation of funks." I think he was right when he said that. The words are on Hansard; of course, I would not use them myself, but, particularly when it comes from such an authority as the member for Red Deer, it is, perhaps, proper to use language which was not thought out of the way at that time. This Order in Council was submitted to the King, and by him considered in Council; upon it the King in Council made certain suggestions, and submitted them to the Government of this country. If the motion of the Acting Prime Minister to-night was to leave the matter as it was left by that Order in Council, and as it was left by the vote of this House, I should be disposed to agree. But, "How long, O Lord, how long," will the Government continue to hold to one thing? That was the order then; they want another thing to-day; to-morrow it will be something else. For goodness sake, let us get clear of this title business and get down to something else that is of more importance to the people. Over a year ago the Government solemnly declared its position in this matter, and that position was affirmed by Parliament; now the whole thing, in the absence of the Prime Minister, is to be unravelled, and thrown back to a committee of twenty or twenty-five members from both sides of the House who, in all human probability will not agree. That is the condition in which we find ourselves now.

Here is an extract from a speech of the Prime Minister on May 21, 1918, reported on page 2364 of Hansard of last year. As the Prime Minister is not here, and as whatever else I may do, I want to be absolutely fair to him in his absence, I am going to read his speech which is short:

Sir Robert Borden: If by the leave of the House I may be permitted to say a few words, I shall make the matter perfectly clear so far as I am concerned. The subject was taken very fully into consideration by the Government at different times. We spent three or four weeks in reaching a conclusion as to our recommendations through the Governor General to His Majesty the King and to the Government of the United Kingdom. We dealt with it according to the light that we had. And when the motion of my hon. friend the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) came before the House, I took the House absolutely into my confidence, told them of the discussion that we had had and of the conclusion that we had reached. I said that the Government of the United Kingdom, regarding some of the matters in the Order in Council as of very grave import, had asked us for an opportunity to discuss the whole subject, because undoubtedly it has relation to its ultimate effect not only to this Dominion but to all the Dominions of the Empire and to the United Kingdom as well. We reached a certain conclusion, and it has been stated frankly and clearly, as far as I was able to state it frankly and clearly, to the House. I can only say, so far as I am concerned, that if the House does not propose to accept the course which I have asked them frankly and with much respect to take, I should consider that I am relieved from my duty of carrying on any longer the Government of this country, and I should ask His Excellency the Governor General to seek other advisers. It seems to me that a somewhat peculiar course has been pursued by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in inquiring of the Leader of the Opposition as to whether or not this motion was to be treated as a motion of want of confidence. My understanding of the course to be pursued on such occasions is that the Leader of the Government should be asked with regard to that question, and I cannot quite understand the reason why there should have been resort to my right hon. friend on the other side of the House to learn how I should regard a motion of this kind. However, the course has been taken, and it is entirely in the judgment of the House to determine what course they propose to pursue in the matter. So far as I am concerned my course is absolutely clear and open.

That is the whole of the speech, and it is perfectly clear what was before the House. It bears out exactly what I said. Now, if, when this motion was taken on the 21st May, 1918, the Prime Minister was going to resign if his friends on that side did not support his Order in Council, what guarantee have we that we are not going to bring the same catastrophe on the country to-day if hon. gentlemen opposite will do anything except just fall in line as the Prime Minister called upon them to do on that occasion? If, after three or four weeks of close consideration of the question, as the Prime Minister tells us, a conclusion was reached, surely as much learning was put into the matter then as can be brought to bear upon it by this committee. The war is not a new thing. Every phase and every condition of the war that exist to-day, except peace, for which we thank the Lord, was well to the fore on the 25th of March, 1918. Whether titles should be granted to men who fight, or to women who helped, or to anybody else who was engaged either here or in the Old Country in connection with the war—all that was certainly before the Government, and they decided with all that knowledge before them that the Order in Council which was read here to-night was the best and safest conclusion to reach. Surely there is no excuse now for reversing that decision and starting over again anew. For those reasons I think we should decide the question now, once and for all, and if this House will reach the conclusion that the Order in Council for which they voted last year was good enough, I do not understand how hon. gentlemen who voted for that Order in Council are going, in the absence of the Prime Minister, to tell him that he was wrong then, that they will not support that, but that they want another thing altogether. There is no finality to this matter at all. It is given a twist and a turn just to suit the exigencies of the occasion. That is about all I have to say on that particular phase of the subject; but in view of what I have read from the Prime Minister's speech, I think I should bring to the notice of wise, patriotic hon. gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House, particularly those supporting the Government and those who left their old friends, cut away from their old moorings on the high question of conscientious necessity and duty, as they thought, the weight which the Prime Minister attached to this situation. A few days before this motion he was returned from the country by an overwhelming majority to fight the war to a finish; he was the selected champion of the Canadian people to fight this war. What weight does he attach to this question? There comes up in this House a trivial matter about titles—I say "trivial" advisedly, for it was trivial as compared with the great question of life and death of this war—and we find our friends who were honest and in earnest about this thing told by their leader: Away with your war, away with your catastrophe, away with your loyalty, if you do not come up to the scratch on this question of titles, I will throw you to the dogs and will have nothing further to do with you. That shows to me the hollow mockery of the business and that it was politics, first, last and all the time. And I want to hear the argument to the contrary in face of the declaration of the Prime Minister himself that if they did not come to the mark on this little business of titles, there was nothing further to it and he was relieved from all the vast and great responsibilities of the salvation of this country thrust into his hands by the Canadian people. And I should like to know from hon. gentlemen who are sitting behind him for no other purpose than to see that the mandate of the Canadian people in respect to the war was carried out, why they were ready to permit that mandate to be torn to shreds and thrown to the dogs for the mere purpose of carrying the Prime Minister's views in regard to titles into effect.

The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) spoke about unrest in this country, and the same matter was referred to by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). There is unrest in this country, but that unrest is not created by reason of titles. I am a poor man and a poor man's son. I am in touch with the poor people of this country, working men and all classes. I know their pulsations and heart-beats and the circumstances in their houses and families, and I know they are not concerned very much about titles. They do not lose any sleep over who is a knight or a baronet or a lord, but it does concern them that the flour is getting down to the bottom of the barrel; that the meat barrel is almost empty. It does concern them that their children's shoes are getting thin and worn, and that they cannot keep their children warm at night or in the day time; that they are not able to gather together enough of this world's goods to carry them along decently and comfortably.

There is another class of knights, another class of autocrats, they are after in this country, and that is the combines and the trusts who are taking the money and the very heart's blood of our people. Let me hope, Sir, that the eloquence and learning of my good friends from Kingston and Springfield will be directed along this channel. I hope that an opportunity will be given them to strike a blow at these autocrats who are bringing pain, penury and trouble to the homes of the people by reason of the title which they have to control this Government. Why, we had the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) the other day saying right before hon. gentlemen who sit on the Government benches that this Government is owned body and bones by the Baronet Sir Joseph Flavelle. Is that true or is it not? There are other chosen ones besides Sir Joseph Flavelle; he is not the only pebble on the beach. I repeat, it was said here openly by a supporter of the Government, that hon. gentlemen on the Government benches, with all their learning and all their ability, are nothing but a flock of sheep in a cart, with their legs tied, being driven to market by Sir Joseph Flavelle and other autocrats and plutocrats in this country. I invite my hon. friend from Kingston and my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to let their voices be heard along these lines. My hon. friend from Red Deer will find in Holy Writ severe condemnation of those who are starving the poor, and robbing the people, and putting heavy burdens on the workers, which they will not touch even with a finger. My hon. friend will find the sternest condemnation in Holy Writ of these practices, and nobody can apply it better than he. If this discussion does nothing more than to compel us to think of these things and to help us make this a truly democratic country, it will have done some good. Let us show our democracy by going to the homes of the poor, and seeing to it that there shall be an even distribution of the great wealth of this country. Let us help to relieve the suffering so that every man, woman and child in this country will know that this is a Parliament to which they can look with confidence for redress, and that there is a Government in this country which has their interests at heart. These are the things which come home to my mind and conscience much more than the question of titles.

Mr. G. W. ALLAN (South Winnipeg): I wish to add a very few words to the debate which has taken place to-night. First of all, I wish to say that I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment. I put this proposition to the House, and I do not believe it can be honestly contraverted by any man inside or outside of the House. We in Canada owe to all those who have served in our military and naval forces a debt of gratitude which we shall never be able wholly to repay, and having those men in mind, it should be an honour and a distinction to be able to serve on the committee which has been suggested by the amendment to the amendment by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White)). I trust that the members of that committee will work most earnestly and faithfully in order to offer to this House their very best decision as to whether titles should be conferred on our naval and military forces. With regard to distinctions and decorations for those who have served in connection with the war in a civilian capacity, I will frankly say that I regard that service from an entirely different point of view. For the military and naval forces there is nothing too good that this country can accord in the way of distinctions or decorations, if this House believes they can be conferred with advantage. I believe, however, that no man who has not served in the military or naval forces in this war can feel for one moment that any act or accomplishment of his life is comparable for one solitary second to the accomplishment of the youngest youngster who has served in either of those forces. That is my feeling, and I feel it deep down. I doubt very much whether the bestowal of decorations in acknowledgement of civilian service will redound very much to the advantage of this country. With all the complex problems facing us as an aftermath of the war, and calling for solution, I think it would not tend to better the situation or to overcome our difficulties to confer distinctions or decorations on civilians. I believe there is a good deal in the widow's mite, and I think those who were well enough off to offer their services in a civilian capacity freely and without hope of reward are entitled to no more recognition than the thousands of working girls in this country who have given of their small wages to send parcels to our soldiers, and who, in order to do that, had to exercise the direst economy and practise the greatest self-sacrifice from the commencement of this war until victory was achieved.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I regret very much that I find it necessary to say a few words in this debate. When the resolution on the Order Paper came before the House, I had no intention of taking part in the discussion, which I had assumed would resolve itself into the clear-cut question whether this House favoured or did not favour the granting of such titles as knighthoods in this country. I had hoped that there would be a vote on that simple question, and I had intended to vote with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). I by no means agree with either of these hon. gentlemen that this country is at all agitated over the question of titles. I have never heard in my own constituency, or in different parts of the country in which I have been, anything of the great agitation over the question which they and other hon. members would lead us to believe exists. I believe there are a great many bigger questions which the people are much more agitated about to-day. I do not think the people of this country care very much about that question at all, although if it came to a vote I believe they would overwhelmingly support the hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Springfield. I do not believe there is any real open agitation in connection with the question, but I must take issue with some of the statements contained in the letter from the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in which it was implied that a good many decorations should be bestowed in this country on civilians who have worked in Canada or in London in supporting the men at the front. I think that the most humble Tommy who has served in the line deserves far more in the way of decorations than any of those who have worked on the Patriotic Society or the Red Cross Society either in London or in Canada. Another opinion I wish to emphasize is that the mothers of the boys who died at the front —even women who did nothing else than supply those boys—deserve ten thousand times more the gratitude of the country, whether in titles or anything else, than the people who worked in Red Cross or patriotic societies. I do not for a moment belittle those who have rendered service in these societies, because I have every respect for them; but in my opinion the giving of titles to such people is responsible for whatever agitation there may be in the country and whatever adverse opinion that may exist in regard to the conferring of titles. Speaking for myself as a returned soldier, and not for any group of returned soldiers, I wish to raise another point, and it is this: I do not believe any titles should be conferred—and when I say "titles," I mean for example, knighthoods, with the title "Sir"—any more to the naval or military forces than to civilians, because I do not believe we have any right to establish in Canada a military autocracy or aristocracy. I shall quote some of my words of last year on this question. Last year when the question came before the House I intended to vote as I intend to vote to-night, but the Prime Minister made a statement that if a vote were given against the conferring of titles he would resign. I then expressed the opinion that in the condition of world affairs that existed at the time the question was of too small importance to turn out any Government, and accordingly I voted with the Prime Minister. To-day I understand the Acting Prime Minister to say that the subject is not a party question. At any rate I shall vote against the appointment of a committee for the reason that I do not require any committee to instruct me on this question. I regret that I should have to take this position. I regret that the Government has found it necessary to make me take this position, and it is unfortunate that a question like this should be brought before the House, in my opinion, more or less unnecessarily at the present time. I think that a number of questions are unnecessarily introduced, and it is a matter for much regret that the House should be forced to divide on an issue which is not of paramount importance to the country. I feel it my duty, in view of the statement which I made last year and my sentiments in this matter, to vote against the Acting Prime Minister, but there are times when perforce we must take a stand, and, as my hon. friend from Red Deer said, "let the chips fall where they may." My position last year was stated in these words:—

> I wish to say that, generally speaking, I agree absolutely with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that not only hereditary titles but all knighthoods should be abolished in this country.
> I repeat that I believe that this Government was elected for the purpose of carrying out the Military Service Act and sending soldiers to the front. I do not believe that it is the duty of this Parliament, of men who are elected as I was with that specific purpose in view, to turn out this Government on such a question as this without due consideration. If after due consideration this question comes up again, if it comes up in the next Parliament, I am willing to say here to-night. that if the hon. member for Springfield moves this motion I shall be willing to support it at that time.
> There is one point I wish to make before I sit down, a point in regard to naval and military titles.
> I do not agree that there should be titles given only to naval and military men in this country. I agree absolutely with the Prime Minister in that. We should not make a military caste to stand over and above the other people of this country. While we are fighting to put down autocracy in Germany, we do not want to create a military aristocracy or autocracy in our own country. I do not believe that the military should be given titles any more than any other class. But I do believe that for deeds of valour the military should be given decorations.

That is where the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was somewhat confused in thought when he spoke of the Military Cross and the Victoria Cross. There is no resemblance between these distinctions and titles. I believe that Military Crosses and Victoria Crosses should be granted for deeds of bravery, and I may point out that while the Republic of France does not confer titles it gives such decorations as the Legion of Honour, which the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) wears.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after quoting what I said last year, I do not see how I could consistently or honestly take any other position than to vote against the appointment of a committee. If the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Kingston can take any other course, after introducing this motion on two different occasions and forcing men like myself to take the stand I am taking on the question, then I say they have more elasticity of mentality than I have.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, when this question was before the House last year I took the liberty to discuss it and I shall endeavour to avoid repeating the arguments which I then advanced. I rise merely to support the position taken by my hon. friend from Rainy River and Fort William (Mr. Manion). The resolution involves a declaration of principle, and certainly does not necessitate the consideration or report of a committee. As far as I can learn, a question is usually referred to a committee after the principle which is involved has been decided upon by the House, but when the whole question resolves itself into a declaration of principle I do not see why it should be referred to a committee at all. Are we or are we not in favour of the continuance of bestowing titles upon citizens of Canada? That is the whole question. I do not wish to employ harsh terms, but I think that this Parliament would stultify itself if it accepted the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Acting Prime Minister to-night. Such an action would simply mean the postponing again of the settlement of a question which was before the House last year and upon which the opinion of the House was perfectly clear. Every one remembers, as has been stated to-night, that all the hon. members who spoke upon the question last year were emphatically opposed to titles, apart from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and, I believe, the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell), so much so that the right hon. the Prime Minister was compelled to resort to what I think was a most arbitrary position to save an unpopular institution. The Prime Minister virtually said to Parliament: We are passing through the most critical period of the war; this Government has been elected to conduct the war; it has been elected on a policy which has as its object the winning of the war; but if this Parliament decides that the Government shall no longer have the right to bestow titles on its friends and on such citizens as it may deem fit, the war can take care of itself and I shall quit and go home.

That was the position taken by the Prime Minister last year, and it was on account of that position, an hon. gentleman stated, that his amendment was voted on and accepted by the House. Sir, since that took place public opinion has asserted itself in this country and in no mistakable manner. The people are utterly tired and sick of this title question. The Prime Minister last session, when moving his amendment to the amendment, as reported at page 2343 of Hansard, said:

> There is another consideration which I submit to the House and it is this: His Majesty's Government have to take into consideration, of course, the relation of this proposal not only to Canada but to all the Dominions of the Empire, and they have asked us, in a respectful and courteous way, that the whole subject be brought under discussion during the coming summer when certain of the Canadian ministers are to visit the United Kingdom. It seems to me that as the Order in Council has been passed and has been communicated to His Majesty's Government, the delay that would ensue between this session and the next session, when the matter might be taken up again, if desired, ought not to stand in the way of our acceding to that respectful request. I do not imagine that the public interest will suffer by any action taken before Parliament shall assemble again. The Government of this country will then be in a position to announce to Parliament the result of their conference with the Imperial authorities in respect to this subject. So, I would suggest to my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson)—and I hope he will accept this suggestion—that the sub-amendment which I have proposed be accepted.

So the Prime Minister moved his amendment last year for the purpose of having another year to confer with the Imperial authorities at the then coming conference, and stated to this House that at this session the Government would come down with a definite policy upon the question. Instead of that being done, when the hon. member for Kingston again introduces his resolution on the very same subject, the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) moves another dilatory motion, and asks again to postpone the settlement and the decision of this question. As far as I am concerned, I am prepared to vote now on the question. I have the greatest confidence in the hon. gentlemen whose names have been proposed as members of the committee, but I do not wish any of those gentlemen to make a finding or to form an opinion for me on a question of principle such as that which forms the subject of the present resolution.

Nobody has tried to defend the institution, although perhaps my hon. friends from Brantford and Red Deer went close to it. My hon. friend from Red Deer pointed to the fact that there are men in this country who got rich overnight, went to Britain, and then found their way to knighthood. Well, Sir, I think that no stronger indictment can be preferred against the whole institution than those very words. Honours which are bought are no honours at all, and we do not want them in this country of ours. The hon. gentleman also said that the nobility of England conducted itself splendidly during the great war. That is true, but so did the plain citizens of England, so did the workingmen of England, so did the democracy of England. I know something else: I read only recently in an important British review that it was a misfortune that when war broke out commissions in the army had been confined exclusively to the sons of the aristocracy, and that it took some time for the brains of the country to be called and trained to serve as officers in the army. My hon. friend from Brantford said that the word "democracy" was worked to death in this country. There are words which my hon. friend does not like. I remember that a few years ago—I think it was during the naval debate—my hon. friend said he was tired of the word "autonomy." Let me tell him that the words "autonomy" and "democracy" will be used quite a few times in this country again, and if he does not like them he had better change his mind and tolerate them at all events. Mr. Speaker I am going to vote against the amendment of the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I think it was the hon. member for Red Deer who said that if you were going to be radical you should start at the root of things. I do not know whether the people that I have the honour to represent in this House would come within that category or not, but one thing I do know, that they have been very consistent upon this matter. They have not let an opportunity slip, for the last few years, of passing resolutions upon this subject, and voting against not only hereditary titles, but titles in all forms. And as their representative, I feel that I would be very derelict in my duty if I did not express that opinion in this House. I am heartily in favour of the resolution as introduced by the hon. member for Kingston, and whilst I do not feel like going as far as the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) I feel that the Government has not treated me properly by putting me in the position that it has done in this matter. I believe that the members of this House should be left to decide this matter for themselves. As has been very well pointed out, it is really a matter of principle upon which every man should be able to make up his own mind.

The hon. member for Brantford made some comparisons which I think were altogether unfair in his application to members of this House of the term "honourable gentlemen." We all know, at any rate I think I know, that is a term which is merely used for convenience in the transaction of the business of the House, and as soon as we go outside the portals of this Chamber the term is used no longer. Reference has been made also to the titles conferred upon the officers of fraternal organizations, but I think the comparison was ill-advised. The people of my constituency are absolutely opposed to titles in any shape or form, and, as a member of this House, I intend to back them up as far as I can.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): I regret that I was prevented from being present at the earlier stages of this debate, and have only had the pleasure of hearing the last two or three speakers. It is quite conceivable that if I had had the pleasure of hearing the whole of the debate I should have reached a different conclusion. However, I am disposed to fall back upon the view which I ventured to express when this matter was before the House a year ago. The motion of the hon. member for Kingston has been repeatedly referred to to-night as if it were the same motion he made a year ago. That is not the case. When my hon. friend brought forward his motion last session, I had great pleasure in giving it my very cordial support. It dealt with hereditary titles, and upon that question I had no hesitation whatever in expressing an opinion. On the wider question of titles generally I frankly confessed that I had some hesitation in agreeing with the amendment moved at that time by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). I did feel that these titles had been rather freely distributed, and in that way there was an abuse of the system which had tended to make it very unpopular. But when you look back to the days when Macdonald, Cartier, Galt, and a few others, received titles, there was no condemnation of them in the community, as these titles were then granted but rarely and to men of undoubted distinction. If that had been the case in later years, I presume the conferring of titles would not have been as unpopular as it is to-day. I am hesitating a little in this matter. It will not break my heart if the ultimate decision is that all titles of the kind are to be abolished, and probably that will be the outcome; but if in the meantime the Government thinks that it can get any help from Parliament, that this is a matter for a committee, I have no objection to letting it make the trial, although I have not much faith in it. I would have some hesitation in voting for the resolution of my hon. friend from Kingston, but I am quite content to let the Government make a trial of its committee, although I do not expect it to make much out of that course.

Mr. D. SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): The question of titles is one that appears to engage the attention of this House to the exclusion of a great many other matters of very urgent importance. I thought a year ago when the question was under discussion that we were possibly devoting too much attention to what was a question of very minor importance compared with the urgent questions then before the House; and although the war has ended I believe that the reconstruction period with which we are confronted demands not only our closest, but almost our exclusive attention, and that we could well afford to leave matters such as this to some time in the future without any great injustice to the country. I do not mean that I approve of the conferring of titles upon people in this country. There have been times when titles were considered a great honour and the recipients were deserving of them, but I agree with the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) that titles have been conferred in a manner which has taken away from them any prestige which they might at one time have had, and that we do not regard them to-day in the light in which they were intended to be regarded, or would be regarded if they were properly conferred. I think that the amendment of the Acting Prime Minister to refer this to a committee to report upon will be much more satisfactory than attempting to dispose of it here. I must again repeat that I believe we are devoting altogether too much attention to matters of minor importance when other matters of urgent public importance are demanding our attention.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With the consent of the House I should like to substitute for my amendment, in order to improve the phraseology, the following:

That the subject matters of the said motion and amendment together with the questions of conferring honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon the subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who have performed overseas, in Canada or elsewhere, naval, military or civilian services in connection with the war be referred for consideration and report to a Special Committee consisting of the following members: Messrs. Nickle, Green, Peck, Buchanan, Clark (Red Deer), Thomson (Qu'Appelle), Cowan, Richardson, Whidden, Nesbitt, Middlebro, Pardee, Cockshutt, Murphy, McCoig, Ross, Ames, McMaster, Lemieux, Robb, Fielding, Elkin, Copp, McCurdy, Sinclair (Guysborough).

Mr. SPEAKER: This can only be put with the unanimous consent of the House. I would direct attention also to the fact that under Rule 11 a committee consisting of more than fifteen members can only be appointed with the unanimous consent of the House. The question is on the amendment to——

Mr. NICKLE: Before the debate is closed I would like to exercise my privilege——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has risen at a very peculiar stage of the proceedings.

Mr. NICKLE: I endeavoured to rise but I did not catch your eye, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not see the hon. member. I will accept his statement that he purposed to rise.

Mr. NICKLE: What I want to say before this debate is closed will be very brief. As has been said by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), the resolution I introduced this afternoon differs from the resolution I introduced last year in this respect, that last year's resolution was aimed at hereditary titles, while the resolution of this afternoon is aimed at titular distinctions. I do not intend at this late hour to go fully into the various arguments that have been advanced both for and against the resolution and the amendments, but I do not think I should allow the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to pass entirely unnoticed. One is always charmed to hear him, he has a wealth of comparisons, a vigour of diction, and a charm of style peculiarly his own. But sometimes in the swing of his argument, it seems to me, that he is not entirely consistent. To-night, if I judged his argument correctly—and I endeavoured to give due weight to everything he said—it seemed to me he failed to make the distinction that exists between officiary appellations—if I may use two very large words—and titular distinctions of an honorary character. He elaborated and laboured the point that one was inconsistent in contending for the abolition of titular distinctions provided one were prepared to admit that such terms as "senator," "minister" and "president" should be used.

I am utterly at a loss, Sir, to understand how we can express ourselves in the ordinary parlance of every day life unless we use some words to describe the objects about which we intend to talk. I do not see how you can describe the presiding officer of an assembly unless you call him "president". I cannot see very well how you can make a distinction between male and female, man and woman, unless at times you use the words "Mr." or "Mrs.". I am also at a loss to understand how you are to make the distinction between the commoner and the senator unless you use the ordinary parlance of every day life to describe those who happen to sit in this assembly or those who sit in the assembly across the way.

The member for Red Deer waxed eloquent—and probably rightly so—when he described the magnificent service which those who occupied positions of importance in England had rendered in this great war. He described in glowing terms the service rendered by the sons of those who belonged to a long hereditary line, and for a moment I wondered whether he was forgetting the men in the trenches, because I know with what favour he views the services these men have rendered. But in a moment his natural impulses overcame his argument, and he paid just as glowing a tribute to the simple men in the trenches as he paid to those who came from the aristocratic homes of Britain. All of which only demonstrates that valour is not confined to any particular group of men. When the call of country is heard, brave men, no matter what their birth, come from cottage or from castle and render efficient service to the State in a great time of need.

The member for Red Deer said that I said labour unrest and labour trouble were traceable to titles. I do not think I used any such expression this afternoon. I said—and I quoted from the speech of Lord Shaughnessy—that there was labour unrest in this country, but I did not say that the question of titles was that 11 p.m. which was disturbing labour. I said that labour was dissatisfied in respect of the status that it occupied in this country and that it was a pity that at a time like this we should accentuate that unrest by the establishment or the recognition, or the granting, of fresh titular distinction.

I now come to a question that has caused me some consideration to-night. The question with which I am confronted is this: Am I to vote for the amendment to the amendment as moved by the Acting Prime Minister, or am I to stand firm, if I may use the expression, and vote for my resolution? Now, I want to be perfectly frank with this House. Last year, when this question came to a crisis, late in the evening, after a bitter yet brilliant debate in which many members took part, I voted against the amendment of the Prime Minister because I did not think that this question should be made at that time a want of confidence motion. I thought it was a question on which the House should reach its own conclusion, each man thinking for himself; I therefore stood to my guns and voted for the amendment proposed by the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). What I want is results, not notoriety. I am absolutely sincere in what I am urging this House to do and in advocating the reform which I want this country to adopt. I am not playing politics; I am not looking for recognition by way of notoriety in this quarter or in that. I realize that difficulties have to be met, obstacles have to be overcome. I realize, as I said this afternoon, that this is an involved and confusing subject. The Acting Prime Minister made to me this afternoon what I consider an eminently fair, a just and a judicial offer; and I am going to accept his proposal in exactly the same spirit as he offered it to me, to this House and to the country. He said that the Government had no desire to shelve this question. He said: We have held up honours that might have been granted; honours have been granted in all parts of the British Empire except Canada; we realize the difficulty of the situation and we want the deliberate judgment of the House on the question. Had the Acting Prime Minister submitted to this House a blanket resolution without naming a committee, I doubt very much whether I would have voted for it. But he has been honest with me, and I am going to be quite as frank with him. On the committee named by the Acting Prime Minister are representatives of all shades of thought, all shades of opinion, from the radical to the Conservative in this House. He says that the Committee is to meet promptly and is to prepare a report, and that that report is to be considered in this House this session.

If I and those who see eye to eye with me on this subject cannot convince as fair a committee as the Acting Prime Minister has suggested of the merits of the subject that we have been debating to-day and that we debated last session, then I say that we are not entitled to win, because if any contention in a matter of public interest cannot win on its merits, cannot win on the arguments that are advanced in favour of it, it should not win at all. I believe that there is a preponderance of opinion from one end of this country to the other in favour of the resolution that I have propounded this afternoon. Such confidence have I in public opinion; such confidence have I in the merits of the matter which I have introduced to this House for consideration, that I am going to vote for the committee proposed by the Acting Prime Minister. I believe that that committee will give honest and thorough consideration to the broad questions that have been relegated to it for consideration—broader questions by far than have been embraced in my resolution—and that we shall get out of the way, once and, I hope, for all time, questions that have caused, are causing, and will cause unless finally settled, unrest and disquietude in Canada.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment of Sir Thomas White, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I was paired with the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POWER: I rise to a point of order. Sixty-four members have just voted against the appointment of a special committee of 15. I raise a point of order whether this Committee can sit or not, because Rule 11 of the House says:

> No special committee may, without leave of the House, consist of more than fifteen members—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in a position to rule now, if the hon. member will only permit me. I drew the attention of the House to that rule and pointed out that the motion of the Acting Prime Minister could only be put by unanimous consent, and that consent was given when the motion was first put.

Mr. POWER: It was certainly not given by unanimous consent, when 64 members voted against it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I especially drew the attention of the House to Rule 11 and stated that a special committee of more than 15 members could not be appointed except by unanimous consent. That was done before the motion was put in the first instance. The hon. member, to be in order, should have raised the point of order prior to the time the motion was put in the House. He is not in order now.

Mr. POWER: I wish to raise another point of order. Rule 11 says further:

> No member who declares or decides against the principle or substance of a Bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), and two or three others who have already decided, are nominated of this committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the second point of order raised by the hon. member, I am in the judgment of the House; but in my opinion the rule does not apply here, because the subject of the resolution and also that of the amendment have not been determined upon. They are both referred to a special committee of the House for consideration, and that is an entirely different matter from a committee being appointed to consider a resolution as to the principle of which a vote has been given by any hon. member. Therefore, in my judgment, the rule does not apply in this respect at all, and I so rule.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Tuesday, April 15, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

DAYLIGHT SAVING—MR. ETHIER'S VOTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval—Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, on March 27, the House divided on an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie) on the question of daylight saving. The vote was taken as appears on page 968 of Hansard, but my vote is not recorded. I voted "nay" on the amendment to the amendment and would ask that the omission be rectified.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall inquire into the matter and have the necessary correction made.

CARDINAL MERCIER'S VISIT TO AMERICA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I noticed in the press this morning that a very distinguished personage, His Eminence Cardinal Mercier of Belgium who played a noble part in the war is coming to America soon. The other day the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Justice paid their respects to His Eminence in his episcopal city. I am informed that on his visit to America Cardinal Mercier will be invited to visit Canada, and perhaps the Acting Prime Minister will inform the House if an official invitation has been extended to His Eminence.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not to my knowledge. My hon. friend's statement is the first intimation I have had of the proposed visit.

LABOUR STRIKE IN MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. DESLAURIERS (St. Mary): Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour (Hon. A. K. Maclean) to a very serious situation which exists in the city of Montreal. The employees of the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company, some thousands of men, are on strike, and the situation of the five hundred thousand people who compose the population of Montreal will be extremely critical if this strike continues, and if they are unable to obtain light, heat and power.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will be quite in order in asking a question but not in reading a statement.

Mr. DESLAURIERS: Well, will the minister be kind enough to inform me whether an arbitration tribunal has been appointed to deal with the matter and, if so, with what result? Is it a fact that the company have refused to recognize the employees' union, and can any steps be taken by the Government to remedy this deplorable state of affairs?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I have not been able to catch the remarks of the hon. member and cannot therefore undertake to answer him immediately. The question will appear in Hansard to-morrow and at the first opportunity I shall answer him fully.

CANADIANS IN THE IMPERIAL NAVY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Yesterday the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) inquired of the Acting Prime Minister if any arrangements were being made with the British Admiralty for leave for men serving in the navy. In reply I may say that the British Admiralty have issued instructions that officers and men in the Imperial Navy from the Dominions may, as their services can be spared, be granted leave to visit their homes after two years of service.

DELIVERY OF MAILS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: The leader of the Opposition yesterday made inquiry in reference to an alleged failure to deliver mail to a man named John G. Gunning, and read a telegram in connection with the matter. I have inquired into the matter and it would appear that my hon. friend's correspondent has a somewhat vivid imagination. He is in correspondence with public men all over the country and if he does not get letters from those from whom he expects to receive them he files complaints in the Post Office. A great many of such complaints have been filed and investigated, and the Post Office authorities think that if the correspondent would turn his attention to some other branch of the Service—

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The only explanation I can give is that the man's name is "Gunning."

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): May I ask when the second report of Dr. Bruce may be expected by the House?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I personally have no knowledge of any second report of Dr. Bruce. It has never come before me.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think the hon. member refers to the reply of Dr. Bruce to the Baptie report.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My recollection is that the Prime Minister, in answer to a question in the session of 1917, stated that as the report in question was not an official one it would not be brought down. I am merely speaking from recollection.

MILITARY MANAGEMENT OVERSEAS—THE ALLEGATIONS BY BRIGADIER-GENERAL SMART, COLONEL PRATT, COLONEL PRICE.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister), that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Before the House resolves itself into Committee of Supply I wish to refer to some matters which have engrossed the attention of the public of late. In rising I must say I am not casting any reflections on the administration of the Militia Department.

I cannot forget that my hon. friend took office when the conditions to which I intend to allude briefly this afternoon were in existence. I would certainly impugn his administration if, after the disclosures that have been made of late and which I intend to re-echo this afternoon on the floor of this House, he did not think it proper to take the necessary action in order to probe the whole matter to the bottom. My object this afternoon is to elicit information, first, and then having shown the conditions that exist, and have existed of late in connection with the administration of the Department of Militia and Defence overseas, to ask for an investigation to be held at the earliest moment. The country is entitled to know whether or not the charges which have been made of late are true. It is not a good answer to say that the war is over and that bygones should be bygones. It is true that the war is over, but if conditions continue to exist until complete demobilization has taken place, we have a right to ask the Government to put an end to the state of things which has been denounced. It is not a good answer to say: The war is over; therefore we must not investigate. At the time the war was being carried on the only answer the Government had to our criticism was that it was not fair to bring charges whilst the war was being carried on. From whichever angle you look at this question, certainly, the Government must see to it that these charges are probed to the bottom.

The effort of Canada during the war has been simply marvellous. The total enlistments have been, according to the official report which I hold in my hand, 595,441 men, and the total casualties, died of wounds, died of disease, wounded, prisoners of war, 218,433. The loans made by the Canadian people to the Government amount to the fabulous sum of $1,436,000,000; or in other words, $192 per capita of the population of the Dominion. The net debt of Canada, chiefly as a result of the war, amounted, on the 30th November, 1918, to $1,307,449,661. The proceeds of taxation during the last fiscal year amounted, in round figures, to $76,000,000. So, from this cursory reference, you have an idea of the magnitude of the effort on the part of Canada in connection with the war. This has been accomplished with a population of less than 8,000,000.

By all means, our country is entitled to the fullest information as regards the conduct of the war. Although the war has been happily ended, there have been fatal errors in connection with the demobilization plan adopted by the Government, which errors, I submit, must be avoided in the future. Our returned soldiers constitute a national asset of the first importance, and therefore their grievances cannot be disregarded with a wave of the hand. Besides, the honour of Canada is at stake. The other day my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) drew the attention of my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) to the charges which have been made by a returned officer of very high rank—I refer to Brigadier General Smart—and when he drew the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to the very serious charges made by that gallant officer, my hon. friend, I regret to say, did not give the matter the attention that he should have given to it. He simply gave a denial in toto of all the charges which had been made by a responsible and gallant officer who had served the Empire and the King since the beginning of the war overseas. Now, Sir, the matter cannot be hushed up; the bald, naked truth must be told. There is, I am sorry to say, dissatisfaction in every province of this Dominion, not excepting the good province of Ontario, against the administration of the Department of Militia and Defence, bar always what I said a moment ago that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence came late into the present Administration and found conditions existing for the creation of which he was not responsible. But there is general dissatisfaction. We can hardly meet a soldier, or an officer back from the trenches, or from the camps in England, who has not his tale of woe to repeat.

The gentlemen who have become very prominent of late in their denunciation of the administration of the Department of Militia and Defence overseas are very well known. I am glad to be able to refer to the evidence of General Smart, of Colonel Pratt and of Colonel Price not as constituting biased, ex parte evidence but as the evidence of men holding high and responsible positions in the Canadian army besides being prominent members of the Conservative party and supporters of the Union Government. Of course, you cannot expect that petty officers will dare speak on this question. They are afraid to think even, but General Smart and Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price are not afraid to speak and speak boldly.

Since this cloudburst, the press which supports the present Administration has been very vociferous in asking for a thorough investigation. I shall not quote extensively from that press, but I may be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if I take what I consider the most influential newspaper in the great province of Ontario—I refer to the Toronto Globe, which has given the present Government very faithful support—and quote from an editorial which appeared in its issue of April 3rd. This editorial, which is entitled "Investigate General Smart's Charges," was published a few days after the denial made by the Acting Prime Minister, when his attention was called to the Smart charges by my hon. friend the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy). I will quote a couple of paragraphs:—

Not a few members of His Majesty's loyal Opposition.

—Thousands of people in Canada are dissatisfied with Sir Thomas White's rather offhand manner of dealing with the charges made by Brigadier-General Smart, a member of the Quebec Legislature, in which he alleged inefficiency and neglect on the part of the administration of Canadian Medical Services in England, and inefficiency and favoritism on the part of the overseas administration generally. There has long been a good deal of anxiety and uneasiness among Canadians over these questions, particularly in view of the unsatisfactory method of dealing with the report of Colonel Bruce. It is not surprising to find General Smart returning to the attack and using emphatic language in the repetition of some of his allegations, nor is there much room for doubting that the public generally feels that an inquiry is in order; but the partial excuse that his charges deal with the condition existing in England in 1916—

Now, mark this: General Smart mentions reports and occurrences of a later date, and I shall draw the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to them. Among those is the report of Lieut.-Colonel J. S. Jenkins, submitted to the Overseas Minister of Militia in November, 1918. The Globe concludes its article in the following words:—

The country is entitled to the truth, good or bad, and the Government ought not to be afraid to probe for it, no matter who may be hurt in the operation. If the charges are shown to be without foundation, all Canadians will be happy; meanwhile they are suspicious and uneasy.

The Globe is an influential organ friendly to the present Union Government, and it states positively that thousands of people are suspicious, uneasy and dissatisfied with the offhand answer given by my hon. friend the Acting Premier. I remember that during the early part of the present session the member for Russell called the attention of the Minister of Militia to the existence of the report of Lieut.-Colonel Jenkins, and the hon. minister disclaimed any knowledge of that report. I have not seen that report, but I will convey to him the information which I have in regard to it, so that he may take the necessary steps to make sure that that report will be tabled during the present session, in order that the Canadian Parliament,—which constitutes after all, as in England, the voice of the nation,—may know how the Department of Militia overseas has been administered. I am informed that Colonel Jenkins was asked by the Minister of Militia overseas—just as Colonel Bruce was asked—to investigate the financial administration of the Canadian Medical Service in England, and that he reported, after a very close investigation, a leakage of Government funds to the amount of $10,000,000. I have that information, Mr. Speaker, on thoroughly reliable authority. My hon. friend says that he has no knowledge of the existence of that report. That report does exist, if I am well informed, and is in the hands of the present Minister of Militia overseas, Sir Edward Kemp. I do not know when he intends to sail for Canada, but now that all the German submarines have been surrendered to England I hope it will not be stated as a reason for withholding that report that it cannot be sent to Canada lest it should become lost through submarine activity. It is the duty of the overseas Minister of Militia, to table that report during the present session so that we may have full knowledge of the conditions of things overseas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming to the charges made by General Smart. General Smart. I need not say, is a well known citizen of Westmount, and represents that constituency in the Legislature of Quebec. He enlisted during the early days of the great war; he rallied to the colours the yeomanry of Westmount and Montreal, and crossed the ocean in the early fall of 1914, remaining overseas until quite recently. He served his King and country faithfully and gallantly.

Brigadier-General Smart said the other day that, now that the war was over, he felt it his duty to tell the people of Canada that the moving factors in the whole administration of the medical service branch of the Canadian army in England were patronage. influence and pull. He gave facts and data concerning the evil treatment and abuse of our sick and wounded soldiers, and he traced all these troubles, all this scandalous state of affairs, to the evil influence of what is called Argyll House, and especially to the interference of Sir George Perley, the High Commissioner.

Let me quote briefly what General Smart says about the medical service in England.

Mr. PECK: Did Brigadier-General Smart specify the medical service in England? It was not so reported in the papers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The medical service in connection with the Canadian army, mostly in England.

Mr. PECK: I did not see that report in the papers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will read what General Smart said, and my hon. friend may draw his own conclusions. He said:

I feel it is up to me to tell the people of Canada how the Canadian Medical Service blundered overseas; how patronage, influence, pull, went to paralyse the good work of the medical services.

I perfectly know who is responsible for this state of things; official Ottawa knows it too; Sir Robert Borden does not ignore it, but no one dares tell. And that is why I feel it is up to me to show all the evil that has been done, to show the abuse, the ill-treatment our wounded and sick received overseas at the hands of the improperly managed medical service. The whole trouble is to be traced to Argyll House.

And I may add that personally, after seeing all that I have seen, I have not the slightest confidence in those who administer the affairs in England.

I pass over the uncomplimentary references he makes to Sir George Perley; also —because this should come up later—what he says about the death of General Steele. He goes on to say:

Gentlemen, I tell you, without fear of impartial contradiction, that the medical service overseas was directed in an insensible and neglected way. Our Canadian wounded were afforded a medical service that was absolutely inadequate, and I have seen instances where medical officers, ridiculously inapt to care for the sick and wounded, were put in charge of important hospital units. I have pitied the poor soldiers that were made to travel through the British Isles to far-off hospitals when they passed close to the unit that should have received them for their particular treatment.

So it would appear that this happened in England. I quote further:

He stated instances where men medically found unfit in Canada, were, however, sent to England. These men cause hard work and worry to the officers overseas,. went through hardships, and are now coming back a charge to the country, for they will be getting pay pension all at the expense of the country.

Then General Smart told of what he saw in his own military district of Shorncliffe, which again justifies my saying that his words have special reference to what happened in England. (Reading):

He said he could not criticise the medical officers and nurses. They were up to what he had expected from them, but, he says, I feel I must and do criticize the headquarters of management of this service.

General Smart said that each Canadian hospital had its full staff of competent doctors and nurses, but outside of these hospitals, there had been organized Voluntary Aid Detachments, made up of people of good-will, but who knew little or nothing of medical care, and he stated instances where soldiers were left for definite treatment in these Voluntary Aid Detachments while cots were empty in the regular hospitals.

He stated that, in cases he knew of, men—

This is a very serious accusation. (Reading):

He stated that in cases he knew of, men had lost the use of their eyes because of this practice. When such cases reached the proper hospitals, said Generol Smart, it was too late for treatment to have any effect.

General Smart then mentioned cases where patronage placed in responsible posts men who had not even diplomas of medical studies, while competent men without the "pull" were kept in England or in posts where their science and experience could not be used to succour our wounded and sick.

Talking of the riot, General Smart said that the Rhyl outbreak was not the first of this kind; there had been outbreaks previously at Shorncliffe, Witley, Bramshott, and even at Rhyl before.

This is the gist of the charges made by Brigadier-General Smart. They are not new, Mr. Speaker, in this House. During the sessions of 1916 rumours came to us that the medical service overseas had been impaired through the intrusion of outside influence. The member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) denounced that intrusion and the fussiness of certain people in the Old Country. The Government appointed Colonel Bruce to investigate. I have not the honour of knowing Colonel Bruce personally, but I know from some medical friends that he enjoys the highest reputation in the part of the country in which he lives; indeed, he is known as one of the best surgeons in Canada. The Government, then, appointed Colonel Bruce to investigate the conditions said to exist in connection with the medical service in England. His report created quite a sensation. I have here the conclusions of that report, divided into twenty-three parts, each of which is a charge against the administration of the medical service in England. Let me refer briefly to those conclusions. It was in September, 1916, that Dr. Bruce was deputed by the then Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) to conduct this investigation. His report says:

1. Many soldiers are arriving in England from Canada medically unfit, who should never have been enlisted.

2. The system of disposing of casualties from the front to Imperial hospitals in England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland, is extremely unsatisfactory.

3. The present method of having Canadian hospitals scattered over a large area is very objectionable.

4. There is unnecessary detention in hospitals. There has been no medical inspection by the Canadian Medical Service of Canadian soldiers in Imperial hospitals, and there has been no efficient medical inspection of Canadian hospitals, in consequence of which Canadian soldiers are retained in hospitals in Great Britain, many of whom would have been returned to duty and others should have been returned to Canada, where they could have been more economically and efficiently treated. The lack of system permits of the aimless moving of patients from hospital to hospital.

5. The use by the Canadian service of Voluntary Aid Hospitals is very undesirable as they are inefficient, expensive and unsatisfactory.

6. The administration of the group of 57 Voluntary Aid Hospitals under Shorncliffe Military Hospital by the Canadian Medical Service is unsatisfactory and expensive.

7. The present method of operating, jointly with the Red Cross, certain hospitals built and equipped by them is unsatisfactory. Such dual control is undesirable.

8. Impropriety of detailing Canadian Army Medical Corps personnel to Imperial hospitals and still retaining them on Canadian pay-roll.

9. Unsatisfactory situation at Shorncliffe owing to our Canadian A.D.M.S. acting in a similar capacity over a large area for the Imperial authorities.

10. No attempt has been made to restrict surgical operations which produce no increased military efficiency.

11. The installation of an expensive plant at Ramsgate was inadvisable, as a large number of cases treated there should be sent to Canada for treatment.

12. The establishment at Buxton of a special hospital for the treatment of rheumatics which is ill-advised as the majority of rheumatics will not be fit again for active service and could be better and more cheaply treated in Canada.

13. The present system of handling Canadian venereal patients is very strongly condemned.

14. The method of handling infectious diseases is most unsatisfactory.

15. Medical Boards which regulate the classification of casualties when convalescent have not been adequately provided for.

16. Satisfactory records regarding individual casualties are not available.

17. The exceedingly important question of pensions, which will involve the expenditure of large sums of money by Canada annually has been neglected by the Canadian Medical Service.

18. Lack of co-ordination in the Canadian Medical Service between Canada, England and the front.

19. The medical personnel is not being used to the best advantage.

20. The policy of the department has been opposed to the use of experienced medical and surgical consulting specialists.

21. Discontent concerning promotions, especially in regard to regimental medical officers serving at the front.

22. The Canadian Army Medical Corps training school in England has never been properly organized, although of the greatest importance to the Canadian Medical Service.

23. In the operation of the Medical Service sufficient regard has not been paid to economy in management.

Such are very briefly the conclusions of the report made by Colonel Bruce at the request of the Government. That information was handed to the Government, and Sir George Perley, who was then Acting Minister of Militia overseas, found the report so severe against the Government of which he was a member that he thought, by appointing another commission, the Government might, perhaps evade the responsibility which they bore. As if Dr. Bruce had not been an authority on such matters—and besides he was surrounded by some of the ablest men—another commissioner, Sir William Babtie, an Imperial officer who had seen service in Mesopotamia, was appointed with other commissioners, the object of the new commission being to investigate Dr. Bruce's commission—a most ridiculous state of affairs. Sir William Babtie, however, reported on the whole matter, and, strange to say, he, biased as he was, had to admit that 18 out of the 23 charges made by Dr. Bruce were found to be true; but practically nothing was done. What do we find? We find that the Government, or, rather, Sir George Perley, instead of standing by a Canadian officer appointed by the Government who had fearlessly done his duty by the Canadian army, practically dismisses Dr. Bruce and gets him another appointment in France through the Imperial Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. member pardon me. He did not "practically" dismiss Dr. Bruce; he actually dismissed him. And he did not get Dr. Bruce a position in France; Dr. Bruce got it independently of him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept the correction. Sir George Perley, according to a gentleman who is in a position to know, because he was our Minister of Militia and Defence long enough and because he did enough for the 1st Contingent, actually dismissed Dr. Bruce, and Dr. Bruce was sent to France to take charge of two hospitals, but I think in France he was an officer under Imperial control.

This question came before the House on a previous occasion, and I regret the answer given by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). When reference is made to the Bruce and Babtie reports my hon. friend conveys to the House and the public the impression that the report has been tabled and distributed. What are the facts? I was a member of the House in 1917, and I followed the question pretty closely, as did the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), and also my desk-mate, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair).

The question of Dr. Bruce's report came before the House, not on one or two or three but on at least ten different occasions, I think, and I remember that the Government, after parrying for quite a while, finally said that forty copies of Dr. Bruce's report had been received from the other side. I remember seeing a copy of that report, as well as a copy of Sir William Babtie's report and the interim report of General Jones. But strange to say, you cannot find a copy of the Bruce report in the House to-day. It is impossible to obtain a copy of it at the Distribution office. The report was tabled in the House, but the Clerk of the House, the late Dr. Flint, by whose orders I know not, recalled the copies which had been printed, and we never saw the report again. Mr. Speaker, that report was not complete and almost every day in the House the then member for Pictou, Mr. Macdonald, the then leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and my desk mate at that time, Hon. Mr. Pugsley, insisted that the reply of Colonel Bruce be tabled with the Babtie report, but the Government evaded giving an answer for a few months until the Prime Minister was about to leave for England, and then he gave us to understand that the reply would not be tabled or made public. The reply has not been made public since, and for good cause. I am afraid that if that reply was made public, it would be found to contain the most severe indictment of the Government's administration of the medical services overseas. I appeal to the Acting Prime Minister to let the truth be known. The war is over, and let the guilty parties, if there are guilty parties, be punished. Let the Acting Prime Minister come boldly before the House, and in justice to both the living and the dead make public the reply which was made by Colonel Bruce. But I am afraid that my hon. friend, as he de-defended in 1916 Sir William Babtie, who is far from having in England the reputation Colonel Bruce enjoys in Canada, against the charges of Colonel Bruce, whom my hon. friend knows well, and as he sprang to the defence the other day, when reference was made to the charges made by Brigadier-General Smart—I am afraid he will continue to deny the slashing allegations made by that gallant officer. Well Sir, the challenge of the Acting Prime Minister the other day, for it was nothing less than a challenge, has been taken up by General Smart in a public letter addressed to the Ottawa Citizen on the 1st of April last—a fitting day. Let me read part of that letter:

> With reference to my statements in the Quebec legislature on the 14th inst., charging inefficiency and neglect on the part of the administration of Canadian Medical Services in England and also inefficiency and favouritism on the part of the Overseas Administration generally, be good enough to allow me space to reply to the shifty and evasive denial given to my charges by Sir Thomas White in the House of Commons.

Then he quotes the answer given in the House by the Acting Prime Minister, and rejoins:

> What in the name of fairness and honour does Sir Thomas White mean by telling the House of Commons that my charges "refer to a condition which existed in England in 1916 when Colonel Bruce was there"? He knows, as others who are helping Sir George Perley and Sir Edward Kemp to protect those responsible for the shocking administration of the Canadian Medical Services know, that the "conditions which existed in England in 1916 when Colonel Bruce was there" were conditions produced by the notorious inefficiency of those at the head of the Canadian Medical Services previous to that year.
> Despite the evidence of their utter unfittedness, fearlessly exposed by Colonel Bruce in his capacity as an investigating officer of the Canadian Government, at that time, they have continued to enjoy the favour of certain members of the Government and the coterie in London, and the power until an aroused press and public opinion ended their activities, to produce irreparable damage at home. "The condition that existed in England in 1916" continued to exist in 1917, because the Government shut off the searchlight which Colonel Bruce had directed toward its medical administration of the war, and which condition it is still endeavouring to obscure.
> As was the obvious conclusion of any honest interpretation of my speech, the conditions of which I complained existed previous to 1916, and Colonel Bruce had unfavourably reported upon them. Colonel Bruce recommended amongst other things that the system of scattering our wounded throughout the various hospitals in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales be abolished, but instead of accepting Colonel Bruce's recommendations, a commission was appointed under the chairmanship of Sir Wm. Babtie, which, as was known it would do, reported against all, or practically all, of Colonel Bruce's recommendations. As a part of the programme Colonel Bruce was relieved of his appointment in a manner which reflects little credit on Sir George Perley, and it is the general impression that the Babtie commission was appointed to counteract the effects produced by Colonel Bruce's disclosure.
> I further stated that since that time practically all of Colonel Bruce's recommendations have been put into effect (notwithstanding their condemnation by the Babtie commission) with the exception of the recommendation against scattering Canadian wounded men all over the British Isles, which was the pet scheme of Sir George Perley, and which is still in effect. I cited two specific cases, one occurring in a London hospital while I was in London, in the month of February of this year. How then can Sir Thomas White justify his statement, that that existed in 1916 "when Colonel Bruce was there," a statement that could only be construed into meaning that Colonel Bruce was the responsible party? That answer is wholly unworthy of a man in the position that Sir Thomas White occupies.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that it is not competent for him to read any statement emanating from a man outside of this House controverting or having reference to a statement made by any hon. member. Much less is it competent for him to read anything from such a source in the way of criticism or censure.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I shall quote only such parts as I can without violating the rule. To continue:

> Perhaps the most iniquitous phase of the C.A.M.C. scandal is the fact that though the overseas ministry was compelled, in deference to public sentiment, to adopt many of the reforms advocated by Col. Bruce, it was resolved to punish the investigators who had revealed the abuses of the service.

Then he claims that Wilson was persecuted:

I stated that Lt.-Col. F. W. E. Wilson, of Niagara Falls, who collaborated with Col. Bruce, one of the best officers in the C.A.M.C., was also punished by being relieved of his appointment as deputy director of medical services, headquarters, London, and sent off as a medical officer to a Forestry unit in the Jura Mountains. An attempt was made to "square" Lt.-Col. Wilson, but like the sterling man he is, he refused to be "squared" and when I left England in February, was still "carrying on" with his unit.

I wish here to impress upon the Government the gravity of these charges. General Smart demands that an impartial commission be immediately appointed to investigate the whole subject to the overseas administration, especially in connection with the medical administration in England.

Such commission should have wide powers and be authorized to investigate fully:

(1) The Col. Bruce report and recommendations.

(2) The report of the Babtie commission.

(3) Col. Bruce's reply to the Babtie report.

(4) The Taplow hospital scandal.

(5) The Perley scheme for scattering Canadian wounded throughout the British Isles.

(6) The report of Lt.-Col. J. S. Jenkins, submitted to the overseas minister of militia in November, 1918.

What does he say about Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins? Well, I find that if I referred to that I might perhaps wound the feelings of my good friend, the Acting Prime Minister, and I would not do that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No danger.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would not be guilty of such a crime. At all events I have stated what I am informed the Jenkins report contains, and I think that it is the duty of the Government to table that report so that the country may know the facts. General Smart says:

I have received many letters from far distant places, approving my stand in exposing this matter and offering to furnish me with ample evidence, if required, to substantiate my statements.

We have won the war against the Huns but we still have a heavy task on our hands to clean up the rottenness that exists in high places and which those in power seem disposed to cover up.

I have acted as I have done solely from a sense of duty and have refrained from going into many details that would only wound afresh the hearts of those who have already suffered much, but if the government persist in their present unwise policy of attempting to protect those who should be dismissed from office, no matter how high a position they hold, then it may be necessary to publish further details. I am a firm believer in a continuance of the Union Government for some years to come—

I must say his faith is greater than mine.

—but the present administration will have to show greater capacity and more backbone if it is to hold the confidence of the public.

Further on he says:

But whether that administration was a bit of statesmanship or a crafty and discreditable political plot will be more apparent when the people of Canada realize the magnitude of the pension burden which has been thrown upon the country by the conditions of which I have complained, the injustices which will re-act upon the veterans of the war and the needless suffering and waste which this administration produced.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that after such an arraignment, coming from a responsible officer of the rank of Brigadier-General Smart, the Government cannot do otherwise than appoint investigators to probe this whole matter. These are very specific charges. It is no answer to say that he refers to conditions existing in 1916, for he declares positively that the same condition of things has continued since that year. Can these specific and serious charges be ignored? These things are not very complimentary to the administration of Sir George Perley, but he is not the only one who has complained of the activities of Sir George Perley in connection with the Overseas administration. Although Sir George Perley is a knight and is High Commissioner of Canada in England, he must not forget neither must any one else forget, that he is a paid servant of Canada. We vote his salary at every session of Parliament, and therefore he is amenable to this Parliament. I must repeat again, that it is no answer to say that the war is over. I can well understand that when the war was on there might have been state reasons why certain matters—for instance, the reply of Dr. Bruce to Sir William Babtie—should not be tabled. But now that the war is over the Government should have sufficient confidence in Parliament, which was, to say the least, very liberal and generous to them, and in the taxpayers of Canada to tell the whole truth, not only as regards the contents of Dr. Bruce's report, but also as regards that mysterious Jenkins report, which, as I am informed, contains revelations of a most unsavoury nature. As I said a moment ago I am informed that in that report Colonel Jenkins declares that there has been a leakage of at least ten million dollars in connection with the Overseas Administration of the Medical Service. Publicity in such cases is the great cure, and I again entreat the Acting Prime Minister to see that these two reports are tabled during the present session. So far, Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to the charges made by Brigadier-General Smart. Let me now refer to those of Colonel Pratt, another gallant officer and a member of the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, and also, as I am told, a very active member of the Conservative party, therefore a friend of the Union Government. I have already quoted in this House the letter which he addressed to the Toronto Telegram on his return to Canada. His charges then were of a general nature. His new charges made on the 27th March last are more specific and more serious even. Let me give just a synopsis of these charges. Colonel Pratt charges that thousands of our Canadian airmen, after facing death at the front, are actually stranded in London, moneyless, penniless, unable to find accommodation on ships or to get any satisfaction from the air ministry, the High Commissioner or Argyll House. He charges further that some of these young Canadian airmen, who performed such noble service during the last four years, out of their own savings, managed to secure berths, at what price do you imagine? Young Canadian airmen who fought so valiantly for the Empire, for the King and for humanity, can, at the present time, out of their own modest savings, secure berths by bribing for £5 ticket sellers and thus they are able to pay their own passages from England to Canada.

Colonel Pratt charges that the riots at Kinmel camp took place because our men had no pay, no fuel, poor food, no comforts, no pleasures of any kind. Moreover they were being fleeced by grafters, shylocks and profiteers. He charges that whole Canadian detachments were entrained from the camp to Liverpool and then returned to camp without any explanation and that not once but several times. He charges that homesick veterans who served at the front from the beginning of the war were detained while the draftees or the conscripts, whether American or Canadian, were sailing home by boatloads. Colonel Pratt charges that they made frequent representations to the officers commanding, that their representations were at first ignored and that it was because these representations were ignored that the riot took place; so much so, that twenty-four hours after the riot had taken place they received their pay and within a week 20,000 of them were put on ships for home.

Now, I am going to address myself to my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister. I am informed—I may be wrong—that our men were detained at the camp at his solicitation, that he cabled overseas to stop the sending of men to Canada, for what reason he knows better than I do. That is my information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may say that my hon. friend is entirely incorrect in that statement. I sent no cable of that kind at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad to accept my hon. friend's denial. Some others, who claim to know better, will probably take up his challenge. I accept his denial. The arraignment of Colonel Pratt is circumstantial; he gives names and dates. I have here the speech which he delivered as reported in the Toronto Globe, and I might perhaps give just a few extracts. He said, speaking of the reports:

> The first reports allowed to get into the papers were greatly distorted, and he read from The London Times to bear him out in this, contradicting, as he did, so many of the statements contained therein. All told there had been only about 600 rioters in the Rhyl Camp. He attributed the causes for the rioting to the fact that when the men were sent to Rhyl they were told they would be going home soon, and they had to wait around; because they were cold and uncomfortable, feeding arrangements had not been properly organized, and after having been told there were no ships to take them home, they found that the Olympic and the Aquitania had been transferred to transport American soldiers. The men could get no relief, they were uncomfortable, and they could have no pleasures. The men, he said, were unable to get their pay for weeks at a time. There were army canteens in the camp and civilian stores nearby making great sums of money out of the soldiers. Cigarettes could be got only by indenting a week in advance, and then only for cash, and the soldiers could not get their money. On top of this was the fact that many military service men were being brought home before those who had had long service. Some of these conscripts had been taken to France to march into Germany with the Canadians, and they were then sent back to England. They had never fired a shot and yet had got home first.

He tells about the deputation sent to the commanding officer and the poor reception which the men received. Then he continues:

> No communication was had with the men after that, and 10.30 o'clock Tuesday night came around without any promise. It was then the rioting started. The purpose of it was to attract public attention. It was a difficult matter, he said, to understand the condition of private soldiers who "happened to be under a bulldozing, domineering officer. There are some such officers in the Canadian army I am sorry to say," said the speaker.

"I didn't excuse the rioting, but subsequent events have justified the actions of those men," declared Col. Pratt. "They were told they could not get ships. Twenty-four hours after that rioting the men in Rhyl Camp were all paid, although they could not get it before. Subsequent events proved that the men were right. Within a week 20,000 were put on ships and sent home, and they are now coming home as never before."

Up to the beginning of this month and since the armistice was signed,—

The figures are very eloquent, I should say:

—52,000 Canadians had been sent home. He compared this with the record of England, where 2,340,470 men had been disembarked in the homeland in a similar period. During the same time 92,000 Australians had been sent home.

Col. Pratt then told of a senior officer who is now in Toronto who was coming home a couple of years ago and got on a train at Euston Station, London, to go to Greenock to sail for Canada. After boarding the train the coaches were locked, and an officer and two n.c.o.'s claiming to be from Argyll House, passed through and demanded two pounds from each passenger. The Toronto officer paid £4 for himself and wife, and loaned money to other passengers. There were about 1,200 passengers on the train, and this money was collected from each of them. This matter had been brought to the attention of the Ottawa authorities, he declared.

"There should be some accounting, for in the neighbourhood of £3,000 which was collected in that way," said Col. Pratt.

Then he speaks of the experiences of officers in the Royal Air Force.

About 60 per cent of the best flying men in the world were Canadians. There were about 6,000 of them in Great Britain at the present time, many of them waiting to get home for four months. This it was impossible to do but the word had been passed around among them that by "salving" the hand of some ticket seller they could get a berth and trip home. It was a fact that if they went to the Air Ministry and proved they had a passage booked for home they were immediately discharged. He instanced a case of Lieut. Mitchell and another lieutenant who was with that officer. They had been trying for four months to get away. Finally they gave £5 to a ticket seller for a "D" deck berth, and they got home at a cost of £23. The ticket seller confided in them that he was making £75 a week in that manner. "That is a positive scandal," declared Colonel Pratt.

I will not quote what he says about the Earl of Reading, but he speaks of a more serious condition of affairs.

He says that five or six men were killed in the Rhyl riots, and he regretted they had not been given a military burial. He believed that public opinion would yet force them to be given a proper burial. At an inquest the other day it had been stated 80 Canadians were in jails and dungeons of England. There was no Habeas Corpus in the army—

Not only in the army, I am sorry to say, in the civilian life of Canada the Habeas Corpus Act was dispensed with throughout the whole of last year.

He cited a case to show that it was common for men to languish in prisons for two or three months without being brought before a court-martial. A Toronto officer, a criminal lawyer, a couple of years ago had approached the Adjutant-General overseas and said there were many men in Canadian camps waiting to be dealt with by courts-martial. He offered, at his own expense, to visit the camps and make a report within a week. The Adjutant-General promised consideration, and the next morning the Toronto officer was ordered by wire to go home "because it looked as though he might in some way bring discredit on somebody." There was no reason for men languishing in prison for five or six months. When he left England it was said ten Canadian boys were in the Tower of London.

I visited the Tower of London in 1889, Mr. Speaker, and I know by history what took place within its walls in ancient times. When I read these charges by Colonel Pratt I could not believe that Canadian boys were lying in those dungeons. It is a scandal, Sir, that our boys should be languishing there. I can hardly believe that the authorities in London are aware of the fact, for it is inconceiveable, if the fact were known, that the people of England would stand for such treatment to our boys. It is a crime against this country and against our boys that they should languish in those dungeons.

These charges are specific and serious, and they are all corroborated by another officer of high standing, Lieut.-Colonel W. H. Price, another member of the Ontario Legislature and another supporter of the Government. He charges that the riots at Rhyl were caused by the lack of method in the repatriation arrangements. He speaks as follows:

Referring to the riots at Rhyl recently the speaker said that they should occasion no surprise. Newspaper reports had given the impression to those at home that a handful of Russians in the Canadian forces had been preaching Bolshevism and that they started the trouble.

Argyll House, said Col. Price, had not shown itself capable of meeting the situation and it had completely lost sight of the fact that Canadian soldiers would not submit to conditions that the English Tommy would.

He referred to the fact that no official statement had been promptly issued by Argyll House dealing with the riots, although reports about Bolshevists were permitted to be cabled to the newspapers in Canada. Whether the intention had been to let the opinion prevail that Bolshevists had been to blame so as to shift the responsibility from Argyll House, he did not know.

The speaker pleaded the cause of the returned soldier, urging that more adequate pensions be paid and that greater opportunities be offered veterans for employment. He believed that if the provincial government would place itself on record in connection with the latter, the Federal Government would act.

While discussing the returned soldier, Col. Price spoke of the high cost of living which had prevailed in Canada for some time. "I had to pay 68 cents a pound for bacon when I came back," he said, "and I don't know whether to blame the United Farmers of Ontario or Sir Joseph Flavelle, but I know that it was between them. I think they had better get together and clear up where these 68 cents come in. We are not all farmers nor capitalists," he declared.

Continuing, Col. Price said that the returned man would certainly desire an explanation as to who had been making immense profits out of the millions Canada had spent on munitions. He quoted figures extensively to show that during the war production had increased more rapidly than wages, and that production increasing the percentage of material, and labour costs had decreased. That was one of the causes of industrial unrest.

"No man in this country had the right" he said "to put millions of money into his pockets from munition contracts at a time when patriotic men were sacrificing everything they had in the common cause."

Col. Price declared that it was his intention to move a resolution in the House asking the Dominion Government to find out just where the money made by those engaged in war contracts had gone.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, what is the turn of mind of the returning officers and soldiers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. member permit me to put a question? Am I to understand that any reflection is cast on the doctors attached to units all over the country, or is it to the administration service?

Mr. LEMIEUX: To the administration service. As regards the doctors, General Smart seems to say that they were good men, but their services were not utilized. Sir George Perley scattered the wounded and sick all over England, Scotland and Wales,—even Ireland,—in order to promote, as he said, "the cause of Imperialism. The blending of Australians, New Zealanders, Canadians, Englishmen and Welshmen would make for a greater and better Empire." That was the definition of Sir George Perley. I remember at the time when this question was discussed in the Press, a lady, well known in Montreal, who has taken a very active part in the V. A. D. organization in England, stated that the reason given for the scattering of our boys all over the country instead of centralizing them at our Canadian hospitals, organized by Canada and placed under the care and control of our own doctors, was for "the sacred cause of Imperialism." General Smart, who is a good Imperialist himself, says in his speech, "If that is Imperialism you talk of, then I am not an Imperialist."

Coming back to the Rhyl riots, an inquiry took place and a verdict was rendered on the 27th of March last. Here is the verdict:

> That the soldiers came to their deaths by the wounds described by the doctors, but that there is no evidence to show how the wounds were inflicted. Evidence was taken which showed that both the rioters and the defenders of the camp fired ball ammunition, but no one was identified as having actually killed one of the soldiers.

Not a word as to the cause of the riots or the responsibility for them. This is an extraordinary verdict. The surprise of the public in Canada with regard to it is expressed in the following article from such a responsible paper as the Montreal Gazette, of March 31:

> A meaningless verdict was returned by the coroner's jury which inquired into the cause of the deaths of the victims of the Kinmel Camp riots. If any one is to be punished, it will be as the result of military inquiry and court martial. A military inquiry has been held, the results of which will be learned in time.

And further on the Gazette says:

> This, as well as the fact that men were killed in the course of the demonstrations, is to be remembered in forming judgment on the unhappy incident and its causes, the whole truth in regard to which has yet to be made public.

So that the verdict is most unsatisfactory, and this inquiry held by the coroner should be implemented at the earliest moment by the Government in order that Canada may know what caused the riots and how it was that Canadian boys were killed and were buried so unceremoniously as they were on that occasion. This is one of the worst tragedies of the war. Our boys were sent overseas to fight, to die, if need be, for liberty. Their sacrifice was great, but because of the sacredness of the cause, they bore the burden with equanimity all through this long war. Now we hear of riots on the occasion of their return to England prior to their coming home. Some of them are murdered in a cold-blooded manner. Some of them are languishing in dungeons in the Tower of London. Others are left penniless on the streets of London. Others are exploited by Shylocks and grafters. Yet, when such facts as these are brought to light, the Acting Prime Minister, with a wave of the hand, simply denies the charges in toto and says that this one or that one may come back from England in the near future with similar charges, and that his denial in the case of Brigadier-General Smart will be his denial of all other similar charges. This is a very poor answer indeed.

The charges are made by responsible officers holding high rank, friends of the Government. It may be that during the war the Government had some excuse for not covering the charges that were made. But now, speaking on behalf of the boys, speaking on behalf of Canadians generally, I say that an investigation is urgent. The Government owe it to Canada, owe it to the returned soldiers, owe it to themselves as a Government. The widest powers were given to the Government by a benevolent Parliament and a benevolent public during the four years of the war. Is it against the public interest that the truth be known? I always go back to England, the mother of Parliaments, for my precedents. In England, whether during the bright days of victory or during the black and bleak days of defeat, public men are not afraid of the truth; they are not afraid to speak boldly. During the South African war, when there was a surrender of British troops in the veldt,—much against the grain of Britishers generally—the Government granted an investigation, and court-martials and inquiries were held. If you go back to the eighteenth century, at the time of the famous Marlborough charges, you will find that the British Government granted an investigation while a war was in progress. During the Seven Years' war, Admiral Byng, with all his glorious career behind him, was the subject of an inquiry, and at the time of the Napoleonic Wars, Lord Melville was impeached as the result of a naval inquiry. And at the time of the Crimean war, when it was discovered that the commissariat of the British troops had failed, the Duke of Newcastle was removed during the war and replaced by Lord Panmure. As to the matter under discussion, the war is over, and here are specific and serious charges, made not by civilians, but by returned officers who served faithfully their King and country during four successive years, who hold the highest rank in Canadian armies, and who are friends of the Government in office—yet the Government would disregard these accusations. I say that the sooner an investigation is granted the better for the Government and the better for the country. I repeat that the Government should hold such an investigation. They owe it to the country; they owe it to the soldiers, both the living and the dead.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, in opening his somewhat lengthy statement, during which he has covered almost the entire period from the beginning of the war in 1914 down to the present date, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux) was good enough to say that I as Minister of Militia was not responsible for what took place before my regime.

I feel in a somewhat delicate position, because, when I accepted office, I was aware that there was an Overseas Minister of Militia authorized by Parliament, and that the Minister of Militia in Canada was not in any way responsible for anything that took place in the administration, organization, or direction of the Canadian forces after they left Canada, that matter being in charge of the Overseas Minister of Militia, who was charged with the responsibility therefor. Nevertheless, in so far as in my power lies, I am prepared to take the responsibility of defending to the best of my ability any officers absent on duty overseas, whom I consider to be slandered, or as having mud thrown at them without cause. I do not know whether any hon. gentleman has ever experienced the sensation of being a legatee, but when I was burdened with the responsibility of the administration of the Militia Department I felt it was a pretty large legacy that was given to me. I looked upon it as the young man did whose father left him a very large estate, who thought it was a wonderful thing to have this big estate to manage, and who took upon himself the burden and responsibility of managing it. About a year afterwards, when a friend asked him how he was getting along, he said: "Well, I know the responsibilities are somewhat heavy, and I almost wish my father were alive again." Well, Sir, I sometimes wish that one of my predecessors were back again in harness.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is very much alive.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was not the immediate predecessor of the minister—an hon. gentleman named Kemp intervened.

Major-General MEWBURN: I said one of my predecessors; he might be my father or my step-father.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, that is it.

Major-General MEWBURN: As far as I can gather from the statements made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve, he is not willing to make any charges, at least I should like to ask him if he is prepared, as a responsible member of this House, to make the charges he has quoted.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him answer that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not myself a witness of what took place in England. I am simply re-echoing the specific charges made by three of the highest officers in the Canadian army, namely, Brigadier-General Smart, Colonel Pratt, and Colonel Price, three members of the Conservative party and three members of two of the local legislatures.

Major-General MEWBURN: As regards Brigadier-General Smart's charges, which are very specific, great stress seems to be laid on the administration of the medical service. I have not the full text of his statement, as nothing has been laid before the House except allegations that have appeared in the press in which General Smart is reported to have made a number of broad statements regarding the general administration of the medical service. I shall try to deal with his statements seriatim. In one place General Smart says—and the hon. member did not quote it quite in full:

> I say, without fear of contradiction from any impartial source, that the medical administration overseas has been bad.

Further on he says:

> In the area that I commanded at Shorncliffe, in addition to other units, I had seven hospitals under my command—four of them special hospitals, two dealing with shell-shock cases, one hospital for eyes, ears, nose, and throat, and one for venereal diseases, all of which were under me for administration and discipline.

Therefore, General Smart in his own statement almost contradicts his own charges, as he admits that he was responsible for the administration and discipline of all those hospitals in his area, and, consequently, if the administration was faulty, General Smart himself would be responsible. He goes on in a general way to blame High Commissioner Sir George Perley for certain things and then he proceeds to blame Sir William Babtie. I have no brief for General Babtie; I know Colonel Bruce intimately and he is one of the finest medical officers the Dominion of Canada has ever produced. I have never had an opportunity of seeing or reading either the Babtie report or the Bruce report; but General Smart according to his statement, regards Sir William Babtie as though he had been discharged from the British army and was not a responsible man at all, although General Smart complains about his being responsible for the break-down. I notice from what I saw a few days ago that this same Sir William Babtie, as reported in the British Hansard of the 7th of June, 1918, was "not only under no personal aspersion from Mesopotamia investigation, but has since been advanced to Inspector of Medical Services. Babtie has also been promoted to Lieut-General." I imagine, therefore, that Sir William Babtie is pretty highly thought of in the British army today. General Smart goes on to say in his statement to complain that the recommendations regarding the hospitals made in the Bruce report were not adopted; he says that practically all of Col. Bruce's recommendations were turned down. But in another paragraph he says:

> Practically every recommendation made by Col. Bruce has since been adopted and put into effect by General Foster, showing that they were sound.

That shows that, no matter what the Bruce report was and the Babtie report was General Smart, in his statement in the Quebec Legislature, said that all the recommendations made by Col. Bruce were put into effect. The statement he makes is that he wants an investigation into certain things that happened in 1915 and 1916, particularly in 1916. That is some three years ago, and General Smart himself admits that those recommendations of Colonel Bruce have been put into effect. General Smart, as I said before, was an officer who was in charge of the Shorncliffe area. I have know him for many years, and I have always known him to be an officer who took an interest in the active Militia in Canada. Far be it from me to criticise General Smart who is, I believe, highly recognized as an officer and held in high esteem by his brother officers; but why is he making these statements at this late date on his return to Canada, I am not prepared to say. General Smart went overseas in 1915; he proceeded to France, I understand, in October, 1915, and he was returned to England on December 13, 1915. I understand that altogether General Smart's services in France covered 78 days. He was returned to England for service in England and I understand that subsequently he took over the Shorncliffe command.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know my hon. friend desires to be absolutely fair. He mentioned that General Smart was only in France 78 days. Did General Smart refuse to accept service in France, or did he only obey the orders that were given to him.

Major-General MEWBURN: I am not saying anything to belittle General Smart's good-will, but General Smart, I am informed, had actually 78 days' service in France, during part of which time he was in a convalescent hospital.

On the reorganization of the Mounted Rifles he was offered the command, but declined it, contending that he should have been made brigadier-general, which he had been continuously urging since 1915. Then when the policy was adopted that no officer should hold a position in England who had not had six months' service in France, the overseas forces in France were asked if they could use him, and they replied that there was no employment for him with the rank of colonel in France. I am not suggesting for one moment that Colonel Smart was not prepared to serve in France from the start; I am only giving the actual facts. I was going on to say that General Smart did command the Shorncliffe area. When I was in England in July of last year, he did me the kindness to call on me. I saw him on more than one occasion, and he knew that I was Minister of Militia in Canada, but never at any time did he intimate to me that there was anything wrong in any part of the services, medical or otherwise. If he had knowledge at that time that the administration of the Medical Services was faulty or wrong, or that there had been maladministration, why was he not frank enough to tell me, as Minister of Militia in Canada? Several of General Smart's friends came to see me while I was in England, and asked if I could get him a permanent military position in Canada. My reply was that I should be very glad to do what I could for him, but that I was not making—and I have not made, and I am not making—any permanent military appointments, because those positions are being reserved for men who have seen service in France.

Mr. VIEN: Was not the proper course for General Smart, if he had complaints to make, to make them to the Minister of Militia overseas, and not to the Minister of Militia in Canada?

Major General MEWBURN: Perfectly true. I am just pointing out that if he had all these worries over there, one would have thought he would have mentioned them to me. Subsequently, the Shorncliffe command was practically done away with as the troops were moved from there, and I went out of my way to see if any further employment could be found for General Smart in England. After that command, I do not know what employment he did have until he was returned to Canada and transferred to the C.E.F. Reserve. If General Smart, while he was in command at Shorncliffe or since then, had any knowledge of maladministration or had any reason to believe there had been wrong-doing, then it was his duty to bring the matter to the attention of the Overseas Minister of Militia. But I am not aware of his having done so, though he had ample opportunity.

The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) has refered to a report of Lt.-Colonel Jenkins. I was asked a question in the House early in the session regarding the Jenkins' report, and I replied that I had no knowledge of it; I never heard of it. I referred the matter to Sir Edward Kemp. I may not be correct, but I surmise that if Lt.-Colonel Jenkins did make a report—and this is only a surmise—it was for the information of the overseas minister, and not for the Government. It may have been for some personal use; I do not know. The fact remains that that report has never come to the Militia Department here, or to the Government so far as I am aware.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no such thing as a report made for a minister personally. A report of that nature is made for the department, for the Government, and for Parliament.

Major-General MEWBURN: That is perfectly true. I say that the report may have been made at Sir Edward Kemp's personal request or for him, but that so far as I know it has never reached the Militia Department or the Government here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Shall we get the report later on?

Major-General MEWBURN: I was going to refer later on, but I may as well do it now, to General Smart's reference in his letter to three water-tight compartments in France, England, and Canada, and his statement that there is no co-operation, and that intrigue is going on. I wish to say in the most emphatic manner possible that since I have been Minister of Militia in Canada the relationship between the Overseas Minister, Sir Edward Kemp, and myself, has been most harmonious. There has been the closest co-operation between us in our respective spheres of activity. I know that Sir Edward Kemp fully intended to return to Canada so that he could make a statement to the House this session regarding his administration overseas, but hon. members must be well aware how impossible it has been for him to leave his post during the terrible trial of demobilization that he has had on his hands since the armistice was signed, and up to the present time. I know that it is his full intention to return to Canada at the earliest possible moment, and before this House prorogues, for the purpose of making a full statement of his administration. I wish to repeat most emphatically, that ever since he has been Minister of Militia overseas, and since I have held the position of Minister of Militia of Canada, there has been the very closest co-operation and harmony between us, although Sir Edward Kemp is in no way under my control, being a minister of the Crown and responsible to the Government, not to me.

Mr. VIEN: Does not General Smart's complaint refer, not to the lack of co-operation between the Minister of Militia overseas and the Minister of Militia in Canada, but to the lack of co-operation between the commands of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and between the various departments?

Major-General MEWBURN: No. He says distinctly that there is no co-operation between the Department of Militia and Defence in Canada and the Minister of Militia overseas.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Referring to the Jenkins report, which I understood the minister to say had been made to Sir Edward Kemp personally, if it is true, as is rumoured and as far as my information goes, that a leakage of $10,000,000 has been discovered, does not the minister think that that report ought to be tabled?

Major-General MEWBURN: As a matter of fact, I do not know if there is such a thing as the Jenkins report, except for what has been said by my hon. friend this afternoon and by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) about three weeks ago. The hon. member read a statement this afternoon that a report had been submitted to the Overseas Minister of Militia. If there is such a report, the Overseas Minister of Militia when he returns to Canada will be prepared to answer fully any questions with regard to it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Can you not cable him in the meantime?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have already cabled to ascertain if he has such a report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was his answer?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have had no definite answer. Regarding the treatment of Canadian soldiers overseas, I had the privilege of being in England and France last July and August, when I visited very many hospitals in both countries and saw a majority of the medical officers, and I never heard of one single complaint regarding the treatment of Canadian soldiers either in France or in England. I may say further, that an officer from Canada proceeded overseas in July of 1918, a doctor of very high standing in his profession, Dr. Charles Martin, of Montreal. He has been over there since, and he has visited every single hospital in France and in England where Canadians are being treated. He has informed me that he has heard no complaints but, on the other hand, that there are no patients in any of the Allied Armies who receive such admirable treatment as do the Canadians in the Canadian hospitals. I think, Sir, that the statement that our Canadian invalid soldiers have not been properly treated or have been neglected is nothing short of a slander on the medical profession. If there is one service in the whole war more outstanding than any other it is the medical service, and I think that the citizens of Canada have reason to be deeply indebted to our magnificent doctors who, neglecting all that was profitable to them in civil life, went to the front to help our soldiers. The surgeons and doctors who went overseas in the early days of the war, and who continued to go steadily until the armistice was signed, abandoned lucrative practices, many of them giving up thousands of dollars a year in order that they might serve their country. I do not think that anything is too good for these splendid men.

A few days ago I received a couple of letters which indicate the opinion which some people have on the question of the treatment of Canadian soldiers, and one of these letters I shall read:

> I thought perhaps that you would like to see the enclosed extract from the last letter which has just come to hand from my son Austin, officially Major C. A. Bell, M.C. and Bar, 3rd Bn. Engineers, who you may remember was dreadfully wounded August 8th last at the opening day of the battle of Amiens, losing both legs below the knees and the right eye.
> In sending this I do so not so much for the item of news but as an evidence of his wonderful early recovery. As an original first campaigner, badly wounded twice before, one would have thought, so the politicians tell us, that these hardships would have undermined his constitution, but not so. Thanks to the skill of such surgeons as Col. Armour and eye specialists at the I.O.D.E. hospital as well as the constant personal attention of the nursing sisters, among them Miss Robertson, matron of the Christie St. Hospital, he has made a wonderful quick recovery.

out to whom they are indebted for the wonderful work that has been done in this respect.

I am persuaded that one great reason of Austin's quick recovery has been his spirit of optimism and good cheer as well as his belief that he was not yet done for. One of his college chums just returned told me that Austin had counted upon returning to France, figuring the war would last a long time, and believing that he could still make good behind the lines.

I trust, Sir, that in due time the people of Canada will find out the names of the surgeons and nursing sisters who have been satisfied to work out of the "limelight," only looking for results.

I have received one or two other letters written in the same strain, and it fairly makes my blood boil to hear people criticising the work of the medical profession in this war, in view of the splendid, indeed the wonderful service our doctors have rendered.

General Smart has referred to the case of General Sir Sam Steele, and I feel it my duty to make a statement regarding that matter, because General Smart blames the Militia Department in Canada for certain alleged treatment as a result of which General Steele, it is said, died of a broken heart. I am at a loss to know why a man of General Smart's standing should make such statements. General Steele was an officer who was held in the very highest esteem and admiration by every Canadian who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He had served continuously in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police for some twenty-nine years, and he went to South Africa where he served with great distinction. Returning to Canada he was granted leave of absence from the Northwest Mounted Police, without pay, from the first of June, 1902, to enable him to accept a commission in the South African Constabulary. His leave was extended to 1903 when he was finally retired from the Northwest Mounted Police on pension. When the war broke out the then Minister of Militia, in the winter of 1914, appointed him Acting Inspector General of Western Canada. He subsequently proceeded overseas, the intention being, I think, that he should take command of the Second Canadian Division.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He went over in command of the Second Division.

Major-General MEWBURN: Before he left here he met with an accident in Toronto, and unfortunately he suffered another accident in England. He was in France for a very short time, returned to England and was given a command under the Imperial Government, known as the South Eastern Command in England, being in the pay of the Canadian Government. He continued in that command until sometime last year when it was practically abolished. Prior to that, the first I knew of General Steele's retiring, or of there being no employment for him, was the intimation from England that the Imperials did not require his services any longer because they had sufficient British officers available.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think the real reason was that Dover, which is in the South Eastern District, was established as a separate command of its own, and therefore General Steele would be only a Canadian officer after that.

Major-General MEWBURN: Well, there was no further employment for him, and although General Steele's ability and experience were highly regarded by the Imperials, they said that his services would have to be dispensed with, not because of any inefficiency, but simply as a matter of administration. I had several letters from General Steele who made every effort to be retained on the strength on pay until the war was over.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it on account of his age?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, but simply because there was no further employment for him. As there was no employment for him in England or in Canada the only alternative was to pension him.

Mr. POWER: If the minister requested the overseas military authorities to keep General Steele on the strength and they did not do so, is that one of the examples of the cordial co-operation that exists between the Overseas people and this ministry?

Major-General MEWBURN: I did not ask the Overseas ministry to keep him on the strength. There was no further employment for him, and naturally in such a case he would go on pension because his time had expired and he was three years over age. General Steele asked me, as a personal request, if he might be permitted to take his discharge in England instead of coming to Canada for discharge, and I gladly consented, and he was retired on a pension of $2,485. As to his having died of a broken heart, I may say that I have a certificate from Colonel J. A. Roberts, F.R.C.S., who was his medical adviser, in which he replied to a telephone conversation that I had with him when that statement appeared. I very much regret having to refer to this matter, but under the circumstances I think it is my duty to read Colonel Roberts' reply:

Replying to your telephone conversation regarding my professional associations with the late Major General Sir Sam Steele, I would state that I performed the necessary operation subsequent to his accidental injury at Exhibition Camp, Toronto, in April, 1915.

Again in August of 1915 I attended him at Shorncliffe, England, when he was thrown from his automobile and sustained a slight concussion of the brain.

Approximately fourteen months ago General Steel consulted me at his home in Putney, London, and it was learned that he was suffering from diabetes. This condition persisted for over a year, to my knowledge, and in my opinion was directly responsible for his death.

(Signed) J. A. Roberts, F.R.C.S., Eng.

My hon. friend referred to Argyll House, which seems to be the most unpopular place there is in England according to some of the press. Give a dog a bad name and it never leaves him. Argyll House, as I have no doubt that many hon. members of this House know, is the headquarters of the administrative service in England and of the overseas forces. In the early stages of the war I understand there was considerable complaint about the administration and the handling of the officers coming from Canada. I heard it. Lots of us heard it. My gracious, if it were a case of investigating everything, I could myself make hundreds of complaints, but I do not know what good it is going to do. I think one of the troubles that existed at Argyll House was largely due to the number of battalions that went overseas in the earlier days of the war and which of necessity had to be broken up. There were many officers and there was no employment for them. I think that the mannerisms of some of the young officers at Argyll House caused some of the trouble. But I will say that when I was in England in 1918 I heard no complaints about Argyll House. I was in all the camps in England and France. In July 1918 the Overseas Minister laid down the policy that all officers fit for general service who had not served in France would not be given employment in England except in very special cases. I know that as far back as June, 1918, there was a total of 67, all ranks, employed in Argyll House of whom 49 had actually seen service in the front line with the troops in France, 11 were either over age or unfit, and only 7 had not actually seen service in France. The policy which was then adopted by the Overseas Minister has been adhered to from that time on in all the camps in England —any officer, if employed in any of these camps, who had not seen service, had to get out.

There is no special charge against Argyll House. I have no brief for Argyll House. General Smart and Colonel Pratt speak of the intrigue that is going on. When I was in France, during July, 1918, I found, from my observation and from talking with officers of all ranks, and non-commissioned officers and men in very many of the units, that there was the happiest co-operation. I found that the most wonderful team play existed in France from General Currie down to the latest recruit. I found in England that everybody had the utmost respect and esteem for General Currie. I never found any evidence of intrigue going on. On the other hand, I found that there was the most cordial co-operation. There may have been many complaints made; officers may have had personal grievances, but I have no knowledge of any complaints about Argyll House as to its administrative character.

As to the statements of Colonel Pratt, I may say that he went overseas in 1916. He had never had any military experience, as had General Smart, prior to 1916, when he was appointed Lieut.-Colonel and authorized to raise the 133rd Battalion of Norfolk county. Colonel Pratt, in conjunction with an old political enemy, although a great friend, Mr. Hal B. Donly, of Simcoe, worked night and day—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of the Simcoe Reformer?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes; the Reformer and the old Tory pretty nearly slept together during that campaign, but they did some splendid work and set a fine example to other places in Canada. They worked hard and they recruited some 800 men within that county when it was not so easy to get men. Colonel Pratt took his battalion to camp that summer. He went overseas with 665 men. His battalion was broken up within ten days after he got there. Colonel Pratt was employed with the British at Dunkirk, in France, and how long he was there I cannot say.

Major-General MEWBURN: Do you mean as a military man?

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a military man.

Major-General MEWBURN: His experience as a soldier began when he took command of the battalion. I cannot make any statement about his ability as a military man, but I know that he worked hard to raise that battalion. He had in camp when I happened to be there some 800 men and he took 665 men overseas.

Mr. COPP: Had he had any previous military experience?

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand none whatever.

Colonel PECK: Have you any confidential report on Colonel Pratt?

Major-General MEWBURN: There is on file a confidential report on every officer. I do not know that it is for me to present any confidential report here on Colonel Pratt or General Smart. There have been confidential reports in connection with several officers. Colonel Pratt was in France, at Dunkirk, and was employed by the British. I saw Colonel Pratt in England last summer. He was then employed by the British, but he was not doing any military duty at that time. He told me that he was coming to Canada to look into the flax industry. I understand he did proceed to Canada in connection with the flax industry. I think in its relation to aeroplanes. As I say, I saw Colonel Pratt over there and I had a long chat with him. He and I have always been good friends and I have a great admiration for the way in which he took up the work of raising his battalion. I met him in Toronto not long ago before he had proceeded to England again. I have heard of him since he came back from England.

I do not propose to enter at any length into these statements which have appeared in the press particularly in regard to Rhyl. Colonel Pratt was not there and he could not have spoken authoritatively. I would like to point out to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) that what he read was simply the report of the coroner's inquest. I may state that there is a court of inquiry now being held whose duty is not yet completed. It is making a most thorough investigation of the whole trouble at the Rhyl camp and the report of that inquiry no doubt will be made public in due course.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): In order to be perfectly fair to Colonel Pratt is it not a fact that Colonel Pratt has on record an application, repeated no less than three times, to be allowed to revert in order to get into the trenches and serve there?

Major-General MEWBURN: I would not deny that but I have no knowledge of it; that application would be overseas. I can say quite frankly that I think Colonel Pratt is a man who would be just as willing to go to the front as a private as he would be to go to the front as an officer, but as to any letter from him asking to be allowed to revert, I am not in a position to know. I do not know what age he is but I presume that he would be considerably over 35 years and it therefore would not be permissible under regulations to allow him to go to the front.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would not my hon friend say that also of General Smart?

Major-General MEWBURN: I dare say that General Smart would be equally willing; I have not the slightest doubt but that he would. I was informed that he was offered the command of a mounted rifle battalion which he declined, but I do not know the details as to that. An application was made to us that General Smart should proceed to France but the trouble was that we could not have him proceed there with the rank of Colonel. I have the highest respect for General Smart and for Colonel Pratt.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think I can explain that point. The cavalry went over at a certain strength. We broke up the regiment and formed it into a battalion in order that there might be no trouble in holding a certain part of the front. Colonel Smart was supplanted, but not through any fault of his own. Before the debate closes I will give my version of Colonel Smart's case in regard to this battalion at the front. Everything was honourable and straightforward, with regard to Col. Smart. He was a most efficient officer, but his health failed him.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have never suggested for one moment that Colonel Smart was not a most efficient officer and an officer held in very high esteem, but I do object to these charges being scattered around broadcast. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) made a statement regarding the trouble at Rhyl camp —speaking of Colonel Pratt's charges—with regard to holding back the Olympic and other large transports. As early as January 10, I had considerable cable communications with the Overseas Minister, and I then dealt with the question of speeding up the demobilization of the Canadian troops, advising him what we had been able to do regarding the use of various ships, and that we had arranged for five ships to repatriate civilians, when it was decided not to bring civilians back on the troopships. I also advised that we had arranged for some 24 or 25 ships to accommodate troops. I need not read the cable, because it only goes into the question of disembarkation and the number of troops we could handle, information that I have already given to the House, but I may say that at that time these ships had broken away from the Ministry of Shipping and I sent the following cable overseas:

Agents here have not yet been able to obtain rates on Olympic, Aquitania, and Mauretania. Please negotiate direct with companies and cable rates quoted by them for confirmation by War Purchasing Commission.

We were attempting at that early date to secure those ships, and we only succeeded a short time ago in getting the Olympic back; the other boats have not yet been given back to us. But we have been doing everything in our power since December and January to secure those ships to bring back our men.

With regard to the trouble at Rhyl camp, I would not attempt to say what occasioned it until I see the full report of the court of inquiry

With respect to Col. Pratt's charges about the Flying Corps men being left stranded in England, the article my hon. friend read from the press appeared in the London papers, and it was repeated here. I may also read a cable from London which says:

Lt.-Col. Pratt's bribery accusations in the Ontario Legislature, evoked expressions of the deepest resentment at the military headquarters here. The feeling is these particularly mean attacks on defenceless officers, are the outcome of personal spite, or, the disgruntled failure of those whose own military career can in no way be considered successful.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who signs it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: What paper did it appear in?

Major-General MEWBURN: This was in the Montreal Star.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What paper was it published in in England?

Major-General MEWBURN: It is a special Star cable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It may be signed by Sir George Perley.

An hon. MEMBER: It may be signed by Windermere.

Major-General MEWBURN: It is not signed by anybody. This cable continues:

Regarding the charges of bribery from airmen, this statement is absolutely denied. It is pointed out that the charges must be untrue, because the Canadian Headquarters exercise no control over the repatriation of Canadians in the Royal Air Force, the sole responsibility resting with the Air Ministry.

I may say that when I heard there was any suggestion of any Canadians in the Royal Air Force not getting proper attention in regard to repatriation, I cabled twice to Sir Edward Kemp, and I took the responsibility of stating that if there were any Canadians from the Imperial service who were having difficulty in getting back to Canada he was to look after them and see that free transportation was furnished.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What answer did you receive from Sir Edward Kemp?

Major-General MEWBURN: I received no definite information. I did not think any answer was necessary. I simply requested him to take action. Since then I have seen a large number of Canadians who were in the Imperial Forces; and they tell me that they had no trouble at all, that they got their pay, discharge, and transportation from the Imperial authorities. Some of those men came by New York; in fact they came any way they liked. There may be a few isolated cases of distress, but I am not aware of any. However, when I saw that accusation I took the responsibility of seeing that action was taken to look after any such cases.

Mr. COPP: Is the hon. minister referring to Canadians in the Flying Corps in England being given transportation?

Major-General MEWBURN: The Royal Air Force.

Mr. COPP: I know of cases where Canadians in the Flying Corps were forced to pay their own way back.

Major-General MEWBURN: I say there may have been such cases, but none has come to my attention. Generally speaking, Sir, I feel that if the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), or any other hon. member is prepared on his own responsibility to make any specific charges, the Government should take immediate cognizance of them and order an investigation at once. But I do not think that where officers are returning from England —no matter who they are—and are making broadcast promiscuous charges and statements in connection with these matters, too much attention should be paid to them. I have gone out of my way when statements have appeared from different people in the press from time to time to look into them personally. As I said before, I am not responsible for the administration of any troops outside Canada, but I am prepared to stand up in this House and defend honourable officers, who have been devoting their best talents to our Canadian forces overseas against promiscuous charges levelled against them behind their backs when they are not here to defend themselves. I am quite sure that the Minister of Militia and Defence Overseas, Sir Edward Kemp, will be here before long and he will defend himself. I may not have covered the ground as fully as it is covered in the long statement made by the hon. member, but I think in a general way I have dealt with the matter as fully as is necessary and shown that there is no maladministration overseas as far as our knowledge goes. I do not think that these promiscuous statements should be considered when they are not backed up by any definite, positive charges.

Mr. CYRUS W. PECK (Skeena): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we are all very gratified to see the Opposition showing a lively interest in the soldier. It is a little late, but at the same time—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. An hon. member has no right to impugn the sincerity of hon. members sitting on your left in connection with the Canadian army.

Mr. PECK: I wish to assure the hon. gentleman that I meant my remarks in a very good-humoured way.

Mr. McMASTER: In a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. PECK: And I have no hesitation in withdrawing what my hon. friend takes exception to. I would be the last man in this House to impugn the loyalty and honour of the hon. members of the Opposition. If all hon. members will observe the same rules as I do, there will be less of these wanton, cruel, and foolish charges flung out against my gallant comrades of the war. Now, I do not rise to justify the whole administration of the Militia Department or the Government overseas.

It is one of our customs to think that the Government is responsible for all its officers and employees. Our Government is in a very bad situation in that regard, because a great deal that takes place in connection with administration in England is not known here for a long time afterwards. I do not mean to justify all that has taken place in Argyll House or in connection with the administration overseas; I may have occasion later to bring some of these things to the attention of the House. But I shall not do anything of that kind for the sake of cheap notoriety or of attaining some cheap political purpose. I saw a great deal of the administration over there, and I would not be doing my duty as a soldier or as a Canadian citizen if I did not stand up here and say that whatever mistakes have been made by Sir Edward Kemp, he is a very conscientious, hard-working patriotic minister.

Certain charges have been flung against General Turner. I repeat that I am not going to justify the administration of Argyll House, not for a moment. But no man who ever served his country did it with the same absolute patriotism and the same fine sense of loyalty as did Major-General Sir Richard Turner, V.C.

With regard to the administration in Canada, I do not say that I will not criticise it sometime, but I believe that the present Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) in his policy and in his conduct is as straight as he is in his personal carriage and appearance.

I have risen simply to say a word or two with regard to some statements made by General Smart in the Quebec Legislature. Whatever any one may say as to his statement, it read as though it was directed against the whole Canadian Army Medical Corps. I saw General Smart a few days ago. He seemed to think that I had a sort of Bolshevist notion, and I said to him at once: "There is one respect in which I do not agree with you; if you have anything against the administration of the army medical corps in England, that is all right, but you should not also make a charge against the whole Canadian Army Medical Corps." He said: "I do not do that." But the reports in the press, including those referred to by the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), indicated that the statement was made against the entire medical forces overseas. Members may bring up anything they please by way of conducting a cheap political campaign or something of that nature, but nobody is going to play football with the reputation of my comrades in this war while I sit in this House. And, Sir, if there ever was an efficient service in any army in any country, it was the service of the Canadian Army Medical Corps in France. To make a cruel, inconsiderate statement against that service should be beneath the dignity of any member of this House unless he has most ample proof. I have had considerable experience with these officers. I have seen them in times of peril and in times when we were at rest. There was never too much danger for the officers, and the personnel of the Canadian Army Medical Corps to face. When it came to going into the trenches or when we were in action, your medical corps was there, "Johnny on the spot" every time, doing their duty. No class of men made more sacrifices than the members of the medical corps. The great bulk of them were captains or majors, and up to last June the captains were drawing the magnificent sum of $4.75 a day and the majors corresponding pay. I know lots of men there who had a practice at home that brought them anywhere from $5,000 to $20,000 a year; yet they sacrificed it all, went overseas and served faithfully and uncomplainingly. And now we are forced to stand up in this House and defend that noble profession. I say, Sir, it is humiliating that such a duty should become necessary.

Mr. PETER ROBERT McGIBBON (Argenteuil): I read a story some time ago about Peck's Bad Boy, and, like others on this side of the House, who have probably read that story, I remember a few things in it. Peck's Bad Boy was an awful boy; he would say and do terrible things—but, of course, I do not say that the member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) is the same as he was.

I wish to point out that the medical profession has not been attacked by this side of the House; the discussion has been with regard to the management of affairs. A few days ago I was informed that some one wanted to speak to me in the corridor outside. When I went out I found that it was a returned soldier, an old friend of mine, and I took him to my room. I noticed that he was a little lame and I asked him what was the cause. He said he had been in the army and had got his leg broke in France. Before he was sent to England for medical treatment he was sent to a place where, he said, there were a few old maids and an orderly or two, but no doctors. He suffered nine days in that place with a broken limb; just think of it, Mr. Speaker. Of course, they were kind to him in other ways, and he got his board. He was going to break away and get out on the streets, but they got word to Sir George Perley, and he looked after him and took him to a Canadian hospital where there was plenty of room and lots of doctors and nurses. He made inquiry and found that at that hospital they had been without work for some time. Here was one of our good Canadian soldiers suffering day and night in a hospital where there were no instruments to treat his broken limb and where there was nobody to help him. I said: "Why do they treat the Canadian soldiers that way?" "Well," he said, "the Minister of Militia"—he was referring to the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes)—"had made good arrangements for hospitals, but after he was discharged—"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGIBBON: "—they would not keep a man in a hospital that the ex-Minister of Militia had arranged for, notwithstanding the fact that in those hospitals there were paid Canadian doctors and nurses." He told me that they distributed the men all over England and Ireland. I asked him what was the reason for that, and he said that so far as he knew anything that had been done by the ex-Minister of Militia was claimed by others as being not right and was not acknowledged at all.

That is one thing. Then he said there was another thing, if they did go to the Canadian hospitals, there was no chance of graft or of rake-offs, and that was, he thought, the principal part of it. He was side-tracked and lay nine days in this place without medical aid. I do not think any hon. member on this side of the House criticises the doctors.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McGIBBON (Argenteuil): The doctors have done wonders. My sympathy goes out to members of this House and others who have lost sons in France in this great war and, it is not surprising that we endeavour to have an investigation in order to find out who is to blame. No doubt many other soldiers were treated like my friend with the broken limb, being sent to places where they did not receive proper attention. I think, with all respect to the Union Government, it would be in their interest to have an investigation, without politics being brought into it, in order to find out where the blame lies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has taken a good deal of responsibility upon himself in placing before the House and the country the exaggerated statements which he has read to us to-day respecting the Canadian Army Medical Service. It is my purpose to deal more particularly with certain charges which have been made respecting the Canadian Army Medical Service and the policy adopted with respect to the treatment of wounded in 1916, at the time when the Babtie commission was appointed. I purpose dealing with that period because it chanced that I was overseas in the fall of 1916 and was closely associated with Sir George Perley who has come under severe and, in my view, wholly unjustifiable criticism respecting the appointment of the Babtie commission.

Before, however, dealing with that period and the conditions which then prevailed, I desire to make reference to some of the sweeping charges which have been made by General Smart with regard to that gallant soldier General Sir Richard Turner and his gallant associates at Argyll House. It is a very simple matter to make general statements regarding a body of officers, but no general statement of a condemnatory nature regarding any body of officers in Great Britain can be true. Gentlemen returning to Canada may feel, with respect to certain officers with whom they have been brought into contact, that they might have been, let us say, more courteous or more considerate in any particular matter in which they were concerned, but to make a general condemnation of the officers of Canada at their Argyll House headquarters appears to me to be a proceeding absolutely without justification. I do not believe any such charges will find support in London where the situation is known, amongst the members of this House who have returned from overseas, amongst officers generally who have served overseas, or amongst the people at large.

General Smart is reported in the Montreal Gazette as stating with respect to General Sir Richard Turner that he is a weakling, surrounded by weaklings, and a man who listened too much to tattle and intrigue. I leave it to any hon. gentleman in this House who has served overseas if that is a proper description of General Sir Richard Turner. I saw him at the front before he was appointed to command in England, and I know of no man who had in higher degree the respect of the Canadian Expeditionary Force than had General Turner. He won the Victoria Cross, and it seems to me a most extraordinary thing that any returned officer should criticise as a weakling a man of his proven courage and high standing.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have never read General Smart's statement and I never heard before that he called General Turner a weakling.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, March 15, in its despatch from Quebec:

> General Smart in telling of medical conditions brought condemnation to bear against certain high officials, and as regards general army administration described General Sir Richard Turner as a weakling, surrounded by weaklings, and a man who listened too much to tattle and intrigue.

In a cable report which I have before me General Turner is stated to have made, at a luncheon held in London on April 5, the following remarks with respect to these charges:

> General Turner followed, and said: "I have never spoken or written to anybody in Canada asking them to take up the cudgels on my behalf. I do not consider there is any need to do so. Criticisms have been made upon men associated with me at headquarters. I have been responsible for recommending to the minister the following officers: Generals Thacker, Hogarth and Foster; Colonel Hastings, and my personal aide, Major Nickle. Argyll House, which has been so much abused, consists of only 63 officers. I know what a load they carry. There have been remarks lately concerning lack of co-ordination and co-operation between Canada, England, and France. I cannot help feeling that these lying and malicious statements have been bred and fostered in many instances by disgruntled and discredited officers, some of whom have been returned to Canada for inefficiency or for other causes."
> General Turner concluded with the following comparison: Australians returned, from date of armistice to April 1, 50,400; Canadians, 117,500.

I ask this House if, within a period of four months, 117,500 men have been returned to Canada, if Argyll House can be so inefficient as is evidently the opinion of some of these returned officers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it a fact that 20,000 were returned since the Rhyl riots?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is quite probable, but the point I make is that if 117,500 men have been demobilized within four months, Argyll House must be anything but inefficient.

Mr. VIEN: Is the minister aware that most of the complaints are not as to the number of men returned, but as to the discrimination shown in giving the men places on the steamers; that there has been unfair discrimination in bringing back the men. In some cases the last to go overseas have been the first to return home.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The policy which the Government desired to have put into effect was that those who had been overseas the longest should be the first to return, but the Canadian corps themselves desired to return by units, and we have had regard to the wishes of the Canadian corps. Consequently, some who went over later, by reason of their being in a certain unit, have come back earlier than some who preceded them overseas.

Mr. VIEN: Is not my hon. friend aware——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the House is not in Committee, and that the rule that a speaker shall not be interrupted except to ask a question, and with his consent, has not been followed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is one other matter I wish to refer to, and that is the charges that have been made against Sir Edward Kemp and Sir George Perley with regard to Canadian members of the Royal Air Force. As I understand it, that is an Imperial Force. I saw a statement, attributed, I think, to one of the officers whose names have been mentioned by my hon. friend this afternoon, that Sir George Perley ought to be crucified for his treatment of the Canadian members of the Royal Air Force.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would not go as far as that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cabled Sir George Perley to ascertain what he had to do with the members of the Royal Air Force, and he replied as follows:

> There must be some misapprehension as I have no authority regarding Royal Air Force. Have, however, on all occasions assiduously promoted their interests and done everything possible to give support to reasonable claims all Canadians serving in Imperial Forces. For example, I have intervened and secured that Canadian cadets in Air Force should be entitled to honorary commissions on discharge and outfit allowances. Have also taken up many personal cases and have arranged with Air Ministry for special investigation. Have also pressed in direction of expediting demobilization and must say my representations have been received sympathetically by Imperial authorities. Chief difficulty is inadequate shipping accommodation regarding which we are seeking in every direction for relief.

Sir George Perley responsible? He has no authority respecting the Royal Air Force. He has done everything a man could do. What does Sir Edward Kemp say about the matter? Replying on April 2, 1919, he says:

> Assume you refer to Canadians not on our strength but those who enlisted in Canada in R.A.F. or were transferred outright by us here to R.A.F. Imperial Government admits its obligation to repatriate these men free of charge. Difficulty is entirely one of shipping accommodation. On behalf these airmen for some time past we have been pressing Imperial authorities constantly with necessity making arrangements for their return to Canada. We have arranged for two hundred to sail on Megantic leaving to-day. There are eleven hundred still to go and Imperial authorities expect will be able to repatriate all of these during April. Will do all possible to assist.

I ask this House, is it fair to assail these two men—Sir Edward Kemp, one of the ablest administrators I have ever met, and one of the most honourable men that I know, and Sir George Perley, of whom I may say the same thing—with regard to their conduct respecting Canadian members of the Royal Air Force? Is it fair play? I ask my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) if it is fair play that these officers who have come back should assail these defenceless men in England who cannot make their defence here? Is it fair for my hon. friend to bring forward and sponsor these charges that they make against defenceless officers of the highest standing at Argyll House, against the Overseas Minister of Militia, and against the High Commissioner?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (resuming): When the House rose I was dealing with certain charges made by General Smart against the overseas administration of Sir Edward Kemp and against Sir George Perley, the Canadian High Commissioner. In his discussion of the Rhyl riots General Smart makes the following reference as proof of the incompetency of Argyll House:

> Then the unnecessary delay. Almost every newspaper article about the Rhyl riots refers to delay. I don't want to place responsibility on the Admiralty, perhaps they are to blame, but more of the blame rests with the Argyll House in London. There is one case where the C. P. ship Minnesota was detained in Liverpool for one week because of poor staff work on the part of Argyll House. It was held up for a week, and we had to pay demurrage of $6,000 a day. That is no fault of the Admiralty.

To this allegation the overseas minister replies that General Smart's statement regarding the Minnesota, or as applied to any other ship, is absolutely without the slightest foundation in fact. With regard to certain other references the cable from the overseas minister continues:

> Statements regarding friction between Canada, England, France and intrigue regarding Currie are without slightest foundation and have already been denied. On other hand, Currie stated publicly last week that he has had best of co-operation and support. Turner has also denied publicly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to what I desire to speak upon chiefly, namely, the charges made by General Smart with regard to the overseas administration of the Canadian Army Medical Service. When I was overseas in 1916 I visited many Canadian and Imperial hospitals, and talked with scores of officers at the front and in England, and I had an opportunity of consulting with medical men of the highest standing in London. I have on numerous occasions discussed all phases of the war with returned officers and men, and if there is one thing I have heard more than another in connection with the conduct of the war it is that the Canadian Army Medical Service is almost in a class by itself for excellence. I do not believe that any army in history has had the care that the Canadian army has enjoyed with respect to its sick and wounded. One does not like to boast about these matters, but I have yet to hear from any officer who has returned any substantial criticism of the work of the Canadian Army Medical Service. I have known officers to state that such and such a member of the staff, while highly efficient, was rather curt and somewhat uncivil, but they also admitted that the man had duties requiring his attention day and night, duties of the most arduous and responsible character; and it is very much better that a man should be highly efficient, even if he is occasionally curt, than that he should be inefficient though always courteous. The ideal, of course, is to have one who is both efficient and courteous—and I may say to my hon. friend that I think that is what he always finds in the present ministry. With regard to General Smart's charges against the Canadian Army Medical Service, I wish to read from his speech in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, 15th March, 1919:

"I say without fear of contradiction from any impartial source that the medical administration overseas has been bad," said the General. "It has been callous and careless, and there is vast room for improvement Personally I have no confidence after four years' experience overseas in those who are administering the affairs in England to-day. I take it that those men who have suffered, officers and men, are entitled to the best that we can give them, that is the very least that we owe."

A few days later General Smart saw fit to moderate this sweeping condemnatory criticism of the Canadian Army Medical Service, and in a letter to the Montreal Star, dated March 29, two weeks later, he paid a very handsome tribute indeed to the treatment of soldiers in Canadian hospitals. He said:

The treatment given to sick and wounded in Canadian hospitals, both in France and England, was the best to be had anywhere in the whole battle zone. No words of mine could adequately express my admiration for the Canadian doctors and nursing sisters generally.

There were many medical officers of the very highest standing in their profession, from all parts of Canada, attached to Med. H. Q. London, among whom I might mention in addition to Col. Roberts himself, Col. Armstrong, Col. Finley, Col. Primrose, Col. Stuart, Col. Hutchison, Col. Martin, Col. Adami.

If the administration of the Canadian Army Medical Service overseas was so bad, how does it chance that the fruit of that administration is so excellent? How is it that from such an inefficient administration we get results probably greater than those achieved by any other army in the field? If the direction is so bad, how is it that the machinery is working so admirably? General Smart himself paid a tribute to the excellence of the care given to the Canadian sick and wounded in Canadian hospitals. He goes on to say, in his speech in the Quebec Legislature:

In 1916 a policy was enforced whereby the Canadian wounded coming from France were not sent to Canadian hospitals, but were scattered throughout England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. I understand and believe this policy was inaugurated by Sir George Perley, the High Commissioner of Canada. It was inaugurated in opposition to protests that it was not fair to deprive Canadian wounded of the very best treatment that could be had for them in the Canadian hospitals. Sir George Perley had his way, and that policy was put into effect with results that I will indicate later. The medical services of Canada at that time were under the control of the Imperial Medical authorities and there was a terrible mix-up between their hospitals and ours and their staffs and ours, and we supplied them with some ambulances. That was an unsound policy right along, but was shoved down the throats of the Canadian authorities by Sir George Perley. The Canadian Government sent Colonel Bruce to look into the whole question and surrounded him with a number of capable officers. He made certain recommendations, among them was the abolition of this system of scattering our wounded throughout the British Isles. I have not a copy of his recommendations before me, but I saw them, and say they were very sound from an administrative point of view. I am not attempting to criticise the professional side of the question, but I was responsible for administration and discipline. Shortly after we had a change in the Ministry of Militia, and Sir George Perley also became overseas minister of militia. It was quite evident that he did not fall in with the recommendations made by Col. Bruce, and in order to get rid of him, and I believe it was done deliberately, a committee was appointed to consider his recommendations, and that committee was presided over by Surgeon-General Sir William Babtie, one of the heads of the Imperial Medical Service. I would like to tell you who General Sir William Babtie is. He was the medical officer who was responsible for the break-down of the medical services in Mesopotamia, and the Royal Commission who investigated that gave a finding that was strong in the terrible responsibility and crime that was perpetrated on the men in that particular campaign. It is almost unfit to print, the terrible things that those men had to endure, and this man, Sir William Babtie, was responsible for it.

There are two features of the indictment to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. First, he says that there existed a system of scattering our wounded throughout the British Isles. It is very difficult to refute, except by the evidence of those who have had experience, any statement in respect to the quality or character of the service in Great Britain or on the continent. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve said this afternoon that General Smart was a gallant officer and a good Conservative. These are high qualifications, and I am quite willing to accept my hon. friend's statement. I have known General Smart for many years, and certainly I have no intention of in any way reflecting upon his character or standing. My hon. friend knows however that General Smart is not a physician, nor has he had to do immediately with the problems with which the Canadian Army Medical Service has had to grapple. These problems have had to be dealt with by the officers of the Canadian Army Medical Service. As against this statement of General Smart, which generally condemns the Canadian Army Medical Service by reason of the policy which it states ought to be adopted, I desire to cite an opinion which will, I venture to say, command the attention and respect of this House. Only within the past few days, I have received a letter in respect to General Smart's charge. It is from a man of the highest standing in the medical world of Canada. I refer to Sir Andrew Macphail, D.A.D.M.S.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why did you not get a letter from Dr. Bruce?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to Dr. Bruce a little latter. I will deal fairly and justly with Dr. Bruce, who is of very eminent standing, and who has been a personal friend of mine for many years. But I am dealing just at the present moment with Sir Andrew Macphail.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Where does he come from?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I might almost retort: He who says he knows him not argues himself unknown, but, as my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) is one of the best known men in Canada, that would not apply.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I asked a civil question, and I thought I would get a civil answer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will; I was paying him a compliment. Sir Andrew Macphail is a professor in the medical faculty of McGill University. He served in Canada for five months and overseas for four years two of which were spent in France with the second Canadian division, and two in England at various camps, and at medical headquarters, London. I have received from him within the last week this letter:

To those who, like myself, are returning from overseas after four years' service in the British Expeditionary Force it was an extremely painful experience reading an account of the attack which was made upon the Canadian Army in the Quebec Legislature by Brigadier-General C. A. Smart, himself at one time holding a command in that force.

That part of this vague and wandering attack which concerns the medical service I feel competent to meet. I have been in this service continuously since November, 1914. During those years I served five months in Canada, two years with the Second Division in France and two years in England. At the front my service extended from Ypres to the Somme, and from the western front to the extreme limit of the bridge-head beyond the Rhine. In England it was my business to visit every hospital, and every camp in Scotland, and I was of that headquarters which is so wantonly attacked. With the experience so acquired it may fairly be considered that I am qualified to deal with one charge at least of which I have specific knowledge.

Brigadier-General Smart's most specific charge against the Medical Services is that "there is a scheme for scattering Canadian wounded throughout the British Isles."

The exact contrary is the truth. The whole policy of the administration is, and has been for years, to collect Canadian patients, as far as possible, into Canadian hospitals in well defined areas. Not for years have any Canadian patients been so scattered—none to Scotland, to Ireland, or even to the north of England. The Canadian hospitals in England are all placed in three areas; in the South-eastern area, to accommodate casualties from France; in the Liverpool area, for the reception and dispatch of troops; and in the London area for the local sick, and as a general reserve.

A complete organization exists for doing the very thing General Smart suggests, namely, to assemble Canadian patients in Canadian hospitals, and Col. Roberts was charged with this duty. There never was a policy of "scattering Canadian patients over the British Isles." The policy has been to evacuate casualties from the field with the utmost speed by convoys, and shelter these convoys for the time being, in any hospital available. Soldiers from all over the Empire fall side by side. There is no time on the field of battle to sort these men according to their place of birth. The battle of Messines Ridge opened at daybreak, and by luncheon the

Canadians who happened to be in an ambulance convoy cannot be left on the station platform, and a special ambulance train cannot be provided for a small number of men.

At all times during the war provision had to be kept in reserve for 10,000 Canadian casualties, and part of this reserve was in English hospitals. Otherwise it would have been necessary to keep 10 Canadian hospitals empty, though fully staffed, against such an emergency. Apart from the wastefulness of such a policy there are not ten buildings in England available for standing empty against the hour of need.

The Canadian Army was not an allied army. It was of the very essence of the force. Canadian casualties could not be immediately separated from their stricken comrades who were not Canadians. In the early days when hospital accommodation was yet incompletely organized any refuge—even V.A.D. hospitals—was welcome.

The movement of patients is one of the most delicate and technical in the operations of war, and all movement would cease if a rigid rule were made that every wounded Canadian should in the first instance be sent to a Canadian hospital.

The speed with which cases could be passed through Canadian hospitals depended in turn upon the speed of evacuation to Canada, and that was governed to some extent by the activity of German submarines. Now that hostilities are suspended there are comparatively few Canadians in English hospitals so that the policy of the service is being fulfilled and General Smart's objections met.

Andrew McPhail.

I stated that a couple of weeks after his speech in the Quebec Legislature General Smart addressed a communication to the Montreal Star, and on reading that carefully I find that he practically withdrew the charges he had made against the Canadian Army Medical Service and its staff, with the single exception, so far as I understand his statement, of those against one or two men. Therefore, so far as these charges against the Canadian Army Medical Service are concerned, General Smart has practically refuted himself. And yet my hon. friend brings his statement before the House with the intention of having the country believe that these charges of negligence in the care and treatment of the Canadian sick and wounded soldiers are well founded. I do not know anything more calculated to distress those people of Canada who have wounded or sick sons or other connections overseas.

Before taking up the question of the Babtie Commission, which alone remains of the charges put forward by General Smart, I desire to refer to one of the specific charges. I have stated that it is difficult here in Ottawa to refute general charges made with respect to the administration of a service in Great Britain or on the continent. It is impossible, apart from inquiry, to meet specific charges, which may or may not be founded in fact. One of General Smart's specific cases by which he would substantiate his charges against the Canadian Army Medical Service is as follows:

Then there is another case. A friend of mine living in London told me—

Second-hand evidence.

—that on his visits around the various hospitals looking for Canadians to do something for them, he came across the case of a Canadian who was suffering from a severe wound in the spine—so severe that he would never be right again and would not live long. Instead of being taken care of in one of the Canadian hospitals, where he would get the best treatment from trained nurses, he was in a lean-to attached to a V.A.D. hospital. (Cries of "shame".)

On the statement of a friend of his General Smart makes a charge that a Canadian, severely wounded, had been placed in a lean-to attached to a V. A. D. hospital, and such was the impression made upon the minds of those who heard him that there were cries of "Shame." The attention of the Overseas Minister was drawn to this matter, and he cables me as follows:

First, the case of man with wounded spine. Is doubtless case of tuberculosis of spine. Man was sent to be treated at hospital within three miles of home of his people, the recognized treatment being open air. Lean-to is a chalet, an open-air structure specially built for such cases. Man is being treated among his own personal friends and relatives by medical officer who fought with him and shared his dangers in firing line. Man himself has earnestly expressed wish that he be allowed to remain and continue treatment in neighbourhood his family. Also may add he is improving.

Now, I ask this House, is it fair to make a charge against an overseas minister based upon a statement made in conversation by a friend without inquiry by General Smart? Is it in the national interest at this time that a man burdened as Sir Edward Kemp is, with the duties of administration of the Canadian forces, first in Great Britain and then in Canada, should have to make inquiries with regard to a charge of this kind, which rests absolutely upon no foundation? And I refer again to what I stated before six o'clock, that it does seem to me that it is objectionable in the extreme that charges should be made against defenceless ministers and defenceless officers overseas. Many of these men at Argyll House, it has been drawn to my attention, are working literally day and night. They are making great personal sacrifices. Their private affairs urge their return at the earliest possible date; yet, impelled by the sense of duty and devotion which has carried them so far, they are going on. But charges of this kind made in Canada by returned officers is tending to demoralize those men, because they feel absolutely helpless and defenceless. They do not know what charges are being made behind their backs, they are not here to answer for themselves, and it seems to me that the least that could be done by returned officers, if for no other reason than a sense of chivalry, would be to communicate their charges to the officers overseas against whom they are making them, so the latter may have an opportunity of reply and defence.

Before I leave the matter of the Rhyl riots, let me repeat what was stated by the Minister of Militia this afternoon, that a full inquiry is being held into that matter. It does not appear to me, therefore, that it is open for discussion, pending the findings of the court of inquiry which was at once constituted by the Minister of Militia. I do not, of course, desire to limit the freedom of the House in debate—I have neither the power nor the will to do so—but it seems to me to be a recognized rule that where a matter is under judicial inquiry it is well that comment should be refrained from until the inquiry is completed and decision rendered.

But the member for Maisonneuve referred to the fact that shipping had been available since the riot. I wonder whether the hon. member realizes what the shipping situation of the world has been since the armistice. Consider the supplies that have to be taken down the Mediterranean to areas where there are still forces of the Allies, to Mesopotamia, and to other ports of Asia Minor; consider the shipping required for the transportation of the troops back to India; the shipping required to move the Australian and New Zealand contingents home; the shipping required to bring home the troops of the United States and to bring home our own troops. And in addition to all that, shipping is required for commercial purposes on an ever-increasing scale. The demands upon the shipping of the world since the armistice have been tremendous and it is with the greatest possible difficulty that shipping is arranged for in advance. Even after arrangements had been made in perfect good faith between the Admiralty and the Overseas Ministry, sailings sometimes have to be cancelled; arrangements cannot be carried out because of the exigencies of after-war conditions. That is not to be wondered at. It is normal for a period of this kind; it is what you must expect. In the face of these shipping difficulties, the Canadian Overseas Ministry and our Militia Department here have demobilized to Canada nearly 120,000 troops in four months. It is a wonderful achievement, Mr. Speaker; I do not believe there has been a like achievement on the part of any of the Overseas dominions. We are closer to Great Britain than Australia or New Zealand and more shipping is available as between Great Britain and the American continent than between Great Britain and Australia and New Zealand. But after stating that, it must be recognized that the feat of bringing practically thirty thousand men a month—dependent as we are upon two railways to the Atlantic coast and the accommodations of our ports there—reflects the highest credit upon all concerned.

My hon. friend suggested that if the riots had not occurred possibly as many men would not have been brought back; in other words, that the riots brought about a greater amount of shipping for the transportation of Canadian troops. Well, I do not say that that is true, but assuming that it is, is there any reflection upon the Overseas Minister of Militia or the Militia Department here? How is Canada to obtain shipping from the British authorities except by influence and persuasion? Ever since he went overseas Sir Robert Borden has used his best endeavours—and I do not know of any man who is more influential with the British authorities than he—to obtain as much shipping as possible, not only for the transportation of our troops but for the movement of commerce to and from Canada. Sir Edward Kemp has given the matter assiduous and continuous attention, and so, to my knowledge, has Sir George Perley. That being the case, suppose shipping was not available before the Rhyl riots and that as a result of the riots certain shipping which had been allotted to other purposes was allotted to the purpose of bringing home Canadians; is the Overseas Minister of Militia to be blamed? Not if he had used his best endeavours to secure shipping—and I have stated that he has used his best endeavours, and that the Prime Minister has supplemented those efforts in every way possible. I recall that before the armistice, as high an authority as Lord Shaughnessy— and there is no higher authority upon transportation — estimated that it would take at least ten months, if not longer, to bring home the Canadian forces at the front. Yet, such has been the administrative ability of the Overseas Ministry of Militia and the services there that they have demobilized in England some 300,000 men, of whom 120,000 have been returned to Canada—all in the period of a little more than four months.

Now I come to the Babtie Commission. General Smart visits severe condemnation upon Sir George Perley, holding him responsible for the appointment of the Babtie Commission, and suggesting that his purposes were not creditable. He says that Sir George Perley desired to get rid of Colonel Bruce and that he appointed the Babtie Commission for the purpose. My hon. friend said this afternoon that Sir George Perley found Colonel Bruce's report so severely against the Government that he appointed the Babtie Commission. He says that Colonel Bruce made a report and that it was ridiculous to have other commissions investigate that report; now he asks us to investigate the report of the Babtie Commission. Let us hear what General Smart has to say about Sir William Babtie:

> He was the medical officer who was responsible for the breakdown of the Medical Service in Mesopotamia, and the Royal Commission which investigated that gave a finding that was strong in the terrible responsibility and crime that was perpetrated against the men in that particular campaign. It is almost unfit to print, the terrible things that those men had to endure, and this man, Sir William Babtie, was responsible for it.

Now let us find out what this man Sir William Babtie is. He graduated from Glasgow University, entered the Army Medical Service in 1881, served in the South African war and received a medal and five clasps, also the Victoria Cross. General Turner, who is also a winner of the Victoria Cross, is spoken of by General Smart as a weakling. Sir William Babtie, winner of the Victoria Cross, is spoken of as a man who committed a crime in the Mesopotamia campaign. He says that it is "unfit to print the terrible things that these men had to endure," and that "this man Sir William Babtie was responsible for it." It seems to be a bad day for the winners of the Victoria Cross—one of them a weakling and the other guilty of a crime. Let us see what else Sir William Babtie is. In 1901 he was the Assistant Director General of the Army Medical Service; in 1907, Inspector of Medical Services; in 1910, Deputy Director of Medical Services; in 1916, Director General of the Medical Service of India, and, at the time he was chairman of the board, Director of the Medical Services at the War Office.

Sir William Babtie did come under certain animadversion in connection with the Mesopotamian campaign, but I find that in the British Hansard of the 17th June, 1918, Sir William Babtie is referred to in the following manner:

> —is not only under no personal aspersion from the Mesopotamia investigation, but has since been advanced to Inspector of Medical Services. Babtie has also just been promoted from Major-General to Lieutenant-General.

Winner of the Victoria Cross, with the experience in the army which I have mentioned and having been recently promoted to be Lieutenant-General, General Sir William Babtie ought not, after all, to be so bad a man to associate with.

In the fall of 1916 I happened to be in England, and I want the House to realize the condition at the front and the condition behind the lines at that time. It was in November and the battles of the Somme had been going on for months. This was one of the most critical periods of the war and a time of the greatest British and Canadian casualties. This war was not won in the last two weeks before the armistice; it was won in every one of the fifty months of its duration, and the hammer blows of the British army at the Somme, following the heroic resistance of the French at Verdun, wasted the German armies to such an extent as to make the campaign of the next year and the victory of last year possible. Sir Douglas Haig was applying the strategy of attrition, the same kind of strategy which General Grant used against General Lee at the battle of the Wilderness. It was a strategy of attrition, of wastage, of victory by killing. Sir Douglas Haig told me that at the Somme in 1916 there were 550,000 casualties in his army, and that he calculated the Germans had sustained a loss in casualties of over 700,000, a balance of 150,000 of wastage, of human casualties, in favour of the British and against the Germans. That is a terrible way of looking at the matter, but it was a condition of that static war. Think of 550,000 casualties, with the wounded to be brought back from the front to dressing stations, to base hospitals, to be brought in convoys across the Channel, to be taken to British or Canadian hospitals and, in fact, to be taken any place where there was a hospital or hospital accommodation. The British expected that their wounded would be counted by the thousands; they were counted by the tens of thousands and by the hundreds of thousands. I am told that the V.A.D. hospitals throughout the United Kingdom had in their care, in the fall of 1916, 53,000 patients. This meant providing accommodation equal to that of 53 hospitals of 1,000 beds each. I discussed the matter with the British as well as with the Canadian authorities, and they required all the hospital accommodation there was in the British Isles to take care of the wounded being brought back from the front.

I come now to speak of the report of Colonel Bruce and of the appointment of the Babtie commission. Colonel Bruce is one of the ablest surgeons in Canada. He is a man of international reputation as an operator. He has long held a distinguished position as Associate Professor of Surgery in the University of Toronto and as head of one of the surgical services in the Toronto General Hospital, and he had also other high professional positions. The then Minister of Militia, the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), believing that the Canadian Army Medical Service in England required re-organization, appointed Colonel Bruce for the purpose of making an inquiry and reporting upon conditions. Colonel Bruce made his report.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Colonel Bruce and the committee.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is Colonel Bruce's report. Colonel Bruce had associated with him certain assistants, some of them well known to me, amongst others Dr. McEwing, a personal friend of mine.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Colonel Wilson.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He had certain associates with him. I talked the matter over with Colonel Bruce, Sir George Perley and many others whom I knew, surgeons and physicians from Toronto; and I was of the opinion then, as I am now, that Colonel Bruce's report was on the whole an excellent one. The difficulty about this controversy in regard to Colonel Bruce's report and the Babtie commission is that the facts are not understood. One would think that there had been some conspiracy against Colonel Bruce; that some commission had been raised up to destroy him. On the contrary, I recognize, Sir George Perley recognizes, General Carleton-Jones recognizes and the Babtie commission, as I shall show, recognizes, that there was very great truth in Colonel Bruce's proposal. I remember saying that I thought 80 per cent of the report was thoroughly sound; so let me make myself perfectly clear that I have no reflections whatever to make upon Colonel Bruce, quite the contrary.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why suppress the report then?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that. I think the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), who was my colleague at that time, acted wisely in appointing Dr. Bruce for the purpose. Dr. Bruce made on the whole an excellent report. Why was it necessary to appoint a commission for the purpose of passing upon Dr. Bruce's report?

Mr. LEMIEUX: First of all, why was he shelved?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think he was shelved.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was sent to France.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think not; I think he went to France himself. When I went to London in November, 1916, I found this condition. A fierce controversy was raging in the Press and throughout the entire Canadian community with regard to what was called, and I think erroneously called, the question of segregation. It was almost as if the Canadian community was divided into two camps. I found the great majority of those men in the Canadian Army Medical Service, men whose distinction and ability were unquestioned, with whom I discussed the matter, were of the opinion that Colonel Bruce's report, while excellent, as I have said, up to a certain point, was not such that it could be put immediately into effect.

There was a very strong feeling prevailing in the Canadian Army Medical Service because in his report—I am speaking from memory, but I think I am right—Colonel Bruce had stated that the Canadian Army Medical Service needed reorganization from top to bottom. It was also put forward—because the men of the Canadian Army Medical Service were men who had given up their profession and had gone overseas at a great sacrifice—that Colonel Bruce had not sufficiently regarded the very heavy tasks and responsibilities which had devolved on General Jones and the Canadian Army Medical Service in the first two years of the war. Colonel Bruce, in his report, no doubt because he had immediately before him the question of making recommendations, had entirely overlooked the good work that had been done and was being done by the Canadian Army Medical Service in Great Britain and France. The spirit of the Canadian Army Medical Corps for the most part was offended by the report, because it failed to give them what they regarded as their just meed of praise and appreciation for the work which they had done.

It is only fair to say that many members of the Canadian Army Medical Service, and distinguished men, too, whom I know personally, and in whom I have high confidence, were strong votaries of Colonel Bruce. They believed in his report. But I recall distinctly talking the matter over with two of these men, outstanding men in the medical world, who believed that the Bruce report was sound for the most part, but that it was not practicable to put it into effect at once. Now Colonel Bruce wanted to put it into effect at once, and there was a great deal of feeling about the whole situation.

More than that—and I come now to the most important point in Colonel Bruce's report—his theory was that the Canadian sick and wounded should be assembled, so far as possible, in purely Canadian hospitals in England.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I say "Hear, hear," too, if it would have been practicable and fair to do as he proposed, having regard to the arrivals of British sick and wounded from the front. Colonel Bruce, while an eminent surgeon, had had no military experience so far as I know. Just let me put it this way to the House: Supposing we had set out to build Canadian hospitals to accommodate all Canadian sick and wounded in London. That would mean that we must have a maximum of hospital accommodation. Supposing that after a great engagement there were thirty thousand Canadian casualties. To accommodate that number we would require thirty Canadian hospitals of a thousand beds each. Now the Canadians might not again be in action for months, and your hospitals would be gradually emptying. Let us say that through the gradual discharge of these patients you have 15,000 beds vacant, what are you going to do with them? Are you going to await the next great action in which the Canadians are engaged, or will you allow the Australians and the New Zealanders and the English and the Scotch and the Irish to go into those hospitals? If you say, "Yes, we will let them in to the extent that the hospitals are empy of Canadians," you have the hospitals filled. Then may come another great engagement of Canadians, and where are you going to put the casualties? The fact of the matter is that it was absolutely necessary that the hospital resources of the United Kingdom should be pooled for the purpose of taking care of the hundreds of thousands of sick and wounded from the front, no matter whether they were English, Scotch, Irish, Australian, New Zealand or Canadian wounded. Not only that. In all the hospitals that I visited I talked with hundreds of Canadians lying side by side with English, Scotch, Irish, Australian and New Zealand comrades, and enjoying the conversation of them all, and I asked them whether they believed that Canadian hospitals should be used solely for Canadian wounded. They said: "No, we do not want that; that would not be fair. These men have fought with us at the front, and why should they not have the advantage of these hospitals as well as ourselves?" They did say this, however: "We like a substantial number of Canadians in our hospitals, two or three hundred Canadians perhaps, because then we feel at home; but so far as the additional beds are concerned, by all means let them be filled up with the English, Irish and Scotch casualties and the wounded from the other overseas dominions." They liked to talk and exchange ideas with one another.

Now the controversy was raging in London, and it was put forward that Colonel Bruce's plan contemplated the segregation of Canadian wounded, or what is called in the Babtie's Commission's report "a watertight compartment for the Canadians." Now I do not believe that Colonel Bruce intended that; I want to be scrupulously fair.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did Colonel Bruce say that he wanted that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know that he did.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Better be sure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not made the charge, but am simply stating what the condition was in London. It was put forward by members of the Canadian Army Medical Corps, and by men high in the public service, that Colonel Bruce's plan as regards the keeping of Canadian hospital accommodation for Canadians was not practicable. So strong was this feeling that a representative of one of the great Canadian universities told me that if Colonel Bruce's plan was put into operation he would ask his university to endeavour to get leave to withdraw their unit. That was the situation with which Sir George Perley and myself were confronted in November of 1916. Colonel Bruce had made his report; he believed implicitly in that report; he desired to put it into effect. On the other hand, you had this divided opinion I have spoken of in the Canadian Army Medical Service, the weight of opinion there being against the plan. While this controversy was raging, battles were going on at the front, and casualties by the tens of thousands had to be taken care of. In that situation, what was the thing to do? My belief is that Colonel Bruce should have exercised patience. He should have taken time, working with Sir George Perley, to bring his plan into effect, because on the whole I believe it was a good plan and my hon. friend stated this afternoon that it had practically been carried into effect since. Now Sir George Perley had not the idea that for Imperial purposes the Canadian wounded should be scattered all over the British Isles. It is an absolute slander of Sir George Perley to state that. I know his views, because he discussed the question with me on numerous occasions. He believed that all the hospital accommodation in Great Britain, including the V.A.D. accommodation, was necessary for the casualties that were coming from the front. He believed that there should be a pooling of the hospital resources of Great Britain for the purposes of the whole Empire, but he believed also that, so far as practicable, Canadians should be gathered in Canadian hospitals with their own people, and receive the attendance of Canadian physicians and surgeons and the ministrations of Canadian nurses.

That was Sir George Perley's position, and I think it is a fairly sound one. Sir George Perley not only took the trouble to consult with members of the Canadian Army Medical Service in London, and with those whose opinion on the subject was valuable, but in company with myself he visited every divisional headquarters in France and Belgium. and discussed this question with the divisional commanders and their staffs. The one opinion was that the scheme was not practicable to be put into immediate effect. Sir George Perley and I were not experts. Here was this divided opinion, this controversy raging in London, and here was Colonel Bruce's report. What was to be done? Sir George Perley came to the conclusion, wisely, I think, that we should constitute a commission to make as rapid an inquiry as possible consistently with accuracy, and to advise Sir George Perley, as overseas minister, as to what should be done. If they found in favour of Dr. Bruce's report it would be almost conclusive evidence that the objections which had been brought against that report were unsound. How did we select that commission? I noticed that this afternoon my hon. friend used the expression "Sir William Babtie and some associates." Who were the associates? It has been suggested in this House once or twice that the Babtie commission was handpicked. Let us see whether it was or not. Sir George Perley's one desire was to get the best men he could to advise him upon that situation, and he chose men representative of three great Canadian universities. General Fotheringham, of Toronto University. was at the front in the First or Second Division, and he had no desire whatever to take part in this inquiry. Sir George Perley had difficulty in getting these men to act because they had their duties at the front. He got General Fotheringham of Toronto University; Colonel Ross of the medical faculty of Queen's University, a man of exceptionally good sense and sound judgment; and, representing McGill, he secured a man whose name stands as high in Montreal as does Dr. Bruce's in Toronto, —Dr. Elder, in charge of the hospital of the McGill University unit at Boulogne. These are distinguished names. Will any hon. gentleman in this House suggest that these men would conspire to make an improper finding with regard to Colonel Bruce's report? In addition there was Colonel Ashton, who, as is known to all the members of the House, has been a practising physician at Brantford, and was of outstanding executive ability, and conversant with the situation. These were all practical men. And I do not believe that Sir George Perley knew Sir William Babtie. It was desirable, as this was an army inquiry and as Canadians were part of the Imperial army, that the Imperial authorities should be represented on that commission, and the recommendation which Sir George Perley got from the proper department—probably the War Office—was General Babtie. That commission met and reported. We have heard a great deal in this House about the Babtie Commission report. It is an exceedingly fair report, and is in every way considerate of Colonel Bruce. It disagrees with him in certain essentials, but—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not let the public see it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was laid on the Table. Let us see this report about which we have heard so much.

Mr. CANNON: Is it numbered as a Sessional Paper?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot say. A number of copies were laid on the table of the House in 1917—I think some forty copies—all we had. This one I got from the Prime Minister's secretary. The report has been made public and I will read the essential portions of it to-night.

Mr. CANNON: What about the answer of Colonel Bruce?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Colonel Bruce made no official answer, as far as I am aware. The Prime Minister stated that the report which Dr. Bruce made was not an official report. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in 1917, said—page 4954 of Hansard:

> On various occasions some hon. gentlemen have expressed their desire that a memorandum made by Colonel Bruce with respect to matters set forth in a report of the commission of which General Sir William Babtie was chairman, shall be laid upon the table of the House. I have given the matter the best consideration that I could, and I do not think it is a document which ought to be laid on the table of the House by the Government. It is not an official report, as Colonel Bruce was not requested or empowered by any competent authority to make the memorandum in question.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it not a communication addressed to the Government, or officials of the Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have never seen it, and consequently I am unable to answer. I am reading simply what the Prime Minister said to the House in 1917.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Are we to understand that it is not official because he was not instructed to make a report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He was not empowered to make it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Wasn't Dr. Bruce at liberty to make a reply to Dr. Babtie without being requested by the Government to do so?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That might be, and yet his reply might not be an official report which the Prime Minister might feel called upon to lay on the Table.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Considering that Colonel Bruce was dismissed after his first report, would it not be an act of courtesy on the part of the Government to receive his defence?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not aware personally that Colonel Bruce was dismissed. It is news to me if he was dismissed; besides, I have not seen his report at all. I have read to the House the words of the Prime Minister dealing with it. Now, the board was constituted of the members I have mentioned, and was instructed to report as quickly as possible on the following points:

> (a) The criticisms made by Colonel Bruce: as to whether they are justified, in whole or in part.
> (b) The recommendations made by Colonel Bruce; as to whether the Board endorses and concurs in them; if not, in what respect does the Board differ from Colonel Bruce, and its reasons therefore.

The report goes on to state:

> It will be convenient to summarize here the principal points emerging from Colonel Bruce's report. These are:—
> (a) The concentration of Canadian sick and wounded in Canadian hospitals.
> Before offering any general remarks on these topics, the Board thinks it right to explain that up to February, 1916, the accepted policy was to provide special hospital establishments for Canadian patients; that about that date, owing to various considerations, practical and sentimental, it was determined, with the consent of the War Office, to deal with Canadian patients in the same fashion as British patients are dealt with, that is, by distributing them through the United Kingdom to the great series of central hospitals, each with its group of affiliated auxiliaries.

That is Colonel Bruce:

> —the latter system is condemned, and a return to the policy of Canadian hospitals for Canadian sick and wounded advocated. The issue is a fair one, for there is much to be said on both sides, but the board after very careful consideration, has come to the conclusion that the policy therein recommended is not only unwise, but impracticable, having regard to the amount of accommodation that would be required owing to the increase of Canadian troops in Europe.
> All through the report of the Inspector General the dominating idea is a conception that the Canadian Expeditionary Force is something separate and apart from the Imperial Army, a conception that may be summarized as the "water-tight compartment" policy in matters medical. The board is of opinion that as long as the Canadian Expeditionary Force forms an integral part of the Imperial Army, such a view is no more possible in the United Kingdom than it is in France, and so long as Canadian troops continue to operate under the command of the Commander-in-Chief, British Expeditionary Force, it must continue to be impossible to discriminate in the medical arrangements of Canadian and British troops. The personal experience of the majority of the members of the board amply confirms this view, so far as the arrangements at the French front and at the overseas bases are concerned, and the board has satisfied itself that it would be inadvisable to attempt separation on the return of the sick and wounded to the United Kingdom.

It appears to the board that to separate, on their return to England, men who have fought side by side, must tend to undo the bond of brotherhood sealed in the face of the enemy. The board is aware that these considerations of high policy do not strictly come within its purview, but cannot refrain from adverting to this aspect of the matter, because it would almost appear as if the report under consideration was based upon the conception that the Canadian Forces had a similar relation to the British Armies as that held by the Allied nations.

The policy that the board ventures to attribute to Colonel Bruce would have prevented the use of Canadian Medical Units in the Mediterranean, because Canadian troops did not happen to be employed in that theatre of war, and the sending of Canadian hospitals to Paris for the use of the French sick and wounded.

The board, too, is at variance with the contention that the services of the Canadian Army Medical Corps should in the main be confined to Canadian troops; Field Ambulances serve primarily the Canadian formations, but in the case of the Line of Communication units, their work must, of necessity, be largely with other than Canadian troops. This aspect of the case, it is fair to say, was repudiated by the Inspector General when placed before him.

The board feels bound to place on record that in some of the opinions——expressed by Colonel Bruce he is misled by a lack of intimate knowledge of army organization and of the inter-relation of the various branches of the service, as, in some of his criticisms he has failed to make allowance for the sudden expansion of the army and for the unavoidable want of specialized training in its ancillary services. Such imperfections as have existed are rapidly being remedied, and it is plain truth to say that in no war in history has sickness been so well controlled or the sick and wounded so well cared for. The board, relying on its own observations and the evidence laid before it, is abundantly satisfied that the Canadian sick and wounded have been thoroughly well cared for, not only in the Central hospitals, whether British or Canadian, but in the Voluntary Aid Hospitals, which Colonel Bruce criticises. These latter hospitals are the outcome of a mobilization of the medical resources of the United Kingdom, and in them Canadian soldiers are not only well cared for professionally but are comfortable, happy, and at home. The board desires to emphasize its dissent from the criticisms of these institutions, which it believes to be unjust and undeserved.

In some of the opinions.

Then the report goes on:

The other principal issue raised in the report of the Inspector General, the system of Medical Boards, is dealt with in detail hereafter, and the board agrees that there is much justice in the criticisms levelled at the complicated arrangements that have been permitted to grow up. With the reorganization proposed, the board is unable to concur, and has ventured, as the result of the combined experience of its members, to suggest a system that it believes to be simple and likely to be practical in operation.

There is no violent attack upon Colonel Bruce in this report. The report recognizes the good features of Colonel Bruce's report and agrees with certain of his criticisms. They do not agree with him as to the practicability of confining Canadian troops to Canadian hospitals having regard to the conditions prevailing at the front and the limited hospital accommodation at the time in Great Britain. The report goes on:

The Board does not concur in Colonel Bruce's view that a complete reorganization from "top to bottom" of the Canadian Army Medical Service is necessary. In its opinion the reforms he suggests would not remedy the defects he deplores, which are not due to the system but to inexperience on the part of officers, military and medical, and to defaults in administration which are commented upon in the detailed criticisms that the board has felt it its duty to record.

Then the board goes on to pay a tribute to the good work done by Surgeon-General Jones and his staff under circumstances of novelty and great difficulty.

The Board has not hesitated to criticise those matters, wherein, in its opinion, the Director of Medical Services has failed, but does so with great reluctance, for it is satisfied that much of what has been accomplished has been the result of his zeal and industry, while the good relations of the Imperial and Canadian services are largely due to the tactful performance of the many delicate duties that fell to his lot.

After dealing in detail with the question of the distribution of casualties and the concentration of hospitals, and pointing out that it is impracticable to earmark and collect Canadian casualties at the base in France, and that it would be difficult and inconvenient to direct them solely to Canadian hospitals in England, they go on to point out:

The special advantages that Colonel Bruce claims for a policy of concentration can be attained with existing arrangements, which are sufficiently extensive to permit of the utilization of the special skill of Canadian physicians and surgeons in all branches of medicine and surgery.

There are twenty thousand Canadian soldiers in hospital in the United Kingdom to-day, and the provision of special Canadian hospitals for them all would necessitate additional accommodation for nine thousand, and even this would not allow a margin for battle casualties. Of this number, the board is informed that between two and three thousand are being provided for by special arrangements with the Ontario Government and the Red Cross, and there are a large number of patients now in the United Kingdom who the board agrees should be returned to Canada, as they are unlikely to be fit for general service within a reasonable period.

The board cannot agree that there is a lack of efficient medical inspection in hospitals, but, while not reflecting on the efficiency of these inspections, the board agrees with Colonel Bruce and Surgeon-General Jones that additional inspection of Canadian hospitals, and of Canadian patients in British hospitals throughout the United Kingdom, is desirable, from a Canadian standpoint.

The report also makes the observation:

The comments made in Colonel Bruce's report on the V.A.D. Hospitals have been widely resented, and this Board is of opinion that these strictures are unjustified and regrettable. While the Board agrees with Colonel Bruce that patients could sometimes be more advantageously treated in, and more speedily evacuated from, large military hospitals, the advantages of the V.A.D. system should not be overlooked in this regard. In these hospitals the board found the Canadian patient well fed, comfortable and happy, and receiving an amount of care that is only possible in institutions organized on the line of "the home." This has been an enormous asset in the case of soldiers widely separated from their kith and kin.

Then there is this extract:

The Board disagrees with Colonel Bruce and is strongly of the opinion that the forces and resources of the Empire must be pooled to the utmost in this struggle, and that, therefore, interchange of personnel is desirable and necessary, in the interests of both services.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I ask the minister to explain where the question of responsibility would come in?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to what?

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the officers are going to be distributed, as stated, where would the question of responsibility come in?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not enough technical information to answer my hon. friend, but without agreeing with Colonel Bruce that inspection is necessary, I have no doubt it would be possible, under a proper organization, to maintain a measure of supervision over Canadian soldiers in V.A.D. hospitals. The situation, as I understood it when I was over there in 1916 was that the V.A.D. hospitals were absolutely needed. I am speaking from memory, but I am positive the number was 53,000 in V.A.D. hospitals, the equivalent of 53 hospitals with an accommodation of 1,000 each.

With reference to the remarks of Colonel Bruce that "the present Medical Board situation is a disgrace to the Canadian Army Medical Corps," and that "Medical Board work has often degenerated into a farce," the Board thinks it right to begin their comments on this section by remarking that on examination Colonel Bruce agreed that the use of the words first quoted were unjustifiable and had little or no application to the part taken by the Canadian Army Medical Corps in carrying out the procedure prescribed for them.

The Board agrees that there is a necessity for reformation in the Medical Board situation and in the classification of casualties, and is of opinion that an easy solution of the problem would be to adopt the British system so far as applicable.

Then with regard to the matter of records:

The criticisms made by Colonel Bruce are generally agreed to by the Board, which, however, would point out that they are of universal application and apply to all Medical Services in all wars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to read further from the report. I have dealt with the essential features of its criticisms, unfavourable and favourable, of Colonel Bruce's report. But I desire to make this point again. There has been a misunderstanding of Colonel Bruce's report and of the inquiry held by the Babtie Commission. My personal view is that it is a case where medical authorities differ, as frequently happens. They differed upon the important point whether it was practicable to carry into effect the recommendations of Colonel Bruce with regard to the assembling of the Canadian sick and wounded exclusively, or so far as possible, in Canadian hospitals.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. minister give us the dates of the Bruce report and the Babtie report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend the date of the Bruce report, but I think it would be October, 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: September and October, 1916.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Babtie Commission's report is dated 22nd December, 1916. Whatever was done was done in absolute good faith and to meet an exceedingly difficult practical situation which confronted Sir George Perley. He agreed with many of the proposals put forward by Colonel Bruce, but in the face of the adverse opinion of many of the Canadian Army Medical Service and of the doubt as to the practicability of carrying the proposals into effect, Sir George Perley felt justified in asking to be advised by a commission of experts who had had practical experience. That is all there is in the matter. In order that I may not by any possibility be misunderstood, I desire to say that I know Dr. Bruce to be a man of the highest professional ability, that he entered upon his work in all good faith, and that he made valuable findings, with most of which, so far as I was able to judge, I was in agreement. The question was: Could they be carried into effect? And in the situation which I have described—and I think fairly described, because it developed quite naturally—the course taken by Sir George Perley was one for which I think he should not be criticized, to say the least. Whether the findings of the Babtie report are sound in all particulars, I am unable to say. I think to-day in England and on the Continent among authorities in the Canadian Army Medical Service and the Imperial Army Medical Service a difference of opinion would be found. Doctors differ; they differ in hospital practice, and they differ in military practice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with all the charges brought forward by General Smart, and I submit that, on his own admissions and on what I have placed before the House to-night, they are without foundation. It does not appear to me that any purpose connected with national interests could be served by an investigation of the findings of the Babtie Commission or of the situation that existed in England from 1916 down to the present with regard to the concentration or the disposal of our Canadian sick and wounded soldiers. There are no charges brought against the integrity of any person. At most there was a difference of opinion, which Sir George Perley tried to resolve by the appointment of a commission of experts.

With reference to the laying upon the Table of Colonel Bruce's report and the report of the Babtie Commission, I find that on the 7th of February, 1917, the Prime Minister laid both upon the table of the House.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does the hon. minister say it was printed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I thought it was; I am unable to say.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Was a printed copy laid upon the Table? It was not ordered to be printed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is the most innocuous report I have ever read, having regard to the amount of criticism it has undergone in this House. If any hon. member wants to see this report of the Babtie Commission that I have in my hand —it is the only copy I have—

Mr. VIEN: Would it not be well to have it printed in Hansard?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is pretty long. It will be sufficient to just put in the extracts I have quoted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the reply of Dr. Bruce?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Dr. Bruce's report is there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To complete the whole record.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not add the Jenkins report at the same time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have taken longer than I intended, Mr. Speaker, but I do feel that it is desirable that this question should be discussed in order that hon. members may be in possession of all the facts. The charges which have been made appear to me to be exceptionally objectionable, the more so by reason of the fact that those against whom they are directed are not in a position to defend themselves. Sir Edward Kemp will be in Canada within the next few weeks, he will be able to attend the present session, and I can promise the House that once he is in his place he will not refuse to answer any questions that may be asked him touching his administration overseas. I do not know any more capable administrator than Sir Edward Kemp, nor any man who has more unreservedly devoted himself to the onerous duties of his office during all the years of the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. minister ask Sir Edward Kemp to bring with him the Jenkins report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall take that into consideration. I never heard of the Jenkins report until the other day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am sorry. You will hear of it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly. Just a word as to Sir George Perley.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Why don't you read it? You have got it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. I am told that Dr. Jenkins is awaiting the pleasure of the Government.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Why don't you read it yourself?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Sir George Perley, my former colleague, who is now Canadian High Commissioner in London, during this war has rendered service to this country upon which it would be difficult to place too high a value. I have been in almost daily cable communication with him during the war upon all manner of subjects, and I can confidently say that he is without exception the most capable business man that I have ever had communication with respecting important subjects. His efficiency is of the highest possible character. Any matter that has been entrusted to him has been handled promptly, efficiently, and in a way to reflect the highest credit upon himself and his office.

