GONE BEFORE.

Where the gentle winds sigh softly Through the long, bright summer days, Where the tiny, feather songsters Warble forth their sweetest lavs ;-

Where the nodding, fresh grass listens To the tale the tall pines tell, Mid the silence of the dell :-

Where the brightest, sweetest flowers Which, o'er all the quiet valley, Evening zephyrs softly bear.

Dances onward to the sea; And at morni at noon, at even, Ever tells its tale of glee :-

Where the mellow boughs wave softly, And at night the pale stars keep. Vigils in their solemn stillness,

Brush the golden ringlets softly From her pale and peaceful brow; Fold her hands across her boson She is with the angels now.

Close the eyelids while she slumbers,-Slumbers ne'er again to wake; 'Till that last, that glorious dawning In the eastern sky shall break.

Turn awdy and sally leave her To her deep and dream'ers rest; Turn with slow and weary footstep To the home her presence blest.

Well, 'tis better so-though sorrow Evermore with us will dwell; Though with her our hopes lie buried In the silence of the dell.

For we know that sister angels Took her to that peaceful shore; And that sale from earthly trouble She's not lost, - but gone before .

For the Standard.

ETYMOLOGY OF MAY .- No month in this May, it is in the strict sense of the word our first spring month; the woods put forth their gorgeons manufer of green, the meadows are a boquet of loveliness, and all nature awakes as if by magic flow long inertia, no wonder the Hebrews named it styan from a universal word-signifying to rejeive. The Anglo Saxons knew it as Tri-mideli because their cattle stimulated by the fresh and boundant herbage were advantageously milked municated with, and all the arrangements abundant herbage were advantageously milked municated with, and all the arrangements tives were acquainted with what had happen.
