Harvest Song.

When roses were budding, and clo green, was laughter and song with the haymaker's feet, And labor went merrily on between;

Till the hay was gathered from every lea,
And the babbling brooks ran to tell the sea,

When the wheat was yellow in all the land.

Then glad was the earth with the harvest

And the heart kept tune with the binding

hand—
Kept tune with the sheaves piled up so high;
With the losded wains, and the full barn's gice,
While the babbling brooks ran to tell the sea,
"The wheat is home." in the cool sweet shades where the apples grow, Under the sun where the canes turn sweet,

Par in the cotton fields white as snow,

Down in the swamps where the rice is beat—There's never a land in the wide world free Where the babbling brooks have not told the

A Strange Adventure.

"Good morning, sir-a lovely day !" I started rather guiltily from the stooping position in which the voice of my unknown colloquist had accosted me. In truth and in fact, I was engaged in examining the padlocked moorings of a graceful little boat whoseskeel lay on the shore, and meditating to myself how very agreeable a row across the crystal lake would be through the silence of the purple August daybreak.

"Good morning," I responded, turning to meet the inquiring gaze of a tall, ing to meet the inquiring gaze of a tall, gentlemanly-looking personage, apparently about thirty-five years of age, who stood leaning against a little gate. He was dark and handsome, with piercing eyes, a forehead slightly bald, and a jet-black mustiche, twisted jauntily away from a small, nervous month; and his last degree. He had taken off his light straw hat to greet me, and now stood apparently awaiting some more definite nation on my part.

"I beg your pardon, sir," I stam-mered, rather confused; "I—I hope I am not trespassing on private grounds? "Why, sir, you are undeniably on private grounds," returned the stranger, smiling; "but I think we won't call it by any such barsh name as trespassing. You are staying in the neighbor-

I stared at him, aghast. Was the man mad, or dreaming?

"To your knees, sir!" he said, with a sharp, sudden imperiousness. "Have you no reverence for royalty?"

I obeyed his quick sign, almost before I knew what I was doing. He smiled complacently, at the same time drawing a gaudy tinsel star from his pocket, and gravely affixing it to the left breast of his coat.

"Yes, my friend," he went on im-

"Yes, my friend," he went on, impressively, "you are now in the presence of the prince consort of Great Britain!

Men have amused themselves by disseminating the idle tale that I was dead; that's all they know about it; I am not dead; and, what is more, I shall never die. I am privileged with the gift of everlasting existence. As long as I wear this jeweled star, death can never come near me!" near me !"

Nothing has given the writings of Charles Dickens so strong a hold upon the hearts of parents as the well-known excellence of his portrayal of children and their interests. These delineations having received the approval of readers of mature age, the different child characters have been detached from the large mass of matter with which they were originally connected, and presented in the author's own language, to a new class of readers, to whom the little volumes will be as attractive as the larger originals have proven to the general public. A series of twelve volumes has been prepared, presenting, among others, the following characters: "Smike," from Nicholas Nickleby; "The Child Wife," from David Copperfield; "The Boy Joe," from Pickwick Papers, etc., etc. A new edition of the first volume of the scries, "Little Paul," from Dombay & Son, has just been issued, illustrated by Darley, and attractively bound.