I do not believe that the burdens which are cast upon these men in war time are generally realized. I think it is not too much to say that Sir Edward Kemp and Sir George Perley literally worked day and night during this war. They have had exceedingly heavy responsibilities. They would be the last to ask for any sympathy on that account; I certainly do not ask it for them. But when charges are made against men discharging the important duties that they have been and are now discharging in our national affairs, they should be capable of complete substantiation, and, it seems to me, should first be brought to the attention of those against whom they are made in order that opportunity of answering them may be afforded. We have come through the war, but we are in the midst of the most critical conditions ever known in Canada or in the world. These men are burdened with day-to-day duties, and it seems to me that it is unfair to overburden them with obtaining information on all manner of subjects in order to answer charges made against them in their positions overseas.

Lt.-General Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the matter which has been brought to the attention of the House, namely the charges of General Smart, Colonel Pratt, and Colonel Price, for the simple reason that I have not yet had the privilege of reading their letters or their speeches. I missed the papers containing the reports and have not since obtained them. In any event, I shall not enter into a discussion of these things tonight.

I congratulate the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) on the very plausible statement he has made in regard to the Babtie and Bruce reports. I watched for these reports in this House, and tried to find out whether they had been laid on the Table. I went to the committee room and endeavoured to ascertain if the reports had been laid on the Table in order that I might see the Babtie report; but whether they were laid on the Table or not I have never yet been able to obtain—and I tried twice—a sight of either. I have the Bruce report but I have not the Babtie report; and the Bruce reply to the Babtie report has not yet been published. If the Acting Prime Minister were actuated by a spirit of fair play, as he professes to be, he would have seen that the Bruce reply to the Babtie report was presented to the House to-night. He knows that it is in existence; he knows that it is within his reach. Why the Babtie report is presented here to-night and the Bruce reply thereto is not presented passes my comprehension.

The Acting Prime Minister has stated that he is sorry those who make these charges do not run to Messrs. Perley and Kemp and to the officers at the front with their complaints with regard to maladministration and so on. But has the Acting Prime Minister himself been in the habit of doing this? Has he gone direct to men against whom complaints were made—men who were within his reach? I am afraid that the policy has been that the matter has gone in whispers when the gentleman to whom such a report might be communicated was within easy reach. Side-stepping and choosing the back-door way has been the policy of these gentlemen.

I do not agree in the slightest that Sir George Perley is a great business man. I had experience with him from the start in the war. One of the first things that met me in 1914 when I reached England was that concurrently with the arrival of the Canadian Corps, Sir George Perley, in conjunction with Harrod's and Sir Edward Ward, had made an arrangement to tax Canadian officers large sums daily for their rationing at Salisbury Plains. I had rationed the boys for twenty-five cents a day at Valcartier, and they were well rationed; but they were being charged, if I remember aright, seven and six pence, or something of that kind, on Salisbury Plains. I declined to accede to the business arrangements made by Sir George Perley, and two shillings a day, I think, was all I allowed officers to pay for rations in addition to the rations supplied. I could point to scores of other business transactions of a similar nature on the part of that hon. gentleman in connection with the force. So far as I could form a conclusion they all gravitated around the society influences of London, not around that which would benefit the Canadian service.

So far as Sir Edward Kemp is concerned, I have nothing to say with regard to his administration, as I was not there. But I was somewhat surprised to see that the policy now theoretically advanced by the Acting Prime Minister in regard to the criticism of other officers has not been carried out by the Government in regard to General Smart, Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price. These three gentlemen are personal friends of mine; three good Tories, I am proud to say; three loyal men; three men who have served the country faithfully and well. Whether their criticism is right or wrong I am not saying, because I have not read the reports; possibly I do not know the details of them, anyway. But whether they are right or wrong, there has been a persistent attempt on the part of every Government newspaper, on the part of every Government propaganda, on the part of every Government camouflage, on the part of hon. gentlemen in this House, to belittle the standards of these gentlemen. That is not in conformity with the principle of manly fair-play that you would expect to exist between one Britisher and another. General Smart was one of the finest administrators it has ever been my privilege to meet. A year or two before the outbreak of the war I visited the camp at Farnham, of which he was in command at that time, and I found that there had been a smallpox scare, and some of the "stores" people were complaining that he had ruthlessly burned tents and blankets. I said: "What did you do in the matter, Smart?" He said: "I was requested by the Quartermaster General's department to hold an inquiry to ascertain whether or not these blankets were infected. I became satisfied, from the information of the medical officers, that the men who had slept on these blankets had had smallpox, so I burned the blankets first, and now we will hold an inquiry afterwards." A proper administrator was Colonel Smart then; a proper administrator, I venture to say, was General Smart in England.

As to the hint that General Smart was sent back from the front, it is not manly to send abroad the impression that there has been an attempt to create here to-day, namely, that General Smart was sent home from France because of incompetency or something of that kind. A cavalry regiment consists of about six or seven hundred men; a battalion of infantry has upwards of a thousand men. You can easily understand that five battalions of infantry would not fit into a line with five regiments of cavalry; so we decided to break one of the cavalry divisions up and divide it into infantry battalions. Accordingly, some commanding officers were disposed of. General Smart was not given the command of a brigade as he had expected, and he felt aggrieved. However, he was taken ill about that time—remember, he had served a considerable time in France before this, and had served valiantly and well. He is rather an outspoken man, and I do not know whether he would win the approval of those in the highest authority or not. He was not the type of man who would win the approval of those who did not want to hear the truth.

I would point out to the Acting Prime Minister and to this House that the whole trouble from start to finish in the administration of Sir George Perley—and I believe it is carried on more or less at the present time —is the suppression of facts. The Baptie report was published broadcast; the Bruce reply to that report was not published. Statements were made from time to time in the press in regard to inquiries into the Rhyl mutiny and all that sort of thing, and the public have had no facts given to them. Let us say an inquiry is proposed in connection with something in the Old Country. I can give the Minister of Finance and the House the result of one inquiry regarding charges made as to malfeasance in connection with one of the departmental subordinates who had been manipulating supplies for the benefit of certain officers. The senior officer against whom the charge was made took the matter up, and I have a letter written by an officer stating: "I have just been in consultation with the Minister of Militia overseas and we have Major So-and-So,"—the officer named who preferred the charge—"fixed, and he will go to France." That was the punishment inflicted on those medical men who stood out and demanded that there should be no malfeasance in any of the camps. While I was Minister of Militia, we had this sort of thing to deal with, and three times in succession the officer in charge of Taplow hospital sent men to the front line trenches because they had refused to be parties to manipulating to their own ends supplies destined for the men. This sort of thing went on and it has gone on since then. When the Jenkins report is produced —and there is or was a Jenkins report— it will show that end of the case up much more clearly than ever was dreamed of in the old days.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend know for what purpose Jenkins was appointed?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I really do not know. The first I heard of his report was when the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) asked a question about the "Jenkins report." I made inquiries and I found out about it from the boys, because any fellow coming home can tell all about it. There is no secret about the Rhyl riots. I have talked with two of the ringleaders in the Kinmel riots who have returned home hale and hearty, and they have no hesitation in giving the facts. The statement is openly made by officers that the cause of the riots in the Rhyl camp was a cablegram sent by the Government of Canada to the overseas military authorities not to send any more troops out, to cancel the steamers because they could not get the men away by rail and could not demobilize them quickly enough in Canada. And this is confirmed by a statement made by Sir Edward Kemp the other day at the same public dinner to which the minister referred when he spoke of this love feast between Turner and Currie and Perley and Kemp and the whole gang of them—I do not know at what period of the dinner it occurred — that the Canadian authorities were wrong in seeking to keep back the demobilization of the men; that his, Kemp's policy from the beginning has been to shove them over, but that he had been held up by the authorities in Canada.

Major-General MEWBURN: Does the hon. gentleman make the statement that a cablegram was sent overseas to stop demobilization?

Major-General MEWBURN: I say distinctly that no such cablegram was sent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Then all I have to say is that the Minister of Militia should deal with his colleague overseas, Sir Edward Kemp. Moreover, I want to point out this fact, that the night when the 8,000 boys at Rhyl had been ordered to get ready to go to Liverpool, and the order came cancelling that, a Canadian officer who was in touch with the Admiralty was informed by the Admiralty that night that the ships were not going to sail, and the Canadian officer stated to the Admiralty officer: "Then there will be a riot." The Admiralty officer handed him a memorandum and said: "Do not blame the British authorities; blame the Canadian Government." I was not there but I have every confidence that that is absolutely true, and also that some instructions were sent by some one in the Government of Canada to stop these troops from coming home. I am not finding fault with that. But that is not the way to deal with the men; let the men demobilize themselves, and let us put a stop to this eternal spoon-feeding of the men. I am not criticising especially; I am merely stating the facts.

As regards General Turner and Argyll House, I have not one word to say against General Turner except that he was compelled to give up his command at the front, where he should have remained in command of a Canadian corps, and to come back to England where it would be an utter impossibility for any man to carry on the administration as he was expected to carry it on.

As to the harmony existing between Canada and England, I know nothing further than that I could, if I chose, make some revelations. All was not smooth sailing between Canada and England after the dual control was created; but a love feast was held last year, whereby the friction which had been going on between the Canadians in Britain and the Canadians in France was smoothed over as far as possible for the time being, but every one in the force knows about the bad feeling that existed then. Why should those men communicate to the public the charges against the people of Argyll House? This is the place to make charges, and if the people of Argyll House, or the ministers, feel aggrieved they have every opportunity of setting forth the facts in this House. All these reports and copies of the cables cancelling the sailings of those ships should be tabled. Then the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) could read them, and if he found he was misinformed he could have refrained from bringing in his motion and wasting the time of the House as has been done to-day. I wish to point out that while I was minister there was an order: Let the clear light of day get in on these things, and then we shall know where we are at.

I have on the Order Paper motions which, before the end of the session, I shall discuss in chief and without any equivocation. These motions deal with much that has been discussed here to-day, and I shall, therefore, not detain the House on the present occasion, but I will say this as regards the Bruce report. When war broke out we went overseas, we found everything under the control of the British War Office, and I was amazed to find it stated in the Babtie report that it was advisable that there should be Imperial control of the medical services. That is what I fought against in regard to every service during 1914, 1915 and 1916 while I was overseas. So far as the British Government is concerned, the moment anything was referred to them they understood the situation; but when one came to the subordinate military officers no one could be found who was not anxious to grasp and control everything. When I went overseas first as Minister of Militia of the Dominion of Canada I was not even recognized by General Alderson as having any say in connection with the force. Lord Kitchener himself, as I pointed out before in the House, said to me: "You do not claim any control over these troops, do you?" I said: "None excepting what the law allows." Sir George Perley said to me: "You do not pretend to have anything to do with these soldiers, do you?" I told him I was not aware that he was thoroughly posted on military questions and I did not want to discuss the matter with him. When Lord Kitchener asked me what control the law allowed, I referred him to Section 177 which is the one that deals particularly with troops such as we were sending over, that is, where a colony raises and pays for her own troops in the field.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the Army Act?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. I have brought that up half a dozen times in this House. The British law says that a colony raising and maintaining her own troops in the field is supreme with those troops as regards making every appointment from the highest to the lowest, and in the management of those troops in the field except as regards the direction of the Commander in Chief of the British Army. Under the law the British authorities have no control direct or indirect of the training at Salisbury. Under the law they have no control of the rationing of provisions or supplies. Under the law they have no control over discarding wagons and harness and saddlery and things of that kind, all of the very best and unused. At Salisbury we had no say. I took the matter into my own hands the next year, and over-rode them completely. When the Canadian troops left Salisbury Plain, they left millions of dollars' worth of Canadian material piled up there in the mud that had been discarded by the British and supplanted by other equipment. They discarded our trucks costing from $1,800 to $2,400 apiece. They said we had three different kinds of trucks, and they could not get supplies for them in France. They supplied us with 51 trucks of seven different kinds; the details are all on Hansard, I have given them time and again. These fifty-one trucks cost us fifty-five thousand pounds sterling, or a little over twice the price we had paid for just as good a truck.

I challenge any one to name one solitary item of equipment of any description that these subordinates of the British War Office did not attempt to throw out at the beginning of that campaign, and supplant with their own equipment.

It was the same with the Pay Corps. While I was over there in 1914 I received a cable from Canada: "Are the Canadians in action?" I wired back "No" and a cable came back from my home county saying that so-and-so, a British reservist who went over with the Canadians, was reported killed. I looked the matter up and found that he had been drawing his pay up to a day or two before I looked at the record. And yet the British record showed that he had been killed in Flanders. We had muster parades then, and at the first parade a thousand men who were reported to be present were absent. We wiped out the British system of pay, and I put General Carson in charge. All I could get from the Canadian Minister of Finance and the Canadian Cabinet for General Carson was that he should "look after supplies," but I managed to slip in the words "and for other purposes." That is all I could get after a bitter fight. The whole thing was kow-towing to these subordinate officers of the British War Office who wanted to run the whole Canadian show. I said: We will run our own pay service, and put a stop to these fellows carrying money around in valises which very often got lost. We put a stop to that, and had every man paid by cheque. From that time on, although the Minister of Finance was worrying his great brain about the condition of affairs in England, on the financial side, when he came back from that famous trip to England with the Auditor General, he was forced to admit that he found the pay system perfect in every way from start to finish.

We were being charged two prices for our supplies. I wiped that out ruthlessly. I did not ask permission of the Canadian Government, because I knew it would take six months to get their consent. It took three months to get Max Aitken, the greatest man in the Empire, one who has done more to win this war than any other man living, appointed an officer. The objections came from here, not yonder. I will say this much: Lloyd George, Kitchener, Bonar Law, all recognized the rights of Canada at once. Section 177 was taken as the standard, and we were treated by them as an independent entity, subject only to the commander-in-chief.

in charge, and everything went smoothly and well; but it was an up-hill fight. The medical service was run on British lines in the same way as the pay service and the transport service had been, all being run by subordinate officers in the British service. That was done away with. Our Canadian men who knew more about transport in five minutes than these men had known in a lifetime had to take the advice of young sprigs from the War Office.

I also objected to the canteen system over there, and wanted to follow our practice in Canada, where each battalion runs its own canteen. I was politely told by a British officer—you never saw anything to equal the politeness of these grafters—that this was a matter wholly within British control, that contracts had been let, and that these people could charge our fellows what they wanted. We soon regulated that, but it was an up-hill fight.

The next step taken was in connection with the medical service. I was not satisfied with it when I went over there in 1914. I was satisfied with the men, mark you, because no finer body of men, no equal body of men ever donned the uniform of a medical officer in this or any other country. When the Minister of Finance says that one of our universities was talking of withdrawing their unit, why was he not fair enough to say that the plan proposed was to divide these university men up amongst the different hospitals, so that instead of one hospital having four or five or six men from the best university in Canada wasting their time in one hospital their services could be utilized in other hospitals helping the more inexperienced men? I challenge comparison between the Bruce and Babtie reports. I will back the Bruce report every day in the week, and every week in the year. I challenge any one outside of the V.A.D. and the society organizations that wanted to keep these hand-holders and brow-rubbers going, to find a solitary word against the Bruce report that is worthy of consideration.

I want to speak of the Medical Service. In 1915 when I was over there I went to review a battalion, and only 300 out of 1,000 men turned up. I inquired the cause, and was told that they were convalescing here and there around the camp. I asked what the mischief convalescing men were doing around there. These men were doing no good to themselves nor to the men in training when they were allowed to convalesce around the camp in that way; so we had the convalescents gathered in central camps, and arranged in fifteen different grades, so that when a man stepped out of the fifteenth grade he was fit to take his place in the line against the Germans the next morning. The result was that instead of returning only about thirty per cent of our wounded, within a certain period we returned sixty-five per cent, which is nearly double the percentage ever shown by any other force in the world. That saved the country millions of dollars.

What else did we find? I asked General Jones, for the Prime Minister, then in England, for a list of hospitals where Canadian wounded were the first morning I arrived in England. Nearly three weeks later I got it. One week-end I was taking a run out into the country to call on some of these hospital people, and in Oxford I found sixty Canadians wounded, and not a solitary report from General Jones on these men. I went on to Cheltenham, Aberystwith, and to Cardiff, where 200 were reported to be present, and I found only three. General Jones' report was not worth the paper it was written on. The next year, in 1916, I found that a great many of our men were teetotally lost. However, I will not go into that aspect of the case further than to say this: I asked, with the authority of the Canadian Government, that Colonel Bruce should be appointed with a good strong committee of the most capable men to report upon the whole situation, and his report stands there.

The society influence around London has had a detrimental effect in this respect, but they have been forced to accept almost every recommendation he made in that report, and have adopted it to-day, I see, with the exception of these society influences around London. I shall not enter into that aspect of the matter to-night, as perhaps it may come again. At that time I went out of office. Colonel Bruce was not continued in office by the Canadian Government, but through the influence of friends, of whom I have the honour to be one, he was given service in the British army and his work was well recognized and has redounded to the credit of himself besides being of great advantage to the British army. But if his report had been carried out the men would have had the service of these splendid medical men who were wasted to a certain extent, being duplicated instead of being more generally distributed among the hospitals. As regards the segregation of these men, there is a society aspect that I shall not touch on at the present time, but which was a strong influence in preventing the segregation of Canadians in Canadian hospitals. So far as the V.A.D.'s are concerned, Dr. Bruce objected to them because of their total inexperience, lack of proper supervision and isolation. We were paying seventy-five cents a day for the untrained nursing of our soldiers, and the British soldiers were getting our highly trained nurses, and were only paying seventy-five cents a day, which was unfair. I remember one morning the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), who occupied your place for a time to-night, sent me a telegram stating that the mother of a soldier had spoken to him in regard to her son, who was in Welsh hospital and had written her a letter saying that he was dying, and would like to be taken to a Canadian hospital. The hon. member wired me to know if I could do anything in the matter. Within twenty-six hours we were notified by Gen. Carson that the boy had been taken from the Welsh hospital, where he did not understand the language, to a Canadian hospital; and three weeks later we received a second telegram saying that he was absolutely restored. I could give thousands of instances where boys cabled to be removed, and when I was in England they begged me, scores of times, to send them to Canadian hospitals where they would be among friends and not total strangers. There was a question of administration. Colonel Bruce undertook to hunt up lost cases, and it was found that there were seven hundred that were absolutely lost sight of. The medical department had totally lost them, but they turned up in less than a week, and hundreds more every week thereafter. Hundreds were lying around England that should have been sent home. There was no suppression of facts then, and wherever an officer was found to be negligent, or where it was discovered that there was anything wrong, we wanted matters remedied as quickly as possible, whether or not any one was hurt. Of course, we did as little as we possibly could to hurt any one, and if any excuses were offered we were willing to listen to them; but we took pains to see that the work was properly done. If not, those who were at fault had to make place for others. I shall not enter upon anything of a controversial nature.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has spoken of Brigadier-General Smart. Can he give us his opinion as regards Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am sorry I forgot Colonel Pratt. A seemingly confidential report has appeared in the Ottawa papers against Colonel Pratt. I do not for a moment think that the Minister of Militia and Defence in Canada would permit a report of that kind to get out, but it has got out. What are the facts of the case? Colonel Pratt offered to go over in any capacity in order that he might fight. He was too old and so they put him in a command at Dunkirk.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He raised his regiment?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. He had no military experience. But ninety-nine per cent of our boys had had no military experience, and some who had military experience were not too ready to go to the front, and so we took men like Colonel Pratt who was anxious to go. The point I want to make is that Colonel Pratt was at Dunkirk. The senior officer did not like Colonel Pratt's energetic, free and easy Canadian way, and so spoke of it. But when this old gentleman got into trouble with the Chinese coolies, Colonel Pratt undertook to handle these fellows, and in less than three hours he had restored peace among these five thousand Chinese and saved the butchery of a lot of Chinamen because they got scared at the shelling of the German guns. The senior officer was practically helpless. I do not think anything can be said that is too complimentary of Colonel Pratt's work in this war. When I was a member of this House twenty-five or thirty years ago, I found that sneaking reports could be made by divisional officers, some of whom held their positions because they could not earn their own living at anything else. These reports could be put in against a man, and the officer would not see them. I fought session after session until I forced the Minister of Militia and Defence to see that no adverse reports should be made against any officer by a senior unless a copy of the report was signed by the officer. I have never heard, directly or indirectly, one word derogatory of Colonel Pratt, and if this officer at Dunkirk has passed any such report, he has violated all the rules of honour. Colonel Pratt is impulsive, but it is the impulsive and daredevil men who do great deeds and not the easy-going men. I have never heard any criticism of Colonel Price. He is a gentleman of the city of Toronto and raised a splendid battalion. Military men are somewhat like preachers and doctors. I remember once having heard an old lady say that if you want to get into the good graces of a preacher you must disparage his rival. The same truth applies to military men. Tell a military man that he is a much greater soldier than Colonel So-and-so, and he is highly pleased, and there is a great deal of that sort of thing going on in the military service.

An hon. MEMBER: It is human philosophy.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It may be, but it is cowardice. I have studied the characters of Canadian soldiers, and while some have faults and weaknesses, I do not think you can find better officers and men, taking them altogether than the Canadians at the front.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): After hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), I have come to the conclusion that Canada owes him a great debt of gratitude. He has saved us from the ravages of Imperialism, and has been able to go to the highest authorities in Great Britain and tell them that the Canadian soldiers were entitled to certain things, and to get them. I have always had a high opinion of my friend, the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and I take this opportunity of expressing it to him in the House. He has said, very properly I think, that the answer of Colonel Bruce to the Babtie report should have been taken cognizance of by the Government, and tabled. Colonel Bruce, who was a good soldier and a good medical man, made a certain report, eighty per cent of which is approved by the Acting Prime Minister; yet, the Government profess to have heard nothing from ever about certain aspersions cast upon him. Almost every one else has heard about them. It should have been the duty of the Minister of Militia, or of the Acting Prime Minister, to have inquired into this matter.

I listened very carefully during the whole course of the speech of the hon. Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn) I have always found him to be very frank on all questions in regard to which I have had dealings with him, and he was almost equally frank this afternoon. In making his answer to the Smart Pratt charges, he stated, in almost every case that he did not know. Every time some hon. member asked him for some information, the minister would say: Overseas knows; I do not. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the co-operation of which the minister was so proud this afternoon can hardly have existed to the extent which he boasted. If it does exist the minister should at any rate have more information from the other side. I think that, in this Parliament of Canada, we should have some one able to answer any questions we may ask in regard to our boys at the front, their treatment, and the general conduct of the war. I am not intending this as any great criticism of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia; as I said before, I have the greatest respect for him. But, constitutionally, some one should be in this Canadian House of Parliament to answer questions. I think that to a great extent the Minister of Militia is suffering from some of the faults of his immediate predecessor, and perhaps a little also for the faults—for he had some—of his former predecessor. Therefore, while giving him all the credit I can, I am simply making the statement that perhaps if he had been more ready to stand up like his predecessor and say to the people in England, and to the overseas ministers: "I want this done; I want it quick and I want you to ruthlessly cut off any expenditure"—and if he had carried on, in a word, as his predecessor did, we would have had greater satisfaction in this House.

To sum up the answers to the charges made by General Smart and Colonel Pratt, I have found them, as given both by the Minister of Militia and the Acting Prime Minister, to be to a large extent these: General Smart does not know anything about it; Colonel Pratt does not know anything about it; these men should not have carried on this way; they should have come to us and told us about it; we are the people they should have come to instead of going and telling the people of Canada that the boys were badly treated at the front. Is that the answer that is wanted? Is that the answer that the House of Commons is entitled to from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia? It is no answer to say that General Smart remained in England and that he was only 72 days in France. From the fact that these charges concern England, and England alone, General Smart would be in a better position to know something of the hospital administration there than if he had been in France for four years. The same thing would apply to Colonel Pratt. It is no answer whatever to say that these officers, both of whom had excellent records, did not go to France. One of them, we are told, offered to revert in order to go to the front. The other one was prevented, on account of the organization of the unit to which he belonged, and he later offered to revert to the rank of Colonel in order to proceed to France. It was found that there was no place for him as a colonel in the Expeditionary Force in France. If he was not fit to be a colonel in the Expeditionary Forces, why is it that they kept him as a general training our Canadian troops?

To come to the main question, I have no doubt that had any complaints reached the Minister of Militia when he was in England he would have done his very best to remedy them. But it is not the custom in the army —it has never been the custom, and it is something which has been greatly discouraged—for army officers to go over the heads of their military superiors and make complaints. If they did make complaints, as happened in this case, if they did divulge some of the knowledge which they are presumed to have, we would find, as in this case, that they would be attacked by every sheet that is Government owned and Government controlled. In this case they are told that even their private lives will be exposed and that their conduct is discreditable. These men who have served in France must not, at the risk of their own reputations, or advancement, make any charges or statements.

In so far as the medical services are concerned, I was an orderly in that service myself, and I have nothing but praise for my gallant comrades, those men who, under fire of the worst possible description—stretcher bearers, doctors, and orderlies—were always able, courageous, and willing to perform their duties as Canadians should and to the credit of the Canadian service. I have nothing to say of the conduct of the men of the Canadian Medical Corps. I have nothing to say of the majors, captains, and sergeants. But in my opinion—and I have a certain amount of knowledge on the subject—the administrative end of the Canadian medical service, in so far as the higher command was concerned, was not, in 1915 or 1916, what it should be. I can very well understand that such should be the case without attaching any particular blame to any one. The Government of Canada were anxious to obtain for the service the very best doctors. They went to Montreal, Toronto and all the large cities and obtained them. They could not reasonably hope that a man who had a practice of $20,000 or $40,000 a year would work on the pay of an ordinary captain. Therefore, they made these medical men colonels, and these colonels, as a rule, were placed in administrative capacities at the head of hospitals. It is not reasonable to expect that an eye, ear, nose and throat specialist, or even a family physician, the moment he becomes a soldier, will be able to administer a hospital containing a thousand beds.

So it is only natural and a logical consequence of the state we were in that there should have been mismanagement and inefficiency in the higher command of the Canadian army. If there was no inefficiency after the Bruce report and the Babtie report were made, why was Sir Guy Carleton Jones later returned to Canada? I understand that shortly after these reports were made the then Director of Canadian Medical Services, Sir Guy Carleton Jones, was literally deprived of his command. If there were no administrative mistakes why did the Babtie report say there had been mistakes made by the administration? And that, Sir, is about the foundation of the Smart and of the Pratt charges. Why, therefore, should the hon. Acting Prime Minister say that these men are not doing their duty by their country and are not good officers when they make such charges?

Now the question of so-called segregation. In 1916 I was in hospital just a little outside London about the time the Acting Prime Minister stated he was there, and I remember the controversy which raged about this question. I think it was an extremely difficult question, a question which required the very best men to handle and a question about which, as the hon. minister says, literally one-half of the Canadian forces was against the other half. However, if the question was handled and decided only from the standpoint of the efficiency of the Canadian service, I agree with the Acting Prime Minister that it was properly handled, because at that time with the number of casualties coming in, I maintain, it would have been impossible to have segregation of the Canadians. But if the dispersal plan was adopted merely to please the Imperialistic friends of Sir George Perley who were parading the streets of London, or the medical men who were on the Babtie commission and stated as their principal reason for adopting such a system that they wanted to improve the Imperial ties, then, Sir, I am against it. I do not believe in carrying on Imperial propaganda at the expense of the casualties inflicted in the war.

Now, Sir, I come to the question of Argyll House. I have had very little experience with Argyll House. On most of the occasions that I had anything to do with it I was too junior an officer to be admitted to anybody I wanted to see—I did not even have a chance to get near him. But although the Minister of Militia may not have heard of any complaints in regard to Argyll House, I can assure him that I have, and I know scarcely an officer or a private who has ever had anything very much to do about Argyll House but will say that it is one of the worst and most mismanaged institutions in the world. As to General Turner, I know him personally. He is a Quebecker —and I would like to say for the benefit of some hon. gentlemen opposite that there were eleven other generals from the city of Quebec in this war. So if these hon. gentlemen complain that we did not send the brawn to the war, at least we furnished the brains. General Turner is a hero. He won his V.C. by the greatest gallantry in the field in South Africa; he carried on in France; and there he attained as great success as any general in the British or Canadian army. He was taken away from the front and brought to Argyll House. I have heard it said that the appointments made in Argyll House were mainly political and mostly from Canada. The appointments were of such a nature that there is hardly a man in the Canadian force who did not have a word of complaint or something derogatory to say about Argyll House. Complaints were general. Nobody wanted to make any specific complaints, because he was afraid, as I have said already, of losing his place or chance of promotion in the Army; but nobody who could possibly avoid having anything to do with Argyll House went near it.

The question of demobilization has been raised. I wonder if the hon. minister is aware that either late in 1916 or early in 1917 a committee was formed in England, with Sir George Perley as chairman and Sir Montague Allan or Sir Andrew Allan as one of the members, and Major Sullivan of Winnipeg as secretary. That commission set to work and planned for the demobilization of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I congratulate the Government of the time upon having taken those steps; but the complaint I have to make is that a lot of time was lost in useless work. For instance, some practical jokers got busy, and sent out questionnaires asking for information of your wife's ancestors, and, in the style of the Ordnance Department, in describing your wife you would have to add " female," and so on and so forth,—this department got to work and those questionnaires were sent out all over the country. A plan was arrived at I understand—the hon. minister will correct me if I am wrong—by which the Canadian troops were to be demoblized by trades or occupations; that is to say, trades most needed in any particular district were to be sent home in their order of urgency, probably transport workers first, carpenters second, and so on. I do not know whether this plan was adhered to very long, but I think it probably could have been carried out. At any rate, when the armistice was signed we found the Government without any very pronounced plans. We found that there were complaints with regard to the boats when the first troops returned; we had an inquiry into the Northland, then we had the Metagama trouble and other troubles about the accommodation on the transports. The plans for demoblization were changed again, and very recently it was decided that the men wanted to come home by units. It seems to me that when these questionnaires were being sent out in 1917, and later it might have been ascertained by these same process as now whether the men wanted to come home by units or not, and the matters might have been arranged in far better fashion than they were. I was informed the other day by an officer in France who had just recently left the Rhine district, that at least three days a week the men were paraded to answer another lot of fool questions, and they were getting just a bit fed up on it. The rumour was about—I do not know whether it was true or not, but I think it was—that the Canadian Government had given up the Olympic and the Aquitania to the transportation of the American troops back to the United States, leaving the Canadians who had been over there for four years to freeze in English camps. I think that was one of the proximate causes of the Rhyl riots. It is more than likely that the extreme expedition with which our troops are coming home—expedition with which I agree—is due in large measure to the Rhyl riots. Inquiry was made in the House this afternoon as to how many men have been returned since these riots. I do not know, but I think that a very large percentage have been returned since that time. It is a fact, however, that the Olympic and the Aquitania have been taken away from the work of transporting American troops and have been bringing our boys home. That would seem to be somewhat of a justification of the riots and somewhat of a condemnation either of the Minister of Militia here or of his colleague overseas.

I understand also—and this I say to the credit of the Minister of Militia—that within the past month the authority which Argyll House had with regard to the embarkation or the disembarkation of Canadian troops has been taken away and has been vested more particularly in the Canadian Minister of Militia. If such is the case, the charges made against Argyll House would seem to be proved by the very action of the Canadian Government.

We should have a full, fair and frank investigation of these charges. If they are not true—and I do not know whether they are true or not—the Government has no reason to fear them. If they are true, then the Canadian Government and the people of Canada have a right to know how the Canadian soldiers were treated overseas. I maintain that if any Canadian soldier, whether he be an officer or the meanest private, has been ill-treated in a British or in a Canadian hospital to such an extent that he suffered physically in any way or to such an extent that he died; if Canadian soldiers are being kept in England or were kept in England beyond the time for demobilization by the inefficiency of Argyll House or of any other body, those who were guilty of such inefficiency and neglect should be brought to book. I believe that the people of Canada share that view.

Some charges were made this afternoon against British hospitals. Constitutionally, tempermentally and racially, I have had no great liking for England. But during the years that I was there, on the two occasions on which I was wounded I went to British hospitals, and for the brave nurses, the doctors and the orderlies of those hospitals I have nothing but the highest praise. I was in Miss Pollock's hospital on Weymouth street, London, for something like a month and a half, and later went to an English convalescent home. The treatment there was the very best you could get in any civilian hospital. On the second occasion I spent almost a year at the Royal Herbert hospital in Woolwich, one of the largest and oldest hospitals in the British Empire. There also everybody was kindness itself; all those engaged in work there went out of their way to do what they could, particularly for the colonials, more particularly for Canadians and Australians. They said: "These poor boys are from across the sea; there is nobody to look after them; we will look after them." We were looked after in the British hospitals so well that I cannot but refute any statement made against the people of England or the medical authorities in England with respect to the treatment of Canadian soldiers in English hospitals.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): The member for Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon) intended to say a few words this evening, but had to leave to take a train. I had not intended saying anything on this subject, but as there are in the House three members of the medical profession who have served at the front, it might seem strange if they did not say a word or two to show that they are not absolutely ignoring this discussion. Of course, the three members of the medical profession who are in this House and who served at the front were not among those distinguished medical men mentioned by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White); they were just ordinary captains serving over there. Consequently, the trickeries that Argyll House is accused of are not, perhaps, within their purview.

The member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) through the generosity of his heart, made a defence of the medical men this afternoon. The reason that the medical men themselves have not risen to make any defence is that we are of the opinion that the medical men at the front require no defence. I look upon these charges as being directed not against the medical men, but against the administration of the medical department; so that those of us like the member for South Essex (Mr. Brien), the member for Muskoka, and myself, who served in various branches from the base hospitals to battalions in the lines and who are probably familiar enough with many phases of this question to contradict some of the statements made to-day on both sides of the House, consider that it is not necessary for us to defend the medical men.

The member for Skeena said that the medical men were brave. Certainly they were brave, but they were no braver or no less brave than the other Canadians and Britishers who went to the front, from the Tommies to the Brigadier-Generals. Practically everybody who went out there was brave; there was no cowardice at the front so far as I was able to see. I may mention in passing that one of the first Victoria Crosses won at the front was won by a Canadian physician of Montreal, Dr. Scrimger; so that the medical men do not feel that they are required to speak very much for themselves.

The member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) was also very kind; indeed all the speakers during the course of this discussion have been kind in their references to the medical profession. But the member for Victoria made some remarks with regard to the women of the Voluntary Aid Detachment at the front, referring to hand-holding and brow-rubbing and so on. So long as human nature is human nature, a certain amount of that will go on, but outside of the ordinary amount of that which goes on in all spheres of life, I believe that there was no more of it among the women of the Voluntary Aid Detachment than there was among any other class of women. I saw their work out there in the base hospitals, and I believe that the vast majority of the V.A.D.'s deserve the gratitude of the whole civilized world for the work they did at the front. I do not think, therefore, I should be doing my duty if I did not say a word on their behalf, even if at the same time I have to take exception to some of the statements of the member for Victoria, for whom I have a very deep personal affection. But, like all good guns, he sometimes goes off at half-cock.

I repeat, in closing, that to my mind it is the administrative end of the medical profession at the front that has been attacked here to-day. For that reason, and because the Government have defended it, I do not feel that it is necessary for any medical man in the House to take up the cudgels on its behalf.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If I understood the hon. member aright, he stated that I found fault with the V.A.D's. I have never found fault with the V.A.D.'s. I have found fault with the system. And is he not aware that after the Bruce report, instead of the V.A.D.'s having little cubby-holes here and there throughout the country, they were all amalgamated with the large hospitals?

Mr. MANION: The hon. member is probably right. There were many things changed after the Bruce report. I admit that very frankly, and the Acting Prime Minister admitted that very frankly this evening. But I must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman very badly if I did not understand him to refer jokingly to the brow-rubbing and hand-holding V.A.D.'s. I took that as a slight reflection on the women who composed that detachment. If I am wrong I withdraw my remarks.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Were not the hon. member himself and every other medical man in England laughing at the system of the V.A.D.'s as it was at the beginning until it was reformed after the Bruce report?

Mr. MANION: I was not speaking of the system; I was speaking entirely of the V.A.D. work at the front, and according to my experience the Voluntary Aid Detachments, both Canadian and British, did wonderfully good work at the front and deserve the gratitude of all Anglo-Saxon people at least.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the charges that have been levelled here this afternoon by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to the whole medical administration in connection with the war through which we have passed must cause some of us to ask ourselves how long our feelings are going to be harrowed in this House and out of it by charges of this nature. It is only a short time ago in this House that we were told frankly and fairly by one who, at least we presumed should know, that our boys had been forced into positions that meant practically nothing more nor less than deliberate and wilful murder in order that some officers in the Canadian corps might cover themselves with personal glory. This afternoon we heard it stated that a similar condition prevailed in connection with the Canadian and British hospitals in which our boys were put when they were wounded at the front. We heard it stated by the hon. member for Maisonneuve that this country is going to be saddled with a burden of tens of millions of dollars in pensions due to the maltreatment criminally administered to our Canadian boys in the hospitals in England.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With my hon. friend's permission, he does not, I am sure, wish to put in my mouth any statement which I did not make. What I said this afternoon was based on speeches delivered by three officers. These statements do not come from me; they come from General Smart, Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price.

Mr. BUREAU: Quotations.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am a new parliamentarian, a new member of this House. The hon. member, I believe, stated in this House in my hearing, that he was the dean of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: One of them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are we to understand that the hon. member will stand up in this House and put upon Hansard statements made outside of the House, and not accept responsibility for those statements?

If General Smart, Colonel Price and Colonel Pratt made outside of this House or in some other assembly, statements that were unfounded, and the hon. member for Maisonneuve repeats them in order that they may be scattered broadcast throughout this country, who then is responsible? Is it General Smart, Colonel Pratt and Colonel Price; or is it the hon. member for Maisonneuve?

Mr. LEMIEUX: They can be court-martialed if those statements are not true.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I question whether they can or not. They are made not by Generals or Colonels, but by civilians.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They can be summoned for libel, can they not?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can a man be taken up for libel who makes a statement in the privileged sanctuary of the Legislature of Quebec or in this House, or not?

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have made it in the press over their own signatures.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Be that as it may, the statement was made here this afternoon that this country is going to be saddled with a burden of millions of dollars due to the maltreatment of Canadian soldiers in the hospitals of France and in England, and right there is where I disagree with the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), much as I should like to agree with him, in relation to the aspect of the charges that have been made. If our men have been criminally maltreated as has been stated, in the hospitals in Great Britain and France, who was it that maltreated them? Was it those in charge of Argyll House, or was it the doctors and nurses who were treating them? I do not believe the statements that have been made would bear investigation for a single minute. If we are going to have this wide-open investigation that is asked for, then the men who are making these charges should be the first ones to be investigated. The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) said that it was not chivalrous—I think that is the word he used—to refer in any derogatory way to General Smart, Colonel Pratt, and Colonel Price who have served overseas as they have done.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, no.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Was it chivalrous for them to make the charges they did against the comrades who served with them? What about that aspect of the case? I have on file in my home five hundred letters from boys who served in England and France, more than two hundred of those letters being written in hospitals in France and in England, and every one of those two hundred boys speaking in the highest terms of the treatment they received in those hospitals. My own boy spent five months in a hospital in England, and writing to his mother he said: "For heroism, and devotion to duty, no man who ever went over the top in France has done more in this war than the doctors, and nurses who are looking after the wounded men when they come back from the front." And the whole trend of the charges that have been made this afternoon, say what you will or clothe it in as nice language as you may, comes back to nothing else but this, that the doctors and nurses did not do their duty. And as a friend of some of those who I know have been doing their duty over there and have been making sacrifices in doing it, I say in this House that the men who made those charges should be compelled to prove them.

Mr. BUREAU: So say we all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just one or two words with regard to the riots at Rhyl Camp. In some of the charges referred to by my hon. friend this afternoon, and made by Colonel Pratt, and Colonel Price, it was stated that the riots at Ryhl Camp were due to maladministration on the part of "armchair officers." I happen accidentally to know the officer that was in charge of Ryhl Camp previously to and during those riots. The information came to me in an indirect manner. Major M. C. McLean, who won the Distinguished Service Order for taking his company across the canal, and practically taking the city of Valenciennes, who went over with the McLean Highlanders, and came back with that decoration and stayed with the fight until the Canadians went into Mons—he is the man who is held up as the "armchair officer," the "safety-first" man who led the Canadians at Rhyl to riot.

There is one other point in connection with demobilization. It has been stated to this House and to the country that the Government are criminally responsible for these riots, because they did not bring the men home fast enough. I have not heard the Government make the statement, but I am ready to say here and now that the men were brought back to Canada as rapidly as it was reasonably possible to handle them at the Atlantic ports as they came in. We are handling 30,000 men a month, and in March 42,000 were handled. For every thousand men that come into Halifax, forty passenger cars are required to take them to their destination, and it takes on an average ten days at the very least to get those passenger cars back to Halifax for the next contingent. How many men could be handled with the total equipment of the Canadian railways? Personally, I think it is a marvel what has been accomplished, when we consider all the difficulties surrounding the transport of Canadian troops after landing in this country. It is quite true that two million men have been brought back to England, but they had only the Channel to cross, which takes only two or three hours or at the most half a day. But transporting the Canadian troops is a different proposition. They have to be transported 2,500 or 3,000 miles across the Atlantic, and then by rail, one-half of them at least, to Winnipeg and points West, making a further distance of from two to four thousand miles, and the equipment has to be back at Halifax in time for the next contingent. Yet hon. members will say, because our troops have not been brought back in larger numbers, the Government is criminally responsible for the Rhyl riots. If we are going to fight this whole war over again, and if the fathers and mothers who have suffered as a result of this war are to be forced to continue to listen to these charges made by disgruntled officers—because that is what they are pure and simple, when it comes down to the ground—then Heaven help the Canadian people! If we have not passed through enough without listening to this kind of stuff, then I do not know what is going to become of us. A great deal has been said about the dissatisfaction among Canadian soldiers. Where are they getting their leadership in this dissatisfaction? Right here in this House, and from men who ought to know better.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is accusing hon. members of this House of being leaders of rebellion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member will retract any such statement that he may have made. I did not exactly understand it in that sense myself, but I am sure that if he imputed that any hon. member of this House was the leader or head of a rebellion, he will be glad to take it back.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that men in this House were leaders in rebellion.

Mr. BUREAU: You insinuated it. Have the manhood to say it if you think it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will repeat what I did say. I say that there is unrest throughout this country and dissatisfaction in the minds of a good many of our soldiers. Where are they getting their leadership? Right here in the Canadian House of Commons. Statements are made and sent broadcast throughout the country charging the Government, as was done this afternoon, with criminal negligence in the treatment of our soldiers. I am ready to admit that there may have been mistakes, and there still will be mistakes. Would any hon. member say that 400,000 men could be transported from Great Britain to their homes in Canada in the period in which we have to demobilize this army without a mistake being made? There is only one man that I know of in these days that assumed to be infallible, but even he found that he had made a mistake, and that was the Kaiser. We have all made mistakes. Our men at the front have made mistakes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I thought he had in mind the Pope.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You cannot put any words of that kind into my mouth. Don't make any mistake. I say that the man who put himself up, not next to, but above, God and claimed infallibility was the Kaiser, but he found he had made a mistake—and some of our Canadian boys who were traduced here this afternoon and are being traduced in this country were instrumental in convincing him that he had made a mistake. But with all our mistakes, we have won this war. I believe that there is not a single man connected with the administration of the affairs of this country during the war, or with the administration overseas or in the fighting forces, who has not been giving the very best that was in him. If he has made a mistake it was a mistake of his head; his heart was right in any case. I repeat, it is absolutely unfair that these sweeping charges should be made. I do not know General Smart, or Colonel Pratt, or Colonel Price, but I venture to say that inside of twelve months they will all acknowledge that they made a mistake in coming back here and making the charges they did against the men who have given the very best that was in them and who have made great sacrifices in order that Canada could do her part in winning this war.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): It has been repeated several times by hon. members on the other side of the House that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has made charges against the overseas administration in connection with this war. The hon. member has made no such charges. He has discharged his duty, as I understand it, in bringing to the notice of this House a very important matter bearing upon the life of our soldiers beyond the seas. That duty he owed to those men who have risked their lives in the defence of this country. It does not require a great deal of courage on the part of any member of this House to sit tight and say nothing about anything that may be put in circulation as to the administration of public affairs. It is the man who is anxious for a clean administration, that the affairs of this country shall be properly conducted, who takes upon himself to bring questions of this kind to the notice of the House. If questions of this sort are not to be brought to the attention of this Parliament, this high tribunal, where shall we go with them? What are we here for, if it is not to safeguard the interests of the country?—for this is the only federal Parliament we have. I submit, therefore, that no apology is required for the action of the hon. member for Maisonneuve. I am not going to say whether the charges are right or wrong. All I would say to the Acting Prime Minister, if he were in his seat, is that he has taken the course he usually takes in matters of this kind, of putting up a straw man and then knocking him down. He spoke of things that had nothing whatever to do with the question before the House. There was no mention in those charges, as I understood them, of the Bruce or the Babtie report.

The Bruce report dated in August or September of 1916, and the Babtie report is dated September 22, 1916. When we inquire about things that took place after 1916—1917, 1918 down the years to the present day—is it any answer for the Government to say: "Oh, why, there was a report on September 22, 1916. What are you talking about? That report settled the whole thing then, and of course settled everything down to the present day." Nobody would say that, and I am sure that it is only fair, if there is anything to investigate, at all events from September 22, 1916, to the present day, that it should be investigated. I was brought up to believe—and I would impress this view on every hon. member—that an officer wearing His Majesty's uniform was in every sense of the term a gentleman, beyond reproach, that his word was his bond, and that what he said was absolutely the truth, should the heavens fall. I have always believed that we should accept without question the word of a general, a colonel, a captain, or any other officer of His Majesty. And, Mr. Speaker, it is highly necessary that this should be so. The fathers and mothers of this country who allow their sons to be placed under the control of these men should have implicit confidence in their integrity; and I hope that there is not a member in the House who would countenance any man bearing the title of general, or brigadier general, or colonel, or any of these high-sounding names, which mean so much, if, in the ordinary vulgar Anglo-Saxon term he were a liar. Those men who made the speeches in the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec are officers, and we have a right to believe that they have made statements that are absolutely true as far as they know. If the statements are not true, and they do not believe them to be true and consistent with the facts, they have no right to the titles they bear, nor to wear His Majesty's uniform. They should not be in the army of either Canada or the Mother Country and should be stripped of their honours and driven out of positions of responsibility. If there is no other investigation than to find out whether or not those men are telling the truth, it is well to ascertain that fact. If they are not telling the truth an example should be made of them, so that officers now, hereafter, and for all time, will understand that the Canadian people expect of them truth, integrity and honour, and a dignity that will be above reproach. I make no accusations against anybody. I appreciate the responsibilities of the men in office, and until I know to the contrary I believe they are doing the best they can. But I insist that men who hold important offices of this kind, in whose care the lives of the young men and women of the country are placed, should be gentlemen above all else, true to the traditions which we have always cherished in the British army and in our militia as well. I trust that those who are in authority over these men—I care not whether they are in office or out of office; so long as they bear the titles and wear the uniform they are under the control of the Government—will see that they tell the truth, and that if they do not, they shall suffer the consequence and be stripped of any honour they now possess. If, on the other hand, these men are telling the truth, we should know it. The people have the right to expect that this or any Government that may be in power will not tolerate irregularities or abuse of our men and women who serve the country faithfully and well, as has been done in this war.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): I noticed that the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) said that if these statements are not really true the men who make them should be stripped of their honours. I heard the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) read one charge which I think every hon. member in the House will conclude, if he gives it any consideration at all, is untrue on the face of it. I know one of the three gentlemen mentioned, and it is he that made the statement in question. Colonel Pratt is a very close neighbour of mine, and a gentleman I have known for some years, and I am sorry to disagree with him in regard to anything he may say. But I want to call the attention of the hon. member for Maisonneuve to a statement which he read and which, apparently, he took as gospel. Colonel Pratt makes the statement that he knew of a train containing 1,200 or 1,500 soldiers who were held up by some Canadian ticket agents and had £2 apiece extracted from them. I would ask the hon. member himself, does he believe that statement?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I leave the responsibility to Colonel Pratt.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, my hon. friend, I have no doubt, knows about trains, if he does not know about Colonel Pratt, and he knows that no train during this war has ever carried 1,200 or 1,500 men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Suppose there were only 100 men, what would you say?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend supposes 100, but the statement multiplies it by twelve or fifteen. On the face of it, the charge could not be correct, and I think the hon. Minister of Militia will say that 500 men is a very full train-load. Here we have a statement that there were 1,200 or 1,500 men on one train—I am not positive about the exact number, but the hon. member for Maisonneuve has the figures—and about three thousand pounds was obtained from them. Now, is it likely that these men had each spare £2 to hand over to two or three ticket agents? A band of men coming back from the front, who could not be held up by fifteen hundred Germans of the best type, would not likely be made to shell out, as the saying is, £2 apiece for a bill they did not owe. On the face of it, the statement is not true. I know the gentleman that makes it, and he is guilty of great exaggeration on many occasions; and if the rest of his charges have no more at the back of them than this one, such charges must be received only for what they are worth. I believe that it will be found out that these three officers have personal grievances and if they were summoned to the bar of the House, not one of them would dare to make the statements contained in these charges; and I do not believe they can prove them before a committee of this House or anywhere else. It appears to me that the hon. member for Maisonneuve made a serious mistake in bringing to the House charges reflecting on the whole overseas service. It reflects on the whole department overseas and states that Canadian soldiers there were not well cared for and that a great many were improperly treated. I had two boys over there for four years. They were in several hospitals from wounds and other causes. They have not one word of complaint as to what was done for the soldiers overseas. Coming from a constituency which had between 4,000 and 5,000 troops overseas, I can say that I have not had one man come into my office and say that he did not receive in the hospitals overseas the best of treatment. If that is the case, there must be something wrong about the broadcast statements which have been sent out that our hospital service was inferior and that these men had not been well treated. My information is quite to the contrary. There never was a war in the history of the world with so many serious casualties and such a large percentage of men restored to physical well-being. That is my information; it may be wrong, but I believe it is true. I only know one of these three gentlemen who are making these charges. They have cast aspersions upon the various departments of government which I do not believe they can sustain before any tribunal whatever. I fear they are actuated by other motives than the good of our forces overseas or of any Canadian Government that is endeavouring to carry on to the best of its ability in the face of a difficult situation.

Mr. POWER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the cars in which troops are moved in France are built to contain eight horses or forty men. That would make a total of 1,200 men on a train of thirty cars.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend knows that no train ever hauls thirty cars. This was not in France, but it was on the way to the boat in Great Britain. My hon. friend knows it is not possible and he never saw a train carrying thirty cars with forty men each. Why try to make that complaint at all when it is not possible?

Mr. POWER: It is quite possible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply.

6. Where were these bases situated?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. See reply to inquiry of Mr. Mayrand, Debates House of Commons of 24th March, 1919, page 780.

2 and 3. The Canadian Government erected for the Royal Canadian Naval Air Service two bases, one at Dartmouth and one at Sydney, N.S. These stations were temporarily manned by United States air force officers and men.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH WEST INDIES.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Is the Government giving any attention at the present moment to the suggested conclusion of a commercial union between Canada and the West Indies, as advocated by the Canadian West Indian League?

2. Is there official information showing that it would be of advantage to Canada to hold, commercially, a strip of tropical country which it might call its own?

3. Have commercial relations been improved with those countries since the granting of the present preferential tariff?

4. If so, what action has been taken lately?

5. As a result of the war and the grouping of nations and territories, has the Government taken any action to induce Newfoundland to enter the Confederation, or does it intend doing so?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. The Government of Canada has not been officially approached by any of the West Indian Islands with a view of forming a commercial union, and it is not deemed expedient to give official recognition to any movement in that direction by the Canadian West Indian League.

2. This is a matter of opinion and the Government does not deem it desirable to express an opinion thereon.

3 and 4. It is difficult to express an opinion as to what improvement has taken place in the commercial relations between Canada and the British West Indies since the treaty was entered into, by reason of the fact that the treaty came into effect on June 2, 1913, that is to say in the Canadian fiscal year 1913-14, the trade statistics of which would be the first that could be affected by the results of the agreement; and as the war was declared in the ensuing year and all shipping arrangements were upset, no normal complete fiscal year has since occurred. The trade shows a large increase, but owing to the interruption of traffic between the British West Indies and Europe much of the West Indian trade was turned into Canadian and United States channels.

The following statement shows the imports and exports between Canada and the British West Indies and British Guiana for the past 11 fiscal years:

MOTIONS DROPPED.

Mr. Lapointe (Kamouraska)—That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to make certain amendments to the Rules of this House, and that a committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon said Rules.

Mr. Boyer—That, in the opinion of this House, a more rigorous inspection of maple products is essential to their proper manufacture, in order to prevent such conditions as are reported in Government Bulletins Nos. 409 and 415 showing adulteration in quantities of maple syrup, and also in 68 out of 137 samples of maple sugar, taken during April and May last, from Montreal and Toronto merchants who had been indulging in such practices prior to 1915, when the law regulating maple products was passed.

Mr. Lemieux—For a copy of all correspondence concerning the advisability of establishing and developing plants for the utilization of fish waste and waste fish.

Mr. Lemieux—For a copy of all correspondence and petitions concerning the Order in Council of November 7, 1918, granting a bonus to the Civil Service.

Mr. Lemieux—For a copy of all correspondence, petitions and other papers concerning the proposed highway belt line connecting Bonaventure, Gaspé and Matane counties, Quebec.

Sir Sam Hughes—That, in the opinion of this House, it would be an advantage to the community at large as well as to the non-commissioned officers and men residing in Canada, who are honourably discharged from His Majesty's forces, whether Canadian or other, were a corps of Commissionairs composed of these men to be formed in Canada on the basis of the similar corps in Great Britain.

Mr. Casgrain—That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient and necessary to establish, at once, an experimental farm in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency, in order to promote the interests of agriculture in general and the farmers of that country.

Mr. Mowat—That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to dispense with a standing army after the demobilization of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and that Canada should rely for a defensive force, for service in Canada, upon a citizen army based on universal training of young men from eighteen to twenty-five years of age, for such periods in the year as will not appreciably detach them from civilian and industrial occupations; and that Canadian democracy can best be maintained by equal, and not volunteer or casual service.

Mr. Casgrain—For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, documents, letters and Orders in Council, relating to the paper inquiry conducted by Mr. R. A. Pringle, K.C., since the beginning of said inquiry to date, together with all decisions and orders emanating from or given by said Commissioner Pringle.

Mr. Myers—That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that some immediate action be taken by the Dominion Government in order to in some manner control the price of wheat grown in Canada in 1919, both in the interests of the producer and the consumer, and further, make immediate provisions for the establishment of the necessary credits and transportation facilities to insure that our farm products be marketed to the best possible advantage.

Mr. Bureau—That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the salaries of the officers of the House of Commons should be revised and altered in order that these Civil Servants be remunerated on the basis of duties, responsibilities and experience required, and with a view of making these salaries conform with the classification of the staff made by resolution of this House passed on the 5th of June, 1913.

FIBRE FLAX PRODUCTION IN CANADA.

Mr. SAMUEL FRANCIS GLASS (Middlesex, East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the impetus given to the extension and development of fibre flax production in Canada has achieved results which justify further serious consideration, co-operation and encouragement by the Government, and to this end it is desirable:—

First: That a modern experimental and demonstrative station should be established at the most convenient and central point within the area where flax for fibre is being produced so that growers may be advised and educated in the most modern and improved methods of retting, scutching and generally preparing their fibre for the market.

Second: That improved mechanical appliances and equipment being necessary for the economic harvesting of the crop, as well as for the preparation of fibre, constant watchfulness should be exercised by the Government to insure that Canadian growers may be supplied with most modern machinery for harvesting and scutching and instructed in the newest and best method of retting.

Third: That in order to secure full economic value to the grower, it is desirable that the Government should establish a system of grading and standards consistent and consonant (in so far as possible) with continental standards so that the world's best markets may be available for our exportable surplus.

Fourth: That Canadian farmers, urged by the stress of war and the Empire's insistent needs for increased production, have increased their fibre flax acreage more than eighteen fold, at a time when the world's markets were at their highest figures, and have thus developed a source of natural resource which has materially added to the value of our agricultural wealth, not only so, but have demonstrated in the world's markets that Canadian flax fibre is equal in quality to best continental standards and superior to any produced in Russia, which hitherto produced 75 per cent of the world's supply; therefore, in view of these results attained, the Government should jealously guard the interests of growers and lend such co-operation as may be necessary to increase production and to encourage by every means possible the full development of its manufacture from the field to the loom, so as to obtain the full economic value of the production to the country.

He said: Mr. Speaker, having regard to the important part that the flax industry has played and must play in the economic wealth and development of this country, I feel that I do not owe any apology to the House for again directing the attention of hon. gentlemen to this matter. I desire to express my appreciation of the very valuable assistance lent to this industry through the encouragement given by the Department of Agriculture—encouragement which has resulted to some extent from the discussion which we had in the House in 1916 and 1918.

In 1915 the flax industry in Canada was but a small and struggling one of very little significance; the total acreage of flax fibre under production—I am speaking of the fibre end particularly—was only about 1,400 acres. Due to the necessities of the war and the very urgent demand of the Empire for an increased supply of flax fibre—a demand resulting from the need for linen cloth to be used in the manufacture of aeroplane wings—earnest efforts were made in this country to increase the production of fibre flax to meet the national need. In 1916 Lloyd George, urging the agriculturists of the Empire to increase their production of cereal and foodstuffs, said that this matter was of so much importance that the man who was doing his honest duty in endeavouring to increase the production of foodstuffs and cereals was serving in the second line of defence and doing as important work for the Allies as those who were serving in the front line. Lloyd George said at that time:

> The line which the British Empire holds against the Germans is held by those who work on the land as well as by those who fight on land and sea. If it breaks at any point it breaks everywhere. In the face of the enemy the seamen of our Royal naval mercantile marine and the soldiers gathered from every part of our Empire hold our line firstly. You workers on land must hold your part of our line as strongly. Every full day's labour you do helps to shorten the struggle and brings us nearer victory. Every idle day, all loitering, lengthens the struggle and makes defeat more possible. Therefore, in the nation's honour, heed! Acquit yourselves like men, and as workers on land do your duty with all your strength.

In the early part of last year the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries in Great Britain, who were in charge of the matter of flax production, sent out a circular letter urging an increased production of flax for fibre. The circular letter said:

> The Board of Agriculture and Fisheries have decided that any flax grown for the Government in your district shall rank of as equal importance to cereals and your War Agriculture Committee has been informed accordingly.

A message came over the seas to Canada in this matter because it was found that we could produce fibre of a sufficiently high quality for use in the manufacture of aeroplane wings. The necessity of speeding up production in Canada, therefore, was evident, and the Experimental Farm Branch of the Dominion Department of Agriculture early in that year issued a circular to the flax growers of Canada, from which I quote the following:

> The Canadian Farmers' opportunity to save the lives of many of our men and aid directly in our victory. Aeroplane wings must be covered with linen. The supply of flax for this purpose is alarmingly short and most sources of supply are cut off. Canada is expected to do her utmost to make up the deficiency.
> The mastery of the air is proving a great, perhaps the determining factor, in the struggle now going on. Aeroplanes are being built in vast numbers as rapidly as possible. As a covering for the wings of these, linen is the only material found satisfactory. Large quantities are also needed for machine-gun webbing, ambulance and truck covers, thread for sewing uniforms, and a number of other uses. Were the supply of fibre flax for these purposes to fall short, as is threatened it would directly and profoundly affect the success of the Allied forces.
> So serious is the situation that the British Government has commandeered all flax products entering the United Kingdom, and Ireland has taken extraordinary steps to increase the 1918 flax acreage in the British Isles. It has to this end imported large quantities of flax seed from Western Canada, although but little is known of the possibilities of the prairie-grown seed for fibre production.

The Resources Committee of Ontario, also active in stimulating production by facilitating matters affecting the gathering of the harvest and the securing of the necessary labour, issued a circular and did splendid work in developing the flax resources last year. They asked the people of Ontario to grow flax this year, pointing out that each additional acre of flax provided wings for another aviator; that one-third of all the aviators in the British Air Service had been supplied by Canada, and that these brave boys must have further help from Canada—in order that they may fly; we must give them wings. In concluding their circular they said:

If you cannot fly yourself, help others to fly by growing flax.

During the early part of the year this matter was taken up among the farmers, and, stimulated by a sense of patriotic duty and by a desire to increase the economic wealth and production of the country as urged by the Government, Ontario put to fibre seed some eighteen thousand acres. In Quebec, in the district which the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) represents, fibre of a quality superior to anything grown elsewhere in Canada has been produced under experimental tests. In Ontario, fibre is being grown superior to any quality of fibre produced in Russia and quite equal to the highest continental standard. It would seem, therefore, as if there were great possibilities for the production of fibre in Quebec and Ontario. In Ontario last year, under the stimulus of greater production and patriotic duty, we seeded 18,000 acres and produced over 3,000 tons of flax. What might this country do, not only in meeting our national needs, but in increasing our economic wealth, if the same earnestness in flax production were developed in all parts of Canada in which it is possible to grow this fibre? This is not an industry peculiar to Ontario, or to any particular part of that province, because at the present time, the number of flax mills is increasing and they are springing up all through eastern Ontario and throughout Quebec. In such parts of the country as cereals can be cultivated, a very high quality of flax can be grown. Years ago it was demonstrated that in Nova Scotia a very high quality of flax could be produced, and in British Columbia, and in certain districts of the provinces of the Northwest flax for fibre can be successfully grown. It would, therefore, seem as if there were plenty of opportunity for the development of flax growing in this country at the present time.

Before the war, Russia produced about 80 per cent of the total world production of flax, namely, about 400,000 tons, about 200,000 tons of which were exported from that country and used in other countries in which flax fibre spinning was developed to its highest degree. We are led to believe at times that France and Belgium are the countries which have hitherto produced the high qualities of fibre, and that if we are to develop this industry in Canada in the future, our fibre must measure up in quality to that produced in those countries. Notwithstanding the fact that Belgium and France have in the past produced a high quality of fibre, the quantity they produce is really an insignificant portion of the total world production. Before the war, the fibre production of Belgium was about 10,000 tons, and that of France about 30,000 tons, or a total of 40,000 tons, which is small as against a total world production of 500,000 tons.

We have, in the face of difficulties, increased and improved the production of flax in Canada. I am not going to go over the ground that I covered last year as regards the prejudice that exists amongst farmers as to the effect of flax on the soil, but I desire to refer to a matter I overlooked last year, namely, that while this prejudice may be founded, it is founded on causes which are now controlled. Mr. Clark, Seed Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture, in a report for the year 1916, referring to the examination of seeds, says:

Most of the so-called cleaned grain contained large numbers of very small weed seeds as well as small, light kernels and inert matter, clearly indicating poor results from the attempt at cleaning. With flax, this is shown by the presence of such small seeds as tumbling mustard, cinquefoil, wormwood, lamb's quarters, worm seed mustard, and also grain, black bindweed and other large seeds in samples that had been through fanning-mills. One sample reported as cleaned with a common fanning-mill contained seventeen species of weed seeds, including over 2,500 tumbling mustard—

This was a seed cleaned and ready for the market.

—over 1,000 lamb's quarters, 803 black bindweed, and 140 wild oats per pound, besides wheat, oats and barley. Some of the grain samples furnish equally striking examples of failure to remove even small weed seeds by the fanning-mill.

It would not be surprising that seed of that kind sent out to the farmers and seeded would produce disastrous results and disappointment to the farmers. Mr. Clark says further:

Nearly all the samples of flax would have been much improved by the use of a woven wire riddle 3 x 16-inch size (three spaces to the inch one way and sixteen the other), to carry the large foreign seeds over the back of the mill, and a zinc sieve below, with 1-12-inch perforations, to let through the small seeds with practically no loss of flax.

I desire to bring to the attention of the minister and of the Department of Agriculture the very great importance, if we are to develop this industry on a broad and successful basis, of the closest care and jealous scrutiny and protection of our standards of seeds. We must also have the confidence of our farmers, and we must disabuse their minds of the prejudice that still exists that flax seed is dirty for the land, that it takes away from the soil essential properties. These prejudices are easily removed by an examination of the reports of agricultural farms in this country, in the United States and in England, and there would seem to be no reason why these prejudices should continue to exist.

Another reason why there are great possibilities for the development of this industry in Canada is this: While flax is the most ancient of all textile industries, it is the one that has made less progress and lagged further behind than any of the others. The ancient methods of harvesting, of retting, of producing the fibre, that have been in existence for the last 5,000 years, have continued until the last two or three years. Before the war we were confronted with this condition, that our production was insignificant because, while we could grow a good quality of flax, we could not compete with the markets of Russia on account of cheap labour in that country and cheap labour in France and Belgium. Those conditions have, however, been materially changed because, owing to the demand for greater production, man has set his ingenuity to solve those problems which, for years, have apparently more or less baffled humanity. In Great Britain and Ireland, in the last three years, more progress has been made in inventing and improving mechanical appliances to manufacture fibre from flax straw than has been made in centuries gone by.

Very great progress has been made in the process of retting. Flax, I might explain, is a cereal that will grow where wheat or any other cereal will grow, but the product of fibre from the straw is obtained only after a very expensive process of retting, which entails much labour. The old method was to spread the straw out in the field and let the dews and rains of heaven, by a gradual process of fermentation and decay, rot the outer bark of the straw, and then after it had been properly dried through an operation known as scutching, the straw was easily separated from the fibre. The production of fibre by that process was a gamble more or less, because when a man had his straw out in the field it depended on the elements whether the retting would be a success. Too much rain would have the effect of discolouring or weakening the fibre. To obtain the best results the flax had to be gathered and dried at the psychological moment, and it was not always possible, owing to the elements, to lift the straw at the proper time.

Some development, however, has been made of a new process called tank retting, which is very largely followed in Ireland, has been used in Belgium for some time, and is making some slow progress in Canada. The possibility of reducing the labour costs by tank retting was considered early in the war by the Department of Agriculture here, and an experimental station was established at the Central Farm, where the process has been carried on with satisfactory results. In the county of Lambton, in the village of Forest, Mr. H. Fraleigh, one of the most prominent flax men on this continent, and admittedly its greatest authority on flax, has developed on his own responsibility a tank retting system which has achieved a marked measure of success. He told me last year that tank retting had yielded him $400 more per ton than the dew retting in the open field. The tank retting process, while an advance on the old process, and ensuring the curing of the straw at the proper time, is a slow process, taking some days. The Government have had brought to their attention another interesting process of retting. The Société Française de Rouissage Industriel reports as follows, under date of July 22, 1916:

> Professor Giacomo Rossi M. D., Director of Laboratory of Agricultural Bacteriology, and Professor of the Superior School of Agriculture of Portici near Naples, some years ago succeeded in isolating a specific aerobic bacterium, the "Bacillus Comensii" which produces the fermentation of pectic matter, or that is to say, of the gums which hold together the fibres of flax and of other textiles plants.
> By the action of this fermentation, this pectic matter is dissolved and the textile fibres are liberated.
> The fermentation produced is one absolutely specific for the pectines so that the fibers (cellulose) can never be attacked. The best proof of this is given by the fact that the process of retting can be continued indefinitely without ever attacking the cellulose or fibre.
> We wish to emphasize this point, and attract especial attention to it for it holds a very important place in the question of economy of the system. It makes it possible to utilize the entire quantity of textile fibre that is contained in the flax straw. There is absolutely no waste.
> It is quite different with the retting processes used up to the present either in water or in the fields (dew retting). In these processes the fermentation produced varies extremely, either because of difference in the water used, or in the temperature, and it varies even according to the depth in the same water. Thus in the River Lys, where the best flax fibre known is produced, the retting process is repeated twice and even three times and each time the position of the bundles is changed. The roots being all at one end, one time they are at the bottom and the next time at the surface. The fermentations which are produced in the rivers and on the fields attack the cellulose (fibre) as well as the pectic matter (gum), and sometimes it even happens that the fibre is completely lost. Without arriving, except in rare cases at this extremity, it is an absolute fact that a certain per cent of fibre is always lost and that one hundred per cent of what exists before retting is never obtained.

On the contrary, in the specific fermentation, produced by pure cultures of "Bacillus Comensii" it is certain and has been proved, industrially as well as scientifically that there is no danger possible for the fibre.

In fact, the mass in fermentation sown with a pure culture of the pectic aerobic bacterium "Bacillus Comensii", under the influence of a temperature of 86 to 93 fahr., and of the circulation of air in the mass, attains in a few hours, a very intense degree of fermentation. At its maximum point the bacteria attains the number of 80,000,000 per cent cubic centimeter (1,200,000,000 per cubic inches) in other words, that work is done to all intents and purposes in a pure culture, and the fermentation obtained is solely pectic without its being necessary to take any special precautions to obtain it.

In the industrial application of this method, the large per cent of fibre obtained suffices alone to cover the cost of retting. The following must also be taken into account.

In speaking of the retting carried on in water or on the fields, it has already been stated, and moreover it is a fact well known to all those in this industry, that a part of the cellulose is attacked by this process of fermentation, and is damaged not only in quantity, for it loses a part of its resistance and its spinning value. In the application of the Rossi Method where fermentation of the cellulose is impossible, besides the conservation of the quantity of fibre, there is also the absolute certitude that the quality of robustness has not been attacked. The pure cultures which we receive always contain small bits of flax or hemp, which have often been in the presence of bacteria during several months.

The fibres are completely freed separated into their elementary fibrils, but they remain unaltered.

Application of the Rossi Method.

In order to undertake an operation that shall be regular and systematic every day, an installation of four vats in reinforced cement is necessary.

The complete operation of retting takes from 60 hours up (70 hours for the finer and more retted qualities) so that the output of one vat per day is obtained.

With vats of 100 cubic meters (325 cubic ft.) 12 to 14 ton of flax straw can be retted per day. This quantity corresponds to the crop of 8 to 10 acres, in France.

If in Canada, as it seems probable, the flax crop will be cut, the quantity of 12 to 14 tons will perhaps be commensurate with 10 to 12 acres, because of the loss of the roots.

The installation requires also a boiler to maintain constantly in the vats the temperature of 86 to 93 fahr., and a small air compressor kept working constantly by an electric motor of 4 or 5 HP.

It is not necessary to have a specialist for the preparation of the ferments. An ordinary workman can prepare them in a few hours daily after having seen them prepared one or twice.

Once the retting is accomplished the flax is treated, in the drying, as in the other process, exactly as usual, that is to say it is dried in the open air in the fields and it is scutched with the Flemish mills as is done ordinarily in Belgium, France, Holland and Ireland.

We wish to call attention to a machine for breaking and scutching, which has just been put on the market and which renders the work of scutching very rapid and really industrial. It has been invented by a specialist in the flax question and it is destined to render great service, above all in countries where labour is scarce and dear.

We have had the occasion to read the following considerations that Mr. James A. McCracken Secy, of the Canadian Flax Growers has published in the Canadian Textile Journal.

"We must set for our goal, now that times are good, the production of the best flaxes in the world, so that spinners with special demands may come to us for their supplies of fibre, because they can get what they want nowhere else—like millers send here for the finest wheat.

"And if we don't achieve first place as a flax fibre nation our high striving ought surely to land us somewhere very near it. Even that much would mean permanence for our flax industry. Can we get beyond the Russian fibre? It means more than that most of us will get 2 or 3 cents a pound more than the average Russian producer. It means that altogether and every year we must produce an essential Canadian flax true to standards so unerringly that in the world's market we will come to be known and recognized. We are not recognized nor mentioned at all in the world's markets today. In bulk we cannot claim much attention in any case, but quality, irrespective of quantity, is the paramount consideration in flax as it is in diamonds."

We do not know how to emphasize sufficiently what a just vision Mr. McCracken has in this question.

Since we have begun to ret flax at our plant at Bonetable we have found that it is absolutely possible by means of a perfectly regulated method of retting to produce entirely uniform types of fibre.

It is a well-known fact that a year may produce an excellent flax crop but that the resulting fibre may be very mediocre, if the season has been poor for retting, while another year may be bad for the flax crop, but the conditions of the retting season being good, the fibre produced may be excellent relatively to the flax straw.

In any exploitation, and having at disposal a method of retting, always sure and absolutely controllable from every point of view, by the will of man, each year the straw harvested can be divided into three classifications, in order to obtain three well defined categories of product.

1. The average straw of the year's crop, average in quality and length. This average straw can be called the "Standard type of the Year."

2. The inferior straw, inferior in quality and in length, and

3. Extra quality, carefully chosen and worked to give a superior product.

At this moment we have at our disposition the crops of 1914 and 1915.

The crop of 1914 is very superior and we have obtained two qualities of fibre—average and superior—(about 50% of each). From the crop of 1915 which was very mediocre, we have inferior and average quality.

France planted in 1913 30,000 hectares.
Belgium " " " 23,000
Holland " " " 14,000

In the same year Canada planted 628,000 hectares in flax.

These figures indicate clearly that the Dominion of Canada is capable of organizing a very powerful linen industry.

With 30,000 hectares, France obtained 25,000,000 francs of seed, that is 1,000 francs worth per hectare.

In Canada 628 000 hectares produced 450,000 tons of seed valued at 90,000,000 francs, that is about 150 francs per hectare.

Russia planted 1,448,000 hectares and her exportation in fibre in 1913 reached 250,000,000 francs as against 50,000,000 francs of seed.

The conclusion is that flax culture is very interesting from the point of view of the fibre, but very little remunerative for the seed, and it seems certain that cultivators will be quickly and easily persuaded to sell their flax straw, and to regulate their flax culture according to the conditions necessary to obtain good straw for fibre.

I should also like to refer to a report that reached me only a day or two ago from New York. I cannot say anything as to its reliability, but it appeared in the March number of Cotton, a textile trade journal published in the United States. It draws attention to the possibility of the production of linen from flax fibre at a price to compete favourably with cotton. Referring to the flax and linen industry in the United States, the March number of Cotton says:

Whether the stimulus afforded by the necessity of war will prove of lasting benefit is still to be demonstrated, but from the report from William J. Robinson, Chairman of the Division of Flax, Fibre and Linen Manufacturers, U.S. War Industries Board, hope of this result is given.

If it comes true, the United States will in one more direction be free from that dependence upon foreign nations which was such a handicap in 1915 and 1916, though happily it has turned out to be a blessing in stirring American initiative.

According to Mr. Robinson, the cotton belt will have to look to its laurels. At any rate, he says that "recent discoveries in the treatment of flax make it possible for America not only to grow flax successfully and profitably, in every state of the union, but to produce flax fibre with an average yield of two-third of a bale to the acre more cheaply than cotton can be produced, and with more profit to the farmer. Synthetically prepared American flax has been converted into linen commercially for the first time in America, in a mill in Wisconsin.

Following are some parts of the report made by Mr. Robinson:

"After long and painstaking research a new synthetic process has been discovered, which is one of the most important discoveries to the entire field of commercial industry. The process dissolves the gum from the flax straw in less than an hour, without any injury to the fibre, and produces a strong, clean, beautiful fibre, ready for the spinner when dried and prepared. The process can be operated in either summer or winter, and has no disagreeable features, costs 70 per cent less in labour, time and expense than either of the other processes, and makes bleaching, except to secure extremely white linen, absolutely unnecessary.

In a test of the comparative strength of water-retted fibre—

This is a very important part of the report, because the objections to the process of chemical retting and any other process except the old one of dew retting, has been that it weakens the tensile strength of the fibre. Mr. Robinson says:

In a test of the comparative strength of water-retted fibre and the retted fibre by the United States Bureau of Standards, October 15, 1918—water retted flax broke at a strain of 115—while retted fibre by this new process stood a strain of 183. Flax by this new method can be produced more cheaply than cotton.

I do not affirm or accept the statement as accurate, but coming from such an authority as the chairman of the Division of Flax, Fibre and Linen Manufacturers, United States War Industries Board, and in view of the tests made by the United States Bureau of Standards, we should at least give some attention and weight to the report presented.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the flax produced in Canada manufactured into linen anywhere in Canada?

Mr. GLASS: Yes, I am coming to that feature of it; it is being done now. I said, Mr. Speaker, that in the year 1914 we were producing a small acreage of 1,400 acres only of fibre flax in Canada. We had nine mills in operation and they were scattered over a very small area of southwestern Ontario, not because the weather conditions there were more favourable than elsewhere, but simply because these few mills were the only remaining ones of a large number that had gradually, from time to time, gone out of operation owing to the competition of the Russian fibre and the cheap labour in European production. Now, however, the industry is extending well over the province of Ontario and at the present time 47 mills are reported to the Department of Agriculture with a total flax area last year of 18,000 acres, and an area rented for the purposes of next year's production of 25,000 acres. I have here a list of mills distributed as follows:

Nicholson & Hodgins, Crediton; McMurchy & Anderson, Ripley; Amerlin Flax Co., Petrolia;

Wm. Forrester, Mitchell; O. Geiger, Hensall; Doon Twines Ltd., Floradale; Tipling & Mills, Wingham; T. A. G. Gordon, Sarnia; Jas. McColl & Co., Alvinston; H. W. Ebel, Conestogo; McDonald Burns Ltd., Dresden; H. A. Griffin, Arthur; Barbour Flax Co., Moorefield, Alma; Ontario Flax Co., Parkhill, Ailsa Craig, Shipka, Exeter and Tilbury; Wm. Ward, Lucan; A. Heiderman & Son, Zurich; V. Stock, Tavistock; H. Fraleigh, Forest; Dashwood Flax Co., Dashwood; F. Kalbfleisch, Zurich; Sebringville Flax Co., Sebringville; R. J. Nicholson & Son, Merner and Seaforth; Blyth Flax Co., Blyth; Netherlands Flax Co., Winnipeg.

The Netherlands Flax Co. of Winnipeg, a new company, have 700 acres under contract for next year, and this is evidence of the confidence they have that flax fibre can be grown in the province of Manitoba.

Canadian Flax Mills, Drayton, Arthur, Seaforth, Wallaceburg, Essex and St. Catharines; A. L. McCredie, St. Marys; Stratford Flax Co., Stratford; Flax Spinners Ltd., Guelph and Listowel; Wm. Weir, St. Marys; Edward Weiler, Bowmanville; Canadian Flax & Seed, Oshawa; J. Flock, Windsor; James Rose, Pickering; J. B. Hudson, Millbank.

I point out this distribution to show that the cultivation of flax is spreading out into new areas which for some years have not made any progress. The fact that we have to such a large extent developed this industry under the stimulus that has been pressing us, and the fact that we have increased our production considerably is not, to my mind, the most important thing that we have discovered. We knew that we could produce a good fibre. Our fibre previous to 1915 found its market entirely in the United States, in the mills of Massachusetts and New Jersey, where it was spun into yarns for shoemakers' and harnessmakers' purposes, and for twines for fishing nets, as well as for coarser purposes; but that we were able behind it all to produce a quality of fibre fine enough to make the fine linens that were being made, seemed absolutely unknown to us. I have pointed out that the Ontario Flax Mills Company have five different mills in that province, and it is interesting to tell the House who the Ontario Flax Mills Company are. They are an organization directly representing in Canada the Belfast Spinning Mills of Belfast, Ireland, the largest linen mills in the world. Knowing that a good fibre must be produced and that they could not count on the fibre of Russia as regards its quality, and realizing that the supply from Belgium must be shut off, and as there were limitations to the amount that could be grown in Ireland, the Belfast mills four years ago sent Mr. F. J. Lockhart, a most capable man who understands the flax business from A to Z, to Parkhill in the county of Middlesex to try out our Canadian flax. They obtained a small acreage of four or five hundred acres altogether and seeded flax in that district with the Dutch child seed. The crop was so satisfactory that every pound of it was scutched and sent over to their mills in Ireland, and the next year they put in 1,000 acres, increasing the acreage in 1917. Last year they had over 1,800 acres, and according to the statement I have, they have under contract 2,500 acres for fibre for the Belfast linen mills for next year. Why should men of their experience go to the expense of establishing industries here, if it be not because they know that they can obtain in Canada the raw material necessary to keep their mills in operation and cannot get it so satisfactorily elsewhere? That is their reason for being here; and may we not hope that, as this large industry in Ireland, the largest in the world, sees the possibilities of producing raw material here, the time will soon come when under the stimulus and encouragement of the bounty now being given for the spinning of yarns in Canada they will transfer from Ireland some of their large spinning plants? May we not hope that the time will quickly come when this industry, which was of such insignificant importance here a year ago but which is gradually blossoming out, will be an important factor in the economic and industrial develoment of this country? Last year in discussing this subject I urged on my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture and the Government to connect up the fibre industry with the weaving industry by giving encouragement to the spinning of yarns. This was the position we occupied and have occupied: We have had a linen mill in the city of Guelph representing an investment of $750,000, a mill that can weave as fine cloths as those produced in any part of the world. This mill had to bring its yarns from Ireland to weave cloths. We were producing the raw material; were the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the other fellows, doing the hard, laborious and difficult work which gave the least value in money

We sent this material over to Ireland and Ireland spun it into yarn. Our mills bought back the yarn as their raw material, and this is what they are weaving in the city of Guelph. I am told this is the only linen weaving mill on the continent of America. Whether that is right or wrong I cannot say, but I do know it is the only one in the Dominion of Canada.

The Government did not take action in the early part of last year in the direction I suggested, that of giving a bonus or a bounty on the spinning of yarns in Canada from Canadian fibre. But in September last the demand for aeroplane cloths and linen products was so insistent that the British War Board represented to the War Trade Board of Canada the urgency of the situation. The War Trade Board of Canada made their representations to the Government and as a result a bounty was given for the spinning of yarn varying according to the fineness of the yarn. These yarns are known by the word "lea" which defines their fineness. On 20 lea, which is a comparatively coarse yarn, the Government allowed a bounty of three cents a pound; on yarn over 20 and under 40 lea, they allowed six cents a pound and on all yarn over 40 lea of fineness nine cents per pound was allowed. What happened? The ink had scarcely dried upon the paper putting that Order in Council into force when contracts were negotiated for the establishment of a big spinning mill. That only happened last September and notwithstanding the difficulties of procuring machinery and establishing such industries, in the city of Guelph, a spinning mill has been established representing an investment of some $300,000 and instead of sending our fibre out of the country to Ireland, the Canadian Spinneries Limited in Guelph are spinning our fibre into yarn which is a step in the right direction. But the Canadian Spinneries Limited at Guelph, operating to their full capacity, could not spin one-eighth of the fibre that was produced in Canada last year and it will be largely increased for the coming year. That is not all. I desire to tell the House that a very large corporation interested in the linen trade and which has been doing much to develop the linen industry in this country, have their buyers to-day in England buying the necessary machinery to establish a mill in Canada for the production of linen in all its departments. Their slogan is: "Flax from the field to the mill." They are going to grow, ret, scutch, heckle, spin and weave the flax. They are going to carry on the whole operation. This concern is going to establish a very large industry. It is expected that $2,000,000 will be invested and its plant will be up to date in every respect. It seems to me that there has been sufficient justification for the Government in carrying out the recommendations that were made to it at that time.

In the Canadian Textile Journal, published at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, a series of articles has appeared under the name of Alfred S. Moore, a very prominent trained flax man in Ireland. He is giving considerable attention to the development of flax in this country. I noticed that in the number of February 4, speaking of Canada and the possibilities of the flax industry, he points out the achievements of Canada in the development of flax fibre. But there is one feature which I desire particularly to call the attention of the House to and that is the high standing we have achieved in the British market for our product. He says:—

> Despite the high price and scarcity of Canadian labour it is at present the most promising country for flax and seed supplies. There is an active Canadian Flax Growers' Association in existence and the Dominion Government in its Experimental Farm at Ottawa, has also shown itself most energetic. Nor should one forget the stimulus given to the industry by the "Canadian Textile Journal" and the "Monetary Times" . . . The great Belfast York Street Flax Spinning Company—the world's largest linen mills—and also several other Belfast firms have proved the excellent quality of Canadian flax, and, as a result, large tracts of flax lands are now being cultivated in the Dominion.
> It is a matter for congratulation, however, that a step has been taken in the right direction, and it is hoped that Canadian flax will soon take the place of that grown in Russia in providing the flax for the world's linen trade, and it is to the benefit of the Dominion and ourselves to develop the promising field.
> It is due to Canadian seed that the extended flax acreage in Ireland this season has been possible. Most of the Canadian flax is exported to the United States, and what is most needed in Canada is the development of a good flax pulling machine. In the Canadian Northwest also two million acres are annually planted with flax—not grown for the fibre, as the climate of the West is not considered the best for fibre production. To the linen trade of Ireland it is tantalizing that thousands of tons of flax fibre should be annually burnt up in Canada.

What I desire to especially draw to the attention of the House is that tests have been made under Government direction in England and Ireland in their experimental farms in regard to the production of flax, and they have demonstrated that Canadian seed, side by side with the world's established standards, Dutch (White Flowering), Yorkshire, French, Irish, Russian (Perneau Crown), and American (Minnesota), ranks amongst the very first. At present Great Britain is controlling all the seed that will be sown for fibre in Great Britain next year. Great Britain controls the price at which the seed shall be sold and the profit that wholesalers shall receive for the sale of it. In the list of prices issued to the trade only in March last, which appeared in the Linen Circular, a linen journal in Ireland, Canadian standard fibre is the very highest priced seed offered to the growers of Great Britain of all the world's standard varieties. It seems to me that it is very important that we have been able to attain so high a reputation in the production of our seed. Great Britain this year will be dependent largely on the seed grown in this country for her crop of 1919.

To this end, in September or October last, the British Government asked the Canadian Government to commandeer all the available export flax fibre seed in this country for use next year. The Canadian Government did so, and the price obtained by the growers amounting to something like $8.30 a bushel, or thereabouts. Some one hundred and ten thousand bushels of this seed were commandeered, and after doing that sufficient supply was left to seed the crop of 1919. The British Government, I am sorry to say, instead of using this seed for the purposes for which it was commandeered has directed a certain amount of it to the West to produce seed for their supplies next year. However, the reputation we have made in the world's best market must be jealously guarded, and carefully maintained. I know personally that the Minister of Agriculture has given very serious consideration to this feature, and that he will throw about it such safeguards as are necessary to maintain that reputation.

It is said that in the West a large amount of flax is grown for seed only, and the question has been asked by members from the West: Why cannot we grow fibre out there? I say to our friends from the West: If we attempt to grow flax in this country as you grow it out there we would not produce fibre either. There are two methods of growing flax, one for seed, and one for fibre. Where flax is grown for seed, about half a bushel of seed to the acre is used. It produces a short stubby stalk which throws out very large seed bolls, which are grown for seed for manufacturing oil and certain by-products. Where seed is sown for fibre, a bushel and a half to two bushels to the acre is used and produces a thicker and longer straw with only a few seed bolls in the top. The lands of the West, I understand, have produced as high as twenty-eight bushels to the acre of flax seed. That, no doubt, is a very large production, a great deal larger than the average. From lands where flax is seeded for fibre the maximum average production of seed is about eight bushels to the acre. In the United States and in Canada considerable effort has been devoted to research in the hope of ultimately using the waste straw of the Western provinces. I have a report here in which a Mr. George Harrison claims to have made considerable progress in discovering a method for using the western straw for gas purposes. This gentleman says:

> Plain loose threshed straw is placed in an air-tight retort, and when roasted, not burned, for half an hour in three hundred degrees of heat, the gas leaves by the only means of escape, through a pipe into a scrubber or refiner. At this point a by-product in the form of jet black tar is taken from the gas, and the purified product passes into the gasometer, or large storage tank. From there it is piped to the various cooking or heating appliances and operated in the same manner as by city users of gas. The bluish flame is similar to coal gas, though claimed to be of a much higher grade and having greater heating propensities.

Without going into this report very fully, I may say this man claims to have discovered a means of manufacturing gas from this straw whereby a ton of straw, which is of small value compared to a ton of coal, will develop more gas than a ton and a quarter of coal. I have no doubt this matter is being looked into by the Government, and by the Research Department, and, if it has any merit, that full advantage will be taken of this process. The United States Government are making extensive investigations along the same line, and they also hope to find some use for this straw.

A few years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway Company obtained the services of Arthur D. Little & Co., the most prominent research chemists, I presume, in the United States. They established a branch in Canada and were directed by the Canadian Pacific authorities to devote their energies primarily to the solution of the problem of the utilization of western straw in industry. Dr. Howe, who had charge of their research bureau in Montreal, spent some considerable time in the work, and I was disappointed that it had not been prosecuted to a point where some definite proposal for the utilization of this straw could have been presented. It appears, however, that they had been making their investigations in Canada up to 1918, and about this time the Canadian Government established its research bureau. The Canadian Pacific thereupon feared they would be treading on ground that properly belonged to the Federal Government, and withdrew before completing their experiments. I hold in my hand a sample of linen paper produced from our western prairie straw—and Dr. Howe says that this paper is of a quality suitable to the highest requirements that the Government would demand for bank notes. He also says that it is commercially possible to manufacture pulp from the straw in small mills in the western provinces, and then ship it to the paper-mills where it can be converted into an industrial product. This paper, Sir, looks to be a most extraordinary sample in point of quality, and I am sure would prove very interesting to any member of the House who cared to examine it. It was sent to me by Dr. Howe, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Research Department, as a product of paper manufactured from western flax straw.

In connection with this matter, Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn quite recently to the possibility of the utilization of this straw in the spinning of yarns. I have had some very interesting correspondence with a gentleman in New York, in which he expresses absolute confidence in the merit of his process for treating this western straw and manufacturing it into fibre. In a letter written to me on March 15, this gentleman says:

> I thank you for your favour of 13th, and appreciate your courtesy in keeping me informed as to the progress of your work on flax in Canada. Shall be very glad to receive a copy of the discussion in the House when you can send it.
> I wonder if I made it quite clear that the process of handling flax straw to which I referred can be successfully used on oil seed flax straw so largely burned and wasted in the great Northwest? The inventor has produced some splendid goods, comparing favourably with the best Irish linen, both as towelling and table cloth fabrics. He uses standardized textile machinery, and claims to be able to produce the spinning fibre and yarn at a small fraction of the cost for the same kind of product by the ordinary process.
> There are a number of American inventors who seem to be producing a yarn from this oil seed flax straw suitable for crash towelling, etc., but this man is the first one I have discovered who shows anything in fabrics even approximating the best Irish linen goods. For your information, I am sending a small sample of a table cloth which this man says was produced by this method. I did not see the goods made, but have confidence that the inventor's statement is true as I have known the man for over thirty years and know that he has a large experience in textile work. At present he is without resources and is looking for financial backing to start a factory to turn out linen goods. He has suffered greatly at the hands of apparently unscrupulous promoters who tried to tie him up, hand and foot, but failed to supply the requisite capital. He is now free from this entangling alliance and no doubt can be arranged with on a reasonable basis to take charge of a factory which should use his process.

Consultations were held with the Minister of Agriculture and Dr. Macallum of the Research Bureau, and it was considered that enough material had been presented in his letters to suggest that there might be some merit in the process that he claimed to have discovered. As a simple means of getting information concerning it, I suggested that it would be desirable to have this man come here and present his process and his plans to experts. Dr. Van Bruyssell of Montreal, who is on the Flax Research Committee, Dr. Grisdale of the Experimental Farm, Dr. Shutt, and the head of the Fibre Department, Mr. Hutchinson, and others. If there be merit in his process, it is a matter of vital importance to the whole of Western Canada that this material which represents such a large waste year by year should be used in economic industries. With reference to my suggestion, he said:

> My friend would be glad to accept the Government's invitation for a visit and conference. He is a man of attainments, a gentleman and a scholar, a trained engineer, graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and a textile expert in every sense of the word, with an actual mill experience of some twenty years. I am confident that if given the opportunity, he can convince Dr. Macallum and his associates, theoretically, at first, that he has solved the problem, and that the Government would be warranted in equipping a plant under his direction, which can produce from seed flax fibre all kinds of linen goods, equal to those now produced by the so-called long line method.
> As I have previously written you, I think, I do not know of my own personal knowledge that my friend has already done this. He tells me he has and I believe him. To my mind there is only one practical question to be settled: Can he do it on a commercial basis, that is, at a cost to compete with normal cost of long line linen production? On this point I am so far affirmatively convinced that if I had the means, I certainly should equip a mill and give him a chance to prove out his claims. I have spent months investigating the matter, have met many experts who said it cannot be done, have seen the wreckage following several failures to do this thing, and believe thoroughly that my friend has solved the entire problem. I think he has taken advantage of all the good points of other processes, so far as he can legitimately use them and not infringe existing patents; has eliminated a lot of useless steps, has avoided some pitfalls present in other processes, and by skilfully combining and utilizing standardized textile and other machinery, has a process that is simple, economical and practical.

I submit that the representations this man makes justify at least an investigation of his claims.

If Canadian flax fibre is to maintain the reputation it has gained through the stress of necessity and through the exigencies of war, we should take advantage of this opportunity to guard jealously the position that we have attained. While Russia and other European countries where cheap labour prevailed were able to manufacture a fibre at a price that prevented our competing with them successfully, the advantages they have had have been largely overcome by the invention and utilization of mechanical appliances for harvesting the crop and scutching it, and by scientific research in the matter of a simpler and cheaper process of retting. If the Government establishes a Department of Research as is suggested by the resolution of the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) on the Order Paper, there would be a wide field of usefulness in connection with zymo-technology, the study of fermentation, which has played an important part in industry. It is admitted that the process of retting in flax production is a bacteriological, micro-biological process. Professor Rossi seems to have separated and segregated the bacilli necessary for this process, and they are successfully carrying on the work by the use of these bacteria. If we solve the problem of cheaper retting, and the cost be reduced by seventy per cent, as is stated here, if we solve the problem of mechanical appliances for harvesting machinery—and we believe we have done that—having demonstrated that we can produce a better quality of fibre than Russia can, there is nothing under heaven to keep us behind the producers of Europe. If it be true, as stated by Mr. Robinson, of the American War Board, that the process of separating the gum and retting the flax can be completed in an hour; that the tensile strength of the fibre produced stands in a ratio of 183 to 115, and that we can produce in various parts of Canada a flax fibre that will compete with cotton, who can estimate the possibilities of accomplishment in this line? Here is opened a field for thought and investigation that should commend itself to the very best consideration of the Government.

It so happens that fibre is being produced at the present time in a comparatively small area consisting of seven or eight counties, the production being largely in Western Ontario. These producers are groping in the dark and working by the methods of years ago. If we are to help these men to solve the problem of retting, improved scutching, and reduction of the cost of labour in handling, Government experimental mills along the line of the Experimental Farm station in Ottawa, although possibly on a larger scale, should be established in central parts of the flax growing areas. If we are to make a success of the production of flax fibre, we have to put it within the power of the farmer to get the full economic value of all the straw that he produces, not to sell his straw to the flax mill, and thus get the small end of the deal, but to do as he would with his wool, to produce his own fibre from the straw and then to sell his fibre in the market.

We ask also that the Government take into consideration the matter of establishing standards. We know that in the past few years a marked advance has been made in the value of his wool to the farmer on account of the higher price obtained by grading. There is just as great possibility of increasing the value of his flax to the farmer by proper grading and standardizing as there was in the wool, and the Flax Growers Association, at a meeting held in March last, passed a resolution endorsing the resolution I have moved as embodying those principles which most essentially would benefit the flax men of this country. Therefore in this way the Government may be able to lend further encouragement to this industry, and to develop it, not only in Western Ontario, but in other parts of Canada by similar processes by which it may be originated and developed.

The matter of standards for flax fibre is very important, and no less important is the desirability of having a Government cleaning station where the seed, after it is cleaned, and set to a standard, may have its pedigree, character, and reputation standardized and maintained in the markets of the world. I need only to refer to the deplorable report from the Seed Commissioner as to the results of his investigation of samples of flax seed which were handed to him as being properly cleaned. He found them so foul and full of weeds that they would befoul the land of any farmer who attempted to use them. Suitable machinery has been invented for properly cleaning flax seed, and we have it on the authority of the Linen Circular published in Great Britain and Ireland that Canadian fibre is recognized in the world's biggest and best markets in Great Britain as being the highest standard that is sown and as commanding the highest price. We have built up that reputation during the past few years, and it is most important that that reputation should be maintained.

While I am on that question, I purpose reading a report made by Mr. Moore, a cultured gentleman in Ireland, who has written several articles on this subject to the Canadian Textile Journal: He says—

> The most important deductions to be drawn from this table of seed productivity, is that of the several varieties tested, Dutch (White Flowering), Yorkshire and Canadian gave better, and French and Irish slightly poorer results than Russian (Pernau Crown), and Dutch seed, American Minnesota was relatively a failure. These results further confirm, says Mr. Moore, those obtained in the trials of the previous year—in fact further tests since bear them out also and demonstrate that seed suitable for fibre production might be procured from Canada.

Now that we are able to produce a seed for the growing of flax fibre, a pedigreed seed, a seed of character and quality superior to almost all others and practically excelled by none—and I may say further equal to and on a par with the best known continental standards—it will be our duty to jealously guard this reputation and to take any means necessary to prevent the frauds that are being attempted to blast this reputation, by trying to grow our fibre seed in western provinces of this country, where experience has repeatedly shown that fibre seed loses its quality and character under the climatic conditions prevalent there, and trying to sell this product as Canadian fibre seed against the seed of established reputation grown in Ontario. If Canada is to maintain the enviable position she has attained, I am of opinion that the Government must lend a hand, establish proper standards and provide for rigid inspection of our fibre seed. Cleaning stations should be provided, and no seed allowed to be sold for fibre, unless it shall have the brand and stamp duly approved by the Department of Agriculture, which should be a guarantee of its quality and pedigree. So much for our seed. Of equal importance, however, is the result of our experience in the production of fibre—not so much that we have been able to so largely extend our acreage, and thus more adequately meet national needs, but that we have been able to improve the quality of our fibre, so that in the world's best markets Canadian flax fibre is classed as amongst the best of the world's supplies. To-day our fibre stands side by side with best continental standards. This is a great achievement, but we must not rest satisfied, we must aim higher. May we not, therefore, look forward to greater achievements, may we not hope that by patience, perseverance, and close application to the study of this great industry to make our product stand in a class by itself recognized throughout the world as superior in quality, dependable in grading on approved standards, so that buyers in the world's markets will be assured that when a purchase of Canadian fibre is made, they will know it will be true to standard and quality.

Let us make quality our aim, a higher and better quality than has been hitherto produced. The name "Canada" stands for quality throughout the world, firmly established by the efficiency, courage and fighting quality of our fighting men in the late war. Their record stands out as a beacon light, directing us to greater energy that we may to the fullness of our powers embrace the opportunities that surround us, and press forward to greater endeavour. We have proven to the world that we can produce manufactured goods as well as raw materials, and our ambition must have a higher aim than that of remaining a raw material producing country.

If these higher aims are to be realized, I am of opinion that close co-operation and encouragement will be required of the Government not only in guarding that which we have, but in the development of the industry generally. We can congratulate the Government on its forward policy so far. As a result of the bounty they placed on yarns spun from Canadian flax fibre already a large spinning mill has been established at Guelph, and Canadian linens are now being woven from Canadian yarns manufactured from Canadian flax fibre. That should be our slogan—flax from the field to the loom. We need a dozen mills, yea, even twenty such mills as that at Guelph if we spin our product of fibre into yarns. And why should we not export these yarns rather than the fibre? A large mill is now under organization behind which it is understood over two million dollars of capital is placed, for the purpose of establishing an industry in western Ontario which will embrace the whole field of manufacture from the growing of fibre to the weaving of the finished cloth.

We must encourage scientific research in the industry, so that newer methods, improved methods will be found for retting of flax, and in this I would suggest that the Government in connection with its research work might establish a department of zymotechnics, with a view to the study of this subject in its relation to retting of flax.

Professor Giacomo Rossi, M.D., Director of Laboratory of Agricultural Bacteriology in the superior School of Agriculture in Portici, Italy, has, it is said, made very valuable discoveries in research work, and has practically solved the problem of improved retting process. It is claimed that by this process it is possible to utilize the entire quantity of textile fibre that is contained in the straw. The straw is retted in tanks of varying size even to a capacity of ten or fifteen tons. It is claimed that by his process the large per cent of fibre obtained suffices alone to cover the cost of retting. Full report of this process was obtained by the Canadian commercial delegation to France in the year 1916 from the Société Française, de Rouissage Industriel, and this has been sent to the Honorary Advisory Council of Research. It would seem to be well worthy of investigating.

Improved harvesting machinery has now been perfected and the matter of labour in harvesting will have been solved, the efficiency of which will be proved by the Nitro Products Co. of St. Dennis, Ontario, who have undertaken to have their machines in operation during the coming season. Improved scutching machines have also made much headway, and this will likewise aid in reducing the labour costs in the production of fibre. All advantages which in the past, as regards labour, were held by European countries will have been overcome by improved machinery devices, so that with these and the application of research work as I have suggested, there is no reason why this country should not attain a place in the linen industry, successfully competing in the trade with the world's largest linen centres. Opportunity is knocking at our door, how shall we use it? I am convinced that the Government of Canada is alive to the importance of the industry, and our people may count on their co-operation and encouragement in all that pertains to the fullest development of it in this country.

In conclusion, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a matter which, though it has not been discussed, is of considerable importance. We have shown in this country that we are capable of producing just as high a quality of hemp as of flax. Hemp seed is a commercial article brought into this country chiefly for the purpose of bird seed. It is a product of China which has been acclimatized in the United States and grown with varying success in the state of Wisconsin. Our flax fibre men in Western Ontario have experimented in growing hemp. In the year 1916, on the farm of Mr. Howard Fraleigh, at Forest, in the county of Lambton, I saw a field of five acres of hemp which stood on an average twelve feet high, and some of it was fifteen feet high. It was a beautiful crop. We have an ideal climate and an ideal soil for the growing of hemp, and the industry should be encouraged. It is a very expensive seed under present conditions, because after being imported from China into the United States, it has to be acclimatized there for two or three years before it is ready for distribution in this country. I believe that the Fibre Department, which I know has given some attention to this matter, should recommend the taking of the necessary means to encourage to the fullest extent the development of hemp growing in this country. The industry has wonderful possibilities, if we go into it properly. The hemp has to undergo a treatment of retting somewhat similar to that undergone by flax, and if tank retting and other progressive methods work out satisfactorily we shall take a step in advance of European countries in the growing of hemp. I think hemp seed should be admitted into Canada on the same footing as grains brought in for seed purposes; it should come in absolutely free of duty. I respectfully submit to the minister that there is a possibility of growing hemp in this country over a very wide area, and that with proper encouragement a very large and remunerative industry could be built up.

I wish to express again my appreciation and that of the members of the Canadian Flax Growers' Association for the valuable aid given by the minister in the development of the fibre industry. We have made splendid advances, and the possibilities are beyond the power of the mind to calculate. Let us have for our slogan: "What we have we'll hold," and then we will not only sustain the reputation we already have, but will aim at a higher and better quality of fibre than we have produced in the past.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I shall say only a few words on this subject, as the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) has covered the ground very fully, and I am sure we have all appreciated what he has said. I want to congratulate the Government on the assistance they have given to this great industry. I am sure the Government is willing to make every effort to make flax growing one of the successful industries of the country.

I rose merely for the purpose of urging upon the minister the need of standardizing and classifying the seeds and the fibre. It is absolutely necessary that the growers of flax in Canada should take advantage of the market that is offering in Ireland and elsewhere, but unless our seed and fibre is properly classified we cannot expect to receive the returns we otherwise would. The day is not far distant when we shall have a Government-owned elevator in the province of Ontario, and I hope when that day comes the elevator will be used, to some extent at least, for the purpose of cleaning not only the seed grains and other seeds that are largely used in the province, but also the flax that is sent out of the country stamped by the Government as Canadian-grown flax. I know that the minister fully appreciates the fact that this flax and flax seed that we export to Ireland compares favourably with the very best flax seed and fibre imported into Ireland from any other country. I would respectfully urge the minister to give consideration to these few points, and particularly to seeing if it is not possible to classify the seed and the fibre.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): The subject that is covered by the resolution which has been discussed so ably by the hon. member who has introduced it this afternoon (Mr. Glass) is one of growing importance in the agricultural field of our endeavours in Canada. My study—my limited study, I should say—of the development of the fibre flax industry in Canada has taught me that some forty or fifty years ago the flax fibre industry in the older provinces of Canada was one of considerable dimensions. The flax produced at that time was spun and handled mainly by the growers themselves. Owing, however, to the difficulty of getting cheap labour and the consequent inability to compete with the flax fibre products of countries like Russia, Belgium, and Holland, where labour has been very cheap, the industry declined in Canada, and very little attention was paid to it until a few years ago. The revival of the industry in Ontario has been quite marked within the last few years. That revival has been due primarily to the impetus given to the industry by war conditions. In 1912 there were approximately 2,000 acres of flax planted for fibre purposes in the province of Ontario. Next year, I am informed, there will be 25,000 acres, which, taking all the circumstances into consideration, is a very remarkable development indeed.

When we were producing flax in Canada quite a number of years ago, I am informed, the growers were able to get for the flax fibre between ten and twelve cents a pound. During the last year or two, owing to war conditions, the price has ranged from seventy-five cents to one dollar a pound.

As the hon. member has stated, the quality of the fibre produced in Canada is fully equal if not superior to the best produced in any of the European countries, and this fact itself affords a very substantial foundation for the building of a permanent and secure industry. It seems to me—and I referred to this aspect of the subject in the few remarks I made when it was under discussion at the last session—that the future of the industry in Canada depends almost altogether on the development of labour-saving devices for harvesting the crop and for manufacturing it into the finished fibre after it is harvested.

I would like to give a brief outline of the work that is being carried on in the Experimental Farms branch in this connection. In the carrying on of this industry I find that there are several stages, the first, of course, being the planting of the seed, followed by the pulling of the plant when it is ready for harvesting. In Western Canada where we have been accustomed to produce flax for seed purposes, or rather for the production of oil, the crops are harvested in the ordinary way, but when the plant is used for fibre purposes it requires to be pulled from the ground in order that the slender threads running through the stem will not be broken or cut. Consequently the first part of the operation is the pulling. After the flax is pulled it has to be deseeded, and then the retting or rotting process takes place. After that process is over the plant has to be passed through what is known as a breaking machine where the woody part that is already rotten from the process of retting is broken up. After that comes the scutching, when the woody part is all stripped from the plant and the rough fibres are left. The next process is heckling, whereby the fibres are passed through another machine and stripped of any remnants of woody matter. The completion of this process leaves the fibre in the fine silky condition necessary for spinning. It was quite clear to the officials of the department, when this matter was first undertaken by them, that there were several of these processes that would have to be closely examined into. In Russia, Holland, and Belgium, where this plant is produced for fibre purposes and where labour is cheap, it was a comparatively easy matter to get the necessary labourers to pull the plants from the ground and attend to the processes of retting and scutching. In Canada, however, where our labour is much more expensive we would obviously be at a very serious advantage as compared with our competitors in Europe, and consequently the attention of the department was directed at first to discovering a machine if possible that would supersede hand labour in the pulling process. The officials of the department were fortunate after some enquiries in meeting a gentleman, who had been carrying on considerable experimental work in this respect. The name of this gentleman was Vessat. I believe he had the distinction at one time of being a preacher of the gospel, and had in his spare time turned his attention to the invention of a machine that would do this work. This machine was tested out and found to be defective in some respects, but with some financial assistance given by the department, and with the aid of experienced officials in the department, he continued his work until it was finally in a completed form. Last fall the machine was given its first test and the results were very satisfactory indeed. It was demonstrated beyond any question of doubt that the machine would pull from 4 p.m. four to six acres of flax a day, and would thus do the work that under ordinary conditions twenty men would be required to do. It therefore appears that as a result of the assistance we have given in this matter we have in Canada a machine that can attend to this part of the work, which is really the most laborious and expensive of all the processes.

There was also the question of retting. A few years ago there was established at the Experimental Farm a building for the purpose of carrying on experiments in this direction, and experiments were conducted with a view to determining the best process of water-retting. The ordinary method of retting that prevailed in the olden days was to take the plant after it had been pulled and spread it out on the ground so that it might get the rains from heaven and the dews of night until it had been sufficiently retted. That process, of course, was subject to the vicissitudes of the weather. The energies of the officials of the department were directed to discover if possible a water-retting process that would apply to our conditions in Canada. These experiments have achieved quite satisfactory results but they are not by any means completed. These things usually have to run for a series of years in order to fairly test every method to ascertain which is actually the best. The next process is the scutching, and until very recently no machine has been discovered to take the place of hand scutching. I have seen the process in operation and it is a rather difficult one to explain, but I might state that every particle of flax straw that is scutched has to be handled by the hands of the operator. About two months ago the head of our flax development work in Canada was sent to Ireland to investigate the development of modern machines for this purpose, and we received from him a few days ago a cable to the effect that he had discovered a mechanical scutcher which, in his judgment, produced excellent results. He cabled for authority to purchase this machine and that authority was given him a short time ago. The machine will cost, I believe, some $4,000, and it is the intention of the department to place it, along with other equipment we have, on the Experimental Farm and test out the various classes of fibre that come before us to see to what degree of perfection the machine will do its work. I do not need to go over the ground that the hon. member has so ably covered in respect to the market of our product in Canada. Up to the present, I might say, our market has been chiefly in the United States; but if we can provide—and I emphasize this point again, because in my judgment it is the important matter in our successful development of the industry—if we can provide labour-saving machinery that will handle these various processes, I am reasonably sure that we in Canada can occupy a position in this industry that will not be surpassed by any other country in the world. Until we can do that, we must continue our experiments in that direction.

Mr. McKENZIE: Comparing the yield from an acre of ground, sown to flax, with a similar area sown to oats, for instance, how many crops of flax, without manuring, would an acre of ground in Western Ontario yield? Would it yield the same amount without manuring, or would it yield less?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry, I cannot give the hon. gentleman definite information as far as fibre production is concerned. I know that when it is produced for seed only one crop can be taken off without a rotation of crop. There is a question whether or not successive crops of fibre flax can be produced from the same land without rotation. I am not sure that it can be.

Mr. McKENZIE: The idea is that it exhausts the soil very much?

Mr. CRERAR: Undoubtedly it exhausts the soil. I am of the opinion that it has to be rotated with other crops and probably a great deal of manure supplied. I would like to deal now briefly with a few of the points in the resolution. The resolution calls for the establishment of an experimental and demonstrative station:

> —at the most convenient and central point within the area where flax for fibre is being produced so that growers may be advised and educated in the most modern and improved methods of retting, scutching and generally preparing their fibre for the market.

For the present I think we had better confine our efforts to the plant we have already established at the Experimental Farm. The establishment of another plant would largely mean the duplication of the one we already have. I would not say, however, that later, when we have carried our experiments and investigations farther, the establishment of an experimental station in Western Ontario, or in some other part of Canada where this industry is being developed, would not be justified. At the present time I am inclined rather to the view that we should proceed for another year with the experimental work we are conducting before we consider incurring the expenditure which will be necessary to establish a new experimental station.

There is this advantage in connection with the plant we have at Ottawa, that we are able to conduct these experiments with flax gathered from all parts of Canada. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the best results in actual fibre content have been produced from flax taken from the Gaspé peninsula in Quebec. Excellent results have also been obtained from flax produced in British Columbia. The second point is this:

That improved mechanical appliances and equipment being necessary for the economic harvesting of the crop, as well as for the preparation of fibre, constant watchfulness should be exercised by the Government to insure that Canadian growers may be supplied with most modern machinery for harvesting and scutching and instructed in the newest and best method of retting.

I have already referred to what has been accomplished with the flax pulling machine. I have also mentioned that we are now securing additional machinery from Europe to assist in the scutching process. I can assure the House that it is the intention of the department to follow up every avenue of information that is available with respect to the development of modern machinery that may be useful in this work. The retting process does not require machinery. This is really a matter of fermentation, and of experiment as to the length of time the fibre shall be under treatment. The third point is:

That in order to secure full economic value to the grower, it is desirable that the Government should establish a system of grading and standards consistent and constant (in so far as possible) with continental standards so that the world's best markets may be available for our exportable surplus.

I heartily agree with the observations of the hon. member who introduced this resolution with regard to the importance of this part of the industry. I think it quite possible that a great improvement could be made in standardizing our seed, in cleaning it, and in putting it in proper shape for the market. The proper cleaning of the seed and raising it to a proper standard, gives it a reputation that will, if we live up to it, ensure it a prominent place in those countries in Europe that have to import their seed every year. With reference to the other point that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) alluded to, the standardizing of the fibre itself, a greater difficulty is presented. The quality of the fibre depends, as I am informed, on the conditions of retting, conditions of weather, the condition of the plant when it is grown, and many other things, and you will find variations in quality of the fibre as between plants grown in the same field or in the same district. As far as my information goes, it has always been a difficult matter in the countries of Europe where this industry has been long established to secure absolute standards of quality in the fibre. Even to this day the fibre product is purchased almost entirely on the eyetest. The representative of a mill who is purchasing the commodity wants to see and examine it before he fixes the price for it. Every encouragement and assistance possible should be given to instructing and educating our growers and mills in the proper methods of preparing and treating the flax in order to get the best possible fibre product. That matter is receiving the attention of the department and will continue to do so.

These are the main points that have been referred to by the hon. member. We have in the experimental work we are conducting, the assistance of an Irish and a Belgian expert, and their knowledge is of very great value because, this industry being a comparatively new one in Canada, we have a great deal to learn in respect to it.

There is another point I would like to mention, and that is the possible use that may be made of the flax straw that is threshed in Western Canada. There we have not produced the flax for fibre purposes, but a good deal of consideration has been given to the fact that annually in those localities hundreds of thousands of tons of straw, containing a certain amount of valuable fibre, are burned and destroyed in cleaning up of the fields. A few years ago some experiments were conducted by private parties with a view to ascertaining whether or not there could be produced from this threshed flax straw fibre that could be converted into twine suitable for binding our Canadian crops. As hon. gentlemen know, the raw material that enters into the production of our binder twine comes from foreign countries.

A large proportion of this raw material is very closely controlled and we are altogether dependent on outside sources of supply. The experiments that were carried on by the gentlemen to whom I have referred indicate conclusively that a twine could be prepared from this straw. The factor that had to be determined was the cost at which it could be produced; and I might state for the information of the House that last fall the Department of Agriculture took this question up with the view of getting reliable information upon it. We arranged to secure several carloads of the straw in Western Canada and have it treated. We intend to take that straw to Ontario this summer, have it spun into twine, and keep correct data as to the cost of production, in order, if possible, to arrive approximately at an idea of what the cost of producing this twine would be. I see no reason why, with the development of modern science and its application to an industry of this kind, we cannot produce from the vast quantities of this material that is now destroyed every year, the twines that are necessary for all our crops in Canada. It may take a few years to work out the experiments, but I am confident that will eventually be done, and to that extent we will make ourselves independent of the sources of supply for these necessary twines that are now, as I have already said, very closely controlled in other parts of the world.

The information given to the House this afternoon in respect to the possibility of utilizing the fibre produced from this Western flax straw for the manufacture of linens and cloths was indeed very interesting. and served to show that we are only on the threshold of the development of what is possible in utilizing this material. I had not been aware that experimental work had been carried on in this respect.

I do not know that there is anything further that I can contribute to this discussion beyond saying that the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman in his address this afternoon will be taken into serious consideration. I think the flax industry of Canada owes a considerable debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Glass) because of the able and continuous manner in which he has studied this problem and brought it to the attention of the House and the Canadian people. The flax growers of Canada have been well represented in this House in that respect. Let me say that the industry is a growing one in Canada, and I believe it contains great possibilities. It should receive, and will receive, the most careful consideration and assistance that can be given in the way of conducting experimental work and ascertaining the best processes of treating the product and the most economical methods of handling it. It is rather a difficult matter for a private person to expend large sums of money in testing out different classes of machines, and I think that is work which can be properly undertaken by the Government. I can assure the hon. gentleman and the House that the department is thoroughly alive to the importance of this subject, and is gathering all the latest and best information with respect to it that is available. Under the circumstances I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he either allow his resolution to stand or withdraw it, the object which he had in mind in introducing it having doubtless been served by the discussion which has taken place.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is my duty, before the hon. gentleman exercises his undoubted right of closing the debate, to remind hon. gentlemen that the debate is about to terminate, in case there are any other members who would like to speak upon this subject.

Mr. GLASS: I shall detain the House but a moment or two in answering what has been said with respect to the possibility of soil exhaustion by growing flax. I did not refer to that point to-day to any extent because it was fully covered in my address to the House last year. This subject has not only been dealt with in Dominion Experimental Farm reports, but has been treated by Professor Zavitz, of the Ontario Agricultural College, Professor Doidge, of the Bureau of Agriculture, Washington, and Dr. A. W. Thornton, of Bellingham, Washington, a recognized authority who has done much research work and study for the Washington Government. These authorities have all expressed views entirely opposed to the theory that the growing of flax exhausts the soil; in fact, expert agriculturists are commonly agreed that the growing of flax, when used in rotation with other crops, does not cause any more exhaustion than other cereals, and not quite as much as oats. One cereal may take certain chemical properties out of the soil—for instance, flax takes considerably more nitrogen than wheat or oats—but that is easily replaced by rotation where clover is grown. The adoption of scientific agricultural methods can easily overcome the temporary loss of such chemical constituents, and therefore I say that the growing of flax does not result in any greater injury in the way of exhaustion of the soil than any other crop when it is used in proper rotation. I appreciate very much what the Minister of Agriculture has said on this subject. I brought this matter to the attention of the House in order to further the development of this industry throughout Canada, and having achieved my purpose, I now beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion agreed to and resolution withdrawn.

EFFICIENCY IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Motion by Mr. Steele for inquiry by a committee of the House.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) moved:—

That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee should be appointed during the present session to inquire into and report wherein the Inside Civil Service staffs in the various departments can be reduced and re-arranged with a view to securing the greatest efficiency in the service with the minimum number of employees, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

He said: At the outset I wish to state that owing to the very brief time now remaining for private members, this being the last day at their disposal, I propose to abbreviate the remarks I should otherwise have made, so as to allow other members to have an opportunity of bringing forward the resolutions standing in their names.

I am sure that I need not apologize to the House or to the country for moving this resolution. The Civil Service is the great working force of the country, and the country gets just such administration as the character of the Civil Service permits. A vast interest is being taken in the Civil Service throughout the country to-day, which is due to several reasons. One is that, largely owing to the war, there is a demand for efficiency in every line of industry and every occupation. Efficiency is being advocated in everything, and the country is demanding efficiency in the Civil Service. The abolition of patronage brought clearly before the minds of the people the fact that a great change had come in the method of appointments to the Civil Service. The new Act takes the matter of appointments out of the hands of members of Parliament, which in itself is a great revolution; and on that account the interest of the people has been awakened to the importance of the Civil Service. Another thing that has interested the country in the Civil Service is the fact that last fall the Civil Service made certain demands upon the Government which they followed up by threatening to go on strike and paralyse the work of the country. People began to wonder whether it was possible that in a time of war, when every one was putting forward his very best efforts to serve the country in one sphere or another, the five thousand civil servants in Ottawa would go on strike. That, perhaps, more than anything else led the people to realize that it was time that they took an interest in the Civil Service. It may be said, then, that a deep and widespread interest is being taken in the Civil Service by the electors, the taxpayers, the business men of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

It has long been believed that the conditions in the Civil Service are not satisfactory. I need not argue that in this House; that is a question on which members on both sides agree. In 1911 the Conservative party in the House of Commons apparently strongly believed—and I have no doubt did believe—that the Civil Service was in a bad condition; and since 1911 members of the Opposition have apparently believed even more strongly that the conditions are bad. Indeed, many of us who came into the House in 1911 were convinced by the arguments put forward by the Opposition in the last Parliament in regard to conditions in the Civil Service.

In 1907 the Courtney Commission was appointed to investigate conditions, and their report led us to believe that conditions existed at that time which should be remedied. The evils prevailing then were chiefly over-manning, incapacity and inefficiency; and to correct those evils the Civil Service Commission was appointed in 1909. But the Civil Service Commission could control only the flow of new members to the service, they could see that only efficient appointments were made; but at that time the commission could not correct the abuses inherent in the service. So that some evils which existed then still remain in the service, and many of us believe that they have not been lessened since 1909. If we want evidence of that, we have only to look at the report on the Printing Bureau made a few weeks ago. The committee appointed to investigate conditions in the Printing Bureau found that the inefficiency in that department of the Government service was shocking. They found certain the labour inefficient. They found certain staffs over-manned. They found the conditions in one department pitiable. In another department three men were employed where two could do the work. They found conditions in another department preposterous, and they found still another department a dumping ground for those who could not otherwise be placed. That is the condition that was found to exist in the Printing Bureau, and many of us believe that similar conditions, though perhaps not in the same degree, exist in many other departments. If an investigation were made by qualified men they would probably get information that would substantiate that assertion.

As long as political patronage existed the members of this House—at least those supporting the Government—were held responsible for these conditions. It is time that members should be relieved of that odium. We have no longer any responsibility for any of the appointments; that responsibility should be placed where it belongs. In future the responsibility for conditions in the Inside Service will rest upon the deputy heads of the departments. Section 47 of the Civil Service Act passed last year says:

> The deputy head of a department shall, subject to the directions of the head of the department, oversee and direct the officers, clerks, and employees of the department, and shall have general control of the business thereof, and shall perform such other duties as are assigned to him by the Governor in Council.

The deputy minister is the business head of his department. It is only reasonable that members of the House who long have been accused of making improper appointments and being responsible for conditions in the Civil Service should be relieved of any responsibility in that regard, and that we should now turn around and see that the men at present responsible shall clean up the Service and put it on a business basis.

I rather regret that the Government proposes to increase the salaries of deputy ministers to $6,000. The deputy who can manage his department efficiently and as any good business department should be managed is worth more than $6,000 a year to this country. But during this year I think we should have put the deputies on trial with a view to seeing whether they are qualified to clean up the Civil Service, and those deputies who proved themselves equal to the occasion might well have had their salaries increased next year to a figure commensurate with the work they are doing.

There is a good deal of over-manning in the Civil Service. May I point to one or two facts which I think will satisfy the House, that there is over-manning? We have in the Civil Service to-day 220 people who are of the age of 65 years or over, and 403 people over sixty years of age. While I would be the last to say one word of disparagement of the old man or woman in the Civil Service who has given good service in the past—and there are many of them—we are not so much concerned with that as with the efficiency of the service as a whole, and I think any person will admit that, where there is such a large percentage —about 8 per cent—of the civil servants over sixty years of age, that is a condition which does not tend to the greatest efficiency. The question is: What should be done with these men? That is for the House to deal with at a later date. A few days ago the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) stated in this House that there were in his department 24 men who were of an age that made them of very little use in the service; that he believed a similar condition existed in the Outside Service, and that the services of a very considerable number of men employed in his department might be dispensed with. We find that condition running throughout the whole Civil Service. We know efforts are being made at the present time to reform the service; but even if the plans proposed are carried out, that is not going to give us the reform which Parliament and the country desire in connection with the matter. We want to know what the condition is; we want to know whether there are too many men in the service or not, and if there are too many, this House is going to demand that the staffs be reduced and that the service be put on a business basis.

We have not only the old men who—especially those who have been efficient in their younger days—have the sympathy of every hon. member, but the inefficient class, the incapable class, and the idlers. Those men or women, because there are some women who come under one or another of those heads, deserve little or no sympathy. The man who is incapable to-day should not be in the service of the country. The man who is idling ought to be dismissed at once. The man who is inefficient ought to be either put in a position to become efficient or asked to retire from the service. Then we have another class which I think deserves the attention of the House as it is receiving the attention of the Government to-day. I refer to agitators in the Civil Service, men who are drawing salaries from the country for work which they are not doing, but whose time is being spent in agitating, agitating, agitating, stirring up strife in the service amongst other employees who are willing to give this country efficient service, disorganizing to a large extent the whole Civil Service, so that we are not getting the service and the work to which the country is entitled. We want to know the relations of those men to the Civil Service and to the country, and when we know that, this Parliament will be in a proper mood to deal with them. This is not a matter any longer for the Government or entirely for Parliament. It is a matter for the country, and let me emphasise that the country is demanding of its representatives in this Parliament that something shall be done, that the Civil Service shall be cleaned up and put on a business basis. I believe, if I correctly understand the spirit of this Parliament, that Parliament is going to demand from the Government that this be done, and we hope and believe that the Government, with this demand behind them, will have the courage to do this.

I am not one of those who feel disposed to offer lengthy criticism of the Civil Service Commission. I do not think they have yet had an opportunity of showing what they can do. I am not introducing this resolution to-day to excite any controversy or anything of that kind, and as far as I know, we have, as chairman of the Civil Service Commission, a man who is eminently qualified for the position and for performing the duties which he has undertaken to perform. I believe, in the course of a year or two, when the preliminary reorganization work of the Commission is completed, the country will be very well satisfied with the work the Commission has done.

I am not going to say anything further than simply to suggest to the Government that such a committee as I ask for in my resolution can be of vast service to the country and to Parliament at this time. I believe we can get information which cannot be got in any other way; and when we have that information, we shall be in a position to discuss intelligently the whole question of what shall be done with the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend taking up much of the time of the House in respect of the motion moved by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). He proposes that a committee be appointed to investigate whether the Inside Civil Service might not profitably be reduced and rearranged with a view to securing greater efficiency. The purpose of the resolution is quite a laudable one, and the Government have no desire whatever to object to the motion; in fact it will accept the same and consent to the appointment of a committee, which will be named after the Easter recess.

I am not, however, disposed to agree with the general statement that the Inside Service is to-day very greatly overmanned; but that is a question of fact and is well worthy of investigation by this committee and when the evidence is presented we shall know definitely whether the assertion that the Civil Service is overmanned is correct or not. Under our political system it would not be surprising if I were compelled to admit that there might be found an overmanning of the service in some departments, and more in some departments than in others. This is unavoidable, but nevertheless we should make every possible effort to keep the number in the service to the lowest possible minimum.

The hon. member, in speaking to the resolution, referred to the fact that there was in the service to-day a large number of people who were 65 years of age and over, and that there was further a large number who were over 60 years of age. The hon. gentlemen suggested that such members of the service had seen their best days and should, in some way or another, be retired. This question presents a very great difficulty, and I think the hon. gentleman himself admitted that difficulty, as, I am sure, will every hon. member. Prior to 1907, we had a Civil Service Superannuation Act, and it is very regrettable that that Act was ever repealed. I think I may say so, because the repeal was made by a Liberal Government which I was then supporting and of which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), who is now in the House, was a very prominent member. I have reason to believe that, since the repeal of the Superannuation Act, most of the members of the ministry of that day regret the step then taken. I hope that at a very early date the Government will take into consideration the question of the restoration of a superannuation system for the Civil Service. I do not know how popular that view is in the House or in the country, and I do not care very much, because I say, as a matter of principle, we should have such a superannuation system.

That statement is true not only of the Civil Service, but of all the great employing industries of this country. All these industries must adopt some form of superannuation. It is a fact that many of our leading industries to-day are adopting some scheme of insurance or superannuation for their employees; for instance, the banks and insurance companies. There is no reason in the world why any industry in Canada employing men in large numbers should not provide out of its income some system of superannuation and I hope the day will soon come when some form of insurance or superannuation will be open to every man who has followed the same employment for a certain number of years. Therefore, I should like, when the opportunity presents itself, to have an expression of the views of this House on a superannuation scheme for the Civil Service. As I have already intimated, within two or three weeks the Civil Service Commission's new system of classification will be presented to Parliament for consideration—I hope early in May. I think when presented it will be found to contain many improvements which will be readily accepted by the House, and I trust that the proposals will ultimately prove of great advantage to the public service and to the country.

When the Civil Service Act amendments and the classification resolutions are presented, ample opportunity will be afforded to hon. members to discuss the very matter which my hon. friend brings up in his resolution. The Government accepts the motion, and immediately after the Easter recess a committee will be named by the Government.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): I am in full sympathy with the object of this motion, and should like to point out another method of achieving the economy and retrenchment at which the motion aims. I have reference to the work of the Select Committee on National Expenditure in Great Britain, and especially to their seventh and ninth reports, which propose an examination of the Estimates by committee. The Select Committee gathered a great deal of valuable information and performed a great public service, and perhaps one of their greatest services was their recommendation with regard to a committee on Estimates.

It is not proposed to interfere with the present method of preparing the Estimates, but rather to suggest three reforms: first, and greatest in its scope, a committee of members of the House upon the Estimates; second, a change in the form of the Estimates so that they shall be more indicative of the purpose of the expenditure, and enable comparison to be made; third, that a motion to reduce a money vote be not treated as a want of confidence motion, the object, of course, being to ensure that the vote shall be regarded purely as an economic, and not as a political measure. A government's followers will not wreck a government for a small economy, at the sacrifice of large matters of policy.

A committee on Estimates was formed in Great Britain in 1912, and 1913, but it was found that the committee could not cover the whole field in a reasonable time. To go over all the Estimates would have taken them anywhere from ten to twenty years. The committee, not having any say as to policy, which, of course, in any responsible system of government must be settled by the Cabinet, found itself more or less stalled in its work. The main proposal of the Select Committee on National Expenditure was that there should be an Examiner of Estimates with a permanent clerical staff. They proposed two committees, or one committee with two sub-committees. One of these subcommittees was to consider expenditures on works that had already been launched, and the other to consider expenditures on new ventures—such as, in our case, the Health Department. In the meantime, the clerical staff of the Examiner of Estimates could be instructed to gather certain information, which could be laid before the committee at its next session. The committee would also have the power to examine witnesses and papers and to direct inquiries. That, of course, would mean an entire change in the method of considering the Estimates, and it would be going very much further than the mover of this resolution had in mind, because he is only looking to the Civil Service.

As a new member last year, the way in which the Estimates were considered seemed to me almost futile. Hours would be spent criticising the expenditure of a few hundred dollars, only the fringe of some subjects would be touched, and subsequently millions of dollars would be passed with little or no consideration. As a new member, I had no idea whether the proposed expenditure was commensurate with the service, and that is necessarily the position when the House cannot go into the facts, cannot call witnesses and go to the departments and look at the books and accounts. We have not the material before us on which to form an opinion. The Committee on Estimates would have the proposed expenditures under review and make their report. I do not propose to discuss other features of that report now, but I certainly should like to bring to the attention of the House and of the Government that means of securing retrenchment and economy in the whole public service, not merely in that part of the service called the Civil Service—the wage list—but in all expenditures.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I am not always as keen an economist, Mr. Speaker, as some hon. gentlemen who sit around me, but while this resolution is before the House I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. minister an important fact. There is a large number of men who are servants of this Government performing various duties, for instance, at that door and at the other door, and in other occupations around the gallery and the House, and who are looked upon as merely sessional servants. I have talked, or rather half a dozen of them have talked with me lately, and have informed me that during the last decade or so the wages of the different other civil servants have gone up year after year and year after year, while there is one class—so I am told—that for twelve or fifteen years have been working for the same wages. I think that is absolutely unfair, and I would ask the minister, feeling that he will take cognizance of my appeal, to see that ample justice is done these men. They tell me that fifteen years ago they were receiving the very same wages they are working for to-day. There is an old and respected gentleman at that door who told me the other day that when the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier died there passed away the last man who was in this House when he came here. Yet his wages are still the same, with the difference that in former years he came up to this House from Pictou county on a half railway fare, whereas to-day he has to pay the full fare. I can mention other cases, but I am only speaking for my own province. I have other cases; one from Inverness county, and I am speaking because my hon. friend (Mr. Chisholm) is absent; and I am speaking because I think my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. McGregor) is absent. I am speaking for the absentees, and I am going to ask the hon. minister if it is not advisable, or if at least it would not be praiseworthy that these men should be accorded an equal consideration with all other working men or all other servants of the country.

Mr. HERBERT M. MOWAT (Parkdale): I will support this resolution for the one chief reason that it asserts the principle that this House has not given up control of the Civil Service. I am heartily in favour of the efforts that are being made to improve the Civil Service; but I am inclined to believe from what I have heard that there are quite a number of senior officers in the Civil Service who since the passing of the Civil Service Act have not been playing the game as they should in supporting it. They have asserted themselves in many little ways to show that the whole matter of appointments on recommendation is with them. That should be so, but their actions should also be on the principles on which the Bill is founded. Here is a resolution for the appointment of a committee —I am glad to find that the minister says it is assented to by the Government, and that, indeed, might be made a permanent committee—which indicates that the Civil Service is yet to be under the control of Parliament. While it is a very important desideratum that the appointments should be made as they are, yet if in the administration of the Act the deputies and principal officers, superintendents and inspectors should exceed the powers which have been given them and appoint or recommend friends and on personal grounds, as has occurred in a few instances, this resolution serves notice upon them that Parliament has not given up control of the Civil Service, and unless they are prepared to carry out the Bill in its spirit Parliament will inevitably interfere again.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): It is not my intention to take up more than two or three minutes on this matter, but owing to the fact that the hon. minister said he would like to know the feeling of the House on the question of superannuation, I would like—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman will be in order in speaking on that subject at the present time. I understood the minister to say that the subject could be brought up when the amendments to the Civil Service Act would be under consideration. At the present time the resolution before the House relates entirely to the constitution of a special committee to examine into the Inside Service, and as this is the last day upon which resolutions introduced by private members can be discussed, I think the House will agree with the Speaker that the subject matter of this resolution should be strictly adhered to.

Mr. BEST: I might say a few words in reference to what one of the previous speakers said about different salaries—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman would not be in order. The speaker to whom he refers was allowed a certain amount of latitude so that he could no longer complain that he was always out of order.

Mr. BEST: I wish to say a word or two about the Committee that will be appointed, and I think I will then be in order. I hope that when the Government appoints that Committee they will wait until it reports before they take any action. We had a Civil Service Commission appointed about a year ago and we are told that that Commission will report in a few weeks. If a Committee is appointed I hope that nothing will be done until it reports, I believe, as the hon. member who introduced the resolution said, that very many departments are over-manned, and that some servants are drawing more than they should while others are not getting enough. I know men myself whom it is a shame to ask to work for what they receive, while I really think that some men get double what they should. I hope a Committee will be appointed that will look carefully into the different departments and make an honest report and that when that report is submitted the Government will have the nerve to act on it and not do as they have been doing in the past, giving men a little and having them come back every forty-eight hours. I support the resolution.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): We have already elaborate machinery for controlling the Civil Service. We have a minister whose, duty it is to deal with that, and a Civil Service Commission with jurisdiction over all appointments throughout the Dominion of Canada, and I am not sure that it would be advisable for a Committee to interfere at the present time until the minister has had an opportunity to look into the matter. I was somewhat surprised when he seemed to express a doubt as to the question of the Inside Service being over-manned. I do not think there is much doubt on that question. It was constantly contended, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition, that this service was over-manned. The present Prime Minister was constantly telling us that the service was over-manned, but after a change of Government took place we discovered that in about twelve months some 12,000 men had been dismissed or retired from service chiefly because they exercised the right of free citizens, and that some 25,000 had been put into their places. There has been a constant stream of appointments since that time, and there is no doubt that the service has been over-manned.

We had a report from Sir George Murray on this very question some years ago, and he said that the service was overmanned and that the conditions were confusing. He proposed some very important reforms that have not yet been fully carried out. I trust the present Minister of the Civil Service will undertake to carry them out and not confine himself too much to the question of superannuation. The question that is before the House is that of improving the Civil Service and making it an efficient instrument to do the work of the country. That is what we expect the minister to do. I know it is a big contract but he has a splendid opportunity to make a record. One of his first duties will be to get efficient men to take the places of those who are inefficient. Every man who has dealings with the departments knows how inefficient some of them are. I could show you files of letters in my desk which have accumulated when I was dealing with a little question like a sailor's wages that have been due since last January. A little balance is due him and I have been unable, after a lot of correspondence to secure a settlement. I get a polite answer from one officer, who sends me to another; I go to him and he sends me to another. One man told me that I had got into the wrong place and that I should know that the Minister of Naval Affairs was the man to go to. Notwithstanding all this correspondence I have not been able to get the few dollars that are owing to the sailor. I do not say all the departments are like that. There are some departments of the Government that I have had dealings with where a different condition obtains. If I write them a letter with regard to any matter of business I can get to the end of the transaction at some time, but there are other departments in regard to which I seem never to reach the end of the case with which I am dealing. This is a very important question. What I want to impress upon the minister is that the country is looking to him to give us an efficient Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not want to have the country looking to me with regard to matters for which I am really not responsible. There is really no such person as a Minister of the Civil Service.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): I think the thanks of the House are due to my hon. friend for South Perth (Mr. Steele) for having introduced this resolution. I have not heard anybody speak in a concrete way of the constitution of the committee that may be appointed. I think this is a most important matter from the standpoint of the efficiency of the committee and the relation that the soldier bears to the Civil Service and the other life of the country. There has been a good deal of pressure brought to bear upon the Government to have a soldier or two appointed to the Civil Service Commission. I think whether this is done or not—I do not speak of that at present—the minister will be well advised to consider the personnel of the committee that is under contemplation by virtue of this resolution. If the Government want efficiency in the public service I believe that owing to the training of the returned soldier, he having been amenable to discipline himself, efficiency will be brought to bear by giving an opportunity to returned soldiers from this House to be appointed on such a committee as is here proposed. The reason I say that is probably, in a general way, obvious to the members of the House. But, I have a personal reason for saying it. In conversation with a civil servant—temporarily connected with a rather important branch of the Service in Ottawa—he suggested that he had noticed a great many abuses within the department administered by himself and that he could not have corrected these abuses in the same way as he had, if he had not been a returned soldier. There are no doubt men in any public or private service who at times do not live up to their duties, are inclined in the performance of them to a laissez faire, don't-care sort of fashion, and if a returned soldier happens to have some authority, being accustomed to discipline himself, he naturally tries to discipline his staff. I think one of the weaknesses of the Civil Service to-day largely arises from overmanning. Whether due to political pressure or pressure of friends having the ear of a minister in the old days, or maybe having the ear of the Civil Service Commission to-day, the Civil Service has become overmanned, and girls and young men are employed in too great numbers. The returned soldier will not stand for very much of that sort of thing because he is not only trained disciplinarily but he is trained to efficiency. If I mistake not, I can see signs that the returned soldier, with the capacity for any walk in life, if employed by this Government, will bring to his service in aid of the State a great deal of strength and efficiency because he has been accustomed to discipline. I therefore think that the country will profit by looking to the returned soldier who has had the experience of war. The man who has gone through the war has gone through the stress and strain in the greatest crisis in the life of any man, and what I have observed in the returned soldier is that if he is anything he is not arrogant, he is absolutely fair. He has a big heart and that brings to his mind the necessity for fair judgment in regard to the services that he is rendering to the State and in the treatment of those who may be under his control. Therefore, I would ask the minister to take note and see that the returned soldier is well represented upon any such committee, so that in that regard, there being a common feeling throughout the country that the returned soldier should get the best the country can give him, the returned soldier who is seeking employment at the hands of his country in this period of reconstruction and development shall have some little consideration paid to him—rather would I say, shall have some great consideration paid to him. I think the minister would be well advised if he considered that carefully when he was appointing this committee because in that way he will get efficiency where probably if it were overlooked we will fall back into the humdrum ways of the past and into the old conditions, and will lose what, to my mind, is the most salient feature in the new public life that is coming in this Canada of ours. I leave that suggestion with the minister in the hope that he may act upon it.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that there is a good deal of merit in the suggestions contained in the resolution and that there are a good many things about the Civil Service that might be put in a better position than they are now in. I have no hope whatever that those remedies or good results will come from the appointment of this Committee. I know this House pretty well, and have known it for a good many years, and if I were asked to-day to select three or five of its members to bring in satisfactory recommendations as a result of conducting inquiries as to the proper operation of various offices in the Civil Service, I would be at a loss where to begin. I do not think any member of this House, even a returned soldier, or anybody else, is possessed of the necessary training or experience to bring about the needed reforms. I would suggest to the minister, although we have at present a great many administrators, a great many departments, and a great many officials, as a result of my experience in the district from which I come where there are in operation big industries employing a great many men, that if a superintendent of the Civil Service in Canada were appointed—an officer of equal rank, influence and independence with the Auditor General—to act as general supervisor of the Civil Service and the several departments in this country, a big man and possessed of the necessary training for the position, then we might expect to derive some beneficial and permanent results. I do not expect such results will follow from the appointment of a Committee of the House, and I say that without desiring in the slightest to cast any reflection upon such Committee. If we are going to effect reform in the Civil Service, we must have somebody who is thoroughly familiar with the work of that service, who follows every move that takes place, and who is in a position to systematize the whole of its operations. I think the great fault in the Civil Service to-day, just as much as overmanning, is the lack of system. No system prevails in the departments whereby one man if given the opportunity and a proper allotment of work might perform perhaps just as much service as two or three men now render. The present defects are not so much the fault of the men themselves as of the existing system. I therefore venture to make this suggestion to the minister who has spoken on behalf of the Civil Service, and who has so many departments to look after that we scarcely know how to correctly address him.

The mover of the resolution (Mr. Steele) said that the country had its eyes on the Civil Service and was interested not only in the proceedings of this House but in the work which all branches of the Service have to do. There is no doubt about that fact, and that is just as it ought to be. We should strive to cultivate a live public opinion in respect to every matter with which we deal, because such an opinion will have a most wholesome effect upon the members of this House and upon the Civil Service, as well as upon public officers generally. This is the last day that private members will have for the ventilation of matters before the Easter recess, and I had hoped to have an opportunity of saying a word to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) about some things that touch the membership of this House, and the service of the country as a whole. In view of the prevailing conditions the present is a time when above all other times, public matters should receive proper attention. The meeting of wartime conditions, the carrying out of a reconstruction policy, and the development of the country generally, call for the exercice of our very best judgment. Had the acting Prime Minister been here I would have urged upon him although perhaps I should not be quite in order, that the whole of the people should be represented in this Chamber. However, I will tell the other members of the Government who are present and impress upon them the necessity of giving representation in Parliament to large bodies of people all over the country who are now without that representation, and I hope that during the recess they will take the matter under serious consideration.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): In my opinion it is the most opportune time, although possibly a little late in the session, for the principle of such a resolution as this to be approved by the House and to go into effect. I was a little surprised at the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, who might well say that his remarks were out of order, in advocating class representation in Canada. I will not imitate the hon. gentleman's example, except to say that we have representative government in Canada, although at times I have doubted whether the Government rules, and whether the people are the ultimate tribunal, or whether the Civil Service are going to conduct public affairs. When we came here at the beginning of this session we experienced a condition of affairs that, in my opinion, warrants some action being taken. We have seen these people, as a result of the legislation passed by the House a year ago, form an organization which I consider a menace to the country if those concerned endeavour to carry out what they are now attempting to do. We have seen the business of this country held up for days at a time, and the proceedings of the Parliament not being printed, as the result of the attitude of a certain department of the public service. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) referred to the reforms that might take place in the Civil Service through the admission to its ranks of the returned soldier; but unfortunately, out of some thirty thousand appointments made, permanent and temporary, since the enactment of the amended Civil Service Act of last session, only about twelve per cent of the number have been made from the ranks of the returned soldiers. I do not know whether that is the danger they foresee or not. Meetings are being held in this city from time to time that are having a tremendous influence on the legislation of this country as regards the whole of the people. Under the circumstances I am surprised to find the leader of the Opposition getting up in this House and advocating class representation in this Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the hon. member misunderstood me. Upon what remarks of mine does he found the statement he has made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman regretted that various bodies were not represented in Parliament, and hoped that in the future they would be.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have reference to counties such as Glengarry and North Ontario, that are at present without representation in this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman was by inference leaving the impression that the agitation which is now abroad in this country should be recognized.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly not: I had no such intention. What I said was that the counties that are now without members should be given representation in the House as speedily as possible.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am very glad to hear the hon. member make that statement. I rose to take part in this debate only because I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman was advocating something entirely different.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: You can scarcely go into a passenger coach on any railway in this country without hearing something of that kind advocated, and I may have been a little too ready to associate the hon. gentleman's remarks with what we hear so much of these days. However, if there is a lack of system in a body which exerts such a tremendous influence as the Civil Service does, in a body where the most thorough system should be employed, then we should have such a committee as is suggested by this resolution to inquire into this matter. Such a thing as happened during the early part of this session should not be permissible. It should not be possible for these people to hold up the business of the country as it was held up; some regulation or some means should be provided to ensure that such a thing shall not again occur. I heartily approve of the resolution.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF OWNERSHIP, ETC., OF NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, all newspapers, magazines, trade journals and other periodicals publishing articles designed to influence public opinion shall be compelled from time to time to publish sworn statements setting forth the names of the owners, managers, editors, stockholders, bondholders and of any other person having an interest in such newspaper, magazine, trade journal or other periodical.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this motion is self-evident and the principle which it embodies will, I am sure, be adopted by the House. I had intended to bring this motion up earlier in the session, but unfortunately it has not been reached on the Order Paper until to-day.

I look upon the press as a torch, but as a torch which must at times be held in the hands of the people; thus the torch may be shaken so that it may burn brighter. It is said that a stream will not rise higher than its fountain; the St. Lawrence will not run backwards over the Great Lakes. In other words, the press of Canada will be what the representatives of the people choose to make it. The honest and independent press of Canada will I am sure, support this motion, because the honest press stands for light, not for darkness; stands as a beacon, not as a false light. This motion does not mean an abridgment of the liberty of the press. The liberty of the press in the English-speaking world is merely a matter of history. We know that at the beginning the press was under the control of the King, that nothing was published in book or pamphlet form or otherwise that did not bear the stamp of His Majesty. Then, later came the censorship, and finally by a gradual process the liberty of the press was proclaimed. We have in the words of Lord Wynford a statement of the exact status of the press to-day in the English-speaking countries. He said in a very famous case:—

My opinion of the liberty of the press is that every man ought to be permitted to instruct his fellow subjects; that every man may fearlessly advance any new doctrines, provided he does so with proper respect to the religion and government of the country; that he may point out errors in the measures of the public men, but he must not impute criminal conduct to them. The liberty of the press cannot be carried to this extent without violating another equally sacred right, the right of character. This right can only be attacked in a court of justice, where the party attacked has a fair opportunity of defending himself. Where vituperation begins, the liberty of the press ends.

That is the dictum of Lord Wynford in the famous historical case of Rex vs. Burdett. The press in all liberty-loving countries is an instrument which serves the public; it carries the news and pretends to educate the public. The newspapers to-day circulate in hundreds of thousands, advocating causes, presenting issues, and swaying public opinion. That being the case, the press should not sail under false colours; the greater the freedom of the press the greater should be the protection to the public. I say that the mission of the press is not only to disseminate news, but to educate the public. In the education of our young people there is a very close inspection not only of the pupils, but also of the educators themselves, the professors, the masters. There is a board of supervision, and you cannot clothe that board with too much power in order to protect the rising generation. In the United States they have realized the necessity of protecting the public against the evil influence which the press may exercise through its freedom, and they have passed a law which does exactly what my resolution suggests. In Canada the immense privilege which the press has obtained to circulate almost freely from one end of the country to the other has been accompanied by very little effort on the part of the press to repay the public for that privilege. In 1882 an Act was passed to provide for the free transmission of Canadian newspapers by mail within the Dominion. The proviso establishing the conditions of that power of free transmission was as follows:—

> It must be known and recognized as a newspaper or periodical in the generally received sense of the word, and published regularly at intervals of not more than one month.
> The full title, place and date of publication, and the distinguishing number of the issue must be printed at the top of the first page, and also on any paper purporting to be a supplement to it, and sent with it.
> It must be addressed to a bona fide subscriber, or to a known newsdealer in Canada.

That was the only condition exacted from the proprietors of newspapers in 1882, when this law was enacted by Parliament. It has not been changed since. In the United States much more progressive legislation has been enacted. I find in the United States:

> That it shall be the duty of the editor, publisher, business manager, or owner of every newspaper, magazine, periodical, or other publication to supply to the Postmaster General and the postmaster at the office at which said publication is entered, not later than the first day of April and the first day of October of each year, on blanks furnished by the Post Office Department, a sworn statement setting forth the names and post office addresses of the editor and managing editor, publisher, business managers, and owners, and, in addition, the stockholders, if the publication be owned by a corporation; and also the names of known bondholders, mortgagees, or other security holders; and also, in the case of daily newspapers, there shall be included in such statement the average of the number of copies of each issue of such publication sold or distributed to paid subscribers during the preceding six months.

Then there is a proviso that this does not apply to religious, fraternal, temperance and scientific, or other similar publications. It was further provided:

> That all editorial or other reading matter published in any such newspaper, magazine or periodical for the publication of which money or other valuable consideration is paid, accepted, or promised, shall be plainly marked "advertisement."

This is a very wise legislation, and all that I ask by this resolution is that Canada should adopt similar legislation in order to give to our press the stamp of honesty and respectability. Let me give a case in point. The Montreal Herald, for over a century, was an old and faithful adherent of the Liberal party. It was the old, recognized organ of the Liberal party amongst the English-speaking minority of my province. It had a large clientele. Suddenly, after the election of 1911, Mr. Brierly who had become the proprietor of that paper, mysteriously sold it first to Mr. McGibbon, then to Sir Hugh Graham, who afterwards became Lord Atholstan, both being Tories. But Mr. Brierly was the mask; he was still generally supposed to be the owner. One day Mr. Brierly disappeared. As I said, he first sold the paper to Mr. McGibbon and Mr. McGibbon finally sold it to Lord Atholstan, and during all that time the paper retained the appearance of being a Liberal paper, whilst it was kept in existence by Lord Atholstan, only to prevent a rival from coming into the field against the Montreal Star. This was disclosed in a celebrated case in Montreal, and the respectable English-speaking Liberal people of Montreal were shocked to find that such a game had been played at their expense. From that moment, I decided that I would introduce this resolution in order that the owners, stockholders and mortgagees of papers should be known, so that a paper preaching morality, respectability, should be known under its true colours. The people are entitled to know who are behind the newspapers, who are their backers, if I may use that sporting expression, and the respectable papers of Canada will favour the United States legislation. There is need for such publicity. We live in an era in which publicity is necessary. I cannot forget that during the past two or three years, the country has been flooded with newspapers and magazines, publishing huge advertisements. By whom were those costly advertisements paid; and how is it that at a given moment the whole of the Liberal press of Canada suddenly passed from the Liberal party to the Tory party? When I read those advertisements, I could not help saying in the House, and I repeat it again to-day, that the press, with few honourable exceptions, had been chloroformed, if not bought. The respectable papers of Canada object to being branded as having been bought, and they will, therefore, support my motion. The other day I was reading one chapter of the American Commonwealth by Viscount Bryce, and I cannot better close my remarks than by quoting what that great English writer says about publicity:

> The genius of universal publicity may have some disagreements, but the wholesome ones are greater and more numerous. Selfishness, injustice, cruelty, tricks, jobs of all sorts shun the light. To expose them is to defeat them. No serious evil, no rankling sore in the body politic, can remain long concealed, and when disclosed, it is half destroyed.

Once more, I say that this is a progressive reform, and I hope the Government will accept it and that a Bill will be introduced along the lines of the American legislation.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I desire to support the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux). I am in favour of publicity with regard to ownership of newspapers. The purport of the resolution is, of course, that the Government will afterwards, if they see fit, introduce legislation somewhat similar to that which exists in the United States. It will, I think, be conceded by everybody that anything that will tend to increase the responsibility of newspaper editors and proprietors is a good thing. I have no quarrel with the newspapers, which are doing very good work, and of course, we all recognize the splendid work that many of them did in connection with the war. I am also well aware that they are privately-owned, and that the owners have a right to control their paper and to dictate its policy. I have no objection to that. At the same time, the newspaper moulds public opinion, and it has a good deal to do with the Government of the country, so much so that it has been given the name of "the fourth estate." We are in this country governed by the Governor General representing the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons. We know who the Governor General is; the senators are well known; the members of this House are public men and well known, at all events, in their own constituencies; but the fourth estate, we do not know anything about; we do not know who they are, and we all recognize that they have a very important place in the government of the country, and they always will be so in the government of a democratic country like ours.

In addition to this the newspapers receive large concessions from the public in this country in connection, for example, with carriage in the mails. If you or I, Sir, wish to mail one issue of a newspaper of 50,000 copies to our constituents, it would cost us a cent apiece, or $500, but under the postal laws of this country a newspaper proprietor is required to pay only a quarter of a cent per pound, and I have been told that on an average, or at all events in a great many cases, it takes five newspapers to weigh a pound. If that is true, the newspaper proprietor would have to pay only about $25 for the service of the mails, while the private individual would have to pay $500, or twenty times as much.

