At a meeting held in London on the 10th to further the cause of protection in Great Britain...

THE fondest methods are being pursued by agitators to procure affidavits against government officials...

THE public has been deceived by the lengths to which the office-seekers are forced to go to make charges against officials.

At a public meeting held in Montreal a few evenings ago, the following resolutions were passed:

Whereas, the rights of the Catholic minority of Manitoba to have separate schools is guaranteed...

WHEN the Morning Organ first raised its hue and cry against the proposal to bring St. Joseph's Convent School under the jurisdiction of the City school board...

In the name of "intelligence" and "enlightenment" this "Catholic" avails himself of the opportunity thus afforded him...

DURING the past week, the Morning Organ devoted a considerable amount of its space to a consideration of the habits of the lobster.

be married for "hope springs eternal in the human breast." Now, we are informed, that the negotiations preceding marriage, not unfrequently, continue for a considerable length of time...

The Morning Organ, in its issue of Friday last, contains a short article regarding "nuns as teachers," that manifests about as much animosity as could well be compressed into the same amount of space.

3rd. First-class teachers should be provided for that school. Mr. Handman pointed out that Mr. McLeod and the other members of the board need have no uneasiness regarding the small number of nuns from which they would be asked to select the required number of teachers.

Mr. Archbishop Kennedy was the chief speaker. The very thought of employing nuns as teachers seems to have somewhat the same effect upon him as the proverbial red cloth has on a bull.

regulation of the school board and every provision of the school act would be strictly complied with.

Hon. Mr. Farquharson treated the question in a very diplomatic manner. The proposal of His Lordship had been before the board some years ago and been rejected.

So far as the Protestant members of the school board, who voted solidly against the Bishop's proposal, are concerned, it is quite evident that not one of them ever intended to do anything else.

conditions

In some conditions the gain from the use of Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil is rapid.

In other conditions gain must be slow, sometimes almost imperceptible, health can be built up in a day.

For this Scott's Emulsion must be taken as nourishment, food rather than medicine, food prepared for tired and weak digestions.

imperative; it is absolute separation from her father. Let Philomena choose for herself. But it is only fair to warn her that he will drag her down to a level to which he has himself fallen.

When Mlle. de Joncourt awoke from a long sleep she found Philomena beside her. "You have not slept, my darling!" cried.

Philomena settled her gently on the pillows, and whispered, tenderly: "You are only to think of getting well now, for my sake. I am all your own again. Papa was obliged to start for Vienna this morning."

Mademoiselle moaned and would have arisen, for this news alarmed her. But Philomena laid her gently back on the pillows once more, saying:

"You are not to be agitated or anxious about anything. I shall not leave you until you are quite well. Then you will perhaps take me yourself to St. Petersburg, or anywhere you like," she added, trying to smile.

"And Madame de Kovski?" "She will come for me to-day, but with your permission I will tell her that I am to go with you."

Mademoiselle smiled a smile of great content, and moved her feeble hands about under the pillow, as if seeking for something. "Have you missed anything?" "I thought there is a letter."

"Yes, there is; it is under your pillow. Shall I give it to you?" "Please."

Mademoiselle took the letter to assure herself that it contained a slip of paper. She carefully put the letter under her pillow, the slip of paper she handed to Philomena, saying: "It is yours, dear."

"Thank you," said Philomena. "I will eat your bread and share your purse till I have one of my own. Sleep now, maminka; sleep, little mother."

The tender name of "maminka" sounded sweet on those fair young lips, but the words of the gentle voice were sweeter still. The sick lady drew down the young head to her breast, and with a murmured blessing, oft invoked upon the child who had been "the light and the love of her life," she resigned herself to slumber.

But the shock had not left Philomena unscathed. Alas, it had struck to the root of her life, and never more could she be the same as before. The first intimation of the truth came to Mlle. de Joncourt as she lay one day, listening to Philomena reading aloud, and during the weary hours of her convalescence. She had been listening with closed eyes, but something in the tones of the voice, an occasional hesitation as of difficulty of utterance, made her look up. Philomena was absorbed in the book for its own sake, and Mademoiselle had time to study her face. Alas and alas! What a change she had found there. Pale, drawn, dark circles under the eyes; and as Mademoiselle watched, she saw from time to time, a nervous trembling of the fair young head, which would suddenly bend, as if in submission to some invisible force, a more marked trembling of the slender, beautiful hands, which tried to steady the volume, and a twitching of the sweet young lips. What could it mean? The sight of these startling symptoms so overcame the poor invalid that a cry escaped her, and looking up, suddenly, she beheld her mother, wondering, started gazed upon her.

No more need of secrecy; Philomena arose, and put her arms around Mademoiselle, and whispered softly: "I can bear it very well, maminka, if you will help me to be good to him. Will you?"

Answer there needed none. The tears shed by both in that hour were carried off by their guardian angels to the throne of the All-merciful.

It was easier to both after that. No more words were necessary. A hand clasp, a loving glance, a sigh, expressed the mutual sympathy of those tender hearts.