I took occasion a few days ago to ask some questions about the cost of carrying newspapers in the mails, and the Government answered, as follows:

> 1. What was the gross postal revenue derived from newspapers for the year 1918? Answer: $291,539.21.
> 2. What is the estimated expenditure for the same year in so far as newspapers are concerned? Answer: The department has no data on which a close estimate of the expenditure involved in handling newspapers can be made, except that newspapers make up about 65 per cent of the bulk of the mails. The total expenditure for the carriage of mails and the cost of mail bags during the fiscal year 1918 was $8,293,515.24.
> 3. What is the average daily weight of newspapers carried in the mails? Answer: 239,731 pounds.

Now, 65 per cent of the total cost amounts to $5,390,784, so that we only received from the newspapers $291,539. After crediting what we received, there is a difference of over $5,000,000 which the people of this country contributed to the cost of delivering newspapers to subscribers. That is a very large sum of money. But that does not exhaust all that we do. As members of this House we vote $50,000 a year to the Press Association, on the principle that it furnishes the people with information. The farmers of the country recognize the great importance of the press. I saw a few days ago that the farmers of the province of Ontario are purchasing a weekly newspaper, with the intention of running it as a daily, as an organ to boost their views before the country. They understand that it is of vast importance to them as a class to have their views put before the public. The Union Government have also resorted to this method of establishing themselves in the country, as witness the publication of that organ of public opinion known as the Canadian Official Record. The people are not deceived as to the object of the Official Record. Sometimes it publishes Orders in Council and official documents, but when it resorted to printing the political speeches of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) and other ministers, it became plain to the public that its real mission was to strengthen the party machine by circulating Union propaganda at the public expense. The Germans understood the importance of controlling the press. In the investigation that took place recently in the United States, it was disclosed that they had purchased newspapers. These men had even invaded the capital and had purchased the Washington Times for something like $375,000. Referring to this, the Montreal Witness said:

> The serious feature of all these German plottings is the faith that the emissaries of evil place in the purchase or manipulation of the press. They at least do not doubt that in buying newspapers they are buying the souls of men. It will soon be necessary for free peoples to make the facts as to the ownership of newspapers, and every money interest that affects them public property.

That is the object of this resolution—to give publicity as to the ownership of newspapers. The question arises, will this not be objected to by the newspapers themselves. I see no reason why the owner of any responsible high-class newspaper should object. There is no better work in which a man can be engaged than in the newspaper business when it is conducted as it should be conducted, and the man who is conducting a respectable high-class journal certainly will not object to having the ownership of the paper disclosed to the public. They did not object in the United States, and I see no reason why they should object in Canada.

Of course, this is a matter for the Government. No private member could hope to succeed in passing a Bill of this kind, especially at this late state of the session, unless it was adopted as a Government measure. It is up to the Government to say whether this shall become law or not. I want to say to the Government that they could not do anything more democratic or anything that would please the public better than to enact legislation along the lines of this resolution. I express no opinion as to what their attitude will be but simply invite the Government to take this matter into consideration, and if possible, to embody the principles of the resolution in a statute before the end of the present session.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: There is very much to commend the principle which is set forth in this resolution, and I regret there is not an opportunity to debate it this afternoon. We should not, of course, express an opinion in an abstract way upon a subject which possibly is not within our jurisdiction, and I have some doubt as to whether the Federal Parliament might have jurisdiction to legislate along the lines suggested by my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Amend the postal laws.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: If this Parliament has jurisdiction, I suppose it would be in the way of exercising control over the postal delivery of papers coming within the scope of this resolution.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what they have done in the United States.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: I should like to have the opportunity of giving consideration to this matter and of bringing it before my colleagues, and if my hon. friend would bring up the subject again, say on the Post Office Estimates, I should then be in a position to give the view of the Government. In the meantime, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and the debate adjourned.

NATIONAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that a Special Committee be appointed forthwith to consider the matter of the establishment in Canada of a National Research Institute for research work in the various industries of Canada and the co-ordination therewith of the scientific branches of the various departments of the Government, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Mr. WM. F. NICKLE (Kingston): That resolution, Mr. Speaker, is seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews).

Mr. CRONYN: At this hour, Mr. Speaker, it would be quite impossible to attempt to even outline the reasons and arguments in favour of this resolution, I therefore simply move it.

Mr. NICKLE: I would like to move an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Marshall).

That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "In the opinion of this House, it is desirable that a Special Committee be appointed forthwith to consider the matter of the development in Canada of Scientific Research, with power to call for persons, papers, and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

The only object of the amendment is to widen the scope of the resolution.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Mr. BUTTS: Before putting the motion, Mr. Speaker, would you permit me——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: Before you adjourn the House, Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the Table the annual report of the Editorial Committee. With the unanimous consent of the House, I should also like to make a reply to a question asked the Government yesterday by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) in respect to a strike in Montreal between——

Mr. BUTTS: You have called me to order two or three times now, Mr. Speaker. Why do you not call the minister to order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BUTTS: I am just asking that question now as one I have a right to ask and a right to expect an answer to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BUTTS: You have called me down, and now you are listening to the minister.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member who is leading the House has always been accorded the privilege, by unanimous consent, at the moment of adjournment, and also when the Orders of the Day are called, to lay upon the Table certain papers and to answer certain questions of public importance. When I called the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Butts) to order a moment ago it was after a resolution had been disposed of and when no other matter was under consideration.

Mr. BUTTS: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I sat down then and obeyed your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BUTTS: I wish to say—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACLEAN: I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that yesterday the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) asked for information regarding a strike difficulty between the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company and its employees. At the moment I was unable to give him the information, but after inquiry I have learned that negotiations are now going on between the employers and employees and an early solution of the difficulty is hoped for.

The House adjourned at six o'clock.

Tuesday, April 22, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Volume 4 of the Report of the Auditor-General for the year ended March 31, 1918. —Sir Thomas White.

WAR MEASURES ACT, 1914—EXTENSION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 71 to extend the operation of the orders and regulations passed by the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I do not think copies of this Bill have been distributed. I would therefore be obliged if the minister would allow the Bill to stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill is so simple in its composition that there is very little to be gained by its distribution, although, as a matter of fact, it has been distributed in both languages. It simply provides that Orders in Council passed under the authority of the War Measures Act, 1914, shall, notwithstanding any effect of the termination of the war in the meantime, remain in operation until the prorogation of this session of Parliament, subject, of course, to the existing right of the Governor in Council to rescind any such order in whole or in part. That is the entire purpose of the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is most comprehensive I should say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a comprehension of all that is intended of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Is the Order in Council prohibiting the importation of intoxicating liquor into one province from another one of the Orders in Council covered by the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. The effect of the passage of this Bill would simply be to extend the life of the Order in Council for the duration of this session, subject to the power of the Governor in Council to repeal it. That is to say, the Bill prevents all these Orders in Council from being automatically repealed, by the mere fact, of the termination of the war.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): May I join with my leader in asking the minister to postpone the second reading of this Bill? It is very simple, as he says, but it is a contentious measure and I know of many members who desire to speak on it, but who are not present to-day. This is the first meeting of the House after Easter recess, and I hope the minister will grant the postponement of the second reading as desired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Although I do not like to resist the appeal to defer the second reading of the Bill, let me point out that we arranged to go on with it this afternoon. There is this consideration to be borne in mind: We have no knowledge as to when the proclamation terminating the war may issue. This Bill must receive its second reading, must go through committee and receive its third reading, then be passed by the Senate, and obtain the Royal assent and all that prior to the issue of a proclamation by His Majesty terminating the war. Consequently it is felt that we cannot afford to delay action in this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the minister postpone the second reading until to-morrow?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I will agree to that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the minister considered the advisability of letting these Orders in Council lapse and re-enacting those that are deemed to be of any use?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are considering that every day, but our consideration must be applied to each one individually.

Motion allowed to stand.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT—FOREIGN FRATERNAL SOCIETIES.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the second reading of Bill No. 54 (from the Senate), to amend the Insurance Act, 1917. He said: I desire to have this Bill referred for consideration to the Banking and Commerce Committee. As it is of a technical character, I think I can best explain its purpose and object to the House by reading a memorandum prepared by the Superintendent of Insurance:

The object of this Bill is to provide additional safeguards for the members of fraternal benefit societies operating in Canada, and to make it necessary for foreign fraternal societies to obtain licenses under the Insurance Act, before transacting business in Canada.

The Insurance Act as passed in 1917, and as it has existed since 1885, exempts from its provisions fraternal benefit societies, and at the present time the only fraternal benefit societies licensed under the Act are those societies which have been incorporated by the Dominion Parliament and whose Charters require them to obtain such licenses. Of these there are at present seven. There is in addition one provincially incorporated society which has voluntarily submitted itself to the provisions of the Act.

In addition to these societies there are operating in Canada sixteen foreign fraternal societies and large number of fraternal societies incorporated by the legislatures of the various provinces.

The Dominion Parliament has jurisdiction to require the foreign societies to obtain licenses before transacting business in Canada and this requirement is imposed by the Bill.

For foreign societies not now transacting business in Canada the Bill provides that they must be actuarially solvent before obtaining licenses.

For the sixteen foreign societies now transacting business in Canada, many of which are actuarially insolvent the Bill provides that they may receive licenses up to 1925, provided they properly secure their new members by deposits in Canada, held for their protection exclusively. After 1925, however, the societies must be entirely solvent if their licenses are to be continued.

Foreign societies now transacting business in Canada which are unable to get a license, may continue business in respect of existing policies without incurring penalty.

Parliament has not the same jurisdiction in respect of the provincial societies, and the provisions of the Bill are that these societies may obtain licenses under the Act if they are actuarially solvent, but they are not compelled to do so.

If such a society applies for a license and is not actuarially solvent, it may obtain a license until 1925 if it either deposits with the minister securities to fully protect new members, or creates a separate class, whose fund is actuarially solvent, into which new members will be admitted. After 1925 the license will be continued only if the society as a whole is actuarially solvent.

One of the most important provisions of the Bill is that requiring annual valuations by an actuary, and an annual certificate by an actuary that the society is actuarially solvent.

The standing of the actuary is assured by requiring that he shall be a Fellow of the British Institute of Actuaries, or the Faculty of Actuaries of Scotland, or the Actuarial Society of America. It is believed to be essential that the many serious problems facing these societies should be dealt with by actuaries of the highest standing.

The Bill repeals certain sections of the Act respecting Assessment Companies under which the licensed societies have been operating and which have been for some years more or less inapplicable to these societies, and substitutes a new Part IIA applicable solely to fraternal societies.

The Bill also repeals the exemption granted to fraternal societies.

In a word, the object of this Bill is more effectually to protect members of foreign fraternal societies. Before it was introduced in the Senate it had been carefully considered by the Superintendent of Insurance, who took it up with the societies concerned. I believe that the Bill as now drafted meets the desire of all parties interested and effectually protects the public. As the Bill is of a rather complicated and technical character, I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. It has already passed the Senate.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the Bill was referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

FERTILIZERS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Fertilizers Act, 1909, chapter 16, and to provide that on and after the 1st day of February, 1920, the phosphoric acid contents in the guaranteed analysis of a fertilizer shall be stated in certain terms; that the registration number and guaranteed value shall be plainly printed upon a tag of prescribed size, shape, and colour, and attached to every package sold, or to the invoice if sold in bulk, and such invoice and tag shall be delivered to the purchaser; that the vendor who sells to the consumer shall affix to every package of fertilizer sold in Canada special stamps, to be provided and sold by the Minister for the purpose, to the value of one cent for every hundred pounds or fractional part of one hundred pounds of fertilizer contained in the package, which the vendor shall cancel upon sale, and which shall not be removed until the package is emptied, and if sold in bulk such stamps shall be affixed to the invoice and cancelled by the vendor; and also that an analysis of a registered fertilizer may be obtained upon application in prescribed form, that certain authorized inspectors may enforce the provisions of the Act; that the results of analysis shall be published, regulations may be made and penalties enforced for violation of the Act.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The amendments proposed by the resolution are not very numerous. The Bill will provide for a definition of the word "analyst"; it had been assumed that the word "analyst" had the same meaning in this Act as it had in the Adulteration Act. Owing to the fact that lime has in recent years very extensively come into use as a fertilizer, the Bill will provide that lime shall be included as a fertilizer. The Bill will also recognize the administration of the Fertilizers Act under the Department of Trade and Commerce instead of under the Department of Inland Revenue. It was intended that the Bill should provide a method of stating the phosphoric acid content in the guaranteed analysis of a fertilizer; I propose, however, when we reach the Bill, to have this section deleted and to cover the matter by regulation. The other amendments proposed are amplifications of the existing sections of the Fertilizers Act, with one exception: it is proposed to make provision—this has not hitherto been the law—for securing a revenue from the inspection of fertilizer. The Bill will provide that the vendor who sells to the consumer shall affix to every package of fertilizer sold in Canada special stamps to be provided and sold by the minister for the purpose, to the value of one cent for every hundred pounds or fractional part of one hundred pounds of fertilizer contained in the package. When the fertilizer is sold in bulk, it is provided that the stamp shall be affixed to the invoice. This is the principal amending feature of the Bill.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the purpose of the stamp?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To secure a revenue to pay for the administration of the Act. This is done in the case of almost everything else which, before sale, is inspected under federal statute.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In some countries a great impetus is given to agriculture by encouraging the production and use of fertilizers. Is this proposed legislation intended to that end, or is the department taking any steps to encourage it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The legislation is not of the nature suggested by my hon. friend. I cannot say that at the present moment any special or practical steps are being taken to encourage the production of fertilizers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Or the use thereof.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I imagine that the Agricultural Department is doing everything it can to encourage the general use of fertilizers. During the past summer investigations were made by a department of the Government into the matter of securing potash as a by-product from cement works. The report of the officer making the investigation has not yet been submitted to the Government, but it will very soon. The other amendments are very trivial and might better be considered after the Bill is introduced.

Mr. CAHILL: About what amount does the minister expect to realize from this stamping provision? It seems to me that this business of tagging one cent on every hundred pounds of fertilizer is very foolish legislation. A man is almost afraid to sell anything now on account of a multiplicity of regulations, and if you are going to regulate this thing to death, it might as well be left out of account.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At present all fertilizer produced in Canada is subject to inspection by federal officers; it is proposed that this charge shall cover the cost of that inspection. The policy may be wise or unwise; I suggest that my hon. friend allow that point to stand till the Bill is printed.

Mr. CAHILL: Is lime to be included as a fertilizer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Is all lime to be subject to this stamping provision?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All lime that is manufactured and sold for the purpose of fertilization.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has it been found that improper substitutes for fertilizers have been sold?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Just at the moment I could not speak with a knowledge of the facts, but I think it frequently has occurred that fertilizers below the standard required by the statute have been manufactured and sold.

Mr. McCOIG: I do not think any hon. members will question the great importance of fertilizers being used for the encouragement of greater production, but it seems almost ridiculous to have a one-cent stamp placed on every hundred pounds of fertilizer and lime that is sold for fertilizing purposes. This would probably necessitate the appointment of some additional officers to carry out these regulations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. McCOIG: At the present time, manufacturers of fertilizer have to state on the package the different ingredients of the contents. Is the Minister of Agriculture or is his department recommending this change which might have a greater importance than we may at present be aware of?

Mr. POWER: People interested in the fertilizing industry in Quebec have asked me to oppose this resolution on the ground that for some years past they have made very strenuous efforts to induce the farmers of that province to make a greater use of fertilizer and that, in their opinion, the imposition of such a tax will set their strenuous efforts at naught. They consider that this is not the time to impose such a tax when farmers are just beginning to realize the importance of fertilizers and the benefit that can be derived from them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When we come to consider the Bill I should be glad to hear the representations of my hon. friend. If he can then satisfy me that those provisions of the Bill are against the public interest, I shall be glad to meet what are the interests of the public.

Mr. EULER: I would not raise any particular objection to the imposition of a tax on this commodity, but has the minister seriously considered whether this is the best method of collecting such a tax? In this case, as in the case of the tax on patent medicines, stamps have to be affixed to the packages, and this is a most awkward and inconvenient method of collecting these taxes. The druggists are raising a great deal of objection to this method of imposing taxes on drugs, and this is simply an extension of the same idea. Will the minister consider very seriously whether, if it is necessary to obtain this revenue, it could not be obtained much more readily and with much less inconvenience to the public by having the stamp affixed to the package by the manufacturer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the principle in this Bill. This Bill will hardly be comparable with the tax on drugs to which my hon. friend refers, because in that instance it was found impossible to impose a tax on the wholesaler or manufacturer, and, therefore, it is in some measure a very objectionable tax to the public because the stamp has to be affixed to the article when it is sold in the retail drug store.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why should it be impossible to have the stamp affixed in the wholesale drug store? Four or five good, decent druggists in my constituency were fined fifty dollars each because they sold a patent medicine box without a stamp on it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should not say it was impossible to impose the patent medicine tax upon the manufacturer or the wholesaler, but it was very difficult to administer the Act otherwise than it is now being administered. I remember that the tax when first introduced provided that it be paid by the manufacturer and wholesaler, but during the same session the Act had to be amended to its present form. There are, of course, very few manufacturers of fertilizers in Canada, and it is the intention that the tax be paid by the manufacturer, so that the retailer will not be troubled. At least that is my understanding of the matter at present.

Mr. EULER: What is the idea of the provision to attach the stamp to each package containing 100 or a fractional part of 100 pounds? Does not that indicate that the stamp must be affixed by the retailer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That will be done as the package leaves the factory.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. Maclean thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 74, to amend the Fertilizers Act, 1909.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS ACT AMENDMENT.

The House in Committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, chapter thirty-two of the statutes of 1917, and to provide for the preservation of rights of farmers, drovers, and other persons to sell and buy at stockyards, for regulations regarding inspection, for the size of packages of wool, for compliance with the requirements regarding inspection, branding and marketing before shipment, for the issue of inspectors' certificates, and for the increase of the penalty for violating the Act.—Hon. Mr. Crerar—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister please explain the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. CRERAR: The purport of these amendments is to strengthen in some particulars the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act which was passed by this Parliament two years ago. The resolution provides for establishing more clearly the rights of farmers and drovers in dealing on live stock exchanges. It provides also for the inspection of certain live stock products, for the grading, handling and marketing of which provision had been made under the Act as it stood. It goes further and gives the Governor in Council power to establish regulations governing the marking and branding of certain of these products when imported into Canada, that are subject to regulation when produced in Canada. It also provides for the passing of regulations for the closer control and inspection of shipments in Canada, and for the enforcement of any regulations that may be passed under the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: I presume the word "wool" refers to Canadian wool. It has been brought to my notice that there are some difficulties in the use of Canadian wool by our woollen manufacturers. I am told that our woollen manufacturers for the most part import their wool;—that may or may not be the case, I have no knowledge of the matter myself. I have also been told that large quantities of our Canadian wool are bought and taken across to the United States and there treated by American woollen manufacturers. It has also been intimated that this slight difficulty in connection with our wool is overcome by a certain process used by American manufacturer. If this be true, I think it is advisable that the Government should encourage our own manufacturers to make use of that process, so that Canadian wool may be used by our own manufacturers of woollen goods. This will, of course, have a tendency to cheapen the price of woollen goods.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe that the chief wool markets in North America are in the United States. As to the treatment and preparation of wool for manufacturing purposes, I cannot speak with any definite knowledge of the facilities in Canada. One of the objects of these amendments is to establish more clearly the grades and packages, so that both the purchaser and the seller will know more definitely on what basis they are working.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The resolution provides: "for the preservation of rights of farmers, drovers, and other persons to sell and buy at stockyards." Does that mean that to-day a farmer or drover cannot dispose of his live stock at the stockyard except through a broker? I understand the business has changed considerably in the last five or six years. Then, a drover could ship a carload of stock to the yards and dispose of the stock as he saw fit; but to-day, I understand that the selling has to be done through a broker, and that entails a commission.

Mr. CRERAR: Clause 2 of section 3 of The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1917, provides as follows:

> Nothing in this Act, or in any regulation made hereunder, shall take away, or in any manner limit, the right of any farmer or drover to sell his live stock at any stockyard.

We are proposing an amendment to make more clear the right of a farmer or drover to buy live stock in any stock yard, which right is not clearly defined in the present Act. For the information of the House, I may say that the existing Act empowers the Governor in Council to formulate regulations governing in a general way the conduct of stock yards, the manner in which live stock shall be handled, guarantees of good faith on the part of commission agents, and other matters of that character. These regulations have been under the consideration of the department for some time.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not have them approved by Parliament, which comprises a great many farmers who have just as much knowledge of these matters as the officers of the department?

Mr. CRERAR: The Act as it at present stands empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations prescribing the manner in which the stockyards are to be constructed and operated.

Sir SAM HUGHES: More Orders in Council.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be. The present Act was passed two years ago, and these regulations have been under consideration for a considerable time. The producers, the farmers, and the Live Stock Associations have been consulted and the regulations, which are now practically completed, are the result of our joint collaboration.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are these stockyards located? I do not think there are any such institutions in my part of the country. Are they all under the control of the department?

Mr. CRERAR: The chief stockyards in Eastern Canada are in Montreal and Toronto, and in Western Canada at Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton. There is also a stockyard at Moosejaw, and another at Prince Albert. Some of them are private enterprises, and others are under the control of the railways. In Winnipeg, for instance, the railway companies have formed a stockyards company. The purpose of the Act of 1917, and I think the purpose was entirely commendable, was to provide for a closer supervision of these yards, so that those who were handling live stock would have proper facilities for the carrying on of their work.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these stockyards anything in the nature of an exhibition?

Mr. CRERAR: No, they are purely for market purposes.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I understand that the amendments will more clearly define the right of a farmer or drover to purchase and sell stock at a stockyard.

Mr. CRERAR: The farmer has now a right to sell. We are going to make it clear that he has a right to buy.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: What supervision has the department over by-products imported from the United States. Chicago, for instance, ships in many tons of canned meats, which are used very extensively in the hot weather. Does the department provide for a standard weight and quality of these meats?

Mr. CRERAR: The control of canned meats comes under the Meat and Canned Foods Act. They have to come up to certain standards.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The minister speaks about giving to the farmer the right to buy as well as to sell. What does that mean? Who has had the authority hitherto to deny the farmer the right to buy in the market, and who controls these stockyards? Is it under Dominion, or provincial, or private charter?

Mr. CRERAR: The stockyards are I understand all incorporated under provincial Acts, and I presume the purpose of the amendment when it was introduced into this Act two years ago was to make it absolutely clear that no company privately chartered and conducting the business of a stock-yard could deny the individual farmer or drover the right to go in and sell his stock.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We could not override a provincial statute.

Mr. CRERAR: We have the power to pass regulations governing these stockyards, the same as we have to regulate the handling of grain through elevators.

Mr. McCOIG: From what source does the request come for this change in legislation? I understand that in Toronto the farmers can buy all the stock they wish without interference. The resolution has some reference to the matter of marketing wool, and I do not see why the two things should be connected,—the purchasing of livestock, and the branding and the marketing of wool. Would it not be better to have them in separate resolutions? What I would particularly like to know, however, is where the request comes from to have this change in legislation.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that any request has been made respecting the right of farmers to buy in these stockyards. That right, as I understand it, has not been interfered with, and the purpose of this resolution is to make it clear beyond any doubt. As regards the grading of wool and the size of packages in which wool has been marketed, the request for the regulation of these matters has come practically from all the wool producers in Canada, who have asked that some definite standard be fixed as a medium of sale in this commodity.

Mr. McCOIG: The greatest compliment I have heard from the farmers in reference to the markets in Toronto is as regard the quotations for the different products that are being sold there, and the way in which they are sent out. A great number of producers have expressed a desire that the Government should control the prices that are paid each day for stocks at different markets and that one quotation should be sent to the press throughout the country. Very often contradictory reports are seen in the press and in some cases you will find a discouraging report in one paper and in the same paper of another date possibly an encouraging report as to different stocks being sold. If the minister is anxious to do something in regard to the markets of the country I think he should see that if there are going to be inspectors at these different places they should have full charge in the matter of quotations that are submitted to the press, and see that these quotations are uniform.

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion which the hon. member makes is a very radical one, and one which I do not think it would be wise to adopt. Quotations governing the sale of live stock are available in the same way as are quotations on grain or any other article of commerce. If I understand the hon. gentleman's suggestion aright, it is that the Government should establish some means of definitely controlling the prices that would be paid daily to the public. That certainly is not contemplated in the legislation, and I thing it is rather a radical idea.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The farmer can purchase in the market, but must he purchase through the agent? In the privately owned stockyard, as I understand, you are not permitted to dispose of your stock except through an agent, and you have to pay a percentage to him which reduces your profit. Under this amended legislation will one farmer be able to purchase from another independently of the agent?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot explain that matter more clearly than by referring the hon. member to the provision of the Act:

(2) Nothing in this Act, or in any regulation made hereunder, shall take away, or in any manner limit, the right of any farmer or drover to sell . . . .

We propose to amend that to read, "sell or buy," so that the farmer can have absolute freedom to sell or buy.

Mr. HENDERS: I think it is well that such a law should be provided. We have experienced some difficulty along that line in the West with regard to the handling of live stock. During the last year or two we have been taking out of the stockyards large quantities of cattle for feeding purposes, and the right has been questioned of the individual farmer to go and make his own purchase. The commission men have asserted themselves on that point and have claimed the right to do the purchasing for the farmer, exacting a commission from him. If the Bill intends to cover those two points of selling and buying, I think it is splendid legislation and should go into effect. We should make it clear that the producer has the right to go himself and sell and to go personally and buy and take out his stock. If that is the intention of the Act it should be supported.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I understand the minister to say that these associations are organized under provincial statutes, then it is not good practice that they should be regulated by legislation of this House. While we have no power to repeal an Act of a local legislature, we can render it inoperative by depriving it of all its effectiveness. But it will stand on the Statute Books of the province which enacts it, and I submit to the minister that if there is any local legislation creating a corporation such as a stockyard, and if there is any ground of complaint from the farmers, the legislature of the province creating that institution should be asked to provide the necessary remedy. That should be done under extreme necessity, and if the legislature of the province should refuse to remedy the matter, then we could regulate any provincial institution by legislation in this House. It is a very clumsy and inconvenient way of doing it, and if the institutions which the minister intends to regulate are creations of provincial statutes, I do not think that this House should pass legislation which would have the effect of annulling those statutes. I think that under a local statute a man should know exactly what his rights are without having to consult any Dominion enactment as well.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Do the words "for regulations regarding inspection" refer to the inspection of live stock?

Mr. CRERAR: They refer to live stock products such as wool or hides.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Do they not refer to live stock itself?

Mr. CRERAR: It is intended to cover live stock products such as wool, hides and eggs—such live stock products as are not already under the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Resolution reported, and concurred in

Hon. Mr. Crerar thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 75, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PREVENTION OF FIRE.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69 (from the Senate), to amend the Criminal Code respecting prevention of fire.

Mr. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a Bill that I asked to be introduced into the Senate for expedition. Its purpose is to prevent fires, and the methods employed are these: (1) It makes it a criminal offence on the part of the owner, occupant or tenant of a building to refuse to obey any law of the country looking to the prevention of fire provided that upon his being prosecuted for the offence the jury find that but for his negligence in so omitting to obey the law the fire would not have occurred.

Sir SAM HUGHES: His criminal negligence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It makes it criminal negligence now. The second clause makes it obligatory upon the owner, or occupier or tenant of a property to carry out any instructions of a provincial officer looking to the prevention of fire, which instructions would be in the nature of the removal of material, the construction of fire-escapes, or making some alterations, providing these instructions are reasonable and are passed upon as reasonable by federal officers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will that entail the creation of a number of agents, officers, etc.?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think so. I really have not given much consideration to that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is a bad thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that the existing officers in the various provinces can take care of this work. There will be officers of the Government who will be locally situated and who will be competent to perform these duties. At all events, even if that were considered necessary it would be amply justified. The losses from fires in this country in the year 1918 aggregated some $33,000,000 of which 75 per cent are believed to have been absolutely preventable. That is an average of about $4 per head for every man and woman in Canada; a per capita average that is simply appalling. In European countries, where legislation similar to this is in effect and where greater governmental care is taken, as well as care by associations and societies, the rate of loss is trifling compared with what it is in Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There they have tile roofs and mud floors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very true, but tile roofs and mud floors would be a rather cheap inconvenience if purchased by the saving that might be effected in this country.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that most municipalities have laws regulating this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but this is to give effect to these laws. If the hon. gentleman will read the Act he will see that the law of the municipality is made effective. Wherever there is an enactment which is not obeyed and a fire occurs as a result, which would not have occurred but for the disobedience, then the persons guilty of such disobedience will be guilty of an indictable offence.

Mr. POWER: Most of the municipal enactments are to the effect that such and such structures may not be put up unless with the permission of the municipal authorities. I do not see therefore how this enactment would apply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some of the enactments are of that nature. Other provincial and municipal laws would deal with the distance between buildings, the nature of the material employed and various features like that looking to the safety of the structure when erected and to the safety of the people in it. This Bill says that those laws must be obeyed under penalty of being guilty of an indictable offence provided that the disobedience is found by a jury to be the cause of the fire. As this is a motion for the second reading, I think it would be proper that we should move the House into Committee and let the discussion take place then.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—negligently causing fire which results in loss of life or property:

Mr. SHEARD: I would like to ask the minister if the proposed statute provides that the owners of the building must receive notice of these defects and that a reasonable time be allowed for complying with requirements after the notification has been given?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That question would be applicable to the next section. This section merely refers to disobedience of an enactment by the owner, and everybody else presumably acquainted with the law.

Mr. CAHILL: What effect will this provision have upon the insurance rates, if any, and where would the insurance company come in?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The passing of this enactment will not affect any contractual relations at all between the insurer and the insured. It will be just the same as if the Bill had not passed.

Mr. CAHILL: Will it not affect the insurance rates?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope it will. It will not perform the work unless it does. The impression that fire losses are insurance losses only if the buildings are insured is a wholly unsound impression. Losses by fire are national losses whether the buildings are insured or whether they are not, because the increase in the fire loss is reflected year by year in the increase in the insurance rates. Conversely anything that diminishes fire loss must be reflected in the decrease of insurance rates. Consequently, if this enactment has the effect intended of diminishing fire losses it will result in a diminution of insurance rates. Of course this Bill has no power to diminish rates, but it will enable companies to diminish them, and if companies refused to put such reductions into effect then it would give the Provincial Legislatures ground upon which they might act.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think this Committee should consider this measure with extreme care, because the provisions of the Bill are very far-reaching, and the underlying conditions very onerous. For instance, the penalty is made applicable to the person owning, the person occupying, and the person controlling the property. All three classes of persons will be liable to the penalty imposed by this Bill, and yet any one of the three may not have been officially notified of its requirements. The minister's comparison of the fire losses of Canada with those in European countries, I submit, is hardly fair for several reasons. The insured property in the Old Country is not as valuable as the property in this country carrying insurance, neither is the population of Canada as dense as the population there. Therefore, the per capita comparison of the fire loss given by the minister is not fair and is not justified, and does not warrant the stringent provisions proposed here. The fire insurance companies and the Conservation Commission of Canada have been trying to establish, more particularly during the last year or so, that the fire loss per capita in this country is enormous as compared with the fire loss in other countries. I submit that their method of comparison is not at all justified for the reasons which I have already given. Moreover the fact should be borne in mind that during the last few years we have had enormous losses in Canada through fires in munition plants. One great fire occurred in Trenton which resulted in a loss of $5,000,000. Another great fire resulting in a similar loss occurred elsewhere, and so on. These losses have been included and have swollen the total fire losses of Canada. The comparison therefore is not a fair one because the fires in question were extraordinary in character, and should not be included so as to increase the per capita fire loss of the country. Had I known that this Bill was coming up for consideration I would have studied the matter more carefully, and been in a position to deal with it more satisfactorily, because I have given considerable thought and attention to it. In my opinion the business interests of the country should insist upon delay before enacting a Bill embodying such stringent provisions at the present time.

Mr. POWER: The danger which I see in a clause of this character it this: As we all know, after almost every big fire which occurs in a city or municipality, a large number of new by-laws are introduced; a panic occurs and it is said, "This kind of thing must not happen again." The result is the adoption of various new by-laws, more or less well studied, and after a certain length of time, when the scare has subsided, they are no longer enforced. We have in most of our cities, I should say, a number of antiquated laws and regulations with regard to the character of buildings to be erected, and the provision of fire protection, fire escapes, etc., and these are made applicable more particularly in places where the labouring people congregate. In the city of Quebec we have had a large number of such by-laws, and at one time it was decided to insist upon the use in buildings of cement products, asbestos tiles, and so forth. It was found, however, that these articles were too expensive for the ordinary labouring man's dwelling, and the by-law was thereupon allowed to drop, or the inspector did not perform his duty by enforcing it. Now, should a fire occur in the poorer quarters of the city, and should someone discover that such a law exists, under the present provision the owner, the occupier, and the person controlling the property—possibly the janitor, or even the nightwatchman,—would be responsible, and would be liable to a fine of $1,000. As at present worded the clause is rather too stringent. If there was a possibility of amending it in the direction indicated by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) so as to provide for the giving of notice to the proprietor or occupier that he is not carrying out the law, I think the provision would be a reasonable one. Otherwise I am afraid it will result in a great deal of hardship to the labouring classes and to others against whom such an enactment should not be enforced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not catch the point made by the hon. member for Renfrew, but apparently he is of the view that we should not compare our fire losses with those of European countries, because their population is more dense than ours. It would occur to me that the more dense the population the larger the number of cities having fire losses, and the higher the per capita fire loss, is likely to be. It is a well-known fact that our insurance rates are higher in our cities than in our rural districts, because when the population becomes congested the danger is greater. Therefore, if the hon. gentleman's argument has any force it leads to exactly the opposite conclusion from what he intended. However, I do not know that it has very much force one way or the other. The fire loss in Norway in 1918 was 55 cents per capita and in Belgium, where the regulations would, presumably, be equally strong and enforced with equal care, the loss was $1.02 per capita.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How could the figures for Belgium be got in 1918?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the case of Canada the year given is 1914, and from the statement which I have it would be inferred that 1918 was the year in the other cases. It must have been the year before the war. At all events, Norway has a population of about 2,000,000, spread over a large territory, and Belgium is very thickly populated. The thicker the population the higher the fire loss per capita; consequently, the comparison of the figures for these countries with those for Canada is all the more striking and all the more unfavourable to ourselves, for our loss is $4 per capita. In the Netherlands the fire loss is 11 cents per capita.

Mr. PEDLOW: The figure given by the Conservation Commission of the fire loss in Canada is $2.92 per capita.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Our fire loss was $33,000,000, and, taking the population as something over 8,000,000, the figure would be $4 per head. The loss for January, 1919, is the highest on record.

Mr. PEDLOW: The losses would be specially heavy during the last few years, on account of munition plants and so on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are munition plants in other countries, too. They made munitions in England; the fire loss there was 64 cents per capita.

Mr. PEDLOW: The munition plants were not destroyed by fire there, but they were here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We had better have some laws, then, to prevent their burning here. My hon. friend says that business interests should be consulted with regard to this legislation. I know he must have great respect for the Retail Merchants' Association —I hope he is a member of it. That association has written a letter strongly commending the Bill. Representatives of the following associations have been consulted with regard to these amendments—I do not think it can be said that they are not all business institutions: Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Canadian Fire Underwriters' Association, Non-tariff Insurance Companies, the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the United Farmers of Ontario, the United Farmers of Alberta, the Wholesale Grocers' Association, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association, the Fire Chiefs' Association, the Commission of Conservation. So that I do not think we have failed to take into account the views of the community, and while we do not need to act precipitately, there is no very great reason for delay.

Mr. POWER: Could the minister find it possible to get the United Farmers and the Manufacturers' Association to agree on any other subject?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We hope they will.

Mr. ELKIN: All business men, property holders and those interested in protection against fire will agree with the principle of this Bill. But it occurs to me that confusion may arise from the fact that the fire laws in the different municipalities conflict to some extent. I understand that in the next section of the Bill you take care of anything that might be unjust in municipal fire laws by placing further responsibility upon an officer approved by the Governor in Council; is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but a man to be guilty under the first section must be guilty of a breach of a law, not merely of a breech of instructions of a local fire officer. If he is guilty of a breach of the law and his guilt is found by the jury to have been the only cause of the fire, then he is liable. Neither the occupant nor the owner or controller is guilty unless the law of the province fixes the responsibility on him. If the law of the province fixes the responsibility on more than one, then it is for the province to amend its law if necessary.

Mr. POWER: Most provincial and municipal fire laws provide penalties for infractions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is true, but very often the people responsible for fires have less to fear from any punishment that the province can impose than from the punishment that follows the breach of the Criminal Code.

Mr. ELKIN: The minister did not quite answer my question. In section 2 the responsibility for recommending to an owner or property holder that certain changes be made within thirty days does not rest alone with the municipal or provincial officer; the recommendation must be approved by an officer authorized by the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That applies to the second clause. The other sanction is only the opinion of a provincial officer. We think there should be a second sanction.

Mr. EULER: When the minister says that there is to be no punishment except for breach of the law, does he include by-laws passed by municipal, town and city councils? Many of these by-laws vary in the different cities and towns. In fact some of them consist of many pages of printed matter and the people in the municipalities may not be acquainted with their contents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A law passed legally by a municipality on the authority of provincial legislation is just as much a law as any other law. It is true that these laws vary among the municipalities; still we may assume that the residents of a municipality know the law of that municipality. If the law is too complicated and too long, it is for the municipality to amend it. Our law is neither complicated nor long.

Mr. PEDLOW: The second paragraph of section (1A) says that a person shall be deemed to have caused a fire through negligence if such a person has failed to obey the requirements of any law intended to prevent fires. But suppose a building is considered to have defective electric wiring and the owner has been notified of the defect; if a fire originates in that building from some other cause and is destroyed, the owner would be liable to a penalty of two years' imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the jury must find that his disobedience was the cause.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: While I agree with the principle of the Bill, it seems to me that its drafting requires consideration. The first clause says:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by negligence, causes any fire which occasions loss of life or loss of property.

Negligence might consist in a man going out to his stable with a lantern and setting it down on the floor, and then, perhaps, while doing something else, backing up against his lantern and knocking it over and setting fire to his own barn. In such a case he would, under this clause, be liable to two years' imprisonment, while under the Ontario law the insurance company would be bound to pay his loss. A lady in a house might accidentally leave her electric iron with the current turned on; it might burn its way through the board and drop to the floor and set the house on fire. That would certainly be negligence, but under the law of Ontario, the insurance company would have to pay her loss, and yet under this clause she would be liable to two years' imprisonment. Unless the word "negligence" is defined in some better way, there are many cases of negligence which are perfectly innocent and in which there is no wrong intent, and there is no reason in making a criminal of a person who unwittingly acts in a negligent manner. The gist of every crime is the guilty intent, but as far as I can see, under the first clause standing by itself—and the second clause, which says certain things shall be deemed to be negligent, does not limit it—a person guilty of these innocent, though negligent acts, would come within the purview of the Bill and be liable to imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think my hon. friend's interpretation is right. That is the intent of the law and, I think, a proper intent. There is no definition of negligence here, but negligence in law has been interpreted ten thousand times and one hundred times that again, and will have to stand as so interpreted.

Mr. McKENZIE: How about criminal negligence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This makes what before was negligence that was not criminal, negligence that is criminal. Unless you do that, you do not get to the root of the trouble; you leave things absolutely as they are. Undoubtedly, a man who intentionally does something to cause a fire is liable now, because there is criminal intent, and there is no use in legislating to meet his case, because it was met long years ago. But by this legislation, we are trying to reach the careless person who does not think of fire at all, and it is this kind of negligence that causes over 75 per cent of fires. If we leave this out, we had better not go on with the Bill. The law of the land to-day places criminal responsibility upon persons who have no criminal intent. For example, if the guardian of a ward, by negligence, by insufficient attention, by failure to procure medical attention, and without any guilty intent at all, causes the death of that child, that guardian is guilty of murder. The same thing runs through the law in many respects, and many other instances could be cited. This extends the operation of that law into the field of fire prevention and says to those, who by mere carelessness, taking no thought of what may happen to them or the loss that may happen to others, allow an electric iron with the current turned on to sit upon a table, when any one with common sense would know that if it were not properly insulated it would burn the table and perhaps the house and perhaps even the neighbour's house. You, through your negligence, caused that loss; it is probable you suffered no loss at all, but other innocent people did; your negligence was the primary cause; you are impervious to punishment by fine, but we say to you in advance: You must be more careful afterwards, and if you fail to be more careful, then you must suffer the only punishment that has any effect upon you.

Mr. SHEARD: Would not the owner be liable also under the wording of the clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the provincial law said that the owner shall be responsible for no person in his house doing anything carelessly, then he would be liable, but no provincial law says that.

Mr. DAVIS: Supposing there is a case of defective wiring, which the owner should fix and which the tenant is forbidden to use, but the tenant continues to use it, are they not both liable in case of fire?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS: Whom will you prosecute in such a case; will you prosecute both?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If both are liable. both should be prosecuted.

Mr. DAVIS: The owner may have intended to repair the defective wiring, but in the meantime the tenant continues using it. Is there not some unfairness in making both liable?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is any unfairness in the matter, the unfairness has its root in the provincial law. If the provincial law makes it the duty of both, and both neglect their duty, we cannot help that; both are liable.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The case I was discussing was not one of owner and tenant. If I own a house and pay insurance on it, and I am paying a sufficiently large insurance premium to justify a company paying me for a loss if I should make a mistake in my own house, for instance, if I should leave an electric iron with the current on, or if my wife should do so in her own house, or in my house, under this clause, she is a criminal and liable to two years' imprisonment. It is not an accident; it is due to her negligence in not turning off the electric current, because forgetfulness is negligence. Under those circumstances, while according to the Ontario law, the insurance company would be bound to pay the loss, my wife would be liable to go to prison for two years. If that is the purport of the Bill, I should like the House to know it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is not quite as careful in his statement as he was before. If the provincial law makes it an offence on the part of a wife of an owner, this would not apply at all, because I do not think the hon. member could be the owner and his wife the owner, too, nor could the hon. member and his wife both be said to be occupiers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend does not get my meaning. I am not speaking about the second paragraph at all. If the word " only " were put in the second paragraph, I would understand that the meaning of the word " negligence " in the first clause was being defined. The second clause says:

> The person owning, occupying, or controlling the premises in which such a fire occurs, or on which such fire originates, shall be deemed to have caused the fire through negligence if such person, etc.—

But that does not define the only persons who are liable, under the preceding clause, because of negligence. The minister should insert the word "only" in the second clause if negligence is confined to the commission of the breaches set out in the second clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is right in that respect. I was thinking about the second paragraph. Where he understated the intent was this: The punishment will, we must presume, be proportionate to the guilt. If the negligence is not gross, if it is of the nature of an accident—and the two merge together very often—then we must presume the magistrate or the judge will take that into account, and it may be a judge if the person so elects under this legislation. The punishment is within the power of the judge to inflict: he cannot go higher than two years, but he can inflict punishment of a day's imprisonment if he wishes. He can inflict suspended sentence, if he wishes. He can invoke section 1035 of the Code, and, instead of imposing punishment by imprisonment, he can impose a fine. All that we create is the statutory offence, placing it within the power of the judge to impose such fine or such imprisonment as may be appropriate. Surely that is not too much when the result of the negligence alone is fire. If we are not prepared to go that far, I do not know what we can do to assist in preventing or reducing this annual waste.

Mr. POWER: Does this apply to forest fires?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes; it does not matter what the property is.

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought at one time that this legislation might be amended so as to make it more humane and Christian, but I have come to the conclusion that that is an absolute impossibility. The minister is proposing to go to a length to which we never went before in this country, or any other country, as far as I know. I think the illustrations that have been given are sufficient to bring home to the mind of the minister that this is really dangerous legislation. If a very slight accident is caused in a house, even by a child—I suppose the parent will be responsible for the child—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, then the child is responsible. I think the minister should withdraw this Bill, and wait for another year or so until he hears that anybody wants this legislation. I do not think anybody does want it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quoted quite a few institutions which did.

Mr. McKENZIE: There may be some institutions looking for extraordinary protection, so as to make bigger money out of their insurance; but I am not in sympathy with legislation of that kind, at the expense of making criminals out of people who are absolutely innocent. It has been said a thousand times in this House that it is impossible to have a criminal without a criminal intent, and it is ridiculous to say that some person with the innocent heart and mind of a child and incapable of conceiving a crime, should be sent for two years to the penitentiary on any of these grounds. I cannot see any force in the suggestion that the province may intervene and render this law harmless, because the Act explicitly sets forth that any person guilty of the offence shall suffer such and such a penalty. I do trust that the minister will not find it necessary to put any such legislation as this on the Criminal Statutes of this country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The point that strikes me is this: Suppose I am an insurance agent and an applicant for insurance comes to my office and says: "I want to insure my house." I say: "Yes." He says: "Does this policy cover a fire loss due to leaving on the electric iron, for instance, or to the pipes becoming overheated?" I say: "Yes, you would get your insurance in full. The insurance law so provides." Then when the fire occurs the man is told he is liable to go to jail for these very offences. That is where the inconsistency comes in, to my mind.

Mr. BALL: I quite agree with the minister that the losses from fire in this country are very great, and I think they should be curtailed in some way or other. Not only are they a loss to the country, but all policy holders in mutual companies have to make up for these losses and their rates are consequently much higher. I think anybody who has studied the fire records as given by the insurance companies will agree that Canada's fire losses are very large. Section 1 of this Bill provides:

> The person owning, occupying or controlling the premises in which such a fire occurs, or on which such fire originates, shall be deemed to have caused the fire through negligence, if such person has failed to obey the requirements of any law intended to prevent fires.

His want of knowledge of the law is construed to be negligence. I do not think that is right. If he knew the law and failed to obey it, that would be negligence; but this legislation is convicting him of negligence even though he has not had an opportunity of knowing what the law is. I think this provision should be modified in some way. Let me read it again:

> The person owning, occupying or controlling the premises in which such a fire occurs, or on which such fire originates, shall be deemed to have caused the fire through negligence, if such person has failed to obey the requirements of any law intended to prevent fires or which requires apparatus for the extinguishment of fires.

A man might well be said to be guilty of negligence if, after an insurance or government inspector had visited his premises and advised him that certain conditions must be remedied, he did not remedy them. Many people will come under this law who do not know what the law is in regard to fires. I think that is unfair. Steps should be taken to advise the public of the law, and want of knowledge of the law should not be construed as negligence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really think hon. members are of the view that some principle is being adopted here that is new and of a perilous nature, but such is not the case at all. No law in the world can proceed on any other assumption than that the people know it. We never legislate in this House on any other assumption. If, however, the punishment is made greater, it may be the duty of the federal or provincial authorities to disseminate more widely a knowledge of the law, and when the punishment becomes of a nature differing in certain respects from what it was before, it may well be that the province in enacting a law shall see that the provisions are better known. What I want to impress is this: You cannot legislate on any other hypothesis than that the law is known. If you legislate on any other hypothesis, nobody will make it his business to find out what the law is, because he will not need to care. To-day, the law has the very same defect, if it may be called such, that the hon. member for Grey points out and at which the hon. leader of the Opposition was so horrified this afternoon. The law provides now on this very subject:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who by such negligence as shows him to be reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences—

I would not be a bit surprised if the woman who left a heated iron on the table was considered reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences. In my judgment, she would be liable now under the law.

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who by such negligence as shows him to be reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences, or in violation of a provincial or municipal law of the locality, sets fire to any forest, tree, manufactured lumber, square timber, logs or floats, boom, dam or slide, on the Crown domain, or on land leased or lawfully held for the purpose of cutting timber, or on private property on any creek or river, or rollway, beach or wharf, so that the same is injured or destroyed.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not that bad enough without making it worse?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not consider it bad at all. I am trying to show that this law is no innovation. It is the law to-day with respect to a certain class of property. Let me read it again:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, by such negligence as shows him to be reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences, or in violation of a provincial or municipal law of the locality, sets fire to any forest, tree, manufactured lumber, etc.

If a man is to be liable for two years for burning this class of property, booms, dams and slides, etc., why should he not be liable if he burns a block in a city through similar negligence? It is very hard to see why there should be a distinction. I presume that the reason it was confined here was that the party suffering the loss in this regard was the Crown, but the nature of the offence itself is just the same. I think that meets the point raised by the hon. member for Grey, but the great principle I want to impress upon him is that if you are ever going to secure the utmost obedience to law that can be secured, you must impose upon every citizen of the State the obligation to acquaint himself with the law so far as it effects him. I know that every citizen in the State cannot be acquainted with all law; perhaps no citizen can, but you must legislate on the assumption that it is his duty to acquaint himself as it is in his power with such law as affects him. Let me add this again, which I have already tried to impress upon the Committee: That the punishment itself is still left to be regulated by the grossness of the offence, and where the offence is not gross we must presume that the punishment will correspond. As to a little child being liable, every one knows that no court will hold a child criminally responsible. After the child reaches the age of criminal responsibility and has attained a degree of maturity that justifies the court in fixing guilt upon it, there is no reason why it should be absolved if its negligence results in the destruction of a building, or if it carelessly injures or maims a companion. As regards the opinion of the hon. member for Grey that there is an inconsistency in a person being liable to conviction and punishment and at the same time being entitled to receive insurance money, I must say that I cannot see the force of this argument. Is a person to escape the consequences of his act merely because he is able to contract himself out of financial loss? Why, the loss really is not his at all, and he might go on and be guilty of anything. It is true he does not suffer himself, because the law makes the insurance company pay him But the community suffers, since that carelessness of his tends to raise the insurance rate to every citizen of his district. This result of his negligence may not be apparent immediately; it may take several repetitions of his negligence to effect it. But the result is inevitable and inescapable, and it is the community that suffers from his carelessness. Now the community comes to him in this enactment and says, "Though you may still be able to contract yourself out of financial loss, we who are the sufferers, say to you that if by your negligence you cause us loss, then you must answer before the courts of the country in the way the Act sets forth." What is illogical or inconsistent in that? It is true that if a man causes fire in such a way as to place himself outside the terms of his contract with the insurance company —for instance, if he sets fire to a building intentionally—then his insurance policy does not cover that at all. But if his policy did cover it, that would not say that he should be at liberty to indulge in all the carelessness he liked. It is altogether a matter of contract as to whether the insurance covers his loss or not; but it is a matter of his duty to the community as to whether or not he conducts himself so that they shall suffer no loss. It is the community that suffers, and therefore the community has the right to impose the terms.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I have no objection to the second part of the clause, that is, as to where a person has been guilty of a direct breach of the present law, provincial, municipal or otherwise. But apparently the law which is now on the Statute Books is not drastic enough in the opinion of the minister. The law says that a person must be wantonly reckless before he can come within the code. The word "reckless" is a much stronger word than "negligent," and "wantonly reckless" is stronger still, and a man has to be guilty not only of recklessness but of wanton recklessness before he comes within the provisions of the code to-day.

Under the present amendment the first subsection standing by itself says that every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who is negligent. That is what it says in effect. Now, I venture to say that in seven cases out of ten the fires that occur in this country would, according to this subsection, be due to negligence. A fire may be caused by electric irons, or by a man not sufficiently looking after his electric installation, and under such circumstances he would be held to be guilty of negligence. Or perhaps a man going into a stable might accidentally back on to his lantern and start a fire, and he might also be guilty of negligence. Do we intend, or are we willing, to go so far as to say that a man shall be liable to two years' imprisonment in such a case, and be held to be negligent although the insurance company admits that his negligence is unavoidable inasmuch as they pay him his insurance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He pays for his insurance.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: He signs a contract which says in effect that although his electric iron may start a fire, or he may knock over his lantern or do all these things which amount to negligence on his part, they will pay him his insurance, notwithstanding the fact that he may be liable, under this law to two years' imprisonment. I do not think it is the intention to go as far as that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The law says "if by negligence that is reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences." I think those are perhaps a little stronger than just the word "negligence." But who is to say that we should not make it an offence against the State for one negligently to cause loss to the State? It is an offence to-day. We use the word "negligence" throughout the Code over and over again. For example, if a man to-day by any manner of negligence causes the death of another, is he not answerable before the courts of the land in criminal law? Undoubtedly he is. If his negligence causes the death of or injury to another he is liable now, because he has offended against the law of the State, and you must impose punishment. Of course, it would not be reasonable to make him liable to the same extent as if his negligence merely resulted in financial loss to the community But it is just as logical to make one an offence against the code as to make the other. The character of the injury is the same although in the one case it is greater in degree than in the other. The community suffers in one case financially through his negligence while the community suffers the loss or maiming of a citizen in the other case. I have given one illustration where negligence resulting in the loss or injury to the State is punishable now under the code. I could give many others. We are simply adding another and we say that for loss to the community by reason of a fire you must answer before the courts. We place it in the power of the judges of the land to say just what measure of punishment should be inflicted upon you. There is nothing new in it at all; it is merely the sound principle that is everywhere found in the code extended to another class of cases.

Mr. PEDLOW: This clause has evidently been built up entirely upon the foundation of negligence. The difficulty that will arise under this enactment will be to prove negligence. There are two sets of electrical wiring inspectors to-day operating in Ontario. There is the inspector of the Hydro-Electric Commission and there is the inspector of the Canadian Underwriters' Association. I know of one instance where one of these inspectors visited a building, condemned the wiring and ordered it reconstructed. That order was carried out to the letter. Subsequently the other inspector came along and condemned the wiring done under the order of the previous inspector and consequently the work had to be done all over again. Supposing that a fire had occurred in the meantime with the wiring carried out under the instruction of the first inspector, who would have been negligent in the case? The owner of the property under this law. The difficulty is to establish negligence. It will be almost impossible, as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) says, in seven cases out of ten.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then nobody will suffer.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to have this Bill withdrawn or delayed so that it may receive further consideration. I think that the whole subject of fire insurance should be considered at the same time. A large proportion of the fires that occur in this country are attributable not to negligence on the part of the occupant, owner, or person controlling the property, but largely because insurance agents are trying to effect insurance regardless of the result. All they care for is the commission. With a Bill of this kind you should also couple the responsibility of the insurance agent. He is largely responsible for a large proportion of the fires that occur. I believe that a large proportion of the insurance agents will take a risk on any property they can get through with their companies because all they are interested in is the commission. I think the minister will be well advised to delay the enactment of this Bill until the whole subject of fire insurance is considered from every standpoint. I do not think that negligence on the part of the property owner is at all responsible for a large proportion of the fires that occur. You talk about negligence. To whom do you attribute negligence in the case of the Great Fire in Chicago? Those of us who remember that fire know that it occurred because a cow kicked over a coal oil lantern. What are you going to do with the cow? That fire destroyed millions and millions of dollars worth of property in Chicago. I think the House will be well advised to delay the passage of this Bill until it has had an opportunity to look into the question from other angles than that which has evidently impressed itself upon whoever drafted the Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: There is another feature of the Bill that perhaps has not been fully considered. A man may have a fire by any one of the innocent means of which I have spoken and yet it is negligence. He is insured, he goes over the matter with the insurance company and the insurance company say: We will offer you so much and if you do not take that, you have two years' imprisonment ahead of you; your wife may have neglected to turn off the electric iron. The insurance company would be practically the only people who would know the circumstances under which the fire occurred, because they would have investigated them. This Bill puts them in the position of being able to force a settlement to their own advantage.

Mr. MOWAT: I do not see how the draughtsman of this measure could have chosen language better fitted to carry out the intention. Negligence is something to be proved in each case. Hon. members of this House seem to have it in their minds that carelessness or negligence on their own part, or perhaps on the part of their wives, may bring them within the clutches of the criminal law. That is what is intended. It is to make the people of Canada more careful, in order that Canada may take a fresh step forward and occupy a position on all fours with other nations that do not have these enormous fire losses. I am quite sure that if hon. members had followed the proceedings of the Fire Underwriters' Association, the Conservation Commission, the Retail Merchants and other bodies which have been enumerated here by the minister, they could not but realize that something must be done in Canada if we are not going to fall behind the people of other nations. Our losses are enormously out of proportion to what they should be. It is true that our houses are, generally speaking, more inflammable than houses in some other countries, but that should not excuse our people from the consequences of such negligence as has produced this enormous percentage of losses. I quite understand the feeling of hon. members, such as the hon. member for South East Grey (Mr. Ball), who is afraid that hardship will be brought upon people because of their not knowing the law. But this House is not concerned about that, because the enforcement is left to the provincial authorities. All we have to do is to state what the law is and then if the provincial authorities, the magistrates and judges who try these cases, are convinced that the negligence is excusable, they will find some way of instructing the jury, or themselves deciding, that there is no negligence under the law. Thus hardship is avoided. It would be a great pity if in this House we failed to make a declaration upon this matter simply from the apprehension that the law might be carried out harshly by the provincial authorities. Our duty is to do what is right and define and declare the law as we are asked to do by these important bodies who have considered these matters from time to time. I would be very much disappointed if the reasons which have been advanced and the doubts which have been expressed as to the supposed harshness of the law and the hardships that it might create should prevent us from doing what seems to me our manifest duty.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose that all of us, whether we are lawyers or not, could form some idea of the character of a law, particularly criminal law from the class in which it is placed. The Criminal Code makes a great many classifications of different kinds of law; it is divided into certain parts, and each part deals with a certain class of criminal law. The law which the Acting Minister of Justice proposes to put on the statute-book now, goes into the category, or under the sub-division, of Part 8 of the Criminal Code. The legislation which the minister proposes is put into the class which deals with wilful and forbidden acts in respect of certain property, and the first section under that reads as follows:

Every one who causes any event by an Act which he knew would probably cause it being reckless whether such event happens or not, is deemed for the purposes of this Part to have caused it wilfully.

Now the very first section of that part of the Code starts out by saying that a person cannot be liable under Part 8 unless he does the thing recklessly, whether such an event happens or not, and knowing that probably the mischief would happen. That is, any ordinary man must know that what he was doing would result in mischief. Then the very next section is under the heading of "Mischief." What does any person think of putting such a case as my hon. friend from Grey North (Mr. Middleboro) has described in the part classed "Mischief"? Let us suppose that a woman is ironing in her house and her iron is connected in the proper way with an electric current. She is called out for some purpose, and by the time she returns the house is afire. Is it to be said that because that woman went out when she was called, either to look after a sick child or to do something else that urgently required her presence, was mischievous in her conduct, because she forgot to turn off the current? Yet that is the class of case in which such conduct is put, and it is classed as mischievous. Then again in the same section and under the same category in which my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice puts this offence, is the crime of arson.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not the same section.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is in the same part of the Code, under the same heading, and in the same class of legislation. Now is this woman, whom I have just described, to be pronounced guilty of arson and put in the same class of criminals as a man who commits arson because she neglected to turn off the electric current in her house when she was called out by some urgent summons?

Now there is another heading dealing with setting other fires. The main section, to which my hon. friend expects to add 515A has the same criminal idea running through it, and any lawyer, or any person, who at times acts as a juror although he is not a lawyer, must know that all these sections must be read together, and he must understand the current or thread that runs through them all. Very well, here is what section 515 says:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, by such negligence as shows him to be reckless or wantonly regardless of consequences, or in violation of a provincial or municipal law of the locality, sets fire to any forest, tree, manufactured lumber, square timber, logs or floats, boom, dam or slide, on the Crown domain, or on land leased or lawfully held for the purpose of cutting timber, or on private property or any creek or river, or rollway, beach or wharf, so that the same is injured or destroyed.

That is the section to which my hon. friend wishes to add subsection 515A, making it ten times worse, and bringing criminal law into domestic relations in a way in which it was never done before. What are the kind of cases that may come within this law? It applies whether there is any insurance or not, and the minister tells us that it does not make any difference. Suppose a private individual has a little house with a stove pipe running up through the middle of it. If a fire occurs by reason of that stovepipe being defective, that man is just as liable as if the fire occurred in a large house that was insured, and he is liable to go for two years to penitentiary if he happens to neglect something that he was told to do by an officer. We will suppose that an officer is passing and he enters and tells the man, "You should have a flue in this place. You should build a flue from the cellar to the top of your house and connect your stovepipe to that flue. If you do not do that I am afraid you may have a fire some day." The man says, "I am poor, and I cannot afford a flue. I have no bricks, I have no money, and I cannot afford to hire a mason. I will get along just as I am and be as careful as possible." An accident happens and the little house is burned down, the proprietor loses his house and is sent to the penitentiary for two years because he did not build a flue as he was directed to do. Is it well for us to enact legislation of that kind? I am sure my hon. friend will have to admit that the cases which I have described would come within the meaning, force and effect of this Bill. It is a measure of such drastic character, and is so absolutely unnecessary that I have much pleasure, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) in moving that the Committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the Committee rises may I be permitted to say a few words in reply to my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister would be out of order in so doing. A motion that the Committee rise is non-debatable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be the case.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee to adopt the motion?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Aye.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: No.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Refeiring to the last complaint of the leader of the Opposition he apparently now suspects the Bill not so much for its contents but for the company it is in, and he quotes other offences, very serious in character, in the same part of the Code that this proposed legislation would be under, to sustain him in his contention.

Mr. McKENZIE: Part 8.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman thinks that in view of that it is a pretty serious matter to adopt this legislation. Well, if my hon. friend will go back just a few pages in the Code to Part 6 he will find common assault made an offence, and defined as follows:

> An assault is the act of intentionally applying force to the person of another, directly or indirectly, or attempting or threatening, by any act or gesture, to apply force.

So that according to that law, if I walked across the floor of the House and held my hand in a threatening attitude over the head of the hon. member, I would be guilty of the offence set out in this section. In the same part of the Code— indeed, on the very same page—I find the offence of so doing defined and, just two pages back, the offences of murder, manslaughter, and rape. All these are in the same portion of the Code as the reference to the offence that I would be guilty of if I walked across the floor and held my fist over the magnificent shining dome of the leader of the Opposition. So that it cannot be argued very powerfully that you can judge of the nature of a newly-made offence by the part of the Code into which you place it.

The hon. gentleman mentioned one or two very trifling offences which, he said, would be made offences under this law and would subject the persons who committed them to two years' imprisonment. That may be true, but no one will suffer two years' imprisonment if his offence is trivial. You cannot legislate on that assumption; otherwise I would be liable to seven years if I went across the floor and did what I have described. No judge in the land, not even the hon. member himself were he on the bench, would impose that punishment on me. The maximum punishment is for the maximum offence; the minimum punishment, or none at all, for the minimum offence. Surely two years' imprisonment is not too great a punishment to impose on a person who by his own gross negligence causes very serious loss to the community. The effect of a punishment not only has its application to the individual; it is a matter of example to the community, and a punishment of two years for a gross offence of this kind would have such an effect on the community in general that its adoption by this Committee is absolutely justified.

Mr. REDMAN: The word "negligence" as used here is entirely too wide. A house might be burned down by what we might call an act of God; it might be burned by the act of some person other than the owner. If a man burns his own house with his mind accompanying the act, he does it wilfully and he is guilty of arson; but I cannot conceive of the house being burned in any other way except through his negligence. If the mind accompanies the act, surely it must be a wilful act; if the mind does not accompany the act, it is simply carelessness or negligence. Negligence as set forth here simply means that any act other than one which is wilful which you commit or which you fail to commit and which results in your house being burned, will make you a criminal. I do not think that is the proper principle to apply. The principle of wanton recklessness, set forth in that part of the present Criminal Code which was read by the minister, is the principle that we ought to apply. That principle is well known among lawyers; it is well known in the civil law. It is one of the ingredients of fraud; it sets forth the difference between misrepresentation and fraud. It is a sort of quasi-criminality, and I think it is the only sort of act other than an act accompanied by criminal intent that we should make criminal. The issue is quite clear between the two sides in this controversy. One side desire to make every act other than a wilful act which results in the burning of a building a crime; the other side think that only such carelessness as is in itself a sort of quasi-criminal act should be made criminal. As I say, the present use of the word "negligence" in the section is going entirely too far and is putting into the list of crimes something that has not a tinge of criminalty about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member, as a lawyer, must know that negligence is to-day a crime in many places in the Code of the very same character exactly. Does he mean to intimate that if a man by his negligence—not intentionally in any way, but simply through carelessness—causes the death of another man, he is not criminally responsible? The only difference is in the result; the word used is the same in one case as in the other. In one case the act causes a person's death; Parliament has legislated that that is crime. In the other case it causes, say, the loss of a million dollars to the community; we make that a crime, but with a far less punishment. I fail to comprehend the apprehension of hon. members in this regard. A man whose mind accompanies his act in such a way that he knows what is going to result from his act, and intends it, commits a crime which is punishable now by a far greater punishment than two years' imprisonment—I think fourteen years, at least. The class of people we want to bring home are those who, by mere carelessness, by not realizing their duty to the community, causes this loss. If the same carelessness now causes loss of life or the maiming of another, the offender is criminally liable. Now we propose to make that same carelessness a crime, but with a fair less punishment, if it causes destruction of property. A man of substance who by his mere carelessness causes a building worth $100,000 to be burned is liable to-day for that $100,000 in the courts of the country. All we say now is that he is also answerable before the criminal courts. Very often these things are done by men who have no financial responsibility; why should they escape? Why should the community be always at the hazard of careless, reckless acts on the part of people who have no financial responsibility? Unless we are prepared to bring home to them some punishment, we are saying: Let things take their course; let the community suffer year in and year out to the extent of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 because we are afraid to make a man responsible and to make him suffer appropriate punishment for his own negligence.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister cited the cases of Norway, Belgium and England. Have they such a law as is now proposed here, and if so, has that been the reason for their smaller fire losses?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they have, but I cannot answer for certain. The United States has now before its Congress a much more drastic law.

Mr. CAHILL: To what does the minister attribute the smaller losses in the other countries? Have they better building restrictions or more effective fire restrictions, or is it because they have some law of this kind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quote a memorandum furnished to me by the Insurance Department, the language of which very clearly indicates and, I think, necessarily implies, that these laws are in effect in the European countries mentioned:

> The effect of this drastic legislation is seen in the per capita loss in European countries, which averages less than 50 cents, while the average in Canada is approximately $3. In 1908 it was $4.

So this memorandum says in effect that this drastic legislation is in operation in those countries.

Mr. CAHILL: Would it not be well to get the exact laws of the different countries so that we might have some idea as to how they work out? If this legislation, as proposed, is as good as the minister maintains it to be, that is, to reduce the loss from three or four dollars per capita to fifty cents per capita, and if it is not working any great hardship in Norway or Belgium, it may not be so bad. But if such legislation as this is not the cause of the lesser losses in those countries, then why inflict this legislation on the people if it is not going to produce satisfactory results? For instance, the minister stated that 75 per cent of the losses in Canada were preventable, that is, that they were caused by negligence. What is the nature of that negligence because 75 per cent of a loss of $33,000,000 would not occur simply from leaving stove pipes in houses without proper safeguards? The losses are, I presume, in our larger cities and larger buildings, and most of the cities have fire regulations. Are they living up to them and are they living up to their building restrictions, that is, that certain classes of buildings are not allowed to be built in certain areas? Have the people of Norway and Belgium and other countries better building restrictions, thus causing a lesser loss, or is it that they can, by legislation, scare people out of allowing their houses to burn? This question could, perhaps, be handled better by another of the innumerable commissions appointed by the Government to investigate the whole matter and treat it from a business standpoint. If the loss can be reduced, that would be a direct benefit to the whole of Canada, because it does not matter where the fire is, we pay the loss through the insurance premium. The people of this country desire to reduce our fire losses. If this legislation brings that about, it may be beneficial legislation, but if it does not, we are only incumbering the people with more legislation.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: This legislation appears to be placing a weapon in the hands of insurance agents or insurance companies, it seems to be in the interest of the insurance companies as against the property owners. When the minister makes the comparison of Belgium, Holland, and Canada, I do not think that is fair, because people who have visited those countries know the difference in conditions. In Belgium or Holland the average workingman's house is invariably of solid brick and does not contain a stove or a furnace such as we have, but a little fireplace with a stove in the brickwork which is well protected, and they never put on very strong fires. In the first place, they cannot afford to do so, and in the second place the fireplace is so well protected, there is less danger. In Canada, insurance companies will tell you, or you will see if you look up the records, that fires are not so frequent in summer as in winter. They will tell you, as soon as the people light up their stoves and furnaces in the winter, to be on the lookout for fires. I know of a case myself. In the fall of the year when it was getting cold, a woman put on a fire of wood and coal in her house, leaving the draughts open. There was a baby in the next room. A neighbour called the woman out for some purpose, and she rushed away without checking the draughts and when she came back in about ten minutes, the house was on fire. The fire had worked through the wall of the room in which the baby was, some plaster fell and the baby had a very narrow escape. There was no insurance and the loss was very heavy. That kind of fire and that kind of firing would not occur in Belgium, so that I do not think that it is fair to compare conditions in Belgium and Holland with those in Canada. In Canada, if you do not check the draughts, the house is very liable to be set on fire, unless the pipes are well protected, and we may, therefore, expect greater losses in Canada. This Bill is to drastic and the matter should be looked into further.

Mr. EULER: I would like to refer to a question that I asked of the minister some time ago. I am heartily in sympathy with the object of the Bill, the prevention of fire, but I believe, with many hon. members who have spoken, that it is just a little too broad in its application. The point to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee particularly is this, that it makes every council of every little municipality a criminal law-making body, or at least, a law-making body that can make a law which will constitute men who commit a breach of that law criminals. It seems to me that it is taking away the authority from this Parliament and handing over to any small body of men in any municipality throughout the country, power which, perhaps after all, it was never intended should be given to them. For example, we have heard in this debate a great deal about negligence and what negligence means. It may be rather presumptuous for one who is not a lawyer to attempt to interpret that which is to be a law, but as I read the Bill, it states that a breach of any regulation which may be made by any council, by any municipal body, will in itself constitute negligence, because the clause reads:—

> The person owning, occupying or controlling the premises in which such a fire occurs, ... shall be deemed to have caused the fire through negligence if such person has failed to obey the requirements of any law.

It is quite possible that some of those smaller law-making bodies in some of the smaller municipalities might make regulations, the breach of which would not be negligence in the ordinary accepted sense of the term at all, but by this enactment it will be considered negligence, and if it be negligence it makes the person who commits it liable to criminal prosecution and two years' imprisonment. While the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) said that this law states exactly what it is intended to mean, I say it does not. We are simply handing over the power of this Parliament to any small body of legislators there may be throughout the country, and the breach of whatever regulations they may make, whether right or wrong, shall be considered negligence and the person committing such negligence shall be liable to two years' imprisonment.

Bill reported.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Acting Minister of Customs) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, to provide for the definition measured content, and use by a chemist or druggist, of chemical stills,; for abatements to be allowed in the computation of duty upon spirits when stored in warehouse in wooden or in ventilated metal tanks, and when stored in warehouse in wooden barrels; and further to provide that the license fee for a bonded manufacturer shall be such sum not exceeding three hundred dollars as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council; that there may be a remission of duty on malt used in the manufacture of vinegar under prescribed conditions; that the department may authorize the preparation of tobacco and cigars in packages of such size, and the issue of stamps to cover the same, as may appear advisable; that the words "Methyl Hydrate—Poison" in letters of certain size be affixed to certain medical preparations; that no less quantity than five thousand cigars shall be entered for warehouse by one entry, and except for export, no less quantity than two thousand cigars shall be ex-warehoused by one entry; that an excise duty be imposed upon acetic acid produced in Canada by the destructive distillation of wood, or any other process or from any other source, of four cents on every gallon of six per centum acid, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength; that section 251 and Part X of the said Act be repealed, and in lieu thereof that provision be made respecting the manufacture in Canada of alcohol without the admixture of any denaturants, and denatured alcohol and specially denatured alcohol, which is intended for use in the arts and industries or for fuel, light or power, or for any mechanical purpose; with restrictions as to place of manufacture, sale, delivery and transport of such alcohol and its use in incorporated hospitals, universities, and research laboratories for scientific purposes only; and providing that no alcohol shall be manufactured or sold under these provisions for beverage purposes; with such other enactments as to the use of recovered alcohol and its redistillation and purification, and for labels on containers of wood alcohol or denatured alcohol, and for penalties for violation of the law, as may be prescribed.

He said: Several amendments are proposed, the first being a change in the computation of the duty. Sub-paragraph (2) of section one hundred and fifty-five of the present Act is repealed. Where spirits are stored for over two years a certain percentage is allowed for shrinkage. The distillers claim that this percentage should be higher, as the loss is very serious now that prohibition is in force.

Mr. McKENZIE: How is the shrinkage determined?

Mr. J. D. REID: The contents are measured going in and coming out of the tank. The shrinkage in no case exceeds the deficiency found in the tank. Another amendment to section 250 reads as follows:

The person in whose favour a license is granted to manufacture in bond for exportation, shall, upon receiving such license pay to the collector such sum not exceeding three hundred dollars as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

That is, instead of a flat rate of $300, the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing a lesser amount. There is also an amendment to section 255 remitting the duty when the alcohol is used in the manufacture of vinegar. Section 282 is amended by adding thereto the following words:

The Department may authorize the preparation of tobacco and cigars in packages of such size, and the issue of stamps in such denominations to cover same, as may appear advisable, but as to the necessity of advisability of issuing such stamps, the department shall be the sole judge.

Section 316 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

1. No less quantity than one hundred pounds of raw leaf tobacco or the contents of one package, five hundred pounds of cavendish or other tobacco, five thousand cigars, or eight thousand cigarettes, shall be entered for warehouse by one entry.

2. Except for export, no less quantity than fifty pounds of raw leaf tobacco, five hundred pounds of cavendish or manufactured tobacco, two thousand cigars, or five thousand cigarettes, shall be ex-warehoused by one entry.

Section 366 is repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

There shall be imposed, levied and collected upon acetic acid produced in Canada by the destructive distillation of wood, or any other process, or from any other source, except as by this Act otherwise provided, the following duty of excise, which shall be paid to the collector, etc., etc.

The only change there is that we are adding the words: " or any other process."

Section 368 is amended, and defines denatured alcohol as follows:

Denatured alcohol means alcohol in suitable admixture with such denaturants as to render it in the judgment of the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue non-potable and to prevent recovery of the ethyl alcohol.

Section 369 is amended to read as follows:

Alcohol without the admixture of any denaturants and denatured alcohol and specially denatured alcohol as defined in section one of this part, which is intended for use in the arts and industries or for fuel, light or power, or for any mechanical purpose may be manufactured in Canada free from any excise duty.

It has been represented to the Government that alcohol can be manufactured to a very large extent by the distilleries for fuel, light and power, and this amendment simply empowers the distilleries to use denatured alcohol for that purpose.

Section 370 will read:

Excepting as provided by this Act, no alcohol shall be manufactured, denatured or recovered in Canada except in distilleries thereto licensed.

I think hon. members will approve of these amendments when the Bill is before them and they have had an opportunity to study it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why does the minister want to differentiate in the various amounts that he would charge for the licenses? Importunists might tell him they were only going to manufacture a very small amount and should therefore be given the license for a smaller sum, and I think it would be well to fix the license fee in the Act, so that the person getting the license would know how much he had to pay. It would be inadvisable to leave it open to people to come and ask for favours, and it might place patronage to some extent in the hands of the department.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not discussed that point very closely with the officials of the department, but when we come to the Bill I shall have the information and be glad to discuss the matter on its merits.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. J. D. Reid thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 76, to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 11, respecting The Central Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. McMaster.

Bill No. 55 (from the Senate), to change the name of The Canada Accident Assurance Company to The Canada Accident and Fire Assurance Company.—Mr. McMaster.

Bill No. 20, to incorporate Canadian Merchant Service Guild.—Mr. McQuarrie.

Bill No. 36, to incorporate Grain Insurance and Guarantee Company.—Mr. Blake.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Railways and Canals—Salaries including Deputy Minister at $6,000, Chief Engineer at $5,500, Assistant Chief Engineer, Electrical Engineer, and Inspecting Engineer at $4,500 each, Comptroller at $3,900 and R. A. C. Henry at $3,300, $189,300. Contingencies, $28,000.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): There is a decrease in this vote of $13,812.50. The staff in the department coming under the vote for Civil Government for the fiscal year 1918-19 numbered 110. We have reduced it to 96. The increases in salary are all in accordance with the Civil Service Act with the exception of the following: The deputy minister has been increased from $5,000 to $6,000 in line with all the deputy ministers who have been increased by $1,000. We had last year the position of assistant to the minister. That was Mr. Graham Bell's position and the salary was $5,000. We have dropped that position. The salary of the chief engineer, Mr. Bowden, last year was $5,000; we have increased that by $500. The solicitor, Mr. Fairweather, remains at $5,000. The assistant chief engineer, who was at $4,000 last year, is now increased to $4,500; the electrical engineer from $4,000 to $4,500 and the Inspecting Engineer from $4,000 to $4,500. The names of these gentlemen are: Mr. Bell, deputy minister; Mr. Bowden, chief engineer; Mr. Fairweather, solicitor; Mr. Sherwood, assistant chief engineer; Mr. Murphy, electrical engineer; and Mr. Alexander Ferguson, inspecting engineer. The other increases under the heading of Civil Government are simply statutory increases. The staff has been reduced by the transfer of a number of the employees to the Canadian National Railways, Toronto.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sure the Committee will be very much disappointed if the minister departs from his usual custom of giving at this stage a full statement as to the financial condition of all the railways that the Government is operating. If the hon. gentleman will refer to page 2161 of last year's Hansard he will find that he is reported as stating:

> It has been customary for the Minister of Railways and Canals to make a statement in connection with the operation of the Government Railway System from year to year.

The minister is now at the stage to which he referred when he made that statement, and the Government has many more miles of railway under its control now than it had then. I see no reason why some explanation in regard to the financial operations of the Government railways for the year should not be submitted to the Committee now.

Mr. J. D. REID: It must be remembered that there has been a change in the entire organization of the Government Railway system since a year ago, owing to the transfer of those railways to new management. I intend to make a statement later when the Intercolonial Estimates are being considered. I think perhaps that in a week or two I will be in a much better position to present a statement as to the whole railway situation than I am at the present moment. The hon. gentleman knows that a reorganization is proceeding, and that changes are taking place from time to time, and the present is hardly the proper time to give a statement such as he has asked for.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not understand that there is any difference between the estimates of the Intercolonial Railway and the estimates of any other railway that may come up for the committee's consideration. I gather that the whole system of Government-owned railways is now under the one management and responsible to the Minister of Railways, and when that minister comes here with railway estimates we have a right to suppose that he is dealing with the whole Government system. The statement submitted to the House last year dealt with the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, and the Prince Edward Island Railways, and some small lines in New Brunswick, and the receipts and expenditures were given as for the whole system. Are we now to understand that the minister has been keeping separate accounts for the Intercolonial apart from the other lines, and that there is a different system of management in certain sections of the Government lines, or is the Government system to be dealt with under one head? If the latter is the case I do not very well see how we are to get one statement about the Intercolonial, and a different statement about other portions of the Government Railway system. I find that last year the minister made an estimate as to what the operations of the Government system of railways were to cost for the fiscal year which ended in March last, stated what purchases of rolling stock he was to make, and gave a general outline of the financial operations of the Government system. I think the minister, as in a sense the President of the Government railway system, should, when he asks for more money, give us, as representing the owners of the railway, an exact statement as to how these railways have worked out during the year. The minister told us last year that he anticipated a deficit, and the only question in that regard is whether it is any larger than he thought it would be

Mr. J. D. REID: My intention this evening was first to take up the Canal Estimates, and some smaller items about which there probably would not be much discussion, deferring the railway statement until a later period, because I am not in a position to furnish the necessary information this evening. With reference to the operation of the Government Railways the situation is this: Last year we took a vote for the operation of the Canadian Government railway system. That was for the Intercolonial Railway and its branch lines, and the Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Moncton, which then comprehended the Government railway system. We took a vote until the end of the then fiscal year, the receipts were deposited to the credit of the Receiver General, and the disbursements for operations were made in the same way as for many years past. Three or four months ago the control of the Government Railway operations was transferred from the Railway Department to the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railway System, of which Mr. Hanna is the president, and that board will report to the Government and to Parliament through the Minister of Railways and Canals.

When the Intercolonial Estimates or some of the larger amounts that are in the Estimates in connection with the Government railway systems are before the Committee I shall be pleased to make a statement such as I made last year and to give all the information I can as to the results of the operation of the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the several companies of which the Government has purchased the controlling stock. I had intended simply to have the Civil Government Estimates passed and then to go on to the Canal Estimates.

Mr. McCOIG: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to something that happened last night in Toronto. Before the departure from Toronto for Ottawa of the 10.55 Canadian Northern train, I had wired from Chatham for a berth in the sleeping car, and naturally expected to be able to get one. When I arrived in Toronto, however, I was informed by the conductor of the train that on account of the number of special cars that were on the train containing Government officials, it was impossible to put on any more sleeping cars. I asked the conductor how many private cars were on, and he said that there were three, one carrying the Minister of Finance, another carrying the Minister of Militia, and a third carrying the Chairman of the Railway Board. He said: "The car of the Chairman of the Railway Commission cannot be pulled because we refuse to take on a fourth one." The conductor said that if we wanted to do so we could go into the day coach and sleep on the seats. I refused to do that, and ran to catch the second section of the Canadian Pacific railway train, on which I got a berth; but many others who wanted to go to Ottawa to transact business had the choice of sleeping in the day coach or smoker or of being unable to travel on that train. Because three special cars occupied by three public men were attached to the train, fifty people were unable to travel from Toronto to Ottawa on that line. The Canadian Northern could not put on any more sleeping cars because these three special cars carrying three or four of the public men of Canada were attached to the train. If the minister thinks he is going to economize in that way he is making a very sad mistake. If ministers want to run private cars for their own special comfort during the holiday season, surely two of them ought to be friendly enough to get into one car and let us poor individuals have the privilege of occupying berths. Providence was against the Government in this particular matter; the train ran off the track before it got to Smith's Falls, evidencing its disgust with the action of the Government in carrying three special cars while other folk slept in the day coaches. Moreover, after the train ran off the track, those who had managed to get berths were deprived of the privilege of having their breakfast until a special dining car was sent from Ottawa; but the gentlemen who occupied the private cars had their breakfasts, while the other people on the train watched them through the windows, with empty stomachs. There is not another railway system in the country which, on the occasion of delay caused by a wreck, does not furnish meals free of charge to the passengers. On this occasion, however, I am credibly informed that every man had to pay for his breakfast in the dining car which came from Ottawa. This matter may seem somewhat of a joke, because the whole thing is so ridiculous. But this treatment of those who were anxious to patronize Government roads was so unkind and so unfair that the minister should take some action in the matter and should see that ministers of the Crown may not in future occupy half a train so that the plain people are unable to get berths in the sleeping cars.

Mr. J. D. REID: I agree that a train should not be loaded down with private cars. It happened last night that several ministers were returning from their Easter holiday and were coming down on that train. The president and directors and Sir Henry Drayton were in one car. Sir Thomas White was in another; he had intended to come to Ottawa the night before, but unfortunately there was a death in his family and he could not come until last evening. General Mewburn could not come either; so they all happened to come together on that train. But a thing of that kind probably would not occur once in a year —probably will not occur again. As to the accident, of course that could not be helped; we believe that a switch was tampered with and that that was the cause of the accident. Fortunately, no lives were lost. As to the people paying for their meals on the dining car, I did not hear anything about that; probably in the excitement that matter was overlooked. I am sure that the management of the Canadian National Railways would do everything they could to make things satisfactory for the passengers, as they have done in the past. I understand that in the case of a wreck, the railways have some such understanding with regard to meals as that mentioned by the hon. member. However, I am glad the hon. gentleman has drawn attention to the matter of the private cars and of the furnishing of meals to the passengers after the accident. It does good to bring these matters before the House; at the same time, it was really accidental that two or three private cars were on last night's train. I do not think the members of the House or the people of the country can complain much about the use of private cars by ministers; they are not used very much. After all, it is almost an absolute necessity that they be used occasionally. Ministers have hardly sufficient time to do their work in Ottawa and when they travel they have to take work with them and do it on the train. I think I can safely say that the use of private cars is less to-day than it ever has been at any time during the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. POWER: How many private cars—

The CHAIRMAN: I have to call the Committee to order. The item under discussion is that of salaries for Civil Service, Department of Railways and Canals. The matter of private cars certainly comes under the Outside Service.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I did not happen to be present when an Estimate was passed raising the salary of any other deputy minister. I do not want to make any invidious reference to the deputy minister of this department, but I should like to know the grounds upon which the additional $1,000 is being paid to the various deputy ministers of the departments at this particular time and whether there is a comparable advance to the other members of the Civil Service.

Mr. J. D. REID: The members of the Civil Service, as a whole, have received advances during the past year. They have received bonuses and then there are the usual statutory increases each year. The salaries of deputy ministers, however, have not been increased for many years. The cost of living has gone up with them as well as with others, and it was felt, when the matter was brought to the attention of the Government, that they, along with the other civil servants, were entitled to an increase, and all the deputy ministers were given the same increase.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I should like, so as to be thoroughly understood, to say on that point that I suppose the deputy ministers are feeling the increased cost of living with every other inhabitant of Canada. Personally, I think a deputy minister is, in ordinary times, worth quite the salary which he is getting, including the increase; but as the cost of living is the cause of this, I venture, while not opposing the appropriation, to express the hope that the Government are directing their attention to the question of the cost of living. We had in this House a statement of the most funereal description as to the condition of the finances of the country, and we were also told, in so many words, I think, on two different occasions, that we are $100,000,000 in the hole. Under those circumstances, something has to be done, and I hope the Government are not going to be misled by the state of customs returns, which is, I believe, very good for the moment, into thinking that we can go on spending money and increasing salaries without attempting to do something at the other end, that is, to reduce the cost of living. If it goes on mounting in this way the ministers may have to come before the House next year with another proposal to increase salaries, and with this sum of $100,000,000 not yet provided for, one is naturally waiting with anxiety, and, indeed, with some degree of apprehension, for the Budget statement in this connection, and I can see nothing but very great financial disorder. I hope the Government, as a whole, will, in the next few weeks, pay very serious attention to this question of the cost of living and the general financial condition of the country. Unless history is absolutely misleading, we shall, within the next two or three years, have times very different from the present. We are still running the country under war conditions, and our soldiers are not, by any means, all back. We are selling a great deal of material, as other nations who have it to sell are doing, to our Allies to feed the Central European nations. A summer's harvest in these nations will alter that condition, and if we have good crops ourselves, I want to assure ministers that the financial embarrassment and economic disturbance will be such as they do not seem at present to be quite as apprehensive of as they should be. I venture to say these things at this point without any special reference to the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), who, I think, gets his work through this House wonderfully well—and I am the last man to want to obstruct him—and without opposing this particular vote. The general position, however, is one which should commend itself to the consideration of any Government which desires to be credited in the next two years with average foresight, discretion and economy.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no doubt at all what the hon. member says is true. The cost of living in this, as in every other country, is a very serious question. The Government are certainly considering the matter, and when the Budget speech is brought down, we shall have to discuss the whole situation and consider what can be done. When I see the prices that people have to pay for the necessaries of life, such as clothes and so on, I feel that the cost of living has become so high that people must have higher salaries or they cannot live. I believe every member of the House is anxious to consider the situation and to do what he can to improve matters. This is a big question and one that it will tax the ingenuity of the best people in this country to solve. I hope, when the matter comes up on the Budget, some means will be found by which the cost of living may be reduced.

Mr. POWER: With reference to the item regarding the solicitor, does the Department of Justice not look after the legal affairs of the department?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Justice Department looks after the outside legal work of every department, but it has always been necessary, in connection with railway matters, to have a solicitor in the department to prepare the briefs and give opinions as to cases coming before the department. If those cases are not, or cannot be, settled, then, of course, they are sent to the Justice Department which selects lawyers outside of the department altogether who take the cases up and go to the courts with them; that is, if the Deputy Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General does not deal with them. In many cases, the Deputy Minister of Justice, if he has time, or the Solicitor General, appears before the courts.

Mr. POWER: How many solicitors are there altogether?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have one solicitor in the Department of Railways and Canals. Of course, on the railways, there are several solicitors. When the Intercolonial Railway and the Transcontinental Railway were being administered by the Department of Railways, we had at Ottawa one solicitor, Mr. Fairweather, and then we had Mr. Alward at Moncton, who had one assistant. That was the total staff of solicitors on the whole railway system.

Mr. POWER: If I understand the matter aright, each branch of the Canadian National railways, that is to say, the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, has one or two solicitors. I am at a loss to understand, if each railway refers its legal business to its own solicitor, what the particular solicitor mentioned in this item does. What are his duties?

Mr. J. D. REID: When the Department of Railways administered the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, we had at Ottawa a solicitor to advise the minister on matters coming before him, and there was also work in connection with the canals, such as leases, agreements and things of that sort that were prepared at Ottawa. There is work for solicitors in matters of that kind.

Of course, with a system of 13,000 miles of railway there is a great deal of legal work to do. We have a solicitor at Moncton, for instance. There are legal matters continually cropping up in connection with the Canadian National Railways which have to be referred to the Government, and the minister must have a solicitor at his call. Mr. Fairweather is very busy with the work he has to do in connection with the department. I do not think it possible for a minister to carry on without a solicitor at his call.

Mr. POWER: Could the work not be done as well by one of the solicitors in the Department of Justice Is there nobody sufficiently competent in that department to do the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: It would simply be transferring the work to that department. They would require another solicitor to do the work. Besides, the Justice Department does not do the departmental work that Mr. Fairweather does. Most of the departments have a solicitor, I believe. It would be very inconvenient to have to send our files over to the Justice Department or to have the solicitor continually coming over here to explain matters. Hardly a day passes but a lease or a contract has to be prepared, and a solicitor is absolutely required.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the legislation which is submitted to Parliament on behalf of the Railway Department drafted by the solicitor of the department or by the parliamentary counsel—for instance, the Bill incorporating the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: I asked Mr. Fairweather to consult with the solicitor of the Canadian National Railways and with the Railway Commission, if necessary, in drafting the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it not also part of his duty to assist the Minister of Railways and Canals in the Railway Committee?

Mr. J. D. REID: Oh, yes, he appears before the Railway Committee.

Mr. CAHILL: Who was the assistant to the minister? How did that position come to be done away with?

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Graham Bell was assistant to the minister. When Mr. Campbell, who was deputy minister, became Commissioner of Highways, Mr. Graham Bell took the position of deputy minister, and the position of assistant to the minister was abolished.

Welland ship canal—construction, $3,500,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: Hon. gentlemen will remember that the new Welland ship canal was under construction at the time war was declared. Work was carried on for a time afterwards, then was closed down. There were four sections under construction: No. 1, for dredging the harbour, completing the concrete work, and regulating the weir; that contract was with the Dominion Dredging Company at the time work closed down. Then there were sections 2, 3 and 5 also under construction. These were the four largest sections of this canal. When the war ended and demobilization took place we felt it was necessary to go on with some of the work to provide employment. A great many of the men who had been working on the canal had enlisted, and there were also in that district a great many men who were thrown out of work owing to the closing of munitions plants. Hon. gentlemen will remember well the feeling of unrest there was in the country at that time. We therefore decided to go on with the work that we had under construction. We had, of course, settled with the contractors; the contracts had been cancelled. When we decided to start work again, we thought that the cost of materials and labour was so high that it would be almost impossible for the contractors to tender at a fair and reasonable price. We therefore put the old contractors at work on these four sections which would employ a large number of men, and we decided to let them proceed with the work on a cost-plus basis. We agreeed to pay them 8 per cent. These contractors understood the work, had their organizations, and we thought they would be able to do the work in the most economical way. The work goes on only from month to month, because we stipulated in the contract that we can stop the work on the cost-plus basis at any time and call for tenders, so that we could take advantage of conditions when they become normal again.

We also stipulated in the Order in Council that the contract would not extend longer than the present year, that is December 31, 1919, so that there could be no misunderstanding with the contractors or with the public. In section No. 1 we estimate that the total amount that could be expended on that work would be $500,000; No. 2, $600,000; No. 3, $700,000; and No. 5, $500,000. Then for the purchase of plant, cement, bridges, steel rails, engineering, etc., $1,200,000. They do not get any percentage on the $1,200,000, but only on the other. So that, although we have $3,500,000 in the Estimates we will pay a percentage only on $2,300,000 at the very most, if they do that amount of work.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The work ceased about two years ago. Before construction is re-started it would be well to know what the condition of the work is at the present moment. Has an inspection been made to know the condition the work is in?

Mr. J. D. REID: The engineering staff looked over the work.

Mr. FOSTER: What is the condition of it?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am informed by the Chief Engineer that the work is in the same condition as when we closed down, with the exception of a couple of earth slides where there had been excavation.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Has an inspection been made recently? If so, the engineer will find that it is not as the minister says. There are large abutments that cost many thousands of dollars that are not in their proper condition.

Mr. J. D. REID: One of the slides occurred at Queenston Road Bridge. It was absolutely necessary to close the works down at the time, and of course we could not expect the work to be in as good condition as it would be if we had proceeded. I am informed that the large abutment that did slide in was at Queenston Road.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) raised the very question I was going to ask the minister. Near the city of St. Catharines, since the work on the canal was discontinued, the cement walls collapsed and damage to the extent of thousands of dollars has occurred. Upon whom will the loss fall—the contractors or the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: If there is any loss of that kind it falls upon the Government because we settled with the contractors a couple of years ago. However, I can only give the hon. member the information which the Chief Engineer gives me, and he tells me that the hon. member has been misinformed regarding the damage.

Mr. EULER: I am not an engineer, but any person who drives past the work must see that there is a great deal of damage; the work must be reconstructed. If, of course, the damage is due to the discontinuance of the work at an improper time I suppose the loss must be borne by the Government, but if it is due to inferior work it seems to me the people who put up the work should shoulder the responsibility.

Mr. CAHILL: What do these contractors furnish for the eight per cent plus which they get, and who are they?

Mr. J. D. REID: The contractors are, for No. 1: The Dominion Dredging Company, whose head office is at Ottawa; No. 2, Baldry, Yerburgh & Hutchison, an English firm; No. 3, Doheny, Quinlan & Robertson; No. 4, the Canadian Dredging Company. We furnish the plant. They do not get any percentage on the plant, but only on the materials and labour.

Mr. BUREAU: They get a percentage on $2,300,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is, if they do that amount of work.

Mr. BUREAU: What do they do for that —just walk around the job?

Mr. J. D. REID: These contractors furnish for the 8 per cent what is usually furnished by contractors on a percentage basis. They furnish their organization and do the financing, and their percentage is on the same basis as that paid to any firm. The percentage I consider reasonable. They asked at the time the same percentage as is allowed by other corporations, and the hon. member will know that the Exchequer Court decided that 10 per cent was a fair and reasonable basis.

Mr. BUREAU: What case was that?

Mr. J. D. REID: Take the Dominion Dredging Company: $40,000 would be the total amount they could possibly get during the year, and there is the head of the firm, the superintendent's office, the financing, and so on. So that I think the percentage is very reasonable.

Mr. CAHILL: What financing do they do?

Mr. J. D. REID: They purchase materials and pay wages twice a month, and we pay them once a month. They pay their men in the middle of March and again at the end of March, and we do not pay them until the 15th of April, and there is, therefore, a good deal of financing in connection with the work.

Mr. CAHILL: Do they get 8 per cent plus on that financing, too?

Mr. J. D. REID: They get 8 per cent on the amount of money paid out for materials and labour, but not for the financing as well.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know if I understand this matter correctly, but it seems rather strange. We have a contract, I understand, to build the Parliament buildings on a percentage basis the same as this. Whoever is doing the work—I think it is Lyall—supplies all the equipment. In this case the minister says the work was under contract and he tells us: We have settled with the contractors and it is all off. These contractors must have had the equipment and all the material that was necessary to carry on the work. If I understand rightly, the contractors are employed because they know the work best, and that is as it should be; but the mode of payment is what I cannot understand. The minister says the Canadian Dredging Company are going to do part of that work. You are going to buy the dredges and they are going to put their men on them. They are experienced men and will handle that machinery. You are going to pay these men and you are going to pay the Canadian Dredging Company a percentage on the salaries they are paying their own men. Supposing I am in the position of these contractors; you are going to pay eight per cent on every cent that is expended on these sections, and all I have to do is to sit in my office. The minister seems to lay great stress on the question of financing. In ordinary times I would be willing to finance any one, or anything, with the credit of Canada behind me. All you have to do is to make estimates of the progress of the work and when these estimates are made you have only to go to the bank and the bank will be quite willing to advance the money to the contractors. The contractor is getting eight per cent to supply the staff which is being paid by the Government. The bookkeepers and office staff are paid by the Government, in addition to which the contractor is not using his own plant which is lying idle or is used on some other work, and the Government are buying the plant. It would pay the Government better if they would go a little farther, as they have done in connection with the Parliament buildings, have the contractor supply the plant, and give him a little higher percentage. The Government are not going to dig canals all their life and the plant may be worth nothing to them when they get through with the Welland canal, and there will be $1,200,000 gone to waste. It would pay the Government to pay ten per cent on the equipment and not be loaded up with this material and equipment when the work is done. I cannot understand what service will be rendered by the contractor for the eight per cent which will be paid on $2,800,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: We could not make a contract of this kind on the cost-plus basis and ask them to furnish the plant because this contract might only last for two or three months. I do not think that any member of the Government expects to do this work on this basis very long or to continue it any longer than is absolutely necessary. We will call for tenders—

Mr. BUREAU: What about the plant?

Mr. J. D. REID: Whoever tenders for this work will want the plant and we will ask those who tender to take it over. They will have to take the plant over in order to carry on the work. While we have the plant we are not paying any percentage on it.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that not the contract with Peter Lyall & Sons for the Parliament buildings?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know what their contract is; I am talking about this one. Take the Dominion Dredging Company's plant; their dredges are worth $350,000, and it probably costs $10,000 a month to operate them. We are only paying a percentage on $10,000 being the cost of operation, or $800. If they had $350,000 in that plant they would want more than eight per cent on $350,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly; I know that.

Mr. J. D. REID: So we have the plant, and whoever takes this contract off our hands will have to take the plant when we call for tenders. In addition to that, the contractors are not getting eight per cent on all that is really going into the work. They are not getting it on the cement and the cement is a large item in connection with the work. We do not pay them a percentage on any of the materials we are able to supply. They do not get it on the cement, or the reinforcing steel; we have that on hand. There is a very large amount of stuff that we have on hand from the original contract and they do not get any percentage on that. When we take everything into consideration, the percentage is really, in my opinion, very reasonable. These are very large contractors and very reliable men. They always have an organization on hand that they must pay even though they are not employed in order to keep their organization together. They are out of employment for some time and they must figure on reimbursing their men to a certain extent for the time that they have not been employed. The Chief Engineer, his staff, and I went into this matter, with Council, and threshed it out, and I believe that the percentage is a fair and reasonable amount considering everything.

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot agree with the minister. Supposing the material that the contractors supplied cost sixteen per cent; that would amount to $36,000 over the $2,300,000 that the minister is going to expend. Now he is going to put $1,200,000 into plant and this plant has to be maintained. There will be wear and tear and depreciation. You will have that $1,200,000 which will be sunk anyway; whereas, if you pay double the commission and have the contractor supply his own plant a great deal of benefit to the country will result. It is human nature to take care of that which belongs to yourself better than you take care of that which belongs to your neighbour and therefore you would be better off in the end. I do not criticise the cost-plus basis only I think that it is a big mistake for the Government to supply this dredge and equipment and spend $1,200,000 and in addition pay this commission. The minister says that the percentage will not be paid on the cement which they have on hand. If I understand rightly that is cement which the contractors bought and on which they got a profit.

Mr. J. D. REID: Out of this $1,200,000 we are going to purchase plant, cement, bridges, steel rails, and pay for engineering, and so on. When the hon. gentleman states that we are going to spend $1,200,000 out of $3,500,000 on plant that will be of no value when the contract is ended he speaks without a full understanding of the situation. This is to purchase plant, the cement that is going into the work and on which they do not get a commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Why do they not get a commission?

Mr. J. D. REID: Because that is the contract; on anything furnished by the department they do not get any percentage. It is estimated that $1,200,000 will be required for this purpose, and they do not get any percentage on that. It is not all lost, because the bridges and steel rails will, perhaps, be sold later on at a small loss. They are second-hand rails that we are purchasing now. Of course, if steel rails were to depreciate in value in the next three or four years there might be a loss, but there will not be a loss altogether, for the reason that they can be sold as scrap.

Mr. BUREAU: Are the steel rails and the cement included in the $1,200,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, and the bridges and the engineering work. That is, in the $3,500,000.

Mr. BUREAU: That will pay the wages and material that will go into the contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The cement is regarded here as equipment, which I do not think it is. I would count as equipment all the tools—for instance, the dredges, the derricks, and the machines which were used for boring. That is what I say will be of no use to the Government after this job is completed. What portion of this $1,200,000 is going into cement and steel rails? Then we can get down to closer figures.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Chief Engineer tells me we are purchasing about $300,000 of plant other than what we had on hand. That will leave $900,000 of this estimate that will go into the purchase of cement, bridges, steel rails, and so forth, and pay for engineering.

Mr. CAHILL: I understood the minister to say that one of the reasons for carrying on the work on this basis was that the contractors had to be reimbursed for maintaining their staff during the time they were idle.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman has unduly expanded my statement. What I said was that the contractors have a staff that they must always maintain in order to keep the organization intact, and in putting these men on this work they probably made an estimate for the time during which their staff was waiting for work. Everybody tells me that the percentage these men are working on is a fair and reasonable one. Then, again, when you consider that we can close down the work at any time and call for tenders—

Mr. BUREAU: By giving thirty days' notice.

Mr. J. D. REID: We can give thirty days' notice and we will do that when times are normal. I do not think it is a good time now to call for tenders, because some contractors tell me they would hardly know what prices to charge on account of the abnormal cost of material and labour. We could see no other way if we were to start up this work than to carry it out on a percentage basis.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not object to the system followed, but what seems to call for criticism is what has been done in regard to equipment. This equipment is going to cost the Government $300,000, being paid for at abnormal prices. I think it is a mistake not to have the contractor supply his own equipment. In those sections of the canal that are under contract the contractors supplied their own equipment. They had, and have still, all that is necessary to carry on the work. If the Government had paid the contractors as much as sixteen per cent on the job, it would have resulted in a very considerable saving. Let the man who is going to do the work supply his own equipment. Buy the material if you will, but let the contractor supply his own dredges and other plant. Naturally there is an inducement in this, because a person will take better care of property that belongs to him than he will of what belongs to his neighbour.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is a possibility that we will lose on the plant when we ask the contractor to take it over in the future, that is if prices go down so that we can call for tenders. That is one of the penalties that must be paid in going on with this public work at this particular time. There is no doubt that we paid more for the plant than we would expect to pay in a year from now, if times become normal again, plant and everything else will be cheaper.

Mr. BUREAU: Have the contractors not got the plant? They are the same contractors that were doing the work before, are they not?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Have you settled with them for the plant they sold to the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: When we settled with these contractors, we purchased the plant from them, and then re-sold a great part of it.

Mr. BUREAU: To whom?

Mr. J. D. REID: We sold all of the movable plant to the public, and at prices quite a percentage higher than we paid to the contractors. We took the plant on a valuation basis made by a firm in Montreal, and then sold it at higher prices than we paid. The plant that we have left was also purchased from the contractors when we settled up.

Mr. BUREAU: That settles the question then.

Mr. J. D. REID: Two years ago, when we closed up with these men, we had to take the plant from them.

Mr. BUREAU: If the Government owns the plant it is all right.

Mr. J. D. REID: Four-fifths of the plant we have on hand belongs to us, and the other one-fifth is what we are purchasing.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the minister decided on finishing this work at any certain time? If so, how much does he think it is going to cost, and what is the policy of the Government with regard to it? Is the minister going right on, just making work for the time being for these contractors, and for other fellows that he wants to have on the job?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have decided to carry this work on until the end of December next, that is all that we have provided for in the Estimates. Next session the Government will have to decide what will be done.

Mr. CAHILL: Were there no other contractors that would have been willing to take this work at a percentage plus? It seems an extraordinary thing that these men should go to these works with a lead pencil on their ear and get eight per cent on the expenditures made.

Mr. McKENZIE: It seems to me we ought to have some further justification for entering upon this extraordinary expenditure. There must be great necessity for starting this work at this particular time, and motives of economy must have influenced the minister to close it down when the war broke out.

I assume that he took a proper inventory of what had been done and ascertained how matters stood when the works were closed down. The present works were started in midwinter, at a time when contractors, under ordinary conditions, would have stopped working. I assume that there is a good deal of clay work and masonry work on this canal, all of which is done at great expense in the winter season. The minister has not told us that anybody who had been overseas came to him looking for work on this canal. If a large body of men who had been overseas or who had been working in munition plants came to him and said: We are out of work; we have been working for the country in connection with the war, and we think that the Government should look after us; then the minister could figure out whether it would be cheaper for the country to give these men so much a day for doing nothing or to pay their board or to take some other step than to start this enormous work at such great expense and under such unfavourable circumstances—not for the purpose of doing the work itself, but for the purpose of giving employment. So far, however, we have not been informed that any such men have been looking for work or were actually put on the job. After all, the purpose of this work is more or less charitable; as I say, it is the giving of work to men who are out of employment, not the carrying on of an enterprise for the sake of the results for the country. If he can say that he has accomplished that purpose, he would be affording some satisfaction to the committee, although we should be paying very dearly for it. But I rather fear that there was no such justification for starting the work at this time. I should like the minister to tell us how the officials, after given periods, arrive at the amount that has been expended on this work. It is extremely difficult to make a proper estimate of the amount of clay that is removed in winter, having regard to the slides that frequently take place; and it is difficult also, in cases where tons of water have to be pumped out of the cuttings every morning, to tell how much should be allowed for work of that character. This is the first time that canal construction has been proceeded with on force account. I have never heard of a railway, a wharf or a canal being built on force account, and only because of absolute necessity should the minister carry on such a work as this under the circumstances. Formerly, these works were proceeded with under tender and contract. The minister can tell us therefore, what was the cost per unit of the various kinds of work that were being done and how the cost in pre-war days compares with the cost of the work being carried on under force account. If the minister finds that the work per unit is now costing very much more, he would be well advised to put an end to it as speedily as possible and to wait until he can carry the work on in the ordinary way.

Mr. J. D. REID: In the Niagara peninsula, thousands of men have been thrown out of work since the war ceased and since the munition plants and other war industries discontinued operations. These men were not looking for charity. They did not come to me and say: Pay me so much a day to keep myself and my family living. What they asked for was work in order that they might earn a living for themselves and their families. We did not wish to proceed with the work in the middle of winter, but we were faced with this condition of affairs. Men had been thrown out of work, families were in want, the cost of living was high. Accordingly, the Government were forced to try to provide work in every part of Canada where there was unemployment. I remember, about the time that the war ended, there was consternation down at Sydney; the Dominion Iron and Steel works were going to close down and thousands of men were to be thrown out of employment. The Government was asked to do something to keep these men employed and to keep the Dominion Iron and Steel works going. They were asking $70 and $80 a ton for rails. I believed then that if we waited until normal times came or until we wanted to use the rails, we could buy them at a great deal less. I say frankly that if we had carried out with the Dominion Iron and Steel works the policy now suggested with regard to the Welland canal, thousands of men in the Dominion Iron and Steel works would have had nothing to do during the last several winter months. We did make a contract with them and paid them $65 a ton for rails which, if we had waited until to-day, we could buy for $47 a ton. I do not regret that we gave the contract in order to keep these men employed. The men of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company worked hard to furnish materials to win the war; so did the men in the Niagara peninsula. So it was the duty of the Government, even though they were facing a loss, even though they might get the materials cheaper a few months later, to try to keep all the plants going and all men employed. I go further and say that wherever plants are thinking of closing down because of the changed conditions, I believe it is the duty of the Government and of every member of the House to do all they possibly can to keep the wheels turning in every industry. The Niagara peninsula is a manufacturing centre; it was necessary to do something to keep the men employed, and in my judgment we acted rightly in starting a work about one-third of which had been constructed, which must be continued and which will be completed.

Had it not been for the changed war conditions the Government would have waited until things became normal. I could give the hon. member instances where private corporations should, in my opinion, have gone ahead and done more than they did in order to give employment, but when they did not do so, it was up to the Government to keep the men employed, and I have no regrets in connection with this work, with the Dominion Iron and Steel works, with the Algoma Works, and with any shipbuilding and other plants in Canada to which the Government have been able to give work until times become normal.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has, as he knows and admits, made a departure from the custom in this country of giving contracts by tender, and to justify his position he has appealed to patriotism and endeavoured to prove that the country was undertaking this work in order to give employment to a large number of men who otherwise would not have had employment. The minister would have made his case stronger had he told the committee just how many men were engaged in that work. I suppose the minister will willingly admit that the system of doing work by force contract is, to say the least, a vicious one. The man who has the work in charge finds it in his interest to do it, not as cheaply as possible, but as expensively as possible. If men are employed at $4 a day, his commission out of that is 32 cents, but if he jacks them up to $5 a day, he gets 40 cents out of them, so that it is in the interest of the contractor to do the work just as expensively as possible. I am not going to follow this feature of the matter further. What I rose more particularly for was to say that it seems to me that, in view of the large vote asked for canal purposes, this would be the time for the minister to make a statement as to the transportation problem from the Great Lakes to the seaboard. If the Welland canal is to be deepened, what is to be done with the other canals? We hear rumours; in fact, we are told, that before the close of this session the Government may submit a policy of new canals to replace the present Cornwall canal and the Soulanges canal. The transportation interests and the grain producing interests of the Great West have a right to know now the general policy of the Government as regards the canal system.

Mr. J. D. REID: With reference to the first criticism the hon. member made as to the cost-plus basis, if I were giving a contract of my own, I believe in the cost-plus basis. I believe, moreover, that almost every corporation had, while the war was on, to go on the cost-plus basis. Wages and material are in an abnormal condition, and I do not believe any private individual or corporation would at the present time accept a contract on a tender basis.

Mr. ROBB: If the minister had given a contract for the Welland canal, would wages have gone up?

Mr. J. D. REID: Wages vary from time to time. If, say, just after the war was over, one were to call for tenders for work on the Welland canal and to let the work on a contract, as wages were very high at that time, the contractor would probably base his tender on those wages. Every person believed they might fall, and yet the contractor could not take any chances. Wages on the Welland canal are arranged in this way: there is a fair-wage clause in the contract, and the wages paid are the same as those received by other employees in the locality. The men nearly all belong to unions, and a regular wage is arranged by the unions of each locality. As to the policy of the Government with reference to transportation from the Great Lakes to the seaboard, there cannot be any change in the water transportation situation until the Welland canal is completed, and that, even if the work is pressed, will take at least three or four years. What we are doing at the present time is just keeping the work going on the four contracts that were partially, and some of them very nearly, completed. We are not calling for tenders nor proceeding with the other work, nor have we any intention of doing so during the present year, for the reason I have mentioned. The hon. member can, therefore, see that we are not pressing navigation construction work between Welland and Montreal at present. I have in mind what the hon. member wishes to learn, namely, as to the system between, say, the head of the canal system, that is, just east of Prescott, and Montreal. That is a big question, and I do not believe it will come up during the present session. The hon. member knows this question has been before the people for a number of years. Some years ago an American corporation made a proposition to place a dam across the St. Lawrence at Cornwall for power purposes only. I opposed that at the time, not so much on account of damming the St. Lawrence, but because I believed that when that work was proceeded with it should be done by the Governments of the two countries, and not by private corporations, in order that the power developed would be supplied to the people of each country at the lowest possible cost, instead of on the basis of dividends on stock issues. The power question has been taken up very seriously by the Government of the United States, and it has, during the last few years, developed in this country much faster than we expected a few years ago.

Between the head of the canal system and Montreal I have been informed—and I understand it is a minimum estimate—that about 2,000,000 horse-power can be developed on the St. Lawrence river. My own impression is that all that power will be required; at least, Canada will require her portion of it. I believe that the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways running from west Montreal can use all that power. My opinion is that if the United States will assume their portion of the cost of this work—for it is an international work—Canada should assume her portion, and then we would have a complete waterway system for ocean-going vessels right up to Port Arthur. If this 2,000,000 horse power were developed, and our portion sold to the people at a minimum cost, I think it would be a great thing for the future of Canada. I can only express my own opinion. The American Government had the matter before Congress, and many people on the other side of the boundary, who are privately interested are anxious that this water-power should be developed. The chief engineer of our Railway Department and his staff have been surveying and going into the whole situation for a number of years; they have the whole matter right up to date, and are prepared to take it up at any time it is thought advisable by both governments. Of course we can do nothing more than discuss the matter with the American Government if they feel inclined to take up the proposal, and the whole matter would then be submitted to Parliament for consideration. Personally, I do not think the matter will be taken up during the present session, unless the American Government should approach us.

Mr. ROBB: Are they not developing power now?

Mr. J. D. REID: A large appropriation Bill has passed Congress for assisting in the development of water-powers in the United States; but the American Government is not developing power on the St. Lawrence as a government. Of course a great power is being developed at Messina, and is being used by the aluminum company there; I think it is from 60,000 to 100,000 horse-power. The same company is taking 60,000 horse-power from Valleyfield.

Mr. ROBB: Ninety thousand.

Mr. J. D. REID: Sixty thousand is all they have an export license for. Then there is another power company at Waddington; they want to develop on the American side Under the treaty between the United States and Canada no dam can be placed on the St. Lawrence without the consent of the Dominion Government. The position I have taken in this House, both as a private member and as a minister, is this: If the power is to be developed, the two governments should build the dam and place the lock in the dam. They could build it as cheaply as any private concern. I believe that after the dam was completed, and after deducting what was necessary on account of navigation, they could sell the power at a nominal price which would pay both interest and something on the principal. In that way the people of Ontario and Quebec would be given cheap power, and the cost of operation of the railways, which will be operating under electric power in a few years, would be decreased very materially. Apart from navigation purposes, I believe this work would prove one of Canada's greatest assets in the way of supplying power to farmers and the railways, and, of course, the public would benefit by the decreased cost of operation.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has skillfully evaded saying whether the Government have a real navigation policy or not from the Great Lakes to Montreal, and has simply taken up time trying to draw a red herring across the trail by talking of power. The minister, when a private member, opposed the construction of a dam west of Cornwall because, as Hansard will show, he objected to the power going into the United States. If I remember well, the power was going to Messina, and the minister objected very strenuously. But he had not been a member of the Government for many weeks before he himself was party to a contract that was given to the Cedar Rapids Power Company to develop power on the Soulanges canal, off the St. Lawrence river. The idea was that this power should be developed for use in and around the city of Montreal. The minister states to-night that he knows that an export license was given for 60,000 horse-power. The newspapers say that 60,000 was granted in the first place, and subsequently another 30,000. The minister granted that license himself for the carrying of power, developed forty or fifty miles away from the United States boundary, over to Messina. I think the country will want to know what is going to be the policy of the Government with respect to this power which it is proposed to develop. Is it to be developed for canal purposes? The people of this country are not so much interested in power. The Government has placed a great load on the western grain growers; the rates have been enormously increased since this Government came into power, and that is a tax on the earnings of the man who grows grain for export. Something must be done to lighten that load, and the only way in which it can be lightened, as the minister knows, is by water transportation. What the country wants to know is whether this Government has a real policy in regard to waterways between Fort William and Montreal.

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not want to evade the hon. member's question. With reference to the export of power the hon. member says that I was a party to an agreement to export this power. Previous to my becoming a minister, or at least previous to the change of Government in 1911, permission was given for the export of power, and since I have been a minister I have been trying to reduce the export. In fact, we have had a very difficult time during the last three or four years trying to decrease the export of power that was arranged prior to 1911.

Mr. ROBB: There was no power prior to 1911 at this point I speak of, it was not developed until after 1911.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think some of it was developed by that Montreal firm. With reference to the policy of the Government in regard to transportation from Port Arthur to Montreal, the Government, in 1912, I think, announced its policy; that is, they were going to enlarge the Welland canal in order that these 300,000 or 400,000 bushel freighters should go to Kingston and bring it that much nearer to Montreal. That policy was decided on then, and as to future transportation between Kingston and Montreal, that of course had not been considered up to that time. They started on work in the Welland canal. The war came and everything was changed and they have not considered any other policy up to the present time, except carrying out what they commenced on, the Welland canal. The hon. member knows that the Government could not possibly consider anything while the war was on. The treaty has not yet been signed, and until it is signed we will not consider what will be done east of Kingston to Montreal.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister has so far failed to give the Committee the answer asked for by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, that is, the number of people who are going to be benefited directly by the work on the Welland canal. It is well that we should know that. We are asked to vote $3,500,000 in a lump sum. The minister has told us that although the work is not absolutely essential, yet in order to keep people employed it is necessary it should be proceeded with. I think the Committee and the country would like to know how many men in the Niagara Peninsula are to be benefited by the work.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have about 1,200 men at present but we expect to have probably 3,000 or 4,000 during the summer months. In addition to that, there are men employed outside, not directly 10 p.m. on the canal, in connection with materials and so forth.

Mr. JACOBS: Was this work, which is now being done by force contract, let by tender previous to the war?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: That work was abandoned when the war broke out, and it is now being undertaken under a different form of contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, is that the policy of the Government with respect to all work of that kind done throughout the country?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, it is. On a long contract, where you are going to spend a lot of money and when the work takes considerable time, I would not think of calling for tenders, owing, as I said a few moments ago, to the abnormal conditions that have to be contended with.

Mr. JACOBS: Then how is it that only to-day tenders were opened in the regular way in connection with some excavation at the Customs House at Montreal? It is an important piece of work running into about a quarter of a million dollars, and the minister of that department would not think of doing the work under a force contract.

Mr. J. D. REID: That work will take a very short time. In connection with this work, as I stated before, a lot of plant must be purchased which the contractors would not want to purchase, as the contract may terminate at any time. This contract is not for a definite period. We can cancel it at the end of any month.

Mr. JACOBS: How does the minister propose to give skilled munition workers work on the canal? He has told the Committee that the work is to take the place of that which was closed down owing to the termination of the war. I understand that the men who were engaged in munition work were skilled men who had special training. Does the minister expect that they will be satisfied with ordinary day labour on the canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: In connection with munitions they no doubt require skilled labour, but skilled labour is also required on the canal. You must have skilled men to operate dredges, drills, steam engines and various machines. A great lot of this labour I believe went from the Welland canal to munitions.

Mr. JACOBS: What were most of these men doing before the war broke out? How is it that we have to provide work for these men now if they could go back to their ordinary occupations? If these men were employed in legitimate work in which they were earning proper wages, why should we now have to provide for them a sort of glorified soup kitchen?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think it is hardly fair to say that we are providing a "soup kitchen" for the employees of the Niagara district. On behalf of the employees there I certainly resent that statement. We do not undertake to provide any "soup kitchens" but simply to give legitimate work to these men in that district. That is what we started to do, and what I believe we are doing now. A great many of these men went overseas, and coming back they want their positions again on the Welland canal. The hon. member asks me, where do these men come from, and what they were doing before? Surely he does not expect me to answer a question of that kind. How should I know? All I know is that in that district, as in others, as in Montreal, there were thousands of men who were out of employment. Will the hon. gentlemen tell me where all the munitions workers came from that were working in Montreal?

Mr. JACOBS: They left their positions to get higher salaries working on munitions.

Mr. J. D. REID: They may have done that in Montreal but not in other places; not at the Welland canal.

Mr. ROBB: The munition contractors in Ontario kept employment agencies in Montreal throughout the war hiring men from the farms in Quebec to work on munitions.

Mr. VIEN: Has the minister given any instructions to ensure that the men employed on this work are Canadians?

Mr. J. D. REID: Orders have gone out to the contractors to employ as many returned soldiers as possible. The other men are Canadian citizens. As far as I know they were Canadians only that they were employing.

Mr. VIEN: The minister says that as far as he knows only Canadians were being employed, but sometimes he does not know. Has he inquired, and is he in a position to inform the committee that only Canadians are being provided with work under this system of contracts on a cost plus basis?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, those are the instructions that went to the contractors.

Mr. VIEN: Written?

Mr. J. D. REID: I had the contractors in my office and told them to do that. I am satisfied that is what they are doing.

Mr. VIEN: As part of their contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: The contract is to proceed with the work and the instructions are to employ Canadians. Unless there may be some special man that the hon. member may refer to, these contractors, who are all Canadian citizens, are employing Canadians and men who have been at the front. None of these contractors will take on any others than Canadian citizens unless it may be for some particular reason. I do not know whether the hon. member refers to foreigners, Italians, or some other people of that kind living in that particular locality. There may be some other people of that kind who have been living in that locality, but they are citizens of Canada and they have been living there for a number of years.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that twenty five or fifty per cent of the men who are seeking employment, and who will be employed on this work, are Italian labourers?

Mr. JACOBS: Will the minister give us the proportion of the Italians employed?

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot do that.

Mr. JACOBS: If my statement is untrue how is it the minister cannot give me the exact figures?

Mr. VIEN: Who had the contracts at the commencement of the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: I gave them a few minutes ago. They are the contractors who are doing the work now—the Dominion Dredging Company, of Ottawa, Baldry, Yerburgh & Hutchinson, Doheny, Quinland & Robertson, Montreal; and the Canadian Dredging Company of Midland.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. VIEN: When were the contracts cancelled?

Mr. J. D. REID: Two years ago.

Mr. VIEN: What were the arrangements between the Government and the contractors, and what are the conditions of cancellation?

Mr. J. D. REID: We simply paid them for the work they did up to the day when the contracts were cancelled and took their plant over.

Mr. VIEN: How much did you pay for the plants of these various corporations?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not give the hon. member the exact figures this evening. We took them at the invoice price less a percentage for depreciation. Then we sold a lot of the plant at a profit.

Mr. VIEN: To whom?

Mr. J. D. REID: Any person. There were engines and cars, a great many people wanted that kind of plant at the time, and we were able to dispose of a lot of it at a profit. Part of it we kept. The Dominion Dredging Company had three dredges and steam tugs and scows. That plant we kept, and the contractors are now using it and we are not paying any percentage on it. It is the intention, as soon as we feel that times are normal, to ask for tenders for this work and to ask the contractors who tender to take over the plant we have purchased. We are purchasing about $300,000 worth of new plant for this work. I explained that a few moments ago. Of course that plant would cost a great deal more than it would if times were normal, but it was necessary to purchase the plant in order to proceed with the work. When the contractors take it over there may be a loss on that because we have asked the contractors to proceed with the work in abnormal times.

Mr. VIEN: As far as I can judge from the statement of the minister, the Government has no very fixed policy. The other day the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) told us that unless for some very imperative reason, or for carrying on works necessary for the prosecution of the war, the policy of the Government was never to give a contract on force account. The Minister of Public Works told us that he gave a contract on force account only on one occasion and that was for the construction of buildings for aeroplanes and seaplanes. He said it was the policy of the Government to give no contracts on force account. We see now that the policy of the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) is at variance with that of the Minister of Public Works. It is very curious to see there is no fixed policy of the Government. I would like to know if there is not a law which prohibits the letting of contracts without calling for tenders?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, there is not any law.

Mr. VIEN: The minister says there is no law. I say to the minister that there is a law which prohibits the letting of contracts exceeding in amount $5,000 without calling for tenders. Will the minister explain on what authority he has taken upon himself to violate the law by letting contracts of such magnitude?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is the law with reference to contracts not exceeding $5,000, but in an emergency you can also let a contract other than by tender.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister tell us what the emergency was?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have explained that several times.

Mr. VIEN: Not satisfactorily.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am sorry I cannot satisfy the hon. member, but I say again that these contracts were let in order to provide work for the people in that locality. In other parts of Canada we had to do the same thing. It would be unfair and unjust, the war coming to an end so quickly, to say to these people: We will do nothing to provide you with work; the war is now over and you can do without work and your families can starve during the winter. That is what I call an emergency.

Mr. VIEN: The emergency was not because the Government had not time to call for tenders. Surely the minister is not going to try to make the committee believe that he had not time to call for tenders? Now I want to know from him what statutory authority he had for adopting such a course?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the statutes before me, but as I understand it, we were quite within the law in acting as we did.

Mr. VIEN: I contend that you were not.

Mr. J. D. REID: I can only put the Department of Justice's opinion against that of my hon. friend, and——

Mr. VIEN: But——

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the hon. minister who has the floor, to complete his sentence.

Mr. VIEN: Very well, Mr. Chairman, I bow to your ruling.

Mr. J. D. REID: We certainly let the contract in accordance with the law, as it was interpreted to me by the Justice Department. I go further and say this: I do not believe that Parliament, or indeed any one, would justify the calling for tenders and letting a contract under such abnormal conditions as prevailed at that time. We made a contract from month to month, which is not to extend later than December 31 of this year; that is all we have done. The contractors could not possibly figure on giving us prices for any length of time that we would be justified in accepting while the war was still on. They would have wanted quite a period of time to complete the contract, and to stipulate for provisions with respect to the purchase of equipment, machinery, and so on. Any contractors I talked to did not think that we would at all be justified in calling for tenders.

Mr. VIEN: The minister stated previously that when the former contract was cancelled the Government took over from the various contractors the plant that they had on hand for carrying on the work. The policy of the Government then, was at a certain future date to give to certain contractors the order to go on with the work. Now the Government had the necessary plant in hand, and all that was needed was to call for tenders, and award the contracts in the ordinary way according to law. The minister has failed to convince the Committee that such an emergency existed as to justify him in ignoring the law. It seems to me that the law should be adhered to at all times, and that the minister will fail to find any statutory provision to justify his action. I now ask him to lay upon the Table the contracts entered into between the Government and these men for the carrying on of the work, also the opinion of the Department of Justice stating that he was justified in ignoring the law and not calling for tenders.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will very gladly lay the contracts on the Table to-morrow. With reference to the opinion of the Justice Department the department has its own solicitor with whom I took the matter up. That solicitor consulted the Department of Justice and advised us as to whether the work was being carried out legally. There was no doubt at all in his mind that it was being legally done, nor was there any doubt in the minds of officials of other departments where the same kind of contract was entered into. The Department of Public Works is an instance of that.

Mr. VIEN: In what respect?

Mr. J. D. REID: If the Department of Public Works could adopt that policy in one instance, would we not also be justified in this case?

Mr. VIEN: No, because the Minister of Public Works explained that the buildings for the aeroplane plant—I suppose that is the case to which the hon. gentleman alludes—could not be completed if there had been a delay of four weeks. The expenditure was for war purposes, it was late in the fall, and the buildings had to be completed before the snow came. The Minister of Public Works furthermore clearly explained at the time that it was the settled policy of the Government to always call for tenders, and never to enter into contracts on force account unless there was such an emergency as the one he cited, and which instance has been the only one in his department. I ask the minister when he lays on the Table to-morrow the contract for the renewal of this work, to also advise us of the statutory authority which permits him to dispense with the calling for tenders.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is a lawyer and can more readily consult the statutes than I can.

Mr. VIEN: I am afraid that the complicated Orders in Council which apply to the matter will not allow me to discover the information as easily as the minister can.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no Order in Council except as to the contract that was let, and the statutes are easily available. I could not give any legal information on the matter other than what is to be found in the statutes with which the hon. member is familiar.

Mr. VIEN: Surely the minister will not refuse to tell the Committee on what statutory provision he bases his authority for acting as he has done? Was there any provision in the Estimates voted last year which authorized this expenditure?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member will notice in the present Estimates that the sum of $1,860,000 was voted last year. In the Estimates for 1919-20 the sum of $3,500,000 is asked for the Welland ship canal.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. JACOBS: Might I ask the minister if this paternal solicitude on the part of the Government to supply work to the unemployed in the Niagara district will be extended to other parts of the country where unemployed may also be found, and where public works are in abeyance?

Mr. J. D. REID: I can give the instance mentioned by the leader of the Opposition at Sydney.

Mr. JACOBS: It is a far cry from Niagara to Sydney. If the minister would investigate, he would find a good deal of unemployment in other districts.

Mr. CAHILL: Who are back of the Dominion Dredging Company?

Mr. J. D. REID: Colonel Gordon Stewart, Mr. Larmonth, and Colonel McNeill, the Chief Engineer tells me. I do not know the others.

Mr. JACOBS: Is Senator O'Brien a member of the firm?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. He was a member, I think, of the firm that originally had the contract, but he dropped out of the firm.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is it not a fact that he dropped out only in respect of this contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: He is not in this contract now.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is still with the firm?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, he is not in the firm, I understand.

Mr. JACOBS: He is a senator; he could not be.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister takes shelter behind the statement that some money was furnished for the supplying of rails at Sydney and he looks hard at me as if that was of immense concern to me—thinking, I suppose, that Sydney is in my constituency.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know that Sydney is not in the hon. member's constituency.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was no such depression in Sydney as the minister suggested. The Dominion Steel Works were going at full swing; there was not the slightest let-up in any department. There is no comparison between that situation and the conditions with respect to the Welland canal construction. The Department of Railways and Canals have been getting steel and steel rails from that company for the last ten or fifteen years, and if they continued getting that material a little in advance, that was only ordinary business precaution. If the minister could get steel rails from the Dominion Steel Company cheaper than he could get them anywhere else, no great virtue is to be credited to him or to his department if a little contract was made in advance. In the county from which I come the Nova Scotia steel people were almost exclusively engaged in the manufacture of munitions during the war. That work stopped suddenly and two or three thousand men were thrown out of employment in the town of Sydney Mines. As the member for the county, I made application to the Government for assistance to the Nova Scotia Steel people by way of an advance order or something to help them out, but not twenty-five cents worth of assistance did the Nova Scotia Steel people get from the Government. That is the kind of sympathy and support that the thousands of men of the Nova Scotia Steel works who are out of employment in Sydney Mines received from the Government. Hundreds of these men were returned soldiers and had families to support, but they were obliged to get along as best they could until the company started work again. The difficulty with the minister was that these contractors who were round his office looking for jobs and reminding him of past favours that they had extended to him and to his party, were bothering him, and at least like the woman who bothered the unjust judge who neither feared God nor regarded man—and the minister was somewhat in that frame of mind—he made up his mind that he would rather let them plunge in the mud of the canal than bother him in his office. These contractors had staffs who were unemployed, and these are the men who are engaged on this work to-day. I venture to say that not a dozen returned soldiers are engaged on the whole work—not as many as would save Sodom and Gomorrah—five just men. The emergency on the strength of which the minister attempts to justify evading or passing by the law is not the kind of emergency that the law recognizes—that is, the necessity for getting the work done in a hurry. He is proceeding as he is simply because some people are looking for work; that is not the emergency contemplated by the statute.

I asked the minister quite a while ago to give us some information as to the cost of this work compared with the cost of the work done under the old contract. He did not tell us that; perhaps he can. If we are not losing very much money on it, perhaps we should not be very critical of the minister, but I do not think we should throw away a large sum of money; we have none to waste. This work is being carried on in a very unbusinesslike way. What is the sense of spending millions upon a section of a work which can be of no service until the whole project is completed? It would be ridiculous for a man to finish one-half of a house and do nothing to the other half if he knew that he could not use the house until the whole was completed. The minister is spending millions on certain sections, and when he finishes those sections he is going to stop. Large portions are not finished and will not be finished for four years. What is the use of spending money on works that will cave in, as has happened to work that has already been done? Would it not be good business to put this whole work under construction at once and see that it is all finished as quickly as possible in a uniform and proper manner so that the country will get some benefit from the expenditure? I throw out those suggestions to the minister, which, I think, are along business lines and which he would do well to follow.

Mr. J. D. REID: With reference to the first statement made by the hon. member, as to the work given to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and other corporations, representations were made to us that a large number of men in the Dominion Iron and Steel Works as well as in many other works throughout the Dominion would be thrown out of employment. Rails were the only things that the Government could take, and the order was given in order to keep the rail plant going during the winter. With reference to the Nova Scotia steel plant at Sydney, there was nothing that they manufactured that the Government could use, and not a fifty cent piece was given to that company. A very large order was, I understand, given to the Nova Scotia Steel Company at New Glasgow, I think, for cars.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not speaking about New Glasgow.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know that, but that company got an order.

Mr. McKENZIE: The car company and the Nova Scotia Steel Company are two different companies.

Mr. J. D. REID: I thought they belonged to the Nova Scotia Steel Company.

Mr. McKENZIE: No.

Mr. J. D. REID: At all events, contracts for steel ships, cars, rails and other equipment were given to companies in different parts of the country, wherever the Government could use the material. With reference to the construction of the Welland canal, the policy was settled five or six years ago that the Welland canal would be enlarged, and many millions of dollars were spent on those contracts. The hon. member stated that, by proceeding with and completing those contracts, the work would not be of much use unless we went on with all the work. The hon. member hardly understands the situation, or he would not make that statement. The situation is this, that if we completed those four contracts, we could use that part of the canal with seven locks instead of the twenty-four that are used at present; that is, with the present canal size, the work would be of great assistance. That, of course, would be the only portion that would be deep, but those are the heavy contracts for the locks, and it would probably take four years to do the work. The other work, which is mostly dredging, could be done in about two years, so that we could start it in about a couple of years from now and have the whole work completed. The hon. member will, therefore, see that we are not losing any time by proceeding with the four contracts now. When we were taking up this matter, the chief engineer and the engineering staff went into it thoroughly, and the chief engineer makes this statement at the end of his report:

> After giving the matter careful consideration, I strongly urge and recommend that arrangements be made with the former contractors to resume work upon their respective sections so that we may have the benefit of their experienced organizations. The value of such organizations is evidenced by the practice of contractors carrying many men on pay-rolls during periods of idleness.
> When first requested to submit an offer for the resumption of work on a cost plus percentage basis, they proposed a ten per cent basis. I refused to recommend this, and after further negotiations they agreed to accept an eight per cent basis, "cost" not to include the materials and supplies furnished by the department. For this, they agree to supply their own office staff, general superintendence, bookkeeping, purchasing and the capital necessary to carry on under the proposed conditions.
> I strongly recommend the acceptance of their offer, reserving our right to call for tenders for the completion of the work as soon as it may be deemed expedient to do so.

The chief engineer and his staff negotiated for some time; the whole matter was carried on by them; and after they had negotiated with those contractors and figured the matter out, as they believed, in the very best interest of the public, the matter was submitted to me; we went into it very thoroughly, and I really believed it was the only thing to do at that particular time. As I stated a few minutes ago, just as soon as the time is opportune to call for tenders, we intend doing so and not to proceed any longer on a percentage basis.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is now nearly eleven o'clock, and I do not think we should allow this item to carry to-night, because there seems to be good reason to believe that this contract was illegal. I am quite familiar with the statute as to proceeding with work costing over $5,000 without calling for tenders. The minister may be well advised, and he may have a perfect right to go on with the work; but he should have time to consult his legal advisers, and to-morrow or whenever he goes on again with his Estimates, he can inform us as to the opinion he receives from the Department of Justice upon work of this kind, namely, whether it is legal for any department of the Government under such circumstances to proceed with work under force account without calling for tenders. The point is well worth considering, and as so much money is involved, I am sure every member of the Committee would feel better if we were satisfied that this was a legal transaction and that we were voting money for absolutely legal purposes. So far as I understand the matter, the minister has not asked for tenders, and there is no good reason why the time should not be utilized in getting tenders from different contractors on this work, the work to commence at such a time as may be deemed advisable. There is, on this side of the House, no factious opposition to the item passing; but there is really a legal point involved, and it would be as well to settle it so that we might know once and for all that we are justified in voting the money, and that the minister was legally right in giving the contract. It would be well for the minister to let this item stand, and when the legal point is settled, I do not think he will have any trouble in having this item pass.

Mr. J. D. REID: Even if it were deemed advisable to call for tenders, on account of prevailing abnormal conditions, I cannot agree with the hon. member that it would be advisable to call for tenders now and to proceed with this work on contract. As the contractors state that material is so high in price and labour is so high, if we were to say to them that they must take a contract, I do not think it would be possible to make a satisfactory one. I think it is in the public interest to go on with the work on a cost-plus basis for the present; it is the only way that I can see for this or any other similar work at the present time. As to the awarding of the contract, I took this matter up with the solicitor of the department and was informed, and believe, that we were within our legal rights. The hon. member knows that around the Council board there are a number of legal men who certainly understand the law, and would not approve of a contract that was improper from a legal standpoint. I do not know where I can get any better opinion.

Mr. McKENZIE: We want to see the opinion.

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not ask for a written opinion of the Justice Department. My solicitor gave his opinion, and he would consult the Justice Department if it were necessary. Furthermore, the Auditor General would not pass an account that was improper. If there was any other information I could give, I should be only too glad to give it. I have no desire whatever to withhold information, and so far as the contracts are concerned I will lay them on the Table. I cannot see what advantage there would be in letting the item stand, because there is no further information I can give. Some hon. member has asked me to state the difference in the cost now and before the war. We have not got into very heavy work as yet, and I do not know that I could get the details my hon. friend wants; it would be pretty hard to do so at the present time. I think the hon. member objects to our proceeding with the work at all. The Government, of course, must assume that responsibility. We believed that the possibility of unemployment in that district, and the advantage we should derive from the work, made it necessary for us to go on with it. The hon. member states that he does not believe there were five returned soldiers on that work. My information is that there are at least a dozen returned soldiers on the engineering staff—

Mr. VIEN: On a $3,500,000 work!

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member did not let me finish my sentence. I stated that there were at least a dozen men on the engineering staff, and a hundred or more with the contractors. Why does not the hon. member cheer that? We expect to have between 1,000 and 2,000 returned soldiers within a short time.

Mr. POWER: I can assure the minister that he will not get returned soldiers to dig ditches in the Welland canal. They have dug ditches in France, and they will not do it again.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is trying to put into my mouth the statement he himself makes to the public. I never said that we wanted returned soldiers to dig ditches, and I would be the last man to ask them to dig ditches. I mentioned that we had twelve returned soldiers on the engineering staff. Is that asking them to dig ditches? The hon. member is the only one in this House who would stand up and say that I wanted returned men to dig ditches.

Mr. POWER: I rise to a point of order. I never said that I wanted the returned soldiers to dig ditches, and I want the minister to apologize for having said so. I think I am perfectly within my rights in asking him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The minister, of course, is obliged to accept the statement of the hon. member that he never made such a statement in the House, but I do not know that there is any point of order raised, or that any statement has been made which should be withdrawn.

Mr. POWER: The point of order is this: The minister said that I was the only member of the House who would make the statement that I wished the soldiers to work in the ditches. I most certainly object to a statement of that kind from the minister or anybody else, and I think the Chair ought to support me in asking the minister to withdraw his statement.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member stated that I was asking returned soldiers to dig ditches. I made no such statement, and I said the hon. member was the only one who would charge me with making such a statement.

Mr. POWER: I heard the minister state that within a few days he would have 2,000 men employed on the canal. Now you could hardly have 2,000 engineers on the job, so if 2,000 returned soldiers work on the job some of them will have to dig ditches, and I objected very strongly to the minister giving positions of that kind to returned soldiers, saying that they had had enough of digging ditches in the four years they were at the front.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister told us a few moments ago that there are quite a number of lawyers around the Council board, and that he sought their advice as to whether this contract was legal or not. Now that he has lifted the veil from what transpires at the Council board I should like to know whether the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) was satisfied that this $3,500,000 work should be done by force account, when the policy of the Department of Public Works is tender and contract.

Mr. J. D. REID: When an Order in Council is passed, the hon. member knows Council all agree.

Mr. VIEN: The minister is trying to convince the committee that it is sound policy to give such a contract without calling for tenders, because of some emergency. Sir, there are a number of contracts let, not only by the Government, but by private concerns, for construction work. What are the abnormal conditions of which the minister speaks? Is it the cost of labour, or of materials? Surely the same conditions exist for private companies. To give the minister but one example of the different views held by his colleagues, what did the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) do when he wanted ships built?

He gave contracts not on a cost-plus basis, but on so much a ton to all shipbuilders in Canada who were willing to undertake the building of ships at the price agreed upon. In the building of ships there are the same abnormal conditions that exist in connection with the digging of canals: the men must be employed; steel must be bought and all the other material required in the building of ships must be secured, and yet the policy of the Marine Department has not been the cost-plus basis. In regard to public works, the hon. Minister of Public Works said the other day that unless there was an imperious demand that the work should be let out it was the policy of the Government never to give contracts unless tenders were called for. The Minister of Railways and Canals is now trying to induce the Committee to believe that there was such an emergency by reason of the unemployment caused by the return of our soldiers, and he is compelled to admit that there are twelve returned soldiers employed in the digging of the canal.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member should add that I said there were over a hundred men on the contractors' staff.

Mr. VIEN: If the minister had waited a moment I would have completed his statement. He said that there were about a dozen returned soldiers employed in the digging of the canal and that on the staff of the contractors there were perhaps a hundred—he would not swear to it or make a positive statement. He does not know, and it is the general policy of the Government never to know or to be aware of anything. When a minister is embarrassed he simply says, "We do not know; we are not aware of it; we have no information as to that." It is a Cabinet of non-information or lack of information. The other day the Minister of Public Works made a statement on this very subject. On the 26th of February he said:

> Somewhere on lake Ontario, I believe. I am also going to take the responsibility of starting these works before the money has been voted by Parliament, because I believe Parliament will concur in our views and vote the money in order that we may relieve a certain amount of the unemployment that already exists in the large centres. It is the duty of the Government to relieve that unemployment as far as possible. . . . By tender and contract, most certainly. Perhaps I should qualify that statement to this extent: there may be some buildings which will have to be torn down to clear the site for the new ones. That work possibly might be done by the Government, but it would only be—

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is reading from a debate during this session. That is against the rule.

Mr. VIEN: I am merely quoting the words of the Minister of Public Works on this very question of policy.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My point is that the hon. gentleman cannot read from a previous debate of this session.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The point of order is certainly well taken. It is very clear that an hon. member cannot read from a previous debate in the Official Report of the debates of the current session. That rule applies to the Committee as well as to the House.

Mr. VIEN: Will the Chairman read me the rule.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Bourinot at page 357 says:

> Neither can a member, in speaking, refer to anything said or done in a previous debate during the same session—a rule necessary to economize the time of the House, and a restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded.

Mr. McMASTER: There is no doubt about the accuracy of that rule which is the one rule—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McMASTER: It is the one rule—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that the ruling of the Chair cannot be discussed.

Mr. VIEN: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I must say that there is a divergence of opinion in the present Cabinet as to the policy that should be followed when contracts are made. One minister tells us that contracts should never be let unless tenders are called for, and I must admit that this view 11 p.m. is in accordance with the law, and it is high time that we should do things properly and according to regular procedure. During the war various emergencies might have excused a different system, but we are now on a peace basis, and the last body to realize this fact seems to be the present Administration. They are trying to reorganize the country on a basis of peace, but they are reluctant to adopt the principle which prevails in times of peace, that contracts should not be given by favoritism to any particular contractor to the detriment of others. They do not seem to realize the important principle that in the expenditure of public moneys great care should be taken not to spend more than is absolutely necessary. There is a law in this country which provides that a contract which exceeds $5,000 must not be let unless tenders are called for. This is a wise law and one which has received the approbation of the majority of the members of this House. The only emergency the minister could mention was that employment had to be provided for the unemployed workmen, but he has not been able to convince the Committee that it would have taken very much more time or caused any serious hardship if he had waited three or four weeks to call for tenders. The minister argued also that the conditions were abnormal as regards the wages of workmen and as regards material that it was not expedient to call for tenders and give the contracts according to a fixed basis, but that it was preferable to give the contracts on a cost-plus basis.

In so far as the wages of the workmen are concerned, we do not anticipate any immediate reduction or any immediate downfall in the price of labour. Not only do not the Government expect such a thing but in the contracts that the Government entered into with the various contractors they have specially provided the scale of wages that is going to be paid to the labourers. Surely a scale of wages is provided in the contract. There was absolutely no necessity to give to these men the advantage of carrying on such a tremendous contract, amounting to $3,500,000, without taking upon themselves any risk whatever. They had the plant the Government bought from them and which the Government now place back in their hands without charging anything for it. They know the market quotations of the various materials that are required. They have the wages fixed in the schedule included in their contract.

I fail to see any reason which can justify the Government or the minister in letting contracts without calling for tenders. There is a certain degree of honesty and candour which the minister owes to this House but I do not believe that he has succeeded in proving that there was any such emergency as he has urged in justification of the course which he pursued. I believe it would have been more in the public interest to have delayed the work for two or three weeks which would have been sufficient time to have allowed for the calling of tenders.

I think I should emphasize the point raised by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) that we can hardly be called upon to vote this large amount without seeing the contracts which have been let by the Government or of having the advantage of studying these contracts and seeing what we are voting this $3,500,000 for. With reference to these contracts, we have only the reference that the minister made to them to-night. I think we should let this item stand until the contracts are laid on the Table and until we have an opportunity of going into them more fully.

Mr. J. D. REID: The point raised by the hon. member now that the item should stand until he sees the contracts, is well taken. I had no idea that that was the particular point that was being emphasized. If hon. gentlemen want any information or if they want to see the contracts, I have no objection to allowing the item to stand. I certainly will agree to the suggestion at once and let the item stand. I will lay the contracts on the Table and be glad to get any further information any hon. members wish. They are entitled to any information they want. I have been trying to give all the information it was possible for me to give on this item to-night. The hour is getting late and I do not wish to ask the Committee to proceed with any other items; these can come up some other time.

Mr. McKENZIE: I tried to make it clear that we wanted to see these contracts and the legal opinion upon which the minister acted. I am not at all an authority on cabinet practice, or the practice that is followed when an Order in Council comes before the Government, but I understand that when a minister is putting through a contract in connection with which he does not comply with the statute he must furnish council with his reasons for not complying with the law. Perhaps the minister will be able to give us a legal opinion and the reason that he gave to council for non-compliance with the statute. I must remind the minister that there is nobody on this side of the House who desires to stop the work if it can go along and within a reasonable time produce such a result as to give the country the benefit of the operation of the rest of the canal. If the minister would call for tenders we would have the satisfaction of knowing whether or not he could get along better after he receives these tenders than by continuing as things are now. He will find that he can get tenders to carry out this work now at very much less cost than before. He is doing it in the most expensive way. If there is a proper call for tenders from one end of the country to the other I have every reason to believe that under present conditions there being many contractors looking for work, he will likely receive very reasonable tenders.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED BY MR. D. D. McKENZIE.

Hon. J. D. REID: I promised the leader of the Opposition last night that I would give the House answers to some questions that he asked with reference to the Canadian National Railways. His questions were:

1. What responsibility has the Canadian people assumed financially in taking over the road?
2. What is the mileage of the road and if we operate full mileage that was taken over?
3. What does he think the rolling stock of the road is now worth, and is the road fairly well equipped as regards rolling stock?
4. How much money have we expended on equipment since we took over the road?
5. How much money does he think necessary for operation and equipment during the current financial year?
6. How do receipts and expenditures balance as regards operations of the Canadian Northern?
7. What is the whole indebtedness now upon the Canadian Northern, and what is the present indebtedness per mile?
8. What did the Government take over, and what value did they get for the responsibility and liabilities assumed?

The answers are:

1. The Dominion of Canada purchased $60,000,000 common stock in the Canadian Northern Railway, being the balance outstanding, for $10,000,000, but did not thereby assume the outstanding liabilities, which remained as debts of the company.

2. The mileage of the road in operation is 9,524 miles, and all the mileage taken over is operated.

3. It is estimated that the rolling stock of the road is now worth $67,573,092.

4. We have expended $22,233,107 on equipment since the Government took over the road. This equipment, of course, can be used also on the other Government railways.

5. The estimated deficit of the Canadian Northern Railway after paying all operating expenses and fixed charges for the current year is $7,000,000. The estimated amount for equipment for Canadian National Railways for the current year is $35,000,000. This covers the requirements of the entire Government system, including the Canadian Government Railways revotes.

6. The revenue for the calendar year 1918 was $49,201,955.18, and operating expenses $45,639,651.78, and net earnings $3,562,303.40.

7. The total indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway as of December 31st, 1918, including funded debt, equipment securities, land securities and all liabilities outstanding, amounted to $473,174,432. The present indebtedness per mile (including equipment, land and all subsidiary companies' securities) represent $46,166.

8. The Government purchased the balance of the common stock of Canadian Northern Railway, and thereby obtained control of all of the assets of that system, representing 9,524 miles.

Authority to utilize these ratings was given in a letter from the Commander-in-Chief North America and West Indies dated 17th July, 1917. They were entered from time to time as required between the 26th August, 1917, and 13th April, 1918.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has an official invitation been extended by the Government to His Eminence Cardinal Mercier to visit Canada?
2. If so, has the invitation been accepted?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: 1 and 2: No.

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY CO.

Mr. BUREAU:

1. Have the properties, etc., of the Toronto Suburban Railway Company been acquired by the Dominion Government, the Canadian National Railways or by the Canadian Northern Railway Company? If so, by which of them?
2. What does the purchase include, what is the purchase price, and what liabilities are assumed?

2. The purchase includes all assets of the Toronto Suburban Railway Company, including lines from Toronto to Guelph and from Toronto to Woodbridge. These assets were acquired at actual cost. Liabilities assumed, £540,000 4½ per cent debenture stock and accrued interest June 30, $54,256.63; and sundry outstanding liabilities amounting to $670,135.27.

ROYAL AIR FORCE—REPATRIATION.

Mr. FONTAINE:

1. Has the Government of Canada made any arrangement with the Imperial Government regarding the repatriation of the Canadian officers, N.C.O's and men of the Royal Air Force?
2. If so, what provision has been made for their early return?

Major-General MEWBURN: 1 and 2. It has been represented to the British Government how important it is that Canadians serving in the Royal Air Force should be repatriated as soon as possible; and to that end the Overseas Ministry is now engaged in working out a scheme which, while it will not reduce the shipping facilities for the repatriation of our own troops, will materially help the repatriation of the Canadians serving in the Royal Air Force.

RIOU STORE, FRASERVILLE, P.Q.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. For how many more years has the Riou Store at Fraserville (Riviere Du Loup), Quebec, been leased for military purposes, and what is the monthly rent to be paid therefor by the Government?
2. Is the lease being renewed on the principle of continued tenancy, for at least six more years, at a monthly rental of $90, because the military authorities omitted to duly notify the owner of the said building as to the period of occupation by them?
3. If so, is it the intention of the Department of Militia or the Department of Public Works to purchase said building from Mr. Riou, at its actual value, rather than pay six more years of rent?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. (a) The lease of the Riou store at Fraserville, P.Q., will expire on the 19th May, 1922. (b) Monthly rental is $90.

2. The original lease expired on the 19th May, 1917, but, owing to the necessary notice of intention to vacate not having been given by the General Officer Commanding Military District No. 5, the Department of Militia and Defence was committed for five more years' tenancy.

It may be explained, however, that this building was rented in connection with recruiting for the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Now that recruiting work is over, the building will be used, upon the reorganization of the militia, for purposes of an armoury in connection with one company of the 89th Battalion and the 20th Battery of Artillery stationed at Fraserville.

3. As the lease has only three years to run, from the 19th May, 1919, there is no intention of purchasing the property.

C.G.S. MONTMAGNY.

Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Since the Government steamer Montmagny was sunk in the St. Lawrence river a few years ago, was there any actual attempt made to float it? If so, by whom?

2. Under what terms was such attempt made, and with what measure of success?

3. How many times was it sold, and to whom?

4. If any of the buyers failed to live up to the terms of their contract were they called upon to pay the balance of the price of sale besides losing to the Government the deposit made and the guarantee?

5. Were any of the deposits refunded? If so, on what ground?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Yes. The department invited tenders for the raising and delivering of the vessel at Quebec and accepted the offer of the Levis Wrecking Company for this work. No work was ever undertaken by this company. The department then entered into a contract with the St. Charles Navigation Co., for the purchase and removal of the vessel and this company worked six weeks with a staff of 22 men and 4 divers, but met with no success. The vessel was again offered for sale and the tender of the Public Enterprises Co., represented by Col. C. A. Chauveau and Horace Dussault, Levis, P.Q., accepted. An attempt was made last fall to raise the vessel, but owing to the lateness of the season, the work was postponed until this spring.

2. Answered by question No. 1.

3. Twice. To the St. Charles Navigation Company, Ltd., Quebec, and the Public Enterprises Co., Levis, P.Q.

4. No.

5. Yes. The deposit of the Levis Wrecking Company was returned as the contract was cancelled by the department and other arrangements entered into for the disposition of the vessel. The deposit of the St. Charles Navigation Company was returned as the company was prevented from carrying out their contract owing to all tugs being requisitioned for war purposes and it was impossible to obtain the necessary outfit.

Mr. TOBIN:

For a return showing how many acres of public land have been given to railway companies in the Dominion of Canada by the Federal Government from 1878 to the present time, and also showing how many acres were granted in each year during the above period of time.

Mr. DESAULNIERS:

Mr. DESAULNIERS:

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

For a copy of all documents relating to the conviction and imprisonment of Albert LeBlanc, New Richmond Station, Quebec, for an infraction of the Military Service Act, and of applications for his release.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all correspondence, records, petitions and other documents concerning the prosecution entered against Mr. Ben H. Spence, Secretary of the Ontario Branch of the Dominion Alliance, for publishing objectionable matter.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a copy of all instructions sent to Post Office Inspectors relating to the appointment of Postmasters in the rural districts.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—RIFLES AND AMMUNITION.

Sir SAM HUGHES moved:

For a copy of (a) Circular, supposed of German inspiration, containing ten suggestions, surreptitiously distributed among the Canadian troops about the time of the battle of St. Julien, depreciating the Canadian rifle. (b) Reports by Colonel Primsmall, a British officer, showing comparative and competitive tests between the Canadian rifle and the British (improved) Lee-Enfield rifle, both using the defective ammunition and also good ammunition. (c) Any other reports or authentic data comparing the two rifles in regard to rapidity of fire, accuracy of fire, endurance, jamming, etc. (d) Reports showing various brands of ammunition supplied by the British to their own troops and to the Canadians, also marking which were defective, irregular in size and with cases too highly annealed or were otherwise unsafe or unfit for use. (e) Reports of evidence giving instances where splendid troops of the British service armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle suffered disaster through jamming of the Lee-Enfield rifle owing to bad ammunition. (f) Reports showing that ammunition of every nation, both in the allied and enemy service, at times caused jamming through defects or dirt. (g) Reports of the withdrawal from service by order of the British authority of the defective brands of ammunition. (h) Evidence as to the finding among the Canadian troops armed with the Canadian rifle of thousands of the defective ammunition mixed with the good ammunition long after the order to withdraw the defective ammunition, and the absence of any defective ammunition in the Canadian battalions armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. (i) Report by Colonel Embury, now Brigadier-General Embury, and officers of the 28th Canadian Battalion, of the finding of brands of the defective ammunition mixed with the good ammunition the morning that splendid battalion distinguished itself when a mine was blown up under them. (j) The reasons assigned by the, then, Minister of Militia on finding that many of the Canadian soldiers were honestly and innocently prejudiced against the Canadian rifle owing to enemy reports whispered against it, and his determination not to ask any man, under such circumstances, to carry a rifle in which he had not the fullest confidence. (k) Evidence showing the unauthorized action of certain parties in England in hardening parts of the bolt action of the Canadian rifle to extreme brittleness, thus ruining the rifle after these rifles had left Canada in perfect condition.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no objection to the Order passing, subject to this: If there is any information that, in the judgment of the Government, in the public interest should not be brought down, it will not be brought down. That is understood in connection with all motions of this kind.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That applies to all these motions?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The same as it applies to the Bruce reply to the Babtie Report.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CREDIT TO ROUMANIA—ALLEGED MARKETING OF BONDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): In the Financial Post of April 19 there is an article in connection with the credits established by the Government in favour of Roumania, Serbia, and Greece. The Acting Prime Minister explained the nature of those credits to the House the other day. One paragraph in that article announces that in connection with those credits an intermediary agency has been established through Sir Clifford Sifton, which acts as fiscal agent for manufacturers securing orders by marketing Roumanian bonds to cover the amount. May I learn from the Acting Prime Minister whether Sir Clifford Sifton has any authority from the Government to act as intermediary agent in marketing Roumanian bonds?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend must refer to the private marketing of Roumanian bonds. My attention has not been drawn to the article ir question, but there is no marketing of bonds in connection with the extension of Government credits to the countries mentioned. The Dominion Government makes advances to those countries to enable them to purchase goods in Canada and it takes their bonds, not for sale, but to be held in the Treasury until repaid. No intermediary agency is connected with the transactions between the Dominion Government and the governments in question except the Canadian Trade Commission established here, and the Canadian Trade Commission established in London. The members of those commissions are appointed, my hon. friend knows, by the Dominion Government. What must be in the mind of the writer is some transaction whereby bonds of the Roumanian Government or other governments would be sold to private investors in the ordinary course. There is no connection whatever between the transaction referred to and the extension by the Dominion Government of credits to the countries in question.

STRIKE OF CARTERS IN MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's): I draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact that five thousand carters are on strike in Montreal, and that this is the moving season. Why has an arbitration tribunal not yet been appointed to deal with this matter? Is it the intention of the Government to take steps to effect a settlement of this strike as soon as possible?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The matter to which the hon. gentleman refers is now engaging the attention of the Minister of Labour and the officials of the department. They are rendering all possible aid in securing an early termination of the strike. I shall report further to my hon. friend to-morrow in the matter.

VACANT SEATS IN THE HOUSE UNTIL DEMOBILIZATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I once again direct the attention of the Leader of the Government to the fact that there are five vacancies in the membership of this House. What steps are being taken to fill these vacancies in order that the people of the country may be fully represented?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: While it is common ground that vacancies in the membership of this House should be filled as rapidly as practicable, it will, I think also be common ground that these vacancies should not be filled until demobilization is completed. There are very many soldiers who have not yet returned from overseas, some of whom might possibly be candidates in the constituencies in question, but undoubtedly all the soldiers now overseas should have the right to vote in the constituencies in which they are domiciled. It would, therefore, appear to me, as it does to the Government, that there should be no by-elections until demobilization is complete or practically complete. When it is complete, it will be for the Government to consider when the by-elections shall be held. I can assure my hon. friend that I appreciate the desirability of filling vacancies in the House as soon as practicable and so soon as it will be fair to those citizens of Canada who by reason of being overseas, would be debarred from exercising the right of franchise in this country should any elections be now held.

THE 22nd BATTALION—PLACE OF DEMOBILIZATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): May I ask whether the Minister of Militia and Defence has come to a definite decision as to the demobilization centre of the 22nd Battalion?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): The Department of Militia and Defence has not determined the locality in which any overseas unit shall be demobilized; the selection of the demobilization centre always being left entirely to the unit concerned. The first intimation I had from overseas with regard to the demobilization centre of the 22nd Battalion was that it had selected the city of Quebec. On hearing that, the city of Montreal was very much perturbed, and I have no objection to reading a cable which I sent overseas:

> You have advised the 22nd Battalion will proceed to Quebec for demobilization. Strong representations being made by Montreal that unit raised and organized there, and has been reinforced largely by men from that district. Quebec also submits strong claims. Owing to controversy, please ascertain and cable feelings of officers and of all ranks of this unit as to whether they desire to be dispersed at Montreal or Quebec. Advise number of men of this unit for Quebec and number for Montreal.

On the opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence, at the end of this month, it is hoped troops will thenceforth come to Quebec. Personally, I am anxious to meet the views of both Quebec and Montreal, because I know both cities are desirous of paying proper tribute to this wonderful battalion. It has therefore been suggested, and I am sure the Government will be glad to co-operate, that if this battalion demobilizes at the city of Quebec it shall, before demobilization, be taken to the city of Montreal, so that the people there may have an opportunity of seeing it; but if any men of the 22nd desire to be dispersed at Quebec I do not think it would be right for us to dictate that they shall go to Montreal, or any other place.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): If there is a fight between Montreal and Quebec, may I suggest that a compromise might be effected by demobilizing the battalion at Three Rivers, which is half-way between the two cities?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think that would be a happy compromise.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES.

INQUIRY AS TO WHEN THEY WILL BE BROUGHT DOWN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a matter of importance to the public and to Parliament. In the speech from the Throne on the 20th of February certain legislation was promised. We have now been in session for over two months, and there has not yet been brought down legislation respecting the Franchise Act, the establishment of soldiers on the land, vocational education, pensions for soldiers and their dependents, nor regarding the housing loan provided by Estimate No. 299. I should like to know when this legislation will be brought down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Robb), who was courteous enough to give me notice of his question: the matter of pensions for soldiers and their dependents was at an early date in the session referred to a committee of this House, under the chairmanship of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). That Committee has been prosecuting its work, and as my hon. friend is aware, it has power to recommend the form the legislation should take.

The Bill which it is hoped the Committee will agree upon will be presented to Parliament in the usual way when the report of the Committee is received.

With regard to the matter of housing, there seems to be a misapprehension concerning this legislation. The provision for housing is given effect to already, and is contained in the Estimates, Item No. 299.

> Loan of $25,000,000 to Provincial Governments to encourage erection of dwelling houses in congested districts throughout Canada, on the terms and conditions set forth in the Order in Council of the 3rd of December, 1918 —the amount of loan to any one province not to exceed the proportion of the said $25,000,000 which the population of the said province bears to the total population of Canada, as shown by the last federal census, $25,000,000.

The Government, under the War Measures Act, enacted legislation which the provinces have already acted upon. No further legislation than the item in the Estimates is therefore required in connection with this loan.

With regard to the matter of technical or vocational training, the legislation is under the consideration of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson) who will be represented in respect of it, in this House by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder).

With regard to the important measure of soldiers' land settlement, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) has practically completed the Bill, which I am advised will be presented probably next week.

As regards the Franchise Act, its provisions are now under consideration by the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: How long will they be under consideration?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend—

Mr. BUREAU: What we want to know is, how soon may we expect to get this legislation before the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When consideration of this legislation by the Government is complete, it will be brought down like all other legislation. It is impossible for me to say whether it will be brought down next week or the week after, but it will be brought down in due course. I should like to make this observation with regard to what the hon. member (Mr. Robb) suggested as to the session having already extended over two months—during the war the business of the administration was necessarily emphasized to the disadvantage of private members bringing forward and discussing matters of public interest to the various sections of Canada which they represent. The war having come to an end, it seemed proper to the Government and, I am sure, to the House, that hon. members who had not been able during the war, owing to the pressure of administrative business, to discuss such matters should have opportunity to do so, and the policy of the Government this session has been to allow private members ample time, as we have done, to discuss matters of moment to themselves and their constituents which they might desire to bring forward either by resolution or otherwise.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Speaking only for myself, may I suggest to the leader that as the session has already lasted two months and, if all this legislation is to be brought down, will probably last three months more at least, it might be advisable, as there will be no elections until demobilization is complete, that the Government should postpone its legislation on the Franchise Bill until next session. This, it seems to me, would put a speedy end to the session after proper business had been disposed of.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend that three months should be required to pass the Government's legislative programme. I may suggest to him that with the facilitation which I am sure we may expect from His Majesty's loyal Opposition, we should be speedily able to clear up the Order Paper and take on additional legislation which the Government has prepared.

Mr. ROBB: If I may be permitted to speak once more with regard to the question of the franchise legislation. As the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) does not agree with the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), is it not fair to the country that the Franchise Act should be brought down at once and referred to a Committee representing both sides of the House in order that it might be threshed out, and so expedite matters?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I stated, the Franchise Bill when prepared will be brought down and the Government will take such course with regard to it as may be proper, having in view the fair consideration of its terms.

RAILWAY LABOUR DIFFICULTIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): May I bring to the attention of the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid) a letter I received to-day from the secretary of the Prince Albert Trade and Labour Council, in connection with some difficulties that appear to be outstanding between the National railways and the Government employees, and to ask if the minister has any explanation as to a possible settlement of the trouble?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not know what the hon.

member refers to. Any difficulties in connection with the employees of the Canadian National railways, as well as other railways, are settled now by a board in Montreal that has been organized by the several railway companies. The hon. member will remember that last year the railway companies and the employees got together and organized what is called the Labour Board, comprising six representatives of the employees and six of the companies, and all difficulties are referred to this board. Since the board was organized they have dealt with very many of these troubles, and in every case the result has been satisfactory. I have no doubt whatever that if there are any troubles now at Prince Albert or any other place they will come up in the usual way before the board and be satisfactorily settled.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope the minister received a copy of this letter which I sent him to-day, in which it is stated that the board which the hon. minister mentions decided in favour of the employees but that the Government or management refused to carry out the findings of that board.

Hon. J. D. REID: I have not yet received the letter.

CREDIT TO ROUMANIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a cable despatch which appeared in the New York Times and Montreal Gazette on April 13th to the effect that the Government of Roumania professes to be insolvent, that the peasants are on the verge of revolt, and that conditions generally in that country are appalling. Is it the intention of the Government to verify these facts and, if they are found to be as stated in the despatch, will there be any modification in the decision of the Government with regard to the credit of $25,000,000 to Roumania?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that we have been in continuous communication with the Prime Minister and other representatives of the Government overseas. The action which we have taken has commended itself to them and it does not appear to me that any further inquiry such as is suggested by my hon. friend is necessary. I think we have all the facts before us.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS: I wish to ask a further question in regard to Roumania. The Montreal Star of last evening published a cable despatch from Paris to the effect that the Canadian Overseas Ministry have refused to act on the suggestion of the British War Council to form a Canadian machine force for service on the borders of Roumania, and the despatch goes on to say that in view of Canada's interest in Roumania the British people are surprised that the Canadian Government are not doing anything in this matter. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if he has any information on the subject.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have never received any information or any application of any kind in regard to the matter.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST MILITARY AUTHORITIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT: I would like to ask if there is any truth in the rumour that Canadian soldiers, before leaving England, at Buxton, Derbyshire, are asked to sign a declaration in which they bind themselves not to make any complaints against the Canadian military authorities overseas?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that I think that must be very much of a rumour.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will the Government make inquiry and give the information to the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As a matter of courtesy to my hon. friend, if he will send me any news item, or inform me as to the source of the information upon which he has based his question, I shall be glad to cable.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there not a regulation passed here forbidding the very thing that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Archambault) speaks of? As a matter of fact, I think the minister will find there is a regulation forbidding any officer or man saying anything until he is demobilized.

Major-General MEWBURN: There may be; I am not aware of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is in your own department.

HIGH PRICE OF BUTTER—COLD STORAGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that the official report from the cold storage warehouses indicates that the quantity of butter held in cold storage is about 48 per cent over what it was last year. In view of this fact and of the fact that butter is now selling at the highest price in history, I would like to know if it is the intention of the Government to do anything towards obtaining the release of this butter for public consumption in Canada.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In answer to the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) I am happy to inform him that the Government are going to have erected shortly in the port of Montreal a very large modern cold storage warehouse. We hope that when this warehouse is finished it will take care of all the produce Canada may have.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 38, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PREVENTION OF FIRE.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 69 (from the Senate), to amend the Criminal Code respecting the prevention of fire.

Mr. McKENZIE: We did all we could yesterday to prevent this Bill from passing through the Committee. We have a very full House to-day and I think there should be an expression of opinion in regard to this Bill. This is a criminal enactment which subjects any man, woman or child, in this country, to two years in the penitentiary if by some possible accident they may be the cause of a fire in their own house or anywhere else. I think this is going entirely too far and that it is infringing upon the necessary liberty of the people. It should not for one moment be stated that we in this House are creating a criminal offence where by no possibility a criminal mind or criminal intent exists. By some slight accident a person might have a defective stovepipe and if, by means of that stovepipe, a fire occurs in his house, it is, I think, a most extraordinary proposition that that person should be subjected to two years in the penitentiary. I therefore move:

That this Bill be not now read the third time but that it be read the third time this day six months.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. McKenzie, which was negatived on the following division:

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 70, to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): Before the Bill is read a second time, I think we ought to have some further explanations from the minister. I agree with the object of the measure as set forth in the preamble, and if the provisions of the Bill harmonized with the preamble they would be satisfactory. The preamble states that it is expedient to provide for the incorporation of a company under which the railways, works and undertakings of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System may be consolidated, and, together with the Canadian Government Railways, operated as a national railway system. I understand from that that the Government wishes the Canadian National Railway System to be operated as much as possible on the same lines as privately owned railways are. That impression I gather from the preamble, as well as from the remarks made by the minister when we were discussing the resolution upon which the Bill is founded. On that occasion the minister said that one of the reasons for introducing this Bill was to bring the Intercolonial under the General Railway Act of Canada, and he further said, as reported at page 1454 of Unrevised Hansard, that that railway will have to be placed under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Now, if the idea is to place the Canadian National Railway System on the same footing as privately owned railways, except where the conditions are such that that cannot be done, I do not think we require two railway laws in this country. The General Railway Act is sufficient to meet all requirements, and the only matters in regard to which its provisions might not apply would be with respect to stock, stockholders, shares, capital, and anything relating to shareholders. Otherwise I do not see any necessity for the various provisions which it is proposed to enact in this Bill, or for removing the National Railway System from the operations of the Railway Act, and for changing other things that are most essential and important to the public. I admit that the Government ought to appoint the directors, and should also have certain other powers of control, but I object to the Government exercising the whole right when that right can be profitably exercised for party or political purposes, and freeing itself from responsibility so far as the burden of finances is concerned, or when risks are to be taken by the company operating the system, and criticism might ensue as a result of any action it might take. The whole tenor of the Bill is such that when anything in the way of exercising patronage or taking over the lines is concerned the power is reserved to the Governor in Council, but in financial matters the burden is left entirely with the company—there is no control by the Governor in Council or by the Canadian Parliament. In certain essential matters Parliament will have no voice whatever; it is to be ignored just as it has been in many other things since the war started, and just as is proposed to be done in that very innocent Bill No. 71 which proposes to extend the life of various Orders in Council passed by the Government. I repeat that the principle enunciated in the preamble is all right, but the various clauses of the Bill are all wrong. In my opinion the Bill should not now be submitted to Committee of the Whole, but should be laid over for further consideration, because I see no reason for the differences and the exceptions that are contemplated under it.

For instance, the Canadian National Railways are empowered to build lines whenever they please with the sanction of the Governor in Council. I think that is a wrong principle and that the Bill ought to be amended. If the Canadian Northern Railway has a charter to build a line, then the Canadian National Railways might be allowed to construct; but I do not believe in giving a blanket lease of life to any railway company and its subsidiaries. Why not submit the Canadian National Railway System to the same ordeal as other railway companies? Then another thing, this measure would exempt the Canadian National Railways from the operation of the general Railway Act in expropriation proceedings, and give them the advantages of the Expropriation Act. The Canadian National Railway System ought not to be put under the Expropriation Act; I think that the courts of the various provinces where the other railway companies go in expropriation matters are quite capable of administering justice to the Canadian National Railway System or the Canadian Government. I think, too, that it is an autocratic and high-handed procedure for the minister or his deputy to sign the expropriation plan, file it in the registry office, and thereby have the ownership in the land vested in the Government. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I take no exception to Government ownership in this case—it is the best that can be done under the circumstances—but I do not believe in Government ownership any more than I believe in Government operation. If we are to take the experience of the United States, I think the enthusiasm that has been displayed in this House and in the country for Government ownership and Government operation is likely to be somewhat dampened. The United States have the poulation and the resources to make the experiment; Canada has not the population nor the resources to indulge in the experiment to such an extent as the United States have. From the figures given by the hon. minister to-day we see that for equipment he will require this year $35,000,000, if I understand him rightly, and that the deficit last year on fixed charges was $7,000,000. May I ask the hon. minister if that deficit covers the interest on all the bonds which the Canadian Northern Railway System has issued?

Mr. REID: The answers that I gave to-day I thought were very plain. Those answers stated that there were surplus net earnings of some three million dollars odd, but that after payment of all interest and other charges there remained a deficit of $7,000,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Interest on all bonds which are outstanding?

Mr. REID: Yes, everything.

Mr. BUREAU: You have not assumed the debt of the Canadian Northern, and still you are paying the interest on that debt. It looks like acquiescence on the part of the Government to pay that debt; but be that as it may it has nothing to do with this. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that we can get the right legislation by having this measure put before the committee now and discussed. As I said, we do not want two railway laws in this country. If you are going to incorporate this railway company, let it compete with the other railways with the same advantages and disadvantages that those railways have. I do not see why we should accept the expropriation clauses neither do I see why we should accept the other clauses. Except the matters relating to stockholders, there is nothing whatever to prevent the general Railway Act applying to the Canadian National Railway System, and I would suggest to the hon. minister that this measure be referred to some committee where we could hear not only the views of hon. members, but also the views of the men who are to-day operating this system. We will then be in a better position to judge of the necessity of some of the clauses in this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to hon. members that when the hon. minister exercises his right to reply he closes the debate on the second reading.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to endorse what has been said by the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), particularly on the point that we should have this measure sent to a committee. This is named as a railway company, and in most cases, according to the terms of the Bill, the Railway Act and the railway laws of this country governing railway companies will apply to it. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. minister would be taking the proper course if he would send this Bill in the ordinary way to the Committee of Railways and Canals. Such action would not at all take away the power of the Government over the Bill, and, as the hon. member for Three Rivers has pointed out, it would give us an opportunity of hearing what the management has got to say about it. I do not think I am giving away any secret when I say that to-day I happened to meet the gentleman who is in charge of the Government railways, Mr. Hanna, and I mentioned this Bill to him and what my view was, that is, that it should go to a committee. Mr. Hanna and his lawyer both expressed satisfaction at the idea. Mr. Hanna stated it would give him and his staff an opportunity of coming before the committee and explaining their views as to the necessity of this legislation and the operation of the road generally. As Mr. Hanna and the legal side of the management hold that view, I think the hon. minister should comply with the request and have this Bill go where it can be fully dealt with and then be reported back to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I think the minister would do well to accede to the wishes of the leader of the Opposition and have this Bill go before the Railway Committee of the House, where it can be more freely discussed than here, for the reason that the supporters of the Government would naturally hesitate to criticise the Bill and then have to vote for it if an amendment is moved in the House or in Committee here; whereas if the Bill were before the Railway Committee they would feel free to discuss it and vote as they saw fit. It is probably the most important legislation that this House will have to deal with for many years, and from my reading of the Bill I think many changes could be made in it that would be beneficial to this country. There is, no doubt, considerable opinion in this country in favour of public ownership, but the large majority of those who favour public ownership are not the investing public; that is, they are not people who have invested money in public corporations or public utility undertakings. They seem to be in favour of public ownership merely because, as a general rule, the railway companies were making in the earlier days what they consider to be large profits, and they want to be in on the profits. But few men are at all interested in public ownership from the standpoint of management, from the standpoint which we must take into consideration if we are to make a success of this undertaking. I differ from those who say that this railway undertaking is going to be a loss to us for all time. There is no reason why, in a country of this kind, a railway system of this size cannot be made to pay its own way—unless the people have so little interest in it that they allow it to become a political rather than a business undertaking. If branch lines are built where they should not be built; if terminals are developed at points where they cannot be made profitable; if unnecessary employees are taken on and others dismissed who, though good men, may not be of the right political faith; in short, if the system is treated generally as a political machine, as the political adjunct of a party, we are sure to come to grief. The history of the public ownership of railways the world over shows that railways handled by the Government direct have been a failure in every case. Australia made a failure of direct government management of railways until they put it into the hands of a commission, and even then they did not make of it what railroad men would look upon as a success, because they charge exorbitant rates. In no country has public ownership of railways been made a success until it has been taken as far as possible out of the hands of the Government. There is no reason why this undertaking should not be taken out of the hands of the Government and made responsible to Parliament. It is quite feasible, and the results would be very much better than they will be if the railway system is treated as a political machine. Our business here is to try and get this undertaking in the best possible shape for the people. The minister would be well advised to take this Bill before the Railway Committee and let us thrash the matter out and have these clauses adjusted so that they will be more workable and more satisfactory.

One very important point that the minister apparently has not taken into account is profit sharing with employees. A commission is now investigating the possibilities of closer co-operation between capital and labour in Canada. Why should we not consider this matter in connection with the largest Government undertaking that we have? The Government cannot lose anything by it. If the minister and the Government expect the railroads to go on losing money, why not offer an inducement to employees in the way of profit sharing that might be the means of producing a profit instead of a deficit? If the railroads make a profit, of course the Government should be generous enough to give the employees a share of it. It would not cause a loss to the country; it would not cause a loss to the shipper; it would produce greater efficiency and better work from the employees. Thousands of people will be employed on this railroad undertaking; why not establish some basis of co-operation between capital and labour in connection with it? It is in the interests of the minister, of the Government and of the country generally that this Bill be sent to the Railway Committee. The minister promised us certain information the other day; that information came down about thirty-five minutes ago, and now we are asked to consider this Bill. I think it should be delayed.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not usual for a Bill of this kind to be referred to the Railway Committee. When the Canadian Northern Bill was before the House in 1914—it was a very important Bill—it was taken up in Committee of the Whole. In fact, Government Bills are, as a rule, taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAHILL: This is an unusual Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: Since this Bill was discussed in the House a few days ago I took it up with some of the officials of the railway and of the department, and it is my intention to ask that some of the things against which objection was raised be removed from the Bill. Serious objection was taken to section 20; when we come to that section I intend to ask that it be eliminated. Since the discussion of the Bill took place, representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the only company that would have any serious objection to the Bill, discussed the matter with me and informed me that they could see very little objection to the Bill as a whole, though there might be some objection to three clauses, one of which, I think, was section 20. When we come to these sections in committee I will explain the objections which have been raised, and it will be for the committee to decide whether we amend the clauses or not. This is a very important Bill and every member of the House should have an opportunity to say something with regard to it or to make any suggestions which he may wish to offer. It is hardly fair, therefore, to refer it to a sub-committee of a few members, or to the Railway Committee, and then have it come back here and probably be discussed all over again. When we go into Committee on the Bill hon. members will see that, on the whole, very little objection can be raised to it. The two clauses that the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) mentioned are those against which the strongest objection has been raised; I intend to ask that one be taken out, and the other we can discuss. Let us proceed with the Bill. If it goes to the Railway Committee we shall either have to discuss the Bill again when it comes back to the House, or have it passed without giving members an opportunity of understanding exactly what the Bill means. I do not think it would be fair to the members of the House to refer the Bill to a sub-committee, and I therefore ask hon. gentlemen to agree to the motion.

Mr. BUREAU: May I be allowed one word?

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be out of order at this stage.

Mr. BUREAU: With your permission, Sir, I would say just this: I quite appreciate that the members of the House desire to discuss this Bill, and I have no doubt there is considerable railway talent in the House, but my object in proposing a committee was that we might have the benefit of the advice of the experienced railway men who are practically the operators of the railway. It is only in a committee we can hear these men, and for that reason I insist upon referring the Bill to a committee. I am not suggesting for a moment that I have not confidence in the House.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On the preamble being read:

Mr. BUREAU: I wish to say, on the preamble—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman would not be in order in discussing the preamble at this stage. By the rules of the House, the consideration of the preamble must be postponed until after the clauses have been considered.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought we were considering the clauses. The preamble should not be read if it is not to be considered now. My mistake followed your error.

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 55 says:—

> In proceedings in Committee of the Whole House upon Bills, the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the Committee in its proper course; the preamble and title to be last considered.

On section 1—nomination of directors:

Mr. DEVLIN: What will be the salary of the directors?

Mr. J. D. REID: Section 5 provides:—

> The directors may be paid by the company such sums for their services as directors as the Governor in Council may from time to time approve.

Mr. DEVLIN: But we have not reached section 5 yet. Cannot the minister on this section inform us about how much the directors will get? We know that the Governor in Council may pay any salary at all.

Mr. J. D. REID: The present directors are getting $2,000 per annum, and as far as I know, that will continue to be the salary.

Mr. McMASTER: What duties will the directors be supposed to perform for this remuneration?

Mr. J. D. REID: At the present time the directors hold a meeting every week or every couple of weeks. The operation of the railway entails a lot of work, and the directors have to attend the meetings and perform the usual duties of directors of a railway company.

Mr. BUREAU: I was going to say something about your ruling on the preamble, Sir, but will not just now. Section 1 says that the Governor in Council may nominate such persons as may be deemed expedient. Why not qualify the word "persons" to ensure that persons with railway experience will be appointed? Otherwise, the Governor in Council may appoint ordinary men like us. We have to suppose, of course, that the Governor General will always be advised wisely by Council; but we have seen such strange things lately that our minds are open to all sorts of suspicions, and the members here, representing the people, have had their privileges restricted to such an extent that we ought to take advantage of what remains to protect the people, who will pay for this railroad. A man cannot be assistant commissioner on the Railway Commission, for instance, without so many years' experience at the bar. Why not state the qualifications required, and then the Governor in Council could choose from those possessing those qualifications.

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot agree that we should limit the directors to those having railway experience.

Mr. BUREAU: Not all of them, but a certain number.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is always understood that there will be a certain number of officials on the board, but other companies, the Canadian Pacific, for example, have business men on their board. I think it is well to have business men on the board to assist and advise the officials of the road. Of course, a certain proportion of the board of directors should have railway experience. The Governor in Council would never appoint a board of directors composed entirely of men without railway experience. I hardly think it would be well to accept my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I would urge upon the Committee the advisability of eliminating political patronage from the administration of the Government Railway System. The credit of the country is involved in this undertaking to a tremendous extent, and this Government has been elected upon a pledge to abolish completely political patronage. I do not know whether that has been done. As far as the present board is concerned, I know that one of the gentlemen appointed, Mr. Laporte, is a successful wholesale grocer of the city of Montreal. As he is one of the very few friends of the Government in the province of Quebec, he is appointed to all the commissions set up by this Administration. I do not know that he has any special qualifications as a railway expert. Indeed, I believe that his qualification to be a member of all the commissions appointed by the Government lies in the fact that he is a friend and supporter of the Government.

Mr. ROBB: He is a Commissioner-General.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Yes, Commissioner-General for the province of Quebec. I am sure that policy will be continued if, when this Bill is passed, the authority of appointing directors still lies with the Governor in Council, notwithstanding the protestations of the Government that patronage has been abolished. I would suggest that instead of having the five or fifteen directors, as the case may be, appointed by the Governor in Council, they be appointed by this Parliament, which, after all, is the supreme authority. Let the majority of them be appointed by the Government and the minority by the Opposition. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice is laughing at the suggestion. Well, I knew he would laugh at it because, if it were adopted, it would deprive him and his friends of a fine source of patronage.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a Union Government.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Yes, it is a Union Government, but a queer union. If the suggestion I put forward were adopted it would be a guarantee to the people that there would be less political influence in the administration of the railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really did not know that my hon. friend intended his suggestion to be taken seriously, or I assure him I would not have smiled; but I was appreciating what I thought he himself understood to be a good joke. The suggestion that the Government should appoint the majority of the directors and the Opposition appoint the others, as a means of abolishing patronage, did appear to me to show a source of humour in the hon. member. His logical mind will, of course, immediately perceive that so far from abolishing patronage it would ensure its creation, and that in double measure. It would be simply patronage squared. If the suggestion is seriously made that the Opposition should nominate the minority of the members of this Board, and the Government nominate the majority, and that this should be done in the name of the abolition of patronage, the matter admits of no discussion. I understood the hon. member for Three Rivers to state clearly and frankly that the proper method of appointment was by the Governor in Council, and that is the method now employed in the appointment of commissions certainly of equal responsibility. It is indeed the only method that has been found practicable at all in this or in any other country.

Can the hon. member suggest any commission that is appointed in any country by vote of Parliament? The Government, of course, is responsible to Parliament, but no one can point to a case where Parliament was divided into two parts, each part in its turn selecting its due proportion of the members of a commission. The bench of the country is appointed by the Governor in Council and for each appointment the Governor in Council is responsible to Parliament. This is the basic central and integral principle of our Constitution, and there is no reason for departing from it here, and for the life of me I cannot picture the consequences that might ensue from such a departure.

Mr. DEVLIN: The position taken by my hon. friend from Kamouraska appeals to me as a very sensible one. He asks that the majority of the directors be appointed by the Government and the minority by the Opposition. We in this House occupy, I suppose, a position different from that in any other Parliament in the civilized world. We have one side of the House divided into two camps—the Liberal camp and the Tory camp.

An hon. MEMBER: Camp followers.

Mr. DEVLIN: Camp followers. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior must not forget that the shareholders of this new company will be the people of Canada, not one section of the people, but all sections. We on this side of the House, as the hon. minister must observe, perhaps with regret, are a goodly number and withal a healthy number representing practically half of the shareholders of this company. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite have a majority of seven. With all their forces gathered they went up to eighteen to-day, and that is about the smallest normal majority that a Government has ever had in this country. They do not, therefore, represent very many more of the people of Canada than we do on this side of the House, and the hon. member for Kamouraska asks that the people represented by the Opposition should have some say in the nominataion of the directors who are to represent them. I heartily approve of the suggestion of my hon. friend and trust that the Minister of Railways will take it into earnest consideration and act upon it.

Mr. BUREAU: I think that if the Minister of the Interior really regards this suggestion as a joke, he casts a slur upon the Prime Minister. He will remember that in this House when conscription came up and it was the desire to eliminate patronage and favouritism, the Prime Minister asked the then leader of the Opposition to suggest a number of names of gentlemen who might act as judges. Was it not Parliament that did that? The Government chose their men and then the leader of the Opposition suggested names.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were nominated in Committee.

Mr. BUREAU: The same thing should be done here if it is the intention to eliminate politics. My hon. friend refers to the appointment of judges. You cannot remove a judge unless he is impeached. Under this Act it is provided: "The directors shall hold office from year to year unless removed by the Governor in Council for cause." The chairman of the Railway Commission, if he were a judge of the Superior Court could not be removed by the Governor in Council even for cause; the matter must be brought before Parliament. The chairman of the Railway Commission cannot be as politically useful to this or any Government as the Board of Railway Directors who will manage these railways. We know very well what it means, for we have seen it in operation on the Intercolonial, and I think there is nothing to be laughed at in the suggestion. If the Government desire the people to believe that the Canadian National Railways are operated for the advantage of the country, honestly and free from political influence, I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamouraska should be taken up by the Minister of Railways, and if fifteen directors are to be appointed the Opposition should have the right to nominate five, and the Government ten, and if you are going to appoint five the Opposition could appoint the minority. The proposition is a fair and democratic one, although it may be hard for my hon. friend to appreciate it, as he has been accustomed to run the show his own way, coming to Parliament and saying, "Swallow this," as he did to-day and yesterday. He had a little innocent Bill of five lines. We were asked to swallow a whole sheaf of Orders in Council. I do not intend to swallow them in that way. There may be some of them that I might have to spit out before I got them down. I submit that this suggestion of my hon. friend from Kamouraska ought to be adopted and that this proposed provision should be inserted in clause one. All the appointments I have seen have been made through the Governor in Council so far, but these appointments have been safeguarded. The case of judges was cited by the Acting Minister of Justice, but the judges are safeguarded by the fact that the Governor in Council, once they are appointed, cannot put them out. The chairman of the Railway Commission is in the same position; the Governor in Council cannot touch him. You have to come before the House and practically impeach him the same as you would have to do in the case of a judge. But in this case it is entirely different. Patronage is going to be exercised and these appointees are going to control the business of a railway line extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific and involving the expenditure of millions of dollars. As has been said by my hon. friend from Kamouraska, we in Quebec have reason to ask for this amendment, because Sir Hormidas Laporte has been a universal commissioner both under the Tory and the Union Governments. It is the same thing so far. I would suggest that the clause be amended so as to read:

The Governor in Council may nominate such persons as may be deemed expedient, not less than five, nor more than fifteen, to be directors of the company hereby incorporated, upon the suggestion of the House of Commons, the minority being nominated by the minority in the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to assure the hon. member (Mr. Bureau) that I have no intention of asking the House to swallow anything. Certainly I never need ask the hon. member for Three Rivers, because he has shown a wonderful capacity for swallowing himself. It is only about fifteen minutes since he told this Committee that these people should be appointed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: I have seen better since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has seen better since. So that I never could ask the hon. gentleman to swallow anything; he is capable of doing that himself.

Mr. BUREAU: Anything that is reasonable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all I will ever ask of the hon. member. He refers to different appointments that are made for a fixed period of time and in which the appointeees are removable by vote of Parliament upon impeachment and appointments to which that permanency does not attach, and his doctrine appears to be that if permanency attaches to an appointment then appointment by the Governor in Council is not patronage, but if permanency does not attach, and if the appointments are therefore less desirable, appointment by the Governor in Council is patronage and should be done away with. It would occur to any one that the very opposite of that proposition is correct; that the more desirable the appointment, the greater the patronage power of the appointor. As a matter of fact, the Chairman of the Railway Commission is not removable in the same way as are the other members of that commission. I think he must hold his office for ten years unless by vote of Parliament. I do not know just exactly what the provisions are. There is at all events an element of permanency to it that does not apply to the appointment of the other commissioners. The other commissioners are exactly of the same status as are these appointees as suggested by this Bill and are removable by the Governor in Council for cause. That is the case with the present Bill. The reason the chairman is placed in a different category is, I think, only in the event of his being taken from the bench because when he leaves the bench he leaves an appointment that has necessarily the element of permanency in it. I presume that was the reason that actuated Parliament away back in 1903 in attaching that condition to the chairmanship of the Railway Commission. There is no necessity for that in this case. I do not know that Parliament would like to approve of a Bill in a form that would bind the hands of the Government, which is responsible for the proper management of this railway, to maintain in office an appointee who perhaps would not attend to his duties. That feature of it is in no way associated with patronage. The appointee is now only removable for cause just as the members of the Railway Commission are removable. In the fifteen or twenty years that the Railway Commission has been in existence there has never been an occasion for the removal of any member of the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): The railway commissioners are not operating railways. They have no occasion to exercise patronage.

Mr. BUREAU: They may favour one company or another but they cannot exercise patronage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They favour one company and they favour individuals; they are one of the most powerful commissions that the country ever had. They have an authority that is vast and could be exercised, if one could conceive of it being so exercised, from the patronage standpoint, which is altogether inconceivable. I think the apprehensions of hon. gentlemen opposite are not justified and really I do not think they are serious in suggesting that the officials, who must be responsible to the country for the actual operation of a great business enterprise, should be appointed not by the authority that itself is responsible to the people's representatives, but by a division of the forces in Parliament.

Mr. CAHILL: Was there not a recommendation in the Drayton-Acworth report that the directors should be appointed in some other way than by the Government? The minister speaks of the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council would nominate ultimately the directors suggested by the Opposition party, but they would be more apt to have a more uniform set of directors if they were nominated in that way than if they were nominated by the Government alone. Before we vote on this question I would like to ask the minister what were the causes that led to the conclusion that those who are now members of this board should be appointed as directors. On what ground did he arrive at the decision that these were the proper men?

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell were officials of the company. Mr. Hanna was president and Mr. Mitchell was vice-president and financial controller. They are two of the leading officials of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. On account of their positions in the company they were appointed to the board. Then Mr. Woods, another director, had been on the board for ten or twelve years. He is a prominent citizen of Toronto and by reason of his experience in connection with the work of the road we considered that he would be a very valuable man to have on that board.

Mr. Hobson is a very prominent man in Hamilton and a man in whom, I think, the people of Canada have confidence. His father was chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway for very many years, and I understand that the son worked for seventeen or eighteen years as assistant engineer under his father on the same railway. I considered that Mr. Hobson would be a valuable member of the Board. Taking the province of Quebec, Mr. Jones is a man of prominence, who has had a good business experience, and he also is one in whom everybody has great confidence. Mr. Jones, I think, was for a time general manager of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, Nova Scotia, and knows the country well. The company, I understand, owns and operates a railway, and doubtless Mr. Jones has acquired some experience in that regard. At all events he is a leading business man, and one in whom I felt the people would have confidence if he were made a member of the Board. Mr. Laporte has been in business in the city of Montreal as a wholesale grocer, but is likewise connected with numerous public institutions. I think he is president of one of the banks there, is more or less identified with various industries, and is held in high esteem. I think his appointment was well received in the province of Quebec. As to Mr. Barnhill, I believe he was a barrister in St. John. He is a very prominent citizen in New Brunswick, and is connected with large business interests in that province. From the reports that I received when we were making these appointments, I think that no better selection could be made from that province. Mr. Cantlie is from Nova Scotia, and is identified with various large industries there. He was selected on account of his standing in Nova Scotia and his connection with the industrial life of the province. Turning to the West, we have Mr. Riley, of Winnipeg. He is a citizen of undoubted standing and connected with large institutions in Manitoba. Mr. Hamilton is a foremost citizen of Saskatchewan and has been associated with Farmers' Institutes in Western Canada. I felt that we should have on the Board a representative of farmers in Western Canada, and that was the reason for appointing Mr. Hamilton. In choosing these directors our main object was to secure prominent and reliable men in whom the public would place every confidence. Any person who is not familiar with these gentlemen will, by making inquiry, satisfy himself that better appointments could not have been made, bearing in mind business ability and reputation for honesty. Political patronage did not enter into these appointments for the reason that the gentlemen selected have not been prominent in politics in the past as far as I am aware. They have not had any political affiliations at all, to my knowledge, and were appointed solely on their merits.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister has said that politics was not taken into consideration in making these appointments. Would he be good enough to say how many of the men whom he has mentioned as directors of the Canadian Northern railway voted for the Liberal party at the last election?

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not inquire personally of these gentlemen but I believe that a great many of them have been Liberal in their political views in the past. They may not have voted for the Liberal party at the last election—I cannot say whether they did or not—but there is no doubt that they have been known and recognized as prominent Liberals in the past.

Mr. CAHILL: Ex-Liberals.

Mr. POWER: I am somewhat surprised to hear the minister, particularly after his declaration last evening in favour of the returned soldiers, name a whole board of directors, not one of whom comes within that category. The minister should know, as every person in the House knows, that our Canadian railway troops accomplished miracles in France, and showed the Old Country how to build and operate railroads. It seems to me that this is peculiarly a sphere wherein the work of the returned soldier, who surpassed himself in building and operating railroads in France, should be utilized for the good of the country. We have been told that efforts are being made to give returned soldiers positions everywhere, but the very moment an important position is available, a position which the returned soldier could fill with undoubted success owing to his special qualifications, he is passed over, and we get instead the hacks of the Canadian Northern railway. I am opposed to this clause for another reason. The Government nominates a certain number of directors and naturally and inevitably the men so nominated will favour it. They are removable for cause but I never knew a Government, be it Liberal or Conservative, who could not get rid of a public servant when it wished to do so; and I imagine that whoever is appointed a director on this Board will feel it incumbent upon him, if he wishes to keep his position, to satisfy the demands of the ministers and the members who support the Government. We will therefore have, as we have had in the past, on both sides of politics, a carnival of political patronage and corruption such as has been witnessed on the Intercolonial railway for the past fifty years, and to such an extent that we will be unable ever to see our way clear out of the railway mess into which the country has got. I cannot in conscience give my support to a measure which will place eight or nine thousand, and perhaps more, miles of railroad under the control of men who are responsible to nobody but the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the appointments under discussion are only of a temporary character, and are not necessarily confirmed by this Bill. Should the measure be adopted by Parliament it will be necessary, I presume, to make new appointments under its provisions. Whether the board be composed of the same members or not is another question. With all that the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) have said as to the desirability of having this board so organized as to put it beyond the question of political patronage, and of having it so organized as to represent all the interests of the country, and that the Government must be held responsible for making appointments of that character, I very heartily agree.

I must say, however, that I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) in the suggestion that Parliament should make the appointments. We have no precedent for that. In our system of Government it has always been deemed necessary to mark the distinction between the executive and the legislative powers. I think I am right in saying that, with the exception of the hon. Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, it is not a part of our system that the House of Commons shall directly appoint anybody; all appointments must properly be made, and should be made (with the single exceptions I have mentioned) by the Governor in Council. To that extent I think the hon. member for Kamouraska if he presses his amendment—I hope he will not—will be laying down a principle which will be most embarrassing not only in this case but in all cases hereafter. I entirely agree with him that in the making of appointments to this board due regard should be had to see that it represents all classes and all interests in the country.

This is a tremendous experiment upon which Canada is entering. It is a big thing even as it stands to-day, but it is going to be much bigger apparently before this session ends. I would strongly urge my hon. friend from Kamouraska not to press his amendment. I think that all that has been said by him with regard to the appointment of the board, and the views of my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Power) with respect to the appointment of returned soldiers from the Railway Engineering Corps, should engage the serious attention of the Government. But I do not think we should be asked to declare that this House shall exercise executive powers.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is quite right, the present directors were only appointed pending the passing of this Bill, when the whole matter will have to be again considered. The suggestion as to returned soldiers and the other suggestions that have been made will have to be dealt with. There is no doubt that the Government will have to give its most serious consideration to the matter with the view to having the very best men appointed to the board of directors. We want to make this railway system a success, and it cannot be a success unless it is operated free from political or any other interference. If we take in the Grand Trunk we will have nearly a billion dollars railway investment, and the Government will be responsible for its proper management. It must be remembered that the Government really will have put in these railways only $10,000,000, the amount which we have so far in the capital of the Canadian Northern Railway. It is true that the Government will have to look after the bonds outstanding, and see that every care is taken in the protection of the investments, although it did not itself borrow the money.

So far as I am personally concerned, while in the past I was not in favour of public ownership, let me say that I have the greatest confidence in the railway system that the Government now owns. I do not think after all that the results of last year were so very bad in regard to the Canadian Northern Railway. The net earnings were about $3,500,000, and the loss, after paying fixed charges, was some $7,000,000 odd. It is true that a large amount of money had to be expended in rolling stock, that money being borrowed on equipment bonds, as was done in the past; but we all know that the Canadian Northern had very little rolling stock when it was taken over. I am satisfied that if we all join in excluding patronage or any other interference with the board of directors our railways will be a success. So far as I am concerned as minister, I think that the board of directors would not hesitate to say that I have done everything possible to prevent any interference with them since the Government took these railways over.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Might I ask the hon. minister if it is proposed to appoint a director from British Columbia? I have not heard him mention British Columbia, but, as he knows, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific have large interests in that province and considerable mileage, and there is a very strong feeling that there should be a director from that province. Of course, I know that perhaps here in the East it is not considered necessary to regard the views of British Columbia on all occasions; but really in connection with these railroad matters we feel it is very necessary that a man from British Columbia should be on the directorate. There should be no trouble in getting a returned soldier there, one who is fully qualified in all respects to act as a director. I hope the minister is considering such an appointment.

Mr. J. D. REID: That question will have to be taken up when we are settling the new Board of Directors. Every province is asking for a man to be appointed from within its boundaries. Other suggestions have been made to me in connection with the operation of these railways which might also be taken into consideration. One gentleman suggested that we appoint a board of about seven or eight men, such board to comprise at least four of the most prominent officials of the road. And remember, the officials that we put in these positions must be the very best men that we can appoint. Then he suggested that we also appoint a prominent labour man and about two prominent outside men who would give their whole time and attention to the operation of this road, reporting, of course, to the Government from time to time. Other suggestions have been made, such as the appointment of a returned soldier, or the appointment of a man from British Columbia or some other province. If this were my own property I would turn it over to seven or eight of the very best men I could get in Canada at good salaries, and I would not care whether they all came from British Columbia, Quebec or any other province, so long as they were the very best men, men with extensive railway experience and enjoying the confidence of the people of Canada. Unless we start out with the very best men in charge of this system, with a free hand to operate it as the Canadian Pacific railway is operated, I do not believe we can make it a success.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. D. REID: And I have the fullest confidence that the members of this House and the people of this country will give the directors to be appointed an opportunity to show what they can do with this railway system. If they are given that opportunity and that policy is carried out, I am confident that good results will follow the operation of the railway. Canada will have one of the best assets it has ever had; the people, in the East as well as in the West, will get a better service than they have ever had, and more people will be induced to come into the country. When this Bill passes and the Government comes to appoint a Board of Directors, we will consider the suggestions made by British Columbia and the other provinces. The Government, of course, must assume the responsibility of deciding what is the best way of managing this railway. If the Grand Trunk is taken in we shall have twenty or twenty-five thousand miles of railway to operate, and I repeat that we cannot take chances on any man or any board of directors by restricting ourselves to taking them from any particular provinces. Let us get the very best men we can find in Canada. The employees whom I have learned to know on the Canadian Government railways, including the Canadian Northern, are as good a lot of men as can be found on any railway in the world. Give them a chance, and you will see what the result will be.

Mr. DEVLIN: When does the minister expect to get the Grand Trunk?

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot answer that.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has the minister any idea when he is going to get the Grand Trunk?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the minister know anything about the acquisition of the Grand Trunk?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member knows exactly what the position is. The Acting Prime Minister said a few days ago that negotiations were going on in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Those negotiations cannot be completed in a day or in a few days. They are proceeding, and as soon as any information is available that should be given to the House, it will be given.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has any progress been made in the negotiations?

Mr. J. D. REID: Progress is always being made.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am sure that the country will be gratified to hear the minister say that although at the outset he was prejudiced against public ownership, the limited experience that he has had has satisfied him that public ownership of this great system or galaxy of systems that the country has acquired can be made a success. That statement is particularly gratifying, coming from the source that it does. It is also gratifying to hear the minister's reply to our friend from British Columbia (Mr. McQuarrie). It would be a mistake to restrict the selection of members of the board to particular sections of the country. While there is no objection to various sections of the Dominion being represented on the board, no course that I can think of would be so disastrous as that of subordinating the selection of the best men that can be obtained in the country to selection from particular sections of the Dominion. If Kamouraska had the men who were required to run this system of publicly-owned railways then the men should be taken exclusively from Kamouraska. It is gratifying to know that the minister's view is so clear in that regard. I was struck with an interview given by Lord Shaughnessy in which he sneers at public ownership and tries to discredit it in advance. I hope that the views of the more or less noble lord will have no influence on the action of this House or on the opinion of the people with regard to public ownership. I should like to tell the noble lord that this country contributed to the Canadian Pacific Railway enough in cash, in exemption from taxation, and in other things more than double the cost of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of its equipment. It does not reflect very highly on the more or less noble lord that he should sneer at public ownership and use his influence to destroy the idea in advance. Through no fault of its own, through no action of its own, this country must adopt public ownership of railways. What is the alternative? After this country has paid such enormous sums, such colossal sums, such appalling sums, for the construction of these various railroads, are we to continue pouring hundreds of millions into the maw of the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, or even the old Grand Trunk? Surely the time has come when—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. When the hon. gentleman referred to the interview in question I thought it was merely by way of illustration. He is now discussing the merits and demerits of public ownership, which certainly is not in accordance with the rule that speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to clause under consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is the clause, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The nomination of directors for the new Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am one of those members who always bows to the ruling of the Chair, but in a manner my discussion was relevant, because if we were to follow Lord Shaughnessy's suggestions we would not have any—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman's discussion would have been in order when the principle of the Bill was being considered on the second reading, but certainly is not in order when the discussion is confined absolutely to the clause now under consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I had practically finished the remarks I proposed to address to the Committee, anyway. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DEVLIN: Call him "Mr. Shaughnessy," not "the noble lord."

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I suppose my hon. friend wishes me to adopt the language that he would adopt if he were speaking. I am quite willing to follow his suggestion; if he thinks it ought to be "Mr. Shaughnessy," I have no objection.

Mr. BUREAU: The member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) says that this amendment is a departure from the old rule. I think that what we are doing to-day is a departure from the rule that has been followed up to now. Formerly we had one Government-owned railway, the Intercolonial, which was run by the Minister of Railways; to-day we have a number of railways, which are going to be run by a company on the same principle as that on which a privately-owned railway is run. The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) says that Parliament is assuming executive powers. I do not agree. We are delegating the executive power to the company, and control over that executive may be retained by the Governor in Council. I say that we are the proxies of the shareholders, and the directors should be appointed by the shareholders.

Mr. FIELDING: Then they would have to be appointed by the people direct.

Mr. BUREAU: We are the proxies of the people. We have their mandate to represent their interests here, whether it is to appoint a board of directors or do anything else. This is not a question of legislation. It was not a question of legislation when the Prime Minister asked my leader in 1917 to help choose a joint committee to appoint the judges in connection with the exemption tribunals. The object then was to remove from the mind of the people the idea that any political patronage would be exercised by the people nominated. I say that we are the natural and the actual proxies of the people, and we should have our say in the appointment of the directors. I quite agree that there are details of administration which should be under the control of the Governor in Council, and for which he should be responsible. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice has said that I have swallowed myself. I am ready to swallow myself a thousand times when I see a member of this House make a better suggestion than my own. I am willing to judge myself when I have rendered a bad judgment. I am not proposing this amendment for effect; I do not want my hon. friend to measure me by his own yard-stick. I am proposing it because I believe it is for the good of the country, and my hon. friend's sneers and irony will not prevent me from stating in this House what I think is right and taking the position which I think is right. I think in this case the hon. member for Kamouraska was right in principle. I beg leave to withdraw my amendment, to give my hon. friend from Brome an opportunity to present another which is better worded.

Mr. McMASTER: I beg to suggest an amendment along the lines proposed by the hon. member for Three Rivers. The situation that confronts this country is this:

whether we like it or not, we are entering upon public ownership on a large scale, and many of us are entering upon it with a certain amount of fear. But we wish to see the experiment succeed, because if it does not succeed the situation which will confront the country will be very serious indeed. One of the conditions which will operate for the success of public ownership will be to remove the administration of the railways from any possibility of political or party control. How can we do that? The Government in this Bill proposes to name a Board of Directors, not less than five, nor more than fifteen. The suggestion is made that the board should be named, not by the Government, which after all represents only one party in this House,—the Unionist party,—but by Parliament, the representatives of the people. I have worked out a scheme which I commend to the sympathetic consideration of the House. I would amend section 1 to read as follows:

> The Governor in Council may nominate such persons as may be deemed expedient, not less than five, nor more than fifteen, to be directors of the company hereby incorporated, from a list of not more than fifteen to be furnished by the House of Commons, said list to be composed as follows: Sixty per cent thereof by nomination of those members supporting the Government, and forty per cent by nomination of those members composing His Majesty's loyal Opposition, and upon such nomination being made the persons so nominated, and their successors, and such other persons as may from time to time be nominated in accordance with the above mentioned plan mutatis mutandis by the Governor in Council as directors shall be and are hereby incorporated as a company, under the name of 'Canadian National Railway Company,' hereinafter called the Company.

This is an attempt to have the Government furnished with a list of the full complement of directors for this company, sixty per cent being named by the supporters of the Government, and forty per cent by those who oppose the Government; and from that list the directors shall be chosen. If it is decided that only ten directors are required, the Government would name six and the Opposition four. It may be said that there is no precedent for this. I quite admit that, but we are launching on an absolutely new plan, and I think I am right when I state that the plan adopted by the Government of forming a quasi-independent company to operate the Government railways is a plan which has not been tried in any country in the world. The Government, however, has thought that it is the best plan. Let us endeavour to start right by eliminating all possibility of party patronage. We have no precedent to guide us; we are breaking new ground; let us break that new ground right.

Mr. KEEFER: This amendment is no different in principle from that moved by the hon. member for Three Rivers. It is more vicious in introducing the principle of patronage, because it introduces forty per cent of it whereas the other motion introduced only thirty-three per cent, or five out of fifteen. We have had an illustration here this afternoon of the practical inability to get along when you have factions in a House; and the same thing applies to a board of directors. The Government of the day is responsible to this House; this House meets annually, and it is within the jurisdiction of this House to haul over the coals annually the Government of the day and the directors of this road. So I do not see why we need trouble so much about the question of patronage.

Mr. BUREAU: An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Mr. KEEFER: I agree, and it is for that very reason I say we should not adopt this principle, because it would open the door to patronage much more widely than if the appointments were left to the Government of the day, which would be responsible for the acts of all these directors. The Government of the day could not be responsible for the appointees of the Opposition on the board of directors. The Government is not responsible to-day for the acts of the Opposition in this House—I am speaking in a friendly and logical way. There is a vital principle here at stake—the principle of responsibility to the people. Now if this Government is going to make ducks and drakes of this road, they may do it for a year, but I take it that the people of this country and this Parliament are sufficiently independent to see that no Government shall hold office for more than twelve months that makes ducks and drakes of the millions of dollars worth of capital invested in this system. Section 2 specifically provides that the directors shall hold office ' from year to year '. I do not like that expression. I prefer ' from one annual meeting to the next '. Therefore, any complaints against the board of directors can be threshed out annually in Parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: There is one respect in which the amendment of the hon. member for Brome is important. We are living in times when, I suppose, we must establish new precedents, but my hon. friend is introducing in the form of statute law something that is not to be found in the law of Canada, and I doubt if it can be found in the statute law of any British country in the world. The hon. member seeks to introduce into our statute law the recognition of political parties. It is a curious fact that while our British system of Government is derived from parties, and party is its very essence, there is no formal recognition of parties.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it not true that the leader of the Opposition receives a salary?

Mr. FIELDING: It is, that is the exception, and I think the precedent has been followed recently in the Legislature of Ontario. In the United States parties are often recognized. There Acts of Congress provide that certain commissions shall be composed of so many Democrats and so many Republicans. Under our system of government, however, we have never so recognized that principle. It is, as I say, an interesting and curious fact that while we have party government and party is the essence of the system, nevertheless our statute law has never recognized party at all, except in the one case referred to.

Mr. POWER: What about the War-Time Elections Act?

Mr. FIELDING: I am not as familiar with all that Act as I should be. To what does the hon. member particularly refer?

Mr. POWER: I refer to the fact that the leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister named the candidates that received their approval, and also the fact that the ballot was printed, "Vote for Government," or "Vote for Opposition." If that is not recognizing parties I do not know what is.

Mr. FIELDING: The War-Time Elections Act is about the last Act that I would be willing to accept as my guide. But I think it is a grave and serious thing for us to introduce into our general legislation this principle of recognizing parties.

What my hon. friend says as to the desirability of having both sides represented and abolishing patronage is all right. Of course the idea of taking these railways entirely out of politics is a dream and a delusion. You will never take any service completely out of politics so long as a dollar of the people's money goes into it. We may as well make up our minds to that. But an effort is being made, we are told, to conduct this enterprise without reference to politics and I should like to be helpful in that direction. I sympathize with the object of my hon. friend from Brome, but I think he is introducing a very inconvenient principle which would embarrass us hereafter.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora referred to the fact of the Government being responsible to Parliament. He will probably remember that a few days ago there was a question on the Order Paper inquiring of the Minister of Railways whether the Canadian Northern were buying their ties from the Northern Construction Company, at what price, and so on, and the Minister of Railways answered that it was not in the public interest to give the information. Will the hon. member support a government that makes an answer of that kind, or is he sincere when he says that hon. members are independent? I can see no independence on that side of the House. I think this Bill should be taken before the Railway Committee in order that we might have a clear non-partisan discussion of this question. The minister insisted that it should be kept here, and the moment an amendment was moved, hon. members began to come into the House. I think I am quite safe in the prediction that when this amendment is voted on you will find most members on this side of the House—possibly not all because we sometimes vote independently—will support it but all members on the other side will vote against it. That is practically assured. Now, if at this session, when the people are vitally interested in public ownership of railways, questions put on the Order Paper are to be answered by the statement that it is not in the public interest to give the information asked for, what can we expect from the supporters of the Government in this matter? The Acting Prime Minister in 1917 stated, as will be seen in Hansard, that this road should be taken out of politics entirely, and its management made responsible only to Parliament. The Prime Minister himself made absolutely the same statement last year when he said that the administration should be taken out of politics and be answerable only to Parliament. The Drayton-Acworth Commission in their report recommended that it should be taken out of politics and now we have a Bill before us with absolutely no explanation of where the Government have received the information that has led them to change their minds from the view clearly expressed by the leader of the Government and by the Acting Prime Minister. If on this important subject of the Directorate, their appointment, and their recall, and the management, there is no greater interest among the members to your right than has been shown here to-day, the outlook will be serious. Will the Acting Prime Minister explain on what authority he now bases his change of view in regard to the appointment of directors, and on what authority does the Government change the view expressed by the Prime Minister when he said that this matter should be taken out of the hands of the Government and be made accountable only to Parliament. I think the answer to that question would be of value to the committee and to the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are two ways in which the Government Railways of Canada could be administered. In the first place, they could be administered, as the Intercolonial was administered, by direct action of the Department of Railways under the immediate authority and control of the Minister of Railways. That would mean that in the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Intercolonial, which for administration purposes is now connected with it, the Government of the day would immediately control the administration and operations of the entire system of railways. Now we are getting away from that. The Government of the day will appoint the directors of the Canadian National Railway system. Those men will have as their duty the administration of that system and will not be subject to immediate interference on the part of the Government. We appointed some time ago a Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and so far as I know, these men have had an absolutely free hand, subject only to this, that with regard to expenditures the Government must be consulted.

I am exceedingly desirous, as I am sure the Government is, that this system should be administered absolutely in the public interest without interference on the part of governments having regard to political considerations. I do not know of any way in which it can be done consistently with the principle of responsible government other than that suggested here, namely, that the Government should appoint those who are to administer the system, these men to have a free hand in the administration.

If they are the right kind of men—and I submit that the appointments which have been made have been creditable to the Government—they will not brook any interference on the part of the Government. The greatest safeguard that could be had against political interference should be in the character and standing of the men appointed to the board. My own view is that public ownership will be a success in Canada in almost direct proportion to the character, integrity, responsibility and ability of those who control and direct the operations of the Government system. The greatest service that the Government can render in reference to transportation in so far as it is under Government administration, is in the appointment of first-class men of the highest standing in the community, men of such self respect that they will feel that they will be judged so much by the success of their administration of the system that they will not brook any interference on the part of the Government.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), we are working under the British constitutional practice in this country. I cannot conceive of a division of responsibility between Government and Opposition. Even if we agreed to a division of responsibility between Government and Opposition, it is the Government who would be responsible both in Parliament and before the country. The Government cannot under any system free itself of its responsibility for the administration of the Canadian National Railway System by permitting the Opposition to name forty per cent of the board. If we did that and there was friction, let us say on the board, who would be held responsible? Who are the Opposition in this House? You might have three parties in the House. As pointed out by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens there is no such thing as a recognized Opposition under our constitutional system.

Mr. BUREAU: There is under the statute.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, it is for a particular purpose only; it must be general. The War-time Elections Act was mentioned. But look at the situation; there were hundreds of thousands of soldiers overseas whose votes had to be taken.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not the case I refer to. I refer to the statute that provides for a payment of $7,000 to the recognized leader of the Opposition.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is particular legislation from which general conclusions should not be drawn. I think it is incontrovertible that under our constitutional system every Government must assume responsibility and it cannot devolve it upon the Opposition. It must be responsible for the administration of the National Railway system. The Government will be held responsible by this Parliament. It is absolutely unsound, in my judgment, to get away from that principle.

I think I have met all the arguments put forward by my hon. friend who preceded me. As I said, the Government desires, as far as possible, that this system shall be administered absolutely without regard to politics. An earnest of the Government's intention in that regard may be found in the character of the men who, from time to time, have been appointed to the board. Public ownership will be a success only as a result of the human agencies which are employed in its administration. You may have the best machinery in the world, but it is from the men who administer that machinery that the results are to be got. It seems to me that my hon. friend, who is thoroughly familiar with constitutional practice, might very well consider whether he is wise in pressing a resolution which is in violation, as I understand them, of the constitutional principles upon which the Government is conducted under the British system.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I was rather surprised to find gentlemen with such good sense as the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) take the position which is represented in the amendment before the Committee. They, and those who think with them, must see, because they are gentlemen of experience, how impossible the proposition is that the Oposition should be allowed to nominate forty per cent of the membership of the Board of Directors. Let me point out the practice that is followed in the case of the election of directors of joint stock companies. When there is an election of directors of a joint stock company, there may be different factions, but a slate is selected, and those composing the slate that wins are the directors who administer the affairs of the company for the ensuing year. Now if the plan suggested in the amendment proposed here were adopted it would defeat, I fancy, the very object that its supporters have in view. You would introduce factionalism into the board, you would immediately have a division, you would doubtless have in addition to the gentlemen representing the majority of the board a leader of an opposition as well, and there would be in my judgment no possibility of arriving at amicable decisions—you would have two factions on the board and you would have complications in the administration of its affairs. The members of the board nominated by the Opposition would feel themselves under a special obligation to those who nominated them and would be sure to run with their whisperings and promptings to the leaders in the House. Under circumstances of that kind you could not have governmental responsibility at all. It seems to me that the position which the Acting Prime Minister took in the House this afternoon is the only tenable one. After all, the Government must be responsible for the administration of the affairs of this railway system. We all recall the position of the leader of the Opposition taken a few days ago on the subject of Daylight Saving, when he twitted the Government with abandoning its responsibility. The position then taken by him was that the Government should have accepted the responsibility in regard to Daylight Saving and should have come before the House with a proposition. Because the matter was thrown open for the judgment of the House the Government was criticised, and you would find identically the same thing occur in the case under consideration only in a much more aggravated form. I was particularly struck with the logical position taken by the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) a man of large political and business experience who enjoys the respect of the great majority of the people of this country. That hon. gentleman pointed out with great force how absurd and unworkable is the proposal of the hon. member for Kamouraska and the hon. member for Brome. It is perfectly true that the Opposition in a British Parliament is not recognized constitutionally, although a precedent has been established by paying the leader of the Opposition a salary. Far be it from me to minimize the valuable services that an Opposition leader renders to a country. I am prepared to admit that the present leader of the Opposition in this House is a man of very great ability and performs services that are very valuable to Canada, but I do not believe that the precedent laid down of recognizing an Opposition in the way it has been recognized is after all a good one.

The hon. member for Pontiac Mr. Cahill) spoke of the creation of a new precedent, and claimed that the Government was evading responsibility. The Drayton-Acworth Report, as I remember it, suggested this very thing—the creation of a company to carry on the affairs of a national system of railways.

Mr. CAHILL: Would the hon. member be kind enough to read just what the Drayton-Acworth Report says on that subject?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I have not a copy of the report before me.

Mr. CAHILL: I will give the hon. gentleman a copy.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The hon. gentleman can read what he wishes after I have concluded my remarks. I am speaking subject to correction, and I do not wish to put the hon. gentleman in a position which he does not wish to occupy, but my recollection of the report is that the commissioners suggest the creation of a company to carry on the affairs of the nationally-owned railways. It seems to me that that is the only proper and feasible plan under which this great enterprise can be conducted. As the Acting Prime Minister said, you have either to adopt that plan of continue the old system of managing these roads under the Department of Railways which has not proven an entire success in the past. I take it that it is in order to get away from the old system that the present proposal of the Government has been submitted to the House. As the Acting Prime Minister stated, the matter is one that public opinion will regulate. We have some little idea of the class of men that the Governor in Council in its present mood would appoint as directors of the company. If you take the calibre of the men who were appointed as directors of the Canadian Northern Railway after that road passed into the hands of the country, you will find that it would be very difficult to improve upon the personnel of the Board, because some men of the highest character and integrity have been appointed. I like the argument advanced by the Acting Prime Minister:—that there is so much at stake in this great issue, so vast and far-reaching will be the interests of the nationally owned railways, that the whole country would be in jeopardy if this railroad system were not well managed. The Acting Prime Minister pointed out further, and I think pointed out with great force, that public opinion would regulate the appointments. After these appointments were made, under the system proposed in the Bill, year after year, when this House meets, it will be possible to criticise, and criticise severely, if occasion necessitates, the conduct of the Board or of any member of it. I am satisfied that a keen public opinion, in view of the vast importance of the question, will regulate the matter of the membership of the Board. I suggest to my hon. friends opposite the desirability of considering the effect of the amendment which they have proposed before pressing it upon the committee. I feel sure it must have been brought forward without due consideration, and I am also satisfied from my knowledge of the gentlemen responsible for it that if they carefully consider its effect they will not press the amendment.

Mr. McMASTER: I listened with a great deal of attention to what the Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon concerning the unconstitutionality of the amendment which I proposed, and I believe that a great deal of weight should be given to his opinion. I have the gravest doubts as to the constitutionality of the whole scheme as outlined; it seems to me that the Government is swallowing a camel and straining at a gnat. However the responsibility has to be upon the Government and I shall withdraw the amendment, at the same time stating that if anything would have led me to insist upon the proposition, it would have been the remarks made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson).

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. BUREAU: The amendment which has been withdrawn follows the suggestion advanced in the Drayton-Acworth Report. At page 3 of part 5 of that report the commissioners state:

> We now proceed to set out these recommendations in more detail. The trustees should be five in number. The first trustees should be named in the Act of Parliament constituting the board.

That is the first thing the Commissioners say. They are men who have made a special study of, and conducted a special investigation into, these matters, and I believe they know what they are talking about. They recommend:

They recommend:

> 1. That a Board of Trustees be constituted by Act of Parliament and incorporated as "The Dominion Railway Company."

That is now being carried out by the hon. Minister of Railways in this Bill.

> 2. That the ownership of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways be vested in this company.

3. That the Government assume responsibility to the company for the interest on the existing securities of these undertakings.

The constitution of the Board of Trustees and their tenure of office are dealt with in another paragraph:

The trustees should be five in number. The first trustees should be named in the Act of Parliament constituting the board.

The tenure of office should be the same as that of Judges of the Supreme Court—

My hon. friend, the Acting Minister of Justice, this afternoon argued, if I understood him correctly, that such a long term would not be advisable in a case like this.

Three trustees, one of whom should be chairman, should, if possible, be men of railway experience. They should be required to give their whole time to their duties, and salaries should be fixed adequate to command the services of the best men. Of the two remaining trustees, we think it would be desirable that one should be selected on the ground of business and financial experience, and the other as specially possessing the confidence of railway employees.

The Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon that the only way to make the Canadian Government railways succeed was to appoint the best men in the land to manage them. We all believe that; in fact, we all know it. If you get the best men, and they give all their time and attention to the Government railway system, it will be a success. But we do not think the Government will appoint the best men. That is why we want the responsibility to be taken by Parliament. My hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) said this afternoon: Let the Government take the responsibility, and get after them when you come to the House if they do not do right. What is the use? Take the Star last night, which contained a comparison between the way in which the troops were handled by the Canadian Pacific Railway and by the Canadian Government Railway. An instance is given of the Canadian Government Railway train being three hours late at a point a few miles out of Quebec, but the Canadian Pacific took the troops over and brought them into Montreal on time. Yesterday they were waiting for a Canadian Government train which was first announced at two o'clock, then at three o'clock, and at seven o'clock it had not come in. Who raises a kick in the House, who calls attention to the fact? When our troop trains were jumping off the track every now and then nobody said anything in this House. What is the use? Suppose we say: Those trustees are no good; they have done this or that. Well, they have done it, and it is no use locking the stable door after the horse is gone. You need to have such a board as will command the confidence not only of the railway employees, as the commissioners say, but of the public in general, of all the stockholders, and I think that that or a similar suggestion ought to be adopted. I do not see that we are getting away from any constitutional point. As the Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon, there are only two ways of running Government railways—you have either to run them by the Government through the Minister of Railways; or to run them by a commission or board of trustees or a company. We are now proposing to organize a company, and if we are to organize it, I think there ought to be no difference between it and any private railway company. The stockholders ought to elect the directors, and then the administrative duties of the directors ought to be looked after by the Governor in Council.

Mr. POWER: Since speaking on this clause this afternoon and making a suggestion to the Minister of Railways, I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to put my suggestion in the form of an amendment to the clause in question; that is to say, to give the minister an opportunity to show the country that he and the House are serious when they say that they intend to do the best they can for the returned soldier. As I pointed out this afternoon, the Canadian soldier in France has shown to the world that he can construct railways and run them under the most difficult circumstances possible, and I see no reason why he cannot do it in this country when he is backed by a Government so powerful as this is. I know an objection will be urged from both sides of this House, that by consecrating in our statutes the principle that returned soldiers should be appointed to such and such positions we are liable to create a militaristic class. I think the objection is a good one, but the present circumstances are such, and the wording of the Bill is such, that I do not think we need fear any such calamity—for it would be a calamity to create such a class in this country. We are going through a period of reconstruction. The returned soldier has been promised practically everything; he has been told time and again that the people of Canada will do everything for him—will find him a position. In the past few months since the troops have been coming back in large numbers I have had great difficulty in finding positions on the Government railways and on other railways for returned men with some railway experience. For one reason or another perhaps they are not fitted mentally—that is to say, their mentality has not come back to the absolute normal, pre-war standard, or perhaps they are somewhat incapacitated by their wounds —for the first month to perform their duties in the fashion in which the ordinary concern expects them to be performed. But should there be a returned soldier placed on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, he will be able to enter into the feelings of the returned man, and the returned man will be able to appeal to him and say, "Well, give us a little better chance than the man who is tied down by the hard and fast rules and regulations of his board." Under those circumstances I think the best thing I can do is to embody the suggestion I made this afternoon in the form of an amendment, as follows:

That clause 1 be amended as follows: By inserting after the word "fifteen," in the sixteenth line, the following words: "At least one of whom shall be a man who has seen service as a soldier at the front."

I may say that the two amendments made this afternoon have come to a rather sad conclusion, but in this particular instance I can assure the House that I will not withdraw this amendment under any circumsances whatsoever. Should I withdraw it I would feel very much like a five-cent piece.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I support with pleasure the amendment of the member for Quebec West (Mr. Power). The member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) took exception this afternoon to the strong language used by Lord Shaughnessy in an address which he made the other day in Montreal. But what Lord Shaughnessy said was that this board would turn out to be a political organization. He was right, because the whole system of appointments smacks of strong partyism. I quote the following from a Government organ, the Winnipeg Telegram—one of the rivals in Winnipeg of the Tribune and the Free Press—of 19th April:

Making Railway Experts.

To the Editor Winnipeg Telegram:

Sir:—The west has furnished our Government with two men to fill national railway positions. A short biography of them should provide a tip to President Beatty of the C.P.R., and should also point the way to thousands of ambitious Canadian youths. It should also quiet the disbeliever in Government ownership of railways, as it clearly shows that our prairies turn out captains of industry by the simplest of training.

Charles McGill Hamilton, in the early '90s, was attending school in Indian Head and later in Regina. About 1902 he settled on a section of land near McTaggart, Sask., a village about ten miles north of Weyburn. He followed this worthy but uneventful career until two years ago, when he was nominated in opposition to the Unionist candidate for Weyburn. Mr. Calder was managing Unionist affairs in Saskatchewan, and Hamilton was prevailed upon to withdraw. A few months later he was appointed a director of Canadian National railways. Farming a section of land in Saskatchewan is a mighty good training for directing the affairs of a national transcontinental. The Canadian Pacific railway have been slow to see this.

Sydney P. Porter in Moose Jaw's early days, was a C.P.R. baggageman. Many years of this work was followed by years as homestead inspector. This latter position developed into confidential political agent of the Saskatchewan dominant party. When the by-elections were on, Syd. was there oiling the machine. This week he becomes assistant to the general manager of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, with headquarters at Ottawa.

Handling baggage, homesteaders and political campaigns are, some say, an excellent training for managing a national transcontinental. President Beatty, please take notice. Calder can show him things in selecting men for big jobs.

Government Ownership.

This shows that we are giving too much power to the Minister of Railways and Canals. After all, biased as Lord Shaughnessy may be in regard to the whole question of Government ownership, he is right in intimating that after a while the whole thing will be a huge political system in the hands of the government of the day. Here you have two concrete cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What would my hon. friend propose as to the management of this great system of railways that has been literally dumped on the people of Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend would not take my advice, anyway.

Mr. RICHARDSON: A man who criticises is in duty bound to offer an alternative.

Mr. FIELDING: I see no objection to the appointment of a returned soldier on the board. I do hope that in the selection of the members of the board a competent returned soldier may be found especially one of the engineering corps to which reference was made by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). But I do not approve, if I may use my hon. friend's own words, of "consecrating" in an Act of Parliament the appointment of a returned soldier in the form he proposes. I do not think that is a wise procedure.

Amendment (Mr. Power) negatived—Yeas, 23; nays, 38.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is no provision in this clause for a quorum. I suggest, therefore, that the following words be added after the word " incorporated " in the seventeenth line:

A majority of those appointed shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 13 makes applicable all the provisions of the Railway Act except certain provisions. The Railway Act, by a provision that is not within the exceptions, provides that a majority shall be a quorum, consequently, there is no need of an amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. CAHILL: In order that we may get the best expression of opinion on this all-important section of the Bill, I move an amendment to the effect that this clause be referred to the Railway Committee or to a committee to be selected by the Railway Committee, consisting of fifteen members from the Government side and ten members from the Opposition side. Any vote that is taken here is practically a party vote. Some members on this side may express their opinion by their vote, but members on the Government side always vote with the party. The question of directors is one of the most important that we have to deal with in connection with this Bill, although there are about thirty sections in the Bill, all more or less bad, but some not so bad as others.

I think if a committee were appointed to consider the best means of appointing these directors we should get very much better results than we can hope to get in this Committee of Parliament, for the reason that when we sit down in a committee outside of this Chamber the suggestion of a member of the Opposition is taken for what it is worth, whereas in Committee of the Whole any suggestion made by a member of the Opposition will undoubtedly be voted down by the supporters of the Government. As this is an all-important Bill, I do think the Government should be willing to meet the Opposition in their suggestions for arriving at the best possible means of dealing with this matter, and I therefore beg to move that a committee of twenty-five be appointed, fifteen of whom shall be supporters of the Government, and ten members of the Opposition, to consider the best method of selecting the directors.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am obliged to rule the amendment out of order. The appointment of a committee is a matter that lies entirely within the power of the House of Commons, and not within the power of a Committee of the House. It would be impossible for a committee to appoint a committee, and as the House is now acting as a Committee of the Whole, it is not in order for the hon. member to propose this amendment. It should have been made when the Bill was before the House for its second reading. It cannot now be entertained.

Mr. CAHILL: May a committee not appoint a sub-committee? I would suggest that the Government appoint a committee.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 1 provides:

The Governor in Council may nominate such persons as may be deemed expedient, not less than five, nor more than fifteen, to be directors of the company hereby incorporated, and upon such nomination being made the persons so nominated, and their successors, and such other persons as may from time to time be nominated by the Governor in Council as directors shall be and are hereby incorporated as a company.

Section 2 provides that the directors shall hold office from year to year. It would, therefore, seem that the directors have the privilege of filling vacancies, with the approval of the Governor in Council. Would these new appointees have to be nominated by the Governor in Council in order to form part of the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is what the Bill says. The Governor in Council fills the vacancy by the appointment of a successor.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 2 provides that the directors " may " fill the vacancy by the appointment of a successor. Is there any conflict between the two sections. But perhaps that can be considered when we come to section 2.

Mr. COPP: The Minister of Railways told us this afternoon, and we are very glad to accept his statement, that so far as he was concerned, as Minister of Railways, he would see that no politics or patronage entered into the appointment of the directors or the operation of the railway. Now, section 1 of the Bill bears very distinct earmarks of a huge political machine that is being built up in this country the like of which we have never had in the operation of our railways since Confederation. A great deal has been said of the operation of the Intercolonial. I have always been a very strong supporter of Government ownership and operation of that road, because it was a part and parcel of Confederation. Yet when I consider the mileage that is being added to the Government system and that will be controlled by this board of directors—while, of course, I realize, as does this country, that politics and patronage will not creep in so long as the system is under the efficient management of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) —I shudder to think what may happen when the present minister retires from his position, to be succeeded perhaps by somebody imbued with more partisanship than he. For instance, suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) whom I am glad to see near the minister to-night were Minister of Railways, what a great power would be in his hands to be used in support of his party. When the minister asks us to believe that politics will not be considered as a qualification of a director of this company, it is like asking us not to believe what we have seen going on for years in the operation of the different branches of this Government. In the operation of this huge system, which my hon. friend from Springfield is so prone to say has been wished, or forced, on the Government—I do not say so; these roads have not been forced on the Government, but have been taken over by the Government at a very great price to protect some of their political friends—all possible safeguards should be provided against political influence. Because, as surely as the sun rises in the east and sets in the west, when this great mileage is added to the Government system of railways (and I understand still more mileage is to be added) it will be as impossible for any board of directors or any minister of railways or any government—and it is really the Government who will operate the road—to operate this gigantic system without political patronage as it would be to win an election in any constituency in the Dominion without bringing in politics.

Section 1 provides that the Governor in Council may nominate such persons, not less than five nor more than fifteen, to be approved by the Governor in Council. I want to ask my hon. friend if in all fairness he could not lay the cards on the table, at least to the extent of informing the Committee how many directors will be appointed. Does the Government intend to appoint five of their prominent supporters at large salaries, or will they find places for fifteen? I think we should have that information. The Minister of Railways says that politics are to be eliminated, but the Acting Prime Minister was not by any means so emphatic in this respect. He said that the railway would be operated, as far as possible, without regard to politics. I took his words down at the time and have them before me,—politics would be eliminated "as far as possible." Now that is a very elastic qualification. My hon. friend knows, as well as I and every man and woman in the country know, that it cannot be operated independent of politics. He has studied the matter and I think he should be able to tell us whether there will be five, seven, nine or fifteen directors. Many valuable suggestions have been made in regard to the selection of these directors. It has been suggested that different organizations might be considered, and I have no doubt that every hon. member will concede that if a returned soldier had experience or knowledge regarding railway matters he should at least be given a first place on the board. But if you are to accept the qualifications for membership on the board as suggested by the Winnipeg Telegram, from which my hon. friend quoted a few moments ago, of course the returned soldier would not be considered unless he had been a candidate endorsed by the Unionist party. If there is a board of fifteen directors selected, I suggest that at least two of its members should be representative of the labour interest. There is no class or body of men who are more interested in the operation of the railway than the railway employees, and if there are fifteen directors they should have two representatives; if the number of directors is seven or eight, then only one. At all events labour organizations should be represented on the board of directors.

Mr. J. D. REID: With reference to the question of my hon. friend as to why I have fixed the number from five to fifteen, I may inform him that when we get all the railways consoldidated it will then be decided how many directors should be appointed for the operation of the whole railway system. Probably we have made the number larger than will be really necessary, but it is impossible just at present to decide on any definite number of directors. As to the appointment of labour men and a returned soldier, I believe I stated this afternoon that I thought a labour man and a returned soldier should be on the board. These classes of men will receive the consideration of the Government. As to the question of patronage, I think it is hardly fair to compare the present operation of the Government railways with the conditions that existed a number of years ago. It is now almost impossible to have patronage on the railway system because every employee of the railway belongs to one union or another. You can not dismiss a single employee without an investigation by the union to which he belongs, whereas formerly an employee could be dismissed and some one else appointed in his place on the recommendation of a member. In connection with promotions, if there is a vacancy in the railway the senior man receives the appointment, and there is no way by which political influence can interfere with his promotion. During the short time I have been administering the department vacancies have occurred, sometimes an agent retiring or resigning from the service, when some other man in the particular village or town sought the position. He had no possible chance of getting it, because the senior man on the road under the union was entitled to it. I think this is a fair and equitable way of filling these positions. It is obvious, therefore, that political patronage in appointments to the railway system as a whole has been abolished by the employees themselves. There is one direction in which, perhaps, political patronage might obtain; but if the directors carry out the policy they should carry out, and which I believe they are carrying out at the present time, and call for tenders for all the supplies that are required in the operation of the road there will be no possibility of patronage in that respect. The whole success of the operation of the road depends entirely on the men who are appointed as directors, and when this Bill goes through, I am certain that the men who will be appointed as directors will command the respect and confidence of the people.

If they do not they can be removed at the end of the year, or by the Governor in Council for cause at any time. If there is any dissatisfaction it can be discussed in the House. There has been, in my opinion, the possibility of interference with the operation of this great system as a result of parties outside trying to get information that it will not be in the public interest to give. That question was raised by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) this afternoon. I will illustrate what I mean. A return was asked for giving a statement of all the business done at each and every station on the Transcontinental railway, the amount of money received, and the number of cars that left each station during the year 1918. If that information is given, there is no reason why there should not be an order for a statement of all the business done between Toronto and Montreal, or between Winnipeg and some other place, with the result that the railways that are being operated in opposition to the Government system will get all the information as to the business that is being done at the stations adjoining their own railway, information which, if given, would surely injure the Government Railway system. Other questions are being asked as to what is being paid for coal and whom it is purchased from. I will tell you what happened on the Intercolonial railway during the past few years—I think that hon. members from the Eastern Provinces will bear out the statement I make; perhaps they will not say so here but I think they will not hesitate to confirm what I am going to say. We have in Nova Scotia one or two mines where the coal is much more valuable than that produced from other mines—coal that is worth probably a dollar a ton more than that of some other mines. Years ago a difference was allowed for this coal, because of its quality. A question was asked each year and the information given to the public as to the prices that the Government were paying for coal. Political influence came in each year—it is probably just the same on one side as the other—with the result that influence was brought to bear in consequence of which in the lower provinces we are paying just as much for coal that is not of this high quality as we are for the high-quality article. If the same system is followed throughout the country the directorate will not be able to get the advantages that they should get in matters of this kind. You could not get information from the Canadian Pacific, which will be the great opposition company to the Government-owned system; they do not disclose information of that kind to their own shareholders or the public. We should have men operating this system of such a character that it would not be easy for us to criticise any of their management of the road. Of course, it is possible that the men appointed may not live up to the expectations formed of them. I do not think that any Government would have any hesitation in removing a director who was not able to perform the duties satisfactorily not only to the railway but to the public. We must start out with men in whom we have confidence and we must trust these men for at least a year, or until Parliament meets again, when, if they have not carried out their duties satisfactorily, they can be removed.

Mr. COPP: Why wait until Parliament meets if they are not satisfactory?

Mr. J. D. REID: We will not wait until Parliament meets if any information has been given to the Government that would justify their removal. The Bill gives us power to remove them for cause. If there has been any information given to the public, or if the matter is brought before the House, Parliament can take action if the Government has not acted.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend must be very innocent; or he must think I am—I do not know which. He tells us that it is impossible to exercise political patronage on a Government railway. I happen to live in a community where we have some connection with the working of a Government railway. He says you cannot dismiss men from a Government railway because you will have a strike on your hands at once. My hon. friend apparently has not been Minister of Railways and Canals long enough to get on to the game, or he does not want us to think that he has. If he will come to the city of Moncton, or if he will visit any other place in Westmorland county traversed by the Intercolonial railway, he will find that the statement that there is no political patronage in regard to employees on the Intercolonial is not altogether correct. I do not need to go back a year to prove that; I can cite him an instance occurring in the month of January last. A stationmaster wanted an employee temporarily. He wanted some one in a hurry, and he employed a young man. This young man remained there a few days, or weeks, till the patronage committee in that locality went to the stationmaster and demanded that he be dismissed because he did not belong to the Conservative party. I did not know who he was or what party he belonged to or did not belong to. The stationmaster referred the matter to Moncton and a man was sent from Moncton to investigate. He investigated the case and found that this young man did excellent work, and he did not want to displace him. Finally he made a dicker. There was another man required and he said to the stationmaster: "You had better select a Tory for this other position and maybe this young man will be kept on as well, and there will be nothing more heard about it," but the man in question was soon dismissed. That is taking place in a three-dollar-a-day job. Yet the Minister of Railways tells me, and expects me to accept his statement, that there is no political patronage in connection with Government railways. If there is going to be a cutting out and hewing away with political patronage, why has it been allowed to go on until to-day? Why not cut it out? I do not believe that the officials of the Intercolonial railway want to play party politics, but there must be somebody who is interested in it. I am only speaking of my own locality, and I know whereof I speak. This does not come to me second-hand or as a matter of hearsay; I know it

If that is the case with respect to a little job on the Intercolonial, which is not worth more than three or four dollars a day, what must be expected under this Bill and under the arrangements to go into effect when the Bill is passed? The minister may think that we are suspicious and too sceptical because we bring these matters to his attention, but nobody knows better than he does what may happen at any time on the Intercolonial Railway. A foreman in any shop, or the head of any branch, on that railway says to half a dozen of his employees "We do not want you any longer because we have no work for you to do." Accordingly these men are laid aside. However, when men are again wanted for these positions the former employees are not recalled, but other men are sent for, some political friends of that foreman, or some particular friends of the party in power. This is not held to be a dismissal—you cannot ask the railway to keep men in their employ if their services are not required.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I rise to support the demand made by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) that employees of the Government railways should be appointed to the directorate of this board. At the present time a commission appointed by the Government is engaged in an investigation of industrial conditions, interviewing employers of labour and employees in various centres in Canada for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would be possible to give the workingmen a share in the management of private industries in this country. That is a recognition that the principle involved is sound, and such being the case that principle should be embodied in this legislation and the declaration made that employees of the Government railway system ought to be represented on the Board of Directors of that great public enterprise, the Canadian National Railways. The idea of giving labour a share in the management of industries is now pretty well accepted by all the students of industrial conditions in other countries. In England the great labour unions are asking that this progressive step should be made. The Federation of Miners there are asking that the control of the mines should be vested in a council of ten, five of whom would be appointed by the miners and the other five by the Government, and as they are supported by public opinion in England I think they stand a fair chance of obtaining what they demand. In the United States the same idea prevails, and very recently it was supported and recommended by such a conservative body as the American National Catholic War Council, the administrative committee of which is composed of four bishops. Such an advanced paper as The Nation, of New York, speaking on this policy in its issue of March 29th said:

> The bishops have taken a courageous step, possibly one that some day will be designated as the most serviceable that Catholicism has recently ventured in America. The paucity of constructive thinking in these last months has been in keeping with our inveterate opportunism in dealing with the subject of economics. That a quartette of Catholic clergymen should give the country stronger labour doctrine, more intelligibly presented and more persuasive, than the reconstruction committee of the American Federation of Labour, is a clue to the times.

I merely mention this to show that this idea is entertained not only by radicals and socialists but by all students of labour conditions in every country, and I say that in Canada we should keep abreast of the times. I move, in amendment, that the following words be added to the clause:

> At least two of the directors shall be appointed upon the recommendation of the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. FIELDING: What method would my hon. friend suggest by which the employees would make the nominations?

Mr. CAHILL: Through the brotherhoods.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: At the present time I happen to live in a railway centre where all the railway employees are voting for two representatives on the Pensions Board and the Insurance Relief Fund. The employees of the Canadian Government Railways have two representatives on those boards.

Mr. FIELDING: Does that refer to all classes of employees?

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: All classes. The same means can be easily taken to choose representatives of the employees on the Board of Directors of the National Railways.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The suggestion put forward by my hon. friend in his amendment is, I submit, unsound in principle. The same considerations apply to it as were advanced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) with regard to the appointment of returned soldiers to the Board. The Government is responsible to Parliament and to the country for appointments to the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway System. In making these appointments it has all classes of Canadian citizens before it from which to make selections, and it is its duty to make such selection as will give the best results in the administration of the railway system. This question has come up frequently in this House, and the position which I have always taken when the suggestion has been made in connection with Bills which I have had in charge is this: That I would not discriminate against any citizen in making appointments to a commission which is to act for the Government. On the other hand I think it inadvisable in the extreme to embody in legislation a specific provision that the Government shall make an appointment from a certain class of our citizens, or upon the recommendation of a body outside, because, as I have pointed out, the Government is immediately responsible; the responsibility cannot be with those whom my hon. friend would have elect these two representatives on the Board. If we adopted my hon. friend's recommendation, the Government would have to select the parties put forward. At present it is open for the Government to appoint representatives of labour on the board of directors if it regards it as expedient and in the national interest to do so, but that is a different matter from accepting names put forward by an organization outside of the Government, and in no way responsible—not responsible to the public of Canada in the sense that the Government is responsible.

In my view, the amendment of my hon. friend should be negatived. I would point out further, Mr. Chairman, that at present there is a Railway War Board on which all classes of railway employees are represented, and very capably represented.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a temporary board.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a temporary board, but it is probable that it will be continued.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a good board.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a good board, and I have heard no complaints whatever from labour organizations with respect to the administration of the Government Railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: And it is a very satisfactory board to all the railways.

Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. CAHILL: The Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, says that in the selection of directors the Government have in their mind's eye all of the people of Canada, but he forgets that the Government in this case have but one eye and the only people they can see are the supporters of Union Government, as is exemplified in the appointments which have been made. Some hon. members opposite in commending the Government for their excellent selection of directors said that they expected everything would be fine for the Government-owned railways, and that the Government had taken a very wise course. If my recollection is correct, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated that of the directors with railway experience they had appointed Mr. Hanna, Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Wood—three ex-directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. This House and the country were told by the Government that the company had made a failure of the management and operation of the Canadian Northern Railway System, for which reason we should take over their road—and incidentally we paid them some $10,800,000 more than the commissioners said should be paid. These gentlemen are to be the directors, the men who made a failure of the Canadian Northern Railway System—and the Drayton-Acworth report states that the estimate of the probable earnings and requirements of the road were out millions of dollars. These men, by getting into a position to draw their money directly from the public treasury rather than by the indirect route of getting it through Mackenzie & Mann and their friends in the Government have now been transformed into expert railway operators. The hon. minister says that it will not be in the public interest to give any information concerning the operation of this railway; he practically tells us that this is to be an air-tight political machine whereby millions of dollars can be expended through the friends of Mackenzie & Mann interests and this Government—which seem to me to be practically one and the same thing. Hon. members opposite who are blinded by their public ownership enthusiasm are quite willing to let the Government expend millions of dollars in extravagances for the benefit of the Government and themselves, thus incidentally through government management allowing themselves to again get into office at some future time. How can the Government expect to convince any man who is looking for honest information that it is not in the interest of the representatives of the people, who are the real shareholders, that we should know from whom we are buying railroad ties and what price we are paying, and who is doing our contracting on these extensions, and whether it is being done by tender and contract or by a force contract, as the Welland Canal is being done at the present time? If he insists, as he did this evening, that it is not in the public interest that the people who own this railroad and supply the funds should get any information regarding the expenditures, then it must be apparent to hon. gentlemen opposite, even though they will vote with the Government regardless of their own opinions, that this is nothing more nor less than a political machine for the sole purpose of making places for the friends of hon. members opposite, of bolstering up their bad record, and of again getting them into power. I would like to ask the hon. minister if he will tell us in what way it is opposed to the public interest to let the public, who own this road, know who supplies ties and equipment and who does the construction work. My information is that it is being done by the same old gang that has robbed this country for years, and I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. J. D. REID: There certainly is not any intention to keep from this House or from the public any information that should be published, and of course the information has been given to a very large extent in the past and will be given in the future.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not answer that question?

Mr. J. D. REID: But there are certain matters in connection with the operation that you have to keep private.

Mr. CAHILL: Not ties.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will tell the hon. member why it should be kept private. Supposing information is asked as to how much business is done at every station between Ottawa and Toronto by the Canadian Government Railway, and that information is published, any travelling freight agent of the Canadian Public railway at once knows what business we are doing at Cobourg, Port Hope and the other stations.

Mr. ROSS: That is not what is asked.

Mr. J. D. REID: You are placing in the hands of your competitors information that will enable them to interfere with the legitimate business you are doing. That is one case.

Mr. ROSS: That question is not asked The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) asked a specific question. Why is not that answered?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am giving the reason why I say that some kinds of information should not be disclosed. The member for Pontiac says that the Canadian National Railway Board are giving contracts to "the same old gang," Mackenzie & Mann. He is trying to lead the House, and the country to believe that the board are giving contracts to Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, and that these are the owners of the Northern Construction Company. He knows that the Mackenzie & Mann of the Northern Construction Company are not Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann. He knows that the man named Mackenzie in the Northern Construction Company is Alexander Mackenzie, who is not a relative of Sir William Mackenzie. He knows also that the Mr. Mann in that firm is not Sir Donald Mann, but a nephew of Sir Donald Mann. Why, then, is he not honest about it; why does he seek to give the impression that contracts are let by the board of directors to the same old gang, to Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann?

Mr. CAHILL: And their friends.

Mr. J. D. REID: Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann are not interested, directly or indirectly, and never were interested, in the Northern Construction Company; and it is unfair to make the statement that Mackenzie & Mann are the owners of the Northern Construction Company, and thus mislead the public. Surely if these men have a company they have a right to tender as well as any other private individual or corporation. I repeat that the hon. member's statement that the board of directors are letting contracts to the "same old gang," Mackenzie & Mann, is not correct.

Mr. CAHILL: The only applause that the minister gets is from the member for Centre Toronto and some other Ontario members who are not familiar with the Northern Construction Company.

Mr. SHEARD: Where is the member for Centre Toronto? Will the hon. gentleman point him out?

Mr. CAHILL: They wander around so much when the whip cracks that it is impossible for me to tell just where they are. I meant the member for Toronto South (Mr. Sheard) and other members from Ontario. It is well known to all members from Western Canada that the Northern Construction Company practically built all the Canadian Northern railroad, and that the Northern Construction Company is the Mackenzie & Mann crowd. When the minister was asked what price was paid to the Northern Construction Company for ties, he felt the necessity for getting under cover and refused to answer the question. Why should he not give the Committee the information? If there is nothing to hide, why hide anything? The minister admitted that if Mackenzie & Mann had a company they were entitled to contracts. He tells us that the men who are conducting these National Railways are the men who have been with Mackenzie & Mann for twenty odd years. I remember when Mr. Hanna was with the Canadian Northern Railway Company over twenty years ago, when they had less than two hundred miles of railway in Western Canada. You cannot tell me that men who have been connected with these concerns practically ever since their inception are not still friends of Mackenzie & Mann. D.B. Hanna fought public ownership to the last ditch. He fought it while the Board of Arbitration was sitting in Toronto to determine how much was to be paid for this worthless stock. He was fighting public ownership less than two months ago in Hamilton, and he is still fighting it. Mr. Hanna, Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Wood, who are the absolute controllers of the road to-day—with the advice, of course, of Mackenzie & Mann and the Minister of Railways—are practically the same people who have always controlled the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

The minister told us this afternoon that all his appointees—he used the words "my appointees" were men of integrity and honesty. I am not doubting that; but what have they to do with this railway enterprise? Hanna and the executive, the railway men, tell these gentlemen what they are to do, and they sanction it. We are still leaving this whole enterprise in the hands of the Canadian Northern crowd, the same people who have been filching money from this country for years. No hon. gentleman can deny that and substantiate his denial. If these men had been good railway operators before they came into the hands of the Minister of Railways, they should have been able to make the road a profitable enterprise. But they were not able to do so, and we were opposing them and saying that they were not building and operating in a businesslike way. Now we not only take them into our lap, as the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) says, but we are taking also the fellows who promoted the enterprise and who have been tapping the treasury of the country for years; and we are letting contracts to these same people. There is no getting away from that. If it is not a fact, why does the minister not give us the information? When the minister says that Mackenzie's nephew and Mann's uncle, or grandmother or somebody else, owns the stock in this enterprise, that is getting us nowhere. We know that it is the same family arrangement, and we want to know how long this state of affairs is to continue and how much money these people will be satisfied with. It would be better to give them a lump sum, get rid of the whole outfit, lock, stock and barrel, and put somebody in charge of this railway enterprise who will make it a success. If the minister is not willing to tell us who are getting the contracts for the railway construction, from whom the ties and supplies are being bought and what prices are being paid, he must expect opposition from at least some members of the committee, if not from the docile supporters of the Government.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—term of office of directors:

Mr. KEEFER: I think the first line is not very well phrased and I beg to move:

That the words 'from year to year' in line 25 of the Bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "from one annual meeting to another or until their successors are appointed."

One of the first things done at an annual meeting is to appoint the directors, but for some reason or another it frequently happens in the case of companies that the matter may go over for two or three days, and in that case you would be without a board of directors.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the intention? Is it proposed that they shall be appointed annually?

Mr. KEEFER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: I agree that the language is not very well chosen. There is another point. The section provides that the annual meeting shall be held upon the second Thursday in April of each year. Who are the persons who are to attend this annual meeting? We know what an annual meeting of shareholders is, but who are to be summoned to this annual meeting? We already have provision for the meeting of directors; we are told they meet every week. There is another thought. A little further on in the Bill it is provided that wherever there is anything to be done by the shareholders, the Governor in Council shall do it. Therefore, the shareholders and the Governor in Council are one, and this annual meeting would seem to be an annual meeting of the Governor in Council. That is merely a question of drafting to which I would draw the minister's attention. But there is a more serious objection to that clause, I think. Provision is made that in the event of a vacancy occurring the directors are to fill the vacancy. In the discussion this afternoon the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) very properly, as I thought, took the ground that the power of the Governor in Council must be upheld, and Parliament must hold the Governor in Council responsible. But in this clause you are deliberately getting away from the power of the Governor in Council, and proposing that the Board of Directors shall be a self-perpetuating body, because whenever a vacancy occurs the board must nominate the man to fill that vacancy, and the Government will have a veto power. I do not think that is a wise provision. Surely, if the power of the Governor in Council is to be upheld, as we were told this afternoon, whenever a vacancy occurs on the board it should be filled by the Governor in Council, and the Governor in Council should not have to apply to the Board of Directors to ask their permission to fill it either.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will observe that by section 3 that the Governor in Council may declare that the company shall have a capital stock with or without shares as may from time to time be deemed expedient. At the commencement there will be no shareholders of the company, and the annual meeting provided for under section 2, until there is a share capital, would be a meeting only of the directors; but I do not see any objection to that. When a share capital is created the sole shareholder will be the Minister of Finance holding on behalf of His Majesty, and it would be for the Government or the minister, who would naturally have the approval of the Government, to appoint a representative to attend the meeting. The directors will also be shareholders, so that the meeting of shareholders, after the capital stock had been created, if it is created, would consist of the directors and the representative or proxy of the Minister of Finance.

With regard to the filling of any vacancy occurring during the year, the drafting follows the legislation which is usual in Companies' Acts; that is to say, if between annual meetings any vacancy should occur, the vacancy may be filled by the directors, because it is only of a temporary character. The safeguard from the standpoint of the shareholders is the fact that at the next annual meeting they have power over the appointment of the board. My hon. friend points out that the Government is entirely responsible for the appointment, and I quite agree with him in that. He will observe that section 2 provides that upon any vacancy occurring the directors may, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, fill the vacancy by the appointment of a successor. That really gives the Government power to make the appointment. Personally, I see no objection to adopting the suggestion of my hon. friend and having the appointments made to the vacancy directly by the Governor in Council, and therefore I would suggest that the section be amended by striking out, after the word "occurring," the words "the directors may, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council" and substituting therefor the words "the Governor in Council shall."

Mr. FIELDING: I would suggest that unless the Bill is to be disposed of to-night it would be well to reserve this clause so that it may be drafted more carefully in the line of my hon. friend's suggestion. In the case of an ordinary company, a vacancy that occurs during the year can be filled by the board because it is not convenient to call the shareholders together; but as the Governor in Council is the shareholder here, and as the Governor in Council is very much in evidence, the practice of a private company would not seem to be necessary.

Mr. McMASTER: I understood from what the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) said, that his idea was that the directors should be appointed anew every year. If I am right in that idea, and I believe I am, I would point out that the amendment which he has drafted does not to my mind express very clearly the view he entertains. It looks as if the directors continued in office from annual meeting to annual meeting until their successors were appointed or until they were removed for cause. I would suggest that if they are to be appointed anew every year, that should be set forth clearly in the Act.

Mr. KEEFER: Section 2 provides for the annual meeting being held upon the second Thursday in April of each year. One of the first things done at an annual meeting is to appoint directors, but sometimes that is left over for a day or two, and in that case there would be a period during which there would be no board of directors.

Mr. McMASTER: There is no difference of opinion between the hon. member and myself, but I submit that neither the clause nor his amendment makes it clear that every year the Governor in Council must appoint new directors.

Mr. FIELDING: I suggest that after discussion the minister reserve the clause and have it re-drafted in the light of the discussion that has taken place.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think the word "may" in the second sentence is preferable to the word "shall" and is more in keeping with the sentence immediately following.

The CHAIRMAN: I must again remind the committee that we are getting into a tangle discussing two amendments at the same time. I asked the committee, if it is possible, to let the entire clause stand, or dispose of the amendments as presented.

Mr. CAHILL: As this clause will have a bearing on other clauses to follow, is it the intention of the minister to change the present directors?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not considered that matter. I believe that in the near future we will probably be taking over some of the other railways, and of course it will be necessary to make some changes in the directorate.

Mr. CAHILL: How many directors are there?

Mr. J. D. REID: There are now altogether eleven directors.

Section stands.

On section 3—Capital stock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is to be the capital stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: We do not know how much we want. We cannot determine at the present what the capital stock may be.

Mr. JACOBS: I move that the whole clause be struck out.

Mr. FIELDING: What would be the object of having this capital stock?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This clause providing for the company having placed capital stock if the Governor in Council should so declare has been placed in the Bill for the purpose of meeting a situation which might arise. I confess I do not see at the present time any reason for it but at any time a situation might arise which might make it desirable to have capital stock. As all stock is to be owned by the Government and as the company can operate without stock under section 2, I am of the opinion, speaking offhand, that a share capital will not be necessary, and I would suggest to the Minister and to the committee that the section be allowed to stand until to-morrow. I have not been able to give it very much consideration to satisfy myself as to whether it is necessary or not.

Section stands.

On section 4—Head Office:

Mr. JACOBS: I move that the clause be amended to read that the head office of the company shall be in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understood that the position of hon. members opposite was that there should be no politics in this matter.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I support the amendment of my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). The hon. minister says there ought not to be any politics in the matter, but the mere fact that Toronto has been selected for the head office of the Canadian National Railways proves that there is politics in it. You have only to look at the map of the Canadian National Railways to see that Toronto is only on a branch line of the system. Who ever saw a town or a city on the branch line of a railway selected as the headquarters of the railway? Montreal, geographically, nationally, financially and otherwise, ought to be the railway centre of Canada, and the head office ought to be there. As soon as there was a rumour that the head office of the Government Railways might be in Montreal there was a delegation from Toronto. The Toronto Globe and the Toronto Star and all friends of public ownership clamoured that Toronto should be selected as the place of the head office. They are in favour of public ownership and are opposed to politics in the administration of the railway, but they want the head office to be in Toronto. I think the people know that Montreal is naturally the centre of the railway and is best suited for headquarters.

Mr. KEEFER: I think that the proper place for the head office should be about the centre of the road where all three roads concentrate. Therefore I move an amendment to the amendment that Port Arthur be selected as the place of head office.

Mr. JACOBS: My reason for suggesting Montreal as the place of head office is that the head office of Canadian Pacific Railway is there, as is also the head office of the Grand Trunk Railway, which I understand we propose to take over shortly. The Canadian Pacific Railway has achieved some success operating its line from Montreal, and the Grand Trunk, had it not been saddled with the Grand Trunk Pacific incubus, would probably also have been successful. Montreal is headquarters of ocean navigation, and is a live up-to-date city. You cannot expect to run fast trains from a slow town like Toronto, and that is one of my reasons for asking that Montreal be selected as the place of head office. I think the Committee will agree that our directors, no matter how clever and astute they may be, could learn something from the heads of the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. RICHARDSON: If the Government acquires the Grand Trunk, as it probably will, that system will be so vast that it may be necessary to divide the official authority. While Montreal might very well be the financial head office I suggest that, inasmuch as the West has such a large portion of this system, Winnipeg should be the operating headquarters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but if they will study the map they will agree that, inasmuch as the West embraces such a large portion of the system,—

An hon. MEMBER: It is on the main line now.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is on the main line; it is not like Toronto. It is very important that the West should be represented in the operation of this road and it should be represented from some point in the West. I suppose that Winnipeg is the natural point. I do not suggest it because I live in Winnipeg.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Hon. gentlemen may smile, but let them look at the map and study it for themselves. It will be more difficult to operate the road from Montreal than it will be from the centre of the continent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Gaspé would be the ideal spot.

Mr. RICHARDSON: If my hon. friend thinks so, he may move a motion to that effect.

Mr. SHEARD: I just wish to say, as representing Toronto, that when the war was on and there was pressing need of every man, Toronto did not come second to any other place in its energy in meeting the situation. Our friends opposite are very deeply interested in securing places for returned soldiers and in other matters concerning them. If they will come to Toronto they will find more returned soldiers now than in the whole province of Quebec. They will find more wounded men, I venture to say, two to one, in the city of Toronto than in any other place. When it came to patriotic contributions, I think Toronto held its head up pretty well with Montreal. In reference to Red Cross contributions and to all the energies in connection with this great war, which has sustained and maintained the reputation of Canada amongst the nations of the world, Toronto has done its part as well as any other city in the Dominion. If there is to be any advantage in connection with the administration of this great national railway system, I think Toronto will speak for itself in reference to its ability, energy and capacity for great undertakings. I need do no more in defence of the constituency which I represent, than point to the great record which it has made in this titanic struggle.

Mr. FOURNIER: Although living far away from Montreal, I rise to support the amendment of my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and I do so for many reasons. In the first place, Montreal is the business centre of the Dominion. I do not quite share the opinion of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard). You are not going to run railways on the Red Cross system; you are not going to run railways on patriotism; you have to run them on business principles and you have to come to the place where business is done. The head office of the Canadian National Railways is in Toronto at the present time, but the passenger agent, Mr. H. H. Melanson, who was on the Intercolonial, had to have an office in Montreal because Montreal is the centre. It is proposed to choose the location of the head office by Order in Council. We have had enough Orders in Council. Montreal is the business centre; Montreal is the head of navigation, and Montreal is the place for the railway. I want to register my protest against the head office being located in any other city. Toronto is a magnificent city, I have had the honour and pleasure of visiting it, but it never will be a great Canadian national railway centre. You have to come to Montreal.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I desire to second the amendment of my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier.

An hon. MEMBER: Too late; it is seconded.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: It is not because I am representing one of the constituencies in Montreal that I favour the selection of that city. I am not the same as those gentlemen who, when a business question comes up for discussion in this House, raise the question of soldiers, of nationality, of Quebec, or something like that. Economically it is desirable that the headquarters should be located in Montreal. The directors will have to come to Montreal very often in order to deal with the matters of business which are centred there. If the head office is located in Montreal their travelling expenses will be saved. Everything comes to Montreal in the way of business, and the directors will of necessity have to come. We see big magnates travelling to Montreal in private cars. Gentlemen, save that expense as far as possible and adopt Montreal.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Is Montreal not satisfied with conditions as they are? She has got the Canadian Pacific head office, the Grand Trunk head office, and now she wants to play the hog and get the Canadian National. Surely she ought to be satisfied when she has the big end of it, or two out of three. But she is still grumbling. Industrially, commercially, from the standpoint of shipping, the amount of wealth, energy, ability and also from the standpoint of being near the centre, Toronto is the proper situation for the head offices of this railway system. Toronto is some hundreds of miles nearer the centre of the Dominion than Montreal and it is the natural location for a great enterprise. Toronto is the city of the Dominion, and will be in the near future the largest city in the country. We are preparing there for overseas shipping of which Toronto will be the headquarters. We are spending $25,000,000 to give accommodation to those liners that will run from Toronto through the Welland canal to the head of the lakes and to my hon. friend's destination where he would like to have the Canadian National centred. We have a larger amount of stock carried in the wholesale houses of Toronto than in any other place in the Dominion and from the standpoint of shipping, finance, business and everything necessary to build up a great institution, Toronto is the natural place. You must concede that. I have heard no argument in support of the claim that the head office should go to Montreal. There is no better place for it than Toronto. We will have the Grand Trunk before you know where you are, and then you will have something to murmur about.

Mr. POWER: Without wishing to detain the House for any great length of time on this subject, it seems to me that the city through which all these roads pass should have the head office. Toronto, I am credibly informed, is only on a branch line. Montreal has the Intercolonial, and the Canadian Northern. Winnipeg, I understand, has the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Intercolonial; but Quebec has all the systems.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: It has branch lines.

Mr. POWER: So there is a strong reason in favour of locating the head office in Quebec, and I submit it very humbly to the consideration of the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the Committee ready for the question?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to say a word at this juncture. I do not for a moment understand that the member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) was serious in moving a sub-amendment. I do not think it is fair that the House should be asked to designate any one place in Canada in which to locate the head office of the National System of Railways. I think both amendments should be withdrawn. I believe that the proposer of the first amendment submitted it with the intention of enlivening the proceedings of the House for a few moments—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: —and I anticipated that he would eventually withdraw his proposition. This company should have the same right that every other company has of selecting the place for its head office. The head office of the company can be fixed by it at any time.

Mr. BUREAU: By the Board of Directors?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By the Board of Directors. I submit, Parliament has no right to be called upon to fix the place for the head office of this company.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no special advantage in having the head office in Toronto or Montreal. Very good reasons might be advanced why it should not be at either place. It might very likely happen, and perhaps will happen some time, that the head office will not be in either city, but that would not diminish in any degree whatever the amount of business that might possibly go to either by reason of the operations of this railway system. I would think that both Montreal and Toronto are very well represented on the board, and they should be satisfied with the advantage that comes to these two great metropolitan centres by reason of that representation. I submit that both amendments should be withdrawn and that the committee should not be asked to designate in this Bill where the head office of the company is to be.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Withdraw the amendments and select Toronto.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The selection may well be left to the directors of the company.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the hon. gentleman give some reasons why the head office should not be fixed in the Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It provokes debate, it is purposeless, and serves no good end.

Mr. BUREAU: It is always done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the head office of the company were located in Montreal it does not necessarily mean that more traffic will flow through that city by reason of the fact. The head office of a company is very frequently in a place far removed from the company's operations and activities.

Mr. BUREAU: Who decides about the head office?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might as well be Three Rivers as Montreal.

Mr. BUREAU: We don't want it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think both amendments should be withdrawn. If not, they should be defeated by the committee.

Mr. KEEFER: I wish to withdraw my amendment. I did submit it jocularly, thinking I would say a word for my own city, of which I am very proud.

Amendment to the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. TOBIN: Section 4 of the Bill provides that the head office of the company shall be in such place in Canada as the Governor in Council may from time to time determine. So it is the Governor in Council and not the Board of Directors which is to determine where the head office is to be.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the Government is to determine the location of the head office that is better still.

Mr. TOBIN: But the minister stated that the Board of Directors were to make the selection. If it is left to the Board of Directors it will be quite satisfactory.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no objection to a vote being taken on the amendment, but I would submit that as the designation of any place is likely to be regarded unfavourably by the Committee, those hon. gentlemen who are urging that a selection should be made here are not doing their favourite town a service by pressing for a vote. It seems to me that the head office from time to time might, as stipulated in the Bill, be determined by the Governor in Council—that is to say, by the Government which is responsible to Parliament. If the Government at any time takes action that is contrary to the will of Parliament, Parliament has its own means of dealing with the situation. However, I have no objection to the vote being taken.

Mr. BUREAU: According to the model Bill which has to be followed whenever application is made to Parliament for the incorporation of a railway, the location of the head office of the company must be mentioned, and therefore I do not see why we cannot fix the head office of this company in the present Bill. Make it Toronto, Moncton, or Winnipeg, or any other city. These proceedings must take place in accordance with the General Railway Act, and the directors may change the location by notifying the Railway Commissioners. I do not see why an exception should be made in this case and the location be left to the Governor in Council. If the directors see fit to change the location afterwards let them do so, but by all means follow the procedure that is authoritatively laid down. It looks as if the Acting Prime Minister feared that if a vote now took place it might displease some of the constituents of members who represent an important centre. It would seem as though the Government was afraid that if the location of the head office was fixed in this Bill it would arouse some criticism. If we are going to try and bring the Canadian Railway System as much as possible into harmony with the privately-owned railways, why not follow the procedure laid down in the model Railway Bill? Let the Government take a stand and we will share the responsibility with them. Let them select Toronto, Winnipeg, or any other place they choose.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it customary for Acts of Parliament incorporating railways to contain the location of the head office?

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I doubt it very much.

Mr. BUREAU: It certainly is the custom.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may be done some times, but not always.

Mr. BUREAU: The procedure is set forth in the model Railway Bill, and you will be asked to mention where the head office is to be if you apply for a charter of incorporation for a railway company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is it not the incorporators who have to insert in the Bill the name of the city in which they desire to have the head office of the railway company?

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then this case is precisely analogous; the only shareholder of the company is the Dominion Government.

Mr BUREAU: Oh no, it is the people of Canada as represented by Parliament.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Dominion Government is the shareholder in this case.

Mr. BUREAU: In trust for His Majesty.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend, if I may say so, is confusing the Government and Parliament. They are two distinct entities. The Government has its responsibility and its duties, and Parliament has its responsibility and its duties. But in this case the analogy is absolutely complete—the Government of Canada is the sole shareholder. The Government comes down to the House with a Bill and asks Parliament to support it. Either the head office is designated and the Government will carry its point on a majority vote in the House, or, as in this case, it leaves the matter open. I submit that it should be left open for the reason that the Government railway situation is a changeable one.

Prior to 1917 we had the Intercolonial, and also the Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg; then we acquired the Canadian Northern Railway System with its head office in Toronto; now we have the Grand Trunk Pacific in receivership, and negotiations are proceeding with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The situation is a changeable one, and that to my mind is a strong reason why this section should be left precisely as it is. The situation may change further in the future, although no one can foresee what will occur. The principle of responsibility is here. If the Government desire to name the city where the head office should be located it would come down to the House and ask Parliament to support it. If Parliament declined to support it, the constitutional position would be as my hon. friend knows. On the other hand, the Government comes down with a Bill in which it provides that the Governor in Council may from time to time name the place of the head office of the company. If the Government names a place that Parliament disapproves of, Parliament of course has its remedy; but I submit that the responsibility must be with the Government and the place should be such as the Governor in Council designates from time to time.

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot share that view If the place named in the Bill were determined forever as the head office of the company, the Acting Prime Minister's argument would be valid, and I could not object to it; but you have under the Railway Act the right, not in the Governor in Council but in the directors,—and I think rightly so—to change the head office at any time, provided they notify the Railway Board and advertise in the Canada Gazette. But in every Bill that has come before the House so far, and in the standard Bill, the place is designated. I do not see why the Governor in Council should take away from the directors the power which is given to them by the Railway Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong in his recollection. The Railway Act does not provide that the directors may change the head office as fixed by Parliament. What the hon. member is thinking of is the Companies Act, which I understand does so provide.

Mr. BUREAU: I may be mistaken, but I think not. I will verify it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems very clear that if in this Act Parliament were to fix the place the directors could not thereafter change it. In this Act Parliament empowers the Governor in Council from time to time to fix the place, and that place being fixed the directors could not change it. That is the way I think it should be.

Mr. FIELDING: If the Bill proposed that the head office should be in Toronto, and the amendment said Montreal, we would have rather an embarrassing situation. I think in that case I might have a "slight inclination towards Biddy"—Biddy being Montreal—but I think the principle that the Governor in Council shall have power to determine the head office is fair and reasonable. I may say to my hon. friend that this Government is not going to be in power for ever, and if it does not determine that question wisely, another Government may want to make a change. Geographically the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) has the best argument, because a glance at the map will show that in regard to the extent of the territory that this system covers Winnipeg is the more central place. I think the determination ought not to be made definitely now, and while I have a preference, I think, for Montreal, I am of opinion that the argument for leaving the matter to the determination of the Governor in Council is a fair and reasonable one.

Mr. LEGER: In order to settle the matter between Montreal and Toronto, I would suggest to the committee that the place for the head office be Moncton in the province of New Brunswick. As a matter of fact the head office was settled down there half a century ago when the Intercolonial was built, and I think the office should not be moved so far away as Toronto or Montreal. It seems to me that it is interfering with the selection made at the time of Confederation, and in order to settle the great trouble between Montreal and Toronto it seems to me that the very central railway city of Moncton should not be neglected. The most important officers should certainly not have been taken away to Toronto. It is true that the railway situation is different entirely from what it was at the time the Intercolonial was built, but I think it could be arranged to leave the great bulk of the old Intercolonial staff in the city of Moncton where the railway offices were originated half a century ago.

Mr. BUREAU: Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to lay my hand on the Railway Act, but I take the new Consolidated Railway Bill, section 73:

The head office of the company shall be in the place designated in the Special Act, but the company may, by by-law, from time to time, change the location of its head office to any place in Canada: Provided that notice of any such change shall be given to the secretary of the board.

Mr. J. D. REID: You are reading from the new Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I am. It is the same thing in the old Act; that has not been changed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The section which my hon. friend has just read is analogous to the section we are considering. If a railway company is incorporated by statute, the statute might very properly designate——

Mr. BUREAU: It always does.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: ——the head office; but it also gives the directors or shareholders power to change that head office from time to time, which is practically what this Bill asks.

Mr. BUREAU: It is quite the contrary. You say in the first clause that you incorporate this company; and those directors whom you appoint are the company, are they not? The object is to form a company to operate the railway. They are the people who have the right to change the head office, even taking my hon. friend's argument. The company is not the Governor in Council, the company is the body that is going to be formed by this Bill we now have under consideration. Therefore, they have power to change the head office any time they please.

Amendment (Mr. Jacobs) negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: Does clause 4 carry?

Mr. BUREAU: Before that is passed I would ask permission to read the Railway Act as it is now. I do not want to be taken as incorrect.

The head office of the company shall be in the place designated in the Special Act, but the company may, by by-law, from time to time, change the location of its head office to any place in Canada: Provided that notice of any such change shall be given to the secretary of the board.

Absolutely the same.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who is the company in this case? Is it the Governor in Council, or the directors?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 1 says:

The Governor in Council may nominate such persons as may be deemed expedient, not less than five, nor more than fifteen, to be directors of the company hereby incorporated, and upon such nomination being made the persons so nominated, and their successors, and such other persons as may from time to time be nominated by the Governor in Council as directors, shall be and are hereby incorporated as a company.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—payment of directors:

Mr. FIELDING: The directors may be paid by the company, but the directors are the company. It is like saying that the directors may be paid by themselves. I do not think it is good drafting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is the only way it could be drafted. The company pays the money, but the directors, in deciding what they as a company pay themselves, are subject to the supervisory power of the Governor in Council.

Mr. KEEFER: I suggest that the clause read: "May be paid from the funds of the company such sums," and so on.

Mr. McMASTER: If the company has the financial career which attended the Canadian Northern and Intercolonial, there may be no funds to apply to the salaries of the directors; therefore the suggestion of the member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) may be a dangerous one.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any particular objection to stating in the Bill the amount to be paid to the directors or to the president? We do it in the case of the Railway Commission, the Civil Service Commission and the Superior Court and other judges who are paid by the Dominion Government. Why should the amount to be paid to the president be determined by the Governor in Council instead of by Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The number of the directors runs between five and fifteen, for the reasons clearly stated by the Minister of Railways and the Acting Prime Minister. The number will depend not only upon the composition of the system, but also upon what is found most convenient in the management of the road. The amount to be paid will necessarily depend, in some degree, at least, upon who constitute the directorate. Furthermore, the number of officers appointed will also be governed by that as a very important factor. The vice-presidents are themselves officers of the company and will be paid as such. It would seem to me that we cannot possibly fix the salaries to be paid to the directors until we know what, in point of numbers, shall be the constitution of the directorate.

Mr. BUREAU: Can we not fix the salary of the president of the Board of Directors? I do not see why he should be paid more if there are eight or nine directors than he would if there are six or seven. If these men are to make a success of the operation of the railways they will have to devote their whole time to the work; therefore their salaries ought to be determined by Parliament.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be an unusual procedure to state in a statute what should be the salary of a president. It might be possible to fix the salary to be paid to the present president, but if he resigned to-morrow it might be impossible to get another man to fill the position at that salary, in which case the statute would bar the appointment of a president. There should be some flexibility both as to the number of directors and as to the remuneration. In a year's time, after some experience in operating the National Railways by a board, it may be found wise to reduce the number of the directors to three; and this suppositious board of three might be required to be technical men, in which event they would be paid very substantial salaries. I think, therefore, that the suggestion to leave the section in its present form is fair and that the committee should approve of it. It is not desirable that the statute fix definitely the number of directors, although perhaps that is not so objectionable; but it would be unfortunate if the statute fixed the remuneration of the directors. I do not think that the remuneration of directors is ever fixed by the constitution of a company—and this is the constitution of a company. The remuneration of officers is always a matter of by-law or resolution.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I do not agree with the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau); I think that no amount ought to be fixed as the remuneration of the directors, especially of the president. We have seen an example of this during the course of the present year in connection with public ownership. Mr. McAdoo, the former Director of Railways in the United States, left the service of the country to enter the service of Mary Pickford and Charlie Chaplin because these movie stars were offering to him higher salaries than were being paid by the United States of America. We ought not to place ourselves in such a position as to be unable to compete with any private concern if we have a good man and wish to retain him at the head of our railways.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I do not agree with my hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe). The gentleman he mentions was receiving $10,000, and I suppose he was replaced by a good man at the same price. It is currently known that railway companies pay their presidents and directors fabulous sums. Everybody knows that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company gets $70,000 a year, and that the directors get proportionately large amounts. If the salaries of the president and directors of the Canadian National Railway Board are not fixed in this Act, is there not the danger that the Cabinet may pay them extraordinarily large amounts? I suggest that minimum and maximum amounts be stated so that excessive sums may not be paid to any one, no matter how good he is. This is particularly necessary because in the first section we do not say that these men shall give all their time to the work. They may continue to practice law, to carry on the work of a contractor, or to do anything they like, and still get the salary allotted to them by the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to be understood as criticising, I simply want to know what special reasons there are for not mentioning the salaries of the president and directors of this railway company. The salaries of all the other officials of the Government—of the Railway Commission and the Civil Service Commission, for instance—are known, but no reason has been given for withholding the information as to the salaries of the officials of this road.

Mr. CAHILL: What are we paying the directors who are now operating?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think it is $2,000 per annum. The information was given the other day.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the president of the road getting?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not say what his salary is as president and general manager. As a director he receives $2,000 per annum.

Mr. BUREAU: How much as manager?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know.

Mr. CAHILL: Surely the Minister of Railways and the Government must know what they are paying the manager. It is inconceivable that our money is being paid out through the Minister of Railways without him knowing the amount. He must surely be in a position to answer that question if he wants to.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said that as director he got a salary of $2,000 per annum. Before being promoted to the position of president, he was vice-president. I will inquire what his salary is as general manager.

Mr. COPP: Who provides the salaries for the present board of directors?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. COPP: Do these directors fix their own salaries?

Mr. J. D. REID: The salaries of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway have been fixed at $2,000, by by-law, for several years I believe.

Mr. COPP: The present board has not been there for several years.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said that the salaries of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway have been $2,000 per annum for several years, and the present board of directors, when they took office, simply continued at the same salary.

Mr. McMASTER: I understand that a certain Mr. Hanna is the gentleman in charge of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, whose stock the Government of this country, representing the people, acquired about a year ago at an expense of something over $10,000,000. We have present in the House the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen), the Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), the minister from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who is minister of so many departments I cannot remember them all, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn), the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell), and under-secretaries too numerous to mention. Do I understand that not one of these gentlemen is able to tell the representatives of the people how much public money is given to Mr. Hanna per annum for administering the affairs of this road, which belongs to us, the people of Canada? What is the aggregate amount of money paid to Mr. Hanna? Surely that is within the knowledge of the various heads of departments that we, with so much pleasure, see before us this evening.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: While it may seem strange that the Minister of Railways might not know the salary received by the general manager, I submit that that remark cannot apply to other ministers, and it is quite understandable to me that the Minister of Railways himself might not know the salary with such exactness that he would care to answer the question at the moment. I assume that the general manager is paid a very substantial salary; I hope he is. We are, however, dealing now with the allowances made to the directors, and the Minister of Railways has said that they receive $2,000 a year. I assume that they are paid this amount simply in pursuance of the precedent established some few years ago when the Government nominated directors at the time we obtained control of forty per cent of the Canadian Northern Railway stock. My own recollection is that the allowance made to the directors appointed by the Government was $2,000, and that salary has no doubt been continued. I understand it was intended to cover merely the out-of-pocket expenses of the directors in attending the meetings, or, perhaps, a little more than that. I am sure my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) will be able to get precise information on the point tomorrow.

Mr. McMASTER: I may be quite wrong, but I believe that if the Minister of Railways applied to the gentleman sitting upon his left hand he could get the information immediately and give it to the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was going on to remark that the fact of ministers not knowing the salary of the general manager is pretty good evidence that there is no politics in the administration of the road.

Mr. McMASTER: Interference is one thing, and an entire lack of information is another. I really think that the Minister of Railways knows what the general manager of this great system belonging to the people gets a year. If he does not know, it would not become me to characterize such want of information on the part of a gentleman administering one of the most important departments of the Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not want to make a statement until I am sure of the facts. I have already promised to get the information. The gentleman sitting on my left has not the information. If he had, I should be very glad to give it.

Mr. BUREAU: Parliament is entitled to certain consideration on the part of the Government and the ministers. The Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon that the object in forming this company was to make a success of the operation of these Canadian railways, and that to make a success of them, it was necessary to get the best men. Would any man of ordinary intelligence believe that these directors would give their best ability to the road for $2,000 a year, when the draymen of Montreal are striking to-day for $1,560 a year? To tell the House that shows no respect for Parliament or for the men who inquired what the salary was. We want to get at the bottom of this thing. Either the directors occupy other positions in the company and are paid for those positions, or they do not. If they are receiving only $2,000 a year as directors, you cannot expect them to give the best of their ability or much of their time to the railway company for the good of the country.

If they occupy any other positions, such as general manager, or vice president, or secretary, or under-secretary, and get additional salaries, we should be so informed. We want to know what these men who are going to act as directors are being paid for their services to the country. If we are going to go begging for men to work gratuitously, you will not get the best results. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has just said that $2,000 is practically pin-money to pay their expenses travelling back and forth. That means that they are giving their services gratis. No man will leave his business and work for the Government for $2,000 as a director, and if that is the class of men that it is intended to appoint it is high time Parliament took the matter into its hands. I do not care how much you pay a man provided his services are profitable. When I hire an employee I pay him a salary based on the degree of his usefulness to me in my office, and the same principle ought to apply in connection with the railway. To give us the bare answer that the directors are getting $2,000 is not fair, and is tantamount to saying, "You have been our laughing-stock; we have been just jollying you around and are still going to make you believe that we are going to get the best genius and ability in the country to manage the railroad."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The directors are getting $2,000, and some in executive capacities may be getting additional salaries.

Mr. BUREAU: That is what we want to know. Are they simply directors or do they occupy other positions to which salaries are attached?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suggestion that we are flouting Parliament by telling the truth is indeed a new one.

Mr. BUREAU: Telling the truth partly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the directors are actually getting is $2,000 a year. There are two directors who also occupy other positions for which they receive salaries—Mr. Hanna, president of the road, and Mr. Mitchell, financial controller. As such they receive salaries voted by the directors, just the same as the management of any other company votes its money. There is no question that Parliament is entitled to know what the general manager gets, and Parliament will know. But Parliament is just as much interested financially in what the engineers on the road get as in the salaries of the general manager or the financial controller. In fact, five cents an hour in the payment of the engineers would amount to more in all probability, many times more in actual outlay, than the cost of the general manager. We do not happen to know the exact figure, although I can assure the Committee that it is a fraction of the figure that is given as being paid the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But I do not think that Parliament need necessarily know that in order to vote Clause 5, because that simply puts it in our power to pay to the directors such sums as may be deemed expedient. The principle we have gone on in the past is this: We have not asked the directors as such to give their full time to the road. They give a proportion of their time analagous to that which the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway give to that company. I do not know what the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway get, but usually directors of a large company receive something in the neighbourhood of $20 a meeting. If that is what the Canadian Pacific Company allow it would practically amount to $2,000 a year, as we are allowing in this case. In the future it will not be deemed wise to ask from the directors only a portion of their time, and if the number is smaller and we ask them to give more of their time, they will have to be paid more than $2,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Listening to the discussion during the last ten minutes, it has struck me that we are an easily deluded crowd both in this House and in the country generally. We are foolish enough to think that the business of the country is conducted in a sane, considerate, careful manner by the Government. I was thinking when the railways were taken over—and I am sure hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side thought the same—that the Minister of Railways would call into his office the heads of the different departments of these railways, particularly the management, and that he would say to them: "You have been in the service of the Canadian Northern for the last twenty years—or whatever it may be—and you must understand that you are no longer in the service of that company, but are in the employment of the Government. We want your full time and want to know what your salary is; and we want you to know what is expected of you by the Government. Further, we want to know the members of your staff, what they are getting and what salaries they are willing to work for." That would be something like business. But we have here to-night a sad spectacle displayed by this learned and able Government, who, in the management of this great enterprise on which they pride themselves as handling in so magnificent a manner, are unable to give an answer to a simple question that is asked incidentally. They are asked what is the salary of the chief man in the management of the road, and there is absolute silence from Dan to Beersheba. I am sorry for the hon. gentlemen who sit around the Government—I am not sorry for the Government because they could have put themselves right—for these hon. gentlemen must feel sadly humiliated by the ignorance displayed by the Government in so important a matter. Perhaps the Minister of Railways will put the question in the same category as the railway ties, and suggest that it is not in the public interest that we should know the facts. But it will never kill the public to be aware of all that this aggregation knows. What would be thought of the secretary in the most backward rural school section in any province who, if he were asked at the annual meeting how much the teachers were being paid, should say he did not know? Why, he would be told, "You are a very stupid owl, and have no right to be in the position you hold." Now, we have a great Government appointed by a big majority and consisting of a combination of the talents of two parties, and yet to-night they are absolutely unable to tell us anything at all about the working of this system as regards the most important feature of the whole thing, the services of their chief men and the salaries that are paid them. I think it is time that the people should know really what is going on, or at least, that there is nothing going on, so far as the proper management of this government-owned railway is concerned. We should hesitate before passing any further clauses of this Bill in view of what we have learned of the knowledge, the calibre and the degree of information possessed by the hon. gentlemen who propose to operate under this Bill.

On section 6—no personal responsibility of directors:

Mr. J. D. REID: I would ask that section 6 stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 6 stands.

On section 7—first meeting:

Mr. FIELDING: I venture to suggest that the members of this House and the people have a right to know the salary of every official who is paid out of the public treasury of Canada, and if the minister is not able to give us the salary that Mr. Hanna is getting, I say that we ought not to proceed further with this Bill until we get that information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) that in connection with the Government railway system information as to the salary of any officer or director should be brought down to the House, by reason of the fact that the Government is the corporation and the sole shareholder of the Canadian National Railway system. There is no doubt in my mind as to the correctness of that position. But when information is asked for it is desirable that it should be given accurately. I have no doubt whatever that the Minister of Railways has in his mind approximately what the president of the Canadian National Railway system has been receiving. I have that information myself; but if the question is asked me positively, what is the precise sum—then I desire to obtain the information in order that I may give it accurately to the House. It does not occur to me, in view of the fact that the Minister of Railways has stated that he will obtain the information and give it, that the position which is taken is in any way improper or lacking in respect for the House. As he has undertaken to get the information, it would occur to me that the Committee might very well proceed with the other sections in order that we may make progress with this legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is eleven o'clock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, that is another reason.

Mr. J. D. REID: I might say to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that a question was asked the other day about a number of officials. I brought down the information and the question was answered. It is as the Minister of Finance has stated; I would not like, offhand, to state the salaries of officials with-11 p.m. out looking them up and being quite sure I was accurate. That is the only reason why I have asked the committee to let matters stand until to-morrow. When the Bill is again before the House I will have the information.

Mr. PEDLOW: I heartily endorse the statement made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr.Fielding). It is really a most intolerable situation when the minister who is responsible to this House and the country cannot give approximate information on an important subject of this kind. Surely he can give us the basis on which the salaries are paid if they are paid on a sliding scale or percentage. If he cannot give us the exact figure, and if the salary is on a percentage or commission basis, surely we should at least receive that information to-night. It is a most astonishing situation that the minister is not able to give the House even approximate information on this subject.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the minister is willing to allow the matter to stand to-night and adjourn.

Mr. J. D. REID: No; I said I could not see any reason why we could not proceed with the Bill as I had promised to get this information and have it for to-morrow.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the minister will be well advised and that he will get along just as rapidly if he does not insist on further progress to-night. It is eleven o'clock now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have sent out, and if hon. gentlemen will be patient we will have this very valuable information in a moment or two.

Mr. McKENZIE: We never broke the agreement we made early in the session that eleven o'clock is a reasonable hour to adjourn.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend puts it on the ground that this is a reasonable hour to adjourn that is one thing, but if he puts it on the ground that the information asked for is not immediately forthcoming, it is another thing. I am entirely agreeable to adjournment on the ground that the hour is late, but not on the ground that information which is to be brought down is not immediately forthcoming.

Mr. McKENZIE: Whichever ground is the more agreeable to my hon. friend's sensibilities will be acceptable to us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked that telephonic communication be had with a member of the directorate who is in town, and the information that he gives is that the present salary is $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester) (translation): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding any further with this Bill, I should like to get some information form the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) about clause 7. Prior to my being returned to the House of Commons, Mr. Chairman, I had enjoyed the privilege of sitting in the Quebec legislature, where for four years I represented the very same constituency the views of which I have the honour of voicing and upholding on the floor of this House. In the Quebec Legislature I evidently had a favorable opportunity for making myself familiar with the procedure which is in force in the committees of that legislature and with the way in which the members of the provincial Government dealt with the people's representatives, whenever a public bill came up before the House. And although I sat there for several years, I must admit in all candour—and I do so without fear of contradiction from the hon. Minister of Railways—that never did I attend and I do not believe any member of this House either on this side or on the other side, ever witnessed such a sorry spectacle, such a painful sight, such a baffling spectacle as the one offered by this Government to-night. Here we have this Government drawn from the most brillant talents of both political parties throughout the country, the gifted men whom Mackenzie and Mann, after touring the provinces, could pick up and whom they intrusted with the several portfolios and Departments of the Canadian Administration. These are the men who are called upon to grapple with one of the most important problems, a reconstruction problem which has to be solved and cannont be shelved, I mean the railway problem. A Bill is brought down. We debated it this afternoon, we have discussed it to-night, and when we demand information, when we ask the Minister of Railways to bring down and communicate to the House such data as we are entitled to, he evades answering our questions, or replies that he knows nothing about the matter.

Mr. Chairman, I want to declare this, I want to tell the members of the Government, I want particularly to tell the Acting Minister of Justice that we are sitting here as the representatives of the people, that we have been sent here to protect the most sacred interests of the Canadian people, and so long as I am able to lift my voice here, so long as I have any strength and vigour left in me, never shall I allow such a Bill to pass, without the representatives of the people being given the most elementary information with regard to this legislation. We have had enough legislation in this country which was carried by snap votes, we have had enough legislation which the representatives of the people were forced to pass under the pressure of a so-called war emergency. Those days are over. We have come back to the days when the Constitution and Parliamentary traditions in this country have to be respected, and if the Government wants to govern, the Minister of Railways ought to remember that he must govern according to Parliamentary procedure and not otherwise. Let him come before the House, supported by the acting Minister of Justice or by the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, let him come down here, supported by the Acting Minister of Justice or Maclean), let him come down here even with the support of the whole Cabinet, and I tell him, that never shall he succeed in having a Bill like this enacted and crystallised into law, unless he does us at least the elementary favour of acquainting us with the subject of his words.

Mr. CAHILL: There is no provision in the Bill as to where the directors are to meet, or who shall call the meeting. Section 7 is certainly a most unusual one; it provides:—

> The first directors may after appointment hold a meeting at such time and place as they think proper, for the purpose of passing by-laws and organizing the company.

It is most extraordinary that the so-called first directors are to hold a meeting, but there is no place mentioned for that meeting and no person designated to call it. I cannot understand how the company can hope to do business properly if they are going to act in this half-hearted way.

Mr. J. D. REID: The company is not organized yet, and it has no secretary. The directors will meet and organize and appoint a secretary.

Mr. McMASTER: May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that some one will have to take the lead in the matter, some one will have to call the directors together. They will not all be together in one place and all be moved by the spirit to get together to pass by-laws and do other things. It seems to me that the point of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) is well taken. There should be some one designated to perform this very necessary duty. The Government might give the first director named the power of calling a meeting, or, perhaps, the not unusual method of passing an Order in Council might be adopted. By Order in Council it might be provided that the first meeting might be held at a certain time and at a certain place.

Mr. J. D. REID: The directors are to be appointed by Order in Council. When such appointment is made they would be notified and the notice sent them could state that they might meet at a certain place at a certain time and organize.

Mr. McMASTER: That would be a proper method, but that is not the method that is contemplated by Clause 7. That clause merely says that the first directors may, after appointment, hold the meeting at such time and place as they think proper. If the minister would insert that the directors should meet " as they may be directed by Order in Council to do," or something of that sort, it would make the clause workable. As drafted it is not workable.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why?

Mr. McMASTER: I will do my best to answer the hon. gentleman. The clause reads as follows:—

> The first directors may after appointment hold a meeting at such time and place as they think proper, for the purpose of passing by-laws, and organizing the company.

Now, when and where are they to get together? It is quite clear that some procedure must be outlined. The Government must summon the meeting by Order in Council, or the directors may meet on the call of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a secretary of the company.

Mr. McMASTER: How will the secretary know when to call a meeting? The secretary does not call a meeting of his own motion, he does it on instructions from the president or the board. The point is, there is no procedure in this clause indicating how the first meeting is to be called.

Mr. TOBIN: What secretary does the minister refer to who would call this meeting together?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might be the secretary of the company.

Mr. TOBIN: The secretary of what company?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My recollection of most companies incorporated under Acts which correspond to the English Companies Act is, that the first meeting is called by the provisional directors, and they can meet anywhere they like.

Mr. CAHILL: Who are the provisional directors?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The directors who are subscribers to the memorandum of association in the first place.

Mr. CAHILL: There is nothing of that kind mentioned in this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Still it is an analogous case. The subscribers to the memorandum of association are the first directors, absolutely so if they state that in the articles of association. Very well, the provisional directors call the first meeting in any way they see fit.

Mr. TOBIN: Which provisional directors?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) suggested that the name of the place of meeting should be designated in the Bill. That is hardly a fair objection because the provisional directors—or the first directors, which means practically the same thing—should not be required to have their meeting at one particular place because it may not be convenient to have the meeting in one place more than another. The directors may not themselves at the time have received their charter. There is no purpose therefore, as far as I can see, in designating the place of the first meeting. In any event, the objection is very technical.

Mr. POWER: How should the first meeting of the directors of this company have been organized if this omission in the clause had not been pointed out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They would proceed under this Bill precisely in the same way as they do under the Railway Act. Even without the direction which is contained here the provisional directors mentioned in the Railway Act get together.

Mr. POWER: There are none in this case.

Mr. McMASTER: I draw the minister's attention to the fact that there are no provisional directors mentioned in the Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The directors mentioned by the Government are analogous to the provisional directors. The Governor in Council nominates directors and these directors get together at such time and place as they deem proper, and the business of the company commences. I am quite satisfied that the hon. gentlemen are not over-earnest in putting forward this objection.

Mr. McMASTER: We are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad to have the assurance of my hon. friend, but I had a higher regard for his knowledge of company law. Provisional directors, without any such provision at all, have been able under the Companies Act and the Railway Act to organize a company and commence its business. Here we have directors appointed by the Governor in Council. Even without this section they would get together for the very purpose mentioned. But to make it quite explicit there is this provision, that they shall get together at such time as they deem proper and commence the operations of the company. According to the view put forward by the hon. gentleman there would be an absolute dead centre, so to speak, no action could be taken; although the Government had appointed the directors and this provision is in the Act, still the company would remain without organization and business could not commence. I submit that that is an untenable position.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I would like to know that the word "may" in this section means. Does not the hon. minister think the word "should" is more appropriate. I would suggest also that you put "after fifteen days of their appointment" or "after thirty days of their appointment." It seems to me you should provide that a certain number of days after their appointment they "shall" do this, instead of "may."

Mr. KEEFER: It seems to me that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is thinking of shareholders and so confusing himself.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. KEEFER: The shareholders appoint their directors, then the directors meet at any time they see fit and pass by-laws, and thereafter they are governed by their by-laws. This is the same position exactly. The Government appoint a board of directors just as shareholders would do, and then it is the duty of those directors to meet, which they do whenever convenient, usually immediately after appointment. I do not see what difficulty the hon. member is labouring under.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I want to know, Mr. Chairman, what would happen in that case with the word "may" there instead of "shall."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: "May" is the same as "shall."

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: They may not take any action. What would you do then?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I assume that my hon. friend is earnest in his desire for information, and as far as I can I am very glad to impart it to him. The duty is upon the directors of getting together and organizing. The word "may" is properly used in legislation of this kind, and really has the mandatory force of "shall." That is a well known principle of construction.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Before poceeding any further, may I suggest that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) should answer the question asked by my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). He is certainly entitled to the information, and it ought to be given to him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I intended answering my hon. friend from Dorchester, Mr. Chairman, but I was prevented by somebody on the other side of the House getting the floor ahead of me. I wish to say that I dissent entirely from the remarks of the hon. member for Dorchester and I do not recollect one single particular in which I agree with him. I can very strongly commend to the Committee the adoption of this section, and after that I think we might very well rise feeling we have done a very good day's work. I cannot see any purpose in phrasing this section in any other way. As the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) has well stated, in a company where there are shareholders it is perhaps necessary for their protection that the first meeting of the directors be made public, that is, that the shareholders should know the time and place, and therefore that machinery should be set up in order to protect the rights of the shareholders; but here the first directors are nominated by the Government, they are the shareholders as well as the directors, and I do think that hon. gentlemen opposite are rather too critical of this section. I submit, with all due deference to them, that no purpose could be served by enacting the clause in any other form.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Halifax, the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, must expect difficulties in connection with this Bill. It is a thing he can fall down and worship, because there is nothing like it in the heavens above or in the earth below, or in the waters under the earth. My hon. friend never saw any body consisting solely of directors, with no shareholders, no head office, no beginning or ending—

Mr. BUREAU: No capital stock.

Mr. McKENZIE: When we are talking of directors we always have in mind a body separate and apart from shareholders; but when we consider this Bill the directors are the whole thing, because they are pushed forward and backward, like railway time and other time, by the Governor in Council. My hon. friend will find his education and training in company law—I must give him credit for knowing a good deal about it—do not fit in here at all, and he must go to school again, because this is a company that expects to live in an atmosphere of company law, but has nothing in common with the ordinary company at all. I hope the Acting Prime Minister is in a better humour now—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am always in good humour.

Mr. McKENZIE: —and is willing to let us go home, especially if I say it is well on in the night. I will forget everything concerning the lack of information and say it is time we adjourned.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I know my hon. friend is a good Presbyterian like myself, and, consequently, does not like late hours; and as he is in a very obliging and genial frame of mind at the present time we will have very much pleasure in agreeing to his suggestion. I therefore move that the Committee do now rise. I think we will make just as much progress to-morrow.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Thursday, April 24, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

ACT RESPECTING DIVORCE.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 77, respecting divorce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NICKLE: The object of the Bill is to constitute divorce courts in Canada. In each province the Supreme Court will be constituted a divorce court, and the Exchequer Court will be a court of divorce for the Dominion. The Bill sets out the reasons for which divorce may be granted and for which annulment of marriage may be declared. It deals with the question of domicile of husband and wife and touches also the question of alimony. There are further provisions concerning the decrees of the court. The general purport of the Bill is not only to facilitate divorce, but to harmonize the divorce laws of the country and to make the position of man and woman equal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

8. The J. J. Hughes Co., Limited, the present sub-tenants of the property, have applied to the Railway Department for a continuance of their tenancy. The application is being considered.

BRITISH WAR MISSION.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough):

1. Who is the Chairman of the British War Mission?
2. Who compose this mission?
3. What are their duties?
4. When and how were they appointed?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: May I ask the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) what he means by the "British War Mission?" So far as I know there is no such body. There is in London a Canadian Mission of which Mr. Lloyd Harris is chairman.

Question stands.

MATAPEDIA VALLEY HIGHWAY.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. How much money was expended by the Department of Public Works on the highway in the Matapedia Valley, in the Counties of Rimouski and Bonaventure?
2. When was this expenditure made and was the whole amount voted by this House so expended?
3. Over what mileage was this work done?
4. Is the Government aware of the amount of work remaining to be done to put this highway in proper order?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL:

3. About 18 miles.
4. Yes.

EQUIPMENT ALLOWANCE TO OFFICERS.

Mr. POWER:

1. Is it a fact that an extra equipment allowance was given to officers in England and France after the armistice was signed?

2. If so, what was the amount, and is it the Government's intention to give this to officers who have served for a definite length of time in France?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1 and 2. No, but Order in Council P.C. 2232, dated 12th September, 1918, provides that an additional outfit allowance of $100 shall be paid annually to officers on the strength of and issued with pay and allowances by the overseas military forces of Canada who have completed 12 months' service since the last payment of outfit allowance was due. The first payment of this additional allowance was made with effect from the 1st August, 1918, and no further allowance will be made to any officer until he has completed a further period of 12 months' service hereafter.

LABOUR STRIKES—THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James): In view of the several strikes in Montreal and elsewhere and of many others which are threatened, in connection with which new scales of wages are being demanded; and in view of the fact that this is due to the disproportionately high cost of living, is it the intention of the Government to take immediate steps to meet the general complaint with regard to the high cost of living and to afford our people relief in that connection?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The matter of the high cost of different commodities is at all times having the attention of officers of the Labour Department.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Will immediate action be taken through the Department of Labour or otherwise to remedy the state of affairs revealed in to-day's Montreal Gazette with regard to the numerous strikes in Montreal which threaten to tie up the whole city?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend refers; I really do not know what he has in mind. If he refers to the strike of carters, I may say that the Department of Labour has a representative at Montreal and has offered a Board of Conciliation to both interested parties, but up to the present neither has availed of the offer. The department is doing everything it possibly can in the circumstances.

CENSORSHIP OF LETTERS FROM SOLDIERS OVERSEAS.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): I hold in my hand a letter from a Canadian military officer overseas. On the envelope there is the stamp "Passed by Censor."

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the date of the stamp?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: March 4, 1919. In the letter four or five lines have been deleted or blotted out. Is there still a censorship of letters coming from soldiers overseas, and if so, why?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government will be glad to make inquiry in the matter.

DISCHARGE OR LEAVE FOR SOLDIERS AT HALIFAX.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR (Queens, P.E.I.): I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter of importance, referred to in a Charlottetown paper of April 21, and to ask the Minister of Militia a question regarding it. This is the item on which I base my question:

> Important to Farmers. Premier Arsenault will meet a delegation of farmers having sons in the military at Halifax and who desire to have them granted home leave or discharge, on Friday 25th inst. at 1.30 p.m., in the Y.M.C.A.

Has Premier Arsenault any authority from the Government to grant home leave or discharge to any of the soldiers who are at Halifax? May I also ask why soldiers who were called to the colours after the armistice was signed are still being held at Halifax?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): I may say, offhand, that the Premier of Prince Edward Island has no authority, whatever, from the Militia Department regarding the soldiers at Halifax. I am not aware of any men having been sent there since the armistice. A certain number of troops are, of course, held there during disembarkation, and for carrying on garrison duty. If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the Order Paper, I shall be very glad to give him the answer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 70, to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 7—first meeting:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the Committee rose last night, this Bill was under discussion. Sections 1, 4 and 5 had been adopted. Sections 2, 3 and 6 had been allowed to stand. The Committee was discussing section 7 concerning the first meeting of directors. Shall section 7 carry?

Mr. CAHILL: Have the Government, over night, framed an amendment to this section to make it more understandable and workable? It says that the directors may hold a meeting, but there is no provision as to when or where the meeting shall be held.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 7 is, in my judgment, all right, as it stands, and there is nothing practical in the objection of the hon. member. When the board of directors are appointed, undoubtedly, one of them will be asked, or all may be asked in the appointment to meet at a certain time and place. That is one way of arranging a meeting. If that is not done, then they can, by correspondence, without meeting, arrange where they will meet the first time. That may be done by wire.

Mr. CAHILL: Supposing a director in Saskatchewan should decide to call a meeting at McTaggart and a director who is appointed down in St. John should decide to call a meeting at St. John, just as last night members of the Committee wanted the head office at every way station along the line. Why not make the thing practical? Surely the Government have had time to make this clause understandable to people reading it. Why not insert at the beginning of the clause, or after the words "organizing the company," a provision that the first meeting shall be called at the instance of the Governor in Council by whom the directors will be notified when and where to meet; or, it might be provided that the first named director shall name the place of meeting? In the Bill, no head office is provided; no capital stock is provided; there are no directors and no shareholders. Surely it ought to be within the ability of some members of the Government to draft a section to take care of this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no difficulty in drafting a section to take care of this, but I am afraid we are not able to draft a section to satisfy the hon. member. It is possible that one man appointed might make one excuse, and another, another, and that they would never agree to meet at any place or time. The imagination might reach to that possibility, but, if that ever takes place, then I shall have the very greatest deference for the hon. member. Such a thing is utterly unthinkable. These men, if they are not by their appointment asked to meet, will, by wire, arrange to meet at once, and there is no practical or even remote possibility of their not doing so. That is the way it is always done. As a matter of wording, of course, you might tell them where to meet the first time, or tell one of them to tell the others, but that is wholly unnecessary. A message would do the whole thing, so why go to the trouble of putting unnecessary words into this section? It is in the first place drafted by a man who has, undoubtedly, the most experience in corporation law in Canada. As to its working, there is no doubt in the mind of any sensible or reasonable man, and I do not think there is any doubt in the mind of the hon. member.

Mr. TOBIN: Who is the gentleman who drafted this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Zebulon A. Lash.

Mr. BUREAU: Here you have the result of the first error that was made. In any ordinary railway Bill it is provided that the first meeting of the directors shall be held at the head office of the company, on the call of the secretary, but here the Government do not want to determine where the head office of the company shall be for fear of hurting some friends behind them, for fear they will kick. This, they think, had better be done in the silence of the council room, after the members have gone away. Then let the word slide out that the head office will be in Toronto, or Montreal, or wherever it is. If the head office were determined, the rest would be easy. The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) need not stand behind the fact that the ablest man in Canada drafted this section. I think in the heads of the 232 members of this House there is more than in the head of one man, whoever he may be, even if his name be Zebulon. The objection of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) is rightly taken. This is our railway and we want to know when the directors are going to have a meeting to organize. We are giving them extraordinary powers, and the Government is taking extraordinary powers and setting its own powers aside whenever it is threatened with anything that is important, whenever it will have to guard the public treasury and see that expenditures are not made recklessly or uselessly. Section 6 of the Bill, which protects the directors from any liability to anybody, stands, and I want to have some discussion about it. It makes those men safe from the operation of the law if they do anything crooked. Further on the Bill authorizes them to do certain things, which, under the General Railway Act, no railway company is permitted to do.