St. Petersburg with its domes and spires, its palaces and its granite quays, its bright bay and blue Neva; its incomparable panorama of busy life in winter, when the superb city lies under the spell of King Frost, the Enchanter. He has touched with silver every tree, and roof, and railing; every wall and bridge, every animated creature, and every inanimate object, till they glisten and sparkle with radiant light. The bed of the beautiful river is solid silver, thick enough and strong enough to bear the multitude that traverse its shining paths. The men and women, the horses and the equipages that traverse it are one and all touched by the same magic wand, and move beneath a covering of dainty lake-like frost. The "ivostchick" and his horse, his sledge and paulus, or covering, he is harkin or sheepskin, are enclosed in the same white armor. The splendid horses flying down the Nevsky Prospect or along the quays, under their blue or green settings, the gleaming sparkling silver snow and with their proud feet send it flying in dazzling white clouds before them. The life, the animation of it; the glory and the brilliance of it is something to be described. We hail them, King Frost! Russia's best friend; without thee, what were this much admired city, but a pestilential swamp, the favorite home, the cradle of influenza, rheumatism, typhus, madness, suicide, persecution, luxury, and folly in a thousand forms. The three first are kept down by the strong hand of ice, but what king shall conquer the others?

Mlle. de Joncourt and Philomena are in a tiny room, in the heart of the front-bay, they are happy to have had a shelter there in the history of a home called "Maison de L'Eglise Catholique," and really part of the church property. There is a lodging owned by two sisters, retired teachers, they have found a home. From their low windows they see quite near the cupola and cross of the Cathedral church of the Dominicans, which once belonged to the Jesuit Fathers. They see also the best door, the people thronging in and out, without any respect for the priests, who must robe and disrobe there as best they can; often elbowed by the laymen; they see the street, the wide, low funeral car, with its four plumed-surmounted posts. This is the vehicle of the poor, without balding or crown-surmounted tent, or dazzling bordered plumes, or brocade covering bordered with silver or gold. Philomena watches these poor creatures with curious interest, as they file out through the court-yard gate, and turn to the right to receive their burden at the church door. She sees them again, through the open portal, as preceded by torch-bearers in black cloaks and tall black hats (very shabby indeed), they pass slowly across the open place in front of the church, which stands well back from the street, out into the great Nevsy, on their way to Viborski, Smolenski, or Yelkovo, as the case may be. The poorer is the Catholic; the sacred burial ground, while the other two are peopled promiscuously.

The poor funerals have a strange fascination for Philomena, and a strange charm. Unlike the funerals of the Russian poor, they are not lonely. The poorest beggar's corpse is respectfully followed by a pious throng, who recite prayers by the way. It was the funeral of a young girl, she thought, to see the old women, so poorly and thinly clad, their knobby fingers blue with cold, clasped around their rosary beads, as hugging their ragged cloaks around them, they stumbled over the slippery or slushy road, with such recollected and reverent mien.

It was a deep joy to her to see the intimacy of the poor with heaven, in this great bustling city; and she mentally resolved to have her prayers for her father.

In the days when Mlle. de Joncourt had been convalescing, little or nothing had been said in reference to the fatal letter. For Philomena there could be no question as to choice, and there had been none raised. Her father first and always; beggary with him in preference to the gilded saloons of Madame la Marquise de V. she said to herself; and by force of mutual love and tenderest sympathy, each had divined the other's thought.

Mlle. de Joncourt could not but reverence in her devoted pupil the strength of character, the powers of self-control, and the purity of heart, which she had seen so suddenly called forth by almost unparalleled misfortune. It came upon her like a revelation; she could never have believed that one so delicately reared, so exclusively brought up from the slightest contact with the world, so petted and caressed by the few who had access to her society, so loved and admired by the teachers and pupils of her Parisian school, all of them high-born and rich, as she was herself supposed to be, could have made such a choice; and she could not but feel that her own child was the object of special protection. "Her mother's spirit is watching over her," she said to herself.

When Mademoiselle had installed Philomena in that safe home, she began to seek a situation for herself, hoping by her own efforts to realize sufficient for them. But Philomena would not consent. "The child, she said, as was but natural, from meeting strangers, she was determined to make an effort to support herself, and more than that, to help her poor father; every wall and plainy foreseeing that he would not stop in his wretched career till every available means failed him; and that would find him, she feared, homeless and friendless, save for herself."

It was not easy at this time for a Pole to find occupation in St. Petersburg, or, indeed, anywhere in the Czar's dominions, unless such as openly disavowed their country. There was much bitter feeling on both sides, much suspicion; the oppressed and the oppressor could not fraternize, and when they did, it was with the consciousness of impincerity or hypocrisy on one side or on both.

But Philomena had the powerful protection of the family under whose patronage her father had placed her. She had been urged to take up her abode with them, but neither she herself nor her faithful "maminka" thought it prudent to accept of the offer. Though she did not know it, thousands of rubles had been lost at the gaming table by her father to this same General, and yet the unhappy man had not hesitated to place his only child under such protection. Perhaps he had no other resource at that hour.