I think we are entitled to know what these men are going to do and when they are going to organize, and to be in a position to see every step they take hereafter. I would ask my hon. friend to let the clause stand, and if Mr. Zebulon Lash is the only man who is sufficiently informed on the subject he should be consulted again in order that we might have a clause that would be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. CAHILL: I think the meeting should be called at some specified place, it does not matter where, and at any time and by any person you wish to designate. I do not think there would be any objection as to where the meeting should be called, or as to who should call it; but it should be stated in this clause. It ought to be at the call of the Governor in Council, the Minister of Railways, the Minister of the Interior, or the Acting Minister of Justice.

Mr. DEVLIN: I approve of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Pontiac, that it would be well to have the meeting called by some particular minister, preferably the Minister of Railways, who is the proper person to convene the first meeting. I suggest that the first meeting should be held at the seat of government here in Ottawa, where the directors might be in immediate touch with all the representatives of the Railway Department. I have no particular preference for Ottawa, but if Ottawa were selected as the place of meeting it would remove any jealousy on the part of cities like Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Vancouver, Three Rivers, Regina, and Calgary.

Mr. MORPHY: I disagree with hon. members who are opposing this clause. It seems to me that on the face of it it is workable and reasonable and provides all that any business man would want. If this House were to name a place it might happen to be the worst place that could be selected. I think that this is a matter for the directors themselves and that it is only reasonable that they should hold the meeting at such time and place as they think proper. Business men will have complete charge of the matter, and it is unreasonable to presume that they are going to act like school boys or that they will quarrel and disagree as soon as they meet. "As they think proper" means as they consider most convenient for the purposes of the meeting. They are the operative and executive officers, and surely it is fatuous to contend that they are going to behave like school boys. They are business men and we must assume that they will take the wisest course open to them.

Mr. BUREAU: The general Railway Act provides "all general meetings, whether annual or special, shall be held at the head office of the company." If the Government, for fear of displeasing somebody, are afraid to select the head office, the rest of the Bill will suffer. We are all interested to see the organization under way and the Canadian railways put on such a footing that the company will not be ashamed of them and we will not read of wrecks, and trains running behind time and passengers being disappointed. I would like to see them organize and pass their by-laws before we prorogue, so that we may be afforded an opportunity to criticise their work if it is not as it should be. There is no reason why, as my hon. friend from Pontiac says, it should not be provided that the first directors shall, after appointment, call a meeting within a month in the city of Toronto, if you will, or at the place where the head office now is. I suggest, therefore, that the directors shall within thirty days after appointment hold a meeting at the head office of the Canadian Northern Railway in the city of Toronto for the purpose of passing by-laws and organizing the company.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Three Rivers fails apparently to distinguish between general and special meetings of the company after it is once formed, and this clause in question, which really provides for the meeting is preliminary to the formation of the board. This clause is intended to provide for purposes of organization so that the board may get together and, after consideration, determine where the head office of the company shall be.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not say who shall call the meeting? You have a number of directors, five, ten or fifteen, and any one of them would have power to call the meeting. I think some one man should be designated to call the meeting, as is done in ordinary companies. This is an extraordinary condition of things, for here is a company without a head office. There is no place where the meeting might be held. In all probability it will be held in Mackenzie and Mann's office, where no doubt they will have the counsel of Mr. Lash. I do not care where you hold the meeting, but I think it is only reasonable that some person should be named to call the meeting.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think the matter is of very great importance, but I am not sure that the clause is workable. This is to arrange for the first meeting of the directors who, it says may, after appointment, hold a meeting at such time and place as they think proper. How are they going to do the "thinking" if they have had no meeting? What is to be the evidence that they did that thinking unless they meet for that purpose? If it is proposed that they shall hold a first meeting and before that decide the time and place of meeting; they have to do some thinking but how are we to know that it is the wish of the directors? I am not captious in the matter but it does not look to me to be very practical. I do not attach as much importance to that as some other hon. gentlemen appear to do, but I think the section might be made clearer.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I think the point made by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) is a very strong one. I mentioned it in private last night after we rose. The clause says that they may meet at the time and place they think proper. They must therefore have met together if they are doing that thinking in common. The clause provides for a meeting before the meeting. It would be a simple matter to accept the suggestions of the other side and fix a definite place and time when the business of the company shall commence in connection with this very serious and large undertaking.

Mr. MEIGHEN: First of all, on the general question of thinking and meeting it is not necessary that men shall meet together in order to think. They can think as to whether they will meet without being physically together. The thinking is usually, as a matter of practice, expressed by telegraph. There is nothing new in this. This Bill combines certain things that are not combined in the usual run of legislation. Usually provisional directors are appointed; the provisional directors meet and they call a meeting of the shareholders. They pass certain by-laws and then the place where they shall meet afterwards is fixed. The general Railway Act, which contemplates provisional directors, does not say where they shall meet the first time. These people are not strictly speaking provisional directors but in so far as meeting for the first time is concerned they do the same as provisional directors. Section 74 of the Railway Act reads:

> (1) The persons mentioned by name as such in the Special Act shall be the provisional directors of the company.
> (2) A majority of such provisional directors shall form a quorum.
> (3) The provisional directors may,—
> (a) forthwith open stock books and procure subscriptions of stock for the undertaking;
> (b) receive payments on account of stock subscribed;
> (c) cause plans and surveys to be made; and
> (d) deposit in any chartered bank of Canada moneys received by them on account of stock subscribed.
> (4) The moneys so received and deposited shall not be withdrawn, except for the purposes of the undertaking, or upon the dissolution of the company.
> (5) The provisional directors shall hold office as such until the first election of directors.

The provisional directors have to meet to do that, but the Act does not provide where or when they shall meet. It is merely done as a matter of course. I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) that the matter is of no possible consequence at all. This is just the same as the provision with regard to provisional directors which has been in operation during all these years without any trouble or inconvenience whatsoever occurring.

Mr. BUREAU: The conditions are different. When you ask for a charter you have no organization whatever. You have subscribed money and deposited it in a bank whereas in this case you have a going concern. If it is possible to delay this meeting they might wait for two or three months before calling it. The Acting Minister of Justice may say that that is unthinkable but we have seen such things here that no member of this House can conceive of a thing that would not be done by hon. gentlemen opposite. Here the conditions are known; they are at present existing. We have a going concern; it is now practically what it is going to be except that there have been certain manipulations of the Railway Act in connection with this Bill to give the Governor in Council certain powers that may be advantageously used for political purposes, and putting upon the company certain obligations in order that the Government cannot be criticised if certain things are done. The Bill gives powers to the company that the general Railway Act denies to ordinary companies and the general directors are made immune from any responsibility to any shareholder, director, officer, or employee of the company. Why not determine that within thirty days after the appointment of the directors, the president shall call a meeting in the city of Ottawa for the purpose of organizing. They have to be near the Governor in Council or the Minister of Railways, who is supposed to be the Governor in Council in this connection because they have to be checked up and he has to give his approval to everything they do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no actual president.

Mr. BUREAU: The manager, if you like.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You might create one, I suppose, but that is absolutely unnecessary. We can only pass legislation like this and hope for good results on the assumption that the men who are going to be appointed will be reasonable business men. You might say that they must meet within a week, but that does not ensure that we will get good results. They might meet within a week or they might not. If they met within a week they might never meet again. Then you would not have any clause compelling them to meet. Assuming that they will act as business men, the Bill is all right because a similar clause has proved all right during all these years.

Mr. FIELDING: There can be no objection to saying that the directors shall meet at such time and place as the Governor in Council may direct for that purpose. I do not expect that there shall be a time set, but that would meet the objection of some hon. gentlemen. I cannot see any objection to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no objection to it. It makes the Bill neither better nor worse, but if it will expedite the Bill it might as well go in.

Mr. McKENZIE: Just as the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) rose I was about to propose an amendment. The Bill now reads:

> The first directors may after appointment hold a meeting at such time and place as they think proper, for the purpose of passing by-laws, and organizing the company.

I would move that the words " they think proper " be struck out and that the following words be substituted: " may be designated by the Minister of Railways and Canals." Then it will read:

> The first directors may after appointment hold a meeting at such time and place as may be designated by the Minister of Railways and Canals for the purpose of passing by-laws, and organizing the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is all right as it is, but that is all right too.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—executive committee:

Mr. BUREAU: The board of directors are going to have an executive committee and they are going to give the executive committee powers for the administration of the road. The executive committee will not be the creature of the Governor in Council because I do not see anything in the Bill whereby the actions of the executive committee will be subject to ratification by the Governor in Council.

I therefore presume that the executive committee, or some of them, will be appointed by by-law by the board of directors, and the executive committee is practically and actually the managing body of the railway. In this case the Government declines to assume any responsibility and says: "You may create an executive committee, but if the executive committee makes any recommendations we do not have to ratify them, because we were not consulted. Go to the board of directors—we cannot go into the management of this railway; it is up to the directors to see that everything is all right." Now I want this executive committee and the powers to be entrusted to it to be controlled by Parliament.

Mr. J. D. REID: In all large corporations such as this, where the board of directors do not live at the place where the head office is located, they appoint an executive committee for the purpose of carrying on the business between the regular meetings. In the present instance the directors live a long distance apart. One of them resides in Saskatchewan, another in Manitoba, and the rest live in Eastern Canada. The object of this clause is to enable the executive committee to carry on business in the interval between the meetings of directors. The directors, of course, are appointed by the Government and are responsible for the action of the executive committee, and any action taken by the executive committee in the interval would be ratified and confirmed by the directors at the regular meeting. Otherwise, of course, the directors would be supposed to live where they could be called together at any moment, frequently on only an hour or a day's notice. At the present time, in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways, I think six is the quorum for an executive committee meeting.

Mr. BUREAU: To whom does the present executive committee report?

Mr. J. D. REID: To the board of directors.

Mr. BUREAU: As actually constituted.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The executive committee reports to the directors at the regular meeting.

Mr. BUREAU: That is only as regards the by-laws that were passed for the operation of the old Canadian Northern Railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course the directors of the old Canadian Northern Railway passed the by-laws under which the executive commmittee is now acting. Presumably the new directors will pass new by-laws.

Mr. BUREAU: There is where the trouble arises again. The by-laws may be passed by the company, which consists of directors appointed by the Government, and my hon. friends opposite take it for granted that faultless, sinless and impeccable men are going to be appointed. We on this side do not believe in that because we do not believe in the appointors, if I may coin a term, and that is the reason why we want to be careful, and desire to have some check put upon all these powers that are being conferred. As the minister says, the executive committee will be responsible to the board of directors, and the latter very often will be desirous to have some excuse with respect to the actions of the executive committee if it will only help the Government. That is what we fear, and that is what we want to guard against. There is nothing in the Bill which provides that the by-laws shall be controlled by anybody. In the case of an ordinary company the by-laws would have to be submitted to the shareholders, that is to the people whose money was invested in the enterprise, but here there is no such safeguard. I want these by-laws, and the powers which are to be entrusted to the executive, to be controlled by Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Railway Act certain of the by-laws of a railway company, if not all, must be approved by the shareholders. In this case the by-laws that ordinarily would be approved by the shareholders have to be approved by the Governor in Council. Section 9 of the Bill says:

Whenever under the provisions of the Railway Act, or any other statute or law, the approval, sanction or confirmation by shareholders is required, such approval, sanction or confirmation may be given by the Governor in Council.

Consequently, the by-laws would have to be approved by the Governor in Council wherever the Railway Act required them to be approved by shareholders.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a vicious principle.

Mr. BUREAU: Not in other countries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a pretty old one in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Only since the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the hon. gentleman was arguing that the by-laws should be approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: No, I say they should be approved by Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I am afraid I will have to take issue with my hon. friend there. If the functions of Parliament are to be extended in that way I do not know when it is going to get its work done. However, the point I rose to speak to was that the by-laws are now required to be approved by the Governor in Council. Those by-laws, according to section 8 of the Bill, may provide for the appointment of an executive committee, but that committee must all be members of the Board of Directors. Consequently, those members of the executive committee already have received the sanction of the Governor in Council. It appears very manifest that the board, particularly if the membership is Canadian-wide, will require an executive committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the necessity for section 9 at all? Is it not understood that the Board of Directors has the right to appoint managers, and is as a body responsible for the whole management of the affairs put in their hands? Is it not also a custom, as well as a thing understood, that the board can exercise its powers in such a manner within itself as it may deem advisable? If it is the judgment of the board that a committee, the working part of that body, shall exercise the powers of a few of their own number, why should we tell them what to do? Have they not the general powers to carry on the business of the company as they deem proper?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly they have the powers within the very same sphere of authority as the powers of directors of any railway company, except as modified by this Bill. That is to say, where any railway company does not require to come to its shareholders for sanction, then this board of directors would not require to come; but if it requires to come to the shareholders, the method of doing so is to make application for an Order in Council ratifying any Act of the board which requires ratification by the shareholders.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not touch exactly the point I asked about. Why should we tell them whether they have the right to appoint an executive committee within themselves, when as a matter of common law and practice they have that right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think they have that right unless it is statutorily given. No executive committee could exercise any but statutory powers.

Mr. McKENZIE: They can exercise general powers vested in such bodies.

Mr. BUREAU: From among themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not unless they are authorized to elect an executive committee with those powers, and they could not under common law or under any practice—

Mr. McKENZIE: They could appoint a manager.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course; but they cannot delegate their powers to an executive committee unless they have statutory authority for that purpose.

Mr. BUREAU: The directors are themselves in fact an executive committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are.

Mr. BUREAU: Because they could not delegate to themselves powers that they do not possess. They have power to act as an executive committee. Each individual is a member of the executive committee. Why do you require statutory authority to tell them that five or six shall act as such. You say the members of the executive committee shall be taken from among the Board of Directors; to be a member of the executive committee you have to be a director, and you have executive power in your hands; that means something or nothing. I should judge the object of that section would be to allow the Board of Directors to appoint to that executive committee men who are not on the directorate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect of this section is simply to enable something smaller than a quorum to do the work of the entire directorate. A quorum can do it under the Railway Act now. We are empowering the Board of Directors to constitute a smaller body and, if they desire, call it an executive committee, and give to that executive committee the powers which the directors themselves have.

Mr. ROSS: How many members have you now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Eleven.

Mr. ROSS: Under this section 8 you give the directors power to appoint an executive committee and by by-laws you empower them to clothe that executive committee with any powers they see fit. You appoint eleven directors from all over the country for the protection of certain interests and to secure the advantage of certain knowledge which is supposed to be possessed by them. Are you not going to arrive at this point: That these eleven men will appoint five or six of their number, so that we will have the old gang in charge, as the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), pointed out last night. They may be in a majority, and then by by-laws, which they have power to enact without the approval of the Governor in Council, they may appoint two or three of their number as an executive committee.

Mr. BUREAU: Nine.

Mr. ROSS: It does not specify any number.

Mr. J. D. REID: Six is the number we have now.

Mr. ROSS: I know; but you have given the committee power to appoint any number, and they may appoint two, three, or four of their number. The minister says that under the Railway Act there has to be a quorum of the Board of Directors; but this section will allow the directorate to form an executive committee, and the result would be that those directors might get together and pass a by-law appointing two or three of their number members of the executive committee, with the possibility of the old gang getting in control of the Canadian Government railways,—Mackenzie & Mann and D. B. Hanna —the same old crowd. There should be some protection in the form of providing power to the Governor in Council to approve or disapprove of the executive committee appointed by your board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is another feature that I did not bring out. Any member of the board may, if he desires, attend a meeting of the executive committee.

Mr. ROSS: It does not say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You cannot say everything. You must assume that men are going to act as reasonable business men. If you are going to state every little thing in a Bill it will be endless. The executive committee may be small, that is very true, but under the by-laws as now provided any member may attend that executive committee if he desires; and it is further provided that any action taken by the executive committee as such may be reversed at the first subsequent meeting of directors. We do not want to tie down these men, who are to be entrusted with great powers, more than directors usually are tied down, and I do not think we would gain very much by doing so. I think the proper principle is to entrust them with the necessary powers, hold them responsible for the exercise of those powers, and not hold over them statutory clubs. Upon the assumption that they are not going to act as reasonable men.

Mr. ROSS: My hon. friend says that the by-laws now provide for certain things. But this Bill does not incorporate those by-laws, and we do not know if those by-laws will prevail when the new directors are appointed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why are not the by-laws submitted at the same time as this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The by-laws will have to be submitted to the Governor in Council for approval.

Mr. MARCIL: I did not hear the hon. minister say whether the policy of the Government was to have each province represented on this board of directors. Seeing that this is a national undertaking, are all the provinces through which this railway runs to be represented on the directorate?

Mr. J. D. REID: That question has not been decided yet. The whole matter will have to be considered when we are considering the number of directors to be appointed. We may not appoint nine, there may be fewer than that number. The object would be to select the very best men possible, and it might be that we would not be able to have every province represented.

Mr. MARCIL: Then they might all come from one province?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not likely. Possibly two or three might come from one province, in which case you could not have all the provinces represented.

Mr. ROSS: Did I understand the hon. minister to say that the by-laws will have to be approved by the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, because under the Railway Act they have to be approved by the shareholders, and under section 9 such approval has to be given by the Governor in Council, in lieu thereof.

Mr. CANNON: The previous clause gives the right to the directors to make by-laws and organize the company, and according to this clause we are giving the right to the directors to appoint an executive committee. I would like to know from the Minister of Railways or the Acting Minister of Justice what the Minister of Railways will have to do with the management of the railroad after this Bill is passed; and if the Minister of Railways will have nothing more to do with it, what control will Parliament have over the management of the road. I think this is a very important question. Our railways are going to be run by a board of directors, and these directors we know nothing about. The Government tells us the present directors might be changed later, but they might be maintained in that position, and so the action of the Government in regard to the directorate is very uncertain and indefinite. The only way the representatives of the people can control expenditure in connection with our railways or exercise jurisdiction over their management is to have in this House someone who has authority to speak for the management. If the powers contemplated in the Bill are given to the directors, the management of the railways will be taken from the minister; his department will become useless, and we shall no longer have in Parliament a minister responsible to Parliament in connection with railway matters.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Minister of Railways does not really operate railways; he did not operate the Intercolonial. He depends on his officials for the actual operation of railways. But the Government must keep in touch with the system; every day matters arise that must be brought before the Government. Moreover, there are matters in connection with the other railways throughout Canada that must come to the attention of the minister. The minister must be the medium between Parliament or the Government and this system.

The hon. member need not worry about the Minister of Railways not having very much to do.

Mr. BUREAU: He has the Welland canal on his hands.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, that will assist in giving him something to do. The Canadian National Railway Company must come before the Government from time to time so far as construction is concerned and in connection with many other matters affecting the system. The minister and the department will have plenty of work to do without looking after the operation.

Mr. CANNON: I should be the first to regret the abolition of the minister's department; I enjoy very much his presence in this House and I should be sorry if he disappeared. But after the Acting Minister of Justice has this Bill passed the Minister of Railways may discover that it goes much further than he thinks it does and that he will be deprived of powers which he thinks he still has. The example of the Intercolonial does not fit in with this case at all. The Intercolonial is a Government-owned railway operated by a commission; the Canadian National Railway Company is a company separate and distinct from the Government itself, with the powers of an ordinary railway company. The Minister of Railways has nothing to say with regard to the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and similarly he will have no control over the Canadian National Railway Company. Five, ten or fifteen men selected by the Government will have in their hands the management of all our Government railways and Parliament will have absolutely nothing to say with regard to that management. The minister pointed out that he would have something to say with regard to construction and with regard to the relations existing between this company and the other railway companies of Canada. Well, my experience indicates that quite the opposite will be the case. A few months ago I wrote the minister asking him what he intended to do in connection with certain conditions existing in a parish in my country, and he replied that he had absolutely nothing to do with the matter; that, a commission having been appointed to look after the Government railways, I would have to apply to Mr. Hanna. Three months ago, therefore, the minister acknowledged that he no longer had authority over the railways; after this Bill passes, his position will be worse.

Mr. BUREAU: What railway was that?

Mr. CANNON: The Transcontinental. The minister said that he had no authority to apply to the chairman of the new commission. Parliament should see that in this Bill the privileges of the people are preserved. Nobody knows who the new directors will be. The minister said last night that the directors might be changed. After this Bill is passed the Government will be free to appoint whom they choose. I hope they will be good men, but sometimes the Government makes bad appointments. Will the Government appoint competent railway experts to the board of directors, or will they appoint political friends to reward them for past services? I do not know; members of the committee do not know. We should insert in this Bill as many safeguards as possible. The people are getting sick and tired of the railway situation and of railway legislation brought down by this Government. The Canadian Northern Railway Bill, which was passed a few years ago, brought forth a good deal of opposition; this Bill will certainly agitate the minds of the people. We must examine this Bill very carefully and see that we do not simply hand over to the old gang of Mackenzie and Mann the railways that we bought and paid for with our millions. We want to have no more squandering of public moneys such as we had in connection with the Canadian Northern in past years.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) stated a minute ago that by-laws passed by the Board of Directors will be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. I understand the minister bases that on section 9, which provides that whenever, under the provisions of the Railway Act, the sanction of shareholders is required, the sanction of the Governor in Council will be required under this Bill. Section 122 of the new law, which is going through the House at the present time, provides for the enactment of by-laws by the Board of Directors, but it does not provide that those by-laws shall be submitted to the shareholders.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is now discussing section 9. Shall section 8 carry?

Mr. BUREAU: Both sections work together.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member's law is right. I do not know that in my last sentence I repeated what I said previously in answer, I think, to the hon. member for West Middlesex, namely, that such by-laws as by the Railway Act require confirmation by the shareholders will now require confirmation by the Governor in Council. There are certain by-laws, such as those that have to do with appointment of officials and the general running of the road, which do not require confirmation by the shareholders, but all by-laws of major importance have, as will be seen by reference to, I think, section 132 to be approved by the shareholders, and consequently will now have to be approved by the Governor in Council. Then section 120 says:—

> The directors shall be subject to the examination and control of the shareholders at their annual meetings, and shall be subject to all by-laws of the company, and to the orders and directions from time to time made or given at the annual or special meetings if such orders and directions are not contrary to or inconsistent with any expressed direction or provision of this Act or of the Special Act.

I apprehend the Governor in Council will have power under that section as well.

Mr. ROSS: Under the sections of the Railway Act referred to, will the sanction of the Governor in Council be necessary to a by-law of the directors appointing certain of their number as an executive committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: Where does the minister get that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the directors are expressly given power to pass by-laws of a certain character without reference to the shareholders, and unless, in a word, that power is included within section 122, the directors must get the assent, and on inquiry, I find that assent is always obtained to the by-law which constitutes the executive committee and gives its powers.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister point out the clause in the new Act which makes by-laws of the directors subject to the approval of shareholders?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The law is, as I understand it, that unless powers are expressly given to the board of directors, such powers cannot be exercised except with the approval of the shareholders of the company.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is the clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not need any. What I mean is this, the directors have only such powers as are statutorily given to them. The company are the shareholders, consequently, the directors cannot derive, from the company, any powers except such as may be given to them. The law gives them certain powers. Anything the law does not give them, they do not have, and therefore, they must secure confirmation of any such acts from the shareholders.

Mr. BUREAU: How do the shareholders have the right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the shareholders are the company, and the directors are acting for the company, and unless the directors have something to prove their authority for any act, they cannot do it.

Mr. BUREAU: They can by section 120.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they cannot go beyond that.

Mr. BUREAU: The shareholders cannot do anything inconsistent with law, but the directors may make by-laws or pass resolutions from time to time not inconsistent with law. The argument of the minister falls to the ground. The directors can do anything not inconsistent with this Bill by passing by-laws.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The directors may make by-laws or pass resolutions as provided in clauses (a), (b), and (c) of section 122.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not restrict the power of the former clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any power specified in section 120 they can exercise so long as it is not inconsistent with law, but anything that is not specified there, they cannot do.

Mr. BUREAU: They can, because the directors have power under another clause to manage the railway, and that implies the power to do anything which is necessary for the management. Section 122 simply says that the directors shall have power to make by-laws or pass resolutions, not inconsistent with law, for the purposes of the management. The word "management" covers everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. ROSS: The minister's argument absolutely destroys itself. He says that if the directors are given power by the Act to do a certain thing, then they do not need to get the approval of the shareholders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they have statutory powers, they do not require power from the shareholders.

Mr. ROSS: By this Bill, we are giving them statutory powers. Section 8 says:

> The by-laws of the company may provide for an executive committee of the board of directors, to exercise such powers as the by-laws may specify.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the by-laws of the company, not the by-laws of the directors.

Mr. BUREAU: Who is the company,

Mr. ROSS: Who are making these by-laws?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The company.

Mr. BUREAU: If I ask who is the company, the minister says "the directors." If I ask, who are the directors, the minister says "the company." That is the minister's style of arguing. In this case the company is a body of directors appointed by the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Then what is the difference between the company and the directors? The directors are the company and the company is the directors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is going round in a circle.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister made the circle, I cannot get out of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 8 says:

> The by-laws of the company may provide for an executive committee of the board of directors, to exercise such powers as the by-laws may specify.

That is to say, whatever powers the directors may have as a directorate, they may revest in the executive committee. Under section 120 of the Railway Act, the directors are given certain powers, and any powers there vested in them, they may revest in the executive committee. Any powers not given to them, they cannot revest in the executive committee. If any powers are given to them by the shareholders, they, in turn, could revest them in the executive committee, provided those powers were not inconsistent with the by-laws.

Mr. BUREAU: What are the by-laws that require to be ratified by the shareholders, and in what section does the minister find that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 132, if I remember correctly, contains certain of them. It is a very long section and I do not suppose the hon. member wants me to read it.

Mr. BUREAU: It provides that if you want to issue securities you must have a two-thirds vote of the shareholders.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I see it is provided that the directors can make by-laws relating to the business affairs of the company, the appointment and dismissal of officers, and the conduct of the general business of the company. Now, the Governor in Council are the shareholders of the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Well, as there are no shareholders in the proper sense, should not all by-laws be submitted to the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Committee might very well discuss that point. I do not think there could be any objection, unless perhaps it would be that it would virtually give to the Governor in Council a dictating power as to salaries and management. Whether that is wise or not is a matter that is open to discussion, but it certainly would tend to place the management of this road more on a footing of political patronage than it is at present. There is, however, much to be said the other way.

Mr. NESBITT: I for one am not alarmed at the power given to the directors, and I hope the Government will be in a position to appoint independent directors who know something about the management of railways and who will not be interfered with. I am strongly opposed to the suggestion that the by-laws as drafted by the directors should be submitted entirely to the Governor in Council. Of course there are certain by-laws which have to be submitted to the Governor in Council, such as those relating to the issuance of securities. But to require the directors to submit by-laws relating to the real operation of the road, as for instance the appointment and dismissal of officers, would be to bring it immediately under the influence of political patronage, and that is what I hope we shall avoid. Clause 8 is simply the ordinary clause passed by all large corporations. You have to have an executive management. Frequently very large powers are given to executive bodies who, of course, have to report to the directors before taking any particularly important step. It is a simple every-day proposition to allow the board of directors to appoint an executive committee to have the immediate management of the road.

Mr. BUREAU: Not in railway companies.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, look at the Canadian Pacific Railway and you will see who the executive committee are. It is they, and not the board of directors, whom we have to thank for the very great success of the Canadian Pacific Railway. As to submitting all by-laws, I think we ought to take it for granted that we are going to appoint, or at least endeavour to appoint, as directors and especially the executive, men who know something about railways. As to the Minister of Railways being relieved of his responsibility, that is impossible, for so long as we are owners of the railway, the Government will be responsible for the actions not only of the executive committee but of the board of directors.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend seems to be surprised at the suggestion that the by-laws should be submitted to the Governor in Council. The Railway Act provides: "All such by-laws, rules, and regulations, except such as relate to tolls and such as are of a private or domestic nature and do not affect the public generally, shall be submitted to the Governor in Council for approval."

Mr. NESBITT: What are you reading from?

Mr. BUREAU: The Railway Act, Chapter 37, Revised Statutes, 1906.

Mr. NESBITT: Get the new Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, last night I was called down for using the new Act and that is my reason for quoting from the old Act to-day.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can see no objection to having all by-laws subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. It would be a safeguard and I think it should be added to Section 8. It can do no harm, and I am not disposed to allow the people of the country to be governed by laws made by independent bodies over whom we have no control. The provision is in the general Act as read by the hon. member for Three Rivers, and I think we should very well add it to Clause 8 that all by-laws shall be submitted to the Governor in Council for approval. These by-laws, if they are submitted to the Governor in Council, will come under the eye of the Department of Justice and I presume it will be seen that they are proper by-laws.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section which the hon. member for Three Rivers read concerns by-laws that have to do with the public safety.

Mr. BUREAU: I think I so stated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Similarly, by-laws passed by this company will go to the Governor in Council for approval when they are of the same character as those mentioned in the section read by the hon. member. As to having all by-laws submitted to the Governor in Council for approval, I am personally disposed to agree with the hon. member for North Oxford, but at the same time I cannot help expressing my joy at finding the leader of the Opposition so much in love now with Orders in Council. If we are to approve of all by-laws passed by the Canadian National Railways we will have to approve of them by Orders in Council, and I sincerely hope we shall not again be taunted by the leader of the Opposition with government by Order in Council. We are endeavouring to avoid that, and at all events we feel disposed to leave the railway management a freer hand in the actual management of the road.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Acting Minister of Justice is wrong if he thinks that I am a convert to government by Order in Council. I have always advocated in this House the principle that the law should be found in the statute, and every one who has paid any attention to what I have ever said knows that. But these by-laws should be submitted for approval to a body that is responsible to this House. I am not in favour of by-laws; I want the enactment to be specific and clear in the statute, but if we must have them let us have some check on them. I do not think we should give a free hand to these directors to make such laws as they may see fit without having them approved of by some body responsible to Parliament. You are creating them a miniature parliament capable of making laws binding on the people.

I am not in favour of giving such a free hand to anybody. No matter who is making the laws touching the property and liberties of the people, they must ultimately come to this Parliament and submit to the jurisdiction of the body that represents the people. That is the only purpose I have in wanting to have the by-laws subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. KEEFER: I would like to say a word or two on behalf of the railway men. I know what their desires are in regard to this matter because I was called before them a year ago. They distinctly state that it is their desire that the management of this road shall be, as far as possible, divorced from all political action. They would like to see the road, if possible, operated by a commission. The proposal contained in this Bill is the nearest approach to a commission that we can make. A company only acts by its board of directors, and through its by-laws, and if we are going to have every Act expressed by a by-law supervised by the Governor in Council, we are going to drag into the management of the road that political interference which is directly opposed by the railway men. Take the question of promotion, for instance. If a man serves faithfully, his superiors know whether he should be made a locomotive foreman, a yardmaster, a trainmaster, a divisional superintendent or something of that kind. These men go up to more important positions. Surely it is better to leave all such questions as that to the management whether it be the executive committee or whether it be the general manager of the company. As the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said, any promotion to a treasurership or anything else, should come from that independent tribunal, instead of having to come before the Governor in Council. The Government of the day, no matter what it was, might have some person that they would like to have appointed to a position. I earnestly hope that this House will never dream of having every act of this independent tribunal or board of directors confirmed by Order in Council. It is against the wishes of the men in every respect.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want the hon. gentleman to have any misunderstanding as to what I propose. I do not at all think that every movement in connection with this concern, or every act, must be authorized by a by-law. That before a man can be appointed or promoted, or a locomotive purchased or repaired, a by-law must be passed is something that I have not suggested and I have no such idea. These men that the hon. gentlemen speaks of must be sane and sensible men. We trust them to do their work properly. I would be very sorry to think that what we call politics should be divorced from this enterprise. To divorce politics from it would be to divorce from it every influence that should be brought to bear on the question of public ownership. The people that are selected for the management of this road are not any better than the rest of us. They are human beings, influenced by human proclivities and human ambition. We do not propose any petty interference with them in the management of the road, but we maintain that the general supervision of the Government property and of the people's property must be in the hands of the representatives of the people of this House. To suggest that for the buying of such stock as may be required, the engagements for freight and such measures as are necessary for the general advancement of the road it is necessary to pass by-laws is absurd. We must give these men a free hand but there are certain things on which they will want by-laws as well as they want statutes and if there is anything in the operation of the road that requires a by-law, it ought to be submitted to the Governor in Council and indirectly in that way submitted to the influence and control of this House and of the people as represented by the Governor in Council.

On section 9—approval by Governor in Council instead of shareholders:

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would ask the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) for his reasons why that which, under the provisions of the Railway Act or any other statute, requires the approval of shareholders has to be confirmed by the Governor in Council? It seems strange that we should supersede all statutes applicable to an ordinary company when we are creating a company to manage the railways that the Government are acquiring. This is another example of a resort to Order in Council under which the Government is allowed to do anything. We do not know where the end is going to be. The war is over now and I think that this company which we are incorporating by Act of Parliament should be subject to the very same rules and regulations as any other company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Committee will appreciate how difficult it is to meet the wishes of the hon. gentlemen opposite. We have just been suffering a volley of criticism because we do not require that all by-laws of the company shall be submitted to the Governor in Council, and now we are attacked because we admit that any should be submitted to the Governor in Council. All we ask to be submitted are such as under the Railway Act are compellable in the case of the ordinary company to be submitted to the shareholders before they are effective. We say that such by-laws of major importance as are required to be submitted to the shareholders must in this case be submitted to the Governor in Council. We think that a fair line of division.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not think that this clause should carry immediately. Under this clause the Government are taking the power by Order in Council to issue securities against this new undertaking which would include the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. They might therefore, with the sanction of the Governor in Council, be permitted to go into the markets of the world and sell some $150,000,000 to $250,000,000 worth of bonds and we in this Parliament would have absolutely no control over the expenditures of that money. We are handling an asset free of incumbrance to the company. The company by this Act. are taking power to do all things necessary to carry on the undertaking, to extend the lines and operate the railway.

They also have power to issue securities. If they did so they would have the privilege of floating all these securities against this undertaking and spending the money, and there is absolutely no provision in this Bill requiring them to come to Parliament for sanction of such action, or to account for the expenditures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the hon. gentleman fears is expressly forbidden by section 26 of this Bill.

Mr. CANNON: Are there any shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway who have not sold their shares to the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no shareholders, that is, owners of shares, whose shares are not sold. There are, however, certain shares which the owners have pledged with the Government of British Columbia for some contract, which shares they have not been able to deliver to the Minister of Finance, and consequently they have not been paid for.

Mr. CANNON: What is the number and value of such shares?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Speaking from memory, and not attempting to say that I am certainly right, I think it is about a million and a half of shares, the value of which would be only $200,000.

Mr. CANNON: Has the Government entered into negotiations with the British Columbia Government for the acquisition of those shares?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government has not; it is simply waiting for delivery.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If I remember rightly, the only class of by-laws that require to be submitted to shareholders for approval under the Railway Act, are those dealing with the issuance of bonds and the placing of mortgages on the road. Is it intended that this board of directors shall have power to issue bonds, or execute mortgages, in connection with the railway system under its control? I would like the minister to state what by-laws he refers to, if it is not intended that the board of directors in this case shall have the power to issue bonds or execute mortgages?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say that I can enumerate all the classes of by-laws that require submission to shareholders, but the class that my hon. friend refers to does, namely, the class providing for the issue of bonds or stocks. Also under section 151 of the Railway Act of the present session all by-laws that have to do with agreements for sale, lease and amalgamation of lines require submission to the shareholders as well, and there may be others also as to which this is necessary. Those two classes of by-laws passed by the directorate of this company will require submission to the Governor in Council. The general question which the hon. gentleman raises also, as to the issue of bonds, is covered by section 26 of this Bill, and a reference to that section will show that the directorate will not have power, with the sanction of the Governor in Council, or otherwise, to bond any lines except the Canadian Northern Railway. They cannot bond the Canadian Government Railways, which include the Prince Edward Island, the Intercolonial, and the Transcontinental.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They cannot bond those.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They cannot bond them. That will be made apparent when we come to the discussion of clause 26.

Mr. CAHILL: I think the minister confirms my argument. The Canadian Government Railways are being incorporated in the Canadian National Railway System are they not, they are being taken over?

Mr. J. D. REID: Only for operation purposes.

Mr. CAHILL: There is no limitation of that character in the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is section 26. The hon. gentleman's argument was that this directorate would be able to bond the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, and he says he finds confirmation of that in my speech. All I said in my speech was that they could not bond them at all, because section 26 forbids it. If that is confirmation of his argument, it is easily confirmed.

Mr. CAHILL: There are contradictory statements in this section. By this Bill you are incorporating the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. CAHILL: You are incorporating a company through whom you take over the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we do not.

Mr. CAHILL: Where is the provision for operating merely?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Act we provide for operating the Canadian National Railways.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Definitions, "Canadian Government Railways:"

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Will the taking over of the branch lines connected with the Government system rest in future with this company, or will it rest with the Minister of Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: The branch lines will all come under the operation of this Bill.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: I mean branch lines now owned by private companies. An Act has been passed which authorizes the Governor in Council to take over any railroad not exceeding two hundred miles in length, which connects with the Intercolonial or any other Government railway. Will that power in future rest with this new corporation, or will it continue to be vested in the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The power continues as it is at present under the statute, it is not affected by this Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention that the Intercolonial, and its branch lines, shall come under the management of this company?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are proud of the old Intercolonial Railway, and we do not want its identity to be lost in the Canadian Northern System.

Mr. J. D. REID: This section defines what "Canadian Government Railways" and what "Canadian Northern" means.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would gather from the Bill that the Canadian Northern System will dominate everything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 11 makes quite clear what is contemplated.

Mr. COPP: I want some information with respect to paragraph (a) of this clause, in order to ascertain what line, or lines of railway, it is intended to include in the Canadian Government Railway System. The paragraph sets forth:

> "Canadian Government Railways" means and includes all such railways or parts thereof, and all such properties, works, powers, rights and privileges or interests or any of them as may be designated, whether generally or in detail, in any Order in Council from time to time subsisting.

Now, reading that far, I presume that means any lines of railway that have already been taken over or that hereafter may be taken over by Order in Council. Would the hon. minister be good enough to tell me just what lines of railway have been taken over and have been under operation as the Canadian Government railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the Order in Council which was laid on the Table of the House defines what has been placed under the operation of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. COPP: The hon. minister misunderstands me. I want to know what other railway companies are operated under the Canadian Government railways referred to in this Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Intercolonial railway and the branch lines that were being operated by the Intercolonial railway——

Mr. COPP: From Montreal to Sydney?

Mr. J. D. REID: From Montreal to Sydney; the Prince Edward Island railway, the International railway——

An hon. MEMBER: All the branch lines.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Moncton.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Quebec and Saguenay?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is being operated by the contractors at the present time. Then the Hudson's Bay railway is also being operated——

An hon. MEMBER: The Quebec and Lake St. John?

Mr. J. D. REID: That was part of the Canadian Northern system before.

Mr. COPP: I would like a plain statement of the railways operated by the Canadian Government railways without interruption from hon. members.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I might repeat and say, all the railways that were being operated by the Minister of Railways until they were transferred.

Mr. COPP: When was that?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think some time in January the Order in Council was passed. So far as my memory goes, it includes the line between Winnipeg and Moncton, the International railway between Montreal and Sydney, all the branch lines connected with the Intercolonial, and the Prince Edward Island railway. The Quebec and Saguenay is being operated by the contractors at the present time, but when it is completed it will also come into this Canadian National system. The Hudson's Bay railway has been placed under the management of the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. COPP: Was it with the Canadian Government system before the Order in Council?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, it was under construction and the contract was taken out of the hands of Mr. McArthur, a settlement was made with him, and then the operation of the road was handed over to the Canadian National Railway system. In other words, putting it concisely, all the railways that were being operated by the Minister of Railways have been handed over to the management and operation of this Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. COPP: Will the hon. minister be good enough to say what he refers to in this clause:

> "Canadian Government railways" means and includes all such railways or parts thereof, and all such properties, works, powers, rights and privileges or interests or any of them—

What does he propose to include there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The definition in (a) of section 10 says that it includes all these railways or parts thereof and all properties, works, powers, rights, and so on. "Powers," for instance, might be running powers, which would be appurtenant to a railway. I do not need to define the word "rights."

Mr. COPP: I understand that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Rights, privileges, and so forth—anything we have a right to entrust,, under section 11, to the company having been so entrusted and then becomes part of the Canadian National railways. That is the definition.

5 p.m.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. COPP: The information I am seeking is this; what, for instance, in connection with the old Intercolonial Railway system from Montreal to Sydney, Halifax and St. John would be included in regard to works, powers, rights and privileges? What would there be besides the railway itself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All it has. Has it not works in the city of Moncton? The hon. gentleman knows all about that. It will have certain rights and powers. I do not know whether it has running powers over some other road; it may not; if so, none can pass. The same applies to the Transcontinental or any other road which comes within the meaning of what is embraced in Section 11, so that the Governor in Council has power to entrust such powers, rights, works and properties to the Canadian National Railways. If they have no special powers, rights, works or properties, none can pass; but if they have they will be included in what passes under the Order in Council; that is all. They might have agreements, for example, as to exchange of traffic; if so those would be part of what would pass. All would be included in the subject matter embraced in the Order in Council, and having been so embraced it would become part of the Canadian Government Railways.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If it is thought proper by the board of directors to absorb a branch line, will the board be entitled to act upon its own initiative, or will it have to come before Parliament or the Governor in Council? Mr. Hanna and his colleagues might think it advantageous for the Canadian National Railways to get control of a branch line. What would happen in such an instance? It would be managed on business principles, I suppose, like any other railway company, but would the board of management be empowered to act in such a case?

Mr. J. D. REID: Sections 11 and 12.

Mr. POWER: Do rights, powers, privileges, etc., include the owning and operation of hotels?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they have any they would be included.

Mr. MARCIL: Will this company have the power to open hotels?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to build them?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, to operate them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not considered the subject, but I would say yes, in this way—the Canadian Northern Railway Company will be operated by the Canadian Government Railways, but the Canadian Northern Railway Company will still possess the powers it formerly possessed, and it has power to build hotels. I presume that under the charter of the Canadian Northern, hotels could be even built, but I do not like to speak too definitely on that. This Bill merely provides for a unified operation of these various systems.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the hon. minister any idea of the number of hotels formerly under the management of the Canadian Northern Railway Company? They have a number of large hotels in Winnipeg.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; just two—Brandon and Port Arthur.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hotel in Winnipeg is operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. POWER: Should the company desire to manage hotels in Quebec, I would highly recommend to the consideration of the President of the Privy Council that he should have them licensed.

Mr. BUREAU; Does section 10 empower the Government to turn over the Intercolonial to the Canadian National Railway Company?

Mr. J. D. REID: That section is merely a definition. The power to entrust the company with the management and operation of a Government-owned railway is in section 11.

Mr. BUREAU: But section 10 really leaves the definition to the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Governor in Council may entrust to the Canadian National Railway Company only such Government-owned railways as section 11 permits.

Mr. BUREAU: Then the two sections ought to be considered together?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: The thirty companies mentioned in the schedule of the Bill operate certain railways which are parts of this Government-owned system. I suppose some of these companies are created by local Act; their powers are independent of this House. When and by what method is the physical transfer of these companies from the old to the new management to take place, if it has not taken place already? We had some evidence last night that the Minister of Railways does not know much about the officers of these Government-owned roads or what salaries they are receiving. It is about time we knew who our officers are and how much we are paying them. Are they subject to our control, or to the control of the thirty or forty companies mentioned in the schedule to this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's first point is a legal one. He says: When and how are we going to transfer the Intercolonial and other roads to the Canadian National Railway Company?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not concerned about the Intercolonial. I refer to roads that are operated by companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Canadian Northern system?

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company and are operated as part of the Canadian Northern system; nothing that I am aware of requires to be done in that regard. Two companies that have independent charters will be taken care of under section 21 of this Bill, which provides for an agreement between His Majesty and the company for any of the purposes specified in sections 361 and 364 of the Railway Act. The intention is to bring about a unified management of all these roads immediately after the passing of this Act; there is no reason for delay, so far as we are aware. As to the salaries of the officers, information was given to the committee some time ago in response to a question. It is true that these salaries are not fixed by the Governor in Council, but that is because, with a view of divorcing the road from political control, the Governor in Council is not directly managing it. All this will now be under the care of the directorate of the Canadian National Railway Company; that is the system we submit to Parliament for approval.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these companies named in the schedule still to exist under their respective names?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They can be amalgamated under section 21.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that we are to have general control of the management, but that the names of these companies are to be continued?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not necessarily. The intention is to amalgamate the companies that have independent charters, as well as a great many more. That amalgamation, as I say, is already provided for under section 21.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have taken over these vast properties and are maintaining them, but they are operating under private names, and to the outside world they are owned by private corporations. The names of all these constituent companies of the old Canadian Northern System are still in use; when are we to discard them? When are these trammels to be thrown off? When will these properties be owned by us just as the Intercolonial and Transcontinental are owned? The taxation on these properties in the different provinces, amounting to a considerable sum of money, is paid by the Government, as are the salaries of the manager and of the employees.

If these properties actually belonged to the Government, we would pay no taxes at all, because the property of the Crown is not subject to private taxation in school sections or municipalities. No taxes are paid on the Intercolonial, nor on the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Moncton. Why, then, should we be paying taxes on these thousands of miles of railway as private concerns when, in fact and in law, we are not liable to taxation at all? I am giving this as a reason why we should wipe out these conventionalities which stand in the way of actual, real ownership of those properties which we are supposed to own and for the management of which we are now providing. If this is a Government railway, why should it be called the Canadian Northern and why should it have around it all the machinery that it had when it was the Canadian Northern? The country thinks it owns these properties altogether, when in fact there are in the way what seem to be unnecessary machinery and complications which should be wiped out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under section 21, an amalgamation is provided. The hon. member's question is: To what extent shall we take advantage of that, and when? One of the purposes of this Bill is to pave the way for amalgamation and for getting rid of the various entities that have comprised the system as separate entities. It is the intention to amalgamate just as rapidly as we can, but all cannot be amalgamated, because in respect of some there is still outstanding stock. Where there is outstanding stock, amalgamation would be very inconvenient because stock would have to be given. Where there is not outstanding stock, it is the purpose to amalgamate without any unnecessary delay. Of course, immediately amalgamation takes place, the name goes out of existence.

Mr. BUREAU: If I understand rightly, there are only two sets of railways owned by the Government, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Government railways, the latter comprising the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. The object of the Bill is to consolidate those two systems. The preamble says:

> Whereas His Majesty on behalf of the Dominion of Canada has acquired control of the Canadian Northern Railway company and of the various constituent and subsidiary companies comprising the Canadian Northern system, as specified in the schedule to this Act.

The schedule mentions a number of constituent and subsidiary companies of the Canadian Northern. Does the list contained in the schedule show the names of all the constituent and subsidiary companies, because I see in the list of subsidiary companies the Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited? Would that come under the control of the company which is now being incorporated?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; we now own the stock in that company.

Mr. BUREAU: I find in the Canada Gazette, of January 11, 1919, a notice signed by Mr. Colson, Acting Under Secretary of State, headed "Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Ltd.," and stating:

> Public notice is hereby given that under the first part of chapter 79 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, known as "The Companies' Act," and amending Acts, letters patent have been issued, etc.—

I want to read the names of the petitioners for this charter, and also a few of the powers granted by the Government to this company. My object in bringing this before the House is to find out whether or not this is a separate concern incorporated for a separate purpose, or whether the Government will allow people at large or foreign to the Government to use the name "Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Ltd.?" This seems, on reading the names, to be a first cousin to the Canadian Northern system. Some of the petitioners, whom I happen to know personally, may not be directors, but they are closely connected with the Canadian Northern. The notice continues:

> Letters patent have been issued under the seal of the Secretary of State of Canada, bearing date the 30th day of December, 1918, incorporating Gerard Ruel, barrister-at-law.

If I am not mistaken, this gentleman is general counsel of the Canadian Northern.

Lorne William Mitchell, treasurer.

I think this gentleman is also closely connected with the present administration.

Wilfred Bankart Langmore, solicitor; Charles Durno Cowie, secretary, and Frederick Joseph Buller, paymaster, all of the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, for the following purposes, viz:—

To construct, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, charter, own, maintain, operate and manage:—

(a) steamships vessels, tugs, car ferries, dredges, lighters, barges, boats, and water craft of every description.

That would include the steamers, the King George, and the other "Kings" that plough the ocean.

(b) structures, erections, buildings, hotels, shops, stores, works, appliances, mills, machinery, plant and equipment of every nature and kind whatsoever, on land or on water deemed by the company to be necessary or required for or in connection with the construction, manufacture, maintenance, operation, navigation, management, renewal or repairs of the company's vessels, works, undertakings, appliances or equipment, etc.

I am not going to weary the House with an enumeration of all the powers that are asked for, because they are very numerous. Will there not be a conflict of authority in this case, if those people are really Canadian Northern railway people who are incorporated under the Companies Act to manage that part of the "properties, works, powers, rights and privileges or interests," which the Canadian Northern railway have, which are enumerated in the schedule and which contain inter alia a subsidiary company, the Canadian Northern Steamships, Ltd. There must have been some reason for this incorporation, and if the company incorporated by letters patent is to exercise all the powers it asks for in these letters patent, it covers the construction of docks, the erection, equipment and management of hotels and all those things, part of which form an asset of the Canadian Northern Railway. I want to know what authority or control it exercises over any part of the system.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last company which the hon. gentleman named, Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited, is a subsidiary company. While the Canadian Northern Steamships Company did own certain vessels—the Royal George and the Royal Edward—I believe it owns now only the Perry at Vancouver and a new steamer built at Quebec. The Canadian Northern Steamships Limited is a subsidiary company of the Canadian Northern Railway Company whose stock we own. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, is a new company not yet organized. The charter has just been taken out at the instance of the Government and the stock when issued will be owned by the Government. The stock of that company so owned by the Crown may, under Section 29 of this Bill, be transferred to the Canadian National Railways for the purposes of amalgamation if the Government so desire. The intention is to have all operated together. The company is formed merely for the purpose of taking over the Government steamships being built.

Mr. BUREAU: For the purpose of taking over Government steamships?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Government ships that are being built and such as we will operate ourselves. The stock will be owned by the Government and under Section 29 may be transferred to this company, so that the whole may be operated together.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Does the Government intend establishing a line of steamships as well as railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are building steamships now and it is contemplated they will be operated by this body.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It has been found advisable by railway and steamship companies to have a separate charter for each steamship. A steamship worth $20,000 or $30,000 might run into an ocean liner worth a couple of millions and under marine law all you would lose if your captain were held responsible would be your steamship provided she was regularly incorporated. But if you took her in as part of the Canadian Government Railway and there were a collision, I presume you would have to pay a considerable sum for damages.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have a charter for each steamship.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Have you taken over all branch lines you intend taking over in Eastern Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: All we intend taking over at the present time.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Has any consideration been given to the Gaspé line?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not considered taking over any other than those mentioned in the Estimates of last year. Two of those refused to accept the offer—the Caraquet and another.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: What about giving Quebec a show in the matter? The Gaspé line is 200 odd miles long and was built ten years ago.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not had any request from them to be taken over. I think they are paying well and do not want to be taken over.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Both the hon. member for Gaspé and myself have been advocating this matter for twenty years in this House. Unfortunately the road fell into the hands of a local company who became insolvent and the country has been held back for want of a proper service. The service is nothing compared to what it would be under Government control. Gaspé is a seaport open ten months of the year, and there is a great opportunity there for the Canadian National Railway Company to get a splendid feeder. The roads taken over in New Brunswick are important, but they are not more important than the Gaspé railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: The shareholders have never, so far as I know, approached the Government to sell their railway and we are not anxious to purchase.

Mr. TOBIN: Is it the intention of the Government to take over the Lotbinière and Megantic?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not considered that matter since it was taken up in the House a couple of years ago.

Mr. TURGEON: Is the Minister of Railways now considering the question of taking over the Caraquet and Restigouche railway? In further efforts to have this road absorbed or taken over, I would like to be informed whether I shall have to apply to Mr. Hanna, say, or the company, or shall I have to deal again with the Minister of Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: If the railway is taken over it will only be a matter of negotiation between the Government and the owners. If the Government took it over, under this next section we could hand it over, if we so desired, to the management of the Canadian National railways for operation.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister said that the Canadian Northern Steamships Limited formerly owned the Royal George and the Royal Edward, but that now they own only the Perry at Vancouver. What has become of the Royal George and the Royal Edward?

Mr. J. D. REID: They were sold some years ago during the war.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object in getting letters patent to constitute the Government a company to operate steamships? Why not come before Parliament and let the people know that you have an organization within an organization and tell us what you are going to do. The Department of Marine looks after the interests of our waterways generally, and if you are going to operate a system of steamships in connection with the railway it will be well to have a Parliamentary charter. I do not see that there is anything to gain, and it seems strange to me, and I am sure to those who are not acquainted with the devious ways of the Government, suspicious, that you should get letters patent to have these men run a railway line and a hotel system which would be better run as a branch under the executive of the railway company.

I asked what was the reason for this incorporation and the Acting Minister of Justice did not answer, but said that they formed a company and that the stock is owned by the Government. That million is the property of the Government. We know that the Government must be behind this company because with a million dollars they could never begin to have plans of the road and surveys made and to accomplish all the great things that they have taken power to do. There is nothing serious about this Bill except that the Governor in Council wants to take hold of this railways system and avoid criticism by this House by getting behind the company that we are creating. If you are going to take a subsidiary company like the Canadian Northern Steamships Limited, is there any necessity for this charter which was granted in September last to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited? Whenever the Government wants to exercise power of this kind or to become a competitor in any kind of business, whether merchant marine or railway, Parliament is the proper authority to appeal to. The members of this House, having a mandate from the people, are the persons to discuss these matters and to say whether or not the Government ought to go into this business. In this case, if the object is to form a company to operate a line of steamships for and on behalf of the Government, why not come before Parliament and ask for a charter to that effect and let us have an opportunity of discussing with you the wisdom or otherwise of forming such a company. I do not see why you should issue this charter when you already have the Canadian Northern system charter authorizing you to do the things that you say you desire to do. I have not read the law but still that company have been operating the Royal George and the Royal Edward. They must have power in connection with their railway to operate any kind of steamers connecting their railway terminals with Europe or with any other country beyond the seas. The Acting Minister of Justice said that while these gentlemen were incorporated by charter the stock was owned by the Government. I want to know why this charter was issued instead of using the charter of the Canadian Northern Steamships Limited which was granted by Parliament. I do not think it is right for the Government to launch into an enterprise like that, issue from itself to itself, or to certain men the right to use the Government's name and to operate any kind of an enterprise without the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman could not have been listening to the very clear explanation of that very point made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair): Charters are taken out first of all for each of the boats constructed in order that the liabilities for each boat may be limited to the boat itself. That is the practice of those operating steamships. That is the practice we are following precisely for the reason stated by the hon. member for Guysborough. Then all the stock of the various companies representing the various single boats, is connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited more for convenience than for any other purpose. It costs practically nothing to get the letters patent—only $100 which comes to ourselves—and then all the stock is collected and held by this company. Either the Minister of Finance or the Government holds that stock and it is that stock which may be transferred under section 29 to the Canadian National railways. That is the reason this company has been incorporated.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand the minister to say that he wants incorporation for each steamer so as to limit the liability.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: For what particular steamers was the charter for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited issued?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have just explained. This is a holding company and it holds the stock of the separate companies. That is more convenient than to have the stock of all the separate companies held separately and each one separately transferred to this road. They are all collected together in that way and we have the whole thing in one.

Mr. BUREAU: Why did you not come to Parliament? This company could have been as well incorporated by Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no need to come to Parliament for everything. It is very pleasant to come to Parliament but if we came to Parliament for every single thing it would be a slow process.

Mr. BUREAU: If you are going to incorporate a body of men to handle public money and to operate the property of the people, Parliament is the proper place to come for the incorporation of that company. If the hon. gentleman takes the ground that it is no use coming here, I say that we are not going to sit here like dummies or like an Indian figure in front of a cigar store. We have come to the point where the ministers think they are gods, think they know everything, and that they can do anything without regard to Parliament. I object to that principle. Whether this is a holding company, an operating company or any other kind of a company that is going to handle the moneys or do the business of the people of Canada, the Government have no right to confer upon a certain number of their creatures rights which are conferred generally on outsiders who apply for incorporation. Parliament should be consulted and we should know what we are doing with these operating companies, what they are going to hold and why we are incorporating them. Parliament is entitled to be consulted as to whether or not it is advisable to have such a company. The principle is absolutely wrong and my hon. friend need not say that it is a slow process to come to Parliament with everything. You are going to take a million dollars of the people's money and put it into the hands of this operating or holding company without consulting Parliament. It is not fair to the people that the Government should enter upon any such policy. If that is their policy let them say it and then we will go to the people and tell them that our usefulness is gone and that the Government is prepared to act without reference to the views of the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is getting unnecessarily excited. All this is done under the authority of Parliament. This is done under the Companies' Act.

Mr. BUREAU: The War Measures' Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not the War Measures' Act, but the Companies' Act, and it is just what the hon. member would have power to do in regard to any company.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman is shifting. I do not say you have not power to do it, but the principle is wrong, because you should come to Parliament in such a case even if it does happen to come under the Companies' Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One would ordinarily understand that Parliament meant to give the powers it did give and did not mean to be bothered with the exercise of those powers in each individual case.

Mr. BUREAU: This gives authority to spend $1,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Every dollar has been spent with the direct authority of Parliament.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would the Minister of Railways tell the committee how many steamers he has at present?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are five altogether.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: May I be allowed to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the desirability of developing Canadian trade rather than United States trade?

The CHAIRMAN: I must draw the attention of the committee to the fact that we have been discussing clause 11 for the last half hour, although clause 10 has not yet been passed.

Mr. BUREAU: It was understood that clauses 10 and 11 should be considered together.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 11 has not yet been reached.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked the Acting Minister of Justice if it would not be better to consider both clauses together and he replied in the affirmative, and I understood the committee unanimously consented to that being done.

The CHAIRMAN: The question just asked by the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) would be quite in order if clause 11 was under consideration.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. BUREAU: I move that clauses 10 and 11 be considered together.

Mr. J. D. REID: And shall both be passed together?

Mr. BUREAU: That is another question. The first man who made a break in referring to clause 11 was the Acting Minister of Justice.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Now, Mr. Chairman, am I in order in referring to this matter?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, under clause 11.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I took occasion to ask the minister what use he was making of these vessels, because the people wish to know if they are to be employed in developing Canadian trade. Much surprise was caused by the Canadian Voyageur being chartered last November to carry sugar to New York from the West Indian Islands, which is not promoting Canadian trade. Not even the insurance was taken out in Canada, it being placed with Messrs. Johnston and Higgins of New York. Cannot we place in the hands of Canadian brokers the marine insurance that is necessary on our vessels? With reference to the steamer McKee, which is one of the vessels referred to by the minister, the following questions were put by me in the House and answered on April 7:

1. To whom is the Steamer McKee chartered?
2. What is the nature of the cargo, the rate of freight per ton, the port of loading and port of discharge?
3. What is the return cargo, rate of freight per ton, and port of destination?
4. Is the hull insured? If so, with what company and for how much?
5. Is the freight insured?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. To the American Metal Transport Co., of New York.
2. Cargo of coal from New York to Chili, rate of freight 30 shillings per ton D.W. per month, and the charterers assume all expenses except wages of the crew.
3. Return cargo is ore, the rate of freight per ton is 30 shillings per ton D.W. Port of destination, New York.
4. The hull is insured through Willcox, Peck and Hughes of New York for $336,000.
5. Yes.

It therefore appears that the Railway Department is using steamers that were built at great expense by the Canadian Government for the purpose of developing American trade. Now there has been a great deal of difficulty of late in selling coal from the mines of Nova Scotia and keeping those mines going, and yet this boat was chartered to carry coal from New York to the west coast of South America. Why is she not engaged in carrying Canadian coal, which would mean providing work for Canadian miners in the counties of Cape Breton and Pictou and elsewhere in Nova Scotia? I do not know whether the minister is considering this question or not, but if we are going to send out steamers to engage in trade we should at all events consider the question of using them for the development of Canadian trade and not the trade of a foreign country. If there is any justification for the large expense incurred in the building of these vessels, it must be found in their being used in the development of our own trade. I would like to have some information from the minister as to why Canadian vessels are employed in helping the trade of a foreign country.

Mr. J. D. REID: The steamship to which the hon. gentleman alludes was chartered to carry coal from New York to Chili. I made inquiries about it and learned that the steamer McKee, while on her way from New York to Prince Edward Island with a cargo of rails, was wrecked and had to be taken to New York and repaired. This was in the winter season and the vessel is a small one, adapted to the navigation of the Upper Lakes rather than to ocean navigation. After being repaired she was chartered to carry a cargo on the Southern route, where she was not exposed to transoceanic risks. That was done in order to keep the vessel employed until the opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence, when it is intended that she shall operate between Nova Scotia and St. Lawrence ports. The Government originally had the Sheba and two other vessels of similar type that were suitable for ocean traffic.

Two of these have been lost since the commencement of the war, one as the result of a collision while on her way from a Nova Scotia port to New York, the other being sunk by a submarine en route to Europe with a cargo belonging to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company.

Mr. BUREAU: Was she carrying steel rails?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think steel rails which were being sent by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company to Europe for war purposes. The Government then purchased the Drummond and McKee, but they are not really vessels suited to ocean navigation. It was for that reason that the charter in question to southern ports was allowed to be taken out. Both vessels will return immediately and be placed in service between Nova Scotia and Lévis at the opening of navigation.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it intended to transfer the properties of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, to the company whose incorporation we are considering, or will the properties of the Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited, be transferred to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited?

Mr. J. D. REID: When the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway System was transferred to the Minister of Finance, the transfer of the stock of the Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited, to the same authority followed automatically. As the Acting Minister of Justice has explained, a company is being formed under the Companies Act to operate each steamer which is being constructed by the Government. If we were to build fifty steamers a charter must be taken out for each, and the stock represented by each charter would be transferred to the Canadian Merchant Marine, Limited. When we get to that point and there is, let us say, a million dollars worth of stock in existence, that stock can be transferred either to the Minister of Finance or to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister did not understand my question. Will the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, operate these vessels or will the company that we are now incorporating? In other words, is it intended to transfer the property of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, to the Canadian National Railway Company so as to form part of that system?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian National Railway Company that we are now incorporating will control and operate the Canadian National Merchant Marine. It is carrying out a similar policy to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. member is aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have all their vessels separate from their railway, the stock of the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company being held by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Steamship Company being operated by the board of directors of the railway company.

Mr. BUREAU: Who are the directors of the Canadian National Merchant Marine now?

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, it has not been organized, but the directors of the Canadian National Merchant Marine will be practically the same as those of the Canadian National Railways. There might be one or two changes, for this reason. If you have a general manager of the steamship company who is giving its whole time to its management, you might put him on the board of directors of the Canadian National Merchant Marine; or instead of having fifteen directors as on the railway, you might take seven or eight directors and name them as directors of the Canadian National Merchant Marine.

Mr. BUREAU: Always forming part of the Canadian Government Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: It will always be really part and parcel of the Canadian National Railways. In other words, you cannot very well operate the Canadian National Railways without having a regular steamship line both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and this is intended for that purpose.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand from what the hon. minister says that this is intended for ocean-going steamers?

Mr. J. D. REID: It might apply also to inland steamers. For instance, the Canadian National Railways may have lake steamers running between, say, Port Arthur and Midland; or it may have steamers carrying coal between Lake Erie ports and Montreal. There is a very large amount of coal used there. So this would apply to any vessels used for that purpose.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CANNON: When the Government took over the Quebec and Saguenay railway, how near to the city of Quebec did the rails of that line come?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Quebec and Saguenay commences at the terminus of the Quebec and Montmorency, about thirty miles from Quebec, and extends east to Murray Bay or Nairn's Falls.

Mr. CANNON: There are about thirty miles between the terminal and the city?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have running rights over the Quebec and Montmorency.

Mr. CANNON: When did the Government acquire running rights on that thirty miles?

Mr. J. D. REID: The chief engineer in charge of the construction of the Quebec and Saguenay made an arrangement some time last fall. I could not give the date from memory; it was several months ago.

Mr. POWER: I understand that last August the Quebec and Saguenay did not have running rights into Quebec. I do not know whether the matter has yet been settled.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am speaking only from memory. When the contractor started to operate the railway two rates were charged, one on the Quebec and Saguenay and another on the Quebec and Montmorency into Quebec. Perhaps I am wrong in stating that running rights were acquired. Anyway, a satisfactory arrangement as to rates was made and approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON: Under that arrangement, how much does it cost to enter the city of Quebec?

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot give that information offhand, but if the hon. gentleman wants to see the agreement I shall be glad to send him a copy of it, and to explain the arrangement that has been made for the carrying of traffic from the end of the Quebec and Saguenay line into Quebec.

Mr. POWER: I understand that this arrangement has been made between the Quebec Street Railway Company and the contractor.

Mr. J. D. REID: The contractor is in charge of the operation only while the road is under construction. As soon as construction is completed and the road taken off his hands the Government will have to make a permanent arrangement for operating over the whole line into Quebec.

Mr. POWER: Has the Government considered the question of taking over the thirty miles?

Mr. J. D. REID: Under an Act passed three or four years ago we were to take over three roads, the Quebec and Montmorency, the Lotbinière and Megantic and the Quebec and Saguenay, on a valuation to be made by the judge of the Exchequer Court. But when it went to the Exchequer Court there was some question as to the interpretation placed by the judge upon the subsidies that had been paid and the interest during construction and the valuation of the Quebec and Montmorency and of the Lotbiniere and Megantic has never been finally decided. A valuation was placed on the Quebec and Saguenay and we passed a Bill to take it over. Since then the war intervened and we have not considered the matter. At some future time we shall have to decide whether to go ahead with the purchase of that thirty miles, or to acquire running rights over the Quebec and Montmorency into Quebec. Of course, if we do not wish to purchase the Quebec and Saguenay outright, we can apply for running rights and the Railway Commission can decide on what terms and conditions those rights should be given. From any conversations that have been had—the matter has been seldom mentioned—I understand that there would be no trouble in arranging the matter with those connected with the Quebec and Montmorency. I have been urging the contractors to give me an idea as to when the road will be in operation to Murray Bay, and I am assured that passenger traffic will be handled not later than the first of July.

Mr. MICHAUD: How many miles would that be?

Mr. J. D. REID: Murray Bay is about ninety miles from Quebec; about sixty miles will be completed to Murray Bay.

Mr. MICHAUD: Has the company made any proposal to the Government with regard to the purchase of the road?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not taken the matter up since it was before Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am pleased to hear that the train to Murray Bay will be running by the first of July. I think the Government has made a good bargain in acquiring by agreement those running rights on the Quebec and Montmorency. Has the minister any idea as to the time it will take to run those trains between Quebec and Murray Bay, and will there be a through car attached to the daily train from Montreal central station over the Canadian National railways? As I am a summer resident of Murray Bay, and as I know the conditions there, I would suggest that the minister see that arrangements are made to have a through car service between Montreal and Murray Bay during the summer season, because a large number of people from the United States and from the district of Montreal have summer residences at Murray Bay, St. Irénée and Cap à l'Aigle. If such an arrangement be made, the service will be a source of revenue to the railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member, of course, knows that at the city of Quebec there is now a union station, namely, the Canadian Pacific, for all railways. The Canadian Northern, I think, runs in there now, and since their station was burned or pulled down, they, of course, being part of the Government railways, will use that station. The summer traffic usually commences about the first of July.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before that.

Mr. J. D. REID: I thought that on the first of July trains should be put on the Quebec and Saguenay to take care of the whole summer traffic instead of using the ferry from St. Denis to Murray Bay. In order to do that, a first class train should leave Quebec at night after the arrival of all the different trains, and go to Murray Bay; a day train might also be put on. We would start out with a service that all would be proud of, and we would show that the Quebec and Saguenay is not such a bad road after all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: During eight months of the year there is no necessity of having a fast passenger service, but in June, July, August and possibly on to the 15th of September there is quite a large population along that shore, so that a fast service will be required. Many American tourists and Canadians, too, spend the summer months at Murray Bay, Cap à l'Aigle and St. Irénée. If you had a train which could reach those points early in the day you would attract more people there.

As regards local traffic, I am quite sure that within a few years from now the minister will be surprised at the quantity of freight that can be gathered along that shore. There is on foot just now another project which the minister has possibly heard of, and which, if it materializes, will mean the development of the remaining section of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I understand that another syndicate contemplates building from Nairn's Falls as far as Chicoutimi. If that project materializes it would certainly make a very valuable asset of the Government road.

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot remember just now the amount of business Mr. Grant told me a few weeks ago was being done on the Quebec and Saguenay, but I was surprised to know that there was so much. That railway is giving a splendid service, and I have not had any complaints, except that at the start complaints were made about the freight charges. I took the matter up with Mr. Grant and told him to take it before the Railway Commission, and see that rates were made on a basis that the

Mr. POWER: Has the right-of-way along the Quebec and Saguenay been purchased and paid for?

Mr. J. D. REID: When we took it over, there were some few cases that had not been settled, but before the owners get the money they must give us a clear title. The Department of Justice have a firm of solicitors looking at the titles, and they will not let the money be finally paid out until clear titles are obtained. An amount will be kept to cover payment for those cases that have not been settled.

Mr. POWER: Complete payment has not been made?

Mr. J. D. REID: The money has been paid into a trust company which is holding it until clear titles are obtained, and then we get title from them.

Mr. CANNON: The minister said he was very much surprised at the report made by the engineer as to the traffic carried on the Quebec and Saguenay.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said I was surprised there was so much traffic. There was an impression that there would be very little traffic on the Quebec and Saguenay, and what I wished to convey to the Committee was that I was surprised to learn from the statement Mr. Grant gave me that there was so much more than I expected.

Mr. CANNON: I spent last summer at St. Irénée on the line of the Quebec and Saguenay, and I could see how the line was being built. I think the minister will very soon have more than a surprise on account of the very peculiar way in which the line is being built. The line at St. Irénée is being built right next to the river St. Lawrence, and when there is a high tide in the fall or in the spring, I am afraid the whole thing will wash out.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to have some information as to the Government's shipbuilding programme. There is a certain degree of uneasiness on the part of the people over the fact that the Government is embarking on the ownership of vessels. It is a risky undertaking in any event, and in the last report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries I see there is an indication that it is to become a permanent policy. We were told that the building of vessels was a war measure, and then that it was necessary to build ships in order to give employment to our people. As I suggested once before during this session, I do not think he could have hit on a much worse programme than the building of ships if he wanted to give employment. We are importing the plates from abroad, and the expensive articles that go into the construction of a ship are also being imported; and the labour provided people in the construction of the ships is a bagatelle compared with the expense entailed. I observe in the last Marine and Fisheries report that the Government purpose to build about 200,000 tons of shipping annually at an estimated cost of about $40,000,000. I can scarcely believe that to be the case.

The CHAIRMAN: The question asked by the hon. member would be in order only so far as it might relate to ships which are to be constructed or controlled by the Canadian National Railway. But the shipbuilding policy of the Government certainly cannot be discussed on clause 11 of the Bill.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think it has already been explained that all ships owned by the Government are under the control of the Railway Department. I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I would like to obtain from the minister a statement as to the policy of the Government in regard to this matter. Is it intended that 200,000 tons shall be built each year, and that large liabilities shall be incurred for that purpose? If it is, I would like to have a full explanation as to what use is to be made of the ships. I can understand why the Government should build certain classes of ships in connection with their railway system, and have a line of ships across the Atlantic to connect with the railway system at Halifax and St. John. But there is no more reason for the Government to undertake the building of tramp vessels than to embark on the ownership of automobiles or trucks on the streets. One can understand their establishing a steamship line across the ocean to carry the traffic of the railways, but as I understand the programme, that is not what they intend to do and is not what they have done so far. What does the minister say?

Mr. J. D. REID: All I can answer for this evening are the vessels that are now being constructed—I think about fifty in all. These vessels are to be operated in connection with the Canadian National Railway. We have no steamers on the Pacific, and we require a number of vessels to do the business that the Canadian National Railways will have with the Far East. Then we need vessels on the Atlantic to go to the West Indies and South America. I do not think we can call these "tramp" vessels, and it is in the interests of Canada to do business with those countries. Up to the present time we have had only two of these new vessels. With reference to the shipbuilding policy of the Government, I hope the hon. member will not think me discourteous if I say that that is a matter that can be answered fully by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), who has just returned. After a few days he will be going on with his Estimates and will, I am sure, be glad to give information in connection with the matter.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, has been organized for the purpose of taking over the steamship end of the Canadian National Railway system, and that this is being done because it is necessary to have a steamship line in connection with the railway in order to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway and carry freight around the world. As it appears to me, this Canadian Government Merchant Marine Company is only a dummy and the operation and control of these steamships will be under the Canadian National Railway system. That is, Mr. Hanna who is president of the organization, will see that some one competent to handle steamships will be appointed, like Mr. Bosworth of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to look after the steamship line, which will include both light vessels going through the Sault canal and navigating on the Great Lakes, and ocean-going steamers. If that is so, I do not see why this particular company should not at this time, before its organization, decide where the chief place of business shall be. The only reason seems to be the fact that the Governor in Council would not be exposed to criticism, unless the question were brought before the House and a motion were made to change the place from Toronto to Montreal. I think the main office of the organization which is going to handle the steamships should be at a tidewater port, and if this end of the business is to be in Toronto the minister might as well stand up and tell us so.

Mr. J. D. REID: The company can have the head office changed at any time. With reference to the matter of having the principal place of business at a tidewater port, the general manager, whoever he is, can be located at Montreal or wherever it is necessary for him to be in order to do the business of the company.

We will no doubt take over the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific and have all these railways incorporated under one Act. The whole railway system will have to be reorganized when we get it together. Then the question of the head office organization must be dealt with. We cannot deal with these matters until we get the whole railway situation settled. Negotiations are going on and I hope they will move with sufficient rapidity to enable us to deal with the matter during the session.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand from the minister that when the situation is cleared up the whole railway system will have to be reorganized? Does he mean by reorganization that he will have to submit to Parliament a new Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: If an agreement is arrived at whereby we take over the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, we must certainly come to Parliament. It will be such an immense system and so important that we must reorganize it. When the matter comes up we will be in a position to give much more definite information than we can at present.

Mr. POWER: I would urge on the minister the advisability of establishing a line of freight steamers sailing from St. John or Halifax in winter and from Quebec in summer. As the minister is aware, the Transcontinental has its water terminus in Quebec. It has been repeatedly urged by the board of trade and other public bodies in Quebec that steps be taken to impress upon the Government the advisability of running a line of steamships such as I have suggested for the purpose of carrying western grain. If my information is correct the Transcontinental railway can do the business of carrying western grain far cheaper than the Canadian Pacific. The grain would go through our own Canadian ports. This has been for some years a matter of great concern to the city of Quebec. I take this opportunity, now that we know definitely that steamships are under the control of the railway, of asking the minister to look into the matter with a view to increasing the business of the Transcontinental railway, taking away the business from rival roads, decreasing the cost of transportation to the western farmer, and in general helping on the prosperity of the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall be very glad to take this matter up with the head of the road.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister come to a decision with regard to certain flag stations the establishment of which has been suggested to him along the line of the Quebec and Saguenay railway? Some time ago I sent petitions to his department in regard to the erection of a flag station at Le Petit Debarquement, between Cap Tourmente and Petite Riviere St. François; at Le Ruisseau Jureux, near St. Irénée; and also at Nairn's Falls behind Murray Bay. I would ask the minister to be good enough to let me know what decision he arrived at in the matter. I submitted statements showing the amount of traffic available at these places. I have had no definite answer yet to my request.

Mr. J. D. REID: I asked Mr. Grant to look into that matter very thoroughly and give me a report. I have not yet received that report. As soon as I get it I will send it to the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) and discuss the matter with him.

Mr. CASGRAIN: While we are speaking on the Quebec and Saguenay railway, I would like to submit an observation to the minister concerning his department, and it may also concern the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It is the intention to complete the extension of the road to Murray Bay by next season. But there will still be the service of the steamer Champlain which is being operated between the south shore and the north shore or between Rivière Ouelle and Murray Bay. The service of this boat may not be so necessary when the new railway is completed which will take people from Montreal and Quebec direct to Murray Bay. Will it be possible to devise a plan by which this boat will render a double service that will be useful to the people of other parts of the country, such as Cap à L'Aigle, St. Fidèle, St. Siméon and Tadoussac along the north shore below Murray Bay, which places will never have the benefit of the railway if they are unable to have any communication with it. As the service between the north and the south shore will not be so necessary as in the past, the boat might carry on a service between Murray Bay and Tadoussac and then cross to the south shore once or twice a week and make connections for the people who wish to take the boat for Murray Bay and below that point.

Mr. J. D. REID: The operation of this boat has been carried on by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I will bring the matter to the attention of my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), and I will also try and get the railway in operation as soon as possible.

Mr. COPP: The operation of the ferry between Cape Tormentine and Port Borden is under the Department of Railways and Canals. While the Government are embarking on the enterprise of building steamers for traffic, is it the intention to build another ferry to run between these two points? As the minister well knows, the ferry, after being operated through the ice in the winter time, has to go into drydock for repairs each summer, and for a considerable time there is no connection between these two points. While the Government is engaged in building vessels I would urge upon the minister the great necessity of building a twin ferry so that one boat could always be kept in operation. When the ferry service is discontinued between Cape Tormentine and Port Borden the traffic has to cross between Summerside and Point du Chêne, and the offices have to be moved. New buildings have been erected at the junction point of Sackville for the purpose of accommodating this traffic, but when the traffic is diverted to the other route they are left unused. I notice by the papers that the vessel has been laid off this week for repairs. This suspension of the ferry dislocates trade, and is very inconvenient for those who use that route.

Mr. J. D. REID: Owing to the great cost of vessel construction it would probably not be right to consider the building of another ship for this purpose at present. If I remember correctly, the Scotia was operating at Mulgrave and a new steamer was put on in her place. It was proposed at one time, I think, to fix up that vessel so that she could be used on this route and thus have a spare vessel when the ferry was compelled to lay up for repairs once a year, or might be disabled by accident. The vessel in question is much smaller, but by running more frequently she might meet the need temporarily for three or four weeks.

Mr. COPP: Such a boat might answer as a substitute for two or three weeks, while the regular ferry is undergoing repairs. If that were done it would prove of great advantage to the people who use that route for trade purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: Clause 11 is very wide in its scope. It reads:

The Governor in Council may from time to time by Order in Council entrust to the company the management and operation of any lines of railway or part thereof, and any property or works of whatsoever description, or interest therein, and any powers, rights or privileges over or with respect to any railways, properties or works, or interests therein, which may be from time to time vested in or owned, controlled or occupied by His Majesty, or such part or parts thereof, or rights or interests therein as may be designated in any Order in Council, upon such terms and subject to such regulations and conditions as the Governor in Council may from time to time decide; such management and operation to continue during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and to be subject to termination or variation from time to time in whole or in part by the Governor in Council.

The minister will admit that this confers upon the Governor in Council very wide powers, under which it can do practically anything it likes with any branch of railway forming part of the system. I think the public should be apprised of whatever action the Governor in Council takes in such matters, and I would therefore suggest that whenever an Order in Council is passed taking advantage of any of the powers granted under this section it shall not go into effect until it has been published in the Canada Gazette, so that the public may be afforded an opportunity of knowing what is going on and given a chance, if any objection is entertained, to remonstrate to the department or the Government.

Hon. gentlemen opposite professed to be shocked this afternoon when I proposed the submission to Parliament of the by-laws which might be passed by the company. I notice, however, that in Australia all such by-laws have to be laid before both Houses of Parliament within thirty days of their adoption, and, if Parliament is not in session, within thirty days after it shall have convened. The commissioner in Australia is given very wide powers and can make by-laws applicable to every branch of the administration of a railway, but these by-laws must be submitted to the Governor-General and do not become effective until after they have been published in the official Gazette. In Volume 15, Commonwealth Acts, 1917, is the Statute dealing with the Government railways. Section 88 provides:

(1) The commissioner may make by-laws, not inconsistent with this Act, prescribing all matters which by this Act are required or permitted to be prescribed, or which are necessary or convenient to be prescribed for carrying out or giving effect to this Act, and in particular for the following:

Then follows the enumeration of the subjects upon which by-laws may be made, and paragraph (2) of the section reads:

No by-law shall have any force or effect until it has been—
(a) approved by the Governor General; and—
(b) published in the Gazette.

And then paragraph (3) reads:

(3) By-laws shall not be deemed to be Statutory Rules within the meaning of the Rules Publication Act, 1903-1916.
(4) All such by-laws shall be laid before both Houses of the Parliament within thirty days after the making thereof, if the Parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within thirty days of the next meeting of Parliament.

Now in view of the wide powers conferred by the section in the Bill we are considering, I would suggest adding to the section:

Such Orders in Council to be published in the official Gazette of Canada before they take force and effect.

Mr. J. D. REID: If the hon. gentleman will read the clause he will see that it merely entrusts to the company the management and operation of the lines of railway in question. In the past, so far as the Intercolonial railway was concerned, its operation was entrusted to a general manager, and then a commission was appointed to manage and operate the railway.

Mr. BUREAU: "Upon such terms and subject to such regulations and conditions as the Governor in Council may from time to time decide." That is how the clause reads, and we want to know under what terms it is to be carried out.

Mr. J. D. REID: We formerly had a general manager and all that this clause means is that we propose to do the same thing here—entrust to a board of management the operation of the Government Railway system.

Mr. BUREAU: No, the powers in regard to management can be restricted or enlarged.

Mr. J. D. REID: We must trust the board of management. For instance, if the board of management submits by-laws and the Governor in Council passes an Order in Council with respect to them, the Government must accept the responsibility of its action no matter what the public may think. Then when Parliament meets all the Orders in Council that have been passed can be laid upon the Table for the consideration of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all I want. I want the Orders in Council which will be passed under section 11 to be laid upon the Table within a certain time after Parliament convenes.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is entirely in the hands of hon. members to have those Orders laid upon the Table. The very fact of it being mentioned in the Bill does not make it any more certain that the Orders will be laid upon the Table—

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, yes.

Mr. J. D. REID: For this reason the House is entitled to all Orders in Council, and if they are not laid upon the Table by the Minister of Railways hon. members will ask for them and they will be produced. I do not see that this proposal would afford any greater protection. I do not think we should load the Bill up any more. As was said by the Acting Minister of Justice this afternoon, we are trying to keep away as much as possible from laying Orders in Council upon the Table.

Mr. BUREAU: We are trying to keep away—why?

Mr. J. D. REID: Because there has been so much complaint about Orders in Council having been passed that one does not want so many Orders in Council as the hon. member does.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister does not understand what I am driving at. The clause is clear that these powers may be exercised through the Governor in Council from time to time by Orders in Council. It is not an approval; you have got to enact by Orders in Council. You entrust certain things to the management, and the words must be written down on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and then enacted by Order in Council. It is very easy for the minister to have an extra copy struck off every time he makes a recommendation to Council. The Order in Council will say what is being entrusted to the company, and the company is then supposed to act in the best interests of the country; but the Governor in Council can impose restrictions while entrusting this property to the company, because at line 21 of section 11 it says:

—upon such terms and subject to such regulations and conditions as the Governor in Council may from time to time decide; such management and operation to continue during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and to be subject to termination or variation from time to time in whole or in part by the Governor in Council.

I think the House is entitled to know what parts of the road are being entrusted to the company and under what regulations and conditions they are being operated. The minister says that we do not want to load the Bill for nothing. It will not load it at all; it will just be a reminder to the minister that within a certain time at the beginning of each session all these Orders in Council must be deposited upon the Table of the House, and I think the people, through their representatives, ought to be posted in what is going on in connection with their railway system. I suggested just now that these Orders in Council have no force until publication in the Canada Gazette. I am willing to withdraw my assertion that they have no force, but I think they should be published in the Canada Gazette so that the people can be kept informed of how their railway system is managed. I think it is a suggestion that the minister ought to agree to.

Mr. McMASTER: The Commonwealth of Australia and the different Australian states have had a long experience in state ownership of railways, and it would seem to me to be wise for us to follow their custom and have the by-laws passed by the Board of Directors and approved by Order in Council placed on the Table within thirty days from the time they are passed if Parliament is sitting, or within thirty days after the House convenes. I cannot see any objection to that. It would appear to me to be an excellent means of keeping the country in touch with what is being done with its railway property.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no objection to that, Mr. Chairman, but I think it is entirely unnecessary, because all important Orders in Council are brought down and laid upon the Table of the House. If any hon. member should ask for an Order in Council relating to so important a subject as this it would be brought down without question. But the section is easily amended, and there is no reason why it should not be if hon. gentlemen think the matter important.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: During the debate this afternoon it became apparent that when you apply the rule of Order in Council you do not altogether cover the case, because the directors would have power to make by-laws that are not approved by Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: But this is the important clause that deals with the handling of property—such orders to be deposited upon the table of the House within thirty days of the opening of each session.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under this clause as at present drafted would the Government have the right to acquire any further branch lines, such, for instance, as the Quebec and Oriental Railway and the Atlantic and Western Railway that the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) spoke of this afternoon? These railways are more or less a continuation of the Intercolonial, and all their traffic is practically the traffic of the Intercolonial. Some time ago I had occasion, in the Special Committee considering the Railway Act, to submit a communication regarding the present condition of these railways, and although I hold no brief for the companies, I think they would be willing to enter into negotiations with the Government for sale of their properties.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, Parliament would have to acquire the roads first, and then the Governor in Council would have the right to entrust their management to this corporation.

Mr. CANNON: Several of the companies enumerated in the schedule have names that indicate they are situated partly or wholly in the United States. It is an altogether new situation, and I would like the minister to give information to the House as to exactly the relation that would arise between a sovereign country like Canada owning and running railroads in another sovereign country.

Mr. J. D. REID: The stock of these roads is owned by the Canadian Northern System, and therefore by the Government. The American Government are now operating those portions that run through the United States. The hon. member will of course understand that the American Government are also operating some of our Canadian roads. The Michigan Central is an American-owned road. Two or three roads that go through Ontario are part of an American system.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But they are not owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. J. D. REID: The United States Government is operating them; it is hard to say whether they will be taken over permanently by the Government. The Canadian Pacific runs through a portion of the State of Maine.

Mr. CANNON: Are the legal advisers of the Government of the opinion that the Government has the right to own and operate railroads in a foreign country? I do not think it has.

Mr. J. D. REID: The company have a right to operate in a foreign country; the Government is only a shareholder of the company. From this point of view, the legal advisers of the Government inform me that we have a perfect right to do as we are doing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To meet what my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) has in mind, I move that the following words be added to section 11:

> Any such Order in Council shall be laid before Parliament within ten days after the opening of the next ensuing session, or, if Parliament be sitting at the time such Order in Council is passed, then within ten days of the date of such Order in Council.

Amendment agreed to, and sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—power to transfer to company the stock or controlling interest of His Majesty in any railway company:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does this section mean that the directors of the Canadian National Railway Company may, without getting leave, purchase additional stock in railway companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, their powers are covered by section 21. This section merely gives the Government the power to transfer shares to them.

Mr. BUREAU: I have an objection to this clause. We know and feel the nefarious effects of that transaction in connection with the Canadian Northern, when we got forty per cent of the stock. If His Majesty is to acquire an interest in any company, he ought to acquire the majority of the stock so as to be able to have his own board of directors, his own administration and operation. I do not think that His Majesty ought to hold minority stock in any company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The acquirement of minority stock is not contemplated here. The section says: "acquire the stock or the controlling interest."

Mr. BUREAU: If that means "acquire all the stock," why not say so? The wording is not very clear.

Mr. McMASTER: It may be true that the reference is to the acquirement of the entire stock, but it might be held that the words "the stock" meant part of the stock. If the word "entire" is inserted before the word "stock" on line 2, the meaning will be made perfectly clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no objection to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: This section seems to contemplate the continuation of these companies in their respective entities. I understand that the purpose of this legislation is to get clear of these outside companies. The Act contemplates that meetings of companies are to be held at which the Government will be represented. I am entirely opposed to that, and I would like some assurance from the minister that it is his intention to get clear of these companies. When will the Canadian National Railway Company be doing business absolutely on its own footing? When will it be absolutely controlling this government property?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I had made that clear. As to the constituent companies named in the schedule of the Bill, the policy is to amalgamate all except those in which there is minority stock outstanding, thus getting rid of the separate entities and of the names. Where there is minority stock outstanding it would not be in the public interest to amalgamate, because other stock would have to be given to take care of the minority stock. That applies only to very few companies. The subsidiary companies do not own or operate railways; consequently, it would not be good business to amalgamate them; they are better as they are. As to the constituent companies, two at least are American companies and cannot be amalgamated; the policy is to amalgamate the others.

Mr. POWER: This section says:

> The Governor in Council may transfer, or cause to be transferred, such capital stock or any part thereof to the company, or may by proxies or otherwise enable the company or any nominee of the Governor in Council to exercise the voting power thereof at any meeting of shareholders.

Why should the words "or any nominee of the Governor in Council" be inserted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The transferee of the stock could be our proxy to vote the stocks. That could be done, of course, but power is taken to have the stock voted in an alternative way by naming a separate nominee. For example, the Minister of Railways might be named, or the most immediate Government representative on the board, where there is one.

Mr. POWER: If it is the intention of the Government to give such power to the minister or to any other person whom they may designate, I do not see why that should come into this particular Bill which is a Bill to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only way to have the power is by this Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 13, subsection (1)—application of Railway Act and Expropriation Act to undertakings of company:

Mr. BUREAU: I move that the three subsections of section 13 be considered separately.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What Act is meant by "The Railway Act?" Is it the existing Act or the new Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It means at present the existing law. When the new Bill passes, it will mean that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why not say the Railway Act, 1919?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Interpretation Act covers that.

Mr. FIELDING: Has it been found impossible or too difficult to designate by numbers the provisions of the Railway Act which are not to apply? This form of legislation may be unavoidable, but it is open to criticism. When it is stated that certain portions of an Act are not to apply, it is desirable that those portions should be indicated by the numbers of the sections. When the section states in general terms "all the provisions of the Railway Act excepting those provisions which are inconsistent with this Act" and so forth, that leaves it an open question as to what portions of the law are inconsistent. Further on the Government seem to have anticipated that very point, because they provide in subsection 2:

> In case of doubt, the Governor in Council may declare what provisions and to what extent the provisions of the respective Acts are applicable to the company under this section.

The determining of what sections are consistent and what are not seems to be rather a judicial function. I suppose the matter has been considered, and there may be difficulties in designating the sections by numbers, but if they could be so designated, that would be very desirable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the present Act was to continue or if the new Act was already passed, they could be designated without any difficulty, but inasmuch as both Acts are to apply each in turn, it is difficult to designate; that is to say, the designation which one might now make would not apply when the new Act passes.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a very easy way out of the difficulty, unless there are grave reasons why this section should be worded as it is. This Bill is being passed for the purpose of putting the Canadian Government railways as nearly as possible, the interest of the people being protected, on the same footing as all privately-owned railways. Why should the Canadian Government railways, when they require any land for the construction of railways, follow the Expropriation Act and go before the Exchequer Court instead of following the ordinary provisions of the statute? The Canadian Northern railway, before it was turned into the Government, if it wanted to expropriate, went before the courts of the province wherein the land was situated and got the land, and I do not see why these provisions of the Railway Act should not apply to the Canadian Government Railway System. If there are any objections, I am willing to consider and discuss them. But this would avoid confusion and it would be fairer to prevent the people from following His Majesty the King, who controls the Canadian Government railways on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, before the Exchequer Court. Why should not in this case the interpretation of the law by a judge of the superior court be as good for the Canadian Government as it is for privately-owned Canadian railway companies operating under the General Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no intention of going before any tribunal different from the tribunal other railways go before, namely, a board of arbitrators, to determine the arbitration. The provisions of the Expropriation Act in that regard do not apply by reason of subsection (c) of this section which says:

> The compensation payable in respect of the taking of any lands so vested in the company, or of interests therein, or injuriously affected by the construction of the undertaking or works shall be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Act, beginning with notice of expropriation to the opposite party.

So that the provisions of the Railway Act as regards the fixing of compensation apply. That was done with the idea that persons whose lands, usually farm lands, are taken are given the right of having the values determined by arbitrators, just as under the Railway Act, instead of being compelled to go to the Exchequer Court. The difference is this, that if the Railway Act altogether applied and no power of the Exchequer Act were invoked, then we would have to file plans with the Railway Commission, and furthermore, title would not vest with the filing of the plans in accordance with this clause, but taking the powers of the Expropriation Act and embodying them here, we get title on the filing of the plans and thereby avoid the intervention of intermediary parties purchasing lands ahead of us by reason of knowledge of the filing of plans in advance. That is all the difference.

Mr. BUREAU Clause (c) says:

> The compensation payable in respect of the taking of any lands so vested in the company, or of interests therein, or injuriously affected by the construction of the undertaking or works shall be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Act, beginning with notice of expropriation to the opposite party.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is when the plans are filed.

Mr. BUREAU: There is something wrong here. The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) says that expropriation and the filing of plans with the registrar gives title. That I think is very summary and autocratic, and it is unfair. I may be wrong, but I think that under the Railway Act we have to serve notice to the respondent in which you must offer him the amount which the engineer or surveyor who signs the notice swears is the value of the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That must be done now, too.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the use of doing it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the first step towards getting at the value.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not dispose of the whole matter and say that in the case of the Canadian Government Railway System the deposit of the plan will vest title in the company, and that the proceeding of expropriation shall be the same as under the general Railway Act. That would cover the ground and obviate all confusion that might result from this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where information is given out as to where your route lies an opportunity for intervention by intermediaries arises. The danger time is between the time the information gets out by taking your plan to the Railway Commission and the time of filing the plan.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should that not apply to the general Railway Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another question. I am not prepared to argue now that it should not apply.

Mr. BUREAU: My whole object is to avoid having two laws regulating railways, whether the Canadian Government Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would be well if we could eliminate the confusion as to what clauses should apply and what should not and would relieve the Governor in Council of the trouble and responsibility of determining this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be no difficulty in saying what clauses apply and what do not apply, as soon as the Railway Act passes. I am advised there is very little need for subsection (2).

Mr. BUREAU: The Government will not build roads unless they have a charter, and they generally fairly well indicate where they are going to run. I see there is a section seeking to revive certain charters. The public will know exactly what roads they are and where they lie. I do not see why there should be such a long provision, which is liable to create confusion. If my hon. friend would give me five minutes I would submit a draft amendment to cover the ground.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to giving the hon. member five minutes.

Mr. BUREAU: Of course, if my hon. friend will not accept it I will not go to the trouble of doing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could not accept any clause compelling us to disclose the exact right of way prior to the acquirement of title, because that would give an opportunity to others to come in and buy ahead of us. The charter generally indicates the direction of the road, but it does not give the line. So long as only the general direction is known we have nothing to fear, but we do not want to be in the position of having to disclose the exact right of way.

Mr. BUREAU: That point is open to discussion. The other railways have to have their plans approved by the Minister of Railways and have to submit them to the Railway Commission. Why should the Government have an advantage over other people who want to build a railway? I do not believe that men who would seek to dispose of their land at fancy prices would be given any consideration by the courts. I have known arbitration cases in which land was valued, say, at $400 and was sold for $4,000, but the court, realizing that it was only a hold-up, endorsed the valuation of the arbitration.

Mr. KEEFER: I know cases where plans have been submitted to the Railway Board for consideration and several parties have at once commenced buying lands on the proposed route. They made two or three turnovers amongst themselves and the result was that the railway had to pay considerably more than they should have paid.

Mr. BUREAU: Was it because it was held several months before the Railway Board?

Mr. KEEFER: There is the usual delay. I think the same principle should be adopted in regard to all railways, and when the Railway Bill comes up we ought to see to that. There is no reason why railways should be held up by speculators as they have been in the past in many instances. In this clause we are trying to avoid that so far as the Government is concerned, and if the companies are wise they will protect themselves.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not a question of wisdom on the part of companies, but whether private companies shall have the same right as the Government.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: According to the proposed Railway Act, the notice which is to be served upon the owner refers him to the book of reference and plan which has to be filed with the registrar. You say that the notice for expropriation will give him that information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It gives him the information that the plan is there filed, and from that he can get the exact area taken. It also tells him what is proposed to be paid for it.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Are we, by this clause, to do away with the filing of plans and the book of reference up to a certain point? He may get information from the plans and book of reference after it becomes impossible, as you say, for speculators to step in? In the meantime he gets notice of the expropriation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Afterwards.

On paragraph 2—power to decide cases in doubt:

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think this paragraph should pass in its present form. It is not right that the Governor in Council should be at one and the same time a party to a case and the judge in the matter.

Some independent authority should be selected. I would suggest that the paragraph be changed to read:

In case of doubt the Exchequer Court may declare what provisions and to what extent the provisions of the respective Acts are applicable to the company under this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Speaking at the moment, I rather think that is the law now. A case in conflict would necessarily be decided by the Exchequer Court. If my hon. friend's amendment were accepted, it would be equivalent to removing the sub-clause. If the sub-clause is removed it will have the same effect as if my hon. friend's amendment carries. I do not see that sub-clause 2 need be invoked at all. I would consent to striking it out. I therefore move:

That sub-clause 2 of clause 13 be struck from the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

On paragraph 3 (now paragraph 2)—(a) signatures to plans deposited; (b) lands vested in the company; (c) ascertaining amount of compensation.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any provision by which we have a president and vice-president?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The provision in the Railway Act provides for a president and vice-president.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under this Bill we have the directors on the one hand and the company on the other. The president of an ordinary company, is usually appointed at a general meeting of the shareholders. I do not see what the Railway Act has to do with the appointing of a president when there are no shareholders to appoint him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The directors elect the president. Clause 13 of the Bill provides that the Railway Act, except as to certain clauses, shall apply. One of the non-excepted clauses provides that the directors shall elect the president and vice-president. Consequently that clause applies. Our directors will elect the president and vice-president. Section 13 comes in there and its application is clear.

On section 15—actions, suits or other proceedings:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does this change the existing law in any way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. In one sentence it makes the new corporation liable at law and vests in the new corporation the rights at law of a corporation rather than putting it in the position of the Crown. A man now to sue in respect to anything done to him on the Intercolonial must have a fiat, hereafter he can sue the Canadian National Railway Company without a fiat. Similarly, the company itself can sue without a fiat, it can act as a corporation not subject to the restrictions or to the enjoyment of the privileges of the Crown.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any provision for the liquidation of a judgment that may be obtained against the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The clause provides that:

Any defence available to the respective corporations (including His Majesty) in respect of whose undertaking the cause of action arose shall be available to the company, and any expense incurred in connection with any action taken or judgment rendered against the company in respect of its operation or management of any lines of railway or properties, other than its own lines of railway or properties, may be charged to and collected from the corporation in respect of whose undertaking such action arose.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is what I do not understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any expense in relation to an undertaking is charged against the operation of that undertaking or any judgment recorded in relation to an undertaking is charged against that undertaking. If the undertaking out of which the action arises is in connection with the Intercolonial, the expense is charged against the operation of the Intercolonial and a judgment is charged in the same way.

Mr. McMASTER: That is, supposing that the company will keep a special record showing how each undertaking is charged?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: And it is really only a matter of bookkeeping as between different departments of the same railway. The other party will have nothing to do with that. The other party would levy against the property of the whole company if it obtained judgment and, that judgment was unsatisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not understand that this company are to own anything at all. They will not own the railway, they will not own the rolling stock as an ordinary company would, they are a sort of holding concern and are simply operating the railway system which is really owned by the King, as represented here by the Governor in Council. Now when a person has a judgment against this company, and sends the sheriff to execute it, what is he going to levy upon? This company do not own anything so far as I can see.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is not quite correct in his statement. The company is more than a holding company. It is a holding company, but when the power of amalgamation provided for in section 21 takes place the Canadian Northern itself will be amalgamated in this company and will cease to exist as a separate entity. Therefore it is more than a holding company. But even if it is a holding company it has the stock which may be levied on for judgment.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Finance holds the stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The stock is to be transferred under section 12. The company has to pay its debts, that is manifest, and its debts in respect of a judgment will be chargeable against the undertaking it is operating in regard to which the accident, or whatever it may be that gave rise to the judgment, occurs.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is perfectly clear, but I want to detain the minister for just a moment longer. Suppose that to-morrow Johnston gets judgment from the Supreme Court of Canada against this company, and they refuse to pay it, and he puts an execution in the sheriff's hands, what can he levy on?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could not levy on anything until the assets are placed in the hands of the company; there could not be any judgment until such assets are in their possession. But immediately this Bill passes, the stock the Government owns is placed in the hands of the company, and could be levied on. Subsequently roads will be amalgamated with the existing system, and the physical assets of those roads will be the property of this company and may be levied against.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a new phase of the matter. I did not think the company were going to be the owners of these properties, and I do not think the House understood that the ownership was vested in this company as such. Then we are to understand the directors are to own these properties?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Upon amalgamation the company will own the direct physical assets.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It is generally understood that there are a great many unsettled claims against the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I would like to have the opinion of the Acting Minister of Justice as to whether a creditor of that company could bring action against these directors in respect of any unsatisfied claim against the Canadian Northern, and if so, whether judgment could be obtained against the directors in respect of it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is in error in stating that there are a great number of unsatisfied claims against the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The claims are pretty well settled up, in fact I do not know that there are any outstanding. But if there were, the judgment now would be obtained against the company, and would be collectable from it. But upon amalgamation the company that absorbs the others is then the company liable and will have to pay any judgment rendered.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am glad to hear the minister say there are no outstanding claims against the Canadian Northern, because it has been frequently stated in the House that there were numerous such claims.

Section agreed to.

On Section 16—Expenses to be paid out of receipts and revenues.

Mr. FIELDING: Some of the clauses that we have been discussing have perhaps not been of the utmost importance, but here is a clause that is worth reflecting on, because I doubt if its gravity has been fully understood by the Committee; certainly its gravity is not understood by the outside public. If there is one principle clearer than another in relation to our financial affairs, it is that every penny of revenue that is collected in any form for the purposes of the Dominion of Canada shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund. Once in that fund not one dollar of the money can be paid out until it has been appropriated by the House of Commons. That is the basic principle of our system of finance. Yet we are gravely and deliberately proposing to depart from it. We are proposing, as respects the management of one of the greatest of our departments—a department that is a great one now and will be even greater by virtue of the passage of this Bill—to repeal the Consolidated Revenue Act. We are proposing that this company shall be allowed to take into their treasury every dollar that they earn and use it for the purposes of the railway system as they think best. There was a discussion, at an earlier stage, concerning one portion of this question. I was not present on that occasion, but I find from a perusal of Hansard that there was a discussion on the question of the deficit, as to whether or not that should be paid without an appropriation. But that is only a part of the issue involved. The broader question is that while every other department of the Government will be held under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue Act, this great department will not be so held. The Minister of Customs, the Minister of Inland Revenue, the Postmaster General, and all the other ministers who collect revenue will be obliged to pay it into the treasury and to await an appropriation by this House; but as respects the collections of this department—and they will run into many millions—they are not to go into the consolidated revenue but into the treasury of this company at whatever point it may have its head office. We shall be told that it is very inconvenient to have any other arrangement. Of course, it is inconvenient. It would be most convenient for the ministers, and I have been one, if they did not have to be bothered by appropriations. The truth is that Parliament is rather an inconvenience to ministers at times. But it is necessary in the transaction of public affairs that we shall have a Parliament. I hope that before the Bill is finally passed my hon. friends on the treasury benches will reconsider this matter and see if they cannot, instead of setting the Consolidated Revenue Act at defiance, bring this measure into harmony with it. It was said in the discussion to which I have referred, that you could not make estimates of the probable cost of operating this railway. The answer to that is that for fifty years we have been making estimates for the cost of operating the Intercolonial Railway. I have no doubt it was an embarrassment at times to the Minister of Railways. It was a year ago that he tried to do for that department what he is now proposing to do in the case of a larger scheme. After some reflection and discussion the minister did not press the matter. I do not intend to make any motion on the subject, but I do hope that before this Bill passes the Government will reconsider this matter and see that provision is made for this department complying with the Consolidated Revenue Act as is done by every other department of the Government.

There is nothing in the argument that you cannot make estimates. If you are able to make estimates for the Intercolonial, why cannot you do so for these other roads? I remember some reference was made to the difficulty of making estimates because of the great crop in the Northwest. Surely we all hope that the crop will be a great one, and the wise Minister in making his estimates will show that he is hoping there will be a great crop. But I do think that the setting aside of the Consolidated Act in reference to this Department is not wise, and in all seriousness I would suggest to my honourable friends on the Treasury benches that before the matter is disposed of finally they reconsider that aspect of it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Needless to say I always pay very great attention and am disposed to give great weight to any observations from my honourable friend (Mr. Fielding) with respect to matters of financial administration in which he has had very wide experience as Minister of Finance. He has pointed out that it may be inconvenient to adopt the method which he suggests, namely, of making an estimate and having all expenditures vouched for in the usual way as is done in the case of Departments of the Government. It seems to me that it is not a matter of inconvenience so much as of practical impossibility. I do not say that lightly, because I agree with my honourable friend that if a thing should be done the fact that there is some inconvenience involved should not prevent its being done. But I would submit, without concluding myself as to the position which the Government will take—because we will be very glad to give my honourable friend's views full consideration—that this railway company of which the Government is the virtual proprietor notwithstanding the corporate from in which its assets are held is not a department of the Government in the same sense that the Railway or Customs or Inland Revenue is a department of the Government. As I pointed out last evening when I spoke upon this matter, there are two ways in which the Dominion Government could administer this great railway system which has now come into our hands and such other systems as may be acquired in the future. One way would be to attempt to administer them as the Intercolonial Railway was administered, by the Railway Department of the Government, which, as the Committee knows, is under the direct control of the Minister of Railways. The other way, both for practicability of administration and for divesting the Government as far as possible of control in order that no question of political patronage may enter, is to administer them through the medium of a joint stock company or companies. Take the situation as it exists to-day. The various departments of the Government, including the Railway Department in respect of the Canadian Northern Railway, make their Estimates, and all expenditures are audited by the Auditor General, as my hon. friend has indicated. But in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, whose stock is held by the Government—just as the stock of this company which we are now creating will be held for the Government—the administration being under a corporation is carried out as corporations carry out their enterprises. The corporation, as such, receives all revenue, and all expenditures are made under the authority of the board of directors, who are directly responsible to the Dominion Government. That is the situation existing to-day with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which is owned by the Dominion Government as I have pointed out.

Now, if we had given effect to the suggestion of my hon. friend, the Government during the past year or more that it has owned the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company would have made an estimate showing the entire amount of expenditure which in the opinion of the board of directors and the Government would be necessary, and all expenditures of every kind whatsoever, great or small, throughout the entire system would have to be checked by the proper officers of the Government and vouched by the Auditor General. That would be a very great undertaking. It is a large undertaking as it is. The officers of the company, acting under the authority of the board, receive all the revenue and pay it out under a system of audit established by the company. No doubt a very thorough system of audit should be established, and we have endeavoured to establish such a system. I remember that two years ago we appointed, in addition to the auditors of the company, the well-known firm of Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Co., a firm of very high standing, and they have been auditing the accounts. In a sense while the Canadian Northern Railway is not a department of the Government, the directors and those under them and the auditors are Government officials. They are not Government officials in the sense of officials in the several departments, but nevertheless in substance and in fact, as the Government of Canada owns all the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, its board of directors and their subordinates are Government officers.

I am the first to admit the necessity of the strictest kind of check upon receipts and expenditures, because if there is one thing that we should have learned in connection with public affairs it is that the strictest check is necessary to prevent abuse of power in the control of money. But I submit that in the present situation, in view of the fact that we hold the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway System, it would be very difficult indeed for the officials of the Government to supervise all the receipts and expenditures of the system. And that has not been done; the company has carried on its business as the Canadian Pacific Railway Companies carries on its business, and as the Grand Trunk Railway System carries on its business—through its officers, and subject to audit, which is continuous and is carried on with great care. The system which we have in contemplation, and which has necessitated the creation of this company, in accordance with the terms of this Act is a much larger one than the Canadian Northern Railway Company, because we have looked forward to the probable acquisition of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and of the Grand Trunk Railway System itself.

If that should happen, the Government would find itself in possession of an exceedingly large railway system, twenty thousand miles or more, consisting of the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and, in all probability, the Grand Trunk. These being brought into one incorporation, there would be in Canada two great systems, the Canadian Pacific Railway System, and the Canadian National Railway System of which the proprietor would be the Dominion Government. If you have competent directors in whom the people have the utmost confidence; if you have officers of the same standing and integrity as those of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; if you have a proper system of audit and very full annual reports, you have surrounded the system with all reasonable safeguards. The alternative suggested by my hon. friend is that the Government make its estimates in respect of all the expenditures of that vast system and that all the items of expenditure, great and small, be checked as items of Government expenditure in the various departments are now checked, and audited by the Auditor General. I do not say that that is impossible, but it seems to me to be impracticable. I have very great respect for my hon. friend's opinion on a matter of this kind, but it would seem to be advisable that, if possible, the public interest be safeguarded by the organization of the company and by the checks which are in use in connection with railway systems rather than in the way that we now make estimates and check expenditures of departments of the Government, in the strict sense of the term. I think there is a perfect system of accounts in connection with the administration of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; it would seem to be quite as efficient as that which we have established under legislation of Parliament respecting receipts and expenditures of public money. I entirely sympathize with the view that the strictest supervision of expenditures should be exercised in connection with this system, for this reason, among others: The board of directors in whom this great trust and confidence is to be reposed will receive all moneys through the officials whom they name; will make all disbursements through their organization, and then come to the Government and to Parliament for any deficit. Parliament, therefore, is immediately interested in every expenditure made by that system. The sole question seems to be one of expediency and of the proper safeguarding of the public interest. If we could be satisfied that this company would carry on its operations as honestly and efficiently as other great railway systems carry on theirs, it would be unnecessary to insist upon a further check and audit on the part of the officials of the Government and the Auditor General. If, on the other hand, the conclusion should be reached that what I put forward is impracticable and that public loss would ensue, then there is a great deal to be said for the view put forward by the hon. member. I have given the matter careful consideration, and it seems to me that the suggestion, while it should be weighed with great deliberation, is impracticable; and that we can accomplish the result which the hon. member has in mind by a proper system of administration and of audit and by an annual report which would furnish to the Government and to Parliament the fullest possible details of expenditure. I am not concluding, either myself or the Government, with respect to the attitude which we shall take upon this very important matter, but I submit these observations for the consideration of the hon. member and of the Committee.

Mr. McMASTER: I take part in the discussion of this point with some diffidence, because I cannot bring to bear upon it the years of experience in financial matters that may be claimed by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) and by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). We are face to face with a difficult situation. We are endeavouring so to organize the publicly-owned railway properties of this country that they shall be removed from that partisan influence which has long been the curse of Government-owned railroads in Canada as in other countries. At the same time, we have to retain the control which our fiduciary position towards the taxpayers imposes upon us. Yesterday I proposed a scheme for the first appointment of directors. The argument offered by the Prime Minister in opposition to the proposal was strong enough to convince me that possibly I was mistaken; that there was no way in which the Government could avoid its final and ultimate responsibility, and that, therefore, it had the right to name the entire board of directors. Can we, then, afford to throw aside the safeguards which British constitutional tradition has placed around the expenditure of public moneys? I do not think we can.

Two points were made by the Acting Prime Minister. First, there was the difficulty of estimating what it would cost to run this great railway system. I grant the difficulty, but I do not believe that it is insurmountable. At the beginning the directors will have to administer a certain number of roads which are now in operation, and the expenditures of last year, with increases or decreases, as the case may be, will form a pretty safe indication of what will have to be spent in the next fiscal year. I believe that the estimates can be made. True, they will run into appalling figures, but it is just as well that the people should be brought face to face with the importance of this undertaking. The second point is in relation to the audit. I do not see any difficulty in connection with the matter of an audit.

The Acting Prime Minister has told us that an audit will have to be made; that an audit is made now of Canadian Northern Railway operations. Instead of having an auditor chosen in the manner in which this firm of auditors which he speaks about was chosen, the auditor will be the Auditor General, and his staff will make the audit.

I understand the Acting Prime Minister does not do more this evening than express his doubt as to his ability to meet the desires of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), which, I think, are the desires of a large number of the members of this House. I would join with the hon. member in asking the Government to reconsider very carefully this question, and I think I can say, with those who think with me, that we shall not depart from sound traditional usage which has grown up from generation to generation without the clearest proof and the soundest argument that this tradition can be departed from with safety to the public interest.

Mr. FIELDING: I appreciate the very good spirit in which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has met my suggestion. All that I could ask is that he should, at a more convenient opportunity, give it further consideration. But if he does not mind, I will offer one or two observations upon his argument. His first argument is that this expenditure should not be controlled by Parliament because it is so big. To my mind that is the very reason why Parliament should deal with the matter. If the funds involved should, as is likely, run into enormous figures, that is not a reason why we should depart from all the rules and customs of our financial system —it is only an additional reason why we should adhere to the established practice of the past. The minister has suggested that the audit of the Canadian Northern is a very good one, and nothing I say has the slightest reflection upon any gentleman connected with that enterprise. But he says: If they have capable men, and they have an audit and a report is made, what more do we want? Let us apply that to some other cases. The Post Office Department is generally and, I may say, is at present, presided over by an estimable gentleman in whose integrity we have every confidence. There is a staff of auditors and there are deputies, assistants, inspectors—a large organization. The department makes reports to Parliament and complies with every condition the minister has mentioned. Yet, we do not allow the Post Office Department to disregard the Consolidated Revenue Act; we make the Postmaster General come to this Parliament for his appropriation. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) is absent, but his place is filled by his predecessor, the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid). We do not for a moment, question that gentleman's zeal or integrity. He has a deputy minister in whose zeal and integrity we all have confidence; he has a large staff, and every condition the minister has mentioned with regard to examination and checks and audit will be found in the Customs Department. Yet, we do not let the Minister of Customs control one penny of that revenue; he is bound to turn it all into the public treasury Therefore, I think the fact that the gentlemen connected with the Canadian Northern and those who will be connected with that enterprise, are men of good repute and that they will have an ample audit and so forth, is not a sufficient reason for us to disregard all the checks that Parliament has imposed in the past. The minister has drawn a distinction—I do not think he would like to say it is a very good one—between the department and this company. The public are not technical; they get at the essence of a thing, and the essence of this is that we have a Government railway system which is going to be enlarged to 20,000 or 30,000 miles of railway. Whatever you may call it, a company or anything else, it is the Government railway; the Government has to pay the piper; the Government has to provide the money.

There is, in the Bill, a provision that the surplus shall be paid into the treasury. That is pleasant to think of, but I do not think the Minister of Finance is looking for very much addition to his funds from that source. There is, however, going to be a tremendous operation conducted by this company. I do not want to say that term is camouflage, because that is a word used in another sense; but at all events, the company is only the Government in another form. Instead of having Smith, Brown and Jones acting for the Government, we have Robinson, Thompson and some other people. But it is the Government from beginning to end. I sympathize with my hon. friends on the treasury benches in their efforts to get rid of patronage. I am endeavouring to believe they are sincere and earnest in the matter, and I should like to help them; but we might as well have this fact clearly understood, that the people who talk about divorcing these railways from politics, from the control of Parliament, are simply cherishing a delusion. There can be no divorce of a public work from the people's Parliament so long as the people's Parliament pay the piper. Get rid of patronage if possible; I am not asking that you shall go back to the patronage system. The minister spoke of the two railways, the Intercolonial and this other system. I do not think all the criticisms regarding the Intercolonial management in the past are at all correct or justified; but whether there were defects in the management of the Intercolonial or not, we are not asking that any defects should be perpetuated. We should however, recognize the fact that, while the people of Canada have to pay the bill, they will, in one form or another, hold the Government responsible, and politics will be involved. I do not see any escape from that situation.

On the question of making the Estimates, I cannot see any reason why it is not practicable to make Estimates for 20,000 miles of railway as well as for 2,000 miles. The principle is the same; you are taking simply a bigger job and needing more money for it; and if it should turn out that at any time an exceptional case has arisen for which no provision has been made, we have in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act a provision by which the Governor in Council may grant money for unforeseen expenditures. I think the reasons given for departing from an established custom are not wise. The words of the Revenue and Audit Act are very plain; they are in the most emphatic terms, namely, that every penny of public money coming into the possession of any official of the Government of Canada must be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and that penny can get out of that treasury only after Parliament has so voted. I believe that principle is sound, and what we are now doing, instead of being a reason for departing from it, seems to be a reason why we should adhere to it more firmly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the first place, I think there is a misconception as to the effect of this section which has reference merely to moneys received and paid out in respect of the operation of the Canadian Government railways. It has not reference to moneys received and paid out in respect of the operation of the Canadian Northern railway system. It is because it has reference to moneys received and paid out in respect of the Canadian Government railways that we have to use the term:—

Notwithstanding anything in the Government Railways Act or the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Those two Acts never did provide that money received in respect of the Canadian Northern railway system by the Canadian National Railway Company should come into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and be paid out of that fund.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the minister think it should not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will come to that in a moment. What I mean to say is that we are not in any way setting aside the provisions of the Government Railways Act or the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act in respect of moneys that are received from the Canadian Northern railway system at all, only in respect of the Intercolonial. Apparently my hon. friend is asking that as respects all moneys received by this corporation they should go right into the Consolidated Revenue of Canada and should be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue as departmental moneys. Does not this Bill mean that we are attempting to set up a system of corporate management divorced from direct government interference or control, of this great railway system—corporate as distinguished from departmental management? Can you have corporate management of the road and departmental financing? Or corporate management and departmental auditing? Immediately you commence departmental audit through the Auditor General to that extent you have entirely disintegrated the system of corporate management. I would not for a moment contend that an exact, careful, thorough and responsible system of audit, for which we should be responsible, should not apply to the accounts of the Canadian National Railways as constituted by this Bill. It is not a question of thoroughness or propriety of audit, one system should be just as thorough and rigid as the other; but it is a question of whether you are going to have a system of corporate or departmental audit. Can you have management by corporation and departmental audit? To me it does not seem possible. If all the moneys of the Canadian Northern system are to go right into the Consolidated Revenue, and to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue, how can that be consistent with corporate management of the roads? It appears to be a manifest anomaly.

Mr. McMASTER: May I suggest that your whole company is really an anomaly. It is not a real company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems to me to be a very real company. We want to make it a real company, but it will be a very unreal company if one-half is to be departmental and the other half corporate. I do think that while it is true that this is in reality a Government enterprise, it is equally true that we are trying to operate it as a business concern under corporate management; and every argument that would go to show that we ought to have direct departmental audit would be just as forcible to show that we should directly manage the road as well. There is nothing to show that corporate audit by the system now in vogue in that company, upon which we super-impose an audit of our own to ensure that their audit is correct, should not be just as thorough as any audit through the Auditor General's Department.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. McMASTER: I understand, Mr. Chairman, and I think correctly, that the Acting Prime Minister acceded to the request of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) to let this stand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no reason why it should not stand for consideration. The system is so large, and is likely to be so much larger, that it seems to me to be a needless duplication of work even if it were practicable. It is a question of safeguarding the public interest, and the real point is whether the public interest can be safeguarded through corporate administration under which these railways are to be operated. It would appear to me that it can be so safeguarded, but I think the strictest attention should be given to that point. The system should be under the most competent audit from time to time and the Government should be closely in touch with its general finance. I admit that the situation is anomalous, but it is necessarily so. I agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) said, and I have said the same thing many times myself, though not in the same words, namely, that no matter how the Government or Parliament might try to get rid of responsibility the fact is that this railway system, belonging to the Government and the people, must be administered by the Government subject to Parliament; and it is not possible, nor, in my view, is it proper that the Government should escape responsibility. If it were not for this question of the intrusion of patronage, about which both Parliament and the public hold strong views, whether well founded or not, it seems to me that the logical position would be for the Government to administer the system directly, just as the Intercolonial was administered. We have been seeking to get away from that position, which is the logical one, in order to avoid the influencing of administration in a particular political interest; and to do that we have the expedient not of a commission—which we might have if no question of corporation securities and franchise arose—but of corporation machinery.

Mr. McMASTER: But these men are practically commissioners.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am coming to that; I agree with my hon. friend and the point he raises strengthens my argument. We have adopted corporate administration. If it were a commission the Government would appoint the commissioners just as it appoints the board of directors of this system. These men are responsible to the Government in their administration, but we seek to give them independence of action to avoid the evils which I have mentioned. If we have capable men—and I said the other night and say now that the whole success of government ownership is necessarily dependent upon the obtaining of men of the highest integrity in whom the people will have continuing confidence—and if there is a railway administration similar to that of the great systems like the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk, with a continuous audit and the check again upon that audit such as we have in connection with the Canadian Northern, I submit, the public interest is protected although the machinery is different. The Auditor General would audit the accounts to, let us say, an unlimited degree; so can the auditors of a railway system. The system is spread over an entire continent and the audit system would be a very extensive one. If I believed we could not safeguard the public interest in the way the Canadian Pacific Railway Company safeguards the interests of its shareholders by a thorough audit, I would be disposed to give more weight to the view put forward than I do. But we can safeguard the situation. If we were tempted to introduce departmental finance into this corporate system we should be doing what the Acting Minister of Justice suggested a few moments ago—we should be essentially changing the basis of our administration, and should be carrying on a partly departmental and a partly corporate administration. It seems to me that the essence of the question is this: Can the public interest be protected in connection with this system through officials and through a proper system of audit? I think it can. I am entirely willing that this clause should stand until to-morrow if hon. gentlemen so desire.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nesbitt): The clause has been declared carried and it cannot stand without the unanimous consent of the Committee.

Mr. McMASTER: I would certainly have jumped up before but I understood from the Acting Prime Minister that he had acceded to the request of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) for further consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the Committee consent that the clause shall stand?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the Bill can be finished to-night, I would suggest that the clause be carried now, or later on,—although we would not be disposed to change the Bill in that respect.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that there is not only the public interest to be safeguarded but there is also the control by Parliament of the expenditure of public money? During the war the British Government conducted a great insurance department at a very handsome profit, the figures running into millions of pounds. It would be interesting to know whether the premiums that were collected by this department from the shipowners—I think it was a system of marine insurance—were paid into the Consolidated Fund and whether the losses were paid out of that fund.

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist upon knowing whether this is to stand now or whether it is to be taken as carried.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I stated, the Government would be glad to give it consideration. Let it stand for the present at all events. I think it very desirable that this legislation should be got through as soon as possible consistently with full discussion. If the Bill is to be finished this evening perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite would be willing that this should go through. I may say that we are not disposed to change our view in respect of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are still considering this clause, are we?

The CHAIRMAN: No; it stands.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Stands.

Section stands.

On section 17—fiscal year, January 1 to December 31:

Mr. FIELDING: What is the object of having a different fiscal year from that of the other departments of Government or the other business of Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is to comply with the provision of the general Railway Act.

Mr. FIELDING: That is hardly a sufficient reason.

Mr. BUREAU: If it were to conform with the fiscal year of Canada, Parliament would be able to get fuller information. My hon. friend says that it is to conform with the general Railway Act. Here is a particular instance in which we should differ from the general Railway Act. It would be better to have the fiscal year of the Canadian Railways conform with the Government fiscal year so that we would know exactly how much we had run behind in any one year. If the Government are going to pay the deficits we want to know each year what is going to be chargeable to it.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Railway Act provides:

> Such returns shall be made for the period beginning from the date to which the then last yearly returns made by the company or carrier by water extend, or, if no such returns have been previously made, from the commencement of the operation of the railway, or other works, or undertaking, and ending with the last day of December in the year, or other interval, for which the returns are to be made, or with such other date as the minister may direct.

Mr. BUREAU: If there is any case in which we ought to make an exception to the general Railway Act it is this, because of all the departments of government this is the one that ought to conform to the fiscal year of the Government so that we would know exactly where to charge the deficits at the end of the year.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the Minister of Railways is making his report for the year he will certainly be supposed to report upon this system, notwithstanding that it is under the operation of a company. It is admitted that this system is a part of Government ownership under a different name and the minister will report to Parliament on the operations of this company. Are we going to have two reports instead of one? It is impossible to have a full statement of the operations during the year if one report ends on the last day of December and the other on the last day of March. I submit that the railway year should be uniform with the financial year in the departments of Government. We have nothing as a Parliament to do with the general Railway Act. These companies are not bound to report to this House, and that should not regulate the business at all.

Mr. BUREAU: Referring to the schedule to the Railway Act railway companies have to make returns.

—for the year ending June 30, 19—, required by the Minister of Railways and Canals, showing the conditions of the capital and revenue account of the railways in the Dominion of Canada.

Together with the location and general description of the railways, etc. Those returns, unless the law has been amended, are for the year ending June 30.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Railway Act now applies to the Canadian Northern System, but it does not apply to the Government Railways. The fiscal year now, therefore, under the Railway Act, is the calendar year. It appears as well that this is the fiscal year for all railways, American as well as Canadian, and that returns have to be made. Indeed, this company, must make returns in respect to a part of its system for the fiscal year to the Inter-State Commerce Commission of the United States. It is compelled to do so. Therefore, the company will require to have two fiscal years if you compel it now to change to the 31st March. There does not seem to be any particular object to be served, because the annual returns would come to Parliament in any event.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the fiscal year of the American companies correspond with the fiscal year of their national finance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood that in the United States the fiscal year is the calendar year.

Mr. FIELDING: Is their national fiscal year the calendar year?

Mr. DAVIS: It ends the 30th June.

Mr. FIELDING: The same as our own.

Mr. DAVIS Ours ends the 31st March.

Mr. FIELDING: I could understand that the American railways might be obliged to conform to the national fiscal year. If so, that would be an argument why our railways should conform to our fiscal year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand our statistics are given for the calendar year. The calendar year is required in the United States and my information is that it is not their fiscal year. It is their railway year. This company has to comply with that requirement as to its American lines. It would need to have two years, which would be very complicated indeed.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like the minister to explain how this change would affect the Auditor General's Report. At the present time we have the expenditure on railways given in the Auditor General's Report up to 31st March. I conclude that the expenditure on the Canadian National Railways will be given in that report. Am I right? In that case, will not some confusion arise in the Auditor General's Report by making the fiscal year conform to the calendar year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think not. The Auditor General's Report would, of course, embody a statement of the payments made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or out of the Dominion treasury, to this company. Such payments made, we will say at the end of the company's railway year, thirty-first of December, will appear as of that date in the Auditor General's Report covering the fiscal year up to 31st March.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Expenditures between 31st December and 31st March following will not appear in the Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will appear if any are made. If there was a deficit the payments would not be made at once, but payments made any number of times, as long as they were in the fiscal year of Canada, would appear in the Auditor General's Report of that year.

Mr. FIELDING: The disadvantage of that will be that the books and returns of the Canadian Government Railways are not going to correspond with those of the other departments, and for all purposes of investigation, examination and comparison, the situation will be very embarrassing.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Works declared to be for the general advantage of Canada:

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that all the railways and companies that form part of the Canadian Northern system are enumerated in the list that is printed at the end of the Bill, entitled "Constituent and Subsidiary Companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System." What does this clause mean? Are there any other companies which the Government has acquired, or any companies whose stock is invested in the Minister of Finance for His Majesty, which are not enumerated in the schedule?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand, there are now two companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System which have not as yet been declared works for the general advantage of Canada. This clause declares them works for the general advantage of Canada, and consequently makes them Dominion railways. Then the clause goes on to say that any companies hereafter included within this Canadian National Railway System, by virtue of the authority contained in Clause 11, if my memory serves me right, are now in advance declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, so that the whole can be considered national railways.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all right, but it is the last part of the clause that I am alluding to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The clause does what I have explained.

Mr. BUREAU: No, what it says is this:

The works of any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System which have not heretofore been declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and the works of any company or companies hereafter from time to time declared by the Governor in Council to be comprised in the Canadian Northern System are hereby declared from and after the date of the making of such declaration by the Governor in Council to be works for the general alvantage of Canada.

Now what are the companies that have not been declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, what are the companies that are not known to the Government as being part of the Canadian Northern System? My question is, are there any other companies which ought to belong, or which it is the intention of the Government to declare to belong, to the Canadian Northern System, which are not enumerated in the schedule at the end of this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two now belonging to the system not declared, but we declare them. There is no other at the present time that it is intended to declare, but there may be at any time, because clause 11 contemplates that any road hereafter acquired by the Crown may be entrusted to the management of this company. Then in section 18 we declare that from the time it is so entrusted, under section 11, it shall be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: A question occurs to me, although a layman should not set himself up as a legal authority. There is no doubt that under the British North America Act the Parliament of Canada has the power to declare any railway or other work a work for the general advantage of Canada. But is Parliament to delegate that power to the Governor in Council? That is a legal proposition and I only mention it for the consideration of my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). He is proposing not only that certain roads shall be declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, but that any roads which may hereafter be acquired by the Government may be declared works for the general advantage of Canada by the Governor in Council. That is too fine a legal proposition for me to do more than mention it to my hon. friend. That is not my main point, however. I quite admit the difficulty of operating this large railway system unless all the roads shall be brought under a common control, but is there not a possibility, or more than a possibility, of some trouble arising with the provincial governments? For example, one of the roads which, according to my recollection, is under the authority of the local legislature of Nova Scotia, is the Halifax and South Western. I know that originally it was under the control of the local legislature, but it may since have been brought under the general railway system. Has it been?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that was done in 1914.

Mr. FIELDING: What are the two roads to which the Acting Minister of Justice referred a few minutes ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The St. Charles and Huron, and the Toronto Suburban.

Mr. FIELDING: Both Ontario roads?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One is a Quebec road.

Mr. FIELDING: Have these roads been aided by the provincial government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: The thought in my mind is this: If there are cases where a road, having been aided largely by provincial funds, is declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, some people may say Canada should reimburse the local government. As my hon. friend says that in this case the roads were not aided from the provincial treasury that point cannot be raised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is that the St. Charles and Huron may have got a land grant, but that is all the assistance that was given to either of these two roads. As to the first point that my hon. friend

(Mr. Fielding) raises, it really is very well taken, but I fancy that he is a little wrong in this regard: power is not given to the Governor in Council to declare any road a work for the general advantage of Canada. What is done by this Bill is to declare any road a work for the general advantage of Canada which hereafter the Governor in Council entrusts to this company.

Mr. FIELDING: That is practically giving the power to the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In effect it might be, but still from a legal standpoint the result is different. We do not say to the Governor in Council: "You may declare any road a work for the general advantage of Canada." We say to the Governor in Council: "If the Dominion acquires a road you may then, under section 11, entrust it to this company for operation." Then under section 18 we say: "Since it is so entrusted we here and now declare it is for the general advantage of Canada." I would not like to take the responsibility of saying that even that is within our powers. I do not think I should be called upon to express an opinion on it; it would appear to me at least to admit of some doubt.

Mr. BUREAU: This clause does not say that the roads that will be entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company shall be for the general advantage of Canada, but it provides that the Governor in Council may from time to time declare any road comprised in the Canadian Northern System to be for the general advantage of Canada. What I want to know from my hon. friend is if there are any roads, in addition to those enumerated in the schedule, which the Government may declare to be part of the Canadian Northern railway. As I understand it, the roads which now form part of the Canadian Northern Railway System are divided into constituent and subsidiary companies and are all enumerated in this schedule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no others that we now have that are contemplated to be turned over at all, but if we should acquire, for example, one of the roads mentioned this afternoon, and turn it into the system, then this clause immediately applies to it and makes it a road for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not turn it over to the Canadian Government Railway instead of to the Canadian Northern Railway System? The clause sets forth:

> —and the works of any company or companies hereafter from time to time declared by the Governor in Council to be comprised in the Canadian Northern System are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

I understand that the object of this Bill is to do away with the Canadian Northern System and have all the roads consolidated and operated under the name of the Canadian National Railways System.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right; but immediately it is in the Canadian Northern Railway System, unless there is some outstanding stock, it may be and will be amalgamated under the provisions of section 14. So it all comes out the same.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it does. If anything is to be done you are reserving power to do it. After this Bill becomes law, according to the minister's statement, there will be no roads belonging to the Canadian Northern Railway System beyond those enumerated in the schedule. If you acquire a new road why not bring it under the provisions of this Act, and transfer it to the company direct, instead of attaching it to one particular road or the other?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Supposing there was some outstanding stock, it would not be wise to amalgamate until that stock was under our control, but it would be wise to put the road in the Canadian Northern System.

Mr. BUREAU: You are going to keep the Canadian Northern Railway System as a separate entity, and the roads will not be consolidated for the purpose of general administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is just for convenience until it itself is amalgamated.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Power to abandon line, and dismantle—Or dispose thereof by consent—Consent of security holders.

Mr. FIELDING: Would a majority of the stockholders mean a majority in number or in amount?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Majority in amount.

Mr. FIELDING: If it means amount there may be something in the Railway Act which defines it; but it strikes me that it is open to debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My impression is that an amendment to cover that point should be made. It should read "a majority in amount."

Mr. BUREAU: In value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A majority in value.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What becomes of the securities if a road is abandoned? Are they worthless? It strikes me that we are giving very large powers to the Governor in Council and the Railway Commission to abandon branch lines without the consideration of Parliament. As I understand the clause, it empowers the Governor in Council, with the consent of the Railway Commission and the directors of this new system, to close up any railway branch that may be connected with the system, if they think it is not a paying proposition or for some other reason. I submit that that should be referred to Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In so far as the security holders are concerned, their consent is obtained, but their security is not lost. This would only be a small part of their security that would be dismantled and abandoned, and they would see the wisdom of adopting that course and would consent accordingly. Inasmuch as the whole idea of this measure is the joining together for operating purposes of lines that were formerly under several managements, there will presumably be cases of duplication that may be cut out without injury to the public, and the intention of this section is to provide that that may be done. The Board of Railway Commissioners is entrusted from the point of view of public convenience and safety with deciding what is necessary and what is not in the way of service. Consequently that is the tribunal, it seems to me, to which resort should be had to determine whether any small part or branch is a duplication or for other reasons may be abandoned.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are not some of those securities guaranteed by the provincial governments of Western Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If so I presume their consent would be needed also.

Mr. DAVIS: Does section 19 govern the last four lines of section 11?

—such management and operation to continue during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and to be subject to termination or variation from time to time in whole or in part by the Governor in Council.

That is as to roads that come under the operation of the board subsequent to the incorporation of this company?

Mr. Meighen moved to amend section 19 as follows:

By adding after the word "majority" in the seventh line on page 6, and after the word "majority" in the tenth line on page 6, and after the word "majority" in the sixteenth line on page 6 the words "in value."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. POWER: The amendment is "majority in value of the registered security holders;" that is how it will read in the third last line?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is quite the proper wording.

On section 20—extension of time for commencement and completion of lines of railway:

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think this section should pass now; it requires a great deal of consideration. It is a further revival of the old conditions against which I wish to protest in the most strenuous manner. We are here authorizing those defunct companies, of which we have heard so much, to start building railways and to get their old machinery in operation again, and presumably we are to furnish funds for such building. Is that the idea? What is the good of talking consolidation if those companies, all of which are hopelessly insolvent, are to be given authority by us to go on building railroads? Why should we sit down here solemnly with all the wisdom we can bring to bear on a question of this kind to perpetuate that state of affairs? I certainly expect this clause to stand over until tomorrow.

Progress reported.

EFFICIENCY IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Hon. J. D. REID: With the consent of the House, I move:

inquiry into the Inside Civil Service be referred to a Special Committee consisting of the following members: Messrs. Andrews, Archambault, Boys, Charters, Douglas (Cape Breton South, and Richmond), Jacobs, Loggie, Long, McCrea, Mowat, Pacaud, Redman, Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough) Steele, Stevens, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Friday, April 25, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (E. Lambton) moved:

That the Special Committee to whom was referred Bill No. 19, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, have leave to sit while the House is in session, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the first report of the said committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can be put only by leave of the House.

Motion stands.

PAPER PRESENTED.

Order in Council respecting allowances to be paid to soldier settlers who are taking agricultural training.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 78, to amend the Criminal Code (sexual offences).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill is the same Bill as was introduced into and passed by this House last session respecting seduction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HORSE RACING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALFRED E. FRIPP (Ottawa): Is it the intention of the Government to repeal Order in Council dated June 7, 1917, which prohibits for the period of the war and for six months thereafter betting, pool selling and book-making upon race-courses, in order that the spring meets may take place under the conditions prevailing before the war.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Has the Government in contemplation the enactment of any legislation respecting the matter of betting upon race-courses in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question and I am, therefore, enabled to make formal reply.

It is not the intention of the Government to repeal the Order in Council referred to.

It has been drawn to the attention of the Government that horse racing has been extended beyond the limits in contemplation by Parliament when legislation respecting the subject was enacted in 1912, and that conditions connected with betting upon race-courses in certain sections of Canada have been such as to cause grave public offence to the communities concerned. With a view to remedying these conditions and dealing generally with the question of betting at race meetings in Canada the Government intends before the next session of Parliament to make an inquiry with a view to the enactment of such legislation as may be deemed advisable in the public interest.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—VOUCHERS FOR OVERSEAS PAYMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JAMES ALEXANDER ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire to draw to the attention of the Acting Prime Minister the following entry on page 218 ZZ of the Auditor General's Report, Overseas Department of Militia and Defence.

Expenditure by the Chief Paymaster on account of pay and other expenses of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, vouchers for which have not been received.	$119,546,597.93
Less refunds deposited to the credit of the Receiver General by the Chief Paymaster	4,165,354.22
	$115,381,243.71

This leaves a balance of $115,381,243.71 paid out for which vouchers have not been received. Since the publication of the Auditor General's Report, has the Government taken any steps to secure vouchers for this expenditure of $115,381,243.71 by the Paymaster of the Overseas Department of Militia and Defence, and may the House expect details of this expenditure, none of which are given in the Auditor General's Report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The vouchers for the expenditure in question would be amongst the records of the Overseas Ministry of Militia. My hon. friend will recall that the Auditor General of Canada, the late Mr. Fraser, with the concurrence of the Government, visited London and spent some considerable time there, examining the audit system which was in effect. He returned, expressing himself as entirely satisfied, and since that date, the Auditor General's department has been in close touch with the Overseas Ministry. No question, therefore, arises as to audit. With regard to the publication of the items, I have not had notice until this moment of my hon. friend's question, and I shall be glad to make inquiry with a view to seeing what, if any, information of a detailed character is available here which might be brought down to the House. I shall endeavour to answer my hon. friend's question more fully when we have under consideration the War Appropriation Bill.

TRANSATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: While the Transatlantic mails are actually conveyed by steamer direct from Liverpool to Halifax with the soldiers, unfortunately, whilst the soldiers are landed at Halifax, the mails are taken off only at New York whither the steamers proceed from Halifax. A few days ago the Halifax Chronicle had this item:

> During the past few weeks the Adriatic, the Lapland, the Baltic, the Royal George, the Cedric and the Caronia, arrived at Halifax with Canadian troops and carrying the Canadian mails in every case. The mails, instead of being landed at Halifax, were carried on to New York. So far as the province of Nova Scotia was concerned, this involved a delay of from four to five days in the delivery of overseas mail, and in the case of the rest of Canada there was, of course, corresponding delay all around.

Would my hon. friend who represents the Postmaster General in this House kindly explain how it is that steamers which are subsidized for the very purpose of carrying Canadian mails ignore Canadian ports in this way and deliver the mail at American ports?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (Acting Postmaster General): This is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention. I shall make inquiries and be prepared to give my hon. friend an answer on Monday.

DISCHARGE OR LEAVE FOR SOLDIERS AT HALIFAX.

On the Orders of the Day:

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Sinclair) asked a question regarding an item that had appeared in a Charlottetown paper advertising that Premier Arsenault would meet a delegation in connection with the release of certain soldiers from the Halifax district. I have received a telegram from Mr. Arsenault which I shall read in order to correct any mistaken impression that may have gone abroad:

> Reference Sinclair statement in the House, presume he referred to following advertisement in Patriot newspaper reading as follows: "Premier Arsenault will meet a delegation of farmers having sons in the military at Halifax and who desire to have them granted home leave or discharge, on Friday 25th inst. at 1.30 p.m., in the Y.M.C.A." Permit me to say that this advertisement was inserted without my knowledge or consent, and I have given no statement to newspapers or to any one else with reference to discharge of men. Kindly correct impression given by Mr. Sinclair. I am making a statement in the House here this morning.

I think it is only fair I should make this known.

THE MARKET FOR WHEAT.

RULING ON WHAT QUESTIONS MAY BE PUT ON CALLING THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): I should like to read a letter I have received from a farmer in the riding of South Renfrew.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member would certainly not be in order, at this stage, in reading such a letter. It would be in order, on calling on the Orders of the Day, for the hon. member to put a question to the Government with respect to a matter of extreme urgency. Let me say just here that I have noticed a growing tendency in the last few days to ask various questions on the Orders of the Day which properly ought to be put formally upon the Order Paper. In the nature of things, the Government cannot be expected to answer offhand questions of which no notice has been given. Every latitude will, of course, be afforded to hon. gentlemen in asking questions having to do with matters of policy or of great importance, in which the element of urgency is present; but questions of but ordinary importance should be put on the Order Paper, and in no instance ought correspondence to be read. If the hon. member will summarize his question, if it is of sufficient importance, it may be put—but I hope it will come within the proper bounds.

Mr. PEDLOW: This is a question undoubtedly of great importance not only to the riding of South Renfrew but to the whole Dominion. It has to do with the sale of wheat. This farmer writes that he has on hand 500 bushels of wheat for which he cannot obtain a market in this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: That, in my judgment, is not a question which should be asked upon the Orders of the Day. It should either be put on the Order Paper or be raised when the Estimates come up.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I think the question is of great public interest. A price has been fixed for wheat, and here is a man who says that as he cannot sell the crop he raised last year, he does not know whether he will put in a crop this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the matter is of such urgency that injustice would be done by requiring this question to be placed on the Order Paper in the ordinary course. I think it is purely a local question, but if it has a wider aspect, the hon. gentleman may put it.

Mr. PEDLOW: The kernel of it is this: As this man is unable to dispose of his last year's crop, he has decided not to sow any wheat this year. He claims he has on hand 500 bushels of wheat.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member put his question?

Mr. PEDLOW: The question this man asks is, where can he obtain a market for his wheat? The price of wheat has been fixed, I understand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I concur in the view expressed by His Honour the Speaker, that it is very desirable hon. members should give the Government notice of questions of this character. However, it chances that I am able to answer the question. I may say to my hon. friend that although I have had to do with providing the finances, either directly or indirectly, connected with the crop movements of the last two years, this is the first instance that has been brought to my attention of any one being unable to sell wheat. The Government of Canada did give a guarantee to the banks and to the purchasers of wheat in order that the sale of last year's crop might be facilitated. My understanding with the Wheat Export Company of Canada which buys the exportable surplus of the crop of last year, is that our exportable surplus of wheat and flour will be purchased provided the Dominion Government is able to find the necessary credits. In order that my hon. friend may understand the magnitude of the undertaking of the Dominion Government in this regard, I may say to him that up to date the Government has paid out over $80,000,000 by way of advances to the Imperial Government for the purpose of facilitating the purchase of Canada's exportable surplus of wheat and flour of last year's crop and that within the last month we have undertaken to provide a sum which may aggregate $90,000,000 more for the purpose of taking care of the entire situation. My hon. friend asks where his constituent will find a market. Not knowing the local situation, I am unable to answer that question, but if the wheat is of the proper grade, it would seem to me that he should have no difficulty in finding a market. Beyond that I am unable to make a statement.

DATE OF THE BUDGET SPEECH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister to which he may give a Yes or No answer. In view of the unrest which exists throughout the country, due to the high cost of living, no doubt, will the Acting Prime Minister state when he intends to deliver the Budget Speech?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, many novel suggestions are put forward in this House, but this is the first time I have heard it suggested that the unrest in the community was due to the non-delivery of the Budget Speech. I stated some time ago that, following the usual practice, I should be glad to give the House a week or ten days' notice of the date of the Budget Speech, which I hope will not be unduly delayed. I am not aware that public interests are in any way suffering through the Budget not having yet been brought down. To give my hon. friend as reasonable an answer as I can, my expectation is that the Budget may be expected about the middle of May.

INTERNED ALIENS IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): In view of certain correspondence I have received from interned civilians in Canada, who appear to be British subjects of German origin, may I ask if the Government has reached any decision regarding the eventual deportation of these people? They naturally address themselves to me, because I have been an interned civilian in Germany. They claim to be British subjects.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): If there are interned civilians in Canada who are British subjects, I am not aware of it. I should not like to say, without investigation, that it may not be the fact in individual cases. As to deportation, the matter stands exactly where it stood when discussed in this House about two weeks ago. It is impossible to secure deportation now to any enemy country.

Mr. BELAND: Is it the intention of the Government eventually to deport all interned civilians of enemy origin?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The policy of the Government is set out in an Order in Council which has been laid on the Table—namely, to deport all who from any standpoint are undesirable. That applies, I think, to the great body of the present interned aliens.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 70, to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 20—extension of time for commencement and completion of lines of railway:

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is a very important clause and I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) if he has a statement showing how many lines, or portions of lines, are not yet constructed, what are their respective mileages and their approximate cost.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not a list of all the lines before me. There are a lot of them whose charters have been kept in existence but which will not be proceeded with. There has been some money—probably very little—expended upon them. It might only be the expenditure for surveying and so on. I thought it would be well, until we really understood the situation, to renew them all. They all belong to the Government now. The common stock is now all part of the Canadian National Railway system. It struck me that it would be no harm to renew them in this way for the present instead of coming to Parliament with a Bill to revive or extend every one of these charters. There are a large number of lines that have charters. There were two ways of doing this. We could have had a general clause such as we find in this Bill keeping these charters alive until we can take them up with the Railway Committee in the future. Or, we could have a schedule attached to the Bill giving a list of the charters that we were renewing by this clause. I had asked the solicitor of the company to give me a list of those lines that we are really doing work on and whose charters it is necessary to renew at once. We can do either one of these two things; that is renew all the charters, or just have a schedule attached and take those that we must have renewed this year. If we do that, of course, the others lapse and would have to be revived by Parliament at a future time. The list that the solicitor has prepared gives all that we will require to do any work on during the present year as far as he knows. The list is quite a long one. I can read it. If the Committee thinks it better to have a schedule attached to the Bill enumerating the companies, we, of course, can do that. I could not see any harm in simply renewing the charters that the Canadian Northern Railway Company has had for a number of years for the reason that they are now all owned by the Dominion Government and work under them cannot go on without the knowledge of Parliament. We must ask Parliament for the money to proceed with construction work. A list of the railways whose construction will be proceeded with will be given when the Estimate for that purpose is reached.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Is it the intention of the Government to complete this year the branch line from Oliver to St. Paul de Metis and the St. Guido line?

Mr. J. D. REID: The two lines that the hon. member asks about are two that we are renewing the charters for. We are proceeding with work on these two lines. As to the number of miles, or as to the completion of these lines this year, I could not give the hon. member an answer just at the moment, for the reason that I did not expect that a question of that kind would be asked on this Bill. When the Estimates are reached I will be glad to give the hon. member the details he asks for—as to whether we intend to complete the lines or how many miles we will construct.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The minister will recollect that one of the lines was provincially guaranteed, but the Canadian Northern appropriated the money to other purposes than its construction. A large number of people have left the district through which the proposed line was projected, and the minister ought to be in a position to say whether it will be completed this year or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the Minister of Railways is not giving this question the serious attention which he should. We are conferring large powers on this company, and the method of financing the affairs of the Canadian National Railway System is, in my judgment, rather lax. At all events, the company is made practically free of Parliamentary control, as was clearly established last evening in the remarks of both the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Therefore I think the country is entitled to know what line, or lines, the company intend to build, so that we may have some idea of the amount which will be involved in that construction. The Minister of Railways has a list, but he does not say if it is a list of all the companies which formerly belonged to the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. J. D. REID: The list to which the hon. gentleman refers does not include, by a long way, the charters of all the companies that were obtained, and whose stock is held by, the Canadian Northern Railway Company. A large number of such charters were taken out, but allowed to expire on account of the war. If I were to change this clause in the manner proposed it would have to read something like this:—

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule of this Act, which certain of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act.

Then the schedule would only comprise the railways that we really are going to operate and which it is necessary to keep alive. If we were to do that we should have to leave out of consideration a large number of charters that really should form a part of the Government's system, but are not being proceeded with during the coming year, and would therefore lapse until again revived by an Act of Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Railways should understand that there is such a tremendous expenditure involved in connection with the operation of this whole system that we must be very chary of the powers that we now propose to grant to this company, as regards the railways and the branch lines which formed part of the original Canadian Northern System. The least Parliament should exact from my hon. friend is a list of such railways and branch lines; and I think that in view of the novel institution that we are creating in this country a limit should be imposed upon the board of directors, at least for the next four or five years, so that they should not proceed immediately with the huge programme of construction originally proposed to be carried out by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Some of the branch lines, and possibly some of the sections of the main lines, should be completed, but in all these cases Parliament should be called upon to pronounce upon the policy of the company. I would not leave the company entirely free of control. We are giving sufficient powers to the company; we are practically surrendering all our rights to them, and we are handing to them one, and possibly two, transcontinental railways. Now, by means of this little clause the Minister of Railways will add enormously to the power to spend money which the board already possesses. That is why I say the branch lines, and the other subsidiary lines, of the Canadian Northern with the construction of which the Government intends to proceed, should be clearly set forth in the Bill. Otherwise we shall be entering upon a real carnival of expenditure which the country cannot afford. An hon. member (Mr. Richardson) spoke very disparagingly in a previous discussion of what Lord Shaughnessy, had said on this subject. Well, I am not by any means a corporation man, I am above all a Canadian, and I am afraid of the terrible burden that we are assuming at the present moment; and we must see to it, by a system of checks and safeguards, that the powers given to this board will not in the long run bring us to the verge of bankruptcy. I fear, from my reading of the provisions of this clause, that the board will feel that it is empowered to construct railways and branch lines right and left. This, of course, means that the Canadian people will have to pay the piper, and all that, mind you, Mr. Chairman, without the appropriations first coming before Parliament for sanction. If we give a blank collective charter to the board it may, by virtue of the powers conferred by Clause 17, undertake to build railways right and left. This is a serious danger and Parliament should guard against such a contingency. That is why I say to my hon. friend (Mr. J. D.

Reid) and I am in earnest, that he should state positively and explicitly what are the branch lines and subsidiary lines which this board, or the Government, intend to build, as well as the expenditure which that construction will involve. I notice by the morning papers that my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) intends to electrify part of the system of the Canadian Northern Railway. I do not wish to switch here on to the hydro question, which has of late set all Ontario aflame, but in that news we have an idea, or a hint, of what is in the mind of my hon. friend.

Mr. J. D. REID Oh, no, in the mind of Adam Beck.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, let us hear from my hon. friend on the subject. As for Sir Adam Beck, he is not afraid to express his views. It is strange, however, that such a prominent advocate of Government ownership as my friend should be so much opposed to Sir Adam Beck, who is supposed to be the pioneer and the leader of public ownership in the province of Ontario. Let me ask my hon. friend what he intends to do. Is it true that my hon. friend intends to electrify either the main line or the branch lines of the Canadian National system? And does he know what expenditure that will entail? The Government should give the Committee all the information it has on the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section under discussion merely provides for the extension of certain charters that are now owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. It provides no power to build. The power to build would, of course, be controlled by the power to get the money to build, and that power is entirely in the hands of the Governor in Council, not in the hands of the company; the company cannot issue a bond without that authority, and consequently it cannot build.

Mr. CAHILL: Did you say the authority of the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Governor in Council must ratify the by-law which provides for the bond issue, but Parliament itself must give the initial authority; so that question really is not under review in this section at all. What the hon. gentleman specifically asks for is that instead of a general revival there should be a revival as to certain definite construction powers that have been granted. That request we can meet in full, and to meet it I move:

To strike out all the words after "construction" in the second line of clause 20 and replace them by the following:

"of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act which certain of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act."

The schedule which will be printed will give the lines. The work on some of those lines is under way now and will be gone on with this year, and Estimates for that purpose will be brought down. They are branch lines into districts that had been languishing for railways for some time before the war.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Meighen moves to strike out clause 20 and replace—

Mr. McMASTER: Before that motion is put, Mr. Chairman, should not we have the schedule before us?

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to allow me to put the question; then it can be discussed:

Mr. Meighen moves:

To strike out all the words after "construction" in the second line of clause 20 and replace them by the following:

"of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act which certain of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act."

Is it the pleasure of the Committee to adopt the amendment?

Mr. McMASTER: We all appreciate the desire of the minister to meet our reasonable views in connection with this clause, but should the amendment not stand until he brings down the schedule?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The schedule has been brought down.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was laid upon the Table with the amendment.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not know that.

Mr. BUREAU: These are companies which previously belonged to the Canadian Northern System, and which will now be under the Canadian National Railways. We know that some of those charters were very contentious, and were very fully discussed when extensions of time were asked for. I remember one of the rare occasions upon which I had to fight on the same side as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways was in regard to the extension of a charter to the Canadian Northern Railway—it had slipped from my memory entirely. The minister spoke of Sir Adam Beck; there was quite a lively fight and hon. members were intensely interested, so much so, that Sir Adam Beck wanted to exclude the people from Quebec from taking part in the deliberations of the committee. It is not right that we should pass en bloc the extension of charters to which some people may have objection. We force any other company to come before Parliament and give the people who may suffer from the extension a chance to discuss the matter before the Railway Committee, and they leave that committee to judge whether or not the reasons then advanced are sufficient to justify refusal of the extension asked for. I know I will be met with the answer that the Government had these railways loaded on to it; therefore, it has to protect itself. I am willing that the Government should protect itself to any reasonable extent, provided that it is not at the expense of other interests. But I repeat, it would not be fair to grant any private corporation, say the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, an extension of time on all charters which may have expired at the commencement of the war without knowing what those charters are. The members here do not know anything about the local conditions; there may be reasons existing in certain parts of the country that would justify our refusing any extension of these charters. For instance, there may be rival companies who would be ready and willing to undertake the work the same as in the case of—I forget for the moment a certain charter which had expired and the renewal of which was asked for at the time Sir Adam Beck opposed the Canadian Northern project. I do not believe it is fair to the country to grant an extension of time just by giving the names of a lot of railways the charters of which had expired because the works in some cases had not been commenced within the two years, and in other cases because the works having been commenced were not concluded within the five years. I think it would be fairer that those charters on which the work could not be prosecuted on account of the war should be granted an extension of four or five years in order that the work may be finished.

Mr. CAHILL: Go to the Railway Committee?

Mr. BUREAU: No, by this Act. When work has been commenced on any of these lines which are the property of the Canadian Northern, and which will become the property of this company when this Bill is enacted, and such work on account of the war had to be suspended, I do not see so much objection to an extension of time if the five years had expired; but I do take exception to the granting of two year extensions from the date of this Bill for the commencement of work under charters which had expired for the reasons I have just stated.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is the usual clause in the Railway Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I know; but under the Railway Act they have to give notice in the newspapers and in the official Gazette that they will come before the Railway Committee, and any person having any conflicting interest has a right to appear before the Railway Committee and argue his case. In the present instance we do not know what objections there may be to the extension of the time for the beginning of work under these charters. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways by citing the case where Sir Adam Beck opposed an extension of time brought to my attention the fight we had on that occasion. As I have said, I do not think it is fair to grant these extensions of time when interested persons have no opportunity of appearing before the Railway Committee or any other proper authority to state their objections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the first place, the one specific instance the hon. member gives of a road in respect of which extension might be objected to is not included in the schedule. Those included in the schedule are all roads upon which work has already been done, except one, from Moosejaw to Chamberlain, which is the essential link in the line between Moosejaw and Calgary. Furthermore, all these lines in the schedule are west of Port Arthur. It is true that private companies have always had to go before the Railway Committee in order to get extensions, and certain objections have been raised from time to time which so far as my memory goes, have always been overruled. The objection invariably is that the company is seeking a charter, but not building the road. The ground of the objection is delay; it is asserted, perhaps, that the company applying for the charter is trying to forestall another line and is really not itself going on with the construction. No such objection could be urged here. The lines selected are those the construction of which it is least possible to defer. The districts affected have been without railways for years, and a serious responsibility would rest upon any member of the committee who, if the labour, material, and money can be provided, would oppose such extensions or do anything to delay further the laying out of these lines. But even if one did object, he would have ample opportunity to state his views when the vote was before Parliament. This is merely keeping alive the opportunity for the Canadian National Railway Company to build the lines in question, the money being voted for the purpose.

Mr. NESBITT: Will any of these lines be duplications of the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. McMASTER: Forty-four branch lines are named in the schedule. If you give to the Canadian National Railway Company the right to build, say, into a district where there is a coal mine, would that be interfering with the building of a railway by those coal interests, whose business interest it would be to develop railway communication in that part of the country long before the Government might be able to find the money to construct the line?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The practice is for the coal people to go to the company to build the lines. But the primary object is to extend these lines not to coal mines, but to farmers. In every instance it is the farmers who want the roads.

Mr. CAHILL: I have not yet heard the objection to having these applications for extensions heard before the Railway Committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am at a loss to know why we should go to the Railway Committee to renew charters that are virtually our own. Charters go before the Railway Committee in order that discussion may take place as to whether or not the company really intends to build. We know the intention to build in this case.

Mr. CAHILL: Are these forty-four lines to be built this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention is to do some work on all forty-four lines.

Mr. CAHILL: Then we should at least know where these lines are, why they are necessary, what is the mileage involved and how much their construction will cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say as to the mileage intended. On a few of the lines no work might be done, but it is hoped that some work will be done on all.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not go to the Railway Committee where we may have a map before us and have somebody there to answer questions and to explain why these extensions are asked for? If the Canadian Pacific Railway are ready to build in the same territory, Parliament might rather have the Canadian Pacific Railway build than the Canadian National Railway Company. Why should we not do this thing in the regular way, instead of gobbling up forty-four lines to-day and probably another hundred to-morrow?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is a little out in facts and altogether out in principle. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company does not have to come to the Railway Committee in respect of the construction of lines running from the main line. The time to decide in respect of what lines money should be advanced to assist in construction will be when we are in committee on the Estimates. I will try to improve on the clearness of my language, and then I would rather not be told that I have not answered my hon. friend's objection. The only reason for going to the Railway Committee in a case of this kind is to decide the bona fides of the intention to build the line. We surely would not contemplate allowing another company to come in where we have a charter and intend to build, and say: We want that charter, because you do not intend to build. It would seem to me to be an utter anomaly to go to the Railway Committee. If we intend to apply for the charter, surely that is enough; what would there be for the Railway Committee to consider? If Parliament did not wish to build the line, the matter could be discussed when all the Estimates in respect of the lines that it is proposed to go on with are laid before the committee.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway being ready to build a line into a territory included in these forty-four charters, said to the Railway Committee: This charter has expired, and we do not want you to grant an extension of time that would prevent us from getting a charter for the construction of a line in that territory. Would it not be reasonable for the committee to decide what company they wanted to build the line—the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk, perhaps some American company like the Great Northern, or the Canadian National Railway Company? I cannot see any objection to going to the Railway Committee.

Mr. BUREAU: Are all the railways enumerated in schedule No. 1—

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are not railways; they are construction powers as to branches.

Mr. BUREAU: Are they not railways? They are incorporated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not railways themselves; that is to say, they are not companies. They are construction powers or charters taken out by the companies included in schedule 1.

Mr. BUREAU: They are not lines of railways. The second schedule says "The lines of railway," and the minister says that they are not lines of railway. The second schedule says "The lines of railway which the Canadian Northern Western railway was authorized to construct," and then come the lines of railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. BUREAU: That is what I say. Are the lines of railway enumerated in this list the railways which are being transferred to the Canadian Government railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a difference between a line of railway and a railway company. The list given in schedule 1 are companies, constituting at present the Canadian Northern system, that are being transferred to the Canadian National railways. Those companies took out charters or construction powers to construct lines, and the lines they took out charters for are mentioned in schedule 2 which the hon. gentleman holds in his hand.

Mr. BUREAU: Where did they get their powers? I see some of them got their powers from provincial legislatures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is specified in each case.

Mr. BUREAU: Then they do not yet form part of the Canadian Northern railway system?

Mr. KEEFER: Is not the difficulty easily overcome? The Canadian Northern Railway Company have several charters for roads in the West. Some of those roads have been completed, some of them are partially built and some of them are probably yet to be built. The Canadian Government has taken over all the assets of the Canadian Northern railway system. Part of those assets are those unfinished, perhaps untouched roads.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says we have only the stock; we have no assets and we are not responsible for liabilities.

Mr. KEEFER: It will be for the executive management or the board of directors to decide whether those roads will be built or not. If it is not a paying proposition to build those lines or extensions, they will not be built. If they have to be completed or entirely built, we have to come to Parliament for the money, and then will be the time to attack them.

Mr. BUREAU: No, the consideration of Estimates is a bad time to discuss those matters. When I raised my objection that, of those lines, the schedule of which is laid on the Table, one alone had not been commenced, and the others, 41 in number, had work done on them, the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) said just now that all the Bill provides for at present is an extension of five years to finish the work, and only in one case is there an extension of two years to begin the work asked for. Is that right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information was that, of this list of lines, there was just one upon which no work at all was done, and for which an extension of time to commence and conclude had been asked for. My informant tells me now he may not be quite correct in that. In the great majority, in all, perhaps, but three or four work has been done.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not object so much to the extension of five years as I do to the extension of two years. The Acting Minister of Justice says that we can discuss that on the Estimates. He knows that cannot be done on Estimates the same as it can be done when a Bill is going through the various stages in the House. The minister cannot deny that when Estimates are being discussed, unless a very broad question is involved, the discussion is more of a parochial nature, every member being naturally interested in the particular matter that touches his part of the country. I seriously object to the extension of two years, and I would ask the minister to specify the companies for which he is asking an extension of time to begin operation. When operations have commenced, neither the railway nor the public is in the same position. The public cannot, through Parliament, have the work stopped. When, however, a company have not actually begun the work of construction, we can bring them before Parliament to make sure they are going to build. The biggest fights that take place before the Railway Committee are with regard to opposing the renewal of charters, when people doubted that the companies were in a position to carry on the construction, but often there are objections of an entirely different character, and I do not think the Government should take advantage of its present position to revive charters without going before the Railway Committee, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), and giving parties interested an opportunity to present their cases.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I understood the minister to say there was no objection to the section being passed because members would have an opportunity on the Estimates to object to anything in a charter which is being renewed by this section.

Mr. BUREAU: Not to the charter. All you can do is to object to the money being voted.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: When the Estimates are brought down for the purpose of appropriating money for the construction of a line mentioned in schedule 2, can we ask for an amendment of a charter which is renewed by this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One could not, on the Estimates, add anything to the powers contained in the charter.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I wish to make my point clear. In schedule 2, there is a proposed line from Bandeheim to Vermilion in Alberta. Personally, I object to the construction of that line as outlined in the schedule. Instead of the line going as far as Vermilion, I would like it to pass a little eastward of that town, and I would like to have an opportunity of stating my case when that line is proposed to be constructed. If this section goes through, the only remedy I have is to object to the money being voted. I understand there are forty-two cases of this nature, and I am not prepared to say whether or not every member of this House might have a similar objection to take to the building of one or another of those lines.

Mr. DEVLIN Now is the only time to discuss that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Wright knows better than that. What the hon. member (Mr. H. A. Mackie) is asking for is this: He says the charter for a certain line running as far as Vermilion does not suit him, in that it does not run far enough.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It should not touch Vermilion at all; it should go to the eastward of that town.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The charter would permit of a variation only of a mile. That possibly would not meet the objection?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Consequently, the charter, for the renewal of which provision is made in this section, is not the charter the hon. member would like to see go through. Another charter would have to be taken out for the line the hon. member wants built.

Mr. DEVLIN: The hon. member objects to the charter that is at present granted, and he wants an opportunity of stating his reasons for objecting to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has a perfect right to object to any charter or to the renewal of any charter if he wishes to take the responsibility.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The minister is simply side-tracking my point. It is not a question whether the line goes one mile east of Vermilion or not. Supposing it is a question of five miles east of Vermilion, am I justified in coming to this Parliament to ask for another charter for a line duplicating this one?

I am sure the House would not listen to me. It might not be material to Vermilion to have the line run there, but it might be very material to Vermilion to have the railway four or five miles east of there, and one charter would suit the purposes of the whole community. The minister says I can ask for another charter, but the Government would never grant it. It would be duplicating lines only three or four miles apart.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, it is quite open to the hon. gentleman to oppose the extension of this charter.

Mr. McKENZIE: This question brings us back to the difficulties involved in multiplying authority. By this legislation and the general Railway Act, we are conferring powers on a body of men, called the directors, to build railways. The point of my hon. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie) is pertinent. Why should we encumber this new company that we are creating by any decisions, and possibly wrong decisions, that were made by Mackenzie and Mann? We are starting a new company, which will open up largely a new country. Why should we not give them a free hand to build in such places and to such an extent as they see fit, in view of the circumstances of the country and the prospects they have in mind? Instead of giving them a free hand to build as their own judgment may direct, we are placing forty-two old charters in their hands, and saying: "I do not care what you think. Mackenzie and Mann decided some ten or twelve or fifteen years ago to build in certain places. Here are their plans and specifications and charter, and you must build there or not at all." Is not that the position we are putting this new company in? The proper course, to my mind, is this: Every one of those old charters should be wiped out. If the new company decides it is necessary to build roads in certain places, let them do it, but I cannot understand why we should undertake all the promises that Mackenzie and Mann made. I am told that they went through certain municipalities and got concessions and bonds from them on the promise that they would build certain roads. Mackenzie and Mann got the money, but did not build the roads. Why should we be bound by their promises? I do not think that we should be. I do not want in the slightest way to handicap or trammel this new company; I want it to have all the talent we can put into it; I do not want to bind it down to any old charters or any old bargains. I understand that all the powers that could conceivably be required for the building of railways are found in this Act and in the general Railway Act—if I am wrong in that, I should like to be enlightened. I say there is no necessity for these old charters at all. If these old companies have any property or have acquired any rights, I would certainly be in favour of assigning those rights to this new company, and let the new company have full control with respect to them. We have a Government-owned road already, without assuming the obligations of all these companies. I should like the Acting Minister of Justice to enlighten me why it is necessary to perpetuate these companies. Why should we pay from the Exchequer of this country a large amount of money in taxes on the properties we are creating under fictitious names—because fictitious names they are; the property will not belong to the company, but to the Government, and the law of the land is that the property of the Government does not pay taxes—why should we pay out millions of dollars all over the country which there is no necessity for us to pay, and especially now, when we should look at every dollar of our money?

I am in favour of putting all the powers conferred on these forty-two different companies in one charter. That would simplify matters, and then when a question was asked in the House we should have only one company to deal with, instead of forty or more different concerns. It would be extremely difficult for any one to get into his head the relationship and co-operation of the forty different companies. There should be only one company, both for the sake of unity and efficiency, and I should like the minister to explain why he thinks it necessary to continue these separate companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have tried very hard to understand the contention of the leader of the Opposition. The first thing that struck me to-day was how diametrically he was opposed to the criticism offered by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. That hon. member was appalled at the freedom this clause gave to the company; his leader complains that we are not giving them freedom enough, that we are attempting to make them construct roads on old charters. Both complaints, although diametrically opposed, are equally wrong. We are in no way seeking to impose any obligations on the company; we are simply ratifying charters of companies belonging to the Canadian National railways, which that directorate now runs; the charters must be revived or the roads could not be constructed if construction was desired. The revival of these charters is necessary before we would be in a position to recommend to Parliament an estimate to enable the company to construct. My hon. friend also desires the elimination of these separate companies, whether named in schedule 2, as some may be, or in Schedule 1, as the original constituent companies of the system. I have already assured him, and I repeat the assurance, that the intention is to amalgamate with the parent concern, the Canadian National railways, every one of these companies just as soon as the outstanding stock is got rid of. All these companies can be got rid of at once, except where there is outstanding stock not held by us, and, of course, the American lines.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think my learned and hon. friend so easily disposes of my objection. It is one thing for the Government, or the Minister of Railways, to approve the plans of a company when the company is putting up the money, taking the responsibility of building the road and financing it. It is another thing for the Government itself, or the Minister of Railways acting for the Government, to approve a plan where they have to advance the money and where they have to take the responsibility of the venture upon which they are launching. That is a different thing altogether. These charters which we are asked to revive are charters from this House, some of them, some from other legislatures, to build roads in a certain way and at certain places. They have made their plans, I presume and laid them before the Department of Railways and received the approval of the department for forty or fifty of them. The minister tells us that it is the intention to do some work on every one of them this year but this new company that we are creating now has no choice at all as to whether these roads are to be built, where they shall be placed or to what extent they shall go. The plans are laid down, they have received the approval of the Government and they must be built in accordance with them. What I wanted to say to the minister was that I want this new company when it is starting out to handle the people's money, to have an absolutely free hand as to where these roads shall be built. When the minister puts a charter in the hands of this company, it is merely a construction company in that regard because its powers are confined within the charter that is handed over to it. They must confine themselves to the powers contained in the charter under which they are working and these are the powers that we are reviving. This is imposing a burden upon this new company, which, if they had a free hand, they never would undertake. The minister tells us that they have to take them holus bolus, forty-five or fifty of them, on which Mackenzie and Mann are making promises for the last twenty years and we are to furnish the money whether it is good business or otherwise to go on with these works. We are creating this company to build and to operate these roads and therefore they should have a free hand and should not be encumbered by the thoughts and schemes of other people for whose thoughts and schemes they are not responsible; nor is this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's speech, while he puts his position a little more clearly, is encumbered by the very same inconsistency as his last speech. He says this is a new company, and that it is not building with its own money and its own resources, but it is building with the money and resources of the country. Therefore, he says, the same rule does not apply, and from that he proceeds to argue that we should not impose upon them any special conditions of construction, but that they should have a free hand. It would appear to me that the application would be the other way. We should have some control. There should not be any imposition. There is none. But this company themselves desire the construction of all the lines included in the schedule. Indeed, they would like to construct more. Over that there must be some control exercised by this Parliament of the recommendation of the Governor in Council. There should be that control exercised as expressed in the Appropriation Act or in the Estimates. The company desires the construction of these lines. It is hoped that something may be done on nearly all of them. There may be some on which it may be impossible to do any construction, but for safety's sake it is well to include them in case it will be possible to build them all. But the company desire the construction of these roads because the people demand them. The people in many other localities want construction done there too, but this is the outside list of those we think it would be possible to do any work upon and this is to be done by the company subject to supervision by the Governor in Council and by this House.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the minister mean by giving us the thoughts of the company? We are creating the company. It is not in existence yet. This Act is about to bring some entity into being which shall be the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the time comes that we shall have created the company by this Act the minister with his predestinate, his far-conceiving mind, tells us what this company will be thinking about.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was thinking about the present directorate.

Mr. McKENZIE: They are not the company. I have a little keenness of mind, I have been under the tutorship of the minister for a good many years, and when he talks about a company that is not in existence, I feel that we have a right, particularly when we are dealing with a hair-splitter like the Minister of the Interior, to know what he means.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The unusual thing about a proposal such as this is that we are asked to revive charters granted by the legislature of Alberta and Saskatchewan and not by this Parliament. That is another reason why the proposal of my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) ought to be accepted because these charters have never been before this Parliament. There may be a question as to our competence to revive a defunct charter granted by the legislature of Alberta or Saskatchewan. I question if such a proposal was ever made in the Canadian Parliament before. The minister has not given us very much information. We have been discussing this section now for a long time and we have reached the point of being told that it is proposed to build forty-two railways. We do not know the length of them or their cost. These are essential things. We know that one of these railways is 150 miles in length. The length of the others is not mentioned at all, but if they are 100 miles in length on the average, that means 4,200 miles of railway. If these railways cost $70,000 a mile, that means an expenditure of about $300,000,000. I want to enter a protest against the proposal to spend $300,000,000 more in Western Canada in railway building without any provision being made for building branch lines in Eastern Canada. It is a preposterous proposal to ask Parliament to give a blank charter of this sort to expend $300,000,000. We do not know where these railways are, we do not know their length, we do not know anything about them except that there are forty-two of them. If the minister cannot give us definite information he should not expect this section to be accepted by the Committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid that I shall have to say to the hon. gentleman first of all that all of his assertions are wrong from the commencement of his speech to the end. In the first place we are not giving any blank authority to spend a dollar by this Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: You are paving the way for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are paving the way in this sense, that we have no powers under which to build unless these charters are renewed. We are enabling Parliament later on to say so if Parliament believes that these lines are necessary and if it desires to build them as being necessary. What objection can there be to enabling Parliament, if it sees fit, to build such lines as it thinks are necessary? The next statement the hon. gentleman made was that we did not know what lines they were or where they were.

We know all that from the schedule. We do not know the amount of railway line to be built, but we are not asking for authority to build now, we are simply asking to enable Parliament afterwards to assist in building it. When that time comes all the information will be given that will enable Parliament to come to a conclusion. All we have to conclude now is whether to renew the charters or not. If there is any particular objection to the renewal of any specific charter, this is the time to object.

There is one thing I also wish to say to the Committee. As respects some of these lines the provincial Governments have guaranteed the bonds. Indeed, in certain cases the bonds have already been sold, and the money lies in the hands of the provincial treasurer to be paid out as construction advances. The charters must be renewed, and the lines gone on with, in order that the money which lies there for that purpose only, can be used.

Mr. VIEN: Has the minister a list of those charters which are in abeyance until the lines are constructed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could by occupying some time give the list referred to by the hon. gentleman. But as to the others, the necessity for the renewal of the charter is absolutely just as clear as in this case, so there is no reason for distinguishing either for the purpose of this section or for the purposes of this entire Blll. There may be such reasons for the purpose of the vote when Parliament is actually deciding whether we should assist the building of the line or not.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am glad to have heard the minister say that this is the time to discuss any proposed charter, because a few moments ago when the hon. member (Mr. Mackie) suggested discussing a certain charter the minister stated that the present was not the time for that, but rather when the Estimates were under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not. I said it was the time to discuss whether the charter should be renewed or not, but it was not the time to discuss whether the renewal of a charter applicable to some other place should be taken up.

Mr. DEVLIN: As I understood the hon. member (Mr. Mackie) was offering objections to a certain charter that had been granted, and was proceeding to criticise it when the minister said to him in very clear and distinct language—in language that I could quite understand without any difficulty—that the hon. gentleman would have an opportunity to discuss the charter when the Estimates were being considered.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Or that there could be a new charter.

Mr. BUREAU: You have got to be careful otherwise there will be a paralleling of the line of railway.

Mr. DEVLIN: In a moment or two the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackie) will have an opportunity of discussing that phase of the question in which he is more particularly interested. In the meantime I want to draw attention to one or two other questions which, if ventilated, it seems to me, will help to obviate a good deal of the discussion upon this clause. The hon. member (Mr. Keefer) stated that we owned the constructive rights spoken of a few months ago by the Acting Minister of Justice. On the other hand the latter gentleman said that we do not own them, but we "virtually" own them. I wish to ask the Acting Minister of Justice, as he is in an enlightening mood, to tell the House exactly what the country has purchased from the Canadian Northern Railway Company. We have had statements made by the Acting Prime Minister in the past, but we never could really understand, and we do not understand to-day, just what properties the Government have acquired from the Canadian Northern. We know that they have acquired the common stock of the company. We are told to-day by one hon. member well versed in the subject that we own certain lines of railway and the constructive rights that go with those lines. Again we hear the Acting Minister of Justice say: No, we only virtually own these constructive rights. The word "virtually" caught my ear, and that word does not convey to those of us who perhaps do not understand the fine language of the Acting Minister of Justice whether we have both hands, or only one hand, upon these lines. Perhaps if the Acting Minister of Justice cannot do it, the Minister of Railways will tell us just what we own and what we do not own. Do we own simply the lines of railway spoken of in the schedule to this Bill, along with the constructive rights, comprised in the list that has been laid upon the Table? Because the Acting Minister of Justice would not allow a list of constructive rights to be placed upon the Table and lead us to believe that we own them, if we were not the owners, although he did tell us that we only virtually owned them. I know that the hon. member (Mr. Keefer) would not lead the Committee to believe, and I take it he is one of the most enlightened lawyers upon this subject in the House—

Mr. MORPHY: I rise to a point of order. I do not think the hon. gentleman is discussing the clause now under consideration.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the hon. member please state his point of order?

Mr. MORPHY: Certainly. We are now dealing with the commencement and completion of lines of railway comprised in the Canadian Northern system. The hon. gentleman is asking for a list of what we own. That has nothing to do with the construction of lines of railway.

Mr. DEVLIN: The hon. member cannot understand that the words contained in the clause have a direct bearing upon the question I was discussing?

Mr. MORPHY: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: We have been discussing the matter for the last half hour, so the hon. member must just have awakened.

Mr. BUREAU: He is looking at the stars.

Mr. DEVLIN: I hope that the Acting Minister of Justice will not beat about the bush, but will give us a straight and direct answer—we who represent the people and want to know what we are paying for—and that he will tell us exactly what we have bought. The minister said a few moments ago that the Government intend to build at least a portion of the roads enumerated in the schedule attached to this Bill, or at least that work would be done upon most of those roads.

Mr. BUREAU: Forty-four in number.

Mr. DEVLIN: I presume the construction rights relate to at least thirty to thirty-six out of the forty-two or forty-four enumerated. Now, upon which of these roads will the Government do work, and what will the expenditure be? Will the minister also enlighten the House as to the Government's power to go on and carry out these works when they intend to create, and are creating by this Bill, a company which will have absolute control of the construction and operation of the Government roads, and of all roads necessary to complete the system contemplated under this Bill? How will the Government go on with that building? Will they dictate to the company what roads they are to build? I trust that the minister will be in a position to enlighten the House to that extent and then we shall make greater progress with the consideration of this clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has succeeded in the very ingenious art of confusing the issue. He first asks what the Government have bought. As the hon. gentleman voted on the question one would have thought he already understood what we have bought. We bought the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. DEVLIN: The common stock, which is worth nothing.

Mr. BUREAU: We paid ten millions for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As soon as this very interesting interlude is over I will proceed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The ownership of the common stock, which is now entirely owned by the Government, subject to transfer of some which is pledged and still not paid for by us, means the ownership of the whole Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. BUREAU: It means control?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman already understands just as well as I can ever make him understand, and he understood before he asked me. Among the assets of the company whose stocks we own are the construction rights or charters enumerated in Schedule 2. The hon. member says that I told the Committee we are going to build. If I used the term "we," the more accurate term would be "Canadian National Railways," which of course he must have understood, because I have a high appreciation of his intelligence. The Government will not directly build any roads of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Only indirectly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian National railways will build their own roads; but inasmuch as assistance will in all probability be necessary, the Government must exercise supervision as to what is ventured upon in the way of construction by the company. Upon the company's recommendation it is intended to include in the renewal of charters all those contained in Schedule 2, because it is hoped that under most of them at all events some work can be done this year, and what cannot be done this year it is hoped will be done next year and then continued. I think with my limited capacity of language I have expressed as clearly as I possibly can what is intended.

Mr. BUREAU: Not so much humility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the use of the word "virtually" I really thought it was very appropriate, but with the hon. members' permission I will change it to "virtuous."

Mr. BUREAU: Change it to "scandalously."

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Will the minister allow the clause to stand in order to give us time to study Schedule No. 2?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The schedule is considered after the last clause, so it can be amended then if necessary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BUREAU: No. The lines of railway which the Canadian Northern Western railway was authorized to construct I suppose are under its control and are owned by it the same as the Canadian Government owns the Canadian Northern?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They own the powers contained in the charters.

Mr. BUREAU: Therefore the incorporators were the Canadian Northern Western Railway Company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose so.

Mr. BUREAU: Will they form part of the system that is now being consolidated since the Canadian Northern Western Company is one of the constituent companies enumerated?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: These powers of the Canadian Northern Western Railway Company —which I suppose has a federal charter and is for the general advantage of Canada—are granted by the various legislatures?

Mr. J. D. REID: And declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: The legislatures cannot declare them to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did so in 1914.

Mr. BUREAU: All these lines?

Mr. J. D. REID: The charter which the hon. member mentions was a provincial charter, but in 1914 the undertaking was declared by this Parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: At the time the stock was being acquired by the Federal Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, at the time the Bill went through.

Mr. BUREAU: These charters are actually part of the Canadian Government railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course they are.

Mr. BUREAU: And these powers which they are now exercising are derived from the legislatures of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and some, I see, by the heading are derived from this very Parliament. Now, Mr. Chairman, as has been submitted by the hon. member for Edmonton, forty-four lines are enumerated here, there is one copy of the schedule in circulation among hon. members, and yet the minister expects us to discuss the various clauses of the Bill, and at the same time become conversant with the details of this schedule, which is practically impossible. If the hon. gentleman wishes the matter to be understood by us as well as he understands it, he must give us the same opportunity to get posted. Of course we are all aware that anything pertaining to the Canadian Northern Railway system has been the subject of special and profound study on the part of the Acting Minister of Justice, but it has not been so with us. Therefore I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton is a reasonable one, and that consideration of the second schedule ought not to take place until we have had time to study it.

The CHAIRMAN: I beg to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the second schedule cannot be adopted at present, for according to the rules all the clauses of the Bill must first be considered, and the first schedule must be adopted before we can adopt the second schedule. We are now discussing clause 20, and the second schedule will be discussed when the clauses of the Bill have been disposed of.

Mr. BUREAU: I have always understood, Mr. Chairman, that a schedule attached to any contract formed part of it, and that when a schedule is attached to one section of a Bill it ought to form part of that section, and ought to be discussed at the same time if it is to be discussed intelligently. If the rule of the House is that any reference to a schedule in one section precludes discussion of it until the Bill has been disposed of, that means a very naked discussion and I would suggest that we form a committee to amend that rule at once.

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling of the Chair was not that the schedule could not be discussed; the ruling was that the schedule could not be adopted until the Bill had been fully discussed and the other clauses adopted. May, at page 375 says:

> All the clauses of the Bill are considered before any new clauses are brought up and added to the Bill. . . . . Schedules to a Bill are considered after new clauses are disposed of. . . . . When the schedules have been considered, new schedules are offered.

Bourinot at page 522 says:

> The schedules are the parts of the Bill last considered.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not dispute that. I do not care when it is adopted, whether now, to-morrow, or Monday, but I say you cannot discuss section 20 without looking at the charters and knowing what we are dealing with. May says just what I wanted him to say, that we can consider the schedule at the same time as we consider the provisions of the law.

The CHAIRMAN: He does not say so. He says they shall be offered after.

Mr. BUREAU: We do not want the adoption now; it is just the consideration we are after. We are discussing the various items contained in schedule 2. I was proceeding to say that this is a long schedule with forty-four lines of railway enumerated. We have only one copy of it, and my hon. friend from Edmonton has requested that we postpone consideration of the second schedule until we know exactly what it is. We may agree to the renewal of the charters, except as to certain lines here as stated by him. The Acting Minister of Justice remarked just now that if the line as proposed did not suit the hon. member for Edmonton he would have to get a new charter. If so, that is a reason why the extension of this charter should not be granted. If the charter now does not suit the people to be served by the line, and they want another one a few miles south, east, north, or west, that is a reason why you should not duplicate, and if the other line would better serve the purposes of the people it would be preferable to have a new charter and not renew the old one. That is an argument in favour of not being in too great a hurry to grant wholesale extensions.

We control these railways, but we do not absolutely own them, because there is stock outstanding and the owners of that stock have a say in the administration of the affairs of the railways. The minister says that moneys have been voted by the Provincial Legislatures in connection with these lines and that bonds have been sold the proceeds of which are to be used in their construction. I had thought that one reason why the Canadian Northern Railway system was taken over was to relieve the Provincial Legislatures from the burdens which they assumed when they granted advances or aid to that system, and to pay the bonds and the interest on the bonds which had been negotiated and guaranteed by the provinces. That the Government should now ask for aid from the provinces is not—shall I say "dignified"?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Proper.

Mr. BUREAU: No, I want a word between the two. We are saying to the provinces: We will build your roads; we will build houses for your people; we will aid your agriculture; we will give you money galore; but when it comes to such a vital matter as the construction of railways we ask you to put up your bonds, sell them and give us the money. I do not think that is sound logic. Let us hold back on the roads and let the provinces do their work. Some of these roads are in Saskatchewan. Last year twenty-five or thirty millions were loaned to Saskatchewan or Alberta; and I certainly object to the Dominion Government now asking the provinces for aid in connection with lines of railway that we intend to build.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's indignation again is wasted.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not indignation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government has not asked and does not intend to ask Provincial Governments for assistance in respect of the building of lines of railway or assistance to the Canadian National railways. But before we had anything to do with it, the Governments of the provinces guaranteed bonds for railway extensions. In some cases the bonds have been sold; the moneys are in the bank, and cannot be used for any purpose except construction. What is to be done? The Government cannot pass an Act and use the money for any other purpose. The only thing to do is to go ahead and construct, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Will the minister state one case in which there is money in a bank in Alberta for the construction of railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Edmonton and Calgary-Lethbridge line; there are others as well.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Not the Oliver, St. Paul and Metis? The Canadian Northern Railway got their money in that case, which is a refutation of the statement of the minister that when money is paid into a bank for the construction of a particular line it must be used only for that purpose. In the case of the Oliver, St. Paul and Metis Railway the bonds were guaranteed by the province; the money was secured and paid into the bank and Mackenzie and Mann used it for their purposes. The Government is now making an appropriation in the Estimates for the purpose of building that line. Since 1909 the people of the district affected have not been served by a railway. So that it is not always true, no matter what may be the law on the subject, that Mackenzie and Mann caused to be used for the construction of a line, money that had been deposited in the bank for that purpose. What kind of country is traversed by the lines mentioned in schedule No. 2? What is the extent of the population affected or served, and, generally, what are the advantages of the construction of the proposed lines represented by these forty-two charters? If the minister will give me that information, it will avoid my studying the schedule quite considerably.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might avoid the necessity of the hon. gentleman doing a little work, but it would impose the same work on me. When we are only getting in such a position that we can later on decide what to do, surely it is not necessary to describe the character of the land and the population along each proposed line. The necessity is not before us at the present time; when we commit ourselves to capital investment in the matter, then that will be a proper question. The hon. gentleman, being a western man, can arrive at a pretty intelligent idea by studying the schedule, but the information is not at all requisite to the consideration of this clause.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The minister characterizes members of the Opposition as obtuse; I may belong to the same category. I understood the minister to say that if clause 20 goes through now I cannot at some future time, when the Estimates are under consideration, ask that the charters be amended or that the location of any of these lines be changed, and that as a private member I would not be able to introduce a new Bill, and so I would be entirely dependent on a member of the Government for a remedy to my constituents or to my province. If I am not very obtuse, it seems to me that unless I can make my objections now on the schedule I shall have no remedy except that of asking for a new charter, and if I ask for a new charter which parallels lines or serves a country partly populated or is subject to certain disadvantages from a railway standpoint, then the Government would naturally not grant my request. I note that the minister has beside him Mr. Ruel, who must be familiar with all these lines, as he was solicitor for Mackenzie and Mann at one time. Perhaps he could give us the information we require as to the nature of the country through which these proposed lines run. I do not know why the minister is not in possession of these facts. Only forty-four charters are to be reviewed; the minister should have these things on his finger-tips.

Mr. EULER: I think there is good reason why each of these charters should be reviewed separately. The ideals of private ownership are not always the same as those of public ownership. These charters have been granted at the request of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which, after all, had for its prime object its own advantage. Now the system passes to the possession of the public, and the prime object of public ownership is not the enrichment or the advantage of private individuals, but public service.

That being the case, in each instance in the issuing of these forty-two or forty-four charters, the lines of railway were perhaps located according to the private interests of the company that then owned them. Many interests might enter into the location, such as possibly the question of real estate and other matters which I cannot, having no knowledge of that, particularize. The location, however, of those lines may presumably have been made more with the idea of advantage to private persons than of service to the public. That is now all supposed to be changed, and as these charters have become the property of the people, it might be desirable to make some changes in the location of the roads. That has already been shown in one case by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie), and the same thing may be true in the case of many others of these roads. If this blanket power is given just by this one section to all these roads to extend their charters, there is no power in the future to make any change in the location of the roads. While it is true, as the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) stated, that complaints may be made when the Government asks Parliament for money to build a road, as the hon. member for East Edmonton stated no alteration whatever can at that time be made in the location of the road. That is my reason for saying that if people in any district desire that changes should be made in any of these projected roads, they should have an opportunity of being heard, and the changes, if approved, should be made. Therefore, every one of these charters, before they are renewed, should be considered separately, possibly before the Railway Committee, as has been suggested by other hon. members. I do not believe we can depend upon the men who are now in charge of the system to make any great variation, because nearly one-half of them are the same men who formerly were in control or in the employ of the Canadian Northern railway. When I say that, I have no reflections to make upon them, but I do not believe the mere fact that they have been taken from the management of a private road to the management of a Government road has necessarily changed their ideas very much as to what constitutes services to the public.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These charters have their routes all passed upon by the directorate, which directorate is not the old one at all, as the hon. gentleman, as a member of Parliament, knows, or ought to know. Only two out of the eleven were members of the old directorate; nine of the eleven are new. The charters have been renewed on behalf of the Government, and the Government agrees with the directorate that it would be wise to renew them. If any hon. member desires to move that any one of these charters be not renewed he is quite at liberty to do so.

Mr. EULER: Might not the people of the districts concerned wish to have some voice as to the location of the various roads and if we pass this section now they will have no opportunity whatever of making themselves heard? If each charter has to be considered separately in the Railway Committee, or some other committee of this Parliament, these people would have an opportunity of letting us know their ideas in connection with it. After all, public ownership means the service of the people. The minister's statement, that on the directorate of the Canadian National railways there are only two men of the old directorate, may be true in one sense, but I have just scanned the list of the new management, and on that list there are at least ten gentlemen who were, if not on the old directorate of the Canadian Northern, at least in the employ of the Canadian Northern.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The challenge of the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) only shows that this schedule added to the Bill is nothing other than a small, petty, picayune, political trap. This schedule reminds me of those lists of railway subsidies which before a general election, are usually put into the Estimates, many of which railways never see the light of day except on paper. Who will really believe that the Government will ever have money available to implement the Canadian Northern railway system by the construction of these forty-four lines? The country would be in the hands of a receiver if it was ever attempted to fulfil this blanket promise which, I notice, is made chiefly to western constituencies. Scanning the list of these problematical railways, I notice that the schedule published will include railway schemes for the West only. There is nothing in that list for the East; there is nothing for Quebec. Of course, the support of Quebec is not needed, but the credit of Quebec is of the highest, whilst some of the western provinces were on the verge of bankruptcy because of the guarantees they gave to Mackenzie and Mann. That explains why, before the last general election, we saw so many of those premiers wavering in their faith, because, forsooth, they were promised, if they supported Union Government, that the guarantees given by their provinces would be taken up by the Dominion Government. In fact, no provincial premier came to Ottawa during that eventful period without being met at the station by the wily gentlemen who then controlled the destinies of Union Government. I repeat again that the Government is taking a very serious responsibility in luring the people of this country and people outside of this country into the belief that these forty-four lines of railway will eventually be added to the trunk line of the Canadian Northern. Have hon. members ever thought of the credit of Canada, not only with the Canadian people themselves, but abroad? This country owes some millions of dollars in the United Kingdom and also in New York.

When the bankers of the United Kingdom and the United States take up our stock they have regard to the obligations to which we are committed. I say that the Government is lowering the credit of Canada by this political trick, because it is nothing but a political trick. It is adding to the schedule forty-four lines to be eventually built——

Mr. MEIGHEN: The adding is done at the request of the hon. member himself. He is the author of the trick.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend comes before this House with a blanket clause, which reads:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of any lines of railway which any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct, which had not expired at the beginning of the war, in August, nineteen hundred and fourteen, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act.

That was a notice to the country that the Government or board intended to complete the system by constructing these branch lines which originally formed part of the Canadian Northern system. I say that in fairness to the taxpayers of Canada and the creditors of Canada we should know what railways it is intended to construct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is trying to lead the committee to believe that money is to be voted this year to construct all these lines.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are only asking that the charters be renewed in order that Parliament may have the opportunity of voting such money for construction as may be required.

Mr. BUREAU: Did not the minister state that construction would go on except on three or four lines?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the intention to ask Parliament for a vote in order that work may be done upon the most of them, and if it is possible, and in so far as it is possible, on all. But that will be submitted to Parliament later. The hon. member was altogether misleading the Committee when he endeavoured to make it believe that a vote for the schedule to renew these charters, which must be renewed as all hon. members know, was a commitment on the part of Parliament to construct the whole mileage in the schedule.

Mr. BUREAU: What will the money voted be used for if not for construction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the purposes asked.

Mr. BUREAU: What purpose are you going to ask the money for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For doing work on these lines, as I have told the hon. member now for the thirteenth time.

Mr. BUREAU: Does not that mean construction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not mean construction of all the lines or complete construction of any one.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend wants to play on words. Let us get down to brass tacks. It is construction and nothing else.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not differ with the minister in his interpretation of the schedule and the clause itself. It is a notice served on the country that at some time later on the Government through the board may construct any of those lines. I protest against that. I say the country is not in the mood and has not the resources now to justify notice being served that we may build those lines. It is a crime against the credit of Canada to add to our obligations by the publication of this schedule. The expression may not be parliamentary, and if it is not I will withdraw it, but it seems to me that the Government is going to act like a drunken sailor; but I withdraw that expression. My hon. friend does not seem to realize the extent to which he is committing this country. I certainly find fault with the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway, but it was a necessity, and a necessity which the Government had considerably aggravated during the last five or six years, and God grant that the country may not suffer too much by that awful necessity! But after taking over this white elephant with its tremendous obligations, to think that in case of a general election the country may be committed to the expenditure involved in the schedule, is something which I cannot understand.

There is another point. By adopting this schedule and renewing the charters en bloc, are we not debarring private companies and the provinces from building lines in the same territory, not exactly on the same routes, but approximately so. These charters have remained dormant—simply paper charters, if I may call them so—for twenty years. Mackenzie & Mann did nothing with them except hold them for their own use; they did not build one mile of railway on any of these charters. Now we are to renew them en bloc and debar private companies and other enterprises, which might eventually wish to build these railways, from doing so.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I should like to be permitted to say a word or two on some of the points which have just been touched upon by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I must say that as one who had co-operated with him for years in political affairs and had formed an opinion highly favourable to himself, of the breadth of his mind, I was surprised to hear from him what I must describe as so pessimistic and reactionary a speech. I do not know what company my hon. friend has been keeping of late. His views of Canadian affairs and the possibility of Canada's development seem to be absolutely jaundiced. When did he get the idea that railroad building in Canada was bound to be so unprofitable an enterprise? The first two general elections that I fought in this country were on the question of railroad development in Canada, and were in support of the great project of the National road.

Then my hon. friend was an enthusiastic and optimistic young Canadian. I was imported into this country and, I partook of his enthusiasm and believed in the possibilities of Canada. I was surprised to hear such a sort of speech from him this afternoon and I was led to the question: What company has my hon. friend been keeping? Is this the new Liberalism that we are hearing to-day? I think I get some little guidance as to the answer to my question from the remark which my hon. friend made in sitting down. He was not enthusiastic over Canadian National railways, I observe. He gives us in so many words the reason, because he tells us, just as he takes his seat, that this national enterprise, this work of making a great railway in a great country, of making a Canadian national railway in Canada by Canadians, may interfere with the interests of some private corporation. He mentioned the private corporation—the Canadian Pacific. As a western Liberal who has not abated one jot or tittle of his Liberalism, and who has as much belief in Canada as he had in the years 1904 and 1908, I want to say to my hon. friend that if he is going to take the position that the interests of the Canadian Pacific are more important than the interests of Canada, then my Liberalism is not his Liberalism.

This pessimism in regard to the building of railways in Canada is not an entirely unknown mood on the part of Canadians. When this enterprise, now the Canadian Pacific, was first mooted in Canada, there were pessimists with whom, I suppose, I, along with my friend, had some sort of a traditional connection. These pessimists, I believe, prophesied that the grass would grow between the rails of the Canadian Pacific and that it would never be a successful enterprise. My hon. friend knows that those pessimists were wrong in their day and I wonder that the reflection does not occur to him that he may be equally wrong, wide as is his knowledge of and close as is his intimacy with Canada's development and Canada's problems.

He asks what the tax-payers of the country are going to say about this business of having charters put into a schedule and projecting our minds into the future, because that is what these charters do. I submit to my hon. friend the consideration that there will only be one way of paying the taxes, there will only be one way of building up Canada, there will only be one way of making this the great nation that we all hope it will be and that will be by bringing to our civil development the same spirit which we have just brought as a young country to the doing of our share in this war. I want to assure him that the spirit that was behind westerners in the war is the spirit that is behind westerners in regard to the possibilities of Canadian development in the immediate future. We believe in Canada and in the possibilities of her development. There will only be one way of building this nation up; there will be only one way of paying taxes; that will be by doing business. Two years ago, in our western country, we had a surplus crop of 300,000,000 bushels of wheat. We use 60,000,000 bushels in this country in one year. It would just be as easy for the West to produce a billion bushels of wheat if we get the railways to carry it and, by other wise processes of development, find markets to sell that wheat in. We purpose developing that enterprise and we purpose developing Canada along these lines. We know that we shall see other commercial enterprises of all kinds grow up in similar proportion and we expect our railways to develop in the same proportion. In so far as the West is concerned we are grateful to this Government for making an honest attempt at Government ownership of a great system of railways and the West will give them a solid support upon that proposition. Do not let my hon. friend be in any doubts upon this question.

Just one more point. I want to clear my hon. friend's head of some of the cobwebs that have gotten into it, from, as I suggest, his having kept the wrong kind of company lately—these private interests about which he is so much concerned. We have in Western Canada 300,000,000 acres of splendid arable land. I am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who has never shared the opinion that the railway enterprises of the last Government were not justified by the possibilities of Canada's development. I am an optimistic Canadian and I hope to die one. There is no pessimism going to get hold of me breathing the clear air of Canada and sharing the stimulating beliefs of the Western Provinces. We have, as I say, 300,000,000 acres of splendid arable land. We have up to now tilled 25,000,000 acres, and no more, of that arable land. Along with the comparable development in other parts of Canada, the result, confining our thought for the moment to railway enterprise alone, has been to build up this very Canadian Pacific railway, about whose interests my hon. friend is at the present time so anxious, and about which other Canadians were so pessimistic, and to put it in a position in which it is rich almost beyond the dreams of avarice. If the other railways are supported with the same faith, the same energy and the same belief in the country it is a simple arithmetical proposition to foretell the possibilities of development. If we have built up one railway system from comparatively small beginnings by the development of a paltry 25,000,000 acres of land in those Western Provinces, it is an easy thing to estimate what will be the position of the Canadian system of railways when we have developed, shall I say, 100,000,000 acres? Then we shall still have 200,000,000 acres waiting to be developed by the next generation.

These are the thoughts that animate Western Canadians. This is the belief that they have in that country and I want to say to the Government and to my hon. friend that as far as the West is concerned there is no pessimism among the people out there. They believe in their country and they believe that the best way to develop its wealth is to further the scheme of developing this national railway.

I repeat that my hon. friend's speech has given me the greatest surprise. It is totally inconsistent with his attitude on railway development only a few years ago. Except in so far as he afforded an explanation in the way in which he has done to-day, I cannot understand what has produced the transformation of a very optimistic young Canadian into one who talks blue ruin in the most pessimistic and depressing fashion. I would really advise him to get back to his former views and become an enthusiastic Canadian once more.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not quite clear, Mr. Chairman, as to the connection between the very eloquent address of the hon. member (Mr. Michael Clark) and the motion before the Chair.

Mr. BUREAU: He has to pat the Government on the back.

Mr. McKENZIE: The ink is hardly dry upon a speech made by the hon. gentleman about two days ago, upon which occasion he solemnly took off his hat, stood up in the House, and warned the Government against any undue expenditure in view of the enormous burden of debts under which the people of Canada were to-day groaning. The hon. gentleman told us then that if he had any advice to give, and if his words were heeded, it would be a warning to the Government to move cautiously and carefully in the expenditure of even ten cents out of the national treasury, except what was absolutely necessary to carry on in the most economic manner the affairs of the country.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Precisely.

Mr. McKENZIE: To-day the hon. gentleman appears in another role: Saul of Tarsus has become Paul the Apostle, and the hon. gentleman finds a great deal of fault with my friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) because he follows along the same line of caution which the hon. gentleman himself, with all his wisdom and experience, a couple of days ago suggested. If the hon. gentleman will cast his memory back a couple of days or so he will recall the incident to which I have reference. No necessity existed for his utterance at that time except that this burden was on his mind and he wanted to get from under it; he wanted to be able to tell this Government, or any other government, that if the crash should come, if the credit of Canada was no longer any good, if our bonds had sunk away down below par, he had warned the people of this country.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am perfectly sure that my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me. He should not put the words "crash" or "sinking below par" into my mouth, when I never used them. I was talking of economy in regard to non-essential expenditure, and I should like to point out to my hon. friend that if you economize on unnecessary outlays you will have all the more to devote to expenditures that are imperative.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman's position is understandable in this way: His financial training enables him to grasp the expenditure involved in the increase of a deputy minister's salary—he understands that and it brings him to his feet in protest—but when he gets to a large amount he is entirely at sea; he falls into the current and goes along with it. That is the only possible explanation that I can give of the hon. gentleman's position. If we are to be faithful servants in this world we must be faithful in small things as well as in big things, in order to possess the joy we look for in the world to come. There is no use trying to blow hot and blow cold; no use trying to be an economist in small matters and a plunger when it comes to big things. There is no use trying to get along in that way. I am sure the hon. member (Mr. Clark) would be very sorry if he felt that in this House there were men who would not profit by experience; I am sure he would be the last man to find fault with them for doing as he advises. We have to-day in the hands of a receiver, some three or four thousand miles of railway in the beautiful West which we all admire, and in the advancement and prospect of which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clark) prides himself. So necessary in the Government's opinion was the receivership, and so great was the need for speed, owing to the gravity of the emergency, that they could not follow the ordinary course of procedure but grabbed the railway before it went to Hades and out of sight entirely.

Mr. BUREAU: By Order in Council, too.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, by Order in Council, which was entirely irregular; and now this line of railway is in the hands of a receiver who is sitting in this House to-day. Is there anything more discouraging, in connection with any enterprise, than to see that enterprise hopelessly insolvent and in the hands of a receiver? That is the condition of a great stretch of railroad which has been built in the West. Now I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Clark), as one of the custodians of the money of the people of this country, does he not think the exercise of a little care is necessary before we plunge into the expenditure of billions of money in the same territory in which the hapless railroad referred to was built, and which, as a result of its operations, has landed in the hands of a receiver? Supposing the hon. gentleman himself were an English capitalist and a man came to him from the West to ask him to aid a railway similar to the one I have been discussing, would he not say: "Are you not from the same country where a very large system of railways has already been built, and I find that it is to-day in the hands of a receiver because it did not pay; do I not find the Government of Canada obliged to take over a railway burdened with a debt of $373,000,000 and hopelessly insolvent"? Are not those lessons, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Finance of Canada should take to heart? Are not those questions that the ordinary taxpayer, and we ourselves, should consider? And when we say in this House——

Mr. MORPHY: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he considered those questions before the expenditure was made on this railway, and if he did not vote for the very expenditure that made the country responsible?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is all the difference in the world between the situation now and then. My good friend (Mr. Clark) whom I am answering said that expenditure was perfectly justifiable at the time it was made. He was a conservative Englishman, conservative in the sense of being careful; it is only recently that he has become conservative in his politics. My hon. friend was in the swim, he actually believed in, and was enthusiastic for, the building of this railway, and the road went along splendidly under our management. When it was in our hands everything went along swimmingly, but when it got into the hands of hon. gentlemen who did not know how to handle the enterprise it went to smash, and that is the condition we have to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: It was knocked by them.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is why the crash took place; and that is the reason for it. It is perfectly legitimate to put money and property into the hands of men who know how to handle and operate it profitably. Unfortunately the railway fell into the hands of people who are absolutely reckless and know nothing about proper business management. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morphy) wants to know the difference between the building of railways in the days of the Laurier Government and the building of railways to-day, it is simply that in our time there was competency and capacity in the railway administration, whereas to-day there is recklessness and incompetence. That is what constitutes the difference.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Of course these forty lines of railway would be all right if my hon. friend was Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. McKENZIE: There is such a thing as committing the unpardonable sin, and such a thing as a man getting beyond the skill of a doctor. Such a condition in the country's health has been brought about by the men who are in charge of public affairs to-day, that even the best men in the land might find it difficult to bring that health back to a proper physical state and normal pulsation.

The hon. member is not going to phase me on this question by a sneering reference to what might happen if I were Premier. I may never be Premier, but I shall be Premier before the hon. gentleman ever will.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I want to assure my hon. friend that if I seemed to sneer it was furthest from my thoughts.—

Mr. BUREAU: But it was on your face.

Mr. M. CLARK:—But if it will remove his impression that I sneered, I can say quite sincerely that he is by far the nearest approach to a Prime Minister that I can see when I am looking at his side of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: And so say we all.

Mr. M. CLARK: With regard to his prophecy that he will be Prime Minister before I am, I can only fall back upon the saying of the well-known Mrs. Malaprop, giving it, however, in proper English, that comparisons are proverbially odious.

Mr. BUREAU: To the man who makes them.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman feels the odium he had better move out from the side of the House he is sitting. I think I have made it perfectly clear that we are now at a stage in the financial history of this country when it behooves every man, particularly those in responsible positions, to be careful. And if to be cautious, to sound a note of warning to those who control the expenditures of this country, is to be treated as pessimism, as the expression of a man who has no faith in his country, then we are trying to teach in this House the doctrine that no man shall dare speak his mind at all, and that the whole proceedings from start to finish are to be regarded as a continuous camouflage, until at last the people will come to believe that we do not understand what we are talking about. The hon. member (Mr. M. Clark) wanted to fasten upon my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) the imputation of being in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway, of being a corporation man, a man who was trying to deprive the people of the west of their rights in favour of some corporation.

Mr. BUREAU: Shame.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am surprised that a gentleman who is usually so fair should in so short a time be transformed into such an adept at small Tory politics.

Mr. BUREAU: Ask him what company he keeps.

Mr. VIEN: Bad company.

Mr. McKENZIE: As to fault finding and pessimism in regard to building railways. if pessimism it be, I think my hon. friend from Red Deer will be quite satisfied with the company of the Montreal Star, for instance, and perhaps Lord Atholstan might qualify for communication and communion with him.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think that paper has achieved a sufficiently high standing in this country to be read by most Conservatives, and its readers are regarded as good staunch Canadians. Let me read to the hon. gentleman what that paper says about the very subject we are discussing, under date as late as April 19, 1919:

The annual report of the Canadian Department of Railways for 1918 is a document of startling timeliness. We commend it earnestly to the apostles who preach public ownership as a panacea for present ills.

Canada operated last year a little over four thousand miles of railway—4073.76 miles to be exact.

The actual operating cost—not counting in any expenditure that could be charged to capital or any interest on the money invested in the railways, as a company would have to do—exceeded the earnings by over six million dollars—$6,159,503.58.

In addition to the operating costs the Government spent $34,699,416.96, which it charged to "capital account"—a financial camouflage in the main. It all has to be paid some day out of the public purse. So that these public ownership roads cost the public last year over $40,000,000 more than they earned.

There is no consideration in this amount of the annual interest cost which the public is paying on the money invested in these railways. Leaving out last year's charge to capital, this investment now mounts up to the huge total of $378,661,442. With interest at five per cent this means an annual charge of nearly $19,000,000. Adding this to last year's deficit and capital expenditure, the suffering taxpayer will find that his little toy cost him in 1918 close to $60,000,000 more than he got out of it.

It may be of interest to business minds to note that of the actual operating deficit the National Transcontinental contributed over three millions, the Intercolonial over two and a quarter millions, the Prince Edward Island Railway almost half a million, and the International about a quarter of a million. They all did their little bit.

Here is an interesting problem in arithmetic to wind up with:

The Government railway mileage in 1918 was 4073. Since then the taxpayer has been handed the Canadian Northern, 9433 miles and the Grand Trunk Pacific 2788 miles. The politicians are now reaching out for the old Grand Trunk which may add 4785 miles.

If it cost us sixty millions to run four thousand miles, how much will twenty-one thousand miles cost?

That is an expression of opinion by a newspaper edited by an orthodox Conservative, a gentleman well versed, no doubt, in the public affairs of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman approve of that opinion himself?

Mr. McKENZIE: I used the word "opinion." I do not think it is so much an expression of opinion as it is a gathering together of facts. The language in which the editor expresses himself does not make so much difference; the figures are the startling and appalling part which cannot be questioned, because we have had them from the records of the various departments.

While I always want to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) and see him in line in the House, he must not find fault with anybody who advises caution in view of the fact that in the very early days of the session the Minister of Public Works,—and the building of railways may be considered as public works—told us that we are one hundred million dollars short this year, and he did not know where to look for the money.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are told by every one who has to do with finance that he is at his wits ends to get money. We have to-day a public debt of two billion dollars. Is it not time to pause before embarking on further expenditure to develop this country and proceed with that development only as our means will allow? That is what the Canadian people expect us to do, and there is no man in the West or elsewhere who is so unreasonable as to say that we should render this country bankrupt to build railways. In my part of the country, which has been settled for over 200 years, there are sections which are 110 miles from any railway to-day. I am not raising any hue and cry on that account. I recognize that we must wait until the finances of the country are in a better position. But that should be a sufficient reason to advance to any fair-minded man in the West for delaying railway construction. Do not let us have any person, no matter how eloquent, tell the people of the West that some men on this side of the House do not want to give them the railway facilities they require. We gave them what they have got to-day, and their facilities would be in good condition at the present time if we had retained control of affairs.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: But they got into the hands of the Huns and Goths and went to smash.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 72, to incorporate the Athabasca and Grande Prairie Railway Company.—Mr. Tweedie.

Bill No. 73, respecting the Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Hocken.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 70, to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National railways.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Owing to the turn which this discussion has taken, and owing particularly to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) respecting the general railway and financial policy of the Government, I think it proper that I should offer a few remarks.

For the last three days in Committee, and for some days previously, on the resolution which preceded the introduction of this Bill, we have been discussing ostensibly the corporate machinery by which the Government of Canada is to administer the railway system which has come into our possession. But this afternoon—I knew from the trend of the discussion that the stage would be reached—the real issue was revealed which is dividing the two sides of the House respecting this measure. The real issue is not the Bill before the Committee, important as its provisions are; the real issue is whether public ownership is to have a chance for success in Canada or is to leave this Chamber maimed, mutilated and deformed. What is before the Committee? A Bill incorporating a holding company of which the Dominion of Canada, through the Dominion Government, is to be the sole proprietor and shareholder. There are many important provisions in this Bill which should be fully discussed, but it is not too much to say that hours have been wasted upon sections of the Bill which are in the general railway and company Acts and which, had they been before the Committee or the House in connection with a charter of a private railway company, would not have commanded one minute of attention from hon. gentlemen opposite. Who recalls—I do not, although I have been a member of the House for eight years—in connection with any private railway charter such a discussion as we have had upon insignificant sections with regard to the provisional directors, the appointment of executive committees, or matters of that kind? What accounts for the present attitude of hon. gentlemen with regard to this measure as compared with their attitude towards measures incorporating private enterprises? Mr. Chairman, the real discussion in this Chamber has been between private railway enterprise and public ownership. Every section of this Bill has received from hon. gentlemen opposite the most critical attention, the most anxious solicitude—well simulated, I admit, but the real nature of which is obvious to all on this side of the House and to the press of this country. There has been an influence—I do not say an improper influence—behind the discussion of this Bill by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we all know what that influence has been—private ownership. I do not blame private ownership for fighting public ownership, but I am on strong ground when I blame representatives of the people in the House for espousing the cause of private ownership as against public ownership.

We might have gone through this Bill without the real issue being revealed as it was this afternoon. But during the last two days, watching the discussion in Committee, I have known that this stage would be reached. The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) disclosed the issue this afternoon, and disclosed it unmistakably. There is no doubt where he stands; he is not in sympathy with public ownership of the railway systems of this country—ownership by the people, and, we hope, for the people. In order that I may do my hon. friend no injustice, I shall quote, from a Hansard extract which I have here, what he said this afternoon. The section before the Committee was a section reviving charters which had belonged to the Canadian Northern Railway system. They are presumably of value, or they would not have been acquired; and the question is whether the Government of Canada—that is, the people of Canada—are to have these charters for the benefit of the Canadian National railway system—that is, the people—or whether they are to go to others who desire to have them. My hon. friend will not deny that he came out unmistakeably to-day against public ownership. I do not see how hon. gentlemen opposite can avoid the charge that as a party, the so-called Liberal party, they stand in this House for private railway enterprises against public ownership of the systems which this Government has to take over and has had to take over. The member for Maisonneuve said:

> By adopting this schedule—

Which contains the charters that the Government desires to preserve, not for any improper purpose, but for the people of Canada; and which this Parliament granted to private enterprises.

> By adopting this schedule and renewing the charters en bloc, are we now debarring private companies—

His interest is with the private companies.

> —are we not debarring private companies and the provinces from building lines in the same territory not exactly on the same routes but approximately so? These charters have remained dormant—simply paper charters, if I may call them so—for twenty years.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If they remained dormant, they were of some value. The Dominion Government seeks to revive them, for what? For the people of Canada. My hon. friend says: No, do not preserve them for the people of Canada; private enterprise may want them. He says further:

> Mackenzie and Mann did nothing with them except hold them for their own use.

Well, if they held them for their own use, it is a fair implication that they were of value for them and for the Canadian Northern Railway system, as they will be for the people of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not for the people. The people get nothing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They will get something; they will get a good deal out of this system before we are through with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They will get the bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says:

> They did not build one mile of railway on any of these charters. Now we are to renew them en bloc—

A terrible thing to renew them en bloc for the enterprise owned by the people of Canada. My hon. friend suggests that they are of no value, yet he goes on to say:

> —and debar private companies and other enterprises, which might eventually wish to build these railways, from doing so.

If they are of no value, why would "private companies and other enterprises, which might eventually wish to build these railways," do so. My hon. friend says in one breath that they are of no value, that Mackenzie and Mann had them and did not make use of them; and in the next he says: Let us not take them for fear some private enterprise in competition with the Government's road might want them.

Does my hon. friend seriously stand upon that ground? As I said, private enterprise and public ownership have been contending during the debate—notwithstanding the form of the discussion in this chamber—upon the provisions of this Bill. I do not mean to say that there may not be a few members opposite with a predisposition, probably inherited from some Liberal ancestor, in favour of public ownership; but if the leader of the Opposition had to depend for support upon those on his side of the House who are sincerely in favour of public ownership, he would not command a corporal's guard.

This discussion, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, has ostensibly gone along the lines of safeguarding the public interest. Every section of this Bill must be subjected to the most minute scrutiny for fear that the people of Canada might not have adequate machinery to carry out their railway enterprise. Most specious arguments have been put forward. The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hand was the hand of Esau. Let me put it to the hon. member for Maisonneuve: Are we going to give public ownership a chance for its life, or are we going to strangle it in this chamber, where its friends ought to be, if they are anywhere in Canada? The Government brings down a measure to revive a number of charters which are valuable to-day and which will be more valuable in the days to come, not for any private railway company or enterprise, but for the people of Canada. What chance will public ownership have in this country if, in this chamber, we are going to deny to our own enterprises what we are willing to concede to rival enterprises? Supposing a meeting was held of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—an admirably managed institution, one of the best in the world, with a fine list of shareholders, a splendid executive, a wonderfully capable and loyal staff—and the general manager of the company informed the shareholders that during the war a number of valuable charters, which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had obtained from Parliament, had lapsed, but that he had succeeded in getting Parliament to revive them so that that company had now the revived charters. Can my hon. friend contend that a shareholder of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, much less a director—and he is in the position of a director, not in that of a shareholder—would rise in his place and say: "Really, Mr. General Manager, we should not ask Parliament to revive those charters, because some other railway company in opposition to us may want to obtain them." Does my hon. friend, public man as he is, and member of this House for many years and former member of a Government of this country, contend that?

What's in a name? My hon. friend has often spoken to us in this House as to the true meaning of Liberalism. He is a Liberal, he says. I believe I am understating the matter when I say there is not a row of seats on this side of the House that does not hold more progressive Liberalism than there is on the entire opposite side of this Chamber. If Liberalism means standing for the public interest and the people's rights, my hon. friend, standing here, as he does, for private enterprise as against public ownership, whatever he is, is not a Liberal. He frankly does not like public ownership. If he would express what is down in his heart, he would boldly say: I do not believe in public ownership. He has been too long in politics to do that; —he side-steps. If he had not been so long in politics he would state his conviction, which is against public ownership. If that is his opinion, it is a perfectly proper one for him to hold as a public man, if he avows it. Whether he likes public ownership of railways or not, whether the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) likes it or not, whether all hon. gentlemen opposite like it or not—and they do not like it—we have public ownership of railways in Canada, and it has come to stay. Let me make an appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite. We owned some 4,000 or 5,000 miles of railway, and we have acquired, within the last two years, nearly 10,000 miles more. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company is in the hands of the Minister of Railways as receiver. We are negotiating with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada to acquire their system. Hon. members know perfectly well the steps by which the Dominion of Canada has become a great railway proprietor, and will become one of the greatest in the world. The situation has been such that, by the inevitable trend of events, the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the National Transcontinental Railway Company have come into the possession of the Government; and by the inevitable and inexorable trend of events, I believe, the other systems that I have mentioned will also come into the possession of the Government—this Government did not go out years ago with a policy of taking over the railways of Canada. Having this railway system, one of the greatest in the world, full of possibilities to any one who has vision for the future, should we not, as public men, take a reasonable pride in the situation and make the best of it?

What is the continual criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite? That roads are bankrupt or in the hands of receivers. Well, that does not advance us very far, Mr. Chairman; this Government did not make them bankrupt. What has produced the railway situation in Canada that has been discussed so often in this House? The railway situation, under which taking over by the Government became inevitable, and a receivership for the Grand Trunk Pacific inevitable—what was it that brought about that situation? Was it public ownership? It was private ownership and politics Huns, Goths, and Vandals, we are called on this side of the House by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Well, "what's in a name," Mr. Chairman? What do the Huns and Goths and Vandals do? Destroy completed and productive enterprises. Has this Government destroyed completed and productive enterprise? If the roads that we took over were bankrupt who made them bankrupt? What are we trying to do with them? We are trying to make them fruitful and productive for the people of Canada. That is our clear duty, and I submit that it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to unite with us in doing it, because the railway policy of this country has been the policy both of Liberals and Conservatives. Both are responsible for the building of railways in this country, and both are responsible, in some degree at least, for the situation which I have described. The over-building, the over-lapping, the wasteful expenditure of money—I am not going to make this a narrow party question, that water has gone over the wheel. The policy to-day, if ever there was a time when we should have such a policy, is to make this enterprise fruitful and productive for the people of Canada. What use is there in continually harping on the string that the Government has taken over bankrupt roads? What else could the Government do? I have read in the press, and I have heard in this House, endless criticism of Government ownership of railways. I have never seen in the press that puts out that criticism, nor heard from hon. members of this House who support it, any constructive scheme different from that which the Government has adopted. It was an inevitable policy that we followed, if we were to save this country and its transportation systems which are vital to it. Let me appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to take pride in public ownership, which alone can save these railway children of theirs.

I have been abused many times in this House on account of my railway policy, and I have often thought: What have I done that I am so abused? I found a couple of half-starved babies on the doorstep of the Finance Department when I went in there, puling, weakly creatures, ill-dressed, dirty. Well, we have them here to-night, and they are not bad looking children.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will leave that to the imagination and good sense of the House. We found the babies on the doorstep; we took good care of them; and this side of the House is prepared to continue taking care of them until they grow up and become useful to the country. And all we get for it is abuse—and from unnatural parents. I appeal to the patriotism of hon. gentlemen opposite, and to their sense of loyalty to their own railway policy, not to listen longer to the promptings of private railway enterprise, but to stand with us behind the railway system owned by the people of Canada.

It is put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite that these railroads that we have taken over are bankrupt, and we hear of that same old deficit from day to day. Well, let us make them solvent; let us make them fruitful; let us make them the all-important factor that they can be made in the development of the resources of this country. That is the true, constructive, statesmanlike policy. Any other policy is merely destructive; it will not advance things one bit. I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition how long will it be before the railways of Canada that this Government has been obliged to take over become solvent?—how long will it be before the deficit is wiped out, if we adopt the stand-still policy advocated by him and other hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon? They are so afraid of the revival of charters. Why, it is a terrible thing that the Government should revive charters for its railway system. Evidently the policy is to stand still and let the deficit continue. I say that if we stand still, the deficit will increase, not diminish. There is no standing still in this world, in transportation or anything else. You must go forward or you will go backward. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) took the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to task this afternoon.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any part of Canada in which you cannot build a railway under the Act that is now before the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I submit, that is not the point.

Mr. McKENZIE: I submit, it is.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we can build a line in any part of Canada, then we can build five hundred lines, because there are at least five hundred different sections of Canada. All we are asking for is that forty-four charters be revived. So if my hon. friend says that we can build five hundred lines of railway, he should not object to our taking power under only forty-four charters, to go ahead if we so decide.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why duplicate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All that we are doing is to revive these charters to be used if we see fit, that is to say, if the Government, carrying the majority in this Parliament, thinks it in the interest of Canada. We must come to Parliament to get money to build railway extensions. The whole theory of constitutional government is based upon that, and where is the harm in the Government having these charters revived, for construction to be gone on with, if in the public interest it is thought expedient by the Government and by Parliament to do so?

I was saying that the hon. leader of the Opposition attacked the hon. member for Red Deer this afternoon. Well, he is a hard man to attack successfully; but the leader of the Opposition took him to task for an alleged statement—I emphasize 'alleged',—that at this time, with our great national debt, we must not spend any money. Now, I never heard the hon. member for Red Deer say that we should not spend any money. I have heard him say on many occasions, both before and since the war, that we should not waste any money; but there is a great deal of difference between spending money wisely and wasting it. I think the hon. member for Red Deer this afternoon put forward a statesmanlike policy—the only policy for Canada at this time. The leader of the Opposition says: "Why, you have got a national debt of a couple of billion dollars —or you will have." He is so frightened at the national debt that he says, in effect: "Do not spend any more money; close up everything."

If this Government had adopted that policy since the 11th of last November, there would have been tens of thousands of people walking around in idleness, and there would have been civil disorders throughout Canada. What policy have we laid down, Mr. Chairman? We have laid down a policy which is unassailable—no money for unproductive undertakings but money for productive works in Canada. How are we going to meet the interest on our national debt and provide a sinking fund for its extinguishment unless we enormously increase the production of this country, rich in natural resources, one of the richest in the world? All that it requires is the application of enterprise, labour and capital. Principal among our resources are our great agricultural resources —this vast stretch of arable land not only in Eastern Canada but millions upon millions of acres in the great Prairie West extending from Winnipeg to the foothills of the Rockies. The hon. member for Red Deer spoke of hundreds of millions of acres and of the tens of millions that, by enterprise, could be brought under cultivation and made to yield a golden harvest for the people of Canada. How are they to be developed, unless we have transportation? Are there any members of this House, at this of all times, who will arise and say: You must not have railway extension in the West; you must expand no farther?

The hon. the leader of the Opposition put it forward this afternoon that in his constituency some people were—I think he said—one hundred miles from a railway. My hon. friend, evidently, by implication, was of the view that as long as railways went within a hundred miles of the farmers of the Northwest, or any other part of Canada, there was no cause for complaint. I know a little about farming. If a man has to draw a load of wheat one hundred miles to the elevators to sell it, he has not very much of the value left by the time he gets it there.

Mr. Chairman, at this of all times we must have a progressive, productive policy in this country or else we shall not overtake the effects of this war. We have, in this Government railway system, a wonderful instrument for increasing the productiveness of all parts of Canada, especially the Northwest. Do hon. gentlemen realize what a heritage we have in the West?—to say nothing of the East with its boundless resources; and there are boundless resources in the East. We have the great provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta each of them as large as modern Germany,—in fact, larger; 250,000 square miles each, and modern Germany 207,000 square miles. Have we a vision of the far future? How will it be realized? Will it be realized by a standstill policy under which we will say: No further railway extensions? Or shall we consider the situation from time to time and wisely make extensions which will multiply productiveness many fold for the benefit of the population of the West and for the general benefit of Canada? Is that not the policy that we should follow? It requires courage and imagination, and these are qualities which are necessary in this Dominion, not only for the remainder of this reconstruction period, but for many years to come.

Now, we want these charters. We want them for no improper purpose. We do not desire to give them away or sell them to any rival enterprise. We want these charters for the Canadian Government Railways; that is to say, for the people of Canada. I utterly fail to understand how any hon. member of this House, the Government being the sole proprietor of these railways, can object for one moment to the Government railway system having the benefit of the revival of these charters to be availed of as may be expedient in the public interest.

Private railway enterprise in this country is apprehensive of public ownership. There is no doubt about that. I do not blame it. But we have our duty to perform, and I submit that our first duty in this House is towards our own railway system. No man in this House will be fairer than I to any other railway enterprise in this country.

They serve a most useful purpose. The Canadian Pacific is the greatest system in the world, and most capably managed. I gladly pay them my tribute of appreciation. But as between any private railway enterprise and this publicly owned railway enterprise, I submit, it is the obvious duty of every man in this House, representative as he is of the people, to support measures designed to promote and make more productive the Government owned enterprise.

Speaking about the West, I was amazed this afternoon—in fact until I saw the extract from Hansard I could hardly believe it—at the attack made by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve upon our three western provinces. My hon. friend may have spoken as a politician, although I can scarcely see the ground upon which he might hope to gain any advantage. At all events, in the heat of his remarks he evidently expressed the deepest convictions of his heart. But to say the least, his remarks were not politic. Let us hear what he says:

> Scanning the list of these problematical railways—

So problematical that he was fearful that private enterprise might be debarred from getting them.

> —I notice that the schedule published will consist of railway schemes for the West only. There is nothing in the list for the East; there is nothing for Quebec.

Let us see what that means, Mr. Chairman. Nothing for the East and particularly nothing for Quebec! Carry that to its logical conclusion and it is that it has meant nothing, in the opinion of my hon. friend, to Ontario or Quebec that the West has had any railway facilities at all. Why, these railway facilities have made possible the immense production of the West which has enured to the advantage of the whole of Canada, and notably to the East. He says: There is nothing for Quebec. He says by implication clearly: Any development you make in the West is of no advantage to Quebec, and therefore I am against it. He says:

> Of course, the support of Quebec is not needed, but the credit of Quebec is of the highest.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad to agree with him. My hon. friend will look over Hansard in vain for any statement of mine reflecting against his province, so we are on common ground with regard to that.

Mr. BUREAU: He has only to look through your press if he wants to find out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My press?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, your press, the Tory press, or, if you like it better, the Unionist press.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We practically have all the press now.

Mr. BUREAU: Because you bought it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The press of this country is above all things an intelligent press, and it is inconceivable that it should not strongly support this Unionist Government.

Mr. BUREAU: But the owners are financial men first.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) says:

> The credit of Quebec is of the highest, whilst some of the Western Provinces were on the verge of bankruptcy because of the guarantees they gave to Mackenzie and Mann.

Why drag that into a discussion of this Bill. My hon. friend seems to delight to dwell upon the fact,—as he assumes it,—but which I controvert,—that the Western Provinces are bankrupt. He says further:

> That explains why before the last general election we saw so many of these premiers wavering in their faith, because, forsooth, they were promised if they supported Union Government that the guarantees given by their provinces would be taken up by the Dominion Government.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the legislation was put through before the general election took place. We took over the Canadian Northern Railway system before the election took place. It is a slander upon those public men—the Prime Minister of Manitoba, the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan, the Prime Minister of Alberta—that an hon. member of this House, the first lieutenant of the Opposition, should rise in his seat and state that they were bribed to support the Dominion Government in the last general election. That is what the hon. gentleman says, and it is a pretty serious indictment against leading public men. The hon. gentleman says:

> In fact, no provincial premier came to Ottawa during that eventful period without being met at the station by the wily gentlemen—

That is Mackenzie and Mann were waiting down here at the station——

> —who then controlled the destinies of Union Government.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I think I will leave it at that so far as my hon. friend from Maisonneuve is concerned.

Now, let me say one word with regard to the railway policy with which I have had something to do; with which I have been obliged against my will to have something to do since I have been Finance Minister. When we came into office we found the National Transcontinental Railway line from Moncton to Winnipeg unfinished. I was loyal to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, because Government is a continuing thing, and I felt it my duty as Minister of Finance to provide the means of completing that enterprise, and it was done faithfully and well. The appropriations were put in the Estimates. I never criticised them. I felt that that great enterprise, partly finished as it was, should be completed, although I had very great doubt indeed as to its financial success—in fact I felt certain that it would not be a business success. There is not an hon. member in this House on either side who, if he would say what is in his heart, would admit that the National Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, built at a cost of $200,000,000 and over, could possibly be made productive. If you only take three per cent upon it, to say nothing of four per cent, you have got fixed charges of $6,000,000 per year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to refer to responsibility for this. That belongs to the past. I want to make the best of the situation. Since I have been minister I have endeavoured, so far as my voice was influential in the Government, to make the best of the railway situation, and the money was provided for the finishing of the Transcontinental Railway—including the Quebec bridge—from Moncton to Winnipeg. There is no man in this House or in this country who would like to see the railway succeed better than I would; because it is Canadian. I do not consider whether any mistakes have been made or not; the railway is there, let us make the best of it. Take the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert. The leader of the Opposition says the Goths, and the Vandals, and the Huns—that is, myself and others—destroyed it. Well, we certainly did not destroy it, no matter what else we did. The railway was only partially built. Why, it was only taken out of the construction stage a couple of years ago. One of my first acts as Minister of Finance was to bring down a guarantee of $15,000,000, then a vote of $16,000,000, and then successive annual votes of $7,500,000, down to the present year.

Whatever charges hon. gentlemen opposite can bring against me, they cannot say that I did not faithfully, as Minister of Finance, seek to provide the means to carry out this enterprise which they initiated. Now, I am not going to follow my hon. friend in his argument as to whether the railways could have been made productive or not. My hon. friend knows the situation too well. There is nothing gained by reflecting upon your own enterprise—it is a sad kind of business to do that. There is nothing in being pessimistic. Men hate the gloom and love the sunlight. Let us be optimistic about our railways. A first condition of success in anything is to be optimistic; it spurs your courage. We need courage in this situation.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would like my hon. friend to have a little more of it.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I would need it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let us look to the future of this country despite the great debt which we have as a result of the war from which we have emerged with the utmost credit to Canada. Thanks to the sacrifices of our men and thanks to the initiative and capacity of the people and of the Government of this country since that war broke out, we have come most creditably and honourably through it. So far as I am concerned, I say that all gentlemen in this House share in that credit and honour; there is enough glory to go round. But now that we are through the war, let us set our faces to the future, and inspire our hearts with courage to meet this reconstruction period, and overcome whatever difficulties it may present. Let us not say: Now we must stop; we must spend no more money, whether productively or otherwise, let us stop. Well, if we do that we will not only stop, but we will go backward. I say to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that he will never carry the people of Canada on a destructive policy; his must be a constructive policy, and it must be an optimistic policy, looking to the larger future which this country is destined to have, and which every patriot believes it must have and will have.

We must throw our gates open to properly selected immigrants, and we must develop enterprises, so far as it is the function of the Government to do so; and provide transportation facilities to the extent that is necessary to promote development in order that we may continually increase our production and make this country the home, not of eight million or ten million people, but of twenty-five million or thirty million people within the lifetime of those in this Chamber. There is nothing far fetched or visionary in that; I believe it is an understatement; but we can only accomplish it, Mr. Chairman, if we have faith and hope and courage and resource. In connection with our railway policy we must be progressive, we must be enterprising, and we must be able to compete with the other great railway system which is in opposition to us and whose prosperity I have very much at heart. For I believe there is room for both systems. We have heard a good many reflections on public ownership from hon. gentlemen opposite, sometimes in express terms, at other times in a veiled way and by implication or insinuation stating that the railway systems of Canada are bankrupt and consequently the Government should not have taken them over, and that we will not be able to run them or to appoint directors of standing and integrity to ensure that they shall be properly administered.

Now, let me again make an appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to help in this matter, to have a new outlook with regard to the possibilities of the Government-owned system. And if any hon. gentlemen have it in their minds that the situation could be made different, let me say this to them—and there are not many men in Canada who have devoted more attention to the railway systems of Canada than I have, because I have been obliged to do so: There are just two courses open so far as Canadian Railway systems are concerned; two and no more: One is that the Government of Canada should acquire the railways that must be acquired from time to time following the policy which we have adopted, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be the other great enterprise, in friendly and honourable competition with the Government, and prosperous, as I know it will be. The other, since the Canadian Northern Railway enterprise and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway enterprise were inaugurated, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should acquire all the railway systems of Canada. Two great systems —possibly three if the Grand Trunk is not in—one owned by the Dominion Government and the other owned by the Canadian Pacific; or as an alternative, and the only alternative, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company owning and operating all the railways of Canada. That was the alternative with which the Government was confronted in 1917, and there is no other alternative to-day.

I do not mean to say for one moment that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could not operate all the railways of Canada with the highest degree of efficiency; I think they could. But when I say that I also say that the public of this country, great as is their admiration for the abilities of those who control the destinies of the Canadian Pacific Railway, would never permit any private corporation to own and operate all the railways of Canada.

I submit that that is the inevitable situation. If I am right, then let us quit harping about public ownership and reflecting upon the railway systems which we have taken over. Let us not go over all that old ground as to what the Liberals and what the Conservatives did—I am sick of it. Let us face the situation like business men and patriots, and make the best of it, with pride in our Government-owned system. I am sure that that carries the judgment of the members of this House.

I am a great believer in Canada. I believe in its inimitable resources, I believe in the enterprise, capability and patriotism of the Canadian people. We are destined to a great future; no one in this House doubts that. Well, let us set our faces to that vision and be constructive in all departments of our Government's activities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken up a good deal of time. I had not intended to say a word more in this debate upon the sections of this Bill, because we have consumed days of valuable time, part of which undoubtedly has been wasted. I am the first to say that there should be full discussion of a Bill of this kind, but I cannot overlook the fact that much of the discussion has appeared at least to be of a dilatory character. I would not have intervened except that this discussion had taken a turn in which it became necessary in the interests of the policy for which we stand on this side of the House, and in the interests of the people of Canada in connection with their publicly-owned railway system, that I should intervene and express my convictions as to the principles which should govern us in dealing with these great enterprises which have come into our possession.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister derived so little comfort from the report which he had in his hand a moment ago of what I said before six o'clock that he found himself under the dire necessity of delivering a long and emotional speech just to avoid the only point at issue. I suppose the hon. gentleman is not willingly reading into my words a meaning which he could not honestly find in them, but as he proceeded to do so by implication, at least, whilst he was reading the report, I may repeat for his benefit what was the point at issue when I rose. We were discussing clause 20 of the Bill to revive forty-four charters, which were dead and buried long ago. I said that the reviving of those charters, bearing in mind the obligations that the Government was assuming by taking over the main system of the Canadian Northern, was simply another means of deceiving the people of the Western Provinces, and preventing private corporations, if you please; preventing the provinces as well, from constructing railways where there is real need for them. Is there anything strange, anything criminal in criticising a procedure whereby the Government takes a blanket, collective charter and prevents the people of the provinces, east or west, from developing railway construction? That is the result, because the Government has not the means, has not the money, considering all its obligations, to implement that railway construction. That is what I said; that is the only meaning that can be given to my words. My hon. friend derived very little comfort, indeed, from what he read a moment ago. Sir, I am not the promoter or the advocate of private interests in this House; during the twenty-three years that I have sat in the House I have never championed private interests against public interests. My hon. friend said that we must have faith, that we must have hope. Let him have a little charity, too, and give to the words of his opponents the meaning which they obviously intended to convey.

Mr. BUREAU: Not charity, but justice.

Mr. VIEN: And fairness.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, a little Christian preaching does good under the circumstances. My hon. friend spoke a moment ago of the "legacy of dirty babies" from the Laurier Government. I notice that the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) nods his assent; he is on familiar ground. Now, this is not precisely Gladstonian language.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. EDWARDS: I beg to differ; I do not approve of dirty babies. I am very fond of clean babies but I do not care for the dirty ones.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a doctor, my hon. friend should not approve of dirty babies, and I am glad that he quickly dismisses the idea of nursing them. But in the heat of the discussion the Acting Prime Minister overlooked the compliment that he paid to those babies and to their nurses when he was fresh from the polls in 1911. When he first came to this Parliament, having served private corporations for some time with great distinction, my hon. friend spoke of the future of the country in a speech which nobody could forget. He referred to that legacy of babies which he had received from the Laurier Government. On March 13th, 1912—on the thirteenth, a very unlucky day for him, but a very lucky one for me—he had hope and faith in the future of Canada. He said:

> Despite the serious vicissitudes through which the western wheat crop has passed and the unusual heat experienced in the province of Ontario during the past summer—

Yes, there was serious heat in Ontario during that summer.

> —the field crops of Canada show a bountiful yield and with the high prices prevailing for practically all its products the great basic industry of agriculture continues in a flourishing condition. Almost every department of trade and commerce shows expansion. Our mines are wonderfully productive. Our coast fisheries, notably the Atlantic, have enjoyed a good catch and high prices. Our manufacturers are thriving and new industries are springing up throughout the whole Dominion. Railway construction, especially in the West, proceeds apace, preparing a way for settlement in districts not yet opened up and for trade with other markets than we now enjoy. Our increased bank deposits, clearings, and circulation, the amount of public and private building evidenced in municipal and business structures, extensions to manufacturing plants and residences in almost every part of the country, all attest that the general prosperity of Canada at the present time is very great.

"Railway construction proceeds apace"—the Laurier policy of railway construction for the western provinces. At that time my hon. friend was tinged with Liberalism. He remembered the day that he had been a Liberal; he could not completely forget that he had supported the railway policy of the Laurier Government for fifteen years; so he had to praise it when he delivered his first Budget speech. My hon. friend, therefore, who lauded the wisdom of the Laurier railway policy in 1911 now makes reference to the "dirty babies" of the Laurier Government. My hon. friend is apt to change his views. Some years ago speaking in the city of Toronto when the first great fight for the hydro-electric took place, he described the supporters of public ownership as "coveting Naboth's vineyard." You see, I have a long memory. Now, behold my hon. friend extolling the men who covet Naboth's vineyard. My hon. friend will have to again alter his views on many questions as long as this Government lasts.

My hon. friend was fair to me a moment ago when he put the question squarely: Are you or are you not in favour of Government ownership? Well, I am not like my hon. friend, who was described by one of his friends the other day as living in a fool's paradise—I hope the expression is parliamentary; I will never "rush in where angels fear to tread." I have no opinion to offer with regard to the Government ownership of railways. I do not think I shall be taken to task for not at this juncture stating, ex cathedra, that Canada must adopt Government ownership of railways as against private ownership of railways. There are men who are just as well educated on this question as even the Acting Prime Minister. He referred to the Canadian Pacific railway a moment ago. Lord Shaughnessy is a man of some experience in railway matters, a man who knows whereof he speaks. Speaking in Toronto last September on the occasion of the opening of the Canadian National Exhibition—which, I must say en passant, is a great credit to Ontario—Lord Shaughnessy, though he did not commit himself as being, as my hon. friend would seem to infer, against public ownership, said:

> I have covered a great deal of ground in the quickest possible way. Much of it would stand great elaboration, but on an occasion of this kind long speeches are an abomination. I think probably that you expected me to say something on the subject of transportation. But I would prefer to postpone that until another occasion. It is beyond doubt a very live question, one in which the people of the country are taking a very great interest, but to my mind it is a question regarding which a decision should be reached only after most careful analysis and consideration. We shall, within the next short period, have an opportunity to learn the result of our neighbour's management of the railways of the country and probably have a little experience of our own. I do not wish to have it understood that I am taking an attitude opposed to nationalization of railways. When the Government is satisfied that the people of this country want nationalization, we are a democratic people and we shall have it. But whatever our policy, we should be very sure of our footing or it may become a very serious problem.

The words of Lord Shaughnessy are full of wisdom. Since he made that declaration in the city of Toronto, we have had the result of United States' public railway ownership. Not later than, I think, Monday last, Mr. Mitchell, president of the National City Company of New York, speaking before the Canadian Club at Montreal, gave in a few concise, pungent words, the experience of the United States as regards public railway ownership:

> On paper, Mr. Mitchell declared, the scheme was sound. The country was divided into seven great traffic regions, and for these regions were appointed regional directors, who were, for the most part, the presidents of leading trunk lines. The fact that these operators, however, working to a man to the height of their efficiency and power, were unable to produce satisfactory results, and service deteriorated and morale became constantly lower, is a striking commentary on the general subject of Government operation. The roads were free from hampering restrictions and yet the net earnings fell off $285,000,000, compared with the previous year, the railroads earning only 75 per cent of the amount which the Government had guaranteed them as rental. Notwithstanding the increases in rates, which were far greater than private management had ever dreamed of asking, and which produced greater gross revenue by $865,000,000, the people of our country, after suffering inferior service, were called upon as taxpayers to advance $210,000,000, the amount by which the net earnings failed to equal the guaranteed rental. In other words, the American people paid $865,000,000, more in rates for inferior service and were taxed $210,000,000, in addition, so that the true cost to the people of one year of Federal operation amounted to $1,075,000,000. With these figures before you, I need not repeat that the popular passion for Government ownership and operation has materially cooled during the past year.

Was Lord Shaughnessy not right when he said that, before adopting a policy of public railway ownership, we should be sure of our footing? For my part, I have no solution to offer. I say that we are, under present conditions, obliged to take the main line of the Canadian Northern, but my objection this afternoon and this evening to section 20 of this Bill is that not only do we assume that enormous burden of the Canadian Northern, but the Government are foisting on that system 44 wrecks—and I have some regard for the credit of my country. Let not the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) think for one moment that I have not, equally with him, the interest of my country at heart. I have the interest of my country at heart just as much as any hon. member opposite.

This afternoon, I referred to the province of Quebec. I did not do so from any desire to force the Government to give to Quebec as much as they were seemingly giving to the West, because I sincerely believe the West will get nothing out of the 44 wrecks. This is simply another way of deceiving the West on the eve of a general election, as the West will get no relief from the belated tariff policy of the Finance Minister. I referred, and I am glad to refer, to Quebec, for this reason. Out of the nine provinces of this Dominion, at least four were and are on the verge of bankruptcy because of the Mackenzie and Mann system of railways. This is a truth which I am not afraid to state on the floor of this House as I have stated it before during the session of 1917. Sir, the credit of my province on the foreign markets is higher and better than that of the Dominion Government, because the bonds of my province are sold at par, while the bonds of the Dominion Government were sold on the New York market less than three years ago at 93 cents on the dollar. I have reason, therefore, to be proud of Quebec, the only province which did not deliver itself into the hands of Mackenzie and Mann, and we of Quebec have a right to resent the increased expenditure to which we are committing this country, because my province will have to pay its share of that vast expenditure if it is ever expended. That is the reason why, this afternoon, I referred to Quebec.

Speaking again on this question of public ownership, it is a popular fancy at the present time; but really those who favour that new fancy should take the time to read some of the best authorities on the question. I do not know if the Acting Prime Minister has ever read the views of possibly the greatest authority on economics in Europe, and, I should say, in the world, Mr. Paul Leroy Beaulieu, who is absolutely opposed to public ownership. So one might well pause and ponder before committing himself to this fancy. Within a year from to-day many people will regret having committed themselves to the wild policy of the Government which is embalmed in the Bill at present before the committee. It is made to appear as if members were retrograde because they dare offer some mild criticism as regards the wisdom of this policy. Sir, I could find in the city of Toronto some of the highest financial authorities opposed to this very policy, and they are the best friends of the Government. My hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) said a moment ago that the Opposition was not a unit on this subject. Is the Government of Canada a unit on this question? Let me ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell); let me ask my good friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) if they are as keen as their colleagues for Government ownership. No, Mr. Speaker. We have at heart the interests of Canada, and we are all proud as the the hon. gentleman (Sir Thomas White) stated a moment ago, of the part that Canada and our boys have taken in this war; and the greatest homage that can be paid to those who have survived the great war is for us to serve the country to the best of our judgment and according to our conscience.

In my humble judgment and according to my conscience, the policy of the Government is a dangerous policy, and I speak having regard to the best interests of the country. It is launching the country into a gulf from which it may not emerge. To-day it is a receivership of one of our railway systems. Later on, as is predicted in many reviews and newspapers it may be a receivership for Canada. I do not care for such receivership, Mr. Chairman. I want to remain a Canadian. A country may be lost through the economic errors and fallacies of some of its statesmen as well as on the battlefield. Many of our great industrial establishments, many of our railways, many of our commercial institutions in Canada are more or less in the grip of American finance. When this country has no more credit to back its undertakings, I say to my hon. friend: God help Canada and God save Canada. It is all very well for the Acting Prime Minister to come here and deliver orations on a plain question of facts and figures. The facts and figures are staring my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) in the face. He knows that this country is debtor to-day to an inconceivable amount—nearly two billion dollars. He knows that the credit of our country stands in the balance seriously impaired. He knows that the eyes of the financial world where we have launched loan after loan are fixed on Canada. My friend invites us to have faith and hope. I have faith and I have hope, but I like to have a little common sense with my faith and hope.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I rise to a point of order, but before raising the point I wish to state my position in this matter because I feel somewhat under the lash. I took exception to clause 20 this afternoon and I propose to renew my objection until I am satisfied that I am wrong. The hon. member for Maisonneuve started something which I am sure he did not anticipate would lead to the discussion we have reached at this stage. None of the speakers up to the present time have really discussed clause 20, but they have rather discussed the Government's policy of public ownership. So far as I am concerned, I was in favour of public ownership before private ownership forced the Government to adopt public ownership, and so expressed myself in the province of Alberta, from which I come. My address before this House last session leaves no room for doubt where I stand on that policy. I am entirely in accord with the remarks made by the Acting Prime Minister and also in accord with the remarks made by the hon. member for Red Deer, so far as the spirit of the West is concerned. But it is peculiar what different angles may arise in the discussion of this Bill, and how in one view I may be condemned by the members of the Unionist Government, and how in another view I can partially support the attitude of the Opposition. My objection to clause 20 may be exemplified by a resolution of the Railway Committee of the Edmonton Board of Trade. The territory which is to be traversed by the proposed Bruederheim-Vermilion line is threatened to be invaded by the Canadian Pacific, a private-owned company. The people of Edmonton do not want that territory to be invaded by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and consequently they desire that the location of the Canadian Northern shall be changed to such an extent as to make it impossible for the Canadian Pacific Railway to come into that territory at all. This is what the Railway Committee of the Edmonton Board of Trade has to say on that subject:—

> The more consideration that we give to this proposition the more convinced do we become that it is a tremendously serious menace to Edmonton's trade. The road from Cut Knife goes into territory between the C.N.R. main line and the Saskatchewan river. That country is already fairly well settled and is producing heavily in the way of live stock, and present conditions of transportation are not conducive to grain farming, and the country will probably always remain principally a live stock country. The trade of that territory properly belongs to the Government system, which should develop it by something like the old proposed Bruederheim Line, and which they should perhaps bring a little farther north than the projected route of that line, and which should possibly continue eastward instead of turning down to Vermilion.

Now, by clause 20 the Bruederheim-Vermilion charter is renewed, and I have no means of having that charter amended so that the location of the proposed Canadian Northern line can be changed, except by blocking the Estimate which the Government brings down for the purpose of constructing this branch line. My position therefore is this: The Governernment has brought down to-day, very suddenly, on the suggestion of one of the members of the Opposition a list of forty-four charters, and we are called upon suddenly to criticise each and every one of these charters without the assistance of solicitors or experienced railway men who have projected these proposed lines; and if the Bill goes through, the second schedule to the Act, which is incorporated in clause 20, will become law without the members of this House having a fair opportunity of discussing each and every one of these charters. I am willing to support the Government in everything that is reasonable, but I am not prepared to become a servile follower of the Government or of any minister of the Crown who tells me that I must follow a line of conduct which my conviction tells me I should not. We are not given a fair opportunity of discussing these various charters. If it were of any use I might suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there are good reasons for being suspicious of the whole Bill. I might suggest, for instance, that Mr. Lash who framed the Bill was formerly a Mackenzie and Mann employee. I might suggest that the counsel, Mr. Ruel, now sitting on the floor of this House, was once in the employ of Mackenzie and Mann, and is now in the employ of the Government. To strengthen the suspicion of the Opposition and others I might suggest that the same counsel at the time he was receiving pay from Mackenzie and Mann was advisory counsel to Mr. Tilley in the investigation which awarded $10,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann.

There are circumstances, Mr. Chairman, which do justify to a certain extent our suspicions of this Bill, and particularly when we find some of the personnel of Mackenzie and Mann employed in connection with it at the present time. But I am not urging these things at all, I am urging the fact that the Government has brought about an amendment to section 20 of the Act without giving hon. members an opportunity of considering it. Now, I raise my point of order, which is that the minister, in moving the amendment to section 20, has changed the character of the Bill and that this Committee has no power to pass a Bill differing in principle from that which was adopted on the second reading.

The CHAIRMAN: Has any hon. member anything to say on the point of order before the decision of the Chair is given? The point of order raised is that the minister in introducing the amendment has completely changed the character and principle of a Bill as adopted on the second reading. The amendment appears to be merely a restriction of clause 20. Clause 20 in the Bill as voted upon during its second reading contained the following words:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of any lines of railway which any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct, which had not expired at the beginning of the war, in August, nineteen hundred and fourteen, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act.

The amendment restricts clause 20 to the lines of railways specified in the second schedule to this Act. It is therefore a restriction and not a change in the principle of the Bill. May, at page 370 says:

> Amendments may be made in every part of the Bill, whether in the preamble, the clauses or the schedules; clauses may be omitted and new clauses and schedules added. . . .

On the same page, I find the only exceptions to be as follows:

> Amendments cannot be moved which are based on schedules or other provisions, the terms of which have not been placed before the Committee. Amendments are out of order if they are irrelevant to the Bill, or beyond its scope; governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived; inconsistent with, or contradictory to, the Bill as agreed to by the Committee; inconsistent with a decision to which the Committee has come upon a former amendment or offered at a wrong place in the Bill.

Bourinot, page 523, says:

> The rules of the English Commons provide that any amendment may be made to a clause, provided the same be relevant to the subject matter of the Bill, or pursuant to any instructions, and be otherwise in conformity with the Rules and Orders of the House.

In view of these authorities, I rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. BUREAU: Would not the point of order be well taken if we raised the question of the discussion of the principle of the Bill on section 20 after the second reading has gone by?

The CHAIRMAN: A point of order concerning the scope of the discussion would be worthy of more consideration. The debate has not always been strictly relevant to clause 20 which is under discussion before the Committee. The matter has been considered by the Clerk Assistant and myself several times during the afternoon. In view of the scope of the clause and the fact that it relates to the construction of a large number of branch lines extending over the entire western portion of Canada, we have come to the conclusion that the discussion of the public or private ownership of these lines is in order.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I rise for one purpose and one purpose only. It is not my intention to go back to ancient history and relate what has taken place in this country with regard to railway construction and various other railway matters. I take part in the discussion only because of certain words uttered by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). I want to clear up, in my own way, certain misunderstandings under which some people seem to labour. There are gentlemen, the Acting Prime Minister told us in so many words to-night, who seem to believe that to be a Liberal one has to be for nationalization. Liberalism is not socialism, either state or any other kind. Liberalism stands for liberty—liberty of the subject, liberty of speech, liberty of action. liberty of commerce. Liberalism stands for freedom and competition in all lines and spheres. Those who believe that nationalization means necessarily liberty and freedom are mistaken. In many respects it is the very opposite of liberty. Its purpose is to kill competition and erect a bureaucratic state.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what they did in Germany.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That is what was done in Germany. But that is not Liberalism; that is state socialism; that is the beginning of Bolshevism—let my Tory friends on the other side not be mistaken about that. I believe that a free trader cannot consistently be in favour of the nationalization of industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: There are gentlemen who speak on certain questions who do not take the trouble to study them. Let my friends read the works of the great free-trader, Yves Guyot; he is against nationalization. Protection prevents freedom of trade and competition in trade. State nationalization prevents freedom of competition in those industries which are subject to it. Do you think that the republicans and radicals of France are lesser Liberals than my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister and the Toronto magnates who are associated with him?

Sir, the French Liberals at the present time have taken full advantage of the way in which the state has substituted itself for private enterprise and industry during the war in all directions, and they have just formed an association called "The League of Free Men," to vindicate the rights of private citizens as against the state. Nationalism is a great problem. I do not blame anybody for advocating it, I confess to have an open mind with respect to it, but I deny to any man the right to say that a Liberal has to favour Sifton—I beg the committee's pardon, this is the word that comes naturally when we speak about it; has to favour the system—if he wants to remain true to his principles. Certain gentlemen in this country have queer ideas about Liberalism and Liberal principles, and what Liberalism stands for.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Who says "hear, hear?"

An hon. MEMBER: We all do.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: My friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) is certainly a good authority to speak for Liberalism. I read quite recently in the Toronto Globe that to be a Liberal a man must stand for prohibition. I am sure the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) as well as myself will not accept such an absurd theory. Any man has the right to advocate prohibition, but that is not Liberalism. That is the rumour which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has circulated in the province of Ontario, but it is not true. Prohibition is a restrictive policy, whereas Liberalism stands for personal liberty of the subject. A Liberal allows his fellows to differ with him on public questions. He is a queer Liberal indeed who believes that he embodies in himself the essence of Liberalism and Liberal ideals. Sir, I claim to be a Liberal in the clear sense and meaning of the word, and I deny the right of the Acting Prime Minister and those who are associated with him to give me any lecture on Liberalism. Needless to say I shall not accept such lectures from him or his associates.

Mr. ROWELL: It is not my intention to follow my hon. friend (Mr. Ernest Lapointe) in a discussion of theoretic Liberalism. The hon. gentleman has explained Liberalism as it was expounded in England some fifty years ago. At that time Liberalism was a struggle for freedom, a struggle for religious, economic, and personal liberty. But with the changes that have since come about, due to the development of modern industry, the growth of corporations, the large development of life in the cities, progressive Liberalism has felt compelled to change the point upon which it places emphasis. Progressive Liberalism in England, and in every other country where it touches the social conditions of the people, has felt compelled not to increase personal liberty, but to restrict the power of the strong for the protection of the weak. Modern legislation which the Liberal party of Great Britain placed upon the Statute Books has been legislation to curb the power of the strong, to restrict the power of the great, to control and regulate trade, industry, and commerce, in order that the individual toiler who was unequal to competition in a free, unfettered field, such as my friend (Mr. Lapointe) suggests should be granted—should be protected against the oppression of the strong, whether it be corporate power or large organizations of wealth, and that there should be thrown round him safeguards which would give him a fair chance in life under decent living conditions. So Liberalism has introduced all those great measures of social legislation which have been so characteristic of the administration of which Mr. Lloyd George was such a distinguished ornament, and of which Mr. Asquith was the Prime Minister.

What I rose to refer to was one or two observations of the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). If I rightly understood his objection to clause 20 of the Bill it was based on two grounds: First, that the proposal to grant an extension of the charters involved an expenditure of public money which Canada at the present time was not in a position to undertake, and second, he doubted the wisdom of public ownership in any case and quoted from Lord Shaughnessy and other authorities on the matter as evidence that it was not a wise policy for us to pursue. Now, first as to the question of the expenditure involved. My hon. friend knows, as all the members of the House know, for it was repeated time and again this afternoon, that this clause does not involve one dollar of public expenditure; the House may vote the money when the time comes if it sees fit to do so. All that the clause does is to extend the period during which these charters may be acted upon, and these branch lines may be built, just as the usual extension to private railways is granted by the Railway Committee of the House, and approved by the House from year to year. Therefore, my hon. friend's contention in that regard fails. He is too good, and too old, a Parliamentarian not to know that there is no just ground for opposition to the Bill on that score. But in that connection I was surprised when my hon. friend made the statement he did with reference to the credit of Canada. I would remind him that if the situation be as he states—I am glad to think it is not—he is not rendering Canada good service when he rises here as one of the leaders of the people and suggests, on the basis of some magazine article, that the next receivership will be a receivership of the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows that there is no country in the world to-day that has come through the war better than Canada has done. All the countries of the world have an enormous burden of debt to carry, but we have come through it probably better than any other country. Certainly no country, unless it be the United States, is in a better position than we are. We have borne the burden in this war in an astonishing manner. As a matter of fact, while the public debt is very heavy, while the public debt is such that we should not unnecessarily increase it, the increased wealth of the people of Canada is greater in excess of the increased public debt. The people of Canada to-day are better off than when the war broke uot.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain what he means by increased wealth? In what way have we accumulated more substantial wealth?

Mr. BUREAU: The physical assets of the Canadian Northern.

Mr. ROWELL: The millions of money which have come into this country and have been spent here for munitions, for all other war supplies, and for food supplies, have added to the wealth of the people of Canada —the money that has come in from the Government of Great Britain, and from other Governments also. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has not done Canada a service by making such a suggestion in reference to our financial position.

Coming to the other point to which the hon. gentleman referred, the question of public ownership, his address has simply made still clearer, if it was necessary to do that, the real situation behind the opposition to this Bill. My hon. friend has clearly stated that he is not in favour of public ownership; at least he holds that he is not bound to commit himself to it, but all of his arguments were against public ownership. And the situation, therefore is this, those who believe in private ownership as against public ownership are entirely opposed to the Bill; but the people who either believe in public ownership because there is no other course open to us—we have the railways on our hands—or who believe in public ownership because they think it is the right thing in the public interest, are in favour of the Bill, and on that issue the hon. members supporting this Government have no hesitation in taking their stand. My hon. friend quotes from the experience in the United States. How does that help us? We have the railways on our hands, as the Acting Prime Minister has pointed out, and we have either to operate them, or turn them over to another company to operate, and the only other company left to do it is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I believe the only thing to do is to go forward and operate these railways and make them the greatest success possible. How are we going to operate them successfully and justify public ownership in this country? We can only do it by developing them along the same lines as a private corporation would develop them—by constructing the necessary feeders through the country so the main line may have the traffic which these feeders bring in. Everybody recognizes that there are strong and powerful interests in this country opposed to public ownership. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) expect the ex-President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to be in favour of public ownership? My hon. friend quotes him, and undoubtedly he is an exceedingly able man, but you would not expect him to be an authority on the question. My hon. friend quotes him against it; of course, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are opposed to public ownership.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What I quoted from Lord Shaughnessy was not an opinion opposed to public ownership, but what he said at the opening of the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto, that before embarking on public ownership the country ought to be sure of its footing, and should wait until the experiment of the United States was known.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that Lord Shaughnessy stated his position on public ownership more diplomatically than my hon. friend did this afternoon when he referred to the western Prime Ministers.

Mr. BUREAU: There is nothing wrong about it. I am against public ownership; I have stated so.

Mr. ROWELL: There is nothing wrong about it?

10 p.m. Mr. BUREAU: Certainly not.

Mr. ROWELL: But we want to know that the issue is clear and plain: public ownership as opposed to private ownership.

Mr. BUREAU: What has that to do with the Bill?

Mr. ROWELL: It appears to have a great deal to do with the opposition to the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. As far as I am concerned and as far as I know it has had nothing to do with the opposition to the Bill. The minister is insinuating that members on this side are actuated by motives other than those that should actuate them—or are influenced by the Canadian Pacific Railway, to put it in plain words.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know what may be in the mind of my hon. friend from Three Rivers, but it is absolutely impossible for the Chairman to impute motives to the hon. member.

Mr. BUREAU: I say the minister is imputing improper motives to the Opposition when he says the question of public ownership as against private ownership has influenced the attitude of hon. members on this side of the House. Our criticism of the Bill is not founded upon any hostility to public ownership.

The CHAIRMAN: That is certainly not a point of order.

Mr. BUREAU: All right; go to it.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not question the right of any hon. member to oppose public ownership if he does not believe in it. It is his duty to oppose public ownership in that case and his position is perfectly consistent. On the other hand whether one believes in public ownership or not, we have the railways on our hands and we must operate them. But I go further, I believe in public ownership of this railway system, and therefore I am a hearty supporter of the Bill. I was proceeding to say that there are in the country undoubtedly influential forces opposed to public ownership. They have been opposed to the Government taking over the Grand Trunk, they have been opposed to the Government interfering with the Grand Trunk Pacific and have said we should not do so. In order to make public ownership a real success, I venture to submit, Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the Government to acquire or develop such a complete transportation system throughout this Dominion that it can fairly compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway on something like equal terms. Therefore it is not only the duty of the Government to go ahead and take authority for the construction of the necessary branch lines, but to complete and round up the system by acquiring the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk. Then we will have a system of transportation able to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The position of hon. members on this side of the House in supporting this Bill is that it is a necessary measure in order that the best results should be secured in the operation of the system of railways which the Government of Canada owns and which it must operate.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. member believe that this company we are creating should be allowed to start out with a free hand? If so, why does he want to foist upon that company forty-four wrecks?

Mr. ROWELL: I am dealing with the section, which is simply for the purpose of extending the life of the existing charters which had expired during the period of the war, to enable the company to construct the roads covered by them. The company must come to the House for the money; my hon. friend knows it cannot undertake any construction in the absence of that.

Mr. McKENZIE: No, there are Orders in Council.

Mr. ROWELL: The money has not yet been granted for the construction of those roads, and the company must come to the House for it. My hon. friend referred to the position of the Western Provinces and the relation of Mackenzie and Mann to them; that is all connected with private ownership. I believe that one of the strongest reasons for public ownership in this country is the experience we have had with private ownership of railways. That is one of the reasons why I support the public ownership of these railways. One has only to travel through Western Canada and see the rival railways running side by side for hundreds of miles through territory that could only support one line, to realize that there is no justification or excuse for such a waste of public money, that it is a crime to waste public money in this way. That was all done under private ownership. I believe that private ownership of railways has helped to bedevil the public life of this country, and that is another reason why I want to see a strong state-owned and operated railway system in this country. I am quite prepared to concede if you like, for the sake of argument, that a railway may not be run as economically and efficiently by the Government as by a private corporation, but I would rather that it should be run a little less efficiently and economically so long as it is owned by the people of Canada and operated in their interests rather than owned and operated in the interests of a private corporation.

Mr. EULER: Because hon. members on this side are not absolutely satisfied with all the clauses of this Bill, would the minister say that they are necessarily opposed to the principle of public ownership? Because, if so, I desire to protest against such an assertion I am just as much a public ownership man as any hon. member in this House, and I would go a little further—I would also acquire not only the lame ducks but the Canadian Pacific Railway as well.

Mr. ROWELL: I would not think of suggesting anything of the kind. The clauses of the Bill should be discussed on their merits, each and every one of them. The hon. member for Maisonneuve, to whom I rose to reply, based his opposition on the grounds which I am answering, and on which I say I am opposed to him and on which I join issue. I stand for public ownership and operation of this railway system, expanded and enlarged until it is made a thoroughly complete system able to compete on equal terms with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. minister answer my question? We are putting a Bill through this Committee that empowers a body of the ablest railway men we can get to build railways anywhere in Canada. They have authority under this Act to build over every inch of the ground included in those forty-four charters. Why do we encumber this new institution with those wrecks? Because we on this side are opposed to this wreckage being thrown upon the country, we are told that we are opposed to public ownership and to any progress in the West. That assertion is nonsensical, it is without a shadow of truth, and I hurl it back into the teeth of any man who chooses to fling it across the floor of the House.

Mr. ROWELL: Which of the clauses that have been adopted gives the power suggested by my hon. friend?

Mr. McKENZIE: Every part of the Bill.

Mr. ROWELL: We are going through this Bill clause by clause; which clause that we have passed in Committee gives the power that my hon. friend suggests?

Mr. McKENZIE: We were given to understand by the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) that this Bill, together with the Railway Act, confers all the power that the company and the Government require to build railways throughout the country. If that is not true, it is not my fault.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman was given to understand nothing of the sort. We come to clause 23 later—and I may add that it is proposed to offer an amendment to clause 23. That has already been made known to the Committee. No clause which has been passed gives the power the hon. gentleman describes, and he ought to know that. I think he does.

Mr. McKENZIE: This Bill gives power to expropriate lands for the purposes of the beds of railways; what is that for? Does the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), who knows so much about railways that he does not know whether he has a manager or not, or if so, what the manager's salary is,—does he tell us that we have been discussing for hours all the machinery necessary to the acquirement of rights of way from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but that the Bill does not enable us to build the roads?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member knows that we were discussing expropriation after the charter had been granted by this Parliament.

Mr. BUREAU: This Bill must be taken as a whole; we cannot read one clause and put another aside. Section 23 gives the company, with the approval of the Governor in Council, power to construct and operate railway lines.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said yesterday that when we came to that clause I intended to amend it.

Mr. BUREAU: But the clause is in the Bill and we have to consider the Bill as a whole.

Mr. ROWELL: We have not reached it yet.

Mr. BUREAU: We have not reached it, but must we pass all the preceding sections without giving consideration to the power conferred by section 23? When we consider a given section we may go beyond it to see what the Bill says; we do not have to accept the dictum of the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell). I will not do it, anyway.

Mr. McKENZIE: Read section 23, so that the Committee may know what it contains.

Mr. BUREAU: This is section 23:

With the approval of the Governor in Council and upon any location sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Company may from time to time construct and operate railway lines, branches and extensions, or railway facilities or properties of any description. A copy of any plan and profile made in respect of any completed railway shall be deposited with the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada.

The Acting Prime Minister, in his remarks this evening, either departed from his usual custom or tried to put up a little bluff on the Committee and to scare us from discussing this Bill. I resent the imputation cast upon members on this side that they were opposing the Bill because they were opposed to public ownership. So far as I am concerned, that is absolutely false. I happen to be against public ownership. I stated on the second reading that I was against it; that I was in favour of private ownership and public control. I am just as good a patriot as the Acting Prime Minister and I am as loyal as the President of the Council. My loyalty is not on my lips alone and is not for political purposes alone. I am loyal because I have no other country but this country, because I have no love to send across the ocean or to give to any other part of the world than Canada, where I stand the eighth generation. It makes me sick when I hear the Acting Prime Minister appeal to our loyalty to pass this Bill. Are we to sit here as dummies to prove our loyalty? Are we to take for granted everything that comes from the Government? No, not when we remember the fight of 1917; not when we think of how this Government came to power and how it is holding itself in power. Instead of being rebuked because we criticize legislation that is brought down, we should be congratulated. No men who can be influenced by outside interests when they discuss public measures here should accuse others of being prompted by any other interest than the interest of their fellow-countrymen. When I get up to speak in this House I get up to speak my mind and discuss questions as I conceive them, and no power on earth shall prevent me from doing so; it is the only liberty left to us on this side of the House. We may be mistaken, but when we are mistaken we are honestly mistaken, we are not mistaken as the result of calculations or as the result of machinations which might bring to us some benefit or even the hope of benefit. I am not going to discuss the relative values of public ownership and private ownership. The Acting Prime Minister tried this afternoon to describe those who did not share his opinions as private ownership people, as people dangerous to the country, as disloyal people. But I have stated my position, and am not ashamed of it. When men in Parliament have no more right to think for themselves and to express their views, it is high time we dissolved Parliament. We shall be on the eve of Bolshevism when that comes.

The Acting Prime Minister tried to besmirch the policy of his predecessor. He said that when he came to power he found on the door-step of the Department of Finance two dirty babies. That may have been.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: We find more than that.

Mr. BUREAU: If he had been logical he would have fired the nurse who had not taken care of those babies. He would have said: I am going to change this; I want clean ones; let us clean this baby and make it as it ought to be. But what does he do? He tips the nurse and says: I am going to do better; I am going to give you better treatment; I am going to increase your wages—but I do not care about the dirty baby; let him rot in his dirt. If I came home and found my children not properly taken care of by the nurse, I would fire the nurse and get a better one. Now, I will be candid:

This was, I think, only a bluff on the part of the Acting Prime Minister—pulling the wool over the eyes of the people. The Government know that they have before the committe a poor Bill, a Bill that they cannot explain, a Bill that contradicts itself in a good many clauses—I will not say in every clause—a Bill that we did not oppose because it was vesting in a company power to administer Canadian Government railways but which, ever since it was brought before the House, we have been trying to word so that the company can be properly administered. This is not a question of deciding policies. We are saddled with these railways; they have to be administered, and we have given the best of our time and ability to framing a Bill which will give the best results in administering and operating those roads. What we have been afraid of, and rightly so, has been that politics will not be taken out of the Bill. What we have been fighting for is to vest in Parliament a little more power and to take from the Governor in Council some of the powers which are proposed to be granted by this Bill. I do not think we can be reproached on that account. Some hon. members on your right, Mr. Chairman, may think it is proper that the Governor in Council should run the country, and that Parliament should be convened simply to ratify Orders in Council. We on this side of the House do not think so; we think this country should be run by Parliament and that the administrative part delegated by Parliament to the Government should be taken care of by the Government. Surely we can differ on those questions without its being said that one side possesses all the ignorance and the know-nothings and that the other side is all-powerful and all-knowing, able to do everything. I do not believe that; I think God has been kind enough and good enough to endow every man in this world with a little something called brains, and that all the brains are not on the other side of the House. Thanks be to God, there are some brains on this side of the House, and outside of this House also.

On the second reading, I stated that I was against public ownership, my reason being, concisely, experience both with the Intercolonial and in the United States. Last year we were taking our cues from the United States—we had to change our standard of cement; we had to change our standard of weights and measures, because the United States were changing theirs. If those cues were good enough last year, prudence ought to teach us to follow the example of the United States when they have had the experience they have had with public ownership.

I hope to-night, whatever our opinions may be as regards public or private ownership, we shall continue to devote our time to the consideration of the clauses of the Bill. Again I repeat, every time I have risen from my seat has been not for the purpose of opposing the Bill because I am against public ownership, but for the purpose of endeavouring, if possible, to improve the Bill and to protect the interest of the people, and so much so, that one of my amendments has been adopted by the Acting Prime Minister who thought it was better, although before he thought it was of no importance. Since then I have met people outside of this House who also thought it was better.

Section 20 provides that all the roads mentioned in Schedule 2, whose charters have expired because they have not been commenced or completed within the time fixed, shall, in some cases, have their charters extended, but mostly revived. What I said was that I had no objection to reviving a charter or to granting an extension of five years for those roads upon which work had been commenced. I also stated that it was not just to grant a revival of a charter without the parties interested or the residents of the territory through which the railway was proposed to be run having an opportunity of being heard before the Railway Committee, or the parties granting the extension. My objection was immediately corroborated by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) stating that there was a road, the location of which ought, in his opinion, to be changed. The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) replied to him: If you want to change the location of the road, you will have to get a new charter. I replied to that: If you should get a new charter for a road to run in the same territory, would it not be fair to cancel the original charter? As the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) said just now there would then be none of the duplication of railways, two roads running side by side spoken of by the President of the Council. Is there anything unfair in that? Supposing public opinion and public necessity in the part of the country where a deviation of the road was required further than is allowed by the Railway Act without permission being received from Parliament or new plans being filed—or a new charter, being obtained—if you will and some persons applied for a new charter and showed that they were ready to build the road in a part of the country where it would be required, would it not be fair to cancel the old charter, or let it expire, let it die a natural death, and give an opportunity for building, under the new charter, a road which would be promoted by private interests to serve the better, more populous and richer part of the country? I do not see any disloyalty in that. That is how the whole discussion arose this afternoon.

The ministers say: We cannot go on with the construction of those roads without getting permission from Parliament, and when the estimates are brought down to the House, honourable members can voice their objections. The honourable member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) objected to that, because there were in those charters certain points which would require changes; and when an item is put into the estimates, the charter cannot be discussed or changed; all one can do is to say: I vote against the estimate because the construction of a line in that particular locality is not required. The better way to serve the public interest and that of the people in the West would be to give them an opportunity to say what lines are of most imperative and immediate necessity and to make any objections or suggestions they wish. Other companies have to make an application to Parliament, to come before the Railway Committee and to go through the usual routine, and anybody who has an objection to offer may cite it. This afternoon I cited a case which brought about the biggest fight there ever was in the Railway Committee. I refer to the Canadian Northern, this very company, and Mr.—Sir Adam Beck, I ought to say, because titles are still under the consideration of the committee—that makes the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) smile, I suppose before we get through with this session or before the Committee reports, I shall have the pleasure of calling him "Sir" also.

Mr. ROWELL: I am afraid the hon. member will be disappointed.

Mr. BUREAU: The question was, if I remember rightly, whether the Canadian Northern or the Hydro-Electric Company, should have priority of right of way on a piece of land. The Hydro-Electric declared: We will give the Canadian Northern right of way if we have priority, and the Canadian Northern said: We will give the Hydro-Electric right of way if we have priority. Such things may happen at any time, and it is unfair to revive a charter which is extinct, when no work has been done on the line, without giving an opportunity to the parties interested and the people in the district through which the line is to pass, an opportunity of voicing their opinions. I am willing, however, to grant an extension of five years for any line that has been commenced. We should not be asked to grant this extension of time without having seen the plans, not knowing where the railway runs, having just one copy of the list of lines which are supposed to have out-lived their charters and for which a renewal or resurrection is granted. It is not fair that we should vote on such things without having an opportunity of discussing in this committee the merits of each line, and of knowing when work has been commenced, how much has been done on the line, what has been the expenditure per mile, what the line is going to cost and how far we should engage the credit of the country.

The Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon that if the directors of the Canadian Pacific asked the stockholders to approve the renewal of valuable charters of that road, they would not hesitate to do so. But the cases are not parallel. That is a private enterprise, with private money invested; but in this case it is the people's money that is being invested. I do not want any of these lines in the province of Quebec. All I ask the Government to do, if they undertake public ownership. is to give us better service. I would suggest for one thing that the Minister of Railways see the manager of the National system, if he wants it to compete with the Canadian Pacific, and have a train start from Montreal and go right up to La Tuque, instead of from Montreal to Garneau Junction, and then to Hérvey Junction. The present service means that the industries at La Tuque and above that point have to wait a week for their freight and two or three days for their express. I would ask the minister to give me an opportunity of meeting him and the general manager on Monday to discuss this matter.

Mr. J. D. REID: The president will be here on Tuesday, and I shall be very glad to arrange for a meeting on that day.

Mr. BUREAU: I have received instructions from certain parties in La Tuque to ask for a hearing before the Railway Commission. If the minister will agree to have these people meet the president and myself on Tuesday or Wednesday, I will telephone them to come to Ottawa.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall be glad to arrange for that, and if the president is too busy on Tuesday I will arrange for a meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. BUREAU: I want my good friends to see that in spite of my opposition to public ownership I want to help the system as much as I can. I think if we were to scratch hon. gentlemen opposite we should find that in some of them the principles of public ownership are not very deep-rooted; but every man of course is entitled to his opinion, and we should not impute motives.

Would it not be well for the minister to let us know how much has been expended on the line from a point on the constructed line of the Canadian Northern railway at or near Edmonton, thence in a northeasterly and easterly direction on the north side of the North Saskatchewan river to St. Paul de Metis, and thence to the eastern boundary of the province of Alberta. We were told this afternoon by the hon. member for Edmonton that certain subsidies were granted to that road and that the subsidies had not been used, or that bonds had been issued and the proceeds not used for the construction of the road. Is that correct?

Mr. J. D. REID The bonds were guaranteed and part of them, if not all, were sold. The money is in the bank and will not be expended except on the certificate of the engineer. Part of the road has been built, and it is necessary to have the charter renewed.

Mr. BUREAU I am willing that the extension should be granted.

Mr. J. D. REID: In the case of almost all the charters that have been mentioned some work has actually been done, and if we do not renew the charters an asset of the Canadian Railway system will be lost.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: When was this money deposited in the bank?

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot say exactly.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: My information is that it was deposited in the bank in 1912, and if that is the case, why has not the line been constructed?

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly the money should have been expended by this time.

Mr. J. D. REID They have not gone on with railway construction during the war.

Mr. BUREAU The money was deposited apparently two years before the war.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am prepared to give all the details the House wants when the Estimates come up, but I have not the information here to-night. We simply wish to have these charters renewed.

Mr. BUREAU: I am willing that every charter on which work has been commenced should be renewed.

Mr. KEEFER: There are only about four on which work has not been commenced.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not fair to revive a charter when no work has been done, without giving the public a chance to make any objections they may have. It may be in the public interest that those objections should be heard.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. KEEFER: I think it would be eminently fair to revive them, and why? The very clause says that it is only those charters which but for the war would not have expired.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, no.

Mr. KEEFER: Yes, that is one way of expressing it. Section 20 says:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of any lines of railway . . . . which had not expired at the beginning of the war.

These only are the ones we are renewing. If we did not have that clause any one could take advantage of the existing condition of affairs during the war. We do not allow all that in mortgages and so forth, because we have a moratorium. Why not apply the same principle here? The Government is thoroughly honest in the matter. We are taking over these assets under the stock of this company, and the leader of the Opposition says: "Why not give this company a free hand?" The answer is, if you do not give them the assets they have not a free hand—which is what we are seeking to give them.

Mr. BUREAU: I am willing to give them all the chances where work has been commenced.

Mr. KEEFER: Did my hon. friend notice what the clause says about the war?

Mr. BUREAU: Let me read the amendment:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act which any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System were authorized to construct are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act.

Some of these charters that are being extended were dead before the war. In some cases extensions were granted by Federal statutes, which allowed one year in which construction was to begin and three years in which to finish. Now the Canadian Pacific, when they asked for extensions during the same period, were granted two years in which to commence and five years in which to finish; the Federal statutes show that. So there must have been some reason why the Canadian Pacific was given two and five years, whereas the Canadian Northern was given only one and three. I do not know whether the reason for specifying one and three years in the case of the Canadian Northern was that no work had been done, but there must have been some reason. So why not, in reviving these charters, if there are only four of them, give the people a chance to present their objections?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I dislike very much at this late hour on Friday night to take up even a few moments of the time of the House, but the discussion that arose this afternoon and which has continued this evening is so vastly important that I believe it my duty to present a few points which I think have been overlooked.

In regard to these charters, even if there are forty-two of them, like my hon. friend Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) I cannot understand why there should be any opposition on the part of members of this House to their renewal. Renewal is being asked in the interest of the people. These roads have passed into the control of the people and the people are merely asking that these charters be renewed and that the time for construction be extended. Every member on the opposite side of the House who has had any experience whatever in the Railway Committee during the last twenty or twenty-five years knows that the policy had been adopted of free trade in railway charters. Hundreds, if not thousands of times, railway charters have been renewed in the interest of private corporations. One of the evils of the renewal of these charters has been that it has prevented the construction of railways. I am happy to say that the Railway Committee has adopted a new policy and that most of the members of that committee are now of the opinion, and they have enforced that opinion, that charters should not be renewed.

But there was never any opposition, as a rule, to the renewal of these charters and here, I repeat, the renewal of these charters is in the interest of the country. In some cases the work has been started on these branches, and it would seem inexplicable that any opposition should be offered to them. Let me give a summary of these charters. In Alberta there are twelve or thirteen. This is not, as has been suggested by speakers on the other side, the construction of new railways. These are only little branch lines designed to accommodate settlers here and there, feeders for the nationally owned railway. In Saskatchewan there are twenty-three; in Manitoba, four; and in British Columbia four. These are not new railway systems but they are merely feeders. Why should they not be granted?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am perfectly in accord with my hon. friend in saying that these railways should be built wherever they can be usefully built. My position is that we have the authority in this new Act and in the Government Railway Act which might be made applicable to build these roads absolutely in the same places, on the same lines and more quickly for the advantage of the people under this legislation than by bothering with these old charters. That is why I am opposed to this section.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Even if you had that power under the General Railway Act, is there any harm in giving them this authority? The company that obtained these charters must have considered them of great importance, and the Government, acting in the interest of the country and in the interest of the nationally owned railway, asks that these charters be renewed. Surely that is a reasonable and fair proposition. I cannot understand why there should be any opposition. I think my hon. friend from Maisonneuve raised the point that it might prevent the construction of railways. He knows, because he is an intelligent man and because he has been in this House for twenty-four years, that henceforth there will only be two systems of railway in this country, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. No company is going to build a little line from nowhere to some other indefinite locality, because it will not pay. From now on the policy will be to build feeders for these two railways. Then, why raise any objection? The Canadian Pacific will be knocking at the door of this Parliament very soon asking for feeders for their great system. It will be interesting to watch the position which hon. gentlemen on the other side will take in regard to that application.

I remember—and I am not a very old man—when the Canadian Pacific applied to this House for a blanket charter to build lines indefinitely all over the Northwest. I sat on the Liberal side at that time and I opposed the application with all the force at my command. But I was as the voice of one crying in the wilderness. The old Liberal party just swept me aside and this blanket charter was granted in order that the Canadian Pacific might fasten its monopoly on that country.

As a young man I learned some of my politics at the feet of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the namesake of the present leader of the Opposition. Alexander Mackenzie's policy, and the historic Liberal policy in those days, was public ownership. Well would it have been for this country—it would have saved this country, I believe, two billion dollars and I could not tell how much more in rates—had the historic Liberal policy that was adopted by Alexander Mackenzie been followed. But Alexander Mackenzie's Government was defeated, Sir John Macdonald's Government came into office and they made the Canadian Pacific contract which Sir John Willison declared was the most insane contract ever entered into by a free people. I have not time to discuss that contract to-night.

I remember that the prophet from Brome, (Mr. McMaster) the other night invited us up to Mount Carmel and in a subsequent speech he also invited us up to Mount Delectable so that we on this side might have a view of the Promised Land. I was one of the simpletons who, twenty-five years ago, with the Liberal party of those days, went up Mount Delectable to have a view of the Promised Land believing that we were to have free trade and public ownership of railways. But I was led back to the wilderness; the Liberals went asleep for fifteen years and I got lost.

An hon. MEMBER: You are still lost.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I had to find my way out; I had to blaze my own trail. I now find myself in fairly good company, because I am happy to be able to agree with the declarations of the Acting Prime Minister this afternoon that there is more Liberalism in one tier of seats on this side of the House than there is on the other side altogether. It is disappointing to me, as it is to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), to hear member after member on the other side repudiating the idea of public ownership and going back on the policy made, I might say, almost sacred by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the honoured leader of the Liberal party. What can we expect? Take our intelligent, able and cordial friend the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe). I divine from his statement to-night, to which I listened with mixed pleasure, that he is not in favour of public ownership because he says, public ownership is really opposed to Liberalism.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. member allow me——?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Do not interrupt me at present. I do not want to put my hon. friend in a wrong position because I personally like him very much. But I say that the impression that he has made on my mind, and I am afraid on the minds of other hon. members on this side, is that he is opposed to public ownership.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I said I had an open mind on the question, but that no man has the right to chase away from Liberalism one who is opposed to the public ownership of railways.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am delighted to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, so I will leave his case and pass on to that of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), another old friend of mine. Now I challenged that hon. gentleman on several occasions in this House, when he was denouncing the policy that the Government was pursuing, to state what policy he would adopt; but, like the old Presbyterian minister, he looked the difficulty squarely in the face and passed on; he would not tell, and he will not tell yet. I wager that even if I sit down the hon. gentleman will not tell us where he stands on this question. However, I think I can fairly draw the inference that he is opposed to public ownership, because he said a few moments ago that it was a dangerous policy. Moreover hon. gentlemen know how he fulminated against the policy in the House this afternoon; and now he quotes approvingly from Lord Shaughnessy. No wonder when the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) chased the Ethiopian out of the wood-pile this afternoon there was a row. Because hon. gentlemen opposite must see—they call themselves Liberals, but they must see—they are adopting a reactionary policy that is not Liberalism at all. I say that a man—particularly a member of this House, an ex-minister, and one of the chief leaders from Quebec—who denounces the policy of the Government is in duty bound to state what policy he would follow. But this shifting and shirking of responsibility, what are reasonable Liberals to think of it? What is the country to think of that policy? I like very much better the position of my old friend—a friend of mine for more years than I would like to tell, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. BUREAU: Do not give me away, I am only twenty-five.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I like much better his position; he comes out with perfect frankness and says: I am opposed to public ownership.

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I told the hon. gentleman the other day, that if he would give me half an hour I would be able to convince him that public ownership is all right.

Mr. BUREAU: You could not convert me.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I hope the hon. gentleman will be converted, because he has been perfectly frank in this matter. Do I misrepresent the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie)—do I place that hon. gentleman in an improper position, when I say that by implication he also is opposed to public ownership? I pause for a reply.

Mr. McKENZIE: All I can say to my hon. friend is that if he will read the Hansard of last session at page 2191 he will see exactly where I stand. There is no mistake about my attitude.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I will look it up later, because I certainly would not wish to state the hon. gentleman's position incorrectly. But what impression must this House and the country gather when leading member after leading member on the Opposition side impliedly takes a stand against public ownership, and, as an hon. gentleman sitting near me suggests, raises every possible obstacle to the passage of this Bill? I am not disposed to criticise the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) for requiring the Bill to be amended in every proper way, but I think I am not going too far in concluding that the Opposition as a body are unfriendly to public ownership, and I want to warn them that if they hope to secure the confidence of this country, and to gain the treasury benches it will not be by means of the policy that they are pursuing on this question.

Now I have been an advocate of public ownership for thirty years. That is a long time, and if I had to offer an excuse for rising to discuss this question to-night, it would be because I listened with pardonable pride and very great satisfaction to the speeches which the leader of the Government and the President of the Privy Council delivered. To me it was a great satisfaction, because it means that the Acting Prime Minister and the party with which he is identified are now declared supporters of the policy of public ownership—in fact those gentlemen told us that a study of the question has brought them to that view. It was estimated, I think by the Minister of Railways, that the surplus on the operation of the Government-owned railways would not be less than $3,000,000. It is not a large amount but at least it is something and it is no wonder that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is looking askance at the policy of public ownership. It seems to me that any member who desires to serve his constituents and the people as a whole must range himself as a supporter of this policy. The leader of the Opposition spoke of the policy of the Laurier party as one of competence and capacity. Let me deal with that claim. When the Liberal party came into office it was on a pledge to wipe out protection from the tariff and to settle satisfactorily the railway question. The West had groaned under the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific and the Liberals for years and years had denounced that company and wanted competition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. I think my good friend is drifting from the subject.

Mr. VIEN: Let the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) sit down.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman is going to enter upon a discussion of the tariff we shall never conclude the consideration of this Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON: My reference to it is only incidental, I spoke to the Chairman about the matter, and he said that so much latitude had already been given—the leader of the Opposition himself read a long extract from the Montreal Star, and the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) also quoted extensively—that he would give me every facility. I am really dealing with the railway question. The Liberal party promised reforms with regard to the construction of railroads, but that party spent a billion of dollars of the people's money in constructing a transcontinental railway which in the general opinion of everybody was an entirely unnecessary and superfluous undertaking. It was promised that that road would cost the country in the neighourhood of $13,000,000; it has actually cost Canada $200,000,000—such an enormous amount that I do not think the railway ever possibly can pay. With regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, we listened to the words of the President of the Privy Council this evening, who said that it was a melancholy spectacle to travel through the Northwest Territories—in fact, I called the attention of the leader of the Opposition to it the other day—and see the duplication of railroads that exists. Now, if that is a policy of competence and capacity, it certainly does not appeal to me as such. However I am not anxious to blame one party more than another. I think there is no doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman who has considered the question at all that the representatives of the people, sanctioned by the people, have made appalling mistakes in railroad policy. Both sides are to blame, and we can probably fairly dismiss the subject with that statement. But we have entered upon a new era. The "babies" that the Acting Prime Minister referred to have not come to the country because the country desired them—that is a point I have tried to drive home a number of times in this House and I want to repeat it.

We are not going to have ideal public ownership at all. If we had started as the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie endeavoured to start, and had had public ownership from the first, we should have ideal public ownership and this country would be many hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars better off. But that time has passed and we have these babies thrust upon us. I think therefore that hon. members of the Opposition are in duty bound to assume their share of the responsibility for dealing with these children, inasmuch as they are equally responsible for bringing them into existence.

I have been struck, when reading the press of this country, to find papers like the Montreal Gazette and Montreal Star denouncing public ownership day after day, when it must be apparent to every hon. member and every citizen that there is no other policy to be pursued. Lord Atholstan, the proprietor of the Star, took a hurried trip through the Western provinces last fall, and he announced that he was studying the railway question. Of course the Star is strongly against public ownership. Do these newspapers and do hon. members of the opposition desire that this country shall hand over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company all these railways that we have acquired, including the Grand Trunk, which doubtless soon will fall into our hands? Because if they adopt that policy the probabilities are that the country will be called upon to make good any deficits that may arise in connection with these roads.

My hon. friend from Maisonneuve talks of private ownership. Private ownership has been the curse of the whole business. Private ownership has driven the great Canadian Northern System—hundreds and hundreds of miles of which never should have been constructed—into the hands of the country; we cannot help ourselves. The same thing has happened in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I interrupt my hon. friend? Assuming that private ownership is somewhat dangerous, does he not think that the Railway Commission can curb any predatory instincts inherent in private ownership by controlling freight rates?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I do not think so, and I will tell my hon. friend the reason why. I hold in my hands—I would like to read it, but I must hurry along—a copy of the Montreal Gazette, one of those papers that backs up Lord Shaughnessy in denouncing public ownership, and which follows the lead of the Montreal Star in that direction.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no harm in that.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The Montreal Gazette says that when these railways come into the hands of the country the Government must see to it that rates sufficiently high are charged to pay operating expenses, upkeep and interest at 5 per cent on the capital invested. The capital cost of the Grand Trunk Railway is $127,000 a mile. In my judgment, it will be impossible, until Gabriel blows his trumpet, to pay 5 per cent on such a cost per mile.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is not so optimistic as some of his colleagues.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The capital cost of the Canadian Pacific railway is $68,000 a mile. Now, you see how these newspapers play into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because if the Government compels these railroads to charge rates to give a return of 5 per cent on the enormous capitalization, we cannot compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway at all, and that is where public ownership would get a black eye at the outset.

Here is the only remedy—and I want my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, to follow me. I believe the party to which he belongs is a little more responsible than any other party for the great mistakes that have been made in the construction of these railroads. The Grand Trunk Pacific cost something like $97,000 a mile, and the Transcontinental cost an enormous sum per mile—I cannot give the exact figure. If the country has to take over these roads and set rates to pay operating expenses, upkeep and interest at 5 per cent on this vast over-capitalization, public ownership is a failure from the start. We must take our medicine. Both parties are equally responsible for the colossal mistakes that have been made. When we get the Grand Trunk system, as we shall in all probability, we will have to co-ordinate the entire public-owned system, and hundreds, if not thousands, of miles of railroad will be useless, because, owing to the folly of the people's own representatives, those useless lines were built. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern parallel each other for hundreds of miles through the Yellow Head Pass; you could throw a snowball from one line to the other. The Canadian Northern has many hundreds of useless miles of railway. I believe in the policy of the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) when Sir Wilfrid Laurier announced his policy to construct the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific —although I believe my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, if he were to make a frank confession, would say that that was a tremendous blunder. The right hon. gentleman's (Sir Robert Borden's) policy, as leader of the Opposition at that time, was that those roads should not be built, but that the Canadian Pacific railway should be double tracked around the north shore and the new railway system given running powers over the Canadian Pacific railway. That would have been the ideal policy and it would have saved a billion of dollars; but at that time we had in the West that prince of political cracksmen, Hon. Clifford Sifton, driving the thing through, and when he ran for Brandon he had a gang of railway engineers locating branch lines almost to the backyard of every Liberal who was recalcitrant and of every Tory who, he thought, might be influenced to vote for him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend seems surprised.

Mr. RICHARDSON: My hon. friend seems pleased. That is where thousands of miles of unnecessary railway were unloaded on the country. I have not spoken to any individual members of the Government, but the only sane system to be adopted, and the only system under which public ownership can possibly be made a success, is to co-ordinate the whole system, abolish every mile of unnecessary railway, and, after you have that done, let a commission state what shall be accounted the fair cost for the system, and what rates ought to be set to pay operating expenses, up-keep and, say, 5 per cent on the capitalization so ascertained. It would mean writing off from the public ledger probably half a billion dollars, but that is the only possible way in which public ownership can be made a success. And it is the just way, because both parties, I repeat, have been equally responsible for what has happened, and so have the people, because they have backed both parties in pursuing such an insane policy. So, let them take the consequences.

I was struck with the position taken by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve this afternoon when he said that Quebec did not get its share of these forty-two charters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Forty-four.

Mr. RICHARDSON: But the Acting Prime Minister dealt with that phase of the question so ably and so satisfactorily that I hesitate to refer to it again. It indicated, however, the trend of the hon. gentleman's mind: the West is getting a lot; why should not the East? Why should not Quebec get its share? He indicated that the construction of these railroads might be used for political purposes.

Mr. BUREAU Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON Well, that shows that in the mind of the hon. gentleman and perhaps in other gentlemen's minds—possibly in my good friend's (Mr. Bureau's) mind, in view of his "hear, hear"—there is the idea that the construction of railroads should be used for political purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: That is against my idea.

Mr. RICHARDSON; Now, in God's name —and I take His name on my lips with reverence—surely the time has come when that kind of thing should be eliminated from the life of the country. Surely a new era is dawning. Surely the idea of service must take the place of the idea of political patronage or political power. At any rate, if that is not in the minds of members of the House, it is in the minds of the people. The people are beginning to understand the significance of the railway question. The member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) said that he had grown tired of hearing about this railroad question.

Mr. CANNON: I did not say that I was tired; I said that the people were tired of the way this Government was handling the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am prepared to accept my hon. friend's statement, although if he refers to Hansard I think he will find that he used that language. However, I do not wish to attribute to him anything that he did not say. But my point is that the people that he refers to will be a great deal more tired before they are through with this railway question. It is the most important issue so far as the economic interests of the country are concerned. I scarcely think that it takes second place to the tariff—though possibly the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) will not agree with me on that. The railway question affects in a vital sense the interests of the people; it affects them to the extent of millions yearly. If you increase the rates, just see what it costs. The Canadian Pacific has built up an enormous surplus. Why was it able to do so? As Sir John Willison said, what the country did for the Canadian Pacific was the most insane bargain ever entered into by a free people. We gave them sufficient subsidies to build and equip the line two or three times over; no wonder they are in a specially good position to take care of themselves. The Canadian Pacific was endowed in oriental fashion and the Government is blamed if it deals with the publicly-owned system in a reasonably generous way. In my judgment, there is only one way in which this matter can be dealt with and that is by the method that the Government have adopted. As I sat here to-night, having advocated public ownership for thirty years, it was an inspiring incident to me to find that at last the chief members of the Government were strongly in favour of that principle. Public ownership is nothing new, as might be inferred from the words of the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe). It is successful in the glorious country from which his ancestors come—France. I hesitate to quote Germany, but there the Government-owned railway system pays five per cent on the capital invested, and according to an article which I read in a magazine some time ago, four-fifths of the people travel at half-a-cent a mile because they have first, second, third and fourth classes. The Australasian colonies own all their railways. Switzerland, the most progressive republic in Europe, owns its railroads; Hungary owns its railroads, why should not Canada own its own railroads? Public ownership is the only system that can be followed; it has been forced upon the people. Such regulations must be enforced and the capitalization must be so limited that failure will be impossible. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company know that an efficient system can be created by the co-ordination of services, and that the people will be very friendly to their own system. I admire as much as does the Acting Prime Minister the way that the Canadian Pacific is managed and operated, and the ability of its staff. We must make of the Canadian National railways a system which will appeal to the people just as strongly as does the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the minister willing to act upon the agreement which we have had all along to adjourn at eleven o'clock?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not at all anxious that we sit late, but I do not think it is unreasonable to ask that we pass this one clause which we have been discussing all day, and take the Bill up again on Monday.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister must not forget that the Acting Prime Minister took up an hour and a quarter of the time of the Committee, the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) a few minutes and the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) some little time also. The question of public ownership has been discussed and during that time we have been unable to deal with this particular clause. We did not, therefore, take up all the time of the Committee

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not finding fault with any one. We cannot get away from extending these charters; work has been done on them, and so on. I am not asking that we pass the schedule this evening, but why not pass this clause?

Mr. McKENZIE: I suggest that this section be left out of the Bill; that we go on with the Bill and incorporate the company, and that after the company is incorporated, which I hope will be within a short time, my hon. friend can come back to the House with a separate Bill asking for the revival of these charters. That Bill can then go to the Railway Committee; the officers of the company can be there and explain which of these forty-four charters they want extended or renewed. They may want them all; they may not want any of them. I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be about as effective obstruction as the ingenuity of the human mind could devise. We have discussed all day the renewal of charters that were the possession of companies that are now the property of the Dominion. We have asked now to pass the rest of the Bill, then come to Parliament with the proposal to renew these charters, then go over the resolution, with four or five discussions on that; then have the discussion in committee again; then the third reading—the whole thing duplicated. In a word, we are asked to start back to-night, in so far as all this routine goes, just where we commenced some weeks ago. That is considered a fair proposition by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BUREAU: This is the first intimation we have had of these new roads. I would ask also that the second schedule be printed in Hansard so that we shall have copies of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be printed to-night.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the minister going to have the Bill printed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The schedule will be printed.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What agreement does the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) refer to, that we should adjourn at eleven o'clock at night? That is an agreement we are not all acquainted with, and I should like to suggest to him that it is really only a quarter past ten by the sun. The night is therefore, quite young.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know if my hon. friend would call it an agreement. It was an arrangement between the acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) and myself that was made in the early stages of the session. It was made at his suggestion, not mine.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I suppose my hon. friend will want to get through the session this year. I am not in any hurry and we have had a rather pleasant session so far.

Mr. BUREAU: I am surprised at my hon. friend wanting to be so retrograde. He is generally quite a progressive man.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has been hurled across the floor of the House, very broadly insinuated by the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), and not insinuated at all, but stated, by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomes White), that there was on this side of the House a combination of hon. gentlemen, who represented the Canadian Pacific railway, putting up this obstruction. I can only say that such a statement is absolutely without the slightest foundation in fact and is an insinuation and statement which reflects upon the honour and honesty of men on this side of the House. If the Acting Prime Minister thinks it is to his honour to be a member of a Parliament which is capable of having an Opposition of such a character as he describes, I do not think that is very much to his credit. I am sorry he is not here at present as I wish to tell him that, if my estimation of him would mean anything to him. I am very sorry to have heard him making the heated statements he made to-day. I hope when he reads them in print, he will be sorry for having allowed his passion to carry him away to the extent of branding honourable members on this side as being in the pay of any concern or influenced by any consideration except that of duty to the people. If anybody on that side thinks that was a proper position for the leader of the Government to take, I am very much surprised. A great deal has been said about where and how we stand in regard to this business. Last year there was not a word about this company or this policy, and I wish to put myself right by stating exactly what I said last year when there was not a word about what is being done now. Last year, when the Estimates of the Minister of Railways were before the House, I said, in part, as reported on page 2191 of Hansard:

Mr. McKenzie: It is important for the people that we should have some conception of what we are doing. If this were a meeting of directors it would not be a very cheerful one. The directors and shareholders would have discovered that we were spending away up in the millions in the development and working of the road, but that we have made no money. We are in debt. If we were ordinary directors and shareholders of a road we would have to put our hands down in our pockets to find money in order to make betterments and to run the road, and that would not be a cheerful prospect. However, we are new beginners in this enterprise. I was never in favour of Government ownership.

There can be no mistake about where I stood.

I am not in favour of it now; as I think private enterprise will do better in these matters. Particularly in colonization and development, will private enterprise and private energy do much better than Government ownership.

Now I want to be perfectly plain.

But, by the force of circumstances, we are in this net, and we must stay in it and make the most of it—that is the way I view it.

No mistake about that.

While a great railway like the Canadian Pacific is being conducted privately we have something to compare our works with. It would be interesting for myself as a citizen of Canada and a member of this House to know how our expenses per mile of operation, for merely running the road, compare with the expenses of the Canadian Pacific. It would be interesting to know how our expenses for betterments, for keeping the road in repair, for rolling stock and all other requirements compare with those of the Canadian Pacific. Everybody admits that their road is well managed and that it is well equipped. It is making money. It is in the same country side by side with ours, and there is no reason why we should not have just as brainy and as capable men to run our road as they have. I would expect the Minister of Railways to come to this House and make a favourable comparison between his railway and the privately owned line and to be able to show that he is making money.

Surely hon. gentlemen will do me the credit of believing that I was stating my honest mind at that time. This Bill was not in sight; nobody was thinking about it. I am in exactly the same position now as I was then. If I had my own way, we would not have this road at all. But we have it, and my position is that we must make the most and the best of it. My best evidence is what I said before, and I have not changed one iota. I am anxious that this road should be administered in the best possible manner and not be encumbered by old things. I am sure my good friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) is one of those men who do not want to have this new enterprise loaded down with unnecessary baggage of Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am with you heartily.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is not in the West a man who wants this enterprise handicapped by enterprises of Mackenzie and Mann which were a failure from start to finish as regards making a success of railways, and I am opposed to loading down this new enterprise with 44 enterprises of Mackenzie and Mann, of which we know nothing and which may contain entanglements that are going to be an everlasting difficulty for this concern. My good friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) shakes his head. He may find nothing in it whether he shakes it or not. I know that I am safe on this ground anyhow, that we have all the machinery necessary for building a road by the Government in any part of the West or any part of Canada where they think, in their best judgment, it is advisable to build it. We have this Bill which we are putting through, section 23 of which says that we can construct railways wherever we like. We have the old Railway Act which is made applicable to this section except where it is inconsistent with this Bill. We have a distinct Government Railways Act, and all we have to do is to add two lines to this section of the Bill saying that the Government Railway Act will apply. Then, we have in the hands of the company all the powers and privileges of the Government Railways Act with all the other legislation we have. With all that machinery and all those powers, why should we go to the graveyards of the west to resurrect those old carcasses of Mackenzie and Mann enterprises? If these unwholesome, unseemly carcasses are to be resurrected and brought into this House we should have them put in a room by themselves where we should not all be compelled to inhale the unsavoury mess. I am not hampering this enterprise or the men to be appointed. I have met Mr. Hanna a few times, and I hope he will be on this new enterprise; I think he is a gentleman of large views and great capacity. But, apart from him, let me tell the Government in all honesty that the people of this country do not want to carry all the baggage of Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about Mr. Hamilton?

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Immigration will look after him. I understand that a life annuity of some kind is being provided for that gentleman, who was the minister's opponent. I think I have made perfectly clear why I am opposed to the resurrecting all these useless Acts of incorporation. Why should we tie up this new concern to a charter, with some money belonging to a province in a bank somewhere, and say that it must follow the line laid down by that charter? We do not want to take anybody's money but our own to build this railway. Some machinery can be found by which that money will go to the provinces. That will be better for the provinces. Agreements have been made with Mackenzie and Mann which were not favourable to the people, and if we take over these charters we take over the agreement with them; we take over the locations, and all the encumbrances imposed upon the people by Mackenzie and Mann. We know nothing about these charters, we have not a syllable of information about them. And we are said to be disloyal, obstructionists, and in the pay of the Canadian Pacific simply because we do not want these agreements foisted upon the Canadian people without knowing something about them. It is well known that some of these charters have been dead for ten years. Is it reasonable to suppose that we, the representatives of the people, will sit here and give our "Amen" to legislation of that kind of which we are entirely ignorant and about which hon. gentlemen opposite can tell us nothing? I say: Go on with your Bill, incorporate your company, and get the men who know all about these things—Mr. Hanna knows all about them—to come before a special committe, and I pledge myself that there will be no opposition to putting through the legislation in the most expeditious way possible, if Mr. Hanna says it is necessary to have these charters, and that they will be in the interests of the people of the West and the national railway system.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will scarcely escape or enable his party to escape from the position in which he has allowed them to be led, and indeed has led them, through the whole course of this day, by the speech which he has just delivered.

Mr. McKENZIE: The day is far spent now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And little has been done, and the hon. gentleman is responsible, and those that sit around him. He resents the imputation that the influence of private corporations is at the back of the opposition to this clause. The events will speak for themselves. The speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite speak for themselves. The speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve speaks for itself, and is doubtless well known to the country by this time. He did not take the ground that charters were encumbrances. Nobody in this Parliament or any other ever suggested that idea. Charters entail no obligations, charters are rights which may be exercised or not as the company, under the approval of Government and Parliament, determine them to be wise. To describe them as "obligations," and "carcasses," and "baggage," and "wrecks," is to assume that the hon. members are children or fools. Charters are rights. We know they are rights; we know they are not encumbrances. The country knows they are rights, and the country knows that there is some reason for this opposition to charter rights being granted to the Canadian National railway system. The hon. member for Maisonneuve was quite clear. He said that he was opposed to them for one reason, because if they were assumed by the Canadian National Railway System, which originally held them—and no one else held them—they would not be at the disposal of private corporations. Those words have a clear meaning; no one can mistake them. They would not be at the disposal of private corporations. But I do not attach so much weight to words as I do to deeds.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I never said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell me what he said?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will explain for the third time what I said. When we were discussing clause 20 my hon. friend announced to the Committee that he had a list or schedule containing forty-four charters to be revived by that clause. I said: Now the Government does not intend to build those railways—my hon. friend himself said the Board did not intend to build those railways, and that he only wanted to revive the charters. I said: This is a blank collective charter that you are giving to forty-four subsidiary lines of the Canadian Northern, and when these railways are needed, the charters will prevent private corporations or the provinces from building those railways where they are needed. I blamed the Government for putting a blank collective charter in the hands of the Board when the Government did not intend to build.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has stated his position precisely as I stated it, only in a lot more words.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. Be honest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would prevent private corporations from building on charters which constituents of the Canadian National Railways own, and which we now seek to own.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose you do not build.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One sure fact is that we cannot build unless we revive the charters. If the hon. member is afraid of our not building, let him put us to the test by reviving the charters.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister say he cannot build without these charters?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do. Until these charters are revived we cannot build as this Bill will pass. Is that clear enough? I repeat, I do not attach so much weight to words as I do to deeds. Here we have sat all day asking that a clause pass which merely approves of the revival of charters fixed in a schedule, while that schedule itself awaits the consideration of this Committee and may be amended by this Committee by the striking out of any charter right embodied in it. We simply ask the Committee to affirm in general the revival of charters, leaving the specific charters to the further determination of the Committee. While that is all we ask, we are faced all day with a stubborn opposition, and here at midnight we are told that this simple clause cannot pass after all this consideration. Is the country to draw no inference? What inference can it draw?

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not know, but I am afraid the country knows.

Mr. BUREAU: Make allowance for the time you spent in discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will not allow one clause to pass which merely asserts that the Canadian National Railways may revive charters, when he himself knows, as do all hon. members, that the Committee is at liberty to say later on what charters may be revived.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think my hon. friend is all wrong. It is wrong to ask us to revive forty-four charters, saying that later on he is going to pare them down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows that we did not say we would pare anything down. When the schedule to this clause is considered, which it must be when all the clauses are through, this Committee may take out any one of these charters or all of them, or may add to the list. In the face of that, and knowing that he commits himself to no single charter by the passing of this clause, he asserts that he cannot let this clause go through. What must be the judgment of the country on that attitude?

Mr. McKENZIE: I leave nothing to inference. I have stated absolutely and clearly what my position is this year and what my position was last year. I care not what suggestion the minister may make as to what inference the country may draw.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take the hon. gentleman's position and I believe that it is one of opposition to Government ownership. His opinion of Government ownership might lead him to criticise this Bill. I am free to admit that he is opposed to Government ownership, and he can stand or fall before the country on that. He has not been at all equivocal on that point. But because he is opposed to Government ownership, is that any explanation of why he should refuse to let the Committee vote on a simple clause of this Bill the only intent of which is the revival of specific charters which are still awaiting the consideration of the Committee? Is that the necessary corollary of his disbelief in the principle of Government ownership? It has no relation to it whatever. I still await an explanation of why the hon. gentleman cannot allow this clause to pass after a whole day's deliberation.

Mr. BUREAU: The amendment reads:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act which any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern system were authorized to construct, are hereby extended for two years and five years respectively after the passing of this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And we will submit these charters when the schedule is under consideration and they can then be dealt with

Mr. BUREAU: After the clause is passed you have revived for from two to five years every line of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subject to consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: There is absolutely no restriction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman knows right well that the schedule can be amended when we come to its consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not discussing that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say that the schedule cannot be amended, abbreviated or extended when we come to its consideration?

Mr. BUREAU: I am not under cross-examination; I am reading the amendment drafted by my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why will the hon. gentleman not answer the question?

Mr. BUREAU: I am not answering questions; I am putting a question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can answer it myself.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman drafted the law and has to stand by it. The section as proposed to be amended provides that:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this Act—are hereby extended.

You cannot separate the clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not need to separate the clause.

Mr. BUREAU: These extensions are all granted without being mentioned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; when the schedule is complete the whole thing is complete, but until the schedule is complete, it is not finally settled. As long as the hon. gentleman admits that when we come to the consideration of the schedule he can decide whether any or all of those contained in the schedule shall be allowed to remain. Then the passing of this clause does not commit us finally to the adoption of the whole schedule.

Mr. BUREAU: Mr. Chairman, you ruled this afternoon that the schedule was to be considered last. I claim this cannot meet the case that we are considering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The cases are the same.

Mr. BUREAU: My contention is that we base our opinion as to whether we ought to pass this or not on the schedule itself, and we decide whether the charters mentioned therein deserve or do not deserve to be revived or extended. My hon. friend cannot argue that after we have revived all these charters by passing section 20 we can go back and strike out any from the schedule that we do not approve of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not worded any differently from any other clause that refers to a schedule.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not care how it is worded.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say I cannot find him a case where the very same wording has been used referring to a schedule, adopting it and where the schedule has not been amended?

Mr. BUREAU And the schedule omitted?

Mr. MEIGHEN The schedule not omitted, but considered afterwards, and amended?

Mr. BUREAU: It might not be an identical case.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of the Interior seems to be very anxious about the opinions of the country on our attitude towards the Bill. If he is so anxious he might go up to North Ontario, open that constituency and see how the people of Ontario, where they have the hydro-electric—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VIEN: We have heard from the treasury benches insinuations which are hardly in keeping with the high offices of the gentlemen who have offered them. We have heard the insinuation that the interest we take in this matter is absolutely simulated. These are the exact words used by the Acting Prime Minister—that we are not trying to safeguard the interests of the people, but that we were simulating. He made another statement which to my mind is as unfortunate—that the gentlemen on this side of the House, when speaking on this matter, were actuated only by the purpose of fostering private interests and particularly the interests of the Canadian Pacific. He also accused the Opposition of unduly delaying the enactment of this clause. The hon. member (Mr. Richardson), speaking after him, said that we were opposed to the extension of time which this clause purports to give for the construction of various branch lines. These insinuations are absolutely unwarranted. The Opposition has a right, and it is its duty, to carefully study the measures brought down by the Government, particularly when we are in Committee of the Whole. This is not the first time in which it has been said that this country had been overburdened with duplicated railway lines. In the Drayton-Acworth report attention is drawn to the fact that we had duplicated railway lines. The Acting Prime Minister in his remarks said that we had overbuilt railways in Canada and that several lines overlap. And yet in the presence of the Drayton-Acworth Report accusing both parties of having overbuilt railways in the presence of the Prime Minister's statement to the effect that lines had been duplicated and were overlapping, the Minister of Railways lays on the Table a schedule which proposes a blanket authorization for forty-four branch lines. We are not objecting to the construction of these lines; we are simply going into the matter carefully.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VIEN: Some hon. members laugh, but if they will recall what has been said in the House to-day they will realize that the discussion has not been confined to the discussion of clause 20, or of the schedule annexed to it. When the Acting Prime Minister complained that the Opposition was delaying the enactment of this clause he might better have directed his complaints to the Dominion Day patriotic and political rambling of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). But no, he only had bouquets to offer to that hon. gentleman, giving further ground for the suspicion that political action is contemplated here, and that this section is brought in only for political purposes. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very sensitive to the imputation that they are not always actuated by public interest, and yet they have the effrontery to suggest that we are actuated by other motives. There should be no surprise at the Opposition asking quite a few questions before giving a blanket authorization to build forty-four branch lines. The members of the ministry have had ample time to peruse what that schedule contains, but we on this side have not had the same opportunity. We simply ask the Minister of Railways to allow the clause to stand until we have had a chance to discover what it actually means.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would like to make an explanation with reference to the schedule which I handed in. Originally it was contemplated to renew all the charters but hon. genlemen opposite declared that they wanted the charters specified. I therefore asked the Departmental Solicitor to give me a list of the lines on which it was necessary for us to do work this year. He complied with my request, and that in the schedule which has been so much discussed, relating to undertakings that will have to go through this year. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask for time to consider the schedule, and the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) doubts whether if this clause were passed it would not also mean the adoption of the schedule. Let me assure my hon. friends that if the clause is passed, when we come to deal with the schedule each of the forty-four railways can be considered separately if so desired. I mention that so that my hon. friends will see we are not endeavouring to force anything through. I would ask them to let the clause pass, so that we may consider we have done some business to-day. It is only one out of thirty clauses, and I ask that we be allowed to take the vote on it, with the understanding that the schedule be considered in detail when we come to take it up.

Mr. VIEN: I would point out to the minister that if we pass clause 20 we admit the principle.

Mr. CALDER: With respect to the list of charters, I can claim to know the railway situation in the province of Saskatchewan, because I was Minister of Railways there for five years. Many of these charters were originally granted by the Saskatchewan Government, and I know exactly the position in regard to them. As a matter of fact the construction of a number of these railways will be proceeding very soon, and it is absolutely necessary to have these charters renewed. The Canadian National Railway Company will actually be at work on some of them in the course of a few weeks, so that it is imperative that the principle embodied in this section should be adopted by the House. As the Minister of Railways has said, when the time comes for the consideration of the schedule there will be the fullest opportunity to discuss every one of these lines, and if it is thought necessary or advisable to strike out any of the projected railways, well and good. So far as the twenty or thirty lines in the province of Saskatchewan are concerned, I am acquainted with the situation and I can say that no single one of those charters can be dropped. I daresay the same holds true of the remaining sections.

Mr. VIEN: It is very possible that when the clause and the schedule are closely examined we might not find any cause of objection to them. If the schedule is going to be scrutinized in detail at a later date, surely there can be no objection to letting the clause itself stand until the next sitting of the House, so as to allow us to fully digest its provisions. In that way, we may save much of the Committee's time, and probably facilitate the ultimate passage of both the clause and the schedule. Both practically mean the same thing, and if we approve of one we surely approve of the other.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the House ready for the question.

Mr. VIEN: No. If the minister is not willing to agree to that, we are willing to go on.

Mr. J. D. REID: All right.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want anything that might appear like unreasonable delay. The Minister of Colonization and Immigration expressed himself as having personal knowledge of these charters. It must not be understood for one moment that we want to do anything that will delay the building of necessary roads, but he must give me credit for the position I take. These are local charters granted by the legislature of Saskatchewan.

Mr. CALDER: Some of them.

Mr. McKENZIE: Those with which he is particularly familiar were charters granted by the legislature of Saskatchewan. The position that I want to impress upon the minister is that the people of Saskatchewan are surer of getting their roads built when the Dominion Government undertakes to build them. Mackenzie and Mann, who are behind these charters, cannot build those roads.

Mr. CALDER: May I interrupt my hon. friend? The local company to which the charters were originally granted by the province of Saskatchewan have since been amalgamated with the Canadian Northern Railway system, and those charters do not now belong to that local company, they belong to the parent company, because amalgamation has since taken place.

Mr. J. D. REID: They belong now to us.

Mr. CALDER: And as they now belong to the parent company, practically all the charters belong to the Government itself.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is exactly the position I take and which the hon. gentleman does not seem to comprehend. Those smaller companies went into the parent company. All right, let us admit that. The parent company, nolens volens, went into the hands of the Government, and the Government is creating a piece of machinery to work the whole thing under Government control through this company that it creates. Now, I may be the dullest man in this House, but I do not see any further necessity for those old charters. I submit that we have sufficient machinery in legislation to go on with these works and do everything that is necessary to construct the railways, if we have the money to construct, and incorporate them in this company when they are built. I have not been in any way satisfied that the carrying forward of those old companies is necessary. If I were convinced to the contrary I would be only too happy to take them over. So far as I can see, by taking them over we are only binding ourselves to carry out the agreements made by those companies, about which we know nothing, and lots of complications may ensue—in fact some have already been mentioned. If we are going to build those roads under Government supervision, for the Canadian people, let us do so absolutely free from any entanglements whatsoever. That is all I want. If the Minister of Colonization can show me that it is necessary to keep alive those old concerns which are amalgamated now in the parent company—and we are replacing that parent company by this legislation—I shall be happy to accept his view; but it seems to me like a man buying a new automobile and tying his old one behind it; he cannot go anywhere in his new automobile without towing the old one. Our opposition is not in the least factious, indeed, our only desire is that this legislation shall be put through in the best possible way.

Mr. CALDER: I quite realize the stand taken by the leader of the Opposition in reference to the number of these lines, and I think there should be the fullest opportunity given to the House to know exactly what the position is in the case of every one of these charters. They are not all the same. All that is asked for in this section is simply an extension of the time within which these lines shall be built. Let me give a very simple example of what the situation is with regard to one of them, and it will apply to others I know very well. We gave a charter for the building of a line from Yorkton to Craven, just north of Regina; about 46 or 47 miles of that line is now built ending out in the prairie; at the other end there is about eight miles built; bonds have been issued and much of the money has been spent; there may be some money remaining, but the only company in the world that can take up and complete that line is the Canadian Northern. There are a number of other lines in Saskatchewan in exactly the same position. I repeat again, all that is asked for at the present time is to place the railway company in a position where it can proceed with some of those lines, which must be undertaken and completed within a comparatively short time. That is the only principle involved in this section. When we come to the schedule many of the matters that have been referred to by the leader of the Opposition and other hon. members will be open for discussion, and if thought advisable, any of the lines referred to in the schedule may be struck out. But I can see no reason why the principle of this section should not be adopted.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would like to explain another matter to the leader of the Opposition. He made the statement that if this Bill passes the Government can build a railway at any place in Canada without coming to Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: With the approval of the Governor in Council under section 23.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; and that is one of the reasons why there is so much opposition to the Bill. I mentioned yesterday and I want to repeat again in case the hon. gentleman may have overlooked my statement, that the position is this: We cannot possibly go on with the construction of the railways we are asking for unless we have the charters renewed. I agree with the hon. member that we could strike out this clause altogether if section 23 were passed in its present form, but I mentioned yesterday that when we come to deal with that section, I was going to amend it in a way that would change it entirely. I have the amendment here and if it would not be out of order I would like to read it and give the information now. The hon. member will then see that so far as the Canadian National railways are concerned we cannot go on with any lines other than those enumerated in the schedule without coming to Parliament and getting a charter in the regular way. The only way the Government can build railways without getting a charter is by putting an item in the Estimates; and that item must be passed before construction can be proceeded with. I intend to ask the committee to amend section 23 by inserting after the word "description" in the eighth line thereof, the following words:

> In respect of the construction whereof respectively Parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities.

That would mean that if we wanted to construct new lines we would have to put an amount in the Estimates for that purpose. Another way would be for Parliament to authorize the Government to guarantee the bonds of the new line, and to sell the bonds. But in either case we could not proceed with the construction of any new lines other than those mentioned in this schedule without coming to Parliament. With the assurance that section 23 is to be amended in this way, that these railway charters must be extended, and that each railway will be considered separately when we come to the schedule, surely it is not unfair to ask that a vote be taken on section 20 before we adjourn.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the objection to letting the section stand until we reach the schedule?

Mr. VIEN: We should have some information before this clause is adopted. How many branch lines for which charters have been given or in respect of which construction powers have been obtained from Provincial Governments are dropped from the schedule? What branch line among those mentioned have been subsidized as to construction by Provincial Governments or other governments, and in what way can we revive their charters? How can we revive them when authority for the construction has been granted by provincial statute?

Mr. CALDER: When we acquired the Canadian Northern Railway we took over those lines which were part of that system.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

The Dominion Government stands simply in the position of the Canadian Northern; the position of the provinces has not been altered. The provinces have guaranteed the principal and interest on those bonds, and if there is a default the provinces could be called upon.

Mr. VIEN: Does not the province guarantee the interest on the bonds provided the construction is commenced and finished within a certain time?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: Then how could Parliament extend the time of construction and revive a provincial charter?

Mr. CALDER: Our legislation provided for the amalgamation of these lines with the parent company. Since that amalgamation took place these lines ceased to be provincial lines and became Federal lines.

Mr. VIEN: We were led to believe this afternoon that in several instances provincial grants have been given by way either of money grant or of bond guarantee, and that unless we revived the construction power those subsidies would be lost or the guarantee of bonds become void. We are now asking ourselves: In what way can a law of this kind revive a provincial statute, even if these branch lines have been incorporated with a system which has been taken over by the Government? The fact that the Canadian Government has taken over the Canadian Northern does not give to Parliament the right to extend the time of construction mentioned in a provincial statute.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, it does. If the hon. member has been in the Railway Committee he will understand the situation. When a railway that has a provincial charter asks this Parliament that it be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada that makes it a Dominion charter and if the road is to be further extended, this Parliament is the only authority to grant that extension. That brings the road under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. When we took the Canadian Northern Railway system over, all those provincial lines were declared in the Act to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and, therefore, this Parliament is the only legislative assembly that can extend the time for construction.

Mr. VIEN: Will this extension, even if it is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, have the effect of maintaining the guarantee of bonds, or the subsidies offered by the provincial authorities?

Mr. J. D. REID: It would, but as regards the construction of roads on which provincial guarantees have been given, the only action we could take in connection with those guarantees would be to use in construction any money that is now in the banks from the sale of bonds. Bonds have not been sold for the whole construction of the roads. Supposing in the Canadian Northern Railway Company there was a charter, with the bonds guaranteed by a Provincial Government, for a hundred miles. If we have constructed 25 miles, it is not the intention of the Government to say to the Provincial Government: You have guaranteed bonds, and although we own the road, we want you to guarantee the bonds on the further 75 miles. This Government will furnish the bonds as regards any further construction of such lines.

Mr. VIEN: Would it not be fair for the Government to ask the provinces to live up to the guarantees they had given of bonds of those branch lines? Would it not also be fair to ask the provinces which are going to benefit from the construction of those lines, to give the Federal Government the same advantages that they would have given to a private corporation?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Committee might argue on that point, but I would not consider it fair. If the Canadian National railways are going to construct fifty miles of those lines that we are to complete, and are going to issue bonds in the name of the Canadian National Railways, or practically of the Dominion Government, I do not think the hon. member would suggest that we should ask the local Government to guarantee those bonds, because it is only right that they should be guaranteed by the Government that owns and constructs the railway.

Mr. VIEN: There are a number of other questions which we are going to put to the Government as to the construction of those branch lines, not with any purpose of unduly obstructing their construction or the authority to construct them, but simply to do our duty to the country, because, in view of what has already been said as to duplication of lines, we should not be asked to give a blanket authorization. It would expedite the matter if the clause were allowed to stand with the schedule, and then the whole thing will pass as soon as we have had an opportunity to go into it carefully.

Mr. J. D. REID: We cannot pass the clause and schedule together; we would have to come back and pass this clause again. When we come to the schedule there are practically 44 clauses to pass, because each railway in the schedule can be taken up separately, and I shall have officials here to give all information in connection with each one. If the Committee feels that any charter should not be extended, we can just strike it out. The passing of this clause does not pass the schedule of the 44 railways. We must, however, renew the charters, and, therefore, I think it is not unfair to ask the House to pass this clause.

Mr. VIEN: It is not logical to pass a clause which gives to the Government authorization to build the various railways mentioned in the schedule. If we are not prepared to pass the schedule, we should not be prepared to pass the clause, because the schedule is practically embodied in the clause.

Mr. BUREAU: Who owns the real estate on the townsites along those lines which are mentioned in schedule 2 and the charters of which we are asked to revive?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am informed there are no townsites yet where the railways are intended to be built.

Mr. BUREAU: There may not be towns, but have not townsites been chosen? Have the locations of the stations not been determined upon? Who owns the property round the proposed sites of the stations?

Mr. J. D. REID: Where the railways are not built, we do not own anything yet. If we decide to construct the lines, we shall have to buy whatever property we require.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not speaking about the right of way, but about the station sites. It is spoken of openly that Mackenzie and Mann own property all along that line, and that the object of reviving those particular charters, one of which is located in each of the counties of Saskatchewan and Alberta, is two-fold—first, to induce the electorate to support the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and second, to allow Mackenzie and Mann to speculate on the properties when the charters are revived. We may just as well let that cat out of the bag. The Canadian Pacific are not behind the matter in this instance.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister not answer the question?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know who owns the property. We would have to buy land for the right of way.

Mr. BUREAU: The committee should have that information.

Mr. J. D. REID: We shall come to it when we come to the railways in the schedule.

Mr. BUREAU: If we admit the principle of the thing, when we come to the railways in the list, as usual when we come to the end of a Bill, that will be brushed aside with a wave of the hand. If the minister will tell us how much land the Mackenzie and Mann interests own there, and how much of it is going to be traversed by these railways, we shall be able to discuss the matter in a more intelligent manner.

Mr. CAHILL: What mileage was built last year? I understand there was some construction.

Mr. J. D. REID: The solicitor tells me that there was no construction last year.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Immigration and Colonization a few moments ago made the statement that it is absolutely necessary that charters should be extended in this way for the reason that spring was coming and in a few days, presumably, the contractors would be able to go on with construction, which was necessary. I would ask whether the Government did not expect two months ago to have this Bill before Parliament, and if so, why did not they ask for an extension of the charters before the Railway Committee in the usual way? Instead of that, they bring down a Bill prepared by Mr. Lash, and the Acting Prime Minister waxes eloquent over public ownership. Now Mr. Lash is not generally known throughout Canada or Ontario as a great advocate of public ownership; neither is Mr. Hanna, nor Mr. Wood, nor Mr. Mitchell, nor any of the other gentlemen at the head of this undertaking.

Mr. COWAN: What difference does that make?

Mr. CAHILL: All the difference in the world. It means that the Government, instead of giving public ownership a fair and honest chance, are handling it through Mackenzie and Mann, Lash, Hanna, Mitchell, Wood, and the same old gang that has been reaping the harvest from this country for years. Now that it is proposed to construct lines, I presume the Northern Construction Company will come in for some forty-odd construction contracts. Or will the Government let the contracts to the lowest bidder in the usual way, or on a cost-plus basis? The cost-plus basis seems to be the favourite plan of the Minister of Railways. The Government might also tell us whether they expect this railway will be run in a businesslike way, or whether it expects to hand out to it several million dollars a year from the treasury. The Minister of Railways stated in the House a few days ago that the surplus earnings over operating expenses were $3,000,000. Am I correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: The net earnings were $3,000,000 odd.

Mr. CAHILL: And the gross deficit $7,000,000. Would the Minister say how he arrives at his figures? There are $470,000,000 odd of bonds on which interest has to be paid, and it is a fair assumption that the rate will not be less than 4 per cent, which brings the interest to $18,800,000. Now if you deduct the surplus earnings of $3,000,000 from $18,800,000, you have a deficit of $15,800,000. Is not that correct? Where does the Government expect to get with this undertaking when they make such ridiculous statements—statements that are out of all proportion and absolutely against reason and common sense? One member of the Government tells us that we are hopelessly in debt and face a deficit of $100,000,000. Another member of the Government tells us that we have increased our national wealth since the war began. The only way in which our wealth has been increased since the war began is by the Minister of Finance grinding out with his printing press treasury bills and Dominion notes, departing in the first instance from sound finance, in order to pay the Canadian Northern Railway. Why will not the minister explain how he arrives at his figures?

Mr. ROWELL: Because it has absolutely nothing to do with the clause under discussion, and would only help you to consume more of the time of the House.

Mr. CAHILL: Why did the hon. member make the statement if it was irrelevant to the question? My question was based on his statement. Well, we are going on with this great undertaking with one member of the Government telling us one thing, and another member another. Where do we expect to get in view of that kind of thing? The minister came down here yesterday with this Bill, and the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) was opposed to changing one single letter of it; he would not even name the head office. But suddenly, to-day, without any apparent reason, he slips in this amendment concerning forty-four branch lines. Now there are fifty seats in Western Canada, six of them in cities, and forty-four in the rural districts. I have not had an opportunity of looking at this amendment, and the minister asks us to empower the Government to build, I presume, one line of railway in every one of those forty-four rural constituencies.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Is the hon. gentleman opposed to the building of these branch lines in Western Canada?

Mr. CAHILL: I want to know where they are to be built. I am not as willing as my hon. friend to swallow this thing holus-bolus.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I have looked through the schedule of the lines in the province of Alberta, and six or seven of the eighteen lines are already under construction and serving the people.

Mr. CAHILL: Why does not the Government give the Committee full information? We are getting more enlightenment from the back benches than from the front, and may get somewhere if the back benchers will continue to enlighten us.

Mr. BOYS: Do you not accept the word of the Minister of Railways that when the schedule is reached you will be able to discuss all these charters?

Mr. CAHILL: I never heard of it.

Mr. BOYS: It has been stated on his honour that all these charters can be discussed then.

Mr. CAHILL: When the minister is proposing a Bill he always refers to his Estimates and says: That is the place to ask questions. When we come to his Estimates, he says: Why not discuss this on the Bill?

Mr. KEEFER Did you not hear the Minister of Railways say that there will be a full opportunity to take these matters into consideration when we come to deal with the schedule, and did you not hear the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) say the same thing?

Mr. CAHILL: What is the sense of passing the section if we have to go back and discuss it again?

Mr. BOYS: What is the objection to the course suggested and guaranteed by the minister?

Mr. CAHILL: What is the question?

Mr. BOYS: He says that when you come to the schedule you will get an opportunity of discussing every one of these charters and that the officials will be here and lay before the Committee all the information the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the necessity of passing this clause if you are going to deal with the schedule later on? Why not discuss this question in the Railway Committee where it belongs and where each of us can ask the officers any questions we wish to put to them?

Mr. BOYS: In the practice of the House, I do not think a Government Bill goes to the Railway Committee.

Mr. CAHILL: This is not a Government Bill; the minister is organizing a company.

Mr. BOYS: It is a Bill introduced by the Government.

Mr. CAHILL: The Government will not even audit the accounts. They are simply handing it over to Mackenzie and Mann to look after.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Is the hon. gentleman aware that nearly every one of these charters is a provincial one and not under federal control in so far as extension is concerned?

Mr. CAHILL: That is also news to me, and I am thankful for it. If the Government will give us the information we are looking for we will find out something about the Bill eventually.

Mr. BOYS: What information do you really want?

Mr. CAHILL: I have asked the Minister of Railways several times why not go to the Railway Committee?

Mr. BOYS: The answer is that it is not the practice of this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg pardon; I was in Parliament when the National Transcontinental Railway Bill was introduced and it went direct to the Railway Committee.

Mr. BOYS: I think the hon. gentleman will agree that it is not the practice of the House to refer Government Bills to the Railway Committee. Although that may have been true on a former occasion, it has not been the practice since this Government has been in office

Mr. LEMIEUX: I gave you one instance.

Mr. CAHILL: This is in no sense a Government Bill. Are the Government going to take power to build branch lines any where they like, as they are doing by this Bill and holding it out as a bait to the western members, telling them that if they do not support this Government they will not get these roads, but if they do they will get them instead of tariff reduction? If the Government were honest with the Opposition and with their supporters they would have come down with a statement showing what these lines were and where they proposed to build them. Do you expect us to sanction the building of forty-odd railway extensions without knowing where they are?

Mr. MORPHY: They are all set out in the schedule.

Mr. CAHILL: Where is the schedule?

Mr. MORPHY: Every member of the House has it.

Mr. CAHILL: It has not even been distributed yet. You may have received one but you are closer to the treasury benches than I am.

Mr. MORPHY: The leader of the Opposition has one.

Mr. McKENZIE: I just got it now. It was not given to me but I borrowed it from somebody else.

Mr. BOYS: The hon. member for Three Rivers had it two hours ago.

Mr. CAHILL: I am afraid I will have to ask you, Mr. Chairman, to keep order. The Government are obstructing so much that we are unable to get information. I am quite willing to answer any question that any member wishes to put to me.

Mr. KEEFER: Will you answer it correctly and fairly?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member has no business to put a question of that kind.

Mr. CAHILL: I will agree to answer any question just as honestly as any member on that side and much more honestly than my hon. friend.

Mr. KEEFER: You are not really desiring to kill time?

Mr. CAHILL: Hon. gentlemen are obstructing again. Surely these hon. gentlemen do not expect this debate to be carried on here with a number of officials around that we cannot ask questions of. The Government will have to turn to each of these officials and get them to answer the questions we put. I would like to take the schedule, go to a railway map and see where these lines are proposed to be constructed. Instead of asking us to swallow forty-four lines to be built throughout Western Canada without regard to where they are to be built or their mileage, the Government should consent to a reference of this Bill to the Railway Committee. On the first discussion of this subject the minister made the statement that the directors were temporary. He said he wanted to divorce the railway management as far as possible from politics and the Government. Now he comes back and we have a new policy laid down to build forty-four lines. The day before yesterday he said that they had no policy yet because the Government were going to appoint new directors who would be practically independent. Now he comes along and tells us that they propose to build forty-four lines all of which have apparently been sanctioned by these temporary directors. When you remember that the temporary directorate have already arranged to spend $70,000,000 what can we expect from the permanent directorate?

Because that is what is amounts to. Mr. Hanna, according to the press, made the statement the other day that they were going to spend $70,000,000 in the Western country. He may have been wrong in that statement, but the Government have admitted that they are going to build forty-four lines of railway. A few days ago, when asked to make a statement regarding the railway policy of the Government the Minister of Railways said that the present was not the time to give that information, but to wait until the Railway Estimates were being considered. Apparently, notwithstanding that, the Government have decided to build all these lines of railway, but are not willing that we should know anything about it. Therefore this afternoon they slip out a schedule of those lines and then expect us to swallow it. It seems to me that is the most unreasonable proposal that was ever drawn to my attention, I never heard anything like it. If the directors of this company are only temporary directors, and have not decided on any plans, how does the Government come to have such a policy with regard to the construction of these lines?

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Would it relieve the hon. gentleman's mind if I were to assure him that all the lines in the province of Alberta were political lines of the present provincial Government?

Mr. VIEN: Does the hon. gentleman say they are political lines?

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: They are chartered by the Provincial Government of Alberta, which is a Liberal Government, and the elections in many cases have been run on the completion of certain of these lines. I might further say for information of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CAHILL: Now we are getting some light.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS:—that the partner of the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) won two elections on the question of the completion of these lines.

Mr. CAHILL: Whose partner?

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: The partner of the hon. member for Three Rivers.

Mr. CAHILL: Now we are beginning to get some light on the subject. Is it the intention of this Government to supplement the promises of the Alberta Government in order to hold the influence of that Government? We are told that these roads were chartered and promised by the Alberta Government, and we know that that Government, or at least some of its members, supported the Unionist administration at the last election. Is this railway construction the price held out to the Alberta Government so that they may continue to support the present administration? There are some Liberals who have changed their minds. Is this the price held out to some of these Liberals to stand by the present administration?

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is not well posted on the personnel of the Alberta Government

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend (Mr. J. M. Douglas) has given the best reason in the world why we should pause before we pass this clause, and that we should know more with regard to it than we do at present. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) stated a moment ago that it was not the custom for the Government to send any of its Bills to the Railway Committee. But that hon. gentleman fails to remember that the Transcontinental Railway Bill, in 1902 or 1903, was referred to the Railway Committee, and for days Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Messrs. Hays and Wainwright were on the stand answering the questions of members of the Committee who were seeking the fullest information at that time. The schedule which has been so much discussed, carefully typewritten and prepared beforehand by the Government, was handed to the Committee this afternoon without their knowing one word about it. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas) has stated that the charters of these railways are provincial charters which is the best of reasons why we should seek for more information. I do not say that these charters should not be revived, on the contrary I believe they deserve to be, and that the Governments which granted them doubtless acted in good faith and in the interests of the people. But what do I know about the matter? Am I not asked, as a legislator in this House, to revive these charters, and am I not right in demanding from the Government that further details should be vouchsafed in regard to them? This afternoon I asked what mileage the forty-four charters covered, but I received no reply. This evening the Government is asked how many townsites there are along the railway lines covered by these charters, but again we obtain no answer. We now have the best of reasons for demanding more information from the Government, and we shall obtain that information from Mr. Hanna, in whose judgment I have the utmost confidence, if he is called before the Railway Committee of this House.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: Will not the hon. gentleman get more information when the schedule in connection with this Bill is being considered and the railway officials are on the floor of the House to furnish that information ?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That may be, but this clause will then have been passed.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have not occupied much time in the discussion to-day, and I take this opportunity to express some views which I entertain on the subject of this Bill. It is difficult for me to understand why the Government refuses to accept the proposition made that this clause be left over until the next sitting of the House, in order that time may be afforded to thoroughly study its provisions. I fail to see what the Government have to gain by forcing the issue to-night. If the proposition submitted from this side were accepted, all of us would gain more knowledge of the subject and understand more fully what this proposition really involves. Furthermore, the Government might then be disposed to give the information which we have been vainly trying to extract from them since three o'clock yesterday afternoon. I must confess to being astonished at the feeling displayed by the Acting Prime Minister in this discussion. It seems scandalous to me that he should hurl insinuations across the floor and impute motives to His Majesty's loyal Opposition. I personally resent treatment of that kind and I decline to allow him or any one else to impugn my motives in the position that I intend to take in regard to this matter. I must state that from my experience of the Acting Prime Minister I had formed a different estimate of him, and in regard to matters of this kind expected different treatment at his hands. I condemn his unwarranted display of temper and resent it with all the force I can.

I claim that in the matter of loyalty, speaking for myself at least, I take second place to no representative in this House, not even the Acting Prime Minister. In my judgment the discussion to-night is not, as insisted upon by the Acting Prime Minister, a question of public ownership versus private ownership. The attitude assumed by members on this side of the House is an altogether different one. We have no objection whatever to the passing of this Bill, but we certainly insist on our rights in discussing the different clauses stage by stage. One thing that does impress me very forcibly is the fact that we are voting away the powers of the representatives of the people, we are delegating those powers to another body, a body that will be a law unto itself, and the representatives of the people will have absolutely no control over it. I object to this attempt at railway overlapping, overbuilding and financial waste. Although these words were used to-night by the Acting Prime Minister, who went into the subject very extensively, we are being asked to pass a blanket order for the building of forty-four lines of railroad. We have no information from the Government as to the length of those railroads or where they are to be located. We were told by the Acting Minister of Justice this afternoon that all of them were in course of construction with one exception. To my mind that is an extensive proposition for this country to undertake at the present time considering our financial condition, for, as has been stated over and over again, our public debt already amounts to the enormous sum of two billion dollars. If we continue spending money at this rate I cannot see that the prospects of this country are any too bright. We have amongst these railroads, the halt, the lame and the blind, and we have no exact information regarding any one of them. I understand that there is an extensive tract of real estate alongside these railroads in the possession of some person or persons, of whom we have no knowledge, and I would ask the Minister of Railways for some exact information on this subject before I can deal with it intelligently. I would like to know who owns the townsites and lands adjoining these railroads that we are expected to vote on to-night without the slightest definite information.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. BUREAU: No; the hon. member is asking a question.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the minister going to answer it?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not going to answer it.

Mr. PEDLOW: The Minister of Railways refuses to answer a straight question. I would have expected that in order to place hon. members in a position to vote intelligently to-night this information at least would be forthcoming. We want to know who is behind this scheme. We have found so often a nigger in the fence in matters of this kind that we want to locate him. We have been told what a splendid brand of progressive Liberalism there is to the right of the Chairman. If that is the estimate of the Acting Prime Minister of progressive Liberalism we hope it will stay there; but in my judgment it is the kind of Liberalism that is walking backward. During the speech of the Acting Prime Minister the Government supporters were very active—more active than I have seen them yet during this debate, for generally they have sat silent and have made no suggestions of a constructive nature or otherwise in respect to a problem that means so much to this country. It is claimed that it is patriotic for hon. members to support this proposition without question; that is practically the statement of the Acting Prime Minister. To my mind it is rather an unconditional surrender to this new directorate of the rights and privileges of Parliament. I for one object to endorsing any such proposition. Now, Sir, in concluding I would like again to ask the Minister of Railways for the information I have already requested from him, so that we will be able to deal with the subject more intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. BUREAU: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move: that the further consideration of this section be postponed. We will proceed to the consideration of the next section.

Motion agreed to.

On section 21—Agreements with other lines:

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, this evening the leader of the Opposition stated that he and the Acting Prime Minister had reached an understanding that the House would adjourn each night at 11 o'clock. It is now 1 o'clock Saturday morning, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that we on this side have not taken up any more time than hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. Any information that we have had regarding the contentious clause has been given to us, not by the ministers, but by their supporters, and I appeal to whoever is leading the House to live up to the promise made by their own leader, the Acting Prime Minister, and now adjourn.

1 a.m.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 21 carry?

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister not explain this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This section has necessarily been explained during the discussion on the various other sections. It provides for the amalgamation that the leader of the Opposition is so anxious for. Sections 361 and 364 of the Railway Act, referred to in section 21, provide for the amalgamation of one road with another, and this section makes those clauses applicable, subject to the conditions mentioned. It enables the amalgamation of the roads now comprised in the system and mentioned in the schedule, or that hereafter are entrusted to the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. ROBB: I am not going to allow the minister who is leading the House to get away from my question whether the arrangement made between the Acting Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition is to be lived up to.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know of no arrangement of that kind. At all events, surely it is not unfair to ask that in one day we pass one clause out of thirty. The leader of the Opposition has absolutely refused to pass this clause.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not this clause.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know of no such agreement, nor has the Acting Prime Minister stated that there was such an agreement. Under the circumstances, I think we should proceed.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 361 of the Railway Act provides that the agreement of amalgamation shall be submitted to the Board of Railway Commissioners with an application for a recommendation to the Governor in Council for the sanction thereof, and that notice of the proposed application for such recommendation shall be published in the Canada Gazette. Section 21 of this Bill does away with all that, and all that is necessary is the approval of the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should the matter not be made public as provided by section 361 in the case of private companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amalgamation of lines comprised in this system, not of any outside lines, is what is provided for. The only reason for submission to the Railway Commission is in case there should be outside interests. There could be no such outside interest in this case, because the lines are comprised in our system.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the leader of the Government willing to adjourn if we accept section 21?

Mr. MEIGHEN Not at all, section 20 is not through.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a motion to let it stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We were compelled to make it. No thanks are due to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am looking for an adjournment, not for thanks.

Mr. CAHILL: Surely the minister will read to the Committee the section of the Act that I asked him to read. This clause refers to some other Act that we have not under our hand. If the minister would let us adjourn for an hour or two we could go to the library and look it up. The minister said to-day that the forty-four charters that he wants to put into section 20 constitute only a fraction of the total number of companies. This section will give the Governor in Council power to take over any roads that are within the so-called Canadian Northern system. That might include some branch lines that are heavily encumbered and that we do not want at all. It is unreasonable that the Government should ask us to pass a clause that we have had no opportunity of studying.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman has had this Bill on his file for some weeks; therefore he has had an opportunity of studying it.

Mr. CAHILL: It has not been printed for some weeks. The longest-winded resolution ever brought into this or any other House was on the Order Paper for a few days. The Minister of Railways was hopelessly lost in it. He got the assistance of a number of his legal advisers and attempted to interpret the resolution, but absolutely failed; then he said: We will bring in the Bill based on the resolution.

Mr. MORPHY: The first reading of this Bill was on April 11.

Mr. CAHILL: That was a day or two before the Easter recess, and the Bill was taken up on the first day following the recess. How many hon. gentlemen opposite have read the Bill? How many know anything about it? We are asked to pass a clause based on an Act that we have no opportunity of referring to or studying.

Mr. BEST: It has been on the desk of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) for two days.

Mr. CAHILL: I have not seen it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One section the hon. gentleman refers to is a page and one-eighth long; another section is about half a page long. I have given very briefly the contents, but if the hon. member needs more time, the best way to get it is to have the clause stand, and he can read it up between now and Monday. I, therefore, move that further consideration of clause 21 be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

On section 22—power to acquire securities or make or receive advances:

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that section 3 enabling the company to acquire stocks stands. While that section stands, we can hardly consider section 22.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman prefers, I would move that we proceed to the consideration of section 3.

Mr. McKENZIE: That would be absolutely fair.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Cahill.]

On section 3—capital stock:

Mr. CAHILL: The Acting Prime Minister was to make a statement regarding the stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware of the statement the Acting Prime Minister was to make, and I can make it in his absence, namely, that for the purposes of a bond issue, particularly in a foreign market, it is sometimes, indeed, usually advisable, that there should be a stock issue of the road. It would not appear to us to be here a matter of major concern, inasmuch as doubtless the bond issue would be guaranteed. But there might possibly be an issue not guaranteed, in which event the bond investor very frequently looks to a stock issue. That is the purpose of section 3. That is the statement the Acting Prime Minister was to make.

Mr. CAHILL: Is any definite amount of stock proposed to be issued?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no definite determination as to that. I would not feel myself a good judge as to what would likely be the proper amount. The determination would be made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, as circumstances might dictate.

Mr. VIEN: What is meant by the words?

Until otherwise ordered by the Governor in Council.

Would not the stock of the company be always kept in the possession of the Government? I can hardly understand what occasion would warrant the transfer of this stock to anybody else by Order in Council. I do not see much objection in issuing capital stock in this company, although I do not see much use for it, provided the stock is kept in the hands of the Governor in Council for the purposes of the people of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One reason, which would be quite sufficient, would be this. The holders of income convertible bonds have a right to take in exchange stock of the company—I believe one holder has still reserved that right—in which case the Governor in Council might feel that a share or whatever would be the proper amount of this stock, should be transferred to him, should elect to take it instead of his income convertible bonds. Is that clear to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. VIEN: Yes. Would that mean that the Government could not in some cases buy up bonds held by other people? Would the Government be compelled to re-buy bonds issued by the company, and would those bondholders have the right to exact from the Government in exchange for their bonds shares in the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only in the Canadian Northern. The Government could not buy income convertible bonds without the authority of Parliament. This stock is kept simply for the purpose of a possible exchange. The hon. gentleman will see that it is to be held in the name of the Minister of Finance unless the Governor in Council shall otherwise order. The only contingency of which I am advised is that there might be a necessity of making an adjustment with the holder of income convertible bonds.

Mr. CAHILL: This would be new stock for this new company, the Canadian National Railway Company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: So that the Government could not have any agreement with a bondholder as regards the new stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. CAHILL: The Government would have to give him Canadian Northern stock in exchange for the bonds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: That would have no bearing on this company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was this: There is no agreement to give any issue of this stock to anybody. There is an agreement with the old Canadian Northern to exchange income convertible bonds for stock in that company. The Governor in Council might decide that it would be more convenient to offer a bondholder a share of the stock of this company than to have any of the shares of the Canadian Northern outstanding. I do not know whether it would be more convenient or not, because that would depend upon circumstances. This is a mere detail that necessarily should be left to the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAHILL: If it is proposed to issue stock of this company, none of that stock should be let out of the hands of the Government, because it would be a serious mistake to divide up public ownership. The section reads:

> All such stock shall, until otherwise ordered by the Governor in Council, be vested in the Minister of Finance on behalf of His Majesty.

One hundred or one thousand shares might be issued. Those shares should immediately be put into the possession of the Minister of Finance. Does the minister not think the stock should be vested there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As a general rule it should. I will bring the hon. gentleman's advice to the attention of the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand the object of this company is to administer Government railways and to acquire all the stock that is outstanding so that absolute ownership will vest in His Majesty. The clause says that new stock issued by the company shall be vested in the Minister of Finance on behalf of His Majesty, and I do not object to that. The objectionable feature is the one pointed out by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). Why give stock to outsiders if the object is to acquire stock held by outsiders and have it vested in His Majesty, so that the Government will have complete ownership of all the stock issued by the various companies?

I do not think it would be good policy to issue stock and allow outsiders to have it, thereby gaining a voice, no matter how small it may be, in the administration of our Canadian National railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Generally speaking, I think the honourable member's views are right. The contingency however is not a dangerous one, and as we will have further time for the consideration of this clause when the Bill is resumed for consideration, I beg to move that its consideration be postponed for the present.

Motion agreed to.

On section 22—power to acquire securities or make or receive advances.

Mr. BUREAU: This clause gives the Company absolute power, without control either by the Governor in Council or otherwise, to acquire securities issued by or make advances to or receive advances from the Canadian Northern or any other company comprised in the system. Now section 149 of the Railway Act provides as follows:

> No company shall, either directly or indirectly, employ any of its funds in the purchase of its own stock, or in the acquisition of any shares, bonds or other securities, issued by any other railway company in Canada, or in the purchase or acquisition of any interest in any such stock, shares, bonds, or other securities: Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the powers or rights which any company in Canada had or possessed on the first day of February, one thousand nine hundred and four.

Here is a clause prohibiting the granting of the power which is given by section 22. The clause I have read has its sanction in section 376 of the general Railway Act which provides:

Every director of a railway company who knowingly permits the funds of any such company to be applied either directly or indirectly in the purchase of its own stock, or in the acquisition of any shares, bonds or other securities issued by any other railway company in Canada, or in the purchase or acquisition of any interest in any such stock, shares, bonds or other securities contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall incur a penalty of one thousand dollars for each such violation;

2. The acquisition of each share, bond or other security or interest as aforesaid shall be deemed a separate violation of this section.

Then it goes on to say how it shall be recoverable and how divided when recovered. On the contrary section 22 of the Act now before us provides that the Company may acquire any securities or make any advances. That is in absolute contradiction of the prohibitive clause 149, the sanction of which is found in clause 376. May I ask the reason for this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The clause now under consideration is merely an adaptation, really a transcript, of section 19 of the old Canadian Northern Railway System Act of 1914, which read as follows:

No company now or hereafter comprised in the Canadian Northern system which is now or may hereafter be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada may acquire shares in the capital stock of or securities issued by or make advances to or receive advances from any other company comprised in such system, and may take or give security for such advances.

The only addition here is enabling power to make advances on notes instead of on the regular securities. There really is no extension at all, but there seemed to be some legal doubt as to the power to use notes. It is simply a matter of internal financing of the Company.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask what was the reason for making an exception of the Canadian Northern Railway, when the law strictly prohibits such transactions and makes any director who knowingly allows any such transaction to be made liable to a penalty of one thousand dollars, and the penalty is imposed for each share or security acquired?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The securities that can be used for the purpose of this borrowing are securities authorized by the subsidiary or constituent companies, not by the parent company; so it is merely a matter of internal financing of the Company, and we are taking no more power than we gave to the Canadian Northern itself under section 19 of the old Act.

Mr. BUREAU: But why make an exception of the Canadian Northern to the general law?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no exception made.

Mr. BUREAU: What about section 149 of the General Railway Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section the hon. gentleman quoted forbids companies to acquire their own securities.

Mr. BUREAU: And other securities. It says:

No company shall . . . . . employ any of its funds . . . . . in the acquisition of any shares, bonds or other securities issued by any other railway company in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor can this company. All they are acquiring are the securities of their own constituent companies, not the stock issue of the company itself; they cannot take that. But for the purpose of borrowing they can take the securities already authorized to be issued and issued by their own subsidiary companies, which constitute their own body. That is very different from taking the securities of an outside corporation.

Mr. BUREAU: Legally it is another company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but they are all united into one, and were so united in 1914.

Mr. BUREAU: Why is not the control of the Governor in Council exercised when these transactions take place? All the other clauses provide for the control of the Governor in Council. There must be a reason for making an exception in this clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The authority that authorized the original issue of the securities by the constituent company was a statutory authority and presumably edged around with sufficient safeguards. Let me repeat, this is merely a matter of the internal financing of the company. I beg to move that the further consideration of the clause be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

On section 23—power to construct and operate railway lines:

Mr. J. D. REID: I beg to amend this clause by inserting after the word " description " in the eighth line the following words:

In respect of the construction whereof respectively Parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities.

This ensures that nothing can be done without first coming to Parliament.

Mr. CANNON: I notice that the amendment reads "for the respective construction whereof respectively." I think that one of the "respectively" or "respectivelies" might be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister moves to add to section 23, after the word "description," the following words "in respect of the construction whereof respectively Parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities."

Mr. McKENZIE: That is very difficult to understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It means simply that with the approval of the Governor in Council, upon any location sanctioned by the minister of Railways, the company may construct and operate railway lines, branches and extensions or railway facilities or properties of any description. What is the condition upon which they may do that?—upon the condition that authority was given by this Parliament by statute or if their bonds are guaranteed by this Parliament for that purpose. The full control is still vested in Parliament. They are authorized to go ahead whenever Parliament authorizes them to do so or guarantees their bonds.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think the intention of the minister is to authorize it before construction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It says "hereafter," in fact, I do not think the word is necessary.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—use of name:

Mr. CANNON: Why should you not call the Canadian Railways the Canadian Government Railways instead of calling them the Canadian National Railways, and maintaining the "C.N.R." I think the sooner the "C.N.R." disappears from the public eye the better it will be not only for the public itself but also for the Government. I think it is only natural that we should call our railway "The Canadian Government Railways".

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only reason I can think of is that, "Canadian National Railways" is more plebeian, or more cosmopolitan. "Government" suggests authority. We want to suggest that this is the nation's, or the people's, property. The Canadian Northern Railway, of which no Canadian need be ashamed, will in due course be amalgamated with the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A more practical reason was given to me last fall by Mr. Hanna. He said that all the cars bore the three letters "C.N.R." and it would need a lot of painting to change the name.

On Section 25—Change of name:

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any particular reason for this reservation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a very good reason for that. It is not intended to amalgamate some of the subsidiary companies that do not own and operate railways; for instance, the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company. The Governor in Council is given power to change the name of that company. The obvious name would be the Canadian National Telegraph.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have we not made very fine progress? I think we might now be allowed to go home.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman precipitated the situation and we must go on with it or else it will mean another day lost.

Mr. McKENZIE: I precipitated nothing. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) precipitated everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will retract the word "precipitated." That is rather too expeditious a term.

Mr. M. CLARK: I cannot permit the hon. gentleman's statement to go uncontradicted that I precipitated anything. I made a few remarks extending over a period of about thirteen minutes in perfectly good temper in response to the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) who was the real "precipitator."

On Section 26—Issue of securities:

Mr. BUREAU: Would it be well to limit the amount of securities to be issued per mile of railway constructed in each case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is limited in the trust deed.

Mr. BUREAU: But a railway may be constructed where there was no justification for issuing securities to the extent of $75,000 per mile. In the case of another road a larger amount might be necessary. You put a maximum here, but would it not be well in the case of each company to determine the amount per mile which it is to be authorized to issue. That provision must be in the general charter of each company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The trust deed, of course, contains a provision to that effect. Each specific one will necessarily be limited when the security is authorized by the company and approved by the Governor in Council, but no matter what the value may be it never can exceed $75,000. It is obviously impossible now to fix what it should be in relation to each issue.

Mr. BUREAU: When these charters were obtained, and before they were vested in the Canadian Government, the amount of the bond issue must have been limited. We always limit in the charter the amount of bonds to be issued per mile of railway constructed. This is virtually the wiping out of that limitation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The limitations contained in the charter still would stand.

Mr. BUREAU: The roads which are to be constructed under this Bill must already have charters. If so the amount of the bond issue is limited. If there is no charter how is the construction going to be carried on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This just applies to Canadian National Railway lines; that is to say, to lines the physical property of which is owned by the Canadian National Railway Company. It would apply, for example, to lines that become the property of the Canadian National Railway Company by virtue of amalgamation under clause 21; but without such amalgamation the original limitations apply.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not seem to be able to make my meaning understood. If you are going to build a line of railway, you can only do it by virtue of an Act of Parliament, whether local or Federal, which limits the bond issue per mile of railway constructed. Whether the railway is the property of the Canadian Government, or remains the property of a particular company, Parliament gives the necessary authority for the issue of the bonds. Such being the case, I want to know what the clause means?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amalgamated company has the power conferred by its charter, plus the power it secures by the amalgamation. The absorbing company can exercise either of these powers to the maximum prescribed.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that an amalgamation takes places with the consent of the Governor in Council, and that the provisions of the general Railway Act —as to obtaining the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders, publication in the Official Gazette, and application for confirmation to the Board of Railway Commissioners—do not apply?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: And the Governor in Council will have the right to determine the amount of securities which is to be issued per mile?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think that power should be left to the Governor in Council. It ought to remain with Parliament, as in the case of other railway companies which are amalgamated. Would it not be better to state that in the case of an amalgamation the amount of bonds shall not exceed per mile constructed the amount authorized by the charter which created the absorbing company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The power is being now exercised, under this clause. We are fixing the limit now, just as it is fixed in the terms of the charter of the individual company; but we provide the additional safeguard that each specific issue shall be limited also by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: I am still afraid that my question has not been understood, but I must leave it at that.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand that this clause, read in connection with clauses 23 and 16, means that the company may at any time issue bonds, securities, or debentures, for the purpose of building a railroad without coming before Parliament? If so, I think it is rather broad in its nature, and at the time of an election, or something of that nature, debentures may be issued and works started on the construction of some of these forty-four railroads in some constituency.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has been brought up in the wrong school of politics. The fact is that this only authorizes a bond issue to provide money subject to the provisions and conditions therein stated. Before there could be any bond issue, there necessarily would have to be authority to build the line. That rests on section 23 and is subject in each individual case to the authority of Parliament, which authority must come first to every line. That being the case, then section 26 applies as to the bond issue.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Power to acquire securities of other companies.

Mr. BUREAU: The same objection exists to this clause that was raised a few minutes ago. This clause provides:

> The company may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, acquire, hold, guarantee, pledge and dispose of shares in the capital stocks, bonds, notes, securities or other contractual obligations—and so forth. We know these may be put on the market for sale, but I think it is a wrong principle to authorize here the disposal of capital stock. The whole object we have in view now is to acquire the capital stock and to have absolute and entire ownership in the operation of these railways without the interference of any outside parties. I do not believe that this should be authorized unless for some special reason such as the Acting Minister of Justice stated a while ago, where there was an agreement with a certain party that the stock was to be exchanged for bonds. I believe those words ought to be struck out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At present the Canadian Northern Railway Company may acquire, hold, guarantee, pledge and dispose of shares in the capital stocks, bonds, notes securities, or other contractual obligations whatsoever of any railway company, or of any transportation, navigation, terminal, telegraph, express, or hotel company authorized to carry on any business incidental to the working of the railway. It was thought wise to extend that, especially as the Governor in Council now has supervisory power under this clause to include any electric or power company, and accordingly the words "electric power or of any other company" were added. It appears to be not only a useful but a necessary power to acquire the stock of, say, a small subsidiary branch line company that might be a useful feeder.

Mr. BUREAU: I have no objection to granting the company power to acquire; on the contrary I say the company ought to acquire as far as possible, all outstanding stock to have absolute and exclusive ownership. But the words "dispose of shares in the capital stocks," I take exception to. I do not think that any shares in the capital stock of any company or organization which may come under the control of this company, which actually represents the country ought to be disposed of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is some reason in the hon. gentleman's objection to the use of those words. I would be prepared to move that the words "and dispose of" be stricken out at the end of the second and beginning of the third line.

Mr. VIEN: If I understand this section it means that the Government may acquire by Order in Council the shares, bonds, notes, and scurities of any railway company, or of any transportation, navigation, terminal, telegraph, express, hotel, electric, power or of any other company authorized to carry on any business incidental to the working of a railway, or any business which in the opinion of the board of directors may be carried on in the interests of the company. That means that after the enactment of this law the Government by Order in Council will have the power to acquire any railway in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is absurd to suggest that they could buy the stock of any other company. It is simply the 2 a.m. power usually exercised by companies for the acquirement of small subsidiary concerns essential to their management.

Mr. VIEN: The section does not say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN But the other sections do. If they had a surplus after paying everything, which I would be very glad to see them have, in respect of the Government railways it would go to the credit of the Receiver General, they could not use that; it would be only profits after payment of everything to the Canadian Northern. If there is any surplus, and they need it for the purchase of stock of any subsidiary company, they should have power to apply it like any other company. But if they need the money of Canada it must be voted by Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX But why do you not say so in the section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman would not want me to say that the money of Canada must be first voted by Parliament?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is money of Canada they are disposing of?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No money of this country can be used unless it is voted by Parliament. That is the law of the land.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But you give the railway company here the right to acquire with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Suppose, for instance, they find it convenient to acquire the Gaspé railways, and suppose they have a surplus to apply towards that purchase, surely they could not come before Parliament for the purpose? Cannot you in a line just preserve the powers of Parliament? Because here the language is very broad. I can quite understand that if it was a small line serving a particular industry the board might find it convenient to acquire it; that goes without saying, but according to this section they may acquire a railway line of one or two hundred miles, which would involve a large expenditure of money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any surplus from the Government lines they cannot use because that goes to the credit of the Receiver General by another clause. All I said was, if it was a surplus from the Canadian Northern system there is no reason why they should not have the same powers as any other company, subject, of course, to the control of the Governor in Council as given here. I suggest that if the hon. gentleman feels so strongly about it, consideration of this clause might be postponed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not ask that. You may add two or three words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion between now and Monday, and if deemed feasible an amendment could be made accordingly on Monday.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Very well. Will you tell me if the company can acquire any transportation, navigation, etc., company outside of the Canadian Northern constituent company and subsidiary companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They might acquire the stock of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited. That is one instance where this power might well be used.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The clause is wide enough to enable the company to purchase the Grand Trunk Railway System.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the amendment of the Acting Minister of Justice be presented for further consideration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to strike out the words " and dispose of " at the end of the second line of section 29.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend consider the line dropped?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am moving postponement of this clause, and in doing so would state between now and Monday consideration will be given to the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

On section 30—consent of municipalities:

Mr. BUREAU: If an agreement cannot be arrived at between the company and the municipality, will they go before the Railway Commission as is provided by the general Railway Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a standard clause.

Mr. BUREAU: Who has the authority to decide in case they cannot reach an agreement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Railway Act would then apply.

Section agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: I move that the following be added to the Bill as Section 31:

Every person who directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, gives or procures, or agrees to give or procure, or offers or promises any office, place or employment, or promises to procure or to endeavour to procure any office, place or employment to or for any voter, director, official or employee of the company, and any director, official or other employee of the company who seeks by bribe or otherwise to influence any other director, official or employee with a view to influence him or them to support a political party in Canada, shall be disqualified from further holding office in the said company, and shall be liable upon prosecution to a term of imprisonment not less than one year, and not exceeding five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the consideration of the proposed section 31 be postponed.

Motion (Mr. Meighen) agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the following be added as section 32 of the Bill:

The Minister of Railways and Canals may appoint or direct any person to inquire into and report upon any matters or things relating to or affecting the company or its works and undertakings, including its management and operation of the Government railways, or relating to or affecting any other company and the works and undertakings thereof, owned, controlled or operated by the company, and any person so appointed or directed may, for the purposes of and in connection with any such inquiry or report, do all such things and exercise all such powers as are referred to or mentioned in section 61 of the Railway Act.

This merely permits the Minister to make inquiry as to anything connected with the management or operation of the road under section 61 of the Railway Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is section 61 as wide as the Public Inquiries Act ?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the clause applicable peculiarly to railways. Apparently it is more appropriate to act under this provision than to appoint a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, as this is what is usually done in the management of railways.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister expect us to gobble up all these clauses just as he proposes them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member would like to have time to look into it, I will move that the consideration of this clause be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

On section 6—no personal responsibility of directors:

Mr. BUREAU: This section reads in connection with section 22, which authorizes a thing that is directly forbidden by section 149 of the Railway Act. The minister says that was the clause that was inserted in the Canadian Northern Railway Act. Section 6 also takes the director of a company away from the operation of section 376 of the Railway Act, which says that any director who permits the funds of the company to be applied in the purchase of its own stock or of the securities of any other company shall be liable to a fine of $1,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are really penalizing clauses. The provision is to guard against penalties already applicable to those who are managers of private roads and are directly interested in them. It would not be applicable to Government appointees whose duty it is to manage a road that belongs to the Crown. A director would not accept an appointment if he were subject to those penalties.

Mr. BUREAU: But that is in the general Railway Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There he is interested in doing these things; here he is not.

Mr. BUREAU: He is authorized to do things that are forbidden by section 149 of the Railway Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Therefore it would not be well to subject him to a penalty for doing them. Here is a clause that was in the Canadian Northern Act with reference to directors who had no interest in the road, and who consequently should not be subject to those penalties. The section reads:

No such director shall be under any responsibility to any shareholder, director, or officer of the company of which he is director, nor to any other person, in respect of any act done, or omitted to be done by him in the execution of his office.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that the original charter of the Canadian Northern Railway company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Act of 1914, when we appointed directors to represent the Dominion of Canada, the Act that was passed at the time that we guaranteed the issue of $45,000,000 worth of bonds. Those directors were given this protection, and there is the same reason for giving this protection now because all the directors represent the Dominion and have no personal interest.

Mr. BUREAU: They may have no personal interest, but they are bound to work in the interest of the country. If they do anything against the law, I do not see why they should not be subject to the same penalties as the directors of any other company.

Mr. VIEN: According to this clause a director is not subject to any penalty under the provisions of any statute, in respect of his office or any act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution thereof. If a director commits malfeasance in office, he will not be responsible, nor will he be subject to any penalty under the provisions of any statute, even the Criminal Code. This section will absolve him of all responsibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman omitted some very important words. As respects a director's responsibility to any shareholder, director, officer or employee of the company, or to any other person, he is entirely free. That is quite clear, but there might be statutes to which he should be liable, and he certainly should be liable to the operation of the Code. Therefore, the section continues:

Nor, except with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall be subject to any penalty under the provisions of any statute, in respect of his office, or any act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution thereof.

Therefore, he is not absolutely exempt. He may, by the Governor in Council be rendered liable to the operation of any penalty imposed in any statute.

Mr. VIEN: Why should they not be stated?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be pretty difficult to go through all the laws and ascertain just what he should and what he should not be liable to. He should be liable to a penalty for malfeasance in office amounting to a breach of the Code. We do not want to get liabilities and penalties in that will debar good men from taking posts as directors, particularly, if the system now adopted is continued whereby men are not obliged to devote all their time, but men of high character and ability are asked to give a part of their time and a general supervision for a small sum per annum, say $2,000.

Mr. VIEN: Is it wise to give the Governor in Council the right to protect by Order in Council any man against any act. If he is liable under the Criminal Code, the Government, by Order in Council, will be able to protect him from any recourse whatever. Suppose he commits a criminal act, the approval of the Governor in Council will be required in order to prosecute him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At present the Governor in Council may remit any pecuniary penalty to which anybody is subject, and he may further remit any imprisonment.

Mr. BUREAU: He cannot prevent a man from being tried?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Perhaps it would be better to insert the word "pecuniary" before the word "penalty." The Government should not have the power to shield a director, at least from trial. I am anxious not to have the section such that we cannot get high class men to take the posts. I move that the word "pecuniary" be placed before the word "penalty" in line 17 of section 60.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the fee of $2,000 to be continued?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has not been finally decided to continue the system of having a large number of directors at say $2,000 a year.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know that for $2,000 a year very good men can be got.

Mr. KEEFER: That is rather a reflection on members of this House who get only $2,500 for watching them.

Mr. BUREAU: I think it is. If I should judge the value of members of this House by the pedigree they got this evening from various members of the Government, I think, at $2,000, we would be overpaid. Fortunately, in our constituencies we are more highly regarded than we have been this afternoon. The remark of the hon. member is absolutely justified. This is one of the reasons we ought to invoke, if we want to maintain our standing before the country, at least in places where we are not known. I do not think $2,500 is sufficient for a man who devotes his time here for six months in the year and who has to sit up until half past two in the morning to see the closure put on him.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On schedule A—constituent and subsidiary companies comprised in the Canadian Northern system.

Mr. BUREAU: We want some explanation in regard to these various companies.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the liabilities and assets of the various companies mentioned in the schedule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That really does not seem enough. These Companies have been in the system right along; they are in it now. We cannot add to or substract from their liabilities.

Mr. CAHILL: This question has been before the House before. When the $40,000,000 guarantee was given the question was raised whether it was wise to take over a number of these companies as their liabilities might be greater than their assets. It has repeatedly been asked in the House what were the assets and liabilities of the various companies. It will readily be understood that when we take over these companies the Canadian National Railways will be responsible for their liabilities. We know that in the case of the Canadian Northern some $100,000,000 of unguaranteed securities were taken over and made good by the Dominion of Canada for the benefit of the friends of the Government, Mackenzie and Mann. I think we are entitled to know what securities are outstanding against these subsidiary companies and what their assets are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is a little out in this particular—that they were taken over four years ago. They are in the system now; we cannot take them over any more.

Mr. CAHILL: They are not taken over but still stand as the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company, do they not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we have taken it over.

Mr. CAHILL: You have only taken over the stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all we want.

Mr. CAHILL: The Canadian National Railways will become responsible for the liabilities of these companies when taken over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian Northern is responsible in the very same sense that the Canadian National will be responsible if this Bill passes.

Mr. CAHILL: The Canadian Northern has nothing to do with them. They are separate companies, in exactly the same position as the steamship companies, and the minute you take them over you become responsible for their liabilities. Liable to whom, I do not know, but I want to know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is too late to commence as far back as the hon. gentleman would require, and I therefore move that further consideration of schedule 1 be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Schedule stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that the following schedule be added to the Bill, to be known as schedule 2.

Mr. McKENZIE What section of the Bill refers to schedule 2?

Mr. MEIGHEN Section 20, on which we spent all day and all night.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Surely the minister does not propose to deal with this schedule as with the other clauses of the Bill, and apply the closure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman would like to discuss it, it will be in print to-morrow morning in Hansard, and he will have until Monday afternoon to study the schedule.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If the hon. gentleman gives the notice which we suppose he is going to give from the procedure he has started to adopt every member will be allowed to speak not more than once and will have to confine his speech on the schedule and on the whole Bill to twenty minutes. If he asks a question, that will be enough; he will have spoken. My hon. friend might give his notice for the other clauses and leave this one. This schedule contains forty-four charters which my hon. friend asks to be extended. Ordinarily, when a company seeks an extension of its charter, a map has to be deposited so that it can be studied by the members of the Committee. But in this case nothing of the sort is done. We are asked to extend the time of construction of forty-four railways, the very names of which we have not before us until this afternoon. No map is produced and no information given, and if the procedure with which we are threatened is carried out we shall be absolutely prevented from giving this schedule and these forty-four charters the consideration which they deserve.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not so serious as if we were giving these charters to parties outside. We are, in effect, only extending this time to ourselves. The schedule will appear in Hansard to-morrow morning and will be open for discussion on Monday afternoon. It is true that a single hon. member can speak only once and for twenty minutes; but he can move an amendment. If the hon. member thinks some of these charters should be struck out he can move an amendment to that effect, and every hon. member can speak on that amendment. It no doubt would have been better if hon. gentlemen had accepted the proposal that we do a little bit to-day by passing clause 20. But now there is no other course open to us. All the clauses and the schedules must be considered together.

Mr. BUREAU: The Acting Minister of Justice says that we are not giving these charters to somebody else, but only to ourselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In effect, I said.

Mr. BUREAU: Neither in effect nor otherwise. Schedule 2 is very important. There has been deposited on the table a list of forty-four lines, the charters for which are to be revived. Now, we want to know where those lines are going, the counties they will pass through, and the owners of the land traversed by the railways. We are informed that the owners of the land are friends of the Government who have townsites, along the railway, and who want the charters revived, not so much for the purpose of having the roads built than for creating a real estate boom to make money for themselves. My hon. friend may laugh, but I think it is serious. Closure was not applied to the Conscription Bill when it was before the House, but it was applied when the Canadian Northern legislation was before the House in order to protect the friends of my friends opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No closure then.

Mr. BUREAU: I can give my hon. friend the number of hours each man spoke. The Franchise Act and the Canadian Northern Bill were passed under the closure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian Northern Bill of 1914?

Mr. BUREAU: Of 1917. Here is a closure motion, and I say that schedule No. 2 in all fairness ought to be given here so that we will have an opportunity to look into it. If hon. gentlemen do not want to give me the information concerning the schedule, we will take the trouble to go through the plans, communicate with people in those ridings and ascertain who are the owners. We will get the information ourselves if you do not want to give it to the Opposition. You shoved a list of forty-four railways into our hands this afternoon, two copies for eighty men. We have had no time to look at it. I think there is something more than land speculation in this Bill. I have an inkling that perhaps the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) has a few roads going through counties that are not strangers to him. It may have a political purpose. I understood the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) to say that an election had been won on one or two of these railways.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: On one of them.

Mr. BUREAU: I am going to ask my partner who keeps better company now and knows all about fictitious charters and perhaps he will give the information to me and we will be able to discover things that it will be to the advantage of the country to know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would need to postpone consideration for a much longer time than Monday to get the owners of the land along forty-two lines of railway. I am afraid the night is getting so late that the hon. gentleman's mental resourcefulness is waning or he could think of some better reason for wanting this postponed. Does he suggest that in the history of granting charters the Government of the day has ever come down with the names of the owners and occupiers of the lands along the line of the projected route? The suggestion really stuns one's sense of propriety. What has the hon. gentleman in his mind? If he thinks there is anything sinister behind the extension of a charter and has information, or claims that he has, to substantiate that idea, I suggest that he bring it before Parliament on Monday. If he can show anything of the nature that he has indicated to-night he will produce somewhat of a sensation in this House. If he has such evidence, it will have a very great effect in determining the vote of hon. members on the Bill before the Committee. In the meantime, although we do not seem to be on the discussion of the schedule, I do not think we should delay the House longer, and I move that the consideration of the schedule be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. McKENZIE: On the preamble I wish to point out that there is all the difference in the world between an ordinary company looking for a revival of a charter and this situation . If a company has an old charter and wants to build a road, that company has to take the responsibility of furnishing the money and of dealing with the people through whose land it is building. It is a private concern. But here are forty-four companies that the people are taking over and here are forty-four lines of railway that this House is undertaking to build and about which nobody knows the first thing whatever. Yet we are smiled at and we are called simpering idiots because we ask for information. Here are forty-four companies building forty-four lines of railway with our money, with the money of the Canadian people. We do not know what it is going to cost or how many miles of road are going to be built. We are left in a state of entire and hopeless ignorance on these points. Still we have in front of us a body of intelligent men who say that it is utterly absurd for the representatives of the Canadian people to try and find out anything about these roads. The Acting Minister of Justice says that it is the same as if an ordinary company spending their own dollars were here looking for an extension. It is nothing of the kind. It is our money, it is our business, and we should know something about it before it is forced over our heads in this way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not undertaking to build railways and therefore the remarks of the hon. gentleman mean nothing whatever.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is to build railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill provides for authority to build them after Parliament votes it, as provided in section 23.

Mr. BUREAU: This schedule gives us no information. My hon. friend says I can get the information between now and Monday. I have some more interesting and better company to keep between now and Monday than that of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I have something better to do than to find out about lands that are owned by the Canadian Northern Railway. Although my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice is endowed with immaculate nerve, he seems to have lost it. Late hours are telling on him. He knows that between now and Monday I cannot get any information. I have reason to suspect by the way they are crowding this that there is something wrong about it, and that there is some land speculation and political patronage and influence behind it. My hon. friend says that they could not procure the name of every owner. I do not think they would have to deal with very many owners where there is a chance of any money being made all along these lines. If my hon. friend wants to apply the closure he is welcome to adopt that procedure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the preamble be amended by adding the word "first" before the word "schedule" in the fifth line.

Mr. CANNON: If the minister moves for further consideration on Monday I am perfectly willing to wait until then to say what I have to say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that further consideration of the preamble be postponed until Monday.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to give notice that at the next sitting of the Committee of the Whole House upon this Bill I shall move that the further consideration of clauses 2, 3, 16, 20, 21, 22, 29 and proposed clauses 31 and 32, first schedule and proposed second schedule, preamble and title of this Bill, shall be the first business of the Committee and shall not further be postponed.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 2.50 a.m.

Monday, April 28, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—VOUCHERS FOR OVERSEAS PAYMENTS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) inquired on Friday respecting the audit of the expenditures of the Overseas Department of Militia and Defence. I promised to obtain the information desired, which I now have in a letter from Major-General Fiset, Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, reading as follows:

With regard to Mr. Robb's question:

Page 218zz, Auditor General's Report, 1917-18. The Auditor General has just informed me that the vouchers covering the items, Overseas Department Militia and Defence amounting to $115,381,243.71 have just begun to arrive in Canada, and there are several carloads of them. It will take the Auditor General's staff many months before the details can possibly be published, but all these accounts have been audited overseas to the satisfaction of the Auditor General.

The main part of this expenditure is for pay and allowances.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 79, to amend the Dominon Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill is of a corrective character only, and involves no departure in principle. It provides among other things for confiscation of goods illegally used in the parks in violation of the regulations; also for the granting of surface rights to the province of British Columbia in the case of applications that came in before the order in council of 1890 confirming an agreement between the province and the Dominion respecting forest reserves. I do not think there is any other clause as important as those two.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

STRIKES IN CANADA.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

Considering the number of strikes which are constantly increasing, does the Government propose to enact some measures relating to the cost of living which will enable the citizens of Canada to meet their obligations without having to resort to strikes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Deslauriers' question is apparently based on some misapprehension of the circumstances. It is quite true that the actual number of strikes for the calendar year 1918 was in excess of those of previous years, but, in the matter of time losses by strikes, which is the real test of losses to those concerned, the disputes of 1918 brought less injury and inconvenience to the public than in several preceding years. The record for the decade ending with 1918 shows the following time losses due to strikes counted in working days:—

Year.	Approximate time losses in working days.
1910	718,635
1911	2,046,650
1912	1,099,208
1913	1,287,678
1914	430,054
1915	106,149
1916	208,277
1917	1,134,970
1918	763,341

Many of the strikes of the year 1918 were of brief duration. Time losses by strikes were materially lower than 1918 only in the worst years, industrially speaking, of the war. The figures do not suggest that cost of living has any exceptional bearing on the frequency of strikes. The whole subject is regarded, however, as of the utmost importance and is receiving special consideration. The following extract is from the Labour Gazette, March, 1919:—

[Mr. J. H. Sinclair.]

MISS LAMONTAGNE.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Has Miss Lamontagne, of 91A Jeanne Mance, Montreal, received a bonus in connection with her services as an employee of the Montreal Board of Registration in 1918? If so, what amount did she receive?

2. Did any other male or female employees of said board receive a bonus?

3. Was the entire staff belonging to said board entitled to a bonus? If so, did every person thereof receive said bonus?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: If the hon. member would indicate what Registration Board he refers to we might be able to answer the question. The Canada Registration Board, which took the national registration, has no such name as the Montreal Board of Registration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PREVOST:

1. How many Canadian officers belonging to the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General since the beginning of the war, to date?

2. What are their names, the military rank which they held at the time they left for overseas, and the military district to which they belong?

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is the Government aware that a landslip has occurred at Ste. Marie wharf, which prevents the steamer Boucherville from commencing its sailing operations?

2. In connection with the construction of the wharves at this point, already commenced, is it the intention of the Government to extend said wharf construction as far as Hochelaga bay, during the summer season of 1919?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. POWER:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to the dismissal of Major J. T. N. L'Heureux from the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and the striking off of his name from the Canadian Militia.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a copy of Mrs. Hembleton's report, dated in the month of May, 1918, and relating to Canadian flour mills.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

On the motions:

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a return showing: (a) The names of all medical officers who joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force since the beginning of the war; (b) the length of service of each of the said officers, in England, France, Canada, or elsewhere; (c) the Units in which they served, the date and length of service therein, and (d) the decorations which said officers respectively received from the Imperial Government, and the reasons given therefor, in each case.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand until to-morrow so that I may have an opportunity of consulting the hon. member with regard to it. As the question stands it would be impossible to obtain all the information asked for, and I think if I see the hon. member that he may possibly change the wording of it. The same remark applies to the hon. gentleman's other question asking for information in regard to the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

DEMOBILIZATION.

STATEMENT BY MAJOR-GENERAL MEWBURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): Before the Orders of the Day are called I feel it my duty to make a statement to the House regarding the delay in the demobilization of troops as a result of a strike in Liverpool. For the information of the House I may read the following statement:

From the date of the Armistice to April 15th there have been demobilized or struck off strength of the Canadian Expeditionary Force 159,444 all ranks. During the month of March over 41,000 troops were brought back from overseas, carried to their respective destinations in Canada and demobilized. On the 16th April there were about 149,000 troops still overseas.

Arrangements had been completed for the movement of at least 45,000 troops from Great Britain to Canada for the month of April, and with the opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence, it is expected that this number will be increased, and it is hoped that the following ships will be available:

I have a complete list of the ships and can read it to the House or put it upon Hansard. The list gives the number of ships, their tonnage and carrying capacity, It is a rather long list and I do not suppose I need read it:

Steamship.	Tonnage.	Carrying capacity.

Aquitania	45,647	5,000

Some of the above ships will have to dock at Halifax others at Quebec and Montreal. Even if some of them are of such capacity as to permit of them going into St. Lawrence ports, the Ministry of Shipping reports that the officers are not accustomed to navigation of the St. Lawrence and they are very timid about undertaking it. Therefore, some of the above ships will go to Halifax. Besides this, some of the ships go to Halifax and from there to New York to get cargo or passengers before returning to England.

I regret to have to advise the House that owing to serious strikes in Liverpool, there has been some delay in carrying out the above schedule this month.

Following the Easter holidays in England the dockers' strike commenced and cable advices say that scarcely any sailings are taking place. Every effort has been made by the Overseas Minister to secure greater regularity in sailings at my request, in order to accomplish quick disembarkation of troops on arrival at ports in Canada.

Further cables have been received stating that owing to continued strikes the ships will not leave in accordance with our programme and many ship sailings are quite uncertain.

The situation is very trying to soldiers waiting their return to Canada and has created a most difficult situation for those charged with demobilization; both in England and Canada, and it will create a further difficulty with sudden congestion at ports of disembarkation for the railway companies to carry out their programme. It may create congestion at both Halifax and Quebec, and there may be some annoyance caused to both the troops and the relatives and friends of the troops on account of the present condition and unavoidable delay but I can assure the House that every possible effort has been made and is being made to meet the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is only in very rare cases that any document can go in Hansard that has not been read in the House, but as this is an important communication I take it that the consent of the House will be given that it appear in Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

TRANSATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (for the Postmaster General): On Friday the hon. member for Maisonneuve raised a question in regard to the delivery of Canadian mails at New York by ships carrying Canadian troops, and in connection with the matter he read an extract from the Halifax Chronicle. I have made inquiries of the Post Office Department and find the position to be briefly this: At the present time, owing to the interruption of regular ocean traffic, due to the transport of troops and supplies, the greater part of the mails have for some time been coming to New York. The particular steamers in question were not steamers that travelled regularly from Liverpool to Halifax, nor were they subsidized to carry Canadian mails; their regular route was from Liverpool to New York. Arrangements were made with the shipping authorities by the Overseas Ministry of Militia or the Admiralty for these ships to carry Canadian troops to Halifax on their way to New York. The Post Office Department here was not advised that they were carrying Canadian troops to Halifax or that they were carrying Canadian mails, and did not know of it until the mails were landed in New York. They were sent on these ships by the British authorities, and as the ordinary route was from Liverpool to New York the British post office authorities evidently addressed the mail to New York. The matter has already been taken up with the British post office authorities to see if this cannot be changed, and to ensure that on all steamers which bring troops to Halifax the mails will be landed there. I hope such an arrangement can be made with the British post office authorities.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES' SALARIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SANFORD JOHNSTON CROWE (Burrard): Before the Orders of the Day are called I would ask the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) if he is prepared to make a statement regarding the outcome of the conference held with the Western postal employees.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (for the Postmaster General): Some days ago, before the Easter recess, I made a statement as to the result of the conference with the Eastern postal employees, and I said at the time that negotiations were proceeding satisfactorily with the representatives of the Western employees. I think that on the whole reasonably satisfactory conclusions were reached. I cannot take up the time of the House now to go into all the matters that came up for discussion, as the Western employees presented some forty-eight distinct requests to the Post Office Department which they desired to have considered. The great majority of those matters were of a purely routine departmental nature and were dealt with by the Postmaster General and his administrative staff, on the whole, I believe, in a way satisfactory to the representatives of the employees. There were, however, certain important questions of policy raised by the Western postal employees some similar in character to those raised by the Eastern employees, and others that differed from those in the East. I shall refer briefly to the most important of these questions.

The first demand was for the equalization of payments as between East and West. Hon. members will recall that for many years the Post Office employees from Sault Ste. Marie West received an additional allowance of $180 to meet what was assumed to be the higher cost of living in Western Canada. When the Post Office employees waited on the Government in July last, the Eastern employees pointed out that in their view the basis on which the additional allowance had been made in the past no longer existed, as the cost of living was approximately the same in the East as the West, and they asked that this discrimination should be removed. The Government went a step towards removing it at that time as they only granted $50 additional bonus to employees in the West while they granted $100 to those in the East. The Government's answer at the present time was that the matter would be dealt with in the re-classification now being made by the Civil Service Commission. Under the re-classification, men will be paid according to the character of the work done, irrespective of the section of the country in which it is done. (This request was from the Eastern employees.) Another request was that the provisional allowance which had been made to men receiving $1,800 or under should be extended to all Post Office employees. The Government replied that this also would be dealt with in the re-classification.

A further request was that they be granted overtime for work done beyond the regular hours for service. The Government agreed to that request, and decided to pay overtime at the rate of time and a half. The fourth request was for a Saturday half-holiday all the year round, or for at least a weekly half holiday. The Government has agreed to the principle of a forty-four-hour week for the postal employees—that is a half holiday for the week—believing the House and the country would support it in doing that. In so far as the half holiday can be given on Saturdays it will be given, but the public service must be maintained in important city post offices. Therefore, those who cannot get the half holiday on Saturday will get it on some other day of the week, or overtime will be paid, or some other suitable arrangement made. Then they asked and pressed that as, under certain Orders in Council, men who had served overseas were relieved of passing the qualifying examinations that barrier should be removed as against all who had not passed that examination. The Government could not see its way clear to grant that request. It felt that the men who had served overseas were entitled to have the barrier in question removed, because they were not here to pass the examination, but, as a matter of fact, in the re-classification that obstacle will disappear, and the basis of examination will be entirely different. Another request made was, in view of the fact that there are many temporary employees in the postal service who have been paid the minimum salary for a considerable time, such employees be granted an annual increase in the same manner as permanent employees, or be appointed to the permanent staff. The Government could not see its way clear to put these temporary employees in the same position as permanent employees, otherwise there would be no advantage in passing the examination and coming into the service; but in the re-classification, so far as vacancies permit, they will be taken into the permanent service. Further it was asked that provision should be made for the necessary machinery for dealing with and adjusting all disputes and grievances in the service, with a suggestion that the co-operative principle outlined in the Whitley report might be adopted. In answer, the Government pointed out that employees in the public service stand in an entirely different position from that of workers in industrial establishments, where the employer is personally and directly affected by the rate of wages paid. The Government has no such interest, its sole object being to deal fairly by the employees in its service, and by the public which it represents. Secondly, it was pointed out that there already exists in the Civil Service Commission an impartial tribunal which is recommending salary schedules and dealing with promotions as provided in the Civil Service Act. Thirdly, one of the members of the Government, Hon. Mr. Maclean, has at the request of the Civil Service organizations, been asked to hear and deal with all questions affecting the Civil Service as a whole, or a particular branch of the service. The employees now have the opportunity of going to him directly in connection with any matter affecting the service. It was further pointed out that in any case the commission appointed to investigate the question of industrial relations was only now commencing its work, and until it had reported no further action can be taken.

I would only mention two other matters that occasioned a good deal of discussion. One was the claim that all acknowledged cases of injustice through the evils of patronage be immediately rectified, and that all time and monetary loss sustained be granted to all employees so affected. These gentlemen claimed that certain employees in the Post Office were entitled to promotion some years ago on their merits, that these promotions had been delayed, and that these employees had suffered an injustice, and that therefore the Government should now rectify this injustice. The view of the Government was that it could not undertake to review the acts of prior administrations in connection with promotions in the Civil Service. If it did it in one branch of the service, the Post Office, it would be asked to do it in all branches of the service, and whatever the disadvantages might be the Government could not undertake to remove them. Another request made was for a minimum salary, and for a certain scale of allowances. To this the Government's answer was that those matters would be dealt with in the re-classification when it came down. On the whole, so far as the Government, acting in the public interests could meet made with the provincial governments inportant matters will be dealt with by the re-classification, and on some questions the Government felt that it could not meet the views presented to it.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER WATER-POWERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I desire to ask the Minister of Railways if the report is true that the Government intends to develop some water-powers on the river St. Lawrence, and if so, whether any arrangements have been made with the provincial governments interested with regard to the proprietary rights to the bed of the river? Linked with this question I desire to ask another which concerns the permission which an American company obtained from the International Waterways Commission to dam the river St. Lawrence in order to construct works for the production of aluminium for air ships, it being clearly understood that that permission would be withdrawn immediately the war was over. What steps are being taken to carry out the understanding in question?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): In regard to the hon. gentleman's first question, he, of course, understands that any work undertaken by the Government in connection with the development of water-powers on the St. Lawrence could not be proceeded with until Parliament gave the necessary authority. The matter is one which has been under discussion in this House for a number of years. As I explained the other evening, the question was brought to the attention of the Department of Railways with a view to having construction work proceed on the St. Lawrence river, and the matter was also discussed in Congress at Washington during the last session. Further than that nothing has been done. With reference to the hon. gentleman's second question relating to the dam that was placed across the Long Sault rapids in order to develop power during the war, I do not understand that the decision of the International Waterways Commission was as the hon. gentleman states. If my memory serves me right, the company in question were empowered by the Waterways Commission to build this dam which was to continue, not only during the war, but, I think, for five years afterwards.

VACANT COUNTY COURT JUDGESHIPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): May I be permitted to ask the Acting Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker, if the Government have reached any decision relating to the appointment of a county court judge for District No. 6 in Nova Scotia; and, if not, when it is likely to be dealt with?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): There are several vacant county court judgeships inclusive of the one referred to by the hon. member (Mr. J. H. Sinclair), but this Government having suggested to the various Provincial Governments that they should take into consideration the reduction of the county court judiciary in each province by amalgamation or otherwise, I have not thought well to recommend to Council the filling of the present vacancies.

THE CLOSURE.

INTERPRETATION OF RULE 17B

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Justice what is the understanding on Rule 17B as to the time allowed hon. members when we get into Committee, whether they can speak once on each clause, or once on the whole Bill? There seems to be a conflict of opinion in the press. Before we get into any trouble I would like to have a definite opinion from the Acting Minister of Justice.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: My opinion is this: That after the motion of which notice has been given, is put, should it be carried, there will be a clause taken up, presumably the first clause in the notice. Each hon. member may speak twenty minutes on that clause, but if it should carry the debate up to two o'clock, then all the clauses covered by the notice and the preamble and title must be decided by the House. If, however, the debate should conclude earlier than that hour on the first clause, the next clause would be taken up, which would revive the right of any hon. member who had spoken thereon.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

DISCUSSION IN COMMITTEE UNDER CLOSURE RULE.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 70, to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I move that at this sitting clauses 2, 3, 16, 20, 21, 22, 29, and proposed 31 and 32, the first schedule and proposed second schedule, preamble and title of this Bill be the first business of the Committee and that consideration of same be not further postponed.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Chairman, this rule—

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is rising to a point of order?

Mr. DEVLIN: No, to the discussion of clause 20.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable. I have just put the question upon the motion.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am not going to debate the motion; I am going to begin the discussion of clause 20.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman would be out of order at the present stage.

Mr. DEVLIN: In debating clause 20?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: I may do it in a moment's time?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Motion adopted; yeas 98, nays 34.

On section 2—Term of office of directors—Vacancy—Annual meeting.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Chairman, it is a peculiar thing that history should in some cases repeat itself, because those who were in the House in the year 1917 will remember that the Act to purchase the Canadian Northern Railway was passed under the rule of closure, and that any hon. gentlemen who were against the granting of large sums of money were of necessity debarred from criticising those grants through the fact that free speech was then refused to what up to that date was a free Parliament. I say, Mr. Chairman, that history sometimes repeats itself. We find ourselves to-day in this peculiar position that we are considering the first important measure that has been brought before Parliament this session, and are debarred from giving it proper consideration through the same rule of closure. In other words, before the war we were told that we were going to fight for a free Parliament. The war is over, and what are we face to face with to-day? I am sorry to have to say so, but I want to say it with all the energy that lies in me, we are face to face with a Government that imposes once again upon the discussion of an important subject, involving millions of the people's money, the rule of gag. It was surprising to many of us to witness honourable members seated opposite, who, upon other occasions, stood for freedom of speech, stand up to-day and say that on this question, which has simply engaged the attention of the House for two or three days, there should not be liberty of speech. I hope that hon. gentlemen who voted that way will understand the full import of their vote, and that henceforward as far as they are concerned they do not stand for a free, but for a tramelled Parliament.

Millions of dollars have been spent upon the Canadian Northern Railway, which is to be taken over by this company. Indeed, the company has been formed without any consultation of the members of Parliament. The Canadian Northern Railway has, in name, become the Canadian National Railway. In the Ottawa Citizen are published the times of arrival and departure of the Canadian Northern trains between Toronto and Ottawa, being the hours of the trains of the Canadian National Railway. The directors were named by the Government before the incorporation of the company, and their salaries are being paid by the Government. Everything in connection with the working of this system is and will continue to be under the absolute control of the Government—and when I say "absolute control," I mean such control as will be allowed by the Canadian Northern Railway system. The man who drew up this Bill was not an officer of the Crown, not one of the legal advisors of the Department of Railways, but the lawyer of the Mackenzie and Mann—I should say, of the Canadian Northern system, Mr. Lash. He gives the Government his Bill and says: Now, you be a lot of little dummies; dance, but pass the Bill. The Government accepts Mr. Lash's Bill, and, through the Acting Prime Minister, says to the House: This is Mr. Lash's Bill, and it must be passed. We ask for information, but the Government refuse to give it. When we ask what salaries are being paid to the directors of the Canadian Northern system, we are told: You shall inquire no longer; Mr. Lash's Bill is about to be passed under the rule of closure. Closure may be a good or may be an evil thing, but the principle of it as applied to this Parliament is a bad one. Everywhere liberty of action and speech is asked for, and it is a sorry thing indeed that the Government should apply the principle of the curtailment of the right of free speech in order to tax the people—yourselves and ourselves, the people of Canada. For that the Government will answer to the people.

Before my time lapses, I want to say a word or two about what this railway is costing the people. The people have obtained about ninety-eight per cent of the common stock, which has been declared by two officials of the Government as perfectly useless. When the Government are asked what else the people have obtained, they try to make an elaborate argument, but invariably come back to that stock. That is what the people have, and no more. What has the system cost the country? It has cost about $298,253,263. According to the testimony of Professor Smart, a very able writer whose version was published in the Montreal Star in 1917 or 1918, based upon the then market prices, the company is going to cost the country some $13,000,000 a year in deficits. The country is groaning under the high cost of living. Investigations are being demanded on all sides; yet you are standing party to the expenditure of the people's money to the extent of hundreds of millions and you are not inquiring where these hundreds of millions are going. No hon. member on the opposite side has taken the trouble, I am sure, of reading the Auditor General's Report from the first page to the last to find out where the people's money is going; yet that is what we are here for. What we cannot find in the Auditor General's Report we try to find out from the Government. We had an instance of that this afternoon. In answer to a question as to where $115,000,000 had gone, the Acting Prime Minister said: Well, the vouchers have not come over—it would take an awful lot to send them over, I suppose—but the accounts have been audited on the other side and have been declared to be satisfactory. And the $115,000,000 of the people's money must go. The people are clamouring for a reduction of the high cost of living. Has the Government taken any one step since the beginning of the session to reduce the cost of living? Not one. We are paying a Food Commissioner for reports. We are paying exorbitant sums for a little rag of a newspaper called the Official Record, which contains no real information. It merely gives clippings from a lot of other newspapers; and it is sent out as the Government official organ. In not one line of that journal is anything told of an attempt of the Government to reduce the cost of living. The Government have not studied the question; they do not know anything about it. The Government represents the wealth of this country, the manufacturers of this country. They do not know what the people are suffering or what it is costing them to keep their homes up. They have absolutely no idea of what the people are doing in trying to keep themselves supplied with meat. The people can hardly buy butter; yet the cold storage plants are loaded up with butter for exportation to the Old Country, while New Zealand is supplying the Canadian market at prices lower than those at which we can obtain butter in this country. And why? Simply because the profiteers have control of the butter. They have put it into cold storage, and they are holding it for higher prices; but the Government is doing absolutely nothing in the matter except taxing the people and imposing more taxes. People complain to-day that they are being taxed to the hilt. What will the taxes be after the Government have taken over all these railways, after they have paid for the debentures held by the people of Canada for loans made to the Canadian Northern? I happened to catch this bit of information supplied in May, 1918, in the Senate. Upon a question asked by the Hon. Mr. Belcourt, the Hon. Sir James Lougheed gave the following information. With the permission of the Committee, I will read the passage:

> I have great pleasure in placing this upon the Table. It shows securities of a par value of $69,000,000 securing the indebtedness of $67,000,000 which I mentioned yesterday.

All this is money which the people of Canada have to pay, for which the people are going to be taxed. Yet, because we protest against it, or at least, because we want to make some inquiries as to how the money is to be expended, my learned friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), with all the art and ability he is known to possess, is brought into the ring; and he starts a sparring match, and when any man attempts to ask a question, the minister stands up and endeavours, not to give the information, but to spar the other man out of the ring. This must be somewhat new to the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) whom I see in his seat to-day. The hon. member must recall just a few years ago when he would attempt to speak of public ownership and to advocate the taking over of all transportation lines, vessels, railways and so on. Many times during the course of the last fourteen years I have heard him speak in favour of public ownership. How dumb was the opposite side of the House then, and he would have received no encouragement whatever, were it not for some encouragement he got from this side of the House. He spoke to absolutely deaf ears on the other side; not one man would stand up with him; he could not even present a motion in favour of public ownership supported by one member on the other side of the House. Yet here is the apostle of public ownership in his seat to-day, looking, with all the pleasure that a man can summon up, with the knowledge of converts he has made to the cause, from the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) down to the last man. The Acting Prime Minister said the other day: The whole trouble is that the Opposition are against public ownership, and that is why they are opposing it. The Acting Prime Minister knows perfectly well that the question of public ownership versus private ownership has never come up for discussion in concrete form in this House, so that he cannot say who are in favour of public ownership and who are in favour of private ownership. But up to three or four years ago, with the exception of the hon. member for South York, there was not on the other side of the House a man who was in favour of private ownership in this country. Therefore, it ill becomes the Acting Prime Minister to cast any slur upon members seated upon this side on the ground that they are against public ownership. Are we against public ownership because we want some information regarding this Bill? Are we against public ownership because we do not believe that it is the right method to pursue, that the first important Bill brought before the House must be brought before us under the rule of closure?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has spoken now for twenty minutes. He will be able to continue his remarks on some other clause that comes under consideration.

Mr. DEVLIN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, because I wish to discuss Clauses 28, 29 and 30.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not wish to express my opinion regarding this "gag" law which the Acting Prime Minister saw fit to bring in on Friday, in lieu of giving information which the Government were either unable or unwilling to furnish to this Committee. The Acting Prime Minister blustered into the Committee about twenty minutes to six o'clock on Friday afternoon when Section 20 of the Bill, a section that had never been printed, that had never been submitted to the Committee before, had been under discussion for less than two hours. At about five minutes to four o'clock, as will be found from Hansard, an amendment was moved to take in some forty or forty-four railroads, and shortly before six o'clock the Acting Prime Minister suggested to the chairman that he call it six o'clock, so that the minister would have an opportunity, at eight o'clock, of making a statement to the Committee for the purpose of endeavouring to cover up the actions of this Government and their nefarious—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHILL: Co-operation with the Mackenzie and Mann crowd. It is a cowardly action of a cowardly Government to undertake.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression, as it is certainly not parliamentary.

Mr. CAHILL: I bow to your decision, Sir. I know you will permit no stronger language, and nothing milder will express my feelings in the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. PARENT: They can swallow it.

Mr. CAHILL: They have swallowed so much already; this is nothing new to them. We are debating a Bill to incorporate the Canadian National railways. On Friday at four o'clock in the afternoon the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) brought in an amendment, and I say, without fear of contradiction, that the minister could not at that time have named ten out of the forty railways. I will challenge any minister of the Government to name, without looking up Hansard, the places where any of those railways start and finish. They cannot do it, because they do not know. The Bill was prepared for them by Mr. Lash—by Mackenzie and Mann, and there was not, in the House, one minister, not excepting the Acting Prime Minister, who could answer one question without first submitting it to the gentleman who was sitting to the left to supply them with the information which Mr. Lash had furnished to the Government in order to put something over on this country. The Acting Prime Minister, with a great flourish, came in shortly before six o'clock for the purpose of bringing in closure on a Bill embodying forty-four charters, after less than two hours' debate, and without a copy of the amendment being submitted to this Committee.

In fact, the Bill we are debating now was only distributed when we came into Committee at three o'clock to-day. And yet, hon. gentlemen opposite hope to lead the country to believe that the Opposition has been obstructing because it was opposed to public ownership! Why, the Acting Prime Minister himself would not state whether he was in favour of public ownership or not. He has never told the House where he stands on public ownership; it is not on record anywhere that he is in favour of it. Why, then, should he insinuate that hon. members on this side are not in favour of public ownership? The reason the Government have brought in closure is because they are not in a position, or are unwilling, to reply to the questions we have asked. They are not able to explain the clauses of the Bill, and their only hope of getting it through is by applying the closure. The Government has a majority of over fifty, and after a debate of only two hours they bring in closure, because the Opposition is making things so hot for them and they do not want to be delayed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHILL: Absolutely; there is nothing else to it. There is not a man on the Government side who can explain the clauses of this Bill, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. That is the reason why they refused to debate the clauses in Committee, when we can get up and ask questions and put them in the hole they are in now. The Government cannot explain their attitude or their actions, and if they attempt to stand up and defend Mackenzie and Mann and their crowd, they will soon find they are on very thin ice and have only a very slim following in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite try to throw the blame on this side of the House, and ask, what will the country think? Mr. Chairman, I should like to go to the country and see what the people think about the Government and Mackenzie and Mann on this question. I should like to go to Ontario or any other place where there is a vacant seat and debate the question of public ownership under the control of Mackenzie and Mann and the Minister of Railways and with the advice of Mr. Z. A. Lash. If hon. gentlemen opposite are so brave about what is going to happen to members of the Opposition for their attitude on this question, let them go to the country now in any constituency that the Government will throw open, and see what the country thinks on their own attitude on public ownership before they attempt to blame us. We are not objecting to public ownership of this railway. We have the railway, and we want an honest management of it, but I have no hesitation in saying that I do not expect it with this Government in power, because they have not been honest in their dealings with the railway situation so far. The question of public ownership has not been raised in this House. I tried to bring it up last year but could not get a debate on the subject. The members of the Government would not say whether they were in favour of public ownership or not. The Government will not tell us to-day whether they are in favour of public ownership, but prefer to draw a red herring across the trail and blame the Opposition for holding up the Bill.

I should like some information on clause 2, but I have very grave doubts of getting it, because the only information we got on Friday was from back benchers, who were immediately gagged when the minister saw they knew something and were willing to impart it. Clause 2 deals principally with the date of the annual meeting, and in this connection I wish to make a suggestion to the Government. The clause provides that the annual meeting shall be held on the second Thursday in April of each year. Now, the statistical year ends on December 31st, and the year of most companies ends in December, and in order that Parliament may have the necessary information—if the Government intend to give us any, which I very much doubt—I would suggest that the date of the annual meeting be changed to the end of December. But if the Government can give a good reason why the date should not be changed, I shall be content.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): It is really an extraordinary thing that the Opposition, whenever they debate the question of railways, should throw up an enormous cloud of dust and yet absolutely fail to proclaim their faith in the principle of public ownership. While it is quite possible that the Government may in matters of detail or even in the general management of the business fall more or less into error and be open to criticism, because that is the lot of all human beings, nevertheless by this very Act the Government are pledging themselves to the principle of public ownership, and it is merely wasting the time of this House and of the people of the country to issue such vacant challenges as we have just heard.

Mr. CAHILL: Sure it is. Nobody will take them up on your side.

Mr. BURNHAM: The Government stand or fall by the principle of public ownership. They have found that the giving of subsidies and the granting of lands and making financial arrangements with vast private corporations were running this country into bankruptcy; so this new policy has been adopted. The Opposition is not trying to find any way out of the difficulty at all, but is simply standing for private ownership. If the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Cahill) wishes to back up his challenge by going into some neutral constituency and fighting the election on the principle of public ownership, he will find many a man on this side of the House to take up his gage. But on the other side of the House, I believe there is not one man in favour of public ownership.

Mr. CAHILL: What about you?

Mr. BURNHAM: I am ready to back up what I say. If any man wishes to contend West Peterborough on the question of public ownership, I will resign and go right at it. Let my hon. friend stand up and say whether he wants it done.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Government will open the constituency, I will do it.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand that he accepts the challenge?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Resign.

Mr. DUFF: I will fight you.

Mr. BURNHAM: What does the gentleman say who is waving his arm so wildly over there? What are the wild waves saying? There is no getting away from the fact that this Bill is a test of where we stand on public ownership. Whoever heard of such a thing as seriously suggesting, in discussing this clause, that the date should be changed from Thursday in April to the end of December, as if the affairs of these great corporations could be managed by such guess-work as that. Let hon. members of the Opposition proclaim one after another this afternoon that they are in favour of public ownership, and then there will be some sympathy for them not only in this country but on this side of the House. But there is not the slightest doubt whatever that they are against public ownership. They are here to express their opinions, and if they are not opposed to public ownership let them say so.

This House should manage the public business of the country, and if it is not capable of directing public corporations, it is not fit, directly or indirectly, to conduct the public business and therefore the whole system of democratic representation stands condemned by the men who rise and make such trivial complaints as we have listened to. They do not care how far-reaching or extravagant their statements may be, because they are determined to oppose public ownership and advocate private ownership, since there is more in private ownership for their friends than there is in public ownership.

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER: I have not taken a very active part in the discussion of this Bill, but I have listened very attentively to all that has been said and I am really at a loss to know why my hon. friend the leader of the Government, when he spoke last Friday, deemed it fit to make such a scathing indictment of us Liberals sitting on your left. We were asking questions simply because we desired information, and I fail to understand why he should impute to us any motives other than that, and to suggest that we were endeavouring to espouse the cause of private ownership rather than public ownership, and that we were unprogressive Liberals lacking faith in Canadian enterprises. and believing that the great Prairie Provinces did not need railways for their development. The unmistakeable inference from his remarks was that we on this side of the House did not want further extension of railways in the West, and his statements were calculated to set the West against the East. That is all I can make of it. Then my hon. friend in the greatness of his heart, and no doubt for the purpose of showing his consistency, pleaded for unity, with all its intoxicating memories. He urged us to be optimistic and to have faith in the outcome of this great period of reconstruction; but no sooner had he completed the remarks in which he made this lofty appeal than he suavely pressed the button which put into operation the air compressor of the gagging machine, thereafter gracefully making his exit from the Chamber. And now, Mr. Chairman, we have this patented infernal machine working smoothly, and to the keen delight and entire satisfaction of its ingenious inventor. I am going to be fair with my hon. friend the leader of the Government, because I should be loath to criticise him unduly; but I must perforce ask him the reason for his assertion that all of us Liberals are opposed to public ownership of railways, and why he should think it a crime for us to ask questions. Why, he himself asked for information; and I may ask him, has he not himself ridiculed the proposition of public ownership? Certainly, for he was reminded of the fact by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, and I was glad to observe that he took it in good part. I do not suppose my hon. friend will deny me the very same privilege that he claimed for himself. I do not see how I can endorse legislation introduced for the purpose of bringing railways, either taken over or to be taken over by the Government, under the control of a corporation responsible not to Parliament but to the Government of the day. There are good arguments in favour of public ownership.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER: That is all right. I have an open mind on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER: Hon. members may laugh but they will hear the rest of my statement: There are also objections to public ownership. There are arguments on both sides, and I do not question the authority of the sponsors of the Bill, the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Railways. Indeed, they may be well versed in railway matters, but in my opinion, considering the qualifications of the two hon. gentlemen, and with all deference to them, I should say that one of them is best versed in law, while the other is undoubtedly best versed in starch. It seems to me that the present Cabinet has developed a remarkable propensity for the assumption of responsibility at a rate which the public has not been able fully to follow, and I do not know how I can vote squarely on the question when we cannot get the information which we seek. Am I going to tell my constituents that the greatest argument in favour of public ownership is the revival of forty-four charters to gentlemen owning townsites and all the land on which they can speculate? I am in favour of public ownership but I want to say to hon. gentlemen who have sat here all through the discussion and some of whom, it seemed to me, were almost dead, that before I undertake to support public ownership I want the few pennies in my pocket and my watch put in a place of safe keeping. I have listened very attentively to all that has been said in regard to this Bill, and all that I have been able to gather is the fact that it creates a combination of very great power which will exercise a political sway unprecedented in our history. This legislation has been very comprehensive in its provisions. Even the headquarters are to be chosen by Order in Council. The form of railway administration proposed is not so much public as it is cabinet ownership, and the ministerial party is vested with powers far beyond the traditional responsibility of Governments. Now, I am a French Canadian, but a Canadian wherever I go. I have the honour to represent Bellechasse, the finest riding in the province of Quebec, and I come from that very spot where the first page of Canadian history was written, where Christianity and civilization made their first lodgment in that vast extent of country covered with wilderness, where the toilers of the soil converted forests into verdant fields thereby planting the first seed of Canadianism on this continent. I am a Canadian, I repeat; therefore why should I not believe in Canadian enterprise? I am a firm believer in Canadian enterprise and progress, and I resent any insinuation to the contrary.

There are strong reasons against the proposed legislation. I am open to conviction on this matter, but how am I to be convinced when the Government refuses me information? The Government's record is not one that can be accepted with good grace, is not one to lead us to trust either the financial capacity or the political honesty of the system which it represents. In this connection let me quote the opinion of an expert on railway matters, Mr. Lovatt, he says:

> There is nothing so essential to the financial peace and the commercial and industrial welfare of this country as a definite government railroad policy.

That is very good advice, let us have a definite policy, but here we are confronted by a new condition. I will be frank with the leader of the Government. Here we have the Canadian Northern on our hands, and I ask who is responsible for this?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, who, tell us?

Mr. FOURNIER: The leader of the Government must look in the direction of his associates; Toronto magnates, malefactors, and, if the expression is permissible, unscrupulous financiers. They are the men that have brought about the present condition of affairs, because they were the bondholders, and they knew that if the Government should take over this railway those bonds would be enormously increased in value and they would be saved from disaster. We now have on our hands what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) pronounced not long ago in Montreal to be a "white elephant." As I do not profess to belong to the so-called aristocracy I will state, in the common, ordinary language of the day, that the public has been handed a lemon. Who wrecked these national enterprises? Take the Transcontinental railway. We were told on the floor of the House by no less a personage than the leader of the Government that the Transcontinental line was an awful thing. But I ask, who wrecked the Transcontinental line? The Acting Prime Minister, in his remarks on Friday night, spoke of this and other railway enterprises as "dirty Liberal babies." When the Transcontinental was in operation, when my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, came into office, what was done with this great railway which was to connect the West with our Atlantic seaports, which was to carry western grain for seven cents a bushel cheaper than any other railway, and which would prove a shorter route to our ocean ports by hundreds of miles than any existing line? Have we not to blame Toronto magnates and unscrupulous financiers? It has been said that all our grain is going by the New York route. If our anticipations in carrying our western grain to our own seaports have not been realized, if the Transcontinental has not proved a success, who is responsible for it? The Acting Minister of Finance charges that we Liberals are unpatriotic. In what category should we place those who have wrecked this railway system? Does my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) think I am going to quietly listen to lectures from him in view of such a record? Not on your tintype. We are conversant with the facts and we know all about the management of the Intercolonial which is referred to frequently as a perpetual national scandal. The Acting Minister of Finance virtually says to us "Believe in all I say." The minister when he takes that position resembles a woman who was reprimanded one day by her husband. Whether she had done wrong or not I cannot say, but her husband made an accusation against her and her reply was "No, I did not do it." "You did," he observed, "because I saw you," whereupon she retorted, "Do you believe the evidence of your own eyes more than you do my word? If so, what sort of a man are you?" In the same way the Acting Minister of Finance takes the position: If you do not believe me what sort of Liberals are you? The minister has presented a very strong indictment of Liberals because they have asked questions. We have been a little bit scrupulous and hesitant about passing all the clauses of this Bill in the absence of complete information. I say to the minister that his indictment of Liberals was not to my liking and I shall, regardless of whoever it may concern, offer a little indictment of my own, and I would ask those affected by it to paste it in their hat so they may see it quite frequently. The minister says I am not patriotic. Very well, here is my reply to that:

Patrician, aristocrat, Tory—whatever his age or name,
To the people's rights and liberties, a traitor ever the same.
The natural crowd is a mob to him, their prayer a vulgar rhyme;
The free man's speech is sedition, and the patriot's deed a crime;
Whatever the race, the law, the land,—whatever the time or throne,—
The Tory is always a traitor to every class but his own.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and for whom I entertain a very sincere friendship, made the statement that this country has been handed a lemon in taking over these railways. I do not know that I particularly care to quarrel with him as to the accuracy of the statement, but if this country has to relieve the existing financial thirst to a certain extent, it must be by making a certain amount of lemonade out of that lemon. That is the only observation I have to make with regard to the so-called lemon which we have taken over. I have listened for the last three or four days to the debate on this railway question, and so far as I have been able to interpret that debate, it has been more or less on the abstract principle of public ownership. I do not intend to impute any motives to the gentlemen sitting to your left, Mr. Chairman, because if they, and if we all, looked back over the history of public ownership in this country, we might find a good deal of reason for criticising public ownership in general. But the trouble in the past has been that we have mixed politics and patronage with public ownership. Both sides of politics in Canada have done that, but I have faith enough in the present Government, and in future governments, to believe that hereafter the two ingredients mentioned will be eliminated from the compound—that politics and patronage will be done away with in connection with the administration of Government railroads, and that we shall be given public ownership in its best form. To my mind the debate on the abstract question of public ownership is entirely beside the real question at issue: no matter what may transpire during this debate, as to the good points or bad points of public ownership, the fact remains that we possess in Canada to-day nearly a billion dollars' worth of publicly owned railways, so that debating the abstract question does not help us at all in the matter. Furthermore, if we take over the Grand Trunk railway, which is very likely to happen in the future according to my reading of the trend of events, then we shall have a billion and a half dollars' worth of publicly owned railroads in this country.

One other observation I wish to make is this, that under those circumstances, considering that we have that billion dollars' worth of publicly owned railways, I consider that any blow at public ownership leads us distinctly towards national financial suicide. Transportation by railways in this and other countries is as truly a tax on the people as is a customs tariff. Railways are the highways of the country. In other words, in the old days the ordinary roads were the highways; to-day the railways have taken their place. Except in the remote past we did not permit the ordinary roads to be controlled by private interests, and to my mind it is just as much to the interest of this country that the railways, which are now our highways, should not be controlled by private interests. So that I do not hesitate to say that at least theoretically I am a public ownership man. I do not go to the extent of saying that we should to-day take over the Canadian Pacific Railway, as was stated by the hon. member for North Waterloo. I would not take that step until we have proven that we are capable of managing in a capable manner the billion dollars' worth of railroads which we now possess free of politics and patronage.

I have no horrors of public ownership in general, and one of my reasons for entertaining that opinion is that a year before the war I had the pleasure of travelling over publicly owned and controlled railways in France, Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Germany and Belgium, and outside of Italy I saw no inferiority in the handling of the traffic on those railways with the handling of the traffic on the privately owned railways in England. Therefore there is no reason in the world to my mind why we should not make good in the handling of our own railroads.

There is one other point I wish to make before I sit down, because I do not intend to take up the twenty minutes allotted to me. The question has been brought up as to these forty-four charters ennumerated in Section 20. It appears to me that Mackenzie and Mann kept those charters open because they were convinced there was some value in them. If so, why should we refuse to take back those charters for the benefit of this country? I cannot see for the life of me why we should refuse to do so for the reason that some private corporation may wish to build in future through the territory covered by those charters. Supposing it is true as suggested by some hon. members that land in the neighbourhood of the lines to be built under those charters is owned by Mackenzie and Mann or other private interests, because most of the land in the West has been alienated into private hands by various governments from time to time, that is no reason why any government which controls the destinies of this country should not use its best judgment in regard to building any of those projected lines. The granting of a charter does not constitute an order to build the railway mentioned therein; if it did we would not have so many private corporations looking for charters. In my opinion the taking over of those forty-four charters is simply handing back to the people of this country what belongs to them. I listened very intently to the different reasons advanced by hon. gentlemen, but I fail to hear a single legitimate reason why those forty-four charters should not be taken back by the people of Canada as their own property.

The conclusion I have reached is that it is the duty of every Canadian to stand up and support public ownership to the best of his ability, for the reason that if he does not do so he is hitting at a railway business controlled by this Government of the value of at least one billion dollars.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman said no Canadian would be against this Bill. Does he consider that the two million of us in Quebec are Canadians?

Mr. MANION: I did not say that no Canadian would be against this Bill; I said no Canadian should be against the public ownership principle of this Bill.

Mr. POWER: Do you consider the people of the province of Quebec are Canadians?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman will sit in this House a long time before he hears me say anything against the people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. McMASTER: I have merely a verbal suggestion to make in respect of Clause 2. During the previous debate on this section it was pointed out that the Government intended the directors should be appointed every year, should be appointed or re-appointed. That was my understanding. I fail to see that the section as amended carries out that understanding. It now reads that:

> The directors shall hold office from one annual meeting to another or until their successors are appointed—

It would seem to me that if the Government did not make the appointment the old directors would continue in office until their successors were appointed. I understood that that was not the idea of the Government, and as a way of more adequately giving effect to what I understand to be the desire of the Government, I would suggest that after the word "office" should be inserted the words "for the term of one year" and strike out the words "or until their successors are appointed." Then the section would be perfectly clear in the sense that these directors would have to be appointed year by year.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. EULER: Like another hon. gentleman who addressed the Committee, I have not had a very great deal to say with regard to this Bill, and anything I have said was, as I thought, entirely in the interests of public owenrship. I am not an obstructionist, but the mere fact that I might be called such will not deter me from using the twenty minutes which are at my command for the purpose of criticising this Bill, despite the fact that we have in vogue that up-to-date instrument of autocracy, the closure, which can be compared only with that other gag of the Acting Minister of Justice—the War-time Elections Act.

It has been stated that a good deal of time has been wasted in discussion of this Bill. Last Tuesday and Wednesday I would have said the same thing. I felt at that time in connection with one of the earlier clauses that a good deal of time was wasted; but I want to submit this, Mr. Chairman, that that time was wasted because of entirely trivial objections on the part of those in charge of the Bill to answering questions that were entirely in order. It seems to me that a good deal of the friction that has arisen in this Committee, so far as hon. members on the Opposition side of the House are concerned, is caused by a tendency on the part of those responsible for this Bill—and I refer more particularly to the Acting Minister of Justice—to refuse to give any consideration whatever to suggestions that come from this side of the House. I can remember no instance where a suggestion from this side of the House has been accepted. I am free to admit that the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill has a great deal of ability, but if I might take the liberty I would say that he will add to his stature if he will widen his outlook sufficiently to admit that some good can come from his opponents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman permit me an interruption? He is quite in error, or else he was not in the House at the time, when he states that no suggestions were accepted by way of amendment from the other side of the House. I would recall to him the fact that several were accepted, indeed, many more than from this side of the House, because many more were offered, and one was accepted which to-day, I am afraid, may have to be reversed.

Mr. EULER: I was not in the House when all these were offered, but as a general thing I believe that my statement holds good.

On Friday afternoon we had an address from the Acting Prime Minister on public ownership. I have a good deal of admiration for the manner in which the Acting Prime Minister has conducted the business of the House. He has ability, he has urbanity; he has seemed to adopt an attitude of fair-mindedness throughout. But I resent with all the strength in my power the statement he made on Friday that this was a fight between the advocates of public ownership and the advocates of private ownership. That statement—with all respect for the high office which the minister holds—was an out-and-out appeal to the press gallery. What he said may sound very well and may read very well in the press, but I do not believe that it was founded upon fact. To my mind, it was mock heroics. It was interesting as an evidence of quick conversion to the public ownership idea, but to me it was not at all convincing. One gentleman who spoke this afternoon said that none on this side of the House were in favour of public ownership. I may say almost the same thing about hon. gentlemen on the other side. I have no accurate knowledge of the attitude of men on this side, but I could count on the fingers of one hand—I would not need to use them all—the men on the other side of the House who are definitely on record as in favour of public ownership. Anything that the Government has done is no proof that they favour public ownership as a principle. We have taken over these roads not because we believe in public ownership—although I do—but as a matter of necessity; and the Acting Prime Minister is making a virtue of necessity. Would the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, if we take it over, or the Canadian Northern have come into the possession of the people had it not been for the fact that these roads could not carry on any longer and that it was absolutely necessary for us to take them over? The Government have not shown by their actions that they are really believers in the principle of public ownership. I resent also the veiled suggestion of the Acting Prime Minister—I do not know that it was a veiled suggestion; it was made pretty openly—that the members on this side are dictated to by, or are the tools of, any private company or organization, meaning the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I do not believe a word of it, and I do not think that the Acting Prime Minister does. Indeed, it looks to me that the accuser should rightly be the accused; the Acting Prime Minister said the other day that only two courses were open in this matter of railway ownership: either the Government must develop these roads which we have acquired into one great system and operate that system in competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, or the Canadian Pacific railway would itself operate all the railroads in the country. Why did he never at any time make the suggestion that the Government might some time own and operate all the railroads in Canada including the Canadian Pacific railway? Had he said that, there would be room for the belief that he is a real believer in the principle of public ownership. But the Canadian Pacific railway has been kept out of it all the way. "Do not touch the Canadian Pacific Railway;" that has been the attitude of the Acting Prime Minister. The Canadian Pacific railway is a private corporation, and it comes ill from the Acting Prime Minister to accuse us on this side of being the henchmen of the Canadian Pacific Railway when the evidence rather inclines us to the belief that that may be said of himself.

I believe in public ownership, absolutely. In that respect I may not be in accord with all members on this side; but I am a believer in public ownership on principle. I believe that the time will come when all public services upon which the convenience and prosperity of the people depend can no longer be entrusted to private interests, which often run counter to those of the people. That is my reason for criticising the provisions of this Bill. I want to see public ownership given a fair chance; I do not want to see the cards stacked at the outset in this public ownership game. I have had a little to do with public ownership in a smaller way. Ninety per cent of the people of western Ontario believe in public ownership. In my own city of Kitchener we own practically all the public utilities and have operated them successfully. In Ontario we are going into the operation of railways, and that is one reason why I think this Bill should be carefully scrutinized. I will come to that later, if I have time.

My strongest reason for making suggestions with regard to this Bill is that I believe the people of Canada are making demands for a much wider application of the principle of public ownership than we have to-day, and I do not want to see the project damned in its infancy. If it is a failure now, the whole future development of public ownership in other directions will be set back a generation or more. I believe that the time is not far distant when we shall own all the railways in this country, including the Canadian Pacific railway. The time may not be ripe for the acquisition of the Canadian Pacific railway; financial objections may be raised to that, but if we rise to our duty we shall own and operate successfully, in the interests of the people, not in the interests of private capital, all Canadian railways. I believe also that we will control telephones, telegraphs, and express services and own or control our natural resources, our oil and mineral deposits, etc. The common people may demand before many years—we see indications of it now among the working people and others—that the Government take over the banking interests, which, I believe, in many instances have hampered the development of this country and its interests. Insurance is also a question for nationalization. In a general way, it is my opinion that all those services upon which the prosperity and convenience of the common people depend will, in the end, perhaps after a great deal of difficulty, become the property of and be successfully managed by the people. Therefore let us take all proper precaution to ensure success from the outset. The Government's responsibility in that connection is truly tremendous.

The opposition which has developed to this Bill is primarily for three reasons.

The first one is the disinclination or refusal of the Government to give information which they ought to give. This has led to a feeling of suspicion on this side that everything is not just exactly as it should be. A second reason, about which I know very little and am not very much concerned, has been suggested, namely, that these forty-four charters in the West are to be used for political purposes. The most important reason of all is as to the personnel of the Board that is going to operate the national railways. We have been told—and I absolutely agree with this—that in order to make public ownership of railways a success, we must have at the helm the very ablest men in the country. Is it logical to reappoint as the managers of this national railway, men who could not make a sucess under private ownership of the Canadian Northern? I say, it is not. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) has been very persistent in his endeavours to procure information, and sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite have rather jeered at him, but what he has done has made some impression upon the public mind. Whatever hon. members opposite may think or believe, there is throughout this country a feeling of profound distrust that the Canadian National railways are still, to some extent, under the control of Mackenzie and Mann. I believe it is true that the public mind is uneasy at the thought that the men who have been taking out of this country a great deal more than they have ever put into it, still have, to some extent, their hand in public affairs in connection with the National railways. There may be no justification for that suspicion, but that suspicion is there, and the Government ought to take cognizance of it. Unless you have public confidence behind this project, you cannot make a success of it.

In Western Ontario, the people will soon develop a system of hydro-radial railways to be operated by electric power from Niagara falls. It would be a pity if the steam railroads which we have now, many of which are not being operated successfully on the branch lines, should be continued in operation in that way, and that we should have to parallel them with electric lines, operated, we shall say, under the chairmanship of Sir Adam Beck and his Hydro-Electric Commission. Here is the difficulty as I see it. The men who are going to have charge of our national railways are men who were not formerly in sympathy with public ownership. I question whether they are now. The man who will be president of the Canadian National railways has, as is well known, been in conflict with the men in

Western Ontario who are trying to advance the idea of public ownership of railways and to operate them by electricity. The two parties ought to work together, and wherever possible, the steam roads should be converted into electric roads. But under present conditions, with Mr. Hanna in charge of the Canadian National railways and Sir Adam Beck in control of the Hydro-Electric Commission, I think that is almost impossible. Let me read a quotation from the Toronto Globe along those lines, although it does not go so far as I did:

> In Ontario economy and efficiency demand the co-operation of the Canadian National railways and the Hydro-Electric Commission. The wasteful duplication of lines must be prevented, and the Hydro-Electric Commission should be permitted, when the Grand Trunk acquired by the country, to convert many branch lines into electric roads. These branches, which serve exclusively some of the richest and most populous districts of the province, are so far below the standard of the trunk lines, and so handicapped by heavy gradients, that they are much more adapted to electric than to steam traction. The Canadian National railways would profit by turning them over to the Commission, as they would continue to serve as feeders, without cost to the national system. For years the Hydro-Electric railway projects have been held up, waiting on Federal plans.

In conclusion, I would say to the Government, I believe they would be well advised if they constituted an entirely new board of directors to run the Canadian National railways. Let them pay the price and get the best men they can, men who believe in public ownership, and keep their hands off, cutting out patronage, and then there will be a chance for success.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am inclined to agree wtih the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that we have public ownership because of necessity. That necessity is forced upon this country by hon. gentlemen opposite, because it was the way the railway situation in this country was bungled by the political party which they represent that public ownership is a necessity at the present time. If we go back to the initiation of the Canadian Northern, what group of public men was it that first provided the money to get the Canadian Northern started? The gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they were in power, launched this project upon the country; they got Mackenzie and Mann committed to the work by giving them bonuses, grants, charters and all that kind of thing. The greatest offence they committed was this: that having had this great railway very largely constructed, they then started another transcontinental railway, and put something like $550,000,000 into that other line, which has become bankrupt and which the country has to take over and the effect of constructing which was absolutely to destroy the work that Mackenzie and Mann were trying to do in building what would have been a really profitable Canadian transcontinental railway. I am surprised that a sense of shame does not prevent hon. members opposite from standing up and protesting against public ownership and against the Bill before us that is trying to put public ownership in a sound position. It is they who are responsible for the plight in which the country finds itself at the present time. If, instead of subsidizing the Grand Trunk Pacific, and building the Transcontinental Railway, the party which hon. gentlemen opposite represent had put another $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 into the Canadian Northern and required the Grand Trunk to operate with the Canadian Northern, we would have had in this country to-day, or we would be on the verge of having two profitable transcontinental railways, instead of one that is profitable and two that are practically bankrupt. The greatest financial crime ever committed in this country was the inauguration and construction of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it was so regarded at the time. The then Minister of Railways retired from the Government because he would not be responsible for the policy that was then forced upon the Liberal party, and it was because of the vast sums of money spent upon what was foreseen by practically every impartial, public-spirited man throughout the country, who had no axe to grind, to be impossible of success, that we find ourselves in the tremendously difficult position that we are in to-day, and that we are forced to take over not only the Canadian Northern, but the Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific. So the responsibility rests with hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. COPP: Some of them are over there with you.

Mr. HOCKEN: The Canadian Northern is the best laid out railway in the Dominion of Canada; it goes through the best territory, has the best grades, and is the best located, and if Mackenzie and Mann had been supported in their undertaking we would have saved all or pretty nearly all of this $550,000,000, and would have had a profitable line. It sounds mighty funny to hear hon. gentlemen opposite criticising Mackenzie and Mann, because it is not very many years since, when they were in power, they were pouring money into the hands of these two men with a prodigality that was simply astounding. They started it, we all know that, and brought the enterprise to the point where the Canadian Government had either to continue pouring money into it or take it over. There was no other choice. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite stand up to-day and denounce Mackenzie and Mann, and curse everything connected with that road. So that you would almost believe they had never been in favour of it. In my judgment, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann are the greatest railway geniuses the Dominion of Canada ever had. They have laid out a line which when properly coupled up with feeders in the eastern part of Canada will be quite as profitable as the Canadian Pacific Railway; and the time will come, and in my judgment is not far distant, when public men, instead of cursing Sir William Meckenzie and Sir Donald Mann, will give them their proper place in our history as men who have performed a wonderful service for Canada. They may have got rich out of it; railway promoters generally do; nevertheless, by their genius they have given us something which will prove to be a most valuable asset of this Dominion. While I am opposed to continuing to pour out public money into private hands, I still can see the service these men have performed for Canada, and I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that they cease denouncing these two men whom they started on their career.

I have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite declaring that they are not enemies of public ownership, that they have an open mind and all that sort of thing, but I have only heard one of them say he was in favour of public ownership. The sentiment in the county of Waterloo, as a matter of fact, is such that no man can occupy a public position there unless he is in favour of public ownership.

Mr. COPP: What about you?

Mr. HOCKEN: Why I am the champion public ownership man of the city of Toronto. Everybody there will tell you that I have gone farther in advocating public ownership in Canada than any other man except the editor of the Toronto World. He was the originator of the whole cult of public ownership, but I have always been a pretty close follower. I am quite plain in declaring where I stand, but I do not hear hon. gentlemen opposite declaring where they stand. They are doing their best to-day to escape the obliquy which they expect will fall upon them for their attitude on this Bill. Perhaps that is good politics; I am not well versed enough in politics to say.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has public ownership even been an issue at a general election in Canada?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not in a federal election, but it has been an issue in some provincial elections. At all events, it is an issue right here to-day; that is the issue which we are debating.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no such issue here.

Mr. HOCKEN: The issue is whether we shall have public ownership of railways of this country, or whether public ownership shall be throttled; and the motives of those who are raising technicalities and discussing side issues are just as plain to the people of this country as they are to the members of this House. I do not like to see a man blow hot and cold; I have no use for a Laodicean. I like to see a man one thing or the other; I like to see him affirm his convictions and stand by them; and I would like to see hon. gentlemen opposite who are in favour of public ownership get up and declare themselves.

There are powerful interests in this country opposed to the nationalization of railways, and those interests centre largely in the city of Montreal. If you take as an index of their attitude the press of the city of Montreal, there are very few friends of public ownership down there. I do not know whether that accounts for the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite or not. In the province of Ontario, practically from the Ottawa river to the St. Clair, and north to James bay as far as population exists, the people are in favour of public ownership and the nationalization of the railways. While we regret that so much money has been put into the Canadian Northern, and that the road has not yet reached the point we might have expected, we are satisfied that to-day there is nothing else for us to do but to take it over, put it on a good basis, and operate it; and we look forward to the day in the not distant future when the road will pay.

Our railways, I understand, are to be kept free from politics, and I believe that the way the Government has adopted is the best way for keeping politics out of the road. I believe that the men who have been placed at the head of our railways will manage the system in the public interest.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. gentleman know who these gentlemen are in whom he has such faith?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not know them all personally but I know those who are in the chief places. They are expert railway men, and I have a very high regard for their business ability and integrity.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member know or does he believe that these men are believers in public ownership?

Mr. HOCKEN: They have accepted a public trust, and I believe they will observe it just as faithfully as the hon. member observes his oath of office.

Mr. McMASTER: May I suggest that that is a somewhat Laodicean answer?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, it is a straight answer I believe they will perform their duty towards the Dominion of Canada just as faithfully as Lord Shaughnessy performs his towards the Canadian Pacific. I think that the Government have chosen the one man for president of the road. He was in the road at the start, has been in it at every stage, and knows every detail of its business. The men associated with him are all men of ability—railway experts or financiers—who are capable of giving this country good service; but they must be supported.

I am not surprised that from the other side of the House there should be a good deal of doubt expressed as to the attitude of Canada concerning public ownership, for I find the principal Liberal organ in the city of Quebec avowedly hostile towards public ownership of railways. I think I have a right to assume that Le Soleil speaks for the party represented by gentlemen opposite, and it comes out distinctly opposed to the purchase of the Grand Trunk, which is an essential part of any harmonious and effective plan of nationalizing railways.

Mr. PARENT: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what paper he is quoting from, and the translation of the extract?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am quoting from a translation in the Montreal Gazette. Will the hon. gentleman accept that?

Mr. PARENT: What is the date?

Mr. HOCKEN: Unfortunately, I have not the date; it is Tuesday.

Mr. PARENT: You should make it clearer.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have cut out the extract from the Gazette and it reads:

> It would seem unbelievable that at the present time when Canada is weighed down with an enormous debt and finds it difficult to meet her financial engagements, and especially when we are obliged to contract a further loan of $350,000,000—

Mr. PARENT: It must be a bad translation.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not responsible for the translation. I am giving it to the committee as I have it.

> —in order to meet our war obligations, and when we have before our eyes the unfortunate railway venture of the United States, that anyone should dare speak of buying the Grand Trunk system, thus increasing the public debt by several hundred million dollars more at the present time.

That is the attitude of the chief Liberal organ in Quebec and it is only in harmony with the position taken by most speakers on the other side. As far as I can judge, the purchase of the Grand Trunk railway is an essential part of any undertaking to make profitable what we now have, and I hope that the Government will take it over. The Grand Trunk in Ontario and Quebec, joined up with the Canadian Northern in the western provinces, will make a better transcontinental system than the Canadian Pacific railway; and if the party represented by hon. gentlemen opposite had pursued that policy instead of putting $550,000,000 into another transcontinental railway we would not be in the dilemma in which we find ourselves to-day, and the Grand Trunk might still remain under private ownership. But there were men connected with that enterprise who thought they saw a big thing in it. We know how sadly disappointed they were. And there were certain people, too, who thought it would be a great achievement to enhance their reputation. So that it was carried out at the expense of the country and we are forced into the present position by necessity. I stand here to declare myself in support of public ownership and the nationalization of railways, and I hope the time will come when the Canadian Pacific, along with the rest, will be nationalized. What we have at present should be put on a sound basis, and the next thing is to take over the Grand Trunk and incorporate that with the National Railway system. After we have reached that point we might consider how much further we should go.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I want to say to the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat that the issue, as some of us understand is, between public ownership of railways and ownership by Mackenzie and Mann. We on this side are in favour of public ownership, but we want real, genuine, clean ownership, divorced altogether from any influence on the part of Mackenzie and Mann. The hon. member and some gentlemen around him seem to favour a peculiar kind of public ownership under the control of Mackenzie and Mann, but to this proposition we on this side are absolutely opposed. We have been discussing this Bill for some time, wrestling with my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice in an endeavour to have it improved, but he has not given us any information and has declined to consider any of the proposals that we have put forward. There are in the Bill a few clauses that we are especially opposed to, and we have offered a number of amendments but they have been rejected. My hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has hardened his heart and refused to listen to us and that is why there is such a desperate struggle over the Bill. If we received the information to which, as representatives of the people, we are justly entitled, and if the minister were disposed to consider the amendments which we think ought to be accepted, I do not think there would be any necessity to resort to the closure under rule 17B in regard to the passing of the Bill by the House. We are asked to revive 44 defunct charters of which we know nothing. Many of them have been passed by the legislature at Regina, and many others by the legislature at Edmonton. They have never been before this House, and hon. members know nothing about them. We asked for the route that the railways are to take, a map for example, showing what part of the country they are supposed to serve, but that information we have been denied. We also asked for the mileage, which I think is a reasonable request. I suppose there are many members on the other side who do not know any more about this matter than we do, but they seem to be willing to accept this Bill in its entirety without the slightest information at all. If there are vicious clauses in the Bill—and I contend there are—the Government will have to take the whole responsibility. Some day there will be a big railway scandal in the country, and money will be stolen, and then the people will say that if the advice of the Opposition had been taken in the debate in 1919 this would not have happened. The attempt of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and others to place the members on this side of the House in the position of advocates of the Canadian Pacific railway is very unfair. Those hon. gentlemen know that this is nothing but a slander, and that as a matter of truth the Canadian Pacific railway has always had more support from members on that side of the House than it has received from this side. At the same time, I have no quarrel with the Canadian Pacific railway, but that question does not arise at present for we are simply creating the machinery to run the Government railways that we have already acquired. If there is anything that we on this side do champion it is not any railway or any corporation, but it is the rights of the people of Canada. I may inform my hon. friend that the Liberal party were the pioneers in Government ownership.

Anything that has been done in Canada to give the people control of the railways has been done by the Liberal party. The National Transcontinental railway was one of the largest undertakings of the kind ever entered upon by this country. That is a case of government ownership. The people secured and maintained their right to the National Transcontinental railway. Gentlemen on the other side fought and voted against it, and did their best to prevent the building of this railway for the people. The appointment of the Board of Railway Commissioners is another, and very important step, taken by the late Liberal Government. Prior to that date the railways had full control and charged what rates they pleased, but the creation of the railway board gave a certain amount of control over the management of Canadian railways, and the credit of that step is due entirely to the Liberal party. If the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite are not too short, and if they will look back over the history of this country, they will find that the Liberal party have been the advocates and pioneeers of public ownership, whereas the Conservative party have been the advocates of private ownership.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have not a very appropriate leader now.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: He is a good man and quite sound on this question. We are quite willing on this side to give public ownership a fair trial, but the necessity for caution can be understood—I have no doubt the Minister of Railways himself has some misgivings—owing to the experiences which we have had in the past. Public ownership of railways is not a new question in Canada, we have had forty years experience of it, and it has not been a very successful experience. We have not succeeded very well in the past as regards public ownership, but I hope we may do better in the future. The Intercolonial has not been a very great success; it has not developed Eastern Canada, it has been to a large extent a drag on the progress of that part of Canada for the last forty years. For eighteen years the former Conservative Government, dominated by that great statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald—were so unprogressive that they were content that the Intercolonial should end in a field opposite the city of Quebec. They took their traffic up to this field and dumped it there and gave it to some other railway to carry. However, a change took place in 1896, a new Government came into office, a progressive Minister of Railways took charge, the Drummond County railway was purchased, and by means of it the Maritime Provinces were connected with the commercial metropolis of this country—the railway was extended to the great city of Montreal. Not only that, which was a really great step, but we got improved trains, we got a fast freight service, and a great done was done to make public ownership acceptable to the people of the Maritime Provinces. The question of branch lines had been before the country for many years. For twenty-five years the people of the Maritime Provinces kept asking the Government to build some branch lines for the benefit of that part of the Dominion. No steps were taken to accede to their request, not that the branch lines were not needed, not that it would not have been a good commercial policy to have carried out what was asked for, but the Government was afraid to build one branch line for fear the construction of twenty or thirty more would be asked for, and it would get them into trouble. The consequence was we got no branch lines from the Government in the Maritime Provinces, and any that were constructed were built by private enterprise. That was owing to lack of enterprise on the part of the Government. I hope we shall do better in future. I think it is the duty of members on both sides to make as good a Bill of the measure we are now considering as we can, and to stand by Government ownership and try and convert it into a success. But, as I said before, there are difficulties in the way. We have a case of Government ownership in this city in the shape of the Printing Bureau. Has it been a success? On the contrary it has been so badly managed that the Government appointed a royal commission to investigate it. That commission made a report and told us the Bureau was permeated with graft, incompetency, and inefficiency. It told us that men were employed in that institution and written down as proof-readers, who could not read proofs and could not do anything at all to earn the money that was being paid to them. That shows what Government ownership may come to if it is in the hands of an inefficient Government. Take the case of the construction of ships by the Government. We embarked on the building of tramp vessels. A ship called the Voyageur was built and launched in the Vickers yards at Montreal last November, and a great display was made at the luncheon on that occasion. Speeches were made and——

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has made one statement that is not quite correct. The commission which investigated the Printing Bureau did not report in any way that there was graft in connection with the institution.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Perhaps I was wrong about the graft, but the inefficiency was clearly demonstrated, and the institution was proved to be a great failure, although it has been under direct control of the Government. When a man takes wages for work that he cannot perform it is closely allied to graft. However, I was referring to the ship construction policy of the Government. This ship to which I referred—

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend, I know, would not like to leave the House under any mistaken impression. The report of the commission to which he referred declared that the state of things of which he complains had obtained ever since the institution of the Bureau and during the regime of successive Governments since then.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I did not state that the Bureau was not inefficient during the term of the former Government, I do not know that, but it is certainly inefficient at the present time, and this Government has been in power long enough to make it efficient. If my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) is in charge of the Bureau it has done him very little credit. If he had the courage to appoint a competent foreman at the Bureau, told him to dismiss every man that could not do his work, and replace them with efficient employees, and make that foreman responsible for getting the work done, he would not have any trouble, but he has not the courage to do that.

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend does not wish to do me an injustice, and therefore he will permit me to interrupt him and make this remark: I would say that practically within the first two months of coming into charge of the Printing Bureau I did what has never been done, placed this matter in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, who, under the Act which empowered them to carry out a re-organization, appointed the commission referred to, the idea being that the time had come when the Bureau should be reorganized, and this process is now under operation.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am very much pleased to hear that my hon. friend has awakened and is going to do something. I do hope he will be successful. All the same he would have done better if he had placed the Bureau under a competent foreman. I was speaking of the matter of government ownership of ships, and pointing out how important it is that we should have efficiency and good management if we are going to adopt the policy of government ownership. The vessel to which I have referred was launched, speeches were made on the occasion, and we were told that she was to be the pioneer ship and that a great development in Canadian trade would be the result. A private owner would have taken . that vessel down the river St. Lawrence before the ice formed and winter set in, but what did the Government do? They sent her down to the city of Quebec and she lay there from the date she was launched in November until about the middle of January. She was fitted out with groceries and supplies in Quebec and lay there until the river was frozen over and filled with ice.

She was then despatched down the river, but only got as far as Father Point, when she was stuck in the ice. The Government sent the Montcalm down to extricate her and the Montcalm also got stuck. Then the Canada was sent to the relief of both vessels, and she got to within fifteen miles of the others when she stuck fast also. A request was then made that the Prince Edward Island ferry should be sent up and liberate the three steamers from the ice, but the Railway Department very wisely refused to accede to the request. However, a storm came and broke up the ice and freed the vessels, and the Voyageur finally arrived in Halifax, where she lay in a damaged condition and finally had to go into dock to be repaired. The other day, when we asked what she was doing and where she was located, we were told she was engaged in carrying sugar at a very low rate of freight to New York to help the refiners there to compete with the refiners of Nova Scotia, Montreal, and elsewhere throughout Canada. The Government also informed us that they had purchased another steamer called the McKee. We were anxious to know whether the McKee was engaged in developing Canadian trade or not, and made inquiry. What did we find? We found that the McKee had been sent to carry coal from New York to the west coast of South America, to Chile, for an American firm, and that she is going to take back fertilizer to New York, being chartered by the month. That is the way in which the Government is developing Canadian trade. We are expending fifty millions this coming year in building ships, we are told for the purpose of developing Canadian trade, and the start that the Government has made in that direction is in the manner I have described.

That shows that Government ownership in the hands of an inefficient government may be a great handicap instead of a benefit to the business of the country.

We are proposing to unite in one system four great lines of railway---the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, involving an enormous expenditure of money. What is the Government's idea of the management of that great system? They are handing it over to a man (Mr. Hanna) who made a complete failure of the Canadian Northern system. He and his associates succeeded in getting a lot of money out of the people of Canada through the Government of the day, but they made a wreck of the enterprise in the end. And the reasoning of the Government seems to be this: That having failed in managing one railway, we will hand over to this man and his associates four railways forming one of the largest railway systems in the world, and we will put that system under their control. The advice of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was absolutely sound, that we clear up the old wreck altogether, that we get a new name for this system, and place it under new management. Is not that a reasonable proposal after the experience the country has had for the past twenty years of the Mackenzie and Mann people? Why do the Government refuse to follow that advice? Is it possible that my hon. friend the leader of the Government is still doubtful of the success of government ownership? Is he looking forward to the people of Canada becoming so disgusted with public ownership after a few years under such management that the old team will get the property back again? Is that his plan? A few years ago he was not in favour of government ownership. He is a recent convert, I believe, of my hon. friend from South York. He went to see him at night, like Nicodemus, and my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) converted him in a kind of way to government ownership, but he seems to be as reluctant as Nicodemus was to be born again, and I do not believe his heart is in this proposal of government ownership. He is said to have told his friends in Toronto some years ago that those Governments which were taking away from private interests the things that belonged to them were adopting the methods of that old Hebrew tyrant, King Ahab, who expropriated Naboth's vineyard. I do not know whether he has changed his real sentiments or not since he joined his present associates and got his legs under Jezebel's mahogany. Perhaps he may think so still, but that is a matter I would not venture to express an opinion on. However, it looks very suspicious when we see the Government insisting on so much control by the old Canadian Northern Railway management of this new system that we are now proposing to set up.

Now, what would a private concern do if they purchased a bankrupt company? Would they continue the old management? Take the two Ontario banks that are being wound up at the present time, to the sorrow of their stockholders. Would the liquidators maintain in control those who wrecked those banks? I say no, they would do nothing of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have to direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact that his twenty minutes have expired. He may continue on another clause.

Mr. TURGEON: Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the debate has turned on the question of public ownership of railways. If the advocates of public ownership were to be counted in this House, we would have to come to this side to find a goodly number. Nineteen years ago when we were advocating the further extension of the Intercolonial Railway with a view to extending the principle of Government operation, we were handicapped by the then Opposition, composed chiefly of members from Ontario, every one of whom was opposed to Government ownership of railways except my hon. friend from South York, who since then appears to have made some converts in his province. During the twenty years that I have been a member of this House, and for twenty years before that time, I have advocated that the Government of Canada instead of paying out money to private interests to build railways should undertake the work itself for the benefit of our people. We have paid excessive bonuses and made extravagant grants of land to railway promoters, and if we had retained those moneys and lands we could have built the railroads and Canada would to-day be in a better position than she is after her experience of private ownership.

The province of New Brunswick gave a quarter of its timber lands to a provincial company to build a railroad crossing the southern part of the province, and that grant has been a hindrance to the prosperity and development of the province ever since. We gave millions of acres of land to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of their very prosperous line, but I might remind this House that if the Government had now in the treasury the millions of dollars which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has for the last twenty-five or thirty years realized upon those lands we would be able to build the Canadian Pacific railway and make it an equally prosperous undertaking, provided we had as economical managers as those who have been in control of that company up to the present time. If my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior had to-day in his possession the lands which are still in the possession of the Canadian Pacific, he would be able to provide for the settlement of every one of our Canadian soldiers, and so give them the chances they are looking for to-day.

I was most amazed when on Friday a couple of hon. members on the other side of the House passed reflections upon hon. members on this side and suggested that we were opposed to nationalization of railroads, although every one of my hon. friends opposite had been opposed to the principle until very recently; they have been converted, they say, by the necessities of the day. We have heard the hon. member for Springfield—whom I regret not to see in his place—say that he also had been advocating the principle of nationalization and that it was due to the maladministration of the Liberal party that railway affairs had come to such a pass—that, figuratively speaking, naked infants had been left on the doorstep of the Government and had to be taken care of. Yet, he himself in 1912, one year after the change of Government, was busy in Winnipeg seeking to bring the country under the rule of Liberal administration. I was amazed at the language of the Acting Prime Minister last Friday night when he attempted to defend his case, which he evidently found not sufficiently strong. The member for Springfield had referred to the children left in nakedness on the doorstep of the Government. The Acting Prime Minister, who generally uses fair and proper language to express his sentiments, went further and said that these were dirty, filthy babies. Evidently he had forgotten that previous to 1911 he, as well as the then leader of the Opposition and the members of the Conservative party, thought that these children were in a healthy condition and growing sturdy and strong. The best evidence of the prosperity of the country at that time, and therefore of the railroads, was the attitude taken by my hon. friend and the then leader of the Opposition when the Liberal leader and the Liberal party proposed a measure of reciprocity with the United States, with a view to providing greater freedom of trade for Canada. They said, "Do not touch it; let well enough alone". My hon. friend saw those children then clothed with the mantle of prosperity; to-day he says that they are dirty, filthy babies. Hon. gentlemen opposite say this simply because it suits their own purposes. The Administration that succeeded that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911, in the course of two or three years, drew back the country from the state of prosperity which it had enjoyed for fifteen years and put it into a state of uncertainty and retrogression, back to the position in which it had been prior to 1896.

Hon. gentlemen say that the Intercolonial had produced deficits. But it must be remembered that in a country like Canada, with its thousands of miles of territory from one ocean to the other and from the United States to the Arctic, great lines of railway were necessary; and these could not be expected to pay from the start. Neither can we expect this new company immediately to put the railways of Canada in a paying position. But the development of the Intercolonial railway has been good not only for the Maritime Provinces, but for the western provinces as well. During the first years of its operation it was not developing very much the interests of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It was carrying at cheaper rates the products of the manufacturers of Ontario and the West and taking care of trade that would otherwise go through New York and Boston. Thus the Intercolonial railway has contributed to the prosperity of the whole of Canada. We do not expect this new corporation to produce immediate surpluses, but it is the nucleus of the nationalization of railroads and we on this side of the House desire that it be placed under the control of the people through the Parliament of Canada. The member for Kamouraska(Mr. E. Lapointe) moved an amendment to the Bill which would have made the operation of these national railways more democratic in this time of democracy. But instead of trying to bring about more democracy in the administration of our railroads, hon. gentlemen opposite wish to establish an autocratic administration behind the curtain of democracy by placing this company outside the reach of the people. Another amendment was submitted to provide that one or two representatives of labour be on the directorate of the new corporation. But hon. gentlemen opposite professedly devoted to the public interest in the nationalization of public resources, could not see their way clear to accept this amendment. Can we not find in the ranks of labour, men with sufficient knowledge and ability to give the benefit of their experience to the other members of the directorate of this company? To have done this would add to the confidence of the people in the new corporation.

Hon. gentlemen say that we are opposed to the development of the West. I have always said, and I say it again to-day, that no member of this House, no man in Canada, is more devoted to the development of Western Canada than the modest member for Gloucester. My heart and soul are in Western Canada. I am a member of this Parliament, but I am also a citizen of Canada. We are not here to be sectional; we are here as Canadians to work for the good of Canada as a whole, and when we advocate the development of the resources of any part of the country it is with a view to the general benefit of Canada. In this Bill there is a list of forty-four charters which are to be renewed. and when we ask for information, it is said that we are against the advancement of the West; that we are not optimistic about the West. No one in Canada is a greater optimist as to the immense resources and future of Canada than I am. For some years before the war things had come to such a pass that the railroads, of which the minister to-day speaks so highly, had practically ceased operation, and one-half of their freight cars were stored away in the divisional points in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. In 1914, conditions became so disastrous that the Government, finding itself going down so fast, was about to take the plunge before the country rather than wait for another year, when war was declared which, from an economic standpoint, saved Canada for the Government. The moment the list of charters was brought before the Committee, the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) stated that the schedule included a charter for a railway in his constituency, the renewal of which charter might perhaps mean the ruin of that portion of Alberta. He wanted an amendment, but he could not have it; he was told simply that later on, when the Estimates came up, he could vote against the item. But if he voted against the Estimate, his county would be deprived of that line of railway. If he wanted the location of the railway changed, he would have to bring in a new charter, and consequently, there would be duplication. Speaking of duplications, the duplication that has brought Mackenzie and Mann to ruin is a duplication made by this Government from Edmonton to the Pacific coast, a duplication of over 700 miles of railway in the most difficult and expensive portion of Canada for railway construction. That duplication was made directly after the Liberal Government had, in 1911, refused to grant permission to Mackenzie and Mann to duplicate the Grand Trunk Pacific from the same point to the Pacific coast, a duplication which would have diverted the trade of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Canadian Northern, a trade, which, in the estimation of our late regretted leader, would not for years to come be sufficient for two lines. If that duplication had not taken place, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the country would have been in a better position to-day, and the Grand Trunk Pacific would not have been in the hands of a receiver.

At six o'clock, the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Section (2) agreed to.

On section 3—capital stock:

Mr. PEDLOW: I should like to read this section:

> The Governor in Council may declare that the company shall have a capital stock, with or without shares, to such amount as may from time to time be deemed expedient. All such stock shall, until otherwise ordered by the Governor in Council, be vested in the Minister of Finance on behalf of His Majesty.

It is closely connected with other clauses of the Bill, some of which have been passed. With clause 12, for instance, which grants power to transfer to the company the stock or controlling interest of His Majesty in any railway company; with clause 23, which grants power to construct and operate railway lines; with clause 26, regarding the issue of securities; and with clause 29, granting power to acquire securities of other companies. The Government are seeking very extended powers indeed for the Governor in Council, who may confer unlimited control on the directorate by order in council. I called the Government's attention to these wide powers when the resolution on which the Bill is founded was under discussion.

It seems to me unreasonable for the Government to ask power that the Governor in Council may declare that the company shall have a capital stock. The country will have to pay for everything, and it seems almost ridiculous to ask for this power. In the second place, if this power is granted, there is no provision in the Bill determining the amount of capital stock which the Governor in Council may transfer to the company. I think this should be named in the Bill. As it is, succeeding clauses give the Governor in Council power to transfer this stock from the Minister of Finance, holding on behalf of His Majesty, to the company to any amount desired, and the company may do almost anything with the stock and with the moneys raised from its sale, transfer or hypothecation. They are given power, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to construct and operate railway lines and so on. Clause 26 gives the company almost unlimited powers regarding the issue of securities. For these reasons I fail to see any necessity for the section we are now discussing; and even if the stock is granted, I contend that the amount should be named here. We know that the Canadian Northern was capitalized at $100,000,000, on a 60-40 basis, the Mackenzie and Mann interests getting 60 per cent and the people of this country the other 40 per cent. That is quite recent history, and every one knows that as a result of that arrangement this country has had to pay $10,800,000 to obtain possession of the company's holding, nowithstanding the fact that after a thorough investigation the stock itself was declared to be of no value whatever, and that for it not one cent had been paid by the holders.

I think we should incorporate in one section of the Bill the names of the directorate. At present we do not know to whom the management of this great company will be entrusted, and it is only fair that we should know. Extensive reference was made to this point in the press in the fall of 1918. We read in the Globe that the predecessor of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) declared that unless he had his way and secured the appointment he would tear things up by the roots, meaning, of course, that there was trouble in store for the Union Government if they did not carry out the arrangement made in the election campaign of 1917.

I might repeat what I said on Friday night regarding the references made by the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) and some of his followers to hon. members on this side of the House, which references have been made again this afternoon. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to understand distinctly that they have no justification whatever for saying that we on this side of the House are opposed in any shape or form to public ownership of public utilities.

Mr. MICHAUD: I hate at this moment to speak under the regulations of closure. It reminds me of the modern history of some countries beyond the seas, where people are gagged and unable to speak when they wished. Mr. Chairman, we have spent only a few hours on this Bill, and in my judgment every minute employed has been time well spent, because this is a gigantic enterprise for Canada to undertake. We have been spending too much money on railroads and not enough on harbours, and navigation, and forestry, and fisheries. Let me quote from an Ontario newspaper of 26th April, a despatch concerning a statement the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) made to an Ontario delegation which came to see him about harbour improvements:

Ottawa, Ont., April 26.—That Canada has devoted too much attention to railways and not enough to water transport and that "a horrible mess" has resulted, was the declaration of Hon. F. B. Carvell, Minister of Public Works, yesterday afternoon. He was answering a delegation from the London district which asked for harbour improvements at Port Stanley and in the course of his remarks said: "I know of nothing in which we are justified in spending public moneys so much as in improving methods of transport and I have to say that heretofore water transportation has been neglected entirely too much. We have gone ahead building railways and we have built too many. I am not saying who is to blame—the whole country probably is to blame. The result is a horrible mess and the Government is compelled to take over lines."

I think we have enough railways and that we should begin to develop other methods of transportation. We have to send our products out of Canada and in order to reach our markets we must have proper water transportation. We have a debt of probably $2,000,000,000, or $250 per capita; and there are 14,000 miles of railways that belong to the Dominion, or one mile to every 300 of the population. In view of these facts, is it not time that we seriously considered the importance of any measure involving the expenditure of large sums of money on further railway development? At one time I was in favour of public ownership of railways, but my experience of the service rendered by Government-owned lines has been such as to compel me to change my view on this question. While travelling on a Government train one winter we were held up for a couple of hours at an inconvenient place, and in reply to an inquiry as to the cause of the delay the roadmaster informed me that they were having a difficulty with the tanks, which were frozen. They were obliged to dig into the brook, to cut out the ice and pump water into the engine. I asked him why the tanks had not been repaired, and his reply was that they never got satisfaction from the Government. That is one example of the results of public ownership. To give another illustration, I may say that I was recently in the yards of the railway in the town where I live, and there was a train composed of about forty-five or fifty cars with one engine trying to start it from nine o'clock in the morning to three or four in the afternoon. I asked one of the railroad men why it was that there was only one engine and his remarkable reply was: "We cannot get orders from headquarters."

Mr. J. D. REID: What date was that? Can you give us any information as to when this happened?

Mr. MICHAUD: I may inform the hon. minister that this matter was brought to his attention, and it has been remedied to a certain extent; but I must say that on the International railway to-day there is no possibility of any successful operation under Government ownership. To-day owing to the unsatisfactory operation of the railway it takes three days to receive a reply to a letter mailed to a point six miles distant, I read this morning in the Campbellton Graphic of April 24 an article under the caption "Better Service Needed." It reads:

The mail service along the International Division, C.N.R. serving settlers between Campbellton and St. Leonards, is a most wretched one and should not be longer tolerated; on account of the poor service on this railway, mail is greatly delayed and the settlers in some districts, send their mail by other routes if they wish to reach Campbellton promptly.

The train service is also deficient and with the change of time, a daily express service should be inaugurated.

Why not restore the service which pertained under private ownership, that is an express over and return the same day. Certainly, there should be a daily express train on this route.

Before I support the public ownership of railways many matters must be explained beyond any question of doubt. Of course, I may be wrong, but so far I have seen nothing but disappointment in the service rendered by railroads under such ownership. I desire to read some of the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister on Friday in reference to this matter. He said:

I have been abused many times in this House on account of my railway policy,—

Abused, why? Simply because we ventured to debate for a few hours section 20 of this Bill, which involves millions of dollars. Forty-four defunct companies are to be revived, and we were at sea as to how much money would have to be spent on the railroads, and very naturally were seeking information on the subject. It was denied us, however. And yet the Acting Prime Minister, in the face of this, charges us with abuse of himself. Let me continue the quotation:

—and I have often thought: What have I done that I am so abused? I found a couple of half-starved babies on the doorstep of the Finance Department when I went in there, puling weakly creatures, ill-dressed, dirty. Well, we have them here to-night, and they are not bad looking children.

Well, whatever credit these infants may be to their progenitors, and while they are somewhat dirty, I would like to know who nursed and fed them and what sort of food they were given. Was it Borden's condensed milk? If haply hon. members do not apprehend the point, I beg to say that my meaning is that the Government are responsible for these dirty babies. I do not think it will do any harm to repeat that we cannot afford to spend much more money on railways, and the people cannot bear further taxation.

We read also that there are strikes everywhere throughout this country. Why? Because of the high cost of living. I blame this Government for not taking the proper steps to reduce that high cost now that the war is over. We need a good administration of railways, and I am sorry to say that the Government in that regard has not pursued the policy calculated to achieve success.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: When the discussion on this Bill began this afternoon we were treated to a very eloquent speech from the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) declaiming against the Government for having made an effort to promote the passage of the measure by introducing the closure, and we heard a great deal from the hon. member, in a manner peculiar to himself with regard to the application of the gag and the consequent inability of members to discuss the Bill on its merits. To demonstrate his sincerity in that position the hon. gentleman occupied about seventeen and a half minutes in discussing every subject under the sun but that of the Canadian National Railways, and about fifty seconds in discussing a matter having any reference at all to the clause under discussion. He was followed by member after member on the same side of the House. I listened to all of them attentively, and but one reference did I hear to clause 2, and only an incidental reference to any other part of the Bill, except that made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). There must be a reason for this, and after trying to determine what it might be, I have reached the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite find they must do something to extricate themselves from the difficult position into which they have brought themselves. The only thing they can do is to throw sand in the eyes of the public by shouting "Gag," in regard to the measure, with respect to which they cannot offer any constructive suggestions or any solution for the problems with which we are confronted. The Bill is an honest effort to provide means by which the country may relieve itself from the tangle into which men—of whom the hon. members opposite are the official legatees—through incompetence and reckless extravagance, if nothing worse, plunged it in the years that have passed. It passes my understanding, how men can declaim, as they have done and are doing, against the actions of this Government, not only in connection with the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Northern Railway, but as regards the men who built and managed the latter system, some of whom are now in the employment of the Government, managing the Canadian National Railways.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) referred to the incidence of taxation that would result from the incorporation of a board of directors to manage the Canadian National Railways and taking over of railways as has been done and will be done to a further degree. He did not say anything, however, in regard to the incidence of taxation that is resulting and will continue to result from the $500,000,000 that has been wasted in the construction of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railways. On one or two previous occasions in this House I took the liberty of saying that we were not likely to get very far in the solution of these problems by harking back to what has taken place in the past, but if hon. members insist in keeping these matters before the House there is only one thing to do and that is to answer them. The situation we are in to-day with regard to railways is the direct result of the iniquitous policy —nothing more or nothing less—that was pursued in railway construction during the regime of men of whom the hon. members opposite profess to be the successors. How are we going to get out of the position in which we find ourselves? We are forced to take over these railways whether we like it or not. It is not a question of whether a man is in favour of public ownership or not, it is a problem that we cannot get away from. I will come to the matter of public ownership in a few moments. We have these railways on our hands, and we must manage them, if they are not going to be a burden that will ultimately sink this country into bankruptcy. The Government is proposing to incorporate a board of directors to manage the railways free from political interference, if that is possible. I believe that it is possible. Notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased to say, I believe that we can find in this country men of sufficient public spirit and ability to manage the Canadian National railways and manage them efficiently. The present general manager, or president, and the present board of directors of the Canadian National Railways have been held up to ridicule in this House and all kinds of inefficiency has been charged against them and even their honesty has been called in question. It was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) that we were placing in charge of the Canadian National Railways men who had made an utter and hopeless failure of the Canadian Northern. We also have the statement of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) on Friday last with regard to the management of the Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific railways:

> If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morphy) wants to know the difference between the building of railways in the days of the Laurier Government and the building of railways to-day, it is simply that in our time there was competency and capacity in the railway administration, whereas to-day there is recklessness and incompetence.

There is recklessness and incompetence in the management of the Canadian National Railways and there is recklessness and incompetence in the construction and management of the Canadian Northern Railway, while according to the leader of the Opposition there was efficiency in the management of the Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways. The Canadian Northern Railway was built simultaneously with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. It was just as good a railway, with a much better location, and was built for less than one-half the money that was put into the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railways. Although I may be a few miles out, I think that 9,555 miles is the approximate mileage of the Canadian Northern, and with a reasonably fair equipment it was produced for approximately $400,000,000. On the other hand, we have about 4,000 miles of line, without any branches or equipment worthy of the name, that has cost this country $500,000,000, and to complete it and make it possible to operate, will bring that cost up to $550,000,000. Yet the leader of the Opposition contrasted the men who were responsible for that $550,000,000, or $125,000 a mile, with Mackenzie and Mann, who were simultaneously able to build their line as it is to-day for less than $40,000 per mile, and whose system was managed by Mr. D. B. Hanna.

How can hon. gentlemen square these two statements? I have stated before, I repeat it now, and I challenge contradiction, that there never was in this or any other country a railway of the same character produced or the same amount of money as the Canadian Northern railway. In that railway this country has an asset that is second to none on the American continent —not even to the Canadian Pacific. And that railway system was carried on under the management of the man who is now president of the Canadian National railways. I do not know whether the present president may be the best man—it may be that this Government or some other government may find a more capable man—but until he has been given a fair trial, there is no man in this House or out of it that can raise his finger and point to one thing in the record of D. B. Hanna and say that it has not been in accordance with good railway practice.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to ask him a question at this point, especially as we cannot get any information from the ministers, and apparently he is a railway expert. He tells us that this road was built economically and was well managed. Will he explain why it could never pay its way?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I was just coming to that, and I am glad the leader of the Opposition has raised that question. The Canadian Northern railway for the two last years for which an accounting is available paid all its operating expenses and between three and four million dollars towards the interest on its bonded indebtedness, a record that in the same period of time has never before been accomplished by any transcontinental railway in America. What has been the record of the Grand Trunk Pacific road that the leader of the Opposition himself says was constructed and managed economically? Only in the last two or three months, as he knows, the management of that line said: Unless the Government comes forward with ten or fifteen million dollars we will cease operation, because we cannot earn enough money to pay the wages of our employees. Is that right or is it not?

Mr. McKENZIE: I had no reference whatever to that road.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: What is the Transcontinental east of Winnipeg doing?

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. member wants to do me justice, I had reference to the expenditure of money by the Government so far as the Government had control over it; I had no reference to any company whatever.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I am willing to admit that under the arrangement made for the construction of the Transcontinental the Government had very little control—or, at least, if they had any control they did not exercise it; that is certain. If hon. members opposite wish to go into a discussion of what took place in connection with the construction of the Transcontinental, well and good. I am ready for a field day in connection with it.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty million dollars went into graft.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I do not know where it went, but I have said before and I repeat it now, a hundred and twenty-five million dollars went into something that was not building a railway.

What we are trying to do is to find a solution of our railway problem, and to that end the Government has brought before the House a measure to incorporate a company to manage our national railways. Let me repeat again, that if D. B. Hanna is not the right man, and if the present Board of Directors are not the right men, there is a means in this Bill by which we can get the right men. What this House and the country must do is to face this issue squarely. Give the management an opportunity to bring the roads all into one system, develop them as they should be developed, and if that is done the Government has an excellent transportation system. It is true that in order to be fair to the railway itself we will be forced to write off the money that we have ourselves thrown away. But that is not a matter that need now concern us. Having read this Bill from start to finish, I can see nothing in it but what is consistent with a reasonable effort to place these railways on a basis where they can be efficiently managed free from political influence. In reading the discussion that has taken place we find that hon. members opposite, one minute demand that the Canadian National railways be taken out of the influence of politics altogether, but in the very next breath they say: We do not want to permit the Board of Directors to pass even a by-law as to how they will conduct their business unless they come before Parliament for the sanction of that by-law. That is the kind of discussion that has been going on all the way through the piece.

Let us see what the situation is. Hon. members have stated that this country is burdened with what the Canadian Northern has cost and will cost. We have a present liability of possibly four hundred and fifty million dollars in connection with the Canadian Northern, and we will be called upon to expend on maintenance and equipment and on terminals possibly an additional hundred million dollars, and we will be called upon to construct branch lines to give the people of the adjacent country an efficient service and gather the traffic necessary to make the railway pay. In order to do that we will again have to spend money, but so long as we keep that expenditure within proper limits in relation to the producing capacity of the railway, which in the final analysis depends on its mileage, the country has nothing whatever to fear. I believe that the leader of the Opposition and hon. members opposite will agree with me that in ten years from now with proper management the Canadian National Railways will not only be paying their way but will be producing for this country a handsome revenue.

One word with regard to public ownership, because that qusetion has been brought forward and there has been a manifest effort to have members declare where they stand on it. My recollection is that the hon. member for Maisonneuve referred to a declaration by Lord Shaughnessy in regard to public ownership, in which he declared himself very emphatically as opposed to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not in the speech I quoted to the House.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I was not able to notice that the hon. member quoted anything from Lord Shaughnessy that would show us a solution of the difficulties in which we find ourselves to-day. No man in this House or out of it has a greater regard for Lord Shaughnessy than I have, and for the splendid system of transportation that has been built up under his genius, but when Lord Shaughnessy or any one else comes before the Canadian people and offers a solution for the present railway problem he will be talking about something practical; so long as he simply declaims against public ownership as a theory it is merely so much idle twaddle. We cannot get away from the present condition of affairs. Would the hon. member for Maisonneuve or any one else suggest that we hand over all these lines to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Would he suggest in the alternative that we should hand them back to Mackenzie and Mann and the Grand Trunk, take the burden of a billion dollars of debt and give them the earning capacity of the road? If not, what other solution is there? The only other thing we can do is to take these roads and operate them. If any member of this House will show me a way by which we can get back to the position we were in before the duplicate transcontinental lines, the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental, were projected side by side, I would say with the hon. member for Maisonneuve; I am in favour of the private ownership of railways. But the hon. member knows as well as I do that that is an utter impossibility. It would be a financial tragedy to put all the railways in Canada under public ownership at this time. The time may come when we shall be able to do that. We now have an opportunity, in this Canadian National Railway Company, of demonstrating our ability to operate publicly-owned railways. There is this saving situation,—we have in Canada, without any exception, the finest, the best-equipped and the best-managed railway system in the world.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) says that the party which I have supported all my life and which I now support, is responsible for the present railway situation. I prefer, if I may do so without discourtesy to my hon. friend, to take the history of railway development in Canada from the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) who has made a study of this matter and whose accuracy and fairness will be admitted by members on both sides of the House. In an eloquent speech which he delivered some days ago, he said that frankly he believed that both parties were responsible for the present railway situation; that the Liberal party had done things which he thought unwise and improvident in connection with railway development, and that the Conservative party had done likewise. The Liberal party had the excuse that whatever they did that was unwise or improper was done when there were bright days in the Canadian horizon; when there was promise of great increase in the population and development of the West; but the Conservative party helped the Canadian Northern railway by vast subsidies and allowed them to build towards the West from Calgary when wise people could see that they were throwing money away. That is the difference, as I see it, between the railway policies of the two parties.

The next point upon which I wish to animadvert for a moment is the testimony which the hon. gentleman gave as to the high character of those in charge of the Canadian Northern railway. Whether the management of the railways under the Canadian Northern Railway Board—for I think it amounts to that—is good or not, it will not affect very much, at least personally, the interests of the member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). I understand that his mills are served by the railway company whose late president was the head of that company for which he has such a great and proper admiration, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

In a moment of haste, the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) the other night was unkind enough to suggest that because the members sitting on your left, Mr. Chairman, did not acclaim the arrival of this Bill in the House with loud huzzas they must be prompted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Such a statement was unworthy of the Acting Prime Minister. But do I to-night hurl back warm words across the floor of the House? No. Christianity bids us forgive. Besides, we know under what heavy responsibilities the Acting Prime Minister is labouring. We know that what he said was said in a moment of nervous exhaustion or nervous irritation. He is bearing upon his shoulders a burden that should not fall upon any one man. Think of it; in a Cabinet which has grown to the swollen proportions of twenty-three members he has to bear two men's jobs and fulfil two men's duties. The work of leading the House and acting as Prime Minister is enough to tax the mental and physical power of any one man. But besides that, he has resting on his shoulders the administration of one of the most responsible departments, that of Finance. Is it any wonder that he is crushed beneath that load? I charge this Government with inhumanity in that with a Cabinet of twenty-three ministers they allow one man to do two men's work.

The Acting Prime Minister is trying to do something which every man of experience will acknowledge is an impossibility, that is, to court two ladies at the same time. He is paying attention to Lady High Tariff and Lady Low Tariff—or perhaps it would be better to say that they are paying attention to him. They are pressing their attentions upon him in such a way that I am sure he often says:

> How happy could I be with either,
> Were t'other dear charmer away.

Of course, his business friends in Toronto are high tariff people, and it is nice to think as your friends do. Then he is a man of education, of information and broad intelligence, and of course the policy of a low tariff must appeal to him.

Now, perhaps I have wandered for a moment from the exact subject under discussion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: No one noticed it; even the diligent member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) did not call me to order.

I may be asked: Are you in favour of or against public ownership? One of the members from Toronto who addressed the committee a few moments ago was scandalized at the idea of any one not being for public ownership: why, public ownership is thought well of in Toronto; that should close the discussion. But the member for East Algoma who probably knows more about engines and railways than most of us know, says very frankly that personally he is for private ownership, but that we are face to face with a condition under which we are forced into public ownership. I agree with him. We are forced into public ownership and we have to see how we can make a success of it. So let us not have this great vaunting of superior political virtue because we are for or against public ownership. The conversion to public ownership of those whose faces I now look into is of most recent date. It was said that one of the Frankish kings became converted to Christianity and that his armies were converted by regiments and were baptised by platoons. That is very much the condition in which hon. members opposite find themselves in regard to public ownership. If they have all the zeal for public ownership which some of them display, it is the zeal of apostates who have recently turned from another political belief—or I should not say political belief for it is a question not of party politics but of economics. Many gentlemen on the other side, had they possessed the courage and frankness of one of the members for Prince Edward Island, would have risen with him when a vote was demanded on this question.

It has been repeated to me time and again by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that we are face to face not with a theory, but with a condition: How can we make public ownership a success? Every man in the House wants to make it a success; yet if it is not a success I do not think anything short of bankruptcy faces the Canadian people. What must we do? First, we have to change the mentality of the people in the matter of their rights and their obligations towards the Government. What have we generally found in the past? Let me illustrate by a story. Some years ago a member of one of our provincial governments was fishing on a salmon river when a telegraphic despatch was brought to him. The messenger was treated with all the kindness which kindly men show to those who do them a service, and then he was asked by this provincial politician: "What do I owe you, sir?" The man said: "Well, Mr. Smith, who is going to pay for this, you or the Government?" If it was the man personally, the messenger charges were to be low; but if it was the Government, the messenger charges were to be high. That, I am sorry to say, has been the mentality of the Canadian people, and perhaps of people throughout the world. That mentality must be changed. The people of Canada, if we are to have an independent, sound, economic existence, will each have to say: What can I do for my country?—rather than: What can I get out of my country? It being a fact admitted by all, that example speaks louder than precept, how has this Government helped to raise the people of Canada to the altitude which I have just indicated? When Union Government was being formed, certain men had to retire from public life in order to make room for others. Did they retire into the modesty of private life? No. One was made a Lieutenant Governor; one was made a Chief Justice; and then we were told that patronage had been abolished.

What has been the attitude of this Government as regards the newspaper press? We would have thought that, when Victory Loans came to be floated the Government might have asked the newspapers, as a matter of patriotism, to give great advertisements for the Victory Loans; the Soldiers' Settlement scheme and so on, if not free, at least, at low rates. What did the Government do? On the one hand, they presented the newspapers with cheaper paper, and, on the other, they gave them payment for advertisements at higher than ordinary commercial rates.

The next great point and one insisted upon by the Acting Prime Minister was that the people must have confidence in the administration of this great railway. I cordially approve. But what is the basis of confidence? Frankness. Have we had frankness? The other day we asked for information as to where the Canadian National railway was buying ties, and we were told that it was not in the public interest that such information should be given us. Not only was it in the public interest that we should have that information, but the information was withheld from us because private interests interfered. Those ties, about which the question was asked, had been purchased by the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), or those responsible to him, from the Northern Construction Company. Moreover, the Northern Construction Company represents the Mackenzie and Mann interests, and the price at which those ties were bought was higher than should have been paid for them. Because my information is to-day that that construction company is going around from dealer to dealer in ties and getting ties at several dollars less than the stipulated price which they are to get from the Government. It is the same game of the middleman again, making money out of the people of Canada.

We have been told that we should have absolute confidence in this board because they, forsooth, know a good deal about the management of the Canadian Northern in the past, and because the Canadian Northern has, in the past, had a management that will bear investigation. May I just give an illustration which comes under my own personal observation? Some time ago, a firm of Philadelphia bankers, 9 p.m. for which the firm that I was associated with then acted, had bought certain bonds of the Canadian Northern elevator at Quebec, which was a Mackenzie and Mann concern. Those bonds were endorsed by the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway; the money for them was paid over into the hands of the Mackenzie and Mann interests, the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway, and was used in the development of that line. Sir Donald Mann, then just plain Dan Mann, assured one of the Philadelphia bankers that, as long as Mann had one dollar, the interest on those bonds would be paid. The interest on those bonds was not paid; but that is not the gravamen of the offence, because any one is liable to a financial reverse. But when we applied to the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway to implement their endorsement on those bonds, we were told that in endorsing those bonds they had gone beyond their charter powers; and it was not until we had obtained a judgment against them in the superior court and in the court of review, and we were on the eve of having the case tried in the Supreme Court at Ottawa, that they settled. That is one fact I am giving to the Committee, and it is by reason of such things as this that the Canadian people will not be satisfied until the Mackenzie and Mann control of the past is eliminated from the control of the Canadian National Railways for the future.

There must be economy in administration, but I find no evidences of economy in this Government. I find that they are not cutting down the Estimates as they should. I even find—if we may explain or illustrate a large thing from a small—that when the ministers are indoors, they allow their automobiles to go on puffing, waiting until they come back, instead of shutting off the engines and starting them again.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friends laugh, but let me tell them that while economy is made up of small things, economy in itself is a big thing. It was Bacon who said: "Economy is a great revenue." Well, it is not a revenue that this Government will ever enjoy.

We want to have the management of these roads divorced from politics, and that is quite right, but how are we going to do it? No suggestion has so far been made. We must do it in one of two ways. There will be thousands and thousands of employees of the national system, when it becomes fully developed, who will be sufficient in constituency after constituency to turn the balance. What we shall have to do will be either to introduce proportional representation, in which I am a strong believer, or do as Australia did, create a couple of constituencies in which the railway men would vote—they would, of course, have to vote by mail,—in order that the Government would not have the temptation, on the eve of an election, of raising the pay of railwaymen throughout the country in order to get their votes.

There is another thing in which I think the Government has lamentably failed in spite of suggestions made by hon. members on this side of the House, and that is in giving representation to the workers on the board of directors of the Canadian National railway. This should be done, because experience teaches it, and it is what Great Britain has done along the lines of the Whitley report. I offer these suggestions with the best will in the world for the success of the Government railroads, in which we are all vitally interested; and I hope that, although it would appear from the faces of many I see before me that the good seed I am sowing is falling on stony places, or on stony hearts, there are some who will profit by them.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: For a few moments, I intend to address the Committee as one who believes in public ownership, and most of all, as one who believes in public ownership at this moment and as the means of dealing with the railroad problem now before the people of Canada. Public ownership is in the air in English-speaking communities throughout the world. The Mother Country, Great Britain, saw fit at the beginning of the war to take over the railways; she has them now, and she will never part with them. We have it on record that the present Prime Minister is preparing now, with the aid of the Government, for absolute and public ownership of the railroads of Great Britain. He knows now that the only way to have the loyal support of the railroad men of England to the Government and the railway system is to establish a national system of railways. What did the United States do? At the beginning of the war they took over every railroad, and they have them yet, and are now working on a plan, not to give the roads back—that will never be done—but to improve and complete the roads, consolidate and co-ordinate them, supply money for their improvement, and run them absolutely in the interest of the people. They are adopting public ownership, not as a secondary measure, not as something to be resorted to in time of trouble, but absolutely on its merits. Great Britain is for public ownership, the United States is now for public ownership, and our co-dominions, Australia and New Zealand, have had public ownership for many years and are so well satisfied with the system that you could not get them to change it. Wherever public ownership of railways has been tried, the great democracies of the world to-day all insist on keeping the roads public-owned; they do not want to part with them. South Africa has been built up on public ownership, and the regeneration of Africa under the leadership of England is absolutely based on a Cape-to-Cairo railway, which will be the property of the Empire for the furtherance of the trade of the Empire and the extension of its settlement and influence. Look at all the great countries of Europe. Germany organized herself into the power she was in the war largely on public ownership. She may have lost the war, but she did not lose it by reason of her public ownership; in fact, she got her strength in the war largely from the public ownership of her railways. The evidence of all mankind is not that the people of different countries are apologizing for public ownership, but that they are taking to it because it is the one thing absolutely necessary for the settlement of their transportation problems. So I am not coming here to apologize for public ownership, or to be afraid to state my belief, and in particular I am not going to be a bat; and I want to tell the House what a bat is. A bat got into an argument with the other animals as to whether he was a bird or an animal. As occasion suited him, he said he was an animal or a bird. At one time he would say: "I am an animal. Don't you see my nose is like a mouse's?" When he saw things going another way, he would say: "I am a bird. Don't you see my wings?" But all the time he was a bat. Are the public men of this country to be bats? The people of this country want to know where you are, whether you are a bird or a beast, whether you are for public ownership or against it. For heaven's sake, don't be a bat. But that is the case with a large number of men in this House. It is not the case with the people of this country. They have seen and learned what has taken place in other countries, and are all for public ownership. I should like to see some man get up here and say: I am against public ownership, because of the experience of all the countries of the world that have adopted public ownership in the past and have practised it and found it, as they think, to succeed.

Coming to Canada, what ought to be our position in connection with the railways of this country? We have heard the question discussed a good deal, but I want to approach it from this point of view. We have the railways, which give the service and are represented by the shareholders; we have the people, who pay for the service, and they are largely interested. But in English-speaking countries—and it is only in English-speaking countries it has come about—in connection with the railroads we have developed not only the shareholders who own the railways, and the people who use them and pay the traffic charges, but, in America, and Canada especially, we have developed what is called the railway magnate. These magnates, or executives controlling the roads, have always been against public ownership, and have tried to persuade the shareholders that public ownership is against them; but they have not been able to prove that. They have always been able to prove, at least they think so, that it was essential that the conduct of the road should be left in the hands of the magnates. But the United States has got rid of them all, and we are getting rid of them in this country, and the last remnant—I speak with all due respect of Lord Shaughnessy and his associates— the last appearance in this country, of the railway magnate who dictates both to shareholders and the public is in the Canadian Pacific Railway. I give them credit for the way they have run their road, but the Canadian Pacific Railway must bow to its fate. It must be absorbed and I am ready any day, in order fully to achieve public ownership in this country, to take the Canadian Pacific over, and to guarantee just as good management to the public as the Canadian Pacific has given us as a private-owned road. We can get the men to do it. I am ashamed to hear my fellow-Canadians in this House say: We cannot trust the Canadians; we cannot trust democracy in this country with the public ownership of railways. I want to tell Lord Shaughnessy and his friends in Montreal, and that other lord, Lord Atholstan, who is also against public ownership, that they have not got the people of Canada with them. The people of Canada believe in public ownership. They know they can get competent men from amongst our own sons to run our railways. The Canadian Pacific will have to bow to what is coming and come in with the other roads.

Another thing has taken place, and it has been mentioned only incidentally in this House to-day. The largest holder of shares in the Canadian Pacific railway to-day is the Government of Canada. The people of Canada the other day took over, I believe, $20,000,000 of the stock of the Canadian Pacific that had been forfeited because it was owned by German shareholders.

I want to tell the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific another thing: If they continue to listen to these magnates like Lord Shaughnessy, instead of looking after their own interests, they will come out at the small end of the horn; but if they are wise they will sell their shares to the Canadian people. The appeal I make now to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific is this: Now is the time to sell and get the best price you will ever get for your road. Come in with the other railways, and the people of Canada will have a great national system with all the railways run for the benefit of the country at large.

I want to speak to my friends from the West. Transportation is the great question in this country, but rail is only one means of transportation. If we go into the public ownership of railways, we must nationalize the steamship lines as well, and until we have done that we shall not have really solved the transportation problem. The evidence of the whole world to-day is that there must be nationalization of transportation not only by rail but by water also. One is the complement of the other. Transportation now is not merely national; it is international, and the real solution of the transportation problem of the world to-day is a joint transportation on an international basis of public control and public ownership. There is no other solution, and the evidence I give to my friends from the West is this: While, by the service of the Railway Commission we were giving to the people of this country, and especially to the people of the West, reduced freight rates, every dollar of reduction that the railroads gave was taken from the farmers of the West by the private-owned steamship lines of the world.

Transportation is a wide and far-reaching question and there is no solution of the problems involved but public ownership. When you have public ownership you are absolute master all the time, and your chief objective is not profits but good service to the people and, after that, good treatment of the men engaged in the service. To this is largely due the progress that is being made in Great Britain to-day in public ownership. The workmen and the coal owners see it, and we must accept it here gladly and not with any apologies. I do not think we should hear any more apologies for public ownership. Can any one go into Ontario and apologize for public ownership there, after the experience we have had with the Hydro Electric? What is Canada deficient in especially in Ontario and Quebec? It is power for the railroads. On the other hand, what is Upper and Lower Canada rich in? It is water-power. And we are allowing that water-power to pass into the hands of private corporations. I think we should keep it for the proper supply of the roads, and when we have public ownership of the roads and of the rivers of the country we shall have the cheapest possible transportation. The worst record in the history of the world in railroad matters is the record of the control by the private capitalists and the private executives of the American railroads. They made a colossal failure of it from start to finish. They wrecked and looted the roads and left them in the dust; and if the American nation has to pay to-day for the roads it has taken over it is because those roads were looted and allowed to run down. They were robbed and were never co-ordinated nor consolidated, nor were they concentrated in the public interest, but were operated for the special profit of the individuals who happened to control them.

Now, we are going to start with the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, and we may bring in others. There are a number of lions in the way, or at least so it is said; but we have to approach the problem apart from politics, and I think the Government are making a fair effort to do so. I have heard them criticised, but still they are making some headway. They are doing what the people of Canada have asked them to do, and if they refuse to do it, there will inevitably be an accounting at the next election when the issue will be: Are you in favour of public ownership, or are you opposed to it?

I have in this House for many years expressed as well as I could my views in favour of public ownership, and I have been sometimes discouraged by lack of response in the House. But the response from the people has always been unequivocally in support of public ownership. My advice to hon. members is not to trim on this question but to find out where they stand and to insist that the Government in power shall carry out public ownership on progressive modern lines as is done in other countries. Is Canada going to stand aside after what all the other nations of the world are doing? I have heard a good deal said about the application of the gag, and it reminds me of a little incident in Canadian history. The first Jesuit who spent the winter outside of what is now the city of Quebec had very little experience of the country, but after spending a winter in the woods, in the course of his narration of his experiences he made the following striking statement: "S'il y a du froid, il y a du bois,"—if there is cold there is wood. As regards the gag, all I have to say is that the attitude of the people on that question is summed up in an epigram somewhat similar to that of the Jesuit: If there is obstruction in the Parliament of Canada, there is the closure. I am not here to justify the closure, but I want to say that the people desire to have this Bill put through. There is nothing else to do but to approach the situation, to vote the money, to stand the loss, and let those who are responsible bear their responsibility. Both parties are more or less worthy of blame in that matter. I know that some hon. members, at the very beginning of this awful trouble, did put in a protest in the House, and it is on record. Man after man whom I have seen in this country talking in favour of public ownership at one time blocked it; but they have come around, and especially those in the Government to-day are trying to support the measure. Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side may have a good deal of justification for what they say, while hon. members on this side may approve their own recriminations. But that is not the question, and what the people are concerned in is a solution of the transportation problem on the best possible lines, recognizing that transportation is made up of river and rail, sea and land. In France there is a Ministry of Communications, by which they mean railroads, telegraph lines, express and telephone, and all the other systems of communication associated with them. Now, we not only have a national system of railways coming into our hands, but we are going to have steamers and telegraph systems which we must nationalize. We must also have a national express and a national parcel post. And in this connection I would like to know what the Government are doing. For two years I have waited to see some sign of a nationalizing of the splendid telegraph system in their hands. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) had an opportunity ten years ago of giving us an Imperial cable service. It was not carried out although it should have been, and I think it is important that we should have an Imperial cable service to meet the growing demands of communication. We must have a great system of communication in all these things, and must recognize that the underlying principle of all these matters is public ownership, administration and responsibility. Let us make a start so that the world may know that Canada really has faith in public ownership of her communications and transportation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very pleased indeed that my good friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) scented a debate on public ownership and hastened from Toronto to Ottawa. It is always a pleasure to listen to him and I must give him this credit: That for the period of twenty-three years during which I have been in this House he has been very consistent on this issue and has steadily advocated the policy of public ownership. But on that question he is somewhat of a doctrinaire——

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Thank God, there are some of us.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —and I am always afraid of that, because a doctrinaire may sometimes take his mirage for a reality. However, I am bound to say that on some phases of this particular question of public ownership I am not afraid to take sides with my hon. friend. He has just referred to the State control of cables. I was accused the other evening by the Acting Prime Minister of being in favour of private corporations and standing for private corporate rights in this House. He has evidently forgotten the history of the last few years because when I was in the Government, and since I have had a seat in His Majesty's loyal Opposition, I have always preached in favour of the State control of cables. I had, as Postmaster General, the clear evidence that in this country the consumers of the cable, if I may use the expression—or the users, but "consumers" is perhaps a better expression—were being mulcted by the cable ring, and I advocated in England and in Canada, in company with other men—Mr. Henniker Heaton, for instance—the establishment of an all-British State-owned cable. We have not yet succeeded in that enterprise, but I hope that as a result of this war the Governments of Great Britain and of Canada will see the necessity of having a State-owned cable, with the nerve centre in London, so that the news of the day can be disseminated, without being tainted by foreign influence, throughout the various portions of the British Empire. Moreover I say that as we are going to have a still larger British immigration to our Western Prairies, it is important for these settlers that we should get a cheap cable rate. But that is not the question at issue this evening; we are speaking of the Canadian Northern, and again I wish to state to the Committee that I never, in the discussion that took place last week, pronounced myself on either public or private ownership. I did not offer any solution. I admit—with both sides of this House, with my leader, and with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat—that we have to face a condition and not a theory in this matter. We now have the Canadian Northern. Two years ago we were obliged, after many and many sacrifices made on behalf of that company by the people of Canada, to expropriate the company. We had to appoint an arbitration to go into the affairs of the company, and since that arbitration the control of the Canadian Northern system has come into the hands of the Dominion Government. Therefore we have to face an existing condition, and, nolens volens, we are forced to accept to-day the administration of that system of railways. What I blame the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) and the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) for is, that they stated on Friday last that this was a fight between corporation interests and public ownership. That is not the case. The objections that were raised against the policy of the Government were two-fold: first, the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) objected strenuously to clause 16 because in that clause parliamentary control of the expenditure, the vast expenditure of money which the administration of this railway system will compel, is taken away; second, we were shocked, to say the least, when the Government intended surreptitiously to revive forty-four wrecks belonging to the old Canadian Northern Railway without informing the Committee of the mileage involved and of the probable cost of the construction of those lines. I do not say that the Government intends to build these forty-four lines, but whether the Government, or whether the board, of which Mr. Hanna is president, intends to build them or not, the House is entitled to know the mileage involved and the probable cost of them. I added as an argument, which has not been refuted, because it cannot be refuted, that whether you spend money or not on these forty-four lines, you affect thereby the credit of Canada, and if there is one thing in economics which ought to be sacred to the Government of the day it is the national credit. When you go to foreign markets to borrow money, as you will have to go for that purpose in the future as you have done in the past, the money-lenders will take your ledger and they will say: What are the assets and what are the liabilities of Canada? They will look into Canada's financial position carefully, and they will know the obligations assumed by the Government for the near future. Do you imagine for one moment that if you seek to borrow money from Kuhn and Loeb, or from Morgan, of New York, that they will not inquire what are the assets of the Dominion and the liabilities as well? Sir, I say, as a Canadian and as a patriot, having the interests of my country at heart, the Government should shrink before adding that enormous possible liability to the ledger of this country. These were the objections that were urged against the two clauses of the Bill, and I see no reason in the world why the Government has imposed the closure in restraint of discussion. No one on this side of the House, and I say it to my friend the acting Minister of Justice, will recede from the necessity of passing this legislation, but we want legislation that is fair to our own reputation and fair to the people of Canada. I say that Government ownership is not an issue in the House to-day, and it was not an issue last week. That was a bogey raised by the ministers because at the present moment there is a popular fancy in some of the provinces in favour of Government ownership. The Government is anxious to please the great province of Ontario where that policy is popular to-day. The Government also wishes to please the western provinces by lavishly promising the construction of forty-four lines in order to pass its budget without any tariff reductions such as are called for in the West.

Before declaring myself in favour of Government ownership of the railway system of Canada, as I stated a moment ago—and my record is well known—so far as regards our cable system I am in favour of Government ownership, I wish to say that it is a question of circumstances, it is not a hard and fast rule which you can impose on the people. We must be guided by circumstances and, as wise men, we must be above all guided by the experience of two peoples, one supposed to be the shopkeepers of the old world and the other the keenest business men of the new world. I refer to the British nation, and to the American nation. I am surprised that I, with my French blood coursing through my veins, who am not supposed to be a business man, should have to repeat this elementary truth to a majority of my fellow members who belong to a race of cold, matter-of-fact men, men whose business ability and business honesty have been known from time immemorial. Those business instincts have made both Great Britain and the United States of America the great commercial countries they are to-day—I repeat, I am surprised to have to recall to my fellow members such an elementary truism that before adopting such innovations we should be guided by the experience of both Great Britain and the United States. My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) this afternoon cited the example of France in favour of Government ownership of railways. I know something of the railway system of France, and I say to the members of this Committee that that Government system has been a fiasco. But now let us take the precedent of the United States and of Great Britain. The other day I gave the House some facts and figures with regard to the United States Railway situation, but let me once more recall to hon. members a few further facts and figures which were given recently in Montreal by a gentleman who is a Canadian by birth, Mr. Mitchell, who has become in the great business centre of New York one of its leading men. Speaking before the Canadian Club in Montreal he said:

> Notwithstanding the increase in rates, which were far greater than private management had ever dreamt of asking, and which produced a greater gross revenue by $865,000,000, the people of our country, after suffering inferior service, were called upon as tax payers to advance $210,000,000, the amount by which the net earnings failed to equal the guaranteed rental. In other words the American people paid $865,000,000 more in rates for inferior service and were taxed $210,000,000 in addition, so that the true cost to the people of one year of Federal operation amounted to $1,075,000,000. With these figures before you I need not repeat that the popular passion for Government ownership and operation has materially cooled during the past year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has been the experience of Great Britain? We are guided in political affairs by the experience of the Mother of Parliaments. We are guided in commercial matters by the business principles of the British people. Well, Sir, what is the experience of Great Britain? I find this information, not as my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) said this afternoon, in his mild and smiling way, in Le Soleil of Quebec, but in that great Toronto weekly, Saturday Night:

> A statement on the condition of the railways of England was recently made in the House of Commons by Sir Eric Geddes. He said that after four years of Government war control the roads are in a semi-paralyzed financial condition and that the Government is now losing $1,250,000 a day in operating them. Further statements made by an authority who has been visiting England are that the railway employees, including the workers in coal mines and industries supplying materials to the roads, have in effect confiscated the properties. The whole English railway system to-day is potentially bankrupt. The burden of meeting the deficit in operation and paying the rental to the owners is being carried by the public treasury. That is, the increased labour cost is being met by the English people through taxation.

This is not my invention, this is the dictum of Sir Eric Geddes, who to-morrow, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to know, will be the principal of McGill University. What does he say further?

> Beginning in October, 1914, and running to November, 1918, there were eight successive wage increases, varying from three shillings to six shillings per week, and totalling thirty-three shillings—$7.40. Thus was added $275,000,000 to the payroll. At the end of the war, when Lloyd George appealed to the country for a vote of confidence, the railway unions made a renewed demand for an eight-hour day. This was granted. Thus was added $125,000,000 more to the payroll, making a total increase in wages of $400,000,000, or 160 per cent. The payroll had been increased to $650,000,000, as compared with total railway revenue before the war of $680,000,000. In addition, there was a very large increase in the cost of coal, steel and other material, adding $140,000,000 more to the operating expenses.

In all the operating expenses have been increased to $970,000,000 per annum. Including rental or interest on investment, the total cost of producing transportation is now $1,220,000,000 as compared with $680,000,000 before the war, an increase of about 80 per cent.

No increases in freight rates have taken place to offset increased costs of operation, the increase of 50 per cent in passenger fares early in the war being a measure of restraining travel. This increase probably added $100,000,000 to passenger revenue, bringing it to $780,000,000.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Will the hon. gentleman pardon me if I ask him to confirm his statement? It is a comparison between war times and peace times.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend believes that peace times will give us a cheaper administration of our railway system, he is more visionary than I thought he was.

Mr. BURNHAM: What alternative does the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just one moment, and I am through; I have only twenty minutes. It is all very well for my hon. friend from South York to say, as he did a moment ago, and as my hon. friend from East Algoma said in the fair statement he made this evening, that Ontario and the West want Government ownership. But give to Ontario and the West a few figures as I have done this evening, and you will find that the business sense of the people of those provinces will make them pause and ponder before launching Canada upon such a venture.

My hon. friend spoke of telegraphs. I am for cable ownership, chiefly for Imperial reasons. We know from experience that the Pacific cable can be made to pay. But what is the report with regard to Government-owned telegraphs? With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall take two or three minutes more, and then I shall finish.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Michaud): With the consent of the Committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the United States, Congressman Aswell, of Louisiana, introduced a resolution for taking over the wire lines. The United States Government has had the wire lines under its control for some time. Here is the published statement of Congressman Aswell:

> I am the author of the resolution that was made the basis of existing law taking over the control of the telegraph and telephone wires for the duration of the war. I believed in it heartily and worked for it faithfully, but I am very frank to state that I am greatly disappointed and discouraged to note the increase of 20 per cent, ordered on telegraph rates. I am not yet ready to admit that any such increase is justifiable or necessary.
> This means the death knell to Government control or ownership of telegraph, telephone and railroad lines. I owe it to my people and to Congress to apologize—

Yes, after experience, he has to apologize.

> —for my resolution if Government control means increase in rates.

The best means so far has been devised for the administration of our public utilities, for the administration of such a public utility, as a railway system, is the Railway Commission, which controls the rates and gives ample satisfaction to the people. But the facts are facing us; we must take the Canadian Northern, and, in the name of all that is honest and sacred let us give an administration that will meet with the hopes of the people; let us vest that administration with such powers as will not be above the control of the representatives of the nation in Parliament. It was stated a moment ago that the Liberal Government was lavish in its expenditure in connection with the railway companies. Let me say, in justice to the dead statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that he at least never granted one inch of Canadian land to a railway company, whereas the Tory party by their subsidies created all the land barons of Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: Like all the others on that side of the House, the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has wandered far afield. One idea I got from him, however, was that Government ownership is not an issue. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should make an assertion of that kind, because no bigger issue is engrossing the minds of the people than that of Government ownership of the great railway lines, under consideration in this Bill. I agree that the theoretical question of public ownership is not exactly an issue now, but public ownership as involved in the condition that Canada finds herself is certainly an issue. The issue is forced because the railways have been put upon the country. I do not propose to go into any avenues of complaint as to how they got there. The member for Maisonneuve says that the Government wants to please Ontario and the West. Why he puts Ontario in when not one of the railways in schedule No. 2 is situated in the province is very hard to understand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend does not want to be unfair, I know. It was on the abstract question of government railway ownership that I said that the Government, by raising that issue, was trying to please Ontario and the West—not on this particular railway question.

Mr. MORPHY: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, and will take him on his remark that it was to please the West. In the schedule of the Bill it is proposed to take over forty-four charters in respect of lines running through fertile lands in the Western Provinces, charters which were applied for by other railway interests and are said to be of great value in the linking up of branch lines with the main trunk lines of railway that this country has to maintain and operate. When the hon. gentleman speaks of the West, my mind goes to what the West is. Twelve or thirteen of these lines are in Alberta, twenty-three in Saskatchawan, four in Manitoba and four in British Columbia. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman does not like the West.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the contrary.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY: He cannot really understand how any one could say a good word for the West. The other night he complained bitterly, almost to tears: All this money for the West and nothing for Quebec. How it pains him to see that splendid West on the threshold of further development. I was struck by the remark of the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in reference to the vast resources of Canada. My mind immediately went to the great province of Alberta crying as one in the wilderness for branch lines to open up its splendid resources. But the member for Maisonneuve says: Nothing for Quebec; therefore starve the West. Consider alone the natural resources of Alberta. Alberta is rich beyond the dreams of avarice. I was astounded when I looked at the figures; in that province they are operating two hundred and seventy-nine collieries which produced, in 1916-17, 4,648,604 tons of coal—all this with their meagre facilities, with their trunk line of transportation crying out for branches. Over four million tons of coal from a country almost unknown from the point of view of coal. Underneath the soil of Alberta which bears the golden wheat there are gold mines in coal, beyond the dreams of any one here. These are the fields through which these branch lines will run; from them they will draw inestimable trade to the trunk lines and will develop, in grain and in coal, tremendous traffic for the Government railroad. But the hon. gentleman says: Money there? Nothing for Quebec? How low will hon. gentlemen descend in their arguments—arguments that do not savour of high public spirit? To the West we all look forward as the great harbinger of prosperity in the future, as the real feeder of the Empire in the days to come. Yet the hon. gentleman says: Everything for the West, nothing for Quebec.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) has been much more frank than the member for Maisonneuve, because he has told us where he stands with regard to public ownership.

He has no confidence, no faith in Government ownership as applied to this Bill; he has no confidence in anything this Government undertakes. Therefore, he is willing to risk not only the prosperity of the West, but the success of the scheme, simply for small political advantage, and nothing more. The other night, the hon. gentleman put himself very clearly on record as regards public ownership. He said:

> I was never in favour of Government ownership. There can be no mistake about where I stood. I am not in favour of it now; as I think private enterprise will do better in these matters. Particularly in colonization and development, will private enterprise and private energy do much better than Government ownership.

The leader of the Opposition is decidedly frank. The hon. member for Maisonneuve argues against public ownership, because, he says, if the Government take over the charters, that will prevent private enterprise from building these railroads. While pretending to be in favour of public ownership, he argues for private interests because he says that the taking over of these charters by the Government will prevent private enterprises from building these railways. Thus, we have two members on the Opposition side opposed to public ownership. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) says: I have no earthly use for public ownership; I am absolutely opposed to it, first, last and all the time.

A back-bencher from Ontario, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler)—and I do not see how he can sit on that side on this great issue—tells the front-benchers they are all wrong. Thus we have, on the other side, the front-benchers against public ownership, the balance afraid to speak, and one voice alone crying in the wilderness scolds them. What a happy family are hon. gentlemen opposite upon this question? I feel very strongly that the people of the provinces throughout the Dominion, including Quebec, are, as one hon. gentleman said to-night, in their very hearts and souls, actually and honestly, in favour of Government ownership as regards this great railway system. Why? What else is there to do? We have the roads placed on our shoulders, and they must be operated by the Government, or, if not, by whom? Will hon. gentlemen opposite, freeing themselves from this destructive criticism, tell this Committee some plan whereby this system, which in the meantime is a great incubus, but which, in time, will, I believe, become a great public project, redounding to the welfare of this country, may be successfully operated under the conditions which confront us to-day? I will give place to any hon. gentleman opposite who will tell us just what alternative there is; I am willing to sit down in order to give him an opportunity to state one. You see, Sir, the fatuity of the situation. Hour after hour, for days, we have been called upon to endure factious opposition, the wasting of the time of the House and the country without one alternative proposition being given. If hon. gentlemen opposite would even say: We have a plan, but we will not tell you; but they have not sufficient temerity for that. Here we are as a Canadian Parliament submitting to destructive criticism hour after hour and day after day. What time was there ever before in the history of Parliament when the closure should have been applied to such absolutely futile destructive criticism of hon. members who are not talking even to the clause before the Committee?

Mr. ROBB: If the hon. member will allow me, I will tell him that the Government had a plan submitted to them not later than the month of February. I am quoting from the report of the annual meeting of the Grand Trunk railway held in London, England, on the 21st March, 1919, at which the president makes the statement, that they offered to the Government—

> —an exclusive arrangement for the exchange of traffic at North Bay with all the Government lines, including, of course, the Grand Trunk Pacific, thus affording the Government lines in the West access over the Grand Trunk to all eastern points, and offering at the same time to work all the Canadian lines in the East at cost.

Mr. MORPHY: I am sure the Committee will be delighted that somebody has got up. Where is the leader of the Opposition on the subject? Has he approved this plan? Does the hon. member who has spoken say that that is a good plan? See him smile. Will either he or the leader of the Opposition take the responsibility?

Mr. ROBB: What does the hon. member himself say about it?

Mr. MORPHY: I have not studied such a chimeric proposition presented by such a half-read resolution as that. The situation is one of great concern to the country; the country's interests are vitally wrapped up in it. And I once more say I think it is a pity, indeed, a shame, that the time of this Committee should be so taken up by futile criticism, without one constructive plank in the platform of hon. members opposite, who show by their paucity of resource, their lack of progressive measures, their absolute inability to put some plan forward, that they are not to be taken seriously; and I think they should be condemned for taking up the time of the Committee in what is nothing short of absolute obstruction to one of the greatest measures which the Dominion has ever had before it.

Mr. PELLETIER: Much has been said as regards public and private ownership. I do not believe that is the real point at issue; but on the other hand, since the Government is ready and willing to operate, as owners, all railway lines, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific, public ownership is, in my opinion, bound to play its part in the drama. I am far from being ready to vote in favour of Bill No. 70. To begin with, we on this side of the House are only desirous of getting information as to who will be named as directors, what their salaries will be and so forth. It took us about an hour the other evening to learn that Mr. Hanna's salary was $25,000 per annum. Further, I do not believe that by taking over these roads the country will be better off, because the company will demand enormous sums of money to repair the roads and put them into good running order. Then it will be discovered that we shall have a very heavy deficit every year, and what will be the decision of the Government then? They will say: This is a losing proposition; we will turn the roads over to private enterprise. And the roads will then be turned over to the same monopolists, the Government's friends, and the public will be the losers. We also asked who were the owners of the tracts of land through which the forty-four roads, the charters of which the Government wishes to revive, will go. We have been unable to get an answer, but I can safely say that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann are the owners of thousands of acres alone. I shall state further that Mr. Mackenzie's sons own thousands of acres of land in those districts, and the information given my by the friend of one of the hon. members on your right, Mr. Chairman, who went West to buy land for cultivation was: These lots or plots of land belong to Sir William Mackenzie or Sir Donald Mann or Sir William Mackenzie's son. Why did they and other speculators secure so many acres of land? In my opinion it was simply because they were aware of the Government's intention, and felt absolutely safe in acquiring this land. There is no use asking further questions on this Bill, Mr. Chairman, because since the "infernal machine," the closure, has been set to work "mum" has been the word on the other side of the House. The Government is very anxious to load up the country with debts even though we now owe over $2,000,000,000. Who are the world's bankers, may I ask? The treasurer of our neighbouring republic recently announced that the United States has advanced further sums to the Allies as follows: Great Britain, $100,000,000; Roumania, $5,000,000; Serbia, $268,000. This with previous loans makes a total loaned by the Americans to the Allies of $9,138,829,000, and of this $4,236,000,000 went to Great Britain. Is not this enough to make us sit up and take notice before taking further action? I sincerely hope that it is; but there is no use in hoping in this case, for the simple reason that the question has been already decided. The closure is working and the Bill will pass whether you like it or not, but I shall certainly take pleasure in voting against it because I consider it against the best interests of the country at large.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I did not intend to say very much in regard to this Bill, but it has involved so much discussion in connection with Western Canada that as a representative of that part of the country I feel it is my duty to say something.

I was very much surprised to hear the arguments which were brought forward by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), complaining about any expenditures which might be made in the West, and I was equally pleased to hear the forcible arguments of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) setting forth the value of that country. We need railway construction there. The province of Alberta is rich in wheat lands, in timber lands, in mineral lands, in coal lands, in asphalt deposits; it is so rich in natural resources that I believe in the not far distant future it will be one of the leading mining, as it is now one of the leading agricultural provinces of the Dominion. An hon. member (Mr. Morphy) from Ontario has referred to the coal production of that province. Although the province of Nova Scotia, from which the hon. leader of the Opposition has the privilege of coming, is one of the greatest coal-producing provinces in this Dominion, and has been engaged in that industry for many years, for decades, yet the province of Alberta in the year 1918 exceeded in coal production every other province in the whole Dominion. It is because of these natural resources that we desire railway construction in the West; and we have other reasons than those. We have the obligations which were assumed by the Provincial Government of that province. We have heard much criticism of Mackenzie and Mann, and no one can criticise them more strongly than I have criticised them in the past. They have taken to their bosoms Governments from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They have possessed alike Federal Governments whether of Conservative or Liberal stripe, and Provincial Governments; they have done more, I believe to corrupt public life in this country than any other two men who were ever in the country. Do hon. gentlemen opposite want to allow the administration of one of the great railway systems of this country to remain in their hands, or are they perfectly willing that we should assume the responsibility which has been cast upon this Government? We find ourselves in the position that we must either keep pouring our money into the bags of these railway magnates whom hon. gentlemen opposite all criticise, or we must assume the obligations, put money into the enterprise, and eventually make it a benefit to the people.

So far as the province of Alberta is concerned, the charters which are referred to in schedule 2 were all guaranteed by the Government of that province. They received their charters, their bonds were guaranteed, and the bonds for three of the lines have been sold and the money now lies in the bank. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the credit and honour of this country. Is it more honourable, I ask them, not to construct those lines in the province of Alberta when the bonds have been sold to the English bondholder, than to assume the obligation which was entered into, not by this Government, but by the Government of the province of Alberta? We owe it to the bondholder to construct those roads. We also owe a duty to the settlers who live along or within travelling distance of these projected lines. It has been argued by the other side of the House, when we put through this schedule it will induce people to settle. We have already induced these settlers to come to the province of Alberta. Thousands and tens of thousands have come on the strength of these charters the bonds of which were guaranteed and sold. These settlers have moved in with their families, and have been crying out since 1911 for railway construction. I submit that this Government owes a duty to those settlers to expend the proceeds of those bonds and give railway communication in that part of the country.

As to the lands through which these lines travel, there seems to have been great anxiety on the other side of the House as to whether it would be a good business venture. I should like to have the privilege of taking many of my friends through the country which will be traversed by these lines. You will pass through some of the richest agricultural districts in the Dominion—through country which will produce hundreds of millions of bushels of grain in the future and support your ports in the East. Hon. gentlemen opposite complain about this expenditure of money on railway construction in the West, but I hear no complaint from any single man about the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been spent in Sydney, Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Toronto and Fort William on harbour improvements and terminal facilities. We realize they will be an outlet for the produce of the West, and we are now only asking that some recognition of the West be given, so that we can develop our own country by means of railways, and then the produce of the West will help build up the great water terminals which you have here in the East.

My hon. friend from Maisonneuve was very much exercised as to the effect the reviving of these charters would have on the money markets of the world. He says we are bankrupting ourselves and that we will not be able to borrow a dollar because there are charters in this schedule. Does he not know that every railway company in this country has carried on for years branch lines under charter upon which they have done no work and that the people in different parts of the country are suffering for want of railway construction? It will not affect the credit of the country one particle to have these lines. The hon. member suggested that these lines were being projected because Ontario was in favour of public ownership, and that it was being thrown out to the West as a sop to satisfy them in connection with the tariff. It must strike him that the tariff and railway construction are two entirely separate problems, and those who are interested in the tariff in the West will not be bought by any promise of railway construction which may be given by this Government. There is no part of Canada that is more strongly in favour of public ownership than the Great West. Perhaps we have been forced into public ownership, but the time is coming when the West will demand public ownership of nearly all its great utilities, the express companies, the telegraphs, the telephones and steamships, and almost every great utility which is necessary to carry on the commercial business of the country. The people want public ownership, and I think we should be fair and not condemn the scheme before it has been tried. Do not let us bring in petty party politics, but let us get together and demonstrate to the world that public ownership of railways and utilities can be made a success. Let us co-operate to the end that every country may point to Canada as the pioneer in this great work. The men who are engaged in the administration of the railway have been criticised in the House. Every member on the other side knows that Mr. Hanna, the president of the company, has the reputation of being one of the best railway men in Canada, and why should he not be employed by the Government? We have also heard reflections on Mr. Z. A. Lash who, as hon. members on the other side must know, is one of the ablest lawyers in Canada. Why should his services not be employed? Now, if hon. members opposite continue to cast slurs on these gentlemen they are just damning public ownership and we shall never get the best men in Canada to assume positions of responsibility under such circumstances. I think the discussion on the part of the hon. members opposite has been one endeavour to do what they could to defeat public ownership, and they have criticised the Government unjustly and unfairly for purely party purposes. They say they want information on this and on that. Are we going to spend the time of the House in discussing railway ties on the 25,000 miles of railway in Canada, or in talking about section hands and general managers? There is much more serious and important business to be discussed, and we should lay aside these trivial matters and proceed to questions of real importance. There is no fear that there will be any patronage, because the railway employees themselves are so powerful now that patronage in the administration of the railway system will never come into play. I have very great pleasure in supporting the Bill, because it is an honest endeavour, as far as possible, to remove the railway systems from the sphere of politics. The question of public ownership was discussed in England during the last years of the war. This scheme which England thought good enough to consider—and I trust they will adopt it—should certainly be good enough for Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It has been suggested that this Bill does not propose Government ownership, but rather provides the machinery to operate our Government railways. I think the hon. member for Maisonneuve is more responsible than any other member of the House for the fact that the discussion has drifted to the issue of public ownership versus private ownership. The first day the subject was introduced the hon. gentleman read an extract from the Winnipeg Telegram ridiculing Mr. Hamilton, the representative from Saskatchewan on the board of management. I wish to refute anything that has been said derogatory of Mr. Hamilton's capabilities, and to do this it is necessary that I should refer to what the hon. member read at that time. The article was headed "Making Railway Experts," and was addressed to the editor of the Winnipeg Telegram. It reads:

> Sir:—The West has furnished our Government with two men to fill national railway positions. A short biography of them should provide a tip to President Beatty of the C.P.R., and should also point the way to thousands of ambitious Canadian youths. It should also quiet the disbeliever in Government ownership of railways, as it clearly shows that our prairies turn out captains of industry by the simplest of training.
> Charles McGill Hamilton, in the early '90s, was attending school in Indian Head and later in Regina. About 1902 he settled on a section of land near McTaggart, Sask., a village about ten miles north of Weyburn. He followed this worthy but uneventful career until two years ago, when he was nominated in opposition to the Unionist candidate for Weyburn.

This is a misstatement of fact, for Mr. Hamilton was never nominated in opposition to any Unionist candidate. He was a Liberal candidate for some three years prior to the formation of the Union Government.

This article continues:

> A few months later he was appointed a director of Canadian National railways. Farming a section of land in Saskatchewan is a mighty good training for directing the affairs of a national transcontinental.

You will notice that it is stated that Mr. Hamilton attended school as a boy. This, I am sure, no one will find fault with, as it is necessary for every young fellow to attend school. But the writer of this article failed to mention that Mr. Hamilton had continued at school until he fitted himself for a teacher's certificate, which profession he followed for a number of years.

The article stops there with respect to Mr. Hamilton, but I wish to add that besides these qualifications, which I claim are real qualifications, Mr. Hamilton is at the present time and has been for quite a number of years, president of what is known in our province as the Rural Municipal Association. This organization has branches in the whole of the organized part of our province, and the annual convention brings him in touch with the reeves, secretaries, and councillors of these rural municipalities once a year. So that I claim we have not in our province a man better fitted to deal with transportation problems than the same Mr. Hamilton. Why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) should read this article to the House I cannot understand. I am confirmed in my belief that he was out to do Mr. Hamilton some harm, because on Friday some other hon. gentlemen to your left, Sir, referred to the management of this road. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) interjected the question, "What about Mr. Hamilton?" I want to say to the hon. gentleman, in order to dissipate any fear he may have in this respect, that Mr. Hamilton is one of the coming men of the province of Saskatchewan, one who will do honour to the board of management of the Canadian National railways or any other organizations with which he may be connected. Another gentleman, whom the same article presumes to ridicule, is Mr. Porter. I will not read what the article has to say about Mr. Porter, but I desire to state that I have known this gentleman for many years and he has qualifications which Mr. Hamilton does not possess, inasmuch as he had been a railroad man for a great many years. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) saw fit to read the article in question and to ridicule Mr. Hamilton, I thought it well to point out that the Saskatchewan people are well satisfied with their representation on the Canadian National Railways board, and so far as Mr. Porter is concerned he has been, as a railway man, connected with the Grand Trunk Pacific for many years, and has simply been put into another position; that is all.

There is another matter that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) touched upon in respect to my province which I thought was not right. In discussing this question he made the statement that many of the western provinces were almost bankrupt. I do not know which of the western provinces he referred to particularly, and as he did not definitely say I take it that Saskatchewan was included. For this reason I think I am justified in putting on Hansard a statement taken from the budget speech of the treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan, as given on the 29th of January last. It says this:—

> On December 31, 1918, the gross public debt of the province amounted to $29,635,906.26. On a population basis it amounts to a charge of $39.83 for each individual in the province, using as a basis of calculation the population used by the Dominion Government in calculating the subsidy to the province. That is the charge per capita, $39.83. In considering the matter, however, the fact that a large portion of this debt is self-sustaining must be considered. That is to say, the taxpayer of the province as such does not have to pay the interest on it. That portion of the public debt which is self-sustaining amounts to no less a sum than $13,159,000. That amount includes investments in the public telephone system. The taxpayer of the province does not pay interest on the amount invested by the Government in the public telephone system. The public who use the telephone system of the province pay that interest in the form of telephone rentals and toll charges. The telephone system of the province is based on the idea that the people who get the service, and not the general taxpayer, should bear the burden. So that while the province has loaned to the telephone department for the purpose of building our telephone system the sum of $7,184,000 the general revenue of the province is not charged with the interest or sinking fund on that sum, the telephone department, out of its receipts, pays into the treasury annually a sum equal to the interest on that investment and the sinking fund with respect to the loans made for therefor.

Then in respect to the Saskatchewan Co-Operative Elevator Company, the Government loaned that organization $1,878,000. The Saskatchewan Farm Loans Board loaned to the farmers of that province $1,826,000, and there was another small sum loaned in respect of the Regina cyclone mortgage. Now, Mr. Chairman, this leaves the net debt of the province of Saskatchewan at $16,476,000, or a per capita debt of $22.14. This, I think, will bear very favourable comparison with that of any other province in the Dominion.

In respect to the branch lines of railway, as outlined in schedule 2 of the Bill under consideration, much has been said and hon. gentlemen have asked for information regarding them. I will have an opportunity of speaking when that part of the Bill is under consideration, I expect, and I can then give the hon. gentlemen information that I think will be sufficient to convince them that all branch lines to be built under these charters in my constituency are absolutely necessary to its development, and I have no doubt that there are other hon. gentlemen from the Western Provinces who will be able to answer the same for their constituencies. In this connection let me point out that while it has been charged that the Government is playing party politics with this Bill, the people of Saskatchewan have got their eye on the Government and on its railway programme. No matter what government is in power in this country, they are looking for a progressive policy with regard to the construction of branch lines which are so much needed in our province.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is not my intention to make any lengthy remarks on this Bill. When I went to Montreal on Friday last I was of opinion that the measure would be disposed of by the time I returned, but I find that in my absence, after certain speeches had been made by certain hon. members, the Government deemed it necessary to invoke the closure. Now we are trying to discuss the different clauses of this Bill and give our opinions with respect to them, and I am glad to have had this opportunity afforded me to-night. Coming up in the train I happened to read in one of the newspapers, said to be a supporter of the Government, that the Opposition were not serious in their attitude on this question, but that we were just spokesmen, gramophones, so to speak, and tools in the hands of other people who were forcing us to make this fight against the Government in order to prevent it from carrying out the policy upon which it had decided. In this connection the names of Lord Atholstan and Lord Shaughnessy were mentioned. Well, Mr. Chairman, if these noble lords exercised a potent influence in 1911 in carrying this Government into power, surely criticism cannot be made if their opinions are cited to-day. The views of these noble lords ought, for the purpose of argument, to be just as good to-day as they were in 1911. We are not backed up by Lord Shaughnessy or by Lord Atholstan; we are speaking our own minds and simply saying what we think ought to be said on this Bill. Why this rush? Why introduce the closure? When the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and other members on this side of the House were simply asking for information that they were perfectly entitled to, why did not the Government answer them properly and tell the House why these forty-four charters were being inserted in the schedule? The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) said that these charters were absolutely necessary for the West. If they were, I submit that years ago the Government should have forced its best friend, the Canadian Northern, to look after the interests of its dear friends, the western provinces.

We are reproached with having no policy; one of our friends opposite said that none of us could stand up and state what was our policy. Mr. Chairman, in opposition we are at liberty to criticise and point out what is wrong in the policies of the Government; but when called upon to prescribe measures to save the country from the calamity which the present Government is hastening upon us, the hon. leader of the Opposition and his immediate supporters will be ready with their policies. The western provinces are clamouring for more railways to help their development. They were aware of that necessity years ago. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built by a privately owned corporation, subsidized by the Government of the day the members of which were large holders of the company's stock. Other railways have been helped as well, but not so much as the Canadian Pacific. The Grand Trunk was helped, and the Canadian Northern was helped because it was a friend of the Government's, and the money of the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario and the eastern provinces was spent lavishly to build up the western provinces; but, Sir, in the province of Quebec there are districts which have been clamouring for railways for many years, and it is only in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen that they are going to have a railway—I am speaking of my own constituency, Charlevoix-Montmorency. We are told that the West absolutely needs many railways. Nationalization is a fad of the West like many other things, the Hudson Bay railway for instance, another white elephant. The West craves to get it all its own way as much as it likes at the expense of the other provinces, pay what they like for it. The hon. member for Red Deer said last Friday that railways should be built in greater number throughout the West. I have here a book, a comparatively modern book, published in Toronto—that fact should surely give it sufficient authority—and it contains the following statement:

> Of Manitoba, the foreigner seeking a home in a new land is told:
> "Railways have anticipated the future, so that few farmers are more than eight or ten miles from a railway."
> And for fear that Manitoba's attractions may not allure, the Government's immigration advocates point out that in Saskatchewan:
> "The province is so well served by the Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern, and Grand Trunk Pacific, that few of the established settlements are more than 10 to 20 miles from transportation; new settlements do not have to wait long for railway advantages."
> For Alberta and British Columbia, the argument is the same—railways to carry the settler to the lands, and railways to haul his grain and other farm-products to market. In other words, to use a salesman's expression, railways are the "talking-point" to the outside world.

This book was published in 1917 and is entitled "Railway Nationalization and the Average Citizen," by William H. Moore. He is telling the people of the West that they have enough railways, and he says:

> Advocates of Government ownership and operation fail to show wherein the public are to benefit thereby. There is not to be more capable management, nor improved service, nor cheaper carriage. Government ownership is a fad come out of the West, where the people change their minds as often as a woman changes her gown, and each new-fangled notion is acclaimed as the real panacea. The volatile nature of Northwest sentiment has had many manifestations; the Hudson Bay railway need only be mentioned. If it were demonstrated that under Government management Canada would enjoy a better and cheaper railway service, the policy would be worthy of approval and acceptance; but no effort at this demonstration is even attempted. The United States Congress has given the President control of the railways during the war and the after-period of demobilization, and has guaranteed to their owners dividends equal to the average earnings of three years preceding June 30, 1917, but Congress promptly rejected a proposal of Government ownership. An increase in rates will soon follow. There is no other course if the burden of guaranteed dividends is to be equitably distributed. Government direction in the United States, moreover, has accomplished nothing in the way of expeditious traffic movement that the Railway War Board has not quite as satisfactorily effected in Canada.

The problem given courageous statesmanship in Canada is this: to finance the railways over the period of closed money markets without impairing their management and without loading upon the people an enormous liability which private capital and enterprise should sustain.

This policy of the Government I submit, Sir, has been adopted in a very hap-hazard way without knowing what it will lead us to. When you have such men as Lord Shaughnessy and Mr. Mitchell of New York, whom the hon. member for Maisonneuve referred to to-night, Prof. Irving Smart, Mr. Beatty, the new President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Sir William Wilson Hoy, General Manager of South African Railways and Harbours, who tell us that nationalization of railways is not a feasible thing, especially in such a young country as ours; when we have the example of the United States and of the countries of Europe—France, for instance—showing the failure of state ownership, I do not see how this Government has the temerity to unload on the country such a burden as this railway problem that we are asked to vote on to-day. I see only one reason: it is because the Government has some friends whom it wants to protect. We are told they are interested as well as Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann—for whose stock the Government paid over $10,000,000, stock which was supposed to be worth nothing—and that behind those people there are other interests; an organization called the National Trust, this so-called financial ring of Toronto and the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I am told on good authority that in 1917 if the Government had not come to the rescue of the Canadian Northern Railway it would have meant the finish of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and that that was the reason why it appropriated certain funds for the benefit of Mackenzie and Mann, Z. A. Lash, the National Trust, and the Contracting Securities Company, which is the go-between of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the National Trust, Z. A. Lash and the financial ring of Toronto. I am not afraid to say that, Mr. Chairman, because I know what I am speaking about, and if it is not true there are gentlemen on the other side of the House who will tell me so. Nobody can say it is a wise policy in this great financial stress and in time of war.

The present Bill, it seems to me, affords hon. members an opportunity of expressing their views upon the Government's railway policy, and it also gives us an occasion to say exactly what we think of the Government. In throwing this big burden on the country the Government is going to lose the last bit of confidence that the people have in it. This policy of nationalization is not acceptable and should not be patronized as long as that policy will not show better results. Before we adopt it we should wait and see its results and we should be guided by the bad results obtained elsewhere and profit by their experience.

I was asked last year in certain parts of the community why certain people did not follow the law of conscription better, and my answer was that it was because the Government did not have the confidence of the people. Well, Sir, if the Government continues to press its present policy of nationalization of railways it will lose every confidence that the people ever had in it. After the next election I hope that we shall have a new Government which will be better able to guide the destinies of this country.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I purpose offering a little information with regard to some of the branch lines mentioned in the notorious forty-four. I do not think any particulars of this nature have already been given. The Government would have been well advised had they brought down certain detailed information in connection with the amendment introduced on Friday. Requests have been made for this information, and as it has not been given, and as I am familiar with a number of the branch lines mentioned, it is in order for me to give some of the details in connection therewith.

During the consideration of this Bill the time has been largely occupied with the discussion of a matter which, so far as I can see, does not enter into the question affected by this Bill, that is, the matter of public or private ownership. I have listened carefully to a great deal that has been said and have read speeches that I did not hear, and I have failed to see in them anything to show me that the question of public or private ownership enters into the Bill that is before us.

We in the West who went through the good old days of property fluctuations and inflations a few years ago became possessed of certain properties in the West, lands and lots and so on, and some of us still hold them. That fact might give people the idea that we are in favour of private ownership of land. On the other hand, should we run across some kind, paternal Government which is desirous of purchasing our properties on terms similar to those on which it took over certain properties from Mackenzie and Mann, we would gladly give up our equities—because, as in the aforementioned instance, that is all we have left in them now— to the Government. We might then be said to be in favour of public ownership. And that indicates about the only connection that the question of public or private ownership has with this Bill. We have on our hands certain railway properties; how we got them does not make any difference so far as this Bill is concerned, but we have to deal with them. The fact that we have them might cause people to say that we are in favour of public ownership. I venture to say that if some private corporation should offer us for these railway properties anything like the amount that the Dominion has expended on them, the person here most strongly in favour of public ownership would not object to turning these properties over to that corporation. Not five members of the Committee would, if confronted with that proposal, fail to rise in their places and vote strongly for it; in which case we would be looked upon as in favour of private ownership. I do not see how a discussion of the question of public or private ownership is going to settle the matter. The Government brings down this Bill, and there is nothing in it to indicate that they are in favour of public or private ownership; they are not in any way committed to either. On the other hand, the Opposition make certain criticisms of the Bill. So far as I can gather, they criticise the character of the measure, not the principle of it; there is nothing to indicate whether they are for or against public ownership. If each member voted according to his own firm convictions, a number on each side would vote for public ownership, a number against it, and a number would be neutral, that is, would be in the position of favouring public ownership in certain circumstances and of opposing it in others. So that I do not think we are getting anywhere by discussing this particular question.

So far as I can figure out, the whole controversy now before us in connection with this Bill is with regard to these branch lines, and the question whether their charters should be renewed. I am surprised that some one has not preceded me, and given the information which I propose to give. I am more or less interested in a considerable part of the territory through which a dozen or more of these lines pass, mostly those in Northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I have checked over the list as it appears in Hansard, and I propose to take up possibly half a dozen of the charters mentioned.

But let me first point out the situation generally as to railroads in the West. Most of the roads run east and west. Until pretty far north the settler can go in an easterly or westerly direction without much trouble, but it is very difficult to get across country, that is, north or south. There are, perhaps, only about three locations where there are north and south lines throughout the whole of the West. One line runs from Winnipeg to The Pas—which is only approximately north and south; another from Prince Albert to Regina through Saskatoon. From Edmonton to Calgary there is one direct line and a couple of lines that are approximately direct. But the vast areas in between have really no means of communication north and south except in a very roundabout manner The aim of a number of these branch lines is to give this north and south communication, not directly, but ultimately. Branch lines will be extended into certain districts where there is considerable settlement, with the idea of accommodating that settlement, and also of bringing other territory just beyond into a position to be settled, and eventually extending into that territory, and so on.

A line is proposed from Craven to Hudson Bay Junction via Yorkton. That would make direct connection, you might say, between The Pas, the terminal of the Hudson Bay railway, and Regina, through a country which is not served at all at the present time. Many settlers throughout that district are not eight or ten miles, but anywhere from fifteen to forty miles from railway communication. The intention is not to complete that railway at once, but to build a certain portion of it, serving well-settled districts at first, and eventualy completing the whole road.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the length of that line?

Mr. CAMPBELL: It runs from Regina to Hudson Bay Junction; I should say, about two hundred miles. It is already partly constructed at both ends. I am not, however, as familiar with that line as I am with others further north.

One of these charters calls for the construction of a line from Melfort northeasterly to the boundary between Saskatchewan and Manitoba. That line goes through one of the best farming districts in the whole of Western Canada; the land is uniformly good. A large delegation from Melfort and surrounding country came here about a month ago to press for the construction of that line.

There is at the present time another delegation here from that district to press for the construction of that line. The intention of the Government and of the Railway Board is to grade thirty miles or so, and ultimately to extend the line to The Pas to connect with the Hudson Bay railway. The idea is not to do all that at once, but it is well in constructing a railway to map it out with some objective in view and then to do as much each year as conditions demand.

Another project is from Hudson Bay Junction, which is the junction between the Prince Albert section of the old Canadian Northern railway and that section which runs up to The Pas to connect with the Hudson Bay railway. This line is intended to be constructed from Hudson Bay Junction to the southern part of Saskatchewan, via Moosomin. Portions of that line have been built here and there, between Sturgis and Canora, between Canora and Yorkton, and between Yorkton and Melville. The idea is to link up these so that there will be a complete line running north and south from Hudson Bay to the southern boundary of Saskatchewan, to the coal fields.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the hon. member tell us the length of that line?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am sorry I did not figure out the length of that line, but when it is finally completed, it will be approximately from 250 to 300 miles long. I do not want to be tied down to an exact figure.

Mr. COPP: Is that road partly built?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Large sections of that road have already been built and these must be linked up in order to make a complete road running north and south.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Where does it go to in the south?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Down into the coalfields district at Estevan, right to the boundary, one might say. Presumably, it will run east of the Moose mountains, connecting up with Moosomin, from Moosomin to Yorkton, from Yorkton to Canora, from Canora to Sturgis, from Sturgis to Hudson Bay Junction. A good portion of that line has already been built, and these parts require to be linked up, so that there will be a complete line from Hudson Bay right down to the coalfields at Estevan and to the boundary between Canada and the United States.

There is another projected line from Prince Albert northeast to the boundary. I do not know so much about that line, but I understand there is a good settlement north of Prince Albert, and in this case it is not the intention to build that line at once, but to build into that settlement with the ultimate object in view of getting into the important mining fields at Saskatchewan and Manitoba boundary.

Still another line is from Melfort southeast to Thunder Hill branch. This is simply connecting up lines that have already been built. The suggestion of the delegation that is here to-day from that district is that the line, instead of running direct from Melfort to the Thunder Hill branch, connect that branch with Tisdale. That, I might say, is just a short section of probably thirty or forty miles, I am not sure of the exact mileage, but it goes through a good section of country and it will enable the people of that district to deliver their wheat and produce east and southeast, saving them a haulage of from sixty to seventy miles.

Then, there is a line from Melfort southwest to Vonda, and farther on in the list there is one from Vonda northeast to Thunder Hill extension. Without going into details in this connection, I might say that these charters cover somewhat the same ground. The distance between Melfort and Vonda is approximately sixty or seventy miles, and already the grade has been made for twenty miles of that, and all that is necessary is to put on the rails. That grade was ready before war broke out, and, of course, since then railway building has been at a standstill. It is, therefore, very important that rails should be laid on that part of the road. So far as I know, all that is intended to be done is to put rails on the part that is graded this year, and extend for a few miles farther towards Melfort. When this line is finally completed there will be a direct route from Saskatoon via Melfort and Carrot River valley to The Pas, a well-settled, fertile country all the way.

The amount of railway building which it is actually intended to carry on this year does not amount to a very great number of miles, being little bits here and there throughout the west that will ultimately form into systems which will be of vast benefit to the west generally. I might take up the time of the committee in going through a number of those, but I will confiine myself just to one instance in Manitoba. In the country west of lake Manitoba and between that lake and lake Dauphin, there is a considerable stretch of country a large portion of which is well settled. I know personally that people are hauling their wheat, not as an hon. member stated a short time ago, only eight or ten miles, but twenty-five or thirty miles. It is the intention of the Governmeent to extend the line from the south up twenty miles. Then there is a gap to Ste. Rose du Lac, and there connection is made with the main line of the Canadian Northern. It is the intention to extend this connecting line farther north, a distance of twenty miles. That means that two particular parts of this general district will be served by those two extensions and that these will be eventually linked up when the territory in between is settled up, but in the meantime, only settled districts are being served. Later the districts a little more remote will be settled up and lines running into those districts will be constructed, and eventually there will be a continuous line from Portage La Prairie to Winnipegosis, which will be a direct line and which will serve one of the best districts in Manitoba.

There has been a great deal of criticism regarding the Canadian Northern management, and particularly regarding the founders of that line, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. I do not purpose going over that ground, but while with a good deal of this criticism I heartily agree, I notice that there was no criticism of Mackenzie and Mann respecting the location of their lines. There seems to be a unanimity of opinion in this Committee that the Canadian Northern Railway system passes through a country which is probably the best for railway purposes of any part of the West. We must give those gentlemen who were the founders of this road credit for having made a particularly good selection of their territory, and they selected the particular districts which are covered by these charters. Therefore, if they were as wise in their selection of these districts as they were in their selection of the territory through which the Canadian Northern Railway system has already been built, it is to the great advantage of Canada that we preserve these charters for the use of the Canadian National railways, and of course, of the Canadian people.

I might say also in connection with these lines that as has probably been noticed, the general trend of a number of them is towards connecting up with the Hudson Bay railway, either indirectly at Hudson Bay junction, which is connected with the terminus of the Hudson Bay railway, by a Canadian Northern Railway section of about ninety miles in length, or directly with The Pas itself, which is the terminus of that railway. I do not purpose discussing the advantage or otherwise of the Hudson Bay railway project at the present time. Probably I shall have something to say about that later on.

But if as much wisdom has been shown in the north as Mackenzie and Mann showed in the rest of Saskatchewan and Alberta, then the connecting up of some of these lines with the Hudson Bay Railway is going to be of great advantage to the West generally, for you will observe that Mackenzie and Mann have had such connections in mind throughout their whole scheme of things.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the hon. member tell us the total or the average mileage of these forty-four lines?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I cannot give the total mileage, because I just obtained these figures this morning and I have not had a chance to study them closely, but I can say this: It is, I am informed, the intention to build 350 miles or thereabouts of these branch lines this year.

Mr. COPP: Have the contracts been let?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not know.

Mr. COWAN: I am not going to agree absolutely with the last speaker. To me this Bill is a public ownership Bill from start to finish. Its title is public ownership, the preamble is public ownership, the first section is public ownership and every other section down to the last. You cannot make anything else out of it. Furthermore, those who oppose this Bill cannot help but oppose public ownership.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COWAN: That is my view. I am very glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite demur, because it again proves to me that they do not know themselves just what they think about it. They have talked on all sides of the subject since they started. Their whole attitude from beginning to end has been an enigma. Some of them have said openly that they were opposed to public ownership. Others have evaded the question entirely and have talked all round it. Even the hon. member for Maisonneuve, for whom I have the very highest respect, told us he was in favour of public ownership of cables, but he did not tell us anything about his views on public ownership of the railways. What did he do? He read copious extracts from one or two papers—for what purpose? These extracts showed that public ownership or public control in Great Britain during a recent period had resulted in a great loss to the Imperial Government. Now, what was his purpose in reading those extracts? Was it to help the cause of public ownership? I fancy not. To me he had only one object in view and that was to do his utmost in opposition to the cause of public ownership. To me it seems that hon. gentlemen opposite have talked in different ways seemingly for a purpose, so that when an election comes they will be able to go to certain people and say, "We oppose public ownership," and in other districts they will quote extracts from their speeches and say, "We are in favour of public ownership." But the fact remains that no matter what they say, they have put every obstacle possible in the way of the passage of this public ownership Bill, and when I find a man putting a lot of rocks on the railway track I must confess to thinking he is putting them there for the purpose of preventing the train from passing, if not of wrecking it. That is the position hon. gentlemen opposite are in.

I have all my life been a believer in public ownership. I have seen it tried in our part of the country in a great many ways, and I have never seen it fail where it was properly handled. Mind you, it has to be handled properly, as any private enterprise has to be handled properly if it is to succeed. I have no doubt whatever that the course now being pursued by this Government in creating this holding company, if I may so call it, is the very best one that could be adopted for the purpose of making a success of the system. A number of hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed to the failures we have had on the Intercolonial, and what political interference has done for that road. I am mighty glad we have had that experience on a minor project like the Intercolonial. It has given us a lesson and taught the Government what it is necessary to avoid in order to make a success of railway management. If we had not had that experience, we should probably have to gain it now in a much more costly way.

My purpose in getting up to-night is more to answer a question which was asked by the leader of the Opposition. He asked why it is that the Canadian Northern has not paid. The answer is very easy to me. Even the Canadian Pacific did not pay the first few years of its operation. I can well recall the time when I lived in that part of the country, thirty-two or thirty-three years ago, when conditions surrounding the Canadian Pacific were very similiar to the conditions surrounding the Canadian Northern or the Canadian National to-day. The country was not then developed; there was no trade then for the Canadian Pacific, just as there is very little trade to-day on the Canadian Northern. The Canadian Pacific had to develop the business, and it did develop it by settling the country. As the country settled the Canadian Pacific became one of the best-paying institutions in this country. Exactly the same conditions prevail to-day with regard to the Canadian Northern. That road has been built as much as a colonizing road as anything else, and the result is that the farmers have flocked in as the railway has been built. The hon. member knows as well as I do that you cannot go on a farm and produce anything to furnish traffic for a railway for a few years. The first year you break a few acres and have a mighty hard time. The second year is not so hard, and by the third year you are producing a little bit which will furnish traffic, and in the fourth and fifth and sixth years are doing better. The Canadian Northern had just reached the point where the produce of the farmers would furnish paying traffic for the railway company which handled it, and from now on I am fully satisfied we shall have exactly the same experience with the Canadian Northern as we had with the Canadian Pacific in years gone by. As soon as the country is settled and is producing the railway will pay. As the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell) has said, it is located through the best stretches of country we have out there. I have travelled over a great many miles of it by automobile and buggy, and wherever I have gone I have been satisfied with the location which the Canadian Northern officials have chosen for their lines.

I have no hesitation in saying that in taking over the Canadian Northern Railway the Government has undertaken an enterprise which will be a paying one in a very few years.

In regard to these forty-four "notorious" branch lines about which complaint is made and which have been referred to as "wrecks" I must take exception to any such description of these lines. I resent the statement that they are wrecks. Twenty-three of them belong to the province from which I come, Saskatchewan, and I wish to say that we have no wrecks and do not intend to have any in that part of the country. I heartily commend the Government for seeking to renew these charters, and I would condemn them if they did not. Can the Canadian National Railway pay simply as a trunk line? Undoubtedly it cannot. The Canadian Pacific Railway never paid as such, but only when they got branch lines as feeders, and that is exactly what is proposed to be done in connection with the Canadian National Railway. If the Government were so shortsighted as not to build these branch lines what would happen? The settlers out there could not wait forever for railway communication, which they must have in order that they may profitably follow agricultural and other pursuits. To my knowledge thousands of farmers are to-day twenty-five and thirty miles from any railway, and if the Government did not build these lines the settlers would continue an agitation until they secured them. If the Canadian Pacific railway builds into these districts do you think there will then be trade for this government-owned road? Unquestionably the business would go to the railway which furnished the best facilities for handling the traffic, and the result would be that the Canadian National would continue to be a losing proposition. It seems to me that the only thing to do is to revive these charters and to build the lines as soon as the money can be provided and conditions warrant, so as to furnish feeders for our own railway and to stem competition. I think the Canadian Northern have located their lines well. There is no duplication, and the impression that has gone abroad to this effect is absolutely false. There is no duplication at any point in any one of the three prairie provinces. There is a little stretch west of Saskatoon where the lines run probably four or five miles apart, and which might be regarded as a duplication, if any one wished to strain a point. As an old Tory I am going to make the admission that I think the Canadian Pacific Railway was improperly located in the first place. We have been hearing about "a thousand miles of rock" separating the East from the West, but this is only along the north shore of Lake Superior through which the Canadian Pacific runs. There is a magnificent stretch of fertile land which, I am satisfied will hold thousands and thousands of stock farmers. I think the grade and the curves on the Canadian Northern are superior to anything the Canadian Pacific has, and I am satisfied that to-day we have an excellent asset and need have no fear of Government ownership. I dare any one to go into our section of the country and advocate private ownership of railways, if he expects to win an election, for you could not win a single constituency in Saskatchewan on the policy of private ownership. In my own city we would not think of granting the franchise to any private company for the street service of Regina. We have made a complete success of government ownership of telephones and believe that the Government can make a success of government ownership of railways, and for that reason we are strongly in support of the scheme. Speaking for a large section of our people, I believe that this matter can be conducted without any political interference; and having studied the Bill as carefully as possible, I have come to the conclusion that we shall have as near an approach to government ownership without political interference as can be had. For that reason I give it my most hearty support.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to remove from the minds of good, honest gentlemen who sit to your right, Sir, the idea that we are obstructing the passage of this Bill or that we have done anything that appears like obstruction. We have received some slight information from the hon. member for Nelson to-night, and this we regard as very good and useful. It is the first sign of even the dawn of any information about these new railways, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, and others like ourselves who are anxious for the development of the country, would suppose that it would not be regarded as carping or factious opposition that we should ask for information throwing some light upon the subject so as to enable intelligent men on both sides of the House to form an opinion as to whether or not the enterprise is a safe and proper one, and one in the best interests of the country. Did we get that information from the proper source from which it should come? We have a right to expect this information from the Department of Railways, but they refused positively to give it to us. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) sometimes acts as a foreign missionary for the Government and makes speeches for this society—which speeches the President of the society says he has no authority to make, and that he speaks without the book—and we thought he was talking with knowledge out in Regina the other day. I put a question in this House to the president of the home mission, the Right Hon. Sir Thomas, as to the authority of his missionary in the West, and he said that gentleman had no authority whatever, and that—to speak in vulgar language—he was talking through his hat.

Mr. COWAN: May I be allowed to correct the hon. gentleman? I never uttered any such statement and never made any speech in Regina, or anywhere else, whilst I was away, and never attempted to speak for the Government. I did say that I expected the Government would make reductions in the tariff. That is as far as I went, and if the newspapers enlarged upon it that is not my fault. I repeat that I never made a speech while I was away.

Mr. McKENZIE: I won't be so unkind as to say that the hon. gentleman could not make a speech. He tried to do so here this evening, and while it was not the best speech in the world it was a very good one.

Mr. COWAN: Thank you.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not finding fault with it at all, but it comes from a section where these roads are being built, and I would have expected of him better than he has done. He seemed to find fault with the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell) for telling us nothing. Because of that I thought the hon. gentleman himself was going to do better. But when it came to his turn he took the back road and told us nothing at all.

Now I am sure that hon. gentlemen in this House who are willing to take their gospel and their information, their brains, their philosophy and their guidance from the Minister of the Interior, will be surprised when they learn that the drafting of this very Bill that we are supposed to have been obstructing was only completed about four o'clock on Friday. I am sure there will be some amusement in the minds and on the faces of hon. gentlemen who say that we were obstructing the Bill, when I tell them that on four o'clock Friday last, about three or four hours before the closure was applied, the drafting of this Bill was completed, a new section 20 was introduced, and what constitutes in the new Bill of to-day, five closely printed pages of new material were inserted in it. There was no sitting of the House on Saturday, or on Sunday, and we had no opportunity of discussing those five pages of closely printed matter and the new section that were embodied in the Bill, except for the few hours that remained between four o'clock and about half-past twelve, when, as I say, the closure was applied. Will any hon. gentleman sitting in this House with reason in his heart and in his head, and who acknowledges responsibility to his electors, say that we were wrong because we found fault with the very short period of time that was given to us for the discussion of a Bill the drafting of which was not finished until four o'clock last Friday, and the printing of which was not completed until some time to-day? At twelve or twelve-thirty to-day I sent one of the messengers of the House to see if I could get a copy of this Bill as newly printed. I failed to do so; I was told that it was not on distribution. The first time I saw this newly printed Bill was at three o'clock when I took my seat in the House, and I venture to say that was the experience of at least ninety per cent of the members who compose this Chamber. At three o'clock to-day, Mr. Chairman, the printed Bill was placed in the hands of members, containing a new section and five pages of new material, and the closure was applied on Friday night! Was it not therefore most extraordinary conduct to apply the closure two days before the Bill was printed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but will any member of the Government, or any member of the House, say they ever saw this Bill in its present form until three o'clock this afternoon? And yet, two days before that the closure was applied on the ground that we were obstructing the progress of the Bill, which was yet in the womb of time, and about which we knew nothing. That statement, Sir, I think will satisfy you, and satisfy the people, that there was no obstruction in connection with this matter but only a fair and legitimate desire for information. Now, Sir, at four o'clock, this new section was brought down and the new schedule was attached, and we had seven hours in which to deal with the Bill before the closure was applied. Well, there are two hundred and thirty-five constituencies in Canada, but if you divided four hundred and twenty minutes by the number of constituencies, it will give each constituency 1-7/9th minutes. Think of it, each constituency in Canada was given 1-7/9th of a minute to discuss this Bill!

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will any person say that we were obstructing because we took more time? The 235 constituencies in Canada took more than one and seven-ninths of a minute in discussing this Bill, and therefore hopeless and reckless obstruction is charged. But is the charge of obstruction well founded when I tell you, Mr. Chairman, and when you know, that a very large body of the Bill did not come to our notice until to-day? No, it simply makes the charge more ridiculous. Suppose we had nothing to deal with at all but the forty-nine new clauses, or new subjects that were added to the Bill. Applying the same rule as in the other case gives us the enormous time of nine and a half minutes to each constituency for the purpose of discussion. Think of it! Think of all these constituencies with their population, their intelligence, their want of knowledge and desire for it in connection with these matters,—and nine and a half minutes have been placed at the disposal of each in order to deal with this Bill. We are told that is obstruction, and I can see on the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite—those hon. gentlemen who are listening to the impression sought to be published abroad that we are obstructionists—that we certainly are obstructionists, and that we certainly ought to be punished on that ground. Most decidedly the people of this country ought to know what kind of obstructionists we are when we tell them that one and seven-ninths of a minute was allowed each constituency in Canada to deal with the subject, and that for only a small part of it, nine and a half minutes constituted the limit. If that did not prove satisfactory we had to accept the odium of being men of little sense, and devoid of any desire to forward the progress and advancement of this country.

The leader of the House (Sir Thomas White), who is not here to-night, went far afield on Friday night to fasten upon us the charge that we were in the hire of some great concern in this country that he suggested, was evidently paying us, either directly or indirectly, to obstruct this legislation, and otherwise that we were putting ourselves up as against public ownership. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) undertook to quote to-night what I said about my own attitude on public ownership. I trust the hon. gentleman would like to be fair to me. and fair to anybody, but when he was giving the quotation he should have stated that it was something I said a year ago. Anything that I might say to-day, since even this discussion of to-day, might be tinged with some partiality, or might amount to trimming my sails to suit the breeze at present. But as to what I said a year ago, when this legislation was not under discussion at all, surely I was not such a prophet as to be able to foresee what is happening at the present time. What I said then is clear evidence that I am not now obstructing the Government ownership of this railway system.

I said then exactly what my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said to-night. He is a good, staunch supporter of the Government and occupies the first seat in the synagogue when it comes to a question of being a hard, hide-bound Tory. Surely they will not question his confession of faith, they will not deny his orthodoxy? What does he say? Exactly what I said a year ago. He says that we are in this position now, that we have no alternative, we have to make the most of a bad bargain; but if things were at a stage where he could choose between public ownership and private ownership he would be a private ownership man. Surely I may be permitted to walk along the street without any stones being thrown at me when I am in such good company, the hon. gentleman, who is an expert on railway questions—and an expert on most other things that we bring up in this House. When the question was put to me the other night I said I was opposed to public ownership, and I could only repeat what my record was. I am not in favour of public ownership, because I believe in my heart that the energy and best abilities of people in charge of any work are brought out when they are working for themselves and for private ownership. I believe that the same keenness and ability and the same ambition are not brought to bear upon public ownership. That is my reason, Sir. If wrong I am honest about it. But I did say a year ago to the hon. Minister of Railways, when he was putting his Estimates through: You are in this thing now; I would not be in it if we could have avoided it, but we are in it and we have to make the best of it; we will have to help you along to do the very best you can, and I hope when you come to us in a year that you will be able to present a fairly successful statement. That is what I am saying now.

That the Acting Prime Minister should try to make political capital out of this question is to me very absurd indeed. It shows that things are getting to a very low ebb and that everything else out of which capital can be made is getting played out. The war is over and the returning soldiers are damning the Government at every station from Halifax to Vancouver. The Government are finding that they cannot pass another War-time Elections Act to carry them into power, and they are therefore scouring around for some other breeze to waft them into power. And now they are laughing and saying: "Ha, ha! We have found something new. We will say that those chaps across the way are opposed to public ownership, and we are in favour of it, we will start that racket, and with another new franchise and a few other fake issues perhaps we can sail to harbour once more." The leader of the House told us that he had found dirty babies on his doorstep, and it seems that they are still dirty. I am sorry to say that his babies are not the only things that are dirty in the Administration which the hon. gentleman to-day leads; there are other things almost as dirty. The policy regarding his babies is rather soiled and unsavoury and will afford some work for this Public Health Bill which has been introduced. Then there are other policies—if you will look at the immigration policy policy regarding his babies is rather soiled and its hands needing some bath-tub treatment; and if you look at the finances of the country—well, that is a baby of the vilest, raggedy looking character conceivable.

If the babies were so dirty and unsavoury and so undesirable, why did he pass a paternity order against the Minister of Railways and make him the putative father of another illegitimate child that they brought into the House—and I am told that he is not very well kept or very clean. If the two dirty babies were on the doorstep, and they were obliged to take them in, why pass this affiliation order upon the devoted head of the Minister of Railways to take in another dirty baby? And I find that they are contemplating a regular baby farm, for they propose to adopt forty-five or fifty other dirty babies throughout the West. I also find that the Acting Prime Minister is trying to get a purchaser for some of his land which he had on his hands some years ago when he became administrator of a certain Naboth. It seems that he has Naboth's vineyard on his hands, and it is quite possible that he contemplates founding a home for these dirty babies in the vineyard—and, certainly, if he gets as many of them as he professes to be looking after now, I really am afraid that Naboth's vineyard will not be large enough to hold them all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I pointed out that we were not dealing with the question of public ownership, that over a year ago I announced what my position was, that I clearly and distinctly understood then the position that we were in by reason of those roads being in our hands, and that the question was: How best to utilize them? The preamble of this Bill settles that question. It says:

> Whereas His Majesty on behalf of the Dominion of Canada has acquired control of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of the various Constituent and Subsidiary Companies comprising the Canadian Northern System, as specified in the First Schedule to this Act, and it is expedient to provide for the incorporation of a Company under which the railways, works and undertakings of the Companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System may be consolidated, and together with the Canadian Government Railways operated as a national railway system: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Canada,— and so forth. That clearly indicates that we knew we owned those railways and were providing for the best way of managing them. If there should be a difference of opinion between hon. gentlemen to your right and hon. gentlemen to your left as to the best way of managing these roads, does it lie in the mouth of anybody to say that we do not want to have them at all? What would be the sense of saying we do not want to have them when they are already in our possession and we have been operating them now for over a year? I submit, Sir, that it is neither honest nor fair criticism for the leader of the House or any other hon. member on his side to say that we are opposed to, or in favour of, holding those roads, when we are dealing entirely with the question of management. For over forty-five years we have had a Government railway in this country and have been managing it without a corporation of this kind, and a man could be for or against it during that time as he would be now——

The CHAIRMAN: I must direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One could easily gather from the speech of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) that he was very angry with the Government over this Bill, and also that he was quite anxious to escape from the unfortunate position upon which he impaled himself and his party last Friday. But the most eager listener would find it very difficult to ascertain whether he was opposed to this Bill or whether he favoured it, and still more difficult to learn, if he opposed it, on what ground he did so, and what he objected to in it. For almost several hours to-day I have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite who are ostensibly opponents of the measure and are complaining of their treatment with regard to it; but all through those seven hours not one has pointed to one clause or one word of the Bill which he opposes or which he says is objectionable. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they have not had time to discuss the Bill. The leader of the Opposition gave us a calculation to show us that if every member wanted to speak on each clause, he would have a minute and seven-eighths, or something of that kind, within which to perform the task; therefore he says that when we moved the postponement of the consideration of clause 20 last Friday we took the Opposition short and did not give them a fair chance to discuss this measure. When we moved the postponement at one o'clock on Saturday morning we had discussed for eight hours that day, and for some time the day before, one single clause of the Bill without making any progress, and with the clearest intimation from the leader of the Opposition that we would not be allowed to make any progress. It did not matter what might happen; if everybody wanted to discuss each clause, so long as two or three hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to delay the Committee in order to delay the discussion of one single clause, we could not get ahead. That one single clause was the most unobjectionable clause of the whole Bill, the most absolutely impossible to take objection to. That was the clause which simply empowered the company, if Parliament voted money for the purpose later, to utilize charters which, while the company was in private hands, were the possession of that private company. Have we heard anything to-day to indicate to us why these charters should not be revived? A listener in the gallery or a member who was not here last Friday might gather from this debate that we who were directly responsible for the measure had sat here all day with hardened hearts and obdurate spirit, had refused to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite, refused to give any information, refused even to take kindly suggestions from them, and that, consequently, the spirit of gentlemen on the other side was such that they had to oppose the Bill whether there was any merit in it or not. Well, it would be interesting to inquire what there is in this complaint about lack of information. The hon. gentleman says that we brought down our schedule only Friday afternoon, giving the exact charters covered by clause 20 and asking that they be revived. That is true. The Bill as it formerly stood provided for the revival of any charters that had been the property of the private company. For the life of me, I know of no reason why the Parliament of Canada should refuse to revive for public purposes charters that were granted for private purposes. Why was the schedule brought down Friday afternoon? It was brought down at the suggestion of the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) who asked that clause 20 be amended and that we specify the charters we wished to be revived. Because we accepted his suggestion we were met with the most stubborn opposition all the rest of the day and with a refusal to pass the clause in the form into which it had been drawn at the request of the member for Maisonneuve. Now we are complained of because we dared to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with obstruction. We are complained of also because we accepted no amendments from hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, we had not much encouragement to accept any others, because, having accepted this one, we were delayed a whole day and threatened with indefinite delay unless we applied the only rule of the House that enabled us to proceed. What information was asked for that was denied?

Mr. PEDLOW: May I answer the minster?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the hon. member can express it better than I can.

Mr. PEDLOW: I asked the Minister of Railways for information which he absolutely refused to give.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was it?

Mr. PEDLOW: Information as to who own lands and the townsites along these railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman need not think that I would forget that; that was really the most amusing of all these requests. One hon. gentleman asked for a map, and for the mileage. The mileage does not matter, because we are not building the mileage. When we come to ask Parliament to vote money to build the mileage, then all the mileage will be given; an estimate will be given as to the amount per mile. That is when Parliament is interested; but we must have the charters, be the mileage long or short. As for a map, I do not know the value of a map dangling between me and the leader of the Opposition. There are maps in almost every room in the building; hon. gentlemen can go to them and see the direction that everyone of these lines is to take. All the information is available; hon. gentlemen have had three days and three nights in which to gaze on the glory of the map of Canada, if that is any advantage to them. But the main thing is the matter mentioned by the member for North Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow). Why, he says, we wanted to know the names of the people who own the land along the routes of these forty-four lines. He is quite correct; they really did ask for that. Here is what the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) said, although he is strangely silent to-night:

> There has been deposited on the table a list of forty-four lines, charters for which are to be revived. Now, we want to know where those lines are going—

The schedule itself tells exactly where all the lines are going; that is to say, the general direction—and that is all that is known.

> —the counties they will pass through—

There are no counties in our part of the country, so they cannot pass through any.

> —and the owners of the land traversed by the railways.

Here are forty-four charters sought to be revived; the hon. gentleman asks us to tell him who are the owners of all the lands that will be traversed by these railways. How do you know who owns the land until you have the right of way, until you have a plan made out and accepted by the Minister of Railways? That is not the case here. We know the general direction; we know the lines that are built. But suppose we had the plans; suppose we knew every farm the lines went through, do hon. gentlemen seriously suggest that we should employ every lawyer in Western Canada to hunt up the land titles records and ascertain who are the thousands of owners of lands—for there virtually are thousands—along these rights of way? A more absurd, a more utterly ludicrous suggestion, was never offered to a Committee of this House. Who, it is asked, owns the land along the right of way? Are they friends of the Government? Well, I assume they are. You could not build a line of railway ten feet in Western Canada without encountering friends of the Government. Hon. gentlemen told us last Friday that some friends of the Government have townsites and are going to make great profits; that the roads are no good, but that these people are going to make great money out of the townsites. I challenged them then to come here to-day with information on that subject—they would have two days and three nights to think it over. I promised them that they would produce a sensation in the Committee if they gave any such information to-day, and that that information would likely have a serious influence upon the votes of hon. members on this side. Has anybody offered it? Has anybody heard any information as to friends of ours who own townsites along these lines? Well, there has not been very much, and I will tell you why: Ever since the Canadian Northern railway was owned by the Government, the townsites, one and all, have been owned by the Canadian Northern Railway, and therefore by the people of Canada.

That, unfortunately, was not the case with the Grand Trunk Pacific. It is the case with the Canadian Northern Railway Company to-day, and it will be the case with regard to all the townsites along the line built under the charters covered by clause 20. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) does not know for the life of him how to vote on this Bill unless we tell him the name of every farmer through whose property these lines are going to run.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why did the minister not supply that information to us on Friday night when he was asked for it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The information as to the names of the owners? I have not given it to the hon. member now.

Mr. PEDLOW: The minister has answered my question, has he not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the question was to give the names of the owners of real estate along those lines, I have given the hon. member no name at all, but he is apparently quite satisfied. Had I known he was as easily satisfied as that, I would have done so before. We do not know the name of a single owner. For myself, I have never even heard of one and never even suggested one.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why did the minister not furnish that information then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really did not think the Committee was so very much interested in the fact that I did not know the name of an owner along those lines. I assumed that the Committee, hon. gentlemen on this side as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, had sufficient intelligence to know that the lines had to run somewhere; that, wherever they ran, there would be owners along the right of way, and that this Parliament was not influenced in the slightest degree by whoever owned the right of way along those lines. What we are interested in is this, that the lines have been called for by setlers for years, and that had it not been for the war they would have been built before this. Any hon. gentleman who made any inquiry at all, would know that there is not one of those lines that has not for years been called for. Governments, whether Federal or provincial, do not grant charters for the construction of lines unless good reason is shown why they should be built. These are charters that have been granted years ago, and that have been allowed to die by reason of the war, and we know that they are needed. Indeed, there are before this Parliament 1,500 signatures praying that one of these lines be built.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is afraid that, because these charters are revived and made the asset of the people of this country through the people's road, foreign creditors of Canada are going to take alarm and refuse to lend us any money. That is what troubles his soul to-night. He says they are going to look at the debit side of the ledger of this country, and that because they see these 44 charters owned by the people of Canada without any obligations on them at all, they are not going to lend us any money for our future financing. Is it going to disturb a foreign creditor to see that, although we have the railway mileage we have in those western lands, there are still districts in which farmers are hauling wheat thirty or forty miles? It is a good country, but there are no railways to haul their wheat for them. We could not have a finer asset for this country than for the foreign creditor to read in the body of this Bill that there are 44 charters which the Government of Canada deem should be taken up and made the property of the people, because the people are there and need the lines to serve them.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain how the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell) knows that the Government are going to build 350 miles this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Nelson has information that I did not have myself, because I have not arrived at the time when the information is necessary. When I come as an hon. member of this House to authorize lines to be built by an Appropriation Act of this House, then I want to know what lines are to be built, how far they are to be built, and what the rate is per mile.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member had no information then. He was guessing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume he made some inquiries some time before, but we are not concerned with that at the moment. If it were 350 miles or 3,500 miles, what difference would that make as regards the revival of these charters? Will the hon. gentleman answer me that?

Mr. McKENZIE: I presume that all of these charters cover thousands of miles of railway. The people of Canada might be willing to build 1,000 miles, while they might be opposed to building 10,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, and they will decide that when they commence to vote the money, but we want the charters whether the lines are long or short, and I vote for the charters, whether the lines are long or short.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did the minister ever, in his experience as a minister, see one vote, once put into the Estimates by the Government, knocked out?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same thing applies to Estimates that applies to any Government Bill: if the Government is defeated on it, the Government resigns. But parliament is then entitled to the information, because the information should affect the judgment of hon. members. That information affects the issue as to whether we should vote the or not, but it does not in the 12 m. slightest affect the issue as to whether we should revive the charters or not, so that every particular item of information asked for that has the faintest bearing on the issue was given to this committee. No information, whatever, was denied, and hon. gentlemen cannot come to this committee to-day and say, with any reason: Our obstruction was on account of the hard-heartedness of the Minister of the Interior. They obstructed this Bill for reasons very difficult for me to define, but they certainly obstructed it by determinedly opposing a decision of this Committee on a single clause for eight long hours one afternoon and evening.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want to interfere with the minister's time, but if he will look over Hansard, I venture the opinion that his own side of the House took up more time than we did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On Friday evening?

Mr. McKENZIE: To-night and every other time that the Bill was under fire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who would not do that to-night? We have to go on until two o'clock anyway. On Friday evening practically the whole time was taken up by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) himself, and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). We have under discussion this afternoon this Bill that was criticised so much, that needed so much minute examination in Committee in order that every clause might be just right and no clause in it that should not be in, and what do we find? We have had speech after speech from hon. gentlemen opposite, and we find that the leader of the Opposition has discussed government ownership in the abstract, discussed where he stood a year ago, and where he stands now, discussed even somethiing about a sugar refinery—no, I think that was the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). He also referred to the tariff, as did the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who had, moreover, something to say about newspaper advertising, railway ties and the puffing of automobiles outside the door of this building. Every subject in the world has been covered except the clauses of this Bill; not one single criticism has been offered of the wording of a single clause, and no suggestion has been made as to any better way of handling the railroads of Canada, with the exception of that made by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb).

Mr. McKENZIE: This is merely a post mortem examination.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member may be dead, but I can assure him I am not. We have had one suggestion. We have had a variety of opinions, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to fit themselves into the peculiar railway beliefs of various sections of the country they have made desperate efforts. We have had all sorts and kinds of opinions and beliefs as to railway ownership, Government operation and everything else that would satisfy the most fastidious taste in the world. We have the leader of the Opposition, who does not believe in Government ownership as a principle, who boasts that he came to that opinion a year ago. We have the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), who says that the Liberal party were the pioneers of Government ownership in this country. What does he think of his leader to-day, now that he has hauled down the flag and set up the standard of private ownership? The Liberal party can no longer, under the leadership of the present incumbent, ever take the stand for public ownership in Canada. Then, also, we have the opinion of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), who is out-and-out opposed to Government ownership from beginning to end, and against that is the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who is not only in favour of our operating those railways we already own, but who would lay violent hands on the Canadian Pacific as well.

Against them both, we have the hon. member for Maisonneuve who although he has been in public life for some twenty years comes here and confesses he has no opinion on the subject at all.

Government ownership is wise when properly applied, when the circumstances are such that it is sound principle to apply it, and it gets to be a sound principle proportionately as the competitive element is eliminated and the element of monopoly takes its place—in proportion as the industry is evolved into that stage of maturity in which it becomes a monopoly, and essentially for its best operation must be operated by the State. Here we have this case, the Government of Canada owning to-day approximately one-half the railway mileage of this country. We propose to operate that mileage aside from politics in a separate organization responsible to the Government of this country, responsible to Parliament; operating it, I repeat, aside from political influence wholly and entirely. That is what we propose. We have all the conditions here for Government operation. We have first the condition of necessity; we have every condition that can obtain. The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon offers the only alternative. He says: Take the offer of the Grand Trunk. They are ready to exchange traffic with you at North Bay, and to run the Canadian Northern at cost. Run the Canadian Northern at cost? What would that mean? Take the railway paid for by the people of this country, every deficit of which must be met by the treasury of Canada, and place its operation in the hands of directors elected by a section of the electorate of England? Place in the hands of men irresponsible to Parliament, irresponsible to the Government, irresponsible to the people, the disposition annually of millions of money of the people of this country? That is the only concrete suggestion we have had all afternoon as an alternative to the Bill before the House.

Now, I say, we are going to compete with the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific has great charter powers and a tremendous organization, and in that competition we shall require the loyal support of every representative of the people of this country. We shall have to hold the balance in our legislative jurisdiction even, between the Canadian Pacific and our own road.

Mr. McCREA: I do not think it is necessary to go into any lengthy arguments as to whether we approve of government ownership, because the roads have been taken over, and it is now a question of the best ways and means of managing them. I think it will be found that the majority of the people of this country are of my own opinion. I do not think they are in favour of government ownership of roads that can be run otherwise. The experience of England and of the United States and other countries that have operated railroads under government ownership in recent years ought to be a lesson to us, unless this Government is of the opinion that it is very much smarter, and more capable than any of those other governments. Canada has had public ownership of the Intercolonial for some forty years or more, and that road has never been able to pay its way. But we need not debate the question of public ownership, because both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are now in the hands of the Government.

The question which seems to be engaging the attention of the House most is the question of renewing some forty-four charters which have been granted to the Canadian Northern subsidiary companies, wisely or otherwise. I believe there are men on the other side of the House who will agree with me that these charters should go through the regular course before being renewed; they should come before the Railway Committee of this House. The Railway Committee has often had to deal with renewal of charters, and whenever I attended the Railway Committee I never knew of one charter that was not cut down, or remodelled, or revised entirely.

I think one of the things that ought to engage the attention of this House is the reckless granting of charters for the construction of parallel lines. I do not believe there is anybody in this House who has any desire to hamstring or hamper the Northwest or any other part of Canada which is entitled to railroad construction, but I do hope that all hon. members of this House will oppose the renewing of charters for parallel roads. If these charters came before the Railway Committee, the Committee could decide whether the roads would serve a useful purpose or not. I certainly think it is unwise to renew at one stroke of the pen these forty-four charters about which very little seems to be known even by the Government supporters. It has been insinuated that Quebec is jealous of the other provinces. I do not think that is the case at all. I think that Quebec and all other parts of Canada are in favour of granting charters for the development of any part of this country, but I repeat, these charters should come before the Railway Committee and be dealt with in the ordinary way. Plans and maps should be produced and the location shown, so that the Committee can see whether it is a case of paralleling another road and whether any useful purpose will be served by renewing the charter. I am satisfied the Committee would deal fairly with these charters, whether they were for construction in the Northwest or any other part of Canada. I can see no reason whatever for bunching them all together and passing them in that form. While I have some confidence in the Government, I have not quite enough to hand over to them the handling of all these matters, about which their own followers seem to know very little.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is it not true that these charters have all been before the Railway Committee, and some of them on several occasions?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The argument we have just heard from the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) is not one that I take exception to particularly. He is entitled to have the information that he asks for, but I think it has all been given from time to time before the Railway Committee. Possibly some of these acts were passed by local legislatures, but a large number have been before the Railway Committee and all the information that was required for the passing of the Acts was furnished to the Railway Committee and to this House at the time the charters were first obtained. That, I presume, is all in Hansard and on the records of the Railway Committee, and can be found by any hon. gentleman who has doubts as to the wisdom of the location of the lines or anything of that kind. It has been explained by the Minister of the Interior that when these lines are to be built this matter will again come up before the House and hon. gentlemen can object at that time to the voting of money to the building of them if they are not thought to be to the general advantage of the people. Many of these branch lines are in territory requiring additional transportation facilities. We have heard from the West and hon. members speaking for that section of the country have made a very strong case as to why railways should be permitted to be built in Western Canada to serve settlers who have been waiting for years and now that the war is over and railway construction is about to begin again, it seems only reasonable that these companies should be rechartered. This perhaps would not be the usual procedure were it a private company but under ownership by the people there surely cannot be any objection. I might remind the leader of the Opposition when he asks whether it is not reasonable that hon. members should have all the information necessary that if he will recall the debates that took place in this House when the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific projects were under consideration the then leader of the Government, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said "We have mountains of information with regard to the building of these roads." Now we know what a mess was made in spite of all these mountains of information. Nothing has ever been projected in Canada that has cost the people so dearly and that apparently was so little needed. The hon. member for Guysborough told us this afternoon that they on his side of the House were pioneers in public ownership, and he instanced the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental as evidences of that contention. He says these railways were built for the people. That surely must be news to all hon. gentlemen in the House at that time. No; they were building them for the Grand Trunk and not for the people. The Grand Trunk undertook to pay 3 per cent on the total cost of construction and I think my hon. friend from Guysborough will realize that it was not public ownership that was in the minds of the Government at that time when they constructed these roads. and it was not foreseen at that time we would be faced with the gigantic proposal on our doorstep to-day. I have not Hansard before me but I think the leader of the Opposition must have repeated the words "dirty babies" from fifty to a hundred times in the course of fifteen or twenty minutes. Might I ask him if as a judge of the court he does not think it would improve his vocabulary if he had occasionally referred to them as soiled infants.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member had better take his leader to task. I was following his language precisely.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I had not the pleasure of hearing the leader of the Government, but I will venture to say that the hon. leader of the Opposition used the term ten or possibly twenty times where the leader of the Government used it once. However, he repeated this expression until it became nauseating. It appears to me that we do not need mountains of information and the question before us is whether it is proper to place in public hands what has been previously owned in a private capacity. I have been on record for four or five years now as being in favour of public ownership of the great utilities. I believe the municipalities should own all their public enterprises such as street cars, electric lighting plants, telephone systems, waterworks, gas supply, etc., and in provincial matters I believe that wherever railways can be projected to the advantage of the province there should be provincial ownership, and the same principle should apply to national enterprises, which should be under public ownership. This may be a comparatively new thing in Canada but nearly all the nations of the world have recognized it for years. Almost every country in Europe and many of the more advanced of the South American republics, and also Australia, have for a long time been owners of their transportation systems. The only question to be decided is: Are the properties that we get such as we would invest our money in if we had our choice? I do not think that public ownership has had an opportunity to prove its value up to the present time. The Intercolonial Railway which has been held up as an instance has been one of the greatest stumbling blocks to public ownership in Canada because it has been constantly unproductive and non-paying. And the reasons are evident. First it was run as a political railway, and secondly its rates were such that no company could afford to haul freights for. Therefore, you cannot hinge a case on the Intercolonial Railway.

The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) advocated the public ownership of all steamship lines plying to our ports. But I do not think this is an opportune time to bring that forward, and I am not going to put myself on record to-night as favouring the acquisition of any steamship lines at the present time; we have plenty of obligations on our shoulders already. This has come to us, however, not because we were seeking it; it is a legacy from our friends across the way. They must realize that, and if they are familiar with the history of railway construction in Canada they will know that this was thought to be folly some fourteen, fifteen or sixteen years ago. But the Opposition, at that time the Government, won out. These railways were built and they are on our hands. What are we to do? We have to take them over and make the best job we can of it. We know that the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific were ill-advised undertakings from the start, that they have cost more than double the money that should have been put into them, and they have involved very considerable expenditure, especially in the Eastern section. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of wanting information in spite of the mountains of information that we had at the time this road was projected. What did we have? We had estimates varying from $13,000,000 up to $60,000,000 for the cost of these roads. Those were the estimates of what the road would cost at that time. Every hon. gentleman knows what the result has been. They have cost the country four, or five hundred million dollars, and the end is not yet. The Quebec bridge alone, one little link in the Transcontinental, has cost this country $27,000,000. I am glad to see my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) enter the Chamber because he knows that bridge very well. Twenty-seven million dollars is the figure which represents the cost of that enterprise to the people of Canada, and this whole road, as to which we had mountains of information when we started in to build it, has cost the country from three to four times as much as we were led to expect it would at the time the enterprise was projected. Can we, under those circumstances, expect that the roads in this country will pay if we invest in them four or five times what should have been spent? Neither can we make the railways pay in operation unless we set out to handle them as business propositions, and with respect to these roads, now aggregating somewhere in the neighbourhood of fifteen thousand miles, we must have a business administration. We must not pay higher wages than are paid on the ordinary railways of the country. We cannot afford to operate those railways at an excessive cost per mile; we will have to reduce our expenditures to such a point as will justify the freight and passenger charges that are levied upon them. If the wages are not sufficient then the freight and passenger rates must be advanced to a point where they will pay, not only all operating expenses, but pay for all betterments and all that sort of thing that is required.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a business man, does my hon. friend think that it will be possible to pay the same wages in future as in pre-war times?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, I certainly do not. I hope that wages will never go back to where they were before the war. I believe they will not, and I trust that with the best of administration, and with getting the intelligent labour that we have in Canada, that although we pay our workmen perhaps double the wages we did before the war, that they are justifying that payment by the service that they render to the people of Canada in whatever walk of life they are engaged. I believe that we have an intelligent class of men. I believe we have as good railway men as there are in the world, but it must not be forgotten that we have a very difficult climate in which to operate railways, and you cannot, when the thermometer drops away below zero and there are four or five feet of snow on the ground, get the same results as in the southern countries where they have none of these obstacles to contend with. That is one thing that we must not forget.

Before my time is up I want to make a special reference to my own part of the province of Ontario, in regard to two or three of the charters that appear in this schedule: One is the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway, and the other is the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway. That is a section that is the most congested probably of railway enterprises in the whole of Canada. Between Hamilton and Toronto we have only the same rails that we had sixty years ago. It has been double-tracked, but the right of way is the same, and the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk are using the same line. Between those two points there is probably heavier traffic than in any place in Canada. We want another road from Toronto just as quickly as we can get it, and I, for one, cannot understand the opposition of Sir Adam Beck to the project that has been laid down here, and that we have granted charters to the Canadian Northern to build. I say that we want that road and we want it just as quickly as we can get it. I say that, being a strong advocate of the Hydro Electric, and a strong advocate of radial roads where they can be justified, but I cannot understand the opposition of Sir

Adam Beck to Mr. Hanna's proposal that this line shall be run into the Niagara district. We are not opposed, nor is the management of the National Railways, as far as I understand it, opposed to the radials. That antagonism should never arise, and it would not arise if proper thought were given to it. The radials of Canada and the electric roads of Canada, in my judgment, are quite on right lines, and I hope to see that branch of our railway enterprises very much increased. But I would suggest that instead of running these common trolley cars, which are apparently proposed on all these lines, they start out with electric engines that will draw a train and not simply a car. Shippers in our part of the country do not want to send goods on trolley lines and have to tranship twenty, thirty, or fifty miles away from where they started. They want to run from Brantford, Hamilton, or any place where those goods are purchased for the West—and we ship many thousands of cars per annum to the West—on lines that can carry the goods all the way through without transhipment. We want these hydro-electric roads and these radial roads to be feeders of the great national steam roads too. These might be electrified, which would be a great advantage in operation. I have visited New York State and there I found electric engines drawing fifteen or twenty cars and drawing more rapidly and getting headway much quicker than a steam engine can do. I only throw this out as a suggestion. I believe these radial roads, which are for the advantage of Canada, and certainly are an advantage to the district in which they are planted, should be subsidiary and should be feeders to this great national enterprise. I say, by all means, let us have this proposed road down to the Niagara river just as quickly as it can be built, where it will be able to secure international connection. A bridge should be built for this purpose across the Niagara river. Then this road, having proper terminals, and being in a position to feed itself from all quarters and from all parts of the country, it will be a paying enterprise, and instead of public ownership getting a black eye on the ground that it is not a paying enterprise, you will have railways under proper management, with proper freight and passenger charges and I believe you will find public ownership justify itself in Canada the same as it has done in almost every enlightened country in the world.

Mr. VIEN: Among all the measures that were announced in the Speech from the Throne, surely the Bill we are now considering was one of the most important. It purposes to consolidate all the state-owned railways of Canada into one company, and to provide for a new system of management. If I were to accept the figures given the other day to the House by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) we have now a liability of over a billion of dollars in respect of these railways. It is to provide a proper system of management for this property, representing a billion of dollars, that we on both sides have been seeking information during the discussions which have occupied the last two or three days. I do not fear contradiction when I suggest that since the beginning of the session no measure of such importance has been brought down by the Government, and it should by no means surprise anybody if, before committing the country to the policies mentioned in the Bill, we take a little time to study them carefully.

It is surprising, it is even amazing, to see the Government apply the closure at this early stage of the discussion, just to avoid giving information to the House and to prevent free speech in this, the people's forum. The Acting Prime Minister and the hon. member for Red Deer said the other day that there was more Liberalism on the right side of the House than anywhere else.

Mr. McMASTER: They were boasting.

Mr. VIEN: They were boasting, Mr. Chairman. Their very act gave them the lie, for at the same sitting of the House they announced the closure. Surely nobody will venture to suggest that that is a Liberal measure. During the fifteen years of the Liberal administration there were protracted debates, but never did that administration impose the closure; on some occasions they preferred to submit to the people the question at issue. The Minister of the Interior has accused the Opposition of unduly delaying this Bill; he failed to see what objection the Opposition had to put forward to the enactment of any of the sections. Sir, I will only say that there was no objection offered by the Opposition to the main features of this Bill, but we studied carefully and conscientiously how we could improve it. We simply asked for information from the Government, and we were sincere in our desire to help the measure along so far as we could do so consistently with public interest. We were blocked on clause 20 of the Bill, granting authorization to build forty-four branch lines, which lines are enumerated in the schedule laid upon the Table on Friday last. What did we say? We did not ask the Government to withdraw the clause or the schedule, we did not say that we were against the schedule, but we simply said that we were not in possession of sufficient information to allow us to pass judgment on the clause. Sir, we are asked to incorporate a company and to authorize it to build forty-four new branch lines. The Government says: You have no ground to object to such power being given to the company; we are not asking for power to build, we are simply asking to revive 44 construction charters given by the various Legislatures or by this Parliament, and never will we go on with the construction unless Parliament is asked to vote the necessary monies. I submit, Sir, that that is not so. The very clauses of this Bill give the lie to the Minister of the Interior and to the other Ministers of the Crown when they assert such a thing. They say that even if clause 20 is passed the Government will not be able to go on with the construction work. Let them read clause 26 as enacted. That clause provides that the company, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may issue bonds, debentures and debenture stock from time to time in respect of the mileage of the line of railway which it constructs, acquires, owns or controls to the extent of $75,000 per mile. The Government will be authorized to pledge the whole Government railway system for the building of these additions, and yet the Minister of the Interior and the Acting Prime Minister the other day told the House that never could the Government go on with such construction without asking Parliament for the necessary funds. I submit that clause 26 of this Bill gives the necessary authorization, and that no further power need be sought from Parliament for construction. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization confirmed my opinion when he said that the construction of many of these lines was going to be commenced in a very few weeks by subsidiary companies of the Canadian Northern System, and would be proceeded with, because by the enactment of this law, particularly by reason of section 26, they did not need any further power, and could issue bonds and pledge the whole of the Canadian Government Railway System for the amount of money so borrowed.

Now, Sir, if the enactment of clause 20 gives to the Government the right to construct 44 branch lines, and if clause 26, which has been approved, gives the Government authority to issue bonds to the full amount of $75,000 per mile, pledging the Canadian Government Railway system to that extent, we are surely justified in going into the matter very carefully. We have the Drayton-Acworth report, which tells us that we have been overbuilding railways in Canada, that this country has the greatest mileage per thousand of population of any country in the world, and that we have been foolishly building railways in the past; and the hon. member for Springfield has used that argument time and again in this House. The Acting Prime Minister the other day said that our railway system was overlapping everywhere, that there was a duplication of lines in many centres. Yet we are now asked to give the Government a blanket authorization to build 44 new branch lines, and we are not allowed the necessary time to inquire whether those branch lines are necessary, or whether they are duplications of existing lines. We are accused of unduly obstructing the work of the House if we ask to be allowed the necessary time to inquire into this matter before we vote upon it. The Acting Minister of Justice, pursuing his ordinary method, ridicules the Opposition because they did not venture to offer any policy or any constructive criticism on this clause. What did we say, Mr. Chairman? We simply asked that the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee so as to allow a full investigation of the matter. This was a fair suggestion; this was not undue delay or undue obstruction. When the minister says that no sound objection could be offered against the proposed law, it is evident that he did not pay sufficient attention to what has been said on this subject. He is wilfully leading the House into error.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman withdraw the expression, that a minister is wilfully leading the House into error.

Mr. VIEN: I withdraw the word "wilfully," and I say that he tries to induce the House to believe something that his own Bill contradicts. As a whole, the Bill has some good features. Everybody admits that the present management of the Canadian Government Railway system is poor and inefficient and that it can be greatly improved; in so far as this Bill provides for some improvement in that management, both sides of the House approve of it. But it is only fair that we should not allow the Government to go on with the construction of these forty-four lines without more careful study and without more information being given to the House. The Acting Minister of Justice says that where these branch lines are to be constructed in the West there is a very extensive agricultural district, the settlers in which have to carry their products thirty or forty miles to reach the nearest railway station. Well, if we are going to build branch lines in every part of this country where the farmers have to travel thirty or forty miles to reach the nearest railway station, the resources of Canada will not suffice. In many sections of the older provinces there are prosperous farming centres the people of which have to travel longer distances than those mentioned to get railway accommodation. Before we launch upon this policy we should look into it very carefully and be able to express our opinion intelligently, with full knowledge of the facts.

The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) said the other day that he was fully conversant with the various charters, because at the time of their enactment by the local legislature he was a provincial minister. But most members of the House have not had an opportunity of going into the question fully. I wish to point out one feature of these charters which is calculated to cast some doubt upon the great utility, and the imperious necessity of building these branch lines. These construction powers were enacted by the provincial legislatures or by this Parliament some years ago, but they have elapsed. Although the provincial governments had held out the inducement of bond guarantees, the interested companies did not think that the traffic possibilities and the conditions generally in the district where these lines were to be built justified the construction of the roads. And now, suddenly, without giving due warning to the House, the Government comes down with legislation and tries to hurry it through without giving sufficient time for members to go into the matter. They want us to give a blanket authority to revive forty-four charters, although the private concerns who originally got the construction powers did not see their way clear to build the lines, and to take advantage of the grants of money that had been offered to them. We are asked to undertake the construction of these lines without taking advantage of these provincial grants. The Minister of Railways said the other night that in connection with the construction of these branch lines they would not call on the provincial treasury to make the grants of moneys even though the provinces would benefit by the building of the roads. The Canadian Government Railway system will depend on Federal resources only.

Section 16 of the Bill provides that all the expenses of the company shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the railway, and that deficits will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That is to say, the company will have the right to apply to all the purposes of the railway, even to the purchase of subsidiary companies, all the revenue and income of these railways, and if there is a deficit they will obtain from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada the necessary amount to cover it. Moreover, they will wait until next session before coming to Parliament to get authorization for and sanction of the payments already made by the minister under this section.

Mr. BUCHANAN: There have been veiled insinuations, if not direct statements, that the extension of the time for the construction of these branch lines would mean a riot of expenditure in Western Canada. From remarks that they have made, it is evidently the opinion of some hon. gentlemen that it is not in the interests of Canada that further expenditure should be made on railroad construction in the West.

Is it the policy of anybody in this Parliament to say that railroad construction in Western Canada should cease. Because if railroad construction in Western Canada is allowed to cease at this moment, there will be a waste of money that has already been spent in the development of that territory. Let me go back to the commencement of the development of that territory, especially the great development that took place under the late Liberal Administra- been in a section of Alberta which I represent, for about ten or more years; they were promised free land, and they were also assured that they would be provided with transportation facilities. People have been in the section of Alberta from which I come, for about ten or more years; they have settled on homestead lands, and up to the present moment they are from thirty-five to fifty or sixty miles from a railway. What will happen if branch lines are not constructed in such sections? Those people will have to leave the country. There are no free lands of any account left in Western Canada, and as those that are left are being limited to settlement for the soldiers, the natural thing is that most of those people will drift back to the United States from which they came, and consequently the money that was spent in bringing them into and keeping them in this country will be lost to Canada. It is, therefore, in the interest of the development of Western Canada that those lines should be constructed in order to retain the people we have in those particular districts. I know something about the branch lines that are mentioned in this Bill, especially in the part of Alberta from which I come, and I can safely state that every one of the branch lines mentioned is absolutely necessary in order to provide transportation facilities for people who are in need of railroads at the present time. If those lines are not provided, the people will at once have to leave Alberta and go to other places.

Might I point out to hon. members that, in Alberta, from the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway south to the international boundary line, there is only one railroad at the present time? That railway is the Canadian Pacific. If we were assured, under any legislation that this Government could adopt, that the Canadian Pacific would provide all the branch lines that were required in that section, I would agree to the Canadian National Railway constructing branch lines in the section of the country that it particularly serves at present. But at this moment we have no guarantee of that kind, and the people have gone into those districts because they anticipated the construction of branches of the old Canadian Northern railway, and they expect now, since the Government took over that road, that those lines will be built.

We must look forward to the development of the great uncultivated areas of Western Canada, and we can do so only by the provision of transportation facilities. People will no longer go long distances from railroads and settle upon the land unless they are assured that they are to be provided with transportation facilities. That stage in the development of Western Canada is past, and consequently, the existing railroads in Canada must also provide lines in the country that is to be developed in the near future. On many occasions in this House I have tried to emphasize the fact that the development of Western Canada, the increase in its population and wealth, are very important considerations to the East. If the West does not develop, if the East is not prepared to share with the West in the construction of railroads, the East is not going to benefit from that great and fertile country west of the Great Lakes. It is just as important to the people of Western Canada as it is to the people of the West that those lines should be built. What would be the state of Eastern Canada at the present time if the West stood as it did in the early nineties? There would not be the prosperity that has existed in the past in Eastern Canada, nor would there be the population. But I have this confidence in the West, and I have the same confidence in Canada as a whole, that if we all bend our energies toward the development of this country east and west, we shall have a country that will very quickly double in population. But if we are going to consider the matter solely from a sectional standpoint, then I am afraid it will not go beyond what it is at the present.

I know of the needs of the people as regards branch lines. I have travelled many miles in that particular section of Alberta where the people are without railroad facilities, and I know the people have been there for ten or more years waiting for a railroad. They have been patient; they have cultivated the land, and they have hauled their grain many miles to a railroad, but they will not continue to do that unless railroads come or are assured to them in the immediate future.

It has been stated that the old "Canadian Northern gang," as it has been called, is still associated with this enterprise. If any evidence was offered to me that that was the case, I would not be inclined to be in sympathy with the nationalization of this road, but no evidence has been offered. It is true, some of the old officials of the Canadian Northern railway are associated with the Canadian National railway. What was the Canadian Government to do when it took over the Canadian Northern railway? Was it to discard all the officials of the Canadian Northern and secure a new outfit entirely? I do not think any business man or any person in this country expected the Government to do that. The Government had to have an experienced railroad man at the head of the Canadian National railway and I think they placed at its head an experienced railroad man. But if they had not taken that experienced head from the Canadian Northern railway, but had gone to the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk, what would have been the charge? It would immediately have been charged that the Government had placed the first real attempt at public ownership in the hands of an official who was in sympathy with private ownership, and if public ownership had failed, the blame would have been placed on the selection made by the Government. Therefore, it was well for the Government to place in charge of the Government railroad a man who was acquainted with the late Canadian Northern railway, and who, in my judgment, is prepared to give to the service of Canada the same ability and energy that he would give to a private corporation. We at least ought to be fair and give him an opportunity of proving his merit.

The Bill which is before the Committee to-night is merely carrying out a policy that was adopted by this Parliament, a policy in favour of taking over the Canadian Northern railway because it had failed to live up to its obligations to this country. This measure provides for the organization and administration of the Canadian National railway, and surely the new system requires provision for its organization and administration. As this is a Government measure and as the railroad we are taking over is now a Government railway, we shall have an opportunity in the future of discussing this railway; and if it is not being properly conducted, we can say so and criticise the Government. I believe the bulk of the Canadian people are in favour of public ownership; at least, those who live in the Prairie Provinces are in favour of it. They are looking to this Government to operate the Canadian National Railway efficiently and honestly, and if this Government fails to operate the road efficiently and honestly then the people will deal with the Government on the first opportunity; and if this Government does not attempt to keep in touch with the sentiment of the people in operating the railway then it is a Government that is looking for defeat. The Government cannot pander to the old Canadian Northern Railway interests; they have to consider the people of Canada in the matter of Government ownership.

In conclusion I want to repeat as emphatically as I can that this is a critical moment in Western Canada in regard to the construction of branch lines. The population, at least many thousands of them, that we have brought into Western Canada, will not be there in the course of the next few years unless they are provided with branch lines. Many of them have left already and many others are threatening to leave, and it seems to me the Government when renewing the charters should provide that as many as possible of these lines be constructed in order to meet the needs of the people who are without railroads and so develop not only Western Canada but the whole country.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Some of my hon. friends on this side of the House are very candid and naive. For instance, having left the House at eleven o'clock on Friday night, I was not present when the Acting Minister of Justice decided to play his favourite part, and dressing himself in the garb of chief executioner moved the application of the gag. Some of my hon. friends whom I met the next morning seemed to be surprised at what they thought was a very unusual incident. I was not surprised, however, at hearing the news. I thought the action of the Acting Minister of Justice was perfectly natural, and thoroughly in line with the spirit of the weathercock combination which at the present time the people of this country have to suffer as a Government. Why, Sir, if you consider that the Tory element of this Government has never failed yet in the high art of side-stepping issues, and in finding some camouflage or other to hide their spreading sores; if you remember that in 1911 in order to win the election they prevented the people of this country from deciding on the reciprocity issue by branding as disloyalty the simple idea of trade with the United States; if you look back at the conscription policy of 1917, when instead of letting the electorate vote on that issue alone, the Government wilfully and purposely unchained the devils of racial and religious strife;—remembering these things, you will not be surprised that in the year of our Lord 1919 the same element, true to its principles which had proved so effective in the past, is trying to abate the threatening storm of the western demands for lower tariff by fabricating for themselves a cloud of rails and locomotives which will burst at their will at the proper time and flood the western prairie.

This Bill is for the building up of a tremendous machine that will enable the Government to distribute millions of the people's money without the constitutional safeguards to protect the taxpayer against illegal expenditure. Clause 20, and the schedule annexed, will allow the Government or its namesake, the Canadian National Railway Company, to revive forty-four charters which their petitioners have not seen fit to utilize, for the building of railway lines of which we have no particulars and which may involve the spending of enormous sums of money. And because, as the representatives of the people, sent here for the special purpose of seeing to the proper expenditure of public funds, we insist on having details before voting, we are not only refused the opportunity of giving an intelligent vote but are branded as obstructionists, and the gag is applied.

Sir, it was because the kings of France prevented the voice of the people from being heard that the monarchy went down in blood. The horrors of Bolshevism were caused by the choking of the representatives of the Russian people. When will this Government realize the dangerous unrest in this country? When will it avoid further irritation which may light the match that will start the fatal conflagration?

If the Bill we are now studying had a momentous object, if we were discussing in the hour of danger and stress a question which necessitated an immediate solution, probably we could realize the anxiety of the Government. But, Sir, we are asked not only to deliver without inquiry into the hands of the Cabinet unheard of powers, but to engage upon a policy that will bring Canada into the hands of a receiver. The United States are losing a million dollars a day by Government operation of their railroads. The earnings so far this year have been lamentably below even the guarantee to the companies. In England the gross receipt for last year were $440,000,000 less than the cost of producing transportation, including return on investment.

I am not going to take up the time of the House by reading articles that have been published recently, even so late as to-day, in the Montreal Star, on the question of Government ownership of railways; but yet I should feel guilty if I resumed my seat without giving this House the benefit of the opinion of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) on Government ownership.

Speaking in the session of 1917 the minister said—page 4266 of Hansard:

> My opinion has always been that if a man has opinions of his own he had better assert them and try afterwards to convince the public that he is right. If he is not right, then he can let the public do what they have a mind to do about it. That may be a very independent attitude, but I have always taken that view. I do not believe in public ownership of any kind. I do object to the Government going as far as they are going in respect of the proposed ownership of the Canadian Northern Railway system. The Minister of Finance stated that it was the intention to appoint a Commission that should be subject to Parliament not to the Government. Well, if the Government can do that, it is a wonderful step in the right direction. But no man who has lived in the Maritime Provinces all his life as I have done can honestly say that he is in favour of the public ownership of railways. I know that in Ontario there is a fetish in respect of public ownership. Men are worshipping the public ownership of everything. But it will not be many years before they come back to sound business principles. We had an illustration of that in the House the other evening. In Ontario they have had public ownership of utilities in the way of electrical energy—the greatest administration of electrical energy which the world has known. There is no doubt that the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario has done wonderful work. But they are commencing to get up against the wall. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) was compelled to call upon his supporters to vote for an amendment to the general railway Act of Canada absolutely to put out of existence a competitor to the Hydro-Electric because it stood in the way of this Juggernaut. You would not find a better illustration in the records of Canada, from Confederation down to the present time of the failure of public ownership.

At page 5148 he said:

> Many of my friends from Ontario and the West have been captivated by this public operation fad, I want to point out to them that it is the greatest farce and fallacy that ever was brought forward in any country. It is useless to talk about the Government operating railways or telephones, or electric light systems, or anything else as cheaply and economically as they can be operated by private enterprise. Such a thing is not reasonable. Some of my friends from the West believe that if they can get this road operated by the Government, in some magic way they will get better service and better results. Possibly they think they may get a reduction of rates. No greater fallacy was ever held out to anybody. They cannot beat the roads down below what is a reasonable business basis. Remember, you have another railway there, and you cannot cut the rates down below what is fair. No Government in Canada can operate a railway system in the West and make it pay with any lower rates than are being charged by the Canadian Pacific to-day. If the Government carried on the road for the next ten years at the same rates as the Canadian Pacific are charging to-day, instead of paying a ten per cent dividend as the Canadian Pacific is paying, it would go behind fifteen per cent or twenty per cent every year. No man knows this better than my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who has had the longest experience in this House, with one exception, and who has lived in the Maritime Provinces. He has seen all the bungling and all the mismanagement, he knows exactly the condition of affairs, and he knows that every word I say is the truth. I am rather surprised that he has sat here as long as he has without raising his voice in opposition to the scheme.

Listen to the following sentence, Mr. Chairman:

> Of course he may have been overmastered and overpowered by his colleagues.

Shall we say to-night to the Minister of Public Works that he has been overmastered or overpowered by his colleagues? I am awaiting his vote at 2 o'clock. It will enlighten us on the matter.

Mr. GLASS: The hon. member (Mr. Archambault) has presented a very dismal and pessimistic view of the nationalization of these railways. He says it is a fetish in Ontario where they have more or less adopted the principle of public ownership. I may tell him that the principle is not so new after all even in Canada, because it is recorded as early as the year 1850 at the time the Grand Trunk Railway was being built that the Government obtained permission, if they desired, to build the railway as a government railway. It appears that the opposition to this Bill is largely in keeping with the policy constantly pursued of obstructing and opposing every measure that is brought forward by the Government. The leader of the Opposition gibes the Government because it undertakes to provide, as he says, a home for these forty-four babies. Well, under ordinary circumstances that would be considered rather a philanthropic work, and I would suggest that the Opposition might well establish a school for the co-ordination of Liberal policies. Throughout this debate we have had demonstrated to us the fact that their policy is rather of the Heinz variety—mixed pickles. There are so many different opinions and different policies that there seems to be no hope of co-ordination. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency said this afternoon that the Government in 1914 were not justified in giving the assistance they gave to the Canadian Northern, and that the object was to protect the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the bondholders and other friends of the Government. In this connection I desire to quote the leader of the Opposition at that time, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said:

> I said a moment ago that my intention was simply to summarize my views and the policy which we have laid before the people on this question, and I summarize them in a few words. We must carry on this enterprise; we cannot allow it to go by default; we cannot allow anybody or anything to come in which would imply anything detrimental to our credit in England; this enterprise has to be carried out; but, instead of carrying it out in the way proposed, we propose that we should carry it out by other means.
> That we should take absolute control of the enterprises and for that purpose I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley): That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway Company unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed thirty million dollars.

On August 8, 1917, when the matter of the Canadian Northern was further being considered by the House, Mr. German, a member of Parliament at that time, gave expression to these sentiments:

> I wish to state, however, that I would have been in favour of a broader and more courageous policy, one which would have gone further in the way of public ownership of these railway systems than this proposition goes. Whatever we may have thought in the past in regard to public ownership of railroads, we must change our opinion at the present time, if we are to keep pace with the opinion of the public, because it is an undoubted fact that the wheels of democracy are revolving very rapidly. The democratic Juggernaut is advancing rapidly, and those who stand in the way will be crushed under its wheels, whether they are lords, barons, knights or premiers. . . . . and I tell the Government they must not stand in the way. The people are determined to have public ownership of these utilities, and it will come.

Sir, it would be possible to quote from Hansard for a period of some years back, as this subject has been frequently discussed in the House, showing inconsistency and variation in the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. I therefore can realize how difficult it is to believe that they are sincere in enunciating any policy—and in fact they have enunciated no policy in reference to the subject under discussion. I have not observed, during the few years I have been in this House, that the Opposition have been really from time to time endeavouring to assist by any constructive policy, the work of the Government. On the contrary, it has been their accustomed policy, on every occasion, to consistently oppose everything that the Government proposes; and the only reason that they are not to-day standing unanimously for the principle of public ownership is because the Government of the day has adopted that policy, and, consistent with the course which they have followed in the past, the Opposition are simply opposed to this measure.

We point with pride to the very great success that has attended the management of the Canadian Pacific railway; we are proud of that road, and gratified at the development which it has effected. The Canadian Northern railway, in the opinion of those who know the western country well, has within it the possibilities of success on its merits, and a prospective earning capacity equal to that of the Canadian Pacific. That road has now been taken over, and the Government of the day is committed to its operation and is interested more closely than ever in its success as a national enterprise. As to these branch lines which have been provided for in connection with the future operation of the Canadian Northern, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the members from the West, those who have a personal knowledge of the different lines, and to the evidence which they have submitted with respect to the importance of the lines in question as feeders to this great system. Hon. gentlemen from Quebec have referred to the large expenditure that has taken place on the railways in the West and to the fact that their province has contributed a considerable portion of the cost. As a man from Ontario, I want to inform my hon. friends that our province, like theirs, has contributed its quota to the national development of our railways; but I desire to say to our friends from the West that we do not begrudge any expenditure, or any effort, that has been made with a view to developing that great western country. Sir, the possibilities which the further development of the West holds for the future lend every hope and every justification to the expansion of our railways—justifying the construction of the laterals, as it were, of these roads running north and south that have been spoken of to-night—until the various parts of the rich prairie lands of the West are provided with that railway accommodation necessary for the sending of their grain down to the trunk lines where it can seek the necessary outlets. I wish to quote some observations made by Mr. E. B. Biggar, a couple of years ago, when he was writing to the press a plea for the nationalization of Canadian railways. He said at that time: :

> To allow matters merely to drift, while immigration is at a standstill and traffic arising from new construction in cities and settlements has largely ceased, and while long stretches of the new main lines are unable to live on local traffic alone, will simply invite a panic whose extent no man can measure. No Government charged with a responsibility for the commercial stability of the country can permit such an outcome.
> There are two other main alternatives—further aid to the private railway companies now in difficulties, or the nationalization of the steam railways of Canada.
> As to the first alternative, there is a deep-seated conviction that the people of this country have already been too grievously taxed to pay for roads which have been extravagantly built, unwisely located from the standpoint of the general interest, and yet remaining to-day inadequately equipped and deteriorating in that equipment, not to speak of over-capitalization and the evils of railway corporation influence on legislation and on the public morals. Any further aid that would be sufficient to place the suppliant companies in the position that would be deemed safe from their own standpoint will raise a tide of public resentment, which, when added to the burdens involved in the war, will bring about the defeat of the party who imposes those burdens, and if the duration of the war is accompanied by a single bad harvest, this defeat will be all the more disastrous. No amount of blame thrown upon the other party for its past railway maladministration will excuse the error by which the last straw is placed on the camel's back.

> Reasons For Nationalization.
> The only way out which promises complete justice to the people, which insures a more patient resignation under the load of taxation which they will have to bear, and the method which will tend to the purification of public life by removing the greatest source of our political corruption, is by the immediate nationalization of the steam railway systems.
> The following are some of the reasons.
> The trend of modern opinion the world over has been steadily in the direction of the State ownership of and operation of railways, until out of the sixty-five countries in the world that have railways, no less than fifty-one have already adopted state ownership.
> The character of this movement is remarkable in three respects:
>
> First, the rapidity of the change—up to 1880 the world's mileage showed 10,000 miles under Government ownership, whereas now there are 230,000 miles, not counting military lines built since the war began.
> The second feature of the movement is that during all this progress there has been no backwash towards private ownership. There are only three cases in the world of even partial abandonment of State ownership, and these are Peru, Cuba and Newfoundland. In the case of Peru, however, the Government takes the option of resuming possession at the end of a stated period.
>
> The third feature of the drift towards State ownership is that it has been brought about in countries with the most diverse forms of government and types of people—from the absolutism of Turkey and the autocracy of Russia to the republics of South America, the referendum-governed country of Switzerland and the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire. Of the seventeen British Crown colonies and protectorates, no less than twelve operate their railways under direct Government ownership, while of the self-governing dominions, all outside of Canada have state ownership of all but a fraction of the total mileage.
> A War Example.
> A study of railway history will show an unprejudiced investigator that England, as the pioneer in both railway building and locomotive engineering, gave the world a false start in the direction of private ownership only because the men who composed the British Parliament in 1830 were, with few exceptions, obstinately blind to the possibilities of steam transport and, more pitiful to state, were careless of the needs of the common people. This defect of legislative insight is full of solemn warning to our own legislators in the present crisis of Canadian railway history. However, Great Britain has at last accomplished complete state control, as by a miracle, and it is a certain deduction from the marvelous accomplishments of this State control, not yet revealed to the British public, that private ownership there has ended now and forever.

What happens when a people really wake up to perceive the true purpose of a railway in the national life is well described by A. G. Gardiner in "The War Lords": "We have talked for generations about the nationalization of railways and have found the scheme too vast to tackle. We woke up one morning to find that the companies had been dispossessed of their control, and that the twelve hundred directors had been sent out to play, and that the whole railway system of the country was subject to the Government. And the transition seemed so natural and proper that no one even 'wrote to the papers about it.' At the impact of a great occasion the whole theory of railway ownership and control collapses without a murmur. It is seen that the sole ultimate function of the railway is to serve the State, and that anything that interferes with that function in a time of emergency is brushed aside as lightly as a feather. The lesson will serve for future use. By a flash of lightning, as it were, it has revealed the true relation of the railway to the community, and that relation is as applicable to conditions of peace as to conditions of war."

The Private Stronghold.

With this transformation in mind, it may now be said that among civilized nations of any importance they are but two remaining strongholds of private railway ownership in the world —the United States and Canada. In the case of the United States, it does not require any profound study of railway literature or the drift of economic and political thought to convince an inquirer that the ever-tightening control of railways exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various State Commerce Commissions must find its logical conclusion in Government ownership; and the change is likely to come sooner than most people expect. This observation about the United States is, of course, only a forecast, but the statements regarding the other countries of the world are not speculations but accomplished facts, and if the forecast of the United States proves to be an accomplished fact, where will Canada stand? At the very tail of the procession struggling through a financial cataclysm due to the exploitations of its public resources by private corporations or struggling upwards to complete representative government and the unfettered exercise of its own sovereign functions?

Is it necessary to remind ourselves that the operation of a railway is a function of sovereignity? The public roads in times past were dedicated to the State, and hence the expressions King's Highway and Queen's Highway.

Those observations were made in the year 1916 on the railway situation, and the figures given there, which I presume are correct, show that the nationalization of public utilities is not a feature peculiar to the province of Ontario, but is spreading throughout the world. I do not want to say to my hon. friend from Quebec, when he speaks of our experience in the province of Ontario, that we have no regrets for having adopted the principle of public ownership of public utilities. I have no knowledge of any instance where it has not been an undoubted success; and there is no reason why under capable management it should not be a success. This management must be entrusted to the Government, and is fairly well provided for in the Bill. My hon. friend stated all the dire consequences that may follow on public management. The Government must manage our national system side by side with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the closest competition, and they have got to manage it efficiently or they cannot succeed. If they do not manage it efficiently we must appeal to the country, and the country will return those who will make Government ownership a success. I admit that it is a most difficult problem, but it is not the only difficult problem we have before us. Let me repeat a definition given by Murray Butler of the word "difficulty":

> Difficulty is a mere word indicating the measure of effort necessary to attain certain objects —a bugbear to children and fools, but to men an incentive to greater exertion.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—power to acquire securities of other companies:

Mr. CRONYN: I would suggest that the words which were struck out "and disposed of" at the end of the second line be restored, so that the clause will read:

> The Company may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, acquire, hold, guarantee, pledge and dispose of shares—

It is quite possible that this company will acquire, or has already acquired, certain undertakings which later on it may desire to sell, and it would very much limit its efforts in that respect if these words were not contained in the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am disposed to think that the hon. member is right. He has drawn this to my attention, as has also the hon. member for Three Rivers. The latter gentleman, however, felt that the words "and dispose of" if introduced should be made applicable only to bonds, notes, securities and stocks. What the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) has in mind is the desirability of providing that this company, should it find itself in possession of certain undertakings, such for example as hotels, might very conveniently dispose of them, with of course, the consent of the Governor in Council, by selling the shares. Certainly the words "and dispose of" should be restored. and therefore I readily withdraw my amendment, which will leave the clause as it was originally.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Government can revive forty-four charters, can undertake the construction of an endless number of railway lines all over Canada, and we are told that our security against extravagance or reckless undertakings will be the fact that they will have to come to Parliament for the money. But this company is vested with the power to issue stocks, bonds, debentures and every form of security known to the devices of an organization of this character; with these they can get all the money they want, and, upon the advice of the Governor in Council, invest it where they please without coming to Parliament at all. What assurance, then, have the people of Canada that these amounts will be put in the Estimates and voted by Parliament, and that the information for which we have been battling for the last four or five days will be given? We shall know nothing about these expenditures until, perhaps, years after the money has been spent and misspent, as much of the money of the people has been misspent in the past.

We on this side have been severely taken to task because we say it is unnecessary to revive these charters. I say now that it is unnecessary to revive them, and that there is no need for them, unless it be the promises that have been made by the Government to members all over the country that roads are to be built. The cat came out of the bag to-night when the member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell) told us that 350 miles were to be constructed this year. How does he know that, if the matter has not been discussed? This thing has been understood; the places where politics are to be played by the Government have been laid out, and members know it. The good, honest member for Nelson gave it out. The Minister of Interior (Mr. Meighen) tells us in one breath that the revival of these charters is a mere harmless thing, and in the next breath that work is to be done on every one of them this year. In Manitoba, to which, of course, the member for Nelson naturally gives most of his attention, there is evidently the promise that at least 350 miles will be built. If as many miles will be built in the larger provinces, there will be at least 500 miles in Saskatchewan and as many more in Alberta. If the promises are distributed anything like fairly, the Government will undertake to build this year about 1,300 miles of railway. I suppose they intend to sell these stocks and build the roads with the money they get from them, while Parliament will whistle and have nothing to do with it.
